1. — OPENING OF THE ASSEMBLY.

M. Lerroux, delegate of Spain, President in Office of the Council, took the chair.

The Chairman :

Translation : Ladies and gentlemen — In my capacity as President in Office of the Council of the League of Nations, I have the honour to declare open the twelfth ordinary session of the Assembly of the League of Nations.

2. — ELECTION OF THE COMMITTEE TO REPORT ON THE CREDENTIALS OF THE DELEGATES.

The Chairman :

Translation : The first item on the agenda is the election of the Committee to report on the credentials of the delegates.

According to the Rules of Procedure of the Assembly, this Committee should be elected by secret ballot. Since the Rules of Procedure were adopted, there have been frequent exceptions to this rule. In view of the precedents and the practice established by my predecessors, the Assembly will not, I think, object to my attempting to help it to reach a decision on this matter, without in any way presuming to influence its choice.

I feel that I shall only be forestalling the Assembly's wishes in submitting a list consisting of eight names, as follows :

Mr. de Villiers (Union of South Africa),
M. Molloff (Bulgaria),
Dr. Woo Kaiseng (China),
M. de Agüero y Bethancourt (Cuba),
Baron Szterényi (Hungary),
M. Raestad (Norway),
M. Gonzalez-Prada (Peru),
Khan Sépahbody (Persia).

Members of the Assembly who may desire to put forward other proposals are invited to do so.

As no objection to my proposal has been raised, I think I may conclude that the Assembly has decided that the Committee on Credentials shall consist of the delegates whose names I have just read.

The list proposed by the Chairman was adopted.

The Chairman:

Translation: My intention in proposing that the Assembly should proceed immediately to constitute the Committee on Credentials was to expedite the proceedings and to allow this Committee to perform its work under the best possible conditions.

The members of the Committee on Credentials will therefore be good enough to meet immediately in a room which has been placed at their disposal, in order that they may submit their report at the earliest possible moment.

3. — SPEECH BY M. LERROUX, PRESIDENT IN OFFICE OF THE COUNCIL.

The Chairman:

Translation: It is a great honour for me, taking part as I am for the first time in your work, to welcome, as President in Office of the Council of the League of Nations, the delegates who have come from every part of the world to take part in the deliberations of the Assembly. I shall not attempt to particularise all the work that has been done by the League during the year in the various fields in which it has been active. This year, as always, you will find very full and detailed information in the report of the Council and the Secretary-General. I should like, however, to make a few general remarks on the work that has been done.

Let me first of all congratulate the League on the completion of the Preparatory Commission's work, which has enabled the Disarmament Conference to be convened. It has taken no less than ten years of investigation and study, of tentative efforts in various directions, of innumerable meetings and of vehement discussions, to bring us to this result, which, after all, is no more than a starting-point. The League has collected the material. We are ready to begin, and we must do constructive work if we are to satisfy the ardent desire of public opinion. Let us all, therefore, wish success to this first Disarmament Conference, which should lead to results that will form a valuable contribution to the maintenance of peace in the world.

The Assembly has always attached great importance to the development of arbitration and the strengthening of security. Since your last session, the number of States recognising the compulsory jurisdiction of the Permanent Court of International Justice has risen to thirty-seven, including almost all the countries of Europe, my own among them. During this past year, the number of States acceding to the General Act for the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes drawn up and adopted by the Assembly of 1929 has increased to sixteen. In this steady stream of accessions to the institutions and the engagements of the League we cannot but see a mark of the intention of Governments to bring their difficulties before the League and submit them to its methods of settlement. It was during the past year that the Convention for the Development of the Means of preventing War, which you will be called upon to examine, was drawn up; it is designed to assist the Council in applying one of the most important articles of the Covenant — Article 11 — that article which has several times enabled the League to ward off threatened conflicts and to settle the matters out of which they might have arisen.

I do not hesitate to give credit to the League as a whole for the activities — indeed, the very existence — of the Commission of Enquiry for European Union, the creation of which was authorised last year by a unanimous vote of the Assembly. I regard this as an important contribution to the maintenance of world peace. During the coming weeks, you will have to decide upon the constitution of this Commission, its organisation, its field of activity and its methods of work. At the same time I should like to emphasise the beneficent influence exerted upon international relations by these periodical meetings of some thirty States, most of them represented by their Foreign Ministers, including those of two countries which are not Members of the League — Turkey and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. Having myself been present last May at the proceedings of the European Commission and the Council of the League, I was able to observe how direct contact between responsible statesmen, and discussions conducted in a frank and liberal spirit at meetings of these two bodies, could influence both Governments and public opinion itself in delicate and difficult circumstances.

During the first year of its existence, the European Commission has concerned itself chiefly with one of the partial and regional aspects of the general economic crisis — the special crisis through which agriculture is passing in the countries of Central and Eastern Europe. It has endeavoured to improve the situation by finding means of encouraging the sale of grain and by organising credit so as to reduce the burdens upon agricultural production in those countries. In a few months, with the assistance of the technical organisations of the League, it has succeeded in establishing a Convention for the creation of an international agricultural mortgage credit company, which will probably begin operations early next year.

The Commission has sought to do more than this. Being called upon to face the problem of the general direction of tariff policy in Europe, it has adopted in outline a wide programme which has been worked out by committees of experts. Their conclusions will be laid before you, together with those of the Conference with a View to Concerted Economic Action.

As you see, a large part of the League's work in the economic and financial sphere since your last session has been devoted to Europe. But it would be a mistake to suppose that the League has failed in its duty of universality. First of all, we may do justice to the various League bodies by pointing out that, in their endeavours to improve the organisation and economic relations of the European countries — a desirable achievement in itself, and profitable, moreover, to the whole world if carried through on the right lines — those bodies have never lost sight of the possible effects of their decisions or recommendations on the other States Members of the League.

Furthermore, there have been numerous demonstrations of the League's activity outside Europe. To mention only the most important of these, we have, in Central and South America, the enquiry into infant mortality in the Argentine, Brazil, Chile and Uruguay; the participation in the Serological Congress at Montevideo; the assistance given to Bolivia in reorganising her health services; the establishment, in response to an offer from the Brazilian Government, of an international leprosy research centre in Brazil.

In the course of the tour which he made this year in various Latin-American countries at the invitation of their Governments, our Secretary-General saw convincing evidence of the devotion of those countries to the League, the importance they attach to its work and their anxiety to co-operate in it more closely, while the Secretary-General's presence enabled the countries he visited to gain a closer view and a clearer realisation of the institution to which they belong. That is the value of these journeys and meetings, which the Assembly has always advocated; they serve to draw closer the ties that unite all the Members of the League to its centre. Let us hope that in the near future the co-operation of Central and South America will extend to those other countries whose delegates we should like to see among us.

Turning to the Far East, I might mention the Leprosy Commission which met at Bangkok; the malaria research in Melanesia; the work on the subject of opium-smoking; the Indian tour of the Director of the Economic and Financial Section, who was invited by the Government of India to give his opinion on the creation of an organisation for the study of economic questions; and the establishment, at the Chinese Government's request, of co-operation over a wide field between China and our various technical organisations — the Health Organisation, the Communications and Transit Organisation, the Economic and Financial Organisation and the Committee on Intellectual Co-operation. I am sure that the Assembly will unanimously wish to offer its heartiest congratulations to the Chinese Government on its efforts to reorganise China, and will express the hope that this co-operation may lead to good results both for China and for the League.

The agreements relating to maritime signals and the lighting of coasts adopted by a Maritime Conference — the first of its kind to be summoned by the League — in which the United States of America, Brazil and Mexico took part, are of a universal nature. The same is true of the Convention for the Unification of Laws on Bills of Exchange and Cheques; the work on economic statistics and veterinary questions; the proceedings of the International Committee on Intellectual Co-operation; the enquiries into the economic depression, the agricultural crisis and the gold problem; and the Convention for limiting the Manufacture and regulating the Distribution of Narcotic Drugs.

I should like to say a few words about this last Convention. It originated with the Assembly, which in 1929 laid down the principle of the limitation of manufacture. The task entrusted to the Conference which met on May 27th last was an enormous one. The Conference had been convened to limit manufacture; it was called upon to frame a system whereby no more drugs should be produced than are required for legitimate world consumption. It is no exaggeration to say that the Conference, at which upwards of fifty countries were represented — including the United States of America, Brazil, the Hejaz, Mexico, Turkey and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics — successfully overcame practically all the difficulties with which it was faced. It established a definite rule for determining world requirements of drugs; it established a system of supervision covering all drugs; it made the Convention applicable to a far larger number of drugs than the 1925 Convention; it even extended the system to all derivatives of opium and of the coca leaf that might be discovered at any future time, deciding that such derivatives should be deemed harmful failing proof to the contrary. That Conference, presided over in so masterly a fashion by M. Louis de Brouckère, whom I would take this opportunity of thanking formally, enabled the League of Nations to achieve one of the most successful results it has ever obtained in the humanitarian and moral sphere.

There has thus been no falling off in the League's work, as regards either quantity or quality. All the various League bodies have been working at full capacity, and although the individual results, considered separately, may sometimes appear rather slight in comparison with the comprehensive mission of the League, all those results, taken together and considered dispassionately, undoubtedly constitute a considerable advance towards the final goal of international co-ordination, that goal being the co-ordination of effort and the simplification of current rules and practices in the general interests of all the nations. The League, as I just now endeavoured to show, has consistently extended its activities and made known its methods in the different continents.

How, indeed, could it be otherwise, when there exists a worldwide depression surely unparalleled in world history in its extent and intensity, weighing down the economic life of every country, of powerful countries and of weak alike, sparing none and threatening all with grave political and social disorders? Anxiety is all-pervading, and the uncertainty of what the morrow may bring forth makes itself poignantly felt in many countries of Europe, Asia and America.

The adjournment of reparations payments and war debts on the proposal of President Hoover, the London Conferences, the conversations held in Paris, Berlin and Rome between German, American, British, French and Italian statesman, the action of the Bank for International Settlements, the work of the Basle Committee of Experts, are all so many tokens of a desire for recovery, of a readiness to co-operate. That desire, that determination, must become even more pronounced and all-embracing, for the decisions taken hitherto seem calculated to result in purely temporary assistance confined to certain countries. No occasion could be more propitious for this purpose than the meeting of this Assembly. There will be exchanges of views and discussions at the present session which will pave the way for conversations and future decisions.

Let the Governments represented here make it plain to the world that they understand their duties in the matter of mutual support and co-operation and that they are prepared to assume the necessary responsibilities. It rests with them, acting in the spirit of the Covenant, to arrest the wave of pessimism, to ensure co-ordination of efforts in the financial, economic and political domain; to restore tranquillity and bring about a revival of confidence. I call upon you, gentlemen, to co-operate in that task.

(The Assembly adjourned at 11 a.m. and resumed at 11.25 a.m.)

4. — CREDENTIALS OF DELEGATES: REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON CREDENTIALS.

The Chairman:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the report of the Committee on Credentials.

I call upon the Chairman of the Committee on Credentials, M. de Agüero y Bethancourt, delegate of Cuba, to read his report.

M. de Agüero y Bethancourt (Cuba), Chairman and Rapporteur of the Committee on Credentials:

Translation: Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen — The Committee appointed by the Assembly to report on the credentials of delegates met to-day at 10.45 a.m. in the President's office. I was elected Chairman, and was entrusted with the duty of drawing up the report.

The Committee examined the documents transmitted to it by the Secretary-General and found that the following States are represented by delegates who are in possession either of letters of credentials from heads of States, letters from Ministers for Foreign Affairs, or telegrams from the same sources, or letters from permanent representatives accredited to the League of Nations:

Abyssinia, Albania, Australia, Austria, Belgium, Bolivia, British Empire, Bulgaria, Canada, Chile, China, Colombia, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Estonia, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Hungary, India, Irish Free State, Italy, Japan, Latvia, Liberia, Lithuania, Luxemburg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Persia, Peru, Poland, Portugal, Roumania, Siam, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Union of South Africa, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

The Committee considers that the representatives of these States Members are duly accredited.

The following States Members have not as yet accredited delegates to the Assembly:

The Argentine Republic, Honduras, Nicaragua, Salvador.

The Committee is glad to note that the majority of delegations are accredited by full powers granted by the heads of States.

The Chairman:

Translation: I beg to thank the Chairman of the Committee on Credentials for his report.

Has anyone any observations to make on the conclusions of the report?

The conclusions of the report were adopted.

5. — ELECTION OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE TWELFTH ORDINARY SESSION OF THE ASSEMBLY.

The Chairman:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the election of the President of the twelfth ordinary session of the Assembly.

In conformity with the Rules of Procedure, voting will be by secret ballot.

May I call upon M. Motta, first delegate of Switzerland, and M. Hymans, first delegate of Belgium, as former Presidents of the Assembly, to be good enough to act as tellers?

(The votes of the delegations were taken in turn by secret ballot.)

The Chairman:

Translation: In the first place, I wish to thank the tellers for their kind assistance.

The result of the voting is as follows:

Number of States voting	50
Blank voting paper	1
Valid votes	49
Absolute majority	25

The following were the votes obtained:

M. Titulesco (first delegate of Roumania)	25 votes
Count Apponyi (first delegate of Hungary)	21 votes
M. Vennersten (delegate of Sweden)	2 votes
M. Costa du Rels (delegate of Bolivia)	1 vote

I have the honour, therefore, in accordance with the Rules of Procedure, to announce that M. TITULESCO, delegate of Roumania, is elected President of the Assembly.

It is with the deepest satisfaction that I congratulate M. Titulesco on his election. He has already been President of the Assembly and is one of the most faithful and devoted workers for the League of Nations.

I call upon M. Titulesco to take the chair as President of the Assembly.

(M. Titulesco took the Presidential Chair.)

6. — PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS.

The President:

Translation: — I accept with feelings of deep gratitude, which it is beyond my power to express in words, the great honour that you have done my country and myself in calling upon me once again to preside over the work of this eminent Assembly and in breaking for once with the tradition that the President shall not be eligible for re-election. I shall endeavour to give proof of my gratitude by adhering to the methods we employed last year and trying to improve them as far as possible, so that, with your help, our work may attain its true purpose, its real objective — efficacy.

Effective work, to be judged, not by the effort made, but by the results achieved, is more than ever essential for the League.

The world is passing through a terrible crisis — a lack of confidence which began in the sphere of finance and threatens to invade every domain. On all hands we hear that the flame of confidence is burning low, is all but spent; and we, all of us assembled here, should be failing in our duty did we not prove to the nations by rapid, visible and concrete acts that, here in Geneva at all events, the sacred fire is not in danger of extinction; that, though the flames are not yet strong enough to quicken with their warmth, they can at least illuminate the world and guide it.

In very truth, they do illuminate and guide it. It is only at the first glance that the League appears as a body of men who meet and deliberate here at the Assembly or in the Council or in the Committees.

In reality, the League stands for a spirit and a method, a habit of thought and a habit of action, an impulse of the heart making for comprehension, and an intellectual discipline making for closer contact. The League is primarily and essentially an attitude of mind, which we can only acquire by assiduously taking our share in the work here at Geneva; but, having acquired that spirit, we carry with us wherever we go an imprint, we hold a real and potent treasure.

We do not claim at Geneva to have the monopoly of the means for preserving peace and drawing the nations together. To deny, however, that the results obtained in the sphere of international understanding without the direct participation of the League are none the less the fruit of its spirit and the outcome of its methods, would be manifestly unfair; to ignore that self-evident fact would be sheer ingratitude.

Far from considering that the results obtained in the field of international co-operation without the direct participation of the League could detract in any way from its merits, I claim those results as our own, and enter them boldly as profits in the League's moral balance-sheet.

If, then, the League's action is so potent even when invisible, how much more should that be the case when the eyes of the world are focused upon it ? Mankind, I know, has always longed for miracles, and our present hardships have only strengthened that natural tendency. With limited means at our disposal, and such a state of mind to cope with, we are faced with a serious situation, which must be met with courage and a clear view of the issues. Let us admit frankly that Geneva is not the land of miracles, but let us prove by our acts that nowhere can goodwill and a spirit of decision produce better results than here within the framework of the League.

Ours is a hard and thankless task, but a task that we cannot shirk. We are the depositaries of the most precious of treasures. In our hands lies the supreme hope of the world, perhaps its last hope. Who among us, for the mere satisfaction of some private interest, however legitimate, would dare violate the sacred trust confided to him ? Let us never, then, in all our discussions, great or small, forget what hangs upon our disagreement or upon any confession of impotence.

We are passing through a difficult period. This clearly is the transition from one form of collective life to another; many of the old truths have died, and the new truths are not yet sufficiently clear to have emerged as motive forces.

That being so, we cannot cling blindly to obsolete formulas. Nor must we, trusting blindly in the future, plunge headlong into the unknown. As things are, it behoves us to hold fast to what has been tested by experience, and to prepare, carefully and patiently, those future positions which we shall not occupy until the time comes, knowing exactly where we stand.

Confidence, caution, action, sacrifice — those are the watchwords of to-day. Reinforce confidence with action, temper action with prudence, never refrain from acting because action involves sacrifice — only thus can the danger be averted, only thus can we play a conscious part in an evolution of which neither the meaning nor the extent can be determined with any degree of accuracy.

Duty calls. It calls for acts of heroism — a heroism without attraction, which offers no immediate reward, which engenders misunderstanding and hostile criticism, the silent, anonymous heroism of the trenches. On this occasion, however, we are fighting for peace, for the nations no longer face one other in fratricidal strife ; they are fighting, for the first time, side by side against an adverse fate, which only full co-operation can hope to circumvent.

Can we be pessimists in face of such a spectacle? Never more than since the world entered upon this crisis, has solidarity among the nations been more strikingly attested. Enter our material losses on the debit side, but enter on the credit side this comforting assurance — suffering is forging the bonds of true brotherhood between the nations.

This is no shipwreck of the world ! This is the workshop in which a new world is being built. Each man must do his duty, we must all work together. Who then could be doubtful of success?

No matter if we are not here to see the work completed. No matter if the first efforts are forgotten. No matter if we prove to have been the Unknown Soldiers in the victory of peace. We have been believers when we might have lost faith, and that is the only merit that counts for the men of Geneva ; that is their sole claim to glory.

I would thank now our Chairman, who, as President of the Council, welcomed me to the Presidency of the Assembly and, in conclusion, utter the two words which justify my election to that office : " To work ! "

(The Assembly adjourned at 12.10 p.m. and resumed at 12.20 p.m.)

7. — AGENDA : EXAMINATION AND ADOPTION.

The President :

Translation : Acting in accordance with precedent, I have just approved a note circulated to the delegations, which will give them an idea of the proposals I should like to submit in regard to the various items on the agenda of the present session.

As all the Members of the Assembly have the note before them, I shall ask them to vote on the first question on the list — namely, the adoption of the agenda for the present session.

In order to save time — unless any delegation wishes for a vote — I propose that the Assembly adopt en bloc the questions appearing on the agenda — that is, the questions contained in document A.2(1), Items 1 to 22.

To these must be added the supplementary list of questions circulated in accordance with paragraph 3 of Rule 4 of the Rules of Procedure of the Assembly. There is only one question of this kind in document A.2(1) : the Draft Convention for the Regulation of Whale Fishing.

If there is no objection, I shall consider the agenda of the twelfth ordinary session of the Assembly adopted.

The agenda was adopted (Annex 1).

The President :

Translation : The President of the Council has just sent me the following letter, dated September 5th :

" I have the honour to inform you that the Council, at its meeting of Friday, September 4th, requested that the following question should be included in the agenda of the twelfth session of the Assembly :

" The installation of an aerodrome near the seat of the League of Nations.

(Signed) A. LERROUX,
President in Office of the Council. "

I do not think the Assembly will have any objection to including the question in the agenda, this being quite in accordance with the practice followed at previous sessions.

If there is no objection, that course will be adopted.

Adopted.

The President :

Translation : The Chairman of the Commission of Enquiry for European Union has written to me enclosing the report of the Co-ordination Sub-Committee, together with reports framed by the various other Committees entrusted with certain work by the Commission of Enquiry for European Union.

The letter from the Chairman of the Commission of Enquiry, and the accompanying documents will be circulated to the delegations and will supplement the other documents received from the Commission which are already before the Assembly and which come under Item 11 of the agenda. I do not think that members of the Assembly will have any objection to my submitting later proposals as to the action to be taken with regard to this communication from the Chairman of the Commission of Enquiry.

This proposal was adopted.

8. — CONSTITUTION OF THE COMMITTEES.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the Constitution of Committees.

The Assembly will probably wish to follow the procedure adopted at previous sessions, and to set up six Committees — the first to deal with constitutional and legal questions, the second with the work of the technical organisations, the third with the reduction of armaments, the fourth with the organisation of the Secretariat and the League's finances, the fifth with social and humanitarian questions, and the sixth with political questions.

In pursuance of the practice followed at previous sessions, I would suggest that the Assembly should arrange for the meetings of the Committees to alternate as follows: the First, Second and Sixth Committees would meet at the same time, and so would the Third, Fourth and Fifth Committees.

If there is no objection, I shall consider these proposals adopted.

The proposals were adopted.

The delegations will doubtless have been good enough to send to the Secretariat by now the forms on which they have entered the names of their delegates and substitute delegates for each Committee. I would ask delegations which have not yet sent in their lists to do so as soon as possible.

The Committees will meet here, in this hall, this afternoon to elect their Chairmen.

9. — AGENDA COMMITTEE: APPOINTMENT.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the constitution of the Agenda Committee. Following the practice of previous Assemblies, I propose that a small Committee of seven members be set up to examine the procedure to the followed as regards the inclusion in the agenda of any new questions that may arise during the session.

If the Assembly is agreed and no other names are put forward for this Committee, I shall venture, following the example of my predecessors, to propose a list of names as follows:

M. BELLEGARDE (Haiti), Chairman,
Dr. GAUS (Germany),
M. MASSIGLI, (France),
Dr. HYDER (India),
The Honourable C. P. BEAUBIEN (Canada),
M. SATO (Japan),
Baron SZTERÉNYI (Hungary).

If no one has any objection, I shall consider the list adopted.

Adopted.

10. — APPOINTMENT OF THE CHAIRMAN OF THE AGENDA COMMITTEE AS A MEMBER OF THE GENERAL COMMITTEE OF THE ASSEMBLY.

The President:

Translation: At its last five sessions, the Assembly decided that the Chairman of the Agenda Committee should sit as a member of the General Committee of the Assembly, together with the Chairmen of the six Committees.

I would ask the Assembly if it agrees, in accordance with precedent, that the Chairman of the Agenda Committee shall sit as a member of the General Committee of the present Assembly.

The President's proposal was adopted.

The President:

Translation: I request the Agenda Committee immediately to elect its Chairman, so that he may take part in the work of the General Committee of the Assembly.

11. — AGENDA: DISTRIBUTION OF ITEMS AMONG THE COMMITTEES.

The President:

Translation: Following the practice of previous sessions, I venture to submit to the Assembly suggestions for the distribution among the Committees of the various items on the agenda as adopted.

I propose that the items be distributed as follows:

First Committee: Items 4, 5, 6, 7 and 15.

Second Committee: Items 16, 17 and 18, and also the supplementary question: the draft Convention for the Regulation of Whale Fishing.

Third Committee: Item 12.

The parts of the Transit Organisation's report concerning communications affecting the working of the League in times of emergency should also be referred to the Third Committee. Among these questions should be included one I have just mentioned which was referred to the Assembly by the Council — the installation of an aerodrome near the seat of the League of Nations.

Fourth Committee: Items 8, 9 and 22.

Fifth Committee: Items 10, 19 and 20.

Sixth Committee: Items 11, 13, 14 and 21.

As regards item 11, I would point out that the covering letter from the Chairman of the Commission of Enquiry for European Union and the accompanying documents will be referred to the Sixth Committee.

As regards item 13 — the Nansen International Office for Refugees — I should mention that the part of the Supervisory Commission's report (document A.5.1931) which concerns the budget of the Office will also be referred to the Sixth Committee. Financial questions relating to the Nansen International Office for Refugees must, under the terms of Article 16, paragraph 5, and Article 16(c), paragraph 1(a), of the Financial Regulations of the League of Nations, be referred for preliminary examination to the Committee appointed to deal with the question as a whole.

The above proposals were adopted.

12. — ORGANISATION OF THE SESSIONS OF THE ASSEMBLY. REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF FIVE.

The President:

Translation: The Committee of Five which deals with arrangements for the organisation of the Assembly has sent me a report in the form of a letter, which will be printed in the Assembly Journal and circulated to the delegations in that way. The report contains certain suggestions for the organisation of the present session. In accordance with precedent, I propose that the Assembly decide to refer it for examination to the General Committee of the Assembly, which will, when constituted, receive the proposals of the Committee of Five and subsequently inform the Assembly of the action which it thought might be taken on these suggestions.

If no one has any observation to make, I shall regard this proposal as adopted.

The proposal was adopted.

13. — ELECTION OF THE NON-PERMANENT MEMBERS OF THE COUNCIL.

The President:

Translation: One of the items on the agenda of the present session is the election of three non-permanent Members of the Council. I thought the delegations might like to know at once the date on which that election will be held.

After consulting the rules and precedents governing the matter, I would suggest that the Assembly should hold the election on the afternoon of Monday, September 14th.

The President's proposal was adopted.

14. — PROCEDURE FOR THE ELECTION OF THE CHAIRMEN OF COMMITTEES: COMMUNICATION BY THE PRESIDENT.

The President:

Translation: I wish to remind the delegations of the programme of work for this afternoon. Beginning at 3.30 p.m. the Committees will meet one after another, at intervals of twenty minutes, in this hall, in order to elect their Chairmen as follows:

First Committee at 3.30 p.m.
Second Committee at 3.50 p.m.
Third Committee at 4.10 p.m.
Fourth Committee at 4.30 p.m.
Fifth Committee at 4.50 p.m.
Sixth Committee at 5.10 p.m.
Agenda Committee at 5.30 p.m.

15. — ENTRY OF MEXICO INTO THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS: DRAFT RESOLUTION PROPOSED BY THE DELEGATIONS OF GERMANY, THE BRITISH EMPIRE, SPAIN, FRANCE, ITALY AND JAPAN.

The President:

Translation: The delegations of Germany, the British Empire, Spain, France, Italy and Japan have just handed to me a draft resolution which reads as follows:

"The German, British, Spanish, French, Italian and Japanese delegations,

"Considering that Mexico is not mentioned in the Annex to the Covenant enumerating the countries invited to accede thereto;

"Considering that the League should now in all justice repair this omission which is wholly contrary to its true spirit:

"Propose to the Assembly that Mexico be invited to accede to the Covenant and to lend its valuable support to the League as though it had been invited from the outset."

The Assembly thus has before it a proposal on which it will be asked to a decision, in the form of a resolution or a recommendation.

In conformity with the usual custom and with the Rules of Procedure, this proposal will be distributed to the delegations, and I shall ask the Assembly, at to-morrow morning's meeting, to decide what action is to be taken on the proposal.

16. — EXPRESSION OF SYMPATHY WITH REFERENCE TO THE CATASTROPHE IN CHINA: DRAFT RESOLUTION PROPOSED BY THE BRITISH DELEGATION.

The President:

Translation: I have before me a proposal submitted by the British delegation which reads as follows:

"The Assembly,

"Having heard with the deepest sorrow the account of the terrible disasters that have overtaken certain provinces of China:

"Appeals to all men and women of goodwill throughout the world to show by action their sympathy for those who are the victims of this appalling catastrophe."

In conformity with the usual custom and with the Rules of Procedure, the above proposal will be distributed to the delegations, and I shall ask the Assembly, at to-morrow morning's meeting, to decide what action is to be taken on the proposal.

The Assembly rose at 1 p.m.

The Agenda Committee has elected as its Chairman M. BELLEGARDE (Haiti).

18. — ELECTION OF THE SIX VICE-PRESIDENTS OF THE ASSEMBLY.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the election of the six Vice-Presidents of the Assembly.

Under Rule 21, paragraph 3, of the Rules of Procedure, this election takes place by secret ballot. I wish to remind delegates that voting papers should include only the names of six members and that no country should be mentioned.

I call upon M. Scialoja, delegate of Italy and Chairman of the First Committee, and M. Munch, delegate of Denmark and Chairman of the Third Committee, to be good enough to act as tellers.

(The votes of the delegations were taken in turn by secret ballot.)

The President:

Translation: The result of the ballot is as follows:

Number of States voting	48
Blank voting paper	1
Voting papers valid	47
Majority required	24

The analysis of voting is as follows:

	Votes

M. Yoshizawa (Japan)	43
Dr. Curtius (Germany)	42

The General Committee of the Assembly, therefore, is now constituted as follows:

M. YOSHIZAWA,
Dr. CURTIUS,
Count APPONYI,
M. RESTREPO,

and the Chairman of the Agenda Committee:
M. BELLEGARDE.

19. — ENTRY OF MEXICO INTO THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS: ADOPTION OF THE DRAFT RESOLUTION PROPOSED BY THE DELEGATIONS OF GERMANY, THE BRITISH EMPIRE, SPAIN, FRANCE, ITALY AND JAPAN.

The President:

Translation: The Assembly will remember that a draft resolution has been submitted by the British, French, German, Italian, Japanese and Spanish delegations concerning the entry of Mexico into the League. The text of that draft resolution reads as follows:

"The German, British, Spanish, French Italian and Japanese delegations,

"Considering that Mexico is not mentioned in the Annex to the Covenant enumerating the countries invited to accede thereto;

"Considering, that the League should now in all justice repair this omission, which is wholly contrary to its true spirit;

"Propose to the Assembly that Mexico be invited to accede to the Covenant and to lend its valuable support to the League as though it had been invited from the outset."

As you will note, this is a proposal that may be incorporated in a resolution or a recommendation, as you may decide. But, first, we must determine the procedure to be followed. The first question to be considered is whether the Assembly is to refer this proposal to the Agenda Committee or whether, under Rule 4, paragraph 4, and Rule 14, paragraph 2, of the Rules of Procedure, it prefers to deal with it immediately.

In accordance with precedent, I shall interpret the silence of the Assembly on this point of preliminary procedure as a sign that it does not desire to refer the matter to a Committee and that, consequently, the Assembly has decided by the requisite majority to place the question on its agenda and deal with it immediately.

The President's proposal was adopted.

The President:

Translation: I open the discussion on that proposal by calling upon the first speaker on the list, Dr. Curtius, first delegate of Germany.

Dr. Curtius (Germany):

Translation: As the representative of Germany a country which has long been bound to Mexico by ties of constant and sincere friendship, I had great pleasure in subscribing to the proposal regarding the invitation to Mexico.

Its population and the extent of its territory give Mexico an important place among the States of the world. Not only the States which form part of the sphere of Spanish culture, but all the States Members of the League will set the greatest value on the active participation of Mexico in the work of the League. We are all aware that the League's activity will increase in importance as it tends to become universal in scope, and a great step towards this universality would be taken if Mexico were to become a Member of the League.

For reasons into which I need not enter here, Mexico has long remained aloof from the League. It was therefore with universal satisfaction that the news was received at the beginning of last year that the newly elected President of the Republic, His Excellency General Ortiz Rubio, had declared, shortly before taking up his high office, that he was in favour of the early entry of Mexico into the League. We shall all be ready to congratulate him and his country, and the League also, when his Government actually presents itself as a Member of the League.

The President:

Translation: Viscount Cecil, first delegate of the British Empire, will address the Assembly.

Viscount Cecil (British Empire):

I have the greatest possible pleasure in supporting this motion which has been made by my friend Dr. Curtius for an invitation to be extended to the State of Mexico to apply for membership of the League of Nations. I do so for many reasons, but for two in particular.

In the first place, this proposal is the correction of an omission that was made at Paris when the formation of the League was being considered. That omission has lasted much too long, and I am not sure that I ought not to acknowledge that I was in part, I suppose, responsible for it. It therefore gives me particular pleasure at this moment to take part in remedying an omission which never should have been made.

The second and more important reason is that we all, I think, desire to have the collaboration of Mexico in our consultations and deliberations. Mexico is one of the most ancient and one of the most influential of the States of the American continent. It has a great position and a history showing remarkable energy and self-reliance in its people. I am quite certain that we shall find its collaboration and assistance of great value to us at Geneva.

I agree entirely with Dr. Curtius that, the more universal the League becomes, the more one of its most fundamental characteristics is realised. Perhaps I may be allowed to add that in my view membership of the League by each State is not only valuable for the League but is valuable for the State itself. It brings more vividly perhaps before its people the knowledge of the interdependence of all States in the modern world, and makes them realise that, in working for the prosperity and peace of the world, they are working also for the prosperity and peace of their own country.

I have great pleasure in seconding the proposal now before us.

The President:

Translation: M. de Madariaga, delegate of Spain, will address the Assembly.

M. de Madariaga (Spain):

Translation: I am here, by an act of noble self-abnegation on the part of the first delegate of Spain, to support the motion submitted to the Assembly. Such a motion is bound to be an extremely attractive one to the Spanish Minister for Foreign Affairs, since it is designed to facilitate the entry into the League of a country which is connected with Spain, not only by historical ties, but by ties of blood. Spain has realised intensely, almost as intensely as Mexico herself, the reason — what our great Cervantes would have called "the reason of unreason" — which has kept Mexico aloof from our discussions for this long period.

After the noble and admirable words of Viscount Cecil, that pillar of the League and of the universal spirit that rules its activities, I need not dwell upon the retrospective aspect of the question.

Mexico to-day occupies a pre-eminent position on the American continent. All the American countries of the same race and language regard her as one of the leading nations of that continent. I have realised, in the official post I have taken up at Washington, where the present Mexican ambassador is the doyen of the Diplomatic Corps, that the great North-American Republic maintains with Mexico relations of the most cordial intimacy and co-operates with her to an unexampled degree.

Moreover, however enviable the continental position of Mexico, there is no doubt that she herself does not find it adequate to enable her to fulfil her destiny as a nation of the modern world. Just as men do not come to a full realisation of their individuality until, to use a sublime expression of Pascal's "they try to understand the universe", so nations cannot come to a complete understanding of their national individuality until they rise to a comprehension of universality. It is this same noble aspiration after universality that, despite all, endears to us the old eighteenth-century imperialism, the worst aspects of which are now happily vanishing.

Nations that are not strong enough for imperialism and those which, though strong, aim at a higher form of development have found, since the creation of the League of Nations, a blameless way to achieve universality. The League can do Mexico the great service of helping her to a complete understanding of her national spirit.

On the other hand, as Lord Cecil has already said, Mexico can help the League by contributing a sturdy spirit of liberty in her political conceptions, a deep-seated tradition and, above all, a unique sense of brotherhood between races, which may be of the utmost service to the League and stimulate its development.

It is the bounden duty of the League to attain, as soon as possible, the universality that is at the very root of its being, that is really the standard and model which inspired its conception. The League must be able to inscribe upon its portals and to use as a motto for its action this sentence adapted from the old classic: "I am the conscious and organised world, and no nation can be foreign to me."

The President:

Translation: M. Briand, first delegate of France, will address the Assembly.

M. Briand (France):

Translation: I wish to say in a few words how happy France is to be able to associate herself with the present gesture towards that great nation, Mexico. It was a great pleasure to me to subscribe to the proposal now before the Assembly — a proposal destined to make good an omission of which we were all conscious and which we all deplored.

At last it is possible to put right a misunderstanding, an unfortunate mistake; and we shall see among us the representatives of that great nation. They will come to share in our work and to contribute a valuable co-operation which we all desire.

It will be a happy occasion, and I wish to say on behalf of my country that France will joyfully welcome the day when Mexico comes to take her share in our work, thus bringing us a step nearer to what is the highest ideal of our League, universality.

The President:

Translation: M. Grandi, first delegate of Italy, will address the Assembly.

M. Grandi (Italy):

Translation: I gladly associate myself with the declarations made by previous speakers who have already spoken. Italy also will be delighted to see a great nation like Mexico taking part in the work of the League of Nations.

The President.

Translation: M. Yoshizawa, first delegate of Japan, will address the Assembly.

M. Yoshizawa (Japan):

Translation: The Japanese delegation was anxious to join with those who proposed the draft resolution inviting Mexico to accede to the Covenant of the League.

We have always been ardent advocates of the principle of universality, which is to combine within the League representatives of all civilisations and of all continents, with their varied types of national genius.

That is why we are so anxious that Mexico should bring to the universal work of the League the valuable contribution of her own individual civilisation.

The President.

Translation: M. Gonzalez-Prada, delegate of Peru, will address the Assembly.

M. Gonzalez-Prada (Peru):

Translation: This is the first occasion on which I have had the honour of addressing you from this platform, having been chosen by the delegations of the Latin-American States to express the satisfaction that those countries have felt on learning that Mexico is shortly to become a Member of the League of Nations.

The draft resolution submitted to us, inviting Mexico to accede to the Covenant and to lend her valuable support to this Assembly is a further step forward towards world unanimity, which must remain one of our most cherished aims.

I have great pleasure in fulfilling the honourable duty entrusted to me by my Latin-American colleagues and declare our profound satisfaction at the prospect of seeing in the near future the representatives of Mexico here among us, sharing in our work.

The President:

Translation: The Hon. Hugh Guthrie, first delegate of Canada, will address the Assembly.

The Hon. Hugh Guthrie (Canada): The delegation from the Dominion of Canada desires most heartily to endorse the resolution which proposes an invitation to our sister State on the North American continent to accede to the Covenant and become a Member of the League of Nations.

Canada has, in the past, had many relationships with its sister State of Mexico. They have all been most pleasant and satisfactory. A considerable international trade is done between the two countries, and I believe always upon a satisfactory basis. It will be a matter of great satisfaction to the Dominion of Canada to know that this invitation to Mexico has gone forth, and a greater satisfaction to know that it has been accepted and that Mexico has become a Member of the League.

The President:

Translation: M. de Quevedo, delegate of Portugal, will address the Assembly.

M. de Quevedo (Portugal):

Translation: The accession of the Republic of the United States of Mexico to the League of Nations will be hailed as a most welcome event by all the States Members of the League. Mexico, one of the great nations of Spanish America, one of the outstanding products in the historic achievement of the Latin-Iberian race, ranks also as one of the greatest nations of the New World. Mexico's greatness lies in her ancient culture, her creative instinct, the valour of her men and the fruitful output of her liberal institutions.

As representative of one of the countries of the Iberian Peninsula, in which the origins of Latin-American culture must be sought, I sincerely rejoice to learn of the probable entry into the League of the great Mexican people, a people who will lend to us the invaluable support of their experience and place upon our work the fruitful imprint of their genius.

I welcome the accession of the United States of Mexico with all the friendliness and enthusiasm of a kinsman and a friend.

The President:

Translation: M. Restrepo, first delegate of Colombia, will address the Assembly.

M. Restrepo (Colombia):

Translation: I gladly avail myself of this opportunity of paying a tribute to that great country, Mexico, an old friend of Colombia, the country which I have the honour to represent at the Assembly of the League of Nations. Ever since the establishment of our independence at the beginning of the last century, we have been on terms of close friendship with Mexico. We Colombians admire the great qualities of the Mexican people, their indomitable courage, their energy, their wisdom, for all of us in Latin America experience great difficulties owing to the fact that the Iberian race came and settled among native races, races so very different in character. Such difficulties still face Governments which have learnt wisdom, Governments as firmly established as those of the older European countries.

One criticism sometimes levelled against us is that we are always having revolutions. The causes of that situation deserve to be closely examined. The reason why it is so difficult for us to establish any permanent system of order is to be found precisely in that mixture of races — native races on the one hand, and, on the other, the Iberian race — which has settled among them.

Mexico boasts of her ancient Aztec stock and prides herself on continuing the native Governments based on her traditions. It is believed that the old Asiatic races reached the New World through the Behring Straits, though another learned theory is that America peopled the rest of the world. That is a moot point, but those scholars who have studied Mexico most thoroughly affirm that her ancient monuments bear witness to a civilisation the origins of which are lost in the beginnings of time. In Yucatan, in the mountains of Mexico, on the high tablelands, in the city of Mexico itself, those mighty monuments are found, silent witnesses of a glorious past.

We in Colombia count it an honour to be descendants of the Spanish, for with us the white race predominates. In Mexico, on the other hand, in addition to several millions of Spanish there are thirteen millions of Indians who speak nothing but their own native tongue. Be that as it may, Mexico is a powerful country, an immense country, organised in the form of a federation which is an honour to the Latin-American race.

The delegates of all the nations assembled here are not, I think, aware of the reason for the invitation now being extended to Mexico to enter the League. Is it possible that so manifestly powerful a nation was once forgotten? This is the moment to explain why Mexico has not been represented here since the foundation of the League. As representative of Colombia, I was one of the founders of this great institution. Not long ago, Costa Rica applied for admission to the League, and the delegates here wondered then why Costa Rica had not received an invitation as the South American States had done. I should like to tell you something about how Mexico and Costa Rica came to be left out, when the great Powers signatories to the Treaty of Peace extended their invitation to the South American countries.

For the first time in history, as you will recall, all the South American States were convened to attend the Second Peace Conference held at The Hague in 1907 under the auspices of the Czar of Russia. After that, some time elapsed. Then, on the signature of the Treaty of Peace, we were all invited again, with the exception of Mexico and the Republic of Costa Rica. What was the reason for leaving out one North American country and one country of Central America? It was because President Wilson, a great American leader, and a great man, to whom I pay a tribute whenever I utter his name, preached a doctrine which rather implied intervention as regards the Governments south of the United States, from the Colorado River to Chile. He held the view that, in the interests of pacification in South America, we should refuse to recognise Governments which were the outcome of revolutionary movements, of coups d'état, of cuartelazos, or military plots.

Costa Rica applied for admission, but Mexico, in the pride and dignity of her race, would not apply. Since then, more stable government has been established under General Ortiz Rubio, to whom Dr. Curtius referred, and at the present time calm reigns in Mexico. Like every other country, she has to contend with economic and financial difficulties; but the country is none the less rich, a country of gold and silver mines, a country with its national heroes like every other nation — heroes such as that Spaniard who burnt his ships when he reached the Mexican shores and cried to his soldiers: "Victory or death!" The Emperor Guatemoc was taken prisoner by that same Spaniard, and Roman history alone offers examples comparable to that episode. Guatemoc was burnt alive, like Saint Laurence, according to Christian tradition, and with him his secretary, a man of poorer fibre than himself. When he began to tremble and to cry out, the Emperor turned to him and said; "Enough! Do you imagine that I myself am lying on a bed of roses?" Such was his nobility of character, such the influence of his personality.

Colombia, like all the countries represented on the League, will welcome Mexico as a fellow Member when the moment comes for her to send her representatives to this Assembly.

The President:

Translation: All those delegates who have spoken have declared themselves in favour of the proposal now under consideration.

I think, then, the time has come to suggest that the Assembly should modify the terms of the text and convert it into a resolution.

I would propose the following wording:

The Assembly,

Considering that Mexico is not mentioned in the Annex to the Covenant enumerating the countries invited to accede thereto;

Considering that the League should now in all justice repair this omission, which is wholly contrary to its true spirit;

Decides that Mexico be invited to accede to the Covenant and to lend its valuable support to the League as though it had been invited from the outset.

Asks the Secretary-General to give effect to the present decision.

If no one has any observations to make, I shall assume that the Assembly agrees to the proposal being converted into a resolution.

Agreed.

The President:

Translation: We still have to settle a point of procedure.

The Assembly can refer the resolution I have just read to a Committee for preliminary examination, or it can adopt it at once. If no one has any observations to make, I shall take it that the Assembly desires to accept the resolution immediately and unanimously.

The draft resolution was unanimously adopted.

The President:

Translation: May I be allowed, as President of this Assembly and as a Roumanian, to express my delight at the prospect that Mexico may soon take her place among us, side by side with the kindred races which form part of that great family, the League of Nations!

20.—REPORT ON THE WORK OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS SINCE THE ELEVENTH SESSION OF THE ASSEMBLY: OPENING OF THE DISCUSSION.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the opening of the general discussion on the report on the work of the League of Nations since the eleventh session of the Assembly (Annexes 2 and 2 (a), Documents A 6 and A 6 (a), 1931.)[1]

M. Grandi, first delegate of Italy, will address the Assembly.

M. Grandi (Italy):

Translation: This is the first occasion on which I have had the honour of addressing the Assembly of the League of Nations, but it is not the first time that I have collaborated with you, here and elsewhere. My many years of direct and indirect co-operation in the work of the League and my unfailing confidence in the efficacy of that co-operation will, I hope, be held to absolve me from the duty of making declarations of a general character.

Italy's policy, moreover, has been explained on various occasions from this platform, so that I should only be reiterating ideas and principles with which you are already acquainted. I should simply be going over ground already covered by the Head of the Government in my country and reviewed here before you with admirable clarity by those in charge of the Italian delegation at previous sessions of the Assembly.

To-day I propose to confine myself to certain considerations connected with the report on the work of the League since the last session of the Assembly and, in particular, to the problems described in the report as constituting the main aspect of that work: I refer to the preparations for the Disarmament Conference and the enquiry into the means of remedying the existing economic depression.

My determination to confine myself to those particular points is due partly to my desire to keep within the limits of the report and partly also to my conception of what the League's work should be. For, in my view, the League should keep before it the realities of international relations and not be afraid to emerge from its study of ideas. The policy of States should be the root and origin of its activities, while it should not be allowed to spend itself in the enunciation of principles any more than in evolving its own constitutional law. In other words, the League should engage in practical work, co-ordinated with that done by each country, adapted to the problems with which we are faced and designed to convince the nations of the sincerity and efficacy of our efforts.

About the constitutional development of the League I should like to say a few words here. I do so because one of the questions in our agenda is directly connected with this aspect of the League's work. I refer to the amendment of the Covenant in order to bring it into harmony with the Pact of Paris of 1928. That question will be examined by the First Committee, and the Italian representative on that body is one of the original authors of the Covenant. Italy, I need hardly remind you, associated herself with the British proposal for the co-ordination of those two instruments. It is only from a general standpoint, therefore, and in connection with what might be called the League's constitutional policy, that I shall take the opportunity afforded by the inclusion of this item in the agenda to express my views on the subject of possible amendments to the Covenant.

I am frankly conservative in this matter. Our association of States is still in its infancy, and the tests to which it is being put are not perhaps the severest that it will have to face. It certainly answers a real need for international co-operation, a need felt by the peoples now more intensely than ever before, and we are entitled to survey with confidence its future, the work that it may be expected to accomplish and its prospects of success.

Nevertheless, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that this association is of recent origin, that the significance of its legal institutions has not yet become part of the national conscience, that its international functions have not yet developed to the fullest extent envisaged in the simple but stupendous plan embodied in the Covenant.

Let us not forget that the Covenant has only been in existence for a few years. Only now, perhaps, in the light of events, are we beginning to appreciate its scope, to understand its spirit and to estimate it at its true value. It is an instrument of which full use has not yet been made, which has scarcely begun to be employed in certain essential departments, such as disarmament. That alone should be enough to counsel prudence.

It seems to me, however, that another aspect of the problem is chiefly deserving of our attention. We must consolidate the actual basis on which our association rests. I do not mean to imply that there is any lack of confidence in the League. May I, however, point out that, if we want international relations to become an organic part of the League system, the contractual principles on which that system is based must not be continually subject to revision. If these institutions are to be a living force in the conscience of our peoples, our undertakings must not be brought up for daily discussions, and we must avoid setting up new structures which might lead to the idea that the institutions of the League of Nations are simply an unsatisfactory means of organising the legal side of international relations and that that could be done better in other ways.

[1] For reasons of economy, the list of ratifications of agreements and conventions concluded under the auspices of the League which was an annex to the Supplementary Report on the Work of the League since the eleventh session of the Assembly is not this year published as an annex to the Assembly records. It will be found in the January number of the Official Journal (1932).

We can hardly be accused of having already gone too far, but the practically universal accession to the Optional Clause of the Statute of the Permanent Court, the increasing number of accessions to the General Act of Arbitration, the framing of the Convention to strengthen the Means of preventing War, and, lastly, the proposals for bringing the Covenant into harmony with the Paris Pact, undoubtedly constitute a programme which may be regarded as adequately supplementing the Covenant.

If the Covenant is to be retained in its entirety, and is itself to retain its nicely balanced proportions, the obligations arising out of it must be applied in full, so that the relations between the constituent elements of what has been termed the international organisation of peace may be scrupulously respected.

Those elements are clearly indicated in the Covenant — the peaceful settlement of international disputes, disarmament and security. The Covenant even fixes the relations between them inasmuch as it declares the peaceful settlement of international disputes and disarmament to be the real basis and token of security and peace.

I have no intention of theorising on the structure of the Covenant; but, to illustrate my remarks, I might mention certain ideas which the Italian delegation has repeatedly put forward here. These may perhaps be pertinent now, when we are preparing for the Disarmament Conference — that is, on the eve of complex negotiations which cannot begin in the necessary atmosphere of clarity, and under favourable conditions unless, from the outset, each one of us frankly states his country's policy.

Since we regard the problem of disarmament as an integral part of the League system, that system must obviously be our starting-point. One principle stands out clearly from the stipulations of the Covenant, — namely, that peace can rest only on the security of nations, and security can be found only in the harmonious evolution of two factors: the peaceful settlement of disputes and a general reduction of armaments.

Disarmament and arbitration, the rejection of all solutions based on force, and the relative equalising of the military strength of States at the lowest possible level — that is not just a theory or dogmatic assertion. It lies at the root of the system which the League Covenant has evolved with a view to the reduction of armaments; it corresponds essentially to real and pressing demands. Indeed, there is no problem of security distinct from disarmament and arbitration.

If, in international relations, solutions could not be reached by the use of force, if there were no excess of armaments, the problem of security would not even arise. It has arisen because the legal organisation of the association of nations which we have been laboriously constructing during the last few years still leaves the door open to the race for armaments, a factor that undermines its structure and jeopardises its efficacy. It is not merely because the excess of armaments has the effect of blunting the sense of justice among the nations, but because no nation can hope to live in peace and security under a system of international justice which, however perfect in theory, is in practice menaced by the pressure that armaments may bring to bear on inter-State relations.

To realise this, we need only survey the period preceding the war, which was marked by two characteristic and simultaneous phenomena — on the one hand, the first concrete manifestations of the principle of conciliation and arbitration, with the creation of the first arbitral tribunal at The Hague, and the conclusion of various treaties based on that same principle; on the other, the race for armaments. In other words, an increase in the number of international acts designed to secure peace and a simultaneous increase of armaments, which was bound sooner or later to lead to war.

When we look back on those tragic happenings, we can hardly be surprised that our nations, which have barely emerged from a war the consequences of which are still crippling them, should refuse to regard international justice as an adequate safeguard for the future.

Nor can we be surprised if the nations ask that international justice shall be safeguarded from the dangers attendant upon a policy of armaments. The Covenant imposes upon us the duty of disarming, but the Covenant does not possess the only claim to our consideration; there exist other claims, vaster still, still deeper and more vital, which we are bound to consider.

For the last twenty years, Europe has been in a permanent state of unrest. Wars and revolutions have succeeded one another, the deaths must be reckoned in millions, national systems of economy have been overturned and the working classes are without employment.

Our civilisation has from time to time been saved in different directions by the genius of a few men, and by the power of resistance and the spirit of sacrifice of the peoples; but the time has come to make a collective and concrete effort in the defence of our common heritage.

Recently, there have been ever clearer and more visible signs that isolated efforts are no longer adequate. No country, however powerful and vast, however well equipped and wisely organised, but feels the menace to its own organisation in the form of possible sudden external events. The consciousness of the solidarity of nations has become more definite, and courageous spokesmen have not been lacking. President Hoover's proposal and the felicitous action of the American Government are a case in point, and no member of this Assembly, I think, will have forgotten the cordial reception given in every country to the American proposal, despite the heavy sacrifices it entails on either side.

We have had further proof during the last few months of the need for closer co-operation between nations, and — what is more important — there has been co-operation even between the nations which only a short time ago were in armed conflict with one another. They have settled their differences and decided to co-operate in the defence of our common civilisation which means so much to us all.

Fresh possibilities have been opened up by the negotiations between those countries, possibilities which do not differ in any respect from those envisaged by the League. All these means lead to the same common goal. In any case, work is being done, ideas are being clarified and — let us be frank — the interests served by international solidarity are being proclaimed and defined. Our business now is to organise, to safeguard and to clear the way, and that we cannot do so long as our efforts at collective organisation are paralysed by the race for armaments.

In this connection, one of the most delicate questions of international policy — the financial obligations arising out of the war — is not without some bearing on the disarmament problem. There is, of course, no diplomatic connection between disarmament, reparations and debts; but nobody will deny the moral connection between them.

Before nations sacrifice their rights, they must be persuaded of the usefulness of the sacrifices demanded of them, and it is difficult to see the usefulness of any fresh settlement of the financial obligations arising out of the war, as long as the race for armaments continues.

We cannot deny the justice of an observation put forward more than once — the sacrifices made must not, by permitting the increase of armaments, be allowed to aggravate the present state of insecurity, which, more than anything, is militating against a general economic recovery, and is one of the fundamental causes, if not the main cause, of the present unsettled situation.

One other observation is relevant in connection with this general economic problem. All countries are suffering as the result of the continual increase in Customs barriers, a protectionist policy which means that the economic development of the various countries is proceeding on individual lines, and prevents the sound development of the process of integration which alone can secure effective economic collaboration between States. One of the immediate causes of the retention and strengthening of these Customs barriers, which have the effect of dividing the world into often extremely small commercial units, and which have had, and still have, the effect of dispersing the efforts of the nations, is the general state of political insecurity which drives nations to organise a system of economic security and to snatch at all costs at some independent means of defence for possible use against dangers that may threaten them from without.

I am well aware that the protectionist fever from which the world is suffering to-day has other more general causes; but, in Europe, undoubtedly one of those causes is an obscure sentiment of danger — possibly a vague and distant danger — which we must do our best to allay. What the countries of Europe want is tranquillity. Let the more powerful States give the less powerful ones a feeling of general security, and let that feeling of general security rest, not only on their avowed will to peace, but on a definite and equitable adjustment of the relations between them, and we shall see the disappearance — as if by magic — of all the special political reasons for what I might describe as economic armaments. Let us lay down our arms, and we shall see the reduction of those barriers, sometimes ridiculously high, which separate the economic systems of our nations.

In my Government's view, therefore, disarmament is the starting-point of many things — the putting into execution of the system of security and peace created by the Covenant, the establishment of greater confidence between States, and the re-establishment of laws of economic integration which have suffered such ruthless violation.

That is the most urgent item in the League's programme; that is the task most closely in keeping with the League's essential purpose.

The Disarmament Conference has been convened and will begin work on February 2nd. My observations may therefore appear superfluous; indeed, I hope that they will prove so. Naturally, they do not refer to the convening of the Conference, but to the policy that may be adopted by the Governments represented there, to the ideas they may bring to it, and to the methods they intend to follow. Now is the time for courage, moderation and above all, common sense. Each one of us must realise the difficulties of the others, must state his own requirements frankly, limiting them to what is really essential, and must reduce his armaments to the lowest point consistent with national safety, and the enforcement by common action of international obligations, within the meaning of Article 8 of the Covenant.

I am, however, inclined to think that, during the actual period of preparation for the Disarmament Conference, States which have definitely undertaken to participate in the Conference might adopt provisional measures. The Council of the League, as you know, suggested preliminary discussions. Acting on that recommendation, we might do really useful work by adopting practical measures without delay. My own feeling is that we ought to try immediately to arrive at a really effective armaments truce, at least for the period of the Conference, and I should like to ask you seriously to consider my suggestion.

A general and immediate agreement between States to suspend the execution of programmes for fresh armaments would not only set our peoples an example of goodwill, but would create a psychological and political atmosphere of greater calm and confidence, which would do more than any declaration of principles to further the work of the Conference and lead to tangible results.

In this connection I may inform you that His Majesty the King of Italy has just signed the General Act for the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes, and I have received from my Government instructions with a view to the accession of Italy to the General Convention to strengthen the Means of preventing War, should that Convention be approved by the Assembly.

I have already had occasion to explain to the Council the importance attached by Italy to the General Act, an instrument which we regard as a welcome addition to the technical machinery of international justice.

Our present duty is to create the conditions for the functioning of international justice. I have no wish unduly to stress my point of view, nor was it my desire, in directing your attention to the disarmament problem, to exclude other questions which call for consideration, or to pass over the fact that disarmament is only one element in the much more complex problem of the international situation. It does, however, seem to me to be the most urgent problem, and a problem which must be settled before we can hope to solve the others.

I do not propose now to go into the economic questions affecting international relations at this difficult period of the life of the peoples. The Italian delegation will certainly have occasion, in the course of our proceedings, to explain its attitude towards these questions, the technical nature of which necessitates careful and detailed study.

I should like, however, to give you a few explanations with regard to one of the questions to which I have referred — the financial obligations arising out of the war.

If that matter were to come up for discussion again, it would, of course, have to be the subject of negotiations between the States directly affected by it. As things are, we do not know if or when such negotiations may commence. In any case, the possibility of a fresh examination of the problem of debts and reparations depends largely on what happens during the next few months, when we shall have an opportunity of judging the effects of the Hoover plan.

Italy sincerely hopes that those effects will prove to be favourable, firmly convinced as she is that an equitable adjustment of debts and reparations would be of advantage to all countries, not only to debtor and creditor countries.

That is the view that has always been held by the Italian Government, and is still held by it. The problem is, of course, infinitely more complicated than appears at first sight, since it presents other than strictly economic aspects — not because it is a special kind of problem in itself, but because no international problem is exclusively political or economic.

It is, in fact, impossible to draw hard and fast lines between the interests of the States, for those interests are interdependent. The important point is to solve political problems in the spirit of co-operation in which it is desired and in which it is necessary to solve the economic problems. Political peace and economic peace must coincide, mutual confidence being a necessary condition for both. It is when a general atmosphere of co-operation has been created that particular differences between States can be most easily adjusted.

There are important precedents in our recent history that may serve as examples — for the European States, of course. I need only recall the fact that the Locarno Agreements, by inaugurating an era of closer confidence in the relations between certain European Powers, have helped to create the objective conditions which made it possible to deal with the problem of German reparations on the lines known to you, from the Dawes Plan to the Young Plan.

I quite realise that these questions do not come directly within the framework of the League's work. The very fact that certain States with important specific interests in connection with the financial obligations arising out of the war are not Members of the League precludes the possibility of thus including those questions in its work. Could they be solved, however, we should find new and broader bases of agreement, which is the aim of us all. The League can help by working still more energetically in the interests of moral reconciliation, a crying need, not in Europe alone, but all over the world.

The further we get away from the great war, the more keenly do we realise the terrible wounds which it inflicted on all countries without distinction—wounds which we should find it impossible to heal were it not for the fact that the spirit of sacrifice which the war brought out in all the belligerent countries itself engendered powers of resistance which have enabled countries to defend their civilisation—reserves which encourage them to face the future with greater confidence.

We are all counting upon that spirit now, and Europe can count on the spirit of the Italian people. Still, as I said, individual national action is not enough, while the creation of exclusive groups might injure, rather than further, the cause of co-operation, security and peace.

As a matter of fact, since the war, European policy has been distracted by the conflict between two great forces which it has not yet been possible to adjust : on the one hand, the collective movement towards establishing a regime of more systematic and stable co-operation than any which has existed before, and, on the other, the tendency of particular States to form themselves into independent groups for the defence of their national interests — in our opinion, a very doubtful solution of the problem of international co-operation.

A collective effort on the part of European and non-European nations, whether Members of the League or not, is necessary to correct these conflicting tendencies, and to discourage the idea of creating exclusive groups in Europe. Such groups are not, in our opinion, in accordance with the conception embodied in the Covenant of regional understandings for securing the maintenance of peace. On the contrary, they have the effect of creating divisions highly prejudicial to the peace and tranquillity of nations. It is a mistake to think that it represents a first stage towards the formation of a larger group. The formation of blocs, in the form either of military alliances or agreements for the furtherance of particular interests or special regimes, inevitably leads to the creation of other blocs. This automatically entails the establishment of powerful associations of interests which tend to form separate centres of action and watch one another.

If we desire to establish a real system of peace, it must be based on real international interests. That is a delicate problem of adjustment as between the particular interests of individual States and the organic system of international co-operation. The Covenant provides us with a happy solution of the problem, and we ought not only to respect that solution but to deduce from it general rules of conduct applicable in our international relations.

We all form one single group, and our dearest hope is to see it expand rather than disintegrate. We trust that the League of Nations may become a true reflection of the solidarity of nations, of all States, great and small, European and non-European, all helping to further their common civilisation, a civilisation which it is our duty not only to protect, but to strengthen and extend.

For that reason we welcome the co-operation of States non-Members of the League. It seems to me that we should be placing too narrow an interpretation upon our interests if we sought to confine to Member States the advantages that may ensue from the League's work. We ought to give the States which do not yet belong to the League every facility for co-operating with it within the general framework of its principles. Even in places where no echo of the League's voice is heard, its spirit may still penetrate — the spirit of co-operation and peace. The world has never needed it so much as now, for if we have not yet seen the worst of the economic depression, we may expect to do so soon.

As our distinguished President has so eloquently said this morning, we must seize on the spontaneous sentiments of solidarity to which the crisis has given birth, not only to meet the stern needs of the times, but as the basis of a greater and more durable institution for the future.

21. — EXPRESSION OF SYMPATHY WITH REFERENCE TO THE CATASTROPHE IN CHINA: ADOPTION OF THE DRAFT RESOLUTION PROPOSED BY THE BRITISH DELEGATION.

The President:

Translation: The first item on the agenda is the draft resolution submitted by the British delegation conveying an expression of sympathy to the Chinese Government.

The text is as follows:

The Assembly,

Having heard with the deepest sorrow the account of the terrible disasters that have overtaken certain provinces of China,

Appeals to all men and women of goodwill throughout the world to show by action their sympathy for those who are the victims of this appalling catastrophe.

Unhappily, there are precedents for the submission of such a resolution. Last year, your President received a draft resolution expressing sympathy with the Dominican Republic, which had just suffered terribly from an earthquake. This year, another Member of the League, one of the oldest and most faithful Members, is enduring an equally terrible calamity.

The Assembly will not, I think, desire to change the procedure it adopted at its eleventh session in expressing its sympathy for a Member State. I therefore propose that we should begin at once the discussion of the draft resolution before us.

Agreed.

The President:

Translation: Viscount Cecil, the first delegate of the British Empire, will address the Assembly.

Viscount Cecil (British Empire):

The motion of which the British delegation has given notice will, I am sure, commend itself to all the members of the Assembly without any exception, and I do not therefore need to occupy your time for more than a very few minutes in order to recommend the resolution to your favourable consideration. It calls the attention of the Assembly to events in China, to the floods there, which I think are really without parallel in the history of that country, or perhaps in the history of any other country. I am informed that right along the valley of the great river Yangtse for more than a thousand miles, and for a breadth of fifty miles, the whole area is flooded. That is a prodigious stretch of country, as large, I understand, as Scotland.

It is stated that several million human beings have perished in the floods; some authorities have put the figure as high as ten millions. It is estimated that something like thirty million persons are homeless as a consequence of the floods. Human bodies are floating about in the flooded area; it has been impossible even to bury them. Crops have been destroyed and relief is urgently needed in order to enable the unhappy survivors to live until the next harvest.

It is said that it is only a matter of organisation, no doubt of considerable organisation, to convey food, clothing and medical stores to the parts of the country which are affected. Unfortunately, the hospitals in the large towns there — for example in Hankow — have all been flooded out, so that the need from a health point of view is very extreme. Those of us who live in countries which have not endured such an affliction must not forget that it is only too likely that great epidemics of disease will follow these floods, and that they may spread far and wide over the surface of the earth; this, therefore, is a matter of great international importance, apart from the sense of fellowship and friendship in which we live and work here in order to promote that sense among the nations of the world.

I do not know, and therefore I have not mentioned the matter in my draft resolution, whether there is any way in which the League of Nations can be of service in this matter; but I am quite certain that the Secretariat and the Council will be only too ready to afford, in this connection, any assistance which the Government of China may require and for which it may ask.

It would be an impertinence and it would be futile to add, by any phrases of mine, or by any attempt at rhetoric, to the claim which the bare facts of this disaster must make on every one of us. I trust we shall adopt this resolution and that it may be fruitful in helping the very hard-pressed and terribly tried provinces of China to which I have referred.

The President:

Translation: Dr. Sze, first delegate of China, will address the Assembly.

Dr. Sze (China):

I arise at once to express the appreciation of the Chinese delegation of the motion proposed by Viscount Cecil of Chelwood, chief of the delegation of the British Empire. I can assure you that, when the news of this proposal of sympathy and help reaches China, the hearts of my people will be stirred by the sympathy thus shown to them in their great trouble.

It does, indeed, appear that the calamity resulting from the floods in China is a vast one. Many millions of people in the neighbourhood of Hankow and elsewhere have had their homes destroyed and been rendered destitute. This is a disaster which could not have been reasonably foreseen and provided against. The records show that never before had the Yangtse River risen so many feet — fifty-three and a-half at Hankow. The highest previous record had been fifty feet, which was about a century ago, and only once since then had it reached as high as forty-nine feet.

In addition to the loss of life and the destruction of the millions of homes, there is the fear that epidemics of disease may follow. It is thus evident that my people will welcome all the aid that can be extended to them from other countries. In this connection, my delegation would be ungrateful if it did not mention the assistance which the League of Nations is already giving to our Government and people. The National Health Administration at Nanking is in touch with the Health Organisation of the League and, through the League's Bureau at Singapore, with the health administrations of other Far-Eastern countries, with a view to securing co-ordinated action for combating possible epidemics, or for taking any other joint action which the emergency may require.

The Transit Organisation of the League, in application of a general scheme of collaboration with the Chinese Government, is proposing to despatch to China, as soon as practicable, highly qualified engineers experienced in the matter of hydraulic work for the prevention of floods. Further, the Chinese Government has recently requested the Secretary-General of the League to recommend the choice of an expert, if possible, experienced in relief work done in the past by the League in the Near East, in order to help the National Government of China in co-ordinating public and private efforts to cope with the situation occasioned by this appalling catastrophe.

You may be sure that the Chinese people will never forget any sympathy and aid that may be extended to them by the League in this their time of trial. I note with gratitude that already His Majesty the Emperor of Japan has made a most generous gift, that the Government of France has authorised the Government of Indo-China to extend medical and sanitary aid, and that other Governments and private organisations and individuals are taking steps to lend their assistance. My Government has lost no time in taking such action as has been within its power to furnish relief to the stricken areas, and the Chinese all over the world are raising what sums they can for the relief of their fellow-countrymen in China; but there will be need for all the help that can be furnished by all generously-minded people.

Once again my colleagues and I thank you from the bottom of our hearts for the action which this day has been proposed to this Assembly. In no other way can the attention of the world be so effectively directed to the dire situation in several of the provinces of China.

The President:

Translation: M. Yoshizawa, first delegate of Japan, will address the Assembly.

M. Yoshizawa (Japan):

Translation: The Japanese delegation associates itself, in sincerest sympathy, with the proposal submitted by the British delegation concerning the terrible calamities which have just overtaken China.

According to official information which we have received, the floods have attained unprecedented proportions. A large number of towns on the banks of the River Yangtse, and, in particular, the whole district of Hankow, are under water, and hundreds of thousands of inhabitants have fallen victims to this disaster.

The Japanese delegation is especially glad to give its support to the British proposal, because the Emperor, as soon as the sad news reached him, was graciously pleased to grant a sum of 100,000 yen for the relief of the sufferings of the neighbouring nation.

Furthermore, a special committee has been formed, on the initiative of certain distinguished persons, with a view to organising the work of relief and assistance to victims of the catastrophe.

It is therefore with great satisfaction that the Japanese delegation supports the proposed resolution. It sincerely hopes that all Members of the League will join in this demonstration of solidarity.

The President:

Translation: Sir Brojendra Mitter, first delegate of India, will address the Assembly.

Sir Brojendra Mitter (India):

It would have been taken amiss in my country had I allowed this occasion to pass in silence, for nowhere has China's calamity stirred deeper sympathy than in India. This is not merely due to the fact that China is our neighbour and a very friendly neighbour; India and China are linked together by material ties of a common civilisation. When one of these countries is overtaken by a disaster of the magnitude which Lord Cecil has described, it is only natural that the most poignant sympathy should be felt in the other country, because we are not merely stirred by humanitarian ideas, but also by the most personal feelings of sympathy. That sympathy springs from a friendship of common culture and common ideas. I do not want to take the time of the Assembly any further; I warmly support the resolution proposed by Lord Cecil.

The President:

Translation: Dr. Curtius, first delegate of Germany, will address the Assembly.

Dr. Curtius (Germany):

Translation: The sympathy of the whole world for the sufferings of the great Chinese people has found expression in the draft resolution before us and in the words we have just heard. As representative of a nation which itself is struggling against the greatest hardships, I cannot keep silence at such a time. It must not be said that we Germans, in our own misfortunes, have lost sight of the sufferings of others.

There is not much we can do to help, but we none the less feel the greatest sympathy for the victims of the catastrophe which has overtaken the Chinese people.

I therefore associate myself wholeheartedly with the words of the previous speakers, and I hope that the terrible disaster which has befallen the richest regions of China will cause us to explore and to utilise all the means in our power to give assistance to that country.

The President:

Translation: M. Beelaerts van Blokland, first delegate of the Netherlands, will address the Assembly.

M. Beelaerts van Blokland (Netherlands):

Translation: The populations of the Netherlands and of the Netherlands Indies are deeply affected by the news of the recent disaster which has befallen vast regions of China.

Our relations with China are of long standing, and we are proud of our friendship with that great people, our neighbour in the Far East, where I learnt to know its splendid qualities in the course of long residence in that part of the world.

I therefore support most heartily, on behalf of the Netherlands delegation, the draft resolution submitted by the British delegation.

The President:

Translation: M. Hymans, first delegate of Belgium, will address the Assembly.

M. Hymans (Belgium):

Translation: I should like to express from this platform my warm approval of the proposal before the Assembly.

China is passing through a period of terrible hardship and trial, and I am anxious to extend to it the heartfelt sympathy of my Government and my country.

The President:

Translation: M. Politis, first delegate of Greece, will address the Assembly.

M. Politis (Greece):

Translation: The Greek delegation wishes to give its warmest support to the generous proposal of the British delegation. It cannot forget that our country has already enjoyed more than once the benefits of the Health Organisation of the League. Greece remembers with gratitude that scarcely nine years ago, at the time of the great catastrophe in Asia Minor, when more than a million refugees poured into her territory, bringing with them the germs of diseases of all kinds, the League, through its Health Organisation, was of the greatest help to her. The specialists it sent to Greece were able to give the necessary guidance to our vaccination committee and our medical corps as a whole to enable them in a few weeks to organise the necessary relief. Greece remembers with the same gratitude the effective assistance she received from the League for the settlement of the refugees.

On the strength of this experience, Greece sincerely hopes that the Assembly will adopt the proposal of the British delegation, and that the help thus promised to China will arrive as promptly as the tragic hours through which she is passing demand.

The President:

Translation: M. de Quevedo, delegate of Portugal will address the Assembly.

M. de Quevedo (Portugal):

Translation: It is with feelings of grief and sorrow that I associate myself, on behalf of my country, with the tributes paid by the Assembly to the Chinese people at a time of suffering and distress. China, that great nation of the Far East, has been linked with Portugal by ties of close friendship dating from the distant and glorious days when my country undertook its first expeditions to the confines of Asia. The friendship between Portugal and China is therefore centuries old, and has never faltered throughout the course of history.

It is therefore an intimate feeling of sorrow and distress which prompts me to address a few words of deepest sympathy to the Chinese nation, our neighbour and friend, at this sad juncture, when one of her most important districts is stricken with disaster, desolation and mourning.

I desire to say that I give my full adhesion to the draft resolution proposed by Lord Cecil, which calls upon the world to give proof, by suitable action, of its sympathy with the victims of this terrible catastrophe.

The President:

Translation: M. de Agüero y Bethancourt, delegate of Cuba, will address the Assembly.

M. de Agüero y Bethancourt (Cuba):

Translation: The people of the Cuban Republic are deeply affected by the news of the disaster which has befallen the great Chinese nation.

My country is bound to China by ties of old and sincere friendship, and I have special instructions from my Government to declare here that the Republic of Cuba warmly associates itself with the draft resolution submitted by Lord Cecil.

The President:

Translation: M. Alâ, delegate of Persia, will address the Assembly.

M. Alâ (Persia):

Translation: As the representative of an Asiatic nation which has for centuries been a friend of China, a country with which Persia has from the earliest times had cultural relations, and for whose civilisation she has the greatest admiration, I desire to associate myself warmly with the draft resolution submitted to the Assembly. I should like to express my most heartfelt sympathy for the sufferings of that great country, and the disaster which has befallen a friendly nation.

I wish to assure M. Sze that the spirit of solidarity which unites all the Members of the League, and especially the Asiatic nations, cannot allow the Persians to remain insensible to the sufferings of their Chinese brethren.

As early as the thirteenth century, our poet Sati said that the sons of Adam all form part of one body and originate from the same substance, and that, when fate afflicts one member of that organism, all the other members inevitably suffer with it.

I hope and believe that my fellow countrymen will put this idea into action and will come to the help of China with all the means at their disposal.

The President :

Translation : Mlle. Campoamor, delegate of Spain, will address the Assembly.

Mlle. Campoamor (Spain) :

Translation : On behalf of the Spanish delegation and of my country, I beg to express my acceptance of the humane proposal of Great Britain, voicing as it does the spirit of fraternity that inspires this Assembly. My delegation not only approves the proposal, but has instructed me to declare that it will make its terms and its spirit known in Spain, which to-day is filled with an impassioned desire for human brotherhood. The feelings which inspired the British proposal will awaken an echo in the hearts of the Spanish people. The present troubles of China not only show us our duty to humanity, but revive many historic and traditional memories uniting us with that country in its hour of sorrow.

The President :

Translation : M. Garay, delegate of Panama, will address the Assembly.

M. Garay (Panama) :

Translation : On behalf of the delegations from Latin America, which have asked me to act as their spokesman, and on behalf of my own country, I desire to express the feelings of solidarity which prompt us to support the draft resolution proposed by the British delegation.

In all our Latin-American countries there are large Chinese communities, and we therefore have friendly and business relations with the great Chinese nation and its Government. Hence, we sympathise with all our heart in China's misfortune, and hope that the resolution the Assembly will pass may be fruitful in happy results for that country, which to-day is passing through a period of such deep distress.

The President :

Translation : From the speeches to which we have listened, I conclude that the whole Assembly accepts the British proposal, and, if no one has any objection, I shall interpret the silence of the Assembly as a sign that it intends to adopt this resolution unanimously, and thus give the Republic of China a token of its warm sympathy.

The draft resolution submitted by the British delegation was unanimously adopted.

The President :

Translation : I shall also request the representative of the Chinese Republic to be so good as to convey to his Government the sentiments which this Assembly has expressed by unanimously adopting this resolution.

There is no doubt that, in the presence of the sufferings of China, the whole world will promptly make the gesture for which these sufferings call.

22. — COMPOSITION OF THE AGENDA COMMITTEE.

The President :

Translation : Before passing to the next point on our agenda, I have a communication to make.

The delegation of Haiti has just informed me that M. Dantès Bellegarde, who appears on the list of delegates as first delegate of Haiti, will not be able to come to Geneva to take part in the work of the present session.

Yesterday morning, the Assembly, in anticipation of M. Bellegarde's arrival, appointed the delegate of Haiti, upon my suggestion, as a member of the Agenda Committee, and that Committee, at its meeting yesterday afternoon, elected M. Bellegarde its Chairman.

Since M. Bellegarde cannot take part in the work of the present session, the Assembly will have to appoint someone else to be a member of the Agenda Committee. I propose the first delegate of Haiti, who has taken M. Bellegarde's place, M. Constantin Mayard.

If my proposal is adopted by the Assembly, M. Mayard will take M. Bellegarde's place as a member of the Agenda Committee. That Committee, at its next meeting, will have to elect a Chairman in the place of M. Bellegarde. As soon as the Chairman of the Agenda Committee has been appointed, he will be asked to serve on the General Committee of the Assembly.

If no one has any objection, I shall consider this proposal adopted.

The proposal was adopted.

23. — REPORT ON THE WORK OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS SINCE THE ELEVENTH SESSION OF THE ASSEMBLY : CONTINUATION OF THE DISCUSSION.

The President :

Translation : The next item on the agenda is the continuation of the general discussion on the report on the work of the League since the eleventh session of the Assembly.

M. Beelaerts van Blokland, first delegate of the Netherlands, will address the Assembly.

M. Beelaerts van Blokland (Netherlands) :

Translation : The circumstances in which the present Assembly is meeting are far from encouraging. On all hands we are threatened with financial and economic disorder, depression and distress. There are some, even, who already see on the horizon the spectre of a new war, which only shows how far astray people can go when they wilfully shut their eyes to the common interests of humanity.

For is not war largely responsible for the chaos in which we are involved? Does not the period through which we are passing prove, if proof were necessary, that, in the international community, essentially interdependent as it now is, violence inevitably has the effect of dislocating the whole machinery of world organisation? Another war would most surely render the obstacles in the way of a return to prosperity insurmountable. The only ray of hope in this economic slough in which we are floundering is the certainty that the peoples are becoming more and more alive to the stupidity of war. They are beginning to realise that war, as a means of satisfying national aspirations, is outdated, and that the community of States has no choice but to co-operate or perish.

We are witnesses of a movement of increasing rapprochement between States in an endeavour to find some means of bringing about constructive co-operation. For the moment, contact is principally in the field in which there is greatest need of it, but which at the same time presents the greatest difficulties — the economic and financial field. Small wonder that the League's work feels the effects of that movement.

The Assembly and the Council, in so far as they were called upon to promote the necessary contacts, may appear now to be playing a relatively less important rôle than before. Only the superficial spectator, however, will be disturbed by that fact or will see in it a diminution of the part played by the League. The League is merely the external image, the form in which the union between States is continually evolving. Anything that promotes that evolution at the same time strengthens the League ; and, while there is reason to feel disappointment at the results achieved by some of the Conferences and Commissions which have met under the League's auspices, it would be a mistake to blame the League for lack of success.

The League's task is to encourage international activities, but that it can only do in so far as its Members allow it. If no progress has been made, the fault lies with the Governments responsible, not with the League.

Everyone is so much concerned with economic difficulties and efforts to find a solution for them that it is only natural that the organic problems with which we have been concerned here during the last few years should appear to have been relegated to the background. It would be unwise, however, to neglect those problems, since they remain supremely important from the standpoint of organisation.

Let us therefore continue to devote our attention to developing the means of preventing war, to bring into harmony the Paris Pact and the Covenant and to continuing the work for the progressive codification of international law. All these problems are important, and the Assembly will not have met in vain if it succeeds in facilitating the solution of any one of them.

The financial and economic difficulties, however, admit of no delay. The Assembly is confronted with what is now the most urgent task of all. By giving proof of the spirit of co-operation which should inspire us all, it will stimulate the efforts made on every hand, whether within the League or outside it, to bring order out of economic and financial chaos.

There are technical problems of the greatest difficulty involved which call for the co-operation of the most highly qualified experts of every country. But to carry through this work, as recent discussions in the Commission for European Union and its Sub-Committees have shown only too clearly, technique is not enough ; what is chiefly wanted is mutual confidence.

Confidence is like security ; constantly speaking about it is not the best way of achieving it. Nevertheless, an atmosphere of mutual confidence in which each tries to understand the difficulties of the others is an essential condition for the comprehension of economic problems and the only condition that can justify any hope of finding a solution for them.

That was the atmosphere that prevailed when the Oslo Convention was concluded, when the Scandinavian States, Belgium, Luxemburg and the Netherlands showed their desire to put into practice the principles underlying the economic action of the League and thus contribute their share towards the development of the international spirit.

Nor is it only in the economic domain that it becomes necessary to consider the needs and the feelings of other nations and the difficulties with which their Governments are faced. We all have our national interests, our legitimate national aspirations, but we must remember that other nations too have theirs, and that it is their right and their duty to consider them.

The question is, then, to reconcile these various aims. We cannot hope to do so unless we approach the problem in a spirit of equity — I might almost say of impartiality — and with the fixed intention of obtaining lasting results, lasting in that they give satisfaction, as far as possible, to all the parties concerned.

The present situation is serious, but it is not hopeless. The strength of the destructive forces must not be over-estimated. Former ages have had their economic crises and have surmounted them. Why should we not succeed to-day, at a time when the difficulties have, it is true, increased and a much larger section of the world is affected by the crisis, but when, on the other hand, the unprecedented technical equipment of the international community is at the disposal of those in search of a common solution ?

Public opinion is beginning to be aware of the solidarity of nations and to see that the prosperity of one State cannot be secured at the expense of other States.

It is not enough, however, for Governments to note with satisfaction the progress of public opinion. Traditions of narrow national egoism have a strong hold on the mind of the people, and nations are easily led astray by the age-old spirit of rivalry and domination. It is the duty of statesmen not to allow Governments to be carried away by passing currents of opinion, but to stand firm and to guide public opinion in the direction of organised peace. To risk a temporary loss of favour is better than to incur the condemnation of posterity.

In considering all the possible means of contributing towards the solution of these various difficulties, it is natural to think first and foremost of the Disarmament Conference convened for next year. The extent of the saving that could be brought about if the Conference reached an agreement on a tangible reduction of armaments is obvious, but the true importance of such a reduction lies elsewhere. There is no better way of promoting mutual confidence between States than by fulfilling the promise contained in Article 8 of the Covenant.

We must realise that the nations, disappointed at the slow rate of progress, are more than ever turning their attention towards this first Disarmament Conference. They are asking us for deeds at last, and without further delay.

The Netherlands Press has just got up a petition among its readers over 18 years of age in favour of international disarmament, to convince the coming Conference that the world is expecting results from its meeting. Nearly two and a-half millions — more than half the adult population of the Netherlands — have signed the petition. That result is remarkable, but, in other countries, I am sure, similar results could be obtained.

A voice is being raised throughout the world demanding something more than peace. It calls for the preservation of our civilisation, the preservation of the supreme heritage, material and spiritual, of mankind.

We cannot afford to ignore that voice, nor can we evade co-operation, which, in the evolution of the world, has become a vital condition of society.

The President :

Translation : M. Pusta, delegate of Estonia, will address the Assembly.

M. Pusta (Estonia) :

Translation : The Commission of Enquiry for European Union decided, at its meeting on September 5th last, that the special proposals by delegates to which the Drafting Committee of the Commission of Enquiry was unable to give special attention would be communicated in full to the Assembly. Thus we have before us the proposal of M. Tônisson, first delegate of Estonia, inviting the Governments to promote by all suitable means — Press, education, propaganda, on the screen and by wireless — the broadcasting, among the general public, of the idea of European Union. I should like to support that proposal.

I agree with M. Tônisson that it is absolutely necessary to broadcast, among the general public, the idea of European Union, as in modern democratic States it is in the last resort the public that governs. I would even go so far as to ask the Assembly to supplement the proposal by a second resolution. The Commission of Enquiry for European Union would, in my opinion, be doing useful work wholly in keeping with its terms of reference if it decided to study the problem of the constitution of the European Union in the strict sense of the term. In other words, it should extend the terms of reference, not only of the Commission of Enquiry, which is far from having completed its work, but also of its Organisation Sub-Committee, by requesting it to do for European Union what it has just done for the Commission of Enquiry — namely, to study its organisation.

I am well aware that my proposal may appear somewhat bold; but I should nevertheless like to try and convince you that present circumstances are such as to permit — nay, to demand — the consideration of such an enquiry.

There are two kinds of arguments in support of this proposal — legal arguments and arguments based on fact. First, my proposal is legally justified as being entirely in conformity with the fundamental resolution adopted by the eleventh Assembly, which set up the Commission of Enquiry in 1930.

This resolution set up the Commission for the express purpose of studying the question of European Union and, according to the terms of paragraph 4, to "pursue the enquiry which has already been begun, and of which the French memorandum of May 17th, 1930, and the replies thereto constitute the first elements".

I venture to draw your special attention to this passage. You are aware that, in the documents described as forming the basis of our enquiry — the French memorandum and the twenty-six notes from Governments — an important place is accorded to questions connected with the constitution of the Union. Consequently, in recommending the Commission of Enquiry to pursue the examination initiated by the memorandum, the Assembly, I feel sure, ipso facto placed on the programme of the Commission the question of the methods of constituting and organising the future European Union.

We have not yet begun this work, and we must do so if we are to fulfil the requirements of the resolution of September 17th, 1930, which is our constitutional charter.

That is not the only argument in support of my proposal; it can also be justified by facts, and in two ways. It is, in my view, doubly important to proceed with this enquiry — in the first place, because public opinion is now inclined to regard the idea of Pan-Europa as having been abandoned by the Commission of Enquiry itself; and, secondly, because, under the stress of circumstances, our Commission has exceeded the strict limits of the enquiry as defined by the resolution of September 17th, 1930.

In view of the increasing difficulties presented by the economic depression, the Commission of Enquiry has left on one side the question of the constitution of the Union in order to concentrate on the most urgent items of the programme. We are in no way criticising this decision of the Commission. On the contrary, we should like it to devote more time to urgent problems which are of especial importance for Europe, such as agricultural credits and unemployment.

As it was quite rightly said in the last memorandum of the French Government, the main thing is to resist the temptation to a dispersal of effort, and to endeavour to co-ordinate effort, to concentrate on a certain number of definite questions and to work along these lines with energy and perseverance. Again, when these problems connected with the economic depression were studied, the Commission took certain decisions which may be regarded as rather different from the mass of the resolutions normally adopted. I would ask you to re-read and meditate upon resolution No. 2 adopted at the second session of the Commission, especially its final passage. As you know, it invites the authorised representatives of the European countries affected (grain-exporting countries of Central and Eastern Europe and European importing countries) to meet at an early date and make a common effort to find means of disposing of the grain surplus at present available.

The meeting was to be called on the sole initiative of the President of the Commission of Enquiry for European Union, and its conclusions were to be put into effect without further reference to the Commission. There is, I think, no need to emphasise the particular significance of this resolution as compared with the normal resolutions of the Commission, which are in the nature of invitations, recommendations or vœux, or which, when they do give rise to a decision, merely entail the setting up of a committee of experts — that is to say, the institution of an additional enquiry.

Resolution No. 2 provides, on the other hand, for a meeting convened on the sole initiative of the President of the Commission of Enquiry with a view to achieving rapid practical results without further reference to the Commission, and we can thus say that these are resolutions of a "customary" character which definitely lie outside the limits of the enquiry.

This resolution No. 2 might be compared with resolution No. 8 adopted at the same session, which is of the same nature inasmuch as it constitutes a real international instrument of peace, adopted and signed by the various Foreign Ministers.

Must we therefore conclude that resolutions of this "customary" character are to be condemned in future? Not at all. On the contrary, we are of opinion that they must be recognised as regular and are to be recommended, inasmuch as they prove that there already exists, in the form of the Commission of Enquiry, a European Union in embryo — that is to say, groups of representatives of the European Governments able to give definite undertakings on behalf of their Governments.

"Policy first", said M. Briand, using a formula which he afterwards interpreted to mean that the examination of economic questions and their solution should be carried out, not by experts, but by duly accredited delegates. In M. Briand's opinion, that is what constitutes the chief progress made by the European Union.

Do not let us destroy the effect of that progress, and, above all, do not let us appear to abandon it, since we are commending to public opinion the idea of European Union on which it is based.

I therefore propose that the Assembly should adopt among its resolutions one to the effect that its Commission of Enquiry for European Union should, on the basis of the Assembly resolution of September 17th, 1930, study the various possible methods of constituting and organising the future European Union.

I have the honour to submit the following draft resolution to the Assembly:

"The Commission of Enquiry for European Union is instructed to include forthwith and permanently in the programme of its work the question of the various possible methods for the constitution and organisation of European Union.

"The Secretariat of the League is instructed to facilitate the task of the Commission of Enquiry by bringing together and collating the existing technical literature on the subject."

The President:

Translation: We have before us a draft resolution submitted by the delegation of Estonia. In accordance with precedent, it will be printed and communicated to the delegations, and suggestions will subsequently be submitted as to the action to be taken upon it.

The continuation of the discussion was adjourned to the next meeting.

The Assembly rose at 5.45 p.m.

24. — FUTURE WORK OF THE COMMISSION OF ENQUIRY FOR EUROPEAN UNION: DRAFT RESOLUTION PROPOSED BY THE ESTONIAN DELEGATION: REFERENCE TO THE AGENDA COMMITTEE.

The President:

Translation: The Assembly will remember, at its meeting yesterday afternoon, a draft resolution was submitted by M. Pusta, delegate of Estonia, concerning the future work of the Commission of Enquiry for European Union. This draft resolution reads as follows:

"The Commission of Enquiry for European Union is instructed to include forthwith and permanently in the programme of its work the question of the various possible methods for the constitution and organisation of European Union.

"The Secretariat of the League is instructed to facilitate the task of the Commission of Enquiry by bringing together and collating the existing technical literature on the subject."

In accordance with precedent, I propose that the Assembly should submit this draft resolution for preliminary examination to the Agenda Committee, which will be asked to make suggestions as to the action to be taken with regard to it.

The President's proposal was adopted.

25. — REPORT ON THE WORK OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS SINCE THE ELEVENTH SESSION OF THE ASSEMBLY: CONTINUATION OF THE DISCUSSION.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the continuation of the general discussion of the report on the work of the League of Nations since the last session of the Assembly.

Sir Brojendra Mitter, first delegate of India, will address the Assembly.

Sir Brojendra Mitter (India):

The members of the Indian delegation are convinced believers in the ideals of the League. They have been consistently loyal to those ideals and are keenly anxious for their progressive realisation. There are some who say that very little achievement can be claimed on the credit side of the League's account. I dispute that. What is it that the League is attempting to do? The war spirit, which dominated nations for centuries, cannot all at once be transformed, as by a magician's wand, into international goodwill. What the League can legitimately claim is the creation of the appropriate atmosphere. Simultaneously with the creation of that atmosphere, the League has started on a career of winning victories of peace by fighting ignorance, disease, economic maladjustment, and other maladies which afflict the body politic.

Looking at the agenda of the present session of the Assembly, we cannot fail to be struck by its variety and importance. I can assure the Assembly that the Indian delegation will endeavour to make its humble contribution towards the solution of the problems before us in a spirit of comradeship and goodwill towards all.

The problem which looms largest is, of course, the reduction of armaments. We hope that the Conference convened for next February will achieve definite results. We rely on the great Powers to instal trust in place of suspicion, and to establish their moral pre-eminence as they have already established their material pre-eminence. The resources, both moral and material, which are bound to be released by such a reduction of armaments will be available for prosecuting vigorously the activities on which the advancement of humanity to higher and still higher planes of existence depends.

The problem of the world slump is no less important than the problem of disarmament. On that subject, the Indian delegation had the privilege last year of moving a resolution in the Second Committee proposing an intensive and continuous study under the auspices of the League. We are glad to find the results of that enquiry before us. Nevertheless, since last year world depression has increased in intensity. While we fully appreciate the merits of the study which has been made, we propose this year to recommend not only a continuation of the study, but an investigation of the means of implementing the same.

While speaking on this topic, I might be permitted to express our high appreciation of the proposals recently made by the President of the United States of America. Here is a silver lining to the cloud which is hanging over the world. Here is the definitive new factor in the situation for which the world has been waiting. Let us see to it that we make the most of it without cavil or quibble and with every resource of self-help as a first step towards re-establishing the economic equilibrium of the world.

I have spoken so far of expectations · it is always more pleasant to speak of achievements. The co-operation between the League Health Organisation and India promises to bear good fruit in one important respect. India has been in close touch with the Far-Eastern Bureau at Singapore, and the interchange of views and the comparative study of the problems of tropical disease is being carried on in the true spirit of the League for the benefit of humanity. A new milestone was reached last year by the publication of the report of the Malaria Commission, which will be of considerable value to India and others intimately concerned, owing to the welcome suggestions which it contains. We are proud that the report bears eloquent testimony to the study of malaria which has been carried on in India and which has yielded important results.

The next topic on which I wish at this stage to make some observations is intellectual co-operation. In the whole range of questions coming before the Assembly, this subject arouses a peculiar enthusiasm in a delegate from India. The vast evolution of culture, education and philosophy in India qualifies us in a special measure to co-operate with other countries on this plane in the development of the international spirit. While we are ready to receive new ideas, we are equally ready to bring into the common pool the experience of centuries. The whole programme of intellectual co-operation makes a strong appeal to India, whether it is the development of inter-university relations, the international co-ordination of libraries and museums, or the translation of classics. I may refer to the activities of at least two Indian institutions in this direction, the Asiatic Society of Bengal and the Indian Museum in Calcutta. The former, by bringing out authorised versions of classics and supplying manuscripts to foreign learned societies, and the latter by exchanging specimens with sister bodies in Europe and America, are doing a signal se vice in the field of intellectual co-operation. It may not be out of place to mention the cosmopolitan institution established by India's poet, Rabindranath Tagore, at Bolpur, in Bengal, the main object of which is the synthesis of the culture of the East and the West.

India is also keenly interested in the activities of the League in the field of the unification of laws. We appreciate the League's efforts in the matter of the unification of the laws on bills of exchange, promissory notes and cheques. For our part, we have recently brought our law on the sale of goods into line with the law in England and America; the law of the Dominions is practically the same. Here, as in fact in other branches of commercial law, the lead of the League will be warmly appreciated in India.

There is one aspect of the work done by the League during the past year that we in India find particularly satisfying. It has often fallen to the lot of the Indian delegation to criticise the League on the ground that its activities have taken little account of the countries east of Suez. We note with pleasure the very substantial effort the League has made this year, and is continuing to make, to come to the rescue of that great country China in the midst of her troubles. We further note the proposal to establish an office of the League in India, which should do much to increase the knowledge of the activities of the League among our population of 350 million inhabitants. We also express our cordial appreciation of the visit to India under the auspices of the League, of that eminent economist, Sir Arthur Salter.

Nevertheless, before I resume my seat, there is a note of warning that I feel I must sound. Though it is true that this year the activities of the League have covered a larger area than before, its European activities would appear to us to have to some extent trespassed on the purely diplomatic field. In our view, the League machinery ought not to be employed for the purpose of arriving at regional agreements in the economic sphere. No doubt the urgency of the economic crisis accounts for this development, but we in Asia share in this crisis, and, to take an example, I do not think that the Agricultural Mortgage Credit Company should have been set up by means of League machinery in a form limited to European countries without Asiatic countries having an opportunity of putting forward their views at this Assembly.

I note the statement in a letter from the Chairman of the Sub-Committee of Economic Experts, printed at the head of the report of that Sub-Committee, to the effect that all members of the Sub-Committee are anxious that the economic rapprochement, which they hope to establish between the countries of Europe, far from proving harmful to the economic relations existing between Europe and the other parts of the world, will, on the contrary, have the effect of intensifying those relations and rendering them closer and more beneficial to both sides. I hope this will indeed be the case; but, so long as Asiatic countries remain outside the scope of this rapprochement, so long must they look on with some anxiety.

The President:

Translation: M. Yoshizawa, first delegate of Japan, will address the Assembly.

M. Yoshizawa (Japan):

Translation: Among the important international questions which, since the constitution of the League, have called for its watchful attention and indefatigable efforts, the problem of the reduction of armaments undoubtedly occupies the first place. After unavoidably lengthy preparatory work, we are now in the happy position of being able to look forward to the coming conference for the reduction of armaments as the crowning of our efforts, and I must warmly congratulate the Preparatory Commission for the Conference, which has thus brilliantly achieved its task after heavy work extending over a period of five years.

Thanks to the Commission, we now have before us a draft Convention for the limitation and reduction of armaments, which may usefully be taken as a basis for the work of the Conference in 1932.

I need hardly say here that it is the earnest wish of the Japanese Government to consolidate world peace and to further the welfare of humanity by means of an equitable agreement on the reduction of armaments. My Government is willing to participate in the coming Conference and to do all in its power to contribute to its success. As everyone knows, the Japanese Government, acting always in the spirit underlying the work of disarmament, endeavoured to bring about a reduction in naval armaments at the successive Conferences held at Washington, Geneva and London, and the agreements concluded are being loyally carried out. In the field of land disarmament also, it has, on its own initiative, already effected considerable reductions. Indeed, whereas before the war there were in Japan twenty-one army divisions, apart from certain independent units, in 1922 the effectives of each division were greatly reduced and in 1925 four divisions were disbanded. Consequently, there are at present only seventeen divisions, with effectives representing not more than 65 per cent of the pre-war effectives, a figure which corresponds to 0.28 per cent of the population.

On the other hand, as our army did not participate in the operations on the European battlefields, its war material and air force are not adequate for the requirements of national defence, and my Government has therefore been obliged to readjust that state of affairs. While willing to do all in its power, in full agreement with the participating Governments, to make a success of the general Conference, the Japanese Government earnestly desires that the Powers whose situation is closely bound up with the national defence of Japan should make similar efforts for the conclusion and loyal execution of the Disarmament Convention.

In view of these considerations, the Japanese Government intends to put forward at the coming Conference such proposals as seem to it most equitable, in accordance with the spirit of Article 8 of the League Covenant, and having regard also to the present position of our armaments and our peculiar situation in the Far East.

It is particularly desirable that the Disarmament Conference should yield positive results at a time like the present, when the world is passing through a period of general economic depression of exceptional gravity. Opinions may differ as to the causes of that depression, but it can hardly be denied that one of its causes is to be found in the fact that numbers of countries have, in their over-anxiety to protect themselves economically, one after the other adopted a policy incompatible with the principle of liberty of trade based on a rational division of international work.

Immediately after the world war, a tendency to erect Customs barriers was observed in nearly every country. In order to combat this tendency, the League convened the Economic Conference of 1927, which exhorted the States to abolish all obstacles to liberty of trade. Subsequently, by means of a Convention for the Abolition of Import and Export Prohibitions, a Convention for a Customs Truce, and other attempts to solve various problems affecting world economic co-operation, the League endeavoured to create an international atmosphere essentially favourable to liberty of trade between the members of the international community.

Those efforts on the part of the League should certainly not be under-estimated. Nevertheless, we must admit that, when the world crisis came — that is, in the course of the last few years — there was revealed more and more clearly a tendency to restrict or prohibit the import of foreign commodities or to prevent their import in actual fact by increasing Customs duties on the pretext that such were necessary to protect the home trade and industry, make good a budget deficit or remedy unemployment. There are even signs of nations going further still and ignoring or restricting the application of the most-favoured-nation clause in commercial treaties, or other similar guarantees.

There is thus a risk of serious interference with the principle of equality of opportunity or non-discrimination which had hitherto been accepted by the nations. Moreover, that tendency not only jeopardises international obligations, but constitutes a serious obstacle to the development of the productive resources of each country, causing international trade depression and aggravating the economic crisis from which the whole world is now suffering.

At the present time, the various countries have become so interdependent economically that any policy of economic isolation pursued by certain countries inevitably entails tremendous difficulties for all the other countries which, in their international trade, adopt the principle of freedom of trade. If an increasing number of States strike out on a line which must inevitably lead to the abandonment of a liberal policy, such a tendency can only be described as deplorable from the standpoint of international economic peace.

I wish to take this opportunity of drawing the attention of all countries to these grave considerations and to express the sincere hope that the League will use every means at its disposal and exert its prestige in order to mitigate, as far as possible, this highly regrettable tendency.

As regards the question of the amendment of the Covenant of the League of Nations in order to bring it into harmony with the Pact of Paris, the Japanese delegation last year expressed certain doubts as to the desirability of such a measure. My Government sees no reason to modify its original view, but I am glad to be able to tell you that it is prepared to accede, in principle, to the draft amendments embodied in the report of the First Committee of the last Assembly, it being understood that those amendments shall in no way affect the legitimate exercise of the right of self-defence.

In conclusion, I should like to take this opportunity of expressing our great satisfaction that the League of Nations has responded to the appeal of our neighbour, China, and that a plan has been prepared and put into execution under the supervision of the Council — a manifest demonstration of the League spirit of universality and solidarity.

More than ever before, the League must mobilise its full resources to secure cordial collaboration and must prevail upon all States to collaborate in eradicating, as far as possible, the evils from which the whole world is suffering. I for one earnestly hope for the progress and success of all the League's activities.

The President:

Translation: The Hon. Hugh Guthrie, first delegate of Canada, will address the Assembly.

The Hon. Hugh Guthrie (Canada):

As one who has not hitherto been privileged to participate in the deliberations of the Assembly of the League of Nations, may I express some trepidation and some reserve as I venture to discuss in a general way one or two of the subjects which are prominently mentioned in the report on the work of the League since the eleventh session of the Assembly?

As a representative of the Dominion of Canada, I wish to express the appreciation of the people of that country at the generous manner in which representatives from Canada have hitherto been received and honoured by this Assembly; in particular, may I express the deep appreciation of the Dominion of Canada for the honour which was conferred on Canada by this Assembly in selecting the head of the Canadian delegation, in the person of the Honourable Raoul Dandurand, as the President of the sixth Assembly of the League of Nations. The active interest which Senator Dandurand always manifested in the work of the League gave him a place of influence and of prominence in the councils and deliberations of the League which another may find it well-nigh impossible to attain.

May I pause at this point in my remarks to make a formal presentation to the League of Nations on behalf of the Dominion of Canada, of a portrait in oils of the Honourable Raoul Dandurand, the President of the sixth Assembly of the League of Nations. This portrait is by Baschet, the celebrated French artist; it will be placed on view in the Library of the Secretariat of the League, and I think you will agree with me that the artist has succeeded in placing upon canvas a remarkable likeness, an admirable portrait, of a great Canadian whose success in the councils of this Assembly is a matter of very deep satisfaction to the Dominion of Canada. Mr. President, I beg of you to accept this portrait on behalf of the League of Nations, and at the same time may I express the hope that the good example now set by Canada may be followed by other countries which have also enjoyed the proud distinction of having one of their representatives occupy the office of President of the Assembly?

I am aware that the absence of Senator Dandurand from this Assembly will be a matter of great regret to many of those present.

While much might be said in favour of a certain degree of continuity in the national representation in this Assembly, regard must nevertheless be had to the changing political conditions in a democratic country such as Canada. It is of primary importance that the views of the Government of each country upon the various questions which arise should be authoritatively laid before the Assembly.

It is a matter of congratulation and satisfaction to all the Members of the League that, notwithstanding the infusion of a certain amount of new blood annually in this Assembly, yet the names of many great statesmen who have hitherto largely guided its deliberations are still found upon the roll of the twelfth Assembly. General recognition will always be accorded to that group of great men from many countries who, through their knowledge, their efforts and experience, are regarded by the world at large as leaders in the work of the League of Nations.

It would be the merest platitude to affirm in this Assembly that the basic principle upon which the League of Nations was originally founded was the maintenance of world peace, the negation of war, the adjustment and settlement of international differences by peaceful arbitration; yet the League, in pursuit of its purposes, has found it necessary to explore and examine many customs, many systems, many conditions which prevail in various parts of the world and which at first glance may not appear to be very directly concerned with world peace, but which have a very direct influence on world conditions. Matters pertaining to trade, finance, agriculture, industrial conditions and unemployment, health and the like, have all received the special care and study of the League, and we admit that in many respects, in regard to these subjects, great advances have been made through the efforts of the League.

While I agree that all these subjects indirectly concern the greater question of peace, yet I venture to assert that, in the eyes of the world — in the opinion of the man in the street — such incidental questions might well be postponed for final adjustment, until the supreme, the all-important, question of world peace shall have been placed upon a more firm and satisfactory basis than that upon which it rests to-day.

In my judgment, by far the most important features of the report which has been presented to this Assembly are those which directly or indirectly suggest the question of world peace, and the most important subjects upon the agenda for the consideration of this Assembly are undoubtedly the questions of peace, arbitration and disarmament, with all that these terms involve.

Let it not be supposed that one in my humble capacity is inclined to be either critical or censorius in his remarks. I assure you that nothing is further from my mind. No one realises more than I do, or appreciates more highly than I do, the long, the enduring efforts of that great body of statesmen who, for the sake of peace, have unselfishly given of their best, and whose successive efforts we expect will soon be crowned with a real achievement for the security of world peace.

If one may be permitted to emphasise a platitude, let me repeat that the maintenance of world peace is the fundamental principle of the League of Nations. While throughout the intervening years the League has performed many useful services and has to its credit many achievements for the benefit of mankind, while it has erected a wonderful superstructure for the dissemination of valuable information for the guidance and improvement of the nations of the world, yet the success or failure of the League in the judgment of the world will always be based upon a single standard: Has it succeeded in the abolition of war and the establishment of peace? I assume that you all realise that such will be the supreme test.

It will be recognised that any contribution which the Dominion of Canada may be able to make in support of the maintenance of world peace, or more particularly in support of the principle of "arbitration, security and disarmament", will be in the nature of deeply sympathetic co-operation in whatever plan may be finally determined as the best means of achieving the desired end.

In no sense of the term can Canada be deemed a militaristic country. Geographically, Canada is rather favourably situated, reasonably remote from active interest or definite concern with the difficult problems confronting many of the great nations in other parts of the globe. While we possess a vast territory, our population is but 10,000,000, composed for the most part of descendants of Great Britain and France, but including also considerable numbers from all countries in Europe.

The armaments of Canada are practically negligible. We maintain only such military, naval and air forces as are necessary for the maintenance of law and order within our own border. Canada has no need for greater armaments. She has but one international boundary. The United States of America, a great and friendly country, is our only immediate neighbour, and we are convinced that the peaceful aims and aspirations of that great country both rival and support our own.

It will be recognised at a glance that there is but one course for Canada to urge in regard to arbitration and disarmament. Our aims and interests in this respect all point in the same direction, and both in this Assembly and in the Conference soon to be held Canada will urge, with all the influence at her command, the acceptance by the nations of the world of the general treaty of disarmament mentioned in the report, which treaty will be submitted to the Conference in February next.

While I do not seek to minimise the important problems which confront many great nations in regard to the proposal for general disarmament throughout the world, it is the belief of the Government of Canada that, under the treaties and covenants now subsisting between the various countries, and with the extension of the principle of arbitration to embrace all causes of international dispute, general disarmament upon a very extensive scale may take place within reasonable time with reasonable security to all nations concerned.

Let me briefly state some of the grounds upon which my assertion is based. In the first place, the League of Nations, after ten years of effort, has created a new international atmosphere, new international ideals; it has established a general desire for peace, and an aversion of war. The willingness to promote peace has become a dominant idea throughout the world. It has been of slow growth, it is true. It was germinated in the destruction, sorrow, and awfulness of the great war. It has been nourished, fostered and encouraged by the League's activities.

We are convinced that, throughout the world to-day, there exists a more marked desire for international co-operation than has ever existed heretofore. Let us strive to take the fullest advantage of the favourable conditions which undoubtedly exist. The foundation for a permanent superstructure of arbitration, security and disarmament has been well and truly laid through the efforts of the great statesmen who have devoted themselves to this noble object under the auspices of the League. Let us continue to build upon that foundation.

In the second place, I submit that ample safeguards and guarantees for all nations and for all reasonable purposes will be found in the Covenant of the League of Nations, and in the subsidiary treaties and covenants which have been accepted by so many nations. Most of the nations of the world stand to-day pledged to the principle of disarmament and arbitration; most of the nations of the world have expressly renounced recourse to war.

Article 8 of the Covenant and the preamble of Part V of the Treaty of Peace clearly indicate a general scheme of disarmament, in the manner prescribed in the documents themselves. The Locarno Treaty of September 1926, which directly concerns Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Belgium, Poland, and Czechoslovakia, reaffirmed in the most definite manner the binding force and effect of Article 8 of the Covenant. The Locarno Treaty further declared that aggressive war was a crime, also that all international controversies should be settled by arbitration or other pacific means. While it is true that the Locarno Treaty is in some important respects limited in its application, it remains an outstanding agreement between the States which were parties to it, in favour of arbitration and disarmament, coupled with reasonable guarantees for security.

Permit me also to mention another international agreement of outstanding importance to the whole world. I refer to the Briand-Kellogg Treaty, otherwise known as the Pact of Paris, which came into effect in July 1929, and has now been accepted by almost all the States Members of the League. In my humble opinion, this particular treaty constitutes an enormous contribution to the peace and security of the world. It most expressly condemns recourse to war and renounces war as a means for the settlement of international disputes.

The importance of the Briand-Kellogg Pact in relation to the peace of the world cannot be overestimated. The fact that it has obtained almost universal approval throughout the world, and also the fact that it was projected to a large extent and has been approved by the United States of America, give to it a value and consequence in world affairs which must be recognised. I assume, therefore, that it will be the duty of this Assembly, either now or hereafter, to effect such amendments in the Covenant of the League of Nations as may be necessary to harmonise any conflict or repugnance which may now exist between the provisions of the Covenant and the Pact, so that the essential elements of both may be maintained to the fullest possible extent. Canada will readily accede to all such amendments.

One other important bulwark for the security of nations and the maintenance of world peace will be found in that forum which has already been established under the authority of the League and is termed the Permanent Court of International Justice. What has come to be known as the Optional Clause and the General Act of 1928 have now been accepted by so many nations that one may predict with some confidence that, in the not too distant future, the jurisdiction of this tribunal will become worldwide in extent and also all-embracing in the nature and character of the subjects upon which it is authorised to pronounce. Such, at least, is the earnest hope and desire of a great many nations which have already accepted both the Optional Clause and the General Act, of which the Dominion of Canada is one.

Before concluding, permit me to make one further observation. The report contains a reference to the work of the Commission of Enquiry for European Union, in regard to which Commission and the proposals which it has made, the Dominion of Canada claims to have a special interest as one of the great grain-exporting countries of the world. I realise that this is not the appropriate occasion to enter upon a discussion of this important question. I desire, however, to reserve expressly the fullest right to discuss this matter when the occasion arises, and in the meantime it will be understood that Canada is in no way committed to the Committee's report or to its proposals.

The President :

Translation : M. Ghika, first delegate of Roumania, will address the Assembly.

M. Ghika (Roumania) :

Translation : For all who are following with deep interest the League's work and its progress towards the consolidation of peace — which is its raison d'être as well as the supreme goal towards which the efforts of Member States are directed — the annual report on the work of this international institution since the last Assembly in 1930 gives some indications as to the value of the progress made and the prospects for the near future. Naturally enough, as time passes and we leave behind us the early years of the League's inception and growth, years characterised by the large-scale work of the constructive period, it may seem, at first sight, as though the League's activity had lessened in scope, if not in effectiveness ; it may seem as though, while not reduced to marking time, its progress had been slower and more tentative.

In reality, a new period of activity has begun, a period of adaptation and readjustment, to clear the ground in preparation for the solution of certain important questions of the day. Among these, disarmament is in the foreground, dominating every other question and demanding of the Member States a joint effort of mutual comprehension and willing sacrifice in the cause of peace. If ultimate success is to be assured, all the States collaborating must be imbued with a sincere and infectious desire to find some common ground.

I have no wish to hurt anyone's feelings or to dismiss without examination opposing views expressed in all good faith and with a warmth of would-be persuasive conviction ; but I confess that, in my opinion, to use security and disarmament as two distinct terms, denoting opposite conceptions, in a definite order of priority, is equivalent to stylistic pleonasm. It is possible to conceive a priori of a community unarmed and without need for arms, because its social order ensures absolute security ; but it is useless to suppose that such a community could throw down the arms it requires for defence — especially on the morrow of a veritable holocaust — if security does not exist or is found to be precarious and ineffectual.

Here I am merely repeating what many have said before me with the voice of authority — that, in the present international situation, security is a function of the confidence which each State inspires in the others. If we mean to shake hands instead of shaking our fists at one another, we must first have the open heart which calls for the open and outstretched hand. That is the magic key which, in a better future, is to open, not the gates of a visionary other-world paradise of the nations of to-morrow, but the doors of a real League of Nations. Compared with it, the League that brings us together in annual session is merely a framework, a half-finished building whose façade bears a symbolic device, and within which we are trying to consolidate peace in an atmosphere of hope and encouragement.

Every Government, in addition to the incessant work of the chancelleries, must mobilise the living forces within the nation in an effort to draw the peoples together. A determination to remove misunderstanding and win hearts beyond the national frontiers must be supported by enlightened public opinion, guided aright by the educational and more particularly the moral elements in each State. These have a real mission to fulfil in school and church. They must see that, to help the League in its work, there is an ever-widening circle of agreement among the masses — under the impulsion of Governments already won over to the cause — as regards the measures which States are contemplating and adopting to secure a lasting peace through disarmament.

Nothing can replace confidence as a guarantee of peace throughout the world ; and, until the elected representatives of the peoples and the acts of Governments are everywhere inspired by that spirit, pacts of non-aggression, which have multiplied apace during the past few years, are rather in the nature of pegs staking out a new road than fixed milestones on the triumphal way to the temple of peace. Such as they are, they have their value, which must be recognised and welcomed as a happy omen.

Roumania, for her part, follows an unswerving policy which the representatives of successive Governments have proclaimed from this platform. She is prepared to conclude pacts of this kind with all States, near or far, without exception. For she is sincerely determined to be a stable element in the maintenance of peace in Eastern Europe ; and she feels that her policy, to which she consistently and confidently adheres, fully safeguards the work of peace.

To sound once more a note of reasoned optimism until the peoples have gained the necessary confidence, I affirm that the League's work of peace is being helped forward by various elements of consolidation based on common interests. The world economic crisis from which the nations of Europe and those beyond the seas are suffering so cruelly provides another favourable element of this kind. True, we should all prefer not to have to test the usefulness of such a form of solidarity, arising as it does from common hardships. Nevertheless, faced with similar economic and financial difficulties, hearing similar cries of distress from across the national frontiers — from factories where work is vanishing into thin air like the smoke from their chimneys, from farms where crops are piling up and rotting for want of purchasers — the nations, feeling themselves a prey to the same evils and day by day becoming increasingly aware of their interdependence, which calls for common self-defence if they are not to perish together, are bestirring themselves. They are making efforts, as yet tentative and isolated, at each new turn of the world crisis, actuated by a common desire — vague at first, but more and more conscious as time goes on — to advance together in search of a way of escape, a means of recovery, a return to normal life and peaceful, fruitful labour.

Roumania, like all the other States, is feeling the repercussions of the world crisis and is sadly regarding her surplus unsold harvests. Accordingly, she is following with the keenest interest the work of the Commission of Enquiry for European Union, the programme of which gives hope of a satisfactory solution. To find a market for the surplus crops from the 1930 harvest, to export future surpluses, to obtain agricultural credits, to regulate production and trade — all these are questions of the utmost importance and touch the very heart of Roumania's daily life. Nor must we forget the Pact of Economic Non-Aggression submitted to the League; it directly bears upon a situation the harassing effects of which Roumania felt last year. Roumania proposes to take part in the League's work during the present session, as at all the previous sessions, in a liberal spirit, a spirit of the most active sympathy. She hopes that her contribution to the common task will be a useful and profitable one and that this year will be marked by real progress in the advance along the difficult road which is to lead us, we hope, by progressively easier stages of more perfect understanding, onwards to the ideal which is the dream of mankind.

26. — CHAIRMANSHIP OF THE AGENDA COMMITTEE.

The President:

Translation: The Assembly will remember that I informed it, at the meeting on September 8th, of the reasons which prevented M. Dantès Bellegarde, delegate of Haiti, from being present at this session and consequently from accepting the Chairmanship of the Agenda Committee to which he had been elected.

The Agenda Committee met yesterday afternoon and elected as its Chairman Dr. L. K. Hyder, delegate of India, whom it had already elected Vice-Chairman. Dr. Hyder is therefore invited, as Chairman of the Agenda Committee, to take his place as a member of the General Committee of the Assembly, to which he will be a most welcome addition.

27. — FUTURE WORK OF THE COMMISSION OF ENQUIRY FOR EUROPEAN UNION: DRAFT RESOLUTION PROPOSED BY THE ESTONIAN DELEGATION: REPORT OF THE AGENDA COMMITTEE.

The President:

Translation: The Assembly will remember that in accordance with the proposal I made at the beginning of yesterday morning's meeting, it decided to refer, to the Agenda Committee, for preliminary examination, the draft resolution submitted by the Estonian delegation concerning the future programme of work of the Commission of Enquiry for European Union.

The report of the Agenda Committee on this matter reads as follows:

> "The Agenda Committee agrees to propose that the Assembly should include this draft resolution in the Agenda of the present session, so as to permit of its examination by the sixth Committee, which would consider it under item 11 of the agenda of the Assembly, relating to the Commission of Enquiry for European Union."

If no one has any objection, I shall consider the report of the Agenda Committee adopted.

The report was adopted.

28. — REPORT ON THE WORK OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS SINCE THE ELEVENTH SESSION OF THE ASSEMBLY: CONTINUATION OF THE DISCUSSION.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the continuation of the general discussion on the report on the work of the League since the last session of the Assembly.

The first speaker on the list, His Excellency M. Lerroux, first delegate of Spain, will address the Assembly.

M. Lerroux (Spain):

Translation: The League of Nations will, I hope, find nothing but cause for congratulation in the change that has taken place in the internal organisation of Spain since the last Assembly. Henceforward, Spain is to be governed no longer forcibly and arbitrarily, but by law and mutual consent. Thus there is complete agreement between the principles of Republican Spain and those of the League. But there is also another reason why the new Spain is profoundly attached to the League. The new Government must devote all its attention to the internal reconstruction of the country on new foundations, and this can be carried through only in an atmosphere of general peace and prosperity. Hence, there is a two-fold guarantee that Spain will co-operate actively, and, I venture to hope, effectively, in your efforts in the cause of peace and right.

You are all familiar with the various reasons why Spain was more or less unaffected by the more direct consequences, both economic and political, of the war. She might have availed herself of this privilege of her historic destiny to sever the bonds of solidarity and, following the classical precept, "cultiver son jardin" — which, as you know, is a most wonderful one. But noblesse oblige, and throughout her history Spain has had too well-established a tradition of universality thus to abandon herself to the part of a disinterested spectator of others' sufferings. Far from that, my country is highly conscious of the bonds that link it with the other countries of Europe, suffering as they are from a serious crisis due undoubtedly to the upheavals of all kinds consequent upon the war; and, in its anxiety to contribute to a solution, it cordially welcomed M. Briand's general efforts to direct European policy towards a closer continental union.

I say it boldly and clearly: though Spain has made herself felt all over the world, and has mingled her blood with that of every race, she feels herself to be essentially a European country, realising the vital part that our ancient continent, fertile and fruitful as it is, plays and must always play in the civilisation, the intellectual progress and the prosperity of the world.

We have therefore followed very closely the proceedings of the Commission of Enquiry for European Union and its sub-commissions and committees — only too happy if, in the course of those proceedings, we could contribute any concrete suggestions to the solution of the grave problems under consideration. Generally speaking, Republican Spain looks for an extension and definition of the right of the impartial technical organisations of the League and the International Labour Office to investigate all political and economic activities which overstep national frontiers. This is true particularly of the development of industrial combines — a desirable development, but one that needs to be watched.

But while Spain, as one of the oldest of European nations, feels an increasing attachment to the old continent and an increasingly intimate concern in its destiny, she can never forget that, in the very year in which, at Granada, she was finally consolidated as a nation, she gave to the world a new continent, which is peopled to-day by twenty nations of her lineage. You will permit the first Minister for Foreign Affairs of Republican Spain to greet from this platform the American peoples of every speech — for all of them, as Americans, owe their existence to Spain — and to tell them that she feels herself more closely united with them than ever before, now that, with identical systems of government, the sole difference between them has ceased to exist. She deeply regrets the absence of a number of American countries — both those which have not seen their way to subscribe to the Covenant, those which have retired, and even those which, though Members of the League, do not come to assist us with their advice. While respecting their various motives, Spain would take upon herself to appeal to them urgently to co-operate constantly and systematically in the noble work of the League, in which those who give always receive.

The new Spain has a profound faith in the League. The inextricable complexity of the problems to be solved, and the multiplicity of committees, too often give rise to jeremiads; and critics, friendly as well as unfriendly, dare to attack the very principles that are responsible for our presence here. But, impatient as we may be to see the world's diseases cured, disappointed as we may be by our lack of success, who would be so unjust as to blame the League — which, after all, is only a method of international co-operation — for failures which are essentially due to the absence of such co-operation?

Spain herself is thoroughly convinced that the world situation demands, not a reduction, but a development of the League; not a restriction, but an extension of its activities; and, above all, not a return to a state of international anarchy and to the system of limited and ephemeral understandings between groups of countries, which at once arouse suspicion in other groups — a barren and dangerous system, as past experience has shown — but a fresh affirmation of the principles of publicity, universality and international co-operation on which the work done at Geneva is founded.

Strong in this faith, Spain is convinced that the day will come when all the nations of the world, including the United States of North America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, will join with us, for those countries are as anxious as the rest of us for peace, and the League is the soundest foundation for the organisation of peace — not only because it is the sole permanent institution that can raise an effective barrier against war, but also because its aim is to eliminate all danger of war by encouraging the habit of international co-operation in all the arts of peace.

For these reasons, the Spanish Republic regards it as an error to suppose that the work of the League should be limited to any particular spheres, whether political or technical. It holds that it is the very multiplicity of the League's operations that contributes most effectively, though indirectly, to peace and disarmament. Nor can we accept the need of economy as a valid argument. It is true enough that economy is necessary — nay, indispensable — in national budgets, and, needless to say, in the budget of the League all unnecessary expenditure must be avoided and every possible administrative economy must be introduced. But when work of an international scope has been declared by the Assembly and the Council to be expedient, the nations that form the League owe it to themselves to provide the necessary funds for that work. It is a great thing to have an institution which bears the responsibility for organised civilisation, and we do not feel that 30 million gold francs represent an unduly high budget for such important work.

The Spanish delegation will therefore examine with care all proposals relating to the international organisation of the League, in order to be sure that the permanent organisations at Geneva and The Hague have the funds and the moral support necessary for the discharge of their duties. When critics attack our activities, we are, I feel, entitled to reply that, if the League had done no more than create these three admirable centres of international technical work and international enthusiasm — the Secretariat, the International Labour Office and the Registry of the Court — it would, even so, have justified its existence. The Spanish Republic attaches the greatest importance to the maintenance of these three centres, which are models of efficiency and international integrity. It will always be ready to participate in any efforts the Assembly may think it necessary to make in that direction, with the assistance of the three distinguished officials in charge, especially the Secretary-General, in whom the Assembly rightly places complete confidence.

In full consciousness of the requirements of justice in the social sphere and of the obligation it has incurred in regard to labour organised in legal associations, which has so effectively contributed to its creation, the Spanish Republic will take an active part in the work of the International Labour Office, with a view to improving the welfare of the workers and making progress in regard to the technical aspect of production on international lines. It proposes to devote its sympathetic attention to the international conventions which are not yet ratified by Spain.

I am especially charged to proclaim here that Republican Spain, which is proud to have been the first to introduce the principles of international law in the Old World, confirms her accession to the Court of International Justice; and I hope that the number of countries which have signed the Optional Clause with regard to the obligatory jurisdiction of the Court will soon include all civilised nations, whether Members or not of the League.

It is in this spirit of sympathy towards all international institutions that Spain, though she had no part in its establishment, welcomes the creation of the Bank for International Settlements as a new manifestation of the law of modern life that the problems of the present time cannot be solved except by international co-operation and on universal bases. My Government is firmly resolved to stabilise the national currency and to adopt the gold exchange standard as soon as the constitutional measures have been passed by Parliament. Spain will then put forward a claim to be represented on the Bank for International Settlements, which even now she hopes will have a successful future.

But, of all these forms of international activity, Spain, in common with other countries, attaches the greatest importance to the Disarmament Conference which is to meet in February next. My Government has made it its first object to reduce its military effectives very appreciably. In other words, she has, as far as she herself is concerned, anticipated the work of the Conference. That is all the more reason for her to be interested in the success of the Conference.

The Spanish representative on the Council is the Rapporteur for disarmament questions. The Preparatory Commission asked the Spanish representative to draw up its general report. The League doubtless recognises that Spain has an exceptional position, and, I may add, a privileged position, in this matter. In reorganising the position in Spain, the Republic has halved the number of divisions of her army, and has reduced by two-thirds the number of her officers, who have accepted the sacrifice with the greatest patriotism. She has also reduced the budget of the army and navy, thus giving evidence that Spain does not wish to have anything more to do with the imperialist ambitions of outworn institutions.

Spain has no capital invested or capitalists interested in the maintenance of gigantic enterprises devoted to the production of war material, which, failing war or a threat of war, are bound to collapse and intensify the economic and financial catastrophe.

Lastly, Spain, which has, by democratic means, regained the free control of its destinies, has established a complete union of purpose among the Spanish people, the nation and the State — a union failing which any understandings between Governments have in the past proved, and will in the future prove, precarious indeed.

The best guarantee of the efficacy of any peace treaty lies in the assurance that the signatures of the Governments are backed by the democratic will of the peoples, and that the peoples mean to stand by those signatures, with the support of the women, as expressed through the Press.

As is clear from the most superficial glance at the geographical, economic and political circumstances which determine the foreign policy of Spain, nothing is more urgently necessary to her future than peace. But — if you will permit me to use so bold an expression — Spain's interest in disarmament is also a disinterested interest. Among the various convergent standpoints, Spain feels that she can preserve a certain impartiality, while remaining firmly attached to the principle of the speediest possible organisation of peace and disarmament, which are the two essential aspects of the question.

But neither the organisation of peace nor even disarmament — at all events within the limits at present possible — is sufficient to ensure the attainment of our ideal. Peace is a state of mind. Therefore, we must keep a careful eye upon the causes that may predispose public opinion in different countries to rivalry and war. I should like to mention two of those causes which seem to me most dangerous. First of all, there is economic competition. As long as the absence of international co-operation forces the nations into rivalry on the markets of the world, introducing methods inevitably borrowed from the war psychology, it will be vain to seek through mere disarmament the ideal of peace by which we are all inspired. Therefore, the League of Nations must endeavour to build up economic co-operation on new foundations, inspired by those sentiments of international solidarity which the universal nature of the present crisis brings so clearly into the foreground.

But there is one cause of anxiety more capable, perhaps, than any other of inducing a state of public opinion favourable to war. I refer to the influence that may be exerted on public opinion in various countries by a Press insufficiently informed of the intentions and acts of other countries. It would be a great mistake to suppose that in such matters danger can only proceed from ill-will or bad faith. Generally, on the contrary, an atmosphere of international mistrust — even an atmosphere of absolute tension — develops as a consequence of false interpretations, due either to insufficient information or to simple misunderstandings caused by the natural divergences between national outlooks. This vast field of international information, this task of clarifying and purifying the sources and channels of the distribution of news, seems to belong naturally to the League of Nations; it is the League which could take the initiative in exploring the possibilities of reform and progress in that direction.

My Government has observed with the keenest satisfaction that a number of delegations, notably those of Sweden and Poland, gave attention to this problem in the course of the investigations concerning measures for strengthening the means of preventing war.

Spain, which has nothing to fear from publicity, but which has repeatedly suffered from misunderstandings such as those to which I have referred, has more than once devoted attention to this problem, which has been laid before the League in various forms, first by M. Urgoiti at the Press Conference at Geneva, and subsequently by M. Casares in the Committee on Intellectual Co-operation. I, who have the honour of addressing you, and who am President of the Spanish Press Association, would ask the Assembly in both capacities to afford a sympathetic reception to the following draft resolution:

"The Assembly,

"Considering that the organisation of peace demands the maintenance of an international spirit freed from all prejudices and misconceptions;

"Convinced of the necessity of ensuring that the Press of all nations receives as impartial and complete information as possible:

"Requests the Council to consider the possibility of studying:

"(a) Means of associating feminine action and feminine feeling with the work of the League of Nations by an effective and direct collaboration;

"(b) Means for preventing, with the assistance of the Press, the dissemination of such false information as may hinder the maintenance of peace and goodwill among the peoples."

International solidarity between democracies, the effect of feminine opinion and the direct participation of women in public life, and opinion as represented by the Press — these alone can give us a solid guarantee of peace established by Governments under the inspiration of the League of Nations.

The President:

Translation: The Rt. Hon. Viscount Cecil of Chelwood, first delegate of the British Empire, will address the Assembly.

Viscount Cecil (British Empire):

A perusal of the report which we are now considering will have brought home to everyone that there has been no diminution of the activities of the League and its efforts to secure peace and good understanding between the nations. I sympathise very much with the passage in the speech which we have just heard which emphasised the importance of that activity and expressed the hope that it would not be diminished.

At the same time, all of us must feel that at the present moment any saving in money by a great institution such as this which can be accomplished without injury ought to be accomplished. It is not, of course, that the actual amount of money involved is considerable. If the League expenditure were diminished by ten or twenty per cent, no appreciable impression would have been made on the economic situation of the world; but if it were possible by one means or another to show that we in this League are not indifferent to the economic difficulties of the world, that action, as a gesture, would be well worth taking.

At the same time, I do agree most heartily with the representative of Spain that it would be the falsest of false economy if we were to do anything, more particularly at this time, to reduce the authority and prestige of the League of Nations, or still worse to reduce its efficiency. That must be the governing consideration in all our efforts at economy. It is only subject to that consideration that the British delegation would feel able to consider any proposals in that direction.

There is one other matter relating to the internal management of the League to which I should like to refer. It has been a matter of discussion in this Assembly over and over again whether the present system of elections to the Council is altogether satisfactory. The British Government, the late Government has given, and I have no doubt the present Government is giving great attention to that subject, and they are satisfied that it is a matter which requires further investigation. I therefore ask leave to present to the Assembly a draft resolution in the following terms:

"The Assembly requests the Council to appoint a special committee to study the existing system of elections to the Council and to report to a future session of the Assembly on any reforms which may appear desirable."

I want to mention two other matters before I come to the main observations which I desire to make; the first is the question of slavery.

This is a matter which has occupied the attention of successive Assemblies for several years past, and I hope it will occupy the attention of this Assembly. The present position cannot be regarded as satisfactory. We drew up some years ago with great care and great thought a Convention on this subject. I believe it was a good Convention. It has certainly been accepted by the great majority of the Members of the League, but the active and positive results of that Convention have not, I am afraid, been very considerable.

In the circumstances, it is right to remind you that there are still in the world something like five million human beings living in a condition of more or less severe slavery. That is a terrible reflection on our existing civilisation. We shall have the honour of pressing upon the Sixth Committee once again proposals for a more efficient machinery to supervise the carrying out of the Convention which we have accepted. I earnestly trust that the Sixth Committee will give its close attention to those proposals and that we may be able to obtain some positive and constructive result this year.

On pages 144 and 145 of the report on the work of the League there is a reference to the Nansen International Office for Refugees, and you will notice that there still remain something like a quarter of a million refugees to be dealt with. Last May, the President of that Office, the very highly respected Dr. Max Huber, a citizen of this country, launched an appeal for assistance to enable the newly constituted Office to carry out and complete its work. I am glad to know that already considerable subscriptions have been sent in or promised; from Norway the interest on something like £12,000 to £15,000; from Armenian sources something like £14,000; from Denmark some £5,000 and from my own country, so far, some £4,000. I do not mean to say that these are Government subscriptions. They come — and that is the object of the appeal — from private sources; but I earnestly hope that the flow of funds will not diminish, and that the great work — one of the greatest of our humanitarian works — begun by one of the greatest of our members, and one of the greatest of internationalists, Dr. Nansen, will be carried through to a triumphant conclusion. I venture very earnestly to commend that object and I trust that the appropriate Committee will be able to do something to forward the cause.

These questions, however, great and important as they are, are not the questions which at this moment occupy the close attention of the peoples of the world. The period in which this Assembly meets is one in which the purposes for which the League was founded are obviously of a special importance, a special gravity and urgency. Never was it more necessary that the world, and that most cautious and apprehensive section of it, the investing public, should be assured of the continuance of peaceful international relations. Never was the international co-operation which is the second main purpose of the League more needed for the world's current poblems. It would be a real tragedy if this Assembly, representing as it does some three-quarters of the world, were to come to an end without contributing anything to the cure of the grave maladies from which the world is now suffering.

The anxiety which is now in all our minds results from the world economic depression which began two years ago, and also from the financial crisis which followed three months ago. Grave as is the economic depression, it is the financial crisis which threatens the more immediate disaster unless urgent action can be taken.

The dominant need of the moment is to revive international investment. This is needed in order to bridge the gap in the balance of payments between creditor and debtor countries, to stop the drain on gold, which, if it continues, will threaten a number of currencies which have been painfully restored during the past decade, and to provide capital for the economic enterprises without which the recovery and employment of those now involuntarily idle will be impossible. If this is not done, and done quickly, it is clear from the evidence before us that one country after another, both in Europe and overseas, will be forced into some form or other of extended moratoria which may endanger the whole system on which the economic life of the world is based, and will be driven again into the chaos which results from demoralised currency.

Let me enforce this argument by referring to the special case of Germany. I do this because the German position is at the centre of the present financial crisis, because the repercussion of a disaster there would obviously extend over a large part of the rest of the world, and because we have the report — this is the most important thing — of the very authoritative expert Committee which met at Basle under the presidency of Mr. Wiggin. That report says, in impressive terms:

"The time is short. The body of the world's commerce, whose vitality is already low, has suffered a severe shock in one of its members. This has resulted in a partial paralysis which can only be cured by restoring the free circulation of money and of goods. We believe that this can be accomplished, but only if the Governments of the world will realise the responsibility that rests upon them, and will take prompt measures to re-establish confidence. Their action alone can restore it. We think it essential that, before the period of prolongation of credits recommended by the London Conference comes to an end, they should give to the world the assurance that international political relations are established on a basis of mutual confidence, which is the sine qua non of economic recovery, and that the international payments to be made by Germany will not be such as to imperil the maintenance of its financial stability.

"We therefore conclude by urging most earnestly upon all Governments concerned that they lose no time in taking the necessary measures for bringing about such conditions as will allow financial operations to bring to Germany, and thereby to the world, sorely needed assistance."

That is what the experts say. That is their urgent appeal, under pain of disaster, not only to the country first in question, but to the whole world.

What can and should the Governments do? If we had a period of years before us there is much that could and should be done. International trade must be extended by the removal of impediments; monetary reforms must be attempted and the new methods and machinery proposed by the French Government in its most interesting memorandum and considered by the League's financial organisation must be tried.

All these and other things are necessary, and in time are practicable; but we are faced by an imperative need of action, not in a period of years, but of months or even weeks. What can be done in this time? Within this time international investment must be revived, sufficient confidence must be given to the invest r to lend again at once. Is there any practicable alternative to the action recommended by the Basle Committee? Is it not evident that the problem of Governmental indebtedness to which temporary relief has been given by the present moratorium needs such a solution as will give confidence for new investments on a long-term basis, which both the Conference of Prime Ministers in July and the Basle Committee in August regarded as indispensable?

This, and perhaps this alone, might give the investor confidence in the credit of debtor countries; and this alone would enable the full amount of what is lent to go direct to its most productive purposes and would reduce the at present unbridgeable gap in the balance of payments between creditor and debtor countries. I see no alternative to this, if we put aside such an expedient as Government guarantees of foreign loans. It is, of course, equally essential for such new investments that the borrowing countries should take every step to balance their budgets and to use the new resources lent by capital for productive purposes.

But this is not all. The lack of confidence which caused the present crisis is due, not only to doubts as to the debtor's capacity to pay, but also to anxiety as regards the political position. I want to say a few words on that subject.

In a sense, the political position is not altogether unfavourable. I do not think that there is the slightest prospect of any war. I know — and history tells us — how rash it is to prophesy as to the future of international affairs; but, nevertheless, I do not believe that there is anyone in this room who will contradict me when I say that there has scarcely ever been a period in the world's history when war seemed less likely than it does at present.

But, nevertheless, there are evils. In the first place, there is prevalent throughout many countries in the world — I was almost going to say every country, but certainly in many countries — a certain atmosphere of internal unrest. That does not only concern those countries; it has its repercussion all over the world. We hear constantly of violent speeches or aggressive demonstrations being made in this country or in that; and I quite realise — for I have been in public affairs all my life — the immense temptation that orators feel in that direction. You see a great multitude before you. That multitude expects to be excited and enthused, and you are led on to make striking and vehement phrases which call forth loud cheers from your audience and cause people to congratulate you on a successful speech. Yet it may well be that such a speech will not only do infinite harm to the foreign relations of your country but will sentence some miserable women and children in far-distant countries to misery and starvation.

If only orators could have before them a picture of people struggling for existence, to whom the economic prosperity of the world means all the difference between life and death, I think they would put a good deal of water in their wine and forego a few of the enthusiastic cheers of their audience. Let us always remember that in this, as in so many other matters, one inflammatory speech cannot be killed even by ten moderate speeches from the same quarter. Unfortunately, moderation is not particularly readable; it does not receive the same publicity as extreme utterances, and for that and other reasons it is very difficult by mere speech to counteract the harm that is done by violent utterances. It is partly due to this, but partly also to many other causes, that there is in the world an atmosphere of international suspicion certainly as great as it has been, perhaps greater than it has been, in recent years, and it is that international suspicion flowing in part from these disturbances and unrest in the countries of the world, and also from other quarters, which it ought to be the special function of the League of Nations to allay.

As I have just said, mere speeches are not enough — not even resolutions or communiqués. As you, Sir, so well said in your opening observations, something of the nature of positive action is necessary. I am not suggesting, far from it, that this is a time for a general revision or reconsideration of the treaty position in Europe. That would not promote peace or quietness or tranquillity, but I do think we ought to do something; and the obvious thing — as almost every speaker from this tribune has already said — is the promotion of international disarmament. By that means a lot of money could be saved. International disarmament would do more, perhaps, than any other single thing to increase international confidence, and by this great and unmistakable act it would be announced to the world that the nations were turning away from violence and looking to reason for the justification of their aspirations, and were prepared really and genuinely to enthrone justice as the arbiter of international disputes.

Do not let us think that this, which is a very urgent matter, is one that can be left to settle itself. I am not going to attempt to make a disarmament speech, but I do just want to draw your attention to one series of incidents as an illustration of the urgency of this matter. It so happens that quite recently, in the last few months, there have been held what are called "air manœuvres" in a number of countries — in my own country, in France, in Italy and in America, and I dare say in many others. Observe what that means. I am not criticising, I need not say, any of the Governments concerned. These are manœuvres to exercise and perfect an arm which is, perhaps, more essentially than any other an aggressive arm. No doubt if one country has aircraft, another country will say that it is necessary — and perhaps it is — for it also to have aircraft. But these manœuvres show once again that the possession of aircraft by one country is no defence against attack by the aircraft of another. It is not a means of defence; at the most it gives to the country attacked the power of reprisal, but nothing else. That is, I venture to think, the lesson of the manœuvres which have taken place.

I have before me a report that was published in one of our great English papers, the London Times, giving an account of some manœuvres in a country which I shall not name because I have no desire whatever to make any charge against any particular country — far from it. It is the system that is interesting to me on this occasion, not the policy of any particular country — a policy which, as far as I can see, is pretty much the same all over the world. Here is the description of the manœuvres that took place in that particular country. I will just read a few extracts from the report:

"The first wave of the raiders flying low from the east appeared in a cloudless sky at 3 a.m. and afforded an impressive spectacle as they roared over the town and dropped hundreds of 'bombs' in the shape of fire-works which exploded loudly a few hundred feet above the house-tops. For an hour and a half the air trembled with the throbbing of powerful engines, as the attacking machines with tail lights flashing intermittently swept in across the town to discharge their explosive loads with splendid accuracy. The afternoon visit of the raiders was even more spectacular. At one moment it was possible to count nearly 300 machines, scouts, fighters and large three-engined bombers in the sky."

That was over one town.

"A similar attack was made yesterday on another town and resulted, according to the official communiqué, in the destruction of the railway station, the paralysing of the factories and the military establishments and in huge casualties amongst the civil population."

Then, with regard to another town, this time a dockyard town, the account is as follows:

"This town is judged by the umpires to have been 'half destroyed, and in any case to be out of action for a long time', with severe losses to its defensive seaplane and aeroplane organisations at a cost to the invaders of only ten fighting aeroplanes and eight bombers. Curtains of smoke were sent up both from the land and from the ships with the purpose of obscuring objectives of particular value and military importance, but the only result was to make them more easily picked out by the airmen. Thus this form of passive defence was only proved to be completely useless."

That is typical, I venture to say, of the results which were obtained from all the other manœuvres. There is no contradiction. There is this broad fact — that there are in existence all over the world military air organisations, one purpose of which is the destruction of cities with the vast masses of civil population, and against which, so far, no adequate defence whatever has been devised. I spoke just now of the necessity for encouraging the investing public, but what kind of encouragement is it when we say to the investing public: "We are threatening the destruction of the material wealth of all these countries, and these countries to which we anxiously implore you to lend money are preparing means for destroying the security on which your loans would rest".

I have taken the case of the air because it is in some ways the most striking; but to a certain degree, and allowing for the difference of method, etc., what has been said of the air may be said to a very large extent of land and sea armaments as well. I therefore welcome most heartily the observations made by my predecessors at this Tribune concerning the meeting of the Disarmament Conference next year, and I would like to emphasise the fact — because, after all, that fact is in itself a great step forward — that, by the unanimous consent of the world, the Conference is to meet on February 2nd of next year, and that no Government, least of all my own, would tolerate for a moment any proposal for its postponement.

I feel that, both for economic reasons and for reasons of world peace and progress and to safeguard which was delivered two days ago by the Italian Foreign Minister, my friend and colleague, Signor Grandi. That speech might be a model to all orators of the true method of the advocacy of peace — peace by means of disarmament and the League of Nations. In the course of his speech, Signor Grandi made a most interesting suggestion; as I understood it he proposes, or he suggests — I do not know that he went so far as to propose — that it would be very fitting and very useful if the nations of the world would agree not to increase their armaments by land, sea or in the air, at any rate until the Disarmament Conference has had an opportunity to come to a conclusion on the subject. That is a most interesting suggestion with which I fully agree.

Speaking personally, as one who, for many years, has taken a great interest in the disarmament problem, rather than as a representative of my country, though I do not know that there is any distinction between the two, I venture to say that, if this suggestion could be put into effect, it would make an admirable preface to the Disarmament Conference. I very earnestly hope that some proposal giving body and concrete effect to the Italian suggestion will be laid before the Third Committee, and I can promise that, so far as I am concerned, I shall give such a proposal the most anxious and most sympathetic consideration, moved by the desire, if possible, to see how a practical measure of that kind can be brought into actual existence. In any case, I desire to express my warmest thanks to Signor Grandi for having made the suggestion, and my earnest hope that it may lead to some practical result.

I feel that, both for economic reasons and for reasons of world peace and progress and to safeguard everything that is really worth having in the civilisation of the world, this Disarmament Conference must succeed. We cannot afford to let it fail. It must result in a substantial reduction of the armaments of the world, and I am quite sure that that result can be achieved if the spirit in which we come to that Conference is only the right spirit. If each country merely seeks to get off with doing as little as possible, we shall produce no good results; but if we all come here, as I hope and believe we shall, with a desire not to see how little but how much we can do, how large a step we can take towards the ultimate ideal of complete international disarmament — if we come here in that spirit I am satisfied that the Disarmament Conference will be a triumphant success. After all, the Conference meets next year, and, if what I have tried to show you earlier in my observations is right, the crisis is very urgent. What are we doing in the meanwhile? What step can we take to improve the international atmosphere? I believe we can do a good deal.

There are present at this Assembly the representatives of two great and highly respected nations, each in its way a leader of civilisation. If there could be a real rapprochement between France and Germany, not only in word but in action, seventy-five per cent of the political unrest of the world would, I believe, thereby be removed.

I have seen it said in the papers and elsewhere that my country is opposed to a rapprochement; that for purely selfish reasons we are anxious to see these two great countries in hostility because we thereby have a greater position in the counsels of Europe. That is a gross and scandalous libel on my country; I have never heard Englishmen give vent to any such proposition. I am satisfied that, whether it is the present Government or any future Government of England, it will always be anxious to do its utmost to promote good understanding between its two great neighbours, and nothing would give it greater pleasure or satisfaction than to see a real friendship — I hope there is a real friendship — and a visible friendship, between these two countries. We endeavoured at Locarno to give practical effect to our desire in that direction, and I can only say that, so far as the spirit of Locarno is concerned, it still persists in my country, and we shall always be ready to do anything that we can — I do not know that there is anything we can do — to promote this splendid spirit.

My reason for referring to these two countries is not only because they are in our minds continually; we know how much depends on the policy of each of them. They, however, are not the only countries concerned; my country may very likely itself be doing something which, in the opinion of others, does not help the pacification of the world. If that is so, I only hope it will be pointed out to us, because, as far as I am concerned, I would say that it is the duty of every Government to search its mind at the present crisis in order to see what contribution its country can make towards putting an end to what is, after all, not a normal condition of international life, but an unnatural and diseased condition of the public mind. That seems to me to be the great task to which we should set ourselves in the coming months, and, I may say with absolute confidence, not only on behalf of my Government, but also on behalf of the people on whom that Government depends, that the only real plank in their foreign policy is to contribute to the utmost of their power to the pacification of the world.

The President:

Translation: In addition to the draft resolutions presented by the Spanish and British delegations, I have received the following proposal from the Norwegian delegation:

"The Assembly,

"Following the precedents already established for several years,

"Decides to refer to the Sixth Committee the annual reports of the mandatory Powers, the reports of the Permanent Mandates Commission, and all other documents dealing with the mandates question which have been distributed to the Members of the League since the last session of the Assembly".

The text of these three draft resolutions will be printed and distributed to members of the Assembly, and I reserve the right to offer at a later date, in accordance with the Rules of Procedure, suggestions on the procedure to be followed.

His Excellency M. Giuseppe Motta, first delegate of Switzerland, will address the Assembly.

M. Motta (Switzerland):

Translation: I attribute the atmosphere of uneasiness which seems to pervade our work mainly, perhaps exclusively, to the economic and financial depression from which all countries are suffering in varying degrees. The duration, extent and effects of that depression — which are not confined to material values but in some ways affect spiritual values also — constitute a remarkable proof of solidarity between all countries. Indeed, the first great lesson to be drawn from it is that of universal solidarity.

The League cannot but feel the effects of the present situation. The sufferings of the various members of the body entail, by a biological law, the suffering of the whole body. We shall never have a prosperous League of Nations so long as the States composing it are themselves unhappy. The only question we have to ask ourselves is this: Can the League of Nations take effective action to mitigate the evils of the present crisis and help to cure them?

The real friends of the League, its most enlightened partisans and surest guides, are not those who indulge in specious optimism, but those who face the evils, diagnose them and set themselves to remedy them.

The efforts made hitherto in the economic field have not yielded satisfactory results, nor can it be denied that, even admitting that international affairs cannot always be measured by the same standards as national affairs, there is sometimes a serious lack of proportion between the means employed and the objects achieved. When storms menace and flood-waters threaten to engulf houses and cities, the inhabitants abandon the occupations and pleasures of untroubled times.

When all is said and done, however, we must ask ourselves this: If the League of Nations did not exist, where, how and by what means would Governments and nations find a way of meeting and taking counsel together?

In common justice we have to admit that quite recently, when the financial conditions of a great country suddenly became so critical, the Bank for International Settlements at Basle was used as a meeting-place where competent financiers could consult together without delay as to the best means of averting the catastrophe which threatened. Is not the Bank for International Settlements a direct off-shoot of the League, or at least a body conceived in the League spirit?

True, several countries have had to grapple with unwonted internal difficulties, and their Governments, which have naturally been most concerned with immediate interests, have looked on the interests attaching to international collaboration as of secondary importance.

Must we not, however, welcome as of good augury the fact that the very existence of the League and the warnings it gives have a relatively restraining influence on States and prevent them from embarking on dangerous courses. But for the League's existence, might not the unfortunate complications of the recent past have led to still more serious complications, perhaps even to social anarchy at least as destructive as war?

All thinking people will view with approval meetings and direct conversations between the heads and members of Governments especially interested in solving urgent and specific problems. There is no reason, however, to take the unsympathetic view that such meetings and conversations are in opposition to the work of the League. It is surely fairer to regard the two methods as complementary and to take the view that the heads of Governments who meet in Paris, Berlin, London or Rome are increasing their chances of success when they carry on their negotiations in the spirit of the League and without losing contact with the League.

The question of reparations and inter-State debts — that onerous legacy of the war — does not come within the League's province. Last spring, the President of the United States of America made a remarkable move, which, though apparently only concerned with a temporary aspect of the problem in question, has actually had the effect of bringing up the whole problem for discussion. That problem demands a solution: to leave it unsettled indefinitely would mean prolonging the general business depression. I venture to say that we all hope the action taken will be carried to its logical and final conclusion.

There is no occasion to indulge in sterile pessimism, still less to abandon ourselves to what has always seemed to me one of the most contemptible forms of pessimism — defeatism. The idea of arbitration is progressing steadily, and the cause of the compulsory jurisdiction of the Permanent Court of International Justice has triumphed. The small States have not hesitated to embark on this course, and the great Powers — to their credit — have followed them. This session of the Assembly will probably see the introduction of a new Convention to strengthen the means of preventing war which, though not of primary importance, will furnish one more proof of our determination to leave nothing undone to avert a clash of arms.

I shall say nothing here of the unification of laws on bills of exchange and cheques, or of the unification of river law, nor shall I mention the international agreements concluded in April, whereby a number of obstacles to road traffic will be removed. I do not propose to expatiate on the new Convention for the limitation of the manufacture of narcotic drugs, which marks perhaps the decisive phase in the struggle against that social evil and the affirmation of a new will and a new method.

We are on the eve of the Conference for the reduction of armaments. That Conference will not be postponed. It will, both by reason of the object for which it has been called and by reason of its composition, be one of the greatest ever held. It has been convened in conformity with the Covenant, and the provisions of that instrument will not have been truly observed unless positive results are obtained. Although public opinion should be warned against entertaining exaggerated hopes, it must also be informed of the greatness of the undertaking. It must be proclaimed in no uncertain voice that the effective reduction of armaments alone can strengthen the feeling of security, help to eliminate certain deep-seated causes of the present economic disorder, and increase confidence in the maintenance of peace. Without such confidence, rendered in some sort tangible and visible, it would be useless to expect a real business revival, it would hardly be possible to base any hopes on equitable treatment for international commerce within the meaning of the Covenant, including more particularly the stabilisation and gradual reduction of Customs tariffs.

The ultimate cause of our setbacks in the economic field has on more than one occasion been stated by the experts best qualified to speak to lie in the fear that peace may not yet be firmly established. Until business men are fully persuaded that the truth is the very opposite, they will be tempted to raise artificial economic obstacles between countries, designed to secure the independence and autonomy of each in time of danger threatening from without.

If, however, the League's methodical work, if accession of all to the Pact for the renunciation of war, if progress in arbitration and, lastly, effective and adequate reduction of land and sea armaments — if all these factors combined do not succeed in creating a fresh spirit which shall engender human progress in its supreme form, then truly we may despair of the future of mankind.

This cannot and must not be. Material and technical progress lies patent to the eye. Everywhere there is a tendency towards internationalisation, and credit too is weaving an ever closer and more far-flung net of solidarity. Men have never before been so near one another in time or in space. The marvellous products of Marconi's genius would lose half their significance did they not prove that the supreme aim and object of material progress is to serve the cause of moral progress. The fatal attempts to apply discoveries and inventions to instruments of death and destruction are aberrations that violate the human and the divine order alike.

Last Tuesday morning, when we were endorsing the proposed invitation to Mexico, I was thinking that the entry of that great and wealthy country into the League would be in the nature of a symbol. It will typify the universal importance that Latin-America continues to attach to our work. It may perhaps herald further additions to our numbers or the return of others to our fold. In any case, despite certain signs to the contrary, it will show that the League is not regarded with indifference by any State. That is why this addition to our numbers at the present time appears to me as a cause of rejoicing and of hope.

This draft resolution will be printed and distributed, and I will make suggestions to you later as to the action to be taken upon it.

The Assembly rose at 12.40 p.m.

30. — REPORT ON THE WORK OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS SINCE THE ELEVENTH SESSION OF THE ASSEMBLY: CONTINUATION OF THE DISCUSSION.

The President:

Translation: The agenda consists of the continuation of the general discussion of the report on the work of the League since the eleventh session of the Assembly.

M. Alâ, delegate of Persia, will address the Assembly.

M. Alâ (Persia):

Translation: Last year, from this same platform, I had the honour to call the Assembly's attention to the economic crisis which was being experienced, not only in Europe, but also in the countries of the East. I emphasised the interdependence of all the continents and the need for extending the beneficent action of the League to Asia as well as to Europe, in the spirit of universality which lies at the very basis of the Covenant.

To-day this need is making itself felt still more urgently, for the situation has grown worse. We are threatened with a general collapse; there is a lack of confidence everywhere.

I venture to submit to you in a few words the reflections and considerations which the common danger has suggested to me, so that I may contribute my small quota to the solution of the problems which beset us.

To take first the economic sphere: In addition to the main causes of the crisis to which previous speakers have referred, there is one to which the League's attention has not been sufficiently drawn. I refer to the loss in purchasing-power of countries having a monometallic — a purely silver — currency, among which is Persia.

To remedy this state of affairs, it will be necessary to institute, through the technical services of the League, an exhaustive enquiry into the question of silver, the revalorisation of which, with the effective co-operation of all countries concerned, would appear to be advisable.

Again, the Commission of Enquiry for European Union has undeniably done useful work in regard to the disposal of the agricultural products of countries suffering either from overproduction or from a lack of markets. In order to relieve the position of these European countries, the question of drawing up a scheme of preferential tariffs is under examination, and an International Credit Bank has been formed, in which, however, States outside Europe may not collaborate until after a trial period of five years. But the agricultural countries of the East, including Persia, are labouring under the same difficulties, and it would only be fair to make general the system instituted under the auspices of the League.

I will not take up your time by citing other means which might be employed for assisting the countries of the East. The two typical examples I have mentioned will suffice. In the meantime, threatened with an unfavourable trade balance, deprived of markets and facilities for transit, left to her own resources, my country has been obliged in self-defence to have recourse to exceptional measures which, whatever may be said of them, were necessary to avoid a real catastrophe.

Despite the clouds looming on the economic and political horizon, we must not be discouraged or pessimistic. The report on the work of the League reveals considerable progress in the right direction. The fruitful activity of the League has been exercised in many spheres. Nevertheless, the criticism has been made that some important questions have been dealt with elsewhere. How could it be otherwise so long as the League has not attained its proper universality?

For my part I am an optimist, and I do not despair of seeing in our midst, at a date not so distant as some people think, those great countries which play a most important part in economics and in politics, but which are holding aloof, although they are not indifferent to the work of our Committees. It was with very real satisfaction that Persia welcomed the invitation sent to Mexico, and we are delighted that that great country is to take its place among us. We shall also be glad to see the countries of the Near East who are neighbours of Persia shortly becoming members of our society and collaborating in our work of peace. By thus enlarging our circle we shall increase the influence of the League and its prestige in the world. Security and confidence between the nations can only gain thereby.

This confidence of which so much has been said cannot be created in the economic field unless, in the political field, an effort is made to clear the ground of all antagonism and all rivalry, and unless the policy of prestige is abandoned, which is fatal to a better understanding between nations.

There is no doubt that the strengthening of the means of arbitration, the accession of a large number of countries to the Optional Clause of the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice and to the General Act for the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes will help to allay fear and bring about wider and more effective co operation. That is why my country, after ratifying the Optional Clause, has just submitted the General Act to Parliament for approval.

Again, confidence will be inspired and maintained if the articles of the Covenant, our constitutional charter, are left as far as possible untouched. The principles on which the League is founded should be maintained intact and the unity of the Covenant preserved.

Last year in the First Committee we examined the delicate question of bringing the Pact of Paris into harmony with the Covenant. We shall have to deal with that question again this year. Without wishing to be too rigid, since there is a continuity and solidarity between the various articles of the Covenant, we should only be prepared to consider slight amendments calculated to consolidate and organise more satisfactorily the guarantees which the articles of the Covenant as a whole give to the Members of the League.

Among the measures intended to restore confidence, I must not forget the resolution adopted by the eleventh Assembly on October 3rd, 1930. It lays down in particular the necessity for asking Governments what are the objections which prevent them from accepting certain international conventions concluded under the auspices of the League. That was a happy initiative, and establishes a procedure for the revision of conventions with a view to their ratification by the greatest possible number of countries. Persia herself has taken advantage of it to communicate to the Secretary-General her observations concerning the Convention of June 17th, 1925, for the Supervision of the International Trade in Arms and Ammunition and Implements of War, and to request him to submit the question to the Assembly with a view to revision.

The problem which outweighs all others, however, and the solution of which will be the most effective means of allaying fears and bringing about the economic recovery of the world, is certainly disarmament. No one desires peace more ardently than Persia, for, despite her neutrality, she experienced from 1914 to 1918 all the horrors of war, being invaded and devastated by the belligerents. It was only after the great world conflict that our defensive preparations really began. In drawing up the scheme of limitation which we shall submit to the Conference next year, we sha l aim at the lowest point consistent with our obligations within the framework of Article 8 of the Covenant. In so doing, we shall count on the other articles of the Covenant which provide for concerted international action in the event of aggression being respected.

Unfortunately, there is a limit to the speed at which we can advance towards disarmament. It is in itself a great step forward that all the countries of the world, even those not Members of the League, have agreed to meet at a first international Conference to discuss the limitation or reduction of their armaments, a question which hitherto has been exclusively national in character.

I sincerely hope it will be possible to reach an equitable agreement, taking into account the geographical situation of each country and the degree of security attained.

The President:

Translation: Sir Thomas Wilford, delegate of New Zealand, will address the Assembly.

Sir Thomas Wilford (New Zealand). — The excuse I have for speaking here this afternoon is that my Government has asked me to deliver two messages to this Assembly. I shall be brief in my remarks, as brief as possible, but, before I deliver those messages, I desire to associate myself entirely with the remarks made by the leader of the British delegation in reference to the question of slavery. All those who have read the recent book by Lady Simon, a wonderfully comprehensive work, ably compiled, and who have studied the subject of slavery as it still unfortunately exists in some parts of the world to-day, will realise that the time has come when some determined effort is expected from an Assembly such as this at least to help to ameliorate the evil if not to banish it altogether.

I make no apologies for referring to the slavery question, for, in 1922, the delegate for New Zealand, Sir Arthur Steel Maitland, moved the first resolution, which was adopted by the League on the subject of slavery:

> "The Assembly decides that the question of slavery shall be included in the Agenda of the Fourth Assembly, and requests that the Council presents to that Assembly a report based on the information which it shall have received on the matter."

This was the first step taken in the League with regard to the problem of slavery on the initiative of my country. We have been sorry to see that so little progress has been made since 1922, but we believe that this has been due to the fact that there was very little reliable data upon which decisions could be based and action taken. Since 1929, however, a great deal of information has become available, and it seems to me that either a Committee acting in a voluntary capacity should be appointed to examine and report upon the material that is now available, and which was not available in 1929, or that some method should be evolved by the Sixth Committee, without expense, in order that progress should be made.

I do not expect to see any revolution, but I do expect some evolutionary movement to take place that will mark its impress on the progress of a reform, which, at the best, must be gradual. I have reminded you of the first step taken by the League in regard to slavery. Five days after that resolution was passed the Council of the League followed it up by calling for a report on any information possessed by the Governments Members of the League on the question of slavery, and, in 1923, following the New Zealand resolution, the Assembly appointed a small committee, with Dr. Nansen as Chairman. This Committee entrusted to a body of experts the task of investigating the slavery question. The Council in due course appointed an expert Committee of persons acting in a voluntary capacity, to examine the situation in the light of the material then before it. This body, the Temporary Slavery Commission, reported to the Assembly in 1925 on the situation, in so far as it was revealed by the information placed at the disposal of the Commission which then disbanded. The British Government has pressed for the re-appointment of this Committee or of a permanent bureau to examine the mass of information which has become available since the Temporary Slavery Commission reported. I wish, notwithstanding, to make the suggestion previously mentioned.

I have here a letter written by the Emperor of Ethiopia, dated July 12th last and addressed to the Anti-Slavery and Aborigines Protection Society. I will not read the whole letter, as it is lengthy, but I propose to put that letter and the letter which evoked it before the Sixth Committee, in order that the members of that Committee who are sympathetic may be informed of the attitude of the Emperor of Ethiopia towards this very important question. Suffice it for me to give an excerpt from that letter, which reads:

"We are definitely decided with reference to the task we have undertaken for freeing the slaves still owned by the public, and not with reference to traffic in slaves, which we have already prohibited by decree. In some of the worst cases we have even gone so far as to inflict the death penalty."

There is a lot more in the letter, which I shall submit, as I have said, to the Sixth Committee rather than occupy the time of the Assembly with it. I cannot believe, however, that there can be any delegate from any country in this great Assembly who will not be willing, if he knows the facts, to help to bring about the abolition of a practice which is, at any rate in this age, to put it in the mildest way possible, against the best ethics of civilisation.

Next, I wish to deliver a message from my country to the Assembly. As you know, New Zealand has always been a subscriber, and a willing subscriber, to the League. Our representation has not been perfunctory; it has been animated by a genuine desire to help. But my Government in a letter sent to me before I left for Geneva states that:

"The growing cost of the administration of the League (and with it, of course, the contribution of New Zealand) is a matter of grave concern to us. The dissipation of the League's activities into so many really secondary functions must tend to divert its attention to some extent from the more vital objects for which in our view it was primarily instituted."

The letter closes with the following words:

"A definite attempt should be made to reduce the present expenditure."

I know that any remarks I may make in this direction may be unpopular. At the same time, if popularity is to be the test of the expression of sentiments in an institution of this kind, the sooner it closes the better. My opinion, and the opinion of my Government, is this, that if there ever was a time in the world — and this has been emphasised on many occasions by speakers during this debate — when a beau geste should be made to the world, it should be made to-day in the reduction in some way or other of the huge amount which it at present costs to run the whole of this League. I am not suggesting how this should be done. It would be quite wrong for me to pretend to indicate to those who have lived in the administration of the League since its inception where useless expenditure could be discontinued. But there is no Government in the world to-day — and I do not except my own — that, in the changed circumstances and in view of the economic upheaval through which every country is passing, but must take in a hole or two in its belt.

I listened last year, and I have listened this year, to a great number of able speakers discussing a United States of Europe. Would it not be better to arrive at a united state of mind as a preface to the United States of Europe? I think we should arrive at a united state of mind if every one gave his candid opinion with regard to the cost that every country is having to bear to-day in connection with the working of this League.

My country would hold me guilty if I did not make a public declaration to the effect that it approves and supports and will pay with pleasure and readiness any contribution that is necessary for the Disarmament Conference which is to be held next year. While therefore my remarks apply to the general budget of the League, they do not apply to the vote for the Disarmament Conference. Whatever that amount may be, we take no exception to it and will gladly and readily pay our share.

Signor Grandi, while speaking, used an expression which attracted me immensely. He said: "The League should deal with the facts of the international situation and not confine itself to declarations of principle or to developing its own constitutional law". I agree with every word of that statement. I hope the Disarmament Conference will not turn out merely to be a Disarmament Conference of hope, but that it will be one of action, and anything that my delegation can do towards making that Conference real and towards achieving a definite result will be done wholeheartedly and readily.

We realise that an unarmed State alongside a State which is wealthy in arms and military equipment lives in fear, and we realise also that it might, if its neighbour were unscrupulous, be in danger. I would like, therefore, to say that, when we are considering the question of the sum which shall be voted for carrying on the work of this League, perhaps a small Committee might be set up to ascertain where a substantial saving could be made in some of the sidelines of its activities — if I may so refer to them — without in any possible way attempting to curtail expenditure which may be described as reasonable in the circumstances. We think that it is undoubtedly possible to save a considerable amount of money, and that this should be done at once.

I want to say a word here, too, in regard to the observation that has been made as to the various contracts, moral or legal, that have been entered into during the last few years. The Covenant, the Locarno Treaty, the Pact of Paris—the Covenant with its sanctions and the Pact of Paris without sanctions — the movement to make the Pact harmonise with the Covenant, all prove that progress has been made by the League under what appeared to be almost insurmountable difficulties.

I have faith as a New Zealander in the League of Nations, because it has created a public conscience which now calls for arbitration and not for war for the settlement of international disputes. My country originated almost the first Arbitration Act that was ever put on a Statute Book for the settlement of disputes between employers and employees. Why did we do this? For the simple reason that we believe that arbitration is an appeal to reason, and that an appeal to reason must come at some time, and is it not better that it should come before the conflagration than after? On that principle, we stand four-square with the Conference in its desire to reduce armaments and to bring about some form of international arbitration for the settlement of international disputes. Every country to-day, as I have said before, talks of a national stocktaking. We can take in this Assembly an international stocktaking by reducing our expenditure, which reduction will help and affect every nation that is represented here — and how sorely some of them need assistance.

In conclusion, I would like to say that, in my country, we experience difficulty in obtaining information regarding what is happening at Geneva. Many delegates hardly realise that we are 13,000 miles away, and, when a country which sends a representative here receives notices of what is going to happen only just before a Conference, and there is no time left for consultation between the country and its representative in London, it is not good for the League.

I do not want New Zealand to be known as a country with a grievance, but I do want the League of Nations to realise that the countries which are far removed from Geneva, where great movements are taking place affecting everyone of us, should have the same opportunities of being consulted as those which are near at hand and that the method adopted in the past of merely informing us should be at once discontinued.

The President:

Translation: M. Michalakopoulos, delegate of Greece, will address the Assembly.

M. Michalakopoulos (Greece):

Translation: We have heard many inspiring words from this platform on the subject of peace and international solidarity, and I should hesitate to address you after so many eloquent speeches were it not for my conviction that the ideal of union and peaceful co-operation which the world is seeking cannot be sufficiently extolled. My country, I am glad to be able to say, has done everything in its power to realise that noble purpose. No doubt its contribution to the general cause is only a modest one, but I venture to hope that its very spontaneity has been of real moral value.

In the firm belief that international disputes can and must be solved by the straightforward method of arbitration, Greece some years ago accepted the Optional Clause and has just acceded to the General Act. She has also concluded with various Powers, neighbours and others, a number of pacts of friendship, conciliation and arbitration which need but a few finishing touches to be entirely satisfactory.

I should like to dwell for a moment on one of these, as it is of peculiar historical significance and practical importance. I refer to the Greco-Turkish agreements concluded some weeks after the last Assembly, which finally put an end to a feud that had lasted for centuries, and inaugurated an era of friendship characterised from the outset by that frank cordiality which is a guarantee of its lasting character.

This example seems to me to be a striking and, I might also say, an instructive one. Not ten years ago, the two nations were locked in a terrible struggle — the last episode in their long history of antagonism. Scarcely a year ago, the problems arising out of the liquidation of that conflict were still numerous and complicated, but the goodwill of both parties triumphed in the end. When they did shake hands, they did so in good faith and once for all. The Greco-Turkish friendship is founded on two firm principles — obliteration of the past and mutual confidence. Greece had the courage to abandon a dream cherished for many generations, and acknowledged as final the territorial status created by these recent treaties. Turkey did the same. There was no arrière-pensée, no thought of revenge. With the atmosphere thus cleared, full, practical and moral effect can be given to these pacts. The nations do not need political conquests in order to progress: science, art, intellectual and economic pursuits supply them with fields of activity into which they can enter with an equal claim to glory and with greater usefulness.

Because the attempt being made to secure a European Union was based on these ideas, we associated ourselves unreservedly with it from the outset. The venture is only slowly making headway, which is perfectly natural, though the results in the matter of agricultural credit alone are a sufficient proof of activity.

It is also thanks to the Commission of Enquiry for European Union that the idea of preferential tariffs between the European States has made such progress. During the discussions in the Commission, Greece took a special interest in the measures designed to protect agricultural products, as is both just and useful — just, because we must try to neutralise the caprices of Nature, which does not accord to every country all the products that it needs, and useful, because the improvement in the economic situation, and hence in the purchasing-power of the agricultural countries, will facilitate the marketing of the products of industrial countries. The Greek Government is glad that it should have been proposed to entrust the examination of this question to a special committee, and feels sure that the Assembly will ratify the proposal.

These are really tangible results, and yet — as everyone knows, though no one likes to emphasise it — there are numerous indications, imponderable it is true, that the League's work is this year surrounded by an atmosphere, I will not say of despair, but of hesitation. Some doubt seems to be felt as to the ultimate success of the great principles of peaceful collaboration on which the League is based. The League has two great enemies; it is at grips with two great forces, or rather two great human weaknesses—forgetfulness and impatience.

The world easily forgets what has been done, and waits impatiently for what still remains to be done. People often forget that the League, which, only eleven years ago, was but an ill-defined embryonic entity, is to-day a great moral force, an organisation whose activities are continually increasing and extending. People forget that it has solved a number of grave political and economic questions. They forget that it has financially restored — that is, saved from ruin — more than one State which, unable to steer its way in the sea of post-war difficulties, was on the point of foundering. My own country was one of them, and I should ike to take this opportunity of expressing once more our gratitude for the League's prompt and efficacious intervention. The work of Locarno —an historic fact of enormous moral and political value — and other events more recent still, are forgotten. In January last, during the German-Polish dispute, pessimists foretold the League's approaching end, yet it was the League that settled the dispute. Again, in May, the international atmosphere seemed to be irremediably affected by the profound repercussions which the proposal for an Autro-German Customs Union produced in Europe, but once again the League, by referring the question to the Permanent Court of International Justice, gave time for personal feelings to subside and for a judicious solution to be evolved.

The League has another enemy in the impatience of nations. After five years of war, when men were locked in savage conflict, and the devastating sword of Mars reaped human and material havoc without parallel in world history, the League is expected to produce order out of chaos with a touch of Circe's wand. People so easily forget how much more difficult it is to reconstruct than to destroy.

We see the same impatience as regards disarmament — a noble ideal indeed, but an achievement attended by all the difficulties inherent in any great innovation. The task before us, however, is neither more nor less then to change a system of armaments which has ruled society from time immemorial.

People expect that to be done in a night. No one will deny the progress made in this field during the last few years, and I can give you another edifying example. Greece and Turkey have undertaken not to increase their naval armaments without previous agreement, and the race for naval armaments, which might well have exhausted the finances of both countries, has thus been ended.

It is easy to make out a case against the League and the alleged inadequacy of its output. That is how nations become discouraged, and nothing is more dangerous. Whether they speak in good faith or not, these apostles of despair do the greatest injury to the idea of peace and understanding between peoples.

The Gospel teaches us that faith moves mountains; but faith is not a purely Christian virtue. It has worked miracles since the world began, and we must neither allow our own faith to waver nor undermine that of the peoples. Let us see to it that our thoughts, our words and our acts are not an encouragement to suicide, but a source of courage, an impulse to life, order and progress.

The Assembly rose at 5.15 p.m.

The President:

Translation: The Assembly will remember that draft resolutions were submitted by the Norwegian and German delegations at the fifth meeting of the Assembly. The draft resolution submitted by the Norwegian delegation proposes that the reports on mandates be referred to the Sixth Committee. The draft resolution submitted by the German delegation proposes to refer to the same Committee that part of the report on the work of the League which deals with the question of the protection of minorities.

In conformity with precedent, I propose that the Assembly should immediately adopt these two draft resolutions and should thus decide to refer the questions to the Sixth Committee.

The draft resolutions were adopted.

32. — COLLABORATION OF WOMEN AND THE PRESS IN THE ORGANISATION OF PEACE: DRAFT RESOLUTION PROPOSED BY THE SPANISH DELEGATION.

The President:

Translation: The Assembly will remember that, at its fifth meeting, the Spanish delegation proposed the following draft resolution:

"The Assembly,

"Considering that the organisation of peace demands the maintenance of an international spirit freed from all prejudices and misconceptions;

"Convinced of the necessity of ensuring that the Press of all nations receives as impartial and complete information as possible:

"Requests the Council to consider the possibility of studying:

"(a) Means of associating feminine action and feminine feeling with the work of the League of Nations by an effective and direct collaboration;

"(b) Means for preventing, with the assistance of the Press, the dissemination of such false information as may hinder the maintenance of peace and goodwill among the peoples."

In accordance with precedent, I propose that the Assembly refer this draft resolution to the Agenda Committee, requesting the latter to submit, as soon as possible, suggestions as to the procedure to be followed with regard to it.

The President's proposal was adopted.

33. — METHOD OF ELECTION TO THE COUNCIL: DRAFT RESOLUTION PROPOSED BY THE BRITISH DELEGATION.

The President:

Translation: The Assembly has been notified of the following draft resolution submitted at its fifth meeting by the British delegation:

"The Assembly requests the Council to appoint a special committee to study the existing system of elections to the Council and to report to a future session of the Assembly on any reforms which may appear desirable."

In accordance with precedent, I propose that this draft resolution should be referred to the Agenda Committee, with a request that the latter should make proposals as to the procedure to be followed.

The President's proposal was adopted.

34. — REPORT ON THE WORK OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS SINCE THE ELEVENTH SESSION OF THE ASSEMBLY: CONTINUATION OF THE DISCUSSION.

The President:

Translation: The agenda consists of the continuation of the discussion on the report of the work of the League since the last session of the Assembly.

M. Sze, first delegate of China, will address the Assembly.

M. Sze (China):

This is the first session of the Assembly of the League of Nations at which I have appeared as a delegate, and I deem it proper that I should preface what I have to say with an expression of the appreciation I have of the high honour conferred upon me by my Government by designating me to represent it in a body of such an august character. I shall do my best to merit this honour; but, however unsuccessful or successful I may be in this respect, I know that I shall personally profit by the opportunity that these meetings will give me to meet and interchange views with the eminent statesmen here gathered from all quarters of the globe.

My colleagues and I represent a country having a culture which, in many respects, differs from that of other countries, and particularly from that of the peoples of the so-called Western world. Of many features of this culture or civilisation the Chinese people are proud, and feel themselves justified in believing that it contains qualities or ideals which will find a proper place in a world civilisation if such a unity of ethical, æsthetic and intellectual ideals is ever achieved. There was a time when the Chinese people were so well satisfied with themselves that they thought they had little to learn that would be of profit to themselves from the customs and institutions of other peoples; but this is no longer the case. The Chinese people, while not blind admirers of Western civilisation, are keenly aware of its many merits, and desire to incorporate into their modes of life and thought those Western ideals and practices which they consider to be good and which can be blended in without impairing their own culture.

So far has this change of national attitude gone that I feel myself justified in saying that, at the present time, there is no country in the world which is more anxious than China for the development of co-operative goodwill among the nations of the world; nor, I believe, is there any country which is more anxious than China to do what lies within its power to advance this development by the common adoption of standards of international conduct and by the maintenance of institutions for securing to humanity, in realised fact, the benefits that should logically flow from international unity and co-operation.

Hence it is that China is a Member of the League of Nations and eager to aid in the accomplishment of the great purposes to which it is dedicated. This China is anxious to do because of its desire that the welfare of the world should be advanced. But my Government is also aware of the special or individual benefits which each of the members may severally obtain from membership in the League. This fact was noted by Lord Cecil when, in seconding the motion of Dr. Curtius for extending to Mexico an invitation to become a Member of the League, he said:

"I agree entirely with Dr. Curtius that the more universal the League becomes the more one of its most fundamental characteristics is realised. Perhaps I may be allowed to add that, in my view, membership of the League by each State is not only valuable for the League, but is valuable for the State itself."

Certainly this has been made manifest to China, which has received, and is now receiving, such invaluable benefit from the co-operation of the technical organisations of the League with her own administrative services. And now, added to these evidences of the League's goodwill and helpfulness, there is the resolution recently adopted by this Assembly, with regard to the great disaster which has come upon China by reason of the overflow of their banks by several of its great rivers.

The assistance which the League is giving to China is further evidence, if, indeed, further evidence be needed, that the aims and purposes of the League are worldwide in character — that it is truly an ecumenical organisation.

By tradition, the Chinese are an unwarlike people, and have ever exalted the glories of peace above those of war. China has, unhappily, during recent years, been forced by domestic conditions to maintain considerable bodies of troops, but she has recognised the evils of this, and will assuredly reduce the numbers of troops as rapidly as, and to the extent that, domestic conditions possibly warrant.

The Chinese Government is in full sympathy with the continued efforts which the League is making to bring about a reduction of armaments. It views this problem as one of extreme and immediate importance, and, therefore, would consider it a calamity should the meeting of the Disarmament Conference, which is scheduled to take place next February, be postponed; or, having met, should fail to reach an agreement providing for a substantial reduction in the present armed forces of the world. My Government will, therefore, support any feasible plan having this end in view.

The Chinese Government is in full sympathy with the efforts which the League is making to implement the provisions of the Covenant with regard to the obligations of the Member States to seek peaceful solutions of such controversies as may arise between them. It views with disapproval acts which tend to arouse national passions and thus make more difficult the peaceful settlement of such controversies as may arise out of differences of national policies or incidents in which their respective nationals may be involved.

To the endeavour of the present Assembly to bring into harmony the Pact of Paris and the Covenant of the League of Nations the Chinese Government gives its wholehearted approval. As the Canadian representative pointed out the other day, the principle upon which the League of Nations was originally founded was the maintenance of world peace, the negation of war, and the adjustment and settlement of international differences by peaceful arbitration; and the present Assembly is justified in giving this supreme question its most serious attention. But it is particularly important to devise ways and means whereby may be prevented or corrected the taking by one State of military action, or the threat of such action, upon the territory of another friendly State, which, though not denominated an act of war by the State committing it, in substance amounts to one. Unless definite sanctions follow acts of non-conformity with the above-mentioned principle of the League, the abolition of war and the establishment of peace will remain noble ideals difficult, if not impossible, of attainment, and the atmosphere of international suspicion of which Lord Cecil spoke yesterday will be aggravated, instead of being diminished.

My Government regards the Convention which resulted from the Conference on the Limitation of the Manufacture of Narcotic Drugs as an agreement far in advance of any earlier international agreement, and it recognises that the Chinese people stand to benefit greatly by the rigid and conscientious enforcement of its provisions by the several parties to it. It is hoped by my Government that this approach to a satisfactory restriction of the supplies of manufactured narcotic drugs to the world's medical and scientific needs will render more certain and prompt the solution of other related problems. In this connection my Government notes with interest and approval that, by direction of the Council of the League, the Advisory Committee on Opium and Other Dangerous Drugs will, at its next session, consider questions relating to the production of opium.

The Chinese Government has not failed to note the extent to which the League, during the past two years, has, through its committees and technical organisations, attempted to determine the causes of, and to suggest means of escape from — or, at least, amelioration of — the evils resulting from the present worldwide economic depression. The fact that this depression is worldwide furnishes evidence of the mutuality of interests between all nations, and, therefore, of the need that exists, which only such an institution as the League of Nations can supply, for co-operative action. Each nation has its own distinctive economic and social problems, and yet the conditions which give rise to them have a significance for other nations. Thus, for example, the great fall in the value of silver, which furnishes the basis for China's monetary system, has reduced the purchasing power of the Chinese people, with the result that they have not been able to buy commodities from other countries to the extent they otherwise would have done. Thus, the export trade of those other countries has been prejudicially affected. Potentially, China, with her more than four hundred millions of population, furnishes a vast market for the products of the other countries of the world. Could this potentiality be realised, a great stimulus would be supplied to the commerce and industry, not only of Asia, but of Europe and America as well.

I have, perhaps, already spoken at too great length. I will, therefore, only add that it is the hope of the Chinese delegation that the present session of the Assembly will be a most fruitful one. You may be assured that the Chinese delegation will lend such aid as lies within its power to secure this result.

The President:

Translation: M. Briand, first delegate of France, will address the Assembly.

M. Briand (France):

Translation: As first delegate of France, I have come here this year, as in previous years, to make a sincere and ardent declaration of faith in the League of Nations. I was afraid at one time that I might be prevented from doing so, and I can assure you that the prospect caused me the greatest distress. I am glad that circumstances have enabled me to take part in the work of this Assembly.

I am particularly glad to be present at this meeting, since it opened in somewhat disquieting circumstances; the work of the Assembly cannot be said to have begun in any atmosphere of optimism.

The sole talk was of the stagnation of the League, the disappointment it had caused in the minds of the nations; some even went so far as to say that a kind of disaffection was causing men to lose interest in its activities.

Personally, I do not take such rumours or such information at their face value. The League has become powerful and has now acquired a moral standing which makes direct attack difficult. It has very few declared enemies; but no one will be surprised to hear me say that not everyone is its friend; and among those whose habits have been upset by it, whose interests have been threatened, are some who, not daring to attack it openly, allow no occasion to pass for disseminating rumours to its detriment.

Naturally, nations, like individuals, when they are passing through difficult times, when they are ready to take offence at the slightest thing, tend to look for a scapegoat on whom to pronounce sentence, and at such times people are always more ready to lend a willing ear to adverse criticism.

Yet, although it is true that the nations are to-day passing through a difficult period and have great cause for anxiety, it would be extremely unfair to blame the League of Nations. When we examine the position we find, on the contrary, fresh reasons for placing confidence in this institution of ours.

The serious time through which we are passing is primarily, it must be admitted, a consequence of the war. It is one of the last of the tidal waves caused by that terrible upheaval, and it is breaking over the nations and doing terrible damage.

It is only fair to say that there are yet other reasons for this difficult situation. I cannot go into all of them; I have not enough experience to do so, and, moreover, they are too many and too varied. Let us admit, however, that the economic welter in which the world is placed is due also to the fact that, after the war, the nations were seized with a frenzied desire to produce. Nations and individuals threw themselves into their task in a spirit of individualism — I dare not say of egoism, but I am not sure that that description would not be more correct.

They produced without discipline, without method, and without the spirit of co-operation, which was really more necessary at that moment than at any other. Then, suddenly, they found themselves faced with the consequences of this economic anarchy. Some countries are being crushed under the weight of stocks, the disposal of which presents almost insuperable difficulties. They are now looking round for a remedy and, naturally, are at last thinking of co-operation. They say: "But there is a League of Nations! What is it doing? What has it done? Why has it allowed us to be a prey to such anxiety, disquietude and suffering?"

Our President, in a very eloquent speech, warned us against the belief that the League could work miracles. The League can accomplish its task of co-operation, but it is not capable of spontaneous generation in economic and financial matters, and it cannot substitute in individuals or nations the spirit of co-operation for the spirit of individualism and egoism.

The present unrest is largely due to that lack of discipline and of solidarity to which I have just referred. Almost everyone is prepared to admit this now. Everyone is looking at his neighbour seeking for points of contact, and, since these are already largely to be found in the League and yet the miracle has not occurred, naturally everyone is ready to turn round and judge the League. Some of these judgments are considered and reasonable and must be taken into account. That is clear from this general discussion, which has enabled some of our colleagues to express here well-founded observations.

At such moments of — I might say — hesitation, the secret enemies of the League naturally think the time favourable to attack it. We have only to read certain news items, certain articles, to see that the old hopes of the early days have revived in certain quarters. Think of the time when the League was founded; think of its origins. What irony was poured upon this effort at universal solidarity! How little encouragement was given to its founders, generous-hearted men of open mind, loving peace! They had to begin in an atmosphere far more electric, more difficult, more depressing than that in which we live at present, and it is to their honour that they never lost heart, but set themselves to their task with perseverance, and braved, in their own countries, the worst enemy a public man has to face — ridicule.

The League began its life in an atmosphere of doubt. Yet it went on, it worked on, it rendered service, it inspired confidence: and to-day, in spite of all, it has struck root too deeply in the minds of the nations for a few gusts bending the tree-top to shake it seriously. It stands too firm for direct or indirect assaults to do it much damage. And this is well; for, if by force of circumstances a decisive blow could be struck at our institution, and the confidence of the nations in it could be shaken, it would be a black day for the whole of humanity. The future would be dark for the nations, for all mankind.

For it is to the League that the nations must look to find a remedy for whatever difficulties are assailing them. It is, too, in the League that they can find the means to avert the risk of war. They feel this; they know it: they are clearly aware of it. And, in spite of all, although the first hours of this Assembly were disturbed by gloomy forecasts, in proportion as the discussions advanced, confidence in the League was seen to revive and to reassert its strength.

Moreover, when we look at the annual report before us — I need not dwell upon that report, or at any rate upon some of its details, important though they are, because they have been quite sufficiently dealt with by previous speakers — when, I say, we look at this report, we see that it would be quite unfair to accuse the League of having failed in its duty.

Last year was filled with all kinds of activities varying greatly in character. Associations like the Commission of Enquiry for European Union took up certain urgent problems. In so doing, they brought encouragement and relief to some countries which were suffering particularly acutely. Meetings were also held between statesmen representing countries to whose interest it was to get into contact with one another. The meetings which took place in Paris and London, and in Italy, and will soon be held in Germany — all such activities, even when limited to certain nations or representatives of nations, are imbued with the League spirit. The League is the guiding force behind these meetings and this work. It was thanks to the League that they were enabled to take place at all.

We are no longer at a stage when our work can be divided into water-tight compartments, and I agree with those speakers who called the Assembly's attention to the universal character of the League. All problems concern all the nations Members of the League, and it would be a great mistake for certain nations to isolate themselves and deal separately with problems in which the whole League is interested and cannot but be interested. If such an attempt were made, it would be fatal to our institution; but no one here would allow such a thing to happen, and all the activities in which we have taken part come under the ægis of the League. Without the League they would be impossible.

Viscount Cecil has said that, when we consider some of the conditions governing the prosperity of the peoples and the ways and means of meeting the crisis, we are obliged to admit the importance of the moral aspect of the situation.

This has been somewhat neglected, and I must concede that, in normal circumstances, in questions of production, self-interest is generally placed above what I may call the ideological factors. Nevertheless, that factor, fortunately for humanity, has a strength of its own, which is frequently irresistible, a strength we have no right to neglect, especially in an association such as ours.

When there are in the world nations which not only do not agree, but are opposed to one another, a sort of uneasiness is felt everywhere, and to-day such uneasiness reacts with astonishing rapidity on what is called the business world, which formerly was set on a sort of Olympus, high above peoples and ideas.

We have recently had proof of the importance of these ideological factors. The peoples were passing through a difficult period; already there was talk of a collapse. A meeting of representatives of the European nations was held at Geneva within the League of Nations, and under its auspices. At the close of their work they said to one another: "Is there nothing we can do from the moral point of view to reassure the peoples and restore confidence ?" We talked the matter over, and decided to draw up a manifesto in which we most strongly affirmed our confidence in peace — a manifesto in which we said to the nations: "Do not listen to pessimistic rumours. Do not be discouraged; take comfort. There is no danger of war; here are our signatures as guarantee."

You will remember the effect produced by that manifesto; and yet those were merely ideas, merely phrases. Nevertheless, business men immediately recovered confidence, and the result was a considerable improvement in the economic field. Hence the state of international relations does undoubtedly influence economic life.

It is therefore not a matter of indifference to the League, and it is, moreover, a result of its moral influence that two great nations like Germany and France should, for the last five years, have been seeking opportunities to draw together, to give each other guarantees of peace, to discuss certain questions together. I was one of those responsible for this rapprochement, and I am glad of it. Whatever may happen, it will be the act of my public life in which I take the most pride. But such a thing was possible only in this atmosphere. It was possible only owing to you, to your help, to the spirit you have created; otherwise, such an attempt would have been vain.

I must here refer to the very fine speech of my colleague Viscount Cecil, who swept aside with perfectly justifiable scorn certain insinuations to the effect that his country took a kind of fiendish interest in keeping certain nations apart in order to ensure its own supremacy. There is nothing new about that criticism; it has often been made. I consider, however, that Lord Cecil was right to protest on behalf of his country. For my part, I second his protest, and am prepared to bear witness that, in the effort to bring about a rapprochement, Great Britain has never ceased to lend her assistance to the two countries. Great Britain collaborated with them in these attempts; it gave them the mark of its approval and reinforced them with the authority of its signature.

I therefore associate myself wholeheartedly with Viscount Cecil's protest. It is untrue to say that England has any secret wish to create difficulty and friction or to do anything liable to cause trouble between two nations like Germany and France.

I affirm, then, that everything that could have been done for the improvement of relations has been done within the framework of the League in accordance with its principles and as the outcome of its efforts, and that the same will be true to-morrow.

At this time, when we are trying to bring about a rapprochement, I would scorn to lie to you or try to mislead you. Things have not always been easy for me; I have often come into conflict with the conditions — and the normal conditions too — of public life. I have often been involved in controversies; in both France and Germany our efforts have met with more or less violent resistance, and those who were striving to obtain a better understanding often intercepted and received hard blows. I have received some myself; and on bad days I feel the effects like a return of rheumatism.

But such things cannot deter public men, and it must be placed to the credit of the League that men from different countries have been meeting in Paris and London and in Italy to talk over their problems and dispel misunderstanding; that representatives from Germany have come to Paris, where they were well received — and I am glad of it; that to-morrow French statesmen will be asked to go to Germany; that, in the conversations held there under the eyes of the nation itself, the foundations may be laid of collaboration not merely verbal, but really practical and effective. This is a development which I desire with all my heart and in which I shall be only too glad to take part if I am allowed to do so.

All this took place in an atmosphere of understanding and mutual confidence. To facilitate such contacts and such co-operation we must avoid anything that may shake confidence. We must not hesitate, in a society where confidence is the essential element, to speak of our problems and to give our neighbours full information. We shall thus avoid much misunderstanding and many an unpleasant surprise from the polemics of those whose minds are not attuned to reconciliation or co-operation.

By the creation of such an atmosphere of confidence among the peoples and, when each nation, before acting, remembers that it is not alone and that it is to its advantage to act in a truly international manner, then all mistrust vanishes, cordiality is restored by loyalty and frankness, and the violent controversies which excite the nations, keep them apart and set them against each other have no hold.

From this point of view, much progress and many improvements have taken place. Recently I took a step which caused anxiety to some of my colleagues, and possibly that anxiety is not entirely dispelled even yet. I refer to my invitation, at a difficult moment — a moment which threatened to become even more difficult — to the European nations to get into touch with one another, to form an organisation within the framework of the League, making use of its administrative organs.

The events through which we have passed have shown the importance of such meetings; they enabled the morale of certain nations which were passing through a period of distress, doubt and great hardship to be restored. In Central Europe there were nations which could not employ their harvests to ensure their means of existence or even the continuation of their enterprises. They were vainly seeking the necessary capital; they could not obtain it except at usurious, extortionate, hopelessly high rates of interest.

Our association, if it has not been able to do all it would have liked to do, has provided some relief, created some contacts. Measures have been taken to improve the cereals market; the foundations have been laid of an International Institute of Agricultural Mortgage Credits. I am sure that, in years to come, the nations to which I referred just now will be proud of these results.

I repeat that the Commission of Enquiry for European Union must not be regarded as compromising the universality of the League, for it is the League's own creation. I hope that the Assembly will give it the encouragement which I consider it deserves.

And now, while apologising for having already addressed you at some length, I come to the subject in which you are all chiefly interested, the subject which has occupied the principal place — I might say the place of honour — in the various speeches you have heard, the subject that is bound up with the dominant idea of this institution, with the will to organise peace on increasingly sound lines, that it may be safe from attack in any quarter — I refer to the Conference for the reduction and limitation of armaments which is to meet on February 2nd of next year. You know how difficult it has been to prepare for that Conference, and I must protest that, if there has been any question of delaying it, of adjourning it, such a thought has certainly never been entertained in France.

It is the sad privilege of my country that in such matters people are always ready to think the worst of her. It has been remarked that the Conference had not yet met and that, lurking in the shadows, there is a country on the watch ready to snatch at any favourable opportunity to bring about its adjournment. That is not so. France will not ask for the Conference to be adjourned; France will do nothing to bring about such an adjournment; and I may say that, if any such attempt were made, France would be among the first to oppose it.

The convening of the Conference — I have said it before from this platform, with all the force at my command — represents the fulfilment of a solemn undertaking embodied in the Covenant of the League. If the Conference did not take place, the League would have failed in one of its most solemn undertakings and, I maintain, would thereby have deeply perturbed the conscience of the peoples. But, as things are, I do not think there is a single nation that has any such hidden intention. Moreover, to view things in a fair and reasonable light, we have to admit that, since it first arose, the problem has made headway in the minds of the peoples; the race for armaments, the armaments fever, are things of the past; the mind of the peoples is no longer set on war.

My own country, to mention no other, has lost no opportunity of limiting its armaments; it has reduced the period of military service by two-thirds; it has reduced its effectives by one-half; by a whole series of provisions it has progressed towards the ultimate aim set forth in the Covenant.

For five years, this question has been under discussion in one of your Commissions. You know what difficulties that Commission encountered and you will not have forgotten that sometimes, when it adjourned, it seemed that it would never meet again and that agreement could never be reached on questions of principle, which were apparently incapable of solution.

I may claim, as first delegate of France, that anyone re-reading the Minutes of that Commission will find that at all those difficult functions France boldly intervened with compromise solutions which enabled the Commission to continue towards its goal. Often the solutions she proposed were acceptable; they were adopted, and, thanks to them, it at length became possible last year to contemplate a definite term, a definite purpose, a definite date.

The meeting has been fixed, and we must all be there. Not to be there would be to fail in our undertaking, and it behoves all of us to arrive animated by the spirit of the Covenant.

When we examine the Covenant, we find that it is soundly conceived, that it is a solid construction, and the only regret I have to voice here is that some of its provisions should still have remained as it were veiled, like one of those statues that are always going to be but never are uncovered.

Beneath the shroud, however, a searching eye can discern the contours of the statue; it is possible to tell what lies hidden behind that shroud. What the founders of the League all wanted, what they were trying to embody in the Covenant, was peace, a means of placing the peoples in such a state of tranquillity as should enable them to forget the horrors of the war and to devote themselves wholeheartedly and unreservedly to the work of peace. When that result had been achieved, the huge outlay that a nation expends on material forces would be found to be needless.

Similarly, the authors of the Covenant had devised means for replacing material force. They were not pure ideologists; they knew quite well that between peoples, as between men, subjects of discord may remain long after the cessation of hostilities. Proportionately as they envisaged the disappearance of individual material force, they prepared legal solutions and collective sanctions; they called upon the peoples to agree to conciliation, to arbitration. They saw a progressive reduction in armaments in proportion as security increased; they saw the peoples, in the settlement of their conflicts, turn more and more to the judge instead of resorting to force. We need only read the Covenant to realise that all these various considerations were in the minds of the authors and founders of the League.

It would not be right to say that the nations have made no progress along that road; many improvements have been made. While men like myself who talk of peace are exposed to ridiculous attacks, those, on the other hand, who talk of war are most certainly not regarded in a very friendly way. The word "war", the vision of what war means, cause among the peoples reactions with which Governments will have to reckon. The peoples refuse to be again led on to catastrophes of such a nature. What they want is to maintain peace at all costs; that is their dominant thought.

Let no one suggest that it is a somewhat ignoble thing for a people, whose pages of history are full of glorious feats of arms, to take refuge in the thought of systematic peace. Let no one look on that as a means of undermining or almost destroying its moral fibre. No, the last war showed men to be imbued with such heroism, such a fund of courage, that anyone who suggested now that the nations are cowardly would be given scant hearing. The peoples to-day love peace because they have a horror of war, because they want to work in complete tranquillity, in complete security, and because they know that their work will be largely unproductive if warlike preoccupations serve to impede it.

But I should have no hesitation in avowing, along with the speakers who have preceded me on this platform, that from that point of view great progress has already been made. That fact entitles us to expect much from the Disarmament Conference which is to meet on February 2nd. We must all come to that Conference with that idea in mind, and with a determination to accept whatever means will permit of the achievement of our desires. My country is ready to do so; it has already acceded to Article 36 of the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice. I have acceded in her name to the General Act of Arbitration. France is a country which does not look to war as a means of furthering her interests. She has said beforehand: "A court . . . a judge . . . that is what we want". I trust that, in a not too distant future, all the nations Members of this institution will say the same.

I now pass to the question of security, a word which my lips hardly dare utter. It is one of those words over which contests have so often raged, which have so often stood as obstacles in the way of certain experiments, that those who employ it appear to do so not in order to act but in order not to act.

This word, however, is written in the Covenant of the League. That is quite natural. If the authors of the Covenant had not kept a place for it, they would have been guilty, for the most generous-minded Members of the League might have been deceived.

As regards security then, has progress been achieved? No one can deny that it has. I who stand on this platform have done all that was in my power to increase the sum total of security. The Paris Pact was conceived with that purpose in view; certain work which you have undertaken and in which you are still engaged is calculated to add to guarantees of this nature.

War is a crime. Such was the dictum of the nations who signed the Paris Pact. Until then, we must not forget, war had actually remained, in certain circumstances, a licit means for settling disputes. It is appalling to think that, in this century, war should have been considered a normal means of putting an end to disputes that might arise between nations. The Paris Pact laid down that it is an impious act to have recourse to war, that war is a crime against mankind. All the nations signed the Pact, thereby declaring that they renounced the possibility of making that fatal gesture — a declaration of war. That is something; morally it is an excellent result.

One fact, however, we cannot disguise: cases still exist in which war may occur. That fact is apt to be forgotten, and it is right not to become obsessed by such an idea; still, it is a contingency that has to be borne in mind. The League of Nations, I willingly admit, had realised this. Lord Cecil will not contradict me if I say that on that point it had thought out a whole system which, had it been adopted, would have obliterated once for all that terrible question-mark. For three whole weeks we met in order to establish that system. I will not discuss the reasons why it was found impossible to put it into application; but it must be admitted that if it had become a living reality, if mutual assistance against the contingency of which I was speaking could actually have been organised, the problem before the coming Conference would have been very much simplified. That system, however, was left standing there, like one of those ever-veiled statues to which I have just referred, those statues of which only the outlines can be discerned. I do not know what Lord Cecil may think about it now; perhaps he will not think I am going too far if I say that like myself he probably would not be sorry if such an institution were ready to function among the nations.

But what was not done, and what perhaps can never be done again in the same way, must be sought in another form. We are drawing near to the conclusion of a term, to a date towards which the peoples are looking with increasing expectation. When, on February 2nd, all the nations of the world, representing the highest ideal, the sum of authority and the sum total of force, are met here solemnly together for that particular purpose, when they are all sitting round the same table and have to consider this twofold problem — the reduction of armaments combined with recourse to juridical guarantees and sanctions relating to security — what will they do? That will be a solemn moment: and I proclaim here and now that never before has such a heavy responsibility lain upon the nations. That will be a decisive moment. Will they, who have power to do anything they choose, leave unanswered, staring them in the face, that terrible question-mark that still haunts us? That is the issue.

When that moment comes, all they need do is to utter the necessary words to supplement in the matter of security and mutual assistance what has already been done; all they need do is solemnly to affirm with a full realisation of the consequences which their words imply: "No more war! In no case, for no reason, in no circumstances will we allow war, which we have pilloried as a crime, to blaze forth again and still remain unpunished!"

They will have power to ensure that such an event shall never occur again. They will say whether they wish to establish contact with one another and to create between themselves reciprocal conditions of security such as to render it impossible.

If, when that moment comes, the Governments utter that word, make that gesture and perform that act in the sight of the peoples, sweeping away all possibility of future wars, and if the unknown elements in our constitution which form a blot on our Covenant disappear, then the peoples can light their bonfires, the peoples can rejoice, the peoples can contemplate the possibility of a big reduction of armaments, for the situation will be clear and definite, it will no longer be weighed down by the terrible risk of war which still burdens the life of nations and is one of the essential causes of the unrest and instability from which the world to-day is suffering.

The President:

Translation: M. Mayard, first delegate of Haiti, will address the Assembly.

M. Mayard (Haiti):

Translation: I feel that I owe you an apology, for to me has fallen the honour of addressing you on behalf of my nation, on the occasion of the examination of the Council's annual report to the Assembly of the League. My delegation would have been more adequately represented, and you, I know, would have been only too pleased, had my colleague and co-delegate, M. Dantès Bellegarde, occupied my place, but he has unfortunately been prevented from attending this session by his duties at Washington.

M. Bellegarde had, by his talents and personality, won for himself and for our country the esteem of the eminent representatives of the nations assembled here at Geneva, and I should like to thank the Agenda Committee for having appointed him its Chairman, a position which carried with it membership of the General Committee of this Assembly.

We are a congress of nations rather than of representatives, and I regard your choice of him, therefore, as an honour to our delegation and to our country as a whole. I am extremely grateful, and feel encouraged, despite my lack of experience and the fact that I am a newcomer in your midst, to put before you Haiti's views on the report submitted to you for consideration.

When we consider the knowledge lavished upon the activities of the Council, the Secretariat and the various international offices, when we realise the heavy work those activities have entailed and the conscientious way in which that work has been carried out — the League is assuredly deserving of the highest praise. The Haitian delegation has nothing but respect and admiration for the distinguished men who have devoted themselves to the question of the reduction of armaments, the work of bringing the Covenant into harmony with the Pact of Paris, the questions of slavery, mandates, international arbitration, European Union, and all the various political, technical and legal problems.

The nations directly interested in these questions can afford to wait, patiently and confidently, for the final solutions which you will in due course submit for their approval. The fact that those other peoples, like my own, are far removed geographically from the area of the war and its aftermath — which were productive of such painful and delicate complications — does not prevent them, despite the fact that their small area and restricted population would seem to imply but a theoretical participation in the conduct of world affairs, from taking a real interest in what has been accomplished: because, when trouble reigns and catastrophe follows upon catastrophe, they are forced to bear their share of the common sufferings — as witness the history of the last two decades — and they, too, experience to the full the inevitable repercussions of disturbances more directly affecting other nations and groups of nations.

There is before us, however, another series of questions which embraces every category of States included in the scheme of international affairs, a series of questions independent of any considerations of power or continent, or indeed of distinctions of any sort; I mean questions that touch on world economic recovery.

The present serious crisis has done more than anything else to bring out the truth of a postulate that is too often ignored: the fact of the equality and essential interdependence of human communities, and the further fact which since the war has been brought home as never before to the man in the street, that "the world is one big village".

On the day when our session opened, the Paris and Geneva Press published a number of articles which, while not guilty of the bitter sarcasm found in a recent book — a very clever book, incidentally — were pleased to be mockingly sceptical at the League's expense.

Such a tone, such an attitude, is unjust — is at all events premature — and nothing proves this more clearly than the aspirations with reference to the present crisis voiced by the speakers here when commenting, on behalf of the several countries, on the report now before the Assembly.

First M. Alejandro Lerroux, whose wise remarks will surely be remembered, speaking as he did as Minister of a great country whose exploits have enriched world history, and which has done more than any other country for the spread of Christianity: he asked us, when addressing us in his capacity as Chairman, not to be content with partial measures, but to regard world affairs in their entirety and thus fulfil our duties to society and produce something coherent and tangible. His second great speech and the proposal he submitted yesterday further explained the views of democratic Spain, and her opposition to any expansionist military ventures calculated to engender hatred and conflict.

Following on his speech on the opening day of the session, M. Titulesco, the distinguished jurist who is now our President, asked the nations here represented to regard Geneva not as a land of miracles but as a meeting-place of men of goodwill; his concluding words were: "In our hands lies the supreme hope of the world, perhaps its last hope".

Then M. Grandi, who while employing the circumspection of language proper to a statesman, yet put more life into what he said and approached the subject in a more objective manner than is usually the case at international congresses. He warned us that "individual national action is not enough, while the creation of exclusive groups might injure, rather than further, the cause of co-operation, security and peace". Again, more pointedly still, condemning exclusive arrangements — he was thinking, no doubt, of the network of world economic interest and world remedies for them — he said:

> "If the desire to establish a real system of peace, it must be based on real international interests. That is a delicate problem of adjustment as between the particular interests of individual States and the organic system of international co-operation . . . . . We all form one single group, and our dearest hope is to see it expand rather than disintegrate. We trust that the League of Nations may become a true reflection of the solidarity of nations, of all States, great and small, European and non-European, all helping to further their common civilisation, a civilisation which it is our duty not only to protect, but to strengthen and expand."

How can doubt and mistrust persist in the face of such reassuring and definite statements as these from such a delegate of such a nation?

Some moments before, M. de Madariaga, as delegate of Spain, reverting to the theme of universal interest, already so forcibly advocated by M. Lerroux, and speaking with all the elegance and vivacity characteristic of his nation, expressed himself as follows:

> "The League must be able to inscribe upon its portals and to use as a motto for its action this sentence adapted from the old classic: 'I am the conscious and organised world, and no nation can be foreign to me'."

Shortly afterwards, the Assembly took a decision which constituted an act of practical international solidarity on the occasion of the disasters which befell millions of human beings in China as a result of the Yangtse floods, and the delegate of India, His Excellency Sir B. L. Mitter, who struck a more definite and a more tragic note than anyone else, said:

> "In our view, the League machinery ought not to be employed for the purpose of arriving at regional agreements in the economic sphere. No doubt the urgency of the economic crisis accounts for this development, but we in Asia share in this crisis, and, to take an example, I do not think that the Agricultural Mortgage Credit Company should have been set up by means of League machinery in a form limited to European countries without Asiatic countries having an opportunity of putting forward their views at this Assembly."

His Excellency, Dr. Curtius, the representative of a great people which has suffered much from the vicissitudes of fate, has, in all his speeches from this platform, expressed his nation's desire for worldwide sympathy, its anxiety that the League's activities should benefit all nations without distinction.

All the statements made reflected the same earnest desire. I am sure you will not think it necessary for me to repeat any statement of this kind made by the British delegation, as the head of that delegation is none other than Lord Cecil, that crusader in the cause of peace and brotherhood. Moreover, it is an essential in the organic structure of the great Empire he represents that the various peoples it comprises are, instead of being subjected to a hard and fast system, allowed freedom to pursue, and do in fact pursue their several economic interests along the roads in which fate has placed them, and it is this characteristic that forms the strength and the greatness of that vast association of peoples.

Nor will you expect me to repeat any of France's well-known views on such a point. My delegation has nothing to say of France, as the national existence of Haiti may be described as a fact of French history in America. I have nothing to say, because the head of the French delegation, M. Briand, is to-day the man who, by his incomparable work for the construction of the new world, personifies in the highest degree the traditions which have caused France to be called the soldier of peace and the patron of the small nations.

In view of this unanimity among the nations assembled here, the delegation of Haiti would be failing in its most essential duty if it did not express the hope that, at the present session, the League will be defining its objects and enlarging its sphere of action, do all in its power to ensure that each State receives the assistance it needs, whatever its importance in the world or in whatever geographical zone it may be situated.

The delegate of Spain has fixed approximately the formula for the action required. The League's watchword must be: "I am the conscious and organised world, and the sufferings of no nation can be foreign to me." Above all, the League should act accordingly.

Henceforth, nothing can be allowed to prevent this — no motive of political convenience, no particularist reservation on the part of any continent. Such is the earnest wish of every one of us here, and it voices the desire of the whole world.

The nations which are still holding aloof from the League as a result of unfortunate misunderstandings are the first to act in the spirit of these ideals. It is with feelings of deep satisfaction and a certain pride that we — the American States represented at this Assembly — have seen our great neighbour, the United States of North America, transcend the bounds of its frontiers and tell Europe, in the words of its illustrious President, that the whole of mankind is on the verge of bankruptcy and that we are all suffering from the same evil and should help one another.

The Hoover proposal is inspired by a spirit which is really that of the League; it is in the interests of each nation to help all the others and of all nations to help each one.

Since the United States of America have thus extended a fraternal hand to Europe and asked that the bonds of union may be forged once more, and since, for the moment, the unfortunate position of its own domestic affairs prevents it from carrying out its President's generous proposal with regard to Latin America, it is right for you and and it is vital for us that the League should make a suitable return, a return which is at the same time in accordance with the spirit of international solidarity informing the whole Covenant, by placing its experience at the disposal of the small countries which in our Continent are suffering the consequences of the world crisis, and by extending its aid to them.

Nearly all American countries produce raw materials and tropical products. As, generally speaking, we cannot exchange our products with one another, they being of a similar nature, our market in Europe, and, in these circumstances, it is really impossible to reconstruct Europe economically without helping us.

You will note that what we are asking is not so much financial assistance in the form of a State loan as economic assistance — that is, assistance for our agriculture, whose production is necessary for the world.

In Haiti, the financial operations carried through some years previously during the disorders consequent upon the war in Europe had the effect of placing our finances in a sound position, so that our Treasury was able to make anticipatory payments in respect of its national debt, and, when all foreign securities fell in the slump on the Paris stock exchange last April, the Haitian bond quotations remained stable and satisfactory. For more than fifteen years, no fiscal measure has been taken and no public credit made available in the commercial interests of the country as a whole, so that we are now in the paradoxical position that, on the one hand, the State is rich and, on the other, the nation has become impoverished. Our Treasury is discharging its obligations in respect of the national debt with punctilious regularity; yet all classes of society in Haiti are now in dire financial distress.

For more than ten years, before she herself came under the iron grip of the law, our sister republic, Cuba, had to provide work for some hundreds of thousands of Haitians. The Dominican Republic, which shares our island with us, also extended a helping hand to us, and, only a short time ago, in March, when floods destroyed the crops, carried off animals and even caused loss of human life, bringing ruin and famine to various parts of our territory, it was from these neighbouring countries that help came to us. I should like to thank them on behalf of my nation, here in the presence of the representatives of the countries of the world. But now, alas, all these countries of Latin America are themselves suffering from the crisis, and you have seen the consequences. War — civil war — has broken out over almost the whole extent of our Continent. I should like to say here that the insurrections in this part of the world are due, not so much to mere rivalry or ambition, as is sometimes thought, as to the fact that the economic equilibrium has been upset. Experience has gone to show that when these countries are prosperous perfect peace reigns in them. Indeed, that is the rule in the case of all societies whose national economy is still imperfectly organised and stabilised.

Thank God, there have been no disorders in Haiti; but, during the financial year 1929-30, our imports fell by 25.30 per cent and our exports by 15.42 per cent as compared with 1928-29.

As compared with 1928-29, the value of coffee exports dropped 19.32 per cent in 1929-30 as a result of the fall in the prices of coffee on the world market, despite the fact that the amount actually exported had increased by 20.19 per cent.

Cotton exports increased nearly 200 per cent in weight in 1929-30 — compared with the preceding year, though we suffered losses on that commodity amounting to nearly three million gourdes (the gourde being equivalent in value to the Swiss franc). Thus, the people of Haiti have worked harder and made less every year.

As the result of this steady reduction in the resources of the producing class, the standard of living has dropped to the lowest known level, and never before have our people suffered such distress as at the present time.

The Haitian delegation hopes, therefore, that, at this session, ideas — the ideas of all of us — will be translated into League action and that the Assembly will include in its programme the setting up of a Committee to study urgently solutions for remedying the economic depression which is causing such havoc in Latin America, closely connected as it is with the European and the world crisis.

We hope that real headway may be made with the study of questions of agricultural credit, the adjustment of Customs tariffs in the League spirit of international solidarity, quotas, and the most-favoured-nation clause in commercial conventions, regard being had to these problems as they affect the American States.

I said just now that President Hoover's Government, by intervening in the financial affairs of Europe, seemed to have indicated the direction of League work in America.

There is, however, additional and yet more satisfactory information for me to give you. You all know that last spring the Federal Senate, which determines the foreign policy of the United States, passed, in agreement with the Executive, a resolution prohibiting the utilisation of the Federal Treasury's guarantee for loans accorded by American banks to the small Latin-American States, thus putting an end to the old inter-American policy, which was not really compatible with Article 10 of the League Covenant.

This marks the beginning of a fresh era, the normal international system replacing the former special inter-American system. It marks the abandonment of the "exclusive system" of this part of the world, to borrow a very descriptive term used here three days ago.

Consequently, in Caribbean America, if not all over Latin America, the small countries which need financial assistance to restore or strengthen their economic position will be free to apply for such assistance in any part of the world from those countries with which they have the most regular and most considerable relations.

The international law which came into being at Versailles more than ten years ago will soon be substituted for law deriving from treaties inter nos, or simply from de facto continental situations, provided that you decide to act as circumstances demand. The liberty of small peoples like ourselves can have no reasonable limits other than those determined by the rule of benevolent and beneficent interdependence of peoples, propounded here at Geneva.

"Liberty" makes me think of Lamartine: M. Louis Barthou, in his learned study on Lamartine's political career, has shown him to have been a seer like the old vates. "Siéger au plafond" would really seem to be a favourable position for scanning distant horizons and seeing ahead of one.

Extolling this city of Geneva, the League's home, whose motto: "Un pour tous et tous pour un" is so in keeping with the League spirit, the great French poet and politician said in one of his inspired odes: "La liberté du faible est la gloire du fort". I repeated that line to myself while I was listening yesterday to M. Motta's vigorous utterance concerning the duties of the League, which demand action even more than study and discussion.

I admired that noble citizen of a noble country — a small country which, amid the general collapse, has remained so prosperous only because it has remained free, thanks to the respect which it inspires in all of us, but more especially to its own virtues and its courage which have enabled it to shape its destiny to its own requirements and its own national genius.

I thought of all the good, both material and moral, that the nations of the world, great and small, owe to this illustrious land, not forgetting the generous hospitality accorded here each year to the peoples and races who meet here as one, on the common ground of human ideals.

I was tempted — may the shade of Lamartine forgive the sacrilege — to paraphrase his verse to bring it into harmony with the world's needs to-day: "La liberté du faible est l'intérêt du fort".

Yes, the interest; for, at this time, when the world economy has been shaken to its foundations by the blunders of "monopolised" and Taylorised large-scale production, by the insensate speculations of financial magnates, does it not become increasingly manifest that the distress of the small industrious peoples does in the long run, through the interplay of unsuspected repercussions, mean the undermining, the ruin of the great Powers and hence of world civilisation?

35. — GENERAL DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE: DRAFT RESOLUTION PROPOSED BY THE DELEGATIONS OF DENMARK, NORWAY, THE NETHERLANDS, SWEDEN AND SWITZERLAND.

The President:

Translation: I have received the following draft resolution from the delegations of five countries: Denmark, Norway, the Netherlands, Sweden and Switzerland:

"Being convinced that the crisis which is at present creating such serious disturbance among the nations of the world is due to a number of economic and political causes, one of the principal sources of which is the lack of mutual confidence between the nations;

"Being convinced that the realisation of the undertakings contained in the Covenant regarding the reduction of armaments will be one of the most important means of re-establishing mutual confidence between the nations and alleviating their crushing economic burdens, while a resumption of competition in armaments would fatally lead to an international and social disaster;

"The Assembly,

"Addresses a solemn appeal to all who desire the application of the principles of peace and justice on which the Covenant is based to devote all their efforts to the creation of a world opinion strong enough to ensure that the General Disarmament Conference will lead to definite results involving in particular a gradual reduction of armaments which will be continued until the object mentioned in Article 8 of the Covenant is attained.

"Considering the importance of carefully preparing the ground for the work of the said Conference and, in particular, of avoiding fresh increases of armaments in the present state of affairs;

"The Assembly,

"Requests the Council to urge the Governments convened to the said Conference to show their firm determination to support the efforts to ensure peace and re-establish mutual confidence by abstaining, pending the result of the Conference, from any measure leading to an increase in the present level of their armaments."

In accordance with the usual custom, this draft resolution will be printed and circulated, and I shall submit suggestions later as regards the action to be taken on it.

36. — ENTRY OF MEXICO INTO THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS: TELEGRAM FROM THE GOVERNMENT OF MEXICO.

The President:

Translation: The Secretary-General and myself have just received the following telegram announcing that the Mexican Government accepts the invitation unanimously addressed to it by the Assembly:

[Translation.]

"I have received the message in which your Excellencies inform me that the Assembly of the League of Nations at its meeting yesterday, September 8th, decided, on the proposal of Germany, the British Empire, Spain, France, Italy and Japan, supported by other delegations, to forward to me the resolution inviting Mexico to accede to the Covenant of the League of Nations and to lend her support as though she had been invited from the outset, considering that the League of Nations should now in all justice repair this omission which is wholly contrary to its true spirit. I am also informed that the resolution was adopted unanimously by the Members represented at the Assembly.

"In reply, I am glad to state that the Government of Mexico, which has been absent from that great institution for reasons over which she had no control, now at once accepts the satisfaction thus given.

"Mexico agrees to enter the League on the terms announced and offers, in a loyal spirit of friendship, her constant co-operation in the great task of maintaining peace and promoting international co-operation.

"On this occasion, Mexico thinks it necessary to state, when accepting, that she has never recognised the regional understanding mentioned in Article 21 of the Covenant. On starting her new work, Mexico has pleasure in renewing to all the peoples and Governments which constitute the League of Nations her sincere greetings and in expressing her firm desire to obtain with them the best results for the welfare of humanity. — Genaro ESTRADA (Secretary of Foreign Affairs)."

At a later meeting, I shall ask the Assembly to take the necessary action with regard to the invitation to the Mexican Government and its acceptance thereof.

The Assembly rose at 12.30 p.m.

37. — REPORT ON THE WORK OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS SINCE THE ELEVENTH SESSION OF THE ASSEMBLY: CONTINUATION OF THE DISCUSSION.

The President:

Translation: The agenda consists of the continuation of the general discussion on the report on the work of the League since the last session of the Assembly.

M. de Madariaga, delegate of Spain, will address the Assembly.

M. de Madariaga (Spain):

You will perhaps allow me to use a military expression — as I am going to talk about armaments — and to explain my presence on this platform by saying that I am here under orders.

Spain's views on disarmament have already been briefly but authoritatively explained by our Minister for Foreign Affairs, who is the first Spanish delegate to the Assembly. Our delegation, however, and in particular the leader of the delegation, thought it well that the question should be propounded afresh from a more general standpoint, which does not necessarily coincide with the official Spanish view, but is, as it were — so far as that is possible — an international and objective standpoint.

The two points of view are not substantially different. They lead to identical conclusions, but, although the conclusions may coincide, there is still one important distinction in that they can be arrived at by different means.

The great Disarmament Conference will be upon us in less than five months from now — not six or seven or eight, but five months — so much is fixed.

We are thus, after twelve years, nearing the end of the first stage in our work; and it seems that the moment has come to survey the past and to say whether we have or have not wasted time during those twelve years.

I am afraid there are a number of superficial considerations that may seem to justify a certain scepticism, and even the sarcasm and the sneers referred to this morning by M. Briand, the distinguished first delegate of France. In the course of those twelve years, we have witnessed an imposing procession of Commissions and Committees. First, there was the Permanent Advisory Commission for Military, Naval and Air Questions. Then, on Lord Cecil's initiative, came the Temporary Mixed Commission, followed, after a few years, by the Co-ordination Commission, which was unable to co-ordinate its own constitution with the realities of the situation and consequently died an early death, unhonoured if without reproach. Then there was a Committee of the Council, concerning which it was debated with scholastic subtlety whether it was the Council in Committee or a Committee of the Council.

Finally, there came the Preparatory Commission for the Disarmament Conference, the bold title of which gave promise of something definite, and which created round itself a solar system, a whole constellation of Committees and Sub-Commissions — we had reached the point when we could not think of any more — Sub-Commission A and Sub-Commission B, a Mixed Committee on Technical Questions, a Committee of Experts on Budgetary Questions, a Sub-Committee on Civil Aviation and probably other cogs that I have forgotten in that most intricate piece of machinery.

But the fact remains that all those Commissions and Committees and Sub-Committees helped by their very number to engender a feeling of despair. I remember that Sub-Commission A, which sat from May to November 1926, consumed vast quantities of paper for its Minutes, and it was estimated that the Polish delegation could have walked home on League paper. That was the sort of spirit engendered by the plethora of Committees dealing with the question.

I may say here, incidentally, that the amount of work produced by the Military Sub-Committee led to extremely unjust criticisms of the military, naval and air experts who had worked with us. Now that we are nearing the end of our work, the Assembly will perhaps allow me to say frankly that never has it been my privilege to observe a more devoted or capable body of men, or one more eager to achieve results or more gifted with a spirit of balance, a spirit that enabled them to reconcile the loyalty they owed to the defence of their respective countries with the loyalty they owed to a new international system which must have run counter to their natural tendencies.

However, when all is said and done, and admitting that such scepticism and sarcasm are — ironically — more or less justified, are there any real grounds for pessimism with regard to this first stage of our work? In my opinion, no such grounds exist. On the contrary, the results of this first twelve-year stage justify in the highest degree the methods, machinery and existence of the League.

Let us just look back to the time when the League, with a faith which now, after twelve years, we can only regard as heroic, first set itself to rouse the nations to disarm. Nations had just been at each other's throats. Europe's sacred body showed gaping wounds, and over Europe's soil still hovered traces of the poison gas which blinded her soldiers and — worse still — of those insidious fumes which poisoned the minds of the European nations. Then it was that we called upon those countries to discuss disarmament.

We had to begin by calming passions and staunching wounds. We had to create a technique of international co-operation by means of Committees, the Assembly and the Council, a technique so perfect that — if I may venture to say so now with due respect — we are not even conscious of its existence here, though we use it every day in all its perfection. That technique we owe chiefly to two men to whom I should like to express my admiration for what the Assembly owes to their creative genius — Sir Eric Drummond and M. Jean Monnet.

Those of us who have been here from the outset will remember the great psychological difficulties we had to overcome. Lord Cecil, I am sure, will remember the early stages and the Temporary Mixed Commission, presided over by M. Viviani with an energy which, perhaps, was a legacy of the war.

He will remember how much easier things became when we were able to welcome in Geneva M. Albert Lebrun — so keen and vigorous of mind — now President of the Senate, and Colonel Fabry; and the further progress we made after the arrival of M. de Jouvenel, with his open mind and lucid brain; and, finally, how, when the general situation had so greatly improved through the agency of that wizard of peace whom we have heard this morning, M. Paul-Boncour arrived in our midst, with his youthful crop of silvery hair, his blue eyes and his gift of eloquence.

In the meantime — not independently of Geneva, but still under the influence of the Geneva spirit — the relations between France and Germany continued to improve, until one day there entered the League's portals the representatives of that great country which was destined to occupy here the position due to it.

I wish I could draw a veil over the incidents that occurred at that juncture; but I have no right to, for I conceive it to be my duty to proclaim here that free, parliamentary and democratic Spain disavows and repudiates the action of which a usurping Government, having first muzzled public opinion, was guilty when Germany presented herself before the League.

I may say, here and now — not next week or the week after — that Spain, as long as she is free, will never seek to employ pressure unworthy of her, with the object of securing in the Assembly or the Council of the League the position she considers she should occupy in order the better to serve the League.

Side by side with the gradual pacification produced by all these events, the work of disarmament was proceeding, we were beginning to gain a better understanding of the real substance of the question and of the objective difficulties of the problem, until at length we succeeded in framing a Convention to which I shall ask to be allowed to revert later, but regarding which I may say now that it would be most unjust to describe it as inadequate, since it does in fact represent a first stage of the highest importance, offering great promise of success in the task to which we have set our hands.

A certain pessimism is, however, justified, and I think it is perhaps due to what might be called the duality of development in these matters during the last ten years. We have advanced along parallel lines and two series of acts have been pursued independently of one another.

On the one hand we have had a whole series of solemn declarations with a view to establishing on a firm basis peace, justice and judicial settlement between the nations. First there was the Covenant and then the increasing success of the Hague Optional Clause; then came the suggestions of the Protocol and the eminently successful work of Locarno, the Treaties of Arbitration and Conciliation, the list of which is still lengthening, then the Paris or Briand-Kellogg Pact, then the General Act and now the Convention to strengthen the Means of preventing War.

Side by side with that series of acts, all designed to secure peace, we observe another series which, while not expressly designed to promote war, seem to indicate forgetfulness or ignorance of the efforts being made at the same time. Such acts are the continuance of armaments, increased expenditure on military forces or at least an admittedly inadequate reduction of them. We see what we are perhaps inclined to ignore — the perfecting of military technique and organisation, which allows of the increase of the potential aggression of all nations, while maintaining or even reducing the figures of armaments or of the budgetary appropriations. We see a psychology of precautions, defence and mistrust, which makes it possible, for instance, for all the principal military nations, despite the fact that they signed the Protocol of 1925 (which prohibits the use of gases in warfare) to engage actively in preparing for chemical warfare. There is a contrast between the acts of the National Defence Ministries and those of the Ministries for Foreign Affairs, as if the States, having for their own adopted the Gospel injunction, refused to let their right hand know what their left hand is doing, or as if, imitating the undesirable practices of those people whose religion sits lightly upon them, and who go to a service or to Mass on Sunday and reserve the other six days of the week for the seven deadly sins, they were content to come to their annual September service at Geneva, and to reserve the remaining eleven months of the year for the gratification of their national individuality.

Human psychology is so complex that it is possible to trace these international vices to a hidden virtue, which adopts a distorted means to express itself.

I am often tempted to attribute the phenomena I have just noted to a certain rather attractive virtue to be found in one extremely useful class of collaborators — I refer to the modesty of our legal experts. Those who have drafted most of our texts are so modest that they seem always to be at pains to attribute the smallest value to their own productions. Thus, scarcely had the Covenant been launched on its international career when it was subjected to a regular campaign of interpretations, which curiously enough invariably had the effect of lessening the value of the texts and never of strengthening them.

The Covenant is an organic whole and no one article of it can be taken independently of the rest. It is divided into articles for convenience in numbering; but these have no separate existence, they constitute a single whole no part of which can be weakened without similarly affecting the whole organic body, for that is what the Covenant is.

By diluting certain articles — and I will mention those articles so as not to seem to avoid any obstacles in my path — by diluting Articles 10 and 16, those concerned have managed to weaken Article 8, and that is why it is so ineffective to-day.

There is an essential unity in the Covenant, which results from the legal organisation embodied in it, but there is a more important and deep-seated unity, that of the spirit which inspired it. In my opinion, we have committed a very grave error in trying to extend the scope of the Covenant and in trying to produce a marvellous crop of interpretations which were more often than not weaker reproductions, wasting the sap of the Covenant in external manifestations and possible extensions, instead of keeping the texts well pruned so that the sap might run right through the trunk and penetrate deep into the conscience of men and nations. Only by making the Covenant a more vital force in the conscience of the peoples, not by weakening it by a multitude of interpretations which only obscure its true meaning, shall we succeed in arresting the course of war and consolidating peace.

It would perhaps be well to get back to the Covenant itself, if only by means of a small Convention consisting of a single article stipulating that the contracting parties are agreed that the Covenant means just what it says. But then all of us here must say so and act accordingly.

One illustration of the seriousness of this phenomenon might be obtained by comparing the results of the Covenant and those of the Paris Pact with those obtained from the fruitful combination of the two. I do not propose to expatiate on this theme before an Assembly which knows more about it than I do; I will merely say — and I do not think anyone here will contest it — that from the fact that Members of the League are parties both to the Covenant and to the Paris Pact we must conclude that neutrality is a thing of the past.

Neutrality, then, no longer exists. If that is so, why are we still thinking of it and trying to define the laws of war in such a way as to defend the rights of neutrals?

We have outlawed war. Why then do we continue to study the laws of war? We have killed neutrality. Why do we continue to study laws applicable to neutrals? It is as if we were to restore the laws of inequality in order to define the rights of people who no longer exist. But, it may be objected, there are the States non-Members of the League. Here, I admit, is a serious difficulty, but I think it is eminently desirable to be clear in our minds about it, to face it fearlessly and make the position plain.

We owe to non-Member countries, not as a matter of bare courtesy but as a matter of fundamental frankness, to tell them that we honestly and sincerely respect the reasons which have obliged them to remain outside the League; but, when we have said that, we have the right to take the facts as they are, and one incontestable fact is this: that, until the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics have combined with the rest of us to produce a system calculated to banish neutrality for ever, the ideal of complete disarmament will never become a reality.

or seven or eight, but five months — so much is fixed.

We are thus, after twelve years, nearing the end of the first stage in our work; and it seems that the moment has come to survey the past and to say whether we have or have not wasted time during those twelve years.

It may be argued, I know, that the guarantee of neutrality is a guarantee of the status quo, but I confess I have never been able to understand that argument. What does it mean? Does it mean that the status quo cannot be guaranteed and that we must therefore entertain the possibility of war in order to change it? If so, no one could subscribe to such an argument, for war can never be deemed legitimate even if its object be to change the status quo.

Does it mean that, when we have disarmed, we can no longer change the status quo? The status quo is not permanent — no status quo can be permanent. Mankind does not — never will — respect frontiers bristling with machine-guns or a succession of pacts filling reams of stamped paper. Mankind will claim its rights. It seems to me that we have sufficiently acquired the habit of co-operation here — and it is our right and our duty to trust the statesmen and the nations most directly concerned — to be justified in the hope that when it becomes possible to change the status quo by peaceful means in the interests of Europe and the whole world, this will duly come to pass. But whether that is or is not possible, we cannot admit that the status quo can or should be changed by war.

War is henceforth impossible for civilised countries, and such an argument must therefore be banished from our discussions. I mention it, however, because it seems to me that the Covenant, which in international law is, in essence, profoundly revolutionary, has remained reactionary in its vocabulary. Its ideas have progressed so far that they have gone beyond the form in which they were originally expressed. Thus, we find in the Covenant terms which seem as obsolete as certain fossil formations, such as the horse's toe or the academician's sword.

This applies to Article 16, for instance, which says that the Covenant-breaking State shall be deemed to have committed an act of war against all the other Members of the League. But it has not committed an act of war, for war is in the nature of a duel. Duels, however, take place only between men of honour, and a State which violates the Covenant can no longer be classed with an honest man. The League must seriously set itself to decide whether a Covenant-breaking State can retain the rights of a belligerent. That is a definite problem of international law which it might usefully study. It seems to me illegal for a country which has violated or broken its engagements to be able to claim the rights of a belligerent. It is precisely in that direction, the creation of the new international law necessitated by the revolutionising of the international code of morality by the Covenant that we ought, in my view, to direct our efforts.

If that is done and we take our courage in both hands and decide to strike out on that path in a spirit of full co-operation, without mental reservations, we shall come to admit that armaments are a question not so much of quantity or technique as of quality and policy.

I am not going to argue in favour of a status quo in the matter of armaments — I hope to prove this in a few moments. I do not say that the reduction of armaments does not interest us: far be it from me to say that. In my opinion, however, the problem of armaments is dominated by a question of political quality and not of technical quantity. I will give you an example to explain what I mean. When a man carries a revolver in the street the length of the barrel and the calibre are of no importance: what is of importance is to know whether he is a hooligan or a policeman.

The same applies as regards the difference between two conceptions, which should be analysed, because they are a little blurred and we are apt to confuse them in our minds: I mean the mechanical conception of international society and the organic conception of international society. These two conceptions must necessarily lead to essentially different results. For the sake of greater clearness I propose deliberately to exaggerate the contrast between them.

Assume an international society based exclusively on the mechanical principles of an egoistic individualistic power of nations — all pulling in different directions without regard for common interests — and assume (which is improbable) that those countries, which are actuated exclusively by national egoism, agree to discuss armaments. What will be the result of any Convention concluded by them? There can, it seems to me, be only two possible results: either complete failure, or such an adjustment of the respective armaments of the nations represented at the Conference as would make those armaments correspond more exactly or less inexactly to the political power of the several nations.

It might happen that, for historical reasons, two countries, A and B, whose political strength was practically equal, came to the Conference with military forces which were far from equal, the one perhaps double the other. The result of the Conference would be that, since each nation was actuated by a purely mechanical conception giving full play to its national egoism, it would get out of the Conference all that was open to it by reason of its technical capacity and the diplomatic skill of its representatives.

At the close of the Conference each country would come out with a naval and air force strictly proportionate to its political strength when it entered the Conference.

That is not disarmament. It is an adjustment of military forces producing a new map of the military forces of the world; it may even result in a local, partial or national increase of armaments, in order that the effectives finally agreed upon may correspond to the respective political strengths at the opening of the Conference.

Let us now consider the other extreme. Presuppose a perfect international organic system in which each nation feels itself to be, as it were, an organic part of a universal world body, serving that body and being served by it: national egoism — still a factor — will have the opposite effect. By hypothesis, the collective organism will be responsible for the national defence of all the members composing it, since they are all equally valuable to it; national egoism will make it to the interest of every nation acceding to the Convention to reduce its armaments to an absolute minimum, since in any case it will be sure of being protected by the whole body.

Thus, according to whether you conceive the international whole as a system of mechanical forces or as a conscious collective organism, the resultant position will be that, under the first hypothesis, each nation will try to leave the Conference with the highest possible maximum of military forces proportionate to the political force at its disposal; or, under the second hypothesis, it will try, from national egoism, to reduce to a minimum the military, naval and air forces which it has to support and pay for, with the ultimate object, however, of placing them at the service of the whole body.

What is the present position? Obviously it lies between these two extremes. Life is essentially a compromise. Even after twelve years of the League, it may be said perhaps that we still have our feet planted in the mechanical system and our head, our brain and perhaps some portion of our heart in the organic system. Thus we shall come to the Conference next February with a divided mind, feeling that we do not know where to place our faith: in national egoism, individualistic and exclusive, which bids us not to trust in the whole body but to rely simply on national defence, trying to obtain the highest possible military, naval or air strength; or on international idealism, on the organic sense of the common life of the whole, whereby a nation will be allowed to put its trust in the new moral force of which I have just spoken and to try to lessen its financial burdens, and reduce to the lowest point its military, naval and air burdens, seeing that it will be invited to contribute to the collective defence of the League.

While concrete data may be lacking, we have before us a relatively simple programme to adopt. Before concluding, I shall ask the Assembly's permission to set forth briefly the minimum programme which I consider essential.

First, we must seek by every means in our power to strengthen and build up the organic spirit which will enable us to come to the Conference in the right spirit. That applies, not only to ourselves, but to the countries not yet Members of the League; that is to say, we must seek by every means in our power to instil this idea into the minds of the nations, and not this idea only, but the feeling that the Convenant exists, that it means what it says, that its demands are specific and that we are bound in honour to defend one another against the attacks of international brigands. That must be our first duty, our most urgent duty. That must form the subject of our propaganda from now until February and all the time the Conference is sitting. Next, we must try to achieve a certain number of concrete results, to attain a certain number of definite objects, of which we must not fall short and, beginning with as large a reduction as possible of effectives and material — let us not rely on the idea of limitation — our second aim must be a considerable reduction of the national expenditure on armaments.

Here the Assembly will, I trust, allow me to make a short digression. The Spanish delegation is very much struck by this anxiety for petty economy, a preoccupation which sometimes crops up in the Assembly and which is superficially — but only superficially — justified by the crisis through which we are passing but which, if we compare the League budget with the so-called national defence budgets of the world, really raises a doubt whether the League is acting wisely.

I should like to work out a little sum with you. If the nations of the world had forwarded to the Treasurer of the League Secretariat in 1930 a bare 5 per cent of what they expended in 1930 on their national defence, and if the League Treasurer had invested that sum in a bank at 5 per cent, that 5 per cent interest on the first 5 per cent would have been sufficient — would still be sufficient — to pay for the League, the International Labour Office and the Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague, for the rest of the world's history, without ever having to apply for a centime to Members of the League.

Lastly, I feel I must insist on what, to my mind, is the most striking merit of the Convention. The Convention creates a permanent institution for disarmament. The greatest service (and this applies to all our activities) the League can render in the various spheres in which it intervenes would be to create permanent institutions which should enable the international spirit to manifest itself perpetually.

We shall have a permanent disarmament institution. Armaments to-day are manifestly international facts but, in law, they are still, in spite of Article 8, exclusively national, and the League's aim must be to transform into a de jure international matter what is already a de facto international matter. I repeat that armaments are international facts, because directly a country makes a change in its armaments manifest international reactions occur.

Consequently, it can be no more lawful for a country to change its armaments without international authorisation than it would be for a citizen of Geneva to walk about the streets of the town with a machine-gun or a revolver.

Lastly, it seems to me necessary to stress the fact that the Convention must be based on Article 8, not from mere caprice, still less from any fanaticism on the part of the League. It must be built up on Article 8 because once we begin to deal with Article 8 we shall be finally committing ourselves, and once we have signed a Convention based on Article 8, we can be under no regime but that of the Convention — that is to say, the regime of reform represented by the Convention — and no longer under the regime of international anarchy in the matter of armaments — the evil from which the world is suffering to-day.

Having said what I felt was due in praise of the Convention, I hope the Assembly will allow me to say in what respect we consider it may perhaps be defective. On that point I shall submit no resolution or concrete proposal. I merely wish to make some suggestions; for I may state emphatically that if the time has not come for them to be translated into fact, if the other delegations are not ready to follow us, we, for our part, are prepared to affirm that a time will come when that stage of perfection will be reached.

We believe, although this does not exhaust the list of possible improvements — that the Convention would be enormously strengthened if it were backed up by another Convention placing civil aviation under an international regime.

This is an old idea here, an idea which was discussed by the Sub-Committee on Civil Aviation which met at Brussels in 1926. The three arms, the army, the navy and the air force, are closely bound up with one another so far as armaments are concerned, and it is useless to hope for a dramatic disarmament in any one arm without a similar change in the others. It does not seem possible to hope for air disarmament of any appreciable importance if we do not take into consideration the possibility of transforming civil aviation in a night, in an hour, into a military weapon. It seems obvious that the only remedy for this evil, the only precaution against this risk, is to place aviation under an international regime.

It may be said of course that, once war has been declared, such an international regime would be purely illusory. But any argument based on what will happen when a war is declared is irrelevant. The League can have no interest in what happens from the moment war is declared. During the period preceding war, we can apply powerful brakes which will probably suffice; but a moment will come, perhaps a few days before war actually breaks out, when the war spirit will gather such momentum as to render our brakes useless and destroy our hopes. Our efforts must therefore

It may be argued, I know, that the guarantee of neutrality is a guarantee of the status quo, but I confess I have never been able to understand that argument. What does it mean? Does it mean that the status quo cannot be guaranteed and that we must therefore entertain the possibility of war in order to change it? If so, no one could subscribe to such an argument, for war can never be deemed legitimate even if its object be to change the status quo.

Does it mean that, when we have disarmed, we can no longer change the status quo? The status quo is not permanent — no status quo can be permanent. Mankind does not — never will — respect frontiers bristling with machine-guns or a succession of pacts filling reams of stamped paper. Mankind will claim its rights. It seems to me that we have sufficiently acquired the habit of co-operation here — and it is our right and our duty to trust the statesmen and the nations most directly concerned — to be justified in the hope that when it becomes possible to change the status quo by peaceful means in the interests of Europe and the whole world, this will duly come to pass. During the period preceding war, we can apply powerful brakes which will probably suffice; but a moment will come, perhaps a few days before war actually breaks out, when the war spirit will gather such momentum as to render our brakes useless and destroy our hopes. Our efforts must therefore be concentrated on the period preceding war, on the period when the nations do not yet desire war and are still too indifferent to be infected with the war spirit. Then our brakes will be sufficiently powerful, and it is at that moment that the existence of a strong and exclusively national air force might produce in a people dangerous psychological effects, panic and a tendency to lapse into the war spirit.

For that reason, despite the arguments that may be advanced to the contrary, all based on what might happen after the declaration of war, we still believe that an effort to internationalise civil aviation should be made, seeing that aviation is a new development which has not yet taken root, as it were, in military spheres.

And we believe that, between the present day and February, it should be possible to do something definite in the matter.

We think further that the Convention is manifestly unsatisfactory as regards the limitation of implements of war. We think it would have been possible to make some attempt at once to limit implements of war, apart from budgetary limitation — a valuable means, however, which should be retained — and to institute a direct limitation based on a threefold system: first stocks, then a Convention for the adequate supervision of the international trade in arms, and, thirdly, a Convention for the adequate supervision of private and national manufacture. We are not convinced by the arguments that have sometimes been advanced against these two conventions. The first is, of course, in existence already, and the reason it is not in force is that there are still some ratifications to be received; but it actually dates from 1925. The second is still delayed.

I am afraid that, during the five years which have elapsed, this second convention has been somewhat whittled down by the various committees that have dealt with it, and we still believe that the only way to achieve an effective limitation of war stocks is by a composite system consisting of budgetary and direct limitation together. Direct limitation might begin, I repeat, with stocks, a method which will be found unsatisfactory during the first few years but which will rapidly improve, and might be followed by the Convention on the trade in arms, with, finally, a Convention on manufacture.

Are we to go to this Conference in a defeatist spirit, fearful of disaster? I think not. True, if the Convention fails it will be a disaster, but we need not go so far as to say that such a disaster would justify us in becoming discouraged and renouncing the undertaking.

Adam Smith said that nations can bear much in the way of ruin. The League can bear much in the way of disaster and survive. Let us be anxious, passionately anxious, to succeed, ready to go on trying despite failure, should failure come. Let us regard possible failure as a disaster, let us exert ourselves to prevent it, but let us determine to continue even after the disaster, if disaster there be, for after all we know that we are upheld by the spirit of this Assembly.

A rumour has been current the last few days in the League lobbies that, on grounds of economy, the number of Assemblies is to be reduced. Let us hope that that rumour is false; but if it really has any foundation, let us resist such a proposal with all our might, for it is a mistaken one. The importance of the Assembly does not consist in the actual work it does, though I may perhaps be allowed to associate myself very respectfully with what the French Minister for Foreign Affairs said this morning regarding the importance and volume of that work. It is not so much the work of the Assembly as the existence of the Assembly that counts, the fact that we come here and get in touch with each other. The questions we debate, the problems we discuss, simply constitute, as it were, the material body which by a universal law is necessary if the spirit is to come and dwell in our midst, and we can only pray that the list of questions on the agenda will increase, so that, the body having acquired more substance, the Assembly may endure and the effect of the Geneva spirit be more abiding.

We need not be alarmed to find that spirit — again I should like to associate myself very respectfully with the words of M. Briand and M. Motta — manifesting itself elsewhere than at Geneva. What does it matter if statesmen meet away from here? All the better, provided they meet and consult in the spirit of Geneva. For that spirit, Ariel-like, is mobile and, though born here, can hover over the cupolas of Rome, the great buildings of Berlin, the slender spires of Paris, the massive towers of London, the pinnacles of the Kremlin and even the tall roofs of the Capitol and the White House. There is nothing to regret in this. On the contrary, let us rejoice to find the spirit of Geneva traversing the whole world.

More and more, the nations have insisted that the Press which, at first, did not attend our meetings very assiduously, shall come here and fill the Press galleries and learn what is going on. Why? Do the nations understand anything whatever about our dull reports, our complicated resolutions, our technical problems? No. What they feel is that behind the dense thicket of our commissions and committees and in the bush of our reports and our resolutions — perhaps not a burning bush, though it may be a smoking one — they can hear an august and solemn voice. It is the voice of the world, of the world conscience, which proclaims: "I am the mother of all countries. Serve your country, but see to it that your country serves me also."

The President:

Translation: M. Garay, delegate of Panama, will address the Assembly.

M. Garay (Panama):

Translation: The speeches which have been delivered from this platform by eminent orators on the questions of disarmament, security, the international organisation of peace, and the solution of inter-State disputes by judicial settlement or arbitration, have awakened in me many personal memories, and you will perhaps pardon me if I evoke them now.

In 1924, in the Salle de la Réformation, during the discussions on the famous Geneva Protocol, when Mr. Macdonald, M. Herriot, M. Beneš, M. Politis and other equally well-known speakers addressed the Assembly, I also ventured to speak and to say that, in the matter of disarmament, my country beat the record and could claim to have won the world championship. It was quite true. Unfortunately, misunderstandings have occurred in certain circles and in the Press which have given rise to the belief that Panama was a republic born to international life, and that it had never possessed an army, and that it was consequently no trouble and no credit to it to have disarmed.

Allow me to say that that is entirely incorrect. My country had an army — a small one, I admit, but an army nevertheless — which was dissolved some time after the proclamation of our independence, the maintenance of order and the enforcement of law being entrusted to a national police force. Thus, after seven years, an unfortunate mistake has been put right.

There is another matter on which I wished to speak to-day — the visit paid to Latin America at the beginning of this year by the Secretary-General of the League and certain officials of the Secretariat. On the invitation of the Government of Panama, Sir Eric Drummond was the guest of the Republic for some days, and his visit produced the happiest results.

His visit had the effect of reviving the interest of our nation in the League and in Geneva affairs, as was well said by the President of the Council in his opening speech to the present Assembly. The countries visited were enabled, thanks to the Secretary-General's visit, to obtain a more direct and more exact idea of the institution of which they are Members.

On the other hand, the Secretary-General came back from Latin America with greater experience and enhanced authority. He had entered into direct contact with our leaders and our peoples and was thus enabled to understand more clearly and more exactly our conditions of life and our mentality.

As regards my own country, Sir Eric Drummond had an opportunity of studying at close hand that love of peace which has characterised the people of Panama throughout its history and accounts for many of the sacrifices we have made and many of the servitudes we have assumed for the common good of the world. Sir Eric Drummond and his companions trod the ground where the international assemblies created by the political genius of Simon Bolivar, our great liberator, were held in 1826. Those assemblies made our capital city the precursor of Geneva and our assembly hall the forerunner of the Salle de la Réformation and the Bâtiment Electoral, so that we can regard the protocols signed more than a century ago as the venerable ancestors of the Covenant of the League.

If the objects of the League are to be wholly fulfilled in the case of countries situated so far from Geneva as ours, it is not enough for us to send permanent or temporary delegations to the Assemblies, the Council or the various conferences of the League. The relations must be reciprocal — Mahomet must go to the mountain and the mountain must go to Mahomet.

We welcome the happy initiative which led to the visit to Latin America of Sir Eric Drummond and the Secretariat officials who accompanied him, and we entirely associate ourselves with the views expressed by M. Lerroux in his opening speech, in which he emphasised the desirability and usefulness of such journeys and meetings — prises de contact, as he called them.

Again, we still hear the echoes of the inspired words uttered by the head of the Swiss delegation, M. Motta, whose conscience recoils at the bare thought of our being actors, whether voluntary or unwitting, in a gigantic international masquerade. In listening to him, I was glad to feel that I already shared the sentiments he voiced so eloquently in this Assembly. Barely seven months ago, we received Sir Eric Drummond at the National Institute of Panama on the occasion of a university ceremony organised in his honour by the Panama Society for International Law, at which I had the honour to preside. I made a speech on that occasion, in which I said some things that I should like to repeat here, as they contain (though expressed in rather negative form), a profession of faith in the future of the League.

"It is maintained that the old aphorism, 'Si vis pacem para bellum', continues to inspire the policies of the great Powers and that to-day, as yesterday, the best way to guarantee peace is to prepare for war; but this curious argument would lead us to the absurd conclusion that, when the nations of the world organise pacific means of settling their disputes and seek to promote arbitration, conciliation, organised justice and comparative or total disarmament, they are working indirectly for the cause of war.

"Indeed, if we admit that warlike preparations ensure and guarantee peace, we must also admit conversely that peaceful preparations ensure and precipitate war. This deplorable philosophy would mean that hypocrisy is the only true policy for States in the matter of international security, and that would be far from flattering to our Western civilisation.

"If the world were no better than that, if it were so essentially opposed to the idea of justice and probity, the cause of peace could have no further justification, and our only hope of salvation would then lie, not even in war, but in general destruction."

Let us seek to penetrate with the beams of hope this sombre and discouraging pessimism, to which so many minds are a prey; let us beware of spreading its contagion.

The President:

Translation: Mr. Collins, delegate of Australia, will address the Assembly.

Mr. Collins (Australia):

I had the honour of attending the first Assembly of the League of Nations, in 1920, and therefore am in a position to note the great progress and the many important developments that have taken place in the organisation of peace and international co-operation. When I was here last, there was evidence of careful thought and wise preparation; and the Secretariat, though in its infancy, had already given promise of the high efficiency to which it has since attained. There were at that time many critics and sceptics who prophesied an early decease of the League; but happily there is no longer any need anxiously to take its pulse and to measure its temperature, in order to assure ourselves of its health. To-day it is a well-established institution, a fully recognised and indispensable instrument of international intercourse, and the confidence it has inspired augurs well for the future.

Already in this gathering there have been notable references to questions of economy, and I too desire to make some remarks upon that subject. I know perfectly well that we are not justified in measuring the achievements of the League in terms of pounds, or francs, or dollars; nor should we be justified, on past results, in attempting any large-scale curtailment of its activities. It is not, however, necessary to have any inside knowledge of the working of the League to know that many States Members are asking themselves whether this unquestionably useful organisation is not spending more money than is warranted or can be afforded.

Those who are closely associated with the world's financial position are aware of the tremendous efforts which are being made by nearly every country to reduce national expenditure and to balance budgets. This position renders it necessary that the attention of the Assembly be drawn to some considerations that are important from the League's point of view. I am anxious, however, to assure my colleagues in this Assembly that everything I have to say is to be understood as being in support of the League of Nations. Australia believes in the League and has been, since its inception, both a willing and an enthusiastic member of it.

I desire to associate myself with the attitude of the leader of the British Empire delegation, who said: "It would be the falsest of false economy if we were to do anything, more particularly at this time, to reduce the authority and prestige of the League of Nations, or still worse to reduce its efficiency."

The situation of the League of Nations in relation to its expenditure has become one of much importance. The League itself can raise no revenue and is entirely dependent upon the States Members. Its position in this respect has hitherto been one of comfort, for, at a time when budgets could be balanced, the various countries did without great difficulty provide money on a generous scale which gave to the League an opportunity of extending its activities and of carrying out its functions without being in any way hampered by a lack of funds; in this respect the League of Nations had little need to think of the morrow.

Times have changed and there is a spectacle of countries struggling with adversity, and unable, without sacrifices that not long ago might have been deemed impossible, to find money for development and other internal services that are not merely desirable, but in some cases almost vital. Under these new conditions, it is imperative to review the expenditure of the League of Nations, partly because relief must be found for the budgets of States Members, and partly because dissatisfaction must be avoided, for it is impossible to disguise the fact that members of the public of our various countries, who have been called upon to make enormous personal sacrifices, would view with grave displeasure the continuance of any national expenditure which is avoidable. This aspect of the matter is one, I submit, that is of the highest importance.

A short definition of the purposes for which the League was created might be found in the statement that the League was brought into being in order that it might create harmony amongst the peoples of the world. This idea has found expression in many directions; and, in defence of an expenditure that might be held to belong more properly to domestic than to international expenditure, we often hear the argument that the extension of the activities of the League into what at first sight might appear to be a domestic domain, is justifiable on the ground that it tends to promote a better international understanding. For my part, I raise no objection to that argument; indeed, it is one of the grounds upon which I appeal to the Assembly to take action to review, and as far as possible to reduce, the expenditure of the League. If the impression gets abroad that the expenditure of the League is on a lavish scale, an injury will be done. In that case, the harmony, which it is the main purpose of the League to foster, will suffer, and, instead of happy agreement, there will be discord and unrest.

Taxation is regarded as a necessary evil, and is a fruitful source of discontent; the expenditure of the League entails taxation additional to that which is required for the ordinary Governmental services. Thus, in a sense, the League of Nations imposes taxation upon the peoples to whom it owes its existence, for the States Members are under an obligation to bear stated proportions of the expenditure, whatever it may be. This is the moment when full expression can be given to that which we profess to admire so profoundly — namely, international co-operation; now is the moment for concerted action in effecting economies. Let us then cut down our expenditure as far as is consistent with safety, so that discontent may be avoided, and harmony shall prevail. We must, of course, be careful to safeguard the work of the Disarmament Conference and must approve of ample provision for all contingencies that may arise in that direction.

I do not desire to particularise further on this occasion, but I may say that, in my opinion, there is room for saving both in the reduction of work that has been undertaken by the League, and in reduction of the cost of carrying out essential services; and I submit that the retrenchment which has been forced upon States Members should now have its counterpart in the realm of League expenditure.

Unless all economies that may be possible are carried into effect, it may be inevitable that States Members, hitherto willing and prompt in the payment of their contributions to the League, will find themselves unable to continue upon that satisfactory footing, and the burden of the contributions in arrears, already considerable, may become greater. Thus, higher contributions may be exacted from other States Members, in order to make up the deficiency arising from the default; and, in that case, there will be disparity where equality of sacrifice is on all grounds eminently desirable.

Our colleague from New Zealand has put forward a proposal for the appointment of a Committee to investigate the expenditure of the League and to report upon the savings that can be made. On behalf of Australia, I heartily support the proposal, but would add that, in my opinion, it is necessary that any such committee be asked to report in time for this Assembly to be able to decide upon the economies which can be effected in the budget of 1932.

In conclusion, I may say that my remarks are intended to be constructive, and I strongly urge that this Assembly shall take the initiative in placing the budget of the League upon a basis that is consistent with the condition of the several budgets of the States Members.

38. — EXAMINATION OF THE QUESTION OF THE ENTRY INTO FORCE OF THE PROTOCOL OF SEPTEMBER 14th, 1929, RELATING TO THE REVISION OF THE STATUTE OF THE PERMANENT COURT OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE. — PROPOSAL SUBMITTED BY THE DELEGATIONS OF SWEDEN, THE NETHERLANDS, NORWAY, JAPAN, DENMARK, SPAIN AND FINLAND.

The President:

Translation: The delegation of Sweden, the Netherlands, Norway, Japan, Denmark, Spain and Finland have submitted to the Assembly a proposal concerning the examination of the question of the coming into force of the Protocol of September 14th, 1929, concerning the revision of the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice. The text of the proposal submitted by these delegations is as follows:

"The Assembly, at its last session, expressed the wish that the Protocol of September 14th, 1929, relating to the revision of the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice should obtain as soon as possible the ratifications necessary for its entry into force. As this condition has not yet been fulfilled, it seems desirable that the Assembly should examine the situation which has arisen as regards the question of the entry into force of the Protocol. The necessity for such a discussion is generally felt by the various Governments concerned.

" The undersigned delegations venture accordingly to propose to the Assembly the following resolution :

" The Assembly places on its agenda the examination of the situation as regards the entry into force of the Protocol of September 14th, 1929, relating to the revision of the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice. It refers this question to its First Committee. "

In accordance with precedent, this proposal will be printed and distributed to the delegations, and I reserve the right to make suggestions to the Assembly later as to the action to be taken regarding it.

39. — COLLABORATION OF WOMEN AND THE PRESS IN THE ORGANISATION OF PEACE : ACCESSION OF THE DELEGATION OF URUGUAY TO THE DRAFT RESOLUTION PROPOSED BY THE SPANISH DELEGATION.

The President :

Translation : The delegation of Uruguay has just sent me the following communication :

" The Uruguayan delegation, acting on special instructions from its Government, desires to state that it accedes to the proposal made by the Spanish delegation to the twelfth Assembly of the League of Nations[1], with a view to ensuring the collaboration of women and the Press with the object of contributing in an effective manner to the permanent organisation of peace. "

This is not a new resolution, but merely the accession of Uruguay to the Spanish draft resolution, and I propose that the Assembly should merely take note of this communication.

The Assembly rose at 6 p.m.

40. — REPORT ON THE WORK OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS SINCE THE ELEVENTH SESSION OF THE ASSEMBLY : CONTINUATION OF THE DISCUSSION.

The President :

Translation : The first item on the agenda is the continuation of the discussion of the report on the work of the League.

M. de Vasconcellos, delegate of Portugal, will address the Assembly.

M. de Vasconcellos (Portugal) :

Translation : The Portuguese delegation conceives it to be its duty, as in previous years, to render account to the Assembly of its share in the common work, and to submit such comments on that work as may be necessary, these in themselves being a feature of its co-operation.

We have just passed through one of the most difficult years in the history of this generation. Mankind has been a prey to crises which beset it on every hand, and is still suffering from the effects: over-production, under-consumption, lack of confidence, shortage of credits, defeatism — all aspects of the super-crisis of instability in a society in process of transformation after the terrible upheaval of the great war.

It was inevitable that the League should be affected. On all hands it is being asked for effective remedies for these crises, and invariably it is overwhelmed with criticism when it fails to find the ideal solution immediately. This is the culminating crisis, in which the League is called upon not only to perform the tasks imposed on it by the Covenant, but also to take on the monopoly of world international policy.

Fortunately, the Assembly has met. Defeatism cannot hold out against the spirit of Geneva. Governments speak. Statesmen converse. The political and moral atmosphere clears. You will have noticed already a manifest slackening of tension in regard to the anxiety and apprehensions which confronted us at the outset of our meeting.

Because we have unwavering faith in the institution and work of the League, we trust that it may daily become more perfect in its constitution, more effective in its functioning. Any defect in its complex organic functions must claim our immediate intervention to remove the evil. Two years ago, we ventured to point out to the Assembly that the existing system of electing non-permanent Members of the Council might constitute a serious defect in its organisation, and might result in the exclusion of certain States from the Council. Facts have borne out our fears, and we were obliged to make the declaration which we published at the close of last year's elections. Later, my Government sent a memorandum to all the Member States explaining the reasons for our attitude. You will understand the satisfaction with which we noted the draft resolution submitted by the British Government, proposing that a special committee be appointed by the Council to examine the question. We thank the British Government for its action, we support its proposal wholeheartedly, and we shall later submit to the committee that is to be appointed the constructive solutions which we have in view.

I do not propose to enter into a detailed discussion of the Secretariat's report on the work of the League. I shall confine myself to pointing out in which departments Portugal has been able to offer most effective co-operation.

First, we had the gratification of welcoming at Lisbon the Conference for the Unification of Buoyage and Lighting of Coasts, a Conference which did us the honour of electing as President the late Admiral Ernesto de Vasconcellos, whom it was our misfortune to lose shortly after.

The important results of the Conference, set forth in the report, were obtained by effective co-operation between the various delegations and the distinguished representatives of the Secretariat to whom the Portuguese Organising Committee was happy to offer its modest but wholehearted collaboration.

In the matter of communications and transit, we made our contribution also to the Conferences on Road Traffic and the Unification of River Law.

We would mention the great success of the League at the Conference on the Limitation of Narcotic Drugs, in which we took part in the spirit of enthusiasm with which we regard that work of moral reform.

Portugal's contribution has been particularly effective in the financial and economic field; for it is not only at Geneva, by direct participation in the international work of the League, that a country can contribute to world recovery. A country which succeeds in restoring its own position without outside assistance, which presents a balanced budget, a stable currency and sound financial institutions, is making an effective contribution towards the solution of the crisis, in that it eliminates the factor of disorder and depression which would otherwise have been present.

It was during this last difficult economic year, after three years of financial reform, obtained by firm, skilful and far-sighted administration, that our Minister for Finance succeeded in crowning the work of recovery by his decrees for the legal stabilisation of the currency and the reform of the Bank of Issue, without having recourse to the foreign loan which most eminent experts considered indispensable.

I may add that this drastic budgetary reform did not mean that we neglected the necessary improvements in the public services. Adequate grants were allocated, again without recourse to a loan, for the equipment of the principal ports and the rebuilding of bridges, for the preservation of public buildings and monuments, for the conservancy of certain rivers and streams, for the construction of high-schools and other school buildings, and, more particularly, for the reconstruction of roads. Portugal, which is an admirable country for touring, now possesses an excellent system of modern roadways, which are carefully kept in condition.

At Geneva, we took part in the Conference with a View to Concerted Economic Action. We frankly explained our reasons for not signing the draft Convention. For technical reasons, into which we need not enter here, but on which we could not come to an agreement, we were classed in that Convention as a free-trade country, and thus credited with a fiscal policy which we have never pursued. The Convention fell through for want of signatories, despite the able and zealous efforts of its eminent President. We would point out in this connection the disadvantages resulting for the League from the divergences which have arisen in connection with certain economic Conferences, between the declarations and the votes of delegates at the Conferences, and the resolutions of their Governments or Parliaments, which have sometimes been in complete opposition to the sound principles recommended during the discussion and drafting of the Convention. We have sometimes been obliged to dissociate ourselves from a majority advocating an economic policy too liberal in theory for us to accept, and we have been astonished to find ourselves afterwards at one with that same majority in its practical decisions — often far more conservative than those we had upheld. What a startling symptom of the crisis is betrayed by this lack of coherence in facts, rather than among men!

Though we have been successful in bringing about the satisfactory situation to which I referred by sacrifices on the part of the country and by the steadfast pursuit of a plan of financial reconstruction, we have none the less suffered greatly from the world crisis. Ours is an essentially agricultural country, and its economy has been deeply affected by the tremendous drop in the prices of our agricultural products and by the difficulty of disposing of the greater part of them. For this reason, in the Commission of Enquiry for European Union, we strongly supported the Greek proposal to include products other than cereals in the scheme for the examination by the competent Committees of means to ensure their disposal.

We have been sparing neither of our help nor of our support as regards measures to ensure the marketing of cereals, and have even contemplated solutions which would entail our direct co-operation. But we cannot help thinking that it is equally fatal to the economy of a country whether it fails to sell its cereals or fails to sell its wine, its oil or its cork. If, by means of agreements on the lines of those concluded in regard to cereals, through exchanges of industrial and agricultural products, under satisfactory guarantees, serious economic crises can be overcome in countries which produce cereals only for their own consumption, that will, I think, constitute yet another felicitous example of the application of the principles of equality advocated by the League.

This is the more so, inasmuch as, so far as we are concerned, the crisis has not affected merely the products of Portugal itself, but has had most disastrous effects on those of our colonies. The fall in quotations and the accumulation of stocks have had distressing effects on the magnificent progress of our colonial dominions. The Government and the people have courageously set to work to avert the danger, and the sacrifices required both of the mother-country and the colonies have been agreed to with patriotic devotion.

Speaking of our colonies, I cannot refrain from alluding to what I might venture to describe as the eloquent demonstration we have offered to the world, at the magnificent Colonial Exhibition at Paris, of the extent and success of our colonising achievements. It is an apt reply to unjust campaigns designed to discredit the great services rendered by my country in its colonies to the cause of civilisation, and systematically to disparage those services for ambitious ends, to-day happily doomed to non-fulfilment.

We are glad to find that enlightened world opinion is doing us justice at last, and the "discoverers of the world", as we have just been gracefully designated, have now themselves been discovered.

We have signed the Convention creating an International Agricultural Mortgage Credit Company. We are prepared to ratify it and to support other similar institutions, if its action can be extended to all countries that may require this type of credit and not be confined, owing to defective organisation, to too limited a sphere.

Next February the fundamental problem of disarmament will bring us to Geneva in the hope that a positive solution may crown the desires of all enthusiastic lovers of peace. The Conference for the reduction and limitation of armaments will find that Portuguese armaments have already been reduced to the limits compatible with the maintenance of order at home and in the colonies.

At the close of his speech, my distinguished friend, M. Lerroux, submitted a draft resolution entrusting to a League body the examination of means for preventing the dissemination of such false information as may hinder the maintenance of peace and goodwill among the peoples. We cannot but support this proposal, for, if such an institution had been in existence these last few years, 95 per cent at least of the alleged revolutions in Portugal would never have happened.

I cannot close my rapid survey without once more affirming our deep conviction that only League methods can lead to the maintenance and consolidation of peace, our indestructible and essential faith in the future and the prosperity of our institution, and our firm determination to observe and to obey the four commandments which our President laid upon us in his eloquent opening speech.

The President:

Translation: M. Hymans, first delegate of Belgium, will address the Assembly.

M. Hymans (Belgium):

Translation: I confess that I had much hesitation in taking part in this discussion, as I was afraid of lapsing into needless repetition. I was prompted to speak, however, by another disquieting consideration — I should not like my silence to suggest indifference.

My connection with the League of Nations dates from the origin of the League, and, in spite of the difficulties of the present hour, I still consider it the indispensable organ of a peaceful and regular international life.

I am aware, however, that, in certain circles, the discussion now taking place will cause a certain amount of disillusion and I should like to reply to the criticism or blame which may be levelled at the League by those who take a superficial view and who know and understand it but little. Such people expect from the League and from the present discussion, which closes to-day, a sort of revelation, the announcement of some magic remedy, the passing of some resolution which will suddenly set the whole world right once more.

To begin with, the causes of the crisis from which all nations are suffering in varying degrees are too deep-seated for any hope to be entertained that the evil can be remedied suddenly by some specific. On the other hand, there is a misunderstanding, in my opinion, in regard to the League's rôle and functions. It is not an entity, a political person, a power, a sort of State which can issue laws and decrees.

The League is a meeting, an association of free States, of Governments, who have agreed to meet together and consult one another and come to an understanding, and have assumed certain obligations to co-operate with a view to the prevention of war, the specific settlement of their disputes and the conciliation of their interests.

But the League can only do what the States composing it desire, and the Governments whose representatives meet here can themselves do nothing without the support and approval of their Parliaments and the public opinion of their respective countries.

It follows that sometimes, too often perhaps, the Governments represented in this Assembly give utterance, under the influence of what has aptly been called the spirit — I do not say the climate — of Geneva, to approval of measures which, in their own country, meet with opposition from certain interests or sentiments, from passions or egoism or party considerations, and then find that they are powerless to carry them out.

The result is delay, hesitation, failure. We have experienced this in the economic sphere. I remember that, with some support from the Assembly, I conducted a campaign here for a tariff truce, for the principles of solidarity which served as the basis for the Commercial Agreement of March 24th, 1930. My efforts, however, did not prove successful.

I have championed the idea that Europe can develop and re-organise itself only by enlarging its markets, lowering its tariff walls and permitting the free circulation of goods; and, in the recent work of the Commission of Enquiry for European Union, all the highly qualified experts — as they were described — and all the Government delegates once more strongly affirmed the same views.

But adverse winds have arisen, and the nations have been driven away from these ideas. Yet I do not abandon them. It is for the Governments to convert public opinion and overcome the resistance of private interests.

I am convinced that the time will come when events will dictate to the nations, as an imperative need, these ideas of mutual understanding and co-operation, and will demonstrate that there is no other way possible to bring about the recovery of Europe and of the world.

Again, the discussions of the Commission of Enquiry for European Union have undeniably supplied us with abundant documentation, have laid down excellent rules of guidance and have even achieved certain concrete results. The International Agricultural Mortgage Credit Company has been created, and I venture to call the attention of the Assembly and the competent committee to the initiative suggested by a Belgian expert, M. Francqui, an eminent financier who has taken part in all the conferences of the last few years. M. Francqui proposes that an international bank should be created for the purpose of granting long- and medium-term credits.

This organisation would entail the co-operation of the financial institutions of the various markets, and would act as an intermediary between lending and borrowing markets. The author of this proposal is convinced — and the experts seem to agree with him — that to bring such an institution into operation would help to restore economic activity. The question is important and deserves serious examination, and I am sure the Assembly will take that view.

In the course of these brief observations, I should like to say a few words on disarmament, or, rather, to use the terms of the Covenant, the reduction of armaments.

I am speaking on behalf of a small country which is essentially peaceful, both by conviction and in its own interest, a country that suffered terribly through the war, and to which the war has bequeathed a very heavy burden of financial charges.

We ardently hope for the success of the Conference convened for next February, and we shall take part in it with a keen desire to consolidate peace and lighten the burdens of military expenditure.

In the last few years, Belgium has considerably reduced the effectives of her army and the period of military service; she has, moreover, acceded without delay to all the conventions for the organisation of arbitration and the pacific settlement of international disputes; and, lastly, she has actively and usefully contributed to the work of the Preparatory Commission, on which she was represented successively by M. de Brouckère and M. Bourquin. I may be allowed to mention that I have received many congratulations on the services they have rendered.

But the part the small States have to play in the field of disarmament is naturally limited. Their policy will naturally depend upon that of the great States. That is in accordance, moreover, with the very spirit and letter of the Covenant. To carry out Article 8 fully and faithfully means leaving nothing to empirical formulas. It requires that account shall be taken of national safety and international obligations, of the geographical situation and circumstances of each State.

We must realise that the success of the Disarmament Conference will depend on the atmosphere in which it opens and in which it carries on its work; and its work will inevitably be long and difficult.

If, during the months to come, disquieting incidents occur, arousing passions and creating an atmosphere of fever or unrest, the success of the Conference will undoubtedly be imperilled. It is therefore imperative, in the meantime, to reassure the nations and draw them together, co-ordinating and conciliating their interests.

May I make an appeal to the great Powers? It is true that in our League and at international law all sovereign States are equal; but, in the nature of things and by the force of circumstances, peace and the maintenance of international order depend principally on the great Powers and not on the small. Small States may help the great, but the small States will never imperil the world.

I have listened attentively to the speeches made here by the representatives of the great Powers. They reveal a firm will to peace, and a desire for understanding and co-operation stimulated by adversity and necessity.

We know that conversations have been held between statesmen, and that those conversations will be continued. We hope that they may come to a successful conclusion, and that the action of the Governments will have the calming influence on public opinion necessary for the restoration of prosperity and the moral and economic welfare of Europe and of the world.

The President:

Translation: Dr. Curtius, first delegate of Germany, will address the Assembly.

Dr. Curtius (Germany):

Translation: The general discussion shows that the position of the Assembly of the League of Nations this year has been determined in the main by two facts — the terrible economic depression from which most countries are suffering, and the approach of the Disarmament Conference. These two facts we must bear in mind in any appreciation of the League's work during the past year, or in any attempt to estimate the extent of the assistance which the League is likely to be able to give in present circumstances and the importance of the decisions which we shall be called upon to take this year.

It has often been said, in the last few years — no one, I think, will contest this — that the fate of the Disarmament Conference will be of decisive importance in determining the fate of the League itself. An equally potent factor in shaping the opinion of nations in regard to the League will be the extent to which the latter can help to overcome the crisis from which nearly the whole world is suffering. For this reason I will, like many of the speakers before me on this platform, confine myself in the main to questions relating to the economic and financial problems which are causing us such anxiety and to the problem of disarmament.

The German delegation, I need hardly say, will co-operate fully in the discussions on the other questions on the agenda and will take the opportunity of expounding its views in the competent committees — more particularly, its views on the question of bringing the Pact of Paris into harmony with the Covenant of the League, the question of European Union and the minorities question. I consider, however, that the nations, whose attention is now riveted on Geneva, will desire above all things to know whether the statesmen assembled here are capable of finding, or at least of helping to find, some way out of the crisis, and whether we are able to offer them reasonable grounds for hoping that, in the burning question of disarmament, tangible results will be obtained by the Conference which is to meet in February.

We are all acquainted with the events which, since our last Assembly, have done so much to aggravate the depression from which we were already suffering then. To the collapse of production and markets has, in many countries, been added financial catastrophe. The dangers of the economic situation have assumed alarming proportions; on the one hand, congestion of raw materials and foodstuffs; on the other, want and famine; concentration of capital and accumulation of gold in a small number of countries and shortage of capital and a crushing burden of interest in others; and then the most terrible manifestation of the collapse of the international economy; unemployment in the industrial countries, which next winter will increase to an extent which it is impossible to see at present, with the resulting army of despairing and desperate men who will be only too ready to lend an ear to extremist and revolutionary influences. No one can deny that the whole foundation of our economic and financial system and, indeed, the whole basis of our civilisation is tottering.

Naturally, the League and its organs have not been indifferent to this disquieting position and its attendant dangers; but here the grave question arises whether the results attained up to the present correspond even approximately to the imperious needs of the times. So far as I have observed, not one of my predecessors on this platform has ventured to answer this question in the affirmative; and I think, therefore, I may take it that we are all agreed that the vital part of our work still remains to be done.

The most important result of the work accomplished up to the present by the Commission of Enquiry for European Union is the report submitted by the economic experts, and now before the League. Speaking at a meeting of the Commission of Enquiry, I said that the report must form the starting-point of a fresh phase in the economic evolution of Europe. The Committee, which had received the fullest powers from the Commission to submit any proposals with a view to improving production and trade in Europe, recommends economic rapprochement and economic union as being the most important, — if not the only — means of securing a radical economic recovery in Europe. The report points out that the realisation of such schemes can be pursued only in agreement with the non-European countries and that it should result in a more moderate Customs policy than is followed at the present time. Such guarantees are calculated to dissipate the distrust felt by the other continents as regards these European proposals.

Valuable though the bare statement of these principles of economic rapprochement by the Committee of Economic Experts undoubtedly is in itself, we must not leave things there. Under the influence of our discussions here, the Governments should set to work without delay and put this idea of economic rapprochement into practice as rapidly and completely as possible. The results achieved by these efforts will serve to show how far the nations of Europe realise the dangers resulting from the economic dissection of Europe and how far the will to co-operate on a broad and practical basis is really present in Europe to-day.

Again, the problem of preferential duties on wheat, which calls for a practical solution, will be another test of the spirit of collaboration in the League. The proposals of the Commission of Enquiry for European Union provide for preferential duties on wheat by way of an exception to the most-favoured-nation clause, such preferential duties being restricted as regards place, specific commodities and time. The objections raised from the standpoint of the most-favoured-nation system are quite comprehensible; but these can be overcome by the guarantees established by the International Conference of November 1930, and should give way in the face of the advantages which the realisation of this plan would have, from the standpoint of general interests.

These are not measures taken in the sole interest of particular countries to which preferential duties might be accorded; still less is there any question of the one-sided interests of those who have declared themselves willing to make sacrifices and to accord preferential duties. I venture to hope that this proposal, which is now beginning, after a long struggle, to make headway, will be accepted. The extra-European countries are also beginning to realise that an increase in the purchasing power of European countries will, in the long run, in view of the fact of world economic interdependence, benefit overseas countries also.

The apprehensions of non-European countries have found eloquent expression in several speeches to which I have listened with the greatest interest, and the position may be summed up, from their point of view, by saying that the League seems to be concentrating its efforts on the economic recovery of Europe, and to be neglecting the extra-European countries. Certain though it is that an increase in the purchasing power of European countries would benefit the non-European countries, and while the latter will reap their share of benefit in what the League hopes to be able to do for European economy, it seems to me none the less desirable that the League should make more energetic and direct efforts than hitherto to remedy the economic crisis in extra-European countries.

It has been proposed, I hear, to set up small committees consisting of a few leading experts to be sent to the principal economic centres in Asia and Latin America to study the situation on the spot with the competent local authorities, with a view to reporting to the Assembly in 1932 and making appropriate suggestions. I think that idea is worthy of serious consideration.

Nevertheless, it may perhaps be possible, even without such a detailed enquiry, or even simultaneously with it to organise in one particular field practical measures for the benefit primarily of extra-European countries. I am thinking here of restrictions and the regulation of their agricultural products. The agricultural depression is undoubtedly even more acute than the industrial depression. Agriculture cannot solve its difficulties to the same extent as industry by means of the organisation and cartellisation of production. Again, the restrictions on production in certain countries and other expedients, such as the accumulation of crops, have, as experience has just shown, given no relief, but have proved useless.

International co-operation alone can furnish a real and effective remedy. All who are acquainted with the position know how great the difficulties are. Practical success in certain fields, such as the International Sugar Convention, which has just been concluded afresh, show what can be done when there is a real desire for agreement. As regards the agricultural and forestry products in question, the extra-European countries would primarily and directly benefit, while the European importing countries would no longer need to take prohibitive measures, set up insuperable Customs barriers or introduce import prohibitions in order to protect their agricultural products. I hope that the Second Committee will examine these brief suggestions more fully, and that proposals may be submitted to the Assembly.

I now pass from economic problems to the financial problems which are also a feature of the crisis.

The whole international system of money and credit is disorganised. The movement of capital from rich countries to poor countries — so necessary for the maintenance of the economic balance and purchasing power of the latter — has not only almost entirely ceased, but the countries rich in capital have withdrawn to an unforeseen extent the short-term credits they had accorded to the poorer countries.

The creditors, when opening these credits, which have brought in high interest over a period of many years, should have provided for the contingency that, in many cases, the capital would not be invested, in the poorer countries, in such a way as to be immediately recoverable. The holders of the credits might reasonably have supposed that there existed a sort of tacit agreement that the credits would not be withdrawn suddenly or just when they had greatest need of them. Bank crashes and Government intervention in private trade have been the unfortunate but inevitable consequences. These facts may be attributed in the last resort to the international financial situation resulting from political debts. Enormous political payments from one country to another have been effected without any economic counterpart.

These payments have continually had the effect of removing large amounts from the debtor countries, which were already poor in capital, and those countries have thus been forced, in order to protect their currency, to adopt deflationist measures entailing high rates of interest and reduced purchasing power; hence a decrease in imports and increase in exports. If this continues, if the payment of political debts is effected by means of a reduction in imports and a forced increase in exports on the part of the debtor countries, most disastrous consequences must ensue not only for those countries, but also for world economy. This was clearly stressed in the report of the Basle Committee set up by the London Conference.

As the result of this disturbance of international relations in the matter of money and credit, gold is being accumulated in certain financial centres where it is lying idle because no use can be found for it in the form of loans and foreign credits. The gold standard has been one of the principal factors in the economic development of the world during the last century, but there is a risk that it may now efface itself.

It is to the eternal honour of the President of the United States of America that he should so clearly have seen the dangers ahead and have proposed and succeeded in putting through for one year the suspension of payments in respect of political debts. As representative of Germany, I desire to pay my tribute from this platform to the breadth of vision evidenced by the Hoover plan and to testify to the relief it has afforded my country. But, important though such a moratorium undoubtedly is, it is only in the nature of a temporary respite. Several of those who spoke before me have specifically stressed the point that the problem of international political debts necessarily demands, in the general interest, a comprehensive solution which shall really put an end to the crisis. That is the great task before the world.

Obviously, international co-operation in this field can succeed only if every country is prepared to exhaust all the possibilities open to it of surmounting the crisis. The German Government, I may say, has done so, nor has it shrunk from the sternest measures or faltered before the most painful operations. That fact gives me the right to demand, not only in the interests of my own country, but in the general interest, that a resolute attempt shall now be made to accomplish in this field what can be done only by means of international co-operation.

What can the League do towards such co-operation? It cannot, of course, undertake the settlement of the problem of international debts. That problem must still be left to the Governments directly concerned. A whole series of proposals such as have just been discussed at the various meetings here at Geneva must be taken up and dealt with by the League itself; but all international efforts in the economic and financial field, whether the outcome of League or of inter-Governmental action, are subject to one preliminary condition — the restoration of reciprocal confidence in international political relations. Lord Cecil read to us the final words of the report of the Basle experts, and the truth of those words we cannot afford to neglect.

I am glad to note that, in all the speeches during the last few days which have dealt with the present general position, so much stress has been placed on the need for reciprocal confidence. I entirely associate myself with much that was said by the delegates of Great Britain, France and other countries on the subject. But if the League is to fulfil its mission, the Governments represented here must constantly bear in mind the principles on which confidence in the political relations of the States rests, and it is the League's duty to see that effect is given to those principles.

On this matter my point of view may perhaps differ slightly from one or other of the expressions of opinion we have heard, in that I do not attach so much importance to what we have already done at Geneva, but am interested rather in what still remains to be done. Real confidence implies a reciprocal relationship, and confidence between the nations cannot find and preserve a sure foundation unless it is based on a healthy recognition of reciprocal interests and ideas. That foundation must never be shaken, even in a country's time of direst distress. The solution of temporary difficulties must not be purchased at the price of still more serious future difficulties.

All attempts to re-establish the normal movement of commodities and capital are doomed to ultimate failure directly the principles of justice and equality in political relations are neglected. The League is called upon also to guarantee those principles even in cases in which the practical solution of the various economic and financial problems has not been expressly entrusted to it. If such an attitude could spread from Geneva and really be endorsed by Governments, it would extend from the latter to public opinion in every country; and thus the impatience, the excitability and ready irritation, which are very comprehensible in present conditions, would give place to a calmer, more confident outlook.

We must not try to disguise from ourselves a fact that should be frankly admitted — namely, that in many countries profound scepticism reigns and — what is perhaps worse still — growing indifference to the Geneva institutions. The circles in which this phenomenon is observed are by no means those which do not understand the idea of the League or are hostile to it. On the contrary, it is precisely those people who put their faith in the League that are becoming increasingly disillusioned owing to the absence of tangible results. It would, of course, be absurd to hope for miracles or to expect that our deliberations should provide an immediate remedy for the present distress. What people of common sense want are measures designed to get at the root of the evil and to effect an improvement in the situation. This difficult period of world depression can be turned to account, if it results in the realisation and the strengthening of the conception of real solidarity and of the need for co-operation on a basis of equality.

The German Government will certainly do everything in its power to promote such international co-operation. It is well aware that German interests and the general interest alike imperatively demand such an attitude. Indeed, it was this conception of present-day problems that took us successively to Chequers, Paris, London and Rome. I entirely concur in the view that the League has no reason to be jealous of these direct efforts of responsible statesmen, but has, on the contrary, every reason to encourage them.

The British delegate emphasised the importance which, at every stage in the evolution of international relations, attaches to Franco-German rapprochement, which, as he says, should not be confined to words, but should find expression in acts. Lord Cecil may be sure that the German Government fully appreciates the importance of this point. I am happy to say that the coming visit of French statesmen to Berlin will furnish an opportunity for a direct exchange of views, and I trust that results may be obtained in this way which will be of advantage to both countries and, in addition, serve the general interests of the world.

I now come to the second of the great problems with which the League is faced — and it is an urgent problem — disarmament. While the economic depression of which I have spoken is attributable mainly to events that have occurred outside the League, the latter has, on the contrary, been solely responsible from the outset for the manner in which the disarmament problem has been dealt with. Disarmament was proclaimed to the world in the League Covenant, and that was the principal task assigned to the League on its foundation. On that issue the League's fate depends, and that is the issue to be decided by the Conference convened for next February.

Following the example of many speakers who have preceded me on this platform, I also consider it desirable to explain once more before this Assembly — the last before the Conference — views of my country on the essential points. The preparation and work of the Conference is bound to be facilitated if the opinions of the various Governments are explained now as clearly as possible. Why disguise the fact that divergent opinions still exist? Let me state frankly from the outset that I can associate myself with many of the views expressed here up to the present, but not with all of them.

I should like to refer to the speech of the Italian delegate. I listened with the greatest satisfaction to his statements of principle on the relations between the pacific settlement of disputes, disarmament and security. I cannot but entirely agree with M. Grandi when he said that the pacific settlement of disputes and disarmament together constitute the decisive means of strengthening security.

All efforts designed to secure the final and complete abolition of war are bound to remain incomplete until the League has extended the system of the pacific settlement of disputes so as to guarantee a just and equitable settlement of even the most serious conflicts in the political field.

As regards the importance of disarmament as a factor in increasing security, the statements made in the Assembly in 1928 concerning the relationship between the reduction of armaments and increased international security are as true now as they were then. The conviction that not armaments but disarmament furnishes the real element of security is the essential characteristic of the community of States organised into the League of Nations, as opposed to the old methods of international policy. The security of States is a guarantee of peace only if all States participate to the same degree. The Covenant knows only one kind of national security for all its Members. Security based on preponderance of armaments will always imply a state of insecurity and constitute a danger for the other countries which are less strongly armed. It engenders distrust and inevitably revives the idea of the race for armaments, the complete suppression of which was one of the main objects for which the League was created. The feeling of being left without military defences in the face of strongly armed neighbours weighs on a nation and cripples it throughout, as any German who has had an opportunity of observing the effects of that state of affairs on his nation will be prepared to tell you.

It has been pointed out more than once during the last few days that the protection the League affords to its Members will remain purely problematical until the coercive measures at its disposal have been determined by the extension of certain other parts of the Covenant, and until the application of those measures is clearly defined. Nevertheless, I still think that idea leads to false conclusions. We cannot point to the keystone of this peace organisation until we have ensured, by the adjustment of armaments, that the League's executive power shall be brought to bear against any Member of the League, only on a paritative basis and not by means of the support of certain strongly armed States against others.

Disarmament, within the meaning of Article 8 of the Covenant is, therefore, a preliminary condition without which there can be no question of developing the coercive procedure of the League. At the Conference, the real question — the reduction of armaments — must not be subordinated to questions which cannot be settled until disarmament has become an accomplished fact.

I note with satisfaction that any idea of adjourning the Disarmament Conference has been definitely and categorically rejected by several speakers here. Only after long negotiations did the Council succeed, at the beginning of this year, in agreeing on a date for the Conference. We must at all costs abide by that decision. Our nations, which are impatiently awaiting the Conference, would not understand if any other course were adopted.

The task assigned to the Disarmament Conference is to effect a real and effective reduction of armaments. At the same time the method of achieving the final object enunciated in Article 8 of the Covenant must be clearly established.

In view of the tremendous inequality of armaments, mere limitation at the present level would be equivalent to sanctioning those inequalities, would be tantamount to the failure of the Conference. More than ten years ago, as the result of a lost war, the obligation to reduce their armaments to a minimum was imposed on certain States, including my own country. That obligation has long been fulfilled. I would refer here to the tables showing the position with regard to German armaments, which the German Government forwarded in reply to the League's questionnaire and which have been distributed during the last few days. Those tables show how far Germany has disarmed; she no longer possesses any heavy artillery, any military aircraft, any tanks or submarines. They even show that Germany has, in some respects, kept below the figures authorised by the Treaty of Versailles.

In this connection I must again emphasise one point of primary importance. The counterpart of the obligations assumed by Germany in 1919 is a formal undertaking on the part of the other States that disarmament by Germany should be simply a prelude to general disarmament by the other Powers. German disarmament was to be the first step in a scheme of general disarmament. Twelve years have elapsed since then, and Germany has been a Member of the League for five years, without that undertaking having been fulfilled. If the Disarmament Conference does now at last meet, the German people cannot be asked to agree to any act which would imply the sanctioning of the present armaments position. A large and effective reduction of the armaments of the strongly armed Powers thus constitutes for Germany a preliminary condition for the success of the Conference.

If the Disarmament Conference is to arrive at a result which is politically acceptable, it must put an end, as regards the limitation of armaments, to the existence of different rules of international law for those who were victorious and those who were defeated in the world war. Equality of all States must be the starting-point. There cannot be two standards of weights and measures in the community of nations. The same methods must apply to all as regards the reduction and limitation of the various categories of armaments. Otherwise, the Convention will not fulfil the psychological and moral conditions necessary for the accession of the German people.

I was extremely interested in the suggestion put forward by the first delegate of Italy to the effect that, pending the Conference and while it is sitting, the States should declare their readiness to postpone the execution of new armaments programmes. The German Government as it were anticipated this suggestion in its statement on the occasion of the negotiations concerning President Hoover's plan. I entirely associate myself with M. Grandi's views, and am convinced that the idea of an armaments truce would improve the chances of success at the Conference and facilitate its work. I warmly congratulate M. Grandi on his idea, and trust that it may be possible for all the States concerned to put it into practice. I for my part regard it as self-evident that the mere limitation or armaments as thus contemplated must only be a temporary measure of limited duration.

I cannot conclude my remarks on disarmament without saying that I associate myself with Lord Cecil's appeal to Governments. Let us give our delegates to the Conference the fullest and widest powers. It is the maximum and not the minimum of disarmament that we must aim at in our negotiations. Only if the States — especially the powerfully armed States — make sacrifices in the interests of a courageous, resolute and far-sighted policy of disarmament and peace, can the world be delivered from the nightmare by which it is haunted and which is obstructing it in the performance of its manifold international functions.

It is not merely a matter of saving in the national budgets or of the degrees of security in the different countries. No; I repeat, the fate of the League itself hangs in the balance. If the League fails in this task, it will fall short of the nations' expectations and of our united hopes. The failure of the Disarmament Conference would rob the League of its moral authority in a world of political tension, which is crying out for a solution, a peaceful and harmonious solution.

41. — ENTRY OF MEXICO INTO THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS: ADOPTION OF A DRAFT RESOLUTION PROPOSED BY THE GENERAL COMMITTEE OF THE ASSEMBLY.

The President:

Translation: The Assembly has noted with great satisfaction the acceptance by Mexico of the invitation which is unanimously sent to her to accede to the Covenant and become a Member of the League.

The General Committee has carefully considered the reply received from Mexico and has unanimously asked me to propose the following resolution:

The Assembly,

Having by its resolution of September 8th, 1931, considered as an omission, which should in justice be repaired, the fact that Mexico is not mentioned in the Annex of the Covenant enumerating the countries invited to accede thereto;

Having unanimously decided to repair that omission and therefore to invite Mexico to accede to the Covenant and to lend its valuable support to the League as though it had been invited from the outset;

Having by this exceptional invitation — which must not be regarded as establishing a precedent — formally indicated that it accepts as having been fulfilled from the outset in the case of Mexico the conditions governing the entry of States into the League as set forth in Article 1 of the Covenant;

Noting the reply of the Government of Mexico dated September 10th, 1931, by which it agrees without reservation to enter the League on the terms announced:

Declares Mexico to have become a Member of the League of Nations and invites the representatives of Mexico to take part as soon as possible in the work of the present session of the Assembly.

If no one has any observations to submit, I shall consider the draft resolution adopted.

The draft resolution was adopted.

42. — (1) COLLABORATION OF WOMEN AND THE PRESS IN THE ORGANISATION OF PEACE. (2) METHOD OF ELECTION TO THE COUNCIL: REPORT OF THE AGENDA COMMITTEE ON THE DRAFT RESOLUTIONS PROPOSED BY THE SPANISH AND BRITISH DELEGATIONS RESPECTIVELY.

The President:

Translation: The Assembly will remember that, at its meeting yesterday morning, it referred to the Agenda Committee for preliminary examination two draft resolutions submitted to it the day before — namely, the resolution proposed by the Spanish delegation on the collaboration of women and the Press in the organisation of peace, and that proposed by the British delegation on the method of election to the Council.

The Agenda Committee met yesterday afternoon and sent me its report, which reads as follows:

"The Agenda Committee first examined the draft resolution submitted to the Assembly by the British delegation at its meeting on Thursday September 10th, 1931 (morning), concerning the method of election to the Council.

"After an exchange of views, in which the British delegation took part, the Agenda Committee decided to propose to the Assembly that the draft resolution submitted by the British delegation should be included in the agenda of the present session, and should be referred to the First Committee for preliminary examination.

"The Agenda Committee then examined the draft resolution submitted to the Assembly by the Spanish delegation at its meeting on Thursday, September 10th, 1931 (morning), concerning the collaboration of women and the Press in the organisation of peace.

"It agreed to recommend to the Assembly that this draft resolution should also be included in the agenda of the present session, with a view to its examination by the Third Committee, the latter being left to decide whether paragraphs (a) and (b) should be examined by another Committee."

If no one has any observations to make, the proposals of the Agenda Committee will be adopted.

The Agenda Committee's proposals were adopted.

43. — GENERAL DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE: DRAFT RESOLUTION PROPOSED BY THE DELEGATIONS OF DENMARK, NORWAY, THE NETHERLANDS, SWEDEN AND SWITZERLAND: REFERENCE TO THE AGENDA COMMITTEE.

The President:

Translation: At yesterday morning's meeting of the Assembly, a draft resolution was submitted by the delegations of Denmark, Norway, the Netherlands, Sweden and Switzerland concerning the reduction of armaments.

In accordance with precedent, I propose that the Assembly should refer this draft resolution for preliminary examination to the Agenda Committee, requesting the latter to submit suggestions as to the action to be taken on the proposal.

The President's proposal was adopted.

44. — EXAMINATION OF THE QUESTION OF THE ENTRY INTO FORCE OF THE PROTOCOL OF SEPTEMBER 14th, 1929, RELATING TO THE REVISION OF THE STATUTE OF THE PERMANENT COURT OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE: PROPOSAL SUBMITTED BY THE DELEGATIONS OF SWEDEN, THE NETHERLANDS, NORWAY, JAPAN, DENMARK, SPAIN AND FINLAND: REFERENCE TO THE AGENDA COMMITTEE.

The President:

Translation: As regards the draft resolution on the above question, I propose that this also should be referred to the Agenda Committee for preliminary examination and report to the Assembly.

The President's proposal was adopted.

The Assembly rose at 1 p.m.

45.— REPORT ON THE WORK OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS SINCE THE ELEVENTH SESSION OF THE ASSEMBLY : CONTINUATION OF THE DISCUSSION.

The President :

Translation : The agenda consists of the continuation of the general discussion on the report on the work of the League since the eleventh session of the Assembly.

M. Ferrara, first delegate of Cuba, will address the Assembly.

M. Ferrara (Cuba) :

Translation : The inspiring words we have heard from this platform have certainly revived our hopes just when we were most inclined to be depressed, but no expression of goodwill that is not followed by some plan of action can be of any practical value.

This is a serious time for us all, and we must not be afraid to speak the whole truth.

It is a sad thing for our civilisation — indeed, a crying scandal — that, while materials which represent power, such as petroleum and coal, cannot find markets, and essential universal foodstuffs such as wheat, sugar, cotton, coffee, livestock, and the like are lost to the world, the greater part of the population, even in rich countries, lacks the bare necessities of life.

Whatever the explanation, this phenomenon is none the less a slur upon our international social code, a disgrace to our intelligence. The fact that we have to leave stores of wealth unutilised, and at the same time to see vital activities paralysed, must bring home to us the urgent necessity of completely readjusting the general policy of the whole world. We must change our methods and our exclusive systems if the present depression is not to become a veritable catastrophe.

The interdependence of interests and the ever closer relations between all countries resulting from the mechanical spirit of our age preclude all possibility of settling down on the ruins of others. Mankind is to-day one and indivisible, and lives, suffers and rejoices as if it were one person. Nations, great or small, rich or poor, near or far, depend on one another, in bad times as in good.

The present economic depression first began in Europe, and other countries thought they were immune ; but it gradually became general, attacking all countries, especially those which had thought themselves safe from any possibility of collapse. Cuba, for instance, which relying on the enormous riches of its soil and the industry of its people thought that it would never know another crisis, has been harder hit than any other nation. That part of America which is composed of States producing raw materials and foodstuffs has suffered even more than Europe herself from the effects of the European depression.

It could not be otherwise. A European crisis was bound to be a world crisis.

Europe's participation in world trade is so considerable that it represents 52.2 per cent — that is, more than half the trade of the whole world. The United Kingdom and Germany together account for one-quarter of the export trade of the world, and are consequently the biggest buyers of raw materials and basic foodstuffs.

The fall in Europe's purchasing power has, owing to the direct interdependence of economic phenomena, caused greater injury to the American countries than to the European countries themselves.

Indeed, if we measure the consequences of the present depression in terms of the sudden and unexpected fall in the exports of the various countries, we find in Europe — taking the three principal exporting countries — between 1929 and 1930, decreases amounting to 22.4 per cent in the case of Great Britain, 11 per cent in that of Germany, and 15 per cent in that of France.

As regards extra-European countries, in my own country, which has been obliged by dire necessity to limit its output of sugar, exports have dropped by over 50 per cent, while those in the Argentine have fallen by nearly 48 per cent, in Chile by 42 per cent, and in Brazil by 32 per cent.

Everyone has his own diagnosis of the world depression. Without going into the complex arguments of economists, we are persuaded that, in its nature and its form, the present depression depends exclusively on political causes lato sensu, and that remedies must be sought in the political sphere.

No one can maintain that the last war increased the wealth of the European belligerent countries. Inflation gave an illusion of prosperity and created rapid fortunes, but the aggregate of wealth fell considerably. A respected French economist, M. Charles Gide, has shown that, after the war, death duties revealed a reduction, ranging from 20 to 40 per cent, in the values of inherited property. Death duties covering a long period are a sure index here; but, even if the significance of this percentage is underestimated, it must be admitted that private wealth has undergone a general reduction in Europe.

It might have been thought that the natural consequence would have been a reduction in public expenditure. In point of fact, however, the budget of nearly every country has increased to an unprecedented extent. If account is taken of the expenditure of the State and of local authorities, a constant increase is observed even in the principal countries. If 100 is taken as representing the public expenditure in 1913, the present gold expenditure may be estimated at 250, even in the most moderate countries, where the increase has been attenuated by currency devalorisation, but there are large countries which have increased their expenditure as much as 400 per cent.

All the Governments have thus been obliged to increase taxation proportionately. The taxes chiefly affected in nearly all countries are the indirect taxes, particularly Customs duties. All protectionist systems, even the most exaggerated, are defended on the ground of budget requirements.

Every protectionist measure has the effect of creating other protectionist measures in the country itself — for every industry asks to be protected — and also in foreign countries, which, in their turn, demand protection.

An old economist, in an oft-quoted phrase, once said: "Of all poisonous bites, the least painful is that of the asp, for it renders its victims unconscious, and they pass from sleep to death." He added that indirect taxes and Customs duties were rather like the bite of the asp.

The world is full of asps at the present time. We allow ourselves to be put to sleep by a fatal illusion, and while the increase in public expenditure is increasing the burden of taxation and reducing the purchasing power of the nations, excessive protectionist measures restrict international trade and suffocate the very industries they were designed to protect.

The restoration of confidence, the reduction of public expenditure and tariff reduction, with the consequent stimulus to trade, are essential conditions for world economic recovery. We therefore feel that the remedy lies mainly in the hands of statesmen.

If monetary causes do exist, those causes, it must be remembered, are also bound up with political considerations. It is obvious that payments cannot be balanced in countries which have to increase their public expenditure and at the same time to restrict exports. There is the old vicious circle. If there are no exports and industry is paralysed, unemployment in its turn entails further expenditure and fresh crises.

Among the countless blunders of post-war policy may be numbered the introduction by creditor countries of the most extreme protectionist measures, regardless of the fact that the debtor nations cannot even pay their debts except from their surplus exports.

Some regard the present crisis as a capitalist crisis, and many think that capitalism is on its trial. Frankly, the very opposite appears to me to be the case. The present depression is the consequence, not of our form of production, but of the difficulties placed by States in the way of the circulation of wealth.

We may talk of the crisis of a system, but it is not that of capitalism, which has always developed in conditions of full commercial liberty; it is rather a crisis of Government intervention.

On statesmen devolves the great task of bringing the economic world back to normal conditions, of reinstating in public life the great principles evolved through long experience, and of liberating us from the present political habit of living from hand to mouth by means of temporary expedients.

The tyrant Petrucci of Siena often used to repeat, during the Renaissance, a remark made by the Emperor Frederick, to the effect that "the times are superior to the brains".

Posterity must not say of us that our brains are inferior to the times in which we live.

The President:

Translation · Mr. Binchy, delegate of the Irish Free State, will address the Assembly.

Mr. Binchy (Irish Free State):

If there is one thing which emerges from the Secretary-General's report, it is the extent to which the League has become a part of the organisation of the international society of our time. Reading through this report, it is difficult to think of any important field of international relationship in which the League does not perform some function or other, and in many respects these functions are such that they could not be performed by any other agency and they are, therefore, of the utmost value.

I have nothing to say here with regard to the substance of the particular matters dealt with in the Secretary-General's report. Many of them doubtless call for detailed and careful consideration, but that, I take it, is not the purpose of this debate. That is rather the task of the various Committees to which the different sections of the report will be referred in due course, and we shall have an opportunity later of reviewing the work of those Committees.

To my mind, the peculiar function of the Assembly is to lay down the general directives upon which all the separate activities of the League and its organs should proceed. I think, therefore, that it may not be unfitting for me to conclude this general debate in which we have to view all the work of the League, not as a number of separate activities, but as a single whole, by asking the question whether any tendencies and developments are emerging which are incompatible with the principles on which the League has been founded and whether action by the League is called for to direct and control these tendencies in the interests of the general welfare of the world. An examination of this kind seems to me to be peculiarly necessary at this particular time.

During the past year, the States of the world have been called upon to deal with problems of grave difficulty and urgency. We have had an economic depression of unprecedented intensity and duration which has given rise to new and unexampled difficulties in the sphere of international finance and commerce. During the year, also, we have been called upon to deal with the problems arising from the work of final preparation for the general Disarmament Conference, and other problems have, in addition, presented themselves, some of them hardly of less importance than those to which I have referred.

Europe's participation in world trade is so considerable that it represents 52.2 per cent — that is, more than half the trade of the whole world. The United Kingdom and Germany together account for one-quarter of the export trade of the world, and are consequently the biggest buyers of raw materials and basic foodstuffs.

The fall in Europe's purchasing power has, owing to the direct interdependence of economic phenomena, caused greater injury to the American countries than to the European countries themselves.

Indeed, if we measure the consequences of the present depression in terms of the sudden and unexpected fall in the exports of the various countries, we find in Europe — taking the three principal exporting countries — between 1929 and 1930, decreases amounting to 22.4 per cent in the case of Great Britain, 11 per cent in that of Germany, and 15 per cent in that of France.

As regards extra-European countries, in my own country, which has been obliged by dire necessity to limit its output of sugar, exports have dropped by over 50 per cent, while those in the Argentine have fallen by nearly 48 per cent, in Chile by 42 per cent, and in Brazil by 32 per cent.

Everyone has his own diagnosis of the world depression. Without going into the complex arguments of economists, we are persuaded that, in its nature and its form, the present depression depends exclusively on political causes lato sensu, and that remedies must be sought in the political sphere.

No one can maintain that the last war increased the wealth of the European belligerent countries. Inflation gave an illusion of prosperity and created rapid fortunes, but the aggregate of wealth fell considerably. A respected French economist, M. Charles Gide, has shown that, after the war, death duties revealed a reduction, ranging from 20 to 40 per cent, in the values of inherited property. Death duties covering a long period are a sure index here; but, even if the significance of this percentage is underestimated, it must be admitted that private wealth has undergone a general reduction in Europe.

It might have been thought that the natural consequence would have been a reduction in public expenditure. In point of fact, however, the budget of nearly every country has increased to an unprecedented extent. If account is taken of the expenditure of the State and of local authorities, a constant increase is observed even in the principal countries. If 100 is taken as representing the public expenditure in 1913, the present gold expenditure may be estimated at 250, even in the most moderate countries, where the increase has been attenuated by currency devalorisation, but there are large countries which have increased their expenditure as much as 400 per cent.

All the Governments have thus been obliged to increase taxation proportionately. The taxes chiefly affected in nearly all countries are the indirect taxes, particularly Customs duties. All protectionist systems, even the most exaggerated, are defended on the ground of budget requirements.

Every protectionist measure has the effect of creating other protectionist measures in the country itself — for every industry asks to be protected — and also in foreign countries, which, in their turn, demand protection.

An old economist, in an oft-quoted phrase, once said: "Of all poisonous bites, the least painful is that of the asp, for it renders its victims unconscious, and they pass from sleep to death." He added that indirect taxes and Customs duties were rather like the bite of the asp.

The world is full of asps at the present time. We allow ourselves to be put to sleep by a fatal illusion, and while the increase in public expenditure is increasing the burden of taxation and reducing the purchasing power of the nations, excessive protectionist measures restrict international trade and suffocate the very industries they were designed to protect.

The restoration of confidence, the reduction of public expenditure and tariff reduction, with the consequent stimulus to trade, are essential conditions for world economic recovery. We therefore feel that the remedy lies mainly in the hands of statesmen.

If monetary causes do exist, those causes, it must be remembered, are also bound up with political considerations. It is obvious that payments cannot be balanced in countries which have to increase their public expenditure and at the same time to restrict exports. There is the old vicious circle. If there are no exports and industry is paralysed, unemployment in its turn entails further expenditure and fresh crises.

Among the countless blunders of post-war policy may be numbered the introduction by creditor countries of the most extreme protectionist measures, regardless of the fact that the debtor nations cannot even pay their debts except from their surplus exports.

Some regard the present crisis as a capitalist crisis, and many think that capitalism is on its trial. Frankly, the very opposite appears to me to be the case. The present depression is the consequence, not of our form of production, but of the difficulties placed by States in the way of the circulation of wealth.

We may talk of the crisis of a system, but it is not that of capitalism, which has always developed in conditions of full commercial liberty; it is rather a crisis of Government intervention.

On statesmen devolves the great task of bringing the economic world back to normal conditions, of reinstating in public life the great principles evolved through long experience, and of liberating us from the present political habit of living from hand to mouth by means of temporary expedients.

The tyrant Petrucci of Siena often used to repeat, during the Renaissance, a remark made by the Emperor Frederick, to the effect that "the times are superior to the brains".

Posterity must not say of us that our brains are inferior to the times in which we live.

The President:

Translation: Mr. Binchy, delegate of the Irish Free State, will address the Assembly.

Mr. Binchy (Irish Free State):

If there is one thing which emerges from the Secretary-General's report, it is the extent to which the League has become a part of the organisation of the international society of our time. Reading through this report, it is difficult to think of any important field of international relationship in which the League does not perform some function or other, and in many respects these functions are such that they could not be performed by any other agency and they are, therefore, of the utmost value.

I have nothing to say here with regard to the substance of the particular matters dealt with in the Secretary-General's report. Many of them doubtless call for detailed and careful consideration, but that, I take it, is not the purpose of this debate. That is rather the task of the various Committees to which the different sections of the report will be referred in due course, and we shall have an opportunity later of reviewing the work of those Committees.

To my mind, the peculiar function of the Assembly is to lay down the general directives upon which all the separate activities of the League and its organs should proceed. I think, therefore, that it may not be unfitting for me to conclude this general debate in which we have to view all the work of the League, not as a number of separate activities, but as a single whole, by asking the question whether any tendencies and developments are emerging which are incompatible with the principles on which the League has been founded and whether action by the League is called for to direct and control these tendencies in the interests of the general welfare of the world. An examination of this kind seems to me to be peculiarly necessary at this particular time.

During the past year, the States of the world have been called upon to deal with problems of grave difficulty and urgency. We have had an economic depression of unprecedented intensity and duration which has given rise to new and unexampled difficulties in the sphere of international finance and commerce. During the year, also, we have been called upon to deal with the problems arising from the work of final preparation for the general Disarmament Conference, and other problems have, in addition, presented themselves, some of them hardly of less importance than those to which I have referred.

National public opinion still tends to regard the very existence of an international problem as a reproach to the League of Nations. That is obviously unfair, but it is a fact, and it is a fact that requires to be emphasised, inasmuch as the existence of the problems to which I have referred tends to create a pessimistic frame of mind towards the League of Nations and may produce a diminution in that degree of public support on which the efficacy of the League rests. I mention it here to show that the very existence of the League of Nations depends to a large extent on its ability to reduce the likelihood of these vital problems arising, as well as upon its ability to make rapid and effective contributions to their solution if and when they do arise.

I have no intention of initiating a discussion on events which we have left behind us, but I do think that we must make an earnest and deliberate effort now to safeguard the position of the League. For that reason, we must consider whether the organisations and methods which we have evolved are effective in the circumstances to which the events of the last few years have brought us.

Let me take first the efforts of the League to deal with economic problems. In the year 1927, the World Economic Conference was held. That Conference proceeded on the principle of universality; its conclusions were based upon the principle that the economic difficulties of the time could be regarded as a problem which lent itself to treatment by the immediate worldwide application of a uniform remedy.

In 1929, when the League came to make provision for carrying out the recommendation of the World Economic Conference that the States of the world should proceed to a lowering of excessive tariff barriers by means of collective action, it proceeded upon the same principle. That recommendation was referred to a Conference to which all the States of the world without distinction were invited. When that Conference met, however, it assumed, as if by a process of natural selection, a definitely Continental character. The problems themselves which the Conference was convened to consider were regarded as being of a regional, and not of a universal, character; and, tacitly, both the States which were represented at that Conference and those which were not appeared by their action to lend colour to the idea that the solution of economic difficulties which are peculiar to, or which specially affect, particular States can most usefully, in the first instance, be sought by the collaboration of the States concerned. After that Conference, the efforts of the League to promote concerted economic action among States became more and more efforts to promote that action among the States of Europe.

The next stage in the development of this phase was the publication of the French memorandum of May 1st, 1930. The broad principle of that memorandum was that the geographical position of the States in this part of the world creates among them a certain community of interests, and, as suggested in the memorandum, a Commission was set up to deal with the peculiar difficulties and problems of Europe, as a first step towards an economic solution on a wider basis. For the past twelve months, that Commission has been considering European economic problems. It has tried to approach them as a problem susceptible of solution by the immediate application of a uniform remedy equally applicable to all the States of Europe. Within the limits of Europe itself, it tried to preserve the principle of universality.

But, while the European Commission was engaged upon that task, it was being outstripped by events which were taking place outside the Commission, and even outside the League itself. In different parts of Europe, individual States were coming together and, without reference to the League, were starting to deal with difficulties on a regional basis.

A year's intensive effort to solve European economic problems on uniform principles of general application throughout Europe has not achieved the necessary measure of success. In the meantime, the new tendency in the direction of regional arrangements has been growing. No doubt there is much to be said both for and against this new development. It has already become manifest that opinions with regard to it are sharply divided.

It cannot be ignored that this new tendency, as followed up to the present in the economic field, in the absence of some effective method of League co-ordination, has given rise to alarm in certain countries whose trade and commerce may be prejudiced as a result of regional agreements which have been, or are likely to be, concluded and that there is great danger of the growth of an atmosphere of suspicion and ill-feeling between nations which would be fatal to international co-operation and peaceful economic progress. Nor can we afford to forget that rivalry and jealousy which have their origins in the economic field have invariably tended in time to have reactions in the political relations between States, with results which it is unnecessary to emphasise.

It therefore behoves us to give immediate and earnest consideration to this movement towards regional arrangements with a view to the prevention of the growth of international ill feeling and to the preservation of the prestige of the League. We may not like this movement; we may feel that it is contrary to all the principles which this Assembly has been affirming and re-affirming since the League was established. But it is clear that we cannot ignore it. And once we recognise its existence as a fact, can we deny that safeguards must be sought which will secure that regional and fractional agreements shall be integrated into the general system in such a way that the dangers feared may be averted?

I think that our experience of the problem of disarmament leads us to similar conclusions. It is manifest that the difficulties of the individual State in connection with disarmament lie mainly in the limited problem of its own security. In other words, the difficulties which lie in the way of disarmament are largely of a regional character. Events have shown that disarmament is not a single general problem; that it is constituted by a large number of special limited problems, and the measure of success hitherto achieved in this field has resulted from a recognition of that fact. In the case of disarmament, as in the case of the economic problem, while we here in the League have been attempting to build from above, individual States and groups of States have started to construct from below.

I am not going to multiply examples of this development, this tendency of States to take action in groups outside the auspices of the League. Its existence has been frankly and fully recognised, both in the discussions in this Assembly and elsewhere. May not this tendency be to some extent due to a certain lack of harmony between the exact nature of the international problems with which we have been dealing and the methods which we have been employing in our endeavours to solve them ? If that is so, then I think that the situation calls for appropriate action on the part of the League.

In the first place, let me refer now to the danger of condemning too hastily and without qualification the tendency to which I have referred. If the methods which we have been following here, the method of universal solutions, the process of building from above rather than from below, had achieved a greater measure of success, we would, I think, have been justified in regarding innovations with suspicion. But, taking things as they are, we must be very careful lest, by pronouncing too hasty a judgment, we should debar ourselves from the use of methods of international collaboration which, properly conceived and directed by the League, might be fruitful in their results. I think we must be doubly careful in the present case, because the development to which I have referred is a natural growth, and natural growths of this kind usually have their roots very deep down in the structure of society. Society, whether national or international, has a way of devising new means to provide for its needs.

The League is not at this moment called upon either to approve or to condemn this development. But we must accept it as a fact, and I think we must go further and accept it as evidence of other facts which we have hitherto taken into account either insufficiently or not at all. We must definitely realise now that the structure of international society is not what we have hitherto assumed it to be in the hypothesis on which we have proceeded. International society cannot be regarded as being composed solely of individual States. It also comprises a number of larger or smaller international societies. It is necessary to take account of this fact in devising means for dealing with international problems. While there can be no question of abandoning the ideal of universality upon which this League of Nations was founded, we must recognise that this ideal may have to be obtained progressively. There may be intermediate stages; what cannot be accomplished in one step may be accomplished in two or more.

Let me remind you that there is nothing in the Covenant to prevent regional combinations the objects of which are not inconsistent with its terms. Let me remind you, too, that universality is important, not as the means, but as the end. Accordingly, the task before us is, not to approve or condemn the tendency which I have described, but to recognise its existence and to endeavour to control it with the purpose of ensuring that it will further the objects which we Members of the League have in common. This I consider to be one of the vital problems confronting the League. My Government believes that the League must evolve a technique which will enable it to exercise a sufficient influence upon these groupings, their formation and subsequent conduct, to ensure an ultimate harmony between their objects and the objects which we have pursued in common here for the past twelve years.

If the League cannot do this, then I fear very much that its main activities will be narrowed and that much of the effort which we have expended here for the past twelve years will have been in vain.

I do not propose to attempt to define at this stage a League technique of the kind that my Government considers essential. What is required is something which will enable the League of Nations — and by the League in this connection I mean the Assembly, the Council, the Secretariat, the technical organisations; in fact, all the League's executive machinery — something which will enable the League to perform substantially the same functions and to exert substantially the same measure of directing influence in the case of these regional arrangements as it has performed and exerted in the case of all the international arrangements which have been negotiated or concluded under the auspices of the League since its establishment.

If the League of Nations can successfully evolve a technique of this kind, I do not think that the tendency towards regional groupings will injure the prestige of the League or imperil the attainment of the objects which we have put before it. The ultimate responsibility for the development and operation of such a technique must, however, rest upon the States which compose the League. It is among the Members of the League that this tendency has grown up, so that we ourselves can make its effect upon the League what we will.

If the Members of the League desire to conclude regional commercial conventions and regional political treaties, they should be prepared to abide by the letter and by the spirit of their obligations under the Covenant and the declarations which they have made here. They should be prepared to consider the general rules under which regional agreements should be negotiated. They should even be prepared to accept a certain measure of control by the League — in regard to the principles, at least, in accordance with which such arrangements should be concluded. If the Members of the League of Nations are not prepared to do this: if groups and blocks of States are formed outside the auspices of the League; if the States concerned take up the attitude that the internal arrangements of those groups and their policy towards other States are solely their own concern outside the jurisdiction of the League and its organs; if in this way groups of States are formed within which and between which the principles of the Covenant are a dead letter, then I think the League will have become merely an empty framework outside of which will be found the realities of international life.

If, on the other hand, the Members of the League are prepared to adapt and to bring within a universal framework the methods which they have devised to meet their particular international needs, the League of Nations will have become the real forum of the world.

The President:

Translation: As the list of speakers is now exhausted, I shall close the discussion on the work of the League of Nations since the last Assembly.

I should like to thank the delegations who have been good enough to accede to my requests. Thanks to their zeal, we have been able to terminate the discussion in the space of five days, at the same time leaving two afternoons free for meetings of Committees.

46. — GENERAL DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE: DRAFT RESOLUTION PROPOSED BY THE DELEGATIONS OF DENMARK, NORWAY, THE NETHERLANDS, SWEDEN AND SWITZERLAND: REPORT OF THE AGENDA COMMITTEE.

The President:

Translation: The Agenda Committee has met this afternoon, under the chairmanship of Dr. Hyder. It examined the draft resolution relating to the reduction of armaments submitted by the delegations of Denmark, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden and Switzerland at the meeting of the Assembly on Friday, September 11th. It decided to propose to the Assembly that the draft resolution should be included in the agenda of the present session, and referred to the Third Committee for consideration. If no one has any objection, I shall consider this proposal adopted.

The proposal was adopted.

The President:

Translation: The Agenda Committee also examined the proposal concerning the entry into force of the Protocol of September 14th, 1929, relating to the revision of the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice, submitted by the delegations of Sweden, the Netherlands, Norway, Japan, Denmark, Spain and Finland, and decided to propose to the Assembly that this proposal also should be placed on the agenda, and referred to the First Committee for consideration.

If no one has any objection I shall consider this proposal adopted.

The proposal was adopted.

The President:

Translation: I should like to accord my warm thanks to the Chairman of the Agenda Committee for his prompt compliance with my request, which has enabled us to take a decision at the present meeting.

ELEVENTH PLENARY MEETING

CONTENTS:

48. LIMITATION OF THE EXPENDITURE OF THE LEAGUE. Adoption of a Draft Resolution submitted by the Fourth Committee.

49. ELECTION OF THREE NON-PERMANENT MEMBERS OF THE COUNCIL.

President: M. TITULESCO.

48. — LIMITATION OF THE EXPENDITURE OF THE LEAGUE: ADOPTION OF A DRAFT RESOLUTION SUBMITTED BY THE FOURTH COMMITTEE.

The President:

Translation: The Chairman of the Fourth Committee has asked me to place on the agenda of the present meeting a draft resolution on which he considers it desirable that the Assembly should express an opinion without delay, in order that the Committee may take account of it in their work.

The draft resolution which has been distributed to the delegations reads as follows:

The Assembly,

Being convinced that it is imperative not further to increase the budget of the League for 1932, which will have to provide for the expenses of the International Disarmament Conference, and hoping that it will even be possible to reduce the draft budget:

Makes a strong appeal to its Committees to follow the principles of economy dictated by present circumstances;

Requests these Committees to limit and, if possible, to reduce to the indispensable the programme of work to be undertaken in 1932, and especially to abstain, as far as practicable, from making recommendations which might involve avoidable expenditure.

I will ask the Rapporteur of the Committee, M. Politis, who is also its Chairman, to explain to the Assembly the considerations which led the Fourth Committee to submit this draft resolution to us.

M. Politis (Greece), Chairman and Rapporteur of the Fourth Committee:

Translation: On behalf of the Fourth Committee, I have the honour to propose to the Assembly the adoption of the draft resolution distributed to-day.

The Fourth Committee, which is responsible for the sound administration of our finances, has felt strongly and unanimously, from the outset, that, at a time when the world economic and financial crisis is forcing all the States to observe the strictest economy, it is the League's duty to follow their example. That duty is the more urgent in view of the fact that, owing to the convening of the Disarmament Conference, the coming financial year will involve extraordinary expenditure to the amount of approximately four million Swiss francs, or nearly one-fifth of our normal budget.

Economy has already been aimed at in the framing of the draft budget. The most laudable attempts have been made to reduce expenses. The Supervisory Commission has, nevertheless, had to make further reductions, and the Fourth Committee in its turn will have to examine the possibility of additional restrictions.

The Fourth Committee feels, however, that the same spirit of economy should guide the work of the other Assembly Committees, and that this point should be brought to their notice so that, without condemning the League to stagnation, or even to an undue slackening of its activities, they may shape those activities as far as possible in such a way as to avoid expenditure which is not indispensable. The Fourth Committee accordingly asks the Assembly to request the various Committees to be guided by a spirit of economy and to limit, and if possible reduce to the indispensable minimum, the programme of work for next year, abstaining more particularly from making recommendations which might involve avoidable expenditure.

The Fourth Committee is satisfied that the Assembly will share its anxiety in this matter and will adopt the draft resolution which it now submits as a question of urgency and without reservation. May I add that it hopes that, in order the better to emphasise the significance of your approval, that approval will be unanimous.

The President:

Translation: If no delegate wishes to speak, I shall consider the Fourth Committee's draft resolution unanimously adopted.

The draft resolution was adopted unanimously.

The President:

Translation: I propose to communicate to the chairmen of the other five Committees the reasons which led the Fourth Committee to submit its proposal to the Assembly.

49. — ELECTION OF THREE NON-PERMANENT MEMBERS OF THE COUNCIL.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the election of three non-permanent Members of the Council.

Following the practice of my predecessors in this office, I would remind you of the provisions of the Assembly resolution of September 15th, 1926, making rules dealing with the election of the nine non-permanent Members of the Council, their term of office and the conditions of re-eligibility.

Article 1, paragraph 1, reads as follows:

"The Assembly shall each year, in the course of its ordinary session, elect three non-permanent Members of the Council. They shall be elected for a term commencing immediately on their election and ending on the day of the elections held three years later by the Assembly."

Before opening the ballot, I would again remind you of the provisions of Rule 22(a) of the Rules of Procedure of the Assembly, which apply in this case.

The rule reads as follows:

"1. The Members whose representatives are to sit on the Council as non-permanent Members of that body shall be selected by the Assembly by secret ballot.

"2. Where several seats are to be filled, the election shall be made by voting a list of names. Any ballot paper containing more names than there are seats to be filled shall be null and void."

"3. No Member shall be elected at the first or at the second ballot unless it has obtained at least the absolute majority of the votes. If, after two ballots, there still remain seats to be filled, a third ballot shall be held upon a list consisting of the candidates which obtained most votes at the second ballot, up to a number double that of the seats still to be filled, and those members shall be elected which obtain the greatest number of votes.

"4. If two or more Members obtain the same number of votes and there is not a seat available for each, a special ballot shall be held between them; if they again obtain an equal number of votes, the President shall decide between them by drawing lots."

In computing the absolute majority prescribed for the first and second ballots, I think the Assembly will agree with me that, as at previous sessions, we should here, by analogy, apply the rule contained in the Assembly resolution of September 15th, 1926, concerning "the rules dealing with the election of the nine non-permanent Members of the Council, their term of office and the conditions of re-eligibility".

This resolution lays down that the Assembly shall pronounce separately, by secret ballot, upon each request for re-eligibility. The number of votes cast shall be determined by the total number of voting papers deposited, blank or spoilt votes being deducted.

In electing the non-permanent Members of the Council, blank or spoilt voting papers must not be counted when the number of votes is reckoned. The absolute majority should be calculated on the basis of the total number of valid voting papers.

If no one has any remarks to make, I shall assume that the Assembly, adopting the precedents of previous sessions, considers that this practice should be maintained. (Agreed.)

I would emphasise the point that, to be valid, voting papers must bear the names of States and not the names of representatives of States. Further, any voting paper containing more than three names will be void.

May I ask Viscount Cecil of Chelwood, first delegate of the British Empire, and Dr. Curtius, first delegate of Germany, to come to the platform and act as tellers?

(Viscount Cecil of Chelwood and Dr. Curtius took their places on the platform as tellers.)

The President:

Translation: We will now proceed to ballot by roll-call.

(The ballot was taken.)

The President:

Translation: The result of the ballot is as follows:

Number of votes cast . . .	50
Voting papers blank or spoilt	2
Voting papers valid	48
Absolute majority	25

The votes obtained by the States are as follows:

China	48
Panama	45
Spain	43
Hungary	2
Mexico	2
Portugal	2
Bulgaria	1

I declare that China, Panama and Spain, which have obtained an absolute majority, are duly elected non-permanent Members of the Council for a period of three years. I have pleasure in offering my congratulations to those States, and I trust that their collaboration on the Council of the League may be most fruitful.

I wish also to thank the tellers for their kind assistance.

50. — PARTICIPATION IN THE WORK OF THE THIRD COMMITTEE OF STATES NOT REPRESENTED IN THE ASSEMBLY: PROPOSALS OF THE THIRD COMMITTEE AND OF THE GENERAL COMMITTEE OF THE ASSEMBLY.

The President:

Translation: Before inviting you to discuss the agenda, I feel it my duty to inform you of certain measures which I have taken, with the consent of the General Committee, since the last plenary meeting of the Assembly.

At six o'clock on the evening of Saturday, September 19th, I received from M. Munch, Chairman of the Third Committee, a letter stating that the Third Committee thought it desirable to invite the representatives of countries which had taken part in the work of the Preparatory Disarmament Commission, together with the countries invited to the General Disarmament Conference to assist, in an advisory capacity, in the Third Committee's discussions on the resolution relating to an armaments truce. The following were the countries concerned: Afghanistan, the Argentine Republic, Brazil, Costa Rica, Egypt, Ecuador, Salvador, Turkey, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and United States of America.

The Chairman of the Third Committee left it to the President of the Assembly to decide on the procedure to be followed in forwarding these invitations, whether through the Council or through any other channel.

Being anxious to safeguard the Assembly's prerogatives, I felt that, when the Assembly was sitting in plenary session, it was not for the Council to forward an invitation extended by the Assembly, but that the latter should take such measures as might be necessary through its own organs.

In view of the urgency of the Third Committee's request and in consideration also of the fact that that Committee had been unanimous and that its views were thus representative of all the delegations to the Assembly, I felt that it would not perhaps be expedient to convene a plenary meeting of the Assembly, as that is always bound to involve some delay.

I thought that, with the assistance of the General Committee, I myself might come to a decision on behalf of the Assembly and take the necessary measures. This I accordingly did. I convened a meeting of the General Committee that same evening and consulted it as regards the procedure to be followed and the other relevant questions arising out of the Third Committee's unanimous suggestion.

After examining these various questions, the General Committee of the Assembly adopted the following resolution:

"The General Committee of the Assembly,

"Having taken note of the request formulated by the Third Committee to the effect that the States not represented at the Assembly which participated in the work of the Preparatory Disarmament Commission, together with the States invited to the General Disarmament Conference, should be requested to participate, in an advisory capacity, in its discussions on the draft resolution concerning an armaments truce;

"Notes that the President of the Assembly, having regard to the urgency of the matter and in view of the decision of the Third Committee, and especially of the unanimity of that decision, can, in agreement with the General Committee, take a decision in the matter without further procedure;

"Considers that steps should be taken to carry the Third Committee's proposal into effect.

"Requests the President of the Assembly to take the necessary steps with a view to giving immediate effect to the present decision and to inform the Assembly of his action in the matter at its next plenary meeting".

Acting on this resolution, I immediately addressed on Saturday night to the ten States I have mentioned an invitation to take part in the work of the Third Committee and, if possible, to appoint representatives for that purpose who would be able to come to Geneva at once.

I have received acceptances from Costa Rica, the United States of America, Egypt and Turkey, and the representatives of those countries, who have already arrived — or are about to arrive — at Geneva, will take part in the Third Committee's proceedings.

The Assembly will welcome with feelings of satisfaction these representatives of countries which are desirous of collaborating with it in the great work of disarmament. The Argentine Republic and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, both of whom replied sympathetically to the invitation addressed to them, stated that, owing to the shortness of the time at their disposal and to material circumstances, it would not be possible for them to appoint representatives. The Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, whose reply has been published in the Assembly Journal, states that it would willingly associate itself, subject to certain conditions, with an armaments truce.

Such are the steps I took as President, in pursuance of the Third Committee's request, and such are the results that have followed. I was anxious to inform the Assembly in detail, in order that it might feel quite sure that its prerogatives have been jealously safeguarded.

The Assembly approved the action taken by its General Committee.

51. — CREDENTIALS OF DELEGATES: SECOND REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON CREDENTIALS.

The President:

Translation: The first item on the agenda is the presentation of the report of the Committee on the Credentials of Delegates.

As delegations have been informed through the Journal of the Assembly, the Committee on Credentials was requested by me as President to examine the messages accrediting the representatives of the United States of Mexico to the Assembly.

M. de Agüero y Bethancourt, Chairman of the Committee on Credentials, will address the Assembly.

M. de Agüero y Bethancourt (Cuba), Chairman of the Committee on Credentials:

Translation: The Committee appointed by the Assembly to examine the credentials of delegates met again at the offices of the League Secretariat at 4 p.m. on September 15th, in order to ascertain whether the representatives of Mexico were duly accredited to take part in the work of the Assembly.

The Secretary-General of the League handed to us the following telegram which he had received on September 14th from the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of the United States of Mexico:

"I have the honour to inform you that the President of the Republic has appointed as delegates of Mexico to the League of Nations:

"M. Genaro ESTRADA, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs;

"M. Emilio PORTES GIL, Minister of the Republic in France, former President of the Republic;

"M. Fernando GONZALES ROA, delegate on various international Committees.

"As substitute delegates:

"M. Eduardo SUAREZ, Head of the Legal Department at the Ministry for Foreign Affairs;

"M. Manuel GOMEZ MORIN, former Under-Secretary for Finance;

"M. Alfonso REYES, Ambassador of the Republic in Brazil.

"As Secretary-General:

"M. Salvador MARTINEZ DE ALVA, Director of the the Mexican Office at Geneva.

"And as Secretary per interim:

"M. Alfredo MARTINEZ BACA."

"As the delegates now in America cannot come to Geneva immediately owing to the distance and the shortness of time available, M. Portes Gil will represent Mexico at the present Assembly.

"I have the honour to ask you, Sir, and through you, the League of Nations, to note this communication and to accord your assistance to the Mexican delegation; I would take this opportunity of assuring you of the sincere and constant co-operation of Mexico and of her representatives".

After examining this telegraphic communication, the Committee is of opinion that the representatives of the United States of Mexico are duly accredited.

The President :

Translation : The Assembly has heard the report of the Committee on Credentials.

If no one has any observations to submit, I shall consider that report adopted.

The report of the Committee on Credentials was adopted.

52. — WELCOME TO THE DELEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF MEXICO.

The President :

Translation : It is my pleasant duty to invite the Mexican delegation to come and take the places reserved for it in this Assembly.

To-day, for the first time, the representatives of the United States of Mexico have taken their place among us, and it is with deep and sincere pleasure that I offer them, on behalf of the Assembly, a most cordial welcome.

The fifty-three nations Members of the League assembled here have made a spontaneous gesture, an unprecedented gesture, but also an exceptional gesture. Desirous of repairing what they considered an injustice, they invited the noble Mexican nation to join them, to associate in their work and thus to extend still further that great network of international goodwill which, under the ægis of the League, to-day covers almost the whole globe.

Mexico understood the value and the significance of the Assembly's gesture, and, actuated by a broad spirit of collaboration, responded readily to our appeal.

It is a deep pleasure to us all to see an increase in the number of States represented at Geneva. The Assembly has always felt that the object of the authors of the Covenant would never be fully attained until the League comprised all the nations of the world, seeking in peaceful co-operation instead of by force, ways and means of meeting the ever-growing difficulties with which the whole of mankind has to contend.

Mexico's contribution to the League will be characterised by the two essential qualities of her proud and noble race — courage and loyalty. Of these she has already given us proof. In responding to our appeal, in showing that she is not daunted by the heavy tasks imposed upon the League to-day, Mexico has manifested her determination to battle courageously in our ranks against the difficulties of the present hour.

In unreservedly accepting the obligations of the Covenant, Mexico has shown her loyalty towards all the nations of the world ; and by her acceptance of our invitation, too, she swells the ranks of the Latin-American delegations, who are so deeply valued by the League because their untiring work and ready co-operation are derived from the greatest treasures of the human heart — idealism and disinterestedness.

The Mexican delegates will see how great a place Latin America holds among us. We are happy to make that place still larger to-day, and we are always waiting to enlarge it again and make room for other American States whose absence, doubtless only temporary, has not abated the goodwill we feel for them.

As President of the Assembly may I add that it is not only the States that we welcome here but also their representatives themselves. The fact that the Geneva spirit has come into being and has vanquished so much opposition is largely due — there can be no doubt of it — to the strong personal friendship which unites the statesmen who are called upon to co-operate closely in carrying out the League's aims. That friendship, too, can always be extended.

The Mexican delegates may be sure that it will be extended to them as to others, and they will find us ever ready to show, in the daily work we shall henceforth do together, that we hold them in the same warm regard that I have voiced in welcoming them to-day.

The first delegate of Mexico, M. Portes Gil, has asked to speak. I invite him to address the Assembly.

M. Portes Gil (Mexico) :

Translation : On behalf of my country I should like to thank the President of the Assembly and the delegates for their generous welcome. You may be assured that Mexico values and appreciates the cordiality with which she has been asked to become a Member of the League of Nations and the very satisfactory terms of that invitation.

In order to convey her gratitude in a practical and useful manner, Mexico offers her services to the League in a spirit of co-operation and goodwill, with a view to the attainment of the ideals of understanding and international collaboration which the League is pursuing.

The fact that Mexico has for years endeavoured to obtain for her working classes really humane conditions of life constitutes the best of guarantees that we have come here inspired with every intention of promoting the welfare of mankind and thereby achieving world peace.

Mexico has accepted the invitation to join this organisation with a feeling of pride and confidence, convinced as she is that her loyal efforts will help to facilitate the tremendous task which the League has undertaken.

The friendly terms in which Mexico was addressed by the representatives of the different countries which submitted and supported the motion and the unanimous approval of this Assembly have largely contributed to efface any memory of the situation which existed before to-day.

I consider that the delegates have thereby earned not only the gratitude of Mexico, which I have great pleasure in voicing here, but the gratitude of the League, for which they have gained an additional Member and one which — I may be allowed to proclaim it here with just pride — will work with zeal and enthusiasm and bring its disinterested contribution to the attainment of the League's ideal.

53. — ERECTION OF A MONUMENT IN THE CITY OF SANTO DOMINGO, CAPITAL OF THE DOMINICAN REPUBLIC (ISLAND OF SANTO DOMINGO OR HAITI) TO THE MEMORY OF CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS : ADOPTION OF A DRAFT RESOLUTION PRESENTED BY THE DELEGATIONS OF BOLIVIA, CHILE, COLOMBIA, CUBA, THE DOMINICAN REPUBLIC, GUATEMALA, HAITI, PANAMA, PARAGUAY, PERU, URUGUAY AND VENEZUELA.

The President :

Translation : The next item on the agenda is a draft resolution concerning the erection of a monument in the city of Santo Domingo to the memory of Christopher Columbus. This draft resolution, which was presented to the Assembly by the delegations of Bolivia, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Haiti, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Uruguay and Venezuela, has been duly communicated to the Assembly and reads as follows :

The Assembly,

Views with entire satisfaction the happy initiative of the Government of the Dominican Republic, adopted officially and unanimously by the twenty-one sovereign States of the New World represented at the fifth and sixth International Pan-American Conferences held in Santiago de Chili and Havana, to erect, in the city of Santo Domingo, capital of the Dominican Republic (Island of Santo Domingo or Haiti), at one time the centre of the discovery and colonisation of the meridional hemisphere, a lighthouse monument to perpetuate the sentiments of admiration and gratitude of humanity towards Christopher Columbus, the discoverer of the New World and one of the greatest benefactors of mankind;

Considering that the great lighthouse monument will be raised within the central airport of the Antilles and that it will be the guide to sea and air navigation for the greater part of the Atlantic and the Caribbean Sea, a circumstance which places the proposed work within the aims of the League of Nations ;

Considering also that the above-mentioned first universal homage to the man who did so much to extend our knowledge of the globe, will house in adjacent palaces a library and museum of documents relating to Columbus, and other sources of intellectual culture, at the disposal of humanity, thus coming within the intellectual co-operation activities of the League ;

Expresses a vote of deep sympathy with the happy initiative of the Dominican Republic, an initiative which, besides being an act of homage due to such a genius as Columbus and such a nation as Spain, creates and will sustain perpetually around it elements propitious to the progress and development of international communications and, consequently, propitious to the development of goodwill between the States of both continents and the perfection of human intercourse.

As soon as I received the draft resolution, I submitted it to the Agenda Committee, which, after examining it, proposed in its report that the draft should be included in the agenda of the present session, but left it to the General Committee to decide upon the procedure to be followed for submitting it to the Assembly.

In agreement with the General Committee I shall, if no one has any objection, propose that this draft resolution be adopted unanimously. The Assembly would thus be expressing its appreciation of the happy initiative of the Dominican Republic, which constitutes a just tribute to the génius of Columbus himself, and at the same time creates and will immortalise factors favourable to the progress and development of international communications and hence of goodwill between the States of the two continents and calculated to assist the perfecting of human relations.

The draft resolution was adopted unanimously.

54. — PENAL AND PENITENTIARY QUESTIONS : IMPROVEMENTS IN PENAL ADMINISTRATION : REPORT OF THE FIFTH COMMITTEE : RESOLUTION.

The President :

Translation : The next item on the agenda is the discussion of the report of the Fifth Committee on improvements in penal administration (Annex 3, document A.70.1931.IV).

(On the invitation of the President, M. Alà, Chairman of the Fifth Committee, and M. Pella, Rapporteur, took their places on the platform.)

The President :

Translation : M. Pella will address the Assembly.

M. Pella (Roumania), Rapporteur :

Translation : In submitting to you the results of the Fifth Committee's work on the problem of penal administration, I think it unnecessary, particularly in a matter which concerns the humanising of the system for the enforcement of penalties, to inflict a penalty on you by reading a somewhat lengthy report.

I shall confine myself therefore to a short summary of the more important questions dealt with by the Fifth Committee. The draft resolution unanimously adopted by the Committee dealt with three problems — namely, the progressive unification of penal law, co-operation between States for the prevention and suppression of crime and, lastly, the execution of the penalties and preventive measures of detention, or, more precisely, the question of the treatment of prisoners.

As regards the first problem, certain delegates pointed out that the activity of the League in this domain had already been most productive. The Conventions for the suppression of international offences such as traffic in women and children, slavery, traffic in drugs, obscene publications and, quite recently, counterfeiting currency have all tended to show that States were desirous of presenting a united front against these crimes by means of the unification of the indictments in the laws of the different countries and of the fundamental principles for the suppression of the crimes in question.

These international conventions were framed or completed under the auspices of the League. Further, more numerous draft conventions have been examined by the League, and I might mention by way of example those dealing with the forging of cheques, shares, bonds and other documents of value.

In view of the importance of the work already done by the League and by various independent institutions, the Fifth Committee considered that the best method to follow would be to ask certain specially qualified organisations in what manner the assistance of the League of Nations might be of value with the object of achieving such unification.

Since I maintained in the Fifth Committee the need for the progressive unification of penal law, I desire, in my own personal capacity, to state that there is no question of the unification of the criminal law of States as a whole. There is no question of attacking and abolishing, through international unification, institutions which are deeply rooted in the life of each nation and which have contributed, in all countries, to the development of criminal law. The progressive unification of penal law must aim at establishing certain fundamental principles for the suppression of crime; even when there is a question of uniformity as regards such principles, which have a doctrinal significance, unification can of course be attained first of all in matters in which they have an international application — for instance, in the case of international crimes and offences.

It is important, therefore, to select these questions carefully, beginning with those in which international unification appears to be most urgent and most practicable. In other words, progress might be made wherever the way has already been prepared by international conventions signed and ratified by a number of States.

Again, consideration could certainly be given to regional unification in regard to questions which, although not yet ripe for uniform solution in the legislation of all countries, nevertheless admit of unification as between such countries as have acquired common elements of civilisation: I have in mind the common elements resulting from community of race or from the common circumstances which attended the historical development of certain nations.

Such elements, moreover, have had a great influence in the formation of a legal mentality to some extent common to the nations in question. Unification of this kind, more restricted in space, but at the same time more extensive in its scope, also represents one of the surest means of preparing the ground for the progressive unification of penal law.

The solution of these problems in the internal penal law of States will, moreover, be greatly facilitated by a general phenomenon which cannot be disputed — the influence of the international spirit on the juridical conceptions of the civilised nations, the effect being in some degree to internationalise municipal law.

As regards the second problem — international co-operation for the combating of crime — this is obviously the concern not of municipal but of international penal law. Although incontestably crime in general must no longer be regarded as a legal entity, but rather as a pathological phenomenon of a social nature, it is evident that we must endeavour to perfect rules of international penal law, as constituting the foundation of international co-operation for the repression of crime.

The work of certain Conferences or Committees of the League, in regard to extradition, the communication of judicial and extra-judicial documents in criminal matters, and international police co-operation, prove that it is no new problem that is being submitted to the League.

In this sphere, as in that of the progressive unification of penal law, the Fifth Committee proposes that the Assembly should obtain the opinion of certain organisations as regards the manner in which the assistance of the League might be of value and, when the replies of these organisations have been received, that the States Members should be asked whether they wish the League to lend its assistance in the solution of such questions also.

The third problem dealt with in the draft resolution is the execution of the penalty and preventive measures.

In this connection, as the report states, a penalty can no longer in these days be regarded merely as the infliction of pain, as a means of expiating a crime. Apart from quite exceptional cases, when the criminal has to be eliminated, a penalty is to be looked on as a means of readapting the offender to social life; as regards the execution of the penalty, in certain countries too much room is left for arbitrary administrative methods; in other words, the execution of penal sentences entailing deprivation of liberty is, as has been said, exempted from the application of the principles which must govern all criminal law.

While in these days crime is no longer regarded as an abstract notion, and it is the character of the delinquent that must be kept in view, those responsible for supervising the execution of the penalty obviously have quite as important a task as those who pronounce it. A penalty executed in a barbarous spirit would fail in its real aim, which is to reform and humanise the delinquent. The League of Nations cannot, therefore, ignore the social and humanitarian aspect of this problem.

In this connection, we may mention an extremely pertinent remark by the representative of the British Empire on the Fifth Committee to the effect that, unlike the other evils which the League is trying to remedy in its social and humanitarian work, and which are due to natural causes or to individuals acting contrary to the laws of certain countries, the particular evil in question is almost always the fault of a Government.

No progress can be made, therefore, except with the voluntary co-operation of Governments, and the League's action here might be extremely effective.

In relation to this question, the Fifth Committee had before it standard minimum rules for the treatment of prisoners drawn up by the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission. Many problems might be brought up in this connection. I will merely mention the treatment of juvenile delinquents, habitual criminals, abnormal criminals, political offenders, and certain problems relating to the separation of offenders, to the progressive system designed to avoid the risk of moral contagion and to solitary confinement. Other questions might be mentioned, for example, open-air labour, work in mines, and — last but not least — the burning question of deportation.

As regards convict labour, I would mention certain problems such as the quantity of work given to a prisoner, its duration, the protection of workers in prisons, and remuneration for work; nor can we ignore the very delicate problem of discharged prisoners and the perfecting of measures for their assistance.

The mere mention of certain of these questions, by way of illustration, shows that the Fifth Committee is not at present in a position to discuss the substance of the problem of the treatment of prisoners. It considered it preferable to propose to the Assembly that it should refer the standard minimum rules to the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission with a view to their reconsideration in the light of the replies and observations received.

After receipt of the Commission's reply, it would be expedient to consult the Governments on the question whether the League could best assist in this connection by co-operation with the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission or by setting up a special Committee of the League.

I cannot conclude my statement without stressing point 2 of the draft resolution, which provides for the development of the policy of co-operation between the League and organisations dealing with penal and penitentiary problems.

In point of fact, the League has latterly been following the work of certain institutions dealing with these problems: the Howard League, the International Penal Law Association, and the International Penal Law Union have been consulted by the League on the standard minimum rules for the treatment of prisoners; the Secretary-General of the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission attends all the meetings of the Child Welfare Committee; the League Secretariat sent a representative to a Congress organised at Prague last year by the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission and was represented, by the Legal Adviser of the League of Nations and by a member of the Legal Section, at the Congress of the International Penal Law Association at Bucarest in 1929, at the meeting of the International Bureau for the Unification of Penal Law in 1929, and at the Third Unification Conference, organised by the Bureau at Brussels in 1930.

I have mentioned, merely by way of illustrations, a few of the institutions which deal with prison problems on an international plane and which are already in touch with the League of Nations. As regards point 2 of the draft resolution, the Fifth Committee earnestly desires to encourage the Secretariat in this field by requesting it to develop the policy of co-operation with all organisations dealing with the grave problems connected with the prevention and suppression of crime and with the prison system.

If you will allow me to forget for one moment my temporary position as Rapporteur and to think of myself in my permanent capacity as a professor of penal law, I should like to express to the Secretary-General the profound satisfaction felt by all learned circles which are dealing with these problems at the interest with which he has followed their work. For one fact is of incontestable importance: that the League represents primarily a moral force directed against evil, and it cannot remain indifferent to the increase in crime, which is keeping pace with the continuous transformation and internationalisation of contemporary social life, by becoming international itself. It is for Governments to decide whether the League shall intervene directly in this question or not. We must not forget, however, that all history testifies to the uses and pacific power of penal law, which is itself called upon to combat the hostile forces of nature and those unfortunate aberrations of the passions which lead individuals and communities towards the abyss of crime.

The proceedings of the Fifth Committee resulted in the framing of the following draft resolution, which was adopted unanimously and is now submitted to the Assembly for approval:

The Assembly,

Having been invited by the Council in January 1930 to consider the best way in which the League of Nations could co-operate with the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission and other organisations in their efforts to assist in the improvement of prisons in accordance with modern economic, social and health standards;

Having noted the observations of the States Members and non-members of the League of Nations and of the organisations which have been consulted regarding the Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners (see document C.620 M.24.1930.IV);

Considering that, if the improvement of penal administration by co-operation between Governments is to receive the support of the League of Nations, the latter will need the advice and assistance of a body of experts;

Considering, further, the importance of the efforts which have already been made, both by means of a number of international conventions and by certain organs of the League of Nations and various institutions, to achieve a gradual unification of penal law and to establish co-operation of States in the prevention and suppression of crime:

Requests the Secretary-General:

(1) To refer to the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission the replies and observations received regarding the Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners, and also the Report and Minutes of the Fifth Committee, and to ask it to reconsider these rules in the light of the aforementioned replies and observations;

(2) To develop the policy of co-operation with organisations dealing with the international aspect of penal and penitentiary problems;

(3) To ask the International Labour Office to continue its study in connection with prison labour;

(4) To forward the Report and the Minutes of the Fifth Committee to the International Penal Law Association, the International Bureau for the Unification of Penal Law, the International Criminal Police Commission, the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission, the Howard League for Penal Reform, the International Law Association, the International Penal Law Union, and any other international organisations which may be proposed by the Governments to the Secretary-General, and to ask them in what manner they consider that the assistance of the League of Nations might be of value with a view to achieving a gradual unification of criminal law and the co-operation of States in the prevention and suppression of crime;

(5) After having received the observations of these organisations, to forward them, together with the Report and Minutes of the Fifth Committee, to the States Members of the League, and to ask them whether they wish the League of Nations to lend its assistance also in regard to the questions referred to in No. 4;

(6) After having received the answer of the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission on the Standard Minimum Rules, to ask the Governments of States Members of the League whether they consider that the League could best assist in connection with the treatment of prisoners by co-operation with the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission, or by setting up a special Committee of the League to study this problem.

The Secretary-General is asked to submit a report to the next Assembly on all questions contained in this resolution.

The President:

Translation: The first speaker on the list, Count Carton de Wiart, delegate of Belgium, will address the Assembly.

Count Carton de Wiart (Belgium):

Translation: I should like, with your permission, to make a few brief observations on behalf of the Belgian delegation, though I would add that we accept the conclusions of the report which has just been read.

The question dealt with in the report consists of two parts, the first of which relates to the prison system. As we know, a memorandum on this system has been published by the Howard League, which has introduced this problem into our discussions, on the ground that the treatment of prisoners should be regarded more and more from a humanitarian point of view. The memorandum itself has been communicated to the Governments and also to a number of qualified organisations, and the only step to be taken for the moment is, as indeed is proposed in the Fifth Committee's report, to refer the observations of the Governments and of the organisations consulted to the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission.

I would merely mention, among the observations furnished by certain organisations, the remark of the Child Welfare Committee to the effect that, where children are concerned, there should be no question of prison. As the Committee says, there is absolute antinomy between the terms "child" and "prison". We therefore hope that the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission, to which the results of this consultation have been submitted, will, if it thinks fit, draw up a general body of rules, which will have been revised and completed, and that the problem will then be deliberated afresh and without previous commitments.

A second very important question has been submitted for the first time by the Fifth Committee: unification of penal law and international co-operation in the prevention and suppression of crime. This question, which is a new one, has given rise to certain apprehensions on the part of several delegations.

Naturally, no decision which the Fifth Committee may propose can in any way commit us for the future. My own delegation considers that the League should follow up the enquiries undertaken with a view to securing a certain measure of unification in penal law.

Not only, as our eminent Rapporteur has just said, are there certain offences which must, by their nature, be regarded as offences of an international character, such as the traffic in women and children, the traffic in drugs, obscene publications and counterfeiting currency, forging bills of exchange or cheques, but all offences tend, by reason of the faster tempo of our civilisation, to assume an international character, and technical progress itself is opening up to what may be termed the iter criminis, a field of activity which simply ignores our narrow frontiers.

It seems desirable that, subject to reservations made necessary by differences of civilisation and climate, the goddess of justice, Themis, should not present too different a countenance to men, according to the mere frontiers within which they live.

Unification of penal law and co-operation between the nations with a view to the more effective combating of crime are demanded alike by conscience and clear interest, and it is thought that these considerations, and the expression given to them in the League (which is nothing but a concrete form of the solidarity uniting all nations, which are in reality members of the same body), should lead to the creation of collective rights and duties.

However — and this is my final point — the deliberations of the Fifth Committee and the conclusions submitted to us must leave us an entirely free hand for the future. These new problems of the unification of penal law and co-operation in the prevention and suppression of crime will first be submitted for an opinion to the qualified organisations, which will be asked what methods they consider the League should adopt in dealing with them. Not until the replies from these organisations have been received will the States themselves be consulted as to whether they desire the League to deal with this question, which is still quite new to it.

On these conditions, and subject to these reservations, we heartily endorse the conclusions of the Fifth Committee, which have been so competently explained from this platform by Professor Pella, whose legal erudition has long been recognised.

The President:

Translation: Lord Lytton, delegate of the British Empire, will address the Assembly.

Lord Lytton (British Empire):

I want, in a very few words, to call the attention of the Assembly to the difficult position in which my delegation was placed by the proceedings in the Fifth Committee on this subject. We had on our agenda the report of the Secretary-General dealing with the subject of penal administration and I was prepared to express the views of my delegation on that subject.

The discussion opened, however, with a long report from the Roumanian delegate, the Rapporteur, which travelled far beyond the subject on the agenda and dealt with such large questions as the unification of criminal law and international co-operation in the suppression of crime.

I submitted to the Committee that this wide extension of the subject was not only outside our agenda but was, in fact, beyond the competence of the Fifth Committee. As, however, the sense of the Committee was clearly against me, I did not press my objection, and the discussion, both in the Fifth Committee and in the Sub-Committee to which the matter was referred, took place, not on the report of the Secretary-General, but on the wider report submitted by our Rapporteur.

The Assembly will notice that the report now before it, together with the speech of the Rapporteur which introduced it, deals with subjects which, I submit again, with all respect, the Fifth Committee has no mandate to discuss. They are matters which only a committee of legal experts would be qualified to consider.

This report was presented to us at a late hour on Monday night and I had to content myself with a statement to the effect that my delegation would accept no responsibility for those portions of it which went beyond the range of penal administration.

I only raise the subject now in order to express the hope that, in future, some means may be found of preventing the recurrence of such a procedure. I cannot help feeling that it is contrary to the best interests of the League itself that new subjects should be introduced in this way without notice and without affording delegations any opportunity of obtaining instructions from their Governments upon them.

The President :

Translation : Mlle. Campoamor, delegate of Spain, will address the Assembly.

Mlle. Campoamor (Spain) :

Translation : I should like to begin with a reference to what has just been said by the delegate of the British Empire, though from a rather different point of view. I am really in a difficult position, as I must first say, on behalf of my delegation, that there was, at the outset, full agreement with regard to the report both in the Committee and in the Sub-Committee.

The difficulties to which the wide range covered by M. Pella's report — in so many respects a thoroughly scientific and excellent one — was likely to give rise had been foreseen, and it was with a view to taking into account the reservations of the British delegate that the fourth and fifth conclusions of the report merely asked that the observations of various organisations concerned, which are of importance from the scientific standpoint and which have been studying these questions for many years, should be forwarded to the States Members of the League.

I should like to point out, in particular, that the last two paragraphs of the report, which deal with the codification of penal law and the co-operation of States in the suppression and prevention of crime, originated in a proposal submitted to the League in 1924 for the co-operation of the States in combating crimes at ordinary law.

All the other suggestions and enquiries subsequently undertaken by the various organisations are taken from the report just submitted to you, and, in 1930, on the occasion of the International Lawyers' Congress, a proposal relating to the possibility of suppressing international offences was also studied.

It may therefore be said that the report is simply a collection of the desiderata submitted by the various scientific organisations to the League.

The gradual unification of penal law ought of course to be studied by a committee of experts, but it should be confined to the factors constituting the solidarity of peoples personified by the League, and should take into account the elements of the offence — that is to say, the special factors of climate and of race which vary so greatly in each country, as well as the general biological and social elements which are the same everywhere.

International offences are becoming more frequent every year, and those who commit them constitute a sort of criminal State, against whom various international organisations have had to contemplate bringing to bear what Garufalo calls the solidarity of the nations in the campaign against crime.

I do not think it expedient or advisable to consider or examine these important, complex, and far-reaching questions, and will confine myself, on behalf of my delegation, to supporting points 4 and 5 of the conclusions of the report. At the same time, I should like to allay the fears expressed by the British delegate, who has thought fit to make a reservation. This reservation may be considered redundant, since the two points of the conclusions I have just mentioned merely deal with the transmission of the Report and Minutes of the Fifth Committee to the seven international organisations enumerated.

In point 5 of the draft resolution, it is stated that, after having received the observations of these organisations, the Members of the League of Nations, to which they will be referred, will be asked whether they wish the League also to study the questions referred to in No. 4.

I must say that our work on the Sub-Committee was considerably facilitated by the sympathetic attitude of the British delegate. We were thus enabled to arrive at the present result, which takes into account both the aspirations voiced by the Rapporteur and the very just and legitimate reservations of the British delegation.

In conclusion, I beg to support the report, and I would ask the British delegate to recognise that we are all in agreement here, as we were in the Sub-Committee, since we are adopting a procedure which in no way affects the ideals of the various countries with regard to the suppression of international offences.

The President :

Translation : M. Alâ, delegate of Persia, Chairman of the Fifth Committee, will address the Assembly.

M. Alâ (Persia), Chairman of the Fifth Committee:

Translation : I should like to say that this draft resolution is the outcome of a compromise unanimously accepted by the Sub-Committee and the Fifth Committee, and that it covers the three points mentioned in the report.

The President :

Translation : As no one else has asked to speak, I shall regard the report of the Fifth Committee and the accompanying draft resolution as adopted.

The draft resolution was adopted.

55. — TRAFFIC IN OPIUM AND OTHER DANGEROUS DRUGS : REPORT OF THE FIFTH COMMITTEE : RESOLUTIONS.

The President :

Translation : The next item on the agenda is the discussion of the report of the Fifth Committee on the question of the traffic in opium and other dangerous drugs (Annex 4, document A.65.1931.V).

(On the invitation of the President, M. Sawada, Rapporteur, took his place on the platform.)

The President :

Translation : M. Sawada, Rapporteur, will address the Assembly.

M. Sawada (Japan), Rapporteur : It is with great pleasure that I present to this Assembly the report of the Fifth Committee on the activities of the League during the last twelve months in regard to the opium question. In laying the report before you, I wish to invite your special attention to the more important questions which engaged the consideration of the Fifth Committee.

In the first place, the most outstanding event during the period under review was the convocation by the League of a Conference for Limiting the Manufacture and Regulating the Distribution of Narcotic Drugs and the conclusion of a Convention for that purpose. By virtue of this Convention, the League is in possession of an effective instrument for combating the evils due to the abuses of drugs. The underlying idea of this Convention is to subordinate the economic aspects of the manufacture to higher humanitarian and moral aims. Thanks to the system established by this Convention and also by the Geneva Convention of 1925, already in force, there will be at the League a sort of central counting-house for the world traffic in drugs. By this system, each Government is called upon to account for any discrepancy which may exist between its imports and exports, even to a small quantity of several kilogrammes.

Among the other important features of this Convention, I may say that this instrument covers a far larger number of drugs than are covered by the preceding conventions. Provision is made for a complete system of estimates and their supervisory organs, and the new Convention will strengthen the powers of various League organisations, especially the Advisory Committee and the Permanent Central Opium Board.

It is a cause of satisfaction to note that out of fifty-seven countries which participated in this memorable Conference, thirty-six have already signed the Convention. December 31st next is the last date set for signing it. It is my sincere hope that many more States will sign the Convention and join in this great crusade for combating one of the most dangerous social evils of modern times.

In this connection, I have great pleasure in informing you that the number of countries which have ratified or acceded to the Geneva Convention of 1925 now amounts to forty-seven. This Convention heads the list of all the League Conventions as regards the number of ratifications received.

Among the questions discussed, the Fifth Committee took the view that the limitation of the manufacture of drugs is a first step towards a subsequent limitation of the production of raw materials, and therefore welcomed a resolution proposed by the delegate of Panama. This resolution asks that all material which may serve as a basis for discussion at a Conference for the limitation of production should be collected. After discussion, the Committee adopted unanimously the following resolution:

The Assembly,

Taking note of the wish of certain Governments that a conference should meet in the near future to consider the possibility of limiting and controlling the cultivation of the opium-poppy and the cultivation and harvesting of the coca-leaf; and

Taking note also of the decision reached by the Council at its sixty-second session, in January 1931, to ask the Advisory Committee on the Traffic in Opium and Other Dangerous Drugs to consider the possibility of summoning a conference of the Governments concerned and to report to the Council on the subject:

Asks the Advisory Committee on the Traffic in Opium and Other Dangerous Drugs and the competent Sections of the Secretariat of the League of Nations to undertake, as soon as possible, the collection of all material that may serve as a basis for the discussions of a Conference on the Limitation of the Production of Opium and the cultivation and harvesting of the coca-leaf, and for that purpose to send a questionnaire to the Governments Members and non-members of the League.

Another resolution of considerable importance was also adopted at the suggestion of the Polish delegate, which was to the effect that the Secretariat should collect and analyse all legislation relating to narcotics. The terms of this resolution are as follows:

The Assembly,

Recalling the recommendation adopted by the tenth Assembly instructing the Secretariat to draw up a list of the laws and regulations at present in force in the different countries on the traffic in opium and other dangerous drugs with a view to the preparation of a compilation or analysis of this legislation;

Observing that the performance of this task has had to be delayed owing to the necessity of preparing for the work of the Conference on Limitation:

Expresses the wish that the Secretariat, within the limits of the funds at its disposal, should undertake the preparation of this compilation of laws with a view to publishing it as soon as possible after the entry into force of the Convention for limiting the manufacture and regulating the distribution of narcotics, and that this compilation should embrace all laws or regulations concerning the supervision of the manufacture of and trade in narcotics and the measures taken to combat the drug habit.

The Committee has taken note with satisfaction of the declaration made by the various delegations as to the measures adopted by their Governments in controlling the traffic in narcotics with a greater efficiency, and I should like to draw your particular attention to the part of my report which gives a detailed account of these declarations.

In presenting my report to the Assembly, I should fail in my duty if I ended without expressing the hope that the Conference which is to meet at Bangkok, Siam, on November 9th of this year, at the invitation of the Siamese Government, will make a further important advance in the campaign against the abuse of opium.

With these remarks, I propose the following draft resolution:

The Assembly adopts the report of the Fifth Committee and the resolutions contained therein.

The President:

Translation: As no one else has asked to speak, I shall consider the report of the Fifth Committee and the accompanying resolutions adopted.

The draft resolutions were adopted.

56. — CHILD WELFARE: REPORT OF THE FIFTH COMMITTEE: RESOLUTIONS.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the examination of the report of the Fifth Committee on child welfare (Annex 5, document A.71.1931.IV).

(On the invitation of the President, Countess Apponyi, Rapporteur, took her place on the platform.)

The President:

Translation: Countess Apponyi, Rapporteur, will address the Assembly.

Countess Apponyi (Hungary), Rapporteur:

Translation: I do not propose to read the report on Child Welfare, which has already been distributed. I simply wish to direct your attention to the points which I consider most important — namely, the questions of assistance to foreign minors and the execution of maintenance orders for children abroad, which exceed the limits of the competence of the Child Welfare Committee. As these questions concern, not only children, but adults, the Council decided, at its meeting on May 20th last, to set up a temporary special Committee to investigate them. At its meeting on September 4th, it named twelve countries the Governments of which would be invited to nominate experts to form this special Committee. It took into consideration the interest manifested at previous international conferences by certain countries in questions relating to assistance, and also the desirability of having emigrant and immigrant countries represented.

The Council also fixed the first session of this special Committee for October 1932, unless circumstances should call for any change.

On the proposal of the delegate of the British Empire, the Fifth Committee unanimously decided, in view of the special importance, during the present crisis, of the treatment and prevention of juvenile delinquency, to request the Assembly to make an urgent recommendation to the delegates of the countries which have not yet established special juvenile courts to press for this reform, and for the association of women therewith to the fullest extent authorised by the national legislation.

The Fifth Committee recommends that the Assembly should inform the Child Welfare Committee of the great importance it attached to the improvement of the position of illegitimate children, requesting it at the same time to maintain on its programme, among other questions, the examination of the best means of facilitating the marriage of parents with a view to legitimising the children.

I should like to emphasise once more the need for a solution, even if only temporary, of the question of assistance to foreign minors, for to a great extent the future fate of all mankind depends on the conditions which govern the children's existence and the spirit which governs their education.

The Fifth Committee therefore submits to the Assembly the following draft resolutions:

I. The Assembly,

In view of the special importance during the present crisis of the treatment and prevention of juvenile delinquency:

Decides to make an urgent recommendation to the delegates of the countries which have not yet established special juvenile courts to press for this reform, and for the association of women therewith to the fullest extent authorised by the national legislation.

II. The Assembly takes note of the Child Welfare Committee's report on the work of its seventh session, recommends that the Committee continue its work in conformity with the suggestions and decisions contained in that report, and expresses its satisfaction with the work done.

The President:

Translation: As no other delegate has asked to speak, I shall consider the report and the accompanying draft resolutions adopted.

The draft resolutions were adopted.

57. — TRAFFIC IN WOMEN AND CHILDREN: REPORT OF THE FIFTH COMMITTEE RESOLUTION.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the discussion of the report of the Fifth Committee on the question of the traffic in women and children (Annex 6, document A.72.1931.IV).

(On the invitation of the President, Mrs. Plumptre, delegate of Canada, took her place on the platform.)

The President:

Translation: Mrs. Plumptre, Rapporteur, will address the Assembly.

Mrs. Plumptre (Canada), Rapporteur:

The report of the Fifth Committee on the traffic in women and children is now in the hands of the delegates. I shall, therefore, only call attention to two or three salient points.

The report shows how actively the Traffic in Women and Children Committee is carrying on its work, with the able co-operation of the Secretariat of the League.

The Fifth Committee concurs, although with regret, in the decision that financial conditions do not permit of the printing of the Digest of Laws relating to this traffic which has been prepared by the Secretariat. It respectfully urges, however, that the Assembly will regard this work as temporarily postponed and not as completely abandoned.

It is very encouraging to note recent accessions to the 1921 Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Women, but we must regret that there are still twelve States Members of the League which have not acceded and five others which have not ratified their signatures. The abstention of Members constitutes a very serious weakness in the work of the League, for the traffic in women is organised internationally and will only be suppressed by equally well-organised international action.

During the past year, the Traffic in Women and Children Committee has devoted particular attention to the activities of the souteneur, and the report before you contains a resolution suggesting a study of the effect of penalties inflicted upon these human parasites, who are mostly quite young men, living upon the proceeds of the degradation of others.

Women police have proved themselves so successful in combating the activities of the agents of this traffic that the Fifth Committee requests the Assembly to bring this matter particularly to the attention of those States Members of the League which do not already employ women in their police service.

The circulation of obscene publications, with which we would include obscene films, has a direct importance on the traffic in women and children. Obscene postcards are frequently used as the first means of approach to children and young people, and as these and other similar publications emanate mainly from a few centres and are distributed to all parts of the world, it is obvious that international action is required to secure their suppression.

The work upon which the Fifth Committee has reported clearly demonstrates the importance of a central body, like the League, whose humanitarian operations are not confined within national barriers. The traffic in women and children is only one manifestation of a worldwide network of underground, criminal activities in which are interwoven the illicit traffic in habit-forming drugs, the circulation of obscene publications of all kinds, the issuing of counterfeit money and varied forms of smuggling. In all these activities the risks are great, but the potential gains are greater in the eyes of the dangerous criminals who are engaged in them. To make the risks greater than the rewards requires the united efforts of the legislative, judicial and police forces of the world, supported by an informed and intelligent public opinion; and the fact that certain Members of the League have not accepted the Convention seriously weakens the international offensive against these criminals.

In the discussions of the Fifth Committee, it was emphasised that the need for complete international co-operation in the fight against these evils — and especially the traffic in women and children — is particularly urgent at this time, when economic depression and widespread unemployment are forcing many to seek new methods of earning money. Money is scarce: everyone has to work harder than usual to earn it; and, therefore, among others, the agents of this traffic will be particularly active and persistent. On the other hand, unemployment, with consequent suffering from cold and hunger, may predispose many women and girls to consider ways of earning money and to listen to proposals which, in easier times, would be utterly repulsive to them.

We would, therefore, through this Assembly, respectfully urge all States Members of the League which have not already done so to accede to the various Conventions of the League; and, by implementing to the full the responsibilities which all signatories have undertaken, to do their share in safeguarding those who, hard pressed by poverty and discouragement, are in peculiar need of friendship and protection.

On behalf of the Fifth Committee, I have now the honour to present to the Assembly the report and draft resolution embodying the recommendations of the Committee. The draft resolution reads as follows:

The Assembly,

1. Having taken note of the report of the Traffic in Women and Children Committee, welcomes the new accessions to the 1921 Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Women and Children, and expresses the hope that further ratifications will be registered in 1932:

2. Considers that the studies already made on the part played by souteneurs in this traffic show the need for further consideration of this subject;

3. Recommends that the Traffic in Women and Children Committee should consider the possibility of ascertaining, with special reference to the recurrent conviction of habitual offenders, the results of the penalties inflicted on souteneurs, as defined in Article 1 of the Additional Draft Protocol of the International Convention of 1921 for the Suppression of Traffic in Women and Children;

4. Commends to the attention of the Members of the League the draft protocol (document C.267.M.122.1931.IV, page 9) supplementing the 1921 Convention, submitted for their observations;

5. Thanks the Traffic in Women and Children Committee for its work and invites it to continue its efforts to suppress this infamous trade, especially at this time, when unemployment and economic distress afford special opportunities for the activities of its agents.

The President:

Translation: If no one desires to speak, I shall consider the report of the Fifth Committee and the accompanying draft resolution adopted.

The draft resolution was adopted.

58. — PROTECTION OF MINORITIES: REPORT OF THE SIXTH COMMITTEE.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the discussion of the report of the Sixth Committee on the protection of minorities (Annex 7, document A.67.1931.I).

(On the invitation of the President, M. Motta, Chairman of the Sixth Committee, and Baron Yrjö-Koskinen, Rapporteur, took their places on the platform.)

The President:

Translation: Baron Yrjö-Koskinen will address the Assembly.

Baron Yrjö-Koskinen (Finland), Rapporteur:

Translation: I have the honour to present to the Assembly the report unanimously adopted by the Sixth Committee on the protection of minorities.

The President:

Translation: As the Assembly will have noted, this report is simply an account of the discussions in the Sixth Committee.

If no one wishes to speak I shall consider the Sixth Committee's report adopted.

The report of the Sixth Committee was adopted.

59. — MANDATES: REPORT OF THE SIXTH COMMITTEE: RESOLUTION.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the report of the Sixth Committee on the question of mandates (Annex 8, document A.68.1931.VI).

(On the invitation of the President, Dr. Lange, Rapporteur, took his place on the platform.)

The President:

Translation: Dr. Lange, Rapporteur, will address the Assembly.

Dr. Lange (Norway) Rapporteur:

Translation: The work in connection with mandates forms one of the most important tasks entrusted to the League. It is very natural, therefore, that every year the Assembly should deal with this question which, as you know, is particularly entrusted to the Council under the terms of the Covenant.

The work relating to mandates consists in supervising the administration of the mandated territories on behalf of the international community, and noting how far and by what means the mandatory Powers are performing the task entrusted to them of helping those countries, which might be described as minors, and educating them in preparation for independence.

The purpose, as it were, of the institution of mandates is the eventual acquisition of independence, and this year the problem has arisen of determining under what conditions a country should be recognised as having reached a stage in its development at which it can cease to be a mandated territory and acquire independence.

The Permanent Mandates Commission studied this question with great thoroughness, and the Council and Sixth Committee have both expressed their great appreciation of its work. The Rapporteur to the Council declared that, in the conditions defined by the Mandates Commission, the Council now possesses a criterion for determining, in individual cases, whether a country is ready to pass from the status of a mandated territory to that of independence.

I shall not go into details as regards either the criterion or the report, but I feel it my duty to point out to the Assembly the importance of this fact. It may be said that, in this connection, the year 1931 will rank as an important date in the history of the League.

I shall confine myself, then, to submitting the draft resolution which the Sixth Committee has instructed me to present to you, and which reads as follows:

The Assembly,

Having taken note of the work accomplished by the mandatory Powers, the Permanent Mandates Commission and the Council in regard to the execution of Article 22 of the Covenant:

(a) Renews the expression of confidence in them voted by the past sessions of the Assembly and again congratulates them on what has been achieved through co-operation between them;

(b) Expresses its gratification at the constructive and particularly useful work which the Council has just performed with the help of the Permanent Mandates Commission in determining the criterion to be applied when it is proposed to bring to an end the mandate regime in respect of a country placed under that regime;

(c) Specially notes in the Council's resolution on this question the importance attached to the maintenance of the principle of economic equality and to guarantees for the effective protection of racial, linguistic and religious minorities.

(d) Expresses the hope, as in previous years, that through the prosecution of the joint efforts of the mandatory Powers, the Council and the Permanent Mandates Commission, the mandatory system may continue to ensure the achievement of the ideal of civilisation proclaimed in Article 22 of the Covenant.

The President:

Translation: If no one desires to speak, I shall consider the report of the Sixth Committee and the draft resolution adopted.

The draft resolution was adopted.

The Assembly rose at 12.45 p.m.

60. — WORK OF THE COMMISSION OF ENQUIRY FOR EUROPEAN UNION: RESOLUTIONS PROPOSED BY THE SIXTH COMMITTEE.

The President:

Translation: The first item on the agenda is the discussion of the resolutions proposed by the Sixth Committee on the Work of the Commission of Enquiry for European Union (document A.66. 1931.VII).

(On the invitation of the President, M. Motta, Chairman and Rapporteur of the Sixth Committee, took his place on the platform.)

The President:

Translation: M. Motta, Rapporteur, will address the Assembly.

M. Motta (Switzerland), Rapporteur:

Translation: You have before you the draft resolutions proposed by the Sixth Committee concerning the work of the Commission of Enquiry for European Union. I wish merely to explain in a few words the meaning and scope of those resolutions.

I may mention first of all that the reports submitted to the Assembly by the Commission of Enquiry for European Union were examined by two Committees, the Second and the Sixth. The Second Committee had to examine the technical side of the work of the Commission. This examination has been completed and the results will be found in the reports which the Second Committee will submit to the Assembly on the economic and financial work done during the past year.

The Sixth Committee had only to examine the question of the constitution and organisation of the European Commission and its methods of work; in particular it had to decide as to the advisability of continuing the Commission's work during the year about to begin.

All the delegations without exception agreed that the results obtained were satisfactory and that consequently the work of the Commission for European Union must be perseveringly continued.

The delegations also agreed unanimously that the criteria laid down by the Commission for European Union as regards its constitution and organisation were in complete accordance with the letter and spirit of the resolution adopted by the Assembly on September 17th, 1930.

These criteria may be summarised as follows: The European Commission is a commission of enquiry of the League of Nations. It will submit its reports to the Assembly every year. The Commission has as its Secretary the Secretary-General of the League. It can have recourse to the technical organs of the League. The extra-European States Members of the League have the right, if they think necessary, to take part in the meetings in order to submit their observations. The European Commission can further establish liaison — and has done so — with the Governments of States which are not Members of the League.

If I were to define the nature and essence of the European Commission, I should say that it was an organ of the League of Nations, conceived in the spirit of the Covenant and seeking to draw closer bonds of solidarity between the European States, while bearing in mind that even problems which are apparently European are frequently connected with others of interest to non-European States.

The Sixth Committee recommends that the European Commission should have recourse, whenever possible, to the technical organs of the League. It requests it, and even recommends it, to refer directly to the League any problems which it might have examined, but which ought to be examined on a more elaborate scale than that involved by the continent of Europe alone — on a world scale, in fact.

We were anxious to consult the Second Committee as to whether the technical organs of the League were equal to meeting, with the necessary rapidity and elasticity, any demands which the European Commission might make upon them.

The reply we obtained from the Second Committee was entirely satisfactory. The general rule then is as follows: The European Commission must have recourse, for its technical work, to the technical organs of the League; but there are exceptions to every rule, and it may happen that, in particular cases, the European Commission may usefully set up special committees outside the technical organs of the League.

As this is a question of some importance, I should like to read you a passage from a letter which the Chairman of the Second Committee sent to the Sixth Committee and which bears upon the very points I have just mentioned. This passage is as follows:

> "After having obtained information as to the organisation and methods of work of these permanent organs, the Second Committee considered that, as a general rule, and apart from certain special cases which may arise, these organs seem to be in a position to afford the Commission of Enquiry for European Union such co-operation as it may have to ask of them.
> "The budget of the Financial Section and the Economic Intelligence Service for the year 1932 does not, however, provide for any meeting in addition to the three regular sessions of the Financial Committee and the three meetings of special committees which the normal work of the Financial Committee will probably render necessary.
> "The scheme for an International Agricultural Mortgage Credit Company prepared by the Commission of Enquiry for European Union has involved, in respect of preparatory work during the present year, an expenditure of 27,981 Swiss francs for meetings and 8,820 Swiss francs for costs of printing. The Financial and Economic Intelligence Section will not be in a position to meet calls involving similar expenditure during 1932."

You have seen from the second resolution submitted to you that the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics has asked the European Commission to examine and, if possible, draw up a Pact of Economic Non-Aggression, and you will at once realise that the question oversteps the frontiers of the European continent. This, then, is one of the questions which should, according to the general rule, be treated by the League itself and by its technical organs. Nevertheless, for special reasons, which all the delegates have finally accepted, the Sixth Committee is of opinion that the question of the Pact of Economic Non-Aggression must be considered, examined and dealt with by a special committee which the European Commission has decided to appoint, subject to the approval of the Assembly.

It should therefore be understood, if you accept the Sixth Committee's proposals, that the Assembly will be, as it were, ratifying the institution, by way of an exception, of this special committee for this purpose.

Since, however, this subject is of a worldwide character, you should ask the Commission of Enquiry for European Union to invite some non-European States to take part in the work of the special committee, and, in accordance with the opinion of the Second Committee, reinforced by the discussions of the Sixth Committee, we propose that you should decide that the special committee of the Commission of Enquiry for European Union should be extended to include the following States: Australia, Canada, Chile, China, India, Japan and Uruguay.

I have now only to express the sincere and ardent hope that the institution of the Commission of Enquiry for European Union may prove more and more beneficial to Europe and to the other parts of the world.

Undoubtedly Europe, more than any other continent, is about to undergo profound modifications in its economic and social structure. It would be too much to speak of it as a "revolution"; I will call it a progressive, but rapid, evolution.

The fact that the Commission of Enquiry for European Union may be summoned without delay when occasion so demands and that it can thus establish useful contact between the Governments, if serious and urgent circumstances arise, seems to me to have a symbolic as well as a real value. It bears witness to the determination of the European Governments to co-operate as closely as possible and to hold the helm fast in the hour of grave responsibility.

I therefore submit to the Assembly the following draft resolutions:

1. The Assembly notes with satisfaction the results of the work done by the Commission of Enquiry for European Union;

It approves the report of the Commission of Enquiry regarding its constitution, organisation and methods of work;

It requests the Commission to pursue the work undertaken in conformity with the principles laid down in the resolution of September 17th, 1930;

It recommends it to have recourse whenever possible to the technical organs of the League of Nations and to refer to the League the settlement of any problems which it thinks capable of solution on a world scale;

It requests the Commission to submit a report on its further work to the next session of the Assembly.

2. The Assembly approves the proposal of the Commission of Enquiry for European Union that it should itself set up a special committee to study a Pact of Economic Non-Aggression.

The Assembly decides that the following States shall be invited to take part in the work of this special committee on an equal footing with the members which the Commission of Enquiry may appoint:

Australia,	India,
Canada,	Japan,
Chile,	Uruguay.
China,

The Council is requested to invite the Government of the United States of America also to send a representative to the special committee if that Government considers it desirable.

The President:

Translation: The first speaker on the list, M. Flandin, delegate of France, will address the Assembly.

M. Flandin (France):

Translation: I have only a few short remarks to add to M. Motta's verbal statement, to which we have all listened with great interest. I simply wish to make three observations: first, it was never the intention of those who initiated the movement that was to lead to the constitution of the Commission of Enquiry for European Union to form a rigid organisation from which the extra-European States should be systematically excluded. On the contrary, we were glad to think that this Commission, while naturally concerned primarily with European problems, would deal with their international and even inter-continental aspects as a matter of course, and that the extra-European countries would thus have an opportunity of usefully assisting in the Commission's work. There is no inconsistency from this point of view between the work of the Commission of Enquiry and the intervention of extra-European States. This I would make a point of reiterating, that there may be no arrière-pensée or ambiguity in the matter.

Secondly, I should like to point out that the Commission of Enquiry was never intended by its founders to pass over the eminent services which the technical organs of the League are in a position to render. Indeed, it was provided from the outset that recourse should be had to these technical organs, whenever this could usefully be done. There is thus no competition — nor can there be any — between the work of the Commission of Enquiry and the regular work of the League technical organs, which is as a rule attended by conspicuously successful results.

There is nothing, then, in the recommendation to prevent the technical organs of the League from being utilised for the special objects of the Commission of Enquiry, and the resolution submitted to you is entirely satisfactory from that standpoint. It affords us every satisfaction, since, as M. Motta has said, recourse to the technical organs of the League, which should be as wide as possible, does not exclude the carrying out of special enquiries by the Commission of Enquiry or its committees, should this be found necessary, even without the assistance of those technical organs.

This procedure may be expedient and even necessary. The technical organs of the League generally hold their sessions at fairly long, though regular, intervals. Nevertheless, in certain cases of emergency—and no one will deny that, at the present time, urgent cases may arise — it may become necessary rapidly to summon special committees. We should, I think, congratulate ourselves that such committees have functioned — especially during the past year — for they have very rapidly arrived at practical conclusions to which effect should be given without delay, and this might not have been the case if we had had to set in motion more cumbrous machinery for the examination of the proposals before the Commission of Enquiry.

Before concluding, I desire to emphasise once more how very opportune the establishment of the Commission of Enquiry has proved in the present circumstances of worldwide depression. Its work is directed towards one object: the finding of a common policy and the discovery of means to remedy by joint effort a situation that might become really serious.

The Commission of Enquiry is, I venture to say, an integral, living and active part of the League, and I should like to take this opportunity of associating myself with M. Motta's tribute to the Commission, and of offering it a cordial welcome and every encouragement to continue, in the future as in the past, its useful work.

The President:

Translation: Mr. Collins, first delegate of Australia, will address the Assembly.

Mr. Collins (Australia): The resolutions submitted by the Sixth Committee on the work of the Commission of Enquiry for European Union indicate that a special committee is to be set up to study a proposal for a Pact of Economic Non-Aggression, and that it is intended to invite Australia, among other States, to take part in this work.

While I desire to express the thanks of my Government for the invitation to Australia to be represented on this projected committee, I should like to point out that I have not had an opportunity of consulting my Government on the subject, and am therefore unable to say definitely whether Australia will be able to participate in the work contemplated — work which seems to apply primarily to Europe only.

I am glad to learn from another document not under discussion at the moment (document A.75. 1931.II.B.) that, in connection with economic rapprochement, the Second Committee expressed its views in the following terms :

> " The Committee is naturally bound to consider the effects such efforts might have on relations between the European countries and countries in other parts of the world. "

The Second Committee further stated that it was glad to know that the proposals in this connection had been surrounded with guarantees for the purpose of safeguarding the interests of other countries. This, I think, is all-important. It is the predominant note in the constitution of the League ; that is, its universality, and, in deciding whether acceptance of a seat on the proposed special committee is possible, Australia will certainly be guided by the important pronouncement of the Second Committee with regard to guarantees to which I have referred.

The President :

Translation : As no one else has asked to speak, I shall consider the resolutions of the Sixth Committee adopted.

The draft resolutions were adopted.

61. — WORK OF THE INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE ON INTELLECTUAL CO-OPERATION : REPORT OF THE SIXTH COMMITTEE : RESOLUTION.

The President :

Translation : The next item on the agenda is the discussion of the report of the Sixth Committee on the work of the International Committee on Intellectual Co-operation (Annex 9, document A.69.1931.XII).

(On the invitation of the President, M. Motta, Chairman of the Sixth Committee, and M. Sato, Rapporteur, took their places on the platform.)

The President :

Translation : M. Sato will address the Assembly.

M. Sato (Japan), Rapporteur :

Translation : As my report has been distributed in French and English to all the members of the Assembly, I shall simply add a few words to supplement what is said in it. What I should like to make clear — very briefly — is the significance of the discussions in the Sixth Committee on questions of intellectual co-operation. Those discussions revealed the profound and universal interest that is taken in the work of intellectual co-operation and the variety of problems it covers. Three meetings were devoted to the examination of the questions referred to the Committee, and the representatives of nineteen delegations spoke. Professor de Reynold, Rapporteur of the Committee on Intellectual Co-operation, and M. Bonnet, Director of the International Institute of Intellectual Co-operation, gave the Committee useful and interesting explanations. The unanimous impression was that, in this field, the League had made progress, that it was boldly attacking living problems, and that it was now in a position to facilitate intellectual relations, the exchange of ideas and collaboration in education between our various countries, and thus help them to get to know and understand one another better.

It was long thought that, in intellectual matters, individualism held the field. Indeed, under the pressure of urgent problems, there was perhaps a tendency to think that men engaged in research and scientific work could not directly co-operate with statesmen and men of action, and it seemed as if the two categories would have to work in different directions. It seemed as though the League, which was endeavouring in the political field and in the various technical matters to establish fresh contacts, and fresh means of mutual assistance and co-operation, would be powerless to render similar services to the intellectual world.

These doubts, I hope, are now dispelled. True, the work undertaken is still in its initial stages, but we are already in a position to submit to the Assembly definite achievements and a programme of action. As you will see from the report approved by the Sixth Committee, the same methods of joint work, liaison and recourse to competent authorities which made it possible for the League's technical work to develop, are being applied by the Organisation for Intellectual Co-operation. Thus, eminent representatives of our various civilisations and cultures can now work together in the interests of common progress.

The work of intellectual co-operation becomes the nucleus of a great undertaking, in which, not only the Ministries of Education and Fine Arts and the national official institutions are collaborating, but also the big private organisations interested in questions of culture and education. This institution is proving its usefulness as a means of co-ordinating these activities and avoiding waste of time and useless dispersion of effort. The League is now assisting those engaged in science and research and is giving them, by its pacific efforts and its example of collaboration, an opportunity of pursuing their eminently useful activities, which are themselves an earnest of worldwide peace and happiness.

I will now read the draft resolutions submitted by the Sixth Committee :

The Assembly :

Having noted the reports of the International Committee on Intellectual Co-operation and of the Governing Body of the International Institute of Intellectual Co-operation (documents A.23 and A.24.1931) ;

Noting with great satisfaction the results achieved during the year by the Intellectual Co-operation Organisation as a whole, and expressing its gratification that the reorganisation effected last year has made it possible to carry on, in the most effective way possible, the international work of liaison and co-ordination which in the intellectual sphere appears essential to the future of the League of Nations :

I.

(1) Approves the work undertaken in the different branches of intellectual activity and the programme of work drawn up for the coming year;

(2) Recognises the existence of the Intellectual Co-operation Organisation, comprising the International Committee on Intellectual Co-operation which is the advisory body of the League of Nations; the commissions and committees dependent on it; the International Institute of Intellectual Co-operation, its executive organ, and the International Educational Cinematographic Institute, these two institutes having been placed at the League's disposal under the conditions laid down in their respective statutes: and the National Committees on Intellectual Co-operation, whose representatives may be called upon to meet occasionally in conference on the proposal of the International Committee on Intellectual Co-operation;

(3) Is glad that special importance is being attached to education and that a plan has been drawn up by the International Committee on Intellectual Co-operation for promoting international co-operation in this respect and for spreading still further among the young a knowledge of the League of Nations and mutual understanding among the peoples;

(4) Expresses its satisfaction at the measures proposed to ensure regular co-operation between the official institutions dealing with the protection of intellectual rights;

(5) Has noted with satisfaction the new work undertaken to ensure an objective and disinterested study of the major international problems through the institutes engaged in the scientific study of international relations, and of the programme drawn up by the Committee of Arts and Letters for the League of Nations to assist, by arranging for regular intellectual exchanges in the international sphere, in defending the interests of culture and civilisation;

(6) Approves the steps taken by the Committee in response to the Chinese Government's request and anticipates the most happy results from this co-operation;

(7) Approves the summoning of a meeting of the National Committees on Intellectual Co-operation in 1934.

II.

(1) Draws the attention of the Members of the League of Nations to the experiments being made by a certain number of countries with regard to the use of broadcasting as a means of education;

(2) Approves the step taken by the Committee on Intellectual Co-operation in asking the Institute to undertake an enquiry, in co-operation with the other competent organisations, into the educational aspects of broadcasting. Recommends that this enquiry should cover all the international questions raised by the use of broadcasting in regard to good international relations;

(3) Asks the States Members of the League to encourage the use of broadcasting to create better mutual understanding, to secure a more thorough comprehension of the international character of a large number of urgent problems, to permit of a more complete appreciation of the task of the League of Nations and of the aims which it has before it and requests the International Institute of Intellectual Co-operation to get into touch for that purpose with the principal national and international broadcasting organisations.

III.

Drawing the attention of the States Members of the League of Nations to the initiative taken by the City of Berne and the invitation addressed to them by the Federal Government to participate in the Exhibition of Popular Arts in 1934;

Having regard to the Council's resolution of September 2nd, 1927, and the Assembly's resolution of the 22nd of the same month:

Urges the Members of the League of Nations to associate themselves with this great international manifestation and to take suitable steps for this purpose.

The Assembly,

Having noted the report of the Governing Body of the International Educational Cinematographic Institute:

Expresses its gratification at the results achieved;

Is happy to note the progress of the preparatory work for the Conference for the abolition of Customs barriers for educational films;

Expresses its satisfaction at the gratifying development of the International Review of Educational Cinematography.

The President:

Translation: M. Costa du Rels, delegate of Bolivia, will address the Assembly.

M. Costa du Rels (Bolivia):

Translation: The report which has just been discussed throws into relief the multiplicity of the problems which have arisen in connection with organisation; it shows also that intellectual co-operation, however imperfectly it may be appreciated to-day in the troubled times through which we are passing, is perhaps one of the League's most important functions, constituting as it does the very mainspring of its being. I have already paid my tribute to the International Committee on Intellectual Co-operation and to the International Institute of Intellectual Co-operation, which, under the guidance of its excellent pilot, is now in full sail launched on its glorious enterprise.

If then the League, in the words of the poet, is simply a company of minds, intellectual co-operation represents the active communion of those minds. The results it has achieved — the creation of ideas, the invention of forms, and (still in the words of the poet) the interpretation of facts — must have already had a most salutary influence on the relations between the peoples. For — this may be a platitude — it is in the field of intellectual co-operation that we first see the beginnings of cordial relations, and, as time goes on, interpretation follows, mutual comprehension dawns, and, little by little, human passions are cooled and purified as it were in a lustral spring.

Thus there is prepared and consolidated that spiritual disarmament, without which the other oft-quoted material disarmament must be illusory and deceptive. All panaceas — security, disarmament and arbitration, in whatever order they are placed, according to the point of view — would be ineffective unless preceded by the spiritual preparation of mutual confidence.

That is the essential word: confidence — confidence between nations and between individuals — confidence, the new philosopher's stone. But, in the meantime, what are those people doing who, for twelve years, have been busy working out theories and recommending infallible remedies? Their voices have not held the masses; nor have figures made any impression. Technical — that is, artificial — means will not secure the happiness of the peoples.

When these modern day-dreamers see their theories collapsing — when, for instance, they witness that strange phenomenon, the evaporation of monetary tokens — these modern workers of miracles cry in all good faith: "We can do nothing: the cause is psychological".

Thus it is that intellectuals are called upon to help them out of their difficulty and to drown with their voices the noise of that super-machinery which claimed to rationalise the brain of man, but has simply destroyed his faith and broken his courage. Upon them devolves the task of preaching the return to the simple life and repeating the words of the Bible: "Drink ye every one the waters of his own cistern".

If that old truth is to be restated and understood anew, we must have brotherliness among the peoples. Humanity is the source to which we must look for the ideal of right — not merely the notion of right, which is quite a different thing. It is the humanist — and by humanist, I mean the complete intellectual — that is called upon to propagate this truth.

If the nations have lost the power to love one another, at least they still have sufficient curiosity to want to know one another.

That curiosity is a step towards confidence in space and time, which raises history to a higher cultural level. The intellectual is, admittedly, in some sort superior to the politician, dogged as the latter is by demagogues. Thanks to his independence, his intelligence and sensibility, he is better able to anticipate the aspirations of the nations and to make them articulate; he is better able to analyse the essential elements of happiness which the nations are pursuing.

It may be objected that the intellectual lives in a world remote from realities. This may be so, but he is a part of reality as we know it. Meridians and parallels are imaginary geographical lines, but they serve, none the less, to determine real positions in space; and, when all is said and done, is it not the intellectual's duty to trace out lines and indicate the general procedure to be applied in determining situations of fact? That is the tremendous rôle of thought which so-called men of action still persistently refuse to recognise.

Here I may perhaps be allowed to indulge in a personal reminiscence. I still seem to see, during the unforgettable meetings of the Permanent Committee on Arts and Letters, Paul Valéry and Thomas Mann sitting opposite one another, only separated from one another by the width of a table, gazing at one another — their faces suddenly transfigured by a common thought. We all understood, and that was a wonderful moment — I appeal to my learned friend and colleague, Mlle. Vacaresco, to bear witness to the effect produced by that moving though silent meeting at Geneva between two men who exercise over the élite of their countries an influence which many statesmen would envy them. Believe me, the cause of peace made more progress during that minute than during the long technical discussions in the course of which national prejudicies so often clash and offend one another.

Was I right in maintaining that intellectual co-operation is the very mainspring of the League?

The preponderating rôle played by the intellectual in the fundamental evolution of which we already see a few premonitory signs obviously entails responsibilities. But let us not lose heart: the term intellectual spells culture, and culture means creation, progress, perfection, purification, of the instincts and, above all, a refinement of the tastes. There are the guarantees!

Thus persuaded, borne onwards by that living community of minds which we call intellectual co-operation; thinkers, writers, savants and artists, bring from the four corners of the world the humble contributions of their individual genius. There is no thought in their minds of individual triumph. Men efface themselves before the beauty of an idea. The ideal alone remains. The most illustrious man is only an instrument like the rest. Famous to-day, lionised to-morrow, perhaps unknown the day after, he will, like the obscure artisan of former times, have helped to confer on the League the glorious anonymity whose imprint cathedrals bear. Believe me, that will be one of the greatest victories — the victory of the mind — ever recorded in the annals of mankind.

The President:

Translation: Mlle. Vacaresco, delegate of Roumania, will address the Assembly.

Mlle. Vacaresco (Roumania):

Translation: After the excellent and very full report of M. Sato and the admirable speeches made before the Sixth Committee and in the Assembly, it would almost seem that there was nothing left for me to say to you on the subject of the Committee on Intellectual Co-operation. Yet I feel I should address you as the mouthpiece of the Permanent Committee of Arts and Letters, which held its first session last July. The finest and most eminent minds of our time take part in the work of that Committee. They bear illustrious names, and I venture to mention their work in the presence of the men who compose this Assembly, the men who have most at heart the destiny of mankind, who respond most readily to ideas and movements making for the progress of mankind's happiness.

In the choice of the subject-matter of my speech, I have been guided by a personal consideration. It is already three years since from this platform I added to your already serious problems a philosophic problem, and to your arduous and arid tasks "the destiny of man", an expression which I must ask you to believe does not conceal any reference to finance or Customs; for even granted a perfect Customs system or the abolition of Customs altogether, and the complete fulfilment of all our concrete desires, the destiny of man would none the less be in danger, would none the less present mystery to be solved. For man, even amid the happy conditions which I shall depict, might still be at a loss in the midst of his conquests, bewildered, uncertain which way to turn. It is that man, the man of the future, for whom you and I and all of us must work.

I further ventured three years ago to speak to this Assembly, which is a little uneasy but always indulgent where I am concerned, of the cinematograph and the countless crowds it attracts. Although I have a horror of dry-as-dust statistics, I venture to remind you here, before the whole world, or almost the whole world, of the 65,000 cinemas that exist, with their audiences numbering a hundred million. Is it any wonder if we are rather appalled at the possibilities latent in this art, which draws masses of spectators and shows them on the film the beauty of doing as little as possible: A workman, a lucky adventurer, marrying the girl millionaire at the shortest notice. After seeing such a spectacle a man may well ask himself what is the use of work.

Then you have heard our eloquent colleague, the British delegate, Dame Edith Lyttelton, calling the attention of the Committee to the potentialities for good or ill of wireless broadcasting. This means that we are faced with the rule of the machine. The machine has fastened upon everything — art, poetry, civilisation. Let us then keep vigilant watch on the machine, and, when thinking of the moral duty we dream of creating, the moral unity that will serve as a basis for peace, let us remember this, that unity of mind, unity of thought, unity of heart can lead only to death, the death of art. And what a prospect! The decay of popular art, its relegation to a museum together with prehistoric relics, tradition reduced to a vague, modish mannerism!

We are engaged on founding a new society; but in doing so, must we not plead guilty to thinking too little of man, without whom no society can exist?

These are the fears that beset my heart: and, remembering me as a poet, remembering my sex, you have been indulgent with me when, though conscious of my over-persistence, I have come to lay my fears before you.

The Committee on Intellectual Co-operation has founded a Permanent Committee of Arts and Letters. At the very beginning of its first report, I find, or rather my lyric muse, hesitant and quavering, has heard, a clear answer to my fears.

The Permanent Committee on Arts and Letters has only been in existence for a few months; yet it has already made a brilliant, a magnificent beginning. The report announcing its existence is signed by two Frenchmen, one a writer of verse and prose, a great leader of modern thought, the other a brillant and learned professor at the Sorbonne: I refer to M. Paul Valéry and M. Henri Focillon.

This report bears witness to the delight in synthesis, the subtle taste for analysis, which characterise the French race.

Some words of the report deserve to be quoted, — indeed the same might be said of the whole report:

> "The League of Nations implies an association of minds.
> "It ought to form a bond of union between those who enrich the life of the mind by creating ideas, inventing forms and combinations of thought, or discovering and interpreting facts.
> "Only by the spontaneous communication of mind with mind can this association find expression."

It is this communication of mind with mind that the Permanent Committee on Arts and Letters has in view. It takes many forms. The Committee realises that the creator must have mastery over the creature, thet it is time man learned to control the machine and use it for his own ends. The Committee does not reject co-operation, and has drawn up a series of questions to lay before the intelligentsia. It asks the Institute of Intellectual Co-operation to catalogue discs and films — no light task, but one which I am sure it will perform admirably under its young and able Director, M. Bonnet.

In conclusion, I will say — though you know it perhaps better than I — that to-day we are faced, not only with this financial and economic crisis, which has become a veritable nightmare, a dreadful spectre evoked by each in turn, but with a crisis of idealism. A summons to spirituality is sounding throughout the world. All of you are concerned to-day with the study of man, the desire to place him in his rightful position in the universe, to widen his realm of thought, to put him in tune with the infinite, to subdue time to eternity.

We shall be parting in a few days' time. You will each carry back to your own capital the light reflected from your thoughts. You will try to shed it abroad. Do not forget that the mask of time must be torn off and eternity revealed. If around us shadows are gathering, if confidence seems to be taking wing and faith is waning, let us remember that across the troublous seas of uncertainty, in the gathering darkness, where false gods are locked in mortal combat, the clear beams of the League of Nations are shining forth. Let us lift up our eyes to the League. Let us honour it and pass on its ideas to others.

Allow me, your poet, to address to the League that cry of unwavering hope which must find an echo in all your hearts.

The President:

Translation: M. Buero, delegate of Uruguay, will address the Assembly.

M. Buero (Uruguay):

Translation: When we consider the results obtained during the past year by the Organisation of Intellectual Co-operation and the programme it has drawn up for the coming months, we cannot but be struck by the importance of the questions with which it has dealt, both from the immediate standpoint of active and vital co-operation between the various nations and that of the future of international relations.

The first characteristic of this activity is that there now exists complete, adaptable and well-balanced machinery for intellectual co-operation, that this machinery is in motion and brings the various national cultures into contact, ensuring regular exchanges between them. All the wealth of procedure created by the League during the ten years of its existence is successfully employed in the service of intellectual co-operation. The Council has the assistance of a Committee consisting of the most representative persons in the world of art, science and letters, and this Committee is, especially since the general reorganisation carried out last year, assisted by a number of specialised Committees, which bring together highly qualified experts, and which can give the main Committee the most enlightened opinions on the various questions submitted to its competence.

Thus officially, through the central organisation for intellectual co-operation — I mean the Committee on Intellectual Co-operation and its committees of experts — we can survey the various ranks in our educational hierarchy, from the universities down to the departments for primary education, the ministries of fine arts, the big libraries, and the research institutes which deal, in a detached atmosphere of disinterested investigation, with the great international economic and political problems of the day.

In addition to this interchange of ideas which the League has instituted, between our great official institutions under the aegis of its Committee on Intellectual Co-operation and the various bodies working for it, there has grown up a close and extensive network of national organisations which pursue the high ideal of bringing together intellectuals irrespective of frontiers and ensuring a better mutual understanding between nations. I might mention, for example, the National Committees for intellectual co-operation, which are steadily increasing in number and activity, the big international associations which group together the various organisations engaged in this useful work, and all who take an interest in the education of young people, the progress of culture and the future of peace.

This brings us to a second essential feature of the work undertaken: it bears the definite imprint of universality. An increasing interest is being shown in intellectual co-operation, not only in Europe, but in Asia and in South America. In the latter continent, four National Committees have been created this year, and contacts with the Institute of Intellectual Co-operation, the League of Nations and the various countries belonging to the League have become closer and more frequent.

The programme that has been drawn up includes another feature to which I should like to call attention, for I consider it the most important of all for the future of the League and of the world. Never has so much encouragement been given within the League to everything relating to the instruction of youth. True, in each successive Assembly since 1920 we have tried to launch and encourage a universal movement for instruction in the aims and objects of the League and its ideals in order to accustom school-children to the new international methods instituted immediately after the war as a normal means of conducting world affairs.

But to-day we have become more ambitious. The International Institute of Intellectual Co-operation will this year convene a committee of experts, consisting of directors of higher education, who will deal directly with the common problems of our universities. Again, higher officials for elementary education, constituting another committee, will draw up a regular programme of co-operation in regard to elementary education.

Hardly had the schools begun to use wireless, that new means of instruction and admirable instrument of international rapprochement, than we find the Committee and the Institute taking up the question, studying it and instituting a vast enquiry. I need not point out what an asset in the future it will be for peace if there is a reasoned, judicious and properly directed control of these new resources which science has put at the disposal of educationists.

This brings me to another point. Speaking generally, all the new activities of intellectual co-operation aim at being practical, at rendering service, at fulfilling requirements. That is not the least interesting aspect of the work on foot; distant countries will be the first to appreciate it.

In the domain of art, to quote one example, the Museums Office has taken steps to encourage the creation, in our national centres of education, of pedagogical collections of engravings and casts which will enable pupils to see at a glance, under the guidance of their teachers, the evolution of art in the great epochs of civilisation. The Office also proposes, next year, to promote, especially in distant countries, the creation of new workshops for casts in which can be reproduced, under excellent conditions from an artistic standpoint and at a moderate cost, the masterpieces of sculpture in the possession of the great centres of art at Athens, Rome, Paris, London and Berlin.

I could give many other examples; they can be found in the domain of political economy, and in organised co-operation in the exact or natural sciences or in belles-lettres.

In this connection, I would direct your attention to the satisfactory agreement concluded in regard to the regular publication of the Ibero-American classics under the auspices of the Institute of Intellectual Co-operation. Two volumes, "Historiens chiliens" (selections) and "Le Diamant au Brésil", by Joachim Felicio dos Santos, have already appeared. Two other volumes, "Facundo" by Sarmiento (Argentine) and "Morceaux choisis", by J. Nabuco (Brazil), are being prepared. A list of the best works has been drawn up by a highly qualified Committee.

Everything then points to the same conclusion — that intellectual co-operation is forging between the Members of the League a new link which may one day be the strongest that unites us.

The President:

Translation: As no one else has asked to speak, I shall consider the report of the Sixth Committee and the accompanying draft resolutions adopted.

The draft resolutions were adopted.

62. — WORK OF THE ECONOMIC ORGANISATION: REPORT OF THE SECOND COMMITTEE: RESOLUTIONS.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the discussion of the report of the Second Committee on the work of economic organisation (Annex 10, document A.75.1931.II.B).

(On the invitation of the President, M. Janson, Chairman of the Second Committee, and M. Rollin, Rapporteur, took their places on the platform.)

The President:

Translation: The Rapporteur will address the Assembly.

M. Rollin (France), Rapporteur:

Translation: I have the honour to submit to the Assembly the Second Committee's report on economic questions. The text before you was accepted unanimously by all the delegations. The report was, I can assure you, discussed carefully and at length. One newspaper, referring to our proceedings, said: "There was much discussion, even on adverbs, which, in diplomacy, are very important". It added: "The impression was of a tapestry embroidered over a volcano". That was an acknowledgment of the conscientious work accomplished in an atmosphere of calm and objectivity, despite the difficulties with which we have had to contend.

Unanimity presupposes a real effort at conciliation on both sides. I was a witness of this and take this opportunity of paying a tribute to all my colleagues and of thanking them for their sympathy and valuable collaboration. Unanimity does, unhappily, owing to the mutual concessions which it demands, militate against vigour of thought and tends to restrict the meaning and scope of resolutions; but, when all is said and done, it is something to have succeeded in agreeing on a minimum of ideas and desires in regard to particularly complex and delicate questions, which give rise to so much controversy and evoke so many conflicting, though legitimate, interests.

We have heard many speakers — all, in virtue of their ability, eminently qualified to speak — and all opinions have been given an impartial hearing. Some of them, surrounded by a calm and serene philosophy, indifferent to the tribulations of the century, have pointed out how relatively ineffectual our solutions were, in relation to the present happenings. Those people still pin their faith to the free play of economic laws and advise us to allow the storm to pass, to keep a hand on the rudder and to wait until the nations have learnt by their own sufferings that sacrifices are necessary. This crude and rather depressing stoicism elicited a merry conceit from the Greek delegate, who — very aptly — quoted an argument from one of Æsop's fables: There was once a good man who lived in a period of crisis and who, though very poor, possessed a donkey, and determined — on account of the hard times — to accustom the gentle and obstinate creature not to eat. He gradually reduced its rations to almost nothing. This plan yielded most satisfactory results, until one day the poor fellow found his donkey dead. "What a pity", he cried: "my donkey has died just as he was getting used to not eating anything!"

Æsop, we all know, was a wise man, and the fable proves it. It is, unfortunately, only too true that there are limits beyond which human privations and sacrifices cannot go. The doctrine of free trade, at a time like the present, when many of its most sturdy partisans are wavering, has found eloquent defenders on our Committee.

We can hardly be surprised at this, unless we have forgotten the tremendous hopes and enthusiasm which free trade first aroused, in the middle of the last century. Cobden and Bastiat saw in it the dawn of an era of cheapness and hailed it as the herald of international peace. One of its protagonists went so far as to say: "Free trade is Christianity in action". I do not think, however, that the merchants of Manchester, any more than those of Paris or Berlin, have anything in common with Christmas angels. As a minimum statement, we can only say that events have not fully justified these prophecies.

What, then, are we to do? What solution are we to recommend? That terrible mark of interrogation reveals the painful, almost tragic, character of our position in the present circumstances as representatives of our sorely tried countries.

The peoples of the world are going through a crisis without precedent in its extent, duration and intensity, and we are all acutely conscious of that crisis. We can discern the causes of the evil and the perils which are already upon us or threaten us. All of us, with the same goodwill, sincerity and fervour, desire to remove them.

We have heard appeals addressed from the Assembly platform by the most qualified authorities, who have drawn attention to the gravity of present problems and the urgency of solving them, and we should like to be able to respond by deeds to these poignant appeals. We realise that salvation is only to be found in the union of peoples, which to-day are so closely dependent on one another that they may be compared to limbs of the same body, none of which can be sick or unhealthy without all the others being immediately affected. We should like to foster their economic relations in the ardent hope that this exchange of interest will pave the way for intellectual and moral rapprochement. But we find ourselves faced with grim barriers on which our intentions stumble, if they do not fall.

Failing a complete solution, we have to look for fragmentary and partial ones; but, when we apply them to realities, we feel they are fragile and inadequate. International solidarity calls for sacrifices, but the national communities which have to accept them are immediately filled with unrest and anxiety.

The work before us is long, but our sufferings require immediate relief, and time presses. We should like to go full speed ahead; time is a factor which it is impossible to disregard. We should like to open up ample communications between the peoples, to multiply and strengthen the bonds which unite them, and to create community of interest between them; but we are hampered at every turn by the prejudices accumulated by age-long selfishness and misunderstandings. Our great scheme of economic union requires confidence, and confidence has still to be created. Cruel is the conflict between human intentions guided by the spirit of Geneva and the brutal force of realities. We must not fear to emphasise this conflict, for the nations we represent must realise it.

Does this mean that we must give way to a gloomy fatalism and to purely negative pessimism? Can we allow it to be said that we can do nothing but bow before the storm and wait for greater sufferings to bring a useful lesson to mankind? We have no right to do so. Without illusion, but without discouragement, we must apply ourselves to bringing the national communities to an understanding of the principles laid down in the recommendations of the 1927 Economic Conference and the Conferences of 1929 and 1930, in the remarkable studies made by the economic organs of the League, and in the conclusions of the Commission of Enquiry for European Union.

We must call upon the Governments to examine with the greatest attention the resolutions adopted by the technical experts with regard to the solutions to be applied to the economic crisis.

Should we confine ourselves to these recommendations? The Second Committee does not think so, and it has reached an agreement of principle on several proposals. These — while they certainly do not provide a general and final solution for our present ills — suggest remedies which, although only partial, may none the less be genuinely effective if supported by the goodwill of the peoples.

With great penetration and wisdom, the Sub-Committee of Economic Experts recently, at the beginning of its admirable report, emphasised the primary importance of the part played by lack of confidence in aggravating the world situation. This report says:

> "The growing international distrust is accentuating the effects of the crisis, increasing the obstacles to the normal circulation of capital and obstructing to an ever-increasing extent the whole mechanism of international trade. Lack of confidence not only entails stagnation of capital, reluctance to lend abroad and refusal to enter into long-term undertakings, but also tends to paralyse and retard all forms and phases of economic life. The result is a flagging of the spirit of enterprise, the postponement of programmes already decided upon, the abandonment of the search for new markets, the limitation of the purchase of raw materials to daily requirements, the dismissal of workers, excessive caution instead of productive activity and stagnation instead of progress."

These wise words must be heard. Governments must learn the lesson they contain, must instruct their public opinion and silence the disturbing elements and the authors of hatred, fear and distrust in order that the peoples, instead of looking backwards with regret and revengeful feelings, may resolutely advance in a new spirit and with free hearts towards a true economic solidarity, the source of wellbeing and pacification.

The report now before you comprises the whole of the work accomplished with perfect consistency by the League of Nations and its research organisations and by the Commission of Enquiry for European Union, in the economic field; it includes clearly defined principles, recommendations to the Governments, concrete solutions and results already achieved which can now be definitely set down to the credit of the League.

In order to give you some idea of the scope and importance of this work, I need only enumerate the problems dealt with: Concerted economic action, the Commercial Convention of 1930, economic rapprochement, international economic agreements, agricultural questions, the organisation of trade in cereals, a preferential tariff for the purchase of cereals from Central and Eastern European States, the co-operative association of agricultural production and consumption, veterinary conventions, the International Mortgage Credit Company, unemployment — and, among the measures best calculated to mitigate it, the execution of big public works — the most-favoured-nation clause, the treatment of foreigners, unified Customs nomenclature, indirect protectionism, marks of origin, unification of laws relating to bills of exchange and cheques, national economic councils and their co-operation in the work of the League, economic tendencies liable to influence world peace, and the Pact of Economic Non-Aggression.

At the conclusion of its deliberations on all these questions, which I have, of course, been unable to do more than mention, the Second Committee adopted various draft resolutions which should lead to action and results, and which you will find embodied in the report.

No doubt these draft resolutions which are expressed in terms that some, including your Rapporteur, consider too vague, bear witness to a divergence of views and interests such as is bound to arise in an assembly of the nations, and do not afford a solution for all the evils that afflict our several countries. Nevertheless, such as they are, they show that, in spite of inevitable difficulties and apparent contradictions, the modern world is progressing towards unity and economic solidarity.

In truth, this is no more than the genesis of this new universe; we cannot really judge of the extent of the metamorphosis now proceeding, but we feel that some great thing is in process of creation. The important thing is not to allow sullied hands to destroy the seeds, but to create an atmosphere favourable to their development.

Nothing great or decisive — this cannot be too strongly emphasised — can be achieved in the economic domain if the essential psychological factor of confidence is lacking. It is essential that this truth should be brought home to all Governments, that they should teach it to their countries, that they should do everything in their power to propagate it.

At the present moment, M. Pierre Laval, the head of my Government, and M. Aristide Briand, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, are about to cross a frontier which has been the scene of so many painful conflicts. Deliberately, in spite of difficulties, resolute and sincere of heart, they are setting forth to accomplish a great act which, if the peoples were able to realise it, may form a new starting-point for the real, loyal and lasting rapprochement which is everywhere awaited as constituting one of the surest guarantees of security and peace.

I propose, therefore, on behalf of the Second Committee, the adoption of the following draft resolutions:

1. The Assembly,

Recognising that the normal exchange of commodities between the nations is seriously hampered by frequent changes in Customs tariffs and, generally, by instability in commercial policy;

Considering the statement made by the Sub-Committee of Economic Experts to the Commission of Enquiry for European Union to the effect that the increasing disparity of tariffs greatly complicates the task of maintaining stability in the monetary and credit system of the world:

Earnestly hopes that every country will try to the utmost possible extent to avoid any such change in tariff or commercial policy as would tend to suspend commercial agreements or to increase the economic disequilibrium and further disturb the general balance of payments. It also recommends that such agreements, where they do not exist, should be concluded on as liberal a basis as possible.

2. The Assembly,

Having noted the resolutions Nos. I and III to VI (document A.38.1931) adopted by the Commission of Enquiry for European Union as a consequence of the report of its Co-ordination Sub-Committee;

Being informed that the Commission of Enquiry did not feel able to put these resolutions into effect until they had been submitted to the Assembly:

Approves these resolutions and requests the Council to take the necessary action to put them into effect.

In particular, as regards the report of the Sub-Committee of Economic Experts the Assembly,

(a) Considering that closer economic co-operation is one of the essential conditions for relieving and overcoming the present economic crisis;

Considering that the report of the Sub-Committee of Economic Experts suggests methods for attaining this object;

Recognising that the seriousness of the crisis and the distress that the coming months will bring require a speedier application of all useful remedial measures:

Notes the resolution of the Commission of Enquiry for European Union inviting the European Governments to present, if possible before January 1st, 1932, their observations on the said report; it recommends the report to the attention of all the Governments;

(b) Having noted the resolution adopted by the Commission of Enquiry for European Union regarding the appointment of a special committee to study the extension of a system of special facilities to agricultural products other than cereals;

Considering that such extension would raise difficult questions of principle, in particular as regards the relations between such a system and the most-favoured-nation clause:

Deems it desirable that the findings of the special committee referred to above should be examined by the Economic Committee before being submitted to the Commission of Enquiry for European Union.

3. The Assembly,

Considering that among the means likely to contribute to better organisation of production, the World Economic Conference, and more recently the Sub-Committee of Economic Experts, have expressed the opinion that, under certain conditions and guarantees, the development of international economic agreements may exercise a beneficial influence on the organisation of production and the regulation of trade;

Draws the attention of the Governments to the recommendations of the economic experts in this connection.

It requests, in particular, the Governments and the League of Nations to devote their attention to studying the means of ensuring that international economic agreements should be organised and operated in the general interest and with due regard to all interests concerned in accordance with the recommendations of the economic experts and the relevant chapter in the report of the World Economic Conference.

It draws special attention to the necessity of measures to ensure as wide publicity as possible for these agreements, making it possible to follow their activities so as to safeguard all legitimate interests, particularly those of consumers, whether countries or persons.

It further requests the Economic Committee of the League of Nations to resume and push forward its consultations concerning the most important branches of production.

4. The Assembly,

Seeing that, among the measures of international solidarity calculated to mitigate the effects of the economic depression and to assist the resumption of activity which would benefit the workers of all countries, consideration should be given to the execution of important public works jointly undertaken by public or private groups on European or extra-European territory;

Seeing, further, that the problem has already been approached by the Commission of Enquiry for European Union and has been laid before the competent organs of the League of Nations;

In order to expedite the examination of these programmes, to co-ordinate them on an international scale, to hasten their putting into effect and to follow their execution:

Invites the Council of the League of Nations to instruct the Committee of Enquiry set up by the Communications and Transit Organisation, to which should be added representatives of the International Labour Office and possibly of the economic and financial organs of the League, to undertake these various tasks.

This Committee will examine the concrete proposals of the various Governments, particularly from the point of view of the utility and productivity of the works proposed.

It will report to the Council of the League of Nations. The Commission of Enquiry for European Union will be called on to give its opinion on the proposals relating to Europe.

5. The Assembly notes with satisfaction that the draft unified Customs nomenclature prepared after an urgent request from the Assembly by the Sub-Committee of Experts appointed for the purpose has now been completed.

It considers that the adoption of an agreement to utilise a uniform Customs nomenclature would facilitate the development of international economic relations.

Considering that the great advantages resulting from the adoption of such a common instrument will generally compensate for the difficulties of adjustment which its adoption may entail, it agrees with the procedure suggested by the Economic Committee and the Sub-Committee of Experts and approved by the Council.

It therefore earnestly appeals to all Members and to the States non-Members of the League of Nations to which the draft unified Customs nomenclature will shortly be submitted to examine the draft without delay, so that they may be in a position to forward their replies to the Secretariat as soon as possible.

6. The Assembly notes with satisfaction the valuable results of the two International Conferences for the Unification of Laws on Bills of Exchange, Promissory Notes and Cheques, and strongly urges the Governments of the States concerned to take steps to ensure that the instruments of ratification of these Conventions shall be deposited as soon as possible, and in any case before the expiry of the time-limits provided.

7. The Assembly,

Considering that it would be desirable to associate with the work of the League of Nations institutions (National Economic Councils) representing the most important economic and social elements in certain States;

Considering that institutions of this nature already exist—although with different methods and with different powers—in a number of countries, especially in Europe;

Convinced of the desirability of utilising these institutions as much as possible in the work of improving international economic relations:

Requests the Council to seek the most appropriate means of providing for the co-operation of National Economic Councils in the work of the League of Nations.

The President:

Translation: As no one else wishes to speak, I shall consider the report of the Second Committee and the accompanying draft resolutions adopted.

The draft resolutions were adopted.

63. — DISPUTE BETWEEN CHINA AND JAPAN: COMMUNICATION BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL.

The President:

Translation: Before the Assembly passes to the next item on its agenda, M. Lerroux, President of the Council, wishes to make a communication.

The President of the Council will address the Assembly.

M. Lerroux (Spain), President of the Council:

Translation: As President in Office of the Council, I have a communication to make to the Assembly.

The question of the dispute between China and Japan is being examined by the Council. Consultations are in progress with the representatives of the two countries on the Council and we hope that a satisfactory conclusion will be reached.

The Council hopes to be able to make a statement to the Assembly as soon as circumstances allow. Meanwhile, it has asked me to assure the Assembly that it is devoting to this question the time and attention that is fitting in view of the interest of peace and of the respect due to the two parties concerned.

The President:

Translation: I think I may make a statement which for the moment will obviate any discussion. It is clear that, as long as the dispute has not been submitted to the Assembly, it is for the Council to discuss the facts and to seek some means of appeasement. But in circumstances like the present, it is most essential that the League should be able to count on the support of public opinion in all countries. That support will certainly not be withheld if our action is in accordance with what is expected of us. It will not suffice, therefore, for the Council to remain in session continuously, and as far as possible in public, until the maintenance of peace is assured. It is necessary, further, that the Assembly should not adjourn without giving expression to the interest felt by all Members of the League in the success of measures of such paramount importance to our institution.

We hope, therefore, that the Council will make a further communication to us on this subject before the close of our session, in order that the Assembly may express its views on this dispute.

64. — OPENING OF A CONVENTION FOR THE REGULATION OF WHALING: REPORT OF THE SECOND COMMITTEE: RESOLUTION.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the discussion of the report of the Second Committee on the opening of a Convention for the Regulation of Whaling (Annex 11, document A.64.1931.II.B).

(On the invitation of the President, M. Braadland, Rapporteur, took his place on the platform.)

The President:

Translation: M. Braadland will address the Assembly.

M. Braadland (Norway), Rapporteur:

Translation: I have the honour to submit to you a report on the subject of a Convention for the Regulation of Whaling. The main object of the draft Convention annexed to the report is to secure the adoption by the greatest possible number of countries of certain rules intended to prevent, in the interest of the whaling industry itself, the destruction of a source of wealth available to all.

The draft before you is the outcome of work begun in 1925 as the result of an Assembly resolution, adopted in the previous year, for the creation of a Committee of Experts.

After a preliminary examination, the Economic Committee came to the conclusion, in July 1929, that international measures might be contemplated to ensure the protection of whales and that such measures were actually urgent.

The Norwegian Government meanwhile had prepared a Bill providing that its whalers throughout the world should observe certain rules with a view to putting an end to the incomplete utilisation of the whales taken. These rules were framed with a view to obtaining valuable biological information.

The draft Convention which you have before you, and which follows the main lines of the provisions of the Norwegian law, is the outcome of a thorough study of the question by a Committee of Experts. After being recast by the Economic Committee, the draft Convention was submitted by the Council to all Members of the League and to the non-Member States for their observations.

Finally, the Committee of Experts appointed by the Governments studied the question once more, taking into account the observations and suggestions received. Thus the draft before you is the result of patient and careful work by qualified persons and has already been under consideration by the Governments.

For the provisions of the Convention, I shall refer you to the report. Article 12 provides that the information collected by whalers shall be regularly communicated by the Governments of the contracting parties to the International Bureau for Whaling Statistics at Oslo, for the purpose of comparing such information.

I take this opportunity of thanking the League for the honour thus conferred on my country, which will do everything in its power to fulfil the task entrusted to it. As I have already said, this is an urgent matter; I venture then to make an urgent appeal from this platform to all Governments, that the Convention may be signed and ratified as soon as possible.

I should like to stress the fact that the co-operation of countries which have not at present a direct interest in the question is an essential condition if the Convention is to have the full effect desired. Those countries can now, without any sacrifice on their part, guarantee by their signature that the rules of the Convention shall not be evaded, but shall be recognised as binding on everyone, and, if one of those countries later on starts a whaling industry, it will profit by the results of the Convention thus concluded with the Governments concerned.

As regards my own Government, I have pleasure in announcing that I am prepared, in virtue of the full powers conferred upon me, to sign the Convention this very day.

In conclusion, I propose the following draft resolution:

The Assembly,

Convinced of the importance and urgency of regulating whaling by means of an international agreement prohibiting the taking or killing of certain kinds of whales which have become extremely rare and of making the fullest possible use of the animals the catching of which is still permitted;

In view of the fact that the attached Convention differs from that communicated to the Members of the League and non-Member States by Circular Letter No. 158, of July 3rd, 1930, only as regards certain minor points of drafting, and that no substantial changes have been introduced therein:

Decides to open the said Convention immediately for the signature of Members of the League and non-Member States, and expresses the hope that the largest possible number of States will accede thereto without delay.

The President:

Translation: Mr. Collins, delegate of Australia, will address the Assembly.

Mr. Collins (Australia): It is my intention, on behalf of the Government of the Commonwealth of Australia, to sign the Convention for the Regulation of Whaling. My Government, however, has instructed me to say that it may be necessary at the time of ratification, to make a reservation concerning the limitation of the powers of the Commonwealth Government with regard to fishing.

Under Article 1 of the Convention the contracting parties agree, within the limits of their respective jurisdictions, to carry out the Convention and to punish any infractions of its provisions. Therefore, any Commonwealth legislation on the subject would necessarily be limited to " Australian waters beyond territorial limits ", and it is in consequence of this constitutional difficulty that the reservation to which I have referred may become necessary at the time of ratification.

The President:

Translation: If no one else wishes to speak, I shall consider the report and the accompanying draft resolution adopted.

The draft resolution was adopted.

The President:

Translation: As the draft resolution submitted by the Second Committee has been adopted, the Convention, the text of which is appended to the report, becomes open for signature immediately by the States Members and non-Members of the League.

I have been asked to inform those members of the Assembly who possess the necessary powers that the Convention is open for signature and that they can sign it in Room 110 at the Secretariat.

65. — WORK OF THE ORGANISATION FOR COMMUNICATIONS AND TRANSIT: REPORT OF THE SECOND COMMITTEE: RESOLUTION.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the discussion of the report of the Second Committee on the work of the Organisation for Communications and Transit (Annex 12, document A.76.1931.VIII).

(On the invitation of the President, M. Costa du Rels, Rapporteur, took his place on the platform.)

The President:

Translation: M. Costa du Rels, delegate of Bolivia, Rapporteur, will address the Assembly.

M. Costa du Rels (Bolivia), Rapporteur, read his report and the following draft resolution :

The Assembly,

Takes note of the work undertaken by the Organisation for Communications and Transit since the last Assembly and in particular of the success achieved by the Conference for the Unification of Buoyage and Lighting of Coasts, the Conference for the Unification of River Law and the Conference on Road Traffic;

Expresses its confidence that the Organisation will do its utmost to secure the entire success of the co-operation established with the National Government of China for the study of questions of public works in which its assistance has been requested;

Likewise expresses its confidence that the Transit Organisation will endeavour to take suitable steps to comply with requests for advice in respect of public works which it may receive from the various Governments; such as the requests for advice referred to in the report of the Commission of Enquiry for European Union.

The President:

Translation: As no one has asked to speak, I shall regard the report of the Second Committee and the draft resolution adopted.

The draft resolution was adopted.

66. — WORK OF THE HEALTH ORGANISATION: REPORT OF THE SECOND COMMITTEE: RESOLUTIONS.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the discussion of the report of the Second Committee on the Work of the Health Organisation (Annex 13, document A.60.1931.III).

(On the invitation of the President, M. Fierlinger, Rapporteur, took his seat on the platform.)

The President:

Translation: The Rapporteur will address the Assembly.

M. Fierlinger (Czechoslovakia), Rapporteur:

Translation: Two years ago I had the honour to report to you on the work of the Health Organisation, and on that occasion I emphasised the growing importance of that work, which is becoming more and more systematised and is being extended to an ever-growing number of countries in all continents.

While the efforts of the other organs of the League are necessarily concentrated on certain weak points in the world, the Health Organisation is at the disposal of every country which desires to consult it on any technical point or wishes for its opinion on the reorganisation of its health services. Its salient features are its universality and its entirely non-political character; and these in themselves go far to enhance the prestige of the League in both hemispheres.

The work of the Health Organisation is extremely varied, and I have been unable in my report to deal adequately with the different problems with which it has successfully dealt. I have mentioned only the most important tasks in the various branches of health, undertaken in co-operation with the different Governments — such as, for instance, the study of the different methods for the serological diagnosis of syphilis, the enquiry into the causes and prevention of infant mortality in Roumania and the work of the special Commissions, such as the Leprosy Commission, the Malaria Commission, etc.

I should like to emphasise the social and economic importance and significance of these problems, such as the study of rural hygiene undertaken on the proposal of the Spanish Government. The problem is how to preserve intact and to increase that vast reservoir of health, the rural population, so as to be able to draw upon it for renewed vigour for our anæmic civilisation, debilitated by town life. The Spanish Government's proposal redounds to its credit and clearly shows us the direction which Spain's national aspirations are taking. Her desire is unselfishly to serve humanity and to stimulate social and moral progress.

Spontaneous unanimity was displayed in the discussion regarding China, whose people have been the victims of an appalling catastrophe caused by natural forces and need effective international assistance. This catastrophe, which has already claimed so many victims, might undoubtedly have other disastrous consequences, if millions of men were left without shelter or food or the means of combating epidemics.

It is not selfishness which prompts us to take energetic measures to combat this evil; it is our common duty towards that great country, China. We hope that all the Governments, and especially those which have suitable technical organisations in the Far East, will respond to the appeal which the French delegation, supported by the Japanese delegation, very appositely added to the resolution proposed by the Committee. This appeal is a fresh proof of the international solidarity which the League is endeavouring to encourage between all nations whether Members or non-Members of our great organisation.

The few examples I have mentioned to illustrate the work of the Health Organisation lead me to hope that the lofty aims pursued by our Assembly in the matter of health will come to be more and more widely understood and that the Assembly will, as in previous years, approve the report and the accompanying draft resolutions, which read as follows:

I. The Assembly,

Having noted the reports on the work of the Health Organisation of the League of Nations since the last session:

Recognises with satisfaction the value of the methods of international co-operation employed by this Organisation;

Notes with satisfaction that the experience acquired by the Health Organisation is being made available to the States Members of the League to an ever-increasing extent;

Expresses the hope that steps will be taken to give the widest and most rapid distribution to the information collected by the Health Organisation concerning the practical and scientific health work, carried out in the different countries, which is of international interest;

Views with interest the work accomplished on rural hygiene, and hopes that the task undertaken in this field will be extended so that the rural populations of all countries may benefit in the near future;

Approves the work carried out by the Health Organisation since the last session of the Assembly;

And congratulates that Organisation on the results obtained, which give fresh proof of the concentration of its efforts on definite tasks, and the universality of its work.

II. The Assembly,

Regarding the danger of the spread of epidemics and the loss of life as a result of the terrible disaster in the Yangtse valley, both as a humanitarian problem of the first magnitude and a matter of international concern,

Recalling the assistance rendered in similar circumstances by the Health Organisation through its Epidemic Commission in Poland and Greece in 1921 and 1923;

Convinced of the need to show clearly and concretely the sympathy of humanity for the victims of this appalling catastrophe;

Invites all the Member States of the League of Nations, and non-Members, and particularly those in close contact with the Far East, to respond, so far as is in their power, to any request that may be made to take all possible measures for relief in the flooded areas of China, in co-operation with the League of Nations;

Requests the Council to take the necessary steps to render the international co-operation effective.

The President:

Translation: As no one has asked to speak, I shall consider the report and the accompanying draft resolutions adopted.

The draft resolutions were adopted.

67. — CO-OPERATION OF WOMEN AND OF THE PRESS IN THE ORGANISATION OF PEACE: REPORT OF THE THIRD COMMITTEE: RESOLUTIONS.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the discussion of the report of the Third Committee on the co-operation of women and of the Press in the organisation of peace (Annex 14, document A.73.1931.IX).

(On the invitation of the President, M. Munch, Chairman of the Third Committee; and M. Buero, Rapporteur, took their places on the platform.)

The President:

Translation: The Rapporteur will address the Assembly.

M. Buero (Uruguay), Rapporteur:

Translation: I do not think it is necessary to read the report, as it has been distributed to all the delegations.

The Spanish proposal, in which the Assembly showed particular interest, included two questions, one relating to the Press and the other to the co-operation of women. In the Committee, with the Spanish delegation's approval, we framed two separate proposals, which are reproduced in the document before you.

The Spanish proposal concerning the co-operation of women reached us at a particularly opportune moment. Now, when the League is undertaking what may perhaps be decisive work in the organisation of peace, the co-operation of women may be indispensable or, at all events, of very great value in creating an atmosphere favourable to the proceedings of the forthcoming Disarmament Conference and to the pacification of those Chauvinist passions which subsist practically everywhere — a dark inheritance of the past.

As M. de Madariaga, delegate of Spain, pointed out during the discussion in the Third Committee. the influence of women in the training of young people is decisive at the age when young minds receive their first impressions, which may perhaps play a large part in the mentality of the future citizen, and, as I mention in the report, what is suggested is not official co-operation but simply the non-official co-operation of women in the organisation of peace and the maintenance of good understanding between peoples.

If these considerations are approved by the Assembly, the Committee proposes that you should accept the draft resolution included in Part I of the report.

The other part of the report and the second draft resolution concern the co-operation of the Press in the organisation of peace. It is so explicit in itself that there is no need for me to go into details. I therefore propose the adoption of the following draft resolutions:

I. The Assembly,

Convinced of the great value of the contribution of women to the work of peace and the good understanding between the nations, which is the principal aim of the League of Nations,

Requests the Council to examine the possibility of women co-operating more fully in the work of the League.

II. The Assembly,

Considering that the organisation of peace demands an international spirit freed from all prejudices and misconceptions,

Convinced of the necessity of ensuring that Press information shall be as impartial and complete as possible,

Requests the Council to consider the possibility of studying, with the help of the Press, the difficult problem of the spread of false information which may threaten to disturb the peace or the good understanding between nations.

The President:

Translation: M. de Madariaga will address the Assembly.

M. de Madariaga (Spain):

Translation: The Spanish delegation desires to thank M. Buero for the excellent report which he has presented on its two proposals.

As regards the first of those proposals, the Spanish Government has shown by the composition of its delegation that it is in full sympathy with the tendency which has been displayed, in connection with this motion, to suggest that women should form part of the delegations. The Spanish delegation feels, however, that that question was not really the starting-point of its motion and that it might perhaps betray a lack of tact to suggest to Governments what they ought to do when forming their delegations.

The same applies with perhaps even greater force to the other question submitted to the Committee concerning the composition — whether more or less feminine — of the big international meetings and in particular of the Disarmament Conference. The Spanish delegation deems it necessary to adhere strictly to the feeling which inspired its motion, a feeling certainly shared by the majority of the Third Committee — namely, that the co-operation of women should be restricted, for the time being at all events, to the specific functions of women in their own countries and in their own homes — namely, that they should concern themselves with creating the moral atmosphere indispensable to the League's success. Naturally, the other questions raised by delegates who are in favour of a greater extension of feminine participation in public life are not affected. My Government and my delegation reserve full liberty with reference to any decision for the future.

As regards the Press, we wish to say quite plainly that it would be truly surprising if a Government formed as the result of a violent reaction in the country — violent, that is, in substance, for the reaction was peaceful in form — against a long period of censorship should submit to the Assembly, which owes its existence to liberty of conscience, any suggestion for limiting the freedom of the Press. The Spanish delegation desires to state categorically that such a thought has always been and always will be remote from its intentions. My delegation will never accept any restriction of liberty, even if it be necessary to bow before the evils of liberty.

There is, however, one very definite point beyond which the Spanish motion on the Press is not intended to go — that is, the moment when the news has become known and has been published. What happens prior to that moment does not concern the censorship. The latter can operate only after the Press has published its news. Then only can there be any right to criticise or perhaps to ascertain whether the news is false, to discover the source of the news and to decide with whom the responsibility rests. But we do not think this constitutes a field of research which it is legitimate or perhaps even necessary for the League to explore.

I wish to revert, however, to my first point, to the necessity of maintaining intact freedom of thought and opinion, and I have no hesitation in affirming, on behalf of my delegation and my Government, that we should even be prepared to abandon all idea of remedying the evils resulting from false news, if that meant jeopardising liberty, which we prize above all else.

The President:

Translation: As no one has asked to speak, I shall consider the report of the Third Committee and the accompanying draft resolutions adopted.

The draft resolutions were adopted.

68. — COMMUNICATIONS OF IMPORTANCE TO THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS IN TIMES OF EMERGENCY: REPORT OF THE THIRD COMMITTEE.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the discussion of the report of the Third Committee on communications of importance to the League of Nations in times of emergency (Annex 15, document A.74.1931.IX).

The President:

Translation: M. Buero, Rapporteur, will address the Assembly.

M. Buero (Uruguay), Rapporteur:

Translation: The report before you contains information which the Committee has felt that it should place before the Assembly relating to certain measures to be adopted by the League in times of emergency. I do not think I need add anything further, since the information in question has been obtained from the Secretariat, but I am at the disposal of those who may wish for any further details.

The President:

Translation: As no one has asked to speak, I shall consider the Third Committee's report approved.

The Assembly approved the report of the Third Committee.

69. — EXTENSION OF THE TERM OF OFFICE OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE OF FIVE FOR THE ORGANISATION OF THE SESSIONS OF THE ASSEMBLY: ADOPTION OF A DRAFT RESOLUTION PROPOSED BY THE GENERAL COMMITTEE OF THE ASSEMBLY.

The President:

Translation: At its meeting this morning, I directed the attention of the General Committee to the desirability of extending the mandate of the Special Committee of Five which had been instructed to consider, in the interval between two sessions of the Assembly, what improvements might be made in the organisation of the conditions of work of the Assembly.

The Special Committee of Five has done some very useful work. Several of its suggestions have been adopted by the Assembly and have been found to be extremely valuable — for example, that of simultaneous translation. It would be expedient accordingly to enable the Committee, between the twelfth and thirteenth sessions, to ascertain once again, on the basis of the experience obtained, whether further improvements could be recommended.

The General Committee decided accordingly to propose to the Assembly that it should extend the term of office of the Special Committee, and requested me in consequence to submit to the Assembly the following draft resolution:

The Assembly,

Congratulates the Special Committee of Five for the organisation of sessions of the Assembly on the results of its work and thanks it for the most valuable advice which it has hitherto given the Assembly;

Decides to extend for one year the term of office of the Special Committee of Five and requests it to submit new suggestions to the Assembly at its next plenary session.

The draft resolution was adopted.

70. — PARTICIPATION IN THE WORK OF THE THIRD COMMITTEE OF STATES NOT REPRESENTED IN THE ASSEMBLY: COMMUNICATION BY THE PRESIDENT.

The President:

Translation: Following on the information which I gave the Assembly yesterday morning concerning the invitation which it addressed to various States not represented in the Assembly to take part, in an advisory capacity, in the proceedings of the Third Committee relating to the proposed armaments truce, I have the honour to state that another reply has been received from one of the Governments — Brazil — invited in these circumstances: that Government informs me that it will send an observer to represent it at the proceedings of the Third Committee.

The Assembly rose at 1.15 p.m.

71. — APPOINTMENT OF A SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO STUDY THE EXISTING SYSTEM OF ELECTIONS TO THE COUNCIL; REPORT OF THE FIRST COMMITTEE: RESOLUTION.

The President:

Translation: The first item on the agenda is the discussion of the report of the First Committee concerning the appointment of a special committee to study the existing system of elections to the Council (Annex 16, document A.56.1931.V).

(On the invitation of the President, M. Scialoja, Chairman of the First Committee, and Viscount Cecil of Chelwood, Rapporteur, took their places on the platform.)

The President:

Translation: The Rapporteur will address the Assembly.

Viscount Cecil (British Empire), Rapporteur:

The resolution I have to put before you is extremely brief, and I hope quite uncontentious. It reads:

The Assembly requests the Council to appoint a special committee to study the existing system of elections to the Council and to report to a future session of the Assembly on any reforms which may appear desirable.

It is not proposed that the Committee should work with undue haste, but it is proposed that it should be appointed so that the subject can be ventilated. I think this procedure is in every way preferable, rather than that suggestions should be made by individual members to the Assembly of any reform that might occur to them, which would probably be done without sufficient regard to the interests of all concerned. It is much better that, in the first instance, the matter should be impartially examined, and if any results arise out of that examination, the Assembly would have to consider them.

The only other remark I wish to make is that the terms of the resolution have been purposely made as wide as possible, so that the Committee may be able to consider the question of the enlargement of the Council, if necessary, though I personally would rather regret a change in that direction.

The President:

Translation: As no one wishes to speak, I shall consider the draft resolution proposed by the First Committee adopted.

The draft resolution was adopted.

72. — AMENDMENT OF THE COVENANT OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS IN ORDER TO BRING IT INTO HARMONY WITH THE PACT OF PARIS: REPORT OF THE FIRST COMMITTEE: RESOLUTION.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the discussion of the report of the First Committee on the amendment of the Covenant of the League of Nations in order to bring it into harmony with the Pact of Paris (Annex 17, document A.86.1931.V).

(On the invitation of the President, M. Rolin, Rapporteur, took his place on the platform.)

The President:

Translation: The Rapporteur will address the Assembly.

M. Rolin (Belgium), Rapporteur:

Translation: I am submitting to you, on behalf of the First Committee, a resolution for postponement; but if I may be allowed to make the distinction, this decision for postponement has been taken, not with resignation, but with confidence. This is the third year that this question has been before the Assembly, and when I say this is a confident postponement, it is because I have a profound conviction that we have considerably reduced our divergencies of view and are approaching a solution.

Last year, in the report which he submitted from this pl..tform on behalf of the First Committee of the Assembly, my predecessor, M. Cassin, told you that the First Committee had been held up by political difficulties and that various delegations had expressed the opinion that, although the legal aspect had been adequately examined, the political aspect had not as yet. In our opinion, too much is made of this sort of distinction, which is so often drawn between political and legal questions. In practice, this may have a certain interest, but only if these questions are not divided into watertight compartments.

The First Committee is no doubt the Committee for legal questions, but I shall not surprise you when I say that all your various committees, especially when they draw up draft conventions, are doing legal work, perhaps not always in the best possible way, but it is legal work. So you will not bear any ill-will to the First Committee if, in connection with the essential work of the Covenant of the League, it has been obliged to consider political problems, sometimes in a general and abstract manner and sometimes, I admit, in a concrete way. We found that some of us felt misgivings on particular points. We dealt with them as frankly as possible and, I may add, as discreetly as possible. It was in this spirit that we worked, and we arrived, I think, at bases providing greater possibilities of ultimate agreement.

Furthermore, if we have been concerned with questions of policy, it has been in the highest sense of the word, and our discussions, as one of our colleagues pointed out, have sometimes had a philosophical bias rather than any other and have bordered on the common ground where politics and law meet.

What was the question before us? The amendment of the Covenant in order to bring it into harmony with the Pact of Paris. This expression "harmony" is particularly suggestive. The aim was to avoid discord between the Pact of Paris and the Covenant: the Pact, which prohibits resort to war as an instrument of national policy, and the Covenant, which still allows recourse to war against a State refusing to have recourse to arbitration, against a State refusing to carry out an arbitral sentence, against a State refusing to carry out a unanimous recommendation of the Council and, finally, against a State which, in presence of a report of the Council adopted by a majority, refuses to wait for three months, as prescribed by Article 15 of the Covenant.

These were known as licit wars; for we are all agreed that the legal value of the Paris Pact is not the point, and that what is prohibited for signatories of the Paris Pact by that Convention is likewise prohibited in their relations as between Members of the League, since it would be impossible to allow that rules of international law exist from certain points of view and not from others.

We see that from the moral standpoint it is to the interest of public opinion or of the student, the scholar who studies the Covenant, that there should be no uncertainty, that nothing should be allowed to remain in some texts which is disallowed by other texts, that the prohibition to have recourse to war by those who are at the same time signatories of the Paris Pact and Members of the League should, as it were, be codified: but we realised that the work of bringing these instruments into harmony presented a loftier, a more complex aspect. We realised that to take this prohibition to have recourse to war embodied in the Paris Pact and to incorporate it in our social organisation was liable, in the nature of things, to have certain repercussions.

We have in the League an organisation designed for the purpose of maintaining peace, which makes provision, in the event of any threat of war or actual war, for measures of collective intervention, of joint action. We must consider what repercussions the adoption, the consecration of the rule prohibiting recourse to war would have on the functioning of our institution.

The problem has various aspects: first, the constitutional aspect, the statement of the new principle of prohibition to have recourse to war, and we thought that this very simple formula — which encountered practically no difficulty among us — would be sufficient; there was apparently a tacit acceptance at least of the preference expressed last year by the First Committee for finding a single formula, to be substituted for the various specific prohibitions scattered through the Covenant, which should embody the very simple principle that, so far as Members of the League are concerned, they renounce the right to have recourse to war.

Various questions, various difficulties were, however, raised by certain of our colleagues. Several of them were concerned with the question of legitimate defence, and we wondered whether it might be necessary to provide expressly in the Covenant for the right of legitimate defence. That question proved simple. The right of legitimate defence is provided for in the Covenant, though not expressly so. Why should it be expressly included in the event of revision? The right of legitimate defence is simply the application of a general principle of law — to employ an expression of the Permanent Court of International Justice — the principle that, when an agreement has been entered into on a bilateral or multilateral basis and one of the parties evades its obligations, the other parties are automatically released from theirs.

That is the non adimpleti contractus clause. A State violates its undertaking not to have recourse to war; it has no right to demand that the other parties shall respect that same obligation.

The definition of legimitate defence, and especially the limitative definition of the various material aspects under which legitimate defence might occur in practice, was a problem also considered this year by the Third Committee. The latter gave up the attempt to formulate a solution and we do not feel any more competent to do so than they.

Legitimate defence is a conception which exists in municipal law, although the character and conditions of such legitimacy are not, to my knowledge, defined in any law. It is a principle of conscience, a principle of common sense, a concept which perhaps defies definition in abstract terms, but which in practice presents no difficulty.

In order, however, to indicate somewhat more precisely the various solutions or complications that might be encountered in practice, we have, like the Third Committee, indicated in a footnote to our report a very important, if not decisive, passage, by my compatriot M. de Brouckère, which occurs in a report to the Council on the application of Article 11.

Certain problems were also raised in regard to the right of spontaneous intervention. As you know, Article 16 provides that a violation of the undertakings of the Covenant places the violating State in a state of war with all the other States, and provides for the immediate application of economic sanctions and for a later application, generally on the recommendation of the Council, of military sanctions. The point to be determined was whether provision was to be made for such assistance also as an exception to the prohibition to resort to war, and we seem to have agreed that no such exception should be specified expressly, that here again it was not so much a question of an exception as the simple application of the principle of law, since the State which violates its undertakings is not entitled to demand the execution of those undertakings by the other parties to the Convention.

We considered the question whether one factor in the problem, the appreciation of legitimate defence, could be affected by special conditions, and on that point also we did not feel obliged to recommend, for our future work, any specific solution, since it seemed to us that sufficient indications were already to be found in the general body of the League principles.

These Conventions are of several types. Some are reciprocal and are recognised and approved by the League, being included among the special Conventions which Article 21 defines as engagements for securing the maintenance of peace.

When the League organs, whether the Convention has been concluded under their auspices or merely referred to them, have found that it is actually of such a character, the question is already settled in advance and the Council of the League can take account of these Conventions as a matter of course, their character having been thus unanimously recognised. We have one example of this which seems likely to take effect this very year: the Third Committee is drawing up a Convention to reinforce the means of action at the disposal of the Council; the Convention does not confer on the Council the power to prescribe provisional measures, but it gives to this power, which the Council already has, a legal effect which those measures have not hitherto possessed.

It is understood that anyone who violates such provisional measures after having signed the Convention will find himself de jure and not only de facto, according to the Council's view, presumed to be an aggressor, if there is no other means of determining the aggression.

No one, I think, raised any objection in the Third Committee to the possibility, for Members of the League, of framing certain rules of this nature which will, beyond all doubt, have certain effects beyond the scope of the actual relations between the Members, since the Council of the League and the Members which have not signed the Convention in question will have the right to invoke it, if necessary, when establishing the aggression.

Lastly, the question arose whether later on, when the moment comes to draw up definitive texts, it would be necessary to catalogue the measures of constraint that might be employed either as reprisals or in execution of arbitral awards, and which measures should be prohibited, since resort to war was strictly prohibited in the wording contemplated. On that point also we considered that the definition of these concepts should be left to experience, to the concrete development of international law, to international jurisprudence, or that, at all events, it was not in the Covenant, which forms the body of constitutional rules, that provision should be made for the solution of this particular difficulty.

We affirmed one essential point — and this is certainly a big revolution even in regard to the execution of arbitral awards — namely, that resort to war in the strict sense of the term was comprised in the general prohibition, but that, as a consequence of this, the task which devolved upon the Council of considering the measures necessary to ensure execution took on a fresh importance and significance, that that task became a particularly imperative one for the Council, that the Council could even, in the last resort, in the face of States which persisted in their attitude, authorise measures of military execution by way of exception in serious cases, but that, in such cases, the measures prescribed by the Council would take on an entirely different character, that they would not, any more than in the case of legitimate defence, constitute a resort to war, but would represent concerted action in perfect conformity with the principles of the Covenant.

Having thus examined the fundamental principle of the prohibition of resort to war, its principal repercussions were next considered with a view to ensuring the desired harmony.

The most familiar aspect, and the one which is very generally placed already on a plane with the principle of prohibiting recourse to war, is the problem of the pacific settlement of disputes. As things stand, the Covenant allows States the choice between arbitration or judicial settlement, on the one hand, and recourse to the Council on the other. Arbitration or judicial settlement implies findings which are binding upon the parties and to which effect must be given. Recourse to the Council, even when the Council is unanimous, produces only a limited effect, since, in the Covenant as it stands, war is prohibited against a State which fails to comply with the unanimous recommendations of the Council; but the Covenant does not provide for any obligation to carry out its recommendations, and the Council has no means of guaranteeing such execution, even when its recommendations are unanimous.

Many delegates therefore held quite logically that, if war is prohibited in every case, a final settlement of the dispute must also be assured in every case.

Two methods seemed feasible. The first and simpler was to extend arbitration or judicial settlement by means of contractual undertakings. This we are trying to do, and considerable progress has been made through the Optional Clause of the Statute of the Permanent Court and the General Act of Arbitration. Tempting as it may be to carry things to their logical conclusion, it is better in this matter not to attempt to hurry States, not to try to break down such resistance as is still manifested in somewhat rare cases, not to impose on all, by means of amendments which would doubtless not be ratified, so big a step as general arbitration. This solution was therefore abandoned, at all events, in the form of an amendment.

The second solution contemplated was to confer upon the recommendations of the Council — at any rate, its unanimous recommendations — a binding effect, to entrust the Council with the task of ensuring their execution and, even, in cases in which the Council might be divided, to provide that it would then be under the obligation to refer the parties to arbitration or judicial settlement. This amounted, indirectly, to much the same result — namely, the exercise of constraint on Members. The problem, however, was further complicated by the fact that a certain number of States in favour of compulsory arbitration were not prepared to grant to the Council arbitral or judicial powers or to give its decisions executory and compulsory force, even with the guarantee that the Council could, by a majority, apply for an advisory opinion to the Permanent Court of International Justice.

It seemed that, provisionally, account should be taken in the report of the fact that it would doubtless not be possible to go beyond the point indicated last year in the First Committee's report and that it must suffice to ensure for the unanimous recommendations of the Council a moral effect, in the sense that it would be provided that the Council shall ask States to conform to its unanimous recommendation and that Members of the League which are third parties shall not be able to give assistance to a State refusing to do so.

Thus there is to be no legal obligation laid down in the Covenant, but a certain moral pressure, and provision is made for certain sanctions in the event of violations of that moral obligation.

From a logical standpoint, this may not perhaps be very satisfactory; from a political standpoint — which is dear even to jurists — it is perfectly viable. The States have set this great example by accepting, in the Pact of Paris, the prohibition of resort to war, although the obligation in regard to a pacific settlement is actually far less stressed than in the Covenant.

We consider that this is an example by which we might profit and that, psychologically, it is not astonishing that States should be unanimously prepared to renounce recourse to violence as a means of settling their disputes, even if they are not quite clear in their own minds what pacific methods should be chosen to arrive at a solution.

I now come to the last and perhaps the most important aspect of the problem, in regard to which it seemed the most difficult to reconcile the divergent points of view. I do not say that we reached unanimity, but I have no fear of being contradicted when I say that we understood each other better, that each of us appreciated the force of his opponent's argument and perhaps the points in the argument which we had been defending with equal conviction; thus, as you may see, it is already possible dimly to discern what will probably be the solution of to-morrow.

What was the main argument last year, the one which has still, I think, the greatest number of supporters? Although as Rapporteur I cannot give you any details, that argument was that, on this essential point, it is impossible, among all the kinds of war prohibited by the Covenant, among all the possibilities of illicit resort to war, to point to certain categories to which sanctions would be applied and others which would escape. Conscience demanded, we may say, that no distinction should be allowed, because we considered that to say that in certain cases Members of the League, after taking note of the violation of an undertaking, could simply wash their hands of the whole matter, would be to undermine at the outset the moral and legal force of this radical prohibition to resort to war.

We have been accused, to begin with, of attaching too much importance to the problem of sanctions; it was averred that the function of the League, its raison d'être, was not to be a repressive judge, whose duty it would be to take cognisance, with a view to penalties, of acts committed by States or to ensure immediate punishment. Such a function would in reality often be very alarming and difficult of accomplishment and would involve delay. It was pointed out that the direct, immediate and essential function of the League is to bring about peace, to reassure minds and hearts, and that the problem of assigning responsibility was one to be solved later, a problem of reparation, if need be.

On that point we very quickly reached agreement. The experience of the Council is there to help us.

In the various cases in which the peace of Europe has appeared to be endangered, the Council has been anxious above all to try and restore peace, before attempting to determine the causes of the dispute which had for a space embittered world feeling.

Those in favour of not extending sanctions declared that we were attaching too much importance to providing in the texts for the extension of obligations, whereas the real problem was a question of procedure, of machinery. What was required was to determine whether Members of the League were or were not under an obligation, rather than to determine under what conditions and subject to what guarantees they should recognise that, in a particular case, they must take concerted action against an aggressor State. In this connection, attention was directed to the importance of what was being done in the Third Committee, where legal force was being conferred on the power which the Council already possesses to prescribe provisional measures.

We were told: "It is an organic matter; the Council takes provisional measures; it places itself in a position to verify their execution or violation, as the case may be. Having thus made its arrangements with regard to machinery under its own control, it is then possible for it to take a unanimous decision as to the aggressor." We are prepared, by way of compromise, to consider the extension of sanctions to all cases in which the Council may have been unanimous in establishing the aggressor.

On this point we agreed — or rather, I agreed — with certain delegations that it was perhaps at the outset a formal mistake to describe as a limitation of sanctions what was in fact only their regulation, that the point was not whether actually the obligations to lend assistance in virtue of the Covenant would extend to all cases of aggression, but whether the execution of such obligations ought not to be subject to certain formal conditions concerning proof.

We then took precautions to repudiate the charge that we were increasing the number of cases of sanctions. We considered that the idea of extending sanctions might lead to ambiguity and that, if the principle of unity as regards the pacificatory action of the Council and the prohibition to resort to war were accepted, there might perhaps in theory be an extension of intervention to cases which were not at present liable to sanctions under the Covenant, but that, from a practical standpoint, the likelihood of intervention by the League, far from being increased, would be reduced.

In this connection, we brought out the point that Article 11 of the Covenant enjoins upon the Council to concern itself with any war or threat of war, even licit, under the original Covenant; we considered that that would be the duty of the Council a fortiori when all wars had been prohibited, and we thought that it would be anomalous if, in certain cases, it should be the duty of the Council to intervene, while Members of the League of Nations were at liberty to stand aloof, and that the Council would find itself without any concrete means of action.

We then considered whether, in the apprehensions expressed by those in favour of this restrictive amendment, there might not be a modicum of truth. We were told: "If the Council has been divided on the settlement of disputes, it is possible that it may be divided when establishing the aggressor. If there is serious division in the Council, if the Members of the League are required, as under the existing Covenant, to form an opinion in the light of their own conscience, is it fair to place them in such a dilemma that they will either have to violate their individual undertaking, entered into in good faith, to take action against the aggressor whom they may have recognised as such, or perhaps to rush into an unthinkable war of each against all, to be the Don Quixotes of collective assistance, to set out alone to apply sanctions when, in the meantime, the collective instrument has proved unable to function?"

It is surprising, perhaps, that such possibilities should have been considered; let me hasten to say that we regard them all the more calmly, inasmuch as we consider them quite improbable. In point of fact, we think that, although the Council may at times, in perfect good faith, be divided in regard to concrete events, it has means for achieving unanimity in the future by adopting provisional measures; we consider that such means will become the more readily available, as it realises the necessity for obtaining the support of public opinion, and for keeping it informed, while following as far as possible the practice advocated by the President of the Assembly, in his reply to the speech of the President of the Council, of holding public meetings and avoiding in public defections which, obviously, are more liable to occur at secret meetings.

Unreal though this hypothesis may seem, we can assure those to whom it is causing anxiety that we recognise that the obligation under Article 16 is an individual one within the framework of a social organisation — that is to say, we recognise it as an individual obligation to co-operate in common action and, in all good faith, we can say that, in the hypothetical case of the League of Nations failing in its mission so completely that there is no common action and that defections outweigh allegiance, the whole social edifice would naturally collapse and individual undertakings would undergo the same fate.

I hasten to add that, in our opinion, such a hypothesis of despair finds no place in any legal system which presupposes the functioning of the League and, just as no constitution in the world provides for revolution, so the Covenant cannot be expected to provide for the possibility that a large number of Members may fail in their international obligations. On the contrary, we have a right to say that the only hypothesis we have to consider in connection with our legal texts is that of the good faith and goodwill of the majority.

Thus we arrive at the conclusion that a reasonable interpretation of the Covenant does already largely meet the apprehensions to which expression has been given. If, however, we cannot — or certain of us cannot — accept, as it stands, the amendment proposed — namely, to restrict to cases where unanimity had been established by the Council the obligations under Article 16, which are not at present subject to any conditions of the kind — that is because such a condition of unanimity is in itself too formal and too rigid. It might be possible with a much smaller Council, working under conditions of greater publicity and offering less danger of division, but such a further condition for the application of Article 16 would be inadmissible, as we cannot allow that the essential guarantee of the Covenant — the individual obligation — would be entirely destroyed merely because there might be on the Council, besides the aggressor State, another State secretly allied with it or not sufficiently alive to its own obligations as a Member of the League to carry out its undertakings. For this reason, we have not up to the present seen our way to considering any formulæ such as those which were proposed to us.

What will be the solution? I do not wish to constitute myself a prophet, but I think that, in the light of what I have told you, you will feel that, although the arguments put forward on one side must carry some weight — and I think I have brought that out — the objections of the other side are also worthy of consideration and we may quite possibly arrive at a less rigid settlement of the question of the application of sanctions than had been contemplated.

That is the point we have reached. I do not think that any one of us has changed his opinion to the extent of going over to the opposite side, but I believe we shall all agree, as I said just now, that we have understood one another's point of view and that a solution appears less difficult and more probable than last year, when M. Cassin submitted a report on the same subject.

We have summed up in our report, as conscientiously as possible, the legal and political aspects of the problem and enumerated the points of agreement and of difference, and we do not ask you to approve the report in the sense of inviting you to accept, here officially, as States, the opinions expressed in it. We realise that on such an important subject the delegations desire, before committing themselves officially, to be able to discuss the question and refer it to their Governments. We have drawn up a report which has been approved by the First Committee, and therefore carries a certain amount of moral authority. We think it may serve as a basis for subsequent discussions, and that must be our excuse for making it so long.

We also considered the question of procedure and realised that the problem of bringing the Covenant into harmony with the Pact was bound up with a different problem — the reduction of armaments.

Some of us are of opinion that if the Covenant is thus completed, clarified and brought into harmony with present-day international law, which prohibits recourse to war, its effective operation will be facilitated and the authority of our constitutional position will be considerably strengthened and that, in the circumstances, certain States will perhaps come to the Conference for the Reduction of Armaments with more confidence.

We also realised that the fears expressed by other States on the score of the repercussions of what they call the extension of sanctions — which is the theoretical extension of their obligations to give assistance — will be greatly mitigated if the Disarmament Conference leads to the conclusion of a sound, permanent and satisfactory Convention such as to satisfy the requirements of Article 8 of the Covenant both in letter and spirit, and world peace is consequently consolidated and the chances of conflict reduced to a minimum.

We thought that, in the circumstances, agreement would be considerably facilitated, even as regards those points on which there were still divergencies of view, if we postponed the establishment of a final text until the Disarmament Conference or after that Conference.

We have therefore suggested that the question of completing the texts and seeking a final agreement should be postponed, the work being referred to a temporary Committee which would meet between the two Assemblies and prepare texts for next year

The Council will decide the date on which this Committee is to meet, but we have suggested that it should be during the Conference, both on account of the logical connection between the two questions in the minds of certain States — though other States do not concur in their view — and also for reasons of economy. We shall have at Geneva, for months at a time, jurists of every nation represented on the League, and it is only natural that we should desire to take advantage of their presence and ask them to do this additional work in their spare time.

There is of course no question in our minds of including in the agenda of the Conference the problem of amending the Covenant in order to bring it into harmony with the Pact of Paris. That work would proceed side by side with that of the Conference. Indeed, it could not be otherwise, as certain States participating in the Conference are not Members of the League. It will be carried on at the same time as the work of the Conference and, we hope, will be harmonious with it. For my part, I am confident that both the Conference for the Reduction of Armaments and the Committee to settle the amendments to the Covenant will achieve entirely satisfactory results and solve this problem, which, as you must realise, strikes at the very heart of the League.

In conclusion, I submit, on behalf of the First Committee, the following draft resolution:

The Assembly,

Taking note of the report approved by the First Committee:

Reaffirms its intention of continuing the task of inserting in the Covenant of the League of Nations a general prohibition of recourse to war and the principle that the settlement of international disputes may only be sought by pacific methods;

Decides to create a committee consisting of representatives of all the Members of the League of Nations, which may meet during the Conference for the Reduction of Armaments for the purpose of seeking unanimous agreement on the bases indicated in the report and of drawing up a final text which may be voted by the Assembly at its next session;

Requests the Council to convene the Committee for the date which it considers appropriate;

Requests the Secretary-General to transmit the present resolution and the report to the Members of the League of Nations, in order that, if they consider it necessary, they may send to the Council their views as to the lines on which they think agreement could be attained.

The President:

Translation: As no one else has asked to speak, I shall consider that the Assembly has duly noted the report of the First Committee and adopted the accompanying draft resolution.

The draft resolution was adopted.

73. — SLAVERY: REPORT OF THE SIXTH COMMITTEE: RESOLUTION.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the discussion of the report of the Sixth Committee on slavery (Annex 18, document A.83.1931.VI).

(On the invitation of the President, M. Costa du Rels, Vice-Chairman of the Sixth Committee, and M. Loudon, Rapporteur, took their places on the platform.)

The President :

Translation : The Rapporteur will address the Assembly.

M. Loudon (Netherlands), Rapporteur :

Translation : It is an admitted fact that, despite the campaign instituted more than a century ago, to her lasting honour, by Great Britain, slavery — that blot on modern civilisation — is still found in many parts of the world.

It is rife in certain countries not represented on the League, and unfortunately there are also countries which do belong to the League where it still exists in various forms. The Governments of those latter countries, however, are by no means inactive and, far from condemning them, we ought — considering the tremendous difficulties with which they have to contend — to acknowledge their efforts to extirpate this evil.

Indeed, this homage was paid to them in the Sixth Committee. Count Apponyi and several other delegates, including myself, expressed their sincere admiration of the way in which that enlightened ruler, the Emperor of Abyssinia, has demonstrated his determination to abolish slavery, despite the difficulties he is encountering in eradicating throughout his vast empire a custom which is so deeply rooted there.

A tribute was also paid to the Liberian Government for its efforts to eliminate the evil, and the Sixth Committee intimated that the same feelings inspired it as regards all the Governments concerned which were resolutely adopting a similar course.

Those Governments need the League's support. That is why the British Government, protagonist in the fight against slavery — as shown by the work of the Anti-Slavery Society, now nearly a century old, and by the recent extremely important debate in the House of Lords — is constantly emphasising its keen interest in this problem.

Last year, the British delegation, regarding as inadequate the communications concerning slavery forwarded by Governments under the 1926 Slavery Convention, proposed the setting up first of a permanent Commission and then of a permanent advisory office. It was decided, however, before modifying the procedure which had been in existence for barely two years, to wait another year.

This year, the British delegation, in view of budget difficulties, has dropped its original proposal for the time being and proposed, through Lord Lytton, that the former Temporary Commission set up in 1923, which had never concluded its work, should be reappointed for a year, on the understanding that the expenditure involved should be reduced to a minimum.

This Commission, if re-established, would be instructed to examine the material on slavery collected since the publication of the last report of the Temporary Commission and to recommend to the next Assembly the measures of assistance which the League of Nations could render to those countries that have agreed to abolish slavery. It might also study the possibility of setting up a permanent office.

In the Sub-Committee appointed to examine this proposal, which was opposed in particular by the delegate of Portugal, I put forward, in the form of an amendment to the British text, a suggestion, which I had already made in the plenary Committee that, instead of the Temporary Commission, a Committee of three experts should be appointed, to be chosen exclusively on the grounds of their personal qualifications and competence.

The British proposal, which was supported by several delegates, won the day, and unanimity was achieved, but only after an amendment providing that a small committee of experts should be set up to examine the material and submit to the Council suggestions with a view to recommending to the next Assembly the measures of assistance which the League could render to countries that had agreed to abolish slavery and might request such assistance.

Count de Penha Garcia, delegate of Portugal, explained that his Government could not agree to the setting up of a Committee which was outside the framework of the Covenant and did not take into account the legal position created by the Slavery Convention. Subject to this reservation, he accepted the resolution adopted by the Sixth Committee.

M. Louwers, the Belgian delegate, also made a very pertinent legal observation, which is deserving of special mention.

He was, he said, in favour of the formula adopted, inasmuch as it did not imply control or interference in the internal affairs of States. If, on the other hand, it had done so, he could not, he said, have subscribed to it, as the Assembly had no authority to take such a decision either under the Covenant or under the 1926 Convention.

The draft resolution, which was duly submitted to the Fourth Committee in view of the expenditure involved by even a small committee of experts — whose number would be fixed by the Council — formed the subject, in the Fourth Committee, of a discussion which reflected the necessity of restricting expenditure during the present crisis.

The British delegation having given an assurance that the League expenditure on the committee of experts need not exceed 10,000 gold francs, as the British Government could, if necessary, furnish for this object a sum derived from a private source, the Fourth Committee offered no objection to the inclusion of this comparatively small item in the League budget for 1932.

I have the honour, therefore, on behalf of the Sixth Committee to submit to the Assembly for approval the report which you have before you and which I have only amended in a few unessential particulars in accordance with the Committee's wishes, together with the accompanying draft resolution, which reads as follows :

The Assembly,

Requests the Council to appoint for one year a small committee of experts to examine the material upon slavery which has been supplied or transmitted by Governments since the signature of the Convention of 1926. This committee will submit to the Council suggestions with a view to recommending to the next Assembly the measures of assistance which the League of Nations could render to those countries which have agreed to abolish slavery and which request such assistance.

The President :

Translation : Lord Lytton, delegate of the British Empire, will address the Assembly.

Lord Lytton (British Empire) : I desire in two or three words to support the draft resolution which has been presented to you by the Sixth Committee and also to associate my delegation with the remarks made by the Rapporteur regarding the efforts recently made by the Governments of certain countries to abolish slavery within their borders.

As it is not mentioned in the report of the Sixth Committee, I think the Assembly should know that the action recently taken by the Emperor of Abyssinia was brought to the notice of the Sixth Committee by Count Apponyi, and that Committee expressed its great satisfaction at this action and desired that its approval of the steps which he had taken should be conveyed to the Emperor.

It is a cause of great satisfaction to the British delegation that this year at last some step is to be taken in the direction which we, for two or three years, have advocated hitherto unsuccessfully. There are two reasons why the British delegation believes that this small temporary committee of experts will be of value. The first is that, since the framing of the Slavery Convention, it has become known that a considerable amount of material is available and in the possession of various Governments. That information, however, is of such a character that the Governments in whose hands it is are reluctant either to publish it or to take any action upon it until it has been submitted confidentially to the examination of qualified experts to test its value.

We hope, therefore, that this small committee, which it is proposed to set up for one year, may be able in the course of one session to go through this material, sift it, express an opinion upon it and advise the Council as to what action, if any, might be taken by the League to deal with the conditions revealed in those documents. We hope by this means to save the countries where conditions of slavery still exist from being prejudiced by the expression of public opinion insufficiently informed.

The second reason why we think this Committee may be valuable is that we hope the experience gained from its work may remove the anxieties which still exist in the minds of some delegations regarding our proposal for the creation of a Permanent Expert Bureau to examine documents relating to slavery.

I wish to emphasise that the Committee now to be set up is only a preparatory and advisory committee. It will take no action itself, it will merely report to the Council upon the documents submitted to it, but I feel confident that, as the result of its work, the Assembly next year will be better able to decide whether any action, and, if so, what action, is still needed to hasten the emancipation of the slaves that still exist in the world and to remove permanently this evil from society.

The President:

Translation: As no one else has asked to speak, I shall consider the report of the Sixth Committee and the accompanying resolution adopted.

The draft resolution was adopted.

74. — GIFT BY THE CANADIAN GOVERNMENT TO THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

The President:

Translation: Before proceeding with the agenda, I have an agreeable duty to perform. I ought to have performed it before, but I have been waiting for a suitable opportunity, and I will therefore take advantage of the present occasion.

The Canadian delegation has, on behalf of its Government, presented the League of Nations with a very fine portrait of Senator Dandurand, former President of the Assembly and Member of the Council, who has always been a friend of the League and who is, too, the personal friend of us all.

All of us who know Senator Dandurand and feel a warm affection for him must be glad to see him portrayed on this remarkably fine and expressive canvas, which is on view at the Secretariat. We are extremely grateful to the Canadian Government for the pleasure it has afforded us. We must congratulate the artist who has thus restored to us the presence of this distinguished man, who is beloved of all and has rendered such signal services to the League.

When making this magnificent gift to the League, the Canadian delegation expressed the hope that its example would be followed and that other portraits of Presidents of the Assembly would be offered to the League. This wish proves the deep interest which Canada takes in the men who are called by the League to direct its work.

I can assure the Canadian delegation on behalf of the Assembly that its wish has been interpreted in the spirit in which it was meant and that it will not be forgotten.

75. — PREPARATORY PROCEDURE TO BE FOLLOWED IN THE CASE OF GENERAL CONVENTIONS TO BE NEGOTIATED UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS: REPORT OF THE FIRST COMMITTEE: RESOLUTION.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the discussion of the draft resolution submitted by the First Committee on the question of the preparatory procedure to be followed in the case of general conventions to be negotiated under the auspices of the League of Nations (Annex 19, document A.80.1931.V).

(On the invitation of the President, M. Scialoja, Chairman of the First Committee, and Professor Giannini, Rapporteur, took their places on the platform.)

The President:

Translation: The Rapporteur will address the Assembly.

M. Giannini (Italy), Rapporteur:

Translation: The eleventh Assembly adopted a resolution relating to the drafting of international conventions concluded under the auspices of the League of Nations. Part IV of that resolution provided for the procedure to be followed in all cases in which the League might desire to conclude a convention, and was designed to facilitate, after conclusion, the ratification of the convention, which, according to the last part of that section of the resolution, was to be transmitted to the Governments for their observations and also to the technical organs of the League.

After the receipt of the replies of the Governments and of the observations of the technical organisations of the League the problem of the preparatory procedure to be followed in the case of general conventions to be negotiated under the auspices of the League was submitted to the First Committee.

The First Committee has amended certain paragraphs of the resolution, and I shall merely indicate the changes adopted. I may say that the Persian delegation made proposals with regard to other paragraphs of the resolution adopted by the eleventh Assembly, but the Committee considered that the subject of the Persian proposal could not be dealt with at our discussions.

The preamble to Part IV adopted by the Assembly last year and paragraphs 1 and 2 are unchanged. The essential amendment is that made in paragraph 3. It was thought that the Assembly should be the deciding factor in the matter of a draft convention, and it was also thought that, not only a convention to be prepared during a conference, but also the possibility of a protocol being drawn up by the Assembly itself, should be considered.

For this reason paragraph 3 was amended to read as follows:

"The draft convention and the observations of Governments (together with the answers to the questionnaire, if any) shall be communicated to the Assembly, and the Assembly shall then decide whether the subject appears prima facie suitable for the conclusion of a convention."

This amendment also involved an amendment to paragraph 4, which now reads:

"If the Assembly considers the subject prima facie suitable for the conclusion of a convention, the Council shall arrange for the preparation . . ."

Paragraph 5 has also been slightly amended, and now reads as follows:

"In the light of the results of this second consultation of the Governments, the Assembly shall decide whether a convention should be concluded and, if so, whether the draft should be submitted to a conference, the date of which it will request the Council to fix."

The amendments to this paragraph are the following: As regards the second consultation, the Assembly is to be the deciding factor instead of the Council, and provision is also made for the possibility of a draft convention being approved by the Assembly and being opened for signature by the States.

Finally, paragraph 7 has been slightly amended.

I should like to draw the attention of the Assembly to the fact that the first six paragraphs provide for the preparation of a convention by the organs of the League, while the last paragraph provides for the procedure to be followed in the case of a convention initiated either by the Assembly itself or by a Government. Consequently, in accordance with the suggestion made by the Swedish delegation, the scope of the provisions of paragraph 7 has been somewhat extended and the paragraph now reads as follows:

"The procedure set out in the preceding paragraphs will be followed, as far as possible, in the case of draft conventions, the desirability of which is recognised by a decision of the Assembly either on its own initiative or as the result of a proposal by a Government. In these cases, the Council will instruct either the Secretariat or some other organ of the League or specially selected experts to prepare the above-mentioned report, which shall subsequently be submitted to the Council."

This means that, if discussions by a conference are to be instituted on the initiative of a Government or of the Assembly, there will be a choice of three systems.

In the last paragraph it is indicated that this procedure is not absolute. It is stated that it will be followed "as far as possible" and, at the beginning of the resolution, the formula adopted by the preceding Assembly is retained: "The preparatory procedure should, in principle, be followed, except in the cases where . . . the Assembly or the Council consider other methods to be more appropriate".

The two proposals — that contained in the preamble and that inserted in paragraph 7 — tend to make the procedure proposed rather more flexible, for the following reasons: First, there are certain technical organisations of the League which have rules or a particular statute, and it is obviously not desired to change the procedure with regard to them; secondly, certain procedures are already provided for in particular conventions; and, finally, there is the general rule.

The procedure contemplated in the resolution, which is rather a long one, may be followed, but the obligation is not absolute: in other words, precautionary measures are indicated, designed to secure sound preparatory work, and it must always be borne in mind that this paragraph was contemplated in the resolutions of the last Assembly as likely to facilitate the conclusion of sound conventions, as regards both their ratification and their execution. The wording of the preamble and of paragraph 7 removes the doubts entertained by the technical organisations.

The following is the procedure intended: first, the attention of the Assembly is drawn to the fact that the adoption of a good preparatory procedure in the case of a convention does not mean that the convention will be good, just as good preparatory procedure in preparing a national law is calculated to produce a good law, but does not necessarily do so.

There remains the question of substance, which we discussed at the last Assembly — that is to say, that, while counselling precautionary measures with regard to the technical organisation of useful conferences, there still remains one factor to be considered, namely, the spirit of understanding among the nations, which alone can render possible agreement regarding the conclusion of conventions concerning international relations.

The amended text of Part IV of the resolution adopted by the last Assembly therefore reads as follows:

That, in the case of all general conventions to be negotiated under the auspices of the League of Nations, the following preparatory procedure should, in principle, be followed, except in the cases where previous conventions or arrangements have established a special procedure or where, owing to the nature of the questions to be treated or to special circumstances, the Assembly or the Council consider other methods to be more appropriate:

1. Where an organ of the League of Nations recommends the conclusion of a general convention on any matter, it shall prepare a memorandum explaining the objects which it is desired to achieve by the conclusion of the convention and the benefits which result therefrom. Such memorandum shall be submitted to the Council of the League of Nations.

2. If the Council approves the proposal in principle, a first draft convention shall be prepared and communicated, together with the explanatory memorandum, to Governments, with the request that, if they feel that the draft should be taken into consideration, they shall inform the Secretary-General of their views, both with regard to the main objects or the suggested means of attaining them, and also with regard to the draft convention. In some cases, it may be desirable to annex a specific questionnaire.

3. The draft convention and the observations of Governments (together with the answers to the questionnaire, if any) shall be communicated to the Assembly, and the Assembly shall then decide whether the subject appears prima facie suitable for the conclusion of a convention.

4. If the Assembly considers the subject prima facie suitable for the conclusion of a convention, the Council shall arrange for the preparation of a draft convention in the light of the replies received from Governments, and the new draft convention (together with the replies of other Governments) shall be transmitted to each Government with a request for their opinion on the provisions of the draft and any observations on the above-mentioned replies of the other Governments.

5. In the light of the results of this second consultation of the Governments, the Assembly shall decide whether a convention should be concluded and, if so, whether the draft should be submitted to a conference, the date of which it will request the Council to fix.

6. The Council, in fixing the date for the convocation of a conference, shall endeavour, as far as possible, to avoid two League of Nations conferences being held simultaneously, and to ensure the lapse of a reasonable interval between two conferences.

7. The procedure set out in the preceding paragraphs will be followed, as far as possible, in the case of draft conventions the desirability of which is recognised by a decision of the Assembly either on its own initiative or as the result of a proposal by a Government. In these cases, the Council will instruct either the Secretariat or some other organ of the League or specially selected experts to prepare the above-mentioned report, which shall subsequently be submitted to the Council.

76. — PROGRESSIVE CODIFICATION OF INTERNATIONAL LAW: RESOLUTIONS PROPOSED BY THE FIRST COMMITTEE.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the examination of the draft resolution submitted by the First Committee to the Assembly on the progressive codification of international law (document A.79.1931.V).

M. Giannini, delegate of Italy and Rapporteur, will address the Assembly.

M. Giannini (Italy), Rapporteur:

Translation: The last few days of the first Conference for the Codification of International Law were characterised by what might be termed a necrological spirit as far as the future action to be taken in the matter of codification was concerned; but the Drafting Committee, of which I had the honour to be Chairman, retained its optimism and put forward two recommendations in connection with the continuance of the work of codification.

The eleventh Assembly too was somewhat affected by this pessimistic spirit, but in the end optimism triumphed, and we adopted a resolution to the effect that the work of codification should be continued, in view of the fact that practical suggestions had been submitted by the Conference itself with regard to the continuance of the work.

Certain recommendations were communicated to the Governments for their observations, and a great many observations were received. The First Committee has considered these; and this time, without re-discussing the preliminary question of the desirability or otherwise of resuming the work of codification, it merely prepared the rules of procedure to be followed for the continuation of this work.

What method does it recommend?

The first question that arose was whether special rules of procedure should be laid down for the work of codification. A tendency in favour of independent provisions was manifested by the eleventh Assembly itself. During the present Assembly, it has been strongly urged that, while due consideration should be given to the general provisions included in the resolution I mentioned just now, special provisions should be adopted, the two resolutions being brought into harmony as far as possible. That is the spirit in which the resolution submitted to the present Assembly was conceived.

The first paragraph of this resolution deals with the methods to be followed in submitting proposals. Any State or group of States, whether Members of the League or not, may propose to the Assembly a subject or subjects with respect to which codification might be undertaken. Such proposals, together with a memorandum containing the necessary explanations, should be sent before March 1st to the Secretary-General, in order that he may communicate them to Governments and insert them in the agenda of the Assembly. The fixing of this date ensures a minimum period of six months for the preliminary study of any proposals submitted to the League.

Paragraph 2 deals with the consideration of such proposals by the Assembly and states that they will be considered by the Assembly, which will decide whether the subjects proposed appear prima facie suitable for codification.

Paragraph 3, on the other hand, concerns the preparations for the work and provides that, if the investigation of a proposed subject is approved by the Assembly and if no existing organ of the League is competent to deal with it, the Assembly will request the Council to set up a committee of experts, which will be asked, with the assistance of the Secretary-General of the League of Nations, to make the necessary enquiries and to prepare a draft convention on the subject, to be reported to the Council with an explanatory statement.

Thus, apart from certain exceptional cases, a committee of experts will be asked to prepare a draft, which will be accompanied by an explanatory report. The report prepared by the committee of experts will be transmitted by the Council to the Assembly, which will then decide whether the subject is provisionally to be retained as a subject for codification. The second phase, the consideration, not of the question, but of the draft, is also reserved for the Assembly. If this is decided affirmatively, the Assembly will ask the Secretary-General to transmit the report to the Governments of the Members of the League and to non-Member States for their comments. The comments of the Governments will be submitted to the committee of experts, which may decide to retain the draft already prepared, as it stands, or to revise it. These two contingencies are provided for in sub-paragraphs 2 and 3 of paragraph 5; if the committee of experts revises the draft, the revised draft will be submitted to the Governments for their comments and, together with the comments received, will be transmitted to the Assembly, which will then decide whether any further action should be taken in the matter.

Thus, according to the procedure contemplated, and in view of the fact that the contingencies provided for in paragraph 5 will certainly arise, the Assembly will have to decide three times as to the calling of a conference. This procedure may seem, at first sight, rather long. Indeed I am afraid I thought so myself, but I have come to agree entirely with the Committee in thinking that we cannot be too cautious. It is desired, therefore, that, before calling a conference, the States should take three decisions at the Assembly, as to whether the question should be embodied in a convention, in order to prevent hasty decisions being taken in the matter and to avoid any difficulties which might arise out of the examination of such a question by a conference.

I should like, however, to point out that the preamble contains a clause to the effect that, to this end, the Assembly decides to establish the following procedure for the future, except in so far as, in particular cases, special resolutions would provide to the contrary. This clause, which is designed to meet certain apprehensions, and which was suggested by the Chairman of the First Committee, M. Scialoja, is intended to make it clear that it is not desired to establish an absolute code of procedure. A normal procedure is to be adopted in cases where no special procedure is adopted — that is to say, there is no reason to suppose that this provision regarding procedure is liable to render abortive resolutions not in accordance with the procedure established.

Finally I should like to draw the Assembly's attention to the fact that the preamble, which is connected with the resolution adopted by the eleventh Assembly, emphasises once more our desire to continue the work of codification, but it adds: " with the object of drawing up conventions which will place the relations of States on a legal and secure basis without jeopardising the customary international law which should result progressively from the practice of States and the development of international jurisprudence ".

Without defining the limits of codification, therefore, it is desired to make it clear, in the preamble, that we do not wish to arrest the course of history and that the development of customary law and inter-State law should continue.

Finally, the Assembly adopted two recommendations, which are to some extent a restatement of Nos. II and III adopted by the Codification Conference.

The first recommendation is designed to ensure that, in relation with the further work in connection with the codification of international law, the international and national scientific institutes should collaborate in the work undertaken by the League. During the Codification Conference, very remarkable work was done by certain national and international institutes, and it was therefore thought that such collaboration should not be disregarded, but should, on the contrary, be intensified.

This recommendation mentions national and international organisations, for two reasons: There are international organisations which work in a spirit of international co-operation; but there are also important national organisations which are imbued with the same spirit and have carried out enquiries and studies and furnished assistance, services which deserve not to be forgotten. Our colleague of the German delegation has already emphasised the co-operation which certain German institutes have decided to afford, and we should all be prepared to say as much with regard to certain parts of the work of codification. Thus, in connection with the codification of legislation regulating sales now being dealt with by the Rome Institute, the Berlin Institute has done admirable preparatory work.

The recommendation to which I am now referring is in effect the result of the work done at The Hague, and reproduces almost word for word the text of the recommendation adopted th re. Our colleague, Baron Descamps, had contemplated the setting up of a research committee for the advancement of international law within the framework of the League. The Committee, though it appreciated this proposal, did not see its way to accepting it, for two reasons — expediency and the imperative need for economy.

The second recommendation to which I would draw your attention also reproduces a Hague proposal and provides that the work of codification undertaken by the League should be carried on in concert with that of the international conferences of American States.

The Pan-American preparatory work for codification will begin next month, and our recommendation has come just in time to have a practical effect. We were of opinion that the work done in America should be carried on in concert with that of the League. That it should be in concert is necessary, as there can be no question in matters of justice and law of discriminating between nations in different continents. There cannot be different bases of justice and law in different nations.

The First Committee therefore submits for your adoption the following draft resolutions:

The Assembly recalls that the resolution of September 22nd, 1924, emphasised the progressive character of the codification of international law which should be undertaken, and, in view of the recommendations of the First Conference for the Codification of International Law held at The Hague in 1930, it decides to continue the work of codification with the object of drawing up conventions which will place the relations of States on a legal and secure basis without jeopardising the customary international law which should result progressively from the practice of States and the development of international jurisprudence. To this end, the Assembly decides to establish the following procedure for the future, except in so far as, in particular cases, special resolutions provide to the contrary.

1. Any State or group of States, whether Members of the League or not, may propose to the Assembly a subject or subjects with respect to which codification by international conventions should be undertaken. Such proposals, together with a memorandum containing the necessary explanatory matter, should be sent, before March 1st, to the Secretary-General, in order that he may communicate them to Governments and insert them in the agenda of the Assembly.

2. Any such proposals will be considered by the Assembly, which will decide whether the subjects proposed appear prima facie suitable for codification.

3. If the investigation of a proposed subject is approved by the Assembly and if no existing organ of the League is competent to deal with it, the Assembly will request the Council to set up a committee of experts, which will be asked, with the assistance of the Secretary-General of the League of Nations, to make the necessary enquiries and to prepare a draft convention on the subject, to be reported to the Council with an explanatory statement.

4. The Council will transmit such report to the Assembly, which will then decide whether the subject is provisionally to be retained as a subject for codification. If this is decided affirmatively, the Assembly will ask the Secretary-General to transmit the said report to the Governments of the Members of the League and non-Member States for their comments.

5. The committee of experts, if it considers it desirable to do so, will revise the draft in the light of the comments made by the Governments.

If the committee of experts revises the draft, the revised draft will be submitted to the Governments for their comments and, together with the comments received, will be transmitted to the Assembly, which will then decide finally whether any further action should be taken in the matter and, if so, if the draft should be submitted to a codification conference.

If the committee does not see any reason to revise the draft, it will be transmitted, together with the comments of the Governments, to the Assembly, which will then decide finally whether any further action should be taken and, if so, if the draft should be submitted to a codification conference.

The Assembly recommends:

(1) That, in relation with the further work in connection with the codification of international law, the international and national scientific institute should collaborate in the work undertaken by the League of Nations;

(2) That the work of codification undertaken by the League of Nations should be carried on in concert with the conferences of the American States.

77. — PROPOSAL OF THE GOVERNMENT OF FINLAND TO CONFER ON THE PERMANENT COURT OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE JURISDICTION AS A TRIBUNAL OF APPEAL IN RESPECT OF ARBITRAL TRIBUNALS ESTABLISHED BY STATES: RESOLUTION PROPOSED BY THE FIRST COMMITTEE.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the discussion of the resolution (document A.82.1931.V) submitted by the First Committee in connection with the proposal of the Government of Finland to confer on the Permanent Court of International Justice jurisdiction as a tribunal of appeal in respect of arbitral tribunals established by States.

(On the invitation of the President, M. Raestad, Rapporteur, took his place on the platform.)

The President:

Translation: The Rapporteur will address the Assembly.

M. Raestad (Norway), Rapporteur:

Translation: The First Committee requested a Sub-Committee to study the Finnish proposal to confer on the Permanent Court of International Justice jurisdiction as a tribunal of appeal in respect of arbitral tribunals established by States. That Sub-Committee framed a draft recommendation and a draft Protocol, which formed the subject of an important discussion in the First Committee.

The discussion showed that the Committee as a whole was of opinion that appropriate measures should be taken, as far as possible, to obviate the disadvantages to which disputes with regard to the validity of arbitral awards might give rise. Nevertheless, it appeared that there was still some uncertainty as to the means to be employed in attaining this object. The nature of the difficulties encountered will be seen from the report dated May 29th, 1930, of the Committee of Five Jurists appointed by the Council, and from the report and proposals of the Sub-Committee and the Minutes of the First Committee.

I have the honour, therefore, to propose to the Assembly that it should adopt the following draft resolution submitted by the First Committee:

The Assembly,

Noting the report of the Committee set up by the Council to study the Finnish proposal to confer on the Permanent Court of International Justice jurisdiction as a tribunal of appeal in respect of arbitral tribunals established by States;

Noting also the report of the Sub-Committee of the First Committee, and

Thanking both Committees for their valuable work:

Notes that thorough discussion of the question in the First Committee has shown that it presents many aspects on which sufficient light has not yet been thrown, and

Decides to adjourn the question for examination at a later session.

The President:

Translation: As no one else has asked to speak, I shall consider the draft resolution adopted.

78. — SITUATION AS REGARDS THE ENTRY INTO FORCE OF THE PROTOCOL OF SEPTEMBER 14th, 1929, CONCERNING THE REVISION OF THE STATUTE OF THE PERMANENT COURT OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE: REPORT OF THE FIRST COMMITTEE: RESOLUTION.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the discussion of the report of the First Committee on the entry into force of the Protocol of September 14th, 1929, concerning the revision of the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice (document A.81.1931.V).

(On the invitation of the President, M. Pilotti, Rapporteur, took his place on the platform.)

The President:

Translation: The Rapporteur will address the Assembly.

M. Pilotti (Italy), Rapporteur :

Translation : Although the Protocol of September 14th, 1929, did not enter into force on the date originally contemplated (paragraph 4), the Assembly last year accepted the view that it could subsequently come into force, if the necessary ratifications were received.

One of the resolutions regarding the Permanent Court which were adopted by the Assembly on September 25th, 1930, asked the Court to take certain action as regards its sessions and the attendance of judges " pending the entry into force of the Protocol ". The Court acceded to this request and. at the beginning of this year, made certain slight amendments to its rules.

Another of these resolutions invited the States which had not yet done so to ratify the Protocol. In his oral statement to the Assembly, the Rapporteur of the First Committee indicated that the ratifications necessary would be those of all the States which had ratified the Protocol of Signature of the Court's Statute of December 16th, 1920. It should be noted, further, that paragraph 7 of the Protocol provides :

> " For the purposes of the present Protocol the United States of America shall be in the same position as a State which has ratified the Protocol of December 16th, 1920. "

What is the present position with regard to the ratifications ? Thirty-eight Members of the League have so far ratified both Protocols ; the ratification of Cuba is, however, subject to reservations as stated below.

The Members of the League and non-Member States which have ratified the Protocol of 1920 but have not yet ratified that of 1929, are the following : Abyssinia, Brazil, Chile, Lithuania, Panama, Uruguay and Venezuela.

It should be pointed out that all these States have signed the Protocol of 1929, with the exception of Abyssinia.

The following Members of the League have not ratified either Protocol, but, with the exception of the Argentine and Honduras, they have signed the Protocol of 1929 : Argentine, Bolivia, Colombia, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, Paraguay and Peru.

The United States of America have signed, but not yet ratified, the Protocol of 1920 and that of 1929.

The Cuban ratification of the Protocol of 1929 was subject to reservations (a) regarding paragraph 4 of the Protocol relating to its entry into force on September 1st, 1930, if the States whose ratification was necessary, but which had not ratified, gave their consent, and (b) regarding the new text of Article 23 of the Court's Statute.

The new text of Article 23 of the Court's Statute deals, as the Assembly will remember, with the abolition of the former sessions of the Court — that is to say, the Court will sit practically all the year round, except during the annual vacation.

In the letter forwarding the instrument of ratification to the Secretary-General, the Cuban Government made the following declaration :

> " I have, at the same time, the honour to inform you that the Cuban Government consider that the Protocol will not affect the position of judges already elected, and to request you to take note thereof. "

I would remind the Assembly that the question referred to in this declaration had already been raised by other States, and that it had been agreed that it could only be decided by the Court. Consequently, the declaration does not really embody a reservation.

In execution of the instructions given to him by the Council's resolution of June 17th, 1927, in regard to reservations attached to a ratification of a Convention and not provided for by the terms of the Convention, the Secretary-General, by a letter of January 22nd, 1931, invited the other Governments concerned to inform him whether they were able to accept the reservations made by Cuba. He at the same time informed them of the declaration made by the Cuban Government. In view of the nature of the Protocol, and the provisions of its seventh paragraph, the letter was addressed to all the Members of the League, Brazil and the United States of America.

The replies to this letter which had been received up to the date of the present report may be summarised as follows :

> (1) No objection has been raised to the reservation of paragraph 4 of the Protocol ;
> (2) The declaration of the Cuban Government is regarded as referring to a matter which the Assembly last year considered to lie within the competence of the Court itself ;
> (3) As regards the reservation of the new text of Article 23 of the Court's Statute, the replies which had been received at the date of the present report show that a large number of Members of the League of Nations which have ratified the Protocol do not feel able to accept the reservation, and that, accordingly, its maintenance would endanger the coming into force of the Protocol.

It is therefore with particular satisfaction that the First Committee welcomed the following statement which was submitted to it by M. Ferrara, first delegate of Cuba :

> " If, as seems likely from the information which you have, Cuba is asked to withdraw its reservation upon the Convention dealing with the new Statute of the Permanent Court, we request you to state that the Government, having regard to the situation which you anticipate, would be disposed to ask the Senate to withdraw the reservations, and that this attitude does not arise from a change of view, but is due to its desire to contribute wholeheartedly to the development of the League of Nations and of its organs. The Chairman of the Committee of the Senate on Foreign Affairs, who has been consulted, has given a favourable reply. "

In this connection, the first delegate of Cuba pointed out that all that really remained of his Government's reservations was the non-admission of the principle adopted in 1929 with regard to the putting into force of the Convention by presumed ratifications on September 1st, 1930.

Further, the delegate of Chile informed the Committee that his Government had felt that it should await the discussion at the Assembly of the reservations made by the Government of Cuba before pronouncing upon the ratification of the Protocol. He added that the Chilian delegation had felt particular satisfaction in noting the declaration made in the name of the Government of Cuba, which made it possible to hope that the latter Government would withdraw its reservation at a very early date, which would facilitate the decision to be taken by the Government of Chile.

In view of these considerations, the First Committee proposes that the Assembly should adopt the following draft resolution:

The Assembly,

Notes with satisfaction that the Protocol of September 14th, 1929, concerning the Revision of the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice has now obtained almost all the ratifications necessary to bring it into force;

Notes, however, that the ratification of Cuba is subject to a reservation which other States that have ratified the Protocol have not felt able to accept;

Considers that a reservation can only be made at the moment of ratification if all the other signatory States agree or if such a reservation has been provided for in the text of the Convention;

Takes note that the Cuban Government has, through its first delegate, declared that it contemplates the withdrawal of the said reservation, and expresses its thanks to the Cuban Government for the spirit of conciliation which it has shown in the matter;

Reaffirms the hope which it expressed at its last session that the States which have not so far ratified the Protocol will proceed to do so as soon as possible; and

Instructs the Secretary-General to present to the Assembly, for consideration at its next session, a statement showing the ratifications received by the Protocol of September 14th, 1929.

The President:

Translation: As no one else has asked to speak, I shall consider the report and the draft resolution adopted.

79. — RUSSIAN, ARMENIAN, ASSYRIAN, ASSYRO-CHALDEAN AND TURKISH REFUGEES: REPORT OF THE SIXTH COMMITTEE: RESOLUTIONS.

The President:

Translation: We now come to the last item of the agenda, the discussion of the report of the Sixth Committee on questions relating to refugees (Annex 20, document A.85.1931).

(On the invitation of the President, M. Fotitch, Rapporteur, took his place on the platform.)

The President:

Translation: The Rapporteur will address the Assembly.

M. Fotitch (Yugoslavia), Rapporteur:

Translation: I will not comment in detail upon the report on the work of the Refugees Office, but I should like to mention a few points which seem to me to be worthy of note.

I should like first of all, on behalf of the Sixth Committee, to express once more our sincere gratitude to Dr. Max Huber, former President of the Permanent Court of International Justice and President of the International Red Cross, for having agreed to act as President of the Governing Body of the Office and for his devotion in carrying on the humanitarian work initiated by the late Dr. Nansen.

Although the days of the Office are now numbered and the scheme for its liquidation has already been approved, it still has important work to do, and we may be sure that thousands of unfortunate people still look to it for assistance.

Thus, the question of the transfer of Armenian refugees from Bulgaria and Greece to Armenia has again arisen. Dr. Nansen had already taken up the question, but, in view of the material and financial difficulties, which seemed to him to be insuperable, he was obliged in 1927 to give up his scheme. Now the responsible Armenian refugees organisations have informed the Office that the preliminary work necessary for the settlement of these refugees has already been done by the Government of the Erivan Republic, so that 6,000 refugees can be transferred immediately and 4,000 others at the end of this year.

This is a question which will occupy the attention of the Governing Body of the Office, and we may be certain that it will be solved in the best interests of the refugees.

As regards the Armenian refugees in Syria, we have learnt with great satisfaction that 25,000 have already been settled and that the remaining 15,000 will be settled between now and the end of 1933.

In order to pursue its work, the Office needs other funds besides those derived from the League contribution, which covers the administrative expenditure. The Office draws its revenue from two sources — the proceeds from the sale of Nansen stamps and the response to appeals to public charity by means of collections.

The proceeds from the sale of the Nansen stamp have this year yielded 100,000 Swiss francs, which has been derived from about 30 per cent of the total number of refugees. If all the Governments would enforce the Nansen stamp issue, the revenue from that source could easily be trebled, which would greatly assist the Office in its work.

In May last, a moving appeal was signed by the most eminent politicians with a view to obtaining contributions with a view to the establishment of a Nansen Memorial Fund in order to continue the philanthropic work commenced by Dr. Nansen. This appeal revealed the misery of thousands of refugees to whom no help had been rendered despite Dr. Nansen's efforts, and urged all nations, in the name of solidarity and humanity, to supply fresh funds to enable the Office to complete Dr. Nansen's work.

The appeal was not in vain. The Office has received from each of the national societies of Denmark and Great Britain a sum of 100,000 Swiss francs, and the Norwegian delegation has just informed the Office that Norway will contribute a sum of approximately 350,000 Swiss francs — an act of generosity worthy of the memory of Dr. Nansen.

We venture to repeat from this platform the appeal in favour of this work, and we are convinced that, in spite of the difficult times through which almost all countries are now passing, the spirit of solidarity will not allow any to forget those whose fate has been particularly hard.

In conclusion, I propose the adoption of the following draft resolutions:

The Assembly,

Recognises the endeavours made by the Governing Body of the Office to comply with the request of the eleventh Assembly to prepare a plan for the liquidation of the Office before the end of 1939, and notes that it has prepared a scheme which gives effect to the suggestion made by the Supervisory Commission that the budget of the Office should be reduced by approximately 10 per cent per annum;

Recommends the adoption of the plan of liquidation proposed by the Governing Body and of the Rules of Procedure and Financial and Staff Regulations of the Office;

With a view to facilitate the liquidation by the Office of its staff:

Invites the Secretary-General of the League and the Director of the International Labour Office to accord, as far as possible, a preference to that staff when vacancies occur in their respective organisations;

Requests the Governing Body of the Office, in its future reports to the Assembly, to give full information concerning the various aspects of the refugee problems and the measures taken and contemplated by the Office for their solution;

Invites the Governments to encourage and facilitate the creation in their territories of National Committees for the Nansen Memorial Fund;

Requests the Governing Body of the Office, in consultation with the Inter-Governmental Advisory Commission for Refugees, to consider the advisability of preparing a Convention to ensure the protection of the refugees on the liquidation of the Office:

Recommends that the Belgian Government be invited to nominate a delegate to the Inter-Governmental Advisory Commission for Refugees;

Requests the Council to communicate to the Governments the recommendations adopted by the Inter-Governmental Advisory Commission for Refugees at its fourth session concerning certain facilities for the refugees.

The President:

Translation: As no one else has asked to speak, I shall consider the report of the Sixth Committee and the accompanying draft resolution adopted.

80. — NATIONALITY OF WOMEN: REPORT OF THE FIRST COMMITTEE: RESOLUTION.

The President:

Translation: The first item on the agenda is the discussion of the report of the First Committee on the question of the nationality of women (Annex 21, document A.84.1931.V).

(On the invitation of the President, M. Scialoja, Chairman of the First Committee, and Mr. Beckett, Rapporteur, took their places on the platform.)

The President:

Translation: The Rapporteur will address the Assembly.

Mr. Beckett (British Empire), Rapporteur:

I beg to present the report of the First Committee on the subject of the nationality of women. The report and the resolution which is annexed thereto have been printed in English and French, and there is nothing which I need add to what is said in the written document.

The President:

Translation: Dame Edith Lyttelton, delegate of the British Empire, will address the Assembly.

Dame Edith Lyttelton (British Empire):

I only want to say a very few words this morning, not on the legal aspects of the resolution before you, but to raise one or two points on the human aspect. You will, I know, all consent to the women's views being put before your Governments, for all that is asked of you is a reconsideration of those views, and your reports will, of course, influence your Governments very greatly. I therefore want to give you one or two of the reasons why women like myself feel strongly on this matter.

We women see no reason why we should not be the equals of men in this matter of nationality. Providence makes no distinction of sex here. Neither men nor women have control over what country they shall be born in. Whatever our sex may happen to be, we are born German, French, English, as the case may be, and it is just as easy to tell to what nationality a woman belongs as to what nationality a man be ongs. Somet mes I think it is even easier, especially in the case of French women, because they have that marvellous talent for dress. But I must no be frivolous about this, because I do not feel frivolous at all.

We want to know why men abrogate to themselves the power to determine the nationality that has been given us by Providence; we do not understand their right to do it. We do not want our nationality to be treated as a coat or garment which a man can cut or alter or dye or throw away just as he likes. We do not think that this is fair or that it is giving us a proper place.

Two arguments are always brought against us. In the first place, and this I have heard many times this week, we are asked why, at this moment in the world's crisis, we should bother about such a small thing. I do not think this is a fair argument. You might just as well ask why men should be bothering this week about the codification of international law, or why are they bothering about an exhibition at Berne or about the protection of whales. It seems to me that this question of women's nationality is as important as the well-being of a large animal in the sea. This matter, it may be added, will not cost the League one penny.

Another argument which has always been brought against us is this: by granting married women the control of their nationality, you are helping to destroy the unity of the family. To men the unity of the family means a very different thing from what it means to us. To men's minds unity in the family means autocracy in the family. This argument about unity is a bugbear, and I should like to examine it for a moment. Take the case of women who for various rea ons, sometimes perfectly practical and material reasons, adopt the nationality of their husbands. In such cases this argument does not apply, because there is no trouble.

Take, however, the other case of a woman who, for the same kind of reasons, and also for sentimental reasons, does not wish to lose her nationality. There are many hard cases. There are the cases of statelessness, and there are the cases where the husband changes his nationality after marriage. It is not only war that makes women love their country, it is something intimate, their inner being, their soul. When this yearning is present, and there is added to it soreness, bitterness, a grievance, what becomes of the unity of the family? It is only a unity which is imposed by a legal document, a unity kept intact by force. I do not think there is very much to idealise about in that.

Real fundamental unity is founded on respect. All these ideas now in the minds of women are, I think, a little new to even the most kindly, advanced and, from our point of view, progressive men. Men have for so long treated us as inferior beings — I do not mean this in a disagreeable way — but their habit of mind has been to look upon us as not having the same rights as themselves, and it is very difficult for them to realise the change that has come over the scene. It is quite a short time ago since, in my own country, every penny a woman made by her work belonged legally to her husband. It is only sixty years ago that, in our House of Commons, a member spoke of a well-known woman — many of you will know her name, Mrs. Fawcett; a very remarkable woman, a good wife and mother — as having disgraced herself because she did exactly what I am doing now, she stood on a public platform and spoke.

Fortunately, men's minds have changed, and I think this argument about the unity of the family is a remnant of the old days when woman was looked upon as the property of man. Such obsolete inequalities in customs and laws are things that have been left behind in the evolution of the State, and I think that, like other things of the sort, they should be cut out. The situation is exactly the same as that of the appendix in our bodies. We are told that this is a remnant of an old evolution. If it begins to show trouble, wise people cut it out before it festers, and I think the same thing applies to this question of the nationality of women. Cut it out before it festers and becomes septic, and the body politic will be all the stronger and saner for it.

Before I close, I want to tell you an old story of an Irish Catholic saint in the ninth century. There was a hermit called St. Senan and he lived on an island: the one thing he prayed for every day was that no woman should ever set foot on that island. But there was another saint called St. Canair, and she came across the sea in a boat, and, when St. Senan saw her arrive, he hurried down to the shore and said: "God will not allow you to put a foot upon this island". Then St. Canair made what I think must have been the first feminist speech recorded in history. She exclaimed: "What right have you to say that I am not to set foot on this island? Did not a woman bear the Lord? Did not a woman wash His feet?" She also mentioned a whole lot of other things — in fact, she made a most remarkable speech. In the end, St. Senan was so moved by her words that he let her come on the island and she lived there until she died. What we are asking you to do is to give us a place on your island. If you will do it, it will be given to us, as it was to St. Canair a thousand years ago, to dwell beside you in equal partnership, equal in liberty and equal in nationality.

The President:

Translation: Mme Vergara, delegate of Chile, will address the Assembly.

Mme Vergara (Chile):

Translation: The Chilian delegation has listened with great pleasure to the speech of the British delegate and approves the report on the nationality of women which Mr. Beckett has just submitted to the Assembly.

On behalf of my delegation I should, however, like to make one observation on the report. The delegation of Chile submitted an amendment to the British proposal — namely, that the Women's Advisory Committee should be asked to continue its work.

The last paragraph of the draft resolution makes it quite clear that the amendment was taken into consideration, since it assigns to the Women's Committee the right to continue to present any observations which it thinks fit. But the report states: "It is hoped that this Committee will be able to make the necessary arrangements to continue in being and to serve as a medium for voicing the important current of opinion which it represents".

As the wording of this observation might lead to a misunderstanding regarding the Committee's future existence, it was explained that the reservation related only to economic difficulties which might jeopardise the Committee's existence.

I should like to take this opportunity of stressing the point that the speeches in the First Committee make it clear that the existence of the Women's Advisory Committee will not necessitate any expenditure by the League.

The Chilian delegation desires, further, to express its satisfaction that this question — a fundamental one for women — is finally being examined by the League. Our pleasure is derived from the fact that, in my own country, the laws governing the nationality of men and women have long been established on a basis of absolute equality and that the road now being traversed by the majority of civilised countries was taken by my country at the commencement of its history.

Now that the question is before the various Governments, I trust they will bear in mind that the problem contains an element which cannot and will not be removed; that element is woman. Only by taking that fact into consideration can a genuine solution be reached, for the problem does not admit of a sham solution. Whatever the means devised for remedying the present position, if they do not attack the evil at its root. they will only serve to postpone the solution and intensify the struggle. On the other hand, when women find that men are honestly examining their grievances — that is, when women no longer distrust man-made methods — then, and then only, will men feel that their peace of mind is assured.

The problem is a vital one, and we must not be afraid to face it squarely. Above all, we must not treat it sentimentally, nor must we forget that, nowadays, obligations and burdens are borne equally, and it is only fair that rights should be allocated on the same equitable principle.

We must not become distracted by imagining that we are heading straight for anarchy and confusion. Just as a human being adapts himself to the various stages of life, and does not suffer in old age from the same causes as in youth, so society adapts itself to the various conditions that mould it.

That is why a national of a country such as Chile, Uruguay or the Argentine can only smile when he observes the difference between the lurid picture of society some delegates have drawn, if women's emancipation continues, and the picture he finds in his own country.

Chile, whose political constitution from the outset provided for absolute equality as regards nationality rights for both sexes, is a country in which equality has in no way jeopardised the unity of the family. My Government, therefore, is in full accord with the measures taken by countries desirous of bringing about a situation which, morally and materially, has yielded such satisfactory results. Those results it was that determined the action of the Chilian Government's representative at the Hague Conference for the Codification of International Law, when he submitted the following resolution:

> "The contracting parties agree that, from the coming into effect of this Convention, there shall be no distinction based on sex in their law and practice relating to nationality."

That has been, and still is, my Government's attitude.

The President:

Translation: Mlle. Campoamor, delegate of Spain, will address the Assembly.

Mlle. Campoamor (Spain):

Translation: The discussion of the report on the nationality of married women was terminated somewhat hurriedly owing to shortage of time, and my delegation has not been able to voice its opinion. I shall therefore venture to ask your attention for a few minutes in order to state our views, which are identical with the principles on which the laws of the new Spanish nation, now being framed, are based. They are true democratic principles: respect for the explicitly expressed judicial will as opposed to the implied expression of will, the principle maintained by jurists, when they upheld the doctrine that the nationality of a married woman must be determined without reference to her own desires.

My country has adopted this democratic principle, which it respects and which is the very essence of its proposals for a draft Legal Code, and it has adopted it more particularly with regard to those rights which, in the happy phrase of a great jurist, "follow the person as a shadow follows the body".

That was not my only reason for wishing to proclaim our views; a further reason was that my delegation would have liked to see embodied in the report certain considerations which it feels to be important. It asks that these considerations may be included in the Minutes to be transmitted to Governments, as has been done in the case of other opinions expressed in the First Committee and which form the subject of suggestions in the report. This is the case as regards the request made by the Catholic Women's Organisations, which view the question from the standpoint of the unity of the family. This, they think, is not impugned by the various conflicting laws at present in force relating to the nationality of married women. This request the Committee was asked to include in its report.

The Catholic Women's Organisations in question are: the St. Joan's Social and Political Alliance; the "Organisations chrétiennes de Belgique"; the "Ligue catholique pour le Suffrage des Femmes de Belgique": the Lithuanian Catholic Women's Alliance, and many other organisations consisting mainly of Catholic women, such as the "Union française pour le Suffrage des Femmes", the Irish National Council of Women, and the Ukrainian Committee for Women's Rights.

I therefore ask that the Minutes sent to the various countries shall include the letter from Catholic Women's Organisations, dealing precisely with the most delicate aspects of the discussion, in particular, the so-called unity of the family, which was alleged to be impugned by a resolution favourable to women's rights. As the Assembly will have just realised, that is not the view of all Catholics.

It remains for me, on behalf of my delegation, to express our satisfaction at the report of the women's organisations, which was so praiseworthy from the point of view of law and so fair and frank, examining as it did all the questions that arose at the Hague Conference and during the Committee's discussions and investigations. The Committee will, I trust, also recommend that the work of these women's organisations should be continued.

We are dealing with the eternal dispute regarding rights; but, in my view and in that of my delegation, the dispute ceases to be a dispute when it is examined calmly and dispassionately as a social problem. The whole aspect of the dispute alters, and one thinks rather of the possibility of legal and ocial peace brought about by justice.

Never since this eternal dispute regarding rights began has there been such a prospect of peace. In the beginning, before these pacific law meetings were instituted, legislators had the whip hand and women fought; jealously guarding the approaches to the miraculous well of law, the legislators refused to admit women who, eager for their rights and for justice, laid siege. But since the question has been approached from another angle, as in the Fifth Committee and the Assembly, and since the voices from without, the voices of women speaking through their organisations, have been given a hearing, the besieged have been readier to open the door, and all are now imbibing the waters of the miraculous well of law and drawing from its depths, amidst a perfect feeling of peace and justice, the principles of equity and law in all their purity.

Thus has the League envisaged what seems to it the best formula for this delicate and thorny problem, in order that our rights may one day be recognised.

In conclusion, I desire to extend my delegation's congratulations to the Fifth Committee and to the Committee of Women's Organisations, which has given it such valuable assistance by carrying out the recommendation of Ihering — that is, by fighting for the rights of women. I trust also that the Committee will assist in the preparatory work for the next Assembly.

I desire to voice my delegation's approval of the report and request that the claims of the Catholic associations I have mentioned may be included in the records. I have just handed them to the President.

I may add that the Spanish delegation is of opinion that this subject should be examined at the next Assembly and that it should be solved objectively in accordance with principles of equality and justice.

The President:

Translation: M. Loudon, delegate of the Netherlands, will address the Assembly.

M. Loudon (Netherlands):

Translation: After the speeches of the three distinguished ladies, I must offer a slight apology for being a mere male.

In the First Committee, the Netherlands delegation set forth its views on the merits of the question now before us. I do not need, therefore, to repeat what our delegate said in that Committee. Nevertheless, in view of what the preceding speakers have said, my delegation desires to draw the Assembly's attention to one important aspect of the question.

In the draft resolution before us, it is proposed to ask the various Governments to submit their observations on the question of the nationality of married women, including their views regarding the Hague Nationality Convention. If the result were that the States signatories to the Convention did not ratify it, that would be most regrettable; for in the Netherlands delegation s view, the Convention contains provisions on the nationality of married women which, for the time being, represent the most that can be achieved as regards an international settlement of the question. So soon after the 1930 Conference, another consultation between the various Governments could not lead to practical results.

For these reasons, and in order particularly to avoid compromising one of the first results achieved by the League in the codification of international law, the Netherlands delegation hopes that the adoption of the draft resolution will not involve any delay in the coming into force of the Nationality Convention.

The President:

Translation: Dr. Ethel Osborne, delegate of Australia, will address the Assembly.

Dr. Ethel Osborne (Australia):

The resolution before this Assembly does not involve the merits or the demerits of this problem, and, after the very eloquent appeal made by the British del gate, anything I might have had to say on this problem I shall not venture to put forward. I wish, however, to say a few words concerning the resolution.

In the debates in the Committee on this problem, it was perfectly obvious that there was great diversity of opinion and information, and I feel that the situation has been perfectly met by throwing back upon the Governments of all States Members the responsibility for dealing with this problem and supplying further information to the next Assembly.

During the debates, the problem of the unity of the family was discussed, and also the question of the nationality of children; but on neither of those points had informat.on been definitely sought, and those problems require fresh investigation. I take it that the resolution, in the form in which it is now presented to the Assembly, is a very definite challenge to women's organisations. The International Consultative Committee, consisting of sixteen members, is in existence, and there is now a great opportunity for the members of that Committee to take this matter back to their national organisations, in which case the national organisations have an opportunity, such as has not existed for a very long time, of carrying on an educational campaign in regard to these problems, and of bringing before their respective countries the close connection between, and the necessity for an investigation into, the two questions — the unity of the family and the nationality of children.

As the representative of one of the newest countries in the world — Australia — a country which for its pioneering and development has depended equally upon women and upon men, and where, from the beginning, their equality and copartnership have been definitely recognised, I have pleasure in directing your attention to the recommendation that my Government gave me on this matter:

> "The Commonwealth Government of Australia favours the principle of equality of the sexes in matters of nationality, provided that such principle finds a general acceptance by other countries."

I trust that the women's organisations will take the opportunity which this resolution gives them of carrying on the work in their own countries.

The President:

Translation: The Assembly has before it the following draft resolution proposed by the First Committee:

The Assembly,

Having examined with the greatest interest the report of the Secretary-General on the question of the nationality of women, presented in accordance with the resolution of the Council of January 24th, 1931, and the report and proposals of the Committee of Representatives of Women's International Organisations which are annexed thereto:

Notes the desire of the said Committee that steps should be taken to bring about the reconsideration of the Hague Nationality Convention, bearing in mind the principle of equality between men and women;

Thanks the Committee of Representatives of Women's International Organisations for its report; and

Requests the Council, in harmony with Recommendation No. VI of the Conference for the Codification of International Law held at The Hague, March and April 1930, to transmit to all Governments the report of the Secretary-General on the question of the nationality of women, including the report of the Committee of Representatives of Women's International Organisations, and the letter of the International Union of Leagues of Catholic Women of August 19th, 1931, together with the Minutes of the First Committee of the Assembly on this subject, and to request Governments to submit their observations on this subject (including their views regarding the Hague Nationality Convention) for reconsideration of the matter by the thirteenth Assembly, to which any observations which the above-mentioned Committee thinks fit to present will be communicated.

As no one else has asked to speak, I shall regard the First Committee's report and the accompanying draft resolution adopted.

The draft resolution was adopted.

81. — FINANCIAL WORK OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS: REPORT OF THE SECOND COMMITTEE: RESOLUTION.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the discussion of the report of the Second Committee on the financial work of the League (Annex 22, document A.88.1931.II.A).

(On the invitation of the President, M. Bernís Carrasco, Rapporteur, took his place on the platform.)

The President:

Translation: M. Janson, Chairman of the Second Committee, has apologised for not being present, having been obliged to leave Geneva the day before yesterday.

The Rapporteur will address the Assembly.

M. Bernís Carrasco (Spain), Rapporteur:

Translation: The work of the Second Committee this year was devoted chiefly to the examination of financial questions. This was dictated by the necessities of the moment, by the economic crisis and the financial crisis.

I may say, however, that the time at the Committee's disposal was limited and it had to work hurriedly. In order not to take up the Assembly's time, I shall confine myself to making a few brief observations on the three parts of the report which I now have the honour to submit.

In the first part of the report, under the heading "General", attention is drawn to the statements made in the Second Committee by several delegates. It was observed, inter alia, that a fresh stage in our evolution has been reached which renders the assistance of the League and its Financial Organisation both urgent and indispensable. During the discussions, reference was made to the part that must be played, not only by individual initiative, but by Governments.

Further, the Committee examined the suggestions contained in M. Francqui's scheme for medium-term loans. It was suggested that, in the matter of short-term international debts, creditors and debtors should take steps to avoid any further shock to public confidence.

The general discussion in the Second Committee revealed the importance of the League's being adequately prepared and equipped with a view to affording prompt and effectual assistance to those who may need it.

This part of the report is important in that it reflects the suggestions, the recommendations and the sometimes urgent appeals, the anxiety and suffering and the optimistic or pessimistic statements of several delegates, all moved by a realisation of their responsibilities and duties.

The Assembly should know how privileged the Committee was in being able to count among its members M. Flandin, the distinguished French Minister of Finance, who, in the present grave crisis, which affects every one of us, lent the Committee the benefit of his experience and vast financial knowledge.

I may add that the importance of the general part of the report consists, first, in the fact that no special vote was taken nor was any material reservation made in connection with this part of the report, certain delegates' explanations, statements and interpellations having been incorporated in the Minutes, to which reference may be made for the interpretation of various passages; and, secondly, in the great authority of the delegates who took part in the discussion.

I now come to the second part of the report, which constitutes an account of the work of the League's Financial Organisation and at the same time essentially an acknowledgment of the great value of that work and an expression of the hope that it will contribute in an increasing degree towards solving the problems that now beset the world, as well as numerous special problems.

The work of the Financial Organisation during the past year covered a very wide field, and the second part of the report mentions the main problems with which it was concerned — agricultural credits, long-term credits, certain work of the Financial Committee, Bulgarian budget, budgets of Greece and Estonia, counterfeiting currency, work of the Gold Delegation, work of the Fiscal Committee, work of the Committee of Statistical Experts, Economic Intelligence Service.

As regards the last question, the Second Committee laid special emphasis last year, in a striking passage of its report, on the importance of this work.

The passage in question reads as follows:

"When we consider the magnitude of the losses from which the world suffers during a period of economic stagnation similar to that through which the world is now passing, it is impossible not to be impressed by the almost absolute failure of society, up to the present, to devise any means by which such disasters may be averted. The Committee felt that this problem was one which imperatively demanded co-ordinated and concerted study."

Passing now to the resolution, I wonder whether its scope can be regarded as a sort of diagonal line joining two points of view which occasionally are diametrically opposed to one another, or whether it would be better, repeating the thought of the Greek philosopher, to say that sometimes the part is greater than the whole. I for my part believe that the Assembly cannot fail to recognise the value of the concrete proposal contained in the third part of the resolution.

As a conclusion to these observations, I have the honour to submit to the Assembly the following draft resolution:

The Assembly,

(1) At this grave moment of financial and economic anxiety, urges on all Governments to do everything that lies in their power to promote international understanding and make possible the revival on a normal basis of national and international investment.

(2) It welcomes the decision of the Council laying down the conditions on which the Financial Committee should be prepared to consider applications from States which are desirous to obtain the assistance of the League, and requests the Council to follow closely the evolution of events and to take all measures necessary to assure that, at any moment, the decisions demanded by the situation may be taken without delay, and that the League of Nations may be in a position to render such service as may be demanded of it; and, in particular, to provide that the Financial Organisation of the League of Nations obtains the funds and the technical assistance necessary to permit it to afford to all States Members prompt and effective assistance whenever such assistance be sought, whether by means of delegations or advice or by any other means.

(3) In view of the fact that the Commission of Enquiry for European Union and its Sub-Committee of Economic Experts have given favourable consideration to M. Francqui's proposal to establish an institution for long- and medium-term credits, requests the Council of the League of Nations to instruct the competent organs of the League to examine, as soon as possible, with the assistance especially of M. Francqui, the proposal submitted by the latter to the Sub-Committee of Economic Experts, and, in the event of any practical scheme being recommended under the auspices of the League, to ensure that it will be open for all countries to participate on an equal footing.

(4) Expresses its appreciation of the valuable work carried out during the past year by the Financial Committee and its special Delegations on Gold and Agricultural Credits and by the Fiscal Committee and by the Financial Organisation as a whole, and notes with special satisfaction the Convention for setting up an International Agricultural Mortgage Credit Company, the recent response to the request submitted by the Austrian and the Hungarian Governments for enquiries into their financial situation, the second interim report of the Gold Delegation and the study which has been published on the course and phases of the economic depression.

It urges all Governments of signatory States to accelerate their ratification of the Convention of the International Agricultural Mortgage Credit Company, and hopes that those others who, under the terms of the Convention, are enabled to deposit their signatures before September 30th will do so.

(5) Approves the proposal that, in order to co-ordinate the work now being conducted on the problem of the recurrence of periods of economic depression, the League should convene meetings of experts and representatives of those economic councils, research institutes and other organisations that are actively engaged on this question, and should appoint a qualified economist and adequate staff for this purpose, and decides that this work shall be begun either before or in the year 1933.

There is one last observation I should like to make, one more sentiment I should like to express.

I should like to recall to the Assembly the words, both elegant and eloquent, in which the French Minister of Finance voiced, in the Second Committee, what we all feel when he endorsed the high opinion we all have of the work of the Financial Organisation, and singled out for special praise the Director of that Organisation, Mr. Loveday.

The President:

Translation: Mr. Watt, delegate of Australia, will address the Assembly.

Mr. Watt (Australia): I want to refer to a few particular points in this report, because those who followed the discussions in the Second Committee are aware that certain tendencies have been revealed that need to be understood quite clearly.

When addressing this Assembly at its opening meetings, the delegate for India protested against the establishment of the Agricultural Mortgage Credit Company without non-European countries having been given the opportunity to express their views at this Assembly. It so happens that, since that project was brought forward, new schemes along somewhat similar lines have also been mooted, and a study of the records of the proceedings of the Second Committee will show that there is also a tendency, I think, in the minds of some people to hold the view that such schemes ought to be confined for at least a few years mainly to European countries.

I think it is quite in order as the representative of Australia — not because I represent one particular country, but because I represent an extra-European country — to emphasise the fact that, if any such plans are developed under the auspices of the League, special efforts must be made to identify with them the interests, not merely of European countries, but also of extra-European countries.

I am therefore particularly pleased to see in Section (3) of the resolution which the Assembly is asked to adopt, the following words, referring to the proposal mooted by M. Francqui: ". . . in the event of any practical scheme being recommended under the auspices of the League, to ensure that it will be open for all countries to participate on an equal footing ".

We may be quite sure that it is imperative for this Assembly, for its Committees and for delegates to preserve the integrity of the League as a universal organisation.

One other point seems worth emphasising. In the discussions in the Committee, the fact was revealed that some people hoped that these proposals would help primarily to develop manufacturing industries. I am not at all sure that it would be wise for the support of such credit organisations to be used first of all in order to cartelise industries. Most of us are aware that one factor in the present crisis, quite a grave factor, is the very serious discrepancy between the value of agricultural products and of manufactured products. Until such time as the values of agricultural products are brought more into line with those of manufactured products, we may be quite sure that worldwide financial disequilibrium will continue. It is therefore to be hoped that those who have the responsibility of formulating this scheme will pay particular attention to the need for bringing about better equilibrium between agricultural and manufacturing industries.

There is only one other matter to which I wish to refer. At the end of the section concerning "Other Long-Term Credit Problems", the report states that the Second Committee desires to emphasise the need for the Financial Organisation of the League to be ready to meet all calls that may be made upon it. No one could have been present at the meetings of the Second Committee without realizing that, in the minds of the economic representatives, perhaps the focal point of the present world crisis is to be found in the matters which came before that Committee, particularly financial matters.

There seemed to be some doubt in the minds of some of the members as to how far the League could or could not take action. I think the one thing which has caused me to come to this Tribune is the conviction that it should be emphasised as much as possible that, during the next twelve months, many battles will be won or lost for the forces of law and order. We may be certain that the League will divide or multiply its reputation during the next few months in so far as it can come to grips with the world financial crisis.

It therefore seems worth while to suggest that we delegates representing Governments should go back to our countries seized with that fact, and urge that whatever action is possible through the League must be taken, and taken as quickly as possible.

The President:

Translation: As no other delegate wishes to speak, I shall regard the report and the accompanying draft resolution adopted.

The draft resolution was adopted.

82. — CONTRIBUTIONS IN ARREARS — REPORT OF THE FOURTH COMMITTEE: RESOLUTION.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the discussion of the report of the Fourth Committee on contributions in arrears (Annex 23, document A.87.1931.X).

(On the invitation of the President, M. Politis, Chairman of the Fourth Committee, and M. Rappard, Rapporteur, took their places on the platform.)

The President:

Translation: The Rapporteur will address the Assembly.

M. Rappard (Switzerland), Rapporteur:

Translation: The report you have before you is extremely concise, and my verbal comments on it will be equally discreet.

In the first place, I am anxious not to waste your time. You will, moreover, understand that, in this matter, the greatest discretion is the best policy. Nevertheless, it is important that Members of the League should all be aware of the actual position, which may be summed up as follows: whereas at the same period in 1930 only ten States had been unable to fulfil all their financial obligations to the League, the present number is fourteen.

Last year the position was slightly better, but to-day six of these fourteen States still owe their contribution for 1930 and eight other States owe two or more contributions. The total sum due to the League under this heading is 14 millions, though, if we leave out of account a great country whose financial position has been particularly difficult throughout recent years, this total is reduced from 14 to 5 millions.

I should like to submit to you three observations of a general nature on the subject of contributions in arrears. Firstly, there are no European States amongst those which have not yet been able to fulfil their obligations. The obvious lesson to be drawn from this fact is that, though the League is to-day recognised as indispensable to the collective life of European States, it is not yet equally so overseas. From this the further lesson may be drawn that the League should so enlarge its activities that every State in the world may realise the necessity of its co-operation.

Secondly, I must in your name emphasise the common bond of solidarity which is involved in membership of the League. It is regrettable, it would in the long run be intolerable, that some of the Member States should shirk a very definite duty. This common debt of solidarity is clear. It is a duty to all the other Member States, whose burdens are increased to the exact extent of the temporary default of their colleagues; it is a duty towards the administrative organs of the League. Only last night one of the heads of the international administration told us that the officials, who did their duty, felt they had a right to expect the same from all the States.

Thirdly — and I am sure you will agree with the Fourth Committee and its Rapporteur in this — it is the duty of the whole Assembly to do all in its power to hasten the payment in full of all contributions in arrears, and to use all appropriate methods to that end, provided they do not cross the line that divides persuasion from pressure. Nothing could be more deplorable, at a time when a State is suffering from a temporary difficulty in fulfilling its financial obligations towards the League, than a word or gesture that might possibly lead to a loosening of the moral bonds that should unite all Members of the League.

While, therefore, avoiding saying anything that might wound national susceptibilities, I will conclude these brief comments on my report by expressing the earnest hope that my successor on this platform next year may be in a position to give you better tidings.

I submit for your adoption the following resolution:

The Assembly,

Observes with regret that this year a greater number of States than before have not fulfilled their financial obligations towards the League;

Earnestly calls upon States which have received certain facilities for the liquidation of their arrears to fulfil the conditions of the respective arrangements;

Invites the other States which, for various reasons, still owe in respect of 1929 and 1930 to remit their contributions as soon as political or economic conditions permit;

Requests the Secretary-General to undertake or pursue negotiations for the liquidation of arrears by all the States in question, to submit a report to the Council on the action taken by him before the next Assembly, and to communicate the results to the latter.

The President:

Translation: I hope our Rapporteur's eloquent appeal will be borne in mind.

As no one else has asked to speak, I shall consider the report of the Fourth Committee and the accompanying draft resolution adopted.

The draft resolution was adopted.

83. — FINANCIAL SITUATION OF THE LEAGUE DURING THE REMAINDER OF THE FINANCIAL YEAR 1931: RESOLUTION PROPOSED BY THE FOURTH COMMITTEE.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the discussion of the draft resolution submitted by the Fourth Committee on the financial situation of the League during the present year (document A.62.1931.X).

(On the invitation of the President, M. Boheman, Rapporteur, took his place on the platform.)

The President:

Translation: M. Boheman, Rapporteur, will address the Assembly.

M. Boheman (Sweden), Rapporteur:

Translation: It is quite natural that the economic and financial crisis through which the world is now passing should have affected the finances of the League during the present year. The position is not now so favourable as it has been during the last five years. There has been a certain increase in the contributions in arrears and a certain slowness in the payment of the contributions due for this year. In view of this and in order to avoid any deficit in 1931, the Fourth Committee has, on the proposal of the Supervisory Commission, adopted the following resolution, which I beg to submit to the Assembly on behalf of the Fourth Committee:

The Assembly,

Impressed by the difficult situation through which most of the States Members of the League are passing, and by the possible effects of that situation on the finances of the League;

Convinced that, in the present circumstances, it is important that the whole of the appropriations provided in the budget for the present financial year should not be expended:

Requests the competent officials of the three organisations of the League to limit to the utmost possible extent the expenditure incurred between now and the end of the year;

And makes a strong appeal to the Council and the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to endeavour to postpone or cancel the sessions of conferences and committees convened or contemplated for the last quarter of this year, provided always that such postponements or cancellations do not interfere with the essential work of the League.

The President:

Translation: As no one else has asked to speak, I shall consider the draft resolution submitted by the Fourth Committee adopted.

The draft resolution was adopted.

84. — GENERAL CONVENTION TO IMPROVE THE MEANS OF PREVENTING WAR: REPORT OF THE THIRD COMMITTEE: RESOLUTION.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the discussion of the report submitted by the Third Committee on the General Convention to improve the Means of preventing War (Annex 24, document A.77.1931.IX).

I am told that M. Munch, Chairman of the Third Committee, and his Excellency M. de Madariaga, Rapporteur, are at present occupied on the Drafting Committee. I have been asked to adjourn this discussion to another meeting and the suggestion has also been made that this meeting should be suspended for ten minutes. I shall take the latter course so that I may be able to clear up the difficulty.

(The Assembly adjourned at 11.45 a.m. and resumed at 11.55 a.m.)

The President:

Translation: I declare the meeting open.

(On the invitation of the President, M. Munch, Chairman of the Third Committee, and M. de Madariaga, Rapporteur, took their places on the platform.)

The President:

Translation: M. de Madariaga, Rapporteur, will address the Assembly.

M. de Madariaga (Spain), Rapporteur:

Translation: I must begin by apologising to the Assembly. The Drafting Committee of the Third Committee was sitting just now to discuss a question affecting the Rapporteur and I had considered that, as soon as I received the invitation from the President of the Assembly to speak, all the members of the Drafting Committee should be given an opportunity of attending the meeting, as they had collaborated with me in drafting this report; but some slight delay in the proceedings of the Assembly was inevitable, as I had to obtain the Committee's consent.

I will not go into the report or the Convention (document A.78.1931.IX) communicated to you, but will merely point out a certain number of amendments to the texts which served as a basis for the work of the Third Committee.

The most important of these amendments is the separation into Articles 2 and 3 of one article in the old draft — namely, Article 2. This has been done because certain delegations desired that a distinction should be made between what clearly constituted a threat of war and what constituted an incident the nature of which it would be delicate a priori to define. It was felt to be necessary to separate the idea of acts of war and the idea of threats of war and not to regard as acts of war, or even as threats of war, acts which might from some points of view, and especially in the invaded countries, be regarded as acts of war. This need made it imperative to change the wording of Article 2 and led the Committee to separate Articles 2 and 3.

Anothe amendment I should like to mention is the re-introduction of the idea of air forces in Articles 2 and 3. When it is a question of an aeroplane and of the passing of territorial frontiers or the limits of territorial waters, air forces are clearly distinguished from other forces, inasmuch as, technically, they can be subjected to different conditions. The Committee succeeded in expressing itself clearly on this point, and avoided the pitfalls involved by the technical differences between these various forces.

I do not think I need expatiate on the nature of these conventions, but I should like to touch upon the prehistory and the history of this question.

The prehistory goes back to June 6th, 1923, when, during the discussions on the Treaty of Mutual Guarantee, two of my compatriots on the Temporary Mixed Commission for the Reduction of Armaments submitted a draft for a new article, a draft Article 10, and a draft Article 11.

As regards Article 10, they said:

"At the request of any Member of the League of Nations, the Council of the League which, on receipt of that request, must be immediately convened by the Secretary-General, may declare that the political situation between the two States Members is such that precautions with a view to preserving peace are indispensable. The following precautionary measures may be applied:

"(a) Both parties may be asked to withdraw their troops to a certain distance, to be determined by the Council, on both sides of the frontier; to abstain from flying over a certain neutral zone between the two countries: to abstain from allowing their navies to enter the territorial waters of the other State.

"(b) The Council may invite the High Contracting Parties to apply to the State which is endangering peace penalties similar to those provided in Article 16 of the Covenant against a Covenant-breaking State, etc."

The other provisions do not affect Article 16 of the Covenant.

My two compatriots then proposed the following Article 11:

"In the event of any of the High Contracting Parties becoming engaged in hostilities with any other State, whether a party to this Treaty or not,

"(a) It shall so inform the Secretary-General of the League of Nations, who shall summon a meeting of the Council of the League without delay"; and further on:

"(c) Shall be presumed to be the aggressor: any State which has refused to submit to the Permanent Court of International Justice or to the Council of the League of Nations the dispute which is the cause of the threat of war; or any State which has refused to take the precautionary measures indicated in Article 10 when the Council has recommended their application."

This is the origin of the conservatory measures which have now been happily incorporated in a definite Convention.

The second stage is constituted by the discussions on the 1924 Protocol, where we can trace the conservatory measures in the whole structure of Articles 7, 8, 9 and 10. Sanctions are provided for in Article 10, paragraph 2, which reads as follows:

"In the event of hostilities having broken out any State shall be presumed to be an aggressor, unless a decision of the Council, which must be taken unanimously, shall otherwise declare:

". . . . . .

"2. If it has violated provisional measures enjoined by the Council for the period while the proceedings are in progress as contemplated by Article 7 of the present Protocol."

These measures were much more vague than in the Spanish text of 1923, but, notwithstanding their elasticity, were prompted by the same spirit.

So much for the prehistory of the question. I call it the prehistory, because these efforts did not lead to an immediate result, but remained, as it were, the preliminary elements of an idea, before the idea was presented anew and carried into effect. The final success which attended the efforts made was due entirely to the German delegation, which restated the idea at a meeting of the Committee on Arbitration and Security, in the really final form in which it appears in the Convention now before us.

At the session of the Committee on Arbitration and Security held in March 1928, the German delegation submitted the following suggestions:

"With a view to preventing war, the Committee on Arbitration and Security might examine the following possibilities:

"In case of a dispute being submitted to the Council, the States might undertake in advance to accept and execute provisional recommendations of the Council for the purpose of preventing any aggravation or extension of the dispute and impeding any measures to be taken by the parties which might exercise an unfavourable reaction on the execution of the settlement to be proposed by the Council.

"In case of threat of war, the States might undertake in advance to accept and to execute the recommendations of the Council to the effect of maintaining or re-establishing the military status quo normally existing in time of peace;

"In the case of hostilities of any kind breaking out without, in the Council's opinion, all possibilities of a pacific settlement having been exhausted, the States might undertake in advance to accept, on the Council's proposal, an armistice on land and sea and in the air, including especially the obligation of the two parties in dispute to withdraw the forces which might have penetrated into foreign territory and to secure the respect of the sovereignty of the other State.

"The question should be considered whether the above-mentioned obligations should be undertaken only in case of a unanimous vote of the Council (the votes of the parties to the dispute not being counted), or whether the majority, simple or qualified, might suffice in the matter. Furthermore, it should be considered in what form the obligations would have to be drawn up in order to bring them into conformity with the Covenant.

"These obligations might constitute the object of an agreement or of a protocol which would be open for signature by all States Members and non-Members of the League of Nations, and which might come into force separately for the several continents, in a way similar to that provided for in the draft Treaty of Mutual Assistance of 1923."

These form the basis and origin of the Convention which we have before us and which finds its place in the series of Conventions we have prepared here in connection with the questions of arbitration and security. Together with the General Act, the Convention on Financial Assistance and the work to strengthen Article 11 of the Covenant, it voices the need for the political preparation for direct disarmament which has accompanied all the efforts made for the last ten years — efforts which, we hope, will bear fruit in February 1932.

In order to show clearly the relations between the Conference and the Convention, the Convention provides that the Protocol shall remain open for signature until February 2nd, 1932.

On the subject of signatures, allow me to conclude by stating that the Spanish Minister for Foreign Affairs, who is present here, will sign the Convention as soon as the Protocol has been opened for signature.

The Third Committee submits for your adoption the following draft resolution :

The Assembly,

(1) Taking note of the report submitted to it on behalf of the Third Committee;

(2) Thanking the Special Committee for the admirable work it has done towards the framing of the draft general Convention to improve the Means of preventing War:

(3) Approves the text of the said Convention which has been drawn up by the Third Committee (Annex 24 (a));

(4) Decides to open the Convention for signature by the States Members of the League and by those non-Member States to which the Council of the League shall have communicated a copy of the Convention for that purpose;

(5) Earnestly trusts that a large number of States will sign the Convention before the opening of the forthcoming General Disarmament Conference; and

(6) Requests the Council to make the necessary arrangements in good time for the preparation of the rules referred to in the last paragraph of Article 4, in order that, should circumstances so dictate, the Convention may be put into effect immediately upon its entry into force.

The President :

Translation : I should like to apologise to the members of the Drafting Committee, who have had to interrupt their discussions, but I held that, when the Assembly was convened to consider a particular point, its work must take precedence over everything else.

As no one else has asked to speak, I shall consider the report of the Third Committee and the accompanying draft resolution adopted.

The draft resolution was adopted.

The President :

Translation : The adoption of the resolution by the Assembly means that the General Convention to improve the Means of preventing War is now open for signature by the States.

The delegates of the States who desire to sign the Convention immediately may do so either in the President's room, or, after the meeting, in Room 110 at the Secretariat (Legal Section).

The Assembly rose at 12.15 p.m.

85. — ORGANISATION OF THE SECRETARIAT, OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR OFFICE AND OF THE REGISTRY OF THE PERMANENT COURT OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE: REPORT OF THE FOURTH COMMITTEE: RESOLUTION.

The President:

Translation: The first item on the agenda is the discussion of the report of the Fourth Committee on the Organisation of the Secretariat, of the International Labour Office and of the Registry of the Permanent Court of International Justice (Annex 25, document A.91.1931.X).

(On the invitation of the President, M. Politis, Chairman of the Fourth Committee, and M. de Vasconcellos, Rapporteur, took their places on the platform.)

The President:

Translation: The Rapporteur will address the Assembly.

M. de Vasconcellos (Portugal), Rapporteur:

Translation: Last year, when we were discussing the organisation of the Secretariat, of the International Labour Office and of the Registry of the Permanent Court of International Justice, the Assembly, on the proposal of the Fourth Committee, reserved for future study the question of the Under-Secretaries-General, of the salaries and conditions of engagement, etc., of the Secretary-General, Deputy Secretary-General, Under-Secretaries-General, Directors and Treasurer, and also the question of the salaries of Chiefs of Sections and of the Secretary-General's Chef de Cabinet.

In accordance with the decision of the Assembly, all these questions were referred to a special Committee known as the Committee of Thirteen, which, after discussion, submitted a very able report recommending that the decision as to the Under-Secretaries-General should be adjourned for a time, and that the question of salaries should be left as it stood for reasons of economy.

The question of Under-Secretaries-General has therefore been adjourned for three years, until the expiry of the present contracts, unless — and we sincerely hope this will not be the case — the Secretary-General should notify his intention of resigning. In such case, the contracts may be denounced within one year.

The Fourth Committee has endorsed these proposals after examining the reasons for and against, which were so admirably set forth in the report of the Committee of Thirteen.

I have the honour to submit to the Assembly the following draft resolution:

The Assembly,

Having examined the report and the Minutes of the meetings of the Committee appointed by the Assembly at its eleventh session to consider (1) the retention or elimination, the increase or reduction of the posts of Under-Secretary-General, as well as the consequences resulting therefrom, (2) all cognate questions on the organisation of the Secretariat, the International Labour Office and the Registry of the Permanent Court of International Justice which the Assembly had decided to adjourn in 1930:

(1) Adopts the present report;

(2) Decides that the framework of the higher ranks of the Secretariat should be provisionally maintained as it stands;

(3) Requests the Secretary-General to see that all new or renewed contracts concluded with the Deputy Secretary-General or the Under-Secretaries-General:

(a) Should have a maximum duration of three years;

(b) Should contain a clause under which they may be denounced within a period of one year from the date on which the Secretary-General officially notifies the Council of his intention of resigning, this denunciation only to take effect as from the date on which the new Secretary-General assumes his duties or in the year following;

(4) Is of opinion that, in regard to the appointment or promotion of officials to one of the higher posts in the Secretariat, the first and foremost consideration must be the knowledge and capacity of the candidate, which must be in keeping with the duties he will be called upon to fulfil, account being taken, however, in such choice of the different forms of national civilisation;

(5) Approves the conclusions of the present report in regard to the salaries and conditions of engagement of the Secretary-General, the Deputy Secretary-General, the Under-Secretaries-General, the Registrar of the Permanent Court of International Justice, the Directors, the Treasurer, the Secretary-General's Chef de Cabinet, the Chiefs of Section and the Deputy Registrar of the Court.

The President:

Translation: As no delegate has asked to speak on this question, I shall regard the report and the accompanying draft resolution adopted.

The draft resolution was adopted.

86. — BUDGET AND FINANCIAL QUESTIONS: REPORT OF THE FOURTH COMMITTEE: RESOLUTIONS.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the discussion of the Fourth Committee's report on the budget and financial questions (Annex 26, document A.90.1931.X).

(On the invitation of the President, M. Boheman, Rapporteur, took his place on the platform.)

The President:

Translation: The Rapporteur will address the Assembly.

M. Boheman (Sweden), Rapporteur:

Translation: The Fourth Committee, when examining the budget for 1932, found itself in a singularly difficult position. In the first place, the budget estimates provided for an aggregate sum greatly exceeding last year's estimates, and, in the second place, States Members of the League, owing to the prevailing economic and financial crisis, were in more or less serious financial difficulties. It was thus quite natural that, in the general discussion in the Fourth Committee, nearly all the speakers should have urged economy. A strong feeling prevailed that, at the present moment, when every Member of the League is endeavouring to reduce its public expenditure, the League should take similar action.

At the same time, the Fourth Committee unanimously recognised — and I desire to emphasise this point — that nothing must be done which might prejudice the essential work of the League or restrict its powers of action in dealing with a crisis which had rendered international co-operation more than ever necessary.

The Fourth Committee is satisfied that it has acted on these lines. Thanks to the efforts of the Supervisory Commission, it is now able to submit a budget in which the estimates and supplementary estimates have been reduced by 2,350,000 Swiss francs. This reduction does, it is true, entail considerable sacrifices on the part of the three administrations. Thus, an appreciable number of Conferences, sessions of committees and meetings of experts which were not of urgent importance have been postponed for a year, or until such time as the position improves. These measures appeared particularly opportune, as the Disarmament Conference in 1932 will doubtless necessitate some concentration of the League's efforts next year. May I add that the measures thus advocated have been taken with the full assent of the Secretary-General and the Director of the International Labour Office, who fully realise the situation?

Further, a big cut has been effected in the matter of League printing, all publications which are not absolutely necessary being held over. It was pointed out, for the benefit of those working for the League, that reports need not necessarily be long to be of value.

Finally, equally large cuts were effected in various items of the budget, all of which were very carefully examined; the relevant figures will be found in the annexes to the printed report.

Though appreciable reductions have thus been made, I have no hesitation in assuring you that, with the credits you are about to vote, the League will be able, in 1932, to pursue its normal activities within reasonable limits, to organise the Disarmament Conference in a perfectly adequate manner, and to render such services as may be required of it in coping with the financial and economic crisis.

The total budget submitted to you represents an aggregate expenditure of 33,687,994 Swiss francs. Deducting from that amount the estimates for the Disarmament Conference, an exceptional allocation for 1932 amounting to 3,500,000 francs, we reach the figure of approximately 30,200,000 francs, which is a saving of about 1,500,000 francs on the budget for the present year. That saving is, in my view, very considerable, particularly if we take into account the fact that it has not been thought advisable, and would, in fact, to a large extent have been legally impossible, to touch the salaries of the staff and the particular advantages the staff enjoys.

As regards the administrative and other questions dealt with by the Fourth Committee, I would refer you to the printed report. I would merely point out that the Fourth Committee asks you to appoint as members of the Supervisory Commission for the period terminating December 31st, 1934, Lord Meston of Agra, who has already rendered such valuable services on that Commission, and M. C. J. Hambro, whose zeal and energy in the Fourth Committee are well known.

Lastly, I venture to direct the Assembly's attention to a communication addressed to our Chairman by the permanent delegate of Nicaragua concerning the payment of Nicaragua's contribution to the League. The Committee, profoundly distressed by the terrible catastrophe which has overtaken Nicaragua and completely destroyed its capital, recommends that the Assembly should exempt that country from the payment of half its contribution to the budget for the financial year 1932 and should defer the payment of the balance.

On behalf of the Fourth Committee, I have the honour to submit to the Assembly for approval the following resolutions :

1. The Assembly, in virtue of Article 38 of the Regulations for the Financial Administration of the League of Nations, finally passes the audited accounts of the League of Nations for the twelfth financial period ending on December 31st, 1930.

2. The Assembly,

In virtue of Article 17 of the Regulations for the Financial Administration of the League of Nations,

Passes, for the financial period 1932, the general budget of the League of Nations — of the Secretariat and Special Organisations of the League, of the International Labour Organisation and of the Permanent Court of International Justice — amounting, including supplementary credits, to the total sum of 33,687,994 gold francs, including 3,500,000 francs for the International Disarmament Conference,

And decides that the aforesaid budget shall be published in the Official Journal.

3. The Assembly,

Profoundly distressed by the catastrophe which has occurred in Nicaragua and has totally destroyed its capital,

Decides to exempt that country from the payment of half its contribution to the budget for the financial year 1932 and to defer the payment of the balance.

4. The Assembly adopts the conclusions of the various reports of the Supervisory Commission submitted for its consideration, except in regard to the request for credits put forward by the Sixth Committee for the establishment of a committee to examine the material relating to slavery, and in regard to the alteration in the definition of 'locally recruited staff'.

5. The Assembly appoints as members of the Supervisory Commission for the period ending on December 31st, 1934, Lord Meston of Agra and M. C. J. Hambro.

6. The Assembly,

Takes note of the first annual report of the Administrative Board of the Staff Pensions Fund; and

Adopts the following amendments to the Staff Pensions Regulations :

Article 3, paragraph 1, to read as follows :

" The execution of the present regulations and the management of the Pensions Fund shall be effected by an Administrative Board consisting of three members elected by the Assembly, a representative of the Secretary-General of the League of Nations, a representative of the Director of the International Labour Office, the Treasurer of the League of Nations, and three members elected by secret ballot by the officials who are subject to the present regulations. Where questions directly affecting the officials of the Registry of the Permanent Court of International Justice are under consideration, a representative of the Registrar shall be added to the Board."

Article 12, paragraph 4, to read as follows :

" The Administrative Board shall decide in each particular case whether the benefits of the present article shall extend to adopted children, step-children or children not born in wedlock."

Decides that the contribution of the League of Nations to the Pensions Fund for 1932 shall be 9 per cent of the salaries subject to deduction as defined in the Staff Pensions Regulations.

7. The Assembly,

Notes the resolution of the Governing Body of the International Institute of Intellectual Co-operation requesting the admission of the staff of this Institute to the Staff Pensions Fund ;

Further notes a similar request from the Governing Body of the Nansen International Office for Refugees ; and

Decides to submit these two resolutions to the Administrative Board of the Staff Pensions Fund for examination and report to the Assembly at the latter's next session.

8. When proposals involving publications not immediately required for work already undertaken by the League are made by a League body, no final decision shall be taken until the Secretary-General has been consulted regarding the financial and administrative consequences of these proposals.

The Assembly adopts the conclusions of the report of the Fourth Committee.

The President :

Translation : M. Loudon, delegate of the Netherlands, will address the Assembly.

M. Loudon (Netherlands) :

Translation : The budget, as it has been submitted to you, represents a considerable reduction on the original figures. This reduction has largely been the work of the Fourth Committee, which realised that, in the present crisis, the League must make economies. We should be grateful to the Committee ; it has had a thankless task, since what it had to do was not to check any tendency to prodigality, but to cut down undoubtedly useful expenditure. We must not, therefore, underestimate the usefulness of the expenditure which has been suppressed, or the work it would have involved for the Secretariat. The position is the same as in the case of national budgets — Governments are bound to economise, even though it be to the temporary detriment of the country.

As a member of a delegation which strongly supports reduction of expenditure, I desire to say that, in my opinion, we must appreciate the attitude of the Secretariat of the International Labour Office, and also that of the Registry of the Permanent Court of International Justice. These officials, who place their high abilities and their energies unreservedly at the service of the League, might have felt a certain bitterness in seeing the Committee show such eagerness to cut down expenditure, thereby narrowing the scope of their work. Yet they helped the Fourth Committee in every way to reduce expenditure, whenever such reduction did not involve permanent harm to the essential work of the League. I am sure they will do the same in the future.

I am one of the veterans of the League, and on many occasions during Assembly sessions, and especially during the long and arduous sittings of the Preparatory Commission on Disarmament, of which I had the honour to be President, I had an opportunity of realising at first hand how the Secretariat works, although I have not had an opportunity of following so closely the work of the International Labour Office. Only yesterday, when visiting some of the League's offices, I was struck by the fact that the work has sometimes to be carried out under conditions which only strengthen our hope that the new building will soon be completed. I venture to say that the work of the staff is beyond all praise. Just recently, a large number of the officials, realising the exigencies of the times, were, as I know, ready to sacrifice part of their salaries. For various reasons that gesture could not be made for the time being; nevertheless, we appreciate the generous intention of those officials.

It is a universal spirit of co-operation and solidarity that will enable us to overcome our present difficulties. The difficulties will last for months yet, for years perhaps, but — and this is my final word — not for one moment can those difficulties make us doubt the future or relax our efforts.

The President:

Translation: M. Palacios, delegate of Spain, will address the Assembly.

M. Palacios (Spain):

Translation: I desire to draw special attention to the attitude adopted by the Spanish delegation in the Fourth Committee in regard to budgetary questions. I was, unfortunately, the only — or almost the only — delegate in the Fourth Committee to plead a cause different from that which the other delegations supported. The majority of the Committee asked for a reduction in the budget of the League, whereas the Spanish delegation, whose views were expressed first in the speech of M. Lerroux, the President of the Council, and then in that of M. de Madariaga, urged consistently that the expenditure of the League ought not to be reduced, although we are at present, as everyone says — and it is unfortunately only too true — in the throes of a world economic crisis. I may add that our opinion has been strengthened precisely on account of that phenomenon. I shall not repeat now what those speakers said in the Assembly or what I myself maintained in the Fourth Committee.

Nevertheless, one sentence in the report which M. Boheman, the Swedish delegate, has just been explaining to you prompts me to intervene in the hope of perhaps introducing a small change. The report states that all the speakers except the delegates of Spain and Lithuania pleaded in favour of economy. Instead of the word "economy" I should myself prefer the phrase "a reduction of expenditure". My colleagues on the Fourth Committee will remember that I was careful to say that, in the matter of economy, Spain would fall in with the opinion of the other speakers — that is, that she would agree to the idea of adapting means to ends as far as possible, in order to create a suitable and efficient instrument such as would enable the League to fulfil its mission. But Spain did not intend to accept an aggregate and somewhat arbitrary reduction of the means and resources of the League without taking into account its requirements, its objects and its noble purpose. We think that economy in the cause of peace means increased expenditure in the preparations for war.

During the present Assembly I sat for the first time on the Fourth Committee. I learned a great deal, especially through being in contact with the Supervisory Commission, which is so formidable from the standpoint of the other Committees. I desire, however, to pay a tribute to the Commission and, in particular, to its Chairman, M. Osuský, who frankly explained the necessity for severity in regard to League economy. To my mind, his deliberate, sometimes trenchant, form of eloquence is a fitting medium for what he has to say.

I was, however, struck by a problem of competence which at times was settled in what I thought rather a curious manner. The Fourth Committee and the Supervisory Commission have to deal with purely budgetary questions, with regard to which the powers both of the Fourth Committee and of the Supervisory Commission are absolute. But certain questions are budgetary only in part. Thus, when they are settled in the Fourth Committee, the latter may become a sort of committee for the settlement of political and other questions, without perhaps being so well qualified as the representatives of States sitting on the other Committees from which the pre-budgetary proposal or agreement emanated.

I should like to refer, in connection with mandates, to M. Rappard's speech. Despite the arguments he invoked before the Supervisory Commission and the Fourth Committee, the latter decided the question entirely from the standpoint of expenditure without taking into account the functions and mission of the Mandates Commission. The same thing happened in connection with slavery. That is a difficult question. Last year we opposed the proposal to reduce to three members the Committee which was already contemplated. Nevertheless, despite the Sixth Committee's decision, the Fourth Committee, sitting, almost like a court of appeal, decided that it would be desirable to constitute a smaller Committee and reduced the estimate framed by the Section of the Secretariat concerned. The same thing occurred again in connection with the suppression of publications on the enquiry into economic crises, and in other matters.

For these reasons I think the Assembly ought to consider the problem of the Fourth Committee's powers.

I thank you for the attention with which you have listened to my remarks. To be or not to be! The Spanish delegation emphatically reaffirms its conviction that, at the present time, during this world economic crisis, so essentially international in character, it is incumbent on us to give proof of our confidence in the League — which is the body best qualified to find a remedy — and to accord it the resources it requires for the proper accomplishment of its task.

The President:

Translation: M. Max Huber, delegate of Switzerland, will address the Assembly.

M. Max Huber (Switzerland):

Translation: May I, as delegate of Switzerland, make a few observations on the present report with reference to the Nansen International Office for Refugees.

The Office has realised that it will have to bear its share in the budgetary cuts imposed on the League as a result of the present crisis. I could, therefore, only bow before the decisions of the Committees at which I had to explain the special situation of the Office and the reasons which make it difficult for it to bear any reduction of its budget, already very low.

From the report of the Fourth Committee we find, however, that the budget of the Office has been more ruthlessly cut down than that of any one of the other organisations belonging to or affiliated to the League. The budget of the Office has been decreased by 10 per cent, whereas the percentage for the total of the revised budget as compared with the original budget (including the supplementary budget) is only 6 ½ per cent. That is a very big difference.

The diminution of our budget by 10 per cent — 33,000 francs — which is only one per thousand of the total budget of the League, is very appreciable to us, and will undoubtedly cripple our activities, especially in view of the additional work to which the Assembly has directed our special attention. But we shall do our very utmost to avoid diminishing the activity and utility of the Office, despite the decrease in the means at our disposal.

It should, however, be clearly understood that the reduction in the 1932 budget, which is occasioned by very exceptional circumstances, will be entirely without effect on future budgets or the whole plan for winding up the Office — a plan which you adopted a few days ago, which was prepared in conformity with the suggestions embodied in your previous resolutions, and which, as regards the total contribution of the League, is itself based on an annual budgetary reduction of 10 per cent.

If the necessary means were refused the Office in future, it would find it quite impossible to fulfil the mission you have assigned to it during the period when it is being wound up, and I should be obliged myself to ask you to release me from the mandate I accepted a year ago at your request.

I do not wish to leave this platform without expressing my deep gratitude to the statesmen who launched the Nansen appeal and to all those — in particular the British, the Danish and the Norwegian Committees — who by their generous gifts have helped to constitute the memorial fund. I should also like to emphasise the importance of your recommendations concerning the extended use of the Nansen stamp, for it is only by obtaining considerable funds that the Office will be able to meet the very numerous requests for co-operation and help addressed to it.

The President:

Translation: I think we can meet the wishes of the Spanish delegate by inserting the observations he has just made in the records. I may add that the Assembly is only called upon to adopt the conclusions of the report of the Fourth Committee, so that we need have no anxiety on that score.

If no other delegate wishes to speak, I shall regard the conclusions of the report of the Fourth Committee and the accompanying draft resolutions adopted.

The draft resolutions were adopted.

87. — ALLOCATION OF EXPENSES: REPORT OF THE FOURTH COMMITTEE: RESOLUTION.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the discussion of the report of the Fourth Committee on the allocation of expenses (Annex 27, document A.92.1931.X).

The Rapporteur, M. Boheman, delegate of Sweden, will address the Assembly.

M. Boheman (Sweden), Rapporteur:

Translation: The entry into the League of Nations of a new Member is an agreeable event, not only because it represents a step towards that universality to which the League has always aspired, but also because the new Member will pay an annual contribution to the League and thus lighten the burden of other States.

The Committee on Allocation of Expenses, under the chairmanship of M. Réveillaud, has recommended that the number of units to be allocated this year to Mexico, the newcomer to the League, should be fourteen. I therefore have the honour to propose that the Assembly should ratify the recommendation of the Committee for the Allocation of Expenses.

The Assembly will remember that, in 1928, it asked the Council to instruct the Allocation Committee to submit to the 1932 Assembly a final scale for the allocation of expenses, based on scientific data. The provisional scale at present in force, which was established with so much difficulty, has admittedly given rise to serious criticisms from various quarters, criticisms which are certainly justified in more than one case.

It was therefore to be hoped that, from the year 1932, it would have been possible to establish a more equitable arrangement; but unfortunately in this, as in so many other fields, the economic crisis has intervened and upset our most careful calculations. Thus, the Allocation Committee informed the Fourth Committee, through its Chairman, that it considered it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to draw up at the height of a crisis a just and stable scale.

Several delegates on the Fourth Committee put forward arguments which were considered very weighty, regarding the difficulty which their countries would have in accepting an adjournment of the question.

In a spirit of mutual conciliation which the Assembly will certainly appreciate, it was unanimously decided to accept the proposal made by the Chairman of the Allocation Committee to postpone the question until the 1934 Assembly.

I therefore have the honour to propose the following draft resolution:

The Assembly,

I. Approving the recommendation of the Allocation Committee:

Fixes at fourteen the number of units allocated to Mexico in the scale of apportionment of the League's expenditure;

II. Amending the decision taken on September 26th, 1928:

Requests the Council to ask the Allocation Committee not to submit its draft revised scale until the 1934 Assembly.

The President:

Translation: As no other delegate has asked to speak, I shall consider the report of the Fourth Committee and the draft resolution contained therein adopted.

The draft resolution was adopted.

88. — CONSTRUCTION OF THE NEW BUILDINGS: REPORT OF THE FOURTH COMMITTEE: RESOLUTION.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the discussion of the report of the Fourth Committee on the construction of the new buildings (Annex 28, document A.89.1931).

The Rapporteur, M. Boheman, delegate of Sweden, will address the Assembly.

M. Boheman (Sweden), Rapporteur:

Translation: It was with a feeling approaching stupefaction that the Fourth Committee took note of a special report of the Supervisory Commission informing it that the Building Committee had notified the Secretary-General that the estimates for the new buildings of the League — approved by the Assembly in 1930 — would probably be exceeded by 7 to 8 million gold francs.

The Fourth Committee at once felt that this was a very serious question and that prompt and energetic measures must be taken. The question is a grave one, not only on account of the serious consequences it might involve for the League's finances, but also because it would afford the League's enemies a ready handle for criticism in their campaign against our institution.

As one speaker on the Fourth Committee aptly expressed it, how could confidence be placed in the League's capacity to construct an edifice of peace if it could not even construct its own buildings?

The Fourth Committee therefore asserted its firm intention to put the matter in order.

I will not go into the history of the question. All the essential facts are given in the printed report before you. I merely wish to remind you that, in 1927, the Assembly agreed, in principle, that the sum to be expended on the construction of the new buildings should be 19½ million francs.

Difficulties having arisen concerning the ground originally chosen at the edge of the lake, and the Ariana Park having been fixed upon as the site of the new buildings, the 1930 Assembly, after a very detailed examination by the Committee of Five, approved an estimate amounting to 23,633,150 francs for the Assembly Hall, the Secretariat building and the outside work, and 4,250,000 francs for the Library.

In February 1931, the Secretary-General notified the Supervisory Commission that the estimates had been exceeded by 178,000 francs on the work of levelling, and by 50,000 francs for drainage. Subsequently, during the excavations, further difficulties due to the nature of the subsoil necessitated the enlargement and reinforcement of the foundations to an appreciable degree, which resulted in further unforeseen expenditure.

As a result of this considerable excess over the estimates, the Building Committee, which, as the Assembly is aware, consists of high officials of the Secretariat and distinguished specialists, instructed the architects, during the summer of 1931, to revise completely the estimates presented to the Assembly in 1930. This revised estimate, which the architects were unable to submit to the Building Committee until September 9th, 1931, showed an increase of roughly 2,750,000 francs over the 1930 estimates for the Assembly Hall and Secretariat, the estimate for the Library remaining unchanged.

The Building Committee noted that the revised estimates included no margin for unforeseen expenditure, and that the architects were contemplating certain economies which were scarcely acceptable, such as the use of artificial stone instead of natural stone in some part of the façade; it therefore requested the architects to revise their calculations.

An estimate — approximate, naturally — made by the technical members of the Building Committee concerning the final cost of the buildings led to the conclusion that there was reason to fear that the 1930 estimates would ultimately be exceeded by about 7 or 8 million francs for the Assembly Hall and Secretariat, and that the estimates for the Library would exceed the original figure by about 1,750,000 francs.

Following upon discussions that took place on this subject between the technical members of the Building Committee and the architects, the latter addressed to the Building Committee two letters, both of which modify the figures of the revised estimates.

I shall not endeavour to fix here the responsibility for these deplorable occurrences. I will simply emphasise the fact that, in my opinion, part, and no small part, of the responsibility falls on the League itself. For reasons which I will not go into now, it entrusted the construction of its buildings to an association of five architects of different nationalities. That arrangement, which from the outset raised stringent criticism, has certainly been largely answerable for the present state of affairs.

The Fourth Committee came to the conclusion that it had neither the technical and legal competence, nor, at this late stage, the time necessary to go fully into the matter. The Committee therefore proposes, in this difficult situation as in so many others, to have recourse to the Supervisory Commission — a Commission which is fully qualified, both by its composition and by its experience, to put the matter in proper order.

The Supervisory Commission should act as a committee of enquiry; it should be granted the fullest liberty, while bearing in mind the necessity of remaining within the credits already voted. It must obtain the necessary technical and legal advice and, after examining inter alia the possibilities of establishing unity of direction in the work, report as soon as possible to the Council of the League.

I think that, by the adoption of these methods proposed by the Fourth Committee, the Assembly may separate in the knowledge that it has done all it can to place the construction of the League buildings on a sound basis.

I have the honour to propose the adoption of the following draft resolution:

The Assembly,

Having noted the report of the Fourth Committee on the question of the new buildings;

Painfully surprised at the information furnished to the Fourth Committee by the Supervisory Commission, to the effect that it is feared that the estimate approved by the Assembly at its eleventh ordinary session may be exceeded by from seven to eight million Swiss francs unless the situation is taken in hand;

Declares that it is resolved in principle to keep within the estimate adopted last year; and

Instructs the Supervisory Commission, after having obtained the necessary technical and legal advice and without excluding the possibility of reconsidering the contract concluded with the architects, to submit to the Council for approval, as soon as possible, a programme which will comply, under the best possible conditions, with the above decision.

The President:

Translation: Mr. Pienaar, delegate of the Union of South Africa, will address the Assembly.

Mr. Pienaar (Union of South Africa):

I merely wish to ask the Assembly, in considering the somewhat depressing document with which it is now dealing, to bear in mind that similar difficulties have no doubt arisen in the past in the case of other famous buildings. I have no doubt that when Christopher Wren built St. Paul's Cathedral, when the Alhambra in Spain — and even the Pyramids — were being built the Fourth Committees of those days had difficulty with the architects. Therefore, while we should certainly take this question with all due seriousness, I do not think we should take it tragically. The Assembly, the Supervisory Commission and the Council must realise that care should be taken not to go to any extremes in dealing with this matter.

What is required is a building worthy of this great Assembly and of the task which is before us. I do not think that a mere matter of money is of so much importance. I look forward myself to the day when the League of Nations shall have accomplished its task of ensuring the peace of the world. Some may think that at that time the reason for its existence will exist no longer and that the League might then be disbanded. I, however, have another vision of the future.

I should like to imagine the day when, peace being assured, all the nations of the world, all the Governments of the world, will concentrate the activities of their Foreign Offices at Geneva; when we shall have all the Ministers for Foreign Affairs at Geneva for a great part of the year, when they will be able to discuss their foreign affairs and settle them face to face, by word of mouth, without delay and without any danger of misunderstandings. In those days, we shall certainly need buildings worthy of that purpose, and I therefore hope that, when this matter is dealt with by the Supervisory Commission and by the Council, this will be borne in mind and given due consideration.

The President:

Translation: As no other delegate has asked to speak, I shall consider the report of the Fourth Committee and the draft resolution contained therein adopted.

The draft resolution was adopted.

89. — TRIBUTE TO THE MEMORY OF COUNT SKRZYNSKI.

The President:

Translation: I have a communication to make to the Assembly. A former delegate to the Assembly has just died in particularly painful and tragic circumstances.

(The Assembly stood in token of mourning.)

Count Alexander Skrzynski, who was former President of the Council, and former Minister for Foreign Affairs of Poland, a signatory of the Locarno Treaties and delegate to the Assembly of the League of Nations, was recently killed in a motor accident.

This news cannot leave us unmoved. The name of Count Skrzynski recalls, to all of us who have been present at previous sessions of the Assembly, the memory of a statesman as remarkable for his talents as for his sympathy and charm. He placed these qualities at the service of his country, which he represented here with conspicuous ability.

It is only just that he should not be forgotten and that we should pay a special tribute to his memory. I feel sure I am interpreting the unanimous feeling of the Assembly in asking the Polish delegation to transmit to his Government our very sincere sympathy.

M. Sokal has asked to address the Assembly.

M. Sokal (Poland):

Translation: On behalf of the Polish delegation, I beg very sincerely to thank our President for the moving terms in which he spoke of Count Skrzynski. His tragic and premature end is a very great loss, not only to Poland, but to the League itself, of whose ideals he was a staunch champion. I shall duly communicate to my Government the touching tribute which, on the suggestion of our President, the Assembly has paid to the memory of Count Skrzynski.

90. — ERECTION OF A MONUMENT IN THE CITY OF SANTO DOMINGO TO THE MEMORY OF CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS: TELEGRAM OF THANKS FROM THE GOVERNMENT OF THE DOMINICAN REPUBLIC.

The President:

Translation: I have just received a telegram from the Government of the Dominican Republic expressing its gratitude to the Assembly for the message of sympathy it conveyed in adopting its resolution regarding the erection of a lighthouse as a monument to the memory of Christopher Columbus. I am sure this communication will give pleasure to the Assembly, because it emanates from one of its most distinguished members.

91. — ARMAMENTS TRUCE: INFORMATION ON THE POSITION OF ARMAMENTS IN VARIOUS COUNTRIES. REPORT OF THE THIRD COMMITTEE: RESOLUTIONS.

The President:

Translation: The next item on the agenda is the discussion of the report of the Third Committee on the armaments truce (Annex 29, document A.93.1931.IX).

(On the invitation of the President, M. Munch, Chairman of the Third Committee, and M. de Madariaga, Rapporteur of the Third Committee, took their places on the platform.)

The President:

Translation: M. de Madariaga, Rapporteur, will address the Assembly.

M. de Madariaga (Spain), Rapporteur:

Translation: The report I have the honour to submit to you on behalf of the Third Committee comprises two clearly separate parts, each concluding with a resolution.

The second resolution reads as follows:

"The Assembly,

"Noting that, of the sixty-three Governments invited to participate in the Disarmament Conference, twenty-five have up to the present communicated information on the position of their armaments in conformity with the recommendation made by the Council at its January and May sessions:

"Requests the Council to invite the Governments which have not yet transmitted their replies to the circular letters from the Secretary-General dated February 17th and June 13th, 1931, on the position of their armaments, to do so as soon as possible and in any case before November 1st, 1931, in order to enable the Secretariat to provide the Disarmament Conference with adequate documentation."

This resolution is self-explanatory. As you are all aware, the Disarmament Conference must be prepared by means of adequate documentation, collected and co-ordinated by the Secretariat. For this purpose the Council authorised the Secretary-General to ask the Governments to supply the necessary material. At present, only twenty-five of the sixty-three Governments invited have replied. The need for documentation is obviously urgent, and the Assembly clearly owes it to itself to confirm the decision, supported here by all present, to see that the Conference meets on February 2nd next.

I now come to the first question, the armaments truce.

This idea originated in the eloquent speech pronounced here at the beginning of the general discussion by the Italian Minister for Foreign Affairs. In that speech it was announced that the Italian delegation would submit a proposal not to increase beyond their present level the armaments of all countries invited to the Conference, in order to prepare the way, by a moral gesture, for the Conference itself.

At the same time, the Assembly received a proposal from the Danish, Netherlands, Norwegian, Swedish and Swiss delegations, the main thesis of which was that the Assembly should request the Council the urge the Governments convened to the Conference to show their firm determination to support the efforts to ensure peace and re-establish mutual confidence by abstaining, pending the result of the Conference, from any measure leading to an increase of the present level of their armaments.

At the meeting of the Third Committee, the proposal announced by M. Grandi was submitted in concrete form by General de Marinis, the Italian delegate on the Third Committee. This proposal contained a more precise idea, although it was fundamentally the same as that of the five Powers mentioned above. The greater precision introduced by the Italian delegation consisted in transforming the recommendation referred to in the proposal of the five Powers into a definite declaration by the Governments. Moreover, there was a suggestion to give definite form to the limitation to be carried out in regard to armaments.

The Italian proposal was that each Government should undertake for a period of one year dating from November 1st, 1931:

(1) Not to increase its expenditure on land forces already authorised for the current financial year, and not to exceed the total of such expenditure during the next financial year until the expiry of the truce;

(2) Not to place any warship on the stocks, provided always that vessels under construction might be continued and completed;

(3) To suspend the construction of additional military aircraft, except to replace machines which are placed out of commission during the truce.

This proposal was strongly supported by the British delegation. We had, then, still on the basis of the moral gesture proposed by the five delegations, two new ideas: the transformation of the recommendation into a declaration by Governments — a declaration which would involve a moral engagement — and a definition of a specific and technical character, this definition even giving indications as regards the various kinds of armaments — air, land and sea.

Two general tendencies were revealed in the Third Committee; some preferred the recommendation, while others preferred the declaration. Some desired a general form of obligation and others a precise and technical form of limitation.

It will be easily understood that these two tendencies overlapped and shifted their ground. It is obviously easier to define a recommendation than a moral obligation; and, conversely, it was more advantageous that the declaration should have a general and elastic character.

I would emphasise the point that none of the delegations had any difficulty in making the moral gesture which everyone considered necessary — indeed, indispensable — to create an atmosphere favourable to the Conference. That was not the difficulty. The difficulty was caused by a real and objective obstacle. It was hard for countries suddenly to transform the measures taken by their departments of national defence. Any person with experience of departmental life knows that there is a kind of anticipation in programmes, a sort of normal development in the life of a State, and that programmes laid down in advance are gradually carried out. There are certain facts in current public life — work begun, contracts concluded with labour unions or associations of producers for the supply of raw materials, and so on — that cannot be altered. All these points make a sudden decision without previous consideration rather difficult.

I think we ought to interpret the difficulties we have encountered in the Third Committee as a desire to honour an obligation taken beforehand, and consequently as evidence of the necessity of not entering into engagements lightly. There is no need to labour the point; the report is, I trust, sufficiently clear.

I merely wished to note that at no time was there any difficulty in regard to fundamental matters. The only difficulty has been that of adjusting the special problems of the various States so that by some harmonious formula the conclusions of our discussions might be brought out with sufficient clarity to enable the various nations to realise that the Committee was not content merely to put words on paper. At the same time a fairly elastic formula had to be discovered in order that the difficulties of the various States might be solved.

We therefore decided on a form of resolution incorporating the idea we owe to the Italian delegation — namely, a truce. There is to be a truce in armaments for a period of one year, subject to any decisions which may be taken by the Assembly. The resolution submitted includes the idea of the moral gesture, preparatory to the Conference, which represents the contribution of the five Powers. It also includes the moral undertaking, to which all States will subscribe, not to increase their armaments; that is the contribution of the Italian delegation, to which other delegations, and in particular the British delegation, attach particular importance. Lastly, the ultimate formula is sufficiently elastic to allow States to adapt all these ideas to their own individual practice.

There remains, however, one factor which is to be found neither in the resolution nor in the report, and which it is perhaps necessary to explain, since all States will be called upon to express, between now and November 1st, 1931, their opinion on the subject and to state whether they adopt the truce or not.

The Council must take such decisions as may be necessary to enable States, within a period to be fixed subsequently, to know how matters stand as regards the intentions of other States. Obviously, the undertaking cannot be final until all the States that affect the State entering into the undertaking have also similarly bound themselves. The Council must, then, make arrangements for a period during which the undertakings received from certain States will be temporary. Those undertakings will not become final until the other States which affect them have followed suit.

After these preliminary explanations, I will read the text of the resolution which the Third Committee has the honour to submit to you:

"Convinced that the crisis which at the present time is creating such profound disturbance among the nations of the world is due to a number of economic and political causes originating principally in the lack of mutual confidence between the nations; and,

"Convinced that a renewal of the competition in armaments would necessarily lead to an international and social catastrophe:

"The Assembly addresses a solemn appeal to all those who are desirous that practical effect should be given to the principles of peace and justice upon which the Covenant is based and urges them to devote all their efforts towards creating a world opinion strong enough to enable the General Disarmament Conference to achieve positive results, including, in particular, a gradual reduction of armaments to be continued until such time as the object laid down in Article 8 of the Covenant is attained.

"In view of the fact that an undertaking on the part of all States not to increase their armaments would help to create an atmosphere of confidence, to prevent competition in armaments and to prepare the ground for the success of the forthcoming Conference:

"The Assembly,

"Requests the Governments invited to the Disarmament Conference to prepare for this event by means of an armaments truce, and, accordingly,

"Requests the Council to urge the Governments convened to the said Conference to give proof of their earnest desire for the successful issue of the efforts to ensure and organise peace and, without prejudging the decisions of the Conference or the programmes or proposals submitted to it by each Government, to refrain from any measure involving an increase in their armaments;

"Likewise requests the Council to ask the Governments to state, before November 1st, 1931, whether they are prepared for a period of one year as from that date to accept this truce in armaments."

Before I conclude, I must point out that this resolution has been prepared by a Committee comprising representatives or observers of all the countries non-members of the League which were invited and were able to arrive in time to be present at our meetings. I should like to refer, as a very important fact, to the presence, amongst those representatives, of a duly authorised representative of the United States of America, whose profound interest in the question of disarmament is universally known. The collaboration of Mr. Wilson, the United States Minister at Berne, in the work of the Third Committee has therefore been of the very highest importance, and I feel bound to refer to it in this Assembly.

I should add that, although unable to send a representative on account of the short time available, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics nevertheless stated that it was in agreement with the principle of the truce, under the conditions which you will find set out in the report.

We thus have before us a unanimous resolution approved by the States which will be present at the Conference in February 1932; and we are therefore entitled to hope that that Conference will open under happy auspices conducing to make it a conspicuous success.

The President:

Translation: Viscount Cecil of Chelwood, first delegate of the British Empire, will address the Assembly.

Viscount Cecil of Chelwood (British Empire):

It would be quite improper for me to attempt to review the achievements of the Assembly, which will no doubt be done in a masterful fashion in a short time by our President; but perhaps I may be permitted just to say that the Assembly, which opened under the impression that this was going to be a somewhat barren and uninteresting session, has found it to be one of the most fruitful and important in the history of the League.

I observe that our clock has stopped, but the League advances. It is merely sufficient to recall to you that we have admitted Mexico, thus taking an important step towards the universality of the League. We have made real progress in the attempt to extirpate slavery as an institution in the world; we have taken a step forward in the complicated questions involved in the nationality of women; we have had very important debates on the economic question, both in this Assembly and in the Second Committee; and, above all, we have had to deal with the difficult question of a dispute between two of our Members in which — in spite of certain criticism from outside — I persist in thinking that the League has shown itself at its best.

Coming nearer to the subject of the few observations I am going to make, I would remind you that the Third Committee has succeeded in establishing the text of a convention for strengthening the means against war, which is open for signature and which will, I hope, be signed by as many States as possible in the very near future, so as to make an important contribution to the development of that favourable atmosphere in which we hope the Disarmament Conference will meet.

It was with the same object that the matter now before you was inaugurated. The object was to proclaim in the civilised world a truce in the preparations for war — a pause, at any rate, in that senseless waste of money involved in the piling up of armaments which, if civilisation means anything, ought to be unnecessary.

I am glad that our Rapporteur has pointed out to you that the conclusions we reached are not only the conclusions of the Members of the League of Nations, but conclusions in which all the countries that have been summoned to the Disarmament Conference have taken their part. That, I think, is a fact of more importance even than appears on the surface; it inaugurates a system by which it is to be hoped that it may be possible for those States which are not Members of the League of Nations to give their collaboration, assistance and advice to the League when it is dealing with matters of first-rate importance.

What is the result of our efforts? We have not achieved everything. I could have wished, and my Government could have wished, to have gone further even than we have gone; to have made, as the Italian delegation proposed, a more specific and definite statement of the policy of the suspension of armaments. But, though the result does not give us everything we may have desired, and in this world we seldom get everything we want, it is, in my judgment, a very considerable achievement.

Under the terms of our resolution, if the Assembly adopts it — as I hope it will — the Governments of the world will be asked to say clearly and definitely before a given date whether they accept the principle of a truce in armaments. The words are quite specific, quite definite. The Governments are asked to say whether they will refrain from any measure involving an increase in armaments. It is quite true that those are general words, and, in my judgment, however far we had proceeded in the direction in which the Italian delegation asked us to proceed, we should still have had to couch our resolution in general terms; but, if the resolution is carried out honestly and honourably by those Governments which assent to it, the result will be a real suspension, a real truce in armaments, which cannot but have an immensely valuable effect on the public opinion of the world.

As we have repeated in the Third Committee, and as was stated in the remarkable pronouncement made by M. Grandi, the whole conception depends upon an appeal to the honour of the States. We do not seek to bind them by rigid and definite rules; we ask them to accept an honourable engagement — what is sometimes called "a gentleman's agreement" — that they will refrain from all increase of armaments for one year from November 1st.

It will be open to the Governments, when they consider this request, to agree to it or reject it, or to agree to it with comments and explanations as to what their agreement means. To my mind, it will be a great test as to which Governments are so earnestly in favour of a reduction and limitation of armaments that they are not going to be deterred from taking a definite step in that direction by the exaggerated apprehensions which some of their advisers will always feel when the subject is mentioned. It will be, as it seems to me, a great exposition of where the Governments of the world stand, and those Governments which are most in favour of disarmament will have an opportunity of showing their faith by a public act which public opinion will note throughout the world. Similarly, it is a great opportunity, not only for Governments, but for public opinion in each country. All Governments must depend sooner or later on the public opinion of their countries. History emphasises that fact, political events make it clear to everyone who has ever taken part in public life. Now is the opportunity for those who really care for this great cause. Let them exert themselves to show to their Governments that, however far they advance in the direction of disarmament, they are sure of the support of their people.

I am not sure that I do not attach as much importance to the first effective paragraph of the resolution before us as I attach to its conclusions. I refer to the paragraph that urges all those who are desirous that practical effect should be given to the principles of peace and justice upon which the Covenant is based to devote their efforts towards creating a world opinion strong enough to enable the General Disarmament Conference to achieve positive results, including, in particular, a gradual reduction of armaments. That is a call to the peoples, just as the actual request for a declaration is a call to the Governments, and it is upon public opinion that we must always rely in the work which we are trying to do at Geneva. I cannot help feeling that the course of events, even in this matter, has shown how strong and alert a power public opinion is.

Let us review the course of events which produced this final resolution. We all remember the very remarkable speech of the Italian Foreign Minister from this tribune; it was the first speech delivered in this Assembly. It was not only admirable and courageous in itself, it instantly produced a response all over the world; it gave new hope, new confidence, to those who were striving for disarmament throughout the world, and I venture to say to the Governments that they must observe and reckon with that great response. It will show them how powerful the opinion of the people really is in favour of disarmament, and they will disregard that opinion at their peril.

I know that there are individuals — perhaps there are Governments — who are timid in this matter, but I would venture to say to them that, though they may be timid, the peoples of the world are in earnest.

I will conclude my observations by quoting a phrase from my countryman, Lord Grey, and I will say to all the Governments of the world and to the peoples that, if at this Disarmament Conference they do not take steps to make it a real and definite success, the consequences will be incalculable for the world. In his words, "The Governments and peoples of the world must either learn or perish".

The President:

Translation: The Rapporteur, M. de Madariaga, wishes to point out an error in the text of the report.

M. de Madariaga (Spain), Rapporteur:

Translation: I beg to point out that a sentence has been left in the printed document which should have been corrected.

The text of the last sentence of the paragraph beginning, "The Committee's aim has been to prepare the moral atmosphere of the Conference . . ." should be altered to read as follows: "Nevertheless, the Italian delegation, supported by other delegations, pointed out that this latter procedure would not enable the truce to be utilised as an element in preparing for the Conference, and it accordingly pressed its proposal".

The proposed amendment was adopted.

The President:

Translation: General de Marinis, delegate of Italy, will address the Assembly.

General de Marinis (Italy):

Translation: It was the first delegate of Italy who mooted the idea of an armaments truce at the beginning of the Assembly. Several delegates have since expressed their sympathy with the idea and have put forward weighty arguments in its favour.

The Italian delegation then made a concrete suggestion that time should be allowed to enable all delegations to reflect on the possibility of subscribing to this truce and the methods which might be followed to give effect to the idea.

A suggestion was submitted by the Italian delegation to the Third Committee and received considerable support. On the other hand, it was definitely opposed by certain delegations. The Italian delegation, animated by a sincere spirit of conciliation, agreed to the amendments to its proposal in order to facilitate unanimous acceptance.

After a long discussion, the Third Committee brought its work to a conclusion by proposing that the Assembly should adopt a resolution involving the declaration of a truce and its extension for a year — that is to say, an undertaking given by Governments in this present year not to increase their armaments. The resolution in question includes a request to the Governments to state whether they are ready to accept the truce. These were the principles on which our suggestion was based. Moreover, the resolution proposed to us shows that the truce will not prejudge the decision of the Conference or the programmes or proposals which each Government will submit. That is the interpretation we considered should be given to the suggestion.

We had, of course, asked for more, because we had in mind definite engagements for each category of armaments, whereas the resolution we are called upon to adopt refers to armaments as a whole, indicating that, during the truce, those armaments must not be increased above the existing level.

Nevertheless, even in this form the resolution of the twelfth Assembly will, I am sure, have a most beneficial effect in limiting the competition in armaments and will undoubtedly help to arrest the increase in armaments which we have witnessed during the last few years. All will depend upon the good faith and goodwill with which the truce is applied.

There is no doubt on that point, however. All Governments will respond to the powerful appeal of this Assembly and will realise in applying the truce the responsibility they are assuming before the whole world. Confident of this, the Italian delegation fully accedes to the resolution submitted to the Assembly, in the preparation of which it has co-operated with the utmost cordiality.

The President:

Translation: M. Massigli, delegate of France, will address the Assembly.

M. Massigli (France):

Translation: When the idea of concluding an armaments truce before the forthcoming Conference was proposed in this Assembly, and again in the Third Committee, certain delegations, among which was the French delegation, did not hide the misgivings they felt regarding a step the full moral value of which they recognised, but which seemed to them to be, not only a very ambitious anticipation of the work of the forthcoming Conference, but also a task which must inevitably encounter serious difficulties.

I would not say that events have borne out these misgivings; but no one, I think, will deny that they were to a certain extent justified. How could it be otherwise, since some of us seem to have conceived the bold and ambitious scheme of concluding in eight days a convention which the French delegation was advocating as far back as 1928?

Let us say it frankly: the Third Committee's discussions were very animated. Behind theories and principles there loomed at times the shadows of very definite and concrete problems, and we know by experience that such concrete problems cannot be adjusted as easily as principles. On the conclusion of one of the debates in which the various standpoints were freely, and sharply, contrasted, many must have realised that no member of the Committee felt himself quite free to associate himself with the Rapporteur when he came to this platform to secure approval for the Convention on the means of preventing war, which was the happy result of the discussion of three successive Assemblies. Following the example of Viscount Cecil, I avail myself of this occasion to repair the omission so far as I myself am concerned, and to express satisfaction, in the name of the French delegation, that at last there is open for the signature of States a convention which, if a large number of States ratify and adhere to it — as I hope they will — can give to the action of the Council, in certain cases connected with the application of Article 11 of the Covenant, more speed and consequently more efficacy.

And what are the results? The first, and perhaps the most important, is that, on the occasion of this discussion, we have been able not to create but to define, to "organise", if I may say so, a precedent enabling us henceforth, in our discussions, to have more frequently associated with us the representatives of the great American Republic who have been sitting with us for the last week. That is a fact of capital importance.

I now pass to the resolution before us and the report accompanying it, which is admittedly inseparable from it. Quite possibly, this resolution does not fully satisfy any of us. Some would have liked it to be more precise and some would have preferred that it should not definitely bind their Governments. Misunderstandings may arise — though I hope they will not — and perhaps even disputes; but this is no time for recrimination. Let us note the moral value, which Viscount Cecil emphasised so forcibly, of the act which has just been accomplished. Let us also remember the duty which lies upon us so to act that the truce that is to come into force shall be observed under the conditions defined in the report, and that it evinces a spirit of good understanding, goodwill and loyalty on the part of Governments and of nations.

Nothing could be more disappointing or destructive of the value of the truce than quarrelling or quibbling in regard to its application. Nothing could be more disappointing on the eve of so big an event as the Conference of February next. In his remarkable report, our colleague, M. de Madariaga, who has taken — I am sure he will allow me to say — a part in our discussions that will surprise no one who has seen him at work — M. de Madariaga, I say, writes that the Committee notes with satisfaction that the Conference for the Limitation and Reduction of Armaments is fixed for February 2nd next. I should have preferred it if he had added that this fact had been noted with all seriousness.

As this is the last occasion on which we shall have a chance in the Assembly of referring to the forthcoming Conference, may I express the hope that all Governments represented at that Conference will fully realise the importance of the event and that their delegates will come to Geneva armed with instructions and imbued with the spirit without which no success will be possible. I say "all Governments". As M. Briand emphasised from this platform, Governments have the formidable task of balancing, on the one hand, what they hold to be the vital necessities and interests of their countries and, on the other, the necessities and interests of the community of nations. If they come to Geneva hoping to achieve purely individualistic aims under the guise of great principles, whatever such aims might be, I should be very fearful for the result of the Conference. But if they consider it their task to harmonise those individual needs with general aspirations — if, in other words, they can organise their efforts and endeavour to achieve what is reasonable and possible, we may count upon success.

I hope that one year hence we shall meet here once again to register the conclusion of a general convention conceived in the spirit of Article 8 of the Covenant — a convention that will be the crown of a sincere effort to secure the organisation of peace on a solid foundation.

The President:

Translation: Mlle. Forchhammer, delegate of Denmark, will address the Assembly.

Mlle. Forchhammer (Denmark):

In a remarkable speech made by M. Briand in the Assembly two years ago, he appealed to the women to help in the work for peace. This year, again, a request has been made for the co-operation of women.

I want to assure you that women are taking an active part in the work for the establishment of peace and goodwill among the nations, in collaboration with men, as well as in their own associations. How could this be otherwise? Women, like the small nations, have nothing to gain and everything to fear from war.

Now, on the eve of the Disarmament Conference, the women's organisations are doubling their efforts to help bring about the moral disarmament which is so essential for the success of the Conference.

A few days ago a number of important women's organisations joined together to form a disarmament committee here at Geneva. They have pledged themselves "by every means in their power to help in organising the vast and growing public opinion in favour of the Conference and the realisation of the worldwide cry for disarmament and security".

Behind them are millions of women all over the world, who now appeal to the men who have the power to act and therefore the chief responsibility, appeal to them in the words of Bertha von Suttner: "Die Waffen nieder" (lay down your arms).

The President:

Translation: As no other delegate has asked to speak, I shall put to the vote the resolutions of the Third Committee which read as follows:

I. Convinced that the crisis which at the present time is creating such profound disturbance among the nations of the world is due to a number of economic and political causes originating principally in the lack of mutual confidence between the nations; and

Convinced that a renewal of the competition in armaments would necessarily lead to an international and social catastrophe:

The Assembly addresses a solemn appeal to all those who are desirous that practical effect should be given to the principles of peace and justice upon which the Covenant is based and urges them to devote all their efforts towards creating a world opinion strong enough to enable the General Disarmament Conference to achieve positive results, including, in particular, a gradual reduction of armaments to be continued until such time as the object laid down in Article 8 of the Covenant is attained.

In view of the fact that an undertaking on the part of all States not to increase their armaments would help to create an atmosphere of confidence, to prevent competition in armaments and to prepare the ground for the success of the forthcoming Conference:

The Assembly,

Requests the Governments invited to the Disarmament Conference to prepare for this event by means of an armaments truce, and, accordingly,

Requests the Council to urge the Governments convened to the said Conference to give proof of their earnest desire for the successful issue of the efforts to ensure and organise peace and, without prejudging the decisions of the Conference or the programmes or proposals submitted to it by each Government, to refrain from any measure involving an increase in their armaments;

Likewise requests the Council to ask the Governments to state, before November 1st, 1931, whether they are prepared for a period of one year as from that date to accept this truce in armaments.

II. The Assembly,

Noting that, of the sixty-three Governments invited to participate in the Disarmament Conference, twenty-five have up to the present communicated information on the position of their armaments in conformity with the recommendation made by the Council at its January and May sessions:

Requests the Council to invite the Governments which have not yet transmitted their replies to the circular letters from the Secretary-General dated February 17th and June 13th, 1931, on the position of their armaments, to do so as soon as possible, and, in any case, before November 1st, 1931, in order to enable the Secretariat to provide the Disarmament Conference with adequate documentation.

The draft resolutions were adopted.

92. — DISPUTE BETWEEN CHINA AND JAPAN: STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL.

The President:

Translation: The President of the Council has asked to make a communication to the Assembly.

(On the invitation of the President, M. Lerroux (Spain) came to the platform.)

M. Lerroux (Spain), Acting President of the Council:

Translation: In the statement which I had the honour to make to the Assembly on September 24th, 1931, I said I hoped that I should be in a position to make another statement before the end of the Assembly on the question submitted to the Council by the Chinese Government under Article 11 of the Covenant.

The Chinese Government's appeal was submitted on Monday, September 21st. The Council first examined it on September 22nd.

I shall now recapitulate the main facts regarding the origin and history of the affair, according to the statements of the representatives of the two Governments.

On the evening of September 18th, the first incident occurred near Mukden in the South Manchurian Railway zone, which was guarded by Japanese troops.

The Japanese officer in command, acting on the grounds of military precautions, sent troops outside the South Manchurian Railway zone — in particular, to the Mukden line on the Chinese Railway.

The Chinese Government, on receiving the news of the first incident, had contemplated the possibility of settling the matter by direct negotiation, but decided then, in view of the aggravation of the situation, to lay the question before the Council.

The Council's first act, after its meeting on the Tuesday morning, which was devoted to hearing the first statements of the representatives of the two parties, was to authorise its President: (1) to address an urgent appeal to the Governments of China and Japan to abstain from any act which might aggravate the situation or prejudice the peaceful settlement of the problem; (2) to seek, in consultation with the representatives of China and Japan, adequate means whereby the two countries may proceed immediately to the withdrawal of their respective troops without compromising the security of life of their nationals or the protection of the property belonging to them.

The Council further decided to forward, for information, the Minutes of all its meetings, together with the documents relating to this question, to the Government of the United States of America.

On the evening of September 22nd, I telegraphed to the two Governments informing them of the duty entrusted to me by the Council and addressing to them the urgent appeal which the Council had authorised me to transmit.

Simultaneously with these consultations, I convened the Council, when I judged this useful, in order that the latter might be informed of the progress of the affair.

The two Governments replied promptly to the telegrams which I had sent them on September 22nd on behalf of the Council. The Chinese Government's reply was received on Thursday, September 24th, and that of the Japanese Government on Friday the 25th.

The Chinese Government urged that measures should be taken as rapidly as possible to ensure the immediate withdrawal of the Japanese troops. It added that it would assume entire responsibility for the protection of the lives and property of Japanese nationals directly its authority was re-established in the territories evacuated by the Japanese troops.

The Japanese Government, in its reply, stated that it was sincerely desirous of settling the matter peacefully and as soon as possible by negotiations between the two countries. It had withdrawn the greater part of its troops within the railway zone, where they were concentrated. Outside that zone only a few troops remained posted as a measure of precaution in the city of Mukden and in Kirin, while a few soldiers had been stationed at certain points. The withdrawal of the Japanese forces was being effected in so far as the security of Japanese nationals and the protection of the railway then allowed. The Japanese Government proposed to withdraw its troops into the railway zone as the situation improved and felt confident that the Council would, in this matter, trust the sincerity of its attitude.

The Secretary of State of the United States of America also communicated to me on September 24th, through the United States Minister at Berne, a document assuring me that his Government was in wholehearted sympathy with the attitude of the League as expressed in the Council resolution communicated to the Chinese and Japanese Governments, and that he proposed to send to Japan and to China notes on similar lines.

The Council thanked the United States Secretary of State for this communication, adding that it would be happy to continue to keep the United States Government informed of any steps it might take. The Council also expressed the hope that the United States Government would be prepared to enter into communication with it. On September 25th, the United States Minister at Berne communicated to me the text of the identical note addressed by the United States to the Chinese and Japanese Governments.

Following on the replies of the Chinese and Japanese Governments to my telegram of September 22nd, and the additional explanations furnished to the Council by the representatives of the two Governments at the meeting on Friday, September 25th, I was able to inform the Council that the withdrawal of the Japanese forces to within the railway zone was being carried out, and that, if on both sides efforts were pursued to arrive at pacification, the Council might hope for a satisfactory settlement of the problem.

I added that the Council must, in the first place, count on the firm goodwill of the two parties concerned, on their sincerity and on their sincere desire not to aggravate the situation. I stated that the Council would certainly wish, on the one hand, to address an appeal to the Japanese Government to withdraw its troops as soon as possible to within the railway zone, and I stated also that the Council had noted the declaration by the Chinese representative, who, referring to the undertaking contained in the telegram which his Government had addressed to me, gave an assurance that the latter would, in proportion as the withdrawal of the Japanese troops proceeded, assume responsibility for the security of Japanese nationals and the protection of their property outside the railway zone. I added that the Council would doubtless wish to be kept informed of the measures which would be taken by the two parties in reply to the appeal addressed to them.

At the following meeting of the Council, held yesterday (September 28th), the Japanese representative referred to the fact that the Chinese Government had stated through its representative that it would assume responsibility for the safety of Japanese nationals and the protection of their property. While noting the Chinese Government's admirable intentions, the Japanese representative gave the reasons for which it seemed to it necessary, before rescinding all the measures taken to ensure the protection of its nationals, to make certain that the local authorities were really in a position to maintain order, and that the Japanese were not likely to be exposed to danger as the result of the departure of the Japanese protective forces.

The Japanese representative also announced to the Council that the withdrawal of the Japanese troops was proceeding, and that the Japanese effectives stationed at Kirin had been reduced since the communication which he had made to the Council at the previous meeting. Outside the railway zone, there only remained, apart from Kirin and Mukden, small detachments at Hsinmingtung and Chenchiatung for the protection of Japanese nationals against the attacks of bands of Chinese soldiers and brigands which at that time were ravaging those districts.

The Japanese representative added that his Government would not fail to keep the Council closely informed on every phase of the situation and all the measures taken to secure a rapid settlement. As things were, the Japanese representative thought that any further steps in that connection were unnecessary. In conclusion, he asserted once more that his Government had no territorial ambitions in Manchuria, and that it still firmly maintained its intention, which it had already manifested for some days past in the form of definite acts, to bring back its forces into the railway zone, in which the security of its nationals and of their property would be effectively protected.

The Japanese representative hoped that his Government would be enabled to carry out its intentions in full and as rapidly as possible.

The Chinese representative, after stating his satisfaction at hearing that the withdrawal of the Japanese troops was proceeding, expressed his uneasiness on a number of points. On what date would the evacuation be completed? In the evacuated localities, had the prisoners been released and had the seized property been restored to its owners? He thought that certain steps might be taken to hasten the withdrawal of the troops, their withdrawal being desired, not only by China, but also by Japan and by the Council. In his desire to facilitate agreement between the two Governments, he announced that he was prepared, if this proposal were more agreeable to the representative of the Japanese Government, no longer to suggest, as he had done before, the despatch to the spot of a commission consisting of neutral members, but that the Council should assist the parties, in order that, with the assistance of neutral members, arrangements might be made on the spot which would make it possible to fix an early date for the complete withdrawal of the Japanese troops.

The Chinese representative will, I suppose, embody his proposal in a concrete form.

Such is the present situation, I only wish to refer to several essential points: firstly, the statement by the Japanese Government and by its representative that there never has been, and never will be, any question of the military occupation of Manchuria; secondly, the fact that the Japanese Government has on several occasions insisted, before the Council, on its intention to withdraw the Japanese forces as soon as possible to within the railway zone, in so far as the safety of its nationals and their property may be effectively guaranteed; thirdly, the fact that this intention has, according to the declaration made yesterday to the Council by the Japanese representative, already been translated, during the last two days, into definite action and that outside the railway zone Japanese troops are stationed in only four localities.

The Council has noted these reassuring statements by the Japanese Government. It feels certain that, in this very delicate affair, as in other affairs which have been laid before it, the goodwill of the parties and their loyalty to international engagements will be found to constitute the best guarantee for the peace of the world. Having had the matter laid before it under Article 11 of the Covenant, the Council will, after the close of this session of the Assembly, continue its efforts to assist the representatives of the two parties to obtain, by such measures as both may deem acceptable, a satisfactory settlement of a situation which has deeply affected the relations between two great nations and at one time even seemed likely, before the real progress achieved in the last few days, to constitute a threat to international peace.

The President:

Translation: The Assembly will have heard with very great appreciation and deep interest the statement which the President of the Council has been good enough to make. He has given a completely objective account of the cases of both parties and of the action decided upon by the Council.

In the circumstances, I think the Assembly will agree with me that the Council should continue to carry out its pacific mission, and that there is no need for the two parties in question, or for the other members of the Assembly, to open a discussion on the statement just made by the President of the Council. It only remains for me to express the firm conviction of the Assembly that the efforts of the Council will rapidly be crowned with complete success.

93. — CLOSING SPEECH BY THE PRESIDENT.

The President:

Translation: The twelfth Assembly has concluded its work, and the moment has come to take stock of the situation with all frankness, with the courage of sincerity, and at the same time with that sympathetic understanding which enables creative impulses to achieve their purpose.

This Assembly did not open in that atmosphere of chronic scepticism which has characterised the opening of previous Assemblies, an atmosphere which each year we have managed to dispel without too much difficulty, as it were by a ritual gesture. It opened rather in an atmosphere of legitimate distress caused by the serious lack of confidence which was rapidly spreading throughout the world, in every sphere where human effort had established order. Moreover, scarcely had we embarked upon our task when new, and unforeseen events in the domains of finance and politics served still further to aggravate the psychological conditions under which we were called upon to deliberate.

Events such as these would undoubtedly have completely disorganised any international Conference convened to meet the requirements of the hour. But they did not, they could not, upset an assembly of States such as ours, which is, after all, but the transient reflection of a permanent entity, a new form of collective life soundly organised from the outset, forging its way and pursuing its destiny still under the impulse of its early inspiration: and so, when darkness descends upon the earth, it at once takes its rightful place in the sun.

How has the twelfth Assembly reacted to these many adverse factors?

In the first place — and to me this is very important, though I recognise that to the uninitiated it must seem less so — the twelfth Assembly has proceeded methodically and enthusiastically with its ordinary work as if we were living in normal times, and has not allowed itself for a moment to be deflected from the accomplishment of its statutory task by the cries of alarm on every side — cries so insistent that it might have been thought that the work it was doing was not what was most urgently demanded by the times.

When the strong man is put to the test, he does not abandon his daily task; and that man alone is strong who derives from the daily round, the common task, such poise and calm as will enable him, when unexpected obstacles rise up in his path, to transform his energy into an all-compelling and irresistible force.

You will never know with what feelings of comfort and profound gratitude I have followed your discussions. Those discussions on many and varied subjects, in which responsible men from all over the world have participated despite their own anxieties — those discussions at which expert knowledge, goodwill and political good sense were perfectly blended, but which did sometimes, we must admit, seem to be not immediately relevant to the questions that called most urgently for a solution, will remain for all time a striking testimony in favour of this institution.

When the storm is over, it will be said of the twelfth Assembly: "When the world was going through that crisis, and men, despite wise counsels, were beginning to lose faith, the League of Nations, though a new creation in a world which was a prey to haunting anxiety, affirmed its will to live and to pursue the path mapped out in its constitutional character".

For this concrete act of faith, performed so calmly and so simply, for its power to maintain spiritual stability in an unstable world, the twelfth Assembly will have earned the gratitude of future Assemblies and especially of those destined to know better times than ours.

But, it may be asked, what results has the twelfth Assembly achieved? Let us be frank. Some of those results have fallen short of our expectations; others have come up to our expectations; while yet others have so far exceeded anything we had a right to hope that I think, in future, all forecasts with regard to the Assembly's work will be discounted from the outset. The programme of an Assembly such as ours is not based on previous agreement between chancelleries; we prepare our own programme and carry it out, applying to the unforeseen events of the moment the criteria of our fundamental charter.

Let us briefly analyse those results.

In the political field, the crisis has taken much of the sting out of the controversies which temporarily divide certain of our Members and which it has been their habit to discuss frankly and publicly here.

In all other fields — in the field of social, humanitarian and intellectual work and of health and transit — the League action has become more clearly defined, has extended its scope and has come nearer to attaining its goal.

In the economic field, the Council has approved the system of international mortgage credits as a first measure of assistance to sorely tried agricultural countries; but — let us frankly admit this — the twelfth Assembly has been able to add scarcely anything to the proposals of the economic experts, although, by adopting them, it has invested them with the authority attaching to its resolutions.

Having said so much, let us ask ourselves equally frankly if it could have been otherwise. We have been sitting at a time when States themselves were undecided as to the direction to be given to their national policy, and it has been difficult, therefore, to ask them to commit themselves vis-à-vis other countries before knowing exactly what undertakings they would have to give at home.

The League, moreover, is an association of States and, when a crisis affects all its Members in turn, it is only natural that, before acting as a collective body, those States should desire to deliberate among themselves as to whether the course proposed really points the way to salvation. Again, such slight delay as this involves is really only a moment of respite before the preparation of the big general solutions which we shall, I feel certain, be called upon to discuss in the very near future.

In the financial field, on the other hand, the Assembly's intentions have been more definite. It has asked the Council to take effective action with a view to financial assistance for States, and has requested the technical organs of the League to hold themselves in readiness, and, should the States apply to them, to accord such assistance immediately, whether by sending delegations or by some other means.

While we are speaking of finances, how can we avoid touching upon the disquieting problem of our own finances?

The twelfth Assembly, desirous of proving to the world by a noble gesture, which caused it no little effort, that it appreciates the needs of the hour, has imposed on the League sacrifices imposed by circumstances on each of its Members. I respect the Assembly's intention; I appreciate its efforts. May I, however, the President of this Assembly, be permitted, at all events in my individual capacity, to attribute to this gesture a symbolic value, believing firmly, as I do, that its effect must be restricted to the coming year and that it is not the prelude to a future policy. The fact is that League expenditure is expenditure in the cause of peace. It may sound paradoxical, but, the greater the crisis the greater the League's responsibilities and the greater its expenditure.

True, we must be careful not to waste the nations' money. Let us not forget, however, that the contributions of States are simply in the nature of an insurance premium against terrible afflictions which it is our aim to banish for ever; let us not forget that those contributions are infinitesimal compared with the crushing financial burdens which the nations have freely assumed in order that they may make war upon one another. Our duty, obviously, is to do all in our power to repair the consequences of that tragic error — war. We must have recourse to every means, save one — we must not bungle peace by restricting the League's activities, for ours is the only invention ever devised for silencing the thunder of the guns.

In connection with finances, which are, after all, our means of action, how can we help thinking first and foremost and all the time of those whose duty it is to act on our behalf — I mean, the members of the Secretariat and of the International Labour Office?

I am too old and proved a friend of the Secretariat and of every one of its members for there to be any danger of their hearing from me the conventional compliments addressed to them at the close of each Assembly; but I should like to assure them of the high esteem in which this magnificent team of workers, perpetuating the Wilsonian tradition, is held by the Assembly — a team unremitting in its labour, wedded to supple methods and uncompromising in the pursuit of its objects.

True, from time to time we hear criticisms of the Secretariat, criticisms never devoid of courtesy. They bear witness to the important part which the members of the Secretariat have elected to play in the functioning of this institution. When anything goes wrong we say at once: "It is the Secretariat's fault". That is a compliment! But when a thing is going just as we want it to, no one says: "Yes, thanks to the Secretariat". It is so much a matter of course that no one dreams of mentioning it. There you have your revenge!

I should have liked to speak of our Secretary-General, but he is absent — do not misunderstand me — not physically absent, for there he sits with his ever-ready smile, which is so much a part of him that no one ever knows when he is pleased and when he is not. But, mentally, the Secretary-General is no longer with the twelfth Assembly. For him, it has long been over. His spirit is far away, and I will tell you where it is. After ranging over the Disarmament Conference and all the international Conferences that may follow in its train and all the coming Assemblies, his mind is now coping with the agenda of the twentieth Assembly.

We know, Mr. Secretary-General, that you remain here, firm as a rock, while we pass by, a never-ending stream. We know that your lead will always be followed because you are always ready to give a lead, vigilant and confident. But we beg you to come back to earth and join our councils. The twelfth Assembly has not yet terminated its proceedings. It is here before your eyes, anxious to express through me, its President, its affectionate admiration — the admiration of us all, your friends in joy or sorrow, or rather, I should say, in sorrow, for it is your joy to labour for us.

To come back to the results. What we have accomplished would honour any Assembly and satisfy the most exacting, even people who are only aware of the League when the Assembly is sitting, even those who regard the League as no more than a form of hypertrophy of the month of September.

But the twelfth Assembly has done one thing more — and that will be its claim to honour. More than any of its predecessors, it has paved the way for the future; more than any of its predecessors, it has refused to leave to chance the interval which separates it from the next Assembly.

What is the explanation? It is because instinctively it has obeyed the laws which govern collective achievement.

You have all noticed that, as a Conference is drawing to its close, the work it does appears more and more useful. There is a psychological reason for this.

Anyone who has kept in touch with international conferences — and I, though I represent a Power whose interests are essentially limited, have followed them nearly all with ungrudging attention, from the Peace Conference onwards — has observed that any diplomatic gathering goes through three phases.

The first phase is mistrust — national particularism and an uncompromising attitude are the predominating features. During that phase members threaten to leave the Conference if anyone ventures to suggest their reducing their demands below the minimum compatible with their national dignity.

The second phase is that of explanations. We say exactly what we think to one another, in an impeccable form. This is the stage where we are grateful to diplomacy for having remained the last refuge of courtesy, for, without it, how could we diplomats be so agreeably disagreeable?

The third phase is that of sympathy. Delegates are no longer hampered by the necessity of furnishing explanations with regard to their national mandate and begin to regard one another more benevolently. They find, each one of them, that their colleagues are not as bad as they may have been inclined to think. Personal relations begin to play their part and regret is felt that inter-State relations are not as satisfactory as these personal relations. Then gradually and insensibly the inter-State relations are merged in the personal relations. Then it is that the collective spirit of the Conference is formed, and from that moment the Conference really gets to work. As time goes on, even the most unexpected solutions are found to be acceptable. Unfortunately, just as the collective spirit is producing its effect, the Conference comes to an end, and the next one has to begin all over again.

This simply means that international life, like any form of life, is subject to the laws of matter, and that every constructive spirit has somewhere a material body behind it. We do not succeed in accomplishing our tasks as rapidly as we could wish, for we have to break up the collective body just when the spirit informing it is born.

The twelfth Assembly has understood this law which governs collective achievement, and, more than any previous Assembly, it has determined to perpetuate its endeavours; more than any other it has insisted on extending its action beyond the time when it should, officially, have ceased to exist.

The Disarmament Conference is at hand. The eleventh Assembly requested the Council to fix the date, which it did; but we all realise that it is thanks to the twelfth Assembly — which has given the delegates an opportunity of expressing their views and of removing all doubts with regard to the possibility of adjournment — that February 2nd, 1932, has become a categorical imperative of such compelling force that the nations would still meet at Geneva, even if no one mentioned disarmament between now and then.

The Disarmament Conference will be the touchstone of concord between the nations. The issue is not whether this or that view shall prevail, but whether the nations have decided to make a real advance in the direction of applying Article 8, so that — political problems being interdependent — we may know whether, by settling one of them, we can facilitate the settlement of all the others.

Accordingly, we welcome the adoption by the twelfth Assembly of the draft Convention for improving the Means of preventing War, which, together with the draft Convention for Financial Assistance adopted last year, proves that efforts with a view to security go hand in hand with disarmament schemes.

We hail with enthusiasm the action of the First Committee in referring to the jurists included in the delegations to the Disarmament Conference the question of the amendment of the Covenant and the insertion in our fundamental statute of an absolute prohibition of recourse to war.

We cannot but feel infinitely grateful for the suggestion for an armaments truce which you have adopted to-day as a result of the proposal originally made by the Italian delegation and of the resolution submitted in the name of five Powers. As a matter of fact, this is anticipating the Disarmament Conference. So anxious was the twelfth Assembly to perpetuate its activities that it even determined to play out the first act of that Conference.

An institution which, in these difficult circumstances, gives proof of spiritual stability and vitality such as this cannot but command respect, and it has been the privilege of the twelfth Assembly to take unto itself the highest testimony of the League's prestige throughout the world.

For the League must aim at universality, and there are only two means of securing this. The first is to increase the number of Member States and the second is by more intensive and continuous collaboration with non-member States. But not to admit that the second means is only a preparation for the first and, normally, its happy prelude, would be to misinterpret the laws of nature and to deny the wonder of invisible germination until such time as the flower blossoms which alone spells faith to those whose unbelief depends on ignorance.

The twelfth Assembly has made tremendous progress towards universality. The entry of Mexico into the League at this juncture proves that, although the world may be suffering from lack of confidence, one domain — the League — exists to which this does not apply.

Again, the fact that the majority of non-member States have collaborated in the Third Committee proceedings proves that, when it is a question of satisfying the nations' anxiety and strengthening the bases of peace, there is identity of will and outlook among the Member and non-member States, and for this I thank them all very sincerely.

I should like especially to thank the United States of America for its valuable co-operation with the League in the important problems affecting the maintenance and progress of peace. Let us hope that this collaboration will continue and, as far as possible, be extended.

But I want to make myself quite clear. We all realise perfectly the nature of their co-operation. It is voluntary, not arising out of any obligation, and cannot be held directly or indirectly to increase the obligations of the United States. Having said so much, I feel bound to add that the result has been to increase the prestige both of the League and of the United States in the eyes of the world.

In the light of these happenings, how should we refuse to admit that what we call our fundamental charter — the Covenant — is in reality simply a collection of commandments dictated by our own conscience? What does it matter whether they are written or unwritten, accepted or not accepted? When conscience commands, men of honour always act in the same way.

Lastly, it has been the privilege of the twelfth Assembly, before terminating its work, to record a great example of energy and to witness a happy rapprochement.

This lesson of energy was given to us by none other than Great Britain, that great nation, whose age-long history may be summed up in a few simple words: an implacable will to conquer by honourable means, in the face of dire adversity. May I be allowed to express to Great Britain the admiration we have all felt at this further proof of her determination to be true to herself?

As for the rapprochement of which I just spoke, what rapprochement could give us more pleasure than that of France and Germany, whose close co-operation in the interests of true peace has been newly strengthened at Berlin?

I ask you to compare the atmosphere in which we are concluding our work with that in which we began it, and to ask yourselves whether any rational being can still doubt.

When it is a matter of choosing the best means of realising some new venture which is a living reality to all of us, doubt may be legitimate; yet to entertain doubts in regard to what does exist when we do not know for certain what we should put in its place is nothing less than suicide.

No, this time the enemy is not at our doors: he is within ourselves. Let us banish the enemy in our midst — deadly doubt, and most of all that absurd idea that the individual can be saved when the community is in danger of perishing.

Let us do this, and we shall hear the voice of instinct: "Man's destiny is imperishable". Let us do this and then we can say with firm conviction: "The hour of darkness is past, for the light is in us".

I declare the twelfth session of the Assembly of the League of Nations closed.

The Assembly rose at 1 p.m.

2. Report on the Work of the League since the Last Session of the Assembly.

Each year the Secretary-General prepares a general report on the work of the League since the last Assembly, up to May 31st. This report is circulated on July 1st. The work accomplished during June and July is recorded in a supplementary report, which is circulated at the opening of the Assembly.

These two reports form the basis of the general discussion at the beginning of the Assembly, during which the various delegations have an opportunity of stating their opinions on the work of the League.

The Assembly may refer to the appropriate Committee any part of these reports dealing with a question which does not appear on the agenda—e.g., mandates, disarmament, minorities, etc.

3. Election of Three Non-permanent Members of the Council.

The Assembly decided, in 1926, to elect each year three non-permanent Members of the Council for a period of three years from the date of their election.

The States whose terms of office come to an end this year are Spain, Persia and Venezuela. Spain was declared re-eligible by a vote of the Assembly on September 10th, 1928.

A. Items inserted by or arising out of the Decisions of the Assembly.

I. Legal Questions.

4. Progressive Codification of International Law.

In 1930, the Assembly adjourned this question to its next session, and invited the Governments to send in their observations for consideration by the 1931 Assembly. These observations will be circulated during the summer.

5. Preparatory Procedure to be followed in the Case of General Conventions to be negotiated under the Auspices of the League.

The 1930 Assembly deferred to 1931 the question whether the rules laid down in its resolution of October 3rd, 1930, should be modified as a result of the observations received from Governments and from the Technical Organisations of the League.

The observations received will be circulated during the summer.

6. Amendment of the Covenant of the League of Nations in order to bring it into Harmony with the Pact of Paris.

The 1930 Assembly decided to continue its study of this question in 1931. It will examine, in particular, the proposals made by the Sub-Committee of the First Committee in 1930 and any observations made by Members of the League (see documents C.175.M.64. and C.175(a).M.64(a). 1931.V).

11. Commission of Enquiry for European Union.

During 1931, the Commission of Enquiry for European Union set up by the Assembly has carried out various work—enquiries into the economic depression and unemployment; disposal of present and future cereal stocks; establishment of an international institute for agricultural credits—with the help of the Financial Committee, etc. The results of this work will be submitted to the 1931 Assembly.

13. Nansen International Office for Refugees.

Under its Statutes, this office has to submit a report on its work each year to the Assembly.

Further, on the recommendation of the Fourth Committee, the 1930 Assembly requested the International Organisation for Refugees to submit to its 1931 session a systematic plan for the winding-up of the Refugee Organisation by December 31st, 1939.

PENAL AND PENITENTIARY QUESTIONS: IMPROVEMENTS IN PENAL ADMINISTRATION.

REPORT OF THE FIFTH COMMITTEE TO THE ASSEMBLY.

Rapporteur: Professor V. PELLA (Roumania).

INTRODUCTION.

The Fifth Committee has studied with the greatest interest the report on penal administration which was submitted by the Secretary-General to the Twelfth Assembly. The introductory portion contains a summary of the resolutions adopted by the League since 1930 and traces the history of the question brought before the League by the Howard League for Penal Reform.

It might be well to mention that, with a view to a more thorough study of the problem, a proposal relating to international co-operation for the prevention of ordinary crimes was made to the League of Nations as far back as 1924 (see Revue internationale de droit pénal, No. 1, 1924).

In 1927, the representative of Roumania pointed out at the eighth Assembly that the League could not remain indifferent to the increase in crime, which is keeping pace with the continuous transformation and internationalisation of contemporary social life, by becoming international itself. Accordingly, he suggested to the eighth Assembly that the League should turn its attention to this scourge of humanity. These suggestions, which were made during the discussion of the problem of the codification of international law (see document C.548.M.196.1925.V, page 40), were referred to by the Howard League in its memorandum to the League of Nations (document A.P.1). In this document, the Howard League stated that, in connection with the codification of international law, the Committee of three jurists suggested in the report which it presented to the Council in June 1929 that Conventions should be concluded on international criminal law and on assistance between States with a view to the punishment of criminal offences. The Howard League added that it was surely the concern of the States Members of the League that the methods of such punishment should be enlightened and humane.

The representative of Roumania who was appointed by the Fifth Committee to present the question of penal administration to the Committee showed in his preparatory report that the League of Nations would be discharging its duty by organising co-operation between States for the suppression of crime. He stated, moreover, that, internationally, the problem of penal administration, or rather of international criminal policy, might be regarded from three angles: the progressive unification of penal law, the co-operation between States for the prevention and suppression of crime and the execution of the penalty.

The representative of the British Empire considered that it was not advisable for the Fifth Committee to discuss the parts of the preparatory report concerning the unification of penal law and the co-operation between States for the prosecution and punishment of criminals. He called attention to the fact that the only subject on the agenda of the Committee was that of penal administration, and he expressed the opinion that the immense problems raised by the Rapporteur were not germane to the subject on the agenda. This view was supported by the representatives of Germany and Canada.

The representatives of Belgium, Italy, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Spain and Roumania thought that, in view of the complexity of the problem, it would be difficult for the Committee to define its scope. They maintained that all the questions referred to in the preparatory report should be included in the Committee's general discussion.

The general discussion which took place in the Committee covered the problems dealt with in the three following chapters.

I. PROGRESSIVE UNIFICATION OF PENAL LAW.

The representatives of Belgium, France, Spain, Italy, Czechoslovakia, India and Roumania spoke on the progressive unification of penal law.

[1] For the sake of economy, the Report and the supplementary Report on the work of the League since the Eleventh Session of the Assembly (documents A6 and A6(a) 1931) are not reproduced this year.

The Indian representative emphasised the fact that physical, climatic and social conditions vary from one country to another, and that this fact ought to be taken into account in any attempt at unification of law.

The representatives of the other countries mentioned above agreed that progressive unification of penal law was desirable. Some of them drew attention to the passages in the preparatory report which stated that the activity of the League with regard to certain offences of an international character, such as the traffic in women and children, slavery, the traffic in drugs, obscene publications and counterfeiting currency had been most productive. The fact that international conventions concerning the offences referred to above have been drafted or supplemented under the auspices of the League bears eloquent witness to this fact.[1]

But it is not only in the matter of forms of charges that certain of the existing conventions tend towards international unification, or have even succeeded in reaching it. A similar unification is now being carried out with regard to the fundamental principles of criminal law. For instance, the Convention of April 1929 for the suppression of counterfeiting currency contains provisions concerning attempts to commit forgery, complicity and habitual criminality.

It may be recalled also, that the League is at present undertaking investigations for the purpose of preparing new conventions for the punishment of certain other offences which are regarded as having an international character. The Financial Committee is dealing with the question of the possible preparation of a convention for the prevention and international suppression of the forging of documents of value other than paper money and banknotes—e.g., shares and bonds, cheques, bills of exchange, etc.

Certain private or governmental institutions, such as the Association internationale de droit pénal (Brussels Congress, 1926) and the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission (Prague Congress, 1930), reflecting the contemporary tendency towards the international unification of criminal law, have discussed the problem of unification and passed resolutions clearly favourable to such unification.

The representatives of Belgium and Roumania drew attention to the work of a special international institution set up for the unification of criminal law. The aim of the International Bureau for the Unification of Criminal Law is to study the proposals made by Governments, the various organisations of the League of Nations and international associations, for harmonising and co-ordinating criminal law; to carry out preparatory work for the purpose of deciding which questions of criminal law can form the subject of uniform regulations in the various countries, and to take the necessary steps for summoning international conferences for the unification of criminal law.[2]

The Spanish representative moreover drew attention to the passages in the preparatory report which point out that the present time is favourable for the unification of criminal law, and that the opportunity should not be lost. Many States are now engaged in framing new criminal codes. These countries can at present unify the principles relating to punishment—particularly the punishment of international offences—more easily than when they have framed and passed their codes.

[1] The report states that an examination of these conventions shows the tendency to secure international solidarity against criminality by the unification of certain forms of charges in the law of the various countries. Although the results obtained in the older conventions as regards the unification of forms of charges cannot be regarded as altogether satisfactory, it must nevertheless be acknowledged that, as far as counterfeiting currency is concerned, the Convention of April 1929 reached a satisfactory solution.

This Convention is considered in the report as a model to be kept in mind when previous conventions concerning the prevention and punishment of certain other international offences are revised.

The Conference for the Limitation of the Manufacture of Narcotic and Other Dangerous Drugs, which was held under the auspices of the League in July 1931, and which, in the Final Act, contains the following recommendation, expressed a similar view:

> "The Conference,
> "Considering that the Advisory Committee on Traffic in Opium and other Dangerous Drugs has been presented by the International Criminal Police Commission with a draft international Convention for the Suppression of the Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs, the main features of which are based on the Convention of April 20th, 1929, against counterfeiting currency,
> "Expresses the wish that, on the basis of the work undertaken by the Advisory Committee, a convention may be concluded with the least possible delay for the prosecution and punishment of breaches of the law relating to the manufacture of, trade in and possession of narcotic drugs."

The report points out that the tendency to unify certain indictments in municipal law is also facilitated by a general phenomenon. The international spirit is beginning to influence the juridical conceptions of the civilised nations, the effect being to internationalise municipal law. At a more distant date, the possibility might even be contemplated of embodying all the provisions of existing conventions in a general convention, which would include all the rules relating to the punishment of offences declared to be international offences by treaty provisions. All other offences which the Governments might agree to regard as international in character could be inserted within the framework of such a Convention, without its being necessary to draft new conventions.

[2] The preparatory report mentions that, proceeding with the caution necessary for the accomplishment of such a task, the three official Conferences for the Unification of Criminal Law which have so far been held have secured encouraging results. The aim of these Conferences (Warsaw 1927, Rome 1928 and Brussels 1930) was inter alia the unification of forms of charges for offences covered by the Conventions for the Suppression of the Traffic in Drugs, the Traffic in Obscene Publications and the Suppression of Counterfeiting Currency. The next Unification Conference, which is to meet in Paris at the end of this year, will deal particularly with the traffic in women and children, slavery and piracy.

The representative of Roumania reminded the Committee that the Assembly had, at one of its previous sessions, pronounced itself in favour of the principle of the unification of private law. There would, therefore, in his view be no reason for objecting to the principle of the progressive unification of criminal law. Of course, specialists will have to establish carefully the scheme of unification—i.e., to determine its scope.

The Roumanian representative emphasised the point that the unification can only be progressive, and should apply in the first place to offences in the suppression of which all civilised States are interested, particularly international crimes and offences (e.g., traffic in women and children, slavery, piracy, traffic in drugs, etc.).

Taking into account the views expressed on this subject and considering the importance of the efforts already made with a view to the progressive unification of penal law, the Fifth Committee considers that the best method would be to ask certain specially qualified independent organisations in what way the League of Nations could give assistance in this work of unification.

The Fifth Committee considers that, after the observations of the said organisations have been received, they should be submitted to the Members of the League in order to ascertain whether the latter desire the League of Nations also to give its assistance in the matter.

II. International Co-operation for the Prevention and Suppression of Crime.

The Fifth Committee also discussed the question of international co-operation in the suppression of crime. Reference must not be omitted to the work which the League of Nations has carried on in this field.

In this connection, members of the Committee recalled the fact that the Committee for the Codification of International Law had investigated the questions of extradition, the competence of States with regard to offences committed outside their territory and the communication of judicial and extra-judicial documents in criminal matters. Although its work did not lead to the conclusion of multilateral Conventions, it provided models for certain countries in framing bilateral conventions. [1]

The codification of international criminal law is often seriously impeded by national susceptibilities. These will continue as long as important differences exist between the codes of the various countries in regard to the fundamental principles of prosecution and punishment. The preparatory report mentions that the Interparliamentary Union, at its Paris Conference (August 1927), bearing in mind the difficulties encountered by the Committee for the Codification of International Law, adopted a recommendation to prepare the ground for the codification of international criminal law by first of all removing the differences in the various codes. [2]

It was also urged that the opposition between countries whose penal system is based on strict territoriality and those whose systems admit as a general rule of the punishment of crimes committed abroad, constitutes a serious difficulty in arriving at international agreements on criminal matters.

The preparatory report maintains, however, that experience has proved the contrary. Indeed, in the Convention for the Suppression of Counterfeiting Currency, drawn up under the auspices of the League, compromise formulas of a most satisfactory nature were devised, which none the less respect the principles of competence in criminal matters maintained by the different countries. [3]

The representative of Belgium laid stress on the work accomplished in the matter of international criminal law by governmental or private institution. In this connection, without referring in detail to what was done before the war by the International Criminal Law Union and the Institut de Droit international, or to the more recent work of the International Law Association, a special committee of which, at its congress in Warsaw, adopted a preliminary draft model extradition treaty, mention was made of the fact that the International Penal Law Association, the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission, the International Criminal Police Commission and the International Bureau for the Unification of Criminal Law have undertaken the elaboration of certain principles of international criminal law.

[1] A case in point is the Convention regarding Extradition and Judicial Co-operation in Criminal Matters between Portugal and Roumania, which was signed at Lisbon in February 1930. It was based on certain provisional and tentative results obtained by the League Committee for the Progressive Codification of International Law.

[2] The preparatory report stated that evidence of the decidedly favourable attitude of a large number of States to the unification of certain principles of criminal law is also furnished by Recommendations 12 and 14 of the Diplomatic Conference on Counterfeiting Currency.

The said recommendations ask " that the rules for the extradition of accused or convicted persons should be unified on an international basis with a view to obtaining a really effective suppression of crime, and that the despatch and the execution of letters of request should be regulated by an international convention so as to produce a uniform system of rules ".

It may also be recalled that the first Conference of Central Police Offices, which met at Geneva under the auspices of the League in March 1931, unanimously adopted a recommendation in favour of the conclusion of multilateral and regional extradition treaties, to replace, in the case of certain groups of States whose legal codes present no fundamental differences of principle, the many existing bilateral treaties (see document C.193.M.76.1931.II.A, page 15).

[3] This is the case with Article 4 (complicity, distinct offences), with Article 6 (international recognition of previous convictions), with Article 8 (principle of active personality) and with Article 9 (partial application of the principle of the universality of punishment).

As regards international police co-operation, members of the Committee recalled a recommendation made by the Conference of Central Police Offices held this year in Geneva under the auspices of the League. [1]

The representative of Roumania expressed his conviction that, in this branch of its work, the League of Nations can derive advantage from collaborating with an important institution—namely, the International Criminal Police Commission. The work of this institution—the value of which has been unanimously recognised by specialists—the valuable assistance which it has afforded and is affording to States in identifying and arresting criminals, as well as its congresses on scientific police work, show how useful and helpful the Commission can be in securing the general application of international measures relating to identification and arrest.

With regard to all the problems connected with international co-operation for the prevention and suppression of crime, the Fifth Committee, taking account of the importance of certain results already obtained, both by several international conventions and by certain organs of the League and various other institutions, also considers that the best system would be to consult certain independent organisations on these problems and submit their observations to the Members of the League. They should be asked whether they consider that the League of Nations could give useful assistance with a view to a satisfactory solution of these problems. In this field also, while the principle of international co-operation for the prevention and suppression of crime must be followed, the material must be carefully chosen, beginning by questions in which such co-operation appears the most urgent and the most easily secured.

III. Execution of Penalties, Preventive Measures and Aid to Discharged Prisoners.

A penalty can no longer in these days be regarded merely as the infliction of pain or the expiation of a crime. Apart from quite exceptional cases, when the criminal has to be eliminated, a penalty is to be looked on as a means of re-adapting the offender to social life—as a means of reclamation. It is moreover this view of the nature of punishment which has contributed to the great development of penology.

Owing to the great importance of the problem, certain organisations decided to have the question of the need for a special code concerning the execution of penalties examined. The question has been submitted to the Third Congress of the International Penal Law Association to be held at Palermo in April 1932.

If, in the immense majority of cases, the penalty is regarded as a means of reclaiming the delinquent, and if it is intended to influence the whole character of the criminal, it must obviously not be executed in a barbarous spirit, as then it would fail in its real aim, which is to reform and humanise the delinquent.

Thus, it is not without a certain uneasiness that we have to draw attention to the abuses in the execution of penalties, to which reference has been made by the Howard League in its memorandum addressed to the League of Nations.

From a social and humanitarian standpoint, therefore, the question of the regulation of the execution of penalties of imprisonment concerns and must concern the League of Nations.

In this connection the representative of the British Empire pointed out to the Committee that the treatment of prisoners varies very much in different countries. Even in one single country a great divergence of opinion may exist as regards the conception of what such treatment should be. He asserted that abuses still occurred in the treatment of prisoners, and felt that it was a humanitarian question which the League ought to take up, especially as these victims of ill-treatment in prison might be nationals of a foreign State. At the same time, unlike the other evils which the League was trying to remedy, evils due to natural causes or to individuals acting contrary to the laws of their own country, the particular evil in question was almost always the fault of a Government. That made the question particularly delicate, as improvements could not be obtained except with the voluntary co-operation of Governments. He thought, however, that the League's action with a view to obtaining such co-operation might be extremely effective.

Bearing in mind the important work of the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission in this sphere, the representatives of Germany and Roumania expressed the desire that the Fifth Committee should submit to the Assembly a recommendation that States Me mbers of the League which do not as yet form part of this Commission should be invited to belong to it.

The Fifth Committee thought that such a recommendation could be proposed when the States Members of the League had expressed themselves in favour of collaboration with the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission as regards all questions relating to the treatment of prisoners. It proposed that Member States should be asked whether the best means

[1] This Conference recommends:

". . . that the Council of the League of Nations should, if it thinks fit and expedient, in view of the increasingly international character of crime in its various aspects, study the possibility of preparing a Convention on international co-operation between police forces and the establishment of an official police information bureau forming a link between the various police forces, with the general object of ensuring more effective prevention and punishment of crime ". (See document C.193.M.76.1931.II.A.)

whereby the League could assist in this domain would be to collaborate with the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission or to establish a special Committee of the League.

The Fifth Committee was also called upon to give an opinion on the question of the action to be taken in regard to the enquiries carried out and the observations submitted by the various Governments on the General Body of Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners drawn up by the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission. These Rules have given rise to a large number of problems. The Fifth Committee thought that it would be impossible for the Assembly at the present stage to pronounce upon the substance of this question.

While recognising the great value of these Rules, the representatives of Germany and Roumania maintained that they might be regarded by certain countries, which have made considerable progress in this matter, as falling below the minimum requirements desirable. Moreover, in fixing the minimum conditions, care must be taken to avoid giving the impression that certain other countries whose systems conform to those conditions need make no further efforts. Accordingly it has been proposed in the report that these minimum Rules should be converted into a body of fundamental principles for the treatment of prisoners.

Without attempting a full analysis of the Rules drawn up by the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission, which, generally speaking, have had a favourable reception, we would point out that the international institutions consulted, and also the International Labour Office and certain organs of the League, have raised objections in regard to certain special points.

The International Labour Office has drawn up a scholarly memorandum on prison labour (document 200.19.01). The representatives of Germany, Roumania and Czechoslovakia expressed the desire that the International Labour Office should forward its memorandum to the States Members of the League of Nations. In the memorandum it raises objections, inter alia, to Rule No. 13 concerning remuneration for work. This Rule is not imperative, but is a simple recommendation. The International Labour Office also regrets that the General Body of Rules does not deal with the quantity of work given to the prisoner.

Referring to the General Body of Rules, the representatives of Canada, Italy and Czechoslovakia explained to the Committee the recent progress made in their respective countries as regards the treatment of prisoners.

Beginning with the principles upon which the reclassification of offenders should be based, it is obvious that the problem of juvenile delinquents should receive special attention. According to the preparatory report, more stress might be laid upon this problem in the General Body of Rules. The Child Welfare Committee recommends that detention in prisons should be absolutely forbidden in the case of children.

As regards the treatment of juvenile delinquents, certain countries are very backward, while others have made considerable progress. Among the most recent reforms, we would mention the entry into force of the new Italian Penal Code (July 1931).

The Child Welfare Committee has already undertaken enquiries into the question of juvenile delinquents, and it is to be hoped that its efforts will help to improve the methods of their treatment.

It was also maintained in the Fifth Committee that the problem of habitual criminality and the special measures to be taken in regard to the treatment of professional criminals might have been dealt with more definitely in the General Body of Rules.

Special reference was made also to the special treatment of abnormal criminals, and the desire was expressed that, when the Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners are revised, this question might be dealt with more fully.

Lastly, in certain replies from the organisation consulted, special reference is made to the question of the treatment of political offenders. Without going more deeply into this matter, according to the preparatory report one fact seems certain—namely, that there is a great difference between political offences and common law offences. It would be expedient, therefore, to study the consequences that this might have on the prison system.

Moreover, the International Penal Law Association (memorandum by Professor Roux) considers that the question, whether maintenance of very large prisons is or is not desirable, should also have been settled in the General Body of Rules. The International Penal Law Association is in favour of medium-sized prisons, because, if these institutions are too large, the moral influence of the director cannot be effectively exercised. The International Labour Office states in its memorandum that it entirely agrees with the observations of the International Penal Law Association.

As regards the separation of offenders (separation by sex, age, and separation of untried from convicted prisoners), this Association also suggests that they should be separated according to the motives of the crime.

The desire was also expressed in the Fifth Committee that, when the General Body of Rules is revised, further stress should be laid on the application of the progressive system, which is based on a careful classification of prisoners and is designed to avoid the risk of moral contagion.

The delicate problem of the cell system was also dealt with in the observations submitted by the various organisations. For instance, the International Penal Law Union (memorandum by Professor Grünhut) states that permanent solitary confinement is no longer admissible in any case. The length of time during which a prisoner may be confined alone in a cell should be strictly limited by the legislation of every country.

Certain other problems, such as disciplinary measures, corporal punishment of a disciplinary nature, and instruments of restraint have also given rise to interesting observations.

Finally, the problem of prisoners' health has given rise to certain suggestions on the part of the Health Committee, which also proposes to continue its investigations into this special matter. The Fifth Committee suggests that the Health Committee should forward the results of its investigations direct to the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission.

Other questions which have been dealt with in certain countries (the sex problem in prisons, etc.) might also form the subject of further enquiries.

The representatives of Germany, Spain and Roumania stressed the question of the choice of officials, a question to which the most careful attention should be given. It was suggested that it might be best to entrust the management of women's prisons entirely to women. The International Labour Office considers that, if enquiries were made, they would show that, in order to ensure satisfactory organisation, it is in no wise necessary to entrust the management of women's prisons to men. The preparatory report affirms that, in all countries in which these duties have been assigned to women, the latter have been equal to their task. In Spain, the general control even of prisons has recently been entrusted to a woman.

Certain other questions were dealt with in the Fifth Committee, such as the conversion in some countries of a fine, in the case of non-payment, into imprisonment. In this connection it was suggested that it might be desirable, in accordance with the provisions of certain draft penal codes, convert to the fine into a certain number of days' labour without detention, or, if it is impossible for the person convicted to work, into a number of days' arrest at home, with a view to preventing the imposition of short-term penalties of imprisonment, which in many cases tend to corrupt the prisoner.

It was also urged that an enquiry should be held into the conditions under which the system of open-air labour, which, when it is well organised, produces admirable results in certain countries, might be made general.

The preparatory report also lays stress on remuneration for the prisoners' labour. Certain countries, such as Poland (Decree of March 7th, 1928), have gone so far as to allow prisoners the legal right to substantiate their claim to the sum placed to their account.

Lastly, certain delegates proposed the formation in all countries of a " pécule " derived in part from the prisoner's labour. The object of this " pécule ", which was introduced in Amsterdam prisons as long ago as the 17th century, is to make it possible to re-adapt the offender and fit him for an honest life after he leaves prison, and also to assist the members of his family. In some countries, it is possible for a portion of the prisoner's earnings to be given to the members of his family; this is the case in Austria, Belgium, Finland, Germany, Norway, Sweden and some other countries.

Certain of the organisations consulted deal with one very delicate problem, which has given rise to a great deal of discussion—namely, deportation (banishment, transportation). From a humanitarian point of view it would be desirable to consider whether the actual system of deportation should be abandoned, or whether all that is necessary is to improve the conditions of application of such a system, so that the life and health of convicts may no longer be endangered.

From this standpoint, also, attention was drawn to the necessity of limiting the period during which convicts are required to work in mines.

In view of the above particulars and of the fact that a large number of questions still remain to be cleared up, the Fifth Committee came to the conclusion that the League is not in a position to reach a decision as to the substance of the problem of the treatment of prisoners. The Fifth Committee thought, therefore, that the General Body of Rules should be referred to the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission, with a request that they might be re-examined in the light of the various observations submitted.

The Fifth Committee thought it necessary also that the International Labour Office should be asked to continue its investigations into prison labour.

Finally, the moral support, assistance and repatriation of foreign prisoners who have been discharged represent some of the grave problems which cannot be ignored in considering the whole question of international policy in regard to crime.

In this connection, suggestions were submitted to the Fifth Committee concerning the establishment of an international federation of the different associations dealing in each country with the welfare of prisoners. The Committee thought that such a laudable proposal should be encouraged.

Further, it would be advisable for the League to endeavour to co-ordinate the multiple activities of the governmental and private organisations which deal with prison problems on an international plane. With this object, the Fifth Committee thinks it desirable to ask the Secretary-General to get more closely into touch with such organisations.

It was also proposed that the League of Nations might take advantage of the meeting of the Commission for the Protection and Welfare of Children and Young People in April 1932 to consult the Government delegates serving on this Commission, to whom might be added a representative of each of the organisations dealing with prison problems, concerning a systematic programme of work in regard to penal matters. This meeting might also serve as a means of establishing closer co-operation between those organisations and the League.

Apart from budgetary considerations, the Fifth Committee felt that the problem was too vast for it to be usefully examined by the Commission for the Protection and Welfare of Children and Young People. However, the Fifth Committee proposes, in No. 4 of its draft resolution, consultation with certain independent organisations specially competent in the matter. It is desirable as regards the questions included under No. 4 that the representatives of the institutions consulted should arrange to hold a meeting to discuss the different problems referred to them, so as to arrive at conclusions taking into account the various aspects of those problems.

The Fifth Committee also pointed out that if the organisations mentioned in No. 4 were not able to forward a sufficient number of copies of their replies, in the two official languages of the League, for distribution to all the Members, the Secretary-General might forward to Governments, in conformity with No. 5 of the resolution, the conclusions only of the replies of the said organisations.

The proceedings of the Fifth Committee resulted in the framing of the following draft resolution which was adopted unanimously and which the Committee now has the honour to submit to the Assembly for approval:

" The Assembly:

" Having been invited by the Council in January 1930 to consider the best way in which the League of Nations could co-operate with the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission and other organisations in their efforts to assist in the improvement of prisons in accordance with modern economic, social and health standards;

" Having noted the observations of the States Members and non-members of the League of Nations and of the organisations which have been consulted regarding the Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners (see document C.620.M.24.1930.IV);

" Considering that, if the improvement of penal administration by co-operation between Governments is to receive the support of the League of Nations, the latter will need the advice and assistance of a body of experts;

" Considering, further, the importance of the efforts which have already been made, both by means of a number of international conventions, and by certain organs of the League of Nations and various institutions, to achieve a gradual unification of penal law and to establish co-operation of States in the prevention and suppression of crime:

" Requests the Secretary-General:

" (1) To refer to the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission the replies and observations received regarding the Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners, and also the report and Minutes of the Fifth Committee, and to ask it to reconsider these rules in the light of the aforementioned replies and observations;

" (2) To develop the policy of co-operation with organisations dealing with the international aspect of penal and penitentiary problems;

" (3) To ask the International Labour Office to continue its study in connection with prison labour;

" (4) To forward the report and the Minutes of the Fifth Committee to the International Penal Law Association, the International Bureau for the Unification of Penal Law, the International Criminal Police Commission, the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission, the Howard League for Penal Reform, the International Law Association, the International Penal Law Union, and any other international organisations which may be proposed by the Governments to the Secretary-General, and to ask them in what manner they consider that the assistance of the League of Nations might be of value with a view to achieving a gradual unification of criminal law and the co-operation of States in the prevention and suppression of crime;

" (5) After having received the observations of these organisations, to forward them, together with the report and Minutes of the Fifth Committee, to the States Members of the League, and to ask them whether they wish the League of Nations to lend its assistance also in regard to the questions referred to in No. 4.

" (6) After having received the answer of the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission on the Standard Minimum Rules, to ask the Governments of States Members of the League whether they consider that the League could best assist in connection with the treatment of prisoners by co-operation with the International Penal and Penitentiary Commission, or by setting up a special Committee of the League to study this problem.

" The Secretary-General is asked to submit a report to the next Assembly on all questions contained in this resolution. "

TRAFFIC IN OPIUM AND OTHER DANGEROUS DRUGS.

REPORT OF THE FIFTH COMMITTEE TO THE ASSEMBLY.

Rapporteur : M. SAWADA (Japan).

In laying before the Assembly an outline of the activities of the League during the last twelve months in the struggle against the traffic in opium and other dangerous drugs, the Fifth Committee desires to mention with particular satisfaction the important advance represented by the establishment, by the Conference of 1931, of a Convention for limiting the Manufacture and regulating the Distribution of Narcotic Drugs. The Committee is convinced that the League is now in possession of an effective instrument for combating this evil, provided that all necessary steps are taken to ensure the strict and universal enforcement of the Convention, while at the same time every effort should be made to observe more fully the Geneva Convention, which the new diplomatic instrument is intended, not to replace, but to supplement and strengthen.

I. CONVENTION FOR LIMITING THE MANUFACTURE AND REGULATING THE DISTRIBUTION OF NARCOTIC DRUGS.

The Fifth Committee has learnt with the keenest interest of the proceedings of the Conference for the Limitation of the Manufacture of Narcotic Drugs, which met at Geneva from May 27th to July 13th, 1931, under the presidency of Senator de Brouckère. It was attended by the delegations of fifty-seven countries, including several non-Members of the League.[1] The Committee desires to pay a tribute to the distinguished President of the Conference, to the conciliatory attitude of the various delegations, thanks to which an agreement was reached, and also to all the work of political and technical preparation accomplished by the Advisory Committee on the Traffic in Opium and Other Dangerous Drugs. This work was made easier by the very large volume of material which had been collected by the Secretariat. The delegates to the Fifth Committee, especially the Portuguese delegate, who is Chairman of the Advisory Committee, and the Italian delegate, referred with gratification to the progress made as a result of this Convention.

The Convention marks an entirely new and highly important development in international co-operation, since this is the first time that an industry has been brought under international regulation, and that manufacture in its economic aspect has been wholly subordinated to higher humanitarian and moral aims. Thanks to the system established by this Convention and the Geneva Convention, there will be at the headquarters of the League itself a sort of central counting-house for the world traffic in drugs. The League's efforts in the economic field to reconstruct the world on new foundations find an example and an encouragement in this Convention.

The new Convention covers a far larger number of drugs than preceding Conventions; it brings codeine under control, whereas for many years morphine converted into codeine has to some extent escaped all supervision; it prohibits the export, except on very strict conditions, of a substance which has in the past bulked very large in the illicit traffic — diacetylmorphine — and raises the question of its replacement by less dangerous substances. It contains stipulations relating to reserve stocks and surplus stocks, which will be gradually brought into use for legitimate consumption by a corresponding reduction in ouptut, or will be disposed of under the sole responsibility of the Government.

Above all, through a system of estimates furnished by Governments, the Convention enables a world total of the quantities to be manufactured to be fixed, and sets up a Supervisory Body to examine those estimates. The Supervisory Body is composed of members of the Advisory Committee on Traffic in Opium and Other Dangerous Drugs of the League of Nations, of the Permanent Central Board, of the Health Committee of the League and of the Office international d'hygiène publique. Efforts have been made to confer an exceptional degree of authority on this international body. The work of the secretariat of the Supervisory Body will be provided for by the Secretary-General of the League, in close co-operation with the Permanent Central Board established by the Geneva Opium Convention.

[1] Afghanistan, Brazil, Costa Rica, Free City of Danzig, Egypt, Hejaz, San Marino, Turkey, the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

The new Convention strengthens the powers of various League organisations, especially the Advisory Committee and the Permanent Central Board. The Fifth Committee emphasised the importance it attached to the provisions instructing the Advisory Committee to draw up a model administrative code to serve, as it were, as a body of regulations for the application of the Convention and as a pattern for national laws and regulations. It is anxious that this code should be drawn up as quickly as possible. Furthermore, the system of annual reports and reports of seizures, which forms an essential part of the Committee's work, is for the first time effectually incorporated in an international Convention. The Advisory Committee will also have an important part to play in the work of the Supervisory Body, as regards consideration of the estimates, and likewise — in concert with the Health Committee — when any question arises of extending the Convention to new drugs.

The powers and responsibilities of the Permanent Central Board are also enlarged. It will be the duty of the Board, not only to collect statistics from the various countries, but also to prepare a statement of these figures, so that it may be possible to discover or prevent over-production or excessive imports and exports, or the accumulation of stocks which might find their way into the illicit traffic. By defining more clearly the relations between the Advisory Committee on Traffic in Opium and the Central Board, the new Convention will associate them yet more closely in the common task.

Several delegates to the Committee felt that the new Convention, like any other product of the human mind, suffered from certain deficiencies, and that it was incumbent on the League, and on the Advisory Committee in particular, to take steps in the future to make these good. The deficiencies to which attention was drawn by the Polish delegate may be briefly stated as follows: the Convention has not defined the upper limit of the reserve stocks referred to in Articles 5 and 6, and, consequently, in the view of this delegate, Article 6 loses some of its value. There are enormous differences in the morphine content of raw opium imported, according to its origin; but the Convention makes no provision for an impartial analysis of that content, though this is necessary for verifying the quantity of drugs manufactured. The Convention does not touch upon the question of the steps to be taken to prevent a rise in the price of drugs and raw materials, which was a matter of concern to the Assembly of 1929. The Italian delegation mentioned as a weak point the impossibility of enforcing penalties, though it admitted that the publication by the Permanent Central Board of the explanations given by a country that does not fulfil its engagements is at all events a moral sanction. Certain delegations expressed the opinion that the Convention left Governments too much latitude in the disposal of drugs seized, and they would have liked to see the adoption of a resolution moved by the Hungarian delegate, to the effect that the Council should ask Governments to destroy all drugs seized, so as to prevent them from reappearing in the traffic in any form. This view was not accepted by the majority of the delegates, on the ground that the solution provided in the Convention was the outcome of exhaustive discussion in a very representative Conference which has only lately concluded its work.

Lastly, the Fifth Committee specially calls the attention of Governments to the Conference's recommendation (Recommendation IX), which was embodied in the Final Act in consequence of a proposal by the delegate of Panama, based on the idea that manufacture greatly exceeds the medical and scientific requirements of the world. Quoting the figures which, according to the investigations of the League Secretariat (document Conf. L.F.S. 3 (1), Parts 1, 2 and 3, pages 8, 61 and 65), approximately represent the total present medical requirements of these drugs (morphine, for use as such, 9 tons; diacetylmorphine, 2 tons; cocaine, 5½ tons), the Conference recommends that, pending the entry into force of the Convention, countries manufacturing these drugs should, as far as possible, limit their manufacture for use as such to the quantities necessary for domestic consumption and export for medical and scientific purposes.

The Fifth Committee notes with satisfaction that thirty-six signatures to the Convention have been received. It is also glad to learn from the delegates of several Governments, including those of China, Colombia, Persia and Roumania, that they hope to be able to sign the Convention shortly. The Polish delegate stated that he had been authorised by his Government to sign the Convention. The Committee urges the responsible delegates to do their utmost to hasten the ratification of the Convention by their Governments, so that it may be universally enforced — which is the essential condition for it to be an affective .nstrument.

II. Proposed Conference for the Limitation of the Production of Raw Materials.

The Fifth Committee takes the view that the limitation of the manufacture of narcotic drugs is a first step towards a subsequent limitation of the production of raw materials. Noting the decision reached by the Council at its sixty-second session, in January 1931, to ask the Advisory Committee on Traffic in Opium and Other Dangerous Drugs to consider the possibility of summoning a conference of the Governments concerned and to report to the Council on the sub,ect, it welcomed the resolution proposed by the representative of Panama. This resolution asks that all material which may serve as a basis for the discussions of a Conference for the Limitation of Production should be collected.

The British delegation moved an amendment asking that it should be specified that the limitation was to apply to the cultivation and harvesting of the coca-leaf. The text of the resolution unanimously adopted by the Committee is as follows :

" The Assembly,

" Taking note of the wish of certain Governments that a conference should meet in the near future to consider the possibility of limiting and controlling the cultivation of the opium-poppy and the cultivation and harvesting of the coca-leaf ; and

" Taking note also of the decision reached by the Council at its sixty-second session, in January 1931, to ask the Advisory Committee on the Traffic in Opium and Other Dangerous Drugs to consider the possibility of summoning a conference of the Governments concerned and to report to the Council on the subject :

" Asks the Advisory Committee on the Traffic in Opium and Other Dangerous Drugs and the competent Sections of the Secretariat of the League of Nations to undertake, as soon as possible, the collection of all material that may serve as a basis for the discussions of a Conference on the Limitation of the Production of Opium and the cultivation and harvesting of the coca-leaf, and for that purpose to send a questionnaire to the Governments Members and non-members of the League."

When this resolution was under discussion, the delegates of certain countries producing raw materials announced that they had no objection to this preliminary enquiry, but hoped, that, in a spirit of international co-operation, the other countries would pay due heed to the economic aspect of the question and the difficulties it involved for them. The Persian delegate particularly stressed the difficulties involved in limiting production in a country whose opium exports amount to 25 per cent of its foreign trade. He pointed out that this question should come into the general field of the economic investigations on which the League's attention is particularly concentrated at the present time.

III. Position of the Ratification of the Geneva Convention. — Legislative and Administrative Measures.

The Fifth Committee has noted with satisfaction the progress made in the ratification of the Geneva Convention. The number of ratifications is now forty-seven as a result of the accessions of Lithuania (February 16th, 1931), Norway (March 16th) and Iraq (August 8th), and the ratifications of Cuba (July 6th) and the Irish Free State (September 1st). The Geneva Convention now more than ever heads the list of League Conventions as regards the number of ratifications received. As, however, there is still a long list of States which have not yet ratified the Convention, including an important group of Latin-American countries, the Fifth Committee appeals to those countries which have not yet acceded or ratified for their co-operation, which is essential if the Geneva Convention is to produce its full effect.

The Fifth Committee was glad to learn of various legislative measures introduced or contemplated by several countries.

In Germany, at the Government's request, the drug factories have given up manufacturing benzylmorphine (peronine), although this drug is not covered either by the 1925 Convention or by the new German Opium Law.

In Colombia, a decree has been issued placing the import and distribution of drugs for medical and scientific purposes under the control of the National Health Office. Parliament is considering a new law for the severe punishment of clandestine trading.

The Roumanian Government is preparing a new bill to convert the drug trade into a Government monopoly, and considerable attention will be paid in this bill to the Limitation Convention.

The Swiss delegate stated that excellent results had been obtained in his country from the application of the measures of control and the various recommendations of the Advisory Committee regarding the post and Customs. The output and export figures have fallen appreciably, and are worth quoting here. The output of morphine fell from 2,246 kilogrammes in 1928 to 1,576 kilogrammes in 1930 ; the output of heroin from 952 kilogrammes in 1928 to 4 kilogrammes in 1930 ; exports of morphine from 1,761 kilogrammes in 1928 to 615 kilogrammes in 1930 ; exports of heroin from 1,119 kilogrammes in 1928 to 83 kilogrammes in 1930.

Lastly, in connection with legislative measures, the Polish delegation emphasised the importance of the introduction into the text of the Convention for the Limitation of Manufacture of an article binding the signatory States to communicate to one another the laws and regulations enacted by them in order to give effect to the provisions of the Convention. As a complement to this article, the Polish delegation formulated a resolution, which was unanimously adopted by the Fifth Committee, to the effect that the Secretariat should collect and analyse all legislation relating to narcotics. This resolution is as follows:

> " The Assembly,
> " Recalling the recommendation adopted by the tenth Assembly instructing the Secretariat to draw up a list of the laws and regulations at present in force in the different countries on the traffic in opium and other dangerous drugs with a view to the preparation of a compilation or analysis of this legislation;
> " Observing that the performance of this task has had to be delayed owing to the necessity of preparing for the work of the Conference on Limitation:
> " Expresses the wish that the Secretariat, within the limits of the funds at its disposal, should undertake the preparation of this compilation of laws with a view to publishing it as soon as possible after the entry into force of the Convention for limiting the manufacture and regulating the distribution of narcotics, and that this compilation should embrace all laws or regulations concerning the supervision of the manufacture of and trade in narcotics and the measures taken to combat the drug habit. "

IV. Illicit Traffic and Control Measures for suppressing it.

The Fifth Committee was happy to note the important results obtained in the matter of the suppression of the illicit traffic. These very results, however, show the enormous ravages caused by this traffic and reveal the fact that quantities of narcotics greatly in excess of those needed for medical and scientific requirements are being produced and circulated throughout the world. The Committee — and in particular the delegate of India — drew attention to the fact that new regulations had been promulgated by the Japanese Government in regard to the control of the manufacture of cocaine.

The Committee also emphasised the importance of the new regulations issued by the Turkish Government in February 1931, under which drugs may only be exported against an import certificate issued by the Government of the importing country. It paid a tribute to the spirit of co-operation shown by the Turkish Government, which has closed the Etkin narcotic drugs factory at Eyoub (Istambul), this factory having been implicated in illicit transactions, and it expressed the hope that the Turkish Government would participate more and more closely in the League's work and would consider the possibility of acceding to the League's Conventions.

The Committee noted with equal satisfaction the decline in addiction reported in Egypt and the improvement of the supervisory system in Persia, where, according to the declaration made by the Persian representative on the Council on January 22nd, 1931, " a formal clause in the exclusive concession recently granted by the Monopoly Service for the total export of Persian opium obliged the concession-holder to submit for each case of opium that left the country a certificate from the importing country ". The Committee hopes that this new system will make it possible to suppress the illicit traffic which has sprung up during the last few years at Bushire, its chief destination being China.

While it fully sympathised with the efforts made by the Chinese Government to meet a difficult situation and one which was still very serious, the Fifth Committee earnestly hoped that, in accordance with the recommendation adopted by the Advisory Committee at its thirteenth session, it would be possible for China and the Treaty Powers to establish a practical co-operation with a view to combating the illicit traffic.

The Committee was pleased to note the Advisory Committee's proposal concerning the despatch of annual reports on the concessions and leased territories, with regard to which the Secretary-General is now sending a communication to the Governments concerned. The delegate of China said he would state the opinion of his Government later.

The Committee approved, subject to certain observations made by the German Government and mentioned below, the various recommendations of the Advisory Committee dealing with general measures for the purpose of combating the illicit traffic; these measures refer, inter alia, to firms manufacturing or supplying the narcotic drugs for the illicit traffic, the withdrawal of passports held by habitual smugglers, the necessity for an effective control of seizures, closer co-operation between the police authorities and the League, the communication to the Secretary-General of information of every kind regarding the illicit traffic and addiction, in accordance with the resolution of the 1930 Assembly. It associated itself with the Advisory Committee in urging that this work of suppression and moral improvement in the international sphere be vigorously pursued, andin insisting on the necessity for increasing the penalties imposed on traffickers.

Referring to the statement made by the German representative on the Council at its session in May 1931, the German delegate explained why his country objected to the two resolutions in document C.168*(a).M.62(a).1931.XI. As regards the recommendation concerning the withdrawal of manufacturing or trading licences (No. 2(a)*), he explained that, in the case of products not covered by the 1925 Convention, the Government of the Reich could not accept such a severe measure except in specially grave cases. As mentioned above, he recalled the fact that, since April 1st, 1931, German factories had abandoned, at the request of their Government, the manufacture of benzylmorphine (peronine). As regards recommendation No. 2 (b), the Secretary-General's circular letter dated January 11th, 1929, had not come to the knowledge of the German Government until October 1929, at which date the inclusion of morphine esters in the list of substances covered by the German opium law was already under consideration. This was why the Government had not communicated the circular letter to the factories and commercial firms concerned.

As regards the resolution concerning the refusal to issue import and export licences, the German Government considered that the procedure proposed by the Opium Advisory Committee would be justified only if there were valid reasons for believing that the Government of the country in which the firm applying for the licence was situated was not respecting the international obligations undertaken by it.

Lastly, the Fifth Committee emphasised the importance of the question of the chartering of vessels by foreigners, which had been referred for examination to the Committee on Ports and Maritime Navigation of the Advisory and Technical Committee for Communications and Transit. This former Committee is to be reinforced by several members of the Transit Committee's Permanent Legal Committee. On the proposal of the delegate of Australia, the Fifth Committee asked that the question of smuggling by aircraft should be examined at the same time in view of the great facilities afforded by air navigation for the illicit transport of drugs.

V. Distribution of Annual Reports to Governments.

The Fifth Committee approved by a majority (Spain, Italy and Poland abstained from voting) a memorandum by the Secretariat on this matter (document A.V/2.1931). This memorandum proposes that, subject to the approval of the Assembly and for reasons of economy, annual reports in extenso should in future be distributed only to the Advisory Committee. The printed summary of annual reports prepared by the Secretariat will alone be distributed both to the Advisory Committee and to all Governments, but it is understood that any Government desirous of obtaining the annual reports may do so on request.

The Committee noted with satisfaction the Secretary's statement to the effect that this new procedure would result in a saving of approximately 8,000 Swiss francs, which would be added to the 7,000 francs resulting from the new procedure adopted by the Advisory Committee in regard to the communication of the returns of seizures. This would represent a total saving of 15,000 francs on the expenses of the Central Services, without increasing the printing expenses charged to the Opium Section's budget.

VI. Enquiry into the Control of Opium-smoking in the Far East.

The Fifth Committee cannot close its report on the work done during the past year without expressing the hope that the Conference which is to meet at Bangkok on November 9th of this year, at the invitation of the Siamese Government, will mark a further important advance in the campaign against the scourge of narcotics.

Despite the considerable progress made this year, the Fifth Committee is fully conscious of the necessity for sparing no efforts in future, not only with a view to maintaining the results already achieved, but in order to complete the enormous task which has still to be carried out.

The Fifth Committee accordingly requests the Assembly to adopt the present report and resolutions.

CHILD WELFARE.

REPORT OF THE FIFTH COMMITTEE TO THE ASSEMBLY.

Rapporteur: Countess Apponyi (Hungary).

The Child Welfare Committee held its seventh session at Geneva from April 14th to 20th last. The report on the work of this session (document C.249.M.113.1931.IV) was approved by the Council at its session in May last.

The Fifth Committee noted with satisfaction that the question of the return of children and young people to their homes, which has been on the Child Welfare Committee's agenda for several years, has been solved most satisfactorily. The Committee submitted a draft convention to the Council, which, at its meeting on May 20th last, approved the draft and instructed the Secretary-General to submit it to the Governments as a model for the conclusion of bilateral or plurilateral agreements. The Secretary-General also requested all Governments to inform him of any agreements they might conclude on that model.

The Council took further action with regard to two other questions to which the Child Welfare Committee has also been devoting attention for several years: assistance to foreign minors and the recognition and execution of maintenance orders abroad.

The Child Welfare Committee recognised, after careful examination, that the problem of assistance to foreign minors was connected with the problem of assistance to destitute foreigners generally and that the latter question exceeded the limits of its competence. It accordingly recommended the Council to set up a special committee, composed of experts appointed by a small number of countries interested in the question, which would study the question as a whole and preparé a preliminary draft international convention.

When the Committee came to consider the question of the recognition and execution of maintenance orders abroad, it was obliged to recognise one thing — that, while the question has an important bearing on child welfare, it may be argued that the Child Welfare Committee is not competent to deal with it, since maintenance orders may benefit adults at the same time as children. The Committee accordingly came to the conclusion that the study of this question could best be undertaken by a special committee which might be the same as that which it proposed should be appointed to discuss the problem of assistance.

Consequently, at its meeting on May 20th, the Council decided to set up a temporary special committee to investigate these two questions. At its meeting on September 4th, it named twelve countries, the Governments of which would be invited to nominate experts to form this special committee. The Council took into consideration the interest manifested by certain countries in questions relating to assistance at previous international conferences, and also the desirability of having emigrant and immigrant countries represented.

The twelve countries selected are:

Argentine,	Hungary,
Canada,	Italy,
Denmark,	Japan,
France,	Netherlands,
Germany,	Poland,
Great Britain,	Switzerland.

The Council also fixed the first session of this special committee for October 1932, unless circumstances should call for any change.

I hope the Assembly will express a strong desire that the meetings of this special committee should not be further postponed. The information derived from official sources as well as that supplied by voluntary societies has shown the Child Welfare Committee that, in the case of minors, the problem of assistance is urgent. Consequently the Fifth Committee draws the attention of the Assembly to the fact that the Committee has suggested to the Council to instruct the special Committee, if the Committee considers that a complete solution of the whole problem would involve considerable delay, to give prior attention to the question of assistance to minors so as to arrive at a solution, even if only a partial and provisional one, of the problem. It also might be well to call the attention of the experts to the main ideas on the subject of assistance to foreign minors put forward by Count Carton de Wiart in 1929, in his report to the Tenth Assembly.

The Child Welfare Committee very carefully examined the reports laid before it by the Rapporteurs and by the Secretariat on the auxiliary services of juvenile courts. It recognised that the three main factors in the treatment of delinquent children — juvenile courts, auxiliary services, and institutions entrusted with the execution of the measures prescribed — cannot be considered separately. It decided to publish, in collaboration with the International Prison Commission, all the information collected concerning the existence and organisation of juvenile courts; and it appointed a sub-committee to draft, in agreement with the International Prison Commission, a questionnaire to be sent to all Governments with the object of obtaining information regarding institutions for erring or delinquent minors in all countries, whether they do or do not possess juvenile courts. In a few years, therefore, the Child Welfare Committee will be in possession of full information with the aid of which it will be able to study the whole question — one of the most important in connection with child welfare.

On the proposal of the delegate of the British Empire, the Fifth Committee unanimously decided, however, to invite the Assembly to adopt the following resolution:

> "The Assembly,
>
> "In view of the special importance during the present crisis of the treatment and prevention of juvenile delinquency,
> "Decides to make an urgent recommendation to the delegates of the countries which have not yet established special juvenile courts, to press for this reform and for the association of women therewith to the fullest extent authorised by the national legislation."

The Child Welfare Committee has been unable to discuss this year the subjects of illegitimate children and of the cinematograph. It is preferable that the Committee should concentrate its attention on a small number of questions which it can deal with thoroughly and conscientiously.

The Fifth Committee recommends that the Assembly should inform the Child Welfare Committee of the great importance it attaches to the improvement of the position of illegitimate children, requesting it at the same time to maintain on its programme, among other questions, the examination of the best means of facilitating the marriage of parents, with a view to legitimising the children.

Various interesting communications were made to the Child Welfare Committee by the officers of the International Labour Office and the Health Organisation and by certain members and assessors, with regard to blind children, crippled children, the cinematograph, etc.

Finally the delegate of Australia pointed out to the Fifth Committee the special dangers under which the present economic world situation placed adolescents, both boys and girls, from the aspects of employment, education, nutrition and health, and recommended to the Assembly that the Child Welfare Committee should within the limits of its competence direct its attention particularly to this immediate and urgent problem.

In conclusion, the Fifth Committee proposed that the Assembly should adopt the following resolution:

> "The Assembly takes note of the Child Welfare Committee's report on the work of its seventh session, recommends that the Committee continue its work in conformity with the suggestions and decisions contained in that report, and expresses its satisfaction with the work done."

TRAFFIC IN WOMEN AND CHILDREN.

REPORT OF THE FIFTH COMMITTEE TO THE ASSEMBLY.

Rapporteur: MRS. PLUMPTRE (Canada).

The Fifth Committee has the honour to lay before the Assembly an account of the progress made by the League during the past year in its efforts to suppress the Traffic in Women and Children. Ten years have now elapsed since the conclusion of the Convention of 1921 and the Fifth Committee is happy to announce that, apart from colonies, possessions and mandated territories, thirty-eight Governments are now parties to the Convention — the latest signature having been deposited during the present Assembly.

The Traffic in Women and Children Committee devoted special attention to this convention at its last Session; as a result of its deliberations, the Council directed the Secretary-General to ask Governments non-members of the League, who had not adhered to the Convention, whether they were prepared to do so. It is of the greatest importance that as many Governments as possible should adhere to this Convention. Therefore the following Governments were approached: Afghanistan, United States of America, Argentine Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, Hedjaz, Iceland, Liechtenstein, San Marino, Sudan, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and Turkey.

The Government of Turkey has declared its intention of considering accession; and in June, the Egyptian Government informed the League that the ratifications of the Agreement of 1904 and of the Conventions of 1910 and 1921 would be forwarded shortly. The Government of the United States of America, while regretting that it was unable to sign the Convention since some of its provisions pertain to the police functions of the several States of the Union and are therefore outside the competence of the Federal Government, added that it is in full sympathy with the aims of the Convention and hopes to be able to co-operate in the future in the formulation of a Convention to which the United States might become a party. The Committee announces with pleasure that the Governments of Monaco and Lithuania have acceded to the Convention since last Assembly, and that the British Government has informed the Secretariat of the accessions of the Colony and Protectorate of Gambia, of the Protectorate of Uganda, and of the Territory of Tanganyika.

Yet there are still twelve States Members of the League who have not yet acceded to the Convention and five others who have not yet ratified their signatures. In the resolution with which this report concludes, the Assembly is requested to bring this important matter once more to the attention of Governments.

The Traffic in Women and Children Committee at its tenth session dealt also with two matters directly connected with the Convention.

(a) The Convention of 1910 as amended by the Convention of 1921 fixed the age-limit at twenty-one years; but there is a growing desire to abolish this limit. Twenty-six Governments have replied in favour of abolition; but in view of the reservations made by certain Governments, the Committee decided to reconsider the matter at a future meeting.

(b) The definition of the souteneur and the penalties which might properly be imposed upon such persons were discussed at great length by the Traffic in Women and Children Committee. A Draft Protocol supplementing the 1921 Convention is now before the Governments for their observations and suggestions. The Secretariat has prepared a concise statement of the laws and penalties relating to souteneurs, which embodies much careful research. It should be of great value for study of the matter.

A resolution, relating to the effect of penalties on souteneurs, introduced by the delegates of the British Empire and India adopted unanimously, suggested a further line of inquiry into this problem. It will be found among the resolutions at the close of this report.

Attention was called to the severe penalties which may be inflicted upon souteneurs in Poland and Canada. In Poland, the maximum punishment is fifteen years' imprisonment; and, in Canada, a maximum of ten years' imprisonment, with whipping for a second offence.

The attention of the Committee was directed by the delegate of Roumania to the activities of certain secret societies which carry on the traffic in women and children; and she suggested that the Committee should study the methods by which penalties might be inflicted upon their members.

The Committee on Traffic in Women and Children also dealt with the matter of women police on which a preliminary study was submitted by the Secretariat. It decided, however, that it had not yet sufficient information, based upon experience, to justify the formulation of definite conclusions.

On the other hand, taking into consideration that the countries in which women police have been established declare their satisfaction with the same, the Fifth Committee suggests that this matter should be brought again to the attention of the States members of the League who do not yet employ women in their police service.

It seems evident, from the discussions of the Traffic in Women and Children Committee, that the time is approaching when it will be necessary to prepare for a conference to deal with amendments and additions to the 1921 Convention. In addition to the subjects already referred to above, the work of the Central Authorities appears to need further co-ordination and standardisation. The preliminary report on this subject, prepared by the Secretariat on the instructions of the Council, has still to be studied by the Governments. The Traffic in Women and Children Committee expects to deal with this report and with the replies of the Governments at its 1932 session.

The repatriation of foreign prostitutes has been the subject of preliminary discussions: but there is a great diversity of opinion among States Members of the League as to the advisability of such a measure; and no conclusions have been reached.

The suppression of the circulation of, and traffic in, obscene publications was brought to the attention of Governments by a questionnaire in 1930. Thirty-three Governments have already replied. The Secretariat has compiled a collection of the laws relating to this question which will be of great assistance in the further standardisation of methods employed in dealing with it. The Traffic in Women and Children Committee suggested that the Secretary-General be instructed to publish these in a handy form as soon as possible. Particular attention is drawn to the Belgian bill establishing around the schools a protective zone where it is forbidden to exhibit anything which might be of a nature to disturb the imagination of the child, as it is known that the first approaches by agents of the traffic to children and young people are often made through the exhibition of indecent postcards which are printed in certain centres and distributed to all parts of the world. It is therefore evident that the co-operation of all States Members of the League is necessary for effective action.

In connection with obscene publications, the influence of pornographic films should not be overlooked. Even some of those ostensibly prepared as propaganda against venereal diseases, prostitution and the traffic are likely to do more harm than good owing to their crude methods of presentation.

The Committee reports, with deep regret, that the present financial conditions of the League do not permit of the printing and distributing of the digest of the laws and regulations against the traffic in women which has been prepared by the Secretariat. Since the last Assembly stated that "this collection of laws and regulations would be of great value" the Committee hopes that the publication is merely deferred.

In presenting this report, the Fifth Committee desires to direct the attention of the Assembly to the dangers that attend the present conditions of unemployment and economic pressure. Such conditions may tend to make many women and young girls peculiarly open to the approaches of the procurer and the souteneur and to the tempting profits of prostitution. It is especially necessary to watch the transfer of young girls, under contract, from one country to another. It was pointed out that the present world situation seems to provide a unique opportunity for obtaining conclusive evidence, on the relations between economic need and prostitution, and that information and statistics relevant to this problem should as far as possible be collected and analysed. The co-operation of States in preventing all phases of the Traffic in Women and Children is therefore particularly important now.

The signing of the 1921 Convention by those members who have not already adhered, and the careful implementing of responsibilities by those who have already ratified it, will enable the League to fulfil its duty at this time of special need and difficulty.

In conclusion, the Fifth Committee submits the following resolution:

"The Assembly,

"1. Having taken note of the Report of the Traffic in Women and Children Committee, welcomes the new accessions to the 1921 Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Women and Children, and expresses the hope that further ratifications will be registered in 1932;

"2. Considers that the studies already made on the part played by souteneurs in this traffic show the need for further consideration of this subject.

"3. Recommends that the Traffic in Women and Children Committee should consider the possibility of ascertaining, with special reference to the recurrent conviction of habitual offenders, the results of the penalties inflicted on souteneurs, as defined in Article 1 of the Additional Draft Protocol of the International Convention of 1921 for the suppression of Traffic in Women and Children;

"4. Commends to the attention of States Members of the League the draft Protocol (document C.267.M.122.1931.IV, page 9) supplementing the 1921 Convention, submitted for their observations;

"5. Thanks the Traffic in Women and Children Committee for its work and invites it to continue its efforts to suppress this infamous trade especially at this time, when unemployment and economic distress afford special opportunities for the activities of its agents."

PROTECTION OF MINORITIES.

REPORT OF THE SIXTH COMMITTEE TO THE ASSEMBLY.

Rapporteur : Baron YRJÖ-KOSKINEN (Finland).

The Sixth Committee examined during its meeting of September 16th that part of the Secretary-General's report on the work of the League since the last session of the Assembly which deals with the protection of minorities.

The representative of Germany, who had moved that the question should be referred to the Sixth Committee, began by referring to the principles enunciated by M. Motta in the report he had submitted to the last Assembly and by Mr. Henderson in the speech he made before the Council on January 24th, 1931. He then gave a general analysis of the application of the system for the protection of minorities by the League of Nations during the past year, taking in particular as a basis the statistics published by the Secretariat in the Official Journal of August last in regard to petitions and the working of the Minority Committees. The representative of Germany indicated the direction in which he desired to see the present system developed. In his view, it would be advisable that Minority Committees consisting of five Members of the Council should be constituted more frequently, that the Committees should ask the petitioners more often for information and that means should be found for ensuring that the petitioners would be in a position to take note of the contents of the observations sent by the Governments concerned on the subject of their petitions, though that would not necessarily imply any recognition of their status as parties in a procedure in which both sides were to be heard. In this connection the representative of Germany emphasised the importance of securing the publicity of the result of the examination of questions by Minorities Committees in the largest possible number of cases. He pointed out, in particular, that under the present system it was impossible to know in which cases the non-publication of these results was due to the fact that the Committees did nothing in the matter, and in which cases the initiative of the Committees did not meet with the approval of the Government concerned. The representative of Germany added that, in his view, further efforts would be necessary to arrive at a system for the protection of minorities which would operate without creating friction, but that he did not intend on this occasion to make definite proposals.

The delegate of Roumania pointed out, on behalf of Czechoslovakia, Greece, Poland, Roumania and Yugoslavia, that these States had had an opportunity during the discussions in the Sixth Committee in 1930 to state their point of view on the question of minorities. These States had nothing to add to the declarations which were then made and which they maintained in their entirety, it being understood thereby that they were opposed to any extension of the Council resolution of June 13th, 1929.

The representatives of Hungary, Canada, the British Empire and France also stated that they maintained the divergent and well-known views which their delegations had previously upheld. The delegate of Spain, after emphasising in particular the psychological side of the minorities problem, quoted the example of Spain, which is now engaged in settling the Catalan problem in accordance with the principles enunciated by the League of Nations in regard to the protection of minorities.

I would only add that I think we can express satisfaction, as our distinguished Chairman has already done, at the impartiality and moderation which have marked the discussion, and I would propose that the Assembly take note of this report.

MANDATES.

REPORT OF THE SIXTH COMMITTEE TO THE ASSEMBLY.

Rapporteur: Dr. Christian L. LANGE (Norway).

The annual reports of the mandatory Powers, the reports of the Permanent Mandates Commission and the Minutes of the discussions of the Council on mandates questions during the period which has elapsed since the close of the eleventh session of the Assembly have, as in previous years, been submitted to the Sixth Committee.

The Committee has noted that, thanks to the efforts of the Council, of the Permanent Mandates Commission and of the Mandatory Powers, the essentially humanitarian experiment instituted by Article 22 of the Covenant has, after only a short period, been crowned with indisputable success. Hence the Permanent Mandates Commission has again received the praise of several delegations for an achievement to which it has largely contributed.

Furthermore, the delegates of the mandatory Powers have again emphasised the value of the co-operation which has been established between their Governments and the Mandates Commission, to the great advantage of the task undertaken. Some of these delegates laid stress upon the value of the results already achieved.

The Sixth Committee has approved the rules laid down in the Council's resolution of September 4th, 1931, with regard to the general conditions to be fulfilled before the mandate regime can be brought to an end, in respect of a country placed under that regime. Like the Mandates Commission and the Council, it considered that the emancipation of the territories covered by Article 22 of the Covenant should be made dependent on the fulfilment of certain de facto conditions, and on the existence of certain guarantees stipulated in the interests both of the territories concerned and of the international community. The guarantees relating to the safeguarding of the rights of foreigners, the effective protection of racial, linguistic and religious minorities and the maintenance of the principle of economic equality are, in the Sixth Committee's opinion, of quite special importance and deserve the Assembly's particular attention.

Another problem common to all the territories under mandate was raised in the course of the debate, that of the development of the public health services in the mandated territories, which has recently been dealt with in a Council resolution. The recommendations put forward in this connection by the Permanent Mandates Commission, which the Council has endorsed and which it has forwarded to the mandatory Powers, seem likely to contribute largely to the success of the work of civilisation undertaken in the mandated territories under the auspices of the League of Nations.

Lastly, the Sixth Committee has once again manifested the importance which it attaches to the settlement, in Palestine, of the controversies that have arisen owing to the establishment of the Jewish National Home in that territory. The Committee noted that order had not again been disturbed since the regrettable incidents of 1929, and associated itself with the hope expressed by the Mandates Commission and the Council that the efforts made by the mandatory Power to facilitate Jewish immigration without infringing the rights of the Arab population would be crowned with success.

The Sixth Committee has the honour to recommend to the Assembly the adoption of the following resolution:

"DRAFT RESOLUTION:

"The Assembly,

"Having taken note of the work accomplished by the mandatory Powers, the Permanent Mandates Commission and the Council in regard to the execution of Article 22 of the Covenant;

"(a) Renews the expression of confidence in them voted by the past sessions of the Assembly and again congratulates them on what has been achieved through co-operation between them;

"(b) Expresses its gratification at the constructive and particularly useful work which the Council has just performed with the help of the Permanent Mandates Commission in determining the criterion to be applied when it is proposed to bring to an end the mandate regime in respect of a country placed under that regime;

"(c) Specially notes in the Council's resolution on this question the importance attached to the maintenance of the principle of economic equality and to guarantees for the effective protection of racial, linguistic and religious minorities.

"(d) Expresses the hope, as in previous years, that through the prosecution of the joint efforts of the mandatory Powers, the Council and the Permanent Mandates Commission, the mandatory system may continue to ensure the achievement of the ideal of civilisation proclaimed in Article 22 of the Covenant".

Official No.: A. 69. 1931. XII.

WORK OF THE INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE ON INTELLECTUAL CO-OPERATION.

REPORT OF THE SIXTH COMMITTEE TO THE ASSEMBLY.

Rapporteur: His Excellency M. SATO (Japan).

Last year, the Assembly of the League of Nations was informed of the reorganisation plan prepared by the International Committee on Intellectual Co-operation to give a more clearly defined direction to its own activities and also to improve the methods of work of its executive organs and, in particular, the International Institute of Intellectual Co-operation. The Assembly warmly approved the entire scheme laid before it by the Committee. This year, we see the first results and are in possession of the authoritative opinion expressed by the distinguished men who met at Geneva in July under the chairmanship of Professor Gilbert Murray and M. Paul Painlevé on the value of the work accomplished.

I am glad to state that the Committee's opinion is, without exception, favourable to the new methods adopted and that, generally speaking, it is entirely satisfied with the reforms recommended last year. I feel sure we can unreservedly endorse this verdict, and that for several reasons.

In the first place, the methods of work adopted by the Committee and its executive organs are based direct on the experience of the other technical organs of the League. These methods, skilfully adapted to the special requirements of the Intellectuel Co-operation Organisation, will enable it to assume its appropriate place in the general scheme of the League's work, and to render to the several countries and also to the community of States the immense services we are entitled to expect. Without an intellectual rapprochement of the nations, without good mutual understanding and without concerted action to improve by mutual assistance and co-operation the conditions governing thought, scientific work and the education of the young, it is to be feared that the future of the League would be uncertain and the efforts we are elsewhere making to establish a durable peace would be largely wasted.

The characteristic feature of these new methods, as applied by the International Committee on Intellectual Co-operation, is to bring together, under its ægis, the best minds of the various countries to deal with education, art, literature or science. The international questions with which we have to deal in these spheres are innumerable. The Committee does not claim to have elucidated all of these at once. It has made a judicious selection and, when handling those which it has retained, it invariably calls upon the Institute of Intellectual Co-operation to summon a Committee of Experts consisting of the distinguished persons to whom I referred a moment ago. It thus enjoys the benefit of the best advice. It brings into intimate touch the different forms of culture, the most varied experience and the great tendencies of thought. It allows the experts to discuss direct and without any intermediary, the questions with which they are concerned, to compare their methods and to communicate to each other those they deem most satisfactory. It thus proposes to promote and extend progress in all the various branches of intellectual activity. There is no need to add that, in many cases, it thus establishes a new international link between the national departments of education and fine arts and between the learned bodies and scientific institutions of the various countries. That is, if I am not mistaken, the supreme purpose of the League of Nations — that association of Governments and countries which we represent here.

The International Institute of Intellectual Co-operation places at the disposal of the Committees of Experts which I have just mentioned, a body of officials whose work is arranged on the same lines as that of the Secretariat of the League. That number has been reduced but the organisation has been made less rigid, so that the work as a whole does not suffer and their activities may be directed according to circumstances along the desired lines. Thus a large proportion of the funds generously placed at the disposal of the Institute by the French Government and various other Governments — and I take this opportunity of thanking them — may be devoted to summoning the Committees of Experts; a large number of these will meet next year at the Institute of Intellectual Co-operation, which performs services of the utmost importance. Fairly large sums are also available for special investigations carried out by qualified specialists; accordingly, the Council of the League of Nations, when dealing with international questions relating to intellectual organisation, has at its command in the Committee on Intellectual Co-operation itself and the various bodies dependent on it a well-planned and well-equipped organisation, which, in accordance with the methods it has adopted, makes every effort not to let its work overlap that of existing institutions and organisations.

In reading the reports submitted to the Committee and the resolutions adopted by it, one is struck first of all by the important place it has given to educational questions. It is endeavouring to create direct contact between ministries of education both in connection with the universities and with secondary and elementary teaching. As regards universities, it has taken the opinion of the international students' associations and of the university offices, and soon their suggestions will be submitted by the Institute of Intellectual Co-operation to a committee of directors of higher education which will have on its agenda such important problems as the equivalence of diplomas and the overcrowding of our universities.

It has undertaken an enquiry into the best methods to be employed to gain satisfactory results from the increasingly numerous journeys abroad undertaken by the young people of our secondary and elementary schools. In the course of the year, it proposes to bring our respective administrations into contact in order to ensure regular interchanges of scholastic documentation, material and methods and, in a word, to co-operate in pedagogical questions.

Special mention should be made of the work entrusted to the International Institute of Intellectual Co-operation in regard to educational broadcasting. The use of wireless in schools, and its utilisation in the teaching of adults and more generally for bringing about the rapprochement of nations and better mutual understanding between them, are subjects which have engaged the Committee's attention and to which it will revert next year in the light of the information supplied to it and obtained both from the competent official departments and the big international organisations, and especially from qualified experts in regard to the teaching of the young. The observations of the British and French delegations have strongly emphasised the importance of this question.

Among the fresh tasks undertaken during the year, there is one which deserves special mention; a certain number of institutes engaged in scientific research in the sphere of political, economic or social sciences have regularly sent representatives to the Paris Institute to study jointly various technical questions which interest them. It was decided this year that those institutions should henceforward hold an annual study conference at which they would compare the results of their work during the year on one of the main international problems which call for attention from the political angle of the League of Nations. The originality of their work will consist in its being done in a purely objective spirit of scientific and disinterested research; the results of their discussions should not take the form of recommendations or resolutions and they should aim only at elucidating the questions submitted to them. Thus, in one of the most vital and topical domains of intellectual co-operation, that of present-day international relations and of economic and political contacts, a fresh contribution of great value will be brought to the League of Nations.

I ought also to speak of the work of the Intellectual Co-operation Organisation in the matter of scientific co-ordination in arts, bibliography, etc., according to the proposals of the Committee of Advisers presided over by Madame Curie. A general feature which characterises the various reports devoted to these questions is the practical character of the work undertaken. The Committee of Librarians and the Museums Office are concentrating their efforts on facilitating co-operation between the great national institutions. Thus, to take one example, an important conference, summoned and organised by the International Museums Office, will shortly be held at Athens and will bring together delegations of nearly all our Fine Arts Administrations. This conference will study a question which is of great importance to numerous countries in every continent, that of the conservation of artistic and historical monuments. New technical methods have recently been introduced. These will be compared and studied; the best of them will be noted and generalised and thus, in a few days, the technical administrations concerned will be able to give each other valuable assistance which will facilitate their future work and will undoubtedly save them a great deal of time and perhaps money.

In this connection, I must not forget to thank the Greek Government, which has generously helped the International Institute of Intellectual co-operation to organise this great meeting.

The protection of intellectual rights also remains on the agenda of our Intellectual Co-operation Organisation. Regular co-operation has been established between the official institutions concerned, the Berne Bureaux, the Secretariat of the League of Nations, the Rome Institute for the Unification of Private Law and the International Labour Office, which henceforward will hold an annual meeting at the International Institute of Intellectual Co-operation to organise jointly the work to be done in this connection.

But it is not only the material rights of intellectual workers of all kinds with which our Committee is concerned. It has decided to approach the great problems which are of most direct importance to human culture and to give men of science and thought the place which is their due in national and international contemporary life. These lofty considerations belong to the sphere of the Permanent Committee of Arts and Letters, which met this year at Geneva. It drew up a programme which will be carried out in the course of the year and which will respond to the request so often made to the League of Nations to arrange for a wide interchange of thought between those who devote themselves to the things of mind.

It remains for me to refer rapidly to two or three particular points which deserve the Assembly's attention. First of all there is the question of instruction with regard to the League of Nations and the methods of international co-operation which it has introduced. A fresh impulse has been given this year to the work undertaken in liaison with the ministries of education and with the main international associations. Last year, the Assembly approved the programme drawn up by the Committee to solve the often-debated question of school textbooks. A complete documentary report has been drawn up by the International Institute of Intellectual Co-operation. It relates all the measures taken in the different countries to remove from schoolbooks passages harmful to friendly international relations. It outlines the methods employed and the results obtained. When it came before the Committee, the latter decided that a Committee of historians and educational experts should study it and should draw the necessary conclusions and that these conclusions would be submitted to us next year. Several delegations on the Sixth Committee were gratified to find that this question was beginning to take a practical shape.

Another important event must be noted: the Intellectual Co-operation Organisation has this year received two requests for assistance which have every reason to welcome. One came from the International Labour Office, which was already so closely associated with our work through its Committee on Intellectual Workers. At its request, the Institute of Intellectual Co-operation has undertaken an enquiry into the utilisation of libraries and popular arts for the purpose of workers' sparre time. In this way, the Intellectual Co-operation Organisation will contribute to the solution of a social question which is of interest to all of us; and it will do so in a most happy way by endeavouring to open the spheres of art and culture to the working classes.

Secondly, the League of Nations has received from the Chinese Government a request with a view to a larger development of intellectual collaboration between China and the other Members of the League of Nations.

The object of this request is that the League should "find advisers to assist the development of the Chinese educational system and facilitate the intercourse between the centres of intellectual activity in China and abroad".

As far as education is concerned, the request has been referred by the Council of the League of Nations to our Intellectual Co-operation Organisation, which immediately made arrangements to send four distinguished educational experts to Nanking. The eminence of the persons which it reappointed is in itself a sufficient proof of the importance attached by the League of Nations to the Chinese Government's request. I am sure that the Assembly will warmly approve of the steps already taken and will unanimously associate itself with this great enterprise.

Lastly, the Committee on Intellectual Co-operation asks us to urge Governments — and the Assembly unanimously agrees — to take an active part in the preparation of the international exhibition of popular arts which the Swiss Government is organising on a magnificent scale at Berne in 1934. Thanks to the initiative of our Intellectual Co-operation Organisation, which held a general congress of popular arts at Prague in 1928, new vigour has been infused into the study of this essential and popular form of culture.

The beautiful volumes published by the International Institute of Intellectual Co-operation on the Prague Congress show the importance of these researches, which will be given full prominence by the generous initiative of the Canton of Berne and the Swiss Government.

During the debates, the Polish delegate presented to the Sixth Committee a draft resolution which is reproduced in the Minutes of the meeting, and according to which the International Committee on Intellectual Co-operation would be requested to study the suggestion of the International Federation of League of Nations Societies to summon a World Conference on Training in World Citizenship.

Owing to lack of time, the Sixth Committee was unable to discuss this suggestion. M. de Reynold, Rapporteur of the International Committee on Intellectual Co-operation, who was present at the meeting, expressed, however, the opinion that the programme of the International Committee in regard to education was already in conformity with the aims of the Polish resolution. It should be noted that the object of this draft resolution was to obtain the opinion of the International Committee on Intellectual Co-operation on this question. In these conditions, and as moreover the International Committee will give very careful attention to the records of our Committee, it would seem that the desire of the Polish delegation will be attained.

In conclusion, and referring to the observations expressed by several members of the Sixth Committee, I would draw the Assembly's attention to the universal character of all the work undertaken by the Intellectual Co-operation Organisation. It is concerned equally with all continents and all countries. Though some activities may appear at first sight to be more limited in scope, their object is to secure closer relationship between the various great cultures of the world. This applies, for example, to the publication of a collection of Latin-American classics for which the International Institute of Intellectual Co-operation is arranging.

The common interest of all nations in this international work is moreover shown by the development of the National Committees on Intellectual Co-operation, whose activities are steadily expanding and whose number has again increased this year. During the Committee's discussions, attention was drawn to the utility of the liaison work carried out by the National Committees between the learned bodies and institutions dealing with intellectual work in their respective countries. A further proof of this interest is the growing tendency of the various national administrations interested in intellectual questions to establish contact with the Central Organisation of the League. There is now a regular machinery of intellectual co-operation with a centre which is international, but is connected more and more closely to the bodies representing in each country the interests of the mind and of literature, art or science. As a representative of an Asiatic State, I am particularly gratified by the development of these intellectual exchanges through which the countries of the East, and particularly my own country, are united ever more firmly with the other Members of the League.

In these circumstances, the Assembly will be happy to approve the proposal submitted to it that a Conference of the National Committees on Intellectual Co-operation should be convened in 1934.

It will also be glad to accede, like the Council, to the desire of the International Committee on Intellectual Co-operation that the existence of the Intellectual Co-operation Organisation, composed of the bodies to which I have referred in the course of my statement, should be explicitly recognised. Furthermore, I would ask it to urge the various Governments to give material support to the International Institute of Intellectual Co-operation in response to the wish expressed by its Governing Body, after noting the work which the Institute had accomplished and the results secured.

Finally, we would offer our sincere thanks to the eminent members of the Committee on Intellectual Co-operation and the committees connected therewith. The League of Nations is proud to have the assistance of such collaborators. It is happy to see these representatives of the world of thought, these unselfish workers devoting themselves to international tasks; it deeply appreciates, for example, the resolution which they unanimously adopted in favour of the reduction of armaments. It realises that, for the success of all its enterprises, it must rely first and foremost on the support of those who direct and form public opinion and who have the noble task of training the minds of the young generations.

It is one of the pleasant duties of the Rapporteur of the Committee to give an account of the results of the work of the International Educational Cinematographic Institute at Rome. These results have been consistently encouraging, and the Governing Body of the Institute, which meets every year in October, is thus able to show in its report that the work accomplished already fulfils in a large measure the high aims which led to the creation of this Institute.

Up to the end of the year 1930, the efforts of the Institute were especially devoted to extending its relations with international organisations pursuing similar objects. For example, arrangements were made in agreement with the Secretariat of the League of Nations for promoting the production of educational films concerning the League.

The Institute has also undertaken enquiries in close co-operation with the International Child Welfare Committee, the Health Section of the League of Nations, the International Labour Office, the International Institute of Agriculture and the League of Red Cross Societies, with a view to securing closer co-ordination between the parallel efforts of these institutions in the matter of education by the cinematograph.

The list of the results achieved by the Institute is too long for me to be able to mention them all. They are concerned with the most various objects — hygiene, particularly social hygiene, education, etc. Comparative studies have been carried out on the censorship of films in different countries, on cinematography as applied to agriculture and on the social aspects of the cinematograph, among which may be mentioned its use for the prevention of labour accidents.

The preparatory work for a Conference for the abolition of Customs barriers in respect of educational films is being continued. Thirty-eight replies, of which many are favourable, have been received from Governments. An impartial study of the opinions collected will be made by a Committee of Experts, so that any measures which the Governing Body of the Institute may finally take may be based on the wishes expressed by the Governments themselves.

One of the most notable achievements of the International Education Cinematographic Institute is the publication of its Review, which appears in five languages and to which contributions have been made by specialists throughout the world. This Review has aroused such great interest in the circles for which it was intended that the cost of its publication has been entirely covered by subscriptions and sales, which is very rarely the case with a publication of this kind. This shows that its success is most encouraging and that the monographs which are published in it reach a very wide range of readers.

I am sure the Committee will agree with me that the results realised by the International Educational Cinematographic Institute are very satisfactory. We hope and believe that they are not only a reward for efforts of the past, but a promise of future achievements.

The Italian Government, to which the League of Nations is indebted for the creation of the Institute, continues to interest itself in the work and to give it support. It has once more shown its generosity this year by making the Institute an additional grant of 200,000 lire.

ANNEX 10.

ECONOMIC WORK OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

REPORT OF THE SECOND COMMITTEE TO THE ASSEMBLY.

Rapporteur: M. Louis ROLLIN (France).

A. INTRODUCTION.

1. GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS.

The Second Committee's debates this year bear the mark of the extremely grave situation in which we are placed.

Our position as representatives of our sorely tried countries has, in the present circumstances, a painful and almost tragic character, since it seems to leave us almost helpless face to face with events beyond our control.

The peoples of the world are going through a crisis without precedent in its extent, duration and intensity, and we are feeling this crisis acutely.

We can discern the causes of the evil and the perils which are already upon us or threatening us. All of us, with the same goodwill, sincerity and fervour, desire to remove them. We have heard appeals pronounced from the Assembly platform by the most qualified authorities, who have drawn attention to the gravity of present problems and the urgency of solving them, and we should like to be able to respond by deeds to these poignant appeals.

We realise that salvation is only to be found in the union of peoples, which to-day are so closely dependent on one another that they may be compared to limbs of the same body, none of which can be sick or unhealthy without all the others being immediately affected. We should like to foster their economic relations with the ardent hope that this exchange of interests will pave the way to intellectual and moral rapprochement. But we find ourselves faced with difficult barriers on which our intentions stumble, if they do not fall.

Failing a complete solution, we have to look for fragmentary and partial ones; but, when we apply them to realities, we feel that they are fragile and inadequate.

International solidarity calls for sacrifices, but the national communities which have to accept them are immediately filled with unrest and anxiety.

The work before us is long, but our sufferings require immediate relief and time presses. We should like to go full speed ahead; time is a factor which it is impossible to disregard.

We should like to open up ampler communications between the peoples, to multiply and strengthen the bonds which unite them, and to create community of interest between them; but we are hampered at every turn by the prejudices accumulated by age-long selfishness and misunderstandings.

Our great scheme of economic union requires confidence, and confidence has still to be created.

Cruel is the conflict between human intentions guided by the spirit of Geneva and the brutal force of realities. We must not fear to emphasise this conflict, for the nations we represent must realise it.

Does this mean that we must give way to a gloomy fatalism and to purely negative pessimism ?

Can we allow it to be said that nothing can be done but bow before the storm and wait for greater sufferings to bring a useful lesson to mankind ? We have no right to do so. Without illusion, but without discouragement, we must apply ourselves to bringing the national communities to an understanding of the principles laid down in the recommendations of the 1927 Economic Conference and the Conferences of 1929 and 1930, in the remarkable studies made by its economic organs, and in the conclusions of the Commission of Enquiry for European Union.

We must call upon the Governments to examine with the greatest attention the resolutions adopted by the technical experts with regard to the solutions to be applied to the economic crisis.

Should we confine ourselves to these recommendations ? The Second Committee does not think so, and it has reached an agreement of principle on several proposals. These—although they certainly do not provide a general and final solution for our present ills—suggest remedies which, although only partial, may none the less be genuinely effective if supported by the goodwill of the peoples.

With great penetration and wisdom, the Sub-Committee of Economic Experts recently, at the beginning of its admirable report, emphasised the primary importance of the part played by lack of confidence in aggravating the world situation.

> " The growing international distrust ", it says, " is accentuating the effects of the crisis, increasing the obstacles to the normal circulation of capital and obstructing to an ever-increasing extent the whole mechanism of international trade. Lack of confidence not only entails stagnation of capital, reluctance to lend abroad, and refusal to enter into longterm undertakings, but also tends to paralyse and retard all forms and phases of economic life.
> " The result is a flagging of the spirit of enterprise, the postponement of programmes already decided upon, the abandonment of the search for new markets, the limitation of the purchase of raw materials to daily requirements, . . . the dismissal of workers, excessive caution instead of productive activity and stagnation instead of progress."

These wise words must be heard. Governments must learn the lesson they contain, must instruct their public opinion and silence the disturbing elements and the authors of hatred, fear and distrust, in order that the peoples, instead of looking backwards with regret and revengeful feelings, may resolutely advance in a new spirit and with free hearts towards a true economic solidarity, the source of well-being and pacification.

2. Continuity of the Economic Work of the League of Nations.

Two years ago, the tenth Assembly, noting that the recommendations of the World Economic Conference had been carried out only to a limited extent, took the initiative of drawing up a new programme based on two fundamental ideas—" a Customs truce " and, by means of that truce, the execution of a detailed scheme of negotiations.

This initiative was termed " concerted economic action".

The eleventh Assembly still held to the same principle.

It is noteworthy, however, that, in the discussions which have taken place in the Second Committee, very little mention has been made of concerted economic action, whereas a prominent place has been given to the work and the programme of the Commission of Enquiry for European Union. This change might give the impression of a certain lack of continuity and coherence, of an unexpected change of direction in the League's economic work.

It is important to remove this impression. In point of fact, the change we have observed is really no more than a change of terms. Concerted economic action was conceived by the tenth Assembly on a worldwide scale. All countries were invited to take part in it, and it was only through a process of auto-selection, probably in response to urgently felt needs, that the successive Conferences with a View to Concerted Economic Action acquired a definitely European character. It may therefore legitimately be said that the work of European solidarity in the economic field had spontaneously begun even before the creation of the Commission of Enquiry.

Moreover, the world aspects of the economic question were not neglected at any time either before or after the World Economic Conference. As we shall see, they reappear in the list of the various activities which follows these general observations. The Assembly and the Council have constantly taken judicious steps to maintain the work relating more particularly to the economic restoration of Europe, within the province and in the spirit of the League.

Thus the development we have witnessed, which started from the general formulas of 1927 and passed through the various fields of concerted economic action, has now—without, however, losing its close connection with the world aspects of the problem—led up to the programme of the Commission of Enquiry for European Union.

It would therefore be incorrect to say that the League's economic work lacks coherence or continuity.

B. ECONOMIC ACTIVITY OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS AND OF THE COMMISSION OF ENQUIRY FOR EUROPEAN UNION SINCE THE LAST ASSEMBLY.

1. Concerted Economic Action—Commercial Convention.

The last Assembly particularly urged the necessity of putting into force the Commercial Convention of March 24th, 1930, and the immediate execution of the programme of negotiations provided for in the Protocol of the same date.

(a) The Assembly this year regrets to note, however, that, despite two successive attempts in November 1930 and March 1931, it has not been possible to bring the Convention into force. The Second Committee fully realises the reasons for the failure to do so. The economic depression was bound to have a considerable influence on the commercial relations between countries. The unprecedented fall in agricultural prices led to protective measures on the part of importing countries, which were anxious as to the fate of their agriculture. It also led the agricultural countries of Central and Eastern Europe to press with ever-increasing urgency for more favourable conditions for their exports of cereals. Moreover, the shrinking of the external markets for the industrial products of the various exporting countries compelled the latter to seek on the home market compensation for the diminution of their external markets, thereby causing the parties concerned to call with growing urgency for protection, in some cases even to the exclusion of foreign competition.

Faced with this situation, many countries felt it necessary to preserve their freedom of action in tariff matters. Where that freedom was even in part restricted by agreements, they endeavoured to regain it by a process of deconsolidation of duties, and even by the denunciation of treaties.

In view of this ill-success, the Commission of Enquiry for European Union felt grave misgivings, and, at its session in May 1931, made a last effort to save at all events the essential principles of the Convention. It recognised that progress was difficult if the sudden and frequent changes in the basis of international trade could not be checked. Accordingly, the Commission of Enquiry asked the European States to conform, as far as possible, to the principles laid down by the Convention.

The Second Committee associates itself with that appeal, drawing the attention of all States without distinction to the obstacle to the restoration of the economic situation represented by the growing instability of commercial relations, and accordingly it welcomes the Oslo Convention. The signatory States of that Convention have undertaken to apply amongst themselves certain principles of the Commercial Convention, including notification in advance of negotiations with parties who consider themselves prejudiced by the tariff measures contemplated.

(b) The Protocol regarding future negotiations provided for a reduction of Customs tariffs by means of a collective agreement, and also for efforts to devise concerted methods of solving a large number of problems not connected with tariffs, but nevertheless of primary importance for international trade.

After many exchanges of views, the execution of the first of these tasks had to be left to bilateral negotiations. Was the Economic Conference wrong in pointing to collective action as one of the best means of lowering Customs tariffs ? We do not think so. At that time, as the result of the conclusion of a number of important international agreements, a relative stability of international relations had been secured, which enabled further possibilities to be envisaged. At the very time when the first steps were taken in that direction, however, the world crisis developed and rendered them practically useless.

Despite the ill-success of this first attempt to regularise international economic relations, the Second Committee is more than ever convinced that a final remedy for the economic ills from which the world is suffering can be found only in common efforts on the part of all States. It is therefore glad to note the attempts which have been made with this object by the Commission of Enquiry for European Union.

2. Economic " Rapprochements ".

It is only natural that the Commission of Enquiry for European Union should be concerned primarily with the improvement of commercial relations among the European countries. It has asked highly qualified economic experts to seek means for providing closer economic co-operation among the countries of Europe with a view to bringing about in the general interest a better organisation of production and trade.

The economic experts recognised that the weakness of the economic structure of Europe is due more particularly to the multiplicity of Customs tariffs, resulting from the division of Europe into a large number of separate economic units. The existence in that continent of numerous tariff barriers which, under the pressure of the existing crisis, naturally and constantly tend to rise even higher, constitutes, in the experts' opinion, one of the obstacles to the improvement of the economic situation of the world and, in particular, of Europe. The efforts which the League has hitherto made to improve international co-operation having achieved very little result, it is necessary, in the experts' opinion, to contemplate entirely new methods:

" The ultimate goal must be the widest possible collaboration of the nations of Europe in the sense of making Europe a single market for the products of any and every country in it. "

The Co-ordination Committee, summarising the views of the economic experts, says that:

> " Even when Europe has emerged from the present crisis, she cannot hope for a real economic revival unless she is prepared gradually to adapt the traditional conception of separate national economic units and to approximate it—with every necessary precaution, and possibly in forms as yet unknown—to the conception of one vast market accessible on equal terms to all or most of the producers of Europe. "

In this connection, the economic experts were led to contemplate for Europe " economic rapprochements " which might even lead to a complete European Customs union.

The Second Committee welcomes the fact that Europe is making efforts to bring about the restoration of her economic situation, and thereby improve world conditions. But the Committee is naturally bound to consider the effects such efforts might have on relations between the European countries and countries in other parts of the world. It is therefore glad to note that the experts have surrounded their proposals with guarantees for the purpose of safeguarding the interests of other countries, and that they still consider the regime of the most-favoured-nation clause the essential safeguard of normal commercial relations between the nations.

3. International Economic Agreements.

Among the means contemplated for improving the organisation of production and for substituting systematic and co-ordinated organisations for unorganised activity, the World Economic Conference, and still more recently, the Sub-Committee of Economic Experts, have mentioned the development of international agreements. The Second Committee agrees with the opinion expressed by them that, under certain conditions and guarantees which they define, the development of international economic agreements may exercise a beneficial influence on the organisation of industry, agriculture and trade. Agreements of this kind may reduce the danger of overproduction, and also provide a basis for international co-operation. In this connection, the Second Committee looks forward with interest to the publication of the report by the special Experts who have studied the problem of international industrial agreements under the direction of the Economic Committee.

It is undoubtedly important, in order to avoid any disadvantages which they might involve, to provide all necessary guarantees in respect of such agreements and their operation. It is essential that the interests of consumers should be adequately safeguarded, and that States should not be left without means of protecting themselves against an influence which might become too powerful, and that, moreover, any combines formed should be sufficiently adaptable to avoid permanently crystallising the existing conditions of manufacture in the various countries, and to give the economic life of various countries legitimate scope for expansion.

While leaving the Economic Organisation to appreciate the conditions in which these meetings would offer the greatest chances of success and to select the products in respect of which agreement appears to it most easily obtainable, the Commission calls its attention to the fact that, in the discussion, the following commodities were mentioned by several delegations as being likely to fulfil most satisfactorily the conditions for this purpose: cereals, wine, cork, hemp, coal, wood, paper, artificial silk, leather, hides and skins, electrical material, motor-cars and chemical products.

4. Agricultural Questions.

(a) With the co-operation of the International Institute of Agriculture, a large number of agricultural experts were heard by the Economic Committee in January 1931. The experts' reports were published in the form of a study of the question which enables the worldwide nature of the agricultural crisis to be realised.

The gravity of that crisis is such that the agricultural experts must continue to afford their co-operation in the examination of all economic questions affecting agriculture.

(b) Most of the experts attach particular importance to the organisation of the cereal trade. Efforts have been made to establish that organisation on a worldwide scale.

The International Institute of Agriculture held, in March 1931, a preparatory conference with a view to a world conference on wheat. In May 1931, the London Conference, which comprised the wheat-exporting countries of Europe and overseas, did not succeed in reaching any wide international agreement. The Second Committee recommends that active efforts should be continued with a view to reaching world agreement.

(c) As regards Europe, certain countries have concluded bilateral agreements involving preference for purchases of cereals from Central and Eastern European States.

These countries affirm that they have no wish to infringe the principle of the most-favoured-nation clause, nor have they any intention of setting up any new economic doctrine, their efforts being directed solely towards granting a temporary and limited exception, which is urgently necessary in the present grave circumstances. They also expressed the opinion that the granting of a preferential tariff on cereals would enable countries benefiting by it to sell their cereals at a fairly remunerative price, and not, as is the case to-day, at much less than cost price; in this way, their economic situation would be improved and their purchasing capacity increased. They add that the advantages granted in return by the exporting countries would benefit, not only the country giving the assistance, but all States without distinction. The agreements would be submitted to the League and would be given wide publicity.

Those countries consider that, in the exceptional conditions of the present time, and in view of the economic distress which exists in certain countries, but which affects all other countries, preferential tariffs might constitute an exceptional and temporary remedy; and that, subject to the agreed reservations in regard to the previous approval of the agreements, and provided they are given publicity and are in conformity with the principles laid down by the Commission of Enquiry for European Union, they may be regarded as likely to bring an appreciable measure of relief to the economic systems concerned.

On the other hand, certain countries pointed out the drawbacks which might be involved by these departures from the most-favoured-nation clause. In their opinion, the League should not give its approval to special benefits or privileges limited to particular groups of nations.

The Second Committee notes the report drawn up on this matter by the Commission of Enquiry for European Union.

(d) Some European countries have asked that the possibilities of extending the preference to agricultural products other than cereals (tobacco, raisins, etc.) should be studied.

The report submitted to the Commission of Enquiry for European Union by the Economic Co-ordination Sub-Committee provided that the study of this question should be entrusted to a special Committee, such as that on cereals.

The Second Committee notes this recommendation, but observes that the extension of the preference to products other than cereals is likely to give rise to anxiety in the minds of certain delegations who would like the special Committee's conclusions to be carefully examined.

(e) Certain delegations, voicing the views of a large number of agricultural experts, expressed their belief that the co-operative association of production and consumption has an important part to play in the organisation of the disposal of agricultural products. It also would assist to adjust and regulate production with reference to fluctuations in demand as well as to reduce disparity between agricultural and manufacturing prices. This could further be expected to reduce agricultural costs and the burden of agricultural debts.

Finally, the collateral effect of the development of such co-operation would be to contribute towards lowering tariffs, especially emergency tariffs.

The Second Committee considers that this question must be carefully studied by the Economic Organisation, with the assistance of its agricultural experts and in close co-operation with the International Institute of Agriculture and the International Labour Office.

(f) The Second Committee welcomes the establishment of an International Agricultural Mortgage Credit Company under the auspices of the League. International agricultural credit would have an important part to play in improving the conditions of agricultural production and trade and in developing markets. It would have most desirable moral and psychological effects in restoring confidence and bringing about, in the financial sphere, effective international co-operation among all countries.

Several delegations expressed a desire that the activities of the International Agricultural Mortgage Credit Company should not be confined to Europe.

The Second Committee hopes that the Conference convened by the International Institute of Agriculture for short-term agricultural credit will soon achieve practical results.

5. Veterinary Conventions.

After carrying out lengthy investigations with the assistance of veterinary experts of both importing and exporting countries, the Economic Committee, in June last, examined three preliminary draft Conventions relating to:

(a) The campaign against contagious diseases of animals;
(b) The conveyance in transit of animals, meat and other products of animal origin;
(c) Exports and imports of products of animal origin other than meat, meat preparations, fresh animal products, milk and products derived from milk.

Although these draft conventions do not yet seem likely to provide the live-stock trade with the facilities which exporting States have for long been demanding, they nevertheless will probably improve the transit of and trade in products of animal origin.

The Council therefore considered it desirable to communicate these drafts to the Governments, requesting them to send in their observations on them, and to state whether they considered them suitable to form a basis for an international Conference.

Further, the Committee noted the intention of the Commission of Enquiry for European Union to ask the Council " to request the Economic Committee of the League of Nations to examine the expediency of preparing a preliminary draft international convention on the import and export of animals, meat and other products of animal origin ".

In view of the importance which is attached to the trade in stock-breeding products from the point of view of economic rapprochement, the Second Committee approves this recommendation and expresses the hope that the Economic Committee will resume, as soon as possible, the study of this question.

6. Unemployment.

(a) Among the measures of international solidarity calculated to mitigate the effects of the economic depression and to contribute to the restoration of economic activity for the benefit of the workers of all countries, the Committee thought it desirable to contemplate the execution of large public works undertaken jointly by public or private bodies in European or extra-European territories.

Subject to the financial considerations involved, such a programme would primarily have the effect of remedying to some extent the distressing unemployment crisis. The execution of such a programme would be likely to bring relief to branches of trade in which the unemployed are particularly suffering from poverty. It would also tend to bring about among the producers concerned the necessary co-ordination of joint efforts, and would thus indirectly help to create a solidarity which could be further developed in the future.

The problem has already been attacked by the Commission of Enquiry for European Union, and the competent organs of the League of Nations are now dealing with it.

(b) The Committee approves the proposals submitted regarding the international placing of labour, and, in particular, proposals for the summoning of a technical Conference for that purpose.

(c) It also approves the recommendations of the Commission of Enquiry regarding the suggestions for the co-operation of factors in production for the exploitation of undeveloped territories.

7. Most-favoured-nation Clause.

The Assembly of 1930 having taken up the question of various divergences of opinion which had been revealed in the interpretation of the most-favoured-nation clause, and desiring to eliminate this source of disputes and conflicts in inter-State commercial relations, asked the Economic Committee to study certain contested points relating to application such as Customs quotas, anti-dumping and countervailing duties, nationality of goods and " like products ".

The Assembly will now see that the Economic Committee has carried out most of its task. With the help of experts appointed by the countries which had laid these important questions before the Assembly, the Committee reached, in regard to Customs quotas, the nationality of goods and "like products", certain conclusions which amplify and define more closely the doctrine of the most-favoured-nation clause which it formulated in 1929. It has still to give its decision with regard to the problem of anti-dumping and countervailing duties.

On the other controversial points, the Economic Committee expressed a view which is in no way a rigidly theoretical one, but is based on essentially practical conceptions.

The Second Committee is glad to note the results reached by the Economic Committee, and suggests that the Assembly should recommend to the attention of the Governments the conclusions of the Economic Committee.

8. Treatment of Foreigners.

In the Final Protocol of the International Conference on the Treatment of Foreigners, signed at Paris on December 5th, 1929, the delegates of the countries there represented urged the desirability of drafting the proposed Convention on the most liberal lines, with the possibility of allowing for the special situations of certain countries by granting them certain exceptions.

The Committee was informed that, although the enquiries made with regard to the documentation of the Paris Conference from the Governments which had taken part therein had not been completed within the prescribed time-limit, the interval had, nevertheless, been made use of by a certain number of Governments to initiate negotiations with a view to an agreement on a draft Convention which, in their opinion, would constitute an important progress as compared with the present situation.

The Committee was glad to hear that these negotiations were on the point of reaching a successful conclusion.

The Commission of Enquiry for European Union expressed the opinion that " a system of co-operation between European States is inconceivable unless the nationals and undertakings of one State receive in the territory of the other States equitable treatment approaching as nearly as possible to that accorded to the nationals and undertakings of the States concerned ".

The Committee entirely shares this view, but it considers that this equitable treatment should extend to all countries, and at any rate to all Members of the League. It hopes that the agreement which is on the point of being reached between a certain number of countries will facilitate the preparatory work for the second session of the Conference, and the conclusion of an international convention established on such a basis as to provide solutions for the various problems raised by the draft originally submitted to the Conference—solutions which will be likely to further the development of economic relations and international rapprochement.

9. Customs Nomenclature.

The Sub-Committee of Experts appointed by the Economic Committee to study the unification of Customs nomenclature has to-day virtually concluded its work after four years' assiduous labour. Accordingly, the Council, in a resolution dated September 1st, 1931, authorised the Secretary-General to forward the draft unified Customs nomenclature for examination to all Members and States non-Members of the League of Nations, these States being requested to say within six months from the receipt of the draft whether they are in principle prepared to adopt it, and to communicate their observations, if any, to the Secretary-General after consulting agricultural, industrial and commercial circles in their respective countries.

It considers it highly desirable that the different Governments should respond without delay to the invitation thus addressed to them in order to allow the Economic Committee to revise the draft on the basis of the comments received from the Governments. Once this revision has been effected, the Economic Committee will have to prepare a draft international convention for the adoption of the unified nomenclature.

The Committee is aware that the adoption of the unified Customs nomenclature will entail certain difficulties for the majority of States; but it is convinced that the adjustments which may be necessary will be amply compensated by the considerable advantages resulting from its adoption

10. Indirect Protectionism: Marks of Origin.

The Economic Conference of 1927 pointed out that Customs tariffs did not constitute the sole obstacle to the development of commercial relations between the different countries, but that Customs barriers were often reinforced by administrative measures constituting one of the manifestations of indirect protectionism, the effects of which were often more injurious even than those of high tariffs.

In this connection attention was drawn to a large number of similar measures. The studies which the Economic Committee has devoted to them related, in particular, to the complaints aroused in industrial and commercial circles by the application of national laws prescribing the affixing of marks of origin to the goods themselves or to their make-up or packing.

The Economic Committee examined this question in all its aspects and endeavoured to find both equitable and practicable remedies. The consultation of specially qualified experts to which it proceeded enabled it to draw up a series of conclusions which, without denying countries the right to take steps to enable consumers to distinguish between home and foreign goods, nevertheless stipulate that the means employed by States for this purpose should be chosen in such a way as to reduce to a minimum the obstacles and drawbacks which the resulting regulations may impose on the trade and industry of the exporting countries.

The Committee drew from this principle a series of conclusions which the Council has communicated to the Members and the States non-members of the League of Nations, calling their attention to these conclusions.

The Second Committee is convinced that the observance of the Economic Committee's recommendations in this connection will have the most satisfactory results.

11. Bills of Exchange and Cheques.

The League of Nations achieved a further success during the year 1931 in the sphere of the unification of laws of the so-called "Continental" type relating to cheques. The Conference held during the winter, like that of last year with regard to bills of exchange and promissory notes, succeeded in concluding three Conventions, which were signed within the prescribed time-limit by twenty-six States. (The Convention on the Stamp Laws in connection with Cheques was signed by twenty-seven States.)

The time-limit for the deposit of ratifications of the Conventions on bills of exchange and promissory notes expires on September 1st, 1932, and that for the Conventions regarding cheques on September 1st, 1933.

It is to be hoped that the Governments of the States concerned will take without delay the necessary steps for the instruments of ratification to be deposited within the prescribed periods. It is true that, as the application of these Conventions involves a change in the national legislation of States, Governments will have to proceed first of all to consultations and studies which cannot be effected very rapidly. It is to be hoped that, despite this difficulty, these States will be able to avoid a delay which might compromise the success of a work from which the most excellent results may be anticipated.

12. National Economic Councils.

International economic co-operation could no doubt attain more considerable results if the principal elements in each of the national economic systems, having been associated in good time with the preparation of these results, were disposed to accept the obligations which their Governments might enter into in the international sphere.

Further, a more or less direct participation of the different economic circles in the studies, researches and debates initiated by the League of Nations with regard to problems of common interest, would be likely to prepare in each country an enlightened body of public opinion giving international agreements the best chances of success.

During the year 1931, two meetings have already been held at Geneva between the representatives of national economic councils with a view to the common study of the causes of the present economic depression, and it appears that they have already given good results. The Committee considers that further steps should be taken in this direction. When organisations of this kind function in a larger number of countries, having studied the same questions, meetings of these organisations under the auspices of the League of Nations will bring a particularly valuable contribution to the examination of the grave problems of the present day.

The Committee thinks it sufficient to draw the Council's attention to the utility of ensuring the co-operation of these national economic councils in the work of the League of Nations, leaving it to the Council to seek the best means of carrying this idea into effect. It has been suggested in the Committee that this aim might be achieved by means of a suitable modification in the existing Economic Consultative Committee.

13. Economic Tendencies liable to influence World Peace.

Realising the connection which exists between economic policy and peace, the Second Committee is of opinion that the study begun in this connection by the Economic Organisation at the suggestion of the World Economic Conference of 1927 should be pursued.

14. Pact of Economic Non-aggression.

The Second Committee shares the Sixth Committee's opinion that the proposal aiming at the creation of a Pact of Economic Non-aggression submitted to the Commission of Enquiry for European Union is a question of worldwide importance.

Leaving it to the proposed special committee to examine the substance of the question, the Second Committee confined itself to suggesting to the Sixth Committee that certain extra-European States should be requested to take part in the work of the special committee.

C. DRAFT RESOLUTIONS.

In conclusion, the Second Committee submits the following draft resolutions to the Assembly:

" 1. The Assembly,

" Recognising that the normal exchange of commodities between the nations is seriously hampered by frequent changes in Customs tariffs and, generally, by instability in commercial policy;

" Considering the statement made by the Sub-Committee of Economic Experts to the Commission of Enquiry for European Union to the effect that the increasing disparity of tariffs greatly complicates the task of maintaining stability in the monetary and credit system of the world:

" Earnestly hopes that every country will try to the utmost possible extent to avoid any such change in tariff or commercial policy as would tend to suspend commercial agreements or to increase the economic disequilibrium and further disturb the general balance of payments. It also recommends that such agreements, where they do not exist, should be concluded on as liberal a basis as possible."

" 2. The Assembly,

" Having noted the resolutions Nos. I and III to VI (document A.38.1931) adopted by the Commission of Enquiry for European Union as a consequence of the report of its Co-ordination Sub-Committee;

" Being informed that the Commission of Enquiry did not feel able to put these resolutions into effect until they had been submitted to the Assembly:

" Approves these resolutions and requests the Council to take the necessary action to put them into effect.

" In particular, as regards the report of the Sub-Committee of Economic Experts, the Assembly:

" (a) Considering that closer economic co-operation is one of the essential conditions for relieving and overcoming the present economic crisis;

" Considering that the report of the Sub-Committee of Economic Experts suggests methods for attaining this object;

" Recognising that the seriousness of the crisis and the distress that the coming months will bring require a speedier application of all useful remedial measures:

" Notes the resolution of the Commission of Enquiry for European Union inviting the European Governments to present, if possible before January 1st, 1932, their observations on the said report; it recommends the report to the attention of all the Governments;

" (b) Having noted the resolution adopted by the Commission of Enquiry for European Union regarding the appointment of a special committee to study the extension of a system of special facilities to agricultural products other than cereals;

" Considering that such extension would raise difficult questions of principle, in particular as regards the relations between such a system and the most-favoured-nation clause:

" Deems it desirable that the findings of the special committee referred to above should be examined by the Economic Committee before being submitted to the Commission of Enquiry for European Union."

" 3. The Assembly,

" Considering that among the means likely to contribute to better organisation of production, the World Economic Conference, and more recently the Sub-Committee of Economic Experts, have expressed the opinion that, under certain conditions and guarantees, the development of international economic agreements may exercise a beneficial influence on the organisation of production and the regulation of trade;

" Draws the attention of the Governments to the recommendations of the economic experts in this connection.

" It requests, in particular, the Governments and the League of Nations to devote their attention to studying the means of ensuring that international economic agreements should be organised and operated in the general interest and with due regard to all interests concerned in accordance with the recommendations of the economic experts and the relevant chapter in the report of the World Economic Conference.

" It draws special attention to the necessity of measures to ensure as wide publicity as possible for these agreements, making it possible to follow their activities so as to safeguard all legitimate interests, particularly those of consumers, whether countries or persons.

" It further requests the Economic Committee of the League of Nations to resume and push forward its consultations concerning the most important branches of production."

" 4. The Assembly,

" Seeing that, among the measures of international solidarity calculated to mitigate the effects of the economic depression and to assist the resumption of activity which would benefit the workers of all countries, consideration should be given to the execution of important public works jointly undertaken by public or private groups on European or extra-European territory;

" Seeing, further, that the problem has already been approached by the Commission of Enquiry for European Union and has been laid before the competent organs of the League of Nations;

" In order to expedite the examination of these programmes, to co-ordinate them on an international scale, to hasten their putting into effect and to follow their execution:

" Invites the Council of the League of Nations to instruct the Committee of Enquiry set up by the Communications and Transit Organisation, to which should be added representatives of the International Labour Office and possibly of the economic and financial organs of the League, to undertake these various tasks.

" This Committee will examine the concrete proposals of the various Governments, particularly from the point of view of the utility and productivity of the works proposed.

" It will report to the Council of the League of Nations. The Commission of Enquiry for European Union will be called on to give its opinion on the proposals relating to Europe. "

" 5. The Assembly notes with satisfaction that the draft unified Customs nomenclature prepared, after an urgent request from the Assembly, by the Sub-Committee of Experts appointed for the purpose has now been completed.

" It considers that the adoption of an agreement to utilise a uniform Customs nomenclature would facilitate the development of international economic relations.

" Considering that the great advantages resulting from the adoption of such a common instrument will generally compensate for the difficulties of adjustment which its adoption may entail, it agrees with the procedure suggested by the Economic Committee and the Sub-Committee of Experts and approved by the Council.

" It therefore earnestly appeals to all Members and to the States non-members of the League of Nations to which the draft unified Customs nomenclature will shortly be submitted to examine the draft without delay, so that they may be in a position to forward their replies to the Secretariat as soon as possible."

" 6. The Assembly notes with satisfaction the valuable results of the two International Conferences for the Unification of Laws on Bills of Exchange, Promissory Notes and Cheques, and strongly urges the Governments of the States concerned to take steps to ensure that the instruments of ratification of these Conventions shall be deposited as soon as possible, and in any case before the expiry of the time-limits provided."

" 7. The Assembly,

" Considering that it would be desirable to associate with the work of the League of Nations institutions (National Economic Councils) representing the most important economic and social elements in certain States;

" Considering that institutions of this nature already exist—although with different methods and with different powers—in a number of countries, especially in Europe;

" Convinced of the desirability of utilising these institutions as much as possible in the work of improving international economic relations:

" Requests the Council to seek the most appropriate means of providing for the co-operation of National Economic Councils in the work of the League of Nations. "

ANNEX 11.

OPENING OF A CONVENTION FOR THE REGULATION OF WHALING.

REPORT OF THE SECOND COMMITTEE TO THE ASSEMBLY.

Rapporteur: M. BRAADLAND (Norway).

The main object of the draft Convention before the Second Committee is to secure the adoption by the greatest possible number of countries of certain rules intended to prevent, in the interests of the whaling industry itself, the destruction of a source of wealth available to all.

The steady growth of this industry in the last few years, thanks to improvements in equipment and technique, has resulted in an ever larger annual increase in the number of balaenoptera killed. Estimates obtained from various sources show that, for several years past, the number taken has varied from 25,000 to 30,000 each season! For the season which has just closed, the enormous figure of 40,000 has been mentioned.

Past experience shows the necessity of making an effort to prevent the extinction of the species which are chiefly hunted by modern whalers.

Biologists are not as yet very well acquainted with this branch of science and it is impossible to determine the number of these animals which could be taken annually without endangering the species. In view of the fact, however, that certain species of whales are already practically extinct, it will be realised that those species which it is still profitable to capture are exposed to serious danger.

The draft before you is the outcome of work begun in 1925 as the result of an Assembly resolution of the previous year for the creation of a Committee of Experts " to prepare a provisional list of the subjects of international law, the regulation of which by international agreement would seem to be most desirable and realisable ". Among the questions recommended by this Committee for examination was the " exploitation of the riches of the sea " and in his report Professor Suarès emphasised the danger of extermination to which the great balaenoptera were exposed.

A questionnaire was sent to the various States, and from the general trend of their observations it appeared that they recognised the importance of the problem and the desirability of finding a solution by international agreement.

In September 1927, the Assembly asked the Council to instruct the Economic Committee to study the question of the protection of marine fauna and to decide, with the help of experts, " whether and in what terms, for what species and in what areas, international protection of marine fauna could be established ".

In July 1929, the Economic Committee came to the conclusion that international measures might be contemplated to ensure the protection of whales and that such measures were actually urgent. The Committee added, however, that it could not make proposals in this respect until it had consulted experts.

The Norwegian Government meanwhile had prepared a Bill providing that its whalers throughout the world should observe certain rules with a view to putting an end to the incomplete utilisation of the whales taken. These rules were framed with a view to obtaining valuable biological information. The Norwegian law came into force on June 21st, 1929.

The deliberations of the experts who met in April 1930 resulted in the drawing up of a preliminary draft which was based to a considerable extent upon the Norwegian law and which, after being recast by the Economic Committee, was submitted by the Council to all Members of the League and to the non-member States for their observations.

The Economic Committee, after examining the communications from the Governments which, as a whole, were favourable to the draft, felt that a Committee of Experts appointed by the Governments should be entrusted with the revision of the proposed Convention in the light of the observations and suggestions which had been presented.

Thus the draft before you is the result of patient and careful work by qualified persons and has already been under consideration by the Governments.

The amendments made by the Committee which has just concluded its work are not of vital importance. They are indicated in document A.II.3. I shall not, therefore, go into them.

I should like, however, to draw your attention to the scheme of the draft Convention. It is determined by certain general principles.

To begin with, the Convention will apply to all the waters of the world, including both the high seas and territorial waters (Article 9). This does not imply any restriction of the sovereign rights of States within the territorial waters, for which they may, should they so desire, enact any provisions they consider useful, these provisions being added, if necessary, to those resulting from the Convention. This follows expressly from Article 8, paragraph 2.

It is, moreover, for the contracting parties themselves to take the appropriate measures to ensure the application of the provisions of the Convention and the punishment of infractions of the said provisions by their nationals and by vessels flying their flag (Articles 1 and 13).

Provisions of the Convention apply to baleens or whalebone whales (Article 2), but not to toothed whales.

The Convention absolutely forbids the taking or killing of certain species which have become very rare (Article 4).

For the other species, the prohibition applies to the killing or taking of calves, or immature whales, and females accompanied by suckling whales (Article 5).

This provision is intended to prevent waste of the source of wealth which whales represent by premature and unremunerative exploitation.

It is, indeed, difficult at times to distinguish an adult from an immature whale, and the experts who prepared the draft did not feel able to define the difference. They inserted in their draft, however, a provision under which it is to the interest of harpooners and the crews of whalers to capture adult animals, as their remuneration will depend to some extent on the nature of the whales taken (Article 7).

It was found that in many cases factories, whether on shore or afloat, were inadequately equipped for the extraction from the whales taken of the maximum quantity of utilisable products, and that they threw away raw material without turning it to account. With a view to preventing this waste, Article 6 of the draft provides that the fullest possible use shall be made of the animals killed.

It is important, in the interests of effective supervision, that no vessel should engage in whaling unless its owner or charterer has at least notified the Government of the country whose flag the vessel flies of his intention. Article 8 makes this notification compulsory. The same article provides that each of the contracting parties shall have the right to require that any vessel using its territory or territorial waters for the purpose of taking or landing whales, or remaining therein for the purpose of treating them, shall possess a licence issued by its own authorities.

The experience of the Norwegian Government has shown that the co-operation of whalers might be of great assistance in collecting extremely valuable biological data concerning whales, and that the classification and comparison of the information collected should be entrusted to an appropriate central body. As a result of enquiries carried out of its own accord into this matter, the Norwegian Government has been requested by the International Council for the Exploration of the Sea at Copenhagen to undertake this work regularly. The International Bureau for Whaling Statistics was accordingly founded at Oslo in 1930, and Article 12 of the Draft Convention provides that the information collected by whalers shall be regularly communicated to it by the Governments of the contracting parties. A first publication has already been issued.

Among the so-called " formal " clauses of the Convention there are two which call for explanation:

Under Article 17, the entry into force of the Convention is subject to the ratification or accession of eight countries, including Norway and Great Britain. It was considered that if the Convention was to be of service, it should be put into force by a certain number of countries,which should necessarily include Norway and Great Britain, in view of the fact that their combined takings represent approximately 80 per cent of the total number of whales killed annually.

Article 18 deals with the possibility of revising the Convention at the request of two contracting parties and on the Council's decision. The authors of the draft considered that it should be chiefly of the nature of an experiment and that its application would probably suggest improvements to be made later. In such a case it is important that all the contracting parties should participate in the necessary Conference.

As already stated, the draft Convention is based on the provisions of the Norwegian law of June 21st, 1929, which naturally apply solely to Norwegian vessels and their crews, in whatever seas they are operating. Its object is to generalise the application of the majority of those measures by extending them to the vessels of the other contracting parties.

If it is to produce its full effect, the Convention should, of course, be extended to every country in the world, since it is to be feared that, under the protection of the flags of States not parties to the Convention, vessels may engage in operations contrary to the rules adopted by common accord with a view to safeguarding an industry the very existence of which is seriously imperilled. It is therefore to be hoped that the large number of States not directly concerned will co-operate and will become contracting parties to a Convention which is essentially designed to promote general interests and which, in the case of States possessing a whaling industry, involves a voluntary limitation of their activities and positive obligations which they alone are called upon to undertake.

The experts entrusted with the revision of the text of the draft Convention tried to make the latter as simple as possible, and to exclude from it any provision which they did not consider absolutely essential.

It was in conformity with their intention, of which the Committee approved, that the latter considered it inadvisable, as had been requested by one delegation, to add, in accordance with the Assembly recommendation of October 3rd, 1930, a special protocol of signature whereby the Governments of the signatory States would undertake, before a definite date, " either to submit the said Convention for parliamentary approval, or to inform the Secretary-General of the League of Nations of their attitude in regard to the Convention ".

This decision in no way implies that the Committee contests the usefulness of such a provision, but it agrees with the author of the proposal that, since the Convention was not discussed at a conference, it seems advisable to keep as closely as possible to the draft regarding which the Governments have been consulted.

The Committee further expresses the hope that the Governments of the States signatory to the Convention will endeavour to conform to the recommendation mentioned above.

In conclusion, I propose that the Second Committee should transmit to the Assembly the following resolution:

"The Assembly,

"Convinced of the importance and urgency of regulating whaling by means of an international agreement prohibiting the taking or killing of certain kinds of whales which have become extremely rare and of making the fullest possible use of the animals the catching of which is still permitted;

"In view of the fact that the attached Convention differs from that communicated to the Members of the League and non-member States by Circular Letter No. 158, of July 3rd, 1930, only as regards certain minor points of drafting, and that no substantial changes have been introduced therein:

"Decides to open the said Convention immediately for the signature of Members of the League and non-member States, and expresses the hope that the largest possible number of States will accede thereto without delay."

Appendix.

CONVENTION FOR THE REGULATION OF WHALING.

The High Contracting Parties,

. . . . . .

have appointed as their Plenipotentiaries the following:

. . . . . .

Who, having communicated their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed on the following provisions:

Article 1.

The High Contracting Parties agree to take, within the limits of their respective jurisdictions, appropriate measures to ensure the application of the provisions of the present Convention and the punishment of infractions of the said provisions.

Article 2.

The present Convention applies only to baleens or whalebone whales.

Article 3.

The present Convention does not apply to aborigines dwelling on the coasts of the territories of the High Contracting Parties provided that:

(1) They only use canoes, pirogues or other exclusively native craft propelled by oars or sails;
(2) They do not carry firearms;
(3) They are not in the employment of persons other than aborigines;
(4) They are not under contract to deliver the products of their whaling to any third person.

Article 4.

The taking or killing of right whales, which shall be deemed to include North-Cape whales, Greenland whales, southern right whales, Pacific right whales and southern pigmy right whales, is prohibited.

Article 5.

The taking or killing of calves or suckling whales, immature whales, and female whales which are accompanied by calves (or suckling whales) is prohibited.

Article 6.

The fullest possible use shall be made of the carcases of whales taken. In particular:

1. There shall be extracted by boiling or otherwise the oil from all blubber and from the head and the tongue and, in addition, from the tail as far forward as the outer opening of the lower intestine.

The provisions of this sub-paragraph shall apply only to such carcases or parts of carcases as are not intended to be used for human food.

2. Every factory, whether on shore or afloat, used for treating the carcases of whales shall be equipped with adequate apparatus for the extraction of oil from the blubber, flesh and bones.

3. In the case of whales brought on shore, adequate arrangements shall be made for utilising the residues after the oil has been extracted.

Article 7.

Gunners and crews of whaling vessels shall be engaged on terms such that their remuneration shall depend to a considerable extent upon such factors as the size, species, value and yield of oil of whales taken, and not merely upon the number of whales taken, in so far as payment is made dependent on results.

Article 8.

No vessel of any of the High Contracting Parties shall engage in taking or treating whales unless a licence authorising such vessel to engage therein shall have been granted in respect of such vessel by the High Contracting Party, whose flag she flies, or unless her owner or charterer has notified the Government of the said High Contracting Party of his intention to employ her in whaling and has received a certificate of notification from the said Government.

Nothing in this article shall prejudice the right of any High Contracting Party to require that, in addition, a licence shall be required from his own authorities by every vessel desirous of using his territory or territorial waters for the purposes of taking, landing or treating whales, and such licence may be refused or may be made subject to such conditions as may be deemed by such High Contracting Party to be necessary or desirable, whatever the nationality of the vessel may be.

Article 9.

The geographical limits within which the articles of this Convention are to be applied shall include all the waters of the world, including both the high seas and territorial and national waters.

Article 10.

1. The High Contracting Parties shall obtain, with regard to the vessels flying their flags and engaged in the taking of whales, the most complete biological information practicable with regard to each whale taken, and in any case on the following points:

(a) Date of taking;
(b) Place of taking;
(c) Species;
(d) Sex;
(e) Length; measured, when taken out of water; estimated, if cut up in water;
(f) When fœtus is present, length and sex if ascertainable;
(g) When practicable, information as to stomach contents.

2. The length referred to in sub-paragraphs (e) and (f) of this article shall be the length of a straight line taken from the tip of the snout to the notch between the flukes of the tail.

Article 11.

Each High Contracting Party shall obtain from all factories, on land or afloat, under his jurisdiction, returns of the number of whales of each species treated at each factory and of the amounts of oil of each grade and the quantities of meal, guano and other products derived from them.

Article 12.

Each of the High Contracting Parties shall communicate statistical information regarding all whaling operations under their jurisdiction to the International Bureau for Whaling Statistics at Oslo. The information given shall comprise at least the particulars mentioned in Article 10 and: (1) the name and tonnage of each floating factory; (2) the number and aggregate tonnage of the whale catchers; (3) a list of the land stations which were in operation during the period concerned. Such information shall be given at convenient intervals not longer than one year.

Article 13.

The obligation of a High Contracting Party to take measures to ensure the observance of the conditions of the present Convention in his own territories and territorial waters, and by his vessels, shall not apply to those of his territories to which the Convention does not apply, and the territorial waters adjacent thereto, or to vessels registered in such territories.

Article 14.

The present Convention, the French and English texts of which shall both be authoritative, shall remain open until the thirty-first of March 1932 for signature on behalf of any Member of the League of Nations or of any non-member State.

Article 15.

The present Convention shall be ratified. The instruments of ratification shall be deposited with the Secretary-General of the League of Nations, who shall notify their receipt to all Members of the League of Nations and non-member States indicating the dates of their deposit.

Article 16.

WORK OF THE ORGANISATION FOR COMMUNICATIONS AND TRANSIT.

REPORT OF THE SECOND COMMITTEE TO THE ASSEMBLY.

Rapporteur: M. COSTA DU RELS (Bolivia).

A feature of the work of the Communications and Transit Organisation since the last Assembly has been the success of three international conferences — one for the Unification of Buoyage and the Lighting of Coasts, to which the Governments of the maritime countries were invited, and two others on the Unification of River Law and on Road Traffic, to which the Governments of the European countries were invited.

The Conference for the Unification of Buoyage and the Lighting of Coasts met at Lisbon from October 6th to 23rd, 1930, on the invitation of the Portuguese Government. It aroused keen interest among specialists. Though the Conference did not completely finish its work, it nevertheless effected very important progress. It adopted an agreement concerning maritime signals, an agreement concerning manned lightships not on their stations, and a number of recommendations on lighthouse characteristics and radio-beacons. A great many Governments signed these agreements.

The problem of the unification of buoyage characteristics raised serious difficulties and the Conference could not draw up a convention. Nevertheless the preparatory work required for a convention on this subject was carried sufficiently far at the Conference for there to be every prospect of reaching an agreement which would be as universal as possible when the Conference, in accordance with the desire it expressed, is called upon to resume its work. The Assembly naturally expects that the Communications and Transit Organisation will not propose the summoning of a second conference until it has taken every care to ascertain that such a conference would be likely to meet with complete success.

The Conference on the Unification of River Law met at Geneva from November 17th to December 9th, 1930. It adopted, in particular, a Convention for the Unification of Certain Rules concerning Collisions in Inland Navigation ; a Convention on the Registration of Inland-Navigation Vessels, Rights in rem over such Vessels and other Cognate Questions ; and a Convention on the Administrative Measures to Attest Nationality of Vessels employed in Inland Navigation. The first two Conventions in particular were signed by the representatives of the majority of the Governments concerned. The success of this Conference, which dealt with particularly difficult problems requiring methodical and careful preparatory work — which has been carried out by the Transit Organisation's Committee for the Unification of River Law during a number of years — will not only make it possible to prevent certain conflicts of law detrimental to the exercise of river navigation, but will also be of assistance to the owners of inland-navigation vessels in obtaining the mortages which they require. Likewise, in regard to river navigation, the Transit Organisation, in collaboration with the International Labour Organisation, has been able to undertake the study of questions of social legislation concerning inland navigation, particularly of questions of conditions of employment of personnel in inland navigation. It is to be hoped that the studies the experts are now engaged on will enable concrete proposals to be drawn up on this subject.

The European Conference on Road Traffic, which met in March 1931, adopted an International Convention on the Unification of Road Signalling, which is of particular importance for motor tourist traffic and the safety of transport by road ; a Convention on the Taxation of Foreign Motor Vehicles intended to do away with certain formalities and charges to which international motor tourist traffic is at present liable ; and, finally, an agreement between the Customs authorities in order to facilitate the procedure in the case of undischarged or lost triptychs. The signatures already given to these various Conventions make it clear that the Conference has obtained complete success on all those points. The Conference also had before it a draft Convention on International Commercial Motor Transport. Owing to the great and steady growth of commercial motor traffic during the past few years, a great many delegations considered themselves unable to form a correct idea of the legal consequences of a convention on this subject, and the Conference decided that it would be better to hold over for a later Conference such solutions as it might be desirable to adopt internationally, after the further necessary enquiries into the legislation of the various countries had been completed.

It would appear to be unnecessary in the present report to examine the work carried out by the Advisory and Technical Committee for Communications and Transit and its organs with regard to the preparation for the Fourth General Conference on Communications and Transit which is to meet on October 12th next. This Conference, which meets according to the Statutes every four years, will undertake a general examination of the work of the Transit Organisation. Further, in accordance with the request of a previous Assembly, it will examine the expediency from an economic and social standpoint of fixing movable feasts and reforming the calendar. Its results will be brought before the next Assembly, which will be in a better position to examine them.

Nor does it appear necessary to examine in detail the various resolutions adopted by the Committee for Communications and Transit at its last session. It may, however, be pointed out that the Advisory and Technical Committee has taken steps to place and keep on its agenda the question of the transport of agricultural products to which its attention was drawn by the Conference for Concerted Economic Action. Although, for the study of this question to be pursued further we must wait until such time as, in the words of the resolution adopted by the Committee for Communications and Transit, the policy of co-operation between States is sufficiently fixed, it is nevertheless desirable that the Communications and Transit Organisation, with the help of the International Institute of Agriculture, should assemble more precise particulars which would enable it to select those problems which might be approached with advantage, as well as those categories of agricultural products which appear most likely to benefit from the application of suitable measures.

The special attention of the Assembly should be drawn to the services which the Organisation for Communications and Transit is beginning to render in a sphere which in some respects is new — namely, that of international co-operation for the study and preparation of the great problems of public works. In the past, the Communications and Transit Committee, at the request of the Polish Government, granted the assistance of experts who submitted a report to the Polish Government on certain questions which had arisen in Poland regarding internal navigation and the draining of marshes.

The National Government of China, following the visit to China of the Director of the Communications and Transit Section of the Secretariat, requested the help of the Transit Organisation in obtaining the services of experts finally to establish a programme for the public works contemplated by the Chinese Government. The programme includes work in the river basin of the Hwai and the river system of Northern China and a scheme for the development of the port of Shanghai. The assistance of the Transit Organisation has also been requested in the organisation and development of a centre for the technical study of public works. The centre is intended to facilitate the technical training of civil engineers, and to assist in the organisation and direction of studies, more especially for the construction of roads and waterworks. It will form the nucleus of a national service of civil engineers. Further, in response to the request addressed by the Government of China to the Council of the League of Nations that the technical organisations of the League may be continuously available for advice to the National Economic Council which the Chinese Government has set up with a view to a general scheme of reconstruction, the Communications and Transit Organisation may be called upon to assist in establishing a scheme of public works and national technical equipment in China.

The Advisory and Technical Committee, on behalf of the Organisation for Communications and Transit, has agreed to undertake these various duties and has assured the National Government of China that it will spare no effort to justify the confidence placed in it by the Chinese Government and to assist the National Government of China to carry out its work of economic reconstruction in the sphere of communications and public works. A Committee has been appointed to study methods of training civil engineers and has been asked to examine questions relating to the organisation of the technical centre to be created for this purpose. Further, a Committee of Enquiry, appointed to deal with general questions relating to public works, has been invited to examine any questions raised in the course of the collaboration between the Communications and Transit Organisation and the National Economic Council of China concerning the establishment of a scheme of public works and national technical equipment. All the necessary steps have, moreover, been taken by the Advisory and Technical Committee to facilitate the appointment and despatch of experts required to work on the spot and to ensure by means of technically qualified officers, seconded for short service in China, the necessary contact between the Transit Organisation and the technical bodies of the Chinese Government, particularly the technical centre entrusted with the study of public works.

Quite recently, the Commission of Enquiry for European Union, in pursuance of a suggestion put forward by the Director of the International Labour Office, requested the Council to send to the Public Works Committee of the Communications and Transit Organisation for its examination any requests which might be received from various European Governments for the examination of programmes of public works of interest to those States with a view to promoting international co-operation in the execution of works of proved economic and social interest.

The Assembly will doubtless note with satisfaction the work which the Communications and Transit Organisation continues to accomplish and will be especially gratified that the Organisation which at first was obliged to attach special importance to questions of principle relating to the legal settlement of international difficulties in respect of communications, is at present, in view of the economic problems which occupy a predominant position in the minds of all nations, endeavouring more and more to co-operate in the work of economic reconstruction and to carry out the essential task of placing an impartial service for the study of the great economic and technical questions of communications and public works at the disposal of all nations.

I have the honour to submit the following resolution to the Assembly for adoption:

"The Assembly,

"Takes note of the work undertaken by the Organisation for Communications and Transit since the last Assembly and in particular of the success achieved by the Conference for the Unification of Buoyage and Lighting of Coasts, the Conference for the Unification of River Law and the Conference on Road Traffic;

"Expresses its confidence that the Organisation will do its utmost to secure the entire success of the co-operation established with the National Government of China for the study of questions of public works in which its assistance has been requested;

"Likewise expresses its confidence that the Transit Organisation will endeavour to take suitable steps to comply with requests for advice in respect of public works which it may receive from the various Governments; such as the requests for advice referred to in the report of the Commission of Enquiry for European Union."

Official No.: A.60.1931.III.

WORK OF THE HEALTH ORGANISATION.

REPORT OF THE SECOND COMMITTEE TO THE ASSEMBLY.

Rapporteur: M. Zdeněk FIERLINGER (Czechoslovakia).

The reports submitted to the present Assembly on the work of the Health Organisation of the League of Nations — the Annual Report of the Health Organisation for 1930 (document A.7.1931.III), the Report of the Secretariat on the Work of the League of Nations since the Last Assembly (document A.6. and A.6*(a)*.1931) and the Report of the Singapore Bureau — are so complete that I shall confine myself to a brief review of those activities which are particularly significant from the point of view of the interesting methods of international co-operation developed by this Organisation.

You will remember that these methods were eloquently described by the Rapporteur to the last Assembly, the delegate of the British Empire, who pointed out that the solution of the problems dealt with by the Health Organsiation involved three stages — first, study of the problem and collection of information; second, on the basis of this information, the formation of general conclusions; and, last, the period of action: response to the application of particular Governments for advice or assistance in their peculiar problems.

1. Since the last Assembly, the Health Organisation has developed one of its most important tasks — that of giving assistance to Governments asking for advice on the methods to be employed to solve general or special administrative and medical problems in public health. You will permit me, in this connection, to mention in the first place the co-operation which has been established with the Ministry of Public Health and Physical Education in my country with a view to a survey of the health conditions of certain districts. These investigations will, I hope, lead to recommendations which should make it possible to draw up a complete public health programme for Czechoslovakia.

As an important stage in the application of the plan of sanitary re-organisation adopted by the Greek Government as a result of the request for assistance which that Government had previously addressed to the League of Nations, the School of Hygiene — an integral part of the Athens Health Centre — was opened in March 1931. Satisfactory progress is also being made as regards other parts of the programme.

In Bulgaria, the campaign against certain infectious diseases conducted in several districts in co-operation with the Health Organisation has already begun to bear fruit, thanks to the creation of suitable institutions and to the efforts made in the field of medical assistance and public health.

At the request of the Roumanian Government, the Health Organisation co-operated in organising an enquiry into the causes and prevention of infant mortality on the lines of those already carried out with such excellent results, also under the auspices of the Health Organisation, in various countries of Europe and South America. The results of the enquiry at present in progress will be put into practical application in Roumania.

An expert was appointed by the Health Organisation to take part in the work of the mission sent to Liberia by the Council, in order to study the problems raised by the request for assistance submitted to the League of Nations by the Government of that country.

As a result of the report of the representatives of the Health Organisation who were sent to Bolivia at the request of the Government of that country, the Director-General of Public Health laid before the Health Committee a programme for the re-organisation of the Bolivian health services and asked the Health Organisation to co-operate in its application. The Health Committee decided to assist the Bolivian Government in the training of a certain number of public health officers by co-operation in studies of disease conditions in certain tropical and sub-tropical regions and by advising the Government on the proposed plan of re-organisation. An expert of the Health Organisation will shortly leave for Bolivia to continue this collaboration.

The report on the enquiries into infant mortality undertaken in the Argentine Republic, Brazil, Chile and Uruguay was discussed at the Conference held at Lima in July 1930, and has been communicated to the health administrations of Latin-American countries, most of which were represented at this Conference. The results of the enquiry, which correspond to those obtained by similar enquiries in Europe, furnish valuable indications to the health administrations on the methods of combating the dangers which threaten early infancy.

The report of the Montevideo Conference held in September 1930, thanks to the generosity of the Government of Uruguay, and carried on with the assistance of the Health Organisation, also contains important conclusions on the value of the different methods for the serological diagnosis of syphilis. This information will be useful, not only to the South American authors of the diagnostic methods who took part in the practical work of the Conference, but also to all scientists working in this field. The Montevideo Conference recommended that this special serological work should be continued by all the South American countries and should be co-ordinated by the Health Organisation.

I am glad to inform the Assembly that the Brazilian Government has offered to create at Rio de Janeiro an International Centre for the study of leprosy which will be placed at the disposal of the League of Nations. The Council has accepted this offer and expressed its appreciation to Brazil for her generous action, which will be of very considerable assistance in carrying on the international studies planned by the Leprosy Commission.

The Assembly will recall the information given last year by the delegate of the British Empire regarding the progress of the work of reconstruction in China, for which the services of the Health Organisation were placed at the disposal of the Government of China.

Since that time, the assistance of other organisations of the League of Nations has been requested, and I venture to recapitulate the progress achieved in the field of hygiene. The organisation of the Central Field Health Station at Nanking to form the nucleus of the National Health Service provided for in the plan of re-organisation is being actively pursued and the station is already partly in operation. The first national hospital, also at Nanking, is already in full operation. The National Quarantine Service began to function more than a year ago in a number of ports. An expert appointed by the Health Organisation visited the Chinese medical shools and assisted the National Commission in drawing up a standard programme of teaching. His report, with the Health Committee's recommendations, which have been communicated to the Government of China, will permit of the organisation and operation of a first " model " school at Nanking.

The organisation of the campaign against cholera and smallpox in the Shanghai area is being effectively pursued. Moreover, in accordance with the usual practice, individual study grants have been awarded to the candidates for several posts in the new institutions provided for in the plan of sanitary re-organisation.

Our co-operation in the reconstruction of China, which began with health, has been extended to problems of intellectual co-operation, economics, and communications and transit.

I think I am expressing the feelings of all in voicing our admiration for the perseverance with which the Government of China, not dismayed by the disasters which have just occurred within its borders, continues to devote all its energy to the work of national reconstruction.

As the Assembly knows, the Director of the Chinese National Health Administration has requested the Health Organisation to take immediate steps to co-ordinate the action taken by the health services of China's neighbours in order to prevent the epidemics which threaten the flooded regions. We are sure that China's appeal will be favourably received, and we all hope that this action which is now in course of preparation will shortly prove its effectiveness.

The Second Committe was unanimous in approving the following proposal presented by the French delegation, and now asks that this draft resolution should be adopted by the Assembly.

" The Assembly,

" Regarding the danger of the spread of epidemics and the loss of life as a result of the terrible disaster in the Yangtse valley, both as a humanitarian problem of the first magnitude and a matter of international concern,

" Recalling the assistance rendered in similar circumstances by the Health Organisation through its Epidemic Commission in Poland and Greece in 1921 and 1923 ;

" Convinced of the need to show clearly and concretely the sympathy of humanity for the victims of this appalling catastrophe :

" Invites all the States Members and non-members of the League of Nations, and particularly those in close contact with the Far East, to respond, so far as is in their power, to any request that may be made to take all possible measures for relief in the flooded areas of China, in co-operation with the League of Nations ;

" Requests the Council to take the necessary steps to render the international co-operation effective."

The measures taken by the Governments who have asked for the Health Organisation's assistance must of course be based on technical conclusions resulting from the experience of numerous countries and constituting a survey of the present state of science and practice in public health. The new Health Committee, which met for the first time at the end of September 1930, initiated a new method of work which consists in the creation of reporting committees composed of a limited number of experts to formulate recommendations capable of being utilised, not only by such Governments, but by all administrations desirous of organising or re-organising their health services. These committees are responsible for drawing up a plan of action for the different branches of hygiene. Each subject will be dealt with in an essentially practical manner, and the plan will at the same time be capable of adjustment to the natural, social, economic, financial and technical resources of the different countries.

The recommendations contained in the reports of the Leprosy Commission drawn up at this Commission's meeting at Bangkok in December 1930 describe a series of prophylactic and curative methods of universal value, based on the principles I have just indicated and on scientific and practical experience acquired during the last thirty years. Similarly, the report on Schools of Hygiene drawn up as a result of the meetings of directors of schools of hygiene held at Paris and Dresden in 1930 provides guiding principles of this kind, of great value to Governments which, in their efforts towards reconstruction and progress, desire to train public health officials for this work.

The Assembly will certainly agree with me in expressing its appreciation of the methods which the Health Organisation has adopted in response to the desire of the last Assembly that the experience acquired by this Organisation should be placed to an increasing degree at the disposal of the States Members.

2. Among the permanent tasks of the Health Organisation, I should like, in the first place, to refer to the work which it has entrusted to its Eastern Bureau. The value of the Singapore Bureau, recognised by former Assemblies, is continuously increasing through technical improvements in the transmission of information on infectious diseases. This Bureau at present acts, not only as a centre for epidemiological intelligence, but also for co-ordinating research into problems peculiar to the countries situated within its field of action. I am sure that we all desire to see this action develop so that the Bureau may become, to an increasing extent, the general agent for the East of the health work of the League of Nations. The Epidemiological Intelligence Service of the Health Section of the League of Nations Secretariat also continues to develop the rapidity and value of its system of international notifications of epidemic diseases.

Another permanent task of the Health Organisation has been carried out through collective study tours, known as " interchanges ", which provide an effective means of exchanging knowledge acquired by various countries in health matters. Tours of this kind are at present in progress in the United States of America for the study of questions concerning the milk supply and the fumigation of ships. In this connection, may I draw your attention to the welcome offer of the French Government to establish in Paris an International School for Advanced Health Studies for the purpose of continuing and centralising, through a permanent institution open to all nations, the work already carried out in this field by the " interchanges " and by individual study scholarships?

The results of comparative studies of immunisation against diphtheria and scarlet fever undertaken in several countries were discussed at a meeting of experts (bacteriologists, clinicians and serologists) held in London this summer. This meeting adopted recommendations with regard to the best methods of vaccination and the most profitable way of applying them to combat effectively these diseases, which are a matter of concern for all health administrations. The Permanent Commission on Standardisation has again taken an important step forward. This Commission has, during the current year, adopted several new international standards for serological products and for a number of vitamins. These results are valuable, both from the scientific point of view and for the testing of the innumerable preparations on the market. The activities of this Commission furnish another striking example of the methods of international co-operation adopted by the Health Organisation. As a result of comparative studies, international standards are established and subsequently adopted by the national authorities for their own work. Studies made by the Malaria Commission in this connection have also led to the definition of a standard product of the total alkaloids of cinchona (" totaquina "), which is approximately as efficacious as quinine. The results of these studies should meet the necessity to increase the supply of the active product and help to bring about a decrease in the cost of treatment.

3. I was particularly interested in the discussions of the European Conference on Rural Hygiene, which I was able to follow personally. The report of this Conference has just been adopted by the Council (document C.473.M.202.1931.III). The preparatory work and the discussions of this Conference, which was convened by the Council on the proposal of the Spanish Government, have made it possible to compare the experience of various countries in rural hygiene, which must be regarded as one of the most important factors in the development of agricultural districts. Interdependence of economic and social questions, as well as health factors, is, in fact, particularly evident in rural districts.

I was struck by the sincere spirit of co-operation shown by all those taking part in this Conference. This spirit made it possible to adopt the recommendations unanimously, thus giving them a moral force which will be a valuable support to the action of those national or local health administrations which wish to apply them. The recommendations are, in fact, a practical guide to effective and economical rural health administration. They deal with the guiding principles and suitable methods for ensuring effective medical assistance in rural districts, the organisation of rural health services, and the improvement of health conditions in such districts. While taking account of the necessity of adapting the measures advocated to local conditions, the Conference established a certain number of minimum standards and emphasised the praiseworthy tendency towards the rationalisation of health organisation.

For the first time in a Conference of such importance, those taking part included representatives of social welfare, health insurance, agricultural associations and the medical profession, as well as agriculturists, architects, hygienists and engineers. Three large international organisations dealing with the protection of rural populations, the Health Organisation of the League of Nations, the International Labour Office and the International Institute of Agriculture, co-operated closely in the preparation and work of the Conference. The Conference was attended by eighty-six delegates and experts from twenty-five European countries, and by eight observers from non-European States ; indeed, the influence of the recommendations adopted extends far beyond Europe, and their value for overseas countries was recognised by the observers delegated by those countries.

The Conference also put forward a certain number of interesting proposals for international studies in rural hygiene. These are to deal with the programme and methods to be adopted for the technical training of health visitors and sanitary engineers, the cost of medical services and health services in certain specially selected rural districts, the quality of milk in rural districts, the campaign against flies and typhoid fever, standardisation of methods for analysing and testing drinking water and sewage. The various European schools of hygiene and similar institutions whose directors met during the Conference will carry out most of these enquiries according to a uniform plan. This work will be co-ordinated by the Health Organisation, which, for this purpose, will keep in touch with the two other international organisations above mentioned, in order to profit by their co-operation and special competence.

I have spoken at some length on the results of the European Conference on Rural Hygiene, as I was anxious to draw particular attention to them. I am sure everyone will agree with me in recognising the value of the work accomplished and will be anxious for its scope to be increased, so that the rural populations of all countries may benefit by it in the near future.

In conclusion, I have the honour to propose the following resolution :

" The Assembly,

" Having noted the reports on the work of the Health Organisation of the League of Nations since the last session :

" Recognises with satisfaction the value of the methods of international co-operation employed by this Organisation ;

" Notes with satisfaction that the experience acquired by the Health Organisation is being made available to the States Members of the League to an ever-increasing extent ;

" Expresses the hope that steps will be taken to give the widest and most rapid distribution to the information collected by the Health Organisation concerning the practical and scientific health work, carried out in the different countries, which is of international interest;

" Views with interest the work accomplished on rural hygiene, and hopes that the task undertaken in this field will be extended so that the rural populations of all countries may benefit in the near future;

" Approves the work carried out by the Health Organisation since the last session of the Assembly;

" And congratulates that Organisation on the results obtained, which give fresh proof of the concentration of its efforts on definite tasks, and the universality of its work. "

Official No.: A.73.1931.IX.

CO-OPERATION OF WOMEN AND OF THE PRESS IN THE ORGANISATION OF PEACE.

REPORT OF THE THIRD COMMITTEE TO THE ASSEMBLY.

Rapporteur: M. BUERO (Uruguay).

On September 11th, the Assembly decided to refer for examination to the Third Committee the following draft resolution submitted by the Spanish delegation concerning the co-operation of Women and the Press in the Organisation of Peace:

" The Assembly,

" Considering that the organisation of peace demands the maintenance of an international spirit freed from all prejudices and misconceptions,

" Convinced of the necessity of ensuring that the Press of all nations receives as impartial and complete information as possible,

" Requests the Council to consider the possibility of studying:

" (a) Means of associating feminine action and feminine feeling with the work of the League of Nations by an effective and direct collaboration;

" (b) Means for preventing, with the assistance of the Press, the dissemination of such false information as may hinder the maintenance of peace and goodwill among the peoples."

The Spanish delegate, M. de Madariaga, explained that the reason why paragraphs (a) and (b) had been inserted in the same draft resolution was that, in the opinion of the Spanish delegation, an effort was required to ensure that the work of maintaining peace was carried out in a good moral atmosphere, and that among the most important factors in the creation of this atmosphere were, in its view, the action of women and the action of the Press. The Committee, while agreeing with the Spanish delegation, nevertheless thought it preferable to treat these two questions separately, though it recognised that they had a common basis.

In consequence, it has prepared two distinct draft resolutions.

I.

CO-OPERATION OF WOMEN IN THE ORGANISATION OF PEACE.

The Third Committee unanimously acknowledged the results already obtained from the co-operation of women in the work of peace, whether in their individual capacities or by national and international women's organisations. During the discussions in the Third Committee due account was taken of the interest displayed by women in the work of the League and it seems advisable to see whether schemes for closer co-operation could not be examined — especially at a time when the Geneva organisation is undertaking what may be decisive work in the sphere of peace and understanding between nations.

In view of the importance of the educative and moral rôle played by women, and of their influence in the formation of public opinion, this co-operation may be of great value and produce important results.

The Committee felt that on this occasion it should not deal with the question of admitting women to positions either in the League or connected therewith, this question having already been settled by Article 7 of the Covenant. Nor did the Committee intend to raise the question of the composition of delegations taking part in the various conferences and committees of the League of Nations, as this was a question within the competence of each individual Government.

It was only concerned now with their unofficial co-operation in the organisation of peace and the maintenance of good understanding between nations. It would be for the Council to examine the means whereby such co-operation could be promoted and intensified.

With these considerations in mind the Third Committee submits the following draft resolution for the approval of the Assembly:

"The Assembly,

"Convinced of the great value of the contribution of women to the work of peace and the good understanding between the nations, which is the principal aim of the League of Nations,

"Requests the Council to examine the possibility of women co-operating more fully in the work of the League."

II.

Co-operation of the Press in the Organisation of Peace.

During the session of the Special Committee appointed to frame a Draft General Convention to Improve the Means of Preventing War, the Swedish Government submitted the following proposal:

"The High Contracting Parties undertake to endeavour, so far as their national laws permit, to suppress all verbal or written propaganda designed to prevent a peaceful settlement of the crisis."

On the other hand, the Polish Delegation submitted the following recommendation:

"The Special Committee,

"Being aware of the danger which, in the event of an international crisis, may arise from irresponsible Press campaigns and publicity given in the Press to inaccurate or tendencious information;

"Recognising that aggressive propaganda against a foreign Power may in certain circumstances constitute a veritable threat to the peace of the world;

"Requests the Assembly to consider this problem and examine the possibilities of finding a solution."

The Committee decided to lay this question before the Assembly.

The proposal of the Spanish delegation is largely based upon the same considerations as those of the Swedish and Polish delegations.

The Third Committee was unanimous in recognising that the Press could have a great influence on the relations between the peoples, and that it is in the interests of peace that the Press should receive and spread as correct and impartial information as possible.

This question presents only one aspect, although a very important one, of the general problem of moral disarmament. The Third Committee was not asked to give its opinion on the other aspects of this problem, which is dealt with in detail in a memorandum drawn up by the Polish Government for the use of the delegations to the Disarmament Conference.

The Third Committee did not feel that it could make any positive suggestion regarding the method of studying the difficult problem of the spread of false news. It confines itself to proposing that the Assembly should bring this problem to the notice of the Council, as its importance increases pari passu with the increasing interest in international relations shown by the Press. It is for the Council, if it thinks fit, to examine with the help of experts the best way of approaching this question.

The Third Committee noted with the greatest satisfaction the delegate of Denmark's statement to the Committee that his Government would welcome to Copenhagen the heads of official Press bureaux and thus give them an opportunity of discussing means of establishing regular unison between them which might to some extent promote the objects referred to in the Spanish resolution.

The Third Committee considers that the examination of this problem should not be confined to a meeting of representatives of official Press bureaux. It should be supplemented by a consultation of those newspaper groups which could give valuable advice on the subject.

The Third Committee submits the following draft resolution to the Assembly:

"The Assembly,

"Considering that the organisation of peace demands an international spirit freed from all prejudices and misconceptions,

"Convinced of the necessity of ensuring that Press information shall be as impartial and complete as possible,

"Requests the Council to consider the possibility of studying, with the help of the Press, the difficult problem of the spread of false information which may threaten to disturb the peace or the good understanding between nations."

COMMUNICATIONS OF IMPORTANCE TO THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS AT TIMES OF EMERGENCY.

REPORT OF THE THIRD COMMITTEE TO THE ASSEMBLY.

Rapporteur: M. BUERO (Uruguay).

I. FACILITIES TO BE GRANTED TO AIRCRAFT.

At its eleventh session the Assembly adopted a resolution concerning the regime applicable to aircraft engaged in transport of importance to the working of the League at times of emergency. The resolution provided, on the one hand, that negotiations should be undertaken by the Secretary-General and the Governments concerned, with a view to the application of the rules laid down by the Assembly, and, on the other hand, that the Council should decide on certain measures of detail relating to the identification of aircraft used in the service of the League.

The Third Committee has noted with satisfaction that the replies received from the Governments and the information communicated by the Secretariat indicate that the regime desired by the Assembly could be applied immediately in the event of a situation necessitating emergency communications with the League. Some States have not yet replied to the Secretary-General's request, but there is no reason to suppose that they would raise difficulties. With respect to the identification of aircraft engaged in such duties, the Council has adopted a proposal submitted to it by the Advisory and Technical Committee for Communications and Transit, which was drawn up after consultation with the International Commission for Air Navigation. The resolution adopted by the Council applies only to aircraft possessing a nationality. It was not considered fit to raise at this time the question of aircraft belonging to the League of Nations.

II. FACILITIES TO BE GRANTED TO MOTOR TRANSPORT.

At its eleventh session the Assembly also adopted a resolution concerning the regime applicable to motor vehicles effecting transport of importance to the working of the League at times of emergency. The resolution provided that the matter should be generally governed in the same manner as that concerning aircraft. The Third Committee notes with satisfaction that the regime applicable to motor transport, as desired by the eleventh Assembly, could be put into operation immediately.

III. CONSTRUCTION OF A LEAGUE WIRELESS STATION.

The Third Committee has noted that in view of the work being carried on under contracts with various companies, the wireless station is expected to be in operation at the latest by the beginning of 1932. It believes that the Assembly will appreciate the progress achieved in this direction.

IV. LAYOUT OF AN AERODROME NEAR THE SEAT OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

A technical report (see document A.21.1931.VIII), prepared by a committee of experts appointed by the Chairman of the Advisory and Technical Committee for Communications and Transit, concerning the layout of an aerodrome near the seat of the League which would be of service to the League at times of emergency, has been submitted to the present session of the Assembly. While the technical examination of the question appears to be concluded, it would seem that some non-technical questions between the Swiss Federal Government and the Secretariat of the League have not yet been settled. In these circumstances the Third Committee considered that the discussion of this question should be postponed until the next session of the Assembly, in order that the Assembly might be in possession of all the information required for its decision.

APPOINTMENT OF A SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO STUDY THE EXISTING SYSTEM OF ELECTIONS TO THE COUNCIL.

REPORT OF THE FIRST COMMITTEE TO THE ASSEMBLY.

Rapporteur : Viscount CECIL OF CHELWOOD (British Empire).

The First Committee recommends that the Assembly should adopt the draft resolution on the above subject submitted to the Assembly by the delegation of the British Empire, which was in the following terms :

> " The Assembly requests the Council to appoint a special committee to study the existing system of elections to the Council and to report to a future session of the Assembly on any reforms which may appear desirable. "

It is understood that the Minutes of the discussion of the question in the First Committee will be at the disposal of the Council and of the committee which the Council will be invited to establish.

AMENDMENT OF THE COVENANT OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS IN ORDER TO BRING IT INTO HARMONY WITH THE PACT OF PARIS.

REPORT OF THE FIRST COMMITTEE TO THE ASSEMBLY.

Rapporteur : M. Henri ROLIN (Belgium).

1. Both the written observations submitted by various Governments since the last session of the Assembly and the recent discussions in the First Committee seem to show that most of the Members of the League of Nations attach the highest importance to the continuance of the task that has been undertaken.

The importance and the legal effect of the Pact of Paris are not, of course, in question ; but the prevailing opinion is that it would be undesirable to maintain in the text of the League Covenant possibilities of a lawful recourse to war which have been virtually abolished and to fail to adapt the operation of the organisation set up by them to safeguard peace to the new engagements assumed by the Members of the League of Nations.

Even those Governments which had expressed the view that the work of adjustment decided upon by the Assembly in 1929 was not indispensable have in a spirit of conciliation declared that they accept in principle the idea underlying that work.

2. During the previous discussions, the fear had been occasionally expressed that certain difficulties might result from the fact that some Members of the League had not acceded to the Pact of Paris and that some States signatory of that treaty were not Members of the League of Nations. At the present time, it would seem that the League need have no further apprehensions on either point. On the one hand, some Members of the League which had not acceded to the Pact of Paris have either sent or announced their accession since last year ; in any case, no objection is made against the continuation of the work of amendment of the Covenant of the League of Nations. As regards States signatory of the Pact of Paris which are not Members of the League, obviously no decision can be taken in their absence as to the scope they should give to their obligations ; but the task undertaken by the League has the same end in view as the Pact of Paris and reinforces the authority of the principle formulated therein.

It should, however, be emphasised that the task undertaken by the League of Nations in the matter is legally independent of the Pact of Paris, although influenced by that instrument ; its object is to insert the principle of the prohibition of war in the Covenant of the League of Nations.

3. The First Committee successively re-examined the three fundamental aspects of the proposed amendment:

(1) Prohibition of recourse to war;

(2) Organisation of pacific methods of settling disputes;

(3) Extension of the Council's mission of maintaining and restoring peace.

PROHIBITION OF RECOURSE TO WAR.

4. No objection in principle is now made against the idea of formulating in a single article of the Covenant — namely, Article 12 — and in the simplest terms, the prohibition of recourse to war.

The prevailing opinion is that the insertion of this prohibition does not require the insertion of any further elaboration or reservations in the text of the Covenant, since the questions raised on this point in the course of the discussion arise and are equally material under the existing text of the Covenant, so that its amendment does not make it more necessary to solve them explicitly.

It would seem, moreover, that, even now, an answer can be given to most of the questions which will be satisfactory and acceptable to all the Members of the League.

5. One point appears beyond dispute — namely, that neither in the amendment prepared by the Sub-Committee last year, nor in the amendment of the Committee of Eleven, nor in the Pact of Paris, nor in the Covenant of the League in its present form, does the prohibition of recourse to war exclude the right of self-defence.

As has been already pointed out by the Italian Government in its letter of April 16th, 1931:

> " . . . It is not in the least necessary to include in the amendments a clause relating to self-defence, since it is obvious that a State which had disregarded the clause forbidding war could not demand that a State attacked by it should observe that clause. "

6. On the other hand, in the present state of the law, the satisfactory enumeration of the distinctive characteristics either of aggression or of legitimate self-defence appears difficult and even impossible.

After examining a cognate question, the Third Committee felt it desirable to refer on this point to certain explanations contained in M. de Brouckère's report submitted in 1926 to the Council.[1] The First Committee refers to the same statement as showing how difficult to define exactly in advance and how full of fine shades of meaning the notion of legitimate self-defence is.

7. An essential point to note is that the use which a State claims to make of the right of self-defence is a matter which may be considered by the other States concerned and, in the case of Members of the League of Nations, is subject to the appreciation of the Council, particularly when there may be a question of applying Article 16.

8. Obviously, in judging the facts which are placed before it, the Council will have to be guided, not only by the general principles of law, but also by any special engagements for preventing war which have previously been undertaken by the parties to the dispute and been recognised as conducing to the maintenance of peace. Thus, the Members of the League of Nations have frequently and unanimously recognised as conducing to the maintenance of peace, under Article 21 of the Covenant, agreements such as the Rhineland Pact; the general adoption of such agreements was recommended by the Assembly's resolution of September 25th, 1926; and, further, on the initiative of Germany, a convention has just been drawn up the object of which is to facilitate action by the Council to prevent war.

9. These considerations and the interpretation of the obligations prescribed in Articles 10, 11 and 16 of the Covenant lead to the conclusion that assistance given spontaneously by a Member of the League to another Member, which has been the victim of a flagrant

[1] See document A.14.1927.V, page 69. M. de Brouckère said:

" Every act of violence does not necessarily justify its victim in resorting to war. If a detachment of soldiers goes a few yards over the frontier in a colony remote from any vital centre; if the circumstances show quite clearly that the aggression was due to an error on the part of some subaltern officer; if the central authorities of the 'aggressor State' reprimand the subordinate concerned as soon as they are apprised of the facts; if they cause the invasion to cease, offer apologies and compensation and take steps to prevent any recurrence of such incidents — then it cannot be maintained that there has been an act of war and that the invaded country has reasonable grounds for mobilising its army and marching upon the enemy capital. The accident which has occurred has in no way released that country from the specific obligations laid down in Articles 12 and following. It could not be so released unless it were the victim of a flagrant aggression of such a serious character that it would obviously be dangerous not to retaliate at once. In short, to borrow the felicitous phrase used in the Treaty of Locarno, 'the country in question must be exercising the right of legitimate defence'.

" Legitimate defence implies the adoption of measures proportionate to the seriousness of the attack and justified by the imminence of the danger. If a country flagrantly exceeded these limits, even if it were affronted by some incident of little intrinsic importance, it would become in actual fact the real aggressor and it would be only fair that that country should be made the object of the sanctions provided for in Article 16. " aggression, would not constitute a violation of the prohibition of recourse to war. Interventions of this kind would, however, in their turn be subject to the appreciation of their character by other Members of the League and by the Council, and to the opinion of the latter the State which had intervened would be obliged to conform.

10. On the other hand, it must be admitted that the proposed amendment of the Covenant, whether it is adopted in the form suggested by the Committee of Eleven or in that drawn up by the Sub-Committee, would deprive the Members of the League of the right to resort to war in execution of an arbitral award or a unanimous decision of the Council. Such action is obviously quite distinct from the conception of the right of self-defence. It is for the Council to assure the execution of arbitral awards. If it prescribed military measures, the latter would lose their character of recourse to war and would assume a character of social defence in perfect harmony with the principles adopted. This constitutional duty of the Council is, no doubt, particularly imperative under the Covenant as amended, since it is the counterpart to the relinquishment of the individual right of execution.

11. The Committee noted the desire of the Chinese Government to meet the dangers resulting from a country creating what is, in fact, a state of war, while not officially recognising that a war exists. The Committee did not feel it should for the moment enter upon a discussion of this question.

12. The Finnish Government proposed an amendment the object of which was to keep the first sentence of Article 12 in the form in which it is in the present text of the Covenant, on the ground that the provisions of the Covenant should not be changed except so far as is absolutely necessary. Although, however, the Finnish proposal indicates in the second sentence that pacific measures are in general lawful, the Committee felt that the text proposed might be open to the interpretation that acts of retorsion or pacific reprisals which have no aggressive character were prevented and this is a question with which the Committee is not on the present occasion concerned.

The Governments of the Irish Free State and Estonia proposed an amendment suppressing the words " likely to lead to a rupture " which follow the word " dispute " in Articles 12 and 15 of the Covenant. This amendment was felt to raise a question which was independent of the problem of amending the Covenant so as to insert in it a prohibition of recourse to war.

The Governments of Finland, Portugal, the United Kingdom and New Zealand proposed various changes in the text of the contemplated amendment to Article 12.

The First Committee notes that they either deal with points of detail or with the structure of the texts in question and that, accordingly, their discussion should be reserved for a later stage.

Pacific Settlement of Disputes.

13. The present text of the Covenant recognises the binding and executory character of arbitral awards on judicial decisions. Where, however, a case is submitted to the Council, a unanimous recommendation alone has some legal consequences, since it is forbidden to resort to war against the party which conforms to it. The mere extension of the prohibition of recourse to war would by itself give the same force to majority decisions of the Council and thus eliminate all distinction between unanimous decisions and majority decisions. In neither case would such decisions possess an obligatory or executory character.

14. It should be emphasised in the first place that this defect has now been removed in the case of disputes between States both of which have acceded to the General Act of Arbitration, without any restriction or reservation affecting the third part of the Act, or which have concluded bilateral agreements having a similar effect. If the dispute occurs between two States which are bound to submit it to arbitration, its peaceful settlement is already ensured by the operation of the existing provisions of the Covenant.

But while we may congratulate ourselves upon the growing number of accessions to the General Act of Arbitration, it would, in the opinion of the very great majority of the Committee, be premature to seek at present to embody in the Covenant of the League, by means of an amendment, the rigid principle of obligation to resort to arbitration or judicial settlement for all disputes.

15. In view of this situation, a certain number of States have taken the view that, in accordance with the proposals made by the Committee of Eleven, it is desirable at least to provide in the Covenant that Members of the League must carry out in good faith the unanimous recommendations of the Council, and to entrust to the latter the duty of proposing suitable measures to ensure that its unanimous recommendations should be carried into effect.

To justify this extension of the effect of unanimous recommendations, it was proposed to provide that the Council might, by a majority vote, ask the Court for an advisory opinion on points of law relevant to the dispute. Further, with regard to Council reports adopted by a majority, it was contemplated that the Council should recommend to the parties the most appropriate new procedure.

The discussions in the Committee confirmed the opinion already expressed by last year's Sub-Committee that an amendment of this character would not secure the necessary ratifications.

16. The texts of the amendments to Article 15 proposed by last year's Sub-Committee must be admitted to be capable of improvement, seeing that, in paragraph 6, it is provided that the Council shall recommend the parties to comply with the conclusions of a unanimous report, and this is, after all, as is pointed out in the observations of the Government of Finland, no more than a repetition of what is already to be found in paragraph 4 of the present Article 15. It must be recognised, however, that the undertaking the other Members of the League are asked to give — namely, that they will in no way support the parties who do not comply with unanimous recommendations — does strengthen to some extent the provisions of the Covenant. In short, such a provision would have the effect of tacitly establishing for the Members of the League a kind of moral obligation to comply with the unanimous recommendations of the Council — a moral obligation whose only sanction would be the duty of the other Members of the League to refrain from action if the State in question were subjected to certain forms of peaceful pressure by the other party.

The Committee is of opinion that it would in any case be necessary to lay some stress upon the exact scope of the proposed amendment by replacing the word "recommande", by the somewhat stronger word "invitera", the equivalent of which is already employed in the English text.

In the course of the discussion, the Finnish delegation submitted an interesting suggestion which somewhat modifies the text already put forward in the Finnish Government's observations. The Finnish delegation proposes to say:

> "If the report of the Council is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof, other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the party which complies with the recommendations of the report may base its claim thereon, the solution recommended by the Council being incapable of being put in question except as the result of an arbitral or judicial decision. The Members of the League undertake in no way to support any party in refusal to comply with the recommendations of a report which has been unanimously accepted."

On examination, however, it was felt that the legal effect of such a text was too uncertain and that it would require further examination.

17. As regards the hypothesis of the Council being divided, the Finnish delegation asks that the amended Covenant should make it clearer than the present one does that, in that event, the Council's deliberations, in conformity with Article 4, would have the same object as in cases where it is unanimous — namely, to bring about a solution of the dispute in the form of a recommendation.

The Finnish delegation accordingly proposes the following text:

> "If the Council has failed to reach unanimity as defined in the previous paragraph and if the parties do not accept the recommendations made by the majority, the Council shall officially and by a majority vote suggest the best procedure to be followed in the circumstances and shall recommend it to the parties."

The Committee decided that the foregoing proposal might usefully be accepted as a basis for subsequent discussion.

Extension of the Pacificatory Action of the Council.

18. The question which arises is whether, when the prohibition of recourse to war becomes general, it will be necessary to limit the individual obligations of the Members of the League regarding participation in sanctions.

The Governments which have pronounced for the affirmative answer have contended:

> (1) That the desire to effect an extension of sanctions corresponding to the extension of the prohibitions of resort to war contained in the Covenant arose from pushing too far the analogy with the conception of crime and punishment in municipal law;
> (2) That the operation of the system of sanctions presumed that the aggressor had been determined, that the Covenant itself gave no indications on this subject, and ha strong differences of opinion might in fact arise in the Council which would render the application of sanctions impossible or ineffective;
> (3) That the only practical way of improving the application of the system of sanctions consisted in adopting provisions analogous to the draft Convention for the development of methods for preventing war, under which the collective action would be started, not as the result of answering the difficult question as to who had violated the Covenant, but owing to the refusal of a party to comply with recommendations of the Council for the withdrawal of armed forces behind a determined line or the cessation of hostilities.

The Governments holding this opinion have expressed the desire that, at any rate, cases in which the Council was divided on the question as to who was the aggressor, or as to the interim measures of protection which should be recommended to the parties in order to prevent or suspend hostilities, should be excluded from the contemplated extension of sanctions. In those various cases, they considered that the material or moral difficulties in the way of carrying out obligations of mutual assistance would be too great for it to be possible to claim execution of such obligations.

As in the discussions of previous years, however, the opinion has prevailed in the Committee that any distinction of this kind ought to be rejected. It seems, nevertheless, that the discussion has made it possible to remove certain misconceptions on the subject.

19. In the first place, it has been recognised that those who held the above opinion were right in rejecting any too narrow conception of the problem of sanctions. The primary purpose of the Council's action is to prevent or stop hostilities and effect a pacification before it enquires into questions of responsibility and ensures the settlement of the dispute.

It is equally true that the obligations assumed by the Members of the League of Nations for the purpose of maintaining peace, although they rest upon each Member individually, imply a certain agreement among them, a co-operation in common action. If the Members of the League found themselves deeply divided in the views which they took of a particular situation, common action would no doubt in fact be suspended; but it would be for the Council to re-establish unanimity by adopting interim measures of protection such as are contemplated in the draft Convention on the Means for preventing War. If the continuance of too numerous divergences of view created a situation altogether different from that which Members of the League must be deemed to have contemplated, it would be impossible to expect that the Members of the League would carry out obligations undertaken on an entirely different basis. In such a case, it makes little difference whether the original dispute was submitted to the Council of the League of Nations or to arbitration.

On the other hand, it seems impossible to claim that Members of the League of Nations which considered that it was clear who was the aggressor, and that common action was possible, should abstain from carrying out the obligations which rest upon them individually under the first paragraph of Article 16 of the Covenant for the sole reason that formal unanimity had not been obtained in the Council.

Accordingly, a reasonable interpretation of our charter of association seems to answer the fears which have been expressed. These fears, moreover, appear exaggerated and it would be wrong to weaken confidence in the wisdom of the Council's action and in the good faith which the generality of the Members of the League would show in carrying out their obligations.

20. Further, if the proposed exceptions were examined in the light of the existing Covenant, it would be seen that their effect would be to diminish appreciably the guarantees which the Covenant already affords. The obligations of the individual Members of the League under Article 16 of the existing text of the Covenant are not subject to the condition that the Council must have taken a decision as to who is the aggressor.

21. To make such a distinction would from the moral point of view have the disadvantage of making recourse to war, which would in general be forbidden under the Covenant as amended, appear in some cases not to be subject to sanctions.

22. It must, however, be recognised that the principal difficulty in the task of amendment which has been undertaken, and the only serious obstacle to its success, still lies in the hesitation of certain Members of the League to agree to an extension of their existing obligations to give assistance, even if such extension is only theoretical.

It may be hoped that agreement would be greatly facilitated by the entry into force of a general Convention for the reduction of armaments. Certain Members of the League, for example, had announced their intention of making their ratification of the amendment of the Covenant conditional on the entry into force of the Convention for the Reduction of Armaments. Other Governments have expressed, as the date of the Conference draws near, preoccupations which would appear to be satisfied to some extent by the adoption of the proposed amendment.

Thus, on the eve of the Conference, the link between the two undertakings has been further strengthened. Certain States have expressed a desire to know, before giving an opinion on the amendment of the Covenant, to what extent and for how long the Convention for the reduction of armaments will satisfy the requirements of Article 8 of the Covenant.

Such being the case, it would be inexpedient to attempt at present to frame final texts. The most suitable method would appear to be for the Assembly to set up a committee for the amendment of the Covenant, consisting of representatives of the Members of the League, in order that they may, during the Conference for the Reduction of Armaments, endeavour to arrive at unanimous agreement on the bases set forth in the present report. The amendments might then be finally voted during the next session of the Assembly.

Draft Resolution.

"The Assembly,

"Taking note of the report approved by the First Committee:

" Reaffirms its intention of continuing the task of inserting in the Covenant of the League of Nations a general prohibition of recourse to war and the principle that the settlement of international disputes may only be sought by pacific methods ;

" Decides to create a committee consisting of representatives of all the Members of the League of Nations, which may meet during the Conference for the Reduction of Armaments for the purpose of seeking unanimous agreement on the bases indicated in the report and of drawing up a final text which may be voted by the Assembly at its next session ;

" Requests the Council to convene the Committee for the date which it considers appropriate ;

" Requests the Secretary-General to transmit the present resolution and the report to the Members of the League of Nations, in order that, if they consider it necessary, they may send to the Council their views as to the lines on which they think agreement could be attained."

SLAVERY.

REPORT OF THE SIXTH COMMITTEE TO THE ASSEMBLY.

Rapporteur : Jonkheer J. LOUDON (Netherlands).

The British delegation proposed that the Sixth Committee should recommend the Assembly to adopt a resolution to reappoint the Temporary Commission on Slavery which sat in 1924 and 1925. This Commission would have been instructed to examine the material on slavery collected since the publication of the report of the Temporary Commission in 1925, and to recommend to the next Assembly the measures of assistance which the League of Nations could render to those countries which have agreed to abolish slavery.

The British proposal was discussed at the plenary meetings of the Sixth Committee on September 16th and 17th. While the delegations of Hungary, India, Liberia, New Zealand, South Africa and Switzerland, expressing the opinion of the majority of the Committee, unreservedly supported the proposal, other delegations made certain observations thereon. The question was then referred to a Sub-Committee composed of the representatives of Abyssinia, Belgium, the British Empire, Denmark, France, India, Italy, Liberia, the Netherlands, Portugal and Spain. This Sub-Committee met in the afternoon of September 17th under the chairmanship of the Netherlands delegate. The proposal of the British delegation was supported in the Sub-Committee by the representatives of Denmark, India, Liberia and Spain. The representative of the Netherlands submitted another draft resolution which might be described as an amendment to the British proposal. These two texts gave rise to an exchange of views. Certain doubts were expressed as to the expediency of reappointing the Temporary Commission on Slavery, as to its practical value and as to its correctness from a legal point of view. After this exchange of views, the Sub-Committee unanimously agreed on a draftr esolution which it proposed that the Sixth Committee should recommend the Assembly to adopt.

The Sixth Committee approved the Sub-Committee's report and the draft resolution submitted to it. The Committee therefore has the honour to recommend that the Assembly adopt the following resolution :

" The Assembly,

" Requests the Council to appoint for one year a small Committee of experts to examine the material upon slavery which has been supplied or transmitted by Governments since the signature of the Convention of 1926. This Committee will submit to the Council suggestions with a view to recommending to the next Assembly the measures of assistance which the League of Nations could render to those countries which have agreed to abolish slavery and which request such assistance. PREPARATORY PROCEDURE TO BE FOLLOWED IN THE CASE OF GENERAL CONVENTIONS TO BE NEGOTIATED UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

REPORT OF THE FIRST COMMITTEE TO THE ASSEMBLY.

Rapporteur: M. GIANNINI (Italy).

The First Committee has re-examined Part IV of Resolution No. 1 adopted by the Assembly on October 3rd, 1930, on the question of ratification of conventions concluded under the auspices of the League of Nations, as was contemplated by the last paragraph of this part of the resolution. It has taken account of the observations submitted by the Governments and by the technical organisations of the League of Nations. It felt it should also examine what changes would be required in the text in order to bring it into conformity, as far as possible, with the procedure proposed for the codification of international law.

As the result of this examination, the First Committee proposes that the Assembly adopt the amended text set out below, which will be substituted for the text adopted in 1930:

"That, in the case of all general conventions to be negotiated under the auspices of the League of Nations, the following preparatory procedure should, in principle, be followed, except in the cases where previous conventions or arrangements have established a special procedure or where, owing to the nature of the questions to be treated or to special circumstances, the Assembly of the Council consider other methods to be more appropriate:

"1. Where an organ of the League of Nations recommends the conclusion of a general convention on any matter, it shall prepare a memorandum explaining the objects which it is desired to achieve by the conclusion of the convention and the benefits which result therefrom. Such memorandum shall be submitted to the Council of the League of Nations.

"2. If the Council approves the proposal in principle, a first draft convention shall be prepared and communicated, together with the explanatory memorandum to Governments, with the request that, if they feel that the draft should be taken into consideration, they shall inform the Secretary-General of their views, both with regard to the main objects or the suggested means of attaining them, and also with regard to the draft convention. In some cases, it may be desirable to annex a specific questionnaire.

"3. The draft convention and the observations of Governments (together with the answers to the questionnaire, if any) shall be communicated to the Assembly, and the Assembly shall then decide whether the subject appears prima facie suitable for the conclusion of a convention.

"4. If the Assembly considers the subject prima facie suitable for the conclusion of a convention, the Council shall arrange for the preparation of a draft convention in the light of the replies received from Governments, and the new draft convention (together with the replies of other Governments) shall be transmitted to each Government with a request for their opinion on the provisions of the draft and any observations on the above-mentioned replies of the other Governments.

"5. In the light of the results of this second consultation of the Governments, the Assembly shall decide whether a convention should be concluded and, if so, whether the draft should be submitted to a conference, the date of which it will request the Council to fix.

"6. The Council, in fixing the date for the convocation of a conference, shall endeavour, as far as possible, to avoid two League of Nations conferences being held simultaneously, and to ensure the lapse of a reasonable interval between two conferences.

"7. The procedure set out in the preceding paragraphs will be followed, as far as possible, in the case of draft conventions the desirability of which is recognised by a decision of the Assembly either on its own initiative or as the result of a proposal by a Government. In these cases, the Council will instruct either the Secretariat of some other organ of the League or specially selected experts to prepare the above-mentioned report, which shall subsequently be submitted to the Council."

RUSSIAN, ARMENIAN, ASSYRIAN, ASSYRO-CHALDEAN AND TURKISH REFUGEES.

REPORT OF THE SIXTH COMMITTEE TO THE ASSEMBLY.

Rapporteur: M. Constantin FOTITCH (Yugoslavia).

The Sixth Committee had under consideration the report of the Governing Body of the Nansen International Office for Refugees, prepared in conformity with the resolution of the eleventh session of the Assembly, and the report of the Inter-Governmental Advisory Commission for Refugees on the work of its fourth session. The Committee also had the great advantage of a detailed statement on the refugee work and on the work of the Office made by Dr. Max Huber, the President of the Governing Body of the Office.

The Committee expresses its gratitude to Dr. Max Huber for having agreed to act as President of the Governing Body of the Office and for the devoted efforts he has applied to his difficult task; to the Governing Body of the Office and to the Inter-Governmental Advisory Commission for Refugees.

The Committee was gratified to learn from the report of the Governing Body of the Office and from the supplementary statement made by Dr. Max Huber that, in drawing up the plan of liquidation proposed in the report of the Office, the Governing Body had endeavoured to give the maximum possible effect to the suggestion made by the Supervisory Commission that the budget of the Office should be reduced approximately by 10 per cent per annum. The Committee noted that the Governing Body of the Office had taken as a basis for its plan of liquidation the total budget which the League would have been called upon to grant in the event of the budget of the Office being reduced by annual decreases of 10 per cent up to the end of the year 1939. The total cost of the plan of liquidation proposed by the Office does not exceed the sum thus contemplated, but, to achieve that result, the Governing Body has been obliged to propose the termination of the existence of the Office at the end of 1938 instead of on December 31st, 1939, as requested by the eleventh Assembly. In conformity with the recommendation made by the Inter-Governmental Advisory Commission at its first session in 1929, the Office proposes that budgetary reductions should be accentuated during the last five years of its existence and thus enable it during the early period of its work to exert its maximum efforts and accelerate the liquidation of the material side of the refugee problem. Taking into consideration the precarious situation of the refugees, owing to the existing economic conditions, the Committee considers that the proposals of the Office are sound and reasonable.

The liquidation of the Office raises the question of the staff actually employed by the Office. In order to facilitate the liquidation of this staff and to save the payment of any indemnities which that liquidation might involve, the Committee ventures to recommend the Secretary-General of the League and the Director of the International Labour Office to give, as far as possible, preference to the members of the staff of the Office when vacancies occur in their respective organisations.

The President of the Governing Body of the Office reminded the Committee of the resolution adopted by the tenth Assembly to the effect that the High Commissioner for Refugees should continue to keep in touch with the movement for the transfer of Armenian refugees to the Armenian (Erivan) Republic and to acquaint the Council if and when the High Commission's co-operation might appear to be opportune. The President of the Governing Body informed the Committee that he had been approached recently by representative and responsible Armenian organisations with the request to facilitate the transfer of some thousands of refugees from Bulgaria and Greece to the Armenian Republic where provision had been made for their settlement. The Committee feels confident that the Office will examine with the greatest attention and interest the opportunities for the settlement of such an important number of refugees, and requests it to obtain and afford all possible facilities for the transfer of those refugees if it is satisfied that such transfer is in their best interests.

The Committee learned with satisfaction of the progress made towards the solution of the problem of the Armenian refugees in Syria, and noted that, of the 40,000 refugees who were in the refugee camps at Aleppo, Alexandretta and Beirut when the co-operation of the High Commission for Refugees was invited at the end of 1926, 25,000 had been settled. There now remain only 15,000, and steps are contemplated by the Office to ensure their transfer from the refugee camps and their settlement under satisfactory conditions before the end of 1933.

The Committee noted that the report of the Governing Body of the Office, which was prepared after the Office had been in existence for only three months, was necessarily devoted largely to the preparation of a liquidation plan in conformity with the express request of the eleventh Assembly, and to the measures taken for the organisation of the Office. The Committee learned with satisfaction, however, that future reports would deal fully with the various aspects of the refugee problems and with the steps taken and proposed by the Office for their solution, more especially as such information would be very useful to philanthropic organisations in connection with their appeals for funds for relief of the refugees.

Owing to the prevailing economic depression and to the reorganisation of the refugee work, the work of the Office has naturally, during the first months of its existence, been somewhat handicapped. Nevertheless, considerable assistance has been afforded to individual refugees and small groups, to help them to accept employment in various countries, and the Office, within the limits of its exiguous resources, has made grants to refugee organisations to enable them to continue their relief work in favour of the refugees. In this way, it has prevented the closing down of certain organisations whose work for the refugees is extremely useful.

The Committee listened with interest to a statement made by the Chinese delegate concerning the very difficult situation of about 100,000 Russian refugees in China, and particularly of about 2,000 Russian refugees of German origin who are at present in Harbin. The Committee supported the request made by the Chinese delegate that the Office should examine the possibility of securing the transfer of those refugees to other countries.

The Committee noted that the funds at the disposal of the Office for its manifold activities in favour of the refugees were at present altogether inadequate. The only revenue at the disposal of the Office for its relief work is that derived from the issue of the Nansen stamp. The revenue from that source amounts at present to a little more than 100,000 Swiss francs per annum and is derived from about 30 per cent of the total number of refugees. If the Governments of the countries offering hospitality to the remaining 70 per cent of the refugees could find it possible to enforce the Nansen stamp system, there is every reason to believe that the revenue from that source would reach at least 300,000 Swiss francs per annum. The Committee therefore urges the interested Governments to consider the possibility of enforcing in their countries the Nansen stamp system.

The Committee learned with very great satisfaction of the efforts made by the signatories to the Nansen memorial appeal to obtain funds for the Office; of the promise to transfer to the Office the balance — approximately 350,000 Swiss francs — of the relief fund administered by Dr. Alexander Nansen on behalf of the late Dr. Nansen; and of the success obtained by the national committees for the appeal formed in Denmark and Great Britain, which had both obtained contributions of 100,000 Swiss francs to the Nansen Memorial Fund. The Committee ventures to recommend that the work of the Office in raising additional funds should be facilitated by the creation in other countries — especially in those which were not already incurring heavy expenditure in favour of the refugees — of national committees for the Nansen Memorial Fund similar to those in Denmark and Great Britain.

The Committee had under consideration the statement of the Inter-Governmental Advisory Commission for refugees concerning the preparation of a Convention to ensure the protection of the refugees on the liquidation of the Office. As this question is of interest both to the Office and to the Inter-Governmental Advisory Commission, the Committee recommends that those two organisations should examine the advisability of preparing such a Convention.

With reference to the recommendation contained in the report of the Inter-Governmental Advisory Commission that a Belgian delegate should be included among its members, the Committee was very glad to learn that the Belgian Government acquiesced in that view. The Committee therefore recommended that the Belgian Government should be invited to nominate a delegate to the Inter-Governmental Advisory Commission. The Committee also took note of various recommendations in the report of the Inter-Governmental Advisory Commission concerning the definition of the term "refugee"; the validity of the Nansen certificate, the return clause in that certificate, the issue of visas, the renewal and extension of the Nansen certificate, and the expulsion and refusal of entry of refugees. The Committee feels sure that the Assembly will agree that a request should be made to the Council to communicate to the various Governments the recommendations mentioned in the report of the inter-Governmental Advisory Commission.

The Committee ventures to submit, for the approval of the Assembly, the following resolutions :

" The Assembly,

" Recognises the endeavours made by the Governing Body of the Office to comply with the request of the eleventh Assembly to prepare a plan for the liquidation of the Office before the end of 1939, and notes that it has prepared a scheme which gives effect to the suggestion made by the Supervisory Commission that the budget of the Office should be reduced by approximately 10 per cent per annum ;

" Recommends the adoption of the plan of liquidation proposed by the Governing Body and of the Rules of Procedure and Financial and Staff Regulations of the Office.

" With a view to facilitate the liquidation by the Office of its Staff :

" Invites the Secretary-General of the League and the Director of the International Labour Office to accord, as far as possible, a preference to that Staff when vacancies occur in their respective organisations.

" Requests the Governing Body of the Office, in its future reports to the Assembly, to give full information concerning the various aspects of the refugee problems and the measures taken and contemplated by the Office for their solution.

" Having noted proposals made for the transfer to the Armenian (Erivan) Republic of some thousands of Armenian refugees, and bearing in mind the resolution on this subject adopted by the tenth Assembly :

" Invites the Office to examine carefully the possibility of 'facilitating the tranfer of such of those refugees who desire to proceed to the Armenian (Erivan) Republic, if it is satisfied that such transfer is in the best interests of the refugees.

" Requests the Office to devote particular attention to the precarious situation of more than 100,000 Russian refugees in China, with a view to their settlement in employment in other countries.

" Urges the interested Governments which have not already done so to put into full application the Nansen Stamp System ;

" Invites the Governments to encourage and facilitate the creation in their territories of National Committees for the Nansen Memorial Fund.

" Requests the Governing Body of the Office, in consultation with the Inter-Governmental Advisory Commission for Refugees, to consider the advisability of preparing a Convention to ensure the protection of the refugees on the liquidation of the Office.

" Recommends that the Belgian Government be invited to nominate a delegate to the Inter-Governmental Advisory Commission for Refugees ;

" Requests the Council to communicate to the Governments the recommendations adopted by the Inter-Governmental Advisory Commission for Refugees at its fourth session concerning certain facilities for the refugees. "

NATIONALITY OF WOMEN.

REPORT OF THE FIRST COMMITTEE TO THE ASSEMBLY.

Rapporteur : Mr. W. E. BECKETT (United Kingdom).

The draft resolution which the First Committee presents to the Assembly on this subject, and of which the text is given below, has for its object to prepare the ground for consideration by the Assembly at its next session of the very important question of the Nationality of Women. With this object, it is proposed that the Council should transmit to the Governments the documents which were officially placed before the Assembly by decisions of the Council — namely, the Secretary-General's report, the report of the Committee of Representatives of Women's International Organisations which is annexed thereto, and the letter of the International Union of Leagues of Catholic Women of August 19th, 1931. The Minutes of the discussions in the First Committee itself, which have dealt with many aspects of the problem, will also be transmitted to the Governments. The Governments will be asked to submit their observations on the whole matter, including their views regarding the Hague Nationality Convention of April 12th, 1930. It is further proposed that the Assembly should receive and consider any observations which the Committee of Representatives of Women's International Organisations may wish to put forward. It is hoped that this Committee will be able to make the necessary arrangements to continue itself in being and to serve as a medium for voicing the important current of opinion which it represents.

The nature of the First Committee's proposal in itself implies that the First Committee does not express, and does not consider that the Assembly should express at the present stage any opinion on the merits of the question. In particular, it is desirable, in order to prevent any misunderstanding, that it should be placed on record here that the second paragraph of the proposed resolution merely takes note of the conclusions set out in the report of the Committee of Representatives of Women's International Organisations and will not constitute any expression of opinion by the Assembly with regard to the Convention. What the Committee proposes is that the Governments should include a statement of their views with regard to the convention in the observations which they will be asked to present on the general question of the nationality of women.

DRAFT RESOLUTION:

" The Assembly,

" Having examined with the greatest interest the report of the Secretary-General on the question of the nationality of women, presented in accordance with the resolution of the Council of January 24th, 1931, and the report and proposals of the Committee of Representatives of Women's International Organisations which are annexed thereto;

" Notes the desire of the said Committee that steps should be taken to bring about the reconsideration of the Hague Nationality Convention, bearing in mind the principle of equality between men and women;

" Thanks the Committee of Representatives of Women's International Organisations for its report; and

" Requests the Council, in harmony with the recommendation No. VI of the Conference for the Codification of International Law held at the Hague, March-April 1930, to transmit to all Governments the report of the Secretary-General on the question of the nationality of women, including the report of the Committee of Representatives of Women's International Organisations, and the letter of the International Union of Leagues of Catholic Women of August 19th, 1931, together with the Minutes of the First Committee of the Assembly on this subject, and to request Governments to submit their observations on this subject (including their views regarding the Hague Nationality Convention) for reconsideration of the matter by the thirteenth Assembly, to which any observations which the above-mentioned Committee thinks fit to present will be communicated."

FINANCIAL WORK OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

REPORT OF THE SECOND COMMITTEE TO THE ASSEMBLY.

Rapporteur : M. BERNÍS CARRASCO (Spain).

PART I. — GENERAL.

During the past year, since the last meeting of the Assembly, the world has been subjected to an economic depression of unparalleled severity. Month by month, the effects of this depression have become more acute; its scope has become more widespread. Since the early summer of this year, the financial structure within which the mechanism of production and distribution must operate has been shaken by shock succeeding shock. During the week in which the Second Committee has been occupied with financial questions, events of the gravest import have taken place. How far reaching their effects may be it is too early to foresee. Certain it is only that the problems of primordial importance to-day, the problems to the solution of which the efforts of all must be devoted, are essentially financial. Economic recovery is dependent, and must be dependent, on a betterment of the financial situation.

The Second Committee has been faced during its deliberations by the difficulty that the day-to-day evolution of events during this past week, and indeed during the weeks immediately preceding its session, have been exceptionally rapid. In these circumstances, the Committee desires to draw special attention to the Minutes of its discussions and to the important statements made by a number of delegates who took part in those discussions.

But, in spite of this momentary difficulty, the Second Committee is convinced that the League of Nations, during the months to come, may contribute much and must be equipped and prepared to render the utmost contribution in its power to the general work of financial reconstruction. Indeed, it has already entered upon this task.

Financial problems of the first magnitude have arisen for solution — problems, however, which, at the stage reached until quite recently, have demanded either joint action by banks or day-to-day co-operation between a relatively restricted number of Governments. Such limited joint action and co-operation are always required and very much still remains to be done by this means in the near future. But, in recent weeks, a further stage has been reached at which the aid of the Financial Organisation of the League is urgently demanded. Both the Austrian and the Hungarian Governments have called in the aid of the Council. Measures have already been taken with a view to solving the Austrian difficulties and a delegation of the Financial Committee is to visit Hungary almost at once.

Similar or other action may be required elsewhere. The League must not only support and reinforce the financial reconstruction schemes already undertaken ; if other countries need emergency aid or advice the League must be ready to give it. The demands that may arise cannot be foreseen, but in the opinion of the Second Committee it is imperative that the Council and the Committee, which is its financial adviser, should be in a position to afford the full measure of help that lies in the power of the League. Provision must be made for prompt and effective action. The Second Committee has accordingly recommended that a special fund, now voted by the Fourth Committee, should be made available in the budget of the League for this purpose. It recommends further that the Assembly should suggest to the Council the desirability of arranging for a special procedure for prompt action. If the existing organisation and equipment should prove insufficient to bear the strain which may be placed upon it, it must be strengthened and expanded.

Existing difficulties, however, will not be overcome by such special international action alone. International action on a wider scale may be required ; national efforts must be made. The position may gradually improve by the natural impulse of economic forces ; it may worsen. Individual initiative is essential, but a stimulus to such initiative may be — and, in our opinion in certain cases should be — given by Governments. When individual demand is weak and lacking in confidence, it may be necessary for Governments to stimulate social demand.

Whatever means may be adopted with this end in view, they will need to be accompanied by loans to the extent that the situation permits. Such lending will depend, not only on the willingness of those who have available funds to lend, but on the success of the efforts made by borrowing countries to create and maintain the necessary conditions. For these reasons, the Second Committee recommends that the Assembly urge all Governments to do everything that lies in their power to promote international understanding and such domestic social and political conditions as will facilitate the movement of capital. At the same time, it draws attention to the vital importance — so frequently emphasised by leading economic and financial authorities in recent months — of the formulation of a long-sighted policy of steady and continuous foreign investment by those countries in which surplus resources have been accumulating. It is by the application of such a policy and by designing a suitable mechanism of investment where the need exists that the financial leaders of such countries can render the greatest service to the world.

By all to-day sacrifices must be made ; national endeavour must precede or accompany international aid. Foreign capital will not flow readily to countries whence domestic capital is exported owing to the lack of confidence of its citizens. But conditions may arise, in which countries are so directly and so seriously affected by the economic depression that without extraneous aid they can hope neither to borrow without aid nor to maintain their financial equipment without borrowing. If such circumstances arise, there may be no alternative to an international guarantee by Governments of foreign loans granted. For special cases and subject to special safeguards such a procedure might, in the opinion of the Second Committee, have to be contemplated in the future.

The scheme which the Financial Committee elaborated with the experts which it called upon to assist it for the establishment of an International Agricultural Mortgage Credit Company affords another example of a method by which such Government assistance may be afforded. In other cases, direct Government guarantees may be required.

In other cases again, it may be possible to promote international lending by establishing special machinery for that purpose. The Second Committee had before it the outline of such a scheme, prepared for the Commission of Enquiry for European Union by M. Francqui, which is designed to promote lending on medium term. In the recommendations put forward at the end of this report will be found one suggesting that this scheme should be studied. But by whatever procedure the flow of international lending may be restarted, it is of vital importance to secure that the monies advanced should be used for real productive purposes. It would be of the greatest advantage if the League on the one hand and, by their influence, the most responsible authorities in the financial markets on the other could discourage loans to public authorities or to others for unproductive or improper purposes.

The recommendations put forward in this report are concerned in part with the necessary implementing of work already undertaken by the Financial Organisation during the past year or of the resolutions adopted by the eleventh Assembly last September. That work is described and those resolutions referred to in the second part of this report.

With reference to the recommendations concerning the work which is likely to arise in connection with the present financial crisis, the Second Committee desires to emphasise again one point.

During the coming months, questions of the gravest importance must arise for solution. The arrangements which have been made concerning existing international debts are of short duration. It is the business of the creditors and debtors immediately concerned to find means for prolonging, modifying or terminating those arrangements on their expiration in such a way as to permit of a more normal conduct of business and to avoid a further shock to confidence. The measures which they will find most appropriate to the moment must depend on the underlying economic conditions and on the state of public sentiment. The general public no less than the banker and the entrepreneur can thus contribute much to the amelioration of the general situation.

But the problems which arise for solution are manifold and difficult and Governments and their international machinery at Geneva must be ready to act. It is above all important, in the opinion of the Committee, that the League should be prepared and equipped to help promptly and efficiently. Its aid will be sought and that aid must be readily given, whether by special enquiries and advice — in particular, on such financial reforms as may be considered useful — or by the erection of new financial machinery or by special discussions and meetings.

Part II. — Work of the Past Year.

The work of the Financial Organisation during the past year has been exceptionally wide in its scope. The late Director of what was formerly the Economic and Financial Section visited India in the winter of this year on the request of the Government of that country, and went on directly from India to China. His report on the creation of an Economic Council for India was published simultaneously by the Indian Government and, with its consent, by the League of Nations. Its interest, in view of the attention which is to-day being paid to this question of Economic Councils and economic planning, is of much more than national interest. His visit to China was in response to a request received from the Chinese Government that he should discuss with it the effects of the present depression on China's economic activities.

Expert enquiries have not, however, been confined in the financial field to the continent of Asia. A financial expert took part in the work of the mission sent to Liberia in the summer of this year by the Committee of the Council in order to study the problem raised by the request for assistance submitted by the Government of that country. Another visited Lithuania on the request of the Lithuanian Government to report on certain outstanding problems arising out of the Memel Convention. The Deputy Secretary-General and the present Director of the Financial Section paid a visit to Vienna after the request of the Austrian Government to which reference is made below.

Agricultural Credits.

The most important piece of new constructive work carried out by the Financial Committee until its present session has been in connection with agricultural credits.

When the Second Committee met last year, one of the most insistent problems with which European countries especially were faced was that of providing long-term credits to agriculture. Accordingly, the Financial Committee, acting on the instructions it received, elaborated in the first half of the year an International Convention, which has already been signed by 20 States, for the creation of an International Agricultural Mortgage Credit Company and the Constitutive Charter and Statutes for this institution. This is a sound and practical scheme which is fully described in the report to the Assembly (document

A.6.1931) and should come into operation as soon as the conditions of the financial markets permit the capital to be subscribed.

It is to be hoped therefore that the signatory States will ratify the Convention at an early date and that all European States which have not yet signed the Convention will do so before the end of this month.

Other Long-term Credit Problems.

This Convention was designed to meet the special difficulties of the agricultural countries. But, since May, the need for long-term capital has spread far beyond these countries. In view of this new situation, the French Government put forward certain proposals to the Commission of Enquiry for European Union which were afterwards examined by a special committee (Committee on Credit Problems) appointed by the Council. The report of this Committee (document C.504.M.211.1931.VII), was approved by the Council on September 14th. It is pointed out that :

> " The problem of international loans can no longer be considered by the League solely with regard to their effects on individual borrowing States, but should be viewed rather in connection with the general problem of international credit, and any action likely to promote a flow of capital to-day would promise 'valuable international advantages'. "

The Committee on Credit Problems recommended therefore that the League's policy with regard to the issue of loans under its auspices should be developed and that, as the French Government had suggested, the Financial Committee, acting in accordance with the instructions received from the Council of the League, should be prepared to consider such applications from borrowing States as may be made to it for its assistance. These proposals, it is observed, constitute rather a development of than a departure from the policy approved by the Assembly last year. They have received the approval of the Council, which decided in this connection that the collaboration of Treasury officials should be obtained in all cases where requests from Governments for help or advice involve the examination of questions of public finance. The Second Committee desires to emphasise the necessity of the Financial Organisation of the League being ready to meet all calls that may be made upon it.

Other Work of the Financial Committee.

The other work of the Financial Committee has been largely connected with the reconstruction schemes instituted in early years. The great undertaking of settling 1,400,000 refugees in Greece has been successfully concluded, and the similar work conducted in Bulgaria is nearing completion. A special enquiry has been conducted, on the request of the Bulgarian Government, into the co-operative system in that country.

Bulgarian Budget.

The general depression has had serious consequences for the Bulgarian budget. The financial year 1930-31 closed, owing to a falling off in receipts, with a large deficit, which threatened to be renewed in the current year.

The Financial Committee has taken active steps to deal with the position. It made urgent representations to the Bulgarian Government concerning the necessity of taking energetic measures to restore the balance between revenue and expenditure both by cutting down expenses and increasing the yield from existing taxes or creating new ones. The Bulgarian Finance Minister has submitted to it a detailed plan under which it may be hoped that the budget will be balanced and the Treasury position, which was compromised by the previous deficit, will be gradually improved.

Greece and Estonia.

The Financial Committee continued to follow the situation of the Banks of Greece and Estonia which, with its support, had restored the stability of the currency in these two countries.

At the same time, the Committee has kept in touch with the economic and financial situation in these two countries.

Counterfeiting Currency.

A first conference of representatives of the central police offices, with a view to the suppression of counterfeiting currency, met at Geneva from March 4th to 7th, 1931. This Conference, the chief aim of which was to develop international co-operation between these offices for the prevention and suppression of counterfeiting currency, adopted for this purpose a certain number of recommendations and a series of administrative regulations.

Gold.

The Gold delegation has pursued its work and devoted itself, in particular, to the study of the distribution of gold, on which question it issued a report in the spring of this year. It expects to conclude its work at its next session and to publish on that occasion a general report on the whole complicated question submitted to it.

Fiscal Committee.

During its second year of existence, the Fiscal Committee continued to devote its efforts to numerous and varied tasks. Inter alia, it drew up two model drafts for a plurilateral convention for the avoidance of double taxation of the chief categories of income, which it recommended to the attention of Governments.

Further, the enquiry initiated, with the help of the grant made by the Rockefeller Foundation, into the apportionment of profits of undertakings operating in several countries and the possibility of unifying the methods employed in this connection by the different fiscal administrations is making satisfactory progress. The legislation of several important countries has been carefully examined, and it is hoped to reach final conclusions in the comparatively near future.

The Committee also dealt with the taxation of instruments of international commerce, double taxation in respect of the turnover tax, and the Customs and fiscal duties on newspapers and periodicals.

The draft Convention which it had prepared, with the help of the Transit Organisation, on the taxation of foreign motor vehicles was adopted almost as it stood by the European Conference on Road Traffic and was signed by twelve countries.

It seems that, thanks to the efforts made in this sphere by the Financial Organisation of the League of Nations before the Fiscal Committee came into existence, the field of double taxation is being more and more restricted. Certain bilateral conventions of a general nature have recently been concluded between France and Italy, Finland and Sweden, Belgium and France and Belgium and Italy ; they are generally based on the model drafts prepared by the Conference of Government Experts in 1928. As regards maritime navigation, numerous agreements have already been concluded between the nations concerned.

Committee of Statistical Experts.

In January, a new permanent Committee — the Committee of Statistical Experts — was appointed in accordance with the terms of the International Convention relating to Economic Statistics. The Committee held its first meeting in March, when it laid down the lines of the large programme of work that lies before it. At the same time, it took action on two specific and urgent questions — the compilation of a common list of statistical territories to be specified in national statistics of external trade and of a list of commodities entering into such trade.

Economic Intelligence Service.

The eleventh Assembly instructed the Economic and Financial Organisation of the League :

(1) To undertake an enquiry into the course and phases of the present economic depression, and

(2) To examine, after getting in touch with international organisations, advisory councils, research institutes, etc., by what means the work already undertaken on the problem of the recurrence of periods of economic depression might be co-ordinated.

Professor Ohlin, of Stockholm University, was appointed at the beginning of the year to take charge of the enquiry referred to in the first of these resolutions.

In accordance with the wishes of the Assembly, the enquiry has been carried out in close collaboration with the International Labour Office and the International Institute of Agriculture, which have furnished information relating to the subjects with which they are concerned, and with a number of National Economic Councils and Economic Research Institutes. At the beginning of March last, and again in July, meetings of experts from these councils and institutions, together with representatives from the International Labour Office, the International Institute of Agriculture and the International Chamber of Commerce, were held at Geneva to discuss the plan of the enquiry and certain of the technical problems involved. The majority of the national organisations represented at these meetings and a number of Governments prepared special memoranda concerning the conditions in their own countries.

The important report, which has been prepared on the basis of these studies and consultations, was published at the beginning of the present session of the Assembly.

On the second resolution, a special report has been drawn up (document A.55.1931.II.A) by representatives of those advisory and technical organisations with whom the last Assembly decided that contact should be established. In this report, it is recommended that meetings of representatives of such of these institutes and of any national or international organisations as are engaged upon work on the question and of individual experts should be convened at suitable intervals.

On the importance of this proposed work the Second Committee laid special emphasis last year in a striking passage of its report. It remarked :

> " When we consider the magnitude of the losses from which the world suffers during a period of economic stagnation similar to that through which the world is now passing, it is impossible not to be impressed by the almost absolute failure of society, up to the present, to devise any means by which such disasters may be averted. The Committee felt that this problem was one which imperatively demanded co-ordinated and concerted study. "

It will be observed that the proposal put forward by the representatives of the economic councils, research institutes and other bodies consulted by the Financial Organisation is a conservative one. Such conservatism is wise to-day. What is essential is to begin the work in the hope that we may ultimately — however slowly and falteringly — find means to avert or to lessen depressions such as that which we are experiencing to-day.

In spite of the large amount of work falling upon it in connection with the enquiry into the course and phases of the economic depression, the Economic Intelligence Service has, during the last year, issued new editions of the Memorandum on International Trade and Balance of Payments (3 volumes), the Memorandum on Production and Trade and the Statistical Year-Book. The Monthly Bulletin of Statistics has been published regularly and a Memorandum on Commercial Banks is now in the press.

In the course of the year, the necessary arrangements have been made to start the Annual Survey of Economic Developments, in accordance with the decision of the last Assembly. In connection with this contemplated survey, attention may be called to the serious fall in the price of silver which has particularly affected the economic life of certain Asiatic countries in recent years.

Draft Resolution :

In conclusion, the Second Committee submits the following draft resolution to the Assembly :

> " The Assembly,
>
> " (1) At this grave moment of financial and economic anxiety, urges on all Governments to do everything that lies in their power to promote international understanding and make possible the revival on a normal basis of national and international investment ;
> " (2) Welcomes the decision of the Council laying down the conditions on which the Financial Committee should be prepared to consider applications from States which are desirous to obtain the assistance of the League, and requests the Council to follow closely the evolution of events and to take all measures necessary to assure that, at any moment, the decisions demanded by the situation may be taken without delay, and that the League of Nations may be in a position to render such service as may be demanded of it, and, in particular, to provide that the Financial Organisation of the League of Nations obtains the funds and the technical assistance necessary to permit it to afford to all States Members prompt and effective assistance whenever such assistance be sought, whether by means of delegations or advice or by any other means ;
> " (3) In view of the fact that the Commission of Enquiry for European Union and its Sub-Committee of Economic Experts have given favourable consideration to M. Francqui's proposal to establish an institution for long- and medium-term credits, requests the Council of the League of Nations to instruct the competent organs of the League to examine, as soon as possible, with the assistance especially of M. Francqui, the proposal submitted by the latter to the Sub-Committee of Economic Experts, and, in the event of any practical scheme being recommended under the auspices of the League, to ensure that it will be open for all countries to participate on an equal footing;
> " (4) Expresses its appreciation of the valuable work carried out during the past year by the Financial Committee and its special Delegations on Gold and Agricultural Credits and by the Fiscal Committee and by the Financial Organisation as a whole, and notes with special satisfaction the Convention for setting up an International

Agricultural Mortgage Credit Company, the recent response to the requests submitted by the Austrian and the Hungarian Governments for enquiries into their financial situation, the second interim report of the Gold Delegation and the study which has been published on the course and phases of the economic depression ;

" Urges all Governments of signatory States to accelerate their ratification of the Convention of the International Agricultural Mortgage Credit Company, and hopes that those others who, under the terms of the Convention, are enabled to deposit their signatures before September 30th, will do so ;

" (5) Approves the proposal that, in order to co-ordinate the work now being conducted on the problem of the recurrence of periods of economic depression, the League should convene meetings of experts and representatives of those economic councils, research institutes and other organisations that are actively engaged on this question and should appoint a qualified economist and adequate staff for this purpose, and decides that this work shall be begun either before or in the year 1933."

CONTRIBUTIONS IN ARREARS.

REPORT OF THE FOURTH COMMITTEE TO THE ASSEMBLY.

Rapporteur : M. William RAPPARD (Switzerland).

The Fourth Committee instructed a Sub-Committee to consider the question of unpaid contributions for the financial years of the League previous to December 31st, 1930.

The Sub-Committee was composed as follows :

Dr. RUPPEL (Germany) ;
Sir Annepu P. PATRO, Garu, Kt. (India) ;
Mr. Sean LESTER (Irish Free State) ;
Professor Amedeo GIANNINI (Italy) ;
Professor William RAPPARD (Switzerland) ;
His Excellency M. Pedro COSIO (Uruguay) ;
His Excellency M. Cesar ZUMETA (Venezuela).

M. Rappard was elected Chairman and Rapporteur of the Sub-Committee.
The Sub-Committee presented a confidential report to the Committee.
After discussing this report at a private meeting, the Fourth Committee unanimously agreed to propose to the Assembly the adoption of the following draft resolution :

" The Assembly,

" Observes with regret that this year a greater number of States than before have not fulfilled their financial obligations towards the League ;

" Earnestly calls upon States which have received certain facilities for the liquidation of their arrears to fulfil the conditions of the respective arrangements ;

" Invites the other States which, for various reasons, still owe in respect of 1929 and 1930 to remit their contributions as soon as political or economic conditions permit ;

" Requests the Secretary-General to undertake or pursue negotiations for the liquidation of arrears by all the States in question, to submit a report to the Council on the action taken by him before the next Assembly, and to communicate the results to the latter ."

GENERAL CONVENTION TO IMPROVE THE MEANS OF PREVENTING WAR.[1]

REPORT OF THE THIRD COMMITTEE TO THE ASSEMBLY.

Rapporteur : M. DE MADARIAGA (Spain).

In proposing to the Assembly the adoption of the text of a General Convention to improve the Means of preventing War, the Third Committee desires first of all to offer its thanks to the Special Committee appointed by the Council. This Committee, which was presided over by M. Politis, has greatly lightened the labours of the Assembly by making a very exhaustive study of the questions which had prevented the Committee on Arbitration and Security from establishing a single text.

While the Third Committee has made certain amendments to the draft report prepared by the Special Committee, it has in no way departed from the essential principles on which that Committee had reached agreement.

First of all, the Third Committee, like the Special Committee, would emphasise that the General Convention can in no way limit the powers held by the Council under Article 11 of the Covenant. This Article has proved itself very valuable in practice. To facilitate its application, texts have been drawn up and approved by the organs of the League, more especially the report of the Committee of the Council dated March 15th, 1927, approved by the Assembly on September 26th, 1927, and by the Council on December 6th, 1927, the study by the Committee on Arbitration and Security on Article 11 of the Covenant, recommended to the Council by the Assembly on September 20th, 1928, and the Council's resolution of June 7th, 1928, regarding measures to be taken in the intervals between sessions of the Council.

As, however, when a question is laid before it under Article 11 of the Covenant, the Council's decisions must be unanimous, it has seemed desirable to propose to the Governments the acceptance of new undertakings, whereby certain decisions might be taken without their votes counting for the purposes of unanimity when they were parties to a dispute and when the Council thought fit to recommend to them certain clearly specified conservatory measures.

These measures may be of two kinds : Non-military (Article 1 of the Convention) and military (Articles 2 and 3).

Provision is made for two classes of measures of a military nature :

(1) Measures which, in circumstances that, in the Council's opinion, do not create a state of war between the Powers in question, are designed to secure the evacuation of the territory or territorial waters of one party or of a zone demilitarised in virtue of international agreements by the forces of the other party which may have entered that territory or may be flying over it in the course of a dispute (Article 2) ;

(2) The fixing by the Council, if it thinks this necessary, of lines in the territory of the parties which must not be passed by the land, naval or air forces of the parties to the dispute and, where necessary in order to avoid incidents, by their civil aircraft (Article 3).

The text adopted for Article 2 emphasises the fact that it refers to circumstances which, in the Council's opinion, do not create a state of war between the Powers in question. A Convention designed to prevent war cannot, after all, be applicable when war has broken out. For that case, other measures and sanctions are provided by the Covenant.

The question of the moment at which war actually breaks out may of course give rise to difficulties of a theoretical nature. It would not seem that any more satisfactory explanations can be given on this point than those furnished in the following passage from the report submitted by M. de Brouckère to the Committee of the Council in December 1926 [1] which was recognised as a valuable guide in this important matter, but is not formally binding on the Committee.

[1] Document A.78.1931.IX, Annexe 24 (a).

The Committee has further thought it desirable to specify that there shall be equivalent treatment for land, naval and air forces as regards both measures of the first class (evacuation) and measures of the second class (fixing of lines not to be passed by the troops). As States regard their territorial waters as part of their territory, those waters must be evacuated by any forces that may have entered them or may be flying over them, just as the territory itself must be evacuated.

Certain doubts have been expressed as to the possibility of ensuring in practice equivalence of treatment as between air forces and the other forces, as regards measures of the first category, since the mobility of aircraft permits it very easily to fly back over foreign territory during or after evacuation.

In this connection, the Committee desires to call attention to the last paragraph of Article 3, according to which the contracting parties agree to give strict orders to the commanders of their forces, if the Council so recommends, to take all necessary precautions to avoid incidents. It is obvious that the latter paragraph will enable the Council to recommend particularly that the order not to fly over the territory or territorial waters of one party should be given to the air forces of the other party. Moreover, any raids by aircraft would, like those by land or sea forces, if necessary be verified or reported to the Council by the Commissioners which it had sent to the spot in accordance with the provisions of Article 4.

Measures of the second category — that is, the fixing by the Council of lines which the forces and, as far as may be necessary, the civil aircraft must not pass — may be prescribed, if the circumstances contemplated in Article 2 have arisen, and after the Council has prescribed measures designed to ensure evacuation, or if, in the event of a threat of war, special conditions, particularly the possibility of contact between the forces, rendered it necessary. It is understood that the State whose territory has been invaded will not be required to withdraw its forces behind the lines fixed by the Council until that territory has been completely evacuated by the alien forces.

The powers conferred on the Council by this article may be exercised without an invasion having taken place or after an invasion followed by an order for evacuation.

The Committee agrees with the Special Committee in thinking that it is obviously impossible in a general convention to formulate provisions for all the special cases which may arise. The Council will fix, within the limits of the Convention, the conditions for carrying out the measures which it prescribes. It will recommend to the parties only useful and practicable measures. Moreover, as regards civil aircraft, each party has also the right, particularly in the event of a threat of war, to notify in accordance with the rules in force, that it prohibits flying over certain zones of its territory by foreign aircraft.

Further, as regards the actual fixing of the lines which the forces must not pass, it is understood that if the Council, after endeavouring to fix these lines by common agreement with the parties to the dispute, has been obliged, failing such an agreement, to fix them with the consent of the party whose forces are affected, this does not involve the withdrawal of the forces further back than the exterior lines of the defence organisations existing on the frontier of the parties concerned at the time when the Council of the League of Nations takes its decision, nor the abandonment of any other work, position or line of communication essential to the security or the supplies of the party concerned, the natural lines of defence and vital centres being included among "the essential" works, positions, or lines of communication.

[1] "We must now return to our previous remarks concerning the conditions which must be fulfilled before a country can be regarded as having resorted to war. There is no need to dwell upon the case in which the aggressor State formally declares war. Apart from this eventuality, two conditions are necessary, as we said:

"(1) One country must have committed an act of war against another;
"(2) The latter country must have admitted the existence of a state of war.

"Further, the second country must have justification for taking up this attitude.

"Every act of violence does not necessarily justify its victim in resorting to war. If a detachment of soldiers goes a few yards over the frontier in a colony remote from any vital centre; if the circumstances show quite clearly that the aggression was due to an error on the part of some subaltern officer; if the central authorities of the 'aggressor State' reprimand the subordinate concerned as soon as they are apprised of the facts; if they cause the invasion to cease, offer apologies and compensation and take steps to prevent any recurrence of such incidents — then it cannot be maintained that there has been an act of war and that the invaded country has reasonable grounds for mobilising its army and marching upon the enemy capital. The accident which has occurred has in no way released that country from the specific obligations laid down in Articles 12 and following. It could not be so released unless it were the victim of a flagrant aggression of such a serious character that it would obviously be dangerous not to retaliate at once.

"In short, to borrow the felicitous phrase used in the Treaty of Locarno, 'the country in question must be exercising the right of legitimate defence'.

"Legitimate defence implies the adoption of measures proportionate to the seriousness of the attack and justified by the imminence of the danger. If a country flagrantly exceeded these limits, even if it were affronted by some incident of little intrinsic importance, it would become, in actual fact, the real aggressor and it would be only fair that that country should be made the object of the sanctions provided for in Article 16" (see document A.14.1927, page 69).

Such are the provisional measures of a military nature which the Council may, under Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention, prescribe for the parties concerned. Obviously, other measures might, in certain special cases, appear desirable. If so, it will be not in virtue of the Convention, but under the general powers which it derives from Article 11 of the Covenant that the Council will be able to prescribe them with the consent of the parties concerned.

Certain delegations have recommended, in particular, the generalisation of the system of permanent demilitarised zones, but the Committee considers that such generalisation might be brought about by way of bilateral agreements, and not by a general convention.

Other suggestions have been made with a view to facilitating the application, if necessary, of Article 3. The possibility has been considered of neighbouring States negotiating between themselves in advance the limits of the demilitarised zones which they agree to create in their territory in the event of a threat of war.

The Polish delegation again defended in the Committee the point of view which it put forward in the Special Committee. It considers that, if the conservatory measures of a military character are restricted to those provided for in Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention, the latter will have little value, and the Polish delegation would, in particular, have liked to have the following clause included :

> " In the event of the Council's deciding that an international obligation concerning the state of a High Contracting Party's armaments has been violated, it shall call upon the High Contracting Party to restore the situation in accordance with the said obligation. The High Contracting Parties undertake to comply with such invitation without delay. "

The Third Committee shared the opinion of the Special Committee that the question did not come within the scope of the Convention and the Polish delegation reserved its right to submit the matter to the Conference for the Reduction and Limitation of Armaments.

The Third Committee unanimously accepted the text of Article 4 proposed by the Special Committee for the supervision of the execution of measures of a military character prescribed by the Council. It is understood that the task of the Commissioners appointed by the Council in accordance with the provisions of Article 3 will consist exclusively of verifying on the spot the withdrawal of forces prescribed by the Council under the conditions defined in Article 2 of the Convention. The Commissioners may not make a more extensive inspection than is necessary to verify the withdrawal of the forces, works or military establishments and in no case may they inspect naval or air bases.

The Committee furthermore draws the Assembly's attention to the last paragraph of Article 4 under which the rules to be followed for the composition and working of commissions of inspection shall be embodied in executive regulations which shall be prepared by the competent organs of the League of Nations so as to enter into force at the same time as the Convention. The Assembly will certainly wish to draw the Council's attention to the expediency of giving the competent organs of the League the instructions necessary for these regulations to be ready in good time.

As regards Article 5 concerning the question of penalties, the Third Committee succeeded in achieving unanimity, the Netherlands delegation having renounced the reservation which it had asked to have inserted in the Special Committee's report. It is understood that the second paragraph of Article 5 refers to the case of wars breaking out as a consequence of a violation, established by the Council, of the conservatory measures of a military character defined in Articles 2 and 3. As in all cases in which war breaks out, the Members of the League may, and, in fact, must, decide whether a State has resorted to war contrary to the obligations entered into under Articles 12, 13 or 15 of the Covenant, before considering ipso facto that a Member of the League has committed an act of war against all the other Members. Furthermore, in the special case referred to in the second paragraph of Article 5 of the General Convention, the contracting parties will consider that the violation by another contracting party of the supplementary obligations which it has freely entered into under Articles 2 and 3 of this Convention constitutes prima facie evidence, if war breaks out, that the said party has resorted to war within the meaning of Article 16 of the Covenant. It is understood that this is only prima facie evidence, which does not preclude proof to the contrary.

The Committee inserted in Article 6 a clause under which the parties to the Convention undertake to provide, by the means at their disposal, such publicity as the Council may think fit for its proceedings, decisions and recommendations when a dispute is brought before it in the case contemplated by the Convention. For the application of this clause, which is aimed at preventing public opinion as far as possible from receiving one-sided information and also at influencing on the public opinion of the countries involved with all the Council's moral authority, the Council must take a decision concurred in by all the Members voting other than the parties to the dispute. Naturally, this clause, like the others, cannot affect the rights of the Council under the Covenant, and particularly its right to regard publication of its discussions, decisions and recommendations as a matter of procedure under Article 5, paragraph 2, of the Covenant; but publicity only becomes compulsory under Article 6 of the Convention if it is decided upon unanimously.

The British delegation proposed the addition of a clause stipulating that it was understood that the measures laid down in paragraph 1 of Article 2 should not affect the right of free passage through the Suez Canal provided for in the Convention on the Free

Navigation of the Suez Canal signed at Constantinople on October 29th, 1888. To meet the British delegation's wishes, the Committee inserted a second paragraph in Article 9 referring to this Convention.

The formal clauses of the Convention do not call for much comment.

It may, however, be well to draw attention to the fact that for the entry into force of the Convention as provided in Article 14, ten ratifications or accessions will be necessary. Moreover, the last paragraph of the said article gives each contracting party the right to accompany his ratification or accession by a reservation under which he makes the entry into force of the Convention, in so far as he is concerned, conditional on ratification or accession on behalf of certain countries named by him. It goes without saying that the ten ratifications or accessions necessary for the entry into force of the Convention must either be ratifications or accessions not accompanied by reservations, or ratifications or accessions accompanied by reservations but rendered final by the fact that the conditions laid down in the said reservations have been fulfilled.

A proposal was put forward to insert a clause making the entry into force of the Convention conditional, apart from the number or ratifications or accessions provided for, on a declaration by the Council accepting the responsibilities laid upon it by the Convention. After consideration, it was thought that such a declaration was superfluous; the Convention having to be approved by the Assembly, it was recognised that the Council would have to obey its provisions.

It was also proposed to draw up the Convention in the form of an instrument open only to the accession of the parties on the model of the General Act. The Governments would only have been able to accede after obtaining the authorisation prescribed by the national constitutions.

The Committee eventually decided on the system generally adopted for conventions concluded under the auspices of the League of Nations, because it recognised the force of the argument that it would be easier for Governments to affix their signatures before the Conference for the reduction and limitation of armaments than to obtain the necessary authorisation for accession before February 2nd, 1932, the date on which this Conference is to open. In signing the Convention, the Governments will assume a moral obligation, and it is highly desirable that a large number of them should assume this obligation before the Conference.

In conclusion, the Committee wishes to recall the passage in the Special Committee's report in which the latter appraises the value of the draft which it drew up, and which has become, with a few amendments, the text of the present Convention.

After stating that it realised perfectly well the limitations of the text it had prepared, the Committee explained that it did not seem possible to ask the States to accept more extensive obligations in a general convention, "But", it added, "whereas, in the matter of conservatory measures, the contracting parties will not be legally bound except by the obligations in the convention, there can be no doubt that they may, if they think fit, themselves agree or propose to the Council to take other measures 'that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace' and 'the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends'.

"Moreover, although the draft represents only a modest advance in the direction of the means of preventing war, the Committee desires to emphasise its practical importance and cherishes the hope that in the future this first step may be followed by other and more important steps."

The Committee fully endorses the Special Committee's opinion, and associates itself with the hope thus expressed.

I have accordingly the honour to submit the following draft resolution for the approval of the Assembly:

"The Assembly,

"(1) Taking note of the report submitted to it on behalf of the Third Committee;

"(2) Thanking the Special Committee for the admirable work it has done towards the framing of the draft general Convention to improve the Means of preventing War:

"(3) Approves the text of the said Convention which has been drawn up by the Third Committee;

"(4) Decides to open the Convention for signature by the States Members of the League and by those non-member States to which the Council of the League shall have communicated a copy of the Convention for that purpose;

"(5) Earnestly trusts that a large number of States will sign the Convention before the opening of the forthcoming General Disarmament Conference; and

"(6) Requests the Council to make the necessary arrangements in good time for the preparation of the rules referred to in the last paragraph of Article 4, in order that, should circumstances so dictate, the Convention may be put into effect immediately upon its entry into force."

ANNEX 24 (a).

Official No. : A.78.1931.IX.

GENERAL CONVENTION TO IMPROVE THE MEANS OF PREVENTING WAR.

[Names of the High Contracting Parties.]

. . . . . .

Being sincerely desirous of developing mutual confidence by increasing the efficacy of the means of preventing war ;

Noting that, for this purpose, the task of the Council of the League of Nations in ensuring peace and conciliation might be facilitated by undertakings assumed voluntarily in advance by the States ;

Have decided to conclude a Convention and have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries :

[Designation of Plenipotentiaries.]

. . . . . .

Who, having deposited their full powers found in good and true form, have agreed as follows :

Article 1.

The High Contracting Parties undertake, in the event of a dispute arising between them and being brought before the Council of the League of Nations, to accept and apply the conservatory measures of a non-military nature relating to the substance of the dispute which the Council, acting in accordance with the powers conferred upon it by the Covenant of the League of Nations, may recommend with a view to preventing the aggravation of the dispute.

The Council shall fix the period of duration of these conservatory measures. It may extend this period should circumstances render it necessary.

Article 2.

If, in circumstances which, in the Council's opinion, do not create a state of war between the Powers at issue which are parties to the present Convention, the forces of one of those powers enter the territory or territorial waters of the other or a zone demilitarised in virtue of international agreements, or fly over them, the Council may prescribe measures to ensure their evacuation by those forces. The High Contracting Parties undertake to carry out without delay the measures so prescribed without prejudice to the other powers vested in the Council under Article 11 of the Covenant.

Article 3.

If the circumstances referred to in Article 2 have arisen, or, if in the event of a threat of war special conditions, and in particular the possibilities of contact between the forces of the parties to the dispute render it necessary, the Council may fix lines which must not be passed by their land, naval or air forces and, where necessary in order to avoid incidents, by their civil aircraft. The High Contracting Parties undertake to comply with the Council's recommendations in this matter.

The lines referred to in the previous paragraph shall, if possible, be fixed by agreement with the parties at issue.

Failing such agreement, the Council shall fix the lines with the consent of the party whose forces are affected, provided always that this does not involve the withdrawal of the forces further back than the exterior lines of the defence organisations existing on the frontier of the High Contracting Parties concerned at the time when the Council of the League of Nations takes its decision, and that the lines do not involve the abandonment of any other work, position or line of communication essential to the security or the supplies of the party concerned.

It shall, in every case, rest with the Council to determine the period within which the said lines shall be fixed under the conditions specified above.

The High Contracting Parties further agree to give strict orders to the commanders of their forces, if the Council so recommends, to take all necessary precautions to avoid incidents.

Article 4.

The Council shall, if it thinks fit, or if one of the parties at issue so requests before the Council has reached any of the decisions referred to in Articles 2 and 3, appoint commissioners for the sole purpose of verifying on the spot the execution of the conservatory measures of a military character recommended by the Council under the conditions specified in Articles 2 and 3.

When regulating the execution of the measures it has prescribed, the Council shall, at the reasoned request of a High Contracting Party which is a party to the dispute, cause that execution to coincide with the arrival of the commissioners on the spot, so far as it may think necessary.

The High Contracting Parties undertake to afford these commissioners every facility for the performance of their duties.

The commissioners may not make a more extensive inspection than is necessary to enable them to carry out the duty defined in paragraph I. Nor may they make any inspection of a naval or air base, nor may they inspect military works or establishments for any purpose other than to verify the withdrawal of the forces.

The rules to be followed for the composition of working of commissions of inspection shall be embodied in executive regulations which shall be prepared by the competent organs of the League of Nations so as to enter into force at the same time as the present Convention.

Article 5.

If any violation of the measures defined in Articles 2 and 3 is noted by the Council and continues in spite of its injunctions, the Council shall consider what means of all kinds are necessary to ensure the execution of the present Convention.

Should war break out as a consequence of this violation, such violation shall be regarded by the High Contracting Parties as prima facie evidence that the party guilty thereof has resorted to war within the meaning of Article 16 of the Covenant.

Article 6.

The High Contracting Parties undertake to provide, by the means at their disposal, such publicity as the Council may think fit for its proceedings, decisions and recommendations when a dispute is brought before it in the cases contemplated by the present Convention.

Article 7.

In the cases referred to in Articles 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6, the Council's decisions and recommendations shall, except as otherwise provided in those articles, be binding for the purposes of the present Convention, provided that they are concurred in by all the Members voting other than the parties to the dispute.

Article 8.

The provision of the present Convention shall only apply as between the High Contracting Parties.

Article 9.

The present Convention may not be interpreted as restricting the task or the powers of the Council of the League of Nations as laid down in the Covenant.

Nor should it affect the right of free passage through the Suez Canal provided for in the Convention on the Free Navigation of the Suez Maritime Canal signed at Constantinople on October 29th, 1888.

Article 10.

The present Convention shall remain open until February 2nd, 1932, for signatures on behalf of any Member of the League of Nations or of any non-member State to which the Council of the League of Nations has communicated a copy of the Convention for this purpose.

Article 11.

The present Convention is subject to ratification. Ratifications shall be deposited with the Secretariat of the League of Nations.

The Secretary-General shall give notice of the deposit of each ratification to the Members of the League of Nations and to the non-member States mentioned in Article 10, indicating the date of its deposit.

Article 12.

As from February 3rd, 1932, any Member of the League of Nations and any non-member State mentioned in Article 10 on whose behalf the Convention has not been signed before that date may accede thereto.

Accession shall be effected by an instrument deposited with the Secretariat of the League of Nations. The Secretary-General of the League of Nations shall give notice of each accession to the Members of the League of Nations and to the non-member States mentioned in Article 10 indicating the date of the deposit of the instrument.

Article 13.

A procès-verbal shall be drawn up by the Secretary-General of the League of Nations as soon as ratifications or accessions on behalf of ten Members of the League of Nations or non-member States have been deposited.

A certified copy of this procès-verbal shall be sent by the Secretary-General of the League of Nations to each Member of the League of Nations and to each non-member State mentioned in Article 10.

Article 14.

The present Convention shall be registered by the Secretary-General of the League of Nations ninety days after the date mentioned in Article 13. It will then enter into force as regards all Members of the League of Nations or non-member States on whose behalf ratifications or accessions have been deposited on the date of the procès-verbal.

As regards any Member of the League or non-member State on whose behalf a ratification or accession is subsequently deposited, the Convention shall enter into force on the ninetieth day after the date of the deposit of a ratification or accession on its behalf.

Each of the High Contracting Parties shall have the right to inform the Secretary-General of the League of Nations at the moment of the deposit of his ratification or of the notification of his accession, to the exclusion of all other reservations, that he makes the entry into force of the Convention, in so far as he is concerned, conditional on ratification or accession on behalf of certain countries named by him.

Article 15.

The present Convention may not be denounced before the expiration of five years from its coming into force in accordance with Article 14.

Denunciation shall be effected by a notification in writing addressed to the Secretary-General of the League of Nations, who shall inform all Members of the League of Nations and the non-member States mentioned in Article 10. Each denunciation shall take effect one year after the receipt by the Secretary-General of the notification, but only as regards the High Contracting Party on whose behalf it has been notified.

Article 16.

The French and English texts of the present Convention shall both be authoritative.

IN FAITH WHEREOF the above-mentioned Plenipotentiaries have signed the present Convention.

DONE at Geneva, on the . . . day of September, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-one, in a single copy, which shall be deposited in the archives of the Secretariat of the League of Nations, and of which certified true copies shall be transmitted by the Secretary-General to all the Members of the League of Nations and to any non-Member State to which the Council of the League of Nations has decided to communicate a copy of the present Convention, in accordance with Article 10.

ANNEX 25.

Official No.: A.91.1931.X.

ORGANISATION OF THE SECRETARIAT, OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR OFFICE AND OF THE REGISTRY OF THE PERMANENT COURT OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE.

REPORT OF THE FOURTH COMMITTEE TO THE ASSEMBLY.

Rapporteur: M. Augusto DE VASCONCELLOS (Portugal).

On October 3rd, 1930, the Assembly of the League of Nations adopted a resolution submitted by its Fourth Committee on certain questions connected with the organisation of the Secretariat, the International Labour Office and the Registry of the Permanent Court of International Justice. The seventh paragraph of this resolution was worded as follows :

> " Requests the General Committee of the Assembly to appoint a committee of . . . members to consider the retention or elimination, the increase or reduction of the posts of Under-Secretary-General, as well as the consequences resulting therefrom. All cognate questions which the Committee thought it necessary to adjourn in the course of its work shall be referred to that Committee. The latter will be requested to submit a report not later than May 1st, 1931, so as to make it possible for its conclusions to be examined in due time by the Governments of the States Members of the League of Nations and submitted to the next Assembly. "

On October 4th, the General Committee of the Assembly accordingly appointed a committee of thirteen members. The new Committee of Thirteen acquitted itself of its task and submitted a report dated February 5th, 1931 (document A.8.1931.X). After a short discussion, the Fourth Committee adopted the conclusions of this report, with the exception of paragraphs 21 to 26 inclusive, which it referred to the Supervisory Commission for subsequent decision.

The report of the Committee of Thirteen, which has so well carried on the work of its predecessor, deals with the following three questions which had been submitted to it :

1. The question of the Under-Secretaries-General.
2. Question of salaries, conditions of engagement, etc., of the Secretary-General, Deputy Secretary-General, Under-Secretaries-General, Directors and Treasurer.
3. Salaries of Chiefs of Section and of the Secretary-General's Chef de Cabinet.

As regards the first question, the Fourth Committee will certainly remember the interesting discussions held in 1930 with regard to the international character of the principal officers of the Secretariat. Two different solutions were finally put forward — that of increasing the number of Under-Secretaries-General to a maximum of eight posts, in order to ensure the collaboration of nationals of countries not permanently represented on the Council, and thus to guarantee, as far as possible, the international character of the structure of the Secretariat ; and that of abolishing completely all the posts of Under-Secretary-General, with the idea that this international character would be more completely ensured if persons belonging to Powers permanently represented on the Council ceased to exercise an influence.

Neither of these solutions, nor the proposal to maintain purely and simply the status quo, was able to command a majority in the Committee of Thirteen. The arguments on either side will be found in the Committee's Minutes, and a perusal of these Minutes makes it easy to understand that the Committee was unable definitely to settle the problem submitted to it, in view of the difficulty of estimating exactly the respective weight of the advantages and drawbacks of each system.

In these circumstances, the Committee decided, for the time being and as a compromise, to recommend the postponement of the question. The Fourth Committee concurred in this wise advice.

The Committee of Thirteen therefore proposes that the present organisation of the higher staff should be retained for the present, and it suggests that, in three years' time, at latest, the question of the retention or elimination, the increase or reduction of the posts of Under-Secretaries-General should be considered afresh by the Council and the Assembly. If it should so happen that the present Secretary-General retires before then, the position may have changed and the League will have at once to consider whether there should be a general readjustment of the higher posts. Bearing this in mind, the Committee recommends that all new or renewed contracts concluded with the Deputy Secretary-General or Under-Secretaries-General should :

> (1) Have a maximum duration of three years ;
> (2) Contain a clause under which they may be denounced within one year from the date on which the Secretary-General officially notifies the Council of his intention of resigning, this denunciation only to take effect as from the date on which the new Secretary-General assumes his duties or in the year following.

The Fourth Committee unanimously agreed to these proposals, which it recommends in turn to the Assembly.

The Committee of Thirteen had before it a draft resolution submitted to the Fourth Committee last year by the delegation of the Irish Free State regarding the nationality of the higher officials of the Secretariat down to and including Directors of Section.

The Committee of Thirteen, after careful examination and considerable discussion of this matter, is of the opinion that, "in the appointment or promotion of officials to one of the higher posts of the Secretariat, the first and foremost consideration must be the knowledge and capacity of the candidate, which must be in keeping with the duties he will be called upon to fulfil. In making the choice, however, account should be taken of the representation of the different forms of national civilisation. "

The Fourth Committee also accepted the conclusions of the Committee of Thirteen on this point.

It further adopted the proposals of the Committee of Thirteen as shown in paragraphs 16 to 19 of its report, and relating to (1) the salaries of the highest officers of the Secretariat; (2) the normal term of office of the Secretary-General and the Deputy Secretary-General; (3) the question of the entertainment allowance granted to these officials; and (4) the salaries of Directors.

The Fourth Committee decided to give the Treasurer the rank of Director, it being understood that he would receive no increase in salary for 1932.

As regards the Registrar of the Permanent Court of International Justice, an important discussion took place on the application of Article 32 of the Statute of the Court, which states that the salary of the Registrar shall be decided by the Council upon the proposal of the Court. Some delegates and the Chairman of the Supervisory Commission, while recognising with the Committee of Thirteen that this provision is not open to objection, maintained, in agreement with the Registrar of the Court, that it does not invalidate the sovereign right of the Assembly on budgetary matters. This right had, moreover, been recognised and respected by the Council, since it consulted the Supervisory Commission beforehand, and its decision was conditional on the approval of the necessary credits by the Assembly. Since the application of the new scale from January 1st, 1930, made it necessary to include a credit of 7,500 florins in the budget, the Fourth Committee, in confirming the above interpretation, referred the question to the Supervisory Commission. At the meeting of the Fourth Committee during which this question was taken up, the Registrar of the Court spontaneously renounced the amount entered in the supplementary budget for 1932, thus allowing the credit to be cancelled.

On the proposal of the Secretary-General, the Fourth Committee postponed until next year the consideration of the salaries of counsellors and also the question of septennial leave for officials of the First Division.

Actuated by the same spirit of economy, the Committee decided to postpone until next year the question of the new scale of salaries applicable to the Secretary-General's Chef de Cabinet, the Chiefs of Section, and the Deputy Registrar of the Permanent Court of International Justice.

The Fourth Committee therefore proposes to the Assembly the adoption of the following resolution :

" The Assembly,

" Having examined the report and the Minutes of the meetings of the Committee appointed by the Assembly at its eleventh session to consider (1) the retention or elimination, the increase or reduction of the posts of Under-Secretary-General, as well as the consequences resulting therefrom, (2) all cognate questions on the organisation of the Secretariat, the International Labour Office and the Registry of the Permanent Court of International Justice which the Assembly had decided to adjourn in 1930 :

" (1) Adopts the present report;

" (2) Decides that the framework of the higher ranks of the Secretariat should be provisionally maintained as it stands;

" (3) Requests the Secretary-General to see that all new or renewed contracts concluded with the Deputy Secretary-General or the Under-Secretaries-General :

" (a) Should have a maximum duration of three years;

" (b) Should contain a clause under which they may be denounced within a period of one year from the date on which the Secretary-General officially notifies the Council of his intention of resigning, this denunciation only to take effect as from the date on which the new Secretary-General assumes his duties or in the year following;

" (4) Is of opinion that, in regard to the appointment or promotion of officials to one of the higher posts in the Secretariat, the first and foremost consideration must be the knowledge and capacity of the candidate, which must be in keeping with the duties he will be called upon to fulfil, account being taken, however, in such choice of the different forms of national civilisation;

" (5) Approves the conclusions of the present report in regard to the salaries and conditions of engagement of the Secretary-General, the Deputy Secretary-General, the Under-Secretaries-General, the Registrar of the Permanent Court of International Justice, the Directors, the Treasurer, the Secretary-General's Chef de Cabinet, the Chiefs of Section and the Deputy Registrar of the Court. "

ANNEX 9.

FINANCIAL QUESTIONS.

REPORT OF THE FOURTH COMMITTEE TO THE ASSEMBLY.[1]

Rapporteur: M. E. C. BOHEMAN (Sweden).

The present report deals with all the questions on the agenda of the Fourth Committee, with the exception of those concerning the organisation of the Secretariat, the contributions in arrears and the new buildings, which are dealt with in separate documents.

I. AUDITED ACCOUNTS FOR 1930.

The Fourth Committee unanimously recommended that the Assembly should pass the accounts of the Secretariat and of the autonomous organisations of the League in the form in which they have been presented. One speaker pointed out that it would be desirable to state in the accounts the reasons for the differences between the estimates and the final figures or the reasons for any savings effected.

II. BUDGET FOR 1932.

(a) General Discussion, Ordinary Budget and Supplementary Budget.

The general discussion on the budget, which was particularly thorough and detailed this year, was extremely interesting. More than thirty members spoke, and all except the Spanish and Lithuanian delegates advocated the reduction of the budget, laying special stress on the fact that, at a time when each State Member of the League was confronted with an extremely serious economic and financial crisis and was making every effort to reduce public expenditure, the League of Nations should adopt the same policy, the more so since the increasing amount of contributions in arrears gave rise to a certain uneasiness.

It was generally recognised that the increase in the budget of the League was due mainly to appropriations voted for the Disarmament Conference in 1932, and that these appropriations should not be affected by any measures of economy that might be taken. Further, it was agreed that the proposed economies should not interfere with the essential work of the League, which, in 1932, would have to concentrate its efforts mainly on disarmament and the questions touching the financial and economic depression. At the outset, definite proposals were put forward to the effect that the budget should be referred back to the Supervisory Commission for examination with a view to a certain ratio of reduction. The attention of the Committee was also drawn to the difficulties which might arise when the budget for 1933 was drawn up. The Committee, however, in agreement with the authors of these proposals, merely referred the budget as a whole to the Supervisory Commission, requesting it to recommend any reductions it might be possible to effect. The Supervisory Commission complied rapidly and efficiently with the Fourth Committee's request. It made a detailed study of every item of the budget in close collaboration with the Secretary-General, the Director of the International Labour Office and the Registrar of the Permanent Court of International Justice, and it then submitted to the Fourth Committee proposals providing for a reduction of 2,604,999 gold francs on the budget (including the supplementary budget).

The Committee's report made it clear that the proposed reductions were not to be regarded as implying that the estimates for expenditure entered in the original budget could on any account whatever be considered superfluous or extravagant. The draft budget was a carefully compiled estimate of the sums necessary to give effect to the Assembly's decisions and to continue the work of the various organisations of the League; whereas the revised budget was designed to meet the entirely abnormal conditions which had developed within the last five months, and provided, in many cases, for the postponement of work rather than for its abandonment.

The reductions proposed by the Committee referred chiefly to the four following categories of expenditure:

(1) Expenditure on the various conferences, meetings of experts, etc., held under the auspices of the League;
(2) Travelling allowances paid to the members of committees, experts and officials;
(3) Cost of printing, publishing and circulating the League's documents;
(4) Salaries and allowances other than those protected by contractual obligations.

As regards conferences and meetings, the Supervisory Commission was guided by the following principle: whenever a meeting originally fixed for 1932 could, without serious inconvenience to the work in question, be postponed until 1933 or to a subsequent year, the credits provided should be suspended for the moment. Similarly, when credits had been appropriated for two or more meetings of a committee during the year, it should in many cases be possible to arrange the work of that committee so as to be capable of being handled at longer intervals, or with a smaller number of meetings. As the Committee had hoped, the responsible authorities have seen their way in both classes of cases to be satisfied with reduced credits. In other cases, they agreed to reduce the length of the session and the number of experts, etc., invited to take part in it. The Commission was confident that these alterations in the arrangements would not cause inconvenience to persons who lent their valuable services to the League, because they would place the general interest above everything else and would not misunderstand the reasons for these measures.

[1] This is the final text of the report as adopted by the Committee

It should be noted that the Supervisory Commission was of opinion that a sum of 3,500,000 francs would suffice to meet the cost of the International Disarmament Conference. This reduction in the credit of 4,000,000 inserted in the budget has been proposed, on the one hand, as an outcome of the reduction in the number of conferences and sessions of the committees to be held in 1932, which will make it possible provisionally to second to the Conference staff a certain number of officials of the Secretariat belonging to sections other than the Disarmament Section; and, on the other hand, of a revision of the estimates for printing.

As regards travelling allowances to members of committees and League officials, the Supervisory Commission proposes to reduce the present scale to the following figures:

Category	Present figures	New figures
	Swiss francs
Members of committees, experts, etc.	70	60
Officials of the rank of chiefs of section and higher rank	60	54
Members of the intermediate class and higher rank	40	37.50
Other officials	30	28.50

The Supervisory Commission further recommends the Assembly to reduce by 25 per cent —i.e., from 2,000 to 1,500 francs — in 1932, the special allowance granted to members of the permanent Mandates Commission when they have sat for more than twenty-four days in one and the same year.

The cost of printing, publishing and distributing League documents has been reduced by roughly 25 per cent. This reduction has been made possible partly by the Supervisory Commission's proposal, based on a resolution adopted by the Assembly in 1928, that all committee Minutes, except those of the Assembly, the European Union Commission and the Permanent Mandates Commission, should be discontinued.

When unanimously approving the Supervisory Commission's report, the Fourth Committee was anxious to mark its appreciation of the valuable work so conscientiously performed by the Commission. At the same time it thought it advisable to examine chapter by chapter the budgets of the various organisations as modified by the Supervisory Commission's recommendations.

During this discussion, interesting suggestions were made by several speakers, some of which will be followed, the Secretary-General or the Chairman of the Supervisory Commission having declared themselves in their favour.

The latter stated, for example, that the Supervisory Commission proposed to consider, before the next Assembly, the question of the League's branch offices in certain cities other than Geneva. Further, the Secretary-General agreed to a proposal that a clause should in future be embodied in the contracts of the staff to the effect that salaries might be varied by decision of the Assembly.

The Secretary-General undertook to examine the desirability of restricting the distribution of League documents by writing to the persons to whom they were sent and asking them to inform the Secretariat whether they really wished to continue to receive them. He also promised to give in future more detailed particulars of the cost of the principal journeys undertaken by Secretariat officials during the preceding financial year.

Other speakers, while not suggesting that certain of the Supervisory Commission's proposals should be rejected, pointed out that they might hamper the work of certain sections—for example, the Minutes of the Opium Committee are a powerful instrument of propaganda, and, the reduction of the appropriations for the Social Section might impair the prestige and restrict the influence of that section, whose value has time and again been recognised.

Certain members of the Committee called attention to the difficulties that might result from the Supervisory Commission's proposal that the Mandates Commission should hold only one session instead of two in 1932, and suggested that, if the Commission's work suffered in consequence, the Council should be empowered to take such steps as it might think desirable. Finally, one speaker called the Committee's attention to the funds allocated to the Information Section, which seemed to him excessive.

(b) Effects on the Budget of Certain Recommendations included in the Report of the New Committee of Thirteen.

The recommendations of the Fourth Committee arising out of the report submitted by the new Committee of Thirteen are the subject of a special report. Nevertheless, it is expedient to indicate here the effects of these recommendations on the 1932 Budget.

The Fourth Committee decided to postpone until next year the question of the new scale of salaries applicable to Chiefs of Sections. It has therefore been possible to deduct from the supplementary budget the supplementary credits involved, amounting to 1,500 francs for the Secretariat and 27,000 francs for the International Labour Office.

With regard to the Treasurer, the Committee proposes to the Assembly that it should immediately grant him the rank of Director, with the proviso that no increase in salary should be granted for this year. The supplementary budget for the Secretariat is thus reduced by 2,500 francs.

Lastly, the Committee agreed to the Supervisory Commission's proposal, dated September 23rd, concerning the Registrar of the Permanent Court of International Justice. This official's position is, therefore, as follows: The scale of salary fixed by the Council on the proposal of the Court for the period January 1st, 1930–December 31st, 1936, ranging from 27,000 to 32,000 florins, by means of annual increments of 1,250 florins, is applicable as from now. On the other hand, the credit of 7,500 florins included in the supplementary budget by the decision of the Council, subject to the Assembly's approving the necessary credits, has been cancelled, as the Registrar has, of his own accord, foregone, for 1932, the benefit of the above scale. The Committee greatly appreciated this gesture on the part of a particularly distinguished official.

(c) Supplementary Credits.

The Fourth Committee approved, in certain cases by a majority vote, the various proposals for supplementary credits put forward by committees of the Assembly in the form submitted to it by the Supervisory Commission, except in connection with the constitution of a committee to examine the material relating to slavery. Although the Supervisory Commission recommended the rejection of the credit for this new committee, the Fourth Committee considered that a credit of 10,000 francs should be entered in the budget for this purpose, it being understood that, as regards any gifts which might be offered to cover the balance of the expenditure on the proposed committee, those intending to make such offers should inform the Council in good time.

The budget and the revised budget for 1932 may be summarised as follows:

	Original budget (including supplementary budget)	Revised budget [1]
	Swiss francs
1. Secretariat and special organisations of the League	20,689,917	19,174,317
2. International Labour Organisation	9,463,290	8,792,290
3. Permanent Court of International Justice	2,790,140	2,663,702
4. Nansen International Office for Refugees	330,847	297,763
5. Buildings at Geneva	1,748,899	1,748,899
6. Pensions	1,015,023	1,011,023
Total	36,038,116	33,687,994

III. Reports of the Supervisory Commission.

The Fourth Committee accepted all the proposals of a general nature contained in the various reports of the Supervisory Commission, except as regards the definition of local staff, a question which it requested the Supervisory Commission to examine afresh.

The above paragraph refers particularly to the recommendations concerning:

1. The disposal of the surplus for the financial year 1930.

The Commission recommended that the reimbursement of the advances, amounting to 535,179 francs, made out of the Working Capital Fund, to the International Labour Office during 1930, should be considered as a first charge on the surplus of 659,077.82 francs for the financial year 1930. This surplus will thus be reduced to 123,898.82 francs, which sum will, under Article 38(a) of the Financial Regulations, be returned to the Members of the League in 1932.

2. Question of publications.

The Supervisory Commission proposed that the Assembly should vote the following resolution:

> "When proposals involving publications not immediately required for work already undertaken by the League are made by a League body, no final decision shall be taken until the Secretary-General has been consulted regarding the financial and administrative consequences of these proposals."

[1] For full details regarding the modifications approved by the Assembly, see Appendix to Annex 6 (page 114).

3. Salaries of locally-recruited staff.

In accordance with the decision taken by the Assembly at its eleventh session, the Supervisory Commission, in agreement with the Secretary-General and the Director of the International Labour Office, has drawn up a new scale of salaries for the locally recruited officials of the Secretariat and Labour Office.

The credits necessitated by the application of this new scale are included in the budget which has been submitted by the Fourth Committee to the Assembly.

IV. Staff Pensions Fund.

The Committee examined the report of the Administrative Board of the Staff Pensions Fund and approved the two amendments to the Staff Pensions Regulations proposed by the Board. It noted that the first valuation of the Fund would only take place at the beginning of 1932—i.e., after the end of the time-limit granted to officials to state whether they wished to join the Fund or not. In these circumstances, it recommends that, in 1932, the League's contribution to the Fund should, as in 1931, be 9 per cent of the salaries subject to deduction, and proposes the adoption of the following resolution:

" The Assembly,

" Takes note of the first annual report of the Administrative Board of the Staff Pensions Fund; and

" Adopts the following amendments to the Staff Pensions Regulations:

" Article 3, paragraph 1, to read as follows:

" ' The execution of the present regulations and the management of the Pensions Fund shall be effected by an Administrative Board consisting of three members elected by the Assembly, a representative of the Secretary-General of the League of Nations, a representative of the Director of the International Labour Office, the Treasurer of the League of Nations, and three members elected by secret ballot by the officials who are subject to the present regulations. Where questions directly affecting the officials of the Registry of the Permanent Court of International Justice are under consideration, a representative of the Registrar shall be added to the Board.'

" Article 12, paragraph 4, to read as follows:

" ' The Administrative Board shall decide in each particular case whether the benefits of the present article shall extend to adopted children, step-children or children not born in wedlock.'

" Decides that the contribution of the League of Nations to the Pensions Fund for 1932 shall be 9 per cent of the salaries subject to deduction as defined in the Staff Pensions Regulations."

Admission of the Staff of the International Institute of Intellectual Co-operation and of the Nansen International Office for Refugees to the Pensions Fund of the League of Nations.

The Committee examined two resolutions of the Governing Bodies of these institutions asking that their respective staffs should be admitted to the Pensions Fund. It decided to refer these requests to the Administrative Board of the Staff Pensions Fund for examination and report. It accordingly proposes the following resolution:

" The Assembly,

" Notes the resolution of the Governing Body of the International Institute of Intellectual Co-operation requesting the admission of the staff of this Institute to the Staff Pensions Fund;

" Further notes a similar request from the Governing Body of the Nansen International Office for Refugees; and

" Decides to submit these two resolutions to the Administrative Board of the Staff Pensions Fund for examination and report to the Assembly at the latter's next session."

V. Miscellaneous Questions.

(a) The Chairman of the Supervisory Commission informed the Fourth Committee that, although not critical, the financial position of the League was less favourable than at the corresponding stages of the five previous financial periods, and so many contributions had not yet been sent in. The Fourth Committee therefore thought it advisable, with the object of avoiding, if possible, a deficit at the end of 1931, to forward to the Assembly a draft resolution requesting officials to make every possible restriction in expenditure, and begging the Council and the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to cancel or postpone any meetings arranged for the last three months of the present financial period.

In this connection, the Chairman of the Supervisory Commission pointed out that it would be of great advantage to the Treasury of the League if the various Governments would do their utmost to arrange for the payment of at least a portion of their contributions at the beginning of the year.

(b) The Rapporteur of the Supervisory Commission pointed out to the Committee that the Council had decided during the present financial year to charge against Item 3 of the Budget, "Unforeseen expenditure subject to special vote of the Council", expenses which, according to the terms of the Council's resolution, appeared to be recoverable. The Secretary-General had stated that, after careful examination, he had decided not to pay from the Working Capital Fund the sums required in the case in question, as repayment seemed somewhat uncertain in view of the fact that the money was to be used for the creation of a body which did not yet exist. In reply, the Rapporteur of the Commission gave it as his opinion that the terms of Article 33 of the Financial Regulations did not allow of any option, and that, should the advances prove not recoverable, the necessary sum for repayment should be provided for in a subsequent budget of the League.

In this connection the opinion was expressed that the Council, during this year, had drawn too freely on the credit provided under Item 3 for unforeseen expenses of a political nature. This tendency was doubly objectionable, in that it deprived the Assembly of the financial control which should belong to it, and diminished the likelihood of any surplus at the end of the current year.

(c) The Fourth Committee referred to the Supervisory Commission, the question of the revision of the regulations regarding the granting of retiring pensions to ordinary judges and to the Registrar of the Permanent Court of International Justice, and a draft resolution, submitted by the delegate of Uruguay, in favour of the payment of contributions in twelve monthly instalments, and requested it to present a report on these questions to the next Assembly;

(d) Having before it a communication addressed to the President of the Assembly by the permanent Delegate of Nicaragua to the League of Nations relating to the payment of that country's contribution to the League, the Commission profoundly distressed by the catastrophe which occurred in Nicaragua recommended the Assembly to adopt the draft resolution shown at the end of this report.

VI. Rotation in Membership of the Supervisory Commission.

The Fourth Committee, after a secret ballot, proposed to the Assembly the election of the two following regular members of the Supervisory Commission for the period ending December 31st, 1934.

Lord Meston of Agra, M. C. J. Hambro.

VII. Draft Resolutions.

Finally, the Fourth Commission has the honour to propose to the Assembly the following draft resolutions:

"1. The Assembly, in virtue of Article 38 of the Regulations for the Financial Administration of the League of Nations, finally passes the audited accounts of the League of Nations for the twelfth financial period ending on December 31st, 1930."

"2. The Assembly,

"In virtue of Article 17 of the Regulations for the Financial Administration of the League of Nations,

"Passes, for the financial period 1932, the general budget of the League of Nations—of the Secretariat and Special Organisations of the League, of the International Labour Organisation and of the Permanent Court of International Justice—amounting, including supplementary credits, to the total sum of 33,687,994 gold francs, including 3,500,000 francs for the International Disarmament Conference,

"And decides that the aforesaid budget shall be published in the Official Journal."

"3. The Assembly,

"Profoundly distressed by the catastrophe which has occurred in Nicaragua and has totally destroyed its capital,

"Decides to exempt that country from the payment of half its contribution to the budget for the financial year 1932 and to defer the payment of the balance."

"4. The Assembly adopts the conclusions of the various reports of the Supervisory Commission submitted for its consideration, except in regard to the request for credits put forward by the Sixth Committee for the establishment of a committee to examine the material relating to slavery, and in regard to the alteration in the definition of 'locally recruited staff'."

"5. The Assembly appoints as members of the Supervisory Commission for the period ending on December 31st, 1934, Lord Meston of Agra and M. C. J. Hambro."

"6. The Assembly adopts the conclusions of the report of the Fourth Committee."

ALLOCATION OF EXPENSES.

REPORT OF THE FOURTH COMMITTEE TO THE ASSEMBLY.

Rapporteur: M. E. C. BOHEMAN (Sweden).

M. Réveillaud, Chairman of the Committee for the Allocation of Expenses, reminded the Fourth Committee that, in accordance with a decision taken by the Assembly of 1928, the Committee for the Allocation of Expenses had been instructed by the Council to submit to the Assembly of 1932 a new and definite scale for the contributions of the States Members of the League. In view of the present economic and financial situation, however, it seemed extremely difficult to draw up a new scale which would have a permanent scientific value. The Allocation Committee was therefore of the opinion that the question of a definite scale should be deferred until the Assembly of 1934.

The Fourth Committee agreed with this proposal: its decision was preceded by a long discussion — reported in the Minutes of the meetings of September 25th and 26th — during which the delegates of several States emphasised the particularly difficult position in which their respective countries found themselves and the disadvantages which would result from the adjournment of the revision of the scale of allocation. In a spirit of mutual concession, unanimous agreement was, however, reached on the proposal of the Allocation Committee.

With regard to the number of units to be allocated to Mexico, which was admitted to the League at this session of the Assembly, the Fourth Committee was informed that the Allocation Committee had already examined the position and had recommended that Mexico should be responsible for fourteen units.

The following resolution is therefore submitted to the Assembly by the Fourth Committee:

"The Assembly,

"I. Approving the recommendation of the Allocation Committee:

"Fixes at fourteen the number of units allocated to Mexico in the scale of apportionment of the League's expenditure;

"II. Amending the decision taken on September 26th, 1928:

"Requests the Council to ask the Allocation Committee not to submit its draft revised scale until the 1934 Assembly."

CONSTRUCTION OF THE NEW BUILDINGS.

REPORT OF THE FOURTH COMMITTEE TO THE ASSEMBLY.

Rapporteur: M. E. C. BOHEMAN (Sweden).

I.

The Supervisory Commission laid before the Fourth Committee a special paper on the subject of the new buildings dealing with a report addressed by the Building Committee to the Secretary-General on September 18th, 1931, and transmitted by him immediately to the Supervisory Commission for consideration. In this report, the Building Committee warned the Secretary-General that the estimates approved by the Assembly in 1930 would probably be exceeded by seven to eight million francs. In face of this serious situation, the Supervisory Commission considered it essential to consult the Fourth Committee immediately.

It will perhaps be convenient to summarise briefly here the different stages which led to the adoption of the estimates for the construction of the new buildings by the Assembly of 1930.

The Assembly, in 1927, approved the first report of the Special Committee of Five[1] concerning the new buildings and agreed in principle that the sum to be expended should be increased to approximately 19,500,000 francs.

[1] M. Adatci, M. Osusky, M. Politis, M. Urrutia and Sir Edward Hilton-Young.

In 1928, difficulties arose in regard to the lakeside site and the Assembly of that year approved the choice of the Ariana Park as the site for the new buildings.

A revised draft plan for the new site was approved by the Council in June 1929. This draft plan was accompanied by an estimate based on an average price per cubic metre, which put the cost of the buildings at 17,681,061 francs, leaving a margin of approximately 1,800,000 francs on the provisional credit of 19,500,000 francs. The architects stated that this sum would suffice for a modest layout of the grounds around the buildings, but that it would be insufficient to cover the cost of the arrangement of the park as shown in the plan, particularly the monumental terraces in front of the Assembly Hall facing the lake.

The Committee of Five instructed the architects to prepare an estimate of the cost of this latter work before the Assembly of 1929.

In the report of the Committee of Five to the Assembly of that year (document A.58. 1929) it was pointed out that the new site in the Ariana Park would involve much heavier expenditure on external work than the lakeside site and that the cost of erecting the buildings themselves would also be increased to some extent.

In view of these facts, and on the basis of further information furnished by the architects, the Committee of Five informed the Assembly that there was reason to fear that the rough estimate of cost presented by the architects with the draft plans approved by the Council in June 1929 would have to be increased by 10 to 15 per cent and that the cost of the supplementary external work mentioned above would amount to 1,500,000 francs in round figures.

The architects then proceeded with the preparation of their final plans and detailed estimates, and these were presented in June 1930. The total estimate for the Assembly Hall, Secretariat building and external work amounted to 23,633,150 francs, including architects' fees, office expenses and a margin of 759,555 francs for unforeseen expenditure. The cost of the new Library building, which is to be met out of the Rockefeller grant, was estimated at 4,250,000 francs. The plans and estimates were first submitted to the Building Committee for examination and a report was prepared by this Committee for the guidance of the Committee of Five.

The Building Committee stated that its technical members had proposed, as the margin for unforeseen expenditure was in their opinion inadequate, that the estimates should be increased by 5 per cent.

The architects replied that, in addition to the sum of 759,555 francs, a certain margin was allowed under each heading of the estimates for unforeseen expenditure. They stated, further, that the estimates had been drawn up on a well-defined technical basis, and were founded on current prices at Geneva, liberally calculated, so that considerable reductions might safely be counted upon when tenders were received for the work. Moreover, the estimates had not taken into account the freedom from import duties enjoyed by the League of Nations, and the economies under this head would still further increase the margin available for unforeseen expenditure. In view of these considerations put forward by the architects, the Building Committee finally decided to adopt the estimates as they stood.

The Committee of Five, after careful consideration of all these points, also decided to accept the architects' estimates, and in its report to the Assembly (document A.55.1930) recommended that the Assembly should approve the detailed estimates for the Assembly Hall and Secretariat Building amounting to 23,633,150 francs and for the Library to 4,250,000 francs.

In making this recommendation, the Committee of Five reminded the Assembly that the architects had allowed for a very simple style of construction and decoration and even quoted the passage which occurred in its preceding report, which reads as follows:

> "It should be added that the rough estimate furnished by the architects for the building proper refers to a simple construction. On this point the architects state in this report which accompanied their plan:
> > "'We desire to state clearly that our provisions are based upon a very simple treatment of the buildings as a whole and in detail. That is imposed by the funds available, which certainly do not altogether correspond to the size and the character of the buildings as laid down in the programme.'
>
> "The architects stated that the funds available would in any case be insufficient for really imposing buildings; but the Committee believes that it has always been the Assembly's intention to have buildings worthy of the League, but simple in outline and unpretentious. It should be pointed out that no funds have been provided either for works of art or for rich decorative materials."

This report of the Committee of Five having been approved by the Assembly on October 3rd, 1930, the basis of the scheme could be considered as definitely settled.

In February 1931, the Secretary-General notified the Supervisory Commission that the estimates had been exceeded by 178,000 francs on the work of levelling, and by 50,000 francs for drainage. It was noted, moreover, that the necessity of a special system of drainage of the subsoil had not been provided for in the architects' estimates.

With regard to the overspending on the levelling work, the architects indicated that this was in part due to the lowering of the levels fixed for the buildings, but that this would be compensated by a reduction in the cubic content of the buildings which the lower levels would permit.

Subsequently, during the excavations, further difficulties due to the nature of the subsoil necessitated the enlargment and reinforcement of the foundations to an appreciable degree, which resulted in further unforeseen expenditure.

Seriously concerned by this continued overspending, the Building Committee instructed the architects during the summer 1931 to revise completely the estimates presented to the Assembly in 1930. This revised estimate, which the architects were unable to submit to the Building Committee until September 9th, 1931, showed an increase of 2,771,845 francs over the 1930 estimates for the Assembly Hall and Secretariat, the estimate for the Library remaining unchanged.

The additional expenditure on the foundations accounted for about 1,200,000 francs, and the balance was caused by a slight increase in the cubic contents of the buildings and certain increases in various chapters of the estimate.

The Building Committee observed with some surprise that the revised estimates included no margin for unforeseen expenditure and that, in order to reduce, if possible, the increase on the credit already voted, the architects were contemplating certain economies which were scarcely acceptable, such as the use of artificial stone instead of natural stone in some part of the façade. The Building Committee therefore requested the architects to revise their calculations once again and to take fully into account all the accessory work necessary for the completion of the buildings.

Pending this further revision of the estimates, and before communicating the papers to the Supervisory Commission, the Building Committee asked its technical members for an approximate estimate of the final cost of the buildings. The technical members, while pointing out that it was impossible to make anything like an exact estimate at such short notice and without going into all the details, replied that it was their impression that the 1930 estimates would ultimately be exceeded by a sum in the neighbourhood of seven or eight million francs for the Assembly Hall and Secretariat.[1] The estimates for the Library they thought might be exceeded by some 1,750,000 francs.

Following upon discussions that took place on this subject between the technical members of the Building Committee and the architects, the latter addressed to the Building Committee two letters dated September 15th and 17th, both of which modify the figures of the revised estimates submitted on September 9th, 1931.

In one of these letters the architects agreed that a margin of 10 per cent on the revised estimate would be prudent, and reiterated their previous statement as to the simple and economic lines on which their scheme was prepared. In the second letter, the architects stated that provisions for certain fittings and external work which the Building Committee had pointed out were not included in the revised estimate would still further increase the total sum required.

The architects, at the invitation of the Building Committee, also suggested certain ways in which expenditure on the buildings might be cut down if absolutely necessary, with a view to avoid exceeding the credit already voted by the Assembly in 1930. It may be stated at once that these suggestions were not such as could be entertained.

The following table gives a comparison between the figures of the 1930 estimate, those of the revised estimate of September 9th, 1931, and those which result from the two above-mentioned letters from the architects :

	Swiss francs
1930 Estimate (see document A.55.1930).
Assembly Hall, Secretariat and outside work (including fees and office expenses)	23,633,150
Library (including fees and office expenses)	4,250,000
Estimate of September 9th, 1931.
Assembly Hall, Secretariat and outside work (including fees and office expenses)	26,404,995
Library (including fees and office expenses)	4,250,000
Letter of September 15th, 1931.
Assembly Hall, Secretariat and outside work (including fees and office expenses)	28,748,941
Library (including fees and office expenses)	4,671,640

[1] To make this estimate of the excess complete, it should be mentioned that, under the head of accessory expenditure (meetings of the Building Committee, staff salaries, printing expenses, etc.), provision must be made for an additional amount of something in the neighbourhood of 800,000 francs (see document C.C.478).

	Swiss francs
Letter of September 17th, 1931.
Assembly Hall, Secretariat and outside work (including fees and office expenses)	29,925,494
Library (including fees and office expenses)	5,389,998

It is only fair to add that the architects, when questioned by the Supervisory Commission, stated that the approximate estimate of an increase amounting to seven or eight million francs emanated from the Building Committee and not from them, and that they maintained the figures of their revised estimate of September 9th, 1931, which showed an increase over the 1930 figures of 2,771,845 francs. Their two letters to which reference has been made in this report were written in reply to certain questions put to them by the Building Committee, and they regarded the further increases mentioned therein as destined to provide a margin of security and provision for certain work which need not necessarily be executed at the present time.

II.

The Fourth Committee were fully alive to the seriousness of the situation, which might even bring prejudice upon the prestige of the League. A very full and frank discussion took place, in the course of which the necessity for prompt and energetic action was strongly emphasised, in order to put the building operations on a sound basis. Various solutions were examined, even the advisability of suspending the work until the present uncertainties were cleared up.

The difficulties arising out of the fact that the work is entrusted to an association of five architects were also considered, and various means of establishing unity of direction were examined, including the revision or cancellation of the architects' contract. The Fourth Committee finally came to the conclusion that it had neither the technical and legal competence nor, at this late stage, the time necessary to go fully into the matter. It therefore decided that the question should be referred to a Committee of Enquiry, enjoying the full confidence of the Assembly, to review the whole situation and, after having obtained the necessary technical and legal advice, to propose the necessary action. This Committee should be granted the fullest liberty, but would have to bear in mind the necessity, in principle, of remaining within the limits of the credits already voted. The Supervisory Commission, already requested by the Assembly of 1930 to deal with all financial questions in connection with the new buildings, was, in the opinion of the Fourth Committee, eminently qualified to undertake this task. In order to save time it was further decided to recommend that the same procedure which was followed in the case of the reports of the Special Committee of Five should be again adopted, and that the report of the Supervisory Commission should be submitted for approval and ratification to the Council of the League. The Fourth Committee therefore ventures to submit for the approval of the Assembly the following resolution:

> " The Assembly,
>
> " Having noted the report of the Fourth Committee on the question of the new buildings;
> " Painfully surprised at the information furnished to the Fourth Committee by the Supervisory Commission, to the effect that it is feared that the estimate approved by the Assembly at its eleventh ordinary session may be exceeded by from seven to eight million Swiss francs unless the situation is taken in hand:
> " Declares that it is resolved in principle to keep within the estimate adopted last year; and
>
> " Instructs the Supervisory Commission, after having obtained the necessary technical and legal advice and without excluding the possibility of reconsidering the contract concluded with the architects, to submit to the Council for approval as soon as possible a programme which will comply, under the best possible conditions, with the above decision."

ANNEX 29.

Official No.: A.93.1931.IX.

ARMAMENTS TRUCE: INFORMATION ON THE POSITION OF ARMAMENTS IN VARIOUS COUNTRIES.

REPORT OF THE THIRD COMMITTEE TO THE ASSEMBLY.

Rapporteur: M. DE MADARIAGA (Spain).

I.

In the general discussion of the report on the work of the League of Nations since the last Assembly, a number of speakers emphasised the decisive importance of the result of the coming General Conference for the Reduction and Limitation of Armaments.

The Third Committee noted with keen satisfaction that the Council had fixed February 2nd, 1932, as the date for the convening of the General Disarmament Conference, and that the confidence expressed by the eleventh Assembly in this connection had thus been justified. The representatives of many countries expressed the opinion that the Assembly ought not to adjourn without contributing to the work of the said Disarmament Conference, by preparing the moral atmosphere essential to its success by means of an act of international goodwill. This view was expressed by a large number of speakers in the Assembly, in particular by the first Italian delegate, M. Grandi, who announced a proposal for the institution of an armaments truce as a means of preparing the Conference. The matter was also the subject of a draft resolution (document A.51.1931.IX), submitted to the Assembly by the Danish, Norwegian, Netherlands, Swedish and Swiss delegations and referred to the Third Committee on September 12th last.

This draft resolution proposed that the Assembly should, in the first place, issue a solemn appeal to all who desire the application of the principles of peace and justice on which the Covenant is based to devote all their efforts to the creation of a world opinion strong enough to ensure the success of the Conference, and, in the second place, request the Council to urge the Governments summoned to the Conference to abstain, pending its result, from any steps for the increase of the present level of their armaments.

The Third Committee was of opinion that, in view of the close connection between its discussions on the subject and the work to be done by the Conference, it would be desirable for those States not represented in the Assembly, but which are invited to take part in the Conference, to take part also in the work of the Committee relating to disarmament.

On the Third Committee's proposal, the President of the Assembly, in agreement with the General Committee, on September 19th, invited the following States to be represented on the Committee: Afghanistan, Argentine, Brazil, Costa Rica, Egypt, Ecuador, Salvador, Turkey, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the United States of America. It was proposed that the States that were not members of the League should be represented in an advisory capacity only.

The following States accepted the Assembly's invitation: Costa Rica, Egypt, Turkey, the United States of America and Brazil, the latter being represented by an observer.

The Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics stated that, in view, amongst other things, of the short notice given, it was unable to send a delegate to take part in the discussions of the Third Committee. Being, however, always prepared to support any proposal for the limitation of armaments, it would be disposed to associate itself with the proposal of the Italian Foreign Minister, M. Grandi, provided that proposal was adopted in a form obligatory on all countries, and that it covered all classes of armaments, and that the signatories of the undertaking confirmed that it should not in any case replace or postpone the essential problem of disarmament or limitation of existing armaments, which must be settled as quickly as possible.

The Third Committee had before it, on the one hand, the draft resolution presented by the five countries; on the other hand, a concrete proposal proposed by the Italian delegation to give effect to the proposal made by M. Grandi at the Assembly. A discussion of some importance took place in connection with these proposals.

The idea of an armaments truce as a contribution to the preparation for the Conference met with general assent. But opinion was divided as to the forms and methods of giving practical application to this idea.

In the course of the Committee's discussions, the Italian delegation, with the support of a certain number of other delegations, and particularly of the British delegation, submitted a draft resolution which in its view, while based on the same motives as the five countries' draft resolution, was calculated to give more precise form to the idea of the armaments truce.

The Italian proposal was that each Government should undertake for a period of one year dating from November 1st, 1931:

(1) Not to increase its expenditure on land forces already authorised for the current financial year, and not to exceed the total of such expenditure during the next financial year until the expiry of the truce;

(2) Not to place any warship on the stocks, provided always that vessels under construction might be continued and completed;

(3) To suspend the construction of additional military aircraft, except to replace machines which are placed out of commission during the truce.

The British delegation completed the Italian proposal by an amendment to which the Italian delegation agreed, with regard to the procedure to be followed for the practical application of the Italian proposal.

The Committee, moreover, had before it certain amendments by the French delegation to the five countries' draft resolution. Useful suggestions were also made by a large number of delegates.

The Third Committee was of opinion that a tangible gesture should be made, indicating not only the desire of the countries represented on the Committee to renounce for one year, as from November 1st, 1931, any increase in the present level of their armaments, but also creating before February 2nd, 1932, an atmosphere favourable to the success of the great Disarmament Conference.

The Committee was fully conscious of the fact that such an undertaking could not and should not replace the decisions that might be reached on a contractual basis at the Conference itself.

Nevertheless, it felt that it would be expedient to make a gesture which, although having a chiefly moral character, would be, in the Committee's opinion, none the less effectual in its effects on the Governments and public opinion.

The Committee's aim has been to prepare the moral atmosphere of the Conference by getting the present session of the Assembly to take a plain and palpable decision for an armaments truce. Certain delegations felt that a vague obligation was likely to lead to different interpretations and consequently to dangerous controversies, and that only definite obligations could answer to the end in view. But this made it necessary to elaborate a veritable Convention, and only the Conference itself could do so at the outset of its work. Nevertheless, the Italian delegation, supported by other delegations, pointed out that this latter procedure would not enable the truce to be utilised as an element in preparing for the Conference, and it accordingly pressed its proposal.

But the Italian proposal, which had the virtue of defining the obligations to be assumed, contained, as some delegations thought, technical difficulties as regards execution, caused by the definition itself and by the short period allowed the various countries between the adoption and the execution of the plan. The Committee strove to combine the advantages of the various proposals by eliminating their disadvantages, viz., by inviting the various Governments to assume material obligations which were nevertheless sufficiently flexible to allow them to be carried out. The result was the resolution, the text of which is given later. This resolution is intended to prevent an increase in the effort at present being expended on the whole of the armaments of each country.

Certain delegations made a point of stating explicitly that they did not regard as incompatible with the principle thus laid down, which must remain predominant, such measures as the normal carrying out of legal enactments relating to effectives, the regular execution of programmes for the upkeep and renewal of land, naval and air material or fortifications and the constitution of the corresponding stocks.

The Armaments Truce will be brought about by means of an undertaking to be given in the form of a declaration by the various Governments before November 1st, 1931. Certain delegations consider that it is to be anticipated that in their replies States will take into account the position of their neighbours and especially those who are not members of the League of Nations.

If, as a result of unforeseen circumstances, such as are more likely to arise in the case of countries having responsibilities overseas, a Government should find itself compelled to suspend the operation of its declaration, the Secretary-General of the League of Nations should be immediately notified and should inform the other Governments concerned.

The Third Committee hopes that by unanimously accepting the proposed truce, the Governments Members or non-members of the League will help to create an atmosphere favourable to the work of the important Conference to which they have been summoned.

The Third Committee therefore proposes to the Assembly the adoption of the following resolution:

" Convinced that the crisis which at the present time is creating such profound disturbance among the nations of the world is due to a number of economic and political causes originating principally in the lack of mutual confidence between the nations, and

" Convinced that a renewal of the competition in armaments would necessarily lead to an international and social catastrophe:

" The Assembly addresses a solemn appeal to all those who are desirous that practical effect should be given to the principles of peace and justice upon which the Covenant is based and urges them to devote all their efforts towards creating a world opinion strong enough to enable the General Disarmament Conference to achieve positive results, including in particular a gradual reduction of armaments to be continued until such time as the object laid down in Article 8 of the Covenant is attained.

" In view of the fact that an undertaking on the part of all States not to increase their armaments would help to create an atmosphere of confidence, to prevent competition in armaments and to prepare the ground for the success of the forthcoming Conference:

" The Assembly,

" Requests the Governments invited to the Disarmament Conference to prepare for this event by means of an armaments truce and, accordingly,

" Requests the Council to urge the Governments convened to the said Conference to give proof of their earnest desire for the successful issue of the efforts to ensure and organise peace and, without prejudging the decisions of the Conference or the programmes or proposals submitted to it by each Government, to refrain from any measure involving an increase in their armaments.

" Likewise requests the Council to ask the Governments to state before November 1st, 1931, whether they are prepared for a period of one year as from that date to accept this truce in armaments."

II.

At the request of the Danish delegate, the Secretary of the Third Committee has furnished some information regarding the technical preparations for the Conference. He informed the Committee that, out of the sixty-three Governments invited to take part in the Conference, twenty-five have so far replied to the Council's resolutions of January and May last, in which the Governments were requested to forward particulars with regard to the position of their armaments and all other data, technical or otherwise, which might help to inform the Conference and to justify such specific proposals as the Governments may lay before it.

In its May resolution, the Council asked the Governments to forward these particulars before September 15th and to make use, as far as possible, of the model tables contained in the draft Convention drawn up by the Preparatory Commission, and of the model statement drawn up by the Committee of Experts on Budgetary Questions.

The Committee considers it of the highest importance that the Governments invited to the Conference should be in possession as early as possible of full information in respect of all the countries taking part. The Third Committee therefore has the honour to propose to the Assembly the adoption of the following resolution:

" The Assembly,

" Noting that of the sixty-three Governments invited to participate in the Disarmament Conference, twenty-five have up to the present communicated information on the position of their armaments in conformity with the recommendation made by the Council at its January and May sessions:

5. NATIONALITY OF WOMEN.

6. APPOINTMENT OF A SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO STUDY THE EXISTING SYSTEM OF ELECTIONS TO THE COUNCIL.

7. ENTRY INTO FORCE OF THE PROTOCOL OF SEPTEMBER 14TH, 1929, RELATING TO THE REVISION OF THE STATUTE OF THE PERMANENT COURT OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE.

FIRST MEETING.

Held on Wednesday, September 9th, 1931, at 4 p.m.

Chairman: M. SCIALOJA (Italy).

1. Election of the Vice-Chairman.

On the proposal of Count APPONYI (Hungary), seconded by M. CASSIN (France), M. POLITIS (Greece), M. HOFFINGER (Austria), and M. WOO KAISENG (China), M. LIMBURG (Netherlands) was elected Vice-Chairman.

2. Consideration and Adoption of the Agenda.

The Agenda was adopted without comment.

3. Amendment of the Covenant of the League of Nations in order to bring it into Harmony with the Pact of Paris: Observations submitted by the Governments (Series 1, 2 and 3) (Annex 1).

M. LIMBURG (Netherlands) reminded the Committee that the Sub-Committee, over which he had presided, had examined and revised the amendments of the Committee of Eleven; those amendments had been discussed by the First Committee, and the Assembly had communicated them for comment to the various Governments, especially those Governments which had hesitated to accept certain amendments. Consequently, the Committee was not, he thought, in a position to discuss the question immediately. It would be preferable to adjourn the discussion for a few days. Moreover, replies had not yet been received from all countries; fresh replies were coming in daily.

M. PILOTTI (Italy) suggested that the Secretariat be asked, as a preliminary step, to prepare a table showing, for each amendment proposed and each article of the Draft of the Committee of Eleven and the Draft of the Sub-Committee, a short summary of the Governments' replies.

M. POLITIS (Greece) supported M. Limburg's proposal for adjournment. The Committee was in a more or less unprepared state. Its members had not been definitely aware that the question would be discussed at the first meeting. Moreover, the main reason was that the question did not seem to be much more advanced than it had been in the previous year. Not only had most countries failed to reply, but, owing to various circumstances, the work of the Committee had not received all the attention it deserved. Consequently, he suggested that a few days later the members of the Committee should exchange views to ascertain on what lines the discussion could be resumed. The Committee could hardly hope to solve in the present year a problem which it had been unable to solve in the previous year, but that problem must remain on the agenda of the League's work. After a further exchange of views they would be able to draw up for the Assembly a report to be communicated to the various Governments in order that those which had not yet done so might reply and those which had already replied might confirm or amend their opinions. By such patient methods they might slowly reach their goal.

Count APPONYI (Hungary) also supported M. Limburg's proposal, for reasons similar to those advanced by M. Politis. He pointed out the extraordinary situation of the League of Nations: it met and worked on the basis of a Covenant that was partly in direct opposition to the Paris Pact, which was now regarded as universal law.

He did not share M. Politis' pessimism as to the possibility of reaching a satisfactory result that year, because the only points in dispute were few and had already been minutely discussed. It would, however, be difficult to prepare texts and make any definite proposals at a plenary meeting. The Committee might therefore decide to adjourn the discussion for a week, and, in the meantime, appoint a sub-committee to co-ordinate existing material and submit certain definite proposals to the Committee. That would be one way out of the rather comical situation he had just described.

M. HOFFINGER (Austria) regretfully agreed that the question should be adjourned, but only for a length of time sufficient to allow delegates to take cognisance of all the relevant documents. It would be preferable, before appointing a sub-committee, to have a short general discussion which would show what countries wished to make new suggestions. That would make it possible to constitute the sub-committee in such a way as to reflect the various shades of opinion.

Although reason urged him to share M. Politis' doubts, his heart bade him with even greater insistence support Count Apponyi's views—hope against hope that a result would be achieved in the course of the present year.

M. LIMBURG (Netherlands) had not meant to suggest that the question might be adjourned by the Assembly. On the contrary, he hoped that the Assembly would succeed that year in harmonising the Covenant with the Paris Pact. He agreed with M. Hoffinger that it would be desirable to appoint a sub-committee. Last year's sub-committee had worked hard; it had finally put forward certain amendments modifying the amendments of the Committee of Eleven. As a result of its labours, replies had been received from several Governments, and, of the latter, one at least had shown a great spirit of conciliation. But certain Governments, including some which had expressed hesitation, had not yet replied. A general discussion would reveal what points a sub-committee might possibly consider.

M. CASSIN (France) also favoured a preliminary general discussion, in the course of which Governments which had not been able to send in a written reply might explain their views. The general discussion would also make it possible to obtain an adequate idea of the situation before appointing the members of the sub-committee.

The members of the sub-committee were not free agents like cardinals and could not, therefore, be shut up in a sort of conclave from which they could only emerge when they reached a decision. They were the representatives of their Governments. Accordingly, it would be preferable that the general discussion should be as wide as possible.

M. D'AVILA LIMA (Portugal) also urged an adjournment of the discussion, but not to a distant date. He therefore supported M. Limburg's proposal. He thought the documents supplied by the Secretariat showed that almost all Governments were prepared to subscribe to the sub-committee's text.

M. WOO KAISENG (China) thought that the three proposals could be regarded as complementary. He therefore supported the proposal to adjourn the discussion.

The CHAIRMAN thought that, before reaching a decision, the Committee ought to consider the problem as a whole. The problem was an amalgam of law and policy : policy, because it might be dangerous for the League to venture somewhat thoughtlessly into what might prove to be a blind alley, as had already happened more than once.

Complaints had in fact been made that most of the amendments proposed in the previous year had produced no practical effect. They could not, however, contemplate a fundamental revision of the organic statute of the League in any light-hearted spirit. As Count Apponyi had pointed out, it was a very serious matter for the League to be living under an organic statute all the articles of which had been undermined by a proposal for radical reform. Count Apponyi had said that they ought to endeavour rapidly to emerge from this state of uncertainty and reach a solution that year. He himself, on the contrary, thought they ought to progress slowly, because, if they finally drew up a text which was not approved by all countries, they would not merely have shaken the Covenant of the League. The Covenant might live on, but it would be maimed.

They should think less of speed and more of good craftsmanship. They should leave the Covenant untouched until they had formulated a proposal which could be accepted by all the Members of the League. Therein lay the great difficulty of the problem. Last year two texts had been proposed and had led to no result. It was useless, therefore, to continue along the same lines in the present year. He did not in the least mean to suggest that the question ought not to be studied, but from the outset it should be laid down that the question would be studied calmly, cautiously and fully, and that no proposal would be put forward unless it was certain to be accepted.

If the discussions were to bear fruit, the Committee must, as had been observed, acquaint itself with all the documents on the question, particularly as since September last several very important events had occurred, including the approval of the Kellogg Pact by the United States Senate. He hoped that the Secretariat would supply the Committee with a copy of the Minutes of the meeting at which the Senate gave its approval.

He thought he was correct in stating that at that meeting certain important declarations had been made—which had not been disavowed—to the effect that the United States approved the Kellogg Pact with the reservation that each State might interpret that Pact as it wished. To embody the Kellogg Pact in the Covenant without probing that fundamental point would be tantamount to allowing every nation to interpret the amended Covenant as it desired—and that would mean the end of the Covenant.

He had felt obliged to submit these few remarks in order to prove how necessary it was for the Committee to prepare itself for the discussion of this important question. Moreover, the situation had completely changed since September 1930. Once again he would urge the Committee to proceed slowly, for, if it were to submit proposals which did not obtain the consent of a sufficient number of States, it would have done more harm than good.

In support of his argument he would have the Committee note that thirty-four out of fifty-four States had not replied to the Secretary-General's circular letter concerning the amendment of the Covenant. The States which had not replied were the following : Abyssinia, Albania, Argentine, Austria, Belgium, Bolivia, Canada, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Germany, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Liberia, Lithuania, Luxemburg, Nicaragua, Paraguay, Persia, Peru, Roumania, Salvador, Siam, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Uruguay, Venezuela and Yugoslavia.

He therefore proposed that no discussion of the substance of the question should take place before the Secretariat had supplied all the members of the Committee with all the necessary information. Though most members were acquainted with the text of the Kellogg Pact, which had been reproduced in many documents, they were not all acquainted with its history or all that had been done in connection with it. As soon as the delegations had been put in possession of these documents, he would convene the Committee. The question would still remain the first item on the Committee's agenda.

The proposal was adopted.

SECOND MEETING.

Held on Monday, September 14th, 1931, at 10.30 a.m.

Chairman: M. LIMBURG (Netherlands).

4. Communication: Proposal by the Bureau.

The CHAIRMAN explained that Item 1 of the agenda—"Amendment of the Covenant of the League of Nations in order to bring it into Harmony with the Pact of Paris"—had been adjourned, but unfortunately the Assembly journal had not mentioned that fact in the agenda for the day. He proposed, therefore, that the Committee should deal with the second item on the agenda—namely, the proposal of the Government of Finland.

M. HOFFINGER (Austria) was surprised at this further adjournment of the first item, after it had been agreed at the first meeting that it would be adjourned only for a few days. He had no objection to discussing the Finnish proposal if a date were immediately fixed for the discussion on the Amendment to the Covenant, which, he hoped, would be the next meeting of the Committee.

M. RUNDSTEIN (Poland) proposed that Item 4 of the agenda—"Preparatory Procedure to be followed in the Case of General Conventions to be negotiated under the Auspices of the League"—should be discussed before Item 3—"Progressive Codification of International Law". There ought to be some discussion of the procedure to be followed in the case of General Conventions before the question of the progressive codification of international law was considered, because the whole object of codification was the preparation of these Conventions.

The CHAIRMAN asked M. Rundstein not to press that point for the moment. When the Committee came to consider Item 3, it could decide whether Item 4 should be taken first or not.

Baron DESCAMPS-DAVID (Belgium) reminded the Committee that at the last meeting the Chairman had clearly stated that Item 1 still remained the first item on the agenda. He urged that a date should be fixed for the adjourned discussion. He proposed the next meeting if possible; but, at any rate, some date should be fixed immediately.

The CHAIRMAN said he had been asked by several members not to take Item 1 that morning. Consequently, he suggested that the Committee should now discuss the Finnish Government's proposal. In the course of the meeting he would announce a date for the discussion of the amendments to the Covenant. One difficulty was to decide whether it was necessary to distribute certain American documents which had been mentioned at the last meeting.

It was decided to proceed with the discussion of Item 2 of the agenda, leaving the Chairman to make a proposal, at the end of the meeting, regarding the date of the discussion of Item 1.

5. Proposal by the Government of Finland to confer on the Permanent Court of International Justice Jurisdiction as a Tribunal of Appeal in respect of Arbitral Tribunals established by States: Report of the Committee appointed by the Council (Annex 2).

M. ERICH (Finland) said that the Finnish Government's proposal to recognise the Permanent Court of International Justice as a Court of Appeal for certain arbitration decisions had been very favourably received. In the realm of international doctrine several authors strongly endorsed the proposal. In 1929 the Institute of International Law had approved the suggestion, and had in certain respects gone further than that suggestion. The report of the Committee of Experts appointed by the Council on the subject was also favourable.

The proposal did not involve a general right of remedy; it instituted a right to submit to the Court an arbitral award only in case of a plea to the jurisdiction, acts which were ultra vires, or—the Committee of Experts had added—some radical defect in procedure. It had laid down the general principle that the new provision to be decided upon would apply only when the award referred to a dispute in which the parties were discussing a point of law. That, however, did not mean that in principle an application on other grounds was to be excluded. An arbitral tribunal might act ultra vires in a dispute not on a point of law, and the question whether a decision was thus invalidated was always a question of law, whatever the nature of the dispute.

The Committee, however, thought that at first a more limited rule should be recognised. States could always agree either to extend those principles or to conclude special agreements to the effect that certain cases of arbitral awards should, even if they referred to a point of law be without appeal to the Court.

Of the Committee's three proposals, the Finnish Government preferred No. 2, the resolution to which a Protocol open for accession was appended. If that were adopted simultaneously with a recommendation that in future arbitration treaties should include a provision in the same sense, the system would be an excellent one.

The third plan laid down, in a general resolution, that a State which disputed the binding character of an arbitral award, on one or more of the grounds referred to, might submit such an award to the Permanent Court of International Justice for decision. One possible procedure would be to combine the declaration with a formal recommendation that treaties should be drafted in such a way as to recognise that the Permanent Court at The Hague afforded a remedy. If plan No. 2 could not be accepted, plans Nos. 1 and 3 might then be combined.

As a member of the Committee of Experts, he would have preferred the Finnish proposal to the effect that the validity of an award could be disputed either on the ground of lack of jurisdiction or on the ground of ultra vires, but not on the plea of a radical defect in procedure.

M. Hoffinger (Austria) said that his Government was in favour of the Finnish proposal, which, when first made, only referred to cases of lack of jurisdiction and acts ultra vires. It considered that the addition, to these two causes, of "an essential defect in procedure" deeply modified the nature of the proposal. He was happy to note that M. Erich himself proposed a reversion to the original form. The possibility of appeal against an award was not an inseparable attribute common to all legal procedure. On the contrary, every decision or award emanated from a supreme judicial power. National judicial hierarchies with their courts of various instance were only the practical outcome of the multiplicity of cases which the judiciary had to decide and which involved the delegation, or at any rate the temporary delegation, of part of its powers to secondary instances. In international law no supreme judicial power had existed until a few years previously, apart from that which States themselves conferred by appointing arbitral tribunals. Quite recently States had recognised the jurisdiction of the Permanent Court as a jurisdiction inter se but not in any way as a court at which remedy could be obtained against the awards of arbitral tribunals. The latter, within the limits of the jurisdiction conferred upon them by States, were, equally with the Court, supreme judicial tribunals. The powers of these arbitral tribunals and of the Court were co-ordinated but did not represent different degrees of a judicial hierarchy. It had obviously not been the intention of the Finnish proposal to place arbitral tribunals in a position of inferiority as compared with the Court, or to reduce their status by creating a channel of redress on the lines of national juridical systems. The aim was to provide against the possibility of an arbitral tribunal, which was a supreme judicial power as between the States (though only for the case or class of cases for which the States had conferred jurisdiction upon it), exercising its powers beyond the limits thus set.

It was natural that, when once the Permanent Court had come into existence, States should apply to that Court for redress against the possibility of arbitral tribunals exceeding their powers or duties; but that did not yet imply that the tribunals themselves had a jurisdiction secondary to that of the Court, provided they kept strictly within the limits of the case which they were called upon to decide. An application in the case of lack of jurisdiction or acts ultra vires might, therefore, be justified, though it would not be without danger. Any extensive and perhaps vexatious resort to the possibility of application for redress might lead to a weakening of the authority of arbitral tribunals, but that danger was counterbalanced by the fact that the Finnish proposal opened out a way for the settlement of cases which at present ended in an impasse.

The case of an essential defect in procedure was, however, quite different. Defects of procedure were not in the same plane as the other two causes. While the procedure of an arbitral tribunal might be defective, that did not necessarily imply that it had exceeded the competence of its supreme jurisdiction. In the other two cases, it had done so, and could, therefore, no longer claim supreme jurisdiction. Appeal in such cases would definitely connote the establishment of degrees of jurisdiction in international procedure and would place arbitral tribunals in the position of secondary courts. Quite probably, if the causes for appeal were amplified beyond the first two causes, it might become the rule to attack arbitral awards, and Government agents would employ all their wits in discovering or manufacturing defects of procedure when their party had lost its case, in order to provide that party with another chance before another tribunal, or at any rate in order to gain time. That danger was increased by the fact that arbitral tribunals did not possess any exact or detailed rules of procedure such as those which governed national courts for every hearing. It would therefore be easy for parties to plead defects of procedure and multiply their applications for redress.

There was yet one more danger. At the present time the fact of being chosen by States to act as an arbitrator—i.e., to be elected to the supreme judicial power as between those States, was held to be a great honour, so that States could apply to the highest authorities, to men of the highest qualifications and integrity. If the practice grew up of constantly appealing against arbitral awards, the authority of arbitral tribunals would be weakened, and it would become difficult to obtain first-rate arbitrators. Unless the discussion proved beyond all possible doubt the desirability of adding a "defect in procedure", it would be preferable to adopt M. Erich's proposal and retain lack of jurisdiction and acts ultra vires as the only two causes for an application for redress.

M. RUNDSTEIN (Poland) said that the Finnish proposal would prevent a question of a purely legal nature from becoming a political dispute. The three suggestions made by the Committee did not furnish a direct reply to the Finnish proposal; of the three, he would prefer No. 2 with a Protocol. The recommendation with a model for bilateral conventions did not seem very helpful. With regard to No. 3, he did not think the Assembly could impose a duty on States Members to accept a special amendment providing for appeal. The Assembly could not create a juridical obligation without the necessity for ratification. It would be well to dismiss plan No. 3. The Finnish proposal related only to difficulties of an exceptional character; and it was better to deal first with pathological cases, if such a term could be used. The Committee's report was based on French procedure, which allowed a plea for annulment in the case of lack of jurisdiction, ultra-vires acts, and a radical defect in procedure. Proceedings on a plea that a rule of law had been infringed would be difficult to admit in international law.

A procedure for remedy was admitted under existing international practice. The Statute of the Danube (Article 38), signed in 1921, provided that any decision of the International Commission could be referred to the Permanent Court on the plea of ultra vires. In other cases, such as the Railways and Maritime Ports Convention (Article 36), appeal to the Permanent Court was allowed, not in limine litis, but even lite pendente. But the case was one of evocation rather than appeal.

The title of this item of the agenda was not quite correct. The Finnish proposal was not to confer on the Court the character of a "cour d'appel", but rather of a "cour de cassation". It would be better, therefore, to refer to it as an "instance de recours".

M. ROLIN (Belgium) thought that the words "an essential defect in procedure" should be maintained, for he could imagine many such defects in procedure. Take a case where essential guarantees were not observed, such as the presence of both parties. There was no question there of lack of jurisdiction or ultra vires, but a defect in procedure. There might be a case where witnesses were examined in the absence of one of the parties. The phrase therefore should be maintained.

All the drafts showed that there was one danger which must be avoided. A State must not be allowed to hold up all arbitral proceedings by asserting that there had been an abuse of power or lack of jurisdiction. All teachers of law maintained that the corollary must be that, if there were such a defect in arbitral proceedings, the party complaining should have the right to propose a reconsideration of the points raised.

The last resolution proposed by the Committee laid down that each State had the duty to propose in such cases a special agreement for a re-hearing of the case by the Permanent Court. The word "duty", however, was used in a moral sense; there was no legal obligation. It should be laid down that every State had a legal obligation to propose procedure affording safeguards at least equal to that the validity of which was being disputed. Most States were bound by Article 36 of the Statute to refer cases to the Permanent Court of The Hague. That was one observation which might be made in the report.

If a State were a Member of the League and a question came before the Council, it was the Council's duty to see that the award was carried out. If one party asked that the award should be executed, the Council might find itself embarrassed by some plea of invalidity raised by the other party. If such a charge of invalidity were brought before the Council, the latter might ask the Court to give a legal opinion; but the Council ought not itself to make such a declaration of defect in procedure, the proceedings thereby becoming stultified. For that reason it would simplify the Council's task to insert in treaties such a provision for appeal as that outlined in plan No. 2.

M. MATINE-DAFTARY (Persia) said it was the duty of delegates to welcome any initiative extending the jurisdiction of the Permanent Court of International Justice, but that did not prevent delegates from accepting only with a certain reservation a reform which, though inspired with a desire to enhance the jurisdiction of the Permanent Court, might endanger the solution of international disputes. The principle he was referring to was embodied in Article 4 of the Draft, as follows:

> "The Permanent Court of International Justice shall declare the award which is impeached to be null, in whole or part, if it recognises the claim for annulment to be well founded. By such annulment, the parties to the dispute shall be replaced in the legal position in which they stood before the commencement of the proceedings which gave rise to the award which has been impeached."

The work of an arbitral tribunal was always of a delicate nature, and it required a long time to reach a decision; but if the losing party could plead that the tribunal had exceeded its powers, the doors of the Permanent Court would be opened. That Court would give a decision only as a kind of supreme court; it could only annul a judgment, and could not give a decision on the actual substance of the dispute. The Permanent Court, in its judgment, would merely restore the parties to the same position which they occupied before the opening of the proceedings. Was that in the interests of peace? The Assembly must either recognise the jurisdiction of the Hague Court as a court of appeal or insert in the present draft another clause which would enable the arbitral tribunal whose decision had been annulled by the Hague Court to be automatically authorised to reconsider the dispute, in order that it might, perhaps, have an opportunity of bringing its views into line with the views of the Hague Court.

M. RAESTAD (Norway) preferred plan No. 2, the Protocol system, provided there was a possibility of securing numerous accessions. The third system was of little value, while the first system was not of sufficient practical interest. He agreed with M. Rolin that under Article 14 of the Covenant the Council might even now ask the Permanent Court to give an opinion on the validity of an arbitration award. The question might arise under Article 13, paragraph 4, or under Article 15 of the Covenant. He agreed with M. Erich that a distinction should not be drawn between legal and so-called political disputes.

It was provided that the Court would annul an award if it found that the application was well founded—that was to say, if it found that there had been a lack of jurisdiction or an abuse of power. But it was doubtful what the material state of the law was; there was no case-law on the point. He wondered, therefore, whether it could be said that international law, as it existed, did lay down that, where there was an abuse of power, proceedings were thereby always nullified. The notion of abuse of power was taken from French law. It was not known in international law; it was a vague expression, of varying value. In the Danube Statute, the only ground for nullity mentioned was lack of jurisdiction. The difficult point, therefore, was whether, in admitting the mere existence of ultra vires, however slight in extent, as a ground for nullity, they were not making a change in international law. He agreed that, according to the report of the Committee of Five, the point should be left to the Permanent Court, but they must remember that the Protocol would form the law of the Court on that point. He wondered whether, if ultra vires alone were accepted as a ground for nullity, the difficulty pointed out by M. Hoffinger would not arise—that every State would be looking out for acts ultra vires and that arbitral tribunals would become then extremely cautious and laconic, with a resulting diminution of their utility.

Count APPONYI (Hungary) said that the Hungarian Government was entirely in favour of the Finnish proposal. He realised the possible disadvantages of diminishing the authority of arbitral tribunals, but saw the essential interest of having a legal solution of objections raised against arbitral awards by one of the parties, awards which, according to treaty, were binding upon them and yet in which they found grounds for nullity. It was a moral duty that such cases should be solved, as if a legal solution were not afforded, questions relating to jurisdiction or other matters might slip into the jurisdiction of the Council, which would not be to the advantage either of the Council or of international jurisdiction. Such points should not be allowed to fall within the political sphere. Plan No. 3 did not give sufficient guarantees, because the party objecting to an award had the duty of proposing a special agreement to settle the point; and what would happen supposing that party did not do its duty? He was therefore in favour of Nos. 1 and 2. As regards the combination of Nos. 1 and 3 suggested by M. Erich, he would not express an opinion; his main preoccupation was that something should be done in the matter.

M. POLITIS (Greece) observed that the Finnish proposal represented progress in international life; international justice had considerably developed in recent years, but developed unevenly. New organisms had been created and new methods of arbitral procedure had been established side by side with methods of judicial procedure. Sooner or later a definite hierarchy would have to be established and the Finnish proposal marked a step along that road—a timid step, but a step that merited fullest appreciation.

Whatever system were adopted, it should be made perfectly clear that there was no opportunity for a party who had accepted the arbitral or judicial method of settlement to accept that settlement and then refuse to carry it out. There was not only a moral but a legal obligation upon such a party to submit any difficulty that might arise to further arbitral examination. He knew of very few cases where a State had refused to submit for re-examination an award which it regarded as vitiated in any way, and the Assembly should definitely express its view against the admission of any such possibility. On the other hand, there were many recent examples of disputes being satisfactorily settled on reconsideration. It should be indicated that the development of the compulsory jurisdiction of the Permanent Court should tend to solve the problem which arose when a country which had lost its case in an arbitral award stated that the award was invalid and refused to accept the re-submission of the matter to further arbitration. If both sides had accepted Article 36, the party which considered itself injured thereby could demand that the Court should give its opinion. If the Court found that the reason had been a defect of procedure or lack of jurisdiction or abuse of power, it would be in the same position as under the Finnish proposal, which was particularly valuable, inasmuch as it confirmed existing diplomatic practice.

Under the third system, serious difficulties might arise; for instance, would two States engaged in a dispute with regard to the non-execution of an award be in a sufficiently calm state of mind to draw up a new agreement? He was tempted to prefer the first method, a sort of model treaty with model clauses for adoption between States; but when, in 1928, that system of model treaties had been elaborated, it was found that the better course was to draw up one protocol for the signature of States. In 1928, when the General Act was adopted by the Assembly, very few people thought it would receive general acceptance; yet the following year it came into force, and now one-third of the Members of the League were bound by it. He held the same view as regards the Finnish proposal, and probably the second alternative would be more likely to lead to practical results.

As regards the individual clauses of the Protocol, Article 4 did not contain a practical solution; it made of the Court a "cour de cassation", to send parties back before the same judges; that would create great difficulty if the parties were obliged to conclude a new special agreement in regard to the point or if the judge whose award had already been disallowed had once more to give a decision, for his prestige would have been diminished. It would be better to relieve him of all further responsibility and allow the Court to supersede the award by a further decision in conformity with law. In these circumstances an additional ground for appeal might be added—namely, the wrong application of any point of material law. Was it too much to ask them to go thus far? It was a question for individual appreciation, and, if the step were not adopted now, they should see that the point was dealt with in the future.

M. HUBER (Switzerland) thought that refusal to comply with an arbitral award on the grounds that it had been reached outside the jurisdiction of the arbitral tribunal would be a very serious matter for international justice. Provision must be made against such a danger. Such cases would be very exceptional, and States should not be asked to ratify conventions which were not absolutely necessary and which were not likely to be ratified. Solutions could no doubt be found to meet all cases under existing international law, but the ideal solution, as M. Politis had said, would be to develop the compulsory jurisdiction of the Permanent Court of International Justice. Under Article 12 of the Covenant the Council could give a decision, and, if there were no special agreement, the Council might ask for an advisory decision of the Permanent Court. The Council might advise the parties to conclude a special agreement, or might recommend such an agreement or even frame a kind of standard agreement. All three plans had defects, but there was no difficulty in recommending the first solution. With regard to the second solution, the problem might be settled generally apart from any special cases, but was it wise to prepare a general convention which might not be acceptable to all? The third solution was a solution on which he would have to make reservations from the point of view of the situation of the League itself. In law, a State, having accepted an arbitral jurisdiction, must continue to endeavour to settle a matter by arbitration, but the Assembly had no power to lay down laws and obligations in such cases. It might, however, urge an agreement by all parties to refer the matter back to the Permanent Court. If there were a model agreement that could be approved by the Assembly, and if any particular case of the kind arose, it would be easy to secure that the parties should conclude a special agreement, without any compulsion or codification of unwritten law. They should proceed carefully in matters of international law, especially matters of such importance; what was necessary was to amplify the jurisdiction of the Permanent Court to cover all legal questions.

M. D'AVILA LIMA (Portugal) said the Finnish proposal broadly represented the transfer to the international sphere of a procedural solution, which had long existed in all judicial systems of municipal law. That procedure was, in fact, already adopted in the international sphere. A quite recent and important provision was to be found in the Young Plan, whereby according to Article 15 any plea to jurisdiction against any arbitral tribunal set up under Article 15 is to be brought before the Permanent Court of International Justice.

But, while supporting the Finnish proposal, he did not quite understand the restrictions imposed on it—at any rate, the restriction where the question of an ordinary appeal was concerned. Grounds for appeal should include a defect in procedure or the failure by the tribunal to observe some principle of law. He thought there was no danger of conflict between the Finnish proposals and the powers conferred on the Council in the Covenant. An explanation might be found possibly by admitting that, generally speaking, the proposal was for a final award, thereby implying all reasonable guarantees for execution.

M. ANTONIADE (Roumania) said the Roumanian delegation favoured the Finnish proposal, believing that thereby the cause of international justice would be strengthened. As regards the Special Committee's proposals, the Roumanian delegation favoured the second plan as being the most practical. He did not favour plan No. 1, and his delegation thought plan No. 3 was very unpractical and might possibly be dangerous. After hearing M. Rolin on the grounds of appeal, he thought that a defect in procedure should be admitted, and M. Politis' fourth ground, the wrong application of a principle of law, should also be given consideration.

M. TUMEDEI (Italy) said he particularly wanted to refer to the remarks of the Austrian delegate and to the possibilities arising under Article 4 of the proposed protocol. That proposal tended to modify the original position. In the first place, the only grounds for appeal at first taken into consideration were lack of jurisdiction or acts ultra vires. Then were added a defect in procedure, and, lastly, the wrong application of a point of law. That was very dangerous. The notion of ultra vires was extremely comprehensive; it included error on the part of a judge in regard to his own powers.

He could admit the first two grounds; but when the point of a defect in procedure was examined, a new difficulty arose. The examples mentioned by M. Rolin were typical examples of acts ultra vires. If the authorities were consulted, it would be seen that examples of acts ultra vires included cases in which sufficient guarantees were not given to both parties.

As to the wrong application of a point of law, it must be remembered that international law was developing slowly, and was also developing by the aid of other organisations besides the Permanent Court of International Justice. There were different mentalities in the world that had to be conciliated—for instance, the Anglo-Saxon and the Latin. Article 4 proposed that the court of appeal should judge the whole question on its merits. But that meant the appointment of a new judge, not provided for in the special arbitration agreement. There would be a conflict between legal methods of procedure and equity in the mind of the judge himself.

He was in favour of the Finnish proposal; but if the suggestion for drawing up a general protocol on those lines were adopted, he desired to discuss the terms of that protocol later on. He trusted that as many as possible would sign it, but the signing of it must not be regarded as connoting the transformation of existing treaties.

The CHAIRMAN thought the general discussion could be closed. Next morning the Committee might take a decision as to which of the three systems it preferred to adopt. It could then examine the details of the various articles and discuss the grounds authorising appeals.

M. UNDÉN (Sweden) said he had no objection to the Chairman's proposal; he only wished to ask members who had criticised the work of the Committee of Experts to submit amendments in order that the Committee might study them and see what changes it could propose.

M. ROLIN (Belgium) said that the Chairman's proposal was a most logical one, but he was not sure that it was the most practical. Many of them attached far greater importance to the ideas expressed in the discussion than to the adoption of one text rather than another. The Committee should agree on the instructions to be given to a sub-committee, should appoint that sub-committee and should then proceed with its other items. He therefore moved the appointment of a sub-committee.

M. RAESTAD (Norway) suggested that it was to be understood that other proposals might be made besides the three submitted by the Committee.

M. RUNDSTEIN (Poland) approved M. Rolin's suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN was not sure that the time was ripe for appointing a sub-committee, but he would put M. Rolin's proposal for appointing one to the vote.

The proposal was adopted.

Unless the Committee wished to appoint the members of the sub-committee, he would propose that it should be appointed by the Bureau of the Committee and the Secretariat.

Agreed.

The CHAIRMAN, in reply to M. Ito, said that the sub-committee would have to find a solution of the problem on the lines of the discussion that had taken place that morning and make proposals on the questions both of form and of substance.

On the next morning, as they could not now proceed with the Finnish proposal, they might take No. 6—Appointment of a Special Committee to study the Existing System of Elections to the Council. That was a question which might involve expenditure and would therefore have to be referred to the Fourth Committee that week.

The Chairman proposed that the question of the amendment of the Covenant should be taken immediately after No. 6.

Agreed.

THIRD MEETING.

Held on Tuesday, September 15th, 1931, at 10 a.m.

Chairman: M. SCIALOJA (Italy).

6. Appointment of a Special Committee to study the Existing System of Elections to the Council.

The CHAIRMAN read the following draft resolution, proposed by the delegation of the British Empire:

"The Assembly,

"Requests the Council to appoint a special Committee to study the existing system of elections to the Council and to report to a future session of the Assembly on any reforms which may appear desirable."

Lord CECIL (British Empire) explained that the British delegation had made its proposal for two main reasons:

The Council included nine elected members, three members being elected each year. Spain and Poland had obtained the privilege of re-eligibility, and had always hitherto been re-elected when their term expired, while another seat was allocated to a South American State. Various other groups had been formed in the Assembly which thought they ought to be represented on the Council, and States which did not belong to any of those groups had scarcely any chance of being elected. That situation distressed them, and Portugal had laid the question before the Assembly. The essence of the League of Nations was that all States should have approximately the same rights. That was the first reason for which the British delegation had made its proposal.

The second reason was rather an awkward one to put into words, and he did not propose to dwell upon it. The period which preceded the elections to the Council—and in general all elections within the League—was a period when the League was not seen at its best. There was a great deal of what was known in Parliament as "lobbying". The cleverest wire-pullers were not always the candidates whose election was most desirable. He was not referring to any particular person or State, but felt that, as long as the present system lasted, the same drawbacks would occur.

In making its proposal the British delegation did not in any way suggest that the number of Members of the Council should be increased. It would even look rather askance at any such suggestion. The Council was already quite numerous enough. When the number of its Members had been fixed at fourteen, the Chairman of the Committee had expressed certain doubts. He had no particular criticism to make with regard to the working of the Council, but it would probably work better if its Members were fewer. Any further increase in the number of Members would adversely affect the existing intimacy, which was one of the most essential elements of the Council's authority and successful action.

M. SOTTILE (Liberia) was glad that the British and Portuguese delegations had raised the question of the allocation of seats on the Council. He would take the occasion to submit certain observations to the Committee in the name of the principles of the League and of justice, and not because Liberia desired to be a Member of the Council.

In the Assembly he had always heard it said that certain geographical divisions (such as the Balkan countries, the Nordic countries, Latin America, etc.) were entitled to a seat on the Council, but he had never heard any mention of allocating a seat to Africa. There were, however, in Africa three States Members of the League which were by no means overlooked when it came to paying contributions.

He therefore suggested that the proposed Committee should in justice consider whether Africa ought not to be taken into account in the allocation of seats.

M. GAJARDO (Chile) supported the British proposal, but wished it to be amplified by the addition after the words "to the Council" of the words "and the rules for other elections by the Assembly".

The Chilian delegation had particularly in mind the form of elections to the Permanent Court of International Justice in the Assembly's Rules of Procedure. He attached very special importance to Lord Cecil's second argument. It would be desirable to put an end to lobbying, which was harmful to the League's prestige.

M. DE VASCONCELLOS (Portugal) reminded the Committee that the Portuguese Government had raised the question on several occasions.

He thanked Viscount Cecil for his initiative and for the action taken by the British Government. The method of election adopted in 1926 was certainly better than the system previously in force. But after five years' experience the system had been found to have become complicated by the formation of groups, with the result that certain countries were excluded from all possibility of obtaining a seat on the Council.

An increase in the number of Members of the Council had been proposed as a possible solution, and he did not think it would be a serious drawback for a Council of fourteen Members to become a Council of fifteen. Without going into the merits of the case, he would merely support the British delegate's proposal.

Sir Annepu PATRO (India) supported the British proposal because he had noticed that certain groups used electoral methods which did not conduce to develop international co-operation. Notwithstanding possible difficulties of procedure, an attempt must be made to remedy the position, since all countries were concerned in the development of true international co-operation. It would complicate matters unduly for the moment if the enquiry were extended to all elections in the League, but some method whereby every country would have an opportunity of being represented on the Council, one day or another, must be sought.

The Council had very great influence. It was, so to speak, the League's board of management, and all States Members should have equal opportunities of obtaining a seat on it. Any system that permitted lobbying was bad. Lobbying had been put an end to in the East by an electoral system which ensured adequate representation to every province or district. Each country had its own electoral methods, and advantage must be taken of their combined experience in devising a better system. Hence the sub-committee must not be hampered by instructions laid down beforehand. Its only mandate must be to seek for the method that was most likely to conduce to co-operation and harmony among the States Members of the League.

Mr. HEARNE (Irish Free State) supported the British proposal. Although, in principle, he disliked the reference of questions to a sub-committee without definite instructions, he thought that, in the present instance, the general discussion would suffice to enable the proposed sub-committee to ascertain the Committee's intentions. The Irish delegation agreed that the number of non-permanent Members of the Council should not be increased. With the existing number of Members, the Council worked well; if the number were increased, it might become an unwieldy body. Secondly, he felt that the tendency of States to seek to establish a right or to assert a claim to a seat on the Council was a bad tendency. Under the Covenant, the seats on the Council were conferred freely by the Assembly. The Council should certainly, as had already been made clear, be broadly representative of the well-defined geographical, racial and other divisions of the world, but he thought that eligibility for membership ought not, apart from these considerations, to rest exclusively upon the fact that a State belonged to any group or combination of States. The Irish Free State had made it perfectly clear, both before and at the time of its election to the Council, that it sought election as a Member of the Assembly and that it did not seek election on the ground that it had associations with other States. Thirdly, any system that tended to promote lobbying was to be avoided as far as possible. But lobbying was not the worst evil to be avoided in that connection. There was a greater evil still—namely, the formation of groups for bargaining purposes.

M. UNDÉN (Sweden) doubted the advisability of appointing a committee of enquiry. He agreed with Lord Cecil that the present system was inadequate, since it favoured certain States or groups of States. It was, however, difficult to devise an ideal system of elections; he would therefore prefer, instead of the appointment of a committee of enquiry, that the problem should be adjourned to the next Assembly and should be discussed by the First Committee.

M. CASSIN (France) recognised that there were good grounds for Lord Cecil's proposal. He did not, however, delude himself with the supposition that the sub-committee would find a solution easily. Over and above the rules there were men and nations, and hence agreement might be reached by appealing to the spirit of good understanding. Rivalry and lobbying could not be abolished by a rule; they could be done away with only by making admission to the Council automatic, and that would deprive the elections of all real life. Every solution had its disadvantages, but an enquiry by a sub-committee might have other results than a mere proposal to increase the number of non-permanent Members; it might, more particularly, lead to an appeal to reason and good understanding. Hitherto, increases in the number of seats on the Council had almost invariably remained proportionate to increases in the number of Members of the League. That argument could not be advanced this year, notwithstanding the accession of Mexico. The sub-committee's instructions must not be too definite. It must rather be urged to exercise moderation, and not to revolutionise the 1926 rules, which, too, should be applied in a spirit of moderation. Another point to be observed was that, although the Assembly decided its rules with regard to the elections, an increase in the number of seats on the Council would require the agreement of the latter body.

M. MATINE-DAFTARY (Persia) thought that two solutions might be contemplated with a view to satisfying the States Members in regard to the composition of the Council: (1) the number of non-permanent Members might be increased, and (2) a system might be adopted whereby all countries would be enabled to take their seat on the Council in turn, without lobbying. To the first solution there was unfortunately no limit, and to satisfy the Members of the League the Council would have to be transformed into a second Assembly.

The second alternative might be regarded as a better and fairer system. It would be based on the participation of all continents in the work of the Council. The League should reflect the entire world, and all interests should be represented on it. The sub-committee proposed by the British delegation should be composed in such a way that all continents would be represented on it on a footing of equality. Only a committee of that kind could draw up equitable rules for the election of the non-permanent Members.

M. RUNDSTEIN (Poland) considered that the suggestion for increasing the number of non-permanent Members required very careful examination, since it would give certain countries a prospect of being represented on the Council, whereas, under existing circumstances, they had practically no such chance.

The British proposal, therefore, should be drafted in such a way as to foreshadow the possibility of an increase. The special committee would be asked both to study the present system and to consider the various ways and means of increasing the number of non-permanent Members.

M. FERRARA (Cuba) supported the British proposal, but would have been glad if the British delegate had appended a few directions in view of the considerable difficulties which it was bound to encounter. It must be admitted that no perfect electoral system had ever yet been discovered.

A distinction must be drawn between lobbying and preparation for elections. If it were desired to avoid the splitting of votes, no election could be held without previous conversations or exchanges of views. He did not share the view that the Assembly should be left a free choice and that territorial distinctions should be disregarded. He did not intend to discuss the matter, but would point out that there was a gentlemen's agreement under which three seats were allotted to Latin America. He hoped that that agreement would not be allowed to lapse.

M. LIMBURG (Netherlands) observed that the Fourth Committee had adopted the draft resolution according to which the various Members were requested to make no proposals likely to involve fresh expenditure. Would it not therefore be preferable to adjourn the appointment of this special committee, the meetings of which must necessarily involve expense?

Mr. GUTHRIE (Canada) pointed out that nothing in the British proposal authorised the special committee to study a possible increase or decrease in the number of non-permanent Members of the Council. That was a constitutional question which the special committee could not examine. Everyone agreed that the present electoral system was defective and that its reform should be studied by a committee. He therefore supported the British proposal.

M. POLITIS (Greece) supported the British proposal. At first sight, the problem seemed insoluble. There were constitutional rules regarding the free election of non-permanent Members of the Council which excluded all regulations for the enforcement of the election of certain countries. Moreover, everyone agreed that it would be very dangerous to increase the number of the Members of the Council. With its fourteen Members, the Council was already an Assembly in miniature and was no longer what the authors of the Covenant had intended it to be. In view of the complexity of international affairs, the more numerous the Council, the more difficulty it would experience in taking effective action.

How, therefore, could satisfaction be given to countries which, belonging at the present time to no group, were, in practice, automatically excluded from the Council? What could be done if all the rules were intangible and if, as the Cuban delegate had pointed out, existing tacit agreements ought not to be disturbed?

The main difficulty seemed to be the lack of elasticity in the present organisation of the Council. On the one hand there were permanent Members, and, on the other, Members appointed for a fixed period of three years. It was quite comprehensible that countries having general and permanent interests should be permanent Members of the Council. It was more difficult to understand why there was not a certain graduation in the length of time for which the non-permanent seats were occupied by other countries. There was no constitutional obstacle to such a graduation, because Article 4 of the Covenant, which laid down that the election should be free, also stated that the Assembly could choose its own period for holding elections.

Hitherto, too much attention had been paid to the honour and what was called the right of each nation to sit on the Council. The counterpart to every right—namely, duty, had been rather left in the shade. The Council assumed very serious responsibilities, and each Member of the Council ought, proportionately to the place it occupied in the community of nations, to share those responsibilities. Account should be taken, therefore, of the possibility which each Member of the League possessed of taking its part in the common responsibility.

In the light of these two concepts it might perhaps be possible to find a solution, not necessarily immediately—that would be too much to hope—but, when the question had been carefully examined by the League, a certain maturity of opinion would be reached, which would make elections easier and diminish the drawbacks of lobbying.

As the Vice-Chairman had pointed out, the Assembly had adopted a resolution recommending strict economy; but it had not intended to exclude modest and reasonable expenditure of an indubitably useful nature. The special committee proposed by the British delegation might be set up very economically, if it did not include a large number of members, if the members received no allowances from the League and were the delegates of their Governments, the Governments paying the cost of their stay at Geneva.

Sir Brojendra MITTER (India) agreed with the Canadian representative that the question of the number of non-permanent Members of the Council was not strictly a matter to be dealt with by the special committee. But it was a factor which had to be taken entirely into account. That, he thought, was also the opinion of Viscount Cecil.

In the special committee all States should have an opportunity of expressing their views, in order that all possible solutions might be considered. If, therefore, States set out their views without undue delay, the special committee might meet just before the next Assembly.

It would also be desirable to obtain information in regard to the electoral systems in force in the various countries. The States Members ought to be consulted on that point.

M. DE VASCONCELLOS (Portugal) observed that the present system involved much more inconvenience than any increase or decrease in the number of Members of the Council. The present rules practically debarred certain States from any representation on the Council. That was the greatest possible drawback, and should be avoided at all costs.

Lobbying and wire-pulling would cease with the end of the secret vote, which was the fundamental defect of elections to the Council. In an election involving so great a political responsibility, each State should shoulder its own responsibility. Then there would be no more intrigues.

The budgetary question had been dealt with by the highest authority on the subject, the Chairman of the Fourth Committee. It might be added that, since the Disarmament Conference was meeting in February, certain delegates to that Conference might also be experts chosen to sit on the special committee, a procedure which would still further facilitate the solution of the budgetary question.

The CHAIRMAN felt that on this occasion he must break his silence as Chairman.

The Committee would remember that the original Council had consisted of nine Members —they had lost one, the United States of America, but had gained another. The proportion had been changed without much harm. Then a few years ago a large committee had examined the question and the number of Members had been increased to fourteen. Even then the view was taken that the Council might have become too large a body. What suggestions, therefore, could be put forward, if the basic principle were laid down that there must be no increase? What suggestion could the special committee make for any better allocation of seats? Could it again put forward a proposal for rotation? A definite system of rotation might give the Council a higher moral status, but would deprive it of much of its force. The League had no force of its own : it derived its force through the Members of which it consisted—in other words its force was the force of the individual countries. The States which supplied the force must obviously have, a share in the responsibility, so that no change in the permanent Members was likely.

Attention was already given to representation from each continent. He would remind the Liberian delegate that there were not many independent States in Africa and that, in any case, Africa was represented through the Colonial Powers. It was also quite possible that some day an independent African State would be a Member of the Council.

He would not attempt to deny that irregularity existed, but he himself could see no adequate remedy. The greatest country in the world—China—had not a permanent seat on the Council. On the other hand, China was frequently elected as a non-permanent Member, and, later on, the situation might change to an even greater extent. In fact, change was inevitable, and no mechanical rule could be better than the League's own considered judgment, modified from time to time according to circumstances. It was impossible to foresee what the world would be like in a few years' time.

He therefore proposed that the question should be adjourned until the next year.

He was absolutely opposed to consulting persons outside the League. There was practically no analogy between the electing bodies of the League of Nations and the electorates of States. Conflicts of opinion and interests existed, and the League had been formed to prevent such conflicts. The League was one of the most heterogeneous bodies imaginable, but the very plurality of the nations composing it was its soul. Nevertheless, the League had been acquiring a sort of cohesion which an outsider would never understand. An outsider might therefore make quite impossible proposals.

The proposal for an enquiry had been submitted too late to be carried into effect in the current year. He proposed an adjournment for a year in order that both old and new Members should be able to study the matter in a spirit of League consciousness.

M. PILOTTI (Italy) urged that all suggested reforms should take into account the countries that were still outside the League. Some of them were outside because they made their entry or re-entry dependent on the possibility of obtaining a seat on the Council.

If it were thought better that the question should be adjourned, the Assembly might, nevertheless, draw the attention of the various Governments to existing drawbacks and ask for suggestions. Personally, he did not see what the solution could be, unless it were that indicated by M. Politis; but it was just possible that definite suggestions by States would enable some rather better system to be devised.

M. VASCONCELLOS (Portugal) urged that States which felt they were not being fairly treated should at least have the moral satisfaction of knowing that the question was being studied; otherwise, the situation would become intolerable. Though he would be the first to admit M. Scialoja's great experience, he could not agree that M. Scialoja's individual opinion was an adequate reason for shelving the problem.

M. RESTREPO (Colombia) thought there was too much haste all round to reform—to reform the elections, reform the Covenant, reform everything. People might infer that the whole machinery of the League was in bad working order.

In the twelve short years of the League's existence some thirty nationals of some dozen countries had held non-permanent seats on the Council. On the previous day the Assembly had elected Spain, Panama and China. Perhaps next year Portugal would be elected. In any case M. Vasconcellos should not think that Portugal was deliberately being abandoned. Portugal's historic claims alone entitled her to consideration as a future Member of the Council.

Moreover, the Chilian delegation had amended Viscount Cecil's proposal. The whole question, however, required most careful consideration. He repeated once more that the Assembly should avoid all appearance of haste. He therefore supported the Chairman's proposal to adjourn the question until the following year.

M. WOO KAISENG (China) said that China felt great satisfaction at her election to the Council. Her main desire was not to receive honours, but to be in a position to collaborate usefully. China had always claimed a permanent seat, but, if that were not possible without increasing the number of Members, obviously the problem required most careful study. His predecessor had always advocated a continental allocation of seats, but that again raised the delicate point as to how the principle could best be applied. Could not the two proposals to appoint a sub-committee, and to adjourn the question, in the meantime consulting the various Governments, be taken together? That might facilitate the solution. In any case, the Chinese delegation was entirely favourable to Viscount Cecil's proposal.

M. GAJARDO (Chile) said that, as it had been explained to the Chilian delegation that too great an extension of the scope of the enquiry would raise innumerable difficulties, the delegation withdrew its proposal. The main object that the Chilian delegation had in view in submitting that proposal was to find some way of avoiding practices—such as lobbying—which did no honour to the League.

Viscount CECIL (British Empire) noted that no delegation was opposed in principle to the consideration of the problem. True, there had been proposals to adjourn its consideration, some of which were based on the desirability of avoiding fresh expenditure. In view, however, of M. Politis' assurance that the expenditure would be negligible, the Committee need not attach too much importance to that aspect. Other proposals for adjournment had been made by M. Undén, M. Scialoja and M. Restrepo. M. Restrepo had indeed been very frank and had shown that he was himself in favour of postponing the question sine die. The great majority of the delegates were, however, in favour of taking some action. The Assembly could not entirely ignore the sentiments of certain States and shelve the question now in the hope that it would not be raised next year. M. Restrepo had said that they always seemed to be changing the statutes. There had not been many important changes made in the Covenant—the most important, perhaps, had been to add the words "judicial settlement" to "arbitration". No one could call that revolutionary.

There had been a number of changes made in the composition of the Council, but, when the rules were first drawn up in Paris, they were never regarded as final. It had always been thought that some scheme of rotation should be devised for the non-permanent Members. When the League had come to study the system of rotation, it saw that an increase of the membership of the Council was inevitable. But, even with such rotation, certain Members felt they were debarred from the possibility of obtaining a seat.

M. Undén and M. Scialoja had based their proposal for adjournment on the necessity of longer consideration of the problem. He entirely agreed that the question required most careful consideration, and, if he believed that one more year's consideration would make the matter easier to deal with, he would have accepted the proposal. The question had, however, been considered quite carefully. The British Government had at any rate devoted much attention to the point and had what were, he thought, some very useful suggestions to make. Moreover, Members of the League had received several months previously a circular letter from the Portuguese Government. If the question were merely adjourned, then, in fact, nothing at all would be done. One or two Governments might reply in the course of the year and that would be all.

The speed with which the special committee might be able to take action was another matter. Much time and trouble would be required to overcome the immense difficulties caused by the clash of interests. That, however, should not prevent the appointment of a special committee immediately. The special committee would not even be asked to report to the next Assembly. It might submit its report two or three years hence. The essential point was that any countries which felt themselves aggrieved should feel that the matter was being studied. The special committee might or might not eventually feel bound to recommend increased membership. Personally he hoped not, but he did not think that such a recommendation should be absolutely debarred from the outset.

It would be a great mistake to reject all proposals for change. The League of Nations was, and must be, a living organism, which would develop and evolve to meet world requirements.

M. UNDÉN (Sweden) explained that his proposal to adjourn the discussion was intended merely to enable the Committee to discuss the question fully before it was referred to a special committee.

The procedure he had in view was in keeping with that followed in the previous year for the examination of proposals made by a certain Government for the preparation of a general convention. It allowed the Governments interested in amending the existing rules to explain their ideas in a memorandum, which might be discussed at the next Assembly. He did not in any way desire to prevent an examination of the problem.

The CHAIRMAN closed the discussion. The following text would be submitted to the Assembly:

> "The Assembly requests the Council to appoint a special committee to study the existing system of elections to the Council and to report to a future session of the Assembly on any reforms which may appear desirable."

But, before the text was transmitted to the Assembly, he would put the proposal for adjournment to the vote.

The proposal to adjourn the question for one year was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN, in reply to M. Politis, observed that, according tot he text of the resolution, the Council had to decide the composition of the special committee.

Viscount CECIL (British Empire) pointed out that, if the special committee were composed of Government representatives, the cost would be very small. If it were composed of individuals the Fourth Committee would certainly have something to say on the matter.

M. SOTTILE (Liberia) wished it to be stated in the Minutes that he trusted that due consideration would be given to the representation of the various continents.

The CHAIRMAN proposed Viscount Cecil as Rapporteur.

Agreed.

FOURTH MEETING.

Held on Wednesday, September 16th, 1931, at 10.15 a.m.

Chairman: M. SCIALOJA (Italy).

7. Amendment of the Covenant of the League of Nations in order to bring it into Harmony with the Pact of Paris (continuation): Précis of the Observations submitted by the Governments since the Assembly of 1930 (Annex 3).

M. MAJOURANITCH (Yugoslavia) emphasised the importance of the Committee's task. They had to harmonise two not very complicated and extremely concise documents: the Covenant of the League and the Kellogg Pact.

The Kellogg Pact—a star of the first magnitude, which had only recently appeared in the political firmament—had, like twin stars, a dark companion which displaced its centre of gravity and caused all the perturbations and variations of light in the main star. He referred to the reservations which States—even its authors—had made to the Kellogg Pact.

The reservations accompanying the Kellogg Pact had not yet been very minutely defined. Their scope was unknown. The Committee was therefore faced with an alternative.

In the first place they might bring the two acts into harmony without taking the reservations into account, in the hope that the reservations would disappear spontaneously. In that case the first great difficulty arose. Certain reservations were of slight effect—they were, nevertheless reservations made by States. They could consequently not be abolished without the consent of those States, and that consent might be difficult to obtain. Nevertheless, with all these reservations, the Kellogg Pact was an immense step forward towards universal and lasting peace. The reservations were in part and to a certain extent a safety-valve in the vast machine which was destined to modify the whole history of mankind. It would not, perhaps, be very wise to eliminate them.

The other possibility was to allow the reservations to remain. In that case, however, a danger—perhaps a fatal danger—became manifest. The Kellogg Pact was an international treaty. Reservations were therefore feasible; but how was a Pact with reservations to be incorporated in another international Convention which was the basic law of the League founded on the equality of all Members? In that case the reservations would no longer be safety-valves but cracks that weakened the machine. He need not discuss the consequences of such weakness, in view of the League's responsibilities.

Should the problem then be merely shelved?

No; it should be faced and all the reservations of the Kellogg Pact should be analysed. Some of them, concerned with the interpretation of the Pact, would cause no difficulty. Others referred to the very essence of the instrument and were common to a whole group of States. They might be reduced to one single reservation. Possibly, in that case, the single reservation might be incorporated in the Covenant.

That would, nevertheless, leave a residue of reservations which could not be analysed. The League would have to combat them with all its force and would be valiantly aided by all the branches of its activity and all its efforts to ensure co-operation and disarmament, and to avoid war.

He feared his arguments might help to destroy all hope of solving the problem at the present session. It was impossible, however, to ignore the fact that certain States had made the ratification of the amendments to the Covenant depend on the coming into force of a general treaty for the limitation of armaments.

That was both comprehensible and logical. Why hurry, since, in any case, no decision would become operative before the next session? Why not utilise the intervening period in an endeavour to secure a reform which would be beyond all criticism?

He would remind them of the proposal to constitute a special committee of jurists to analyse minutely all the reservations of the Kellogg Pact, and submit a report. A special committee would also be called upon to propose measures for harmonising the two acts, either completely or relatively. The Kellogg Pact, even with all its reservations, and the Covenant nevertheless formed the two corner-stones of lasting peace. Peace was progressing. Nothing could stop it; but excessive zeal or hasty or premature measures might retard its final triumph.

M. MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY (Germany) said that the German Government had not sent in a reply because its attitude had been fully explained in the two committees appointed to examine the question. A German memorandum had been submitted to the Committee of Eleven, and had, he thought, helped to facilitate that Committee's task.

The German Government was still of opinion that the two proposals might be used as a basis for the amendment of the Covenant in such a way to bring the two acts closer together. The hope that certain Governments not represented on the Committee would send in useful suggestions had been fulfilled. Many of these suggestions had been very interesting, including Finland's enquiry as to whether it would not be desirable to replace the expression " resort to non-peaceful methods " by the words " resort to war " as being less ambiguous.

The German Government was prepared to co-operate in reaching an agreement on the modification of the Covenant, and would explain its attitude on all points of detail. Difficulties would be encountered, but could be surmounted. The Committee's task was not merely a legal one. The main aim must be to organise universal co-operation for peace. If the Committee succeeded in solving the problem, it would have got nearer to the intentions of the authors of the Kellogg Pact.

M. D'AVILA LIMA (Portugal) said that that was the second time the Committee had had to consider the body of articles established as a result of the recommendations of the last Assembly but one, for bringing the Covenant into harmony with the Paris Pact.

The Portuguese delegation had already explained its views in a modest but nevertheless full and substantiated manner. Though agreed on the principle, it foresaw difficulties in carrying through the task and preparing a text. Though the expression of those doubts had not endowed the Portuguese delegation with a seat on the special sub-committee, it had secured the support of other distinguished authorities, to whom he wished to express his gratitude.

Like the French and German delegations, the Portuguese delegation thought it would be preferable to maintain the organic structure of the Covenant, not merely by an act of passive solidarity, as implied in the Paris Pact, in spite of the implication contained in the preamble to that document, but by legally implementing peace to avoid the danger expressed in the French note : " To fail to ensure a final solution for all points brought before the Council of the League would be to leave open the possibility of war ".

Contrary to the argument that certain proposals to reform the Covenant were rather daring and not very likely to become operative, Portugal had suggested the ratification of the novum jus, under the General Act of Arbitration, which had been confirmed by the accession of so many countries. Recourse to arbitration, as laid down in the General Act, must not be, as Portugal had at first suggested, a preferential solution, but, in the light of the reservations made by several Governments, must be of a secondary character—a sort of subsidiary procedure to fill the gap in paragraph 7 of Article 15.

The most recent form of the text—that of the sub-committee—was the best, perhaps, because it had gained in intensity what it had lost in amplitude. It might, however, be still further improved.

He again drew attention to the previous suggestion, which had been supported by Italy, to the effect that the Council should still be allowed under Article 15, paragraph 7 bis, in conformity with the proposal of the Committee of Eleven, to ask the opinion of the Permanent Court of International Justice without a unanimous decision being necessary for the purpose.

Not only did such an opinion—which was optional— not adversely affect procedure under the Covenant, but it might help the Council in reaching a decision or in bringing about a solution by endowing it with the support of the Supreme International Tribunal.

Thus, while the cause of peace would be aided, something would be done to allay certain apprehensions, such as those expressed by China and Finland, who rightly maintained that the important point was to conserve the principle which at present dominates the Covenant—namely, the priority of entirely peaceful procedure.

He fully appreciated certain comments that had been made, particularly the British proposal, to give paragraph 2 of Article 12 an alternative character by substituting " or " for " and ", and to restrict the scope of the word " decision " in paragraph 4 of Article 13 by adding the qualification " judicial ".

They ought also to take into consideration the Finnish observations concerning pleonasms or superfluities—for instance, in Article 13, paragraph 4, the words " in a dispute to which they are parties " and the tautological multiplicity of references to recommendations of the Council in paragraphs 6 and 7 of Article 15.

Whatever was decided in connection with these suggestions, there was no doubt that the task of conciliating the two main acts of world peace policy was commencing under happy auspices.

M. RUNDSTEIN (Poland) thought, as the object of the present discussion was to define the views of the various Governments, it would be better not to go into details, but to adhere to more general arguments.

The Polish Government was prepared to accept the amendments proposed in the previous year by the Sub-Committee as being the most practical solution at present. The Assembly could, of course, go further along the lines traced by the Committee of Eleven, but over-radical reforms were risky. It would be preferable to adhere to a minimum compatible with the letter and spirit of the Paris Pact.

If the solutions proposed by the Sub-Committee were held to be good and equitable, they should entrust the final preparation of the revised articles to a Draft Committee. That Committee would also consider several new proposals contained in Government replies or put forward in the course of the discussion by representatives of Governments which had not replied to the Secretary-General's circular letter—in particular, the suggestions of the Finnish Government.

The proposals made in the previous year by the Sub-Committee would, if the Committee adopted them, solve the problem that had been causing the League anxiety for so long. He drew the Committee's attention to the connection between the proposed amendments and the sanctions mentioned in Article 16 of the Covenant. If they did not accept the amendments, Article 16 would still apply only to cases of unlawful warfare and would not cover intervention by the League in other cases of war contrary to the Paris Pact. That would not tend to strengthen international security.

The Polish Government thought that the amendments were ripe for final approval by the Assembly and would be prepared to accept them without reservation. He was glad to see that other Governments took the same view, so that there was hope that a definite result might be attained.

He also wished to remind the Committee of the close connection between the harmonisation of the two acts and the problem of disarmament. Great Britain had already expressed her views in this connection and pointed out how desirable it would be that these two acts should be harmonised before the Conference met. In any case, it was particularly important to note that there was no inconsistency between the Covenant and the Pact. It might be said that the provisions of the Covenant were in suspense or were tacitly abrogated as long as the Paris Pact remained in force. Thus, even though an improvement of the Covenant might be thought to be impossible for the time being, all possible misunderstandings should be dispelled, as the Polish Government had observed in its reply. It was now, at least, a definitely established juridical fact that the provisions of the Covenant regarding lawful warfare had become inoperative according to the principle of the Kellogg Pact. It would, however, be preferable to give that Pact material force by introducing definite rules on the subject in the Covenant.

Mr. GUTHRIE (Canada) said he had positive opinions as to the propriety and necessity of endeavouring to remove the anomalies and inconsistencies which they all admitted existed between the Covenant and the Kellogg Pact. He did not wish for undue haste, but it had to be remembered that the Pact of Paris had been in operation for two years. Two Committees of eminent men had studied the question of amendments to the Covenant. Should a fresh committee be appointed? Only fourteen Governments had replied by June 1st, 1931, but he did not think that meant that the others would not accept the proposals made, since, in point of fact, they had not raised any objection to them.

To adjourn the question for further study would hardly enable fuller information to be obtained. Moreover, he agreed with the Polish delegate that the differences between the two texts should be removed before the Disarmament Conference met.

The Canadian Government had not sent a reply to the League, but had requested him to state their views to that Committee. These views were as follows:

His Majesty's Government in Canada had examined and compared the draft amendments prepared, first by the Committee of Eleven, secondly by a Sub-Committee of that Committee at the last Assembly, to harmonise the Covenant with the provisions of the Paris Pact for the Renunciation of War. In its opinion the schedule of amendments prepared by the Sub-Committee of the First Committee represented an appreciable improvement over the amendments proposed by the Committee of Eleven in two important respects—namely:

1. The text drawn up by the Sub-Committee for Article 13, paragraph 1, made a clear distinction between the positive obligations upon the parties to the dispute from the general obligation "negative in character" to refrain from supporting a State refusing to carry out a decision which on pronouncement of the award or decision becomes incumbent upon all the other Members of the League.

He reminded the Committee that the amendment to Article 13, paragraph 4, put forward by the Committee of Eleven, contained certain elements of ambiguity the implications of which were unsatisfactory to the Canadian Government. The text proposed by the Sub-Committee made it perfectly clear that it was the parties to the dispute who undertook to carry out the award or decision rendered. For that reason his Government preferred, and was prepared to support, the Sub-Committee's text.

2. Similarly, the undertaking proposed by the Committee of Jurists for Article 15, paragraph 6, that "the Members of the League agree that they will comply with the recommendations of the [Council's] report" was, it was felt, open to misunderstanding. The possibility of that misunderstanding was removed in the Sub-Committee's text of that paragraph, which made it clear that it was the parties to the dispute who would be invited to comply with the Council's recommendations. For those reasons the Canadian Government was prepared to accept the text drawn up by the Sub-Committee of the First Committee of the Eleventh Assembly, subject to certain minor alterations which, it was understood, had already been submitted for that Committee's consideration.

There remained for consideration by that Committee the larger question of the expediency of incorporating the proposed amendments to the Covenant in a Protocol, which could be opened for signature during the present Assembly. His Government appreciated the force of the argument that amendments to the Covenant should not be lightly undertaken, but, when that argument was put forward at that juncture as a reason for deferring indefinitely the harmonisation of the Covenant with the Treaty for the Renunciation of War, it might appropriately be pointed out that such an observation, though apposite, was overdue. In 1929 and again in 1930, the Assembly of the League had unanimously adopted a resolution declaring that Members of the League should no longer be accorded by the Covenant the right to have recourse to war in cases in which that right had been renounced by the provisions of the Pact of Paris. If that resolution meant anything at all, it meant that the Members of the League were prepared to amend the Covenant by making the obligation not to resort to war absolute and binding upon all Members of the League. In the view of his Government, the purpose which the Assembly expressed by resolution on those two occasions would be fulfilled by the acceptance of the amendment prepared by the Sub-Committee of the First Committee of the Eleventh Assembly.

In considering the consequences of a further postponement of this important question, it was necessary to look beyond the drafting and juridical difficulties which the process of amendment had encountered, and judge the effect which such a postponement would have upon the public opinion of the world. It was possible that, in presenting the proposed amendments to the Covenant as a simple harmonisation of undertakings already widely accepted, advocates of the change had over-simplified the issues involved. However, to the man in the street the issue was quite clear, and the meaning of any further postponement would be all too obvious. He would say that the nations of the world had rushed to renounce war as an instrument of national policy in signing the Pact of Paris, but had rejected an opportunity to translate their action into a formal undertaking the violation of which would involve the penalties provided by the machinery of the League. Sceptics who had doubted the solemnity of the several renunciations of war would be effectually silenced if a resolve were now made to take a further step by harmonising the Covenant and the Pact, as he ventured to affirm the Sub-Committee's report would do when duly ratified.

M. HOFFINGER (Austria) still hoped that they would do good work even if they could not work with speed. M. Scialoja had always been an excellent advocate of prudence and wisdom, but the speaker had been greatly struck by the difference between his attitude in previous discussions and that which he had adopted at the last session. His remarks in former years had seemed like the markings painted on packages containing fragile goods; they now looked like a red or yellow flag indicating danger or plague. Members of the Committee should reflect on that attitude, because the Chairman, as he had himself pointed out, had been present at the birth of the League. One of the points to which the Chairman had referred was the lack of replies from Governments. From this he seemed to deduce that most Governments were not favourable to the amendments. On the contrary, M. Hoffinger believed that, although the maxim that "silence means consent" could not be applied without qualification, it might reasonably be assumed that a Government which had fundamental objections would have communicated them to the Secretariat. The Canadian delegate's statement confirmed that opinion.

The fact that Austria had not replied in time was due to a fortuitous circumstance—namely, a Government crisis just when the time-limit was expiring. The Austrian delegation was authorised to make the following statement:

> "The Federal Government of Austria is following with deepest interest the efforts of the League of Nations to bring the Covenant of the League into harmony with the Paris Pact.
> "It is of opinion that it would be highly desirable to terminate a juridical anomaly—namely, that States Members of the League and signatories of the Paris Pact are bound by two instruments, one of which prohibits certain acts which the other allows. As a result of this difference, the Statutes of the League present a hiatus in regard to certain situations which are dealt with differently in each Act. The Federal Government is even more convinced that this anomaly should be remedied, inasmuch as the discussion on the subject in the League has proved that the absence of organic and executive provisions in the Paris Pact might produce doubts as to the juridical nature of that Pact, which some speakers seemed to regard as a sort of statement of principles having a moral rather than a legal value. The Federal Government is definitely in agreement with those who, in the discussion, combated this argument and stated that the Paris Pact does not in nature or legal value differ from any other instrument of international law.

"The Federal Government therefore regrets that the Eleventh Assembly of the League was unable to terminate its work on the basis of the Report of the Committee of Eleven, and is prepared to collaborate fully in the completion of that work during the Twelfth Assembly.

"The Federal Government sees no objection to the proposals contained in the Report of the First Committee of the Eleventh Assembly with regard to the amendments to be made to the Preamble and to Articles 12, 15, paragraph 7, and 16, paragraph 1, or to the omission of Article 15, paragraph 7 bis, which had been suggested by the Committee of Eleven. As regards Article 15, paragraph 6, the Federal Government regards as acceptable the text proposed by the First Committee, but would not see any objection to going back to the text proposed by the Committee of Eleven, provided the latter is not modified by clauses restricting the powers of the Council to seek for the most appropriate method of ending the dispute."

The absence of a reply from the Austrian Government does not, therefore, signify disapproval; on the contrary.

He had not been able to study the statements made in the American Senate concerning reservations to the Kellogg Pact to which the Chairman had alluded. He did not, however, see how they could prevent the continuation of the work which had been begun. The Italian Government had pointed out that certain States had made their accession to the Treaty of Paris dependent on individual interpretations of the terms of that Pact and expressed the opinion that it was not possible to take those restrictions into account seeing that they could not be tolerated under the Covenant. A fortiori, therefore, they should reject reservations made by States non-signatories of the Covenant, or by mere Members of Parliament, which had not been ratified by the Government concerned.

The Chairman had also said that good craftsmanship was preferable to speed, but good craftsmanship implied a thorough knowledge of the work. M. Scialoja had said that the Covenant ought not to be weakened by amendments which, if they were not accepted, would diminish its value and authority. He would ask the Committee to compare this observation with that made by the Italian Government, in its reply, to the effect that, unless amendments really improved the Covenant, it would be better to make none at all. In the view of the Italian Government the Covenant would be improved by adopting the text of the Committee of Eleven for the various paragraphs of Article 15. He asked the Chairman, therefore, to tell the Committee whether the crucial point was the difficulty of harmonising the different opinions regarding the paragraphs of Article 15 or whether he foresaw a more general difficulty of such a nature that, even if everybody accepted the Italian Government's views regarding Article 15, the Committee could not make any further progress. If so, it would be very desirable that the Chairman should indicate how the discussion should proceed in view of the difficulties to be solved, for it was impossible to ascertain what those difficulties were.

With regard to procedure, although he agreed with M. Rundstein on many points, he wondered whether M. Rundstein's proposal to appoint a drafting committee was not premature, since it would certainly have a much more important task than drafting, in view of the fundamental differences of opinion still existing with regard to the actual scope of the amendments. If the Committee decided to refer the matter once more to Governments, or to a committee, it would be desirable carefully to define the existing difficulties and to formulate a definite series of points for consideration.

Mr. KNOWLES (New Zealand) said the New Zealand Government was prepared to accept the text drawn up by the Sub-Committee on condition that the two amendments to paragraph 2 of Article 12 and paragraph 4 of Article 13, referred to by the Portuguese delegate, were adopted.

Mr. HEARNE (Irish Free State) said that the views of the Irish Government were contained in their memorandum to the Secretary-General which was before the Committee. In that memorandum, the Irish Government said that they had no objection to the principle of the amendments of the Covenant proposed at the Sub-Committee of the First Committee of the Eleventh Assembly. They considered that, in all the circumstances, these amendments provided the most suitable means of incorporating in the Covenant a general prohibition of resort to war and the principle that the settlement of international disputes should never be sought except by pacific means.

While they were thus prepared to accept the amendments referred to in their present form, the Irish Government felt that there were certain respects in which the proposed text might be improved from a drafting point of view. The words "likely to lead to a rupture" in Article 12 (1) implied a restriction of the general principle of pacific settlement to which it was sought to give effect in the proposed amendments. The Irish Government, accordingly, felt that these words should be eliminated from the text of that article. That would involve a consequential modification of the text of Article 15 (1). The Irish Government also felt that additional words would be required in order to make clear the scope of article 15, and they would make a proposal accordingly. They proposed, therefore, the following wording:

"If there should arise between Members of the League any dispute which cannot be otherwise settled and is not submitted to arbitration or judicial settlement in accordance with Article 13, the Members, etc."

As regards paragraph 6 of Article 15, the Irish Government would accept the draft of the Sub-Committee of the First Committee of the Eleventh Assembly, or, if necessary, they would, like the Austrian Government, accept the draft submitted by the Committee of Eleven. He pointed out that what was necessary was to give some finality to the recommendations of the Council in the circumstances contemplated by Article 15. It was clear that, when a dispute was submitted to arbitration or to judicial settlement, the award of the arbitral tribunal or the decision of the Court was legally binding upon the parties. He felt that, if the proposals of the Committee of Eleven were adopted, the effect would be to give legal binding force to the recommendations of the Council. That would involve finality in cases referred to the Council similar to that which had already been secured with regard to cases submitted to arbitration or judicial settlement.

He referred to the discussion which took place at the Sub-Committee of the First Committee of the Eleventh Assembly on the subject of the extension of the sanctions of the Covenant, which an acceptance of the amendment of Article 15 would involve. He reminded the Committee that Governments which would accept the proposed amendment of Article 12 (1) had accepted an extension of sanctions, and he pointed out that the extension of sanctions, which an acceptance of the amendment of Article 15 would involve, amounted to no more than a theoretical widening of the field of sanctions. In practice, having regard to the provisions of the Kellogg Pact and the provisions of the Covenant as amended, the number of cases in which sanctions would have to be resorted to would be very few indeed. It would be a pity if a valuable and far-reaching reform of the kind suggested should be postponed for any academic or theoretical reason which would have little or no practical significance.

The discussion had, he said, proceeded on general lines. It was now three years since the Kellogg Pact was signed, and, during that time, there had been a serious and substantial inconsistency between the fundamental law of the League of Nations—namely, the Covenant, and the Pact of Paris. These instruments had been examined by the Committee of Eleven and the Sub-Committee of the First Committee of the Eleventh Assembly, and, in the latter Committee, a full and frank discussion of a political character had taken place. A text had been produced. Count Apponyi, a day or two previously, had emphasised the necessity for proceeding with the work of reconciling the two instruments. The trend of the discussion that morning indicated that it was not intended to take the matter to a conclusion at that Committee. He would have thought that the text of the Committee of Eleven and that of the First Committee of last year, together with the replies of the Governments, would have been sufficient material to enable the Committee to arrive, with the assistance of a drafting Committee or a sub-committee, at a text which would have a prospect of success. This question had now become a problem for the Governments themselves. The work of the lawyers had been completed. It was a question for the Governments of the world to accept, or to accept with amendments, the provisions of one or other of the texts already prepared.

In conclusion, he said that it would be well for the Committee to take account of the danger of postponing this matter further. It had been suggested that the whole project of amending the Covenant would be better resumed when the General Disarmament Conference had concluded its labours. He asked whether the further postponement of the project might not seriously injure the prospect of the successful conclusion of the Disarmament Conference. There was, in his view, some uncertainty as to the future growing up all over the world by reason of the tendency in the League of Nations to postpone major issues. He did not wish to exaggerate the tendency, but he thought that, if important matters of the kind under discussion were postponed too frequently or too long, public opinion might begin to entertain well-founded doubts as to the value of their labours in the Assembly of the League of Nations. In the result, Geneva might suffer a total, and perhaps not a transitory, eclipse.

Baron DESCAMPS-DAVID (Belgium), after paying a tribute to the work already accomplished, observed that the British declaration showed that there were certainly some difficulties which had to be overcome. He did not criticise anyone for amplifying the points raised by the British delegation. Great caution was necessary in amending the fundamental statutes of the League, but now that ample light had been thrown on the problem, surely they ought to be able to arrive at some conclusion.

He had carefully studied the Paris Pact in all its aspects. The present question was merely a part of the vast problems raised in the Pact. The Pact was not merely morally binding but was clearly a juridical act having a definite juridical effect—the absolute prohibition of war as an institution.

If they recognised the radical difference between legitimate defence and war they might, he thought, solve the problem of defining the aggressor. It was possible, even now, to determine the relations between law and force; and they were faced with a question far less complicated than that. Old errors died hard, but he was convinced that the problem was not really insuperable.

In any case, both the Covenant and the Paris Pact existed as accepted acts—if there were divergencies between them, jurists and statesmen must draw the necessary consequences.

He wished to call attention to two facts. First, the Pact of Paris and the Covenant had been cumulatively acknowledged by almost all the Members present. Secondly, in objective reality, there was no actual antagonism between the Covenant and the Pact. On the contrary, there was a sort of convergence of tendencies. The Covenant had been adopted at a time when policy with regard to war was not what it was at present. In any case, he most strongly urged that something should be done at the present session. There was already a very large number of provisions on which all were agreed. Those could be adopted at once — if only as a matter of loyalty towards legal principles — with such qualifications as might be rendered necessary by the organic interdependence of the articles of the Covenant which could not be amended separately from one another. The great future problem of disarmament was not itself independent of the decisions the Assembly might reach that year—in fact, the Assembly might by its decisions definitely help forward the cause of disarmament.

He earnestly begged the members of the Committee not to believe that they were faced by an insoluble problem. As the Austrian declaration proved, there was no need to await replies from Governments which had not replied, and as for the question of expressions of opinion by statesmen in countries not Members of the League, surely the fifty-four Members of the League had a right to consider their own position juridically free from all political influence due to individual foreign points of view.

Mr. TE WATER (South Africa) said that the South African Government was prepared to accept the text established in the report of the First Committee, which they considered preferable to that presented by the Committee of Eleven. The South African Government had, however, at no time considered that there was any urgent need for reconciling the terms of the Covenant with those of the Paris Pact. The question was a matter of form rather than substance.

In that regard, he would refer to the observations of the Italian Government of April 16th last to be found in document A.11.1931 (see Annex 1), wherein was stated:

> "The Italian Government considers, however, that the pursuit of this object should be abandoned unless it were likely to result in a real improvement in the working of the system established by the Covenant of the League of Nations for the pacific settlement of disputes.
> "There is no objection to the application of both Covenant and Pact between the States which are bound by both of them; the mere fact that one of these agreements still admits the possibility of war in certain cases, while the other has eliminated this possibility, does not appear to create practical drawbacks sufficiently serious to call for the amendment of the Covenant, especially as there is no hope of really perfecting it."

That view appealed to him as being sound sense. It seemed to him that more harm had been done by the immense discussion that had taken place during the last two years, and was still taking place, and by the extraordinary indecision shown by nations in this matter, than any possible ultimate good that might result from the reconciliation of the Covenant and the Paris Pact. His Government would be quite happy to see these discussions come to an end, for, indeed, it seemed that everything that could usefully be said on this question had been said.

He recognised, of course, the valuable and conscientious work performed by the various Committees which had been appointed to seek a solution of this problem.

The South African Government would not be unhappy, in these circumstances, should a general desire become manifest among delegates that no immediate good was to be found in prosecuting the matter further.

However, if it was clearly the unanimous wish to proceed, he was empowered to say the South African Government was prepared to accept the text proposed by the Sub-Committee appointed last year as being preferable to the proposals of the Committee of Eleven. It would be understood, however, that ratification on behalf of the South African Government was subject to the coming into force of a general treaty for the reduction and limitation of armaments.

FIFTH MEETING.

Held on Thursday, September 17th, 1931, at 10.15 a.m.

Chairman: M. SCIALOJA (Italy).

8. Amendment of the Covenant of the League of Nations in order to bring it into Harmony with the Pact of Paris (continuation).

M. HUBER (Switzerland) said he would explain in outline the standpoint of the Swiss Government, which had not yet replied to the circular letter of November 1930. The publication of the Covenant in 1919 had caused disappointment in certain quarters, even though it constituted immense progress as compared with the previous international organisation. It had been hoped that the Covenant would unreservedly condemn warfare. That suggestion had been embodied in the draft international organisation submitted to the Peace Conference by the Swiss Government. The Swiss Government had therefore gladly acceded to the Kellogg Pact and was prepared to co-operate in finding a positive solution for the problem of the harmonisation of the two instruments.

Contrary to what had been asserted, it was not inconsistent that the Covenant and the Kellogg Pact should co-exist. The Covenant was a starting-point—the absolute minimum of international organisation required to ensure peace. There was nothing to prevent States Members concluding conventions going far beyond the obligations laid down in the Covenant. Article 21 of the Covenant itself stated that no international understanding for the maintenance of peace was inconsistent with any clause of the Covenant.

There was, however, a natural desire to adapt the Covenant to the Kellogg Pact, because the Covenant was the veritable charter of international organisation, and it might seem strange that war could still be regarded as a possible means of settling international disputes, whereas almost all the States Members of the League and certain other very important States had concluded another agreement proclaiming the absolute renunciation of war as an instrument of national policy. But though justifiable, the harmonisation of the two instruments was not a simple matter. There were really two "pacts"; each instrument formed a complete and perfectly balanced system, but they differed from each other essentially in structure. The bringing of the Covenant, which was the basis of an international organisation and laid down political principles of the highest importance, into harmony with an agreement which merely affirmed two principles of policy, mainly of moral weight, was not a simple matter.

The Covenant was unique in that it combined the realities of political life with bold concepts, in order to maintain peace and build up international law on new foundations. The very perfection of this perfectly balanced system was the reason why it was so difficult to incorporate therein the fundamental idea of a diplomatic act of an entirely different nature. In fact, the Paris Pact could not be merely incorporated in the Covenant. It became necessary to revise the Covenant in such a way that the main ideas of the Paris Pact would be reflected therein. On the understanding, therefore, that there was no question of incorporating one diplomatic document in another, the question of reservations lost its importance. It might even be asked whether there really were any reservations, and whether the so-called reservations were not the interpretations given by certain Governments during diplomatic correspondence which preceded the conclusion of the Pact. In any case, the revised Covenant must be acceptable to all countries, or, at any rate, the great majority of countries. It was for States which had made reservations concerning the Paris Pact to explain their reasons when the principles of that Pact were about to be introduced into the Covenant.

He would make the following suggestion with regard to methods. First, they should analyse the Covenant, which provided for procedure in three stages for the exclusion of war and the maintenance of peace. The first defined the conditions under which a State might in certain cases resort to war, the second was concerned with solutions, and the third with sanctions.

The system of the first stage, defined in Article 12, had been completely transformed by the incorporation of the principles of the Paris Pact. Under no circumstances might war be waged except in self-defence; on the contrary, war was absolutely prohibited. That was the great change involved in harmonisation. That would connote a further advance beyond the immense progress achieved in the Covenant, as compared with international law as existing in 1919.

In the matter of solutions, the Covenant was rather timid. It proclaimed the principle, at all times recognised in international law, of absolute respect for arbitral awards, and it gave some sort of binding force, but quite indirectly, to a unanimous decision of the Council, inasmuch as a State desirous of making war would thus bring sanctions into operation. Moreover, all the solutions depended on agreement between the parties. It was primarily a system of conciliation.

Since there had been introduced into the Covenant, in place of the system of the limitation of resort to war, the system of absolute prohibition contained in the Pact, the corollary ought, he thought, to be accepted—namely, peaceful settlement in all cases. That principle was embodied in the Paris Pact without any indication as to methods. The Covenant, which was an organic statute, provided for definite methods.

That hiatus in the Covenant was to a large extent filled by the optional clause, by treaties of arbitration and conciliation—which even included all disputes of any kind—and the General Act. But these methods, although they had spread to an extent that nobody would have thought possible ten years previously, did not cover all the situations which might jeopardise peace. It therefore seemed reasonable to maintain the proposal of the Committee of Eleven to the effect that a unanimous decision of the Council should have binding force. If the Council was really unanimous, there would be every reason to suppose that the solution was an equitable one acceptable to all Members of the League.

But if a decision of the Council were to have the same effect as an arbitral award, it was logical to retain yet another proposal of the Committee of Eleven—namely, that the Council might on a majority vote request advisory opinions on the points of law involved in the disputes submitted to it.

To rely on unanimous decisions of the Council was not going very far; it was, however, an advance in that it formed a true corollary of the prohibition of war.

In the matter of arbitra awards, the universality of which had not yet been confirmed by article 13 of the Covenant, they might perhaps go a little further. The Committee had, on the one hand, the proposal of the Finnish delegation to ensure a solution when the validity of an award was disputed, but they might go still further with a view to mobilising world opinion if a State opposed the enforcement of an award : the Council might, in that case, be empowered to convene an extraordinary session of the Assembly.

Sanctions were the most important part. Here, the Covenant had made a really radical innovation quite different from previous international law—an innovation, that was truly epoch-making in the history of that law. Sanctions formed a very special element of that organic institution, the League, and great care would have to be exercised in extending the system to cases different from those provided for in the Covenant. The authors had been very wise in selecting the circumstances in which the sanctions of the League might apply.

The first case was that of aggression in violation of Article 12—i.e., when the aggressor had not called for arbitration or mediation by the Council. That was the most serious infraction of the prohibition to resort to war : naturally, therefore, such a situation would cause great public emotion. Nations would entirely approve intervention, in cases, even, which did not concern them directly, if the matter was so obviously one of universal concern.

There was also the case of a State resorting to war against a country which was conforming to the arbitral award—in other words, the case of a State desiring to terminate the situation created by the award. Respect for awards and treaties was, however, the corner-stone of civilisation itself.

The third case was that of a State resorting to war against another State which was adhering to the unanimous decision of the Council. In that case, also, war would be intended to terminate a situation confirmed by a unanimous opinion of the Council, exclusive of the parties to the dispute. It might also be held in that case that the solution was acceptable for all countries and that intervention was legitimate.

But there were other cases which had not been clearly ascertained. Was it wise to endeavour to find a definite solution for all war situations which it might be impossible to foresee in advance ? The Covenant had proceeded by enumeration and had selected very serious definite cases in which the League might count on the support of public opinion. But if the decision were reached only on a majority vote and opinion was divided, the situation might not be so clear, and the League of Nations might then find itself in a very precarious position.

It had been said that these cases were merely of theoretical interest. That could not be stated definitely, because no one could foresee what might happen if the League were to accept a comprehensive formula for situations which had not been clearly defined. In any case, disputes not covered by the optional clause, by the General Act, or by treaties of arbitration, which were not settled by the unanimous vote of the Council, might cause conflicts in which opinion would be divided. It would be no service to the League to compel it to risk losing its authority by taking decisions in which the Council might not—as it was at present—be supported by world opinion.

The harmonisation of the Covenant and the Pact should connote the co-ordination of obligations arising under the two instruments, and not any amplification of those obligations. If, in particular, it was sought by some comprehensive formula to apply sanctions to all situations which might arise, they would be going much further than the Paris Pact, which provided no sanctions, and possibly much further than the obligations arising under the Covenant. It would not be a mere addition but a wholesale multiplication of contracted obligations.

If, therefore, they amended Article 16, it would be wise to follow the lines indicated by the Italian and Norwegian Governments and reserve sanctions for cases in which there was a unanimous decision of the Council confirming the measures to be taken to restore peace or subdue the aggressor.

As opposed to juridical possibilities there were the realities of juridical life, and the Committee should take these realities into account in order to ensure the proper working of the Covenant. The harmonisation of the two instruments was not a mere work of juridical logic; it was also a political task, in which allowance should be made for all possible situations. The Covenant of 1919 constituted immense progress in the domain of international law—the greatest progress which had been accomplished for centuries. To ensure its application in its present terms and spirit would already be a great point gained.

M. Erich (Finland) reminded the Committee that the Covenant remained subject to the ever-varying views of political life. It was a delicate instrument which, if amended at all, must be amended with care. When innovations were proposed, whether in the form of amendments to the text or by a separate instrument such as the measures intended to prevent war, there was a danger that some provision or other of the Covenant might be weakened or distorted. The Finnish Government was very interested in this question, as was shown by its observations. He would draw the special attention to the main conclusions of the Finnish memoranda :

1. None of the present advantages or guarantees which the Covenant afforded to Members of the League should be sacrificed, particularly with regard to international security, nor should the meaning of any provision at present in force be distorted implicitly.

2. No reservation, whether express or implicit, made in the new provisions to be inserted in the Covenant, would be compatible with the spirit of the Covenant or its organic unity. Reservations would be bound to cause confusion and might even have a distracting effect.

3. No interpretation should be allowed to the effect that only war in the strict sense could be the corollary of the peaceful means by which international disputes ought to be solved. There were certain measures of coercion which must be termed non-peaceful, although they were not regarded as, ipso facto, involving a state of war.

4. In the new text of Article 15 any formula which might appear tautological or opportunist must be avoided. If there was to be a difference between the unanimous and majority-vote decisions of the Council, the text should be drafted so as to make a real difference, a difference not in appearances only but in substance, between the consequences of the two classes of decision.

After these general observations he would submit several observations of detail.

The principle defined in Article 12, which laid down that disputes likely to lead to rupture and, in general, all international disputes should be settled by peaceful procedure, ought to be maintained. He agreed with the observations of the Irish delegate and emphasised the obvious contradiction between prohibition of war in the Paris Pact and the expression a "dispute likely to lead to a rupture". Disputes must, under the present terms of the Covenant, be submitted to peaceful procedure without any possibility of postponing resort to arbitration or conciliation until it had become obvious that the dispute could not be settled. There was some danger that, if the Committee agreed to the formula adopted by the Sub-Committee in the previous year, an unscrupulous State might resort to non-peaceful procedure on the pretext that no further means were open. Article 12, as at present drafted, was categorical on that point.

Again the texts proposed—"si le différend n'a pu être réglé" ("if the dispute cannot be otherwise settled")—were not satisfactory in view of the fact that the same expression was applied to a different case in Article 15, paragraph 4, of the Covenant.

With regard to Article 15, there were obviously difficulties, it might even be said inequities, that might arise in the case of a very definite dispute concerning the effects between a recommendation adopted unanimously and a recommendation adopted by a majority of the Council. Finland was, nevertheless, prepared to accept in the first place the solution recommended by the Committee of Eleven—namely, that conclusions adopted unanimously were binding. But it was also desirable that the Council should be able, on a majority vote, to request an advisory opinion of the Permanent Court.

The present text of paragraphs 6 and 7 of Article 15 established, with regard to effects of recommendations to the Council, an essential difference between the two hypotheses. Unless all differences were abolished between a unanimous and a majority-vote recommendation, the difference should be maintained, not only in the form, but in the essence of the recommendation. If they were not prepared to agree that a unanimous recommendation was binding, as the Committee of Eleven proposed, the Finnish Government, though still favourable to the first solution, proposed as an alternative that paragraph 6 should be so worded as to show that the party which conformed to the conclusions of the report might rely on its action to claim a settlement of the dispute in conformity with the Council recommendation. That formula was no vaguer nor more ambiguous than the terms of the present text of paragraphs 6 and 7 of Article 15, which was, nevertheless, of the highest importance. There had been some hesitation about making a unanimous recommendation of the Council binding. Such a recommendation should, however, be endowed with other and more weighty effects than those following on a majority-vote decision, unless they were prepared to abolish all differences between the two cases.

If the conclusions of such a recommendation were not binding, at any rate the party conforming to a unanimous recommendation should be authorised to derive certain advantages therefrom—namely, the conclusions should give him an acquired situation which could be pleaded against an adverse party. If the latter refused, by contrary acts, to conform to the conclusions of the recommendation, it should not be allowed to nullify the effect of the recommendation. The party which did not conform to the recommendation ought to be held responsible if, as a result of its resistance, the situation grew so much worse that a rupture became likely.

The draft Convention for the prevention of war laid down in Article 4, paragraph 2, that, if a party violated the orders of the Council, it would establish against itself a presumption that it had resorted to war within the meaning of Article 16 of the Covenant. Similarly, a party which conformed to a unanimous recommendation must be allowed to plead its action as a presumption in its favour.

A unanimous recommendation of the Council would therefore provide, for the party conforming thereto, an excellent position which could not be further questioned and in which it would be entitled to remain, unless, of course, some special agreement were reached by which the dispute was brought before some arbitral or judicial tribunal.

According to the intentions of the authors of Article 15 of the Covenant (paragraphs 6 and 7), a recommendation adopted by a majority would not confer on the party conforming thereto the same advantages as those conferred under a unanimous recommendation. It would be of value only in so far as the conclusions were well founded.

It would be seen, however, on closer examination, that the Sub-Committee's text abolished all actual difference between the two kinds of recommendation. All that was necessary was already laid down in paragraph 4 of Article 15. Paragraphs 6 and 7 only repeated, rather tantologically, the sense of paragraph 4. This point had been emphasised in a passage of the Finnish Government's memorandum which M. Erich had read.

The observations of the Finnish Government had secured the approval of other members of the Committee, and he hoped that they would take them into account in preparing the final text. Finland hoped that the harmonising of the two instruments would be brought to a successful conclusion. It might have been sufficient if they had been allowed to co-exist side by side, but, once the undertaking was begun, it would be most unfortunate if it were abandoned.

M. POLITIS (Greece) was glad that he had helped to bring about the adjournment of the discussion, which had made it possible for all members to become better acquainted with the documents and for some to receive supplementary instructions from their Governments.

The discussion had shown that the question was riper than might have been thought; amendments had been submitted which might perhaps lead to an improvement in the texts adopted in the previous years, but it also proved that the silence of many Governments was not necessarily due to indifference or hostility and did not preclude accession in principle to the proposed reform. Such was the case with Greece, whose Government was of opinion that the harmonisation of the two instruments was both useful and necessary. In addition to the strong arguments set forward at great length in the previous year before the Committee to show why that was so, the present year's discussion had elicited an additional reason which ought to be emphasised—the intimate relationship between the suggested reform and the great work which would be undertaken in a few months' time by the Disarmament Conference. Although certain countries had already declared that they could not ratify the proposed amendments until the Disarmament Treaty had come into force, other countries thought that the coming into force of amendments by Governments was an essential condition to the concessions they would be called upon to make to ensure the success of the Disarmament Conference. These countries quite rightly saw in the amendments new guarantees of security which would enable them to adopt a more liberal attitude in making the concessions necessary for the success of a general Convention on the limitation or reduction of armaments. That was a point which could not be too strongly emphasised and which proved, not merely the utility of the reform, but its urgency.

There were other reasons which had not been mentioned up to the present and which had prevented Governments from replying. The Greek Government, in particular, noted as a result of the discussions of the previous year that the text submitted for its general approval contained provisions regarding the scope of which doubts still existed; it experienced great difficulty in forming a final opinion on the point. After a wide general discussion in full Committee, it had been noted that in the previous year, in addition to the legal questions of the problem of harmonising the two instruments, there were also political aspects of the highest importance.

The Sub-Committee, after examining the legal and political aspects of the problem under the chairmanship of M. Limburg, was able to submit certain texts; but it had not been able to deal with all the questions laid before it, and it had been forced to note that certain rather important differences of opinion existed which could not be solved until the Governments had carefully examined the matter and until an agreement had been reached between the Governments most directly concerned.

He did not know whether such agreement could be reached. He feared not, or in any case, that it would not be full agreement. Without enumerating to the Committee all the divergencies which had become manifest in the Sub-Committee in the previous year, he felt bound to say one or two words on the main differences from a purely theoretical standpoint. One arose in connection with Article 12 and Article 13, paragraph 4—namely, the question of reprisals. M. Cassin's report stated that:

> "As the jurists report notes, the text proposed for Article 13, paragraph 4, clearly allows States the right themselves to proceed to the enforcement of awards given in their favour."

But by what means could they enforce such awards? One thing was certain: they could not resort to war, since war had been forbidden. Apart from war, were they free to choose the means of constraint to ensure enforcement of the award given in their favour? M. Cassin doubted that, for he said:

> "The only open question is the limit imposed upon a State in whose favour the award has been given. The general desire would seem to be to admit that the principle laid down in the preamble concerning the prohibition of resort to war applies in this case. The uncertainty surrounding so new a point in international law should be a further incentive to the successful State to appeal to the Council, and for the Council to propose measures ensuring the enforcement of the award."

A successful country was therefore entitled to ensure the enforcement of the award by its own action, though it could not resort to war for the purpose. It was allowed, in fact, to employ other means; but what means were available? Might it resort to measures of constraint of a military nature?

That was a serious question, which had not yet been solved. It was a danger which ought to be dissipated. They could not modify the Covenant, they could not insert revised provisions in Articles 12 and 13 without knowing exactly what those provisions meant.

But there was yet another more serious divergence, which referred to the right of legitimate defence. It was understood that the outlawry of war, which is admitted by the Paris Pact, and which it was intended to insert in the new text of the Covenant, referred only to wars of aggression. It did not refer to wars of defence undertaken in virtue of a right regarded as absolutely essential for the maintenance of a State's integrity.

There could be no doubt that war undertaken in answer to offensive warfare was still permitted. The contracting parties to the Pact of Paris had not been sufficiently explicit on this point, and as the Italian Government said at the end of its Note :

> "It is not in the least necessary to include in the amendments a clause relating to self-defence, since it is obvious that a State which had disregarded the clause forbidding war could not demand that the State attacked by it should observe that clause."

That was obvious, but defensive warfare might arise in other circumstances—a typical situation being that in which a country was faced with a state of peace created by others which it regarded as seriously imperilling its existence. In order to put an end to that situation, it resorted to arms and began war. It would then say, and be convinced that it was entitled to say, that it had only exercised its right of self-defence.

Unless that point were carefully defined, serious consequences might follow. The exception thus admitted without definition might undermine the rule and lead to consequences of extreme practical complexity and gravity, for, just as the State which invoked self-defence wished to reserve its entire freedom of appreciation to decide whether its security was threatened, similarly other States Members of the League might, on the same grounds, claim the same freedom of discretion in judging an act committed by a State which resorted to war in its own defence, and might not be of the same opinion, deeming that what that State called defensive warfare was really offensive and a war of aggression. The question would then arise whether the sanctions laid down in Article 16 should apply. That was a very serious and doubtful point which ought to be cleared up. If the difficulty were not removed, the proposed reform would be full of danger, for the questions to which he alluded could not be solved at a stroke. They needed careful examination, which could only be effected by a sub-committee. Governments should be consulted on outstanding divergencies in order to ascertain whether the various States were definitely prepared to agree on all such points. On the basis of this new consultation, it might be possible to secure a final and definitive reform next year. That would be not too late for the Disarmament Conference, which in all probability would not have terminated its work by September 1932. It would be desirable that after the thirteenth Assembly the Conference should know whether the Covenant would be remodelled in such a way as to increase the guarantees of safety.

He therefore proposed the appointment of a sub-committee to study the amendments suggested to the text (which the Committee was then considering) and all questions which had not been settled in the previous year. He also proposed that a detailed report on the result of the work of the sub-committee should be made to the Assembly, which would then invite all countries to examine minutely the problems raised and reply in due course next year.

Dr. Woo Kaiseng (China) said that as a member of the Committee of Eleven he had drawn attention to the difficulty of finding a text which would be both juridically sound and satisfactory to all. China preferred the text of the sub-committee of the First Committee to that of the Committee of Eleven as being clearer and a closer interpretation of the desire to prohibit war in accordance with the Pact of Paris.

The Chinese Government deemed that the outlawry of war was not enough unless it were accompanied by the outlawry of other measures of coercion, such as occupation, bombardment, etc., which really amounted to warfare. When one country, by menaces followed by acts, tried to impose its will on another country by force, such action differed from warfare only in externals. If the weaker party were unwilling to yield, such practices inevitably led to war itself.

Great difficulty was experienced in defining the aggressor, but the problem might be made easier if it were declared that the aggressor was the party that first employed coercive measures. Such measures were a manifest violation of the Covenant : the Covenant, therefore, should textually prohibit such measures, in order that the stronger party could not thus break the will of the weaker without resorting to open warfare.

M. Limburg (Netherlands) feared that M. Politis' proposal really meant the postponement of the solution of the problem for several years. This was the third general discussion which had taken place on the subject. There had been a very important debate in 1929; it led to the appointment of the Committee of Eleven, which made its proposals. In 1930 the Committee had discussed the amendments of the Committee of Eleven. Even at that time several delegates had said that it was not so much a question of harmonising the Paris Pact with the Covenant as of deciding whether the time had come to prohibit war in the Covenant in all circumstances. The First Committee had appointed a Sub-Committee to consider the amendments of the Committee of Eleven and had suggested certain modifications. So now they had two groups of amendments, both of which had already been referred to the Governments. True, some Governments were still reflecting; others still had scruples with regard to the extension of sanctions in Article 16. But that was no reason why the Committee should not decide on definite amendments which might, if necessary, be submitted to Governments in 1931, after this third general discussion.

It should be remembered that some Governments had already abandoned their scruples, and were ready to agree to one of the two systems. Other Governments had given their replies yesterday, and those replies had been in the affirmative. He therefore proposed the immediate appointment of a sub-committee to revise the two groups of amendments and see whether they could not secure unanimity on one of these groups, or on a combination of the two, as a final text for submission to the Governments. August 27th, 1928, had been hailed as a day of glory for humanity. War had been outlawed for ever. Was that rejoicing now to be regarded as premature and illusory?

Mr. te Water was right in stating that too much discussion of the Pact of Paris would only weaken it.

If the problem were defined as he now defined it, and as he had defined it in the previous year, he thought they could reach a solution. At present there were fissures in the Covenant by which war could enter, a fact which had been noted and already criticised by all commentators during the last ten years. Was not the Pact of Paris a new circumstance which ought to give the League courage to fill those gaps and banish all legitimate warfare from the Covenant? If so, they had all of them their responsibility as Members of the League, but they had that responsibility only. They were not concerned with the fact that several countries had made reservations.

What were those reservations—or " so-called " reservations, as M. Huber called them. Some referred to the question of legitimate defence—he did not propose to consider the reservations regarding sanctions which were made after the signature of the Pact. If the reservations regarding legitimate defence meant that each State had itself, without an impartial supervision, the right to judge whether its acts merely constituted legitimate defence, then that would be the death, not only of the Paris Pact, but of the Covenant.

Moreover, all authorities agreed that every State had a legitimate right to defend itself. The limits of legitimate defence were not, however, defined in the Covenant. That definition ought to be left to international practice and the decisions of the Council.

M. Politis had mentioned the case of a State which was so hard pressed by another that the only solution would be a resort to arms. That case might, perhaps, have occurred in the past; but for all countries which had signed the optional clause, such a situation had now become a question of law for the Permanent Court to decide. In the case of countries which had not signed the optional clause, the decision would be reached by the Council. In this matter, as in others, they should have confidence in the Council.

Another argument was that certain Members of the League had not yet acceded to the Paris Pact. That was of no importance if the question was defined as he had defined it—namely: " Had not the time come to prohibit war completely under the Covenant? ". Switzerland was a case in point. Switzerland had desired even in 1919 to prohibit all war, and the Swiss delegate had told them that the Covenant in its original conception had on that very account been a disappointment for his country. Switzerland would therefore agree with him.

The difficulties which seemed so great to M. Politis that he desired an adjournment for another year related to self-defence and reprisals. Did he really believe that adjournment for twelve months would bring about the solution of those questions? Of the two the more serious was the question of reprisals, which had been on the agenda of the League since 1923. The Committee would remember that in 1924 a Committee of Jurists had given a very evasive opinion on the limits of reprisals. The fact that this point had not been settled had not prevented States from adhering to the Covenant, because under Article 13 of the Covenant Members " agreed that . . . in the event of any failure to carry out . . . an award, the Council shall propose what steps should be taken to give effect thereto ". There was nowhere any mention of what the State which had gained its case had the right to do on its own initiative, nor need there be, if war were prohibited absolutely under the Covenant.

It was true that sanctions under the Covenant had a corollary in arbitration or judicial settlement, and the unanimous decision of the Council, and that, if all war were banished, the same corollary would not exist. But there was a solution for that objection as set out in the Norwegian and Italian amendments. Even without those amendments, with no corollary of arbitration, judicial settlement or Council decision, did not the Members of the Committee believe that a complete and full system of judicial settlement would be attained all the more speedily if they began by eliminating all possibility of war under the Covenant? If war were banished, the general adoption of the system of judicial settlement would come about sooner. Moreover, many countries had already signed the optional clause and the others would doubtless follow suit.

The question must no longer be adjourned. The Assembly must take action. As regards the effects of their decision on the Disarmament Conference, M. Politis had suggested that the decision would be reached before the Disarmament Conference came to an end. He did not quite agree with that. If the question were adjourned, it was not at all certain that it would be settled before the end of the Disarmament Conference.

If he agreed to the appointment of a sub-committee, he would do so in the hope that the sub-committee would complete its work during the present Assembly, so that the First Committee might consider its recommendations and submit them to the Assembly. That was their duty, for the sake of the prestige of the League and the welfare of humanity.

M. UNDÉN (Sweden) observed that, although complaints had been made of the constant adjournments of this question, the adjournments had proved to be useful. On each occasion further difficulties had been brought to light and new texts suggested. The lesson was not that the League was powerless, but that the question was not so simple as had at first been thought.

After quoting the report of the Sub-Committee in the previous year, he declared that Sweden was not directly interested in the question of reservations to the Paris Pact and the compatibility of the new articles with certain treaties. On the contrary, the Swedish Government still had scruples with regard to the wide extension of sanctions. It had been said that this extension would really have an effect on the deliberations of the Disarmament Conference, but, if so, would it not be better to ascertain what the effect would be in the matter of disarmament? Sweden, however, did not press that side of the problem. She was more preoccupied with the question how sanctions would function within the League. It was highly inconvenient to extend sanctions to cases in which the Council was divided, either on the merits of the case or the provisional steps to be taken. The question of sanctions was also being considered in the Third Committee, in connection with Article 4 of the draft Convention on the strengthening of means to prevent war. Under that article, it seemed that sanctions were extended to all cases without exception when the Council unanimously recommended provisional measures, and those provisional measures had not been carried out. If that were so, the clause was practically the same as the suggestion he had made in the previous year.

As had been pointed out, all delegations desired to reach a solution; but the nations were not unanimous as to the means by which that solution should be reached. He did not think there would be any great inconvenience in adjourning the question. After all, there was not much more discrepancy between the Pact of Paris and the Covenant than, for instance, between the Covenant itself and the General Act of Arbitration. He was sure that not only delegates, but the man in the street whose opinion had so often been quoted in this connection would realise that the Pact of Paris did not lose any of its validity or force, simply because the League could not agree on the best manner of incorporating its clauses in the Covenant.

He emphasised that the outlawry of war had already become an accomplished fact by the signing of the Kellogg Pact.

The CHAIRMAN was afraid that the discussion would have to be adjourned until the following morning. That was no disadvantage, because the question was the most serious the League had ever had to consider. A false step in the drafting of any article might be disastrous. A few more days devoted to the question would not be misspent. No one believed the Pact of Paris to be sufficient in itself : if it had been, there would be no need for a Covenant. The Assembly was engaged in laying down universal law : that was a hard task, for the law must be so clear as to allow the elucidation of all points, even the most complicated ones. The task was indeed harder than had been thought. M. Politis had referred to the question of the definition of self-defence. There was an even more difficult case. Suppose the self-defence of a nation finally took the form of an offensive. How would that point be decided?

If they could not terminate their work in time for the present Assembly, nothing would be lost. It would be better not to terminate their work than to submit to the Assembly something which would not secure universal acceptance. In any case, it would be impossible to have the new Covenant ready when the Disarmament Conference met, because the new text would have to be ratified by Governments, a procedure which would require two or three years.

SIXTH MEETING.

Held on Friday, September 18th, 1931, at 10.15 a.m.

Chairman : M. SCIALOJA (Italy).

9. Amendment of the Covenant of the League of Nations in order to bring it into Harmony with the Pact of Paris (continuation).

M. RAESTAD (Norway) thought it incorrect to suggest that there was any conflict between the Covenant and the Pact. Some speakers appeared to argue that the Covenant authorised certain wars. It did not authorise them; it merely did not prohibit them. The text of the Covenant recognised certain wars, but the actual system on which the Covenant was based did not recognise them.

It was the duty of the League organisations set up to watch over the maintenance of peace to apply international law as a whole. They therefore applied the Kellogg Pact, which was a very important part of that law.

The lack of coincidence between the two instruments was partly logical and necessary in view of the difference in structure between the Covenant and the Pact; that was one of the obstacles to harmonisation. Another difficulty was due to the suggestion that the opportunity should be taken to amend and improve the system of the Covenant.

There were three aspects to the problem—the liberty of action retained by the States Members, the methods for the pacific solution of disputes, and sanctions.

A question cognate to Members' liberty of action was that of legitimate defence. Here there was a logically necessary lack of coincidence between the two instruments. The Kellogg Pact left each signatory free to decide on its own initiative and for its own particular case what it understood by "legitimate defence". The report by the Foreign Affairs Commission of the United States Senate stated that each nation was free at all times, and regardless of the treaty provisions, to defend itself, and was the sole judge of what constituted the right of defence and the necessity for, and extent of, the same.

The contents of the Kellogg Pact, which include the prohibition of the use of non-pacific means, might be incorporated in the Covenant; but this freedom of action and judgment would then necessarily cease to exist, in so for as the Covenant was concerned, because it was, both in logic and in form, at variance with the system of union on which the League was based. Again, as it would not exist for States individually, it could not continue to exist merely by reason of the fact that certain Members of the League combined to agree on a more or less arbitrary definition of the phrase in question.

M. Raestad could not share M. Huber's view with regard to the problems raised in connection with the pacific solution of disputes. M. Huber favoured the solution recommended by the Committee of Eleven, whereby the unanimous recommendations of the Council would become obligatory. In the previous year the Sub-Committee had reached another solution which did not differ greatly from the present state of affairs, and had done so only after mature reflection.

It was, of course, the general desire that legal disputes should be submitted to judicial settlement: it was, however, equally true that in the interest of world peace there must exist a supreme authority able to compel, if need be, the acceptance of solutions which, though at variance with positive law, would represent an equitable settlement of a dispute that might otherwise be a permanent cause of conflict.

If the unanimous recommendations of the Council were brought into the category of final decisions, the Council would be converted into a court which would have to adhere to positive law. This de facto situation was emphasised by the proposed amendment whereby the Council could, by a majority, ask for the opinion of the Permanent Court. The Council would be converted into a legal tribunal, and the loss in the practical and political efficacy of its action would be as great as the gain that would result from making its decisions binding.

The Norwegian Government had at first asked that no change should be made in the system of sanctions. It had, however, found it possible to vary that position. It regarded the present system as constituting an empirical solution which was in no way final and was capable of amendment. For the reasons advanced by M. Huber and M. Undén, it could not go further than agree to the Italian amendment in cases where there was a division of opinion in the Council as to which was the Covenant-breaking State.

No relation would exist between the draft amendment and the vital problem of disarmament but for the proposal to bring the Pact and the Covenant into harmony with one another. The link only came into being owing to the desire to utilise the work of harmonisation to make certain improvements in the Covenant, more particularly with regard to sanctions. The forthcoming Disarmament Convention would be a convention subject to periodical revision, whereas the Covenant was a fundamental law, which was not subject to revision in the same sense and was sure to remain in existence for a long time to come.

As the Chairman had remarked, what was it hoped to gain by linking up the Disarmament Conference and the amendments to the Covenant, seeing that the fate of those amendments would not be known for a long time, perhaps, indeed, for many years to come?

M. Raestad wondered whether it would not be a more useful procedure to arrange for the discussion, during the Disarmament Conference, of agreements parallel to the Disarmament Convention and subject to revision like that Convention, and to give up the complicated and difficult undertaking of attempting to embody in the Covenant the ideas contained in the Kellogg Pact.

M. Cassin (France) observed that France had from the outset supported the British proposal for the amendment of the Covenant, because, although the Briand-Kellogg Pact had undeniably legal force, it was desirable that the Covenant should be harmonised with the progress achieved by the renunciation of war.

In the previous year, the French delegate had stated that his country was prepared to vote for, and ratify without delay, the amendments proposed by the Committee of Jurists; the latter had not placed any narrow construction on their terms of reference, since they had suggested, in addition to the renunciation of war, the opening of proceedings for pacific solutions which would be binding. This attitude on the part of France was in no way linked up with the debates at the Disarmament Conference. At the previous Assembly, France had agreed to accept the much more modest amendments of the Sub-Committee, so as to make it easier for all Members who had signed the Covenant to agree on a number of ideas embodying the measure of progress at present practicable.

There was no change in her general position with regard to the question of substance. She was prepared to go as far as the other countries would consent to go. She considered that the texts proposed last year—in particular Article 12 and Article 13, paragraph 4—represented an advance in comparison with the work of the Committee of Eleven, and she would support them, since the prohibition of war would henceforth be directly bound up with the search for pacific solutions. She would, of course, have to make it clear, as other countries, in particular Japan, had done, that legitimate defence was not excluded from Article 12. It was unanimously agreed that the conception of legitimate defence must be distinguished from that of war, since they did not belong to the same category. France, however, would not embody in a written text a literal definition of legitimate defence. In the present condition of international law, there was what he might term a series of strata one above the other in the judgment of what constituted legitimate defence. The countries which had signed the Pact of Paris, and which were not Members of the League and had not acceded to the Statute of the Court, had been able, as the United States had done, to reserve to themselves a kind of unilateral power of judgment as to what constituted legitimate defence. The countries, however, which had signed, not only the Briand-Kellogg Pact, but the Statute of the Hague Court, and in particular Article 36, were in a different position. The legal force of the Briand-Kellogg Pact emerged from the terms of that article. It was the Court which would ultimately have to judge whether in law there had or had not been a breach of the Briand-Kellogg Pact, which was one of the international undertakings covered by Article 36. It might also be allowed that the States should agree to find a more precise definition of legitimate defence, but the scope of that term might still give rise to divergencies of view.

With regard to Article 13, paragraph 4, it was plain that if the total prohibition of war were incorporated in the Covenant, and if the countries were deprived of their traditional right to exercise their own discretion in carrying out an award, that would be conferring a very grave responsibility and a particularly heavy duty on the Council, since any failure on the part of the League in this matter would have incalculable consequences and might even cause a reaction. The inadequacy of the solutions proposed with regard to Article 13, paragraph 4, had accordingly to be admitted, although, under present conditions, the text approved by the Committee last year represented, perhaps, all that could be extracted from generally held concepts.

M. Cassin called to mind the position taken up by his delegation in the previous year in regard to the solution of disputes. It had then favoured the idea of conferring binding force upon the unanimous decisions of the Council, and of allowing the Council at any time to ask for the advisory opinion of the Court even without the assent of the parties concerned. The great authority lent to this argument by M. Huber's support, and the fact that the Italian delegation also had adhered to it in its observations, only strengthened the French delegation in its attitude on the point of principle, and M. Cassin emphasised the word " principle ".

As to sanctions, he would reaffirm the statements he had made in the previous year. Certain distinguished thinkers like M. Huber, who were entirely familiar with the internal structure of the Covenant, with the development of international justice, and with the progress that had been achieved, failed, perhaps, to pursue their arguments to the end. One fundamental point must be borne in mind. The League had been set up to maintain international peace. Everyone realised how serious it would be, seeing that the countries were already bound by the Briand-Kellogg Pact, which was outside the Covenant, to attempt to incorporate the principle of the total renunciation of war in the Covenant; that was to say, to include it in an organic whole and, at the same time, to remove from that organic whole a certain number of contingencies which in reality there was most reason to fear.

Certain speakers had argued that, if there was an arbitral award, a judicial decision, or a unanimous decision on the part of the Council, the conscience of mankind was more prepared to accept the system of sanctions than in cases where the Members of the Council were divided. That was true; but there was something yet more vital—namely, the need for maintaining peace. War, then, would have been declared illicit in the Covenant; yet at the same time, it would be stated that a breach of the obligation to refrain from war would in certain cases involve no sanction. That was an extremely serious position. Besides, must not the duty to observe the peace take precedence of everything, more particularly when the Council was divided? How could the hands of statesmen be strengthened in their own country? How could they withstand the popular clamour for war, if they were unable to say to their countrymen: " Keep calm. If we go to war, we shall have the entire world against us." ?

It must not be possible, when statesmen say to the public: " If we make war, it will be unlawful ", for agitators to retort: " What does that matter? Let us make war—no one will hinder us and we shall run no risk ".

M. Cassin accordingly laid special emphasis on one point of primary importance—namely, that the Covenant must contain no purely theoretical legal provisions. If it were desired to embody the principle of the renunciation of war in the Covenant, there must be no possibility that any war could be free from the ultimate danger of sanctions. Such danger, moreover, was virtually theoretical, since statesmen would have far better chances of calming public opinion if they could point to the prospect of punishment.

It was theoretical most of all because of the development that had occurred in the past two years in the tendency of amendments. First of all, certain Members of the League who had not originally signed the Pact of Paris had done so later, or were taking steps to do so. That was a very important fact from the psychological, if not from the legal, point of view; but over and above this, there was the increasing number of accessions to the General Act of Arbitration. As the French Government had pointed out in its written observations, it was through the machinery of accessions to Article 36 of the General Act of Arbitration that it would be possible to secure, in the political sphere, the reforms which, perhaps it might be felt, could not at once be effected in legal practice. If there were a large number of accessions to the General Act of Arbitration, the obligation to resort to arbitration would become operative when there was a division in the Council in the circumstances mentioned in Article 15, paragraph 7. There would be an arbitral award, and if there were such an award, Articles 12, 13 and 16 would bring the whole matter within the organic framework of the Covenant. Consequently, as a result of practice and almost without any amendment to the Covenant, a substantial measure of progress, which might give ground for alarm in theory, had already been achieved. It was, however, plain that the countries could not be expected to isolate themselves; it would be perfectly natural to urge them forward—even those which had not acceded to the General Act of Arbitration—by showing them that, if they amended the Covenant, they would thereby be not extending it but ensuring the full application of all its articles.

In this matter it would be well to avoid practical difficulties. Among the instruments of accession to the General Act of Arbitration there were certain formulas which reserved the right of the members of this new form of international judicial association to go first before a political authority—the Council, in political disputes, for instance. He would refer to the formula employed by the British and French Governments and, more recently, by the Italian Government. The British formula, in particular, foreshadowed compulsory arbitration proceedings, which were not to be taken as the principal or immediate proceedings but as subsidiary; that was to say, the parties would have recourse to them only in the event of a division in the Council.

The principle contained in Article 15, paragraph 7, apparently caused misgivings in the minds of many delegations. Some headway, however, had been made, and the statements of the Swedish and Norwegian representatives showed that there was a growing perception of the danger of taking certain steps separately in the work of harmonisation on which the Committee had embarked.

M. Cassin agreed with M. Politis' proposal that a sub-committee should be appointed, not to solve all the difficulties, but to take note, so to speak, of the difficulties which had disappeared or were beginning to look less important and at the same time to isolate those which might still exist.

Some countries—and their number was steadily growing—had stated that there was a link between the success of the work undertaken and that of the Disarmament Conference. One of them had suggested that the problem should be split up, that the principles of the Covenant should be left over and that certain applications of those principles contained in agreements that were open to revision should be taken separately. This, they argued, would advance the work of disarmament. If the sub-committee found no solution for the questions raised, it could at least map out a programme of work for the next year. It could either suggest a further consultation of Governments or convene a committee of Governments, two or three months, for instance, before the Assembly, at a time when the main lines of the Disarmament Conference would have become clear and when the work of the Conference could be appreciated, with the object of deciding what could be embodied in the Covenant at the next Assembly.

Mr. BECKETT (British Empire) said that his Government was for the moment in a somewhat peculiar situation. At the last two Assemblies it had expressed a desire that the Pact of Paris should be incorporated in the Covenant. The necessary amendments had been prepared in the previous year. Almost unanimous agreement had been reached on a formula in the Sub-Committee to which the question had been referred, but at the last moment it had been asked whether these amendments would not have the effect of precluding military operations in the circumstances mentioned in the Treaty of Versailles and certain other treaties. That doubt once expressed had sufficed to involve the postponement of the question, although the British delegation had voted against adjournment.

In the meantime, the Governments had been consulted as to the position they would take up towards the proposal. The last Government of the United Kingdom had replied approving it. The present Government, however, had not yet had time to consider the matter and was therefore in favour (as in the circumstances it could only be) of adjourning a decision to the next Assembly. The speeches which had been made by other delegations indicated that opinion in the Committee was fairly equally divided on the question of adjournment. If it were decided to postpone the question, the present discussion would have had the advantage of bringing out certain points of detail on which misunderstanding still existed.

Lord Cecil, who had taken a deep interest in the matter since 1929, had instructed Mr. Beckett to say that his personal views had undergone no change and that they were in conformity with the last British Government's reply to the Secretary-General's letter.

With regard to the so-called reservations to the Kellogg Pact, Mr. Beckett pointed out the dangers of the imprecise use of language. Inaccurate expressions sometimes led to misunderstandings, and he was uncertain, judging from the remarks of his colleagues, whether some misapprehensions did not actually exist. He had an official copy of the Pact before him, and there were no reservations shown on it. To the best of his knowledge and belief no reservations had been attached to the ratification of any country when they were deposited at Washington.

The references to the so-called "reservations" referred to certain diplomatic correspondence which had preceded the conclusion of the Pact, and it was desirable to appreciate what the nature of this correspondence was. The Pact had not been drawn up in the usual way at a conference; its terms were arrived at as the result of certain diplomatic correspondence. This diplomatic correspondence, in fact, formed the preparatory work of the Paris Pact, in the same way as the records and Minutes of a conference in other cases formed the preparatory work of a convention. There were no reservations, but there was some preparatory work. The preparatory work of a treaty or convention had, subject to certain conditions which had to some extent already been defined by the Permanent Court of International Justice, an interpretative force.

Referring to the suggestion which had been made, that a sub-committee should examine the debates in the American Senate with regard to the Paris Pact, Mr. Beckett said that there was no reason, in principle, for examining the debates in the American Senate rather than the records of the discussions in the Parliaments of all other countries which had participated in the Pact. This would be a formidable task, and he did not consider that it would serve any useful purpose. The meaning and interpretation of a text must be sought first of all in the text itself, together with, if necessary, the records of the preparatory work.

Finally, Mr. Beckett, referring to the amendment suggested by the delegation of the Irish Free State and supported by the Finnish delegation, that the words "likely to lead to a rupture" should be omitted from Articles 12 and 15, said that he desired to express no opinion on the merits of this proposal, but he considered it very necessary that only amendments which were strictly necessary to bring the two instruments into harmony with each other should be examined by the Committee at the present time, and that all other proposals should be considered separately and on their own merits. He considered that this proposal fell outside the scope of the Committee's present task, which was to consider how the two instruments could be brought into harmony with each other.

M. PEDROSO (Spain) wished to dispel a misunderstanding. The failure of the Spanish Government to reply to the questionnaire did not mean that Spain was not interested in the proposals or was opposed to them. Spain had not replied because the change in the Spanish regime had occurred just at the time when the replies were due.

As a matter of fact, the Kellogg Pact had been incorporated in the Spanish Constitution, Article 6 of which laid down that "Spain renounces war as an instrument of national policy". This principle was developed in Articles 45 and 62.

That being so, Spain naturally desired guarantees to be extended and expressed in an international agreement, because there could be no doubt that effective guarantees were required for the Paris Pact. The difficulty of the Committee's task was not insuperable. It merely had to make the sanctions of the Covenant apply to the Pact. If Articles 13 and 16 were enforced by the absolute banishment of war, then the whole former concept of neutrality would be transformed. By making war a crime, neutrality would be tantamount to complicity, and neutral countries would share in the responsibility for the loss of life and wealth incurred, particularly as a new war would probably mean the end of civilisation. He hoped the forthcoming Disarmament Conference would end, not in failure, but in splendid achievement. The Spanish Republic was therefore opposed to an adjournment and would agree to any decision calculated to achieve an effective result.

M. ROLIN (Belgium) desired to rectify certain errors and check a certain tendency to extend the problem in all directions. He must insist that, whatever the conclusion of the discussion, the Committee must make up its mind that it could not abandon the work it had undertaken. To do so would be to deal a fatal blow both at the Covenant and at the Paris Pact.

Jurists were convinced that the legal value of the Paris Pact was above all discussion. It was a treaty signed and ratified by a large number of countries, and, where its clauses went farther than the clauses of the Covenant, it tacitly abrogated those clauses of the Covenant or modified them. Baron Descamps had shown that the outlawry of war—without exception, because legitimate defence was not a real exception—had profoundly modified the whole situation. M. Rolin himself agreed with Baron Descamps and M. Huber that the change brought about by the Paris Pact was nothing less than revolutionary, but its effects could not be complete until the Covenant had been harmonised.

The Covenant differed from the Paris Pact, however, in that it was not a mere convention. It was an organisation which possessed definite rules, and it had certain social functions connected primarily with the maintenance of peace. It was therefore of vital importance to ascertain how an agreement reached outside the League, which referred to the same object and to which almost all the Members of the League had acceded, would affect the League itself.

If, after three years of study, the League could only say that these two instruments were independent, that it was difficult to harmonise the effects of the one with those of the other, and that, if a serious difficulty arose, each instrument would have to be considered separately, that would indeed be a confession of weakness.

It had often been said that the force of treaties lay in the measure of public support they secured. Public opinion would never understand the Assembly's failure to harmonise the two instruments owing to a few obscure considerations.

M. Huber had mentioned three problems: first, the outlawry of war. At the outset the Committee had seemed to be unanimous; but later, certain speakers, delving deeper into the depths of the two alternative texts proposed, had raised a whole series of what they deemed to be difficulties. The Committee ought not to go into the minutiæ of such rare possibilities. The Covenant was the League's constitutional charter. It laid down main principles and essential rules. It could not make provision for every conceivable eventuality. It would indeed be useless to endeavour to do so. If necessary, special rules of application could be prepared to meet certain special cases, but the place for such rules was not in the Covenant itself.

Finally, he would like the Committee to remember that all the difficulties, the solution of which had been mentioned as indispensable, existed under the present Covenant without any appreciable weakening of that instrument's force.

There was, for instance, the question of reprisals.

But that question already existed under the present Covenant. How and to what extent would that problem arise if, instead of prohibiting resort to war for the three months following on the recommendations of the Council, war were prohibited absolutely? That was, after all, a secondary matter the solution of which might be postponed.

He saw no objection to the League endeavouring one day to define pacific and non-pacific acts of constraint in the light of the general prohibition of warfare.

Again, Article 12 of the present Covenant allowed resort to war against a country which refused to conform to an arbitral award. It was asked what pressure could be brought to bear on such a State by the State which had won its case, after the general prohibition to resort to war had been introduced in the Covenant. It would surely be very dangerous to endeavour to settle that question in abstracto in a text. The decision in such cases should be left to the Council. But it should be remembered that in all cases what was prohibited was warfare waged to impose the will of one country, contrary to an award. The Council might, of course, in the last resort authorise a State to apply material pressure in order to enforce the award. But that was not a war of aggression; it was a matter of social action, authorised by the Council.

Many delegates had urged that a definition of legitimate defence was necessary. How could they possibly hope to define in international law—and that in extenso and in abstracto—a matter which, to the best of his belief, it had never been possible to define adequately in municipal law?

Here again, they ought to have confidence in the Council and in the good sense of the Members of the League. He would remind delegates that the Third Committee had, after long discussion, arrived at the conclusion that no better explanation could be given than that set out by M. de Brouckère in his memorandum concerning the application of Articles 11 and 16.

(M. Rolin read the text in question.)

That text indicated the spirit of their application, but did not exactly amount to a definition. It was, however, sufficient: too detailed an interpretation was not desirable. In the case quoted by M. Politis, opinion would doubtless be unanimous in refusing to admit as legitimate defence an effort made by a country to terminate by violence a situation which that country deemed to endanger its vital interests. An argument of that kind would amount to resuscitating in the domain of arbitration the reservation regarding vital interests which had for so long paralysed the development of arbitration. The League could never allow a country to adopt such an attitude, which would be tantamount to a revolt against world law—a revolt which obviously no text could justify.

With regard to individual agreements, let there be no misunderstanding. Under the Convention being prepared by the Third Committee countries would be allowed to undertake to carry out the preparatory measures passed by the Council in times of crisis. Their violation would constitute a presumption of aggression, which the Council would be bound to note, as well as the Members of the League, in bringing sanctions into play. Nevertheless, no one had complained of that, because the contemplated action would remain within the spirit of the Covenant. The Locarno Treaties, for instance, had been accepted without demur by the Council, and the Assembly had even recommended them to countries as models for the conclusion of other agreements. Nevertheless, those Treaties provided in certain cases for intervention.

The second point raised by M. Huber was the pacific settlement of disputes. M. Rolin himself did not believe the time had yet come to make arbitration compulsory under the Covenant and the Pact. States Members should not be placed in such a position that they would have to choose between bowing to compulsory arbitration or leaving the League. It was doubtless quite logical to assert that, when war was compulsorily prohibited, resort to arbitration ought to be compulsory; but there was something more sacred than logic—namely, the public conscience, which, though rather hesitant in certain countries with regard to arbitration, nevertheless entirely accepted the outlawry of war. He saw no objection, however, to laying down that the unanimous recommendation of the Council would be binding and final, and that the Council would be bound to consult the Permanent Court if the majority so demanded.

He now came to certain points on which the Committee had seemed to be divided, and hoped he would be able to persuade some delegates at least that provision was now being made in connection with the revision of the Covenant for eventualities which were not new and which need not cause undue misgivings. In the first place, there was the question of principle. M. Huber's solution was that, when the Council was divided, war would be prohibited, but that the Members of the League of Nations would be entitled to disassociate themselves from that prohibition. Did M. Huber really believe that it was possible to acknowledge in a text the principle of the Paris Pact, while refusing to take that fact into account in the life of the League? If that were so, war would no longer be outlawed. In any case, if a differentiation were made between the two instruments, the outlawry of war would no longer have any value. Could they not see that in schools and universities it would be soon taught that there were two sorts of prohibitions—prohibitions without sanctions and prohibitions with sanctions, complete and incomplete obligations, legal and moral obligations? He thought, moreover, that the effect of M. Huber's suggestions would be to restrict the guarantees of the present Covenant on an essential point. When the Council was divided, the present Covenant prohibited resort to war for three months after the report of the Council. M. Huber said that this clause disappeared because the prohibition to resort to war became absolute; on the other hand, he refused to allow sanctions when the Council was divided. Under the present Covenant they had a safeguard for at least three months. Did he wish that safeguard to be taken away? If not, what sort of a situation had he in view? Whither would that lead the League? If the report of the Council were adopted by a majority, war would remain prohibited without any time-limit; but the parties would incur sanctions only if they did not wait for three months; and if they waited for three months before violating their obligations, they would no longer incur any sanction at all. That would surely be an absolutely illogical situation.

M. Raestad had made another proposal to the effect that the obligation to participate in sanctions should be suspended if the Council were divided as to the determination of the aggressor after having been divided regarding the solution of the dispute. Strange though it might seem, M. Rolin thought that M. Raestad's suggestion went too far, and yet not far enough. On the other hand, it must be admitted that at present, under Article 16, individual obligations did not depend only on the individual recognition of an act of aggression, but on a degree of collective action in which each and all could take their part. If such collective action became impossible as a result of mass treachery, obviously the whole social edifice would collapse and all bonds would be broken, whether the original dispute had been submitted to the Council or to the Assembly.

On the other hand, this hypothesis could not be amplified into an admission, or an implied admission, in the text that a certain weakness on the part of the Council was sufficient to free the Members from their pledges.

Thus, even at present, the interpretation of the text went a long way to meeting the wishes expressed.

It was useless to imprison this matter in a strait-jacket of words.

Did national laws define the action to be taken in the case of non-fulfilment of civil duty, or when the supreme power failed in its task? Here, again, confidence must be shown in the Council and in the belief that the great majority of States would act in good faith.

For the same reason he contested M. Undén's suggestion that the recommendation of the Council should be regarded as binding if aggression were committed in violation of the provisional measures recommended by the Council unanimously. That was too formalistic and restrictive. In reality, these various questions seemed to be foreign to that of the extent of obligations; they referred rather to forms of proof. He would ask the Committee to distinguish carefully between law and evidence.

He now came to a political consideration. He was sure that the United States of America would not remain indifferent and neutral if the spirit of the Kellogg Pact were violated. They had, in fact, taken the initiative in protesting against the Soviet invasion of Manchuria. If, therefore, the League said in its Covenant that it intended to draw a distinction according to whether its own organs, which the United States did not take into account, had or had not succeeded in their laborious endeavours to reach unanimity, could anyone believe that the League would thereby be encouraging the United States to take action? Moreover, with regard to the Disarmament Conference, some countries had asked that security should be strengthened; what better means of strengthening could there be than the adaptation of the Covenant to the Paris Pact? He therefore formally proposed that, if it were not possible to terminate the work that year, they should at least give a mandate to do so to the Members of the League assembled at the Disarmament Conference.

He would terminate on the note of a personal appeal to the Committee. He had served in the war for four years, and in memory of its tribulations he begged his colleagues to erect over the entry to the great social edifice the commandment: "Thou shalt not kill"—without interpretations, restrictions or reservations. Even so they would perhaps not have entirely excluded the possibility of war.

The League had other duties; it had to ensure for all nations satisfactory material and moral conditions of existence, without which no barrier against warfare could be safe. But, at least, it should be made clear to all the world that in the League's juridical organisation there was no place for war.

M. Matine-Daftary (Persia) said that his Government welcomed the principle of the amendments proposed to harmonise the Covenant with the Pact of Paris, but as he had already had occasion to state, in view of the fact that the Covenant was the constitutional charter of the League, the Persian Government could not approve any amendments other than slight modifications which would consolidate and improve the guarantees which the Articles of the Covenant as a whole provided for the Members of the League. The Persian delegation could not in any circumstances agree to amendments which might diminish those guarantees.

M. Antoniade (Roumania) stated that the Roumanian delegation had never been opposed to the idea of bringing the Covenant into harmony with the Pact of Paris. Roumania was represented on the Committee of Eleven and on the Sub-Committee set up during the past year. The reports of those bodies had been accepted by the Roumanian delegation, which was, moreover, convinced that it was highly desirable to prolong the discussions, seeing that various difficulties had been disclosed.

The Committee of Eleven had been compelled to consider the purely legal aspect of the question without dealing with the political effects of adapting certain texts to a principle subsequently recognised almost unanimously. The present discussions had shown how complicated those effects would be. Some who were entitled to speak with authority urged that further consideration must be given to the matter and all the problems which had arisen studied thoroughly. There were doubts as to certain questions, in particular the problem of reservations, the interpretation given by the parties to the Pact of Paris, and the problems of reprisals (Article 13, paragraph 4), legitimate defence, and sanctions in cases not covered by the general prohibition against resorting to war. Various explanations, aimed at removing doubts and scruples which had been expressed, had been given with great legal authority. But in spite of the respect which those opinions inspired and the individual approval with which they might be received, the scruples and the great responsibility of Governments, which were not covered by individual opinions, however authoritative they might be, should be kept in mind.

The Roumanian delegation had been very much impressed by the Chairman's appeal to the Committee's prudence. There was no reason for precipitating the matter, whereas there were several reasons for allowing the question to develop. The British declaration made ratification of the amendments to the Covenant subject to the conclusion of a general convention on disarmament. The idea contained in the reply of the French Government, which thought that the extension of the idea of compulsory arbitration and an increase in the number of accessions to the General Act would facilitate the unanimous adoption of amendments to the Covenant, tended in the same direction. The Roumanian delegation would therefore support any proposal to continue to study the question closely in all its aspects and supported M. Cassin's proposal.

M. MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY (Germany) said that the discussion seemed to be becoming more and more centred around the question of legitimate defence; he was not at all sure that the Committee was well advised to contemplate the harmonisation of the two instruments from that particular point of view.

Though mentioned neither in the Covenant nor the Pact, the right of a nation to defend itself against attack was indisputable. It derived from a natural law which had greater force than any convention.

As the Chairman had observed at the first meeting, the Committee, if it hoped to achieve a useful degree of harmonisation, must take into account the underlying motives of the Kellogg Pact. Delegates should remember the circular note of the United States Government, to which M. Raestad had referred, and particularly the passage in that note stating that it would not be in the interests of peace that a treaty should contain a provision regarding the juridical concept of legitimate defence, because it would be far too easy a matter for an unscrupulous Government so to control events as to bring them into line with the definition contained in the Treaty. He thought the Committee ought to bear that danger of a plethora of provisions in mind, if it really desired, as the Swiss delegate had said, to facilitate as far as possible the harmonisation of the two instruments and carefully avoid anything which might accentuate their differences. As everyone seemed to be agreed that the proposed amendments did not create any new problems regarding the question of legitimate defence, leaving the relations between the written law in the Covenant and the unwritten law of defence exactly as they were at present, it would be better to refrain from discussing or preparing a draft definition of cases of defence, either special or general. If ever the case arose, all would depend on the circumstances, which would reveal the good or bad faith of the parties much more clearly than any abstract law or convention.

On the other hand, the German Government thought that it might be advisable to discover a formula for differentiation between pacific and non-pacific measures, as suggested in the reply of the Finnish Government. All Governments desired that the amendment of the Covenant, now that it had been begun, should be brought to a satisfactory conclusion. Meanwhile, the obligations of the Kellogg Pact retained all their legal and moral force.

The CHAIRMAN declared the discussion closed.

M. POLITIS (Greece) submitted the following motion:

"In view of the general discussion on the amendments to the Covenant, the Committee decides to set up a committee with the following task:

"(1) To note the progress accomplished and to be accomplished with a view to the adoption of the amendments proposed in 1930;

"(2) To point out, if necessary, the method to be followed in order to ensure reaching a solution of the problem during 1932, bearing in mind the convening of the Disarmament Conference;

"(3) To draw up on these lines the terms of a draft resolution to be submitted to the Assembly."

M. Politis explained, in reply to M. Raestad (Norway) that his draft resolution did not preclude the Committee from recommending the Governments to separate the material problem from the problem of introducing provisions into the Covenant.

The CHAIRMAN considered that, in accordance with precedent, a sub-committee should be appointed without formal terms of reference.

Agreed.

SEVENTH MEETING.

Held on Saturday, September 19th, 1931, at 9.30 a.m.

Chairman: M. SCIALOJA (Italy).

10. Progressive Codification of International Law: Observations by the Governments (Series 1, 2 and 3) (Annex 4).

M. HUBER (Switzerland) briefly explained the object of the draft resolution submitted by the Belgian, Danish, Finnish, Japanese, Netherlands, Norwegian, Swedish and Swiss delegations as a basis of discussion (Annex 5).

The work of the progressive codification of international law should be continued in the light of past experience. The League should endeavour to make sure that definite results would be obtained from any conferences it might convene. The draft, based on the resolution of the Hague Codification Conference, proposed a system by which Governments would be consulted beforehand, so that their attitude would be ascertained with fair certainty before further action was taken.

Another aim of the resolution was to protect customary law, as would be seen in the preamble to the draft, which reproduced a resolution of the Hague Conference.

Provision was made for three stages in the consultation of Governments. The latter would first be informed of a suggestion or a proposal for codification made by one or more States before the Assembly met. The Assembly could then decide whether further action should be taken. If so, it would request the Council to appoint a committee of experts to prepare a preliminary draft. The preliminary draft would be communicated to Governments and would then be examined by the Assembly at a later session, and the Assembly would decide whether further action should be taken in the matter.

If so, Governments would be consulted a third time, and their observations would be examined by the committee of experts. A third Assembly would then decide whether it was desirable to convene a conference. Governments would therefore be consulted three times, and the Assembly would be called upon three times to take a decision. If there were a considerable majority in favour of the codification of some particular subject, there would be every reason to hope that the conference would lead to positive results.

Baron DESCAMPS-DAVID (Belgium) reminded the Committee that, when the Committee of Ten was convened to prepare the International Statute of the Permanent Court, he had, as Chairman of that Committee, made the following proposal jointly with Mr. Elihu Root:

> "Convinced that the extension of the sway of justice and the development of international tribunals are urgently required to ensure the security of States and wellbeing of the nations;
> "Moved by an earnest desire to forward the achievement of these results in the world;
>
> "The undersigned propose to the International Committee of Jurists assembled at The Hague the adoption of the following resolutions to be regarded as recommendations:
> "I. That the Council or Assembly or some other authority, which has the necessary powers, should convoke, as soon as possible, a new inter-State Conference to carry on the work of the two first Conferences at The Hague, for the purpose of:
>
> > "1. Re-establishing the existing rules of the Law of Nations, more especially, and in the first place, those affected by the events of the recent war;
> > "2. Formulating and approving the modifications and additions rendered necessary or advisable by the war and by the changing of the conditions of life and of international relations following upon the armed conflict;
> > "3. Endeavouring to reconcile divergent opinions, and bring about a general understanding concerning the rules which have been the subject of controversy;
> > "4. Giving special consideration to those points, which are not at the present time adequately provided for, and of which a definite settlement by general agreement is required, in the interests of international justice."

The authors of the proposal favoured a method of decentralisation—i.e., a method whereby immediate application should be made direct to all the great international organisations, all the associations working for the development of international law, and, in the first place, the conference should be requested to collate the work of those associations and organisations. M. Politis had also taken the important step of proposing to the Academy of International Law that each year an eminent authority should study and set out the general lines of the principles of the law on peace.

Only after this preliminary work would it be possible to establish first drafts, covering the whole body of international law, to be submitted subsequently to the Council and the Assembly

The system followed, however, was a different one. M. Huber had mentioned the three stages through which it would be necessary to pass, not to achieve a general survey and codification of international law, but to secure the acceptance of a small point which might later be studied. By this method it would seem that at least 100 years must pass before any effective codification could be achieved. Would it not be desirable to come back to the true conception of the codification of international law—namely, to apply in the first place to lawyers and experts, and not to seek for a few partial solutions but to work out the main principles of international law? The Hague Conference, conscious of the inextricable difficulties which might arise, had itself put forward recommendations for the modification of its organisation.

Sir Brojendra MITTER (India) said that the Government of India welcomed the resolution in the hope that the machinery set up under it would normally take the place of codification conferences. The resolution had the double merit of progressive deliberation and caution. In the working of the proposed machinery there would be the simultaneous operation of the other important factors in the development of international law—namely, the conventions concluded under the auspices of the League of Nations, the growth of case-law in the Permanent Court, the awards of arbitral tribunals and, above all, the studies of international jurists. This would be more likely to yield important results than codification conferences without previous study. The experience of the last conference had been that the expenses were disproportionate to the result achieved.

M. RUNDSTEIN (Poland) said that the study of the observations submitted by the Governments on the problem of codification had dispelled the pessimism which predominated in the previous year. These replies had shown that the following procedure should be adopted : (1) the work of codification should be continued; (2) the codification should not affect the free development of customary law; its evolution by means of the practice and jurisprudence of the international courts could not be hindered by fixed or inflexible rules. In this manner a certain equilibrium would be established between the old customary law and the new conventional law; (3) consequently, it was desirable to avoid definite rulings and to prefer the method of legislative codification to that of the consolidation of international droit commun.

The principal point in codification was, therefore, the method and preparation. Without entering for the moment into the nature, aims and extent of the codification, it would be preferable to establish a set of rules of procedure for codification.

Numerous proposals and suggestions had been made, such as the draft procedure recommended by the Hague Conference (Recommendation No. 4), the general principles recommended by the Eleventh Assembly in regard to preparatory procedure, the ideas contained in the remarks by the Irish and Netherlands Governments, which were especially important, as they aimed at giving the First Committee a decisive part in the question. Lastly, the Committee had before it a draft resolution from eight delegations. This draft might serve as a basis for discussion on method, which should be undertaken immediately, since no one wished to refer the question to the next session of the Assembly.

M. LIMBURG (Netherlands) said he would merely state that the Netherlands delegation had approved the draft resolution submitted by several other delegations, but had proposed the addition of the following words at the beginning of the first paragraph :

> "Each year the Council shall place on the agenda of the Assembly the codification of international law."

In this manner the question would be brought before the First Committee every year; if any States had made proposals, the Committee would deal with them; if no proposal had been made, the Committee would pass on to other questions.

The Netherlands delegation made this proposal because the Council would probably not place either of these subjects on its agenda automatically, and it was important that States should not lose sight of the question of international codification.

On the other hand, the Netherlands delegation proposed the addition of the following words to paragraph 7 :

> "The Assembly, moreover, may decide that a conference should be convened even if all the Members of the League of Nations do not intend to participate."

That amendment was based on experience acquired, for instance, at the Conference on the Unification of the Laws on Bills of Exchange, over which M. Limburg had presided.

The Conference had been called to draw up a Convention constituting a unification law to apply to the Continent, since Great Britain and the United States of America had intimated that they would be unable to sign the Convention owing to the divergency between the legal conception of cheques and bills of exchange existing on the Continent and in the Anglo-Saxon countries. Nevertheless, the British and American representatives, in particular Professor Gutteridge, had given the Conference the most valuable help.

It should further be observed that an invitation to non-member countries to take part in the work of an Assembly Committee, as suggested in paragraph 7, was entirely novel and at variance with the rules normally followed. Some less categorical phraseology should be used, such as "States non-members . . . may be invited".

M. Ito (Japan) supported the resolution. The Japanese Government considered that it would be desirable to continue the work of codification on the basis of the 1924 Assembly's resolution. His delegation had likewise wished to meet the legitimate demands made by many Governments in their replies to the Secretary-General in the previous year, more especially the desire that the Assembly should be given some kind of preponderance in the choice of the subjects to be codified and in the decision as to the expediency of convening conferences.

The question of the subjects to be codified must not in any way be affected by the words in the preamble: "without jeopardising the customary international law which should result progressively from the practice of States and the development of international jurisprudence". The Japanese Government would later submit observations with regard to the composition, powers and competence of the committee of experts proposed in paragraph 3.

M. Pilotti (Italy) regretted that the proposal made by M. Rundstein on the first day to discuss the preliminary procedure to be followed for general conventions negotiated under the auspices of the League before the question of codification had not been followed. The rules adopted for codification should be based on the general rules laid down for the preparation of conventions negotiated under the League's auspices, since codification was only a particular case. That had, moreover, been the intention of the Committee set up to draft the resolution concerning preparatory procedure. The Committee had taken as a guide the ideas developed by the Hague Conference.

Mr. McGilligan (Irish Free State) regarded codification as one of the most important of the League's tasks. It would meet one of the greatest needs of the present time. The Irish Free State delegation supported the policy outlined by the Assembly in its resolution of 1924. It had set forth its views in the memorandum it had sent the Secretariat on the policy to be followed. It had likewise made a proposal as to what it considered the best method. Mr. McGilligan urged the need for continuing the work of codification. The practical methods adopted must be in direct proportion to the object in view. Various improvements were, he considered, possible:

(1) The present system of international law gave rise to serious objections in regard to its form. The obligations of international law should be simple and clear, since, if they were uncertain, their application would be uncertain as well;

(2) New rules of international law might be found necessary to meet the changed situation. That was the task of the League.

The Irish memorandum also expressed the opinion that the task of codification should be entrusted, not to international jurists, but to the representatives of the Governments which had to sign the conventions. Codification should be one of the League's normal activities and should be carried on continuously.

Lastly, there should be some method for the revision of international conventions. For reasons of economy, the Irish Free State Government would not press for the setting up of a permanent commission similar to the Commission on Disarmament.

The Irish Free State delegation supported the resolution before the Committee, subject to any amendments that might be submitted. If paragraphs 5 and 6 were to be taken to mean that the Assembly should decide whether or no a codification conference should be held, the Irish Government would accept that text, which squared more or less with its own suggestion. . He thought that the proposed machinery, which in appearance was somewhat complicated, might lead to the preparation of a draft convention which could be signed without there being any need to convene a special codification conference.

M. Mendelssohn-Bartholdy (Germany), speaking on behalf of the German Institutes of International and Comparative Law, offered their wholehearted co-operation, more particularly that of Berlin and Hamburg, backed by Government support.

Codification was not very greatly appreciated in Germany, which had felt the effects of excessive codification of municipal law. Nevertheless, much interest was taken there in the headway made in the United States of America towards codification. It should be pointed out that there was in the United States a special method which should be followed elsewhere. The codified law was not imposed on tribunals like an ordinary law, but the law thus re-enunciated formed the subject of a recommendation by a Committee of Experts considered to possess the highest qualifications. In certain States the Courts applied the new law as if it were binding, and, if they thought there were grounds for diverging from it, they indicated the reason.

He did not share M. Limburg's view with regard to paragraph 7. If States non-members were to be invited, they should be invited in all cases and in the normal course of affairs and not merely if the President thought it expedient.

M. Andersen (Denmark) approved M. Pilotti's remarks. It would be difficult to discuss the question of codification independently of the close relationship between it and the unification of the preparatory procedure to be followed in regard to general conventions concluded under the League's auspices; besides, the rules for the preparation of general conventions and the convening of certain conferences drawn up in the previous year had been based on a recommendation by the Conference for the Codification of International Law.

The first point in head IV of the resolution adopted in the previous year must, so far as possible, be brought into harmony with the passage dealing with the different spheres of jurisdiction of the Council and the Assembly.

He associated himself more particularly with the following passage in the Netherlands Government's reply :

> " The Netherlands Government wishes to draw attention to the desirability of drawing up the rules regarding preparatory procedure in the matter of conventions in general, and the rules concerning the codification of international law, so far as possible on the same lines."

He proposed that, if a sub-committee were set up, it should be asked to consider conjointly items 2 and 3 on the agenda.

M. GIANNINI (Italy) thought that, keeping to the practical point of view, the Committee should consider what suggestions might be made for improving the work of codification. The Italian Government had endorsed the suggestions made by the Special Committee in the previous year relating to the procedure to be followed for facilitating the ratification of international conventions concluded under the auspices of the League. The speeches made at the Eleventh Assembly had, however, emphasised the necessity of investigating each question separately, and the report stated that paragraph 4 dealt particularly with the procedure to be followed before conferences were convened.

The Governments had expressed their opinion regarding paragraph 4, which defined the proposed procedure, as had also the League technical organisations. But the latter had made certain reservations, because some of them did not desire to give up their own particular method.

The Governments had made suggestions in which two trends of opinion might be observed; there was the Netherlands view that the procedure should be more flexible, and the Swedish view that it should be slower.

The problem was whether the codification of international law need be studied from a particular angle. In addition to the general procedure laid down in the resolution of the Eleventh Assembly, must there be a special procedure for codification, as was suggested in the proposals of several delegations ?

M. Giannini thought that the two questions on the agenda should be referred for examination to a sub-committee, as proposed by the Danish delegation.

There were three suggestions : that from the Codification Conference, that approved by the Eleventh Assembly, and that submitted to the Committee.

As the outcome of his experience of the various codification conferences on private law—air law, maritime law and international codification—he desired to draw his colleagues' attention to certain practical aspects of the problem.

First of all, the preamble should be maintained, although if it were to contain the word " codification " there must be an agreement as to the exact meaning of the term.

Secondly, it was essential to estimate the time required for preparing a conference. With the procedure proposed by the Hague Conference, four years would be necessary; with the procedure suggested by the last Assembly, six years; and at least ten years according te the methods recommended by the group of delegations.

Reviewing the various stages of the procedure, M. Giannini explained why such a long period seemed to him unavoidable. The experts must be allowed to work in an atmosphere of calm. The Committee of Legal Experts for the Air Conference had taken three years to prepare the draft which had later become the 1929 Warsaw Convention. That was a record time for the preparation of a conference of that kind, for the practical necessity of a convention governing responsibilities as to air armaments had been universally recognised, and Governments had been spurred on by the various airway companies. The proposed procedure was far more complicated, and it would not be an overestimate to put at eleven years the period that would be required to cover all the different stages. The procedure should in prudence be envisaged from a general and not from too rigid a point of view.

Some flexibility was necessary, particularly in politics. In addition, the procedure should be brought as far as possible into line with the rules followed for general conventions.

He thought, too, that if it were desired to summon a Codification Conference, invitations should be sent to Member and also to non-member States. Every State must decide for itself, whether it wished to co-operate. He could not approve the Netherlands amendment to paragraph 7.

With regard to the first amendment proposed by the Netherlands delegation—that the question of codification should be placed every year on the Assembly agenda—he thought this would frequently give rise to barren academic discussions. As soon as there was general international agreement upon the necessity of codifying a particular form of law, the Governments would automatically propose that the subject should be discussed. In the absence of such agreement, it could not be supplied by placing the question on the agenda.

He thought that the question of procedure had caused the other recommendations made by the Hague Conference to be rather overlooked. Apart from the writings of M. Guerrero, M. Rolin, M. Rundstein, and others, the works that had appeared on the problem of codification were few and not very important.

Of the recommendations made by the first Hague Conference, he considered the one suggesting that there should be a connection between European and pan-American codification should be taken up, in order to avoid the creation of a continental international law.

The second recommendation—that the major international organisations should co-operate with the various Governments in the work of codification—should also be examined. Several international bodies were investigating the problem of codification.

The draft resolution which several delegations had submitted to the Committee should be examined by a sub-committee, and he thought the Committee should express a desire that the two recommendations of the Hague Conference should be taken up, and that the sub-committee should seek for a happy medium between the very flexible proposal made by the Hague Conference and the rather hard-and-fast one contained in the delegations' resolution, thus reconciling the demands of progress in international law with the caution that was essential in making a choice of subjects in the preparation of a conference.

He did not attach great importance to the question of procedure, for even though the method of work could contribute to a conference's success, it was not necessarily a guarantee of success.

Finally, he drew attention to the fundamental difference between the Hague Conference's resolution and the resolution submitted by various delegations. The Hague draft did not mention any particular committee of experts, nor did it make any suggestion for its composition. This was left to the Council, as was also the summoning of the conference. The draft resolution submitted by the delegations referred several times to action by the Assembly, in the hope that, if the various Governments were more or less committed in the Assembly's discussions, the conference would have a greater chance of success. He apologised for his scepticism. Every conference held under the auspices of the League would in those circumstances be bound to succeed. In his opinion, intervention by the Assembly was not always necessary. The question merited consideration by the sub-committee.

Mr. BECKETT (British Empire) thought that the only question now remaining to be settled was one of procedure.

He agreed with M. Pilotti as regards the connection between the present question and the next one on the agenda. He also supported M. Andersen's proposal that the two questions should be considered by the same sub-committee. He approved generally the joint draft resolution; in particular, the preamble was very carefully drafted. It was of particular importance that the original suggestion of any subject for codification should come from a Government, and that the suggestion should be made long enough before the Assembly to allow Governments time to form their opinion. He would even like the period to be longer than four months.

He would have no objection to M. Limburg's suggestion to maintain codification as a permanent item in the agenda of the Assembly, provided M. Limburg agreed that the original proposal of any particular subject for codification must come from a Government.

(M. Limburg agreed.)

With regard to M. Limburg's observations and proposals under paragraph 7, M. Beckett did not think the fact that only a limited number of States were willing to participate in the Conference should necessarily form any objection to its being held. He fully endorsed M. Limburg's remarks concerning Bills of Exchange. The Conference had brought many facts to light, which were useful to the countries which did not sign the Convention as well as to those which did. But he did not think any amendment of the text was required, because the Assembly itself would decide whether a conference should be held and whether any particular conference ought to be attended by a large or a smaller number of States. He did not feel that the method proposed for the participation of non-member States in the work of the Committees of the Assembly was the right one. Non-member States would, under the previous paragraphs, be given every opportunity of expressing their views at each stage of any particular proposal, but there might be technical difficulties in inviting them to participate direct in the work of the First Committee. He doubted whether paragraph 7 was really necessary.

Proposals had been made that the actual drafting of the convention should be done by the First Committee of the Assembly. That Committee would not have time to do the work properly. Moreover, if the convention were finally elaborated in the First Committee, in the absence of non-member States, their participation at a vital stage of the proceedings would be lacking. If it were thought desirable that at the final stage of the proceedings there should be present, not merely the technical experts, but Ministers for Foreign Affairs or other statesmen representing their countries, in order that these might take their share in the responsibility of the work, that could probably be arranged by holding the two meetings simultaneously.

M. RAESTAD (Norway) agreed with M. Pilotti that the resolution on codification and that concerning the general preparation of conferences should be dealt with by the same sub-committee. As part-author of the draft resolution on codification, he had studied the question very carefully and did not consider that the proposal on codification was in conflict with the resolution on general conventions. A certain synthesis of opinions of Governments was essential. Any question dealt with by the method of codification was of a juridical nature and was therefore not urgent. The draft relating to general conventions provided several alternatives, some of which would have to be eliminated because they were not suitable for codification; thus harmonisation already existed to a certain extent.

M. Giannini had expressed the opinion that the procedure outlined was too long, but surely there was no need for speed. It was more important to ensure really effective work at each stage. Mr. Hearne had asked whether it was really necessary to convene a conference in each case and whether the Assembly could not open a protocol for signature. There was certainly nothing to prevent the latter course being adopted, and it might certainly be of use in exceptional cases.

On the question of admitting non-member representatives to the work of the First Committee, he agreed with Mr. Beckett, inasmuch as he did not think that Committee should be asked to draft the text; that would be done by experts. Its work would consist merely of an examination with a view to criticism and elimination. In those circumstances, the presence of non-member representatives on the First Committee would not be essential. However, M. Raestad thought there was no objection to their being present. Their presence was, in any case, essential to the work of the Committee of Experts. It would, perhaps, be a bold step if such representatives were admitted to the First Committee, but he did not think that in questions affecting the interests of the whole of humanity a certain amount of boldness was out of place.

Mr. COLLINS (Australia) said that the Commonwealth Government entirely endorsed the view of the Government of the United Kingdom that progress was most likely to be achieved by the development of international law in the form of conventions, as opposed to the process of consolidation which the Hague Conference had endeavoured to carry out.

M. BASDEVANT (France) stated that he would accept the proposal of the eight delegations, subject to a few minor improvements. He had no objection to referring it to a sub-committee, which would also consider the procedure for the preparation of general conventions. The authors of the proposal had had that possibility in view. The sub-committee would no doubt consider the advisability of taking special precautions for the preparation of conferences on codification, even though a certain slowness might result. He proposed an amendment to paragraph 3, because he was afraid the committee of experts might become so engrossed in its own work as to lose sight of realities.

He proposed the following text: ". . . which shall be invited to proceed, with the assistance of the Secretary-General of the League of Nations, to make the necessary enquiries and prepare ". . . .

These enquiries should be addressed to international scientific associations concerned with the codification of international law and to the Governments, in order to ascertain their views and desires. The committee of experts would prepare its draft in the light of the replies received. He was convinced that this method would be useful, however slow it might be. It might be useful even if the subject of the enquiry did not come to fruition. Although the results of the last Conference were rather meagre, yet with regard to customary law the Conference had borne fruit. The three reports of the League of Nations Secretariat on the subject contained a vast amount of material and showed that a great measure of assent by Governments had been obtained on certain important principles.

He also had an amendment to propose to Article 6, on the lines indicated by the Irish and Norwegian delegates—namely, that it might not always be necessary to convene a conference to deal with minor questions. The Assembly ought not to be limited to any one line of approach.

The text he proposed was as follows: ". . . shall be communicated to the Assembly, which shall then decide as to the action to be taken, including the desirability of referring the matter to a codification conference ". Some quite satisfactory results in preparing texts had been obtained by preparing a text direct for signature—for instance, the General Act of Arbitration, and, in private law, the recognition of agreements to arbitrate and the enforcement of arbitral awards.

The CHAIRMAN thought that the initial point of the discussion was not very clear. Some delegates had referred to the law of procedure. Jurists knew what terrible things laws of procedure were. But in this case the Committee was not preparing a law. It could not legislate or even advise legislation. It could, at the most, suggest to the executive power of the League of Nations certain rules which that power might follow, as being good rules if circumstances did not call for some other process.

The only acts having force of law were conventions created by States themselves. Four systems had been proposed as the best means for arriving at such conventions. Personally, he would rejoice if they could secure a convention by whatever means. After all, public opinion looked only at results, and not at the methods by which those results were obtained.

Some questions could be settled rapidly. The settlement of others might take even longer than was primarily foreseen. Obviously, it was often a very difficult task to secure full and complete agreement among so many countries of different history, race and character. It would indeed be better not to arrive at a solution too soon, if that solution had to be revised almost immediately after its publication. The task the League had assumed was not one which any man could accomplish in his lifetime. That was why it had been entrusted to the League. He repeated, therefore, that all the Committee could do was to indicate certain administrative rules which it advocated as being probably the best in most circumstances.

11. Communication by the Bureau.

The CHAIRMAN announced that the following members were appointed to the Committee for the Harmonisation of the Covenant with the Pact of Paris:

M. D'AVILA LIMA (Portugal)
Mr. BECKETT (British Empire)
M. CASSIN (France)
M. ERICH (Finland)
M. HUBER (Switzerland)
M. ITÔ (Japan)
M. LIMBURG (Netherlands)
M. MAJOURANITCH (Yugoslavia)
M. MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY (Germany)
M. PEDROSO (Spain)
M. PILOTTI (Italy)
M. POLITIS (Greece)
M. RAESTAD (Norway)
M. ROLIN (Belgium)
M. UNDÉN (Sweden)
M. WOO KAISENG (China)

12. Progressive Codification of International Law (continuation).

M. ROLIN (Belgium) was not convinced by the Chairman's remarks and did not agree with his conception of what was to be done. A resolution adopted for proposing a certain procedure to be followed in concluding conventions was a resolution to define regulations of a kind approved by the Covenant, like the rules for the election of members of the Council, which, whatever might be said, were binding rules until they were abrogated or modified, as they might be. The Assembly should not leave the door open to others to adopt other rules of procedure. A certain degree of uniformity was what the Committee was seeking to obtain. The rules need not be absolutely rigid. The Council could always decide that special rules were required to meet special circumstances. The Assembly, however, ought to lay down the normal rules to be followed in normal circumstances.

The CHAIRMAN asked the members of the Committee whether they wished to appoint a sub-committee. As his own opinion was somewhat different from those of most members, he would ask M. Limburg to appoint the committee.

M. LIMBURG (Vice-Chairman) proposed a committee consisting of the following members: M. ANDERSEN, M. BASDEVANT, Mr. BECKETT, Baron DESCAMPS-DAVID, M. GIANNINI, Mr. HEARNE, M. HUBER, M. RAESTAD. As he had proposed two amendments which he would be called upon to defend, he also proposed to include his own name.

13. Preparatory Procedure to be followed in the Case of General Conventions to be negotiated under the Auspices of the League of Nations: Observations by the Governments and the Technical Organisations (Annex 6).

The CHAIRMAN observed that this question had been dealt with to a large extent in the discussion on the previous point.

M. UNDÉN (Sweden) said that the Swedish Government had made certain reservations with regard to the method of procedure, and had suggested that the case should also be taken into consideration where the Assembly adopted a convention without that convention being sent to a special conference. He hoped the sub-committee would take that point into consideration.

M. ANDERSEN (Denmark) stated that the Danish Government was keenly interested in the question and hoped the sub-committee would give serious consideration to its observations.

The CHAIRMAN presumed it was the desire of the Committee to refer the matter to the sub-committee, which would be appointed for the consideration of the previous item on the agenda.

Agreed.

EIGHTH MEETING.

Held on Monday, September 21st, 1931, at 10 a.m.

Chairman: M. SCIALOJA (Italy).

14. Nationality of Women: Report by the Secretary-General (Annex 7).

Dame Edith LYTTELTON (British Empire) proposed the following resolution:

"The Assembly,

"Having examined with the greatest interest the report of the Secretary-General on the question of the Nationality of Women presented in accordance with the Resolution of the Council of January 24th, 1931, and the report and proposals of the Committee of Representatives of Women's International Organisations which is annexed thereto:

"Notes the desire of the said Committee that steps should be taken to bring about the reconsideration of the Hague Nationality Convention, bearing in mind the principle of equality between men and women;

"Thanks the Committee of Representatives of Women's International Organisations for its report; and

"Requests the Council, in harmony with the Recommendation No. VI of the Conference for the Codification of International Law held at The Hague, March-April 1930, to transmit to all Governments the report of the Secretary-General on the question of the Nationality of Women, together with the Minutes of the First Committee of the Assembly on this subject, and to request Governments to submit their observations on this subject for reconsideration of the matter by the thirteenth Assembly."

Dame Edith, said that, in proposing this resolution, she would like to begin by making a short reference to the past history of the matter. She referred to Articles 8-11 of the Convention drawn up at The Hague in March 1930 and reminded the Committee of the very great interest taken in the subject by all the organisations in the different countries representing the interests of women at the time of that Conference. It was common knowledge that the representatives of these organisations were disappointed, because the provisions of the Convention did not go sufficiently far to meet their demand that marriage should not put a woman in any respect in a different position from that of her husband so far as nationality was concerned. It was also the case that the Hague Convention did not go so far in this direction as the Government of the United Kingdom would itself desire to go. On the other hand, the Hague Convention did make a step in this direction, and on two points, at any rate, the articles contained provisions which, if carried into effect, would constitute an advance upon the nationality laws of the great majority of countries, including her own. Article 8, for instance, dealt with the question of statelessness, one of the most serious hardships to which women had drawn attention when urging their claims to a greater degree of equality with men as regards nationality. Article 10 could also be regarded as a definite recognition of the principle that a woman, because she was a married woman, was not to have a nationality forced upon her. Her Government, therefore, could not in any way agree that the Hague Convention marked a retrograde step. An invitation to go further was to be found in the sixth resolution of the Hague Conference itself—a resolution which referred to the principle of the equality of the sexes in matters of nationality and asked that States should consider especially whether it might be possible to decide that, in principle, the nationality of a wife shall not be changed without her consent, either by the mere fact of marriage or by any change in the nationality of her husband.

In 1930, the Cuban delegation had moved a resolution referring the matter to the Council, and, in January 1931, the Council had placed the continued study of this question on the agenda of the present Assembly and had asked the Secretary-General to submit a report on the whole question and consult with the international women's organisations. The Consultative Committee met. The report of the Secretary-General was presented to the Council, and the report of the Consultative Committee strongly urged reconsideration of the question. On page 10 of the report five principles recommended were set out, designated (a), (b), (c), (d), (e). Her own Government agreed, in general, with (a), (b), and (c), but at present they could not give their assent to (d) and (e). (d) would place married persons, men or women, in a specially favoured position as to nationality; (e), which dealt with the nationality of children, was an entirely new point which might lead to difficulties. It was obviously wiser not to complicate the simpler question of women's nationality with these other questions.

It was important that the Consultative Committee should continue its work. The speaker would ask the Rapporteur to recommend in his report that the work of the Consultative Committee should be continued for one year under arrangements made by itself, which would not cost the League of Nations a penny. The terms of the resolution had been subject to long consideration, and she hoped the Committee would feel able to support it. She hoped the Committee would agree that the question raised in the first paragraph required the most earnest consideration, for it concerned millions of women all over the world. The operative part of the resolution requested the Council to transmit to all Governments the report of the Secretary-General, together with the Minutes of the Committee, and to request Governments to submit their observations thereon for the reconsideration of the matter by the next Assembly.

The delegation of the United Kingdom realised that at the present moment there might be delegations which were not in a position to state the views of their Governments upon the merits of the question raised in the report of the Women's Consultative Committee. The draft resolution had taken account of this fact, and it would be seen that it did not commit any delegation which concurred in it to any definite view on the merits of the question. Therefore, by voting for the resolution the First Committee would not be pledging themselves or their Governments to any definite pronouncement on the merits of the question; they were only asking that the question should be laid before their Governments, together with the Secretary-General's report and the Minutes of the Committee, and should agree that the whole matter should come up again for reconsideration at the thirteenth Assembly. The Chilian resolution was almost identical with the British, so that no doubt these two resolutions could be combined.

The views of the United Kingdom on the merits of the question were as follows :

> " The British Government considers that it is right that all disabilities of married women in matters of nationality should be removed, and that, in so far as nationality is concerned a married woman should be in the same position as any man—married or unmarried—or any single woman."

Dame Edith said that women felt they had a right to ask for this elementary measure of equity and justice. They had proved that they loved their countries quite as much as men.

It had often been argued that such a measure would endanger the unity of the home; but the truth was that, for women the whole world over, nothing was dearer than the unity of the home. That unity would not be advanced by injustice.

She hoped that the Committee would adopt the British resolution; by doing so it would be according to women that elementary measure of equity and justice for which they were asking.

Mme. VERGARA (Chile) said that the Chilian delegation withdrew its resolution (Annex 8), provided the Committee accepted the following sentence, laid down in that resolution, as an amendment to the British resolution : " Begs the Women's Consultative Committee to continue to carry on its work ".

The Work of the Consultative Committee should continue for many reasons, one of the most important being that the Institut de Droit International, at its last meeting in April, had unanimously accepted a note proposing the setting up of a committee to work with the Consultative Committee on questions concerning women, and, having placed this question on the agenda, recommended States to consider whether it would not be possible to incorporate in their legislation the principle of equality of sexes as regards nationality.

If such an important institution resolved to work with the Consultative Committee, it was because it recognised that women after all were the people principally interested.

Mme. SCHÖNFELD-POLANO (Netherlands) thought that the principal question which the Assembly had to decide was whether the League of Nations should take up the question of the nationality of women again, in the light of the recommendations of the feminist organisations expressed in the annex to the report, or whether the resolution of the Hague Conference represented the maximum of what could be obtained at present by international agreement.

The Netherlands Government had no doubt that Article 8 of the Convention adopted at the Hague Conference contained the maximum of what could be realised at present by international agreement, and was therefore of opinion that the Convention—which had been signed by as many as thirty-eight States in 1930—should not be brought up for revision.

Article 8 was a compromise between the diametrically opposed concepts of countries which believed in absolute equality and those in which the status of the husband governed that of the wife.

Under Netherlands law a Netherlands woman lost her nationality when she married a foreigner, but, as under other laws she might not acquire her husband's nationality, the Netherlands Government was prepared to allow a Netherlands woman to keep her nationality in those circumstances—i.e., it was opposed to Article 8 only in so far as it covered cases where a woman might acquire her husband's nationality by a mere petition or declaration. At the Hague Conference, the Netherlands Government had formulated an amendment which would have made this article acceptable to it. Though Article 8 constituted the maximum on which agreement could be reached, it actually endangered the principle of equality, because it might apply to cases which were not cases of involuntary statelessness.

She did not see how the situation had changed since 1930.

The Netherlands Government could not agree to a system in which husband and wife might be of different nationalities, owing to the disturbances such a system would cause in private law.

If husband and wife were not of the same nationality, what would the nationality of the children be ?

What, again, would be the law governing the status of husband and wife as a married couple ? What would happen in the case of divorce ? The sixth Hague Conference on International Private Law had not been able to discover any generally acceptable solution for that problem.

The system of national unity avoided all these complications. Though sometimes to deprive a woman of her nationality might cause difficulty, the difficulties raised by absolute independence were even greater. That was a point which had already been mentioned by the Netherlands delegation at the Hague Conference. The Consultative Committee had endeavoured to refute the arguments submitted against equality. Those arguments had not convinced the Netherlands Government. The Consultative Committee said that conflicts of law would exist as long as the two systems were maintained side by side. The Hague Conference had, in point of fact, set itself the task of minimising such conflicts, and therefore it would be to the advantage of all that the Convention should be ratified.

The report mentioned a second objection to the system of equality—namely, that the unity of family life would be endangered. The Netherlands delegation could not enter upon an exhaustive study of the question in which of the two systems unity, in the sense of harmony, was best safeguarded. The important practical point was that the Netherlands Government was not prepared to give up the system of family unity, which, in its opinion, possessed great juridical advantages. Nevertheless, it was prepared to help in finding a solution whereby the demand for naturalisation must be made by both husband and wife. That was a more satisfactory position for married women than the present position, and the unity of nationality was safeguarded at the same time. For that reason, that solution was also preferable to the one whereby the woman kept her own nationality when her husband was naturalised.

Practice in the matter of naturalisation was evolving in the Netherlands on the lines she had indicated. When a German applied for naturalisation as a Netherlands subject, the Government required the wife to countersign the application in order to prevent her having double nationality, since, according to Netherlands law, she would acquire Netherlands nationality through the naturalisation of her husband, whereas according to the German law of 1913 she could keep her own nationality when her husband was naturalised.

The report stated that, in certain countries where the old rules held good, juridical unity did not exist, because the husband could change his nationality in the course of marriage without that change affecting the nationality of the wife. That did not prove any illogicality in the Netherlands law, since that law did not allow a Netherlands married woman to keep her nationality when her husband acquired another nationality by naturalisation.

Mme. Schönfeld-Polano proceeded to refute other statements in the report on similar points, her object being to show that the question of the unity of the nationality of the parents was much more important for countries which adopted the principle of the jus sanguinis, just as the unity of nationality of husband and wife was of practical importance for countries in which the statute personal was governed by national law.

It had been stated that husband and wife might have different nationalities when it was not in their interest to have the same nationality. The Consultative Committee favoured a free choice for husband and wife as to unity or diversity of nationality. The matter, however, was not one merely of free choice of the individuals: it was a question of importance to States themselves. The Netherlands Government could not admit that the system of equality, combined with an option to choose the same nationality, had the same value as the system of unity.

The solutions proposed by the Consultative Committee with regard to the difficulties arising in connection with children—solutions intended to avoid giving an equal right to a father and mother of different nationality to transmit their nationality to their children—were not acceptable to countries where the principle of jus sanguinis and the principle of statute personal. Such principles were not out of date: they were based on the closest connection of filiation rather than the connection between the person and the country in which he was born. The Netherlands attached great importance to the maintenance of their legal system regarding nationality. Moreover, the International Union of Catholic Women's Associations, representing 25,000,000 Catholic women (Annex 9), had drawn attention to the danger of any provisions likely to undermine the unity of the family, which proved that the system of the independence of the married woman in regard to her nationality was not unanimously demanded by public opinion.

The inference to be drawn from all this was that no world agreement could be reached either on the principle of independent nationality or on the principle of the unity of nationality of married persons. Moreover, an international examination was not what Recommendation No. 6 of the Hague Conference prescribed. That recommendation, according to which States should examine the question individually, was in no way incompatible with Articles 8 and 9 of the Convention, as the Consultative Committee's report implied.

The procedure proposed by the Consultative Committee was contrary to that outlined at The Hague: their adoption would mean the undoing of what had been done at the Hague Conference. That would be most unfortunate from the point of view of codification itself.

A Convention had been signed at The Hague, and the Netherlands delegation was therefore bound to object strongly to the assertion in the report that no actual convention existed but merely a proposal for a convention. The Convention had been signed, and the whole discussion could not be reopened.

The Netherlands delegation had no objection to the British proposal, but attached no great practical importance to a new enquiry. She proposed the insertion in the British resolution, after the word " Assembly ", of the words: " If need be, in order to show the necessity of awaiting the results of the enquiry set up among the Governments before deciding whether further international action was justifiable ".

Frau VON ZAHN-HARNACK (Germany) said that Articles 8, 9, 10 and 11 of the Hague Convention were intended to prevent double nationality, and undoubtedly constituted progress, inasmuch as women were no longer entirely dependent on their husband's nationality. Nevertheless, the Convention had been a great disappointment to many women because it did not put into practice the idea that women were citizens in their own right.

It was not only women who thought the Hague Convention was not quite satisfactory. No less than seven Governments—those of Colombia, Cuba, Denmark, Japan, the Netherlands, Sweden and Switzerland—had signed, subject to a reservation concerning Articles 8 and 11, and various Governments of Members of the League had made a proposal that a Consultative Committee should be set up, consisting of eight women's organisations, to give an opinion on the problem.

The memorandum before the Committee clearly showed that the Consultative Committee had studied the question very thoroughly and had given careful consideration to the legal position in various countries. It had explained that the basis of the whole system should be the principle of equality of men and women.

The problem interested, not only women who were members of the great feminist organisations, but also very many women who in general did not look at this matter from a purely feminist point of view, because the social and economic position of women had fundamentally changed in recent years. Increased professional opportunities had strengthened the feeling of responsibility, and women considered themselves to-day even more directly attached to their country than they did in earlier days. The idea of unity of the family had also changed in certain respects. To-day, this unity was considered, in the first place, as a moral unity between wife, husband and children, not necessarily endangered or destroyed by different national situations. The old laws which placed women under tutelage had caused them numerous dangers and much harm which had arisen, not only in time of war, but also under normal conditions. That fact could not be ignored by States.

The situation had been stated very clearly a few days previously in the proposals made by the General Assembly of the German Juristentag which said that, under the German law on nationality, women should be given absolute legal equality.

The German delegation therefore seconded the motion of the British delegation.

M. RUNDSTEIN (Poland) hoped a final solution of the problem would be found in the near future. He agreed with the Chilian and British resolutions. The Assembly's resolution might possibly be extended.

Women's organisations had conducted propaganda against the Hague Convention, particularly against Articles 8, 10 and 11. In particular, the following sentence on page 8 of the report was unjustified:

> " These articles, which are directed mainly to preventing statelessness and dual nationality would, if ratified, give recognition. . . . to the old idea of the subordinate position of women . . . ".

They aimed at avoiding the worst cases of conflict and laid down the principle of the complete autonomy of women in the case of naturalisation during marriage. No common denominator could at present be found to reconcile the various systems. The articles in question were so far from retrograde that certain States had only accepted them subject to reservations.

He was of opinion that the Hague Convention should rather be restored to favour, and proposed that a passage should be inserted in the recitals of the resolution to the effect that the Hague Convention took account of the different legal systems in force, contributed to the solution of the difficulties in regard to the nationality of women, and did not in any way prevent the future work of codification.

He was very disillusioned by the lack of impartiality of certain women's organisations in their attack on the Convention.

Sir Annepu PATRO (India) regretted that a woman from India could not have been present to bring the cause of women before the Assembly, but in the absence of any representative of the women of India he rose to support the resolution. It would appear that there was some feeling in some European countries against giving equal rights. He came from India, which was often regarded as conservative; but he would remind the Committee that India was the first country to give a woman the right to sit as Speaker in the House of Commons. He felt it was impossible for men longer to resist the claim of women to equity and justice.

The First Conference for the Progressive Codification of International Law had, he felt, failed in one important aspect—namely, the equality of women. He wished there could be unanimity in the matter. But the immediate issue was not whether equal rights could be conceded to women at once. From the speeches made that morning he had no doubt there was a very strong case for the revision of the conclusions of the Hague Conference. Women should not obtain their rights of citizenship merely from the men to whom they were married; nationality should be given to women in their own right. The Committee should not oppose the resolution now under discussion. That resolution accepted the principle of the equality of women, and recommended all Governments to consider the question. He was surprised that the Netherlands seemed to be so far behind the Eastern nations in this matter, but he felt sure that the attitude of the Netherlands would be revised in the light of the present discussions.

Under Articles 8, 9 and 10 women might be deprived in some cases of their right to hold property as well as office—in other words, deprived of what was the natural right of every citizen. There was the fullest justification for the reconsideration of the recommendations of the Hague Conference by the Governments in consultation with their advisers and their own women's organisations. It was true that women were impatient; but men, while being bound to consider the matter fully, were, he thought, bound to yield to women's just demands, and women based their claims, not on the grounds of services rendered, but on the strength of justice.

M. HOFFINGER (Austria) stated that his Government had instructed him to give the fullest and warmest support to the proposals of the British and Chilian delegations, which could easily be brought into harmony. He agreed with the warning given by the Scandinavian delegate against the tendency of taking resolutions merely in order to give satisfaction to somebody, but in the present case he felt that the Committee could not deny satisfaction to the request made to the League of Nations by the worldwide women's organisations.

Women simply asked that a problem of vital importance to them should be re-examined. This request for the reconsideration of a point of paramount importance to women did not involve the League in any further expenditure or hamper its more urgent work. The problem also was a serious one, inasmuch as it affected 50 per cent of humanity. Although opinions differed as to the nature of the reforms required—as the declaration of the Catholic organisations showed—women were unanimous in taking the view that the present situation was intolerable, and unworthy of them.

Governments, as well as the League, were in duty bound to work for the welfare of peoples, and there could be no doubt that a matter which was of so vital an interest to the female half of the population must also be of interest to them. Thirdly, the interests of the League of Nations must prompt the Committee to show its goodwill, for even optimists could not say that the public opinion of the world was over-enthusiastic about the work done by the League. The Assembly was going to make a strong appeal to women throughout the world to support the League in its work for peace and disarmament; was it possible in such circumstances to refuse to examine this legitimate demand from women?

The complaints of women against the existing legal situation were founded on two practical and moral considerations. The present system, or rather conflict of existing systems, was the cause of serious practical inconvenience, but this was not the main grievance. Outstanding importance was attached to the moral feature. Men had the right of self-determination in the matter of nationality, whereas women had not.

The Hague Conference, which had dealt with some of the practical difficulties and disadvantages of the present system, had touched only very lightly upon the principle of self-determination for women in the matter of nationality.

Women's part in the life of nations had greatly changed during the last few years. That was a fact, whether people approved or not. Legislation was generally somewhat behind the development of social life, but in this particular instance the laws of many States were very far in arrears of social evolution. It was of outstanding importance that the law should be brought up to date nationally and internationally.

The Austrian delegation associated itself with the reservations put forward by the British delegation concerning points (d) and (e). Whilst fully in sympathy with the difficulties mentioned by the Netherlands delegate, he thought those very difficulties provided yet one more reason for reconsidering the question. If Governments simply remained where they were, without agreeing to discuss any new rules, the question would in ten years' time be exactly where it was to-day.

Mlle. FORCHHAMMER (Denmark) supported the British resolution and the Chilian amendment.

Women were not very satisfied with the articles of the Hague Convention dealing with women's nationality. In appointing a special committee, the Council had hoped to remedy the omission made in not consulting women at an earlier stage of the proceedings. The question was so decidedly a woman's question that it was difficult to understand how it had been thought possible to regulate it without consulting women.

She stressed the importance of the Hague recommendations, and hoped that next year's Assembly report would give the views of the Governments as fully as possible, in addition to the recommendations of the Women's Consultative Committee. She hoped that, before replying to the questions, Governments would follow the example of the Council and consult their own women's associations.

Mr. GUTHRIE (Canada) said that Canada had a special interest in the question under discussion, owing to the very great number of international marriages between Canadians and Americans. The Canadian delegation heartily supported the British proposal. The Canadian Parliament had perhaps gone a little further than other countries by adopting recently Articles 8, 9 and 10 of the Hague Convention. He was aware that the Hague recommendations did not go as far as many of the women's organisations desired, or as far as the recommendations of the Fifteenth Conference of League of Nations' Societies. An act adopting them had, however, been passed by both Houses of the Canadian Parliament, but would not be brought into force until a Proclamation had been issued. It was felt that it would be well to see what the attitude of the other nations was before issuing the Proclamation.

The difficulty was acute in Canada. If a Canadian girl married a United States citizen, she thereby automatically lost her British citizenship, yet under United States law she did not acquire United States citizenship, until she had resided in the United States for five years. During that period she possessed no nationality, a situation fraught with great difficulties and inconvenience as regards the laws of succession and property, the right to vote, passport regulations, etc. It was therefore of considerable importance to Canada that this unsatisfactory condition should be remedied as soon as possible.

In Great Britain, the principle of the law of nationality had been based upon common law until 1870. In that year, it was modified by an Act of the British Parliament which had force in Canada. After many amendments to the 1870 Act, the law was consolidated in Great Britain in the Act of 1914. The basic principle of that Act was that the wife of a British subject should be deemed a British subject and the wife of an alien should be deemed an alien.

That principle was operative in a very large number of States but not in all States. It was not operative in the United States or in Belgium, Yugoslavia or certain other European countries, or in South American countries. Consequently, the situation throughout the world was very unsatisfactory, and the time had come to aim at securing uniformity. He believed that his own country would go as far as granting equal rights, if the other nations of the world decided to do likewise. The sooner the equality of the sexes was realised, not only in nationality, but in all matters of law, the better it would be for the world.

M. WINTER (Czechoslovakia) said that the Hague Conference had succeeded in solving the important problem of the stateless woman. This was a very important point for European countries. Its practical importance was seen in the case of women who had to earn their living and were debarred from working in some particular country because of their nationality. It often happened that a widow was unable to work in her native country, because she had automatically acquired the nationality of a foreign husband. Her only alternative was to go away to her husband's country where she was unknown and entirely unused to her surroundings. There were cases of refugees who married students in their adopted country, the wives thereby losing their right to follow their profession in their own country. The result was a tendency towards irregular unions.

Some speakers appeared to be in favour of leaving the whole matter for future solution, while certain women's organisations wanted the whole question to be settled immediately. But it was not only the interests of women that were at stake : the interests of States had also to be considered. He was in favour of adjourning the wider question and dealing with the narrower issue at once. Feminist organisations would, he thought, realise that there was a desire to reach a just solution of the whole problem. By adopting the course he suggested, the confidence of those organisations would be secured.

M. GIANNINI (Italy) proposed to sum up the question, as the discussion had become confused. Women were a great electoral force, but, as he was not a candidate, he could speak impartially, particularly as his only desire was to express clearly the views of his Government.

An initial confusion had arisen in the discussion owing to a slip of the pen in the Secretary-General's report, which was headed " Nationality of Women " instead of " Nationality of Married Women ". The problem arose only in connection with married women. In the light of that correction many observations made became meaningless.

The question had first been raised in 1925 by a questionnaire from the Netherlands

Government concerning problems of private law in connection with the nationality of married women.

He fully believed that the draft Hague Convention of 1928 constituted all that could be done in private law at present as regards the nationality of married women. That Convention was being considered by Governments and would lead to a result sooner or later.

It was practically at the same period that the League of Nations began to study the question of codification. Subsequently, the Committee of Experts had studied the problem. M. Rundstein had prepared a report which was submitted to the various Governments. The Governments had all expressed an opinion. The Hague Conference had been held and the problem had been discussed. Certain articles were adopted (unanimously) and certain recommendations (on a majority vote). The problem, therefore, had not been overlooked, and the women's associations had been given a fair hearing, both by the Bureau and by the Committee on Nationality. It was quite incorrect to say that the question had not been examined. They had had, however, to admit that they could not reach agreement.

But the Convention on nationality had done what could be done. Certain more daring provisions had been eliminated from the very outset—for instance, five Governments refused to accept Article 10 at the very time of the signature of the Convention.

Then there had been agitation among women so strong that the United States delegate had said that for those very reasons he could not adhere to certain proposals, which was rather annoying seeing that other countries had made considerable concessions to secure the adoption of those clauses and had remained empty-handed.

The movement had continued. The Council had appointed a committee of representatives of international women's organisations which had worked with rapidity and had submitted a very interesting report, which obviously, however, was the work rather of lawyers than of jurists or statesmen. All the arguments in the report were exaggerated. Laws were made to say what they did not say and the value of the Hague Convention was undervalued. The Secretary-General had then prepared an admirable report in which the various questions submitted to the members of the Committee for examination were set out.

The Committee would be well advised to define certain specific points. Should the work be continued and, if so, how? By means of a special committee or by consulting the Governments first? There was a previous point, however. The Consultative Committee's report indicated the present position with regard to the Hague Convention and the evolution of national laws.

It was quite inaccurate to say that no Convention existed but only a proposal for a convention He had had full and duly recognised powers at the Hague Conference, and like all his colleagues he had signed a Convention which Governments might or might not ratify. The Secretary-General of the League had asked Governments to notify their decision. Therefore the report misrepresented the situation.

Again, the report mentioned certain provisions in national laws and classified them, but that classification was misleading. Practically the only policy in nationality laws since the war had been that each State endeavoured to keep its own nationals and capture the nationals of other countries. To allege, therefore, that any particular law was based on a particular tendency was mere casuistry.

As a matter of fact there were five very broad systems:

First, a woman marrying a foreigner maintained her nationality of origin unless she formally renounced it; and yet it would be seen that the four or five laws based on this concept offered quite different solutions of the problem. Under French law, a foreign woman became French only if she lost her nationality of origin or at her own request. But a Frenchwoman acquired the nationality of her husband only if she resided abroad or did not request to remain French. Under American law, a foreign woman did not become an American, but an American woman remained American. Under Turkish law, a foreign woman who married a Turk became Turkish, but a Turkish woman who married a foreigner remained a Turk. There was really only one logical law on those lines—the law of the Soviets, which stated that men and women could marry if they liked, and that without changing their nationality.

According to the second system, a woman on marriage lost her nationality unless she stated that she wished to keep it. Here, again, there was the utmost diversity of nationality laws which it would be useless to enumerate.

Third system: A woman on marriage lost her nationality if she transferred her domicile abroad but kept it if she remained in her country of origin.

Fourth system: A woman who married a foreigner lost her nationality of origin, if she acquired the nationality of her husband.

Fifth system: A woman who married a foreigner lost her nationality, whether she acquired or did not acquire that of her husband.

Obviously, therefore, no definite legal system existed. The only way to meet feminist demands would be to adopt Soviet law universally; but that law undermined what was dearest to the hearts of many peoples—the family. Thus, what was a fundamental concept in certain countries would be completely destroyed. In those circumstances was there really any hope of reaching a general agreement?

The report had referred to conflicts of law which occurred under the present system; but its proposals merely amounted to generalising the problem. Conflicts would become systematic; conflicts of law would occur, not only between wife and husband, but between husband and wife, father and son, mother and son, and so on.

With regard to the unity of the family, it was said that that was a tie which should be purely moral and not legal. He could not agree. It was the stronger partner in reality who dominated the union; it might be the wife, it might be the husband. To argue that it was always the husband was false : quite the contrary might be the case. If individuals rather than the law were left to settle the question of family unity, very curious situations might result.

Some delegations had already spoken on the distressing problem of the transmission of nationality to children. Whichever was the dominant partner—husband or wife—would see that the children had his or her nationality, if possible, because neither could prevent the State saying that children born in its territory were its nationals. Suppose, however, a State allowed the spouses to settle the matter between themselves, a number of complications might arise concerning the children in time both of peace and of war. The wife might be governed by one law, the husband by another, and the son by yet another. In fact, if the principle of the free choice of nationality for children were allowed, five children might all in theory be of different nationalities, which would be an impossible situation. What would happen, for instance, in the matter of succession? The reply was that complications occurred even under the present system. True, but why complicate them further? In war-time it would be even worse than in peace-time. For instance, either mother or father or children might be expelled the country and their property be confiscated and the rest of the family allowed or obliged to remain, retaining their property.

After all, if a woman desired to maintain her entire freedom, there was no obligation for her to marry at all. The same applied equally to men. But if two persons desired to marry, the family became and must become paramount. The family, being a moral unit, was of more importance than the individuals of which it was composed. If the highest ideal were, on the contrary, the absolute liberty of each individual, then the only possible system was logically the Bolshevist one.

The problem was not merely a legal or political, but a social one; it struck at the very heart of nations, and for nations which, like Italy, regarded the family and family unity as a fundamental basis of social life, no compromise was possible.

The conclusion was that there was no need to start reconsidering the problem two years after the Hague Conference. There was, moreover, a Convention open for ratification which some countries had ratified. It was to be hoped that others would soon follow suit. The present was not the time to ask Governments to begin to study the problem anew.

What then was to be done? As the Council had appointed a special committee, which had submitted a report (though it must be remembered that the Union of Catholic Women had disagreed with that report), the only course was to refer the two documents to the various Governments asking them whether they were prepared to ratify the Hague Convention as it stood or whether they wished the problem of the nationality of married women to be discussed further.

The resolution submitted by the Italian delegation (Annex 10) tended towards the same conclusion as the British and Chilian resolutions; but it was more accurate, and left a way open for the Hague Convention, some of the solutions of which really ought not to be dropped.

Count Apponyi (Hungary) agreed with the British proposal, because it did not imply any decision on the merits of the question—only a re-examination, because the Hague Convention did not meet all requirements. The Italian resolution was not fundamentally opposed to such re-examination. It must be remembered that not merely individual but national interests were at stake. In addition to the rights of individual husbands and wives there was the duty towards the family. The weakening of family ties was one of the greatest dangers of the time. He would not say that the maintenance by women of their separate nationality would necessarily weaken family unity, but the problem required further consideration. Personally, he was convinced that family ties ought to be strengthened rather than weakened. Subject to that reservation he could accept the British resolution.

M. Politis (Greece) accepted the British proposal in principle. He also agreed with Count Apponyi that family ties ought not to be weakened. The problem, however, of harmonising this primordial principle of family unity with certain strong modern tendencies was a very serious and complicated one. Since Roman times, many social changes had occurred. There must be some system of unity connecting husband and wife and children; otherwise, marriage would be a mere empty form. How could a system of relative subordination be replaced by a system of co-ordination in accordance with social progress?

He supported the British delegation's resolution, because it left the question open for further examination; but he suggested two amendments :

(1) In the paragraph beginning " Notes ", the words " that steps should be taken to bring about the reconsideration of the Hague Nationality Convention " should be omitted. Reconsideration was, if not impossible, quite inappropriate, because it would produce a very bad effect on public opinion.

The Hague Conference had recognised that no radical solution was possible. It had therefore sought to alleviate the most serious cases of conflict—statelessness and double nationality. The Assembly could not say at present: "Let us destroy all we have done and try to do something better". It could only say: "The problem is a very complex one which merits further consideration".

(2) He asked that the Committee should add in the last paragraph the words "and to the said Committee" after the words "to all Governments". Similar words should be inserted in the last sentence after the words "to request Governments". He asked that the British resolution be now referred to the Drafting Committee, together with the various amendments proposed directly or indirectly. He suggested that the discussion should be regarded as closed.

The CHAIRMAN explained that, if M. Politis' proposal for closure were not adopted, the Committee would have to hold a night sitting.

Mlle. CAMPOAMOR (Spain) said she had asked to speak at the beginning of the discussion. During the discussion many statements had been made which required refutation. She was opposed to the proposal for closure.

M. GIANNINI (Italy) said that, with the amendments proposed by M. Politis and certain changes based on the Italian draft, he could accept the British resolution. He would, however, second M. Politis' closure motion.

The Chairman put the proposal for closure to the vote.
By 12 votes to 5, the Committee decided to close the discussion.

The Chairman appointed a Drafting Committee consisting of Mr. BECKETT, M. CASSIN and M. GIANNINI.

NINTH MEETING.

Held on Tuesday, September 22nd, 1931, at 10 a.m.

Chairman: M. SCIALOJA (Italy).

15. Nationality of Women: Draft Resolution submitted by the Drafting Committee.

The CHAIRMAN read the following draft resolution, submitted by the Drafting Committee:

"The Assembly,

"Having examined with the greatest interest the report of the Secretary-General on the question of the nationality of women, presented in accordance with the resolution of the Council of January 24th, 1931, and the report and proposals of the Committee of Representatives of Women's International Organisations which are annexed thereto:

"Notes the desire of the said Committee that steps should be taken to bring about the reconsideration of the Hague Nationality Convention, bearing in mind the principle of equality between men and women;

"Thanks the Committee of Representatives of Women's International Organisations for its report; and

"Requests the Council, in harmony with Recommendation No. VI of the Conference for the Codification of International Law held at The Hague, March and April 1930, to transmit to all Governments the report of the Secretary-General on the question of the nationality of women, including the report of the Committee of Representatives of Women's International Organisations, and the letter of the International Union of Leagues of Catholic Women of August 19th, 1931, together with the Minutes of the First Committee of the Assembly on this subject, and to request Governments to submit their observations on this subject (including their views regarding the Hague Nationality Convention) for reconsideration of the matter by the thirteenth Assembly, to which any observations which the abovementioned Committee thinks fit to present will be communicated."

M. PELLA (Roumania) said that the Roumanian delegation supported the proposal of the Drafting Committee. Roumania, whose law was now one of the most advanced as regards the nationality of women, recognised the important progress that had been made through the Hague Conference, and welcomed any international reform which, while safeguarding family unity, would improve the legal and moral situation of married women. The Roumanian delegation was even convinced that the provisions of the Roumanian law of February 23rd, 1924, might usefully be examined when the merits of the question came to be discussed.

Mr. BECKETT (British Empire), Rapporteur, said that the Drafting Committee had taken careful note of all the expressions of opinion advanced during the discussions in drawing up its resolution, which was a slightly amended version of the draft proposed by the United Kingdom delegation.

He desired to point out, as regards paragraph 2 of the preamble, that note was merely taken of the conclusions set forth in the report of the Women's Consultative Committee itself, and that the resolution in no way committed the Assembly to any expression of opinion on the merits of the question. Consequently, the paragraph referred to did not commit the Assembly to any view in regard to the Hague Nationality Convention.

In the last paragraph of the draft resolution three small changes had been made: First, the letter of the International Union of the Leagues of Catholic Women, which was transmitted to the present Assembly by a resolution of the Council, was added to the documents which were to be sent to Governments for consideration.

Secondly, it was provided that any further observations which the Women's Consultative Committee might think fit to present should be communicated to the Thirteenth Assembly. This implied a desire that the Women's Consultative Committee should keep itself in being, an implication which gave effect to the Chilian amendment to the resolution of the United Kingdom delegation. The Consultative Committee would make its own arrangements, and consequently no expense to the League would be involved.

Thirdly, the Hague Nationality Convention was expressly mentioned as a matter on which Governments were asked to state their views before the next Assembly.

Mr. HEARNE (Irish Free State), in supporting the resolution, reminded the Committee that the Irish delegation had been the first in 1930 to point out that the Hague Convention had not given the question of the nationality of women all the prominence it merited.

Dr. Ethel OSBORNE (Australia) was glad to note that in the draft resolution definite recognition was given to the continuation of the women's Standing Committee, whose observations would be communicated to the Thirteenth Assembly. That seemed to be the best procedure. She did not anticipate any trouble regarding precipitate legislation based on the articles of the Hague Convention. Countries in the past had not shown undue haste in dealing with questions in regard to the position of women. The fact that the whole question would be considered by the next Assembly left the way open for all suggestions and allowed the national committees represented on the International Consultative Committee to become active in their own countries for the purpose of promoting an educational campaign and developing public opinion. It afforded an opportunity for some quite definite information and conclusions, arrived at only after fresh research, to be brought forward to the next Assembly on these two important questions—i.e., nationality of children and the unity of the family.

The Australian delegation supported the draft resolution. She would like to remind the Committee that Australia was one of the most recently settled countries in the world, and one where women had shared equally with the men in pioneering and bearing the burdens of the country. Hence they were looked upon as the co-partners and equals of men.

The recommendations of the Australian Government were in these terms:

> "The Commonwealth Government favours the principle of equality of the sexes in matters of nationality, provided that such principle finds general acceptance by other countries, and particularly by Great Britain and the Dominions."

Mme. VERGARA (Chile) pointed out that there was a difference between her request and the wording of the Committee's text referring thereto. As the text now stood, she was afraid misunderstandings might arise. She thought it was only just, as they were communicating the letter of the International Union of Catholic Women to the Governments, to send, as well, the letter from the Alliance of St. John and the Catholic League of Great Britain, which were not in agreement with the International Union.

The Women's Consultative Committee was not acting against the unity of the family and would have no difficulty in convincing the World Union of Young Women's Christian Associations that neither its convictions nor its principles were being attacked. It would be remembered that the World Union of Young Women's Christian Associations, which had been invited to sit on the Committee, had preferred not to send a representative, because it had never adopted any official attitude on the question under discussion. These Catholic organisations ought to have studied the question with a view to protesting at the time when the Committee was formed.

She did not think that this was the right time for any Catholic institution to define its views.

The draft resolution submitted by the Drafting Committee was adopted.

Mr. BECKETT was appointed Rapporteur to the Assembly on the question (for text of report see Annex 11).

16. Situation as regards the Entry into Force of the Protocol of September 14th, 1929, concerning the Revision of the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice: Note by the Secretary-General (Annex 12).

M. UNDÉN (Sweden) reminded the Committee that this question had been included on the agenda at the request of the Swedish delegation, supported by a number of other delegations. When, in the previous year, the Governments had received a circular letter from the Secretary-General informing them that the Cuban Government had accompanied its ratification of the revised Statute with a reservation referring mainly to Article 23 of the Statute, Sweden had not given a final reply, but he had been instructed to inform the Assembly that the Swedish Government could not accept the reservation in question, because it affected a fundamental rule of the revised Statute.

The Swedish delegation still hoped that it would be possible finally to adopt the revised Statute and that the Governments which had not yet unconditionally ratified the Statute might reconsider the question in the light of the views expressed by the other Members of the League of Nations.

The Norwegian and Swedish delegations had submitted a draft resolution (Annex 13) which they asked the Commission to adopt and decide that the question would be re-examined by the thirteenth Assembly.

M. PILOTTI (Italy) referred to the terms of the Secretary-General's note (Annex 12) and noted that the first Cuban reservation mentioned on page 3 of that document had become superfluous, because the Protocol had not come into force on the date fixed. The Cuban Government had attached to its reservation a declaration in which it said that the coming into force of the Protocol should not affect the situation of judges already elected. That question had been settled in the previous year. They had decided to allow the Court to take a decision on the subject, if such a case arose.

The real reservation of Cuba was concerned with the non-acceptance of Article 23. In conformity with the request made to it, the Court had accepted, in substance if not in form, Article 23, by inserting in its rules provisions which were almost equivalent to the coming into force of Article 23, as was proved in the document prepared by the Secretariat containing the new articles of the Court rules, as approved by the Court itself at a date subsequent to the reservation of the Cuban Government.

In these circumstances, the reservation made by Cuba now appeared to be irrelevant. As his country was amongst those which declared they could not accept the reservation, M. Pilotti would agree to any draft resolution which expressed in any form whatever the hope that, in spite of the reservation made by Cuba, the Protocol would come into force.

In this respect, he felt that the draft resolution submitted by the Norwegian and Swedish delegations was inadequate—first, because it omitted all reference to the revised Rules of the Court, and, secondly, because it stated : " Considering that a reservation could only be made in the moment of ratification if all the other signatory States agree or if such a reservation has been provided for in the text of the Convention ". This sentence raised an abstract legal principle; but the only thing to observe was that Cuba had made a reservation and that several States had explicitly declared they could not accept it.

M. FERRARA (Cuba) thought the best answer he could give to the Italian delegate's observations was to read the telegram he had just received from his Government, which ran as follows :

> " If, as you report, Cuba has been asked to withdraw her reservation regarding the Convention concerning the new Statute of the Permanent Court, we request you to state that the Government, having regard to the position you mention, would be prepared to ask the Senate to withdraw the reservations, and that this attitude is not dictated by any change of opinion but by the desire to share wholeheartedly in the development of the League and its organs. When consulted, the President of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Senate signified his agreement. "

M. Pilotti had let it be understood that the basis of Cuba's reservation was not altogether statutory—that is to say, it did not conform to the Protocol and the new Statute. That was perhaps true, because the Permanent Court had decided that the same system could be adopted under the 1920 Statute. Every State which did not agree to the reservation made by Cuba had committed the same error as Cuba, by investing Article 23 with an importance which the Court did not assign to it. In any case, the reservations made by Cuba might readily have been accepted, because, even with the reservation, the Court retained all its rights both under the new and the old Statutes.

Cuba's real reservation affected, not Article 23, but Article 4 of the Protocol, which provided for the possibility of implementing a Convention which had not been ratified by all the States. The Government of Cuba in this matter had not changed its opinion. As the principle involved had been accepted two years ago by the Council and the Assembly, he did not need to labour the point.

M. CASSIN (France) expressed his great satisfaction with the statement the delegate of Cuba had just made to the Committee. He proposed that the conclusion of the draft resolution submitted by the Norwegian and Swedish delegations should read as follows :

> " Decides that a report shall be forwarded to the thirteenth Session of the Assembly by the Secretary-General showing the progress made with regard to the coming into force of the new Statute."

This was a formal correction, in keeping with the Cuban delegate's statements, which removed any question of " measures to be taken ".

He did not share M. Pilotti's opinion as to the expediency of alluding to an abstract legal principle. It might, however, be advisable to mention that there had been an unaccepted reservation, in the event of the same legal principles having again to be applied to other questions.

It would be desirable for it to be known, when the Committee's proceedings were afterwards studied, that it had referred to a principle of international law.

M. UNDÉN (Sweden) said the Committee was unanimous in expressing its satisfaction to the delegate of Cuba at the important statement he had made. The draft resolution submitted by the Norwegian and Swedish delegations did not, therefore, meet the position any longer, and he accordingly suggested that the Committee should appoint a Rapporteur to draft a short resolution, taking into account the statement made by the Government of Cuba and expressing the hope that the question would be finally settled at the next Assembly.

M. RAESTAD (Norway) supported the Swedish proposal and suggested M. Max Huber as Rapporteur.

M. HUBER (Switzerland) said he could not accept the proposal, because he was still a judge in a case now before the Court.

On the proposal of M. UNDÉN (Sweden), M. PILOTTI was appointed Rapporteur.

17. Proposal by the Government of Finland to confer on the Permanent Court of International Justice Jurisdiction as a Tribunal of Appeal in relation to Arbitral Tribunals established by States (Continuation): Report of the Sub-Committee. (Annex 14).

M. RAESTAD (Norway), Rapporteur, mentioned two formal corrections in the wording of the report. He paid a tribute to the work accomplished in the previous year by the Committee of Five, on which the Sub-Committee had drawn very extensively. In many respects the latter's report contained differences that were more apparent than real.

The case that formed the subject of the proposal would certainly be serious if it occurred; but it would be, and must never be allowed to become other than, a quite exceptional occurrence.

It was serious in the sense that if, under existing international law, the validity of an arbitral award were disputed, the embryonic substantive rules of international law might be pleaded, without there being as yet any definite corresponding procedural rules. Such a dispute might therefore drag on for a considerable time without solution, embittering the relations between the parties.

Moreover, disputes as to the validity of an arbitral award were necessarily very uncommon on account of the nature of the tribunals; indeed it might even be said that they were extremely rare, and any alteration in the procedure must not have the effect of rendering disputes more frequent. The procedure adopted must not be allowed to degenerate into a type of ordinary procedure.

The Committee of Five had intimated that the procedure it suggested might be used as an alternative. The Sub-Committee had accepted that view, in the belief that all the possibilities of disputing the validity of an arbitral award should be, as far as possible, taken into account. It was just possible—though the point was by no means definitely decided—that jurisdiction in this matter already existed under the Optional Clause of the Court's Statute, but the Sub-Committee, like the Committee of Five, had refrained from discussing the question.

If such jurisdiction did already exist, it was a matter for congratulation. If it did not, a system must first be established to enable the parties to agree upon the procedure by means of an international act. The Sub-Committee accordingly adhered to the system of the Protocol. Nevertheless, where the parties were not bound, either by any previous clause or by a protocol, the Sub-Committee had thought that a resolution should be forwarded to the Council suggesting the procedure that appeared most suitable in the matter. The Committee was thus faced with a draft protocol on one hand and on the other a draft recommendation addressed to the Council by the Assembly.

Some members of the Sub-Committee attached a greater importance, from a practical point of view, to the protocol. Others considered the recommendation to be addressed to the Council by the Assembly to be the most important matter.

M. Raestad then gave a succinct account of the underlying ideas embodied in the proposed texts. He pointed out that the Sub-Committee had in both texts avoided any enumeration of the causes likely to involve the invalidity of an arbitral award. There was a risk of any such enumeration being incomplete and containing factors denoting degrees of invalidity. Degrees of invalidity were very difficult to determine. By avoiding any enumeration, the Sub-Committee, probably following the example of the Committee of Five, had tried, as far as this point of substantive law was concerned, to adhere to the present state of international law.

With regard to the protocol, the Committee was divided on the question of inserting a time-limit. Some thought that a time-limit would become necessary as soon as jurisdiction was established. Others felt that it would be very difficult to justify a time-limit. Compared with the report of the Committee of Five, one innovation had nevertheless been made—namely, it was laid down that the time-limit must be counted from the time of the discovery of a new fact. The new fact was not, of course, the one the Court Statute requires as a condition for revision; it was one which showed that the award was so vitiated by defect as to be invalid.

The Protocol contained a concept which was also a new one, and, although it was not to be found in the conclusions of the Committee of Five, its insertion appeared necessary. That concept was that, if the award had been found by the Court to be wholly or partially invalid and if the parties did not then undertake to conclude a special agreement with a view to the adoption of a new procedure, any party might submit the merits of the case to the Court by application, in so far as the award had been declared invalid. The Sub-Committee considered that, unless some such system were introduced, the matter might be left where it stood—that was to say, without a positive solution of the difficulty—a state of affairs which it was desired to remedy.

Naturally, in cases where the parties were not already bound under a Convention, the recommendation provided for resort to the Council. If the parties were already bound, either by a protocol or by another conventional clause, they should conform thereto, and the part played by the Council would consist solely in reminding them, if necessary, of that duty. It was understood that, if the time-limit laid down in a conventional clause in force between the parties had already expired, the latter could not bring the question before the Council and thus reopen the dispute.

M. Raestad pointed out that the recommendation did not confer upon the Council any powers or jurisdiction which it did not already possess. Its sole effect was to provide for the application by the Council of a procedure which would take into account the parallel procedure introduced in the conventional system by the Protocol and also the importance of referring these purely legal questions to judicial organs.

The Sub-Committee proposed that the recommendation should be adopted and that the Protocol should be referred to the Governments for their observations. As an alternative, it also envisaged the reference of the two drafts to the Governments for their observations or their adoption by the Committee. After some hesitation it decided in favour of the first-mentioned solution.

Count Apponyi (Hungary) regretted that he could not agree with the Sub-Committee's conclusion in regard to one part of the report. He approved of the Protocol and of its reference to Governments for their opinion, as it was not possible to establish a new legal system without the consent of all the States Members of the League, and this new system consisted in the setting up of a judicial tribunal to examine whether an arbitral award was or was not invalid. But he could not agree to the part of the recommendation dealing with the procedure to be followed pending the institution of the new system. It was necessary to keep within the framework of the existing law, as laid down in Article 13, paragraph 4, of the Covenant; whereas it was recommended in the draft that " where the Council . . . . finds that the validity of the award is disputed by one of the parties, the Council will invite the parties to conclude a special agreement for the submission of this contention to the Permanent Court of International Justice, and, if unsuccessful in securing this result, will ask an advisory opinion from the Court ". Why was the Court to be asked for an opinion? Not for the purpose of a scientific discussion, but for the enforcement of the arbitral award according to that opinion. Under existing law, the Council had not been, and could not be, accorded that right; it could only take the necessary steps for the execution of the arbitral award. If there were any departure from this principle, that would be the end of the international magistrature. If the Council were granted, whether implicitly or directly, the right to revise an arbitral award—that is to say, the right to decide whether any defect existed in the award or not, the judicial authority would then be subordinate to the political authority. He had opposed and would continue to oppose any development in that direction, which was contrary to the fundamental principles of the League. According to those principles, judicial decisions were to be left to the courts, and the political authority could intervene only for the purpose of enforcing their decisions.

Whereas existing law required the Council to enforce the arbitral award, the recommendation would enable it to avoid doing so if it thought fit and would permit the Council to consult the Court of Justice. It could not be forced to do so, and, consequently, such action was only recommended to it; but the value of the distinction was doubtful. Still less could the Council be enjoined to carry out the Court's advisory opinion. This recommendation was therefore absolutely inadmissible, because it was contrary to the existing law as laid down in Article 13, paragraph 4, of the Covenant. There was no trace in the Covenant of any provision conferring upon the Council the right of post-revision—a right overruling that of the Courts. He would therefore urge the Committee not to take this extremely dangerous course, which would overthrow the international juridical edifice of the League, and asked that the last line of the Committee's recommendation should simply be deleted. If necessary, he could accept the following addition: " It is understood that if unsuccessful in securing this result the Council shall act in accordance with Article 13, paragraph 4 ".

M. Hoffinger (Austria) said that during the general discussion he had already expressed the Austrian Government's approval of the Finnish proposal and the scruples and misgivings which it felt in regard to the extension of that proposal by the Committee of Jurists. His fears had been confirmed by M. Politis, who had said that they were about to take the first step towards the establishment of an international judicial hierarchy and had proposed that an error in the application of the law should be accepted as a cause of appeal against an arbitral award.

His misgivings had not been allayed as a result of the examination of the question by the Sub-Committee of which he was a member, and they had even been aggravated by the fact that the grounds on which an appeal could be made that an award was invalid had not been established. Consequently, the field of application of the regulations on which the Committee was working was very much wider than that provided for in the Finnish proposal.

The Austrian delegation was nevertheless glad to note that the Sub-Committee had unanimously recognised that the cases in question were and should remain extremely rare and that the bona-fide execution of the award should continue to be the rule; appeals against it should be quite exceptional and would be justified only by circumstances of the highest gravity. But it considered that the report did not provide a sufficient guarantee against the risk to arbitration itself of an overwide interpretation, or the abuse or unscrupulous use of the possibilities afforded.

The Sub-Committee had proposed a recommendation and a draft protocol. As regards the protocol, the report of the Sub-Committee showed a slight preference for the procedure of referring the draft to Governments for an examination and reply. In his opinion, this consultation was absolutely essential.

The Austrian delegation considered that the protocol in its present form differed appreciably from the Finnish proposal and might have much more serious consequences. The Governments must, therefore, be given an opportunity of realising its possibilities, of taking advice as to its possible consequences and submitting suggestions on the matter.

If the new rules were to lead to a weakening of the principle of settlement by arbitration, the results would be deplorable. Arbitration was of the greatest importance for the settlement of international disputes and was a method of settlement which, within the meaning both of the Covenant and of the General Act, far from being a subordinate or preliminary procedure to judicial settlement, was linked up with it. The establishment of judicial procedure through the setting up of the Court had been a big step forward and constituted, perhaps, the greatest benefit which the League had conferred upon the nations. The confidence, respect and devotion of Austria for the Court were profound and unshakable; she had proved this on various occasions, and in particular by being one of the first States to sign the Optional Clause. But the Austrian delegation did not think that Governments should be influenced, even indirectly, and recommended to use judicial procedure rather than arbitration in cases where the choice was open. It would also be dangerous to do anything which might result, even involuntarily, in diminishing the value and prestige of arbitration or in undermining the nations' confidence in the possibilities of its practical application. There were some disputes in regard to which arbitration appeared to be preferable to judicial settlement. The Court itself had no desire whatever to have functions assigned to it which by their nature really came within the province of an arbitral tribunal. The study of a case at present before the Court would throw useful light on this matter. The Austrian delegation, therefore, considered that they should not lightly embark upon a course which might cause arbitration to be regarded as a preliminary to judicial procedure, as a waste of time and, consequently, as a method of settlement offering no practical advantages to States and without interest for the arbitrators. Among the methods provided for the settlement of disputes between nations—action by the League, arbitration, judicial settlement—arbitration should not play the part of Cinderella.

For these reasons he considered that a preliminary consultation of the Governments was essential, and his delegation might possibly be obliged to vote against the opening of the protocol for signature during the present Assembly.

As regards the draft recommendation submitted by the Sub-Committee, the Austrian delegation held substantially the same views as Count Apponyi. It was of opinion that in the interests of peace and justice the separation of the political and judicial authorities—which was a fundamental principle of the law of civilised nations—should be strictly maintained in the domain of international law. The relation between the two authorities was confined purely and simply to the obligation on the part of the political authority to assist the magistrature in carrying out the awards rendered by the latter. In accordance with the proposed recommendation, the Council, a political institution, would be called upon to play a part which exceeded those powers. It was true that the recommendation advocated arbitration or judicial settlement, but it nevertheless provided for the possibility in cases where all other means had been exhausted of the Council's taking a decision on a point of law. While recognising the practical value of the recommendation, the Austrian delegation, for the reason of principle mentioned above, could not accept this draft and would abstain from voting. Since the question was not urgent, it would prefer the two texts to be transmitted to the Governments. The protocol might quite well be amended in the light of the Governments' replies, so that it might also become necessary to reconstruct the recommendation. If the Committee were to take a final decision at this stage, it might do more harm than good.

M. Goeppert (Germany) agreed with the Hungarian delegate. Even those who were not willing to omit the last line should hesitate before accepting the proposal as it stood, because provision had to be made for the case in which the same party which had disputed the validity of an award simply refused to submit the matter to the Permanent Court or conclude any agreement to that effect. Would the Council, in such a case, ask the Court what it should do? Surely not. It would use the powers it possessed.

With regard to the draft Protocol he thought it would be better not to open it for signature forthwith, but to submit it beforehand to Governments for further consideration. If that were decided, the German Government reserved the right to give its opinion, not merely on the various articles, but also on the basic idea itself. It was very important to avoid anything which might weaken the principle of arbitration.

M. Limburg (Netherlands) asked whether all agreed with him that for States which had signed the Optional Clause the question whether an arbitral award was vitiated must necessarily be referred to the Permanent Court, because the wording of the recommendation seemed to cast a doubt on that view, inasmuch as, if it were adopted, some might argue that the procedure indicated therein was the only procedure that could be followed to determine whether an arbitral award was defective.

Count Apponyi had objected to the last words of the recommendation. Article 13, paragraph 4, of the Covenant, however, read as follows:

> "The Members of the League agree that they will carry out in full good faith any award . . . In the event of any failure to carry out such an award . . . the Council shall propose what steps should be taken to give effect thereto."

That was clear. But did the Covenant give the Council the right to consult the Court regarding the validity of an arbitral award? Article 14 of the Covenant stated:

> "The Court may also give an advisory opinion upon any dispute or question referred to it by the Council or by the Assembly."

So that, even now, if the Council were in doubt, it could consult the Court. Why then object to words which might almost be said to be superfluous?

With regard to the Protocol, Article 1 referred to an invalidating defect, but Article 2 referred to a new fact. Legally, those might be two quite different matters. A new fact, in municipal law, might involve re-hearing, whereas defects which could invalidate involved either cassation, application for revision of judgment, or even appeal. There might conceivably be new facts which, strictly speaking, amounted to a defect invalidating an award—for instance, the discovery a posteriori of the falsification of a document which had figured in the arbitral procedure.

That certainly fell within the scope of Article 1. But if in Article 2 a general reference were made to the discovery of a new fact, that would not necessarily mean a material defect which invalidated, since the term referred also to new facts of another kind.

Article 3 read:

> "If within three months from the publication of the judgment, the parties have not agreed upon a submission to arbitration . . ."

What sort of submission? Only a request to refer back the whole matter to the same arbitrators? If the article meant that a new agreement concerning the whole case had to be concluded, it might be wondered why nullification was always made to apply to the first agreement, thus obliging the parties to begin the whole procedure over again.

With regard to Article 4, he asked, when the situation described in that article arose, was the State bound to refer the matter to the Court, or could it refuse its national's request to apply to the Court? Those were his main comments on the Protocol.

There was just one point of form in Article 2, which read: "Failing . . . notification, the period shall begin with the date of despatch of the award . . ." How long a period must elapse for non-receipt to be established?

Sir Brojendra MITTER (India) pointed out that lack of jurisdiction had been advanced as one of the main grounds of appeal. The draft Protocol, however, referred only to a defect invalidating an award. It would seem, therefore, that no action could be taken in respect of the proceedings, until the award had actually been given. But surely if lack of jurisdiction were a good ground for questioning the validity of an award, there was no reason why steps should not be taken long before the award was delivered. An early plea to the tribunal might save both time and money. It should be open to a party to plead lack of jurisdiction before the tribunal set to work, or at any stage before the award.

M. CASSIN (France) noted that neither the Sub-Committee nor the Rapporteur had mentioned reasons for excluding a recommendation to Governments regarding certain bilateral treaties (such as treaties setting up a claims commission) where a recommendation would be very useful. He shared the fears of those who thought that the Protocol might shake confidence in arbitration by creating the impression that appeals against abuse of power and other pleas for the invalidation of awards were the commonest thing in the world. Would it not be possible to introduce some check on frivolous pleas in the form of damages with interest?

Any extension of the grounds for appeal referred to in the Protocol would be a very serious matter. His Indian colleague seemed to regret that there was no mention of lack of jurisdiction. He assured him that lack of jurisdiction was there, and abuse of power and many other things as well, because the expression "defect rendering invalid" was very elastic.

He shared M. Limburg's apprehension regarding new facts. If the text meant only new facts revealing a cause of invalidity in the past, it should say so clearly, because in all procedural law throughout the world a new fact involved a re-hearing. It would be an extremely serious matter if, in political cases, either party could, as in Article 3, file an application bringing the substance of the case before the Court for decision. He was not sure that the Court would be particularly pleased at the possibility. He would not press the point, as the Protocol was only a draft at present.

He did not think that the Assembly could possibly submit to Governments a draft recommendation which it might or might not transmit to the Council. The recommendation itself was based on the premise that at present Members of the League were, as such, bound to settle problems by arbitration or by submission to the Permanent Court. That was not the case. A Member of the League, as such, was also entitled to lay its case before the Council. As things stood at present, only those States Members which had signed Article 36 or had acceded to the General Act of Arbitration were bound to submit to arbitration or the decision of the Court. In this connection also, the principle of damages with interest was important. Where a legal obligation existed, the Court might, under Article 36, allow damages against a State which failed in its legal obligation.

He shared Count Apponyi's fears regarding the mixing of politics and law in the Council, but there was no such mixing when the matter was one of obtaining the opinion of the Permanent Court. When something so nearly like an executive as the Council had the duty of enforcing an arbitral or judicial award, it was highly important that public opinion should not be disturbed by the legitimate complaints of the losing State. If a judge or arbitrator had scandalously exceeded his powers, would public opinion be likely to support the Council in enforcing a travesty of justice? In such cases the Council, being a political body, must have the possibility of referring to an impartial and purely legal body.

The recommendation could not alter existing international law. The important point was, could the Council ask an advisory opinion? In the present state of law could it do so without the consent of the parties and, in particular, without the consent of the State which had accused the arbitrator of an abuse of power? M. Rolin thought it could, but he (M. Cassin) was by no means certain. If it could not, the recommendation would be merely platonic, and a very difficult legal obstacle would stand in the way.

The French delegation did not think the Assembly could submit the draft to Governments and did not believe that it would be adopted by the Assembly in its present form.

Mr. Beckett (British Empire) said that the report of the Sub-Committee had appeared on the face of it to be a unanimous one, yet points of detail had already been criticised by some of its members. Speaking as one who was not a member of the Sub-Committee, he was bound to say that he really preferred things as they were, on the basis of the report of the Committee of Five.

There seemed to be two possible views as to the existing law on the question of the validity in all circumstances of arbitral awards; it was, of course, quite possible to reach agreement on a text providing for what should be done under the regime of a Convention without being necessarily in agreement as to what the existing law was. It was perhaps difficult, however, drawing in up a report, to avoid giving some impression as to the author's opinion regarding the existing state of the law.

The two alternative views of existing law seemed to be either, (1) that an arbitral award given under a treaty agreement between two States was and must be valid in practically all circumstances—there were no legal grounds on which a party could attack it or refuse to execute it—or, (2) that there were certain grounds upon which a party could object to the award and refuse to execute it.

The report of the Committee of Five seemed to be based on the first alternative, and the report of the Sub-Committee appeared to be based on the second. The latter report appeared to suggest that there were cases in which, at present, an arbitral award could be attacked and its execution refused.

As he himself shared what he conceived to be the view of the Committee of Five on the question of existing law, he was not comfortable about the implications which seemed to reside in the Sub-Committee's report. He feared that the report or its proposals would suggest that there were more grounds than people at present thought for attacking the validity of arbitral awards. That might not be the actual intention of the report, but it did seem to be the deduction to be drawn from the text.

There appeared to be fairly general agreement that no attempt should be made to open the draft Protocol for signature at the present Assembly. If that were so, and if the draft was to be sent to Governments for their observations, he would not waste the time of the Committee by criticising its provisions in the draft.

As regards the draft recommendation, he did not know why the Sub-Committee, in drawing up their draft had dealt only with the case as it would present itself if it were brought as a dispute before the Council. Surely it would have been better simply to have stated the general principle, that, if States disputed an arbitral award, they should submit it to the Permanent Court, without entering into the question as to what would happen when such a case came before the Council.

Then there was, of course, also the last sentence in the draft resolution, which had already given rise to so much discussion. Three members of the Sub-Committee desired that it should be eliminated, and between the other members of the Committee there was a difference of opinion as to its effect, because there was underlyng it the important unsettled and disputed question as to whether the Council could ask for the opinion of the Permanent Court of International Justice without the consent of the parties to the dispute.

M. Matine-Daftary (Persia) reserved the right to express an opinion on the merits of the question when he had learned the views of his Government, but desired to ascertain what would happen to the recommendation if the Protocol were ratified by all Governments. He agreed with the Vice-Chairman's observations, especially with regard to Article 2. If the matter were really one of a new fact not known by the tribunal when it judged the case, that would, under municipal law, lead to an application for revision of judgment and not to appeal to a higher tribunal. The last paragraph of Article 3 seemed to confuse the two ideas, when one party complained of the award, pleading lack of jurisdiction or incorrect application of the law. It was understandable, if the two parties did not agree on an arbitral settlement within three months, that the loser should refer the matter to the Permanent Court. In the case of a new fact, however, discovered after the award, it would be more logical that the original arbitral tribunal should have the matter laid before it once more.

M. Pilotti (Italy) hoped that, if the Committee decided that it was desirable to send the Protocol to Governments, it would also send the texts prepared by the Committee of Five, in order that the Governments might gradually arrive at the best text. M. Cassin had rightly pointed out that useful provision was made in the first text of the Committee of Five for bilateral treaties, a question which had been carefully studied by that Committee. Provision could be made in a bilateral treaty for a higher tribunal in certain matters—for instance, those entrusted to special commissions like claims commissions. It would consequently be difficult to do so in a treaty which provided an arbitral tribunal for disputes of a political nature.

He agreed with the Vice-Chairman and M. Matine-Daftary that, if the concept of an application for revision of judgment on the grounds of the discovery of new facts were introduced at all, it would be more logical for the case to be referred back to the same tribunal. He knew that the admissibility of this procedure in international law was questioned, but, as the Assembly was engaged in making new law, it would be better to recognise its admissibility, rather than institute a procedure for appeal.

With regard to remedy based on lack of jurisdiction, the Indian delegate had proposed to allow a plea to the jurisdiction addressed to the arbitral tribunal itself having the effect of suspending the proceedings. He begged Sir Brojendra Mitter not to insist on that modification, the acceptance of which would greatly weaken the authority of arbitral tribunals. The fundamental rule of all procedure was that the judge to whom the case was referred decided as to his own jurisdiction. It would be useless to stay proceedings from the outset by pleading, to another court, the judge's lack of jurisdiction. Nullity could be invoked only when the award had been given.

He could agree either that the draft recommendation should be submitted to Governments or that it should be examined by the Committee first and adopted by the present Assembly. It could be improved a little by the incorporation of certain ideas contained in the Committee of Five's draft resolution. Henceforth, account must be taken of one new element—namely, the strengthening of the Permanent Court's jurisdiction through the acceptance by many States of the Optional Clause. Yet the phrase in the recommendation: " Recommends that in all cases where the Council . . . finds that the validity of the award is disputed by one of the parties, the Council will invite the parties to conclude a special agreement . . ." meant that the Permanent Court had no automatic jurisdiction. That might not be true, because a party which contested the validity of the award and thought that the matter was one for the Permanent Court, because both it and the other party had accepted the Optional Clause, would take the case direct to the Court, and the Court would decide. It would, therefore, be preferable to say " . . . recommends that in cases where the Council . . . finds that the validity of the award is disputed by one of the parties and that the award has not been referred to the Court under the compulsory jurisdiction clause . . . "

The words " . . . and, if unsuccessful in securing this result, will ask an advisory opinion from the Court " were needless, because the Council already possessed that right under an article of the Covenant. Furthermore, in case of non-acceptance of the Council's invitation, several other articles of the Covenant would come into force owing to the fact that States Members were in disagreement.

M. RUNDSTEIN (Poland) observed in connection with Article 1 of the draft Protocol that it would be dangerous to leave to case-law the determination of the grounds on which an award could be invalidated. Unless some exhaustive list were given, the number of applications would multiply. The list of causes of nullity prepared by the Secretariat on the basis of doctrine and the draft codification of international law comprised eleven causes.

The report very clearly stated that an application for annulment would be allowed only when a definite rule of substantive law had been infringed. If, however, it were not stated expressly that the wrongful application of a rule might entail nullity, they should at least expressly state that the violation of a definite rule of law might do so. He suggested that they should make lack of jurisdiction the only ground of nullity. Abuse of power was really only an abstract idea. There could be no abuse of power in the procedure of tribunals, but there could be absolute lack of jurisdiction or relative lack of jurisdiction.

He did not think it desirable to mention in Article 2 the ground for an application for revision which had been so defined that the discovery of new facts might justify resort to the procedure laid down in the Protocol. Agreements to submit to arbitration almost invariably laid down the procedure for revision. There could be no clearer definition of the procedure for revision than that contained in Article 83 of the 1907 Hague Convention, particularly in regard to the discovery of new facts

Finally, he supported M. Pilotti's proposal to communicate to the Governments the discussions of the Committee of Five together with the draft Protocol and the Minutes of the First Committee.

M. POLITIS (Greece) congratulated the Sub-Committee on its conscientious work. It was useless to comment on the draft Protocol, because it was merely a draft to be sent to Governments for further discussion.

The CHAIRMAN said that the draft Protocol could not be communicated to the Governments.

M. POLITIS did not share the Chairman's view. The draft Protocol was an extremely useful document and ought to be sent to the various Governments together with the discussions of the Committee of Five. Then, in the following year, in the light of the comments by Governments, the matter could be further discussed, so that possibly a unanimous conclusion might be reached. He would be prepared to accept the recommendation if it were adopted unanimously or by a large majority. It ought, however, to be redrafted on the lines indicated by M. Pilotti. The existence of bilateral agreements and the accession of a large number of countries to the Optional Clause could not be ignored.

He also thought that the last sentence of the recommendation should be omitted; otherwise, there might be some danger of transforming a purely legal question into a political one. If the Committee wished to adopt the recommendation that year, he proposed the addition to the second paragraph of the words: " and that the execution of this obligation is in fact facilitated by the numerous accessions to Article 36 of the Statute of the Permanent Court ".

In the following paragraph, after the words " will invite the parties ", he proposed the addition of the words " under the powers conferred upon it by Article 13, paragraph 4, of the Covenant ", and after the words " . . . validity of the award is disputed by one of the parties ", the words " if they are not bound by any agreement making resort to arbitral or judicial settlement compulsory ". The last sentence, from the words " if unsuccessful " to the end would be omitted. If the Committee could not agree to this amended text, it should at any rate decide that the ideas set out in the report should with the draft Protocol be communicated to the various Governments.

TENTH MEETING.

Held on Wednesday, September 23rd, 1931, at 3.30 p.m.

Chairman: M. SCIALOJA (Italy).

18. Note on the Financial Consequences of Certain Decisions of the First Committee (Annex 15).

The Committee decided to send immediately to the Secretariat the note regarding a request for credits to be submitted to the Fourth Committee.

19. Proposal of the Government of Finland to confer on the Permanent Court of International Justice Jurisdiction as a Tribunal of Appeal in respect of Arbitral Tribunals established by States (Continuation) (Annex 14).

M. HUBER (Switzerland), in reply to various criticisms regarding the work of the Sub-Committee, reminded the Committee that the general discussion had not thrown any light on a number of important questions. The draft Protocol was submitted, not as a definitive text, but rather as a basis for discussion. It differed considerably from the Protocol prepared by the Committee of Five.

The draft of the Committee of Five mentioned the quashing by the Permanent Court of an award the validity of which was disputed. There was reason to doubt the possibility of such a solution. The annulment of an award was conceivable only in the case of a hierarchy of tribunals. The Permanent Court was called upon to examine disputes between States. The dispute in question was based on the plea of a State regarding its obligation to execute an arbitral award. The Court, however, could not annul an award given by a tribunal independent of it. That difficulty had been settled by stating that the Court would decide regarding the validity of the plea. Under the Protocol—which was a convention—the parties recognised that, if the Court were of opinion that the award was vitiated by defect, it would no longer be binding; on the new basis the parties undertook to re-submit the merits of the case to the Court, unless they decided by special agreement to submit the matter to another arbitral tribunal.

It was right that Governments, in forming their views, should be aware of the essential differences between the systems contemplated in the respective draft Protocols.

The notion of a time-limit might give rise to false interpretations and create the impression that these measures formed part of ordinary law. The time-limit was also intended to apply to cases in which the defect justifying the plea against the validity of an award was discovered after the expiry of the time-limits granted, which necessarily were very short.

Mention of the discovery of a new fact might lead to the inference that the Sub-Committee had endeavoured to introduce a procedure of revision as outlined in the Hague Convention, as a possibility for which provision might be made in the special agreement. That had not been the Sub-Committee's intention. The only possible new fact would be a fact likely to justify a plea for the invalidation of the award, as was made quite clear in the formula proposed by the Rapporteur, M. Raestad—namely, the subsequent discovery of a fact affecting the validity of the award within the meaning of the Protocol.

The recommendation had been proposed with a view to ensuring as far as possible a solution on the lines of judicial procedure in cases in which no judicial settlement had been reached under the Protocol.

The Committee appeared to be entirely agreed as to the object in view. Count Apponyi would certainly observe that they all desired, no less than himself, to maintain the intangibility and independence of international justice. Opinions differed only as to the means by which the object could be attained. It should not be forgotten, however, that the question was one of ensuring the execution of arbitral awards in exceptional cases in which the validity of those awards was disputed.

The Sub-Committee had, he could assure Mr. Beckett, been at great pains to avoid anything that might affect the substantive law on which all the work undertaken by the Committee was founded. It had taken as its starting-point the idea that in all international legislative work, even though there might be differences of opinion as to the general formula for the conclusion of conventions, universal international customary law was absolutely excluded from discussion.

Count Apponyi had emphasised that Article 13, dealing with the execution of awards, and the Hague Convention of 1907, which laid down that an award is final and without appeal, seemed to indicate that no discussion of an arbitral award was possible. As Professor Rundstein had observed, however, the enquiries conducted in the course of the preparatory work showed that there existed a whole series of possible causes of nullity. In any case, doctrine, like diplomatic experience, proved that there were actual cases in which the validity of an award was contested by a State which regarded the award as invalid. The Committee was therefore taking its stand on facts. It might happen that awards were disputed, and therefore provision should be made to meet, as far as possible, the danger of an impasse in certain circumstances.

The normal and ideal solution would be that, owing to the existence of the compulsory jurisdiction of the Permanent Court, any question of law raised would be certain to be given a purely judicial settlement. That was the path to be followed. M. Pilotti had remarked that the recommendation, as drafted, might create an impression that Article 36, for instance, of the Court's Statutes would not be operative, because mention was made only of a special agreement. Excluding an error in drafting, the Sub-Committee had only had in view, in drafting the r commendation, those cases in which the normal and ideal solution of a compulsory jurisdiction of the Court was non-existent. He did not think anyone could object to including a reference to compulsory jurisdiction, as M. Pilotti proposed.

That was the first case which arose. When, however, there was no compulsory jurisdiction, the Council invited the parties to conclude a special agreement, thus supplying the omission due either to failure to ratify the Optional Clause or to some other cause.

The third case was when a dispute arose through a State refusing to accept fresh judicial or arbitral procedure. Here there were two possibilities. A State might refuse to execute the award and also refuse to submit to any fresh arbitral procedure. It might, again, demand the execution of the award, the validity of which was contested, and also refuse to submit to fresh arbitration. In that case the Council, if requested to enforce the award, might apply to the State a principle known in English law and say: " You cannot put forward two contradictory pleas; if you will not agree that the award be examined by a fresh arbitral tribunal, we shall enforce it ".

Count Apponyi seemed to think that, when a State refused to accept judicial or arbitral procedure, then execution ought to follow. But there was every reason to suppose that the case of a State categorically refusing to execute an award given against it and at the same time insisting on the execution of an award given against another State would, in practice, be very exceptional. At the request of the Council negotiations would probably be begun for a special agreement. Failing such an agreement it would be very difficult in many cases to say whose fault it was if the judicial decision were not carried out. To meet such an unsatisfactory situation, the Sub-Committee proposed that the Council should ask an advisory opinion of the Court. It would then have something very similar to a judicial solution, so that Count Apponyi's fears would be allayed; but as it was impossible, without an agreement between the parties, for the Council to lay the matter before the Court, the application—even if unilateral—would nevertheless have to be the outcome of an agreement. That was why the Sub-Committee proposed to invite the Council to apply direct for an advisory opinion.

There had never been any desire—nor did the text allow of such an interpretation—to invest the Council with the power to decide whether the plea concerning the validity of the judgment was justified or not. If the last sentence of the recommendation were omitted, very little substance would remain. It was important to make provision for a solution which, though not absolute, would come very near a final settlement in cases in which no agreement could be reached between the parties. Those were the reasons for which the Sub-Committee had put forward its proposals.

M. Erich (Finland) stated that he had been unable to agree on every point with the conclusions of the Sub-Committee; in certain respects, he preferred the system proposed by the Committee set up by the Council. He was not absolutely convinced of the advantage of refraining to indicate the special grounds for the appeal—namely, lack of jurisdiction and abuse of power. Attention had rightly been drawn to the vagueness of these concepts, which neither the Committee of Experts nor legal doctrine in general had been able—or would probably ever be able—to define satisfactorily; in the absence of a better solution, the report of the Committee of Experts recommended confidence in the Court in such cases. If, however, the problem of adequate grounds for appeal were left open, and if only a general distinction were drawn between valid and invalid awards, there would be no criterion, and it would be left to case-law (as was pointed out in the Sub-Committee's report) to decide the grounds on which an award might be invalidated. Could it really be said, then, that it was a much better solution ?

The Sub-Committee's preference had in part been determined by an idea that there might—though quite exceptionally—exist defects that would vitiate an award. He thought it was difficult to include in this general concept the notions of abuse of power or lack of jurisdiction, for instance. Bribery and corruption of an arbitrator or the fraudulent use of a falsified document had been quoted as examples. He doubted, however, whether such considerations were adequate to justify a total renunciation of all definition of grounds for appeal.

True, international law could not, as municipal law did, provide remedies and extraordinary channels of appeal. If, however, a State were guilty of such a crime, there could be little doubt that the revelation of the crime would engender moral pressure which would oblige the guilty State to make reparation. It seemed, therefore, hardly necessary to forgo, simply because certain very exceptional cases might occur, all specification of grounds for appeal and only draw a distinction between valid and invalid awards. The Committee of Experts had shown a tendency, on the contrary, to allow the Permanent Court to annul, if necessary, an award held to be defective.

The Sub-Committee had acted on another principle. It did not wish the decision of the Court to effect an arbitral award, thus trespassing on the domain of arbitration. It proposed that the Court should merely note the existence of a defect, so that the parties would be bound, under their contractual obligation, to draw from the Court's opinion the conclusion that the award was null and void.

That was an ingenious solution, for which much could be said. The difference between the two systems proposed, however, was not very great. The matter was really one of principle. It had not even been possible to maintain intact the rule that the Court could only note the existence of a defect in an arbitral award, since the Court was authorised to suspend the execution of an award; that obviously interfered with the normal and regular effects of the award, without affecting the merits of the case.

It should be remembered that there were already in existence certain special treaties which conferred on the Court an appellate jurisdiction which had never been contested as incompatible with its general functions.

He noted with satisfaction the omission, in conformity with the original Finnish proposal, of the distinction between disputes of a legal nature—i.e., disputes concerning a point of law, and disputes of a political nature.

Like the Committee of Experts, the Sub-Committee had rightly avoided considering in its report the possible influence of the Optional Clause on the question. Any deduction drawn from Article 36 of the Court's Statute on that point encountered an objection to which nobody had yet been able to give a satisfactory reply—namely, if the Court had jurisdiction to pronounce on the actual validity of an arbitral award, it was logically impossible to refuse the parties the right to appeal on the plea of a false interpretation of a rule in international law. If the provision of the Optional Clause were admitted, to the effect that the interpretation of a treaty or point of international law might be one of the grounds for appeal to the Permanent Court, it must also be admitted that any party dissatisfied with an arbitral award had the right to appeal to the Court on the ground of a false interpretation of a rule of law.

There were so many solutions to the problem that it might be discussed ad infinitum. He could not regard himself as bound by the Sub-Committee's draft, ingenious though it was, and must reserve his final opinion.

M. Rolin (Belgium), replying to various criticisms of the work of the Sub-Committee, noted, first, that all delegations shared Count Apponyi's desire to ensure in the best way, and as soon as possible, the independence of the judicial power from the political power. But it was also extremely important not to wander outside the domain of existing law and to avoid any confusion between desire and reality.

In the Sub-Committee's view, it was essential from the point of view of international law that it should be clearly realised that, in spite of the force of arbitral awards and in spite of the right of every arbitral tribunal to decide upon its own jurisdiction, there were, in international droit commun, cases of abuse of power and lack of jurisdiction for which there was no organic solution and which made it possible for States to avoid the execution of awards. On the other hand, it must be definitely stated as a necessary principle of law that any party desirous of avoiding the execution of an award was bound to propose, of its own accord, that the question be submitted to a fresh tribunal offering judicial guarantees at least equivalent to those provided by the former tribunal.

If it were agreed that such was the existing international law when the Covenant came into force, the point which arose was, to what extent had that law been modified by the Covenant? The Covenant said that it was the Council's duty to enforce, or consider measures for the enforcement of, arbitral awards. Did that mean that the Council was to be regarded as non-existent henceforth in all cases in which the validity of an award was disputed? Or was the situation unchanged, so that the Council's duty was still to ensure the execution of awards, provided they were properly given?

M. Politis had proposed as an amendment that, if one party disputed the validity of an award, the Council should propose the conclusion of a special agreement. That was not a solution, because the special agreement depended on the will of the two parties. Belgium had long ago signed the Optional Clause and the General Act. Suppose, however, a country had not signed either the Clause or the Act, the countries went to arbitration, and one of the arbitrators had been bribed, for instance. The Council might then be informed that one of the parties refused to execute so defective an award. The Council then recommended the conclusion of a special agreement, but the other party refused, or raised all sorts of difficulties in the drawing up of the agreement, so that no result was obtained. The Council would then say: no agreement has been reached; there is no arbitral or judicial decision, and therefore the award is final and must be executed. Was that an adequate solution?

There was surely no better way of strengthening the award than a clause to the effect that the Council would consult the Permanent Court as to the validity of the document submitted to it as a sort of exequatur, the Council acting as a constitutional body to ensure the proper working of the other organs of the League. If that was the meaning of the recommendation, the Belgian delegation would support it.

He had heard with surprise certain delegates, in particular Mr. Beckett, say that they much preferred the solutions of the Committee of Five, because the possible discussion of an arbitral award seemed to be admitted in the Protocol, whereas it ought, as a matter of principle, to be final. The very starting-point of the Committee's work, however, was the admission in international law of an appeal on the plea of abuse of power. From that point there would be no possible difference between the work of the Committee of Five and that of the Sub-Committee. How had the Sub-Committee amended or improved the former results? By affording a better definition of the object to be achieved. They were faced with two difficulties: first, the determination of the cases in which the validity of an award might be disputed. According to M. Rundstein and other jurists, there were eleven such cases; according to others, there were only two. Did anyone propose that they should endeavour in abstracto to enumerate all these cases by a mere effort of imagination and mind?

The Belgian delegation thought that, as such occurrences would be rather rare and might assume very different forms, it would be better to leave the Court itself gradually to sort out these grounds in the light of general principles, so that a doctrine might finally emerge, perhaps even a convention defining grounds for nullity. It would be quite premature to begin codification on that point, and yet an attempt to limit the grounds on which an award could be invalidated would, in fact, be codification.

It was, however, reasonable to adhere to the procedure of judicial revision. He proposed, in accordance with the method so often followed by the League, to lay down a somewhat elastic procedure providing, in addition to appeal to the Permanent Court, for the solution of difficulties which the Committee of Five seemed rather to have neglected—namely, who was to settle the subject-matter of the dispute finally. Certain disputes might be concerned with technical points which it would be desirable to leave to bodies other than the Permanent Court. If the Court decided in some rare instances that an award was invalid, or rather that it ought not to be executed, the parties would find themselves before a blank wall. There would be an arbitral award the exequatur of which had been refused, and which would be practically without legal effect, although it had not been annulled as regards form. The parties might then endeavour to agree on some new procedure. Obviously, the same tribunal could not reconsider the question, because it would not be sufficiently independent. If no agreement could be reached at the end of three months, the parties would come back to the Court. After that, all further avenues would be closed, which seemed to the Belgian delegation a practical and reasonable solution.

M. Politis (Greece) thought that M. Rolin had not quite understood his remarks on the previous day. He did not mean that, when the Council proposed an agreement which one of the parties did not accept, the Council ought in every case to enforce the award. What he had really suggested was that the Council should propose an agreement, but, if it failed in its first endeavour, it should continue its efforts and might then apply to the Court. Care must be exercised, however, in providing such an appeal, to avoid encouraging resistance by the parties.

There had been a recent case where the award was obviously invalid. A large quantity of supplies had been ordered and it had been laid down that "reasonable" commission should be paid to the contractor. The latter having estimated his "reasonable" commission at 70 per cent, the debtor Government refused to pay it. The contract contained an agreement to submit to arbitration. The arbitrator consulted gave an extravagant award fixing the "reasonable" commission at 30 per cent. The debtor Government refused to comply with the award, which it regarded as defective, as being contrary to common sense. It proposed to the other Government concerned to conclude a new agreement and submit the same question to another arbitrator, adding that, failing an agreement, it would still not comply with the award but would itself lay the matter before the Council of the League. Fortunately, the two Governments finally reached an agreement to refer the matter to a second arbitrator, but, if there had been a refusal on the part of the successful party, the question would have been referred to the Council. The Council's duty would then have been to say to the parties: "There is obviously something wrong. Conclude a new agreement for further arbitration". It would be very unlikely that the other Government would have persisted in its attitude, but, if it had done so, ought the Council immediately to have referred the whole case to the Court, or ought it not rather to have redoubled its insistence that the parties should conclude an agreement?

His aim in proposing the omission of the last sentence was not to ensure execution in all cases, even when it would be contrary to common sense; what he had wished to avoid was that an official text should lay down that a party was entitled not to accept an award but to take the matter before the Court, with the possibility of thereupon coming before the Council armed with an advisory opinion—which would, of course, then be open to discussion. In that case political considerations might, as Count Apponyi had observed, influence the settlement of a judicial question.

Mr. Beckett (British Empire) said that he had also been misunderstood by M. Rolin on one point. Of the two possible views on the question, he considered that the view that arbitral awards could not, under existing law, be attacked, even on the ground of an abuse of power, was the right one. If one held this view, then the object of the proposal was to make it possible to refer to the Permanent Court of International Justice certain awards which were, in the present state of the law, unattackable.

One might consider that the existing law was unsatisfactory, and think it desirable to provide a machinery for the review of arbitral awards against which certain defined objections were made; but it was important that the possible grounds of objection should be clearly defined.

The Chairman proposed that the question should be adjourned until 1932, to allow time for adequate preparatory studies. The Committee was working in a domain in which experience was very limited and which was fraught with considerable difficulty. The difference of opinion showed that the question was not yet mature. Any false step in a problem affecting all nations would be very harmful.

The League was at present engaged in organising a system of international justice which centred around arbitration. Arbitration was a daily occurrence, a method whereby disputes which were generally of no very great importance were settled. But arbitration also served to settle more important cases. If two countries disputed the possession of a territory, for instance, they would resort to the arbitration of a sovereign. If the latter knew that his award would be subject to appeal—because, if appeal were recognised, the parties would always be tempted to appeal, and would be almost bound to in certain political matters—he would probably not accept the function. Would that be favourable to the extension of arbitration?

Did that mean that no mention should be made of appeal? No. It was wise to provide for appeal in certain cases, but those very cases were not entirely without remedy at the present time. It would therefore be preferable to refrain from making a law, of the effects of which the League could not be quite certain, and to reflect further on the question.

In cases of technical arbitration, if the arbitrator thought there would be an ordinary means for requesting the annulment of his decision, he would not agree to arbitrate if he were a good arbitrator, but only if he were a bad arbitrator.

It would be well to distinguish between the various grounds for annulling an award, in order that the parties might decide themselves whether they admitted appeal or not. The main concern of the parties was to settle the dispute rapidly. They therefore chose as arbitrators persons in whom they had full confidence, and it was stated that the decision of those arbitrators would not be open to appeal. That happened daily in private law, and the practice might be incorporated in international law. It was not desirable to prolong a dispute and, therefore, there should be the possibility of barring an appeal. It would be a serious defect in the draft to give the impression that grounds for appeal were a matter of public interest which could not be abandoned.

The draft was therefore imperfect, as was only natural, because it was a first draft on a subject of great importance. It might be very disadvantageous to apply it immediately. Procedure for appeal had to be laid down, but at the same time appeal must be restricted and defined, and the various categories of cases in which abstention from appeal would be allowed and those in which it would not be allowed must be clearly specified—in fact, a complete structure must be built. That was why he proposed that the question should be adjourned.

M. RAESTAD (Norway) said this was the first general discussion on a question which had been under consideration for the past two years. It was perhaps natural, therefore, that the Sub-Committee's draft was so imperfect and also that so many criticisms of the draft had gone wide of the mark.

Whatever Mr. Beckett said, it was a fact that, on various occasions, States had believed they had a right to contest the validity of arbitral awards. When such a dispute arose again, it was not necessarily submitted to a tribunal which would give a final decision. They all agreed as to the inconvenience of such a situation, even if it were and had to remain exceptional.

The Sub-Committee proposed the setting up of a tribunal for the purpose, and also indicated a means of providing a definite way out of the impasse.

In reply to certain questions as to why the Sub-Committee had not adopted the proposal of the Committee of Five that clauses should be introduced in bilateral treaties, he agreed that the proposal might be combined with the two other alternatives, the protocol and the recommendation; but the Sub-Committee had thought that possibly it would not be of very much use. The protocol itself furnished a model. In bilateral treaties it would be rather a delicate matter to mention the cases of invalidity, so that States would probably content themselves with general clauses.

It had been said that the Sub-Committee had extended the field of application of the procedure regarding causes of invalidity. As M. Huber had replied, their intention was just the contrary. They had not desired to extend that procedure, for its extension would weaken all arbitral proceedings. They thought it would be dangerous to enumerate causes of invalidity, because the mere existence of a cause, even in a very small degree, might invalidate an award. In so doing, of course, they exposed themselves to the criticism that the door was left open to an indeterminate number of causes of invalidity.

He could not agree with the Chairman that, in a multilateral treaty, the causes of invalidity should be enumerated, for such causes differed very much—there were differences of degree. He admitted that the general formula must be limited; he therefore proposed the following addition to Article 1:

> "Without prejudice to the scope of the notion of invalidity within the meaning of the present protocol, it is understood that an award cannot be regarded as invalidated under the present protocol on the ground that it would really amount to a wrongful application of the law or a mistaken view of the facts.
> "The present protocol does not concern the procedure for revision on the grounds of the discovery of a new fact which, if it had been known to the Tribunal, would have exercised a decisive influence on the award."

He also wished to make a proposal with regard to Article 2—namely, in place of the phrase "discovery of a new fact" to say:

> " . . . the subsequent discovery of the fact affecting the validity of the award within the meaning of the present protocol."

The Committee of Five had made a fundamental distinction between juridical and non-juridical disputes. M. Cassin had objected to the elimination of that distinction, because the Sub-Committee had provided that each party could, by means of an application, lay the case before the Court if the parties could not arrive at a special agreement. M. Cassin had thought that this would cause great difficulty in the settlement of a political dispute. That was partly true; but he would refer M. Cassin to the Italian-Swiss Treaty of 1924, Article 15 of which provided that "if, in the opinion of the Court, the case is not of a juridical nature, the Parties shall agree to its being settled ex æquo et bono". Such an interpretation of the case was essential, even if it was not expressed in the protocol. This point should be examined later.

It was conceivable that, in a non-legal dispute, failure to arrive at an arbitral agreement would necessarily involve the establishment of a new agreement by some body.

The text of the Sub-Committee's recommendation had been subjected to criticism; it had been said that the last sentence ought to be omitted. M. Huber and M. Rolin had replied to the criticisms, and he agreed with their remarks. It had been objected that the Council could not ask the Court's opinion unless the parties agreed. That might be a valid objection, without invalidating the motives that led to the drafting of the Committee's text, because the recommendation was, after all, only a recommendation, and if it was not capable of execution, so much the worse. But the fact that the Assembly—in other words, the totality of States—had adopted the recommendation would none the less be a point to be considered if the two parties to such a case were not agreed on the point of asking the advisory opinion of the Court.

The jurisdiction of the Council in the case provided for in Article 13, paragraph 4, does not affect the validity of the award except in so far as the question must be settled in order to enable the Council to do its duty under the terms of that paragraph. The Sub-Committee's task was to fix a limit, as clearly as possible, between the executive and the judiciary, by providing the Council with a procedure by which, in case of doubt, it could submit juridical questions to the Court.

M. Politis had referred to cases in which it would not perhaps be advisable for the Council to ask at once for the Court's opinion. There was no implication in the recommendation that the Council could not mediate, but such mediation would not be exercised under Article 13, paragraph 4. It would be a parallel action to that provided for in that paragraph. If such an occasion arose, the best course, both for the Council and for the parties, would be to consult the Court as soon as possible. Perhaps, however, the wording of the recommendation was a little too categorical.

As regards the procedure to be followed, the Sub-Committee itself suggested that the protocol should be sent for consideration to the Governments. If so, the previous suggestions and discussions should also be communicated to Governments, together with the draft recommendation. It would be well to send all these documents at once. M. Cassin had objected that such a course could not be followed in regard to the draft recommendation. The difference was rather a question of form. As regards the draft protocol, the Governments would comment on the various articles, whereas, in regard to the recommendation, they would merely express their general opinions.

Did the Chairman simply propose an adjournment, without asking the Governments' opinion on these points? It would doubtless be preferable to adjourn the decision to the next year, but it would also be advisable to send all the documents to the Governments immediately. If the Committee decided in that sense, he thought the Sub-Committee should be asked to complete and correct its report in the light of the statements made; otherwise, it would be very difficult for the Governments to express an opinion.

M. HOFFINGER (Austria) agreed with the Chairman and proposed the following draft resolution:

"The Assembly:

"Noting the report of the Committee set up by the Council to study the Finnish proposal to confer on the Permanent Court of International Justice jurisdiction as a tribunal of appeal in respect of arbitral tribunals established by States;

"Noting also the report of the Sub-Committee of the First Committee, and

"Thanking both Committees for their valuable work:

"Notes that thorough discussion of the question in the First Committee has shown that it presents many aspects on which sufficient light has not yet been thrown, and

"Decides to adjourn the question for examination at a later session."

The draft resolution was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN having pointed out that, if the documents were sent to the Governments, there would be a financial difficulty involved, M. RAESTAD (Norway) replied that he did not insist.

On the proposal of the CHAIRMAN, M. RAESTAD was appointed Rapporteur.

20. Situation as regards the Entry into Force of the Protocol of September 14th, 1929, concerning the Revision of the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice (continuation).

M. PILOTTI (Italy), Rapporteur, read the following draft resolution:

"The Assembly,

"Notes with satisfaction that the Protocol of September 14th, 1929, concerning the Revision of the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice has now obtained almost all the ratifications necessary to bring it into force;

"Notes, however, that the ratification of Cuba is subject to a reservation which other States that have ratified the Protocol have not felt able to accept;

"Considers that a reservation can only be made at the moment of ratification if all the other signatory States agree or if such a reservation has been provided for in the text of the Convention;

"Takes note that the Cuban Government has, through its first delegate, declared that it contemplates the withdrawal of the said reservation, and expresses its thanks to the Cuban Government for the spirit of conciliation which it has shown in the matter;

"Reaffirms the hope which it expressed at its last session that the States which have not so far ratified the Protocol will proceed to do so as soon as possible; and

"Instructs the Secretary-General to present to the Assembly, for consideration at its next session, a statement showing the ratifications received by the Protocol of September 14th, 1929."

M. GAJARDO (Chile) read the following declaration:

"The Chilean Government decided to await the results of discussions which were to take place at the Twelfth Assembly with regard to the reservations made by the Cuban Government when ratifying the 1929 Protocol, before expressing an opinion regarding its own ratification of that Act.

"The Chilean delegation notes with particular satisfaction the statement made in the First Committee by the chief delegate of Cuba, which justifies a hope that in the near future the Cuban Government will forgo its reservations, a fact which will facilitate the task of the Chilean Government."

M. PILOTTI (Italy), Rapporteur, said that, after mentioning the list of States that were ratifying the new Statute, he would refer to the declaration made by the Chilean delegate.

Agreed.

The draft resolution was adopted.

21. Progressive Codification of International Law (continuation): Draft Resolution proposed by the Sub-Committee. (Annex 16.)

M. GIANNINI (Italy), Rapporteur, pointed out the changes which had been introduced in the resolution. In the middle of No. 1, a provision was made that proposals should be sent to the Secretary-General before March 1st. That was introduced, because the Japanese delegate proposed the fixing of a time-limit of six instead of four months. There was a change in No. 2, where it said the Assembly would decide whether the subjects proposed appeared suitable for codification. In No. 3, it was provided that the Committee of Experts would be asked, "with the assistance of the Secretary-General of the League of Nations", to make the necessary enquiries and prepare a draft convention on the subject. In No. 5, it was provided that the Assembly would then decide whether any action should be taken and whether the draft should be submitted to a codification conference. On the other hand, the Sub-Committee had decided to omit the former paragraph 7.

Would it be desirable to include two recommendations made by the Hague Conference regarding the collaboration of international and national organisations in the work of codification, and regarding co-operation with the Pan-American Codification Conference? The difficulty was that, owing to the need of economy, the first recommendation would have to remain a mere recommendation in the report. The second recommendation was of importance, in view of the fact that the Pan-American Codification Committee would begin work in October.

M. RUNDSTEIN (Poland) suggested an addition to No. 3—namely, that a draft convention should be submitted "with a statement of reasons".

M. BASDEVANT (France) pointed out that it was provided that the draft would form the subject of a report to the Council, which report would fulfil all that was necessary.

M. ROLIN (Belgium) was in favour of inserting the words "with a statement of reasons".

M. GIANNINI (Italy), Rapporteur, said that, generally speaking, the report explained the spirit of the draft, but, if necessary, they could add "a report with a statement of reasons".

M. GAJARDO (Chile) approved the report and particularly the second paragraph of the draft resolution.

M. GIANNINI (Italy), Rapporteur, thanked the Chilean delegate for what he had said, particularly in view of the fact that their reconsideration of the question was due in great measure to a Chilean, M. de Alvarez, who had expressed his anxiety at a certain antagonism between the two codifications.

M. RUNDSTEIN (Poland) agreed with the Rapporteur's amendment.

M. CABALLERO (Paraguay) was glad that there would no longer be a fixed line of distinction between the codification work in America and that in Europe.

M. MATINE-DAFTARY (Persia) said he had hoped that that point and the next on the agenda would have been amalgamated in one resolution. He asked the Rapporteur whether it would not be possible to combine that question and the next one on the agenda—namely, the conclusion of conventions under the auspices of the League.

M. GIANNINI (Italy), Rapporteur, in reply to the Persian delegate, thought they had better defer a vote until the fate of the other question had been decided.

After discussion, the draft resolution was adopted in the following form :

" The Assembly recalls that the resolution of September 22nd, 1924, emphasised the progressive character of the codification of international law which should be undertaken, and, in view of the recommendations of the First Conference for the Codification of International Law held at The Hague in 1930, it decides to continue the work of codification with the object of drawing up conventions which will place the relations of States on a legal and secure basis without jeopardising the customary international law which should result progressively from the practice of States and the development of international jurisprudence. To this end, the Assembly decides to establish the following procedure for the future, except in so far as, in particular cases, special resolutions provide to the contrary.

" 1. Any State or group of States, whether Members of the League or not, may propose to the Assembly a subject or subjects with respect to which codification by international conventions should be undertaken. Such proposals, together with a memorandum containing the necessary explanatory matter, should be sent, before March 1st, to the Secretary-General, in order that he may communicate them to Governments and insert them in the agenda of the Assembly.

" 2. Any such proposals will be considered by the Assembly, which will decide whether the subjects proposed appear prima facie suitable for codification.

" 3. If the investigation of a proposed subject is approved by the Assembly, and if no existing organ of the League is competent to deal with it, the Assembly will request the Council to set up a committee of experts, which will be asked, to make with the assistance of the Secretary-General of the League of Nations, the necessary enquiries and to prepare a draft convention on the subject, to be reported to the Council with an explanatory statement.

" 4. The Council will transmit such report to the Assembly, which will then decide whether the subject is provisionally to be retained as a subject for codification. If this is decided affirmatively, the Assembly will ask the Secretary-General to transmit the said report to the Governments of the Members of the League and non-member States for their comments.

" 5. The committee of experts, if it considers it desirable to do so, will revise the draft in the light of the comments made by the Governments.

" If the committee of experts revises the draft, the revised draft will be submitted to the Governments for their comments and, together with the comments received, will be transmitted to the Assembly, which will then decide finally whether any further action should be taken in the matter and, if so, if the draft should be submitted to a codification conference.

" If the committee does not see any reason to revise the draft, it will be transmitted, together with the comments of the Governments, to the Assembly, which will then decide finally whether any further action should be taken and, if so, if the draft should be submitted to a codification conference.

" The Assembly recommends :

" (1) That, in relation with the further work in connection with the codification of international law, the international and national scientific institute should collaborate in the work undertaken by the League of Nations;

" (2) That the work of codification undertaken by the League of Nations should be carried on in concert with the conferences of the American States."

22. Preparatory Procedure to be followed in the Case of General Conventions to be negotiated under the Auspices of the League (continuation): Draft Resolution submitted by the Sub-Committee. (Annex 17.)

M. GIANNINI (Italy), Rapporteur, said that, with regard to the motion of the Persian delegation, the Sub-Committee had simply examined the questions connected with Article 4, the only questions referred to it by the Assembly.

The Sub-Committee had not been able to agree to the Swedish proposals. Reference was, however, made to these proposals in the report.

The Sub-Committee also considered that codification should proceed more slowly and carefully, and therefore thought that the two procedures outlined should not be entirely fused into one. As regards the Swedish proposal, the Committee thought that in regard to the first stage, the summoning of a Conference, there was no need to make a recommendation to the Assembly; but the opinion of the Assembly would be required when a draft was already prepared (see paragraph 4).

Various changes had been made in the resolution, the reasons for which M. Giannini explained. The changes were shown in the text in order to facilitate comparison.

The question had arisen whether paragraph 4 should be submitted alone, or the full text as it stood last year, but in the report the Sub-Committee decided to express a hope that the whole text of the resolution would be given, either as it stood in 1930 or the text of paragraph 4 as amended by the Sub-Committee.

The Committee adopted the following draft resolution :

" That, in the case of all general conventions to be negotiated under the auspices of the League of Nations, the following preparatory procedure should, in principle, be followed, except in the cases where previous conventions or arrangements have established a special procedure or where, owing to the nature of the questions to be treated or to special circumstances, the Assembly or the Council consider other methods to be more appropriate :

" 1. Where an organ of the League of Nations recommends the conclusion of a general convention on any matter, it shall prepare a memorandum explaining the objects which it is desired to achieve by the conclusion of the convention and the benefits which result therefrom. Such memorandum shall be submitted to the Council of the League of Nations.

" 2. If the Council approves the proposal in principle, a first draft convention shall be prepared and communicated, together with the explanatory memorandum, to Governments, with the request that, if they feel that the draft should be taken into consideration, they shall inform the Secretary-General of their views, both with regard to the main objects or the suggested means of attaining them, and also with regard to the draft convention. In some cases, it may be desirable to annex a specific questionnaire.

" 3. The draft convention and the observations of Governments (together with the answers to the questionnaire, if any) shall be communicated to the Assembly, and the Assembly shall then decide whether the subject appears prima facie suitable for the conclusion of a convention.

" 4. If the Assembly considers the subject prima facie suitable for the conclusion of a convention, the Council shall arrange for the preparation of a draft convention in the light of the replies received from Governments, and the new draft convention (together with the replies of other Governments) shall be transmitted to each Government with a request for their opinion on the provisions of the draft and any observations on the above-mentioned replies of the other Governments.

" 5. In the light of the results of this second consultation of the Governments, the Assembly shall decide whether a convention should be concluded and, if so, whether the draft should be submitted to a conference, the date of which it will request the Council to fix.

" 6. The Council, in fixing the date for the convocation of a conference, shall endeavour, as far as possible, to avoid two League of Nations conferences being held simultaneously, and to ensure the lapse of a reasonable interval between two conferences.

" 7. The procedure set out in the preceding paragraphs will be followed, as far as possible, in the case of draft conventions the desirability of which is recognised by a decision of the Assembly either on its own initiative or as the result of a proposal by a Government. In these cases, the Council will instruct either the Secretariat or some other organ of the League or specially selected experts to prepare the above-mentioned report, which shall subsequently be submitted to the Council."

ELEVENTH MEETING.

Held on Thursday, September 24th, at 3 p.m.

Chairman : M. SCIALOJA (Italy).

23. Amendment of the Covenant of the League of Nations in order to bring it into Harmony with the Pact of Paris (continuation): Examination of the Draft Report of the Committee to the Assembly. (Annex 18.)

M. ROLIN (Belgium), Rapporteur, gave an account of the discussions and decisions of the Sub-Committee appointed to draft the report. It would not be too much to say that the report amounted to a procès-verbal de carence or a mere motion for adjournment. The political divergencies that were apparent in the previous year's report prepared by M. Cassin had been partly overcome. The discussion in the present year, therefore, marked a distinct advance. The report explained the views of the majority and of the minority in order to make the present state of the problem clearer.

M. Rolin then explained various drafting changes made in the text.

M. ITO (Japan) reminded the Committee that he had made reservations concerning Articles 18 and 19, the wording of which did not satisfy the Japanese Government, particularly as regards the interpretation of Articles 15 and 16 of the present Covenant. He also proposed that the Committee should merely note the report of its Sub-Committee instead of approving the report—a solution which would take into account the reservations expressed by several delegations.

M. ROLIN (Belgium), Rapporteur, was prepared to accept any drafting change in the report concerning Article 18. With regard to Article 19, the report mentioned a point on which agreement appeared to have been reached, but he would endeavour to take into account any contrary opinions expressed, if the delegations desired that these should be maintained. He strongly urged the Committee to approve, and not merely note, the Sub-Committee's report. The report would be much more authoritative, and the mysterious difficulties of a political nature which overshadowed the work would disappear, if the Committee expressed its agreement on certain elementary points. One of the Committee's duties was, in a way, to educate public opinion; it would fail in that duty if it showed itself quite unable to agree on certain points which already had been under discussion for several years.

M. HUBER (Switzerland) said that the Swiss Government hesitated to endorse entirely certain parts of the report which might be regarded as a commentary, not only on the future Covenant, but on the existing Covenant. It was afraid that the report might be regarded as an authentic interpretation of the Covenant.

Count APPONYI (Hungary) said that he personally approved the report, but was not yet in possession of his Government's views on the subject. His Government's opinion was therefore reserved.

M. RAESTAD (Norway) explained that the object of the report was to supply Governments with fresh data for consideration. It was accordingly of very little importance whether the Committee approved it or merely noted it.

M. MAJOURANITCH (Yugoslavia) observed that the insertion of a reservation to the protocol, such as that proposed by M. Huber, would place countries which acceded to that act without reservations in a situation of inferiority.

M. CASSIN (France) supported M. Raestad's observation and remarked that, if the Committee took no final decision on the drafting of the texts, its work nevertheless occupied a very definite place in the series of events leading to the amendment of the Covenant. The political difficulties which had been encountered in the previous year, when the Committee came to consider the Report of the Committee of Eleven, had been partly overcome. In the present year, the Committee had made an attempt to eliminate the remaining difficulties. It noted the progress achieved, while indicating the points still open to discussion. Failure to signify clear approval of the Sub-Committee's report would have a disastrous psychological effect on public opinion. The impression would be created that no progress had been made. With regard to sanctions, in particular, the report stated quite fairly the two opposed views. The Committee's approval would, therefore, not connote a preference for one or the other.

Mr. BECKETT (British Empire) thought that all misunderstanding should be dispelled regarding the effect of the opinion expressed by the Committee in its report. Some delegates had stated that, because they could not bind their Governments, they wanted to make reservations. The document before them was not, however, a Convention; it was merely a report prepared by the Committee, setting out the views of its members. The Committee's approval would not bind Governments, otherwise Mr. Beckett would himself, on behalf of his Government, have been obliged to make reservations.

The CHAIRMAN, replying to M. Huber's objection that the part of the report which was in the nature of an interpretation of the present Covenant might have some influence on the application of the Covenant, stated that, in view of the moral authority of the Committee, the expression of its opinion might exercise such an influence. The report, however, merely provided data to enable the various States to reach a decision. That could not be regarded as an authoritative interpretation of the Covenant.

M. ROLIN (Belgium), Rapporteur, shared the Chairman's opinion. The document did not constitute an authoritative interpretation which would bind the Governments. The Committee, however, should give due weight to a report which set out the results of its collective efforts, even if that expression of opinion had no force of law.

He proposed the following draft resolution :

"The Assembly,

"Taking note of the report approved by the First Committee :

"Reaffirms its intention of continuing the task of inserting in the Covenant of the League of Nations a general prohibition of recourse to war and the principle that the settlement of international disputes may only be sought by pacific methods;

"Decides to create a committee consisting of representatives of all the Members of the League of Nations, which may meet during the Conference for the Reduction of Armaments for the purpose of seeking unanimous agreement on the bases indicated in the report and of drawing up a final text which may be voted by the Assembly at its next session;

"Requests the Council to convene the Committee for the date which it considers appropriate;

"Requests the Secretary-General to transmit the present resolution and the report to the Members of the League of Nations, in order that, if they consider it necessary, they may send to the Council their views as to the lines on which they think agreement could be attained."

The draft resolution was adopted, and the report was adopted with various drafting amendments.

ANNEX 1.

AMENDMENT OF THE COVENANT OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS IN ORDER TO BRING IT INTO HARMONY WITH THE PACT OF PARIS.

OBSERVATIONS SUBMITTED BY GOVERNMENTS.

Series No. 1.

Note by the Secretary-General.

In execution of a resolution adopted by the Assembly on October 4th, 1930, relating to the question of the amendment of the Covenant in order to bring it into harmony with the Pact of Paris, the Secretary-General, by a letter dated November 20th, 1930 (C.L.304.1930.V), submitted to the Members of the League the report of the Committee of Eleven and that of the First Committee of the Eleventh Assembly (both of which are reprinted in document C.623.M.245.1930.V), asking them to be so good as to formulate any observations they might desire to make thereon before June 1st, 1931, the date fixed by the Assembly for this purpose.

The present document contains the following replies from Governments which had been received by the above-mentioned date :

Australia.

LETTER OF FEBRUARY 27TH, 1931.

The view of the Commonwealth Government is and always has been that the Covenant of the League should be brought into harmony with the Treaty for the Renunciation of War. Accordingly, after very careful consideration the Commonwealth Government decided, prior to the last Assembly, to accept the amendments proposed by the Committee of Eleven subject to certain minor modifications. They now consider that the texts submitted by the Sub-Committee of the First Committee of the Assembly are an improvement on the texts proposed by the Committee of Eleven, and they therefore propose to support the amendments in this form, and hope they will be adopted by the next Assembly. It must be understood that ratification of the amendments by the Commonwealth of Australia will be dependent upon the entry into force of a general treaty for the reduction and limitation of armaments.

[Translation.]

LETTER OF MAY 30TH, 1931.

In faithful pursuance of its peaceful policy, my Government is ready to accept any amendment of the Covenant which might be necessary in order to incorporate therein the general prohibition of recourse to war and the principle that the settlement of international disputes and conflicts may never be sought except by pacific means.

The idea of bringing the Covenant of the League of Nations into harmony with the Pact of Paris has, therefore, the full approval of the Bulgarian Government.

China.

LETTER OF MAY 14TH, 1931.

I am instructed by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Nanking, to inform you that the Chinese Government is in favour of the amendments proposed by the First Committee of the last Assembly, which, in its opinion, are more clearly worded and are also in their meaning in the text more in accordance with the aim of harmonising than those proposed by the Committee of Eleven, although there is no essential difference between the sense of the texts of the two Committees.

The Chinese Government further considers that in international disputes one nation has sometimes attempted to menace another by taking military action against it, and has thus in fact created a state of war, whilst avoiding any legal recognition of war. Such aggression in the international field is obviously opposed to the aims both of the Covenant of the League of Nations and of the Pact of Paris. The Chinese Government, therefore, thinks it would be advisable if some effective measures could also be provided for in the Covenant to prevent this danger.

Finland.

[Translation.]

LETTER OF MAY 30TH, 1931.

While maintaining in principle the observations which it made in its letter of February 7th, 1930,[1] and in the various Committees of the Eleventh Assembly on the subject of the contemplated amendments, the Finnish Government is anxious to contribute to a solution the provisions of which would really be of a nature to satisfy all the States concerned. Confining itself as far as possible to the texts drawn up respectively by the Committee of Eleven and the Sub-Committee of the First Committee, it ventures to raise for discussion the following points:

Article 12.

The Finnish Government has drawn attention to the risks involved in inserting the fundamental principles of the Pact of Paris in the Covenant of the League of Nations merely in the form of a simple prohibition of resort to war. It is necessary to prevent any interpretation capable of leading to the conclusion that it is only war which is contrary to the pacific methods through which the solution of international disputes ought to be sought. There are forms of recourse to armed force, measures of coercion, which, although not considered as amounting to war, must be regarded as in essence non-pacific methods. By combining in the same sentence the prohibition of recourse to war and the invitation to employ pacific methods, the draft adopted by the Sub-Committee in itself tends to remove the contradiction which in this connection is apparent in the text of the Committee of Eleven. The amendment annexed to the present letter constitutes a further improvement, although it certainly does not entirely satisfy the Finnish point of view. The amendment is also one which strictly follows the present text of the Covenant.

The new texts on which observations are invited are open to the criticism that, if taken literally, they appear to adjourn methods of pacific procedure in the strict sense (arbitration, judicial settlement, examination by the Council) until after other pacific methods have already proved ineffective. This is not the meaning of the Covenant, for by Article 12 of the Covenant the Members of the League agree that they will submit disputes likely to lead to a rupture to one or other of the methods of procedure indicated in the article.

The preceding observation is the more deserving of attention in that it may perhaps be necessary to reckon with views in favour of bringing, at least under certain conditions, coercive measures such as pacific blockade or armed occupation within the category of pacific methods. The principle which at present is dominant in the Covenant—namely, that of the pre-eminence of purely pacific methods—must therefore be maintained.

There is, moreover, a slip in the Sub-Committee's text in the phrase, "Si le différend n'a pu être réglé". Account has not been taken of the fact that the same expression: "Si le différend n'a pu se régler" is used in Article 15, paragraph 4, of the Covenant with reference to a different case.[2]

Article 13, Paragraph 4.

It appears desirable not to abandon the idea at present expressed by the words "will not resort to war against a Member of the League which complies therewith". Combination of this idea as expressed in the amended draft drawn up by the Committee of Eleven with the prohibition proposed by the Sub-Committee (" . . . in no way to support . . . ") would exactly express what the legal position ought to be.

Article 15, Paragraphs 6 and 7.

The Finnish Government urges that the proposals of the Committee of Eleven are to be preferred. It further ventures to draw attention to the alternative draft which it suggested in its letter of February 7th, 1930.[3] Careful examination of the Sub-Committee's text reveals

[1] See document A.8.1930.V (Legal, 1930.V.2), page 18.

[2] The words used in the English text of the Sub-Committee's proposal for Article 12 are: "If the dispute cannot be otherwise settled", and those employed in the English text of Article 15, paragraph 4, of the Covenant are: "If the dispute is not thus settled".

[3] "If a report by the Council is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, and if the parties declare themselves ready to accept the report, the recommendations of the report shall have the same force and effect as an arbitral award. Should a tautology the object of which is to conceal the absence of any real substance. Article 15, paragraph 4, already implies that a report adopted by the Council either unanimously or by a majority must recommend a solution appropriate to the circumstances. Why, then, proceed to a recommendation which is inherent in the recommendation already made?

Paragraphs 6 and 7 as they appear in the Sub-Committee's draft merely repeat in somewhat different language (paragraph 6: "the Council shall invite the parties to comply with the recommendations of the report"; paragraph 7: "it shall examine the procedure . . . and recommend it to the parties") the proposition that only a recommendation is in question. It all comes to the same thing and proves to be no more than a formula which evades the problem to be solved.

If one is determined neither to recognise the recommendations of the report as binding nor to compel the dissatisfied party to submit the dispute to some other procedure, one might nevertheless insist that the party which complies with the recommendations of the report may make this a ground for claiming a settlement of the dispute in accordance with the Council's recommendations. It is to be anticipated that a recommendation not unanimously adopted by the Council will not be accepted by the parties themselves. It is therefore desirable that the Council should in such case recommend to them some further procedure for reaching a solution of their dispute. The text could thus be drawn up in such a way as to bring out the different cases which may arise.

A draft which takes account of the above observations is annexed.

Annex.

TEXT PROPOSED BY THE GOVERNMENT OF FINLAND.

Preamble.

(Follows the amendment proposed by the Committee of Eleven.)

Article 12.

1. The Members of the League agree that, if there should arise between them any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, they will submit the matter either to arbitration or judicial settlement or to enquiry by the Council. They agree in no case to resort to war for the settlement of their disputes and to employ only pacific means to attain such settlement.

2. (Follows the proposal of the Sub-Committee.)

Article 13, Paragraph 4.

The Members of the League agree that they will carry out in full good faith any award or decision that may be rendered and will in no way support a State in refusal to carry out such award or decision. It is understood that a Member of the League will not take any action against any Member which complies with such award or decision.

(The last paragraph is to follow the text of the Sub-Committee.)

Article 15, Paragraphs 6 and 7.

(If the guiding idea of the Sub-Committee is adopted, and accordingly the recommendations of the report are not recognised to have any obligatory force, the following text is proposed:)

6. If the report of the Council is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the party which complies with the recommendations of the report may make this a ground for claiming a settlement of the dispute in accordance with the Council's recommendations. The Members of the League undertake in no way to support any party in a refusal to comply with such recommendations.

7. If the Council fails to reach unanimity as defined in the previous paragraph and the parties do not accept the recommendations made by the majority, the Council shall make recommendations as to the best procedure to be followed subsequently by the parties for the settlement of their dispute.

Article 16, Paragraph 1.

---

the report not be accepted by all the parties, any party shall, at the request of any other party, be bound to submit the dispute either to proceedings for judicial or arbitral settlement or to a conciliation commission, of which the composition shall be determined by the Council acting by a majority vote of its members other than the parties to the dispute. In case the dispute should fail to be settled within a reasonable period after the Council has made its report, the Council shall resume examination of the case, on the understanding that any party which refuses to comply with a unanimous decision of the Council shall be regarded as menacing by its attitude the maintenance of peace and good understanding between nations.

"If the Council fails to reach a report which is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof, other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the recommendations of the report shall have the force of a recommendation capable of being taken into consideration by all the Members of the League and by any tribunal before which the dispute may be brought."

LETTER OF MAY 2ND, 1931.

In a letter of November 20th last you were good enough to draw my special attention to the proposed amendments to the Covenant of the League of Nations prepared by the Committee of Jurists in March 1930, and by the First Committee of the Assembly, with a view to bringing the Covenant into harmony with the Pact of Paris. You reminded me on that occasion of the desire expressed by the Assembly to receive by its next session the views of the Members of the League of Nations on these two documents.

At the outset of the work, the results of which are contained in the reports in question, I took the opportunity of explaining to the Council of the League of Nations my views as to the bringing into harmony of the two instruments. Expressing my agreement with the words just spoken by Mr. Henderson as to the necessity of this task, I indicated the spirit in which I considered it should be undertaken. I emphasised that it was not a question of transferring from one instrument to the other the principle of prohibiting recourse to war, a principle henceforth universally accepted, but of adapting this general principle to the positive, concrete and legal provisions of the organic regulations constituted by the Covenant, which binds together the Members of the League. "The members of the Committee", I said in this connection, "will again have not only to study methods by which war can be condemned in future, but also to consider means, other than words, for dealing with this terrible scourge".

I will not examine in detail to what extent the work of the Committee of Jurists and of the First Committee of the Assembly has fulfilled this promise, and to what extent the Covenant of the League of Nations, amended according to their proposals, would retain "that organic structure" which, as the German Government rightly pointed out, must, throughout its development, be safeguarded. Such as these amendments are, they were accepted by the French Government through their representative on the First Committee, on the ground that that Government should not prevent the attainment of unanimity in favour of the introduction into the Covenant of the League of Nations of the principle of prohibition of war, even if this principle were not for the moment to lead to such consequences as in the French Government's view logically follow from it.

My Government can therefore only note with regret that the unanimity in favour of which they had provisionally sacrificed certain of their views has not been obtained; but they have not been unduly surprised to observe a certain hesitation which, in their opinion, has its origin in the omissions in the system proposed.

The French representatives have often pointed out to the League of Nations that it would be very difficult to reach a final settlement of the question of sanctions, which is to some extent the frame of the edifice of security, if that edifice was not built upon solid foundations. If all disputes brought before the Council of the League of Nations were not assured of a final settlement, a way would be left open to wars which would break out without there being any objective evidence for determining the aggressor and would impose on each State the responsibility of deciding, on incomplete and in any case subjective evidence, the manner in which it should fulfil the imperative duty laid on it by Article 16 of the Covenant. I do not think I am misinterpreting the facts when I state that the fear that, owing to this uncertainty, there may be a renewal of wars similar in their character to the "private wars" known to history, was the chief cause of the difficulties which the Committee of Jurists encountered in attaining unanimity without reservations, and by which in its turn the First Committee was constantly impeded.

The French Government have no desire to disregard the risk involved by the insertion in the Covenant of a principle such as that of compulsory arbitration, if such principle were to be considered too far in advance of public opinion and if, after its adoption by the Assembly, it were not to receive the ratifications required by the Covenant for the coming into force of the amendments. It is in reality the opinions of Governments and public opinion in general that must be prepared for the idea of compulsory arbitration; for this purpose the League of Nations has created an instrument open to the free accession of Governments: the General Act of Arbitration. And since the situation of the problem before us in regard to the amendments to the Covenant is such at the present time that in no case could these amendments come into force before the completion of the work of the Disarmament Conference, the French Government wonder whether the delay imposed by circumstances on the League of Nations could not be profitably used by the League and by its Members in making a genuine effort for speeding up accessions to the General Act. The extension of the General Act of Arbitration would in itself involve the disappearance of the main difficulty encountered by the Committee of Jurists and the First Committee of the Assembly, a difficulty whose persistence prevents their work from being harmonious. It is quite clear that, if compulsory arbitration as a final means of the settlement of international disputes were accepted by a large number of States, the incorporation of such an obligation in Article 15 of the Covenant would then become merely a formal question.

On this subject the French Government desire to make a practical suggestion which in their opinion will help to co-ordinate the efforts now being pursued concurrently by the League of Nations. They do not intend to return to the arguments which led the Assembly, in drawing up the Act of Arbitration in 1928, to set aside deliberately any reference to proceedings under the Covenant in order to make this Act equally accessible to States non-members and to States Members of the League. But as regards the Members of the League of Nations whose ordinary organ for political disputes is the Council, a question of jurisdiction arises. Several Governments, and in particular the French Government, in acceding to the General Act, have emphasised by a reservation that, in the case of political disputes, arbitration as provided for under that Act did not form a jurisdiction concurrent with that of the Council, but a subsidiary one, a tribunal so to speak of second degree, intended to fill up the gap in Article 15 (paragraph 7). It would seem that some formula reconciling the two procedures and based on the regulations outlined in the accessions of certain States might well be considered by the League of Nations and proposed to Member Governments. The French Government would see several advantages in this : accessions to the General Act would be made easier for States desirous that procedure before the Council should not be eliminated; the obligations of Members of the League of Nations under the General Act would be made clearer; and a solution would be given to a problem which, in its other aspect, the League of Nations will have to face when it has to take the Covenant as a point of departure and consider the methods of completing the procedures laid down in Article 15.

The above suggestions are not extensive; they do not form an outline for a perfect and final work, but a programme for gradual development, based on the lessons of experience and on respect for national opinion whose support is indispensable for the drafting of an organic charter of peace. The progress of the idea of compulsory arbitration, especially since last Assembly, gives grounds for hope that before the expiration of the period fixed for the coming into force of the amendments, the League of Nations may be in a position finally to adapt the Covenant to the legal situation created by the Pact of Paris.

United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

Letter of February 17th, 1931.

1. His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom continue to support wholeheartedly the principle involved in the proposal to bring the Covenant of the League into harmony with the Pact of Paris.

2. As the Members of the League are already aware, His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom were in favour of the proposals made by the Committee of Eleven and were ready to accept them, subject to certain minor modifications, at the recent Assembly. They fully recognise, however, the value of the work done during the Assembly by the First Committee, and they are of opinion that the texts contained in the Report of the First Committee are an improvement on the original proposals of the Committee of Eleven. In particular, they are of opinion that the text proposed by the First Committee for Article 13, paragraph 4, while carrying out the intention of the Committee of Eleven; is free from certain ambiguities which existed in the text proposed by the latter and which might have rendered its acceptance difficult for certain Members of the League. Again, while they were themselves prepared to accept the text proposed by the Committee of Eleven for Article 15, paragraph 6, they consider that, in view of the discussions in the First Committee and of the provisions of other articles of the Covenant, the text proposed by the First Committee is preferable; and they are therefore ready to join with the other Members of the League in accepting it. His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom are accordingly of opinion that the amendments proposed by the First Committee are best fitted to attain the object of incorporating in the Covenant the general prohibition of resort to war and the principle that the settlement of international disputes should never be sought except by pacific means, and they hope that the amendments in question will be adopted by the Assembly of 1931. They wish, however, to repeat that ratification of these amendments on behalf of the United Kingdom will be made dependent upon the entry into force of a general treaty for the reduction and limitation of armaments.

3. The attention of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom has been called to two minor points of form in the texts proposed by the First Committee, which might be considered when the amendments again come before the Assembly. In the first place it has been suggested that in Article 12, paragraph 2, the word "or" should be substituted for the word "and". Secondly, His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom consider that in Article 13, paragraph 4, the word "judicial" should be inserted before the word "decision" wherever the latter word occurs.

India.

Letter of February 13th, 1931.

The Government of India state that they have no observations to offer.

Italy.

[Translation.]

Letter of April 16th, 1931.

Since the majority of the Members of the League of Nations have acceded to the Pact of Paris, the Italian Government considers, as a matter of principle, that it is desirable to embody in the Covenant of the League of Nations a clause forbidding resort to war. For this reason the Italian Government endorsed the proposal made by the British delegation to the 1929 Assembly with a view to bringing the Covenant and Pact into harmony.

The Italian Government considers, however, that the pursuit of this object should be abandoned unless it were likely to result in a real improvement in the working of the system established by the Covenant of the League of Nations for the pacific settlement of disputes. There is no objection to the application of both Covenant and Pact between the States which are bound by both of them; the mere fact that one of these agreements still admits the possibility of war in certain cases, while the other has eliminated this possibility, does not appear to create practical drawbacks sufficiently serious to call for the amendment of the Covenant, especially as there is no hope of really perfecting it.

The Italian Government considers that, as a whole, the proposals of the eleven jurists represented not only an adaptation of the Covenant of the League to the new principle introduced into international law by the Pact of Paris, but an effective improvement in the Covenant in that the Eleven were endeavouring to find more efficacious methods for the pacific settlement of disputes as a counterpart to the diminution of all possibility of resort to war.

For this reason the Italian Government is of opinion that the amendments proposed by the Eleven to Article 15 of the Covenant should be adopted in preference to those proposed by the Sub-Committee, which have a much more limited scope.

After this statement of principle, the Italian Government is prepared to admit that the texts proposed by the Sub-Committee for Articles 12 and 13 (the preamble proposed by the Eleven has been retained by the Sub-Committee) seem from the technical point of view to be drafted with more precision than the corresponding texts drawn up by the Eleven.

The negative undertaking in Article 13 of the Covenant, not to resort to war against any Member of the League which complies with an award or decision rendered, becomes in the text submitted by the Eleven a rather vague undertaking not to " take any action against any Member of the League which complies therewith ". On the other hand, the wording proposed by the Sub-Committee, by which the undertaking is in no way to support a State in refusal to carry out an award or decision, seems sufficiently clear to avoid ambiguity as to the acts prohibited.

As regards Article 15, the Italian Government has already stated that for general reasons it prefers the wording proposed by the Eleven. It wishes to add, however, that it is deeply appreciative of the effort made by the Eleven to lighten the Council's task of reaching a solution in any dispute by making compulsory all its recommendations if adopted unanimously, and by allowing it the right always to ask the Permanent Court of International Justice for an opinion, a unanimous vote to this effect not being necessary.

The objections which have been raised to these proposals do not seem sufficiently serious to justify their abandonment.

If all possibility of resort to arms is eliminated, it becomes increasingly necessary that disputes arising between States should not be allowed to continue unsettled. The Italian Government agrees with the Committee of Eleven that the accession of all the Members of the League to the General Act of Conciliation and Arbitration of 1928 is a logical corollary of the prohibition of war; Italy has decided to accede to the Act.

Meanwhile, all States should agree to the proposals drawn up by the Eleven with a view to strengthening the means for the pacific settlement of disputes.

It is worth while to add that the power, given to the Council to consult the Permanent Court by a majority decision only, in no way prejudices the working of the Covenant. However the general rule in Article 15, paragraph 1, of the Covenant may be applied in the different cases in which the last sentence of Article 14 may be operative, it is certain that the special scope of Article 15 is based on the urgent need to eliminate any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, if the parties concerned do not seek settlement of their difference by arbitration or legal means. The case is therefore sufficiently serious to authorise, on a majority vote only, the taking of steps, not to settle the question entirely, but merely to consult a non-political institution of the highest authority.

Lastly, as regards Article 16, the Italian Government accepts the amendment proposed by the Sub-Committee, which is purely consequential upon the amendments proposed to Articles 12, 13 and 15.

The Italian Government realises the difficulties with which the Committee of Eleven, and later the Sub-Committee, were faced in reconciling the need for amendment of the Covenant with the point of view of some States which were anxious not to find themselves in a situation more difficult than before if other States failed to discharge their obligations.

It recognises the force of the argument that the sanctions under Article 16 will be applied, as soon as resort to war is completely forbidden, in cases not formerly covered. The Italian Government considers that, if the Governments which have stated that they are unwilling to undertake wider obligations continue to maintain their attitude, this might be met by adopting the proposal submitted to the Sub-Committee, to insert after the first paragraph of Article 16 the following clause :

> " . . . Provided always that in the case dealt with in Article 16, paragraph 7, the Members of the League may make their action subject to the condition that the Council is unanimous either in proposing provisional measures intended to re-establish peace or in declaring which is the Covenant-breaking State."

Actually, any extension of the application of sanctions is only conceivable where the Council's decision on the crux of the question is not arrived at unanimously; in such a case, under the present terms of the Covenant, the Members of the League have the right to take such action as they shall consider necessary for the maintenance of right and justice. It is obvious, therefore, that in this case, unless the Council unanimously informs it which is the Covenant-breaking State and if the question has not been settled otherwise, a Member of the League can at least ask not to be forced to apply sanctions.

Another apprehension was expressed in the Sub-Committee which the Italian Government considers legitimate but easy to dispel.

Some Members of the League of Nations are not signatories of the Pact of Paris. It would not be in accordance with the mutual understanding which should exist between associated countries if such Members were indirectly forced to accept the said Pact in the form of an amendment to the Covenant of the League.

The Italian Government therefore endorses the proposal that the Pact of Paris should not be mentioned even in the title given to the amendments to the Covenant, in order that it may be perfectly clear that there is no legal connection between the two instruments, and that the object of the amendments is to voice in the Covenant the idea of forbidding resort to war, as a purely objective idea and without reference to any other text.

It has been pointed out that some States, when signing or acceding to the Pact of Paris, did so subject to special interpretations of its terms.

The Italian Government does not think it possible to take these declarations into consideration in an instrument such as the Covenant of the League of Nations, which could obviously not admit of reservations or limited accessions.

One of these interpretations, however—that which excepts from the prohibition a resort to war in self-defence—has been regarded as being based on a general legal principle.

In the opinion of the Italian Government it is not in the least necessary to include in the amendments a clause relating to self-defence, since it is obvious that a State which had disregarded the clause forbidding war could not demand that the State attacked by it should observe that clause.

If, in spite of the self-evidence of this principle, other Governments think it better to refer to the case in question, the Italian Government offers no objection. A sentence to that effect might be included in the Assembly resolution approving the amendments.

In conclusion, the Italian Government has the honour to submit the following proposals:

A. To adopt the text of the preamble drawn up by the Committee of Eleven Jurists and accepted by the Sub-Committee of the First Committee of the Assembly;

B. Article 12, paragraph 1: to adopt the text drafted by the Sub-Committee;

C. Article 13, paragraph 4: to adopt the text drafted by the Sub-Committee;

D. Article 15, paragraphs 6, 7 and 7*bis:* to adopt the texts drafted by the Committee of Eleven;

E. Article 16, paragraph 1: to adopt the text drafted by the Sub-Committee;

F. Article 16, to insert immediately after paragraph 1 the following paragraph:

> "Provided always that in the case dealt with in Article 16, paragraph 7, the Members of the League may make their action subject to the condition that the Council is unanimous either in proposing provisional measures intended to re-establish peace or in declaring which is the Covenant-breaking State."

New Zealand.

Letter of February 12th, 1931.

His Majesty's Government in New Zealand are prepared to accept the text of the proposed amendments to the Covenant suggested by the First Committee of the Assembly, subject to two minor amendments as follows:

(1) That in Article 12, paragraph 2, the word "or" should be substituted for the word "and", and

(2) That in Article 13, paragraph 4, the word "judicial" should be inserted before the word "decision" wherever the latter word occurs.

His Majesty's Government in New Zealand wish, however, to make it plain that their ratification of these amendments will be made dependent upon entry into force of a general treaty for the reduction and limitation of armaments.

Panama.

[Translation.]

LETTER OF JANUARY 7TH, 1931.

The Government of Panama has no observations or proposals to make in regard to the two reports in question; it considers that the report of the Committee of Eleven is better suited to attain the end in view.

Netherlands.

[Translation.]

LETTER OF MAY 15TH, 1931.

In its note dated February 14th, 1930, the Government of the Netherlands has already expressed its sympathy with the idea on which the amendments proposed by the British Delegation at the Tenth Assembly was based—that is to say, the bringing of the Covenant of the League of Nations into harmony with the Pact of Paris. The Government of the Netherlands is fully prepared to assist in devising amendments for the purpose of incorporating in the Covenant the general prohibition of resort to war and the principle that the settlement of international disputes should never be sought except by pacific means.

Although on certain points it would have preferred the wording which was proposed at a previous stage, Her Majesty's Government could accept the texts prepared by the First Committee of the Eleventh Assembly. The delegation of the Netherlands was not among those which drew the attention of that Committee to certain new political aspects of the question which would make further consideration desirable; the Government of the Netherlands therefore does not feel called upon to express any opinion on this matter. The Government takes the liberty of expressing its hope that those Members who find difficulty in accepting the amendments by reason of these new political considerations will be prepared to indicate more clearly the nature of the said difficulties.

In these circumstances, and pending further explanations that the Governments in question will, we trust, submit, the Government of the Netherlands will confine itself to these brief remarks.

Poland.

[Translation.]

LETTER OF MARCH 28TH, 1931.

The Polish Government have examined with the greatest care document C.623.M.245.1930.X, communicated to them by the Secretary-General of the League, and have reached the following conclusions:

1. The Polish Government maintain their favourable opinion of the whole of the proposals made by the Committee of Eleven, in accordance with their views which were explained at the last League Assembly by the Minister for Foreign Affairs. The Polish Government consider, however, that the discussions which took place at that Assembly preclude any hope that those proposals will prove acceptable to all the Members of the League. Therefore, they no longer consider it practicable to retain the texts submitted by the Committee of Eleven, although they regard those texts very favourably.

2. The Polish Government consider that it would be easier to obtain the accession of the Twelfth Assembly to the texts drawn up by the Sub-Committee of the First Committee of the Eleventh Assembly. The proposals of that Sub-Committee involve less radical changes in the League Covenant and will doubtless give rise to fewer objections than the proposals of the Committee of Eleven. Moreover, in the Polish Government's opinion, the amendments introduced by the Sub-Committee's text are sufficiently far-reaching to be regarded as meeting the wishes of the Tenth Assembly, which desired to eliminate from the League Covenant any provisions contrary to the letter of the Paris Pact.

3. It might therefore be advisable to take the proposals of the above-mentioned Sub-Committee as a basis for the discussion which will take place at the next Assembly. The Polish Government would be prepared, for their part, to accede in principle to the Sub-Committee's proposals, reserving, however, the right to propose to the Assembly any changes which they might consider expedient after the exchange of views in the First Committee. The Polish Government desire to point out here and now that they consider that it would be more in accordance with the spirit of the Paris Pact to define in the actual text of Articles 13, paragraph 4, and 15, paragraph 6 (Sub-Committee's text), that the obligation not to support in any way the resistance of a recalcitrant State would not apply in cases where such resistance was due to aggression on the part of the other State concerned.

4. Lastly, the Polish Government wish to emphasise that they still consider it necessary to bring the League Covenant into harmony with the Briand-Kellogg Pact, since the constitutional charter of the League should not contain provisions which lag behind the stipulations of another international instrument, likewise of universal scope. However, the Polish Government consider that, apart from the result of the work undertaken with a view to bringing the Covenant and the Pact into harmony, the provisions of the League Covenant which sanction so-called "legitimate" warfare should be regarded by all Members of the League as inoperative, in view of the general prohibition of war laid down in the Paris Pact. If, contrary to all expectations, the League's work with a view to the bringing into harmony of the Covenant and the Pact should be unsuccessful, this would not, in the Polish Government's opinion, in any way weaken the Paris Pact, which would still constitute the fundamental basis of world peace.

Portugal.

LETTER OF MAY 1ST, 1931.

The Government of the Republic are fully conscious of the merits of the work of the Committee of Jurists and of the First Committee, which have endeavoured so successfully to improve and supplement the methods of safeguarding peace. The Portuguese Government, while fully appreciating the report of the "Committee of Eleven", consider in any case that, generally speaking, the amendments of the First Committee are preferable, for they are more in accordance with the equilibrium to be maintained between legal and political considerations, in order that the Covenant may fulfil its purpose.

My Government hope that the decision of the next Assembly will be given on those lines, save for a few details. Amongst these is the expression "reasonable time" in paragraph 2 of Article 12, which might perhaps be replaced by another which would state the time, fixing a limit considered to be sufficient; for it does not seem correct to ask the Permanent Court of International Justice to give an opinion or an award "within a reasonable time".

The Portuguese Government see no advantage in the omission of paragraph 7*bis* of Article 15; for it may be desirable that, with a view to facilitating the settlement of a dispute, the Council should have the opinion of the Permanent Court of International Justice on points of law; moreover, the obtaining of the Court's opinion is provided for in several articles of the Covenant.

This answer will be further developed during the discussion at the next Assembly.

Union of South Africa.

LETTER OF APRIL 13TH, 1931.

The Union Government are of the opinion that the text contained in the Report of the First Committee is preferable to that contained in the Report of the Committee of Eleven and they are prepared to join with other Members of the League in accepting it. While expressing the hope that the proposed amendments will be adopted at the Assembly meeting of 1931, the Union Government desire to state that ratification of these amendments on behalf of the Union Government will be subject to the coming into force of a general treaty for the reduction and limitation of armaments.

Estonia.

LETTER OF JUNE 29TH, 1931.

The Estonian Government has carefully considered the proposals made by the Committee of Eleven and the Sub-Committee set up by the First Committee of the Eleventh Assembly, and has reached the conclusion that in certain respects the Sub-Committee's proposals are more satisfactory than those made by the Committee of Eleven. This applies particularly to Article 12, paragraphs 1 and 2; Article 13, paragraph 4; Article 15, paragraph 7, and Article 16, paragraph 1, first sentence. As regards these articles the Estonian Government is inclined to prefer the wording adopted by the Sub-Committee, on the understanding that Article 16 as amended includes all the cases provided for in Articles 13 and 15 and does not in any way lessen the effect of the sanctions.

While, as stated above, it is in favour of the amendment of Article 12 in the form proposed by the Sub-Committee, the Estonian Government nevertheless considers it desirable that attention should be given to the question whether the term "any dispute likely to lead to a rupture" is not more restricted in scope than Article 2 of the Pact of Paris. In the Estonian Government's opinion, it should be stated that the disputes in question are those which it has not been possible to settle through the ordinary diplomatic channel. Such an interpretation would be in accordance both with the resolution adopted by the Eleventh Assembly and with the antecedents of Article 12, since in the preliminary draft (of February 14th, 1919) the phrase, "disputes which cannot be adjusted by the ordinary process of diplomacy", was used instead of the present text. The Estonian Government accordingly considers that, with a view to bringing the League Covenant into harmony with the Pact of Paris, the possibility of embodying in Article 12 the text of Article 2 of the Pact of Paris should be considered. The following text (which does not claim to be complete) is therefore suggested for Article 12:

> "All the Members of the League agree that they will in no case have recourse to war for the settlement of disputes or conflicts of whatever nature or of whatever origin which may arise among them, and will only employ peaceful means for this purpose."

As regards Article 15, paragraph 6, the Estonian Government prefers the wording adopted by the Committee of Eleven, which gives an obligatory character to the Council's unanimous report. According to the Covenant, the Council will only draw up the report if the dispute is not settled despite its preliminary intervention. In these circumstances, would not the fact that the Council's report has an obligatory character induce the parties to accept its proposals? Certain members were even in favour of the recognition of the obligatory character of the Council's unanimous report when the League Covenant was first drafted (proposal by M. Hymans), and the matter was discussed by the Committee of Eleven, and in particular by the First Committee of the Eleventh Assembly, no objection being raised to the principle of the obligatory character of the report, which shows that the supporters of this principle are becoming more and more numerous. The Estonian Government is in favour of the amendment of Article 15, paragraph 6, in the manner proposed by the Committee of Eleven and of the addition to this article of paragraph 7bis, as proposed by the Sub-Committee.

LETTER OF JUNE 30TH, 1931.

The proposal to bring the Covenant into harmony with the Pact of Paris has the full approval of the Latvian Government, which is prepared to do its utmost to bring about the adoption of the amendments for the purpose of embodying in the League Covenant the prohibition to resort to war and the principle that the settlement of international disputes should be sought only by peaceful means.

It is understood, however, that the Latvian Government reserves the right to explain its views in regard to the details of either question when they are discussed at the next Assembly.

Norway.

[Translation.]

LETTER OF JUNE 18TH, 1931.

As is clear, both from the declaration of the Norwegian Government in the letter which it had the honour to send you on February 22nd, 1930 [1], and from the declaration of the Norwegian delegate in the course of the discussion of this question at the First Commission of the Eleventh Assembly of the League of Nations, the Norwegian Government considered that it could accept in principle the idea of bringing the Covenant of the League of Nations into harmony with the Pact of Paris. Nevertheless, the Norwegian Government has always been of opinion that the happiest solution, and the one most in harmony with the end in view, would be to incorporate the provisions of the Pact of Paris in the Covenant of the League of Nations without increasing the number of cases in which sanctions are applicable.

Since, however, various practical difficulties have been encountered in the efforts to achieve this result, and since certain countries attach particular importance to the incorporation, once begun, being terminated as soon as possible, the Norwegian Government felt obliged to waive its request to leave the present provisions relating to sanctions as they stand.

Furthermore, as regards the most difficult eventuality—namely, the application of the sanctions if the Council fails to reach a report which is unanimously agreed to by all the members thereof, other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, it will be necessary to find a formula making the application of the sanctions contingent on the unanimous decision of the Council—apart from the votes of the parties concerned—as to who is the aggressor.

The Norwegian Government is prepared to accept the new provisions relating to the authority of the Council which the Committee of Eleven has formulated in the new paragraphs 6 and 7*bis* of Article 15, although it does not see that these new provisions are an indispensable consequence of bringing the two instruments into harmony. It is also prepared to accept the proposals made on this subject by the Sub-Committee to the First Commission of the 1930 Assembly.

Hungary.

LETTER OF AUGUST 4TH, 1931.

Having acceded to the Pact of Paris, Hungary considers that it is desirable that the Covenant of the League of Nations should be amended so as to establish complete harmony between its provisions and those of the Pact of Paris.

The Royal Hungarian Government greatly regrets to find that the texts contained in the report of the Assembly's First Committee restrict the revision of the Covenant to changes which appear to have a more restricted scope than the original proposal of the Committee of Eleven which the Council appointed under the Assembly's resolution of September 24th, 1929.

The Hungarian Government considers that, to secure complete elimination of war as an instrument of national policy, it is not sufficient to confine oneself entirely to amending those provisions of the Covenant which deal with the employment of international measures of a repressive nature; it would be necessary at the same time to extend, and define more clearly, the field of application of measures having rather a preventive character, which by their very nature may be considered as more effective for the maintenance of international peace than the first-mentioned measures. On this view, the adaptation of the clauses of the Covenant of the League of Nations to those of the Pact of Paris ought to deal with all those provisions of the first of these instruments which, as at present drafted, do not appear fully to favour political initiatives for the maintenance of international peace.

In this class falls the institution, in connection with paragraph 4 of Article 13 of the Covenant, of absolute guarantees to ensure the execution of the decisions given in arbitral or judicial proceedings. Such a guarantee does not seem to be achieved either by the proposals of the Committee of Eleven or by those contained in the report of the Assembly's First Committee. In the opinion of the Hungarian Government, it would be necessary with this object to carry further the amendments to be made in the Covenant in the sense that, in the cases envisaged, the Council should be capable of taking decisions by a simple majority and be thus able to fulfil its task, which is that of giving effect, absolutely and without any revision, to all the provisions of a decision given by an international judicial or arbitral authority.

The Royal Hungarian Government also feels that the conception of preventing conflicts absolutely demands for its realisation that the possibility contained in Article 19 of the Covenant of the League of Nations should not continue to be purely theoretical under the existing text.

Finally, the Hungarian Government cannot omit to emphasise the necessity for amending the articles of the Covenant of the League of Nations in such a way as to secure the maximum participation, in the solution of questions of a legal character, of the international judicial authorities which are called upon to collaborate with the League of Nations.

Irish Free State.

LETTER OF JULY 30TH, 1931.

With reference to the Acting Secretary-General's letter (Circular Letter 304.1930.V) of November 20th, 1930, the Irish Government have the honour to state that they have no objection in principle to the amendments of the Covenant proposed by the Sub-Committee of the First Committee of the Eleventh Assembly, and they consider that, in all the circumstances, those amendments provide the most suitable means of incorporating in the Covenant the general prohibition of resort to war and the principle that the settlement of international disputes should never be sought except by pacific means.

While they are thus prepared to accept the amendments referred to in their present form, the Irish Government feel that there are certain respects in which the proposed texts might be improved from a drafting point of view. Thus, the formula in Article 12 (1), "likely to lead to a rupture", implying as it does a restriction of the general principle of pacific settlement to which it is sought to give effect in the proposed amendments, should, in the opinion of the Irish Government, be eliminated from the text of that article and, consequentially, from the text of Article 15 (1). The Irish Government also feel that some additional words are required in order to make clear the scope of this latter article, and for this reason they propose that Article 15 should open as follows: "If there should arise between Members of the League any dispute which cannot be otherwise settled and which is not submitted to arbitration or judicial settlement in accordance with Article 13, the Members . . ."

The Irish Government assume that an opportunity of discussing this, and such other changes in the proposed texts as may be suggested, will occur during the forthcoming Assembly.

ANNEX 2.

PROPOSAL OF THE GOVERNMENT OF FINLAND TO CONFER ON THE PERMANENT COURT OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE JURISDICTION AS A TRIBUNAL OF APPEAL IN RESPECT OF ARBITRAL TRIBUNALS ESTABLISHED BY STATES.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE APPOINTED BY THE COUNCIL.

NOTE BY THE SECRETARY-GENERAL.

At its session of January 1930, the Council considered the Assembly's resolution of September 25th, 1929, by which the Assembly requested the Council "to submit to examination the question: What should be the most appropriate procedure to be followed by States to enable the Permanent Court of International Justice to assume in a general manner, as between them, the functions of a tribunal of appeal from international tribunals in all cases where it is contended that the arbitral tribunal was without jurisdiction or exceeded its jurisdiction?"

The Council invited the representatives of Germany, Finland, France, Italy and Poland to ask their legal advisers to form a very small committee to make a preliminary study of the question as formulated in the Assembly's resolution. The Committee was to report to the Council at one of its subsequent sessions.

In execution of the Council's decision, a Committee composed of M. GAUS (Germany), M. ERICH (Finland), M. BASDEVANT (France), M. PILOTTI (Italy) and M. RUNDSTEIN (Poland) met at Geneva under the presidency of M. Basdevant from May 19th to 22nd, 1930. It drew up the report reproduced below, which the Secretary-General has the honour to submit to the Council for consideration. The present document is communicated also to all the Members of the League of Nations and the non-member States signatories of the Protocol of Signature of the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE.

The Committee's task was laid down in the resolution voted by the Assembly of the League of Nations on September 25th, 1929, in the following terms:

> "The Assembly invites the Council to submit to examination the question: What would be the most appropriate procedure to be followed by States desiring to enable the Permanent Court of International Justice to assume in a general manner, as between them, the functions of a tribunal of appeal from international arbitral tribunals in all cases where it is contended that the arbitral tribunal was without jurisdiction or exceeded its jurisdiction?"

The Committee has taken into consideration Article 81 of the Convention for the Pacific Settlement of International Conflicts signed at The Hague on October 18th, 1907, the terms of which are as follows:

> "The award, duly pronounced and notified to the agents of the parties, settles the dispute definitively and without appeal."

On the other hand, it has considered the difficulties and controversies which may arise on the subject of the nullity of an arbitral award.

Finally, it has examined the possibilities of judicial settlement of those difficulties which may be furnished by Article 36, paragraph 2, of the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice and by Article 41 of the General Act of Arbitration.

It was not the function of the Committee to determine to what extent those two articles do or do not permit the difficulties in question to be brought before the Permanent Court of International Justice after the award has been given. Its task was to investigate what procedure, apart from those two articles, would be most suitable for bringing disputes of the kind in question within the framework of the obligatory jurisdiction of the Court.

For the purpose of determining what this procedure should be, and of settling its details, the Committee was led to examine two kinds of question. It is necessary both to decide what procedure the Assembly might adopt for the introduction of the new system and to set out in what the system is to consist.

The first question involves considering whether the Assembly will recommend the conclusion of a general agreement, which it would decide to open to signature by the States, or whether it will recommend the conclusion of bilateral agreements, or whether, finally, it will devise some other procedure. In all three events the object will be to confer on the Permanent Court of International Justice compulsory jurisdiction over claims that an arbitral award is null.

In the course of examining this first question, the Committee was led to recognise that the actual circumstances in which arbitral awards are made differ to a considerable extent.

It sometimes happens that the arbitral tribunal has been set up to deal with a whole series of cases which are not specifically named in the instrument creating the tribunal. This has been the case as regards the "mixed arbitral tribunals" and as regards the "claims commissions" which have been established at different times between different Governments. Questions of jurisdiction are often raised before such tribunals. On the other hand, their composition makes it easy to accept the notion of a kind of hierarchic relation between them and the Permanent Court of International Justice. Accordingly, a recourse to the Court against decisions of such tribunals on the ground that the tribunal had no jurisdiction to deal with the matter, or exceeded its jurisdiction, or on the ground of a fault in the procedure, can be readily accepted. One might even, as regards such tribunals, conceive—but the subject is outside the terms of reference of the Committee—that recourse to the Court might be made possible on substantive questions of law, with a view to unifying the jurisprudence of the tribunals, particularly where a number of Governments, in connection with the same events, set up arbitral tribunals which exist side by side but are juridically independent.

The position is different where an arbitral tribunal is set up by a special agreement for the arbitration of a particular case. Before such tribunals questions of jurisdiction more rarely arise. The tribunal's task is ordinarily determined with greater precision than in the preceding case.

Finally, where arbitration has to deal with a political question, recourse against the decision will often be contrary to the intention of the Governments; they are prepared to accept the solution given by persons in whom they have confidence, and judicial proceedings upon some incident of the dispute do not present themselves as a very appropriate means of reaching a final settlement.

It is this divergency of cases and the desire not to compromise the authority of arbitral awards which make it difficult to determine the procedure which should be followed by States desirous of permitting recourse from arbitrators to the Permanent Court of International Justice.

Two methods of procedure at once occur to the mind, based upon the methods followed for the development of arbitration by the Ninth Assembly. The first would consist in recommending the insertion of suitable provisions in those arbitration treaties which may be subsequently concluded, or in agreements supplementary thereto, and in treaties which contain an arbitration clause. Such provisions could also, to the extent deemed appropriate, find their place in the special agreements by which particular questions are submitted to arbitration. The provisions would be drafted now and recommended to the Governments. The second method would be to embody the provisions giving jurisdiction to the Permanent Court of International Justice, and the rules of such jurisdiction, in a protocol which the Assembly would open to accession by the Members of the League of Nations and the non-member States.

The second method would have the advantages of simplicity and uniformity. It may, however, be asked whether it would not be somewhat excessive to propose the conclusion, under the auspices of the League of Nations, of a general agreement for the settlement of disputes as to the alleged nullity of some arbitral awards when such disputes are in practice very rare. Is there not a risk that the adoption of a procedure of a general character for the settlement of such disputes would tend to increase their number?

The method of bilateral agreements (appropriate clauses to be inserted in arbitration treaties or, possibly, in agreements for the arbitration of particular questions, according to a model which would be submitted and recommended) has the advantage of being more modest. Above all, it makes it easier to do justice to the different cases to which attention is called above. On the other hand, it may be asked whether a recommendation of this kind would have practical consequences, particularly as regards treaties already in force.

Both the above methods, which, moreover, might be adopted simultaneously, would seek to establish for the future a rule of law obliging a State which contested the validity of an arbitral award to submit its claim to the Permanent Court of International Justice. Perhaps, however, it may be desired to resort to a method which would legally be less rigid but might nevertheless in practice be equally effective.

The third method would be for the Assembly, basing itself upon the progress which has been made by the notions of arbitration and international justice, to declare that a State, which disputes the obligatory character of an arbitral award on the ground that the tribunal had no jurisdiction or exceeded its jurisdiction or that there was a fault in the procedure, has the duty to propose to the State against which it makes such claim the conclusion of a special agreement submitting the decision of the question to the Permanent Court of International Justice. The bases of such agreement would be set out in appropriate provisions. There is obviously implied a corresponding duty of the other party to accept such proposal.

The practical effectiveness of such a declaration would flow from its connection with the provisions of the Covenant regarding the settlement of disputes and the part which the Council has to play for the purpose of ensuring the execution of arbitral awards. In proceedings of this kind, the position of a State which had failed in the duty of proposing the conclusion of the special agreement, or which had refused to give effect to such proposal, would be extremely difficult.

It will perhaps be objected that the guarantees for the efficacity of this method are sought in the political field rather than in the field of law. The method, however, appears to a greater extent than the other two methods to take account of the exceptional character of disputes as to the validity of arbitral awards.

The Committee has not felt it to be its duty to pronounce between the three methods which it has contemplated. Under the terms of the Assembly's resolution, the results of its work are to be communicated to the Governments; it has felt that their opinion will be a decisive factor in the choice between the three methods.

Accordingly, the Committee has given to the results of its work the form not of a single draft but of three drafts, each of which corresponds to one of the methods above described, namely :

I. A draft recommendation in favour of the insertion in arbitration treaties, arbitration clauses and special arbitration agreements of provisions of which a model is set out;

II. A draft resolution inviting States and Members of the League of Nations to sign a protocol which is annexed to the resolution;

III. A draft resolution declaring it to be the duty of a State, contesting the validity of an arbitral award, to propose the conclusion of a special submission to arbitration, which would be drawn up on certain stated bases and have the object of submitting such claim to decision by the Permanent Court of International Justice.

In thus presenting three drafts, the Committee does not fear that it has unduly complicated its report. The provisions which accompany the drafts and relate to determination of the Court's jurisdiction, the method by which the case is referred to the Court and the function of the Court, are in all three cases very similar and for the most part identical.

The provisions just referred to would establish in what the new system is to consist. The Committee has contemplated that the basis of the system should be as follows :

In the first place, the tribunal competent to hear and determine disputes as to the validity of arbitral awards would be the Permanent Court of International Justice. This is already settled in the Assembly's resolution which fixed the Committee's terms of reference. Under the first two drafts, the case would be one of obligatory jurisdiction; under the third, the Court's jurisdiction would be founded on a special submission, concluded after the dispute arose, in execution of the duty which the Assembly had declared to exist.

The recourse which is contemplated does not, however, apply to all arbitral awards. The Committee has felt that it is desirable in principle to deal only with awards in disputes with regard to which the parties are in conflict as to their respective rights. It would seem more difficult to make a general recommendation in favour of recourse to a judicial body against arbitral awards dealing with conflicts of interests. It is from this point of view that the method of bilateral agreements is more supple than that of establishment of uniform rules. The Committee proposes, however, that the possibility of extending or restricting by special agreement the application of the principle as to what are the awards against which the recourse exists should be reserved. This may make it possible to satisfy both those who would desire to extend the procedure to awards dealing with conflicts of interests and those who would feel some hesitation in admitting recourse to the Court where the arbitral award has been made under special agreement for the arbitration of a particular case.

The Assembly's resolution did not contemplate that arbitral awards might be brought before the Permanent Court of International Justice on any legal point whatsoever. It favours such recourse only as regards claims that the tribunal had no jurisdiction or exceeded its jurisdiction. The Committee has felt able to add the case of a fundamental fault in the procedure. It has not, on the other hand, felt it should define what is meant by a tribunal having no jurisdiction or exceeding its jurisdiction or by a fundamental fault in the procedure. It has thought it best to rely upon the Court, whose decisions will establish, with the necessary precision, the meaning of these conceptions.

On the other hand, the Committee had not to deal with awards in which an arbitral tribunal declares itself not to have jurisdiction, and it has not been felt that the difficulties which may arise in this connection are sufficiently grave to justify establishing provisions with regard to them.

An arbitral award is in principle deemed to be regular and binding. A State which disputes its validity introduces a new factor into the case. It is therefore for it to take the initiative and to bear the consequences resulting therefrom. It follows that such State ought to submit its claim to the Court. Procedure by application to the Court is the appropriate method of bringing the matter before it, if the case has to be considered as a case of compulsory jurisdiction. A complication, however, arises if the system is adopted under which the State contesting the validity of the award would merely have the duty to propose to the other party the conclusion of a special agreement for bringing the matter to the Court. It has seemed desirable to state that, notwithstanding that this is the form in which proceedings are started, the State contesting the validity of the award shall be considered as the plaintiff. This involves certain particularities of procedure which are provided for in Article 3 of draft III.

Whatever be the method of starting the proceedings, it appears indispensable to allow the recourse to the Court during only a very brief period. Nothing, on the other hand, has been said regarding the possibility of considering execution of an award as an acceptance of the award which would render irreceivable any subsequent claim to dispute its validity. It has been felt that this point should be left to the appreciation of the Court, which will take account of the circumstances of the case.

As international arbitral proceedings are sometimes open to individuals, it appears desirable to call attention to the provisions of the Court's Statute (Article 34), under which only States or Members of the League of Nations can be parties in cases before the Court.

The function of the Court will consist in declaring the arbitral award to be null if it recognises that the claim of nullity is well founded. The Committee has considered whether in such case the Court should have the task of giving judgment upon the merits. It has not thought that a general rule could be established which would thus transfer the dispute from the field of arbitration to that of international jurisdiction by a permanent tribunal; a provision of this kind could, however, be inserted in a particular treaty dealing with a single dispute or a well-determined class of dispute. In a provision of a general character, it is impossible to go beyond the conception that, if the Court pronounces an arbitral award to be null, the parties will be replaced in the legal position in which they found themselves before the commencement of the proceedings which have led to the award. If, for example, they were bound under an arbitration treaty to arbitrate the dispute by way of conclusion of a special agreement submitting it to arbitration, they would be obliged to conclude a new special agreement for this purpose, their obligation not having been entirely executed by the signature of the old agreement, since this has led only to an award having no legal validity.

Although the Court has thus only to pronounce upon the validity of the award, and not upon the merits of the case, it nevertheless appears necessary to empower it to order appropriate provisional measures.

The Court's judgment will be binding upon the parties. It seems desirable to add that they must accept the judgment as the basis of any further arbitral proceedings which may be taken for the settlement of the case in the same manner as if the substance of the judgment were set out in a submission to arbitration. The new arbitrator will thus be bound by the Court's judgment and be unable to disregard it without exceeding his jurisdiction.

I. Draft Recommendation.

The Assembly,

With a view to rendering more complete the provisions in force for the settlement of international disputes by arbitration or judicial settlement, and to ensure the solution by legal means of certain difficulties which may arise exceptionally on the subject of the validity of arbitral awards:

Recommends the Members of the League of Nations:

1. To recognise as between themselves a compulsory jurisdiction of the Permanent Court of International Justice to annul arbitral awards which are vitiated by absence of jurisdiction in the tribunal, the fact that the tribunal has exceeded its jurisdiction, or a fundamental fault in the procedure;

2. To insert in their arbitration treaties, arbitration clauses or agreements supplementary thereto, and, where appropriate, in special agreements for the arbitration of particular questions, subject to any modifications which they may deem suited to the special circumstances of the agreement, the following provisions, namely:

Article 1.

Without prejudice to any agreements allowing recourse to the Permanent Court of International Justice in cases not provided for by the present provisions, the High Contracting Parties recognise the Permanent Court of International Justice as having compulsory jurisdiction, under the conditions hereafter laid down, to annul awards given by an arbitral tribunal.

Article 2.

The present provisions apply to awards in disputes with regard to which the parties were in conflict as to their respective rights.

The High Contracting Parties may, by special agreements to that effect, either extend the application of the present provisions to other arbitral awards or exclude particular awards from the application thereof.

Article 3.

A High Contracting Party who disputes the obligatory character of an arbitral award on the ground that the award is null because the tribunal had no jurisdiction, or exceeded its jurisdiction, or on the ground of a fundamental fault in the procedure, shall be bound to submit such claim to the Permanent Court of International Justice.

The application to the Permanent Court of International Justice must be lodged with the Registrar within sixty days from the notification of the award or, if notification is not obligatory, from its publication.

Even where it has been possible for individuals to be parties to the previous proceedings, such application cannot be made except by a State or a Member of the League of Nations.

Article 4.

The Permanent Court of International Justice shall declare the award which is impeached to be null, in whole or part, if it recognises the application to be well founded. By such annulment the parties to the dispute shall be replaced in the legal position in which they stood before the commencement of the proceedings which gave rise to the award which has been impeached.

At the same time as it annuls the award, the Court may order appropriate provisional measures.

Article 5.

The decision of the Permanent Court of International Justice shall be binding upon the parties. By the present provisions, those parties agree that such decision shall operate, in the same manner as a special agreement for arbitration, as a basis for any arbitration proceedings which may eventually be taken for the settlement of the case.

II. Draft Resolution.

The Assembly,

With a view to rendering more complete the provisions in force for the settlement of international disputes by arbitration or judicial settlement, and to ensure the solution by legal means of certain difficulties which may arise exceptionally on the subject of the validity of arbitral awards:

1. Recommends the Members of the League of Nations to recognise as between themselves a compulsory jurisdiction of the Permanent Court of International Justice to annul arbitral awards which are vitiated by absence of jurisdiction in the tribunal, the fact that the tribunal has exceeded its jurisdiction, or by a fundamental fault in the procedure;

2. Invites all States, whether Members of the League of Nations or not, in so far as the agreements which they have already concluded are not already sufficient, to accept obligations giving effect to the purposes above mentioned by becoming parties to the Protocol annexed hereto;

3. Decides to communicate the annexed Protocol to all the Members of the League of Nations and to such States not members of the League as shall be indicated by the Council.

III. Draft Resolution.

The Assembly,

With a view to rendering more complete the provisions in force for the settlement of international disputes by arbitration or judicial settlement, and to ensure the solution by legal means of certain difficulties which may arise exceptionally on the subject of the validity of arbitral awards:

Declares that any Member of the League of Nations which disputes the obligatory character of an arbitral award on the ground that the award is null because the tribunal had no jurisdiction, or exceeded its jurisdiction, or on the ground of a fundamental fault in the procedure, has the duty to propose to the other party the conclusion of a special agreement for the submission of this question to the Permanent Court of International Justice, within the framework of the following provisions:

Article 1.

Without prejudice to any agreements allowing recourse to the Permanent Court of International Justice in cases not provided for by the present provisions, the parties shall, under the conditions hereafter laid down, give the Permanent Court of International Justice jurisdiction to annul the arbitral award.

Article 2.

The present provisions apply to awards in disputes with regard to which the parties were in conflict as to their respective rights.

The parties may, by special agreements to that effect, either extend the application of the present provisions to other arbitral awards or exclude particular awards from the application thereof.

Article 3.

The party which disputes the obligatory character of the arbitral award on the ground that the award is null because the tribunal had no jurisdiction, or exceeded its jurisdiction, or on the ground of a fundamental fault in the procedure, shall be bound to make the proposal for the conclusion of the special agreement within sixty days from the notification of the award or, if notification is not obligatory, from its publication. The special agreement, when duly concluded, shall be validly notified to the Court by whichever party first takes this action.

Even where it has been possible for individuals to be parties to the previous proceedings, the special agreement may not be concluded except by States or Members of the League of Nations.

Notwithstanding that the proceedings before the Court must be commenced by way of a special agreement for submission of the matter to the Court, the party contesting the validity of the arbitral award shall be deemed to be the plaintiff and, in consequence, the order in which the documents comprised in the written proceedings are to be presented shall be determined in the same manner as in proceedings commenced by a written application (Article 39 of the Rules of Court); and the same principle shall be followed in determining the order in which agents, advocates or counsel of the parties shall be called on to speak.

Article 4.

The Permanent Court of International Justice shall declare the award which is impeached to be null, in whole or part, if it recognises the claim for annulment to be well founded. By such annulment, the parties to the dispute shall be replaced in the legal position in which they stood before the commencement of the proceedings which gave rise to the award which has been impeached.

At the same time as it annuls the award, the Court may order appropriate provisional measures.

Article 5.

The decision of the Permanent Court of International Justice shall be binding upon the parties. By the conclusion of the special agreement, those parties agree that such decision shall operate, in the same manner as a special agreement for arbitration, as a basis for any arbitration proceedings which may eventually be taken for the settlement of the case.

GENERAL TENDENCY OF THE GOVERNMENTS' OBSERVATIONS.

1. Fourteen Governments accept in principle the texts drawn up by the Sub-Committee of the First Committee, namely :[1]

Australia	Great Britain	New Zealand	Poland
China	Ireland	Norway	Portugal
Estonia	Japan	Panama	Union of South Africa
France	Netherlands

This acceptance is, however, in the case of certain Governments, accompanied by reservations and conditions.

2. Two Governments raise objections of principle to the texts of the Sub-Committee, namely :

Hungary Italy

3. Three Governments confine themselves to approving the principle of amending the Covenant, namely :

Bulgaria Finland Latvia

4. One Government states that it has no observation to present :

India.

ATTITUDE OF THE GOVERNMENTS IN REGARD TO EACH ARTICLE OF THE COVENANT WHICH IT IS PROPOSED TO AMEND.

Preamble.

Present Text of the Covenant.

"In order to promote international co-operation and to achieve international peace and security by the acceptance of obligations not to resort to war, . . . "

Text of the Committee of Eleven.

"In order to promote international co-operation and to achieve international peace and security by accepting the obligation not to resort to war, . . . "

Text of the Sub-Committee.

"In order to promote international co-operation and to achieve international peace and security by accepting the obligation not to resort to war, . . . "

These two texts are the same and have not given rise to observations.

Article 12.

Present Text of the Covenant.

"1. The Members of the League agree that, if there should arise between them any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, they will submit the matter either to arbitration or judicial settlement or to enquiry by the Council, and they agree in no case to resort to war until three months after the award by the arbitrators or the judicial decision or the report by the Council.

"2. In any case under this article the award of the arbitrators or the judicial decision shall be made within a reasonable time, and the report of the Council shall be made within six months after the submission of the dispute."

Text of the Committee of Eleven.

"1. The Members of the League agree that, if there should arise between them any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, they will only employ pacific means for its settlement. If the disagreement continues, the dispute shall be submitted either to arbitration or judicial settlement, or to enquiry by the Council. The Members of the League agree that they will in no case resort to war for the solution of their dispute."

2. (No change proposed.)

Text of the Sub-Committee.

"1. The Members of the League agree that, if there should arise between them any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, they will in no case have recourse to war for the settlement of the dispute and will only employ pacific means for this purpose. If the dispute cannot be otherwise settled, it shall be submitted either to arbitration or judicial settlement or to enquiry by the Council.

"2. The award of the arbitrators or the judicial decision shall be given and the report of the Council shall be made within a reasonable period."

Various observations deal with this article or may be connected with it.

1. China would desire that precaution should be taken against the danger of a country in fact creating a state of war while avoiding official recognition of the existence of war.

[1] While accepting the texts drawn up by the Sub-Committee of the First Committee, three Governments indicate their preference for the proposals of the Committee of Eleven—namely, France, Netherlands, Poland.

Finland calls attention to the same danger of recourse to violent methods which would not amount to war in the strict sense (pacific blockade, armed occupation). It proposes the following text:

"1. The Members of the League agree that, if there should arise between them any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, they will submit the matter either to arbitration or judicial settlement or to enquiry by the Council. They agree in no case to resort to war for the settlement of their disputes and to employ only pacific means to attain such settlement."

2. At the same time Finland observes:

"There is, moreover, a slip in the Sub-Committee's text in the phrase, 'Si le différend n'a pu être réglé'. Account has not been taken of the fact that the same expression: 'Si le différend n'a pu se régler', is used in Article 15, paragraph 4, of the Covenant with reference to a different case." [1]

3. Ireland would desire the suppression in Article 12, paragraph 1, of the words "likely to lead to a rupture".

Estonia, with the same object, proposes the following draft:

"All the Members of the League agree that they will in no case have recourse to war for the settlement of disputes or conflicts of whatever nature or of whatever origin which may arise among them, and will only employ peaceful means for this purpose."

As regards the second paragraph:

1. Portugal proposes to fix a period instead of using the expression "within a reasonable period".

2. Great Britain and New Zealand propose to replace the word "and" by the word "or" in the English text.

Article 13.

Paragraph 4.

Present Text of the Covenant.

"4. The Members of the League agree that they will carry out in full good faith any award or decision that may be rendered, and that they will not resort to war against a Member of the League which complies therewith. In the event of any failure to carry out such an award or decision, the Council shall propose what steps should be taken to give effect thereto."

Text of the Committee of Eleven.	Text of the Sub-Committee.
"The Members of the League agree that they will carry out in full good faith any award or decision that may be rendered, and that they will not take any action against any Member of the League which complies therewith. "In the event of any failure to carry out such award or decision, the Council shall propose what measures of all kinds should be taken to give effect thereto; the votes of the representatives of the parties shall not be counted."	"The Members of the League agree that they will carry out in full good faith the award or decision rendered in a dispute to which they have been parties. They further undertake in no way to support a State in refusal to carry out an award or decision. In the event of any failure to carry out such an award or decision, the Council shall propose what measures of all kinds should be taken to give effect thereto; the votes of the representatives of the parties shall not be counted."

1. Of the fourteen Governments which give general approval to the texts of the Sub-Committee, eleven do not express any reservation. Three propose changes in the Sub-Committee's text, namely: Great Britain, Poland and New Zealand.

Poland would like to see it clearly stated in the text of Article 13, paragraph 4, that the undertaking in no way to support a State in refusal to carry out an award or decision would not be applicable where such refusal was provoked by an aggression on the part of the other State concerned.

Great Britain and New Zealand propose to insert the word "judicial" before the word "decision" wherever the latter word appears in the English text of the texts of the Sub-Committee.

2. Three of the six Governments which have not given general approval to the texts of the Sub-Committee express an opinion on Article 13, paragraph 4:

Italy accepts the text of the Sub-Committee.

Finland proposes to amend the first passage to read as follows:

"The Members of the League agree that they will carry out in full good faith any award or decision that may be rendered and will in no way support a State in refusal to carry out such award or decision. It is understood that a Member of the League will not take any action against any Member which complies with such award or decision."

Hungary would desire that the Council of the League of Nations should be able to take its decisions by a majority vote.

---

[1] The words used in the English text of the Sub-Committee's proposal for Article 12 are: "If the dispute cannot be otherwise settled", and those employed in the English text of Article 15, paragraph 4, of the Covenant are: "If the dispute is not thus settled".

Article 15.

General Proposal.

France asks that an effort should be made to accelerate accessions to the General Act of Arbitration, in order that incorporation of compulsory arbitration in Article 15 may ultimately be contemplated.

France also asks that the question of concording arbitration and the procedure of enquiry by the Council should be studied.

Paragraph 1.

Present Text of the Covenant.

"1. If there should arise between Members of the League any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, which is not submitted to arbitration or judicial settlement in accordance with Article 13, the Members of the League agree that they will submit the matter to the Council. Any party to the dispute may effect such submission by giving notice of the existence of the dispute to the Secretary-General, who will make all necessary arrangements for a full investigation and consideration thereof."

The Committee of Eleven and the Sub-Committee did not contemplate an amendment in this paragraph.

Ireland wishes to see the words "likely to lead to a rupture" struck out in Article 15, paragraph 1.

This would be consequential on the suppression of those words proposed by Ireland in Article 12.

Further, in order to render paragraph 1 of Article 15 more clear, Ireland proposes the following draft:

"If there should arise between Members of the League any dispute which cannot be otherwise settled and which is not submitted to arbitration or judicial settlement in accordance with Article 13, the Members . . ."

Paragraph 6.

Present Text of the Covenant.

"6. If a report by the Council is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof, other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the Members of the League agree that they will not go to war with any party to the dispute which complies with the recommendations of the report."

Text of the Committee of Eleven.

"If the report by the Council is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof, other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the Members of the League agree that they will comply with the recommendations of the report. If the Council's recommendation is not carried out, the Council shall propose suitable measures to give it effect."

Text of the Sub-Committee.

"If the report by the Council is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof, other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the Council shall invite the parties to comply with the recommendations of the report. The Members of the League undertake in no way to support any party in refusal to comply with such recommendations."

1. Of the fourteen Governments which have given a general acceptance to the proposals of the Sub-Committee, eleven make no reservations. Three present observations:

Estonia prefers the text of the Committee of Eleven.

Norway is able to accept the proposals of the Committee of Eleven, although not considering them to be a necessary consequence of bringing the Covenant into accordance with the Pact of Paris.

Poland would wish to have it made clear that the undertaking in no way to support a State in refusal to comply with a recommendation would not apply in case such refusal was provoked by aggression on the part of the other State concerned.

2. Of the six Governments which have not given general acceptance to the texts of the Sub-Committee, two express their opinion on this paragraph:

Italy prefers the text of the Committee of Eleven.

Finland prefers the proposals of the Committee of Eleven.

Should, nevertheless, the principle embodied in the text of the Sub-Committee be adopted, Finland proposes to replace the Sub-Committee's draft by the following draft:

"6. If the report of the Council is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof, other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the party which complies with the recommendations of the report may make this a ground for claiming a settlement of the dispute in accordance with the Council's recommendations. The Members of the League undertake in no way to support any party in a refusal to comply with such recommendations."

Paragraph 7.

Present Text of the Covenant.

"7. If the Council fails to reach a report which is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof, other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the Members of the League reserve to themselves the right to take such action as they shall consider necessary for the maintenance of right and justice."

Text of the Committee of Eleven.

"If the Council fails to reach a report which is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof, other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, it shall examine the procedure best suited to meet the case and recommend it to the parties."

Text of the Sub-Committee.

"If the Council fails to reach a report which is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof, other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, it shall examine the procedure best suited to meet the case and recommend it to the parties."

Finland proposes to substitute for the Sub-Committee's draft the following draft:

"7. If the Council fails to reach unanimity as defined in the previous paragraph and the parties do not accept the recommendations made by the majority, the Council shall make recommendations as to the best procedure to be followed subsequently by the parties for the settlement of their dispute."

Paragraph 7bis.

There is no corresponding provision in the Covenant.

Text of the Committee of Eleven.
(New paragraph.)

"At any stage of the examination, the Council may, either at the request of one of the parties or on its own initiative, ask the Permanent Court of International Justice for an advisory opinion on points of law relating to the dispute. Such application shall not require a unanimous vote by the Council."

Text of the Sub-Committee.

(Suppressed.)

1. Of the fourteen Governments which have given general acceptance to the texts of the Sub-Committee, eleven make no reservation. Three present observations:

Estonia and Portugal prefer the text of the Committee of Eleven.

Norway may accept the proposals of the Committee of Eleven although not considering them as a necessary consequence of bringing the Covenant into concordance with the Pact of Paris.

2. Of the six Governments which have not given general acceptance to the texts of the Sub-Committee, Italy proposes to adopt the paragraph 7bis drawn up by the Committee of Eleven.

Hungary emphasises the necessity of securing for the solution of questions of a legal character as full as possible a participation of international judicial authorities which are called upon to collaborate with the League of Nations.

Article 16.

Paragraph 1, First Sentence.

Present Text of the Covenant.

"1. Should any Member of the League resort to war in disregard of its covenants under Articles 12, 13 or 15, it shall, ipso facto, be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other Members of the League."

Text of the Committee of Eleven.

(No change proposed.)

Text of the Sub-Committee.

"1. Should any Member of the League resort to war in disregard of its covenants under Article 12, it shall, ipso facto, be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other Members of the League."

1. Of the fourteen Governments which have given general acceptance to the texts of the Sub-Committee, thirteen make no reservation.

Norway declares it necessary to find a formula to the effect that the application of sanctions is subject to the Council deciding unanimously, save for the votes of the parties, which State is the aggressor.

2. Of the six Governments which have not accepted the texts of the Sub-Committee, Italy declares that she can accept the text of the Sub-Committee.

Italy, however, with a view to giving satisfaction to certain States, would agree to inserting after the first paragraph of Article 16 the following provision :

> " . . . Provided always that in the case dealt with in Article 15, paragraph 7, the Members of the League may make their action subject to the condition that the Council is unanimous either in proposing provisional measures intended to re-establish peace or in declaring which is the Covenant-breaking State."

I. NOTE BY THE SECRETARY-GENERAL.

At the Assembly's session of 1930, the First Committee proposed to the Assembly the following resolution which was adopted by it on October 3rd, 1930 :

> " The Assembly has taken note of the work of the Conference which was held at The Hague in March and April 1930, as a result of the initiative taken by the Assembly by its resolution of September 22nd, 1924, regarding the progressive codification of international law :
> " It reaffirms the great interest taken by the League in the development of international law, inter alia, by codification, and considers it to be one of the most important tasks of the League to further such development by all the means in its power;
> " The recommendations made by the Conference contain suggestions of the highest value, and must be taken into account in examining what would be the best methods of continuing the work which has been begun;
>
> " The Assembly accordingly decides to adjourn the question to its next session;
> " Requests the Council, in the meanwhile, to invite the Members of the League of Nations and the non-member States to communicate to it, if they so desire, their observations on these suggestions, in order that these observations may be taken into consideration by the Assembly."

The First Committee further expressed the opinion that the various draft resolutions on the subject of progressive codification which had been submitted to it might be discussed at the Assembly's next session.

The Recommendations of the Hague Conference and the draft Resolutions submitted to the First Committee of the Assembly in 1930 were in the following terms :

1. Recommendations of the Hague Conference.

I.

The Conference :

With a view to facilitating the progressive codification of international law :

Recommends that, in the future, States should be guided, as far as possible, by the provisions of the Acts of the First Conference for the Codification of International Law in any special conventions which they may conclude among themselves.

II.

The Conference :

Highly appreciating the scientific work which has been done for codification in general and in regard to the subjects on its agenda in particular :

Cordially thanks the authors of such work and considers it desirable that subsequent Conferences for the codification of international law should also have fresh scientific work at their disposal and that, with this object, international and national Institutions should undertake at a sufficiently early date the study of the fundamental questions of international law, particularly the principles and rules and their application, with special reference to the points which are placed on the agenda of such Conferences.

III.

The Conference :

Considering it to be desirable that there should be as wide as possible a co-ordination of all the efforts made for the codification of international law :

Recommends that the work undertaken with this object under the auspices of the League of Nations and that undertaken by the Conferences of American States may be carried on in the most complete harmony with one another.

IV.

The Conference :

Calls the attention of the League of Nations to the necessity of preparing the work of the next Conference for the Codification of International Law a sufficient time in advance to enable the discussion to be carried on with the necessary rapidity and in the light of the information which is essential.

For this purpose the Conference would consider it desirable that the preparatory work should be organised on the following basis :

> 1. The Committee entrusted with the task of selecting a certain number of subjects suitable for codification by convention might draw up a report indicating briefly and clearly the reasons why it appears possible and desirable to conclude international agreements on the subjects selected. This report should be sent to the Governments for their opinion. The Council of the League of Nations might then draw up the list of the subjects to be studied, having regard to the opinions expressed by the Governments.

2. An appropriate body might be given the task of drawing up, in the light of all the data furnished by legal science and actual practice, a draft convention upon each question selected for study.

3. The draft conventions should be communicated to the Governments with a request for their observations upon the essential points. The Council would endeavour to obtain replies from as large a number of Governments as possible.

4. The replies so received should be communicated to all the Governments with a request both for their opinion as to the desirability of placing such draft conventions on the agenda of a Conference and also for any fresh observations which might be suggested to them by the replies of the other Governments upon the drafts.

5. The Council might then place on the programme of the Conference such subjects as were formally approved by a very large majority of the Powers which would take part therein.

2. Draft Resolutions submitted to the First Committee in 1930.

I. Draft Resolution submitted by M. Orestes Ferrara (Cuba).

Whereas the Conference of the Codification of International Law, held at The Hague in 1930, adopted a Convention on Nationality, and some States represented at the Conference did not accept it in its entirety, or submitted reservations in respect of certain articles thereof, and, further, no State has hitherto ratified this Convention;

Whereas the same Conference, after approving the Convention on Nationality, adopted a resolution recommending the States to study the possibility of introducing into their respective legislations the principle of the equality of the sexes in matters of nationality;

Whereas the First Commission is instructed by the Assembly to consider Item 19 of the agenda regarding the Progressive Codification of International Law:

The Cuban delegation proposes to the Commission to submit to the Assembly, among the other points dealt with in its decisions on Codification, the following resolution:

"The Assembly begs the Council to examine whether it would be desirable to take up again, with a view to the next Conference for the Codification of International Law, the question of the nationality of women."

II. Draft Resolution submitted by the Irish Delegation.

The Assembly:

Expressing appreciation of the work done by the first Conference for the Codification of International Law;

Affirming its determination to make an ever-increasing contribution towards the progressive codification of international law;

Desiring that the important work already accomplished, and the efforts to be made in the future for such codification, should be continued and directed in a manner most likely to produce the best possible results;

And, noting, in this connection, the recommendations of the first Codification Conference as to future action in regard to the progressive codification of international law:

Requests the Council to appoint a Committee to examine those recommendations, and to suggest such further or other measures as may appear most likely to facilitate and encourage such codification, and to prepare a report in sufficient time for submission to the twelfth ordinary session of the Assembly.

III. Draft Resolution submitted by the British, French, German, Greek and Italian Delegations.

The Assembly:

Having considered the work of the Conference which was held at The Hague in March and April 1930, as a result of the initiative taken by the Assembly by its resolution of September 22nd, 1924, regarding the progressive codification of international law:

Reaffirms the great interest taken by the League of Nations in the development of international law, and considers it to be one of the most important tasks of the League to further such development by all the means in its power.

The Assembly considers that the experience which has been acquired in the process of preparing for the above-mentioned Conference, and as a result of the meeting of the Conference, renders it desirable to recognise a distinction between the gradual formulation and development of customary international law, which should result progressively from the practice of States and the development of international jurisprudence, and the formulation in international Conventions, freely accepted by the States, of precise rules, whether derived from customary international law or entirely new in character, to govern particular relations between States the regulation of which by general agreement is found to be of immediate practical importance.

The Assembly considers that the term "codification" as applied to the work for the development of international law undertaken by the League of Nations should be understood as an activity of the last-mentioned character, and that, in present circumstances, as was shown by the experience of the Conference at The Hague, it is not for the League or the Conferences convened by it to endeavour to formulate the rules which are binding upon States as part of the customary law of nations.

The Assembly notes that, as already recognised in its resolution of September 22nd, 1924, the work of the Conferences convened as the result of the activities of the existing technical organisations of the League constitutes a work of codification in the above-mentioned sense.

The Assembly welcomes the recommendations made by the Conference of The Hague in its Final Act as giving suggestions of the highest value regarding the preparation to be made by the League for future international conferences;

And, being desirous that the eventual development of the organisation of the League, for the realisation of the policy set out in the present resolution, should be considered after full opportunity has been allowed to all the Members of the League to examine the results of the experience already acquired, it decides to consider at an early session in what conditions and by what methods of procedure the work of codification can most usefully be pursued.

IV. Draft Resolution submitted by the Norwegian and Swedish Delegations.

The Assembly:

Having considered the work of the Conference which met at The Hague in March and April 1930, as a result of the Assembly resolution of September 22nd, 1924, concerning the progressive codification of international law:

Reaffirms the high importance which the League attaches to the development of international law, and expresses the opinion that one of the most important duties of the League is to encourage such development by every means in its power.

The Assembly is of opinion that the term "codification", applied to the work of developing international law undertaken by the League of Nations, should be interpreted as meaning the embodiment in a series of international conventions, freely accepted by States, of definite rules, either based on customary international law or being entirely new law, to govern such forms of private interstate relations as it may seem immediately practical and important to regulate by general agreement.

The Assembly recognises that the recommendations submitted by the Hague Conference in its Final Act contain most valuable suggestions for the preparation by the League of future international Conferences.

Requests the Council to institute an enquiry with a view to determining, in the light of past experience, how the work of codification may best be continued, and decides to include this question in the agenda of its next session.

V. Proposal by M. Rolin (Belgium).

Replace paragraphs 2, 3 and 4 of the proposal of the British, French, German, Greek and Italian delegations by the following:

"Expresses the opinion:

"That it is of the essence of any undertaking in the field of codification of international law that it should deal with matters which are wholly or partly governed by international law or by particular conventions;

"But that it has been shown by the experience already acquired in this field by the League of Nations that it is hardly practicable to assign as the object of codification conventions the determination of the existing customary law, since new elements must necessarily be introduced in any endeavour of the kind in question;

"That, moreover, attempts imprudently undertaken in such a sense involve the risk of enfeebling law which is already in process of formation and of which the consolidation and development may be expected from the progress of international practice and jurisprudence;

"That, accordingly, while it is advantageous that documentation regarding international practice and jurisprudence should be brought together for the purposes of the preparation for codification Conferences, it will be desirable that henceforth the discussion should be to a greater degree directed towards examination of the value of the rules which it is contemplated to adopt for the future."

VI. Draft Resolution submitted by the Italian Delegation.

The Assembly:

Considering that the First Conference for the Codification of International Law constitutes the starting-point in the work of codification and that this work should be continued;

Considering that the suggestions and recommendations made by the Conference, and the results of the Conference, are deserving of most careful examination and consideration with a view to ascertaining the best methods of pursuing the work which has been commenced:

Decides to adjourn the question to its next session.

On January 19th, 1931, the Council instructed the Secretary-General to invite the Members of the League, and the non-member States which were invited to the Hague Conference, to present observations on the question of the progressive codification of international law and to examine in this connection the recommendations of the Hague Conference and the draft resolutions presented to the First Committee of the Assembly in 1930. It further suggested that the consideration of the question by the Assembly would be greatly facilitated if "it were able to approach its task, having before it positive suggestions as to the organisation to be adopted and the procedure to be followed in the future work of codification".

II. OBSERVATIONS SUBMITTED BY GOVERNMENTS.

Cuba.

[Translation.]

(Letter of May 9th, 1931.)

In your letter now under reply you ask the opinion of our Government concerning the four recommendations quoted above : these impressed us as being eminently satisfactory and acceptable —this without prejudice to the comments made below on the subject matter of Recommendation IV. No. 1.

Two methods can be adopted in the progressive codification of public international law. One of them consists in the selection of those questions which are of topical interest and usually of greatest difficulty—because the different States are not agreed about them—with a view to drafting uniform laws to deal with these, which laws would be submitted for the consideration of the nations and discussed later at a codification Conference. The little practical success obtained by the Conference held at The Hague a year ago and by others which might be mentioned, proves that this method does not yield the most immediate and positive results. The other method consists in preparing a kind of synoptic table of all matters susceptible of international agreement in public international law and in choosing from among these, first, all those presenting no substantial difficulty; secondly, those open to doubt on account of differences in practice or in standpoint; and thirdly, those involving serious disagreements in doctrine, in practice and in diplomatic spheres. The codification of the first-mentioned would be comparatively simple and would in turn assist the preparation of the others, until finally a code of public international law was arrived at which would be acceptable to the great majority of States.

This is the comment on Recommendation IV. No. 1 of the Hague Conference of 1930 to which we referred at the beginning. Once this general scheme had been prepared and submitted for examination to the various nations concerned, so that they might make any additions they deemed desirable and at the same time indicate the order in which they would prefer the questions to be dealt with, it would be very easy for a permanent organisation to give definite form to the drafts, so that later these might be subjected to the procedure fixed in Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5 of the said Recommendation IV of the Conference of 1930.

The word "codification" should be understood as implying not a mere recapitulation of existing practices, but a genuine legislative operation prepared by States in these codification Commissions through the competent organs, and then submitted to what might be described as a referendum, pending definitive and individual acceptance by each of the countries concerned. This last may demand some active propaganda on the part of the competent organs of the League of Nations, which should be directed, not to seeking points by which the will of each nation should be influenced, but to making direct request for international action by the aforesaid supreme organs.

I have pleasure in communicating this to you for your information and especially for that of the competent Technical Committee of the Secretariat.

Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

(Letter of April 28th, 1931.)

Preliminary Observations.

1. The resolution on the subject of the Progressive Codification of International Law, adopted by the Eleventh Assembly of the League of Nations on October 3rd, 1930, after taking note of the work of the Conference held at The Hague in March and April 1930, and reaffirming the great interest taken by the League of Nations in the development of International Law, called attention to certain suggestions made by the Conference in question and invited Members of the League of Nations and the non-member States to communicate to it their observations on these suggestions. His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom desire accordingly to lay certain observations on the subject of the codification of international law before the States referred to in the above resolution. In so doing they assume that it was not the intention of the Assembly that any observations which States might desire to make should necessarily be confined to the specific recommendations made by the Hague Conference.

2. His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom desire to preface their observations by reaffirming their view that the development of international law constitutes one of the most important tasks which fall within the activities of the League of Nations. In their view, relations between the Members of the community of nations will only be truly satisfactory in so far as they are based upon the firm foundation of recognised and binding law, and they therefore desire to promote the authority, to extend the scope, and to increase the precision of the system of international law. It is because they hold this view that they are anxious that the future action of the League in this connection should proceed upon lines which are calculated to produce the most satisfactory results. The observations which follow are based, not on any intention to disparage the value of the work which has already been done, but on a desire to make suggestions as to the methods by which this task can most usefully be pursued in future.

Methods of developing International Law.

3. There are three processes by which the development of international law can be forwarded. The first is the gradual establishment of rules of international law by the crystallisation of principles resulting from the general practice of nations and by the development of the jurisprudence resulting from the decisions of international tribunals, in particular the Permanent Court of International Justice. This process is a continuing one and is independent of any action taken by the League; in it the work of professors of international law and of the authors of treaties on the subjects can play a valuable part.

4. The second process consists in the free acceptance, by means of law-making conventions, of certain rules by which the parties to such conventions agree to abide in their mutual relations. Such rules may be identical with principles which have already resulted from the operation of the first process, or they may be new, but in either case the purport of the convention is not to lay down what international law already is, but to prescribe certain rules by which the parties to the convention agree thereafter to be bound.[1]

5. The third process consists in the ascertainment and establishment in precise and accurate legal phraseology of rules of international law which have already come into existence by the operation of the first and second processes. In existing conditions this can only be done by adopting the form of an international convention, but such a convention does not, strictly, have the effect of making new law. Such conventions differ from those made under the second process in that they do not prescribe rules by which the parties agree to be bound in future, but state rules which the parties recognise as already binding upon them. The function of a conference convened for the purpose of drawing up conventions of this character should be confined to ascertaining the precise scope and effect of the rules in question and clothing them in appropriate language.

6. The distinction between the second and third processes given above must not be pressed too far. The present state of international law is such that there are few subjects where there is not room for minor differences of opinion as to the existing state of the law, and it may well be that such differences can only be resolved by means of negotiations and agreement at a Conference. But the broad distinction between the two processes is clear.

7. The word "codification" can be and has been employed to describe both the second and the third processes. The second process would be accurately described as "legislative codification" and the third as "consolidatory codification". In view, however, of the importance of making clear the distinction between them, it is convenient to employ a separate short title for each, and in the observations which follow "codification" will be used to denote the second process and "consolidation" to describe the third.

Results of the Hague Conference.

8. His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom are of opinion that much valuable work was done at the recent Hague Conference and that the experience which has been gained should be most valuable for the future development of international law. They think it, however, very important that the situation resulting from the Conference should be carefully examined.

9. It seems clear that the careful preliminary work which led up to that Conference proceeded on the basis that the task of the Conference was that of consolidation and not codification; and the three subjects assigned to the Conference were chosen, after most careful examination, on the ground that they were generally considered to be those most "ripe" for consolidation. But it can hardly be disputed that on the whole the Conference itself proceeded on the basis that its work was that of codification; and the attitude of many delegates made it clear that, in their view, their task was not so much to assist in the establishment in precise language of already existing principles of international law, as to state and defend certain rules by which their country was prepared to be bound.

[1] In international law, a treaty or convention is the form which has to be adopted both for the purpose of legislating (i.e., of laying down general rules of conduct) and for the purpose of making a contract about a particular case (i.e., the grant of a privilege or the settlement of a dispute). Consequently, treaties or conventions may fall either into the class of international legislation or into the class of particular contracts, and in some cases one and the same convention may contain some provisions which fall into the one class and others which fall into the other. This distinction between law-making or legislative provisions and particular contracts has to be borne in mind when such provisions are being studied in relation to the development of international law.

10. On the subject of nationality, a convention and three protocols were drawn up and signed at the Conference. While far from covering the whole of the subject, these instruments, if generally accepted, will no doubt prove of great utility. But the point to which it is desired to draw special attention is that these instruments constitute almost entirely an example, not of consolidation, but of codification. It is true that the earlier articles in Chapter I of the Convention may be regarded as statements of existing international law. But the great bulk of the instruments in question consists quite plainly of new rules by which the signatories agree for international purposes to be bound; to a large extent they constitute an undertaking by the parties to ensure that their municipal nationality laws contain certain provisions, and this, though it is a valuable procedure, is not laying down existing rules of international law. So far, therefore, as concerns this question, the value of the Conference is not that it has consolidated already existing international law, but that it has laid down certain rules which, if generally accepted, would ameliorate a situation for which existing international law provides no remedy.

11. The articles dealing with the Legal Status of the Territorial Sea drawn up by the Conference may be regarded to a large extent as constituting consolidation. But it is to be observed that, even as regards these provisions, the Conference was not able, possibly owing to lack of time, to reach the stage of signature; the provisions in question were only "drawn up and provisionally approved with a view to their possible incorporation in a general convention on the territorial sea". Moreover, the provisions in question cover only a part of the subject with which the Conference was intended to deal; as regards some most important parts of the subject, the proceedings of the Conference showed that no general agreement existed as to the present state of international law. It is plain, therefore, that, except within the limits indicated above, the Conference failed to effect a consolidation of international law on the subject.

12. The proceedings of the Conference in relation to the Responsibility of States are the most striking of all. It had appeared before the Conference to His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom that, if there was one subject of international law which was ready for consolidation, in the sense that a mass of material existed, in the shape of the decisions of international tribunals and the works of textbook writers, from which it should not be difficult to extract a large number of generally accepted rules, that subject was the Responsibility of States. But the Conference failed to reach agreement even on the most fundamental points. It is useless to disguise the fact that a great part of the proceedings of the Conference in relation to this subject consisted of diplomatic negotiations, ultimately unsuccessful, with the object of finding a common factor on which, as the result of mutual concessions, agreement might be possible.

13. If the Conference had been proceeding on the basis that its work was of the nature of consolidation, such a failure to reach agreement would have been, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, not only undesirable in itself but harmful to the gradual development of international law by the process of judicial decisions. Since international tribunals can only proceed on the basis of existing international law, they may, if the result of a Conference is to throw doubt on rules which had hitherto been believed to command general acceptance and of which the consolidation and development might be expected from the progress of international practice and jurisprudence, be deprived of the power to apply those rules to the circumstances which come before them.

14. The result of the Conference was, therefore, that, although the three subjects were selected as being most suitable for consolidation, such a result was only partially effected in the case of one of them. It is probable that more useful work might have been done if it had been recognised from the outset that what was required in the case of all three subjects was not consolidation but codification.

15. The recommendations made by the Conference are consistent with, and even appear to be based on, such a view. It is, moreover, plain that the effect of the recommendations under Head IV would be so far as possible to ensure that no Conference would be summoned until it had been ascertained by careful preliminary enquiry that a sufficient agreement existed to render progress possible. It may be added that the recommendations in question (with which His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom fully agree) are to a large extent identical with the existing practice of the League in relation to such Conferences.

Conclusions.

16. In the light of the above considerations, it seems possible to draw certain conclusions as to the methods to be adopted in future. The process of codification—i.e., the development of international law by means of law-making conventions—is being actively pursued under the auspices of the League, and, while such development must necessarily be dependent on the extent to which conventions of this nature command general acceptance, His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom are inclined to regard this method as being the one by which progress can best be realised in existing circumstances. The various organs of the League are actively engaged in work of this nature, especially in economic and technical matters, and it would seem perfectly feasible somewhat to extend the scope of their operations with a view to including in them matters of a legal character which have not yet formed the subject of conventions, but in relation to which progress may, as the result of careful preliminary enquiry, seem possible. It may be hoped that the general acceptance of conventions of this nature will be facilitated by the resolutions adopted by the Eleventh Assembly on the Ratification of International Conventions concluded under the Auspices of the League of Nations. His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom believe that the full application of these resolutions, both in the letter and in the spirit, by all the Members of the League would greatly increase the efficacy of the method of codification above discussed, and would thus be in itself an effective means of promoting the development of international law which is desired.

17. Consolidation, on the other hand, should be reserved for subjects as to which it can be shown that so large a measure of agreement as to the present state of the law exists that the work of consolidation can usefully be undertaken. It is for the League to decide whether, and if so by what means, the search for such subjects should be pursued; but His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom are themselves disposed, in the light of the experience which has now been gained, to doubt the likelihood of important branches of international law being found to which the application of this method would at present be useful.

18. The above statement is the result of long and careful consideration, and is based upon the experience of the six years' work in the domain of codification which the League of Nations has already done. His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom are hopeful that it may be followed by statements, equally full and frank, of the views held by other Members of the League. They believe that such statements would greatly facilitate the deliberations of the Assembly on the subject, and might well assist in securing a common understanding and a general agreement concerning this most important matter.

For their part, they are satisfied that it is on the lines above discussed, coupled, of course, with the continuous operation of the first process mentioned above, that a steady and fruitful development of international law seems most likely to be attained; and they would, therefore, suggest that it is to the possibility of progress in this direction that the attention of the League, and of the non-member States concerned, should primarily be directed.

They desire to conclude these observations by reaffirming once more their belief that, if the other Members of the League are in agreement in the general views above put forward, a great work for the development of international law can be accomplished through the instrumentality of the League.

India.

(Letter of May 11th, 1931.)

While the Government of India have no detailed observations to offer, they consider it doubtful, in the light of the results achieved by the First Conference on this subject held at The Hague last year, whether further attempts at codification in the near future would yield any practical results. In their view it would be preferable for the present that international law should be left to develop by the existing methods, such as the adoption of conventions through the machinery of the technical organs of the League, the decisions of the Permanent Court of International Justice and of International Arbitral Tribunals, and the agreements which are entered into by limited groups of States.

The Government of India consider it prudent therefore that the codification method should not be further employed until conditions would appear to be more favourable, and the prospects of its successful employment in particular cases is more assured.

(Letter of May 27th, 1931.)

In reply to Circular Letter 21.1931.V from the Secretary-General of the League of Nations, dated February 27th, 1931, the Polish delegation has the honour to inform him that the Polish Government agrees that it is expedient to continue the work for the progressive codification of international law.

Further, the Polish Government thinks it would be well to convene a special Committee of Legal Experts to prepare for further work in this field, in accordance with the proposal submitted to the last Assembly by the Government of the Irish Free State.

Estonia.

(Letter of June 19th, 1931.)

I have the honour to inform you that the competent Estonian authorities have not yet been able to complete their examination of the report of the work of the First Conference for the Codification of International Law, together with the proposals of the Assembly and the Council and the draft resolutions proposed by various delegations in the First Committee of the Assembly; the question is an important and far-reaching one and calls for very careful and thorough consideration. The Estonian Government does not, therefore, yet feel prepared to formulate its observations on the subject. Nevertheless, as regards the recommendations adopted by the First Conference for the Codification of International Law, the Estonian Government entirely agrees with these recommendations and expresses the hope that the future work for the codification of international law may be inspired by the suggestions they contain. Moreover, my Government greatly appreciates the recommendations of the Conference concerning the preparation by the League of Nations of future international conferences.

As regards the organisation which might be adopted and the procedure which might be followed, I regret that I cannot at present transmit to you any definite suggestions on this subject, but I hope that the Estonian delegation to the twelfth Assembly will return to the question either in the plenary meetings or at the competent Assembly Committee.

United States of America.

(Letter of June 23rd, 1931.)

The Government of the United States considers that the steps looking to the codification of international law, initiated by the Assembly of the League on September 22nd, 1924, and resulting in the Conference held at The Hague in March and April of last year, should be continued, and that it is important that very careful preparation on the subjects deemed to be ripe for codification should be made well in advance of the calling of an international conference. On the basis of the experience at the Hague Conference in 1930, the Secretary of State would suggest that any conference called in the future should be limited to the codification of one or not more than two subjects. It is also felt that greater progress would be made toward codification if subjects were chosen for the first few conferences which are less controversial than some of the more complicated subjects.

[1] See document A.12.1931.V : V. Legal. 1931.V.4. page 6.

As to the mode of procedure to be followed, it is believed that the procedure suggested in the recommendations made by the Hague Conference would be likely to attain satisfactory results. It is suggested, however, that, after observations have been received from the various Governments on the draft Conventions referred to in paragraph 3 of those recommendations, a revised draft or drafts might be prepared and circularised with the comments of the Governments on the first draft, and that these new drafts, together with the comments by the Governments, should be communicated to the various Governments sufficiently well in advance of the conference as to enable the Governments to study the drafts and comments and to formulate their views thereon.

It is noted from the draft resolutions submitted by certain delegations, incorporated in the report of the First Committee (document A.82.1930.V), that distinctions are drawn between customary international law and new rules designed to govern relations between States, and that the view has been expressed that the term " codification " as applied to the work for the development of international law undertaken by the League of Nations should be understood as relating to the latter. It is believed that conventions adopted should be declaratory of existing customary law on the subjects dealt with, supplemented by such enlargements as are demanded by modern conditions.

The Secretary of State takes pleasure in recognising the value of the work done at the Hague Conference of 1930. The Government of the United States signed, on December 31st, 1930, the Protocol relating to Military Obligations in Certain Cases of Double Nationality. It is regretted that, because of the unsatisfactory provisions on two important points—expatriation and the nationality of married women—the Government of the United States was unable to sign the Convention on Nationality, the principal agreement concluded at that Conference.

France.

[Translation.]

(Letter of July 23rd, 1931.)

Since the League of Nations first undertook work for the progressive codification of international law, the method contemplated has been the conclusion of international conventions on selected subjects. This method of conventions signed and ratified by the Governments was followed at the Conference which met at The Hague in March-April 1930, and is the method contemplated in the recommendations of the Conference.

It is necessary to bear in mind that to attempt to negotiate and conclude conventions with the object of setting out the rules of customary law in the form of written law would involve a danger of creating unnecessary difficulties and, inter alia, of throwing doubt upon the existence of particular rules which an international judge, as, for example, the Permanent Court of International Justice, would have been in a position to recognise. It appears, therefore, that codification by way of conventions ought not to be directed towards the laying down of rules which would be declared to be already part of existing international law.

The method of conventions signed and ratified by the Governments, or open to their accession, is, on the other hand, appropriate for the establishment of rules which are to be accepted by the Governments as henceforward applicable in their mutual relations without prejudging what may be the rules which the common law of nations applies as regards the matters dealt with in the conventions. In drawing up conventions of this character, account will naturally be taken of the common law of nations, with a view to reaffirming it or with a view to advancing beyond it; but the two aspects of international law would remain distinct. The question whether the law which will thus be laid down in conventions may have operated to modify the customary law will remain to be examined in each case by legal science or to be settled by judicial decisions.

The above distinction appears to be of great importance as regards continuation of the work of codification.

A good method for selecting subjects, and for preliminary study of the subjects selected, is necessary. On this point the Hague Conference made suggestions of the highest value. The suggestion that the draft conventions should be drawn up in the light of all the data of science might be reinforced by contemplating the possibility of consulting the principal institutions devoted to the study of international law. To do so might make the preparatory work slower, but this disadvantage does not seem very serious. On the other hand, it will in general be wise not to submit to the same conference too many or too desperate questions. Concentration of attention seems likely to increase the chances of success.

It seems desirable that the drafts and the conventions should contain only really essential provisions, to the exclusion of rules on points of detail or of a secondary character. The conclusion of the conventions would thereby be facilitated and their permanence better assured. In this connection, account must be taken of the development of international tribunals whose proper function it will be to apply in particular cases the principles on which agreement has been obtained.

Finally, all the preparatory work, the importance of which has been pointed out by the Hague Conference, should, from the very outset, be supported by a very copious documentation as to the data of science and practice.

It is evident that the League, while assuming the initiative and ensuring co-ordination, must, as it has always done, seek the co-operation of non-member States in the progressive codification of international law.

Irish Free State.

(Letter of July 20th, 1931.)

1. With reference to the Secretary-General's Circular Letter 21.1931.V, of February 27th last, with enclosures, on the subject of the codification of international law, the Irish Government have the honour to submit the following observations for communication to the Assembly at its forthcoming session. In formulating these observations, the Irish Government have had before them the observations of the Cuban, British, Indian, Lithuanian and Polish Governments contained in document A.12.1931.V, Series I.

2. The Irish Government would emphasise the fundamental importance of developing the rule of law in the relations between States. They believe that it is essential to the progress of justice and the maintenance of peace to define, improve and develop international law, and that justice and peace can best be promoted and maintained by a system of law which is in form precise and clear and which is general and equal in its application. The development and the maintenance of a comprehensive and effective body of international law is, therefore, one of the most important tasks confronting the States of the world.

3. The existing position of international law is, in the opinion of the Irish Government, susceptible of improvement in two directions.

4. In the first place, the creation of new rules of international law to meet new situations and circumstances in international life, and the alteration of existing rules of international law to meet the changed situation of affairs, are tasks which all the States of the world should undertake in concert and pursue consciously and deliberately as an essential part of the work of the progressive organisation of world peace. The extent of the work of this nature which has been completed, or undertaken, by the League of Nations and other agencies is well known. But this work covers only a relatively small portion of the field of international relationships. The rules of international law developed before the war of nations were the result of a spontaneous and instinctive growth from sources such as custom, the practice of States, the decisions of international tribunals and treaties of high authority—a growth more or less independent of the control of the general body of States and their Governments—and not the result of the purposive pursuit of an international order based upon just and general legal rules. Serious doubt may be entertained as to the extent to which rules of law, derived from the sources just enumerated and developed at a time when no organisation existed which had as its object the conscious promotion and maintenance of universal peace, can continue to command authority in an age in which the co-operation of States for common ends—by treaties and otherwise—has become the accepted instrument of the progress of the world. Undue delay, moreover, in bringing the rules of international law into conformity with the new facts and relationships of international life may impair the organisation of peace and imperil its objects.

5. In the second place, the existing system of international law is open to serious criticism on the ground of its form. The form of law, and particularly of international law, is of paramount importance. If the rules of law are not clear or if they are not readily accessible to those who seek them, the law itself cannot influence conduct. If the prescriptions of the law are ambiguous or uncertain, conflicts as to legal rights are more likely to arise, and greater difficulty is likely to be encountered in bringing them to a satisfactory settlement. It is of considerable importance therefore that the rules of international law, both those already in existence and those being created and to be created hereafter by international legislation, should, so far as possible, be framed in a simple, accessible and unequivocal form.

6. In the opinion of the Irish Government, the progressive improvement of the existing body of international law in the two directions indicated is pre-eminently a task for the League of Nations. The League would, of course, invite the States non-members of the League to participate in its work in this connection.

7. The Irish Government consider that the question of the methods, organisation, etc., to be adopted by the League in the pursuit of this task were best entrusted to the consideration of a technical committee, in conformity with the proposal made by the Irish delegation at the First Committee of the Eleventh Assembly. They feel, however, that it may be useful if they indicate at this stage their views as to the lines upon which the future activity of the League in this field should be organised.

8. Before doing so, however, it may be well to refer to the difficulties which have arisen in connection with the employment of the term "codification" to describe the activity hitherto pursued by the League in connection with the development of international law. The Irish Government realise the confusion which has been occasioned by the undifferentiated use of the term "codification" to describe both the process of reducing the existing law to a clear and definite form, and the process of stating in a clear and definite form those new rules by which the States may agree to be bound. The confusion which has arisen in the past in connection with the use of the term "codification" has made it necessary to draw a distinction between the two processes just described, but the Irish Government nevertheless feel that it is possible to exaggerate the practical importance of maintaining this distinction in the organisation of the future work of the League in connection with the development of international law. The aim and object of that work should, in the opinion of the Irish Government, be to produce simple and unequivocal statements of the law to which States find it possible to give their express agreement. It may be anticipated that in many cases these statements would simply amount to statements of the law as it already exists : in other cases, they will contain new principles or amendments of existing rules. But in either case an important and valuable work will have been achieved if there are produced clear and unequivocal statements of rules by which States expressly agree to be mutually bound and which they recognise as clearly defining their mutual rights and obligations with regard to the subject-matter concerned.

9. The Irish Government suggest that the future organisation to be adopted by the League in pursuit of the objects defined in the preceding paragraphs might be as follows :

(a) A committee should be set up, similar to the Preparatory Commission for the Disarmament Conference or the Committee of Arbitration and Security—i.e., it should consist of representatives of Governments who would possess the necessary technical qualifications. Steps should be taken to ensure that the different civilisations and legal systems would be represented on the committee, which should also include representatives of the principal States non-members of the League.

(b) It would be the function of this committee to make proposals to the Assembly at its annual session with regard to the subjects on which general acts or conventions might be prepared. The choice of those subjects would be made by the committee with special regard to the likelihood of a successful codification of law in relation to them by the method now proposed. Such proposals should be accompanied by explanatory memoranda, and should be in the hands of the various Governments in sufficient time before the opening of the Assembly to enable them to give definite instructions to their delegates, both with regard to the desirability of preparing general acts or conventions with regard to the subject-matters proposed and with regard to the principles or rules which any general acts or conventions dealing with these matters should embody. The proposals of the committee should be considered by the First Committee of the Assembly.

(c) If the First Committee and the Assembly approved the proposals, the committee should be instructed to prepare, for submission to the Assembly at a future session, general acts or conventions dealing with the proposed subject-matters.

(d) The committee should then proceed to the preparation of draft general acts or conventions dealing with the approved subject-matters. It would be for the committee to decide whether specific questionnaires should be addressed to the various Governments before the committee proceeds to draw up the texts of the draft general acts or conventions.

(e) The texts of the draft general acts or conventions prepared by the committee (together with the answers to the questionnaires, if any) should be communicated to the Governments in sufficient time to enable them to give definite instructions to their delegates on the First Committee of the Assembly with regard to the draft general acts or conventions.

(f) The draft general acts or conventions drawn up by the committee should then be considered by the First Committee. As a result of this consideration, the First Committee may decide to refer back these instruments for reconsideration by the committee in the light of the views expressed by the delegates of Governments at the First Committee; or it may decide to ask the Assembly to approve these instruments and to recommend their definite acceptance by the Governments.

If the Assembly approves the instruments, they should at once be thrown open for acceptance by States. Acceptance of the general acts or conventions approved by the Assembly would be by means of accession, as in the case of the General Act of 1928 for the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes. Their provisions would be expressed to apply only as between the parties to them. They would contain saving clauses relating to the existing principles and rules of international law, similar to those inserted in the instruments concluded at the First Codification Conference held at The Hague in March-April 1930, and they would also contain provision for their periodical revision.

Italy.

[Translation.]

(Letter of June 8th, 1931.)

The Italian Government doubts whether the work of codifying international law can be resumed by the League of Nations in the near future. The attention of the Members of the League has already been drawn to numerous urgent questions, so that a full programme of work lies before the League for a considerable period, during which obvious reasons of expediency suggest that no other tasks of a general nature should be undertaken unless they are shown to be of immediate urgency.

The Italian Government recognises, however, the advantages of following the suggestions contained in the recommendations adopted by the Hague Conference of 1930 as soon as it appears possible to continue the work of codification.

The Italian Government would point out that the method indicated in the text of Recommendation IV for the preparation of future conferences on codification has been given a more general character, and greater precision by paragraph IV of the first resolution adopted by the Assembly of the League of Nations on October 3rd, 1930, concerning the ratification of conventions concluded under the auspices of the League, a resolution to which the Italian Government subscribed.

The Italian Government therefore considers that it is rather in accordance with this resolution that the preparatory work for future codification conferences should be carried on, as also that for any other conference summoned to conclude a general convention.

But it desires to express its full agreement with the last suggestion in the above-mentioned Recommendation IV, which is not expressly reproduced in the resolution concerning ratification. According to this suggestion, the Council would place on the agenda of the conference such subjects as had been approved by the great majority of the Powers called upon to take part. It seems likely that this procedure would provide a sufficient guarantee that only questions genuinely ripe for codification would be submitted to the conference.

Lastly, the Italian Government is of opinion that future conferences should not deal with several questions at a time. The practical difficulties involved by dealing at the same time with questions of an entirely different character, from the point of view both of the composition of the delegations and of the organisation of the conference, greatly outweigh the advantage represented by a certain saving of time.

Japan.

[Translation.]

(Letter of June 16th, 1931.)

The Japanese Government is, in principle, in favour of the adoption of Recommendation IV passed by the Hague Conference on the procedure to be followed regarding the future Conference on the Progressive Codification of International Law. The Japanese Government would, nevertheless, point out that:

1. Judging by the experience of the last Hague Conference, the Japanese Government considers that it would be well, in order to facilitate the success of the future Conference, to frame the preliminary draft Convention in the way suggested in Recommendation IV, paragraph 2;

2. The question of setting up a committee or commission to prepare the preliminary draft is of great importance. The body in question might well be composed of members representing the principal legal systems of the world, in accordance with the rules adopted for the election of members of the Permanent Court of International Justice (cf. Article 9 of the Statute of the Court);

3. Contrary to what happened at The Hague, the body which prepares the preliminary draft Convention should avail itself more freely of opportunities to support its preliminary draft at the future Conference;

4. In establishing this preliminary draft, the body concerned might with advantage consult the authorities on legal science in all countries dealing with wage problems.

Latvia.

[Translation.]

(Letter received on July 4th, 1931.)

The Latvian Government has no special observation to make in regard to the progressive codification of international law, but recognises the expediency of continuing the investigations in accordance with the recommendations made by the First Conference held at The Hague in March and April 1930.

The Netherlands.

[Translation.]

(Letter of June 22nd, 1931.)

The Netherlands Government agrees unreservedly with the view expressed in the eleventh Assembly's resolution regarding the great importance for the League of Nations of the development of international law by codification. The League should, in its opinion, expedite this progress by every means in its power.

The recommendations drawn up by the 1930 Codification Conference, as well as the draft resolutions proposed by different delegations in the eleventh Assembly's First Committee—recommendations and draft resolutions which the Governments are invited to consider—deal with two main points:

(1) What is understood by the term "codification" as applied to the work for the development of international law undertaken by the League of Nations?

(2) Under what conditions and by what methods can this work of codification be best carried out?

1. As regards the League's task in connection with codification, the Netherlands Government agrees with the idea expressed in the draft resolutions submitted by several delegations to the First Committee of the eleventh Assembly. The task should consist in the embodiment, in international conventions, of definite rules, either based on customary international law or being entirely new law, to govern such forms of inter-State relations as it may seem immediately practical and important to regulate by general agreement. The Hague Conference has proved that it is better not to try to distinguish between matters involving the conversion of well-defined customary law into conventional rules and matters for which more or less new rules are being drawn up. The distinction between these two forms of codification would not, in practice, always be clear. The same codification might be considered by certain States as the creation of new law, and by others, for which the rules in question were already customary, as a consolidation of customary into conventional law. As is stated in the Belgian proposal, new elements are often necessarily introduced in any endeavour to determine existing customary law. While recognising customary law as an important source for the work of codification, it must, however, be admitted—as the resolutions submitted by the Belgian delegation and by the British, French, German, Greek and Italian delegations have already done—that it is not within the province of the organs dealing with codification to state that any particular rule of international law should be considered as customary law. The task of determining customary law is one for science and the courts.

2. As regards the procedure to be followed where codification is concerned, the Netherlands Government agrees with the resolution adopted by the eleventh Assembly that the recommendations made by the 1930 Conference contain suggestions of the highest value and should be taken into account in examining what would be the best methods for continuing the work which has been begun. The following observations are suggested by Recommendation IV, which deals, in particular, with the procedure to be followed in preparing the work of codification.

The resolution provides for a committee entrusted with the task of selecting a certain number of subjects suitable for codification by convention. It would seem desirable that an organ within the League of Nations, responsible for considering whether it would be advisable to undertake codification in those spheres of international life for which the League has created no special organ and which thus run the risk of being somewhat neglected, should exist alongside the technical organisations which—each in its own domain—prepare conventions and are thus constantly working for codification. Nevertheless, Her Majesty's Government is doubtful whether a special committee is necessary for this purpose, and whether it would not be better to leave the task to the First Committee of the Assembly. It must be remembered that few questions in the sphere envisaged are at the moment ripe for international regulation. A special committee set up for this purpose might, moreover, be forced by circumstances to draw up proposals with no immediate prospect of realisation. There is a certain danger in this. Either the efforts will be doomed to failure or will result in international conventions containing a minimum of rules and constituting a step backward rather than an advance, from the point of view of international law.

The First Committee may be considered as being especially well qualified to carry out the task to which the resolution refers—namely, the selection of subjects codification of which seems prima facie not only possible but desirable from the practical point of view. If this item were placed on the agenda of each year's session of the Committee—which might set up a sub-committee for the purpose—the question of the development of codification would, without fail, be given due consideration every year, while certain drawbacks involved in the creation of a permanent committee would, on the other hand, be avoided.

The First Committee's report, after adoption by the Assembly, should be communicated to the Governments for their opinion, in accordance with the procedure suggested in the resolution, and the Council, with these opinions in mind, would decide whether the study of the proposed question should be continued. A special ad hoc committee, with a very small number of members, might be set up to consider each question approved; it would be entrusted with the task of preparing a preliminary draft convention based on scientific and practical experience. The preliminary draft convention, in conformity with paragraph 3 of the resolution, would be communicated to the Governments with a request for their observations on the essential points. The Governments' replies could first be communicated to the special committee, which would, if necessary, give its opinion as to whether they should be included on the agenda. The committee's suggestions would be communicated to the Governments, together with the replies referred to in paragraph 4.

The Netherlands Government considers the procedure proposed in paragraph 4—that, after submitting the draft convention to the Governments, the desirability of laying it before a conference shall be examined afresh—as an improvement on the procedure followed up till now. The Government feels that the unsatisfactory results of the 1930 Conference were perhaps in part due to the fact that the Preparatory Committee, after receiving the Governments' replies regarding the bases of discussion, was not competent to give an opinion on this question of the desirability of a conference, and that no other organ of the League of Nations gave the matter serious consideration.

The proposed procedure would mean that the Governments would be consulted more than once and would thus have every opportunity of expressing their opinion as to the desirability of a conference. The Netherlands Government hopes that Governments, in replying, will fully realise their responsibility, and that each reply will represent, not the opinion of a single lawyer or high official, but the Government's own point of view, established after consulting the competent organs and administrative services.

The Netherlands Government considers that the stipulation in paragraph 5, that only such subjects as are formally approved by a very large majority of the Powers taking part in the conference shall form part of its programme, should be interpreted as meaning that the Council would be quite free to convene a conference in which all the Members of the League of Nations would not necessarily take part. Although any accentuation of existing divergencies should be avoided, it might be desirable, if necessary, to convene a conference composed only of those Members of the League who had given their consent to a preliminary draft, in order to attain partial or regional codification. The Conferences on Bills of Exchange and Cheques have proved the advantages of such codification.

The Council, when deciding on the conference's programme, could at the same time take the necessary steps for the preparation of a draft convention, revised on the basis of the replies received. This new draft, which might be drawn up by the special committee, should be circulated to the Governments.

The Netherlands Government prefers to leave aside for the moment the question whether consideration of the three subjects dealt with at the 1930 Conference should be undertaken afresh. In conclusion, it would point out that no method of procedure for the preparation of conferences can guarantee success in the matter of codification. The essential thing is, as always, the co-operation of the Governments in that spirit of international goodwill which is a necessary means to the end. If the Governments' chief desire is to maintain their national points of view as typified by their own legislation, if they are not prepared to make concessions in order to bring about common regulations, codification will be doomed to failure, and every improvement in the method of preparation will but act as a further bar to success.

Sweden.

[Translation.]

(Letter of July 6th, 1931.)

The Royal Government considers it most important that the League of Nations should continue the work already begun on the codification of international law. The results of the First Codification Conference were, it is true, of little practical value. The Swedish Government is, however, of opinion that, instead of discouraging Governments from going forward with the work in hand, this fact should rather induce them to ensure that the questions to be dealt with by a general conference are more adequately prepared. The Royal Government, therefore, endorses the suggestions embodied in the recommendations of the Hague Conference, No. IV of which outlines a valuable preparatory procedure.

When this question was discussed by the eleventh Assembly, certain delegations supported the view that, for the future, the League of Nations should limit its work of codification to matters requiring the establishment of rules of law entirely new in character to govern such forms of private inter-State relations as it might seem immediately practical and important to regulate by general agreement. These delegations were of opinion that the League of Nations should make no further attempt at the determination and codification of existing customary law.

The Swedish Government is not convinced that it is wise to begin by excluding certain important subjects from the preliminary investigations in view of a new codification conference. The customary law of nations is a singularly vague conception, and several of the principles of law which it is made to include are so general that courts of law find it difficult to use them as the basis of decisions, while in other instances they give rise to differences of opinion involving considerable practical inconvenience. It is also conceivable that the principles of the customary law of a previous age no longer meet the needs of our time, and consequently require revising by means of international legislation taking the form of a general convention.

The Swedish Government, however, considers that it is not to a codification conference that one should assign the task of defining the scope and effect of existing customary law. This task, in its opinion, belongs rather to the international courts and to writers on doctrine. A codification conference should adopt such principles as it deems necessary and valuable without deciding whether their adoption constitutes a consecration or a revision of existing customary law. It is to this extent only that the Swedish Government supports the view that a future codification conference should not concern itself with the determination of customary international law.

The Royal Government is, therefore, of opinion that the committee entrusted with the preliminary work of deciding what questions are suitable for codification should also be left free to examine matters in respect of which rules of customary law are thought already to exist, if it considers that codification of the law relating to them would be advantageous from a practical point of view—whether because the existing rules are not generally recognised, are too vague for courts of law to use them as the basis of decisions, or stand in need of revision.

The Government of the Republic is following with great interest the work of the League of Nations on this subject; its policy has been guided by the results already achieved in this domain. It is prepared to co-operate in any action which may be undertaken under the auspices of the League of Nations with a view to the progressive codification of international law.

[Translation.]

(Letter of August 24th, 1931.)

The Finnish Government is thoroughly convinced of the importance of widening the sphere of international law by means of codification, and is therefore very favourably disposed towards all measures aiming at a progressive codification of international law.

With regard to the recommendations formulated by the first Codification Conference which met at The Hague, and the resolutions of the last Assembly bearing on the same question, my Government approves in substance of the ideas therein expressed, but desires to emphasise and develop certain points which were embodied in these resolutions.

When preparations for future codification work are made, the Finnish Government thinks it advisable to avoid all work likely to lead to duplication, so that the codification conferences and their preparatory organisations should not be called upon to deal with questions which have already been referred to other international organisations and institutions for consideration. The codification conferences should, in the first instance, be entrusted with the task of attempting to unify the existing rules or to formulate new uniform rules in the legal sphere affecting the mutual relations of Governments.

When the time comes to determine, within this range, the questions which ought to be considered, the Finnish Government believes that attention should be paid chiefly to the practical aspect of these questions, and that, accordingly, the problems to be approached in the first instance are those in relation to which it is established that the unification of existing rules or the formulation of new rules would fulfil an actual and wide-felt need. Further, a fact, which appears to have been borne out by experience, must not be lost sight of—namely, that it is easier to formulate more or less new rules bearing on treaty law than to agree upon what is to be regarded, at any given moment, as a general rule of unwritten international law. My Government considers, however, that, in the work of codification, unwritten international law should not necessarily be entirely neglected. As far as the definition and interpretation of the conception of "codification" is concerned, the Finnish Government adopts as a starting-point the formula suggested by the Swedish and Norwegian delegations at the last session of the Assembly.

The organisation responsible for the preparation of a codification conference must be in close contact with the organisations and authorities which, in practice, are responsible for the questions selected, particularly with the competent Sections of the Secretariat of the League and its various Committees. As soon as the subjects for discussion have thus been chosen, regard being had to the practical aspects, the most thorough preparatory work will have to be undertaken: in addition to the continual assistance of the aforementioned special authorities and technical bodies, recourse should be had to scientific preparation, which might be carried out by well-known international associations or smaller scientific societies, and even by the individual experts in different countries. In this connection, the Finnish Government considers that, in order to co-ordinate the preparatory work for the codification of international law, it would be worth while to arrange for closer co-operation than hitherto between the Committee of Experts for the progressive codification of international law and the Institute of International Law. This Committee's work would thus be facilitated.

In the course of this preparation, the opinion of the Governments concerned may, as far as necessary, be requested from time to time on the questions selected, so that, when the conference is summoned, there will be broad agreement upon the draft resolution used as the basis of discussion.

The question whether it will be necessary, in order to apply the procedure outlined above, to appoint fresh committees of experts or to consider the possibility of another division of the existing committee into sections to which might perhaps be attached technical experts of the League according to the question to be examined is one which at the present stage of the codification drafts it would probably be premature to go into.

Portugal.

[Translation.]

(Letter of August 28th, 1931.)

The Portuguese Government is in agreement with the recommendations of the Hague Conference. It is of opinion that the work of codification should be continued without interruption, and that the preparatory work should be begun immediately, seeing that the success of future conferences largely depends on this preparatory work. The Portuguese Government desires to add that, to enable this preparatory work to be brought to a successful conclusion, steps should be taken to ensure the active co-operation of institutes, academies and associations of international law. The work of such institutions, which is always of great value, would, in the present case, be of real practical worth by reason of its being purposely directed to a definite end. It would lead, moreover, to a more general discussion in the legal Press, and the effects of such a discussion might yield certain advantages.

From among the various draft resolutions submitted to the First Committee of the Assembly in 1930, the one put forward by the German, British, French, Greek and Italian delegations should be singled out as of particular importance. In accordance with this resolution, the term "codification", as applied to the work of development of international law undertaken by the League of Nations, should be taken as implying the fixing, in international conventions freely accepted by States, of precise rules based on international law, whether customary or of an entirely new character, and not the establishment and progressive development of customary international law as the gradual outcome of the practice of States and of the progress of international jurisprudence. Two other draft resolutions were submitted on these lines—that of the Swedish and Norwegian delegations and that of the Belgian delegate, M. Rolin.

The Portuguese Government sees no advantage in this form of prior limitation of the work of codification of international law. In its opinion, everything should be subordinated to questions and circumstances as they arise. Consequently, it thinks that no restrictions of whatever nature should be introduced at present. On the contrary, a very wide view of the problem of the codification of international law should be taken. In order to achieve and to expedite this codification, it is desirable that the greatest efforts, duly concerted, and conceived in the broadest spirit, should be put forth without interruption; that all possible means should be utilised as circumstances demand; and that an endeavour should be made to produce a result corersponding in practice to the needs of intellectual life and the requirements of justice, yet resting on a strictly scientific basis.

Switzerland.

[Translation.]

(Letter of August 21st, 1931.)

We have the honour to inform you that Switzerland has always shown the keenest interest in the progressive codification of international law, which she considers to be closely related to the cause of international arbitration, and therefore of peace. Her attitude to this problem is still the same, and she desires to take every opportunity of indicating the importance which she attaches to the consolidation, through codification, of the bases of international law. It is, therefore, with the closest attention that the Federal Council has followed the attempts to bring the work of codification to a successful conclusion.

The problem has at present two different aspects. In the first place, an appropriate procedure must be sought for the organisation of future codification conferences and, in the second place, there must be an absolutely clear understanding as to the object which it is desired to attain. These two aspects of the problem were considered at the Hague Conference; as far as time allowed, they were also examined by the First Committee of the Assembly.

In regard to the first point, relating to the procedure which should be followed in the preparation of conferences, the Federal Council, like the First Committee of the Assembly, fully recognises the great value of the suggestions put forward at The Hague. In its opinion, the most important point is to ensure that the procedure finally adopted is likely to guarantee to future conferences the fullest measure of success. Advantage should be taken of the experience gained at the first Hague Conference. No new conferences should be summoned unless tangible results are almost certain. From this point of view, the method suggested by the Hague Conference is satisfactory; for, after the threefold consultation of the Governments recommended in the resolution adopted at The Hague, there will be little doubt as to the expediency or inexpediency of drawing up, at a given time, uniform rules on a specified question.

It might be desirable, however, having regard to the last Assembly's investigations on the "preparatory procedure" to be followed in the negotiation of conventions in general, to consider whether the method recommended at The Hague could not be improved by allowing the Assembly, in the same way as the Council, to express an opinion on the choice of subjects for codification. The recommendation of the Hague Conference rules out any action on the part of the Assembly. Section IV of the resolution on the ratification of international conventions concluded under the auspices of the League of Nations provides, however, that, when a draft convention has been prepared at the request of the Council, and the comments of the Governments have been obtained, the Assembly "shall decide whether to propose to the Council to convoke the contemplated conference". The Assembly's powers would obviously not be excessive. It would have nothing more than the right of proposal.

A revision along these lines of the general plan outlined by the first Codification Conference would offer no serious difficulties. Instead of merely providing, as in Section 5 of the Hague recommendation, that "the Council might then place on the programme of the conference such subjects as were formally approved by a very large majority of the Powers which would take part therein", it should be specified that the Council should only take action following a proposal by the Assembly. This method of procedure would appear to be more in keeping with the general practice in regard to international conventions. As far as we are aware, indeed, the Council has never summoned a world conference except at the formal request of the Assembly. In view of the numerous difficulties invariably encountered when any attempt is made to achieve progress in the sphere of normative law, it would appear desirable—in this matter even more than in others—that each step forward should be taken with authority of an organ, such as the Assembly, representing all the competing interests and all the conceptions which will be met with at every codification conference.

The second aspect of the problem, that relating to the object of codification, had been considered by the Federal Council even before the first Codification Conference at The Hague. The question to be decided is as follows: Will the codification conventions drawn up at The Hague be declaratory or enactory? Will they merely state the law as it exists or will they create new law? Will their object be to convert customary law into written law? Or, while leaving customary law intact, will they attempt, in respect of a given subject, to enact a number of rules intended, on the one hand, to define the scope of a customary law which is not always as clear or reliable as it might be and, on the other hand, to introduce certain new principles in an existing law the deficiencies of which no one would deny? In other words, does the conventional law elaborated at The Hague supplant customary law or supplement it?

The Federal Council is of opinion that such new law cannot have the effect of merely supplanting the old. The old law, which is derived from international practice or the decisions of international tribunals, or from both combined, remains in force in its entirety. Otherwise, we should be forced to the conclusion that States not bound by the new conventions are free from all obligations. International law would be shaken to its very foundations, and codification accepted in this sense would cause irreparable harm.

It is not the task of codification conferences to register existing international law, but to lay down rules which it would appear desirable to introduce into international relations in regard to the subjects dealt with. Their work should, therefore, mark an advance on the present state of international law. In certain cases, indeed, it would be extremely difficult to say what the existing law really is, as it is not clearly known or is a matter of controversy. It would be most unfortunate if the attempt to discover an adequate solution of an important problem were abandoned on the ground that no such solution is to be found in the existing positive law. One of the fundamental tasks of codification conferences should be to choose between disputed rules and, within the limits of their agenda, to fill up the gaps in a law whose deficiencies and obscurities are obvious.

The experience gained at The Hague has, moreover, shown clearly that, if a conference were empowered—supposing this to be possible—to state the existing rules of international law, the results might be disastrous. It has been proved that the conception of existing international law current in the various States or groups of States is very different. In some of them it may be extremely liberal, in others much less so. It is therefore beyond question that, on a number of subjects, unanimous agreement would be unattainable without mutual concessions. But, if existing law is to be enunciated in conventions at the cost of concessions which, in fact, would mark a retrograde movement, the law which would emerge from such bargaining would no longer represent what the friends of legal progress could rightly regard as the existing law; it would be a compromise law, a law impaired and weakened. To accept this law as the expression of the only law in force would amount for many to a disavowal of progress. The only reasonable course is to accept such compromise law as a second best, as a kind of supplementary law in no way affecting those rules of customary law which are not incompatible with the new rules. That conventional law and customary law should thus exist side by side would undoubtedly complicate international jurisprudence, but such a state of affairs is inevitable. Customary law is stable; that is one of its virtues. But, if its stability degenerated into immutability, the virtue would become a defect. The law would become petrified, and we should be apt to forget the principle of evolution which is the guiding rule of life. This disadvantage, however, can be remedied by means of conventional law, which, by definition and by nature, is open to revision. The possibility of excessive rigidity in the one will be corrected by the suppleness of the other, and the latter's tendency to variability will be held in check by the comparative stability of the former. A kind of balance will thus be struck between the two kinds of law. The Federal Council is therefore of opinion that the Assembly should abide by the sound principle which forms the basis of one of the draft resolutions submitted at its last session—namely, that the law laid down in codification conferences must not impair the force of customary law, " which should result progressively from the practice of States and the development of international jurisprudence ".

ANNEX 5.

PROGRESSIVE CODIFICATION OF INTERNATIONAL LAW.

DRAFT RESOLUTION PROPOSED BY THE DELEGATIONS OF BELGIUM, DENMARK, FINLAND, JAPAN, THE NETHERLANDS, NORWAY, SWEDEN AND SWITZERLAND.

The Assembly recalls that the resolution of September 22nd, 1924, emphasised the progressive character of the codification of international law which should be undertaken, and, in view of the recommendations of the First Conference on the Codification of International Law held at The Hague in 1930, it decides to continue the work of codification with the object of drawing up conventions which will place the relations of States on a legal and secure basis without jeopardising the customary international law which should result progressively from the practice of States and the development of international jurisprudence. To this end, the Assembly decides to establish the following procedure for the future :

(1) Any State or group of States, whether members of the League or not, may propose to the Assembly a subject or subjects with respect to which codification by international conventions should be undertaken. Such proposals should be sent to the Secretary-General in time to allow of their being inserted in the agenda of the Assembly circulated four months before the opening of the session.

(2) Any such proposals will be considered by the Assembly, which will decide whether the subject proposed is one in respect of which an attempt at codification is likely to be useful.

(3) If the investigation of the proposed subject is approved by the Assembly and if no existing organ of the League is competent to deal with it, the Assembly will ask the Council to set up a committe of experts, who will be asked to prepare a draft convention on the subject, to be reported to the Council.

(4) The Council will transmit such report to the Assembly, which will then determine whether the subject is provisionally to be retained as a subject for codification, and if this is determined affirmatively the Assembly will ask the Council to transmit the said report to the Governments of the Members of the League and non-member States for their comments; opportunity will be given to the committee of experts to revise the draft in the light of such comments.

(5) If the committee does not see any reason to revise the draft, it will be transmitted, together with the comments of the Governments, to the Assembly, which will then determine finally whether a Codification Conference should be held to deal with the subject.

(6) If the committee of experts revises the draft, such revised draft will then be submitted to the Governments for their comments and, together with the comments received, it will be transmitted to the Assembly, which will then determine finally whether a codification conference should be held to deal with the subject.

(7) States not members of the League of Nations will be invited to participate in the work of the competent committee of the Assembly dealing with the subject in accordance with this procedure.

I. NOTE BY THE SECRETARY-GENERAL.

On October 3rd, 1930, the Assembly, having considered the question of the ratification of international conventions concluded under the auspices of the League, adopted a resolution which contained, inter alia, the following provisions :

. . . . . .

IV.

"That, in the case of all general conventions to be negotiated under the auspices of the League of Nations, the following preparatory procedure should, in principle, be followed, exception made of the cases where previous conventions or arrangements have established a special procedure or where, owing to the nature of the questions to be treated or to special circumstances, the Assembly or the Council consider other methods to be more appropriate:

"1. Where an organ of the League of Nations recommends the conclusion of a general convention on any matter, it shall prepare a memorandum explaining the objects which it is desired to achieve by the conclusion of the convention and the benefits which result therefrom. Such memorandum shall be submitted to the Council of the League of Nations.

"2. If the Council approves the proposal in principle, a first draft convention shall be prepared and communicated, together with the explanatory memorandum, to Governments, with the request that, if they feel that the draft should be taken into consideration, they shall inform the Secretary-General of their views, both with regard to the main objects or the suggested means of attaining them, and also with regard to the draft convention. In some cases, it may be desirable to annex a specific questionnaire.

"3. The draft convention and the observations of Governments (together with the answers to the questionnaire, if any) shall be communicated to the Assembly, and the Assembly shall then decide whether to propose to the Council to convoke the contemplated conference.

"4. If the Assembly recommends that a conference should be convoked, the Council shall arrange for the preparation of a draft convention in the light of the replies received from Governments, and the new draft convention (together with the replies of other Governments) shall be transmitted to each Government with a request for their opinion on the provisions of the draft and any observations on the above-mentioned replies of the other Governments.

"5. In the light of the results of this second consultation of the Governments, the Council shall decide whether the conference should be convoked and fix the date.

"6. The Council, in fixing the date for the convocation of a conference, shall endeavour, as far as possible, to avoid two League of Nations conferences being held simultaneously, and to ensure the lapse of a reasonable interval between two conferences.

"7. The procedure set out in the preceding paragraphs will be followed as far as possible in the case of draft conventions, the desirability of which is recognised by a decision of the Assembly or as the result of a proposal by a Government.

"The above rules shall be communicated to the technical organisations of the League of Nations, and to the Governments, for the purpose of enabling the Assembly at its next session to consider whether changes should be made therein as a result of any suggestions which may be made."

The Secretary-General has the honour to communicate to the Assembly the results of the consultation of the Governments and the Technical Organisations which has been carried out in pursuance of the last paragraph of the above-quoted provisions. In accordance with that paragraph, the subject has been placed on the Assembly's agenda for the present year.

II. OBSERVATIONS OF THE GOVERNMENTS.

The following Governments approve the procedure laid down in the resolution and make no comment thereon:

Albania	Irish Free State
China	Panama
Colombia	Poland [1]
Dominican Republic	Siam
Greece	Union of South Africa
Hungary

The following Governments, while approving in general the procedure laid down in the resolution, have submitted observations on certain points of detail.

Italy. [2]

[Translation.]

The rules proposed for the preparatory procedure in regard to general conventions to be concluded under the auspices of the League of Nations appear to the Royal Government appropriate for obtaining the intended object—namely, that the conferences shall deal with drafts which [1] Poland expressly reserves the right to submit observations during the discussion at the Assembly.

[2] The Italian Government at the same time expresses its agreement with other provisions of the Assembly's decision—namely, the approval of the preparation of tabular statements showing the position in regard to signature and ratification of conventions, the draft protocol of signature approved for adoption by conferences with a view to facilitating the entry into force of conventions, and the suggestion that, in some cases, it may be possible for conventions to be given the form of agreements which are not subject to ratification.

all the Governments have had time to examine thoroughly and in which account has already been taken of the point of view expressed by the various Governments. No change or amplification of the rules appears necessary. The Royal Government considers, however, that it should emphasise that it is desirable that the Council of the League of Nations should, in accordance with Rule 6, endeavour to avoid the holding of two conferences simultaneously or at a brief interval from one another.

Netherlands.

[Translation.]

The Netherlands Government considers advisable the insertion, between paragraphs 2 and 3, of a rule stating that the observations of Governments would first be forwarded to the organ mentioned in paragraph 1, which would, if necessary, give an opinion as to the advisability of continuing the work in hand. This organ's opinion would be annexed to the draft convention and the observations of Governments.

The Netherlands Government has certain doubts as to whether the best procedure to be followed is the submission of the documents in question to the Assembly and not, as in the proposed codification procedure [1], to the Governments. The Assembly will have to give a decision, for budgetary reasons, upon the convening of the proposed conference, but the wording of Rule 4 gives the impression that the Council's final decision will, in the main, be based on that of the Assembly, which would thus replace the replies of the Governments as to the desirability of a conference which are provided for in paragraph 4 of the rules on codification.
