INTRODUCTION

Prof. Dhananjaya Ramchandra Gadgil has been writing over a wide field of socio-economic problems for more than four decades now. It began with his dissertation on 'Industrial Evolution in India', in the early twenties at Cambridge, England, where he completed his college and University education. Soon afterwards, he entered the academic profession (after a very short spell as an officer of the Government of Bombay), first as Principal of the M.T.B. College At Surat and later as Director of the Gokhale Institute of Politics and Economics, Poona, where his writings have continued unabated to this day.

Economic history was his early interest and it has continued to be so, as would appear from his more recent writings about the rise of modern business in India. This, however, is only a facet of his underlying conviction about the empirical understanding of the economy of Indian society, indeed any society. This is manifest in his debates with Mr. Anderson on the land revenue settlement in Bombay, his early studies on marketing of fruit in Poona, and on motor bus transportation, his farm business surveys, his association with various programmes of empirical research in India, and runs through most of his writings on economic policy and planning in recent years, as well as in the orientation of the research work carried out at the Gokhale Institute. There is an early conviction in Prof. Gadgil that the abstract formulations of economic theory have to be continuously examined against the empirical reality in any socio-economic context, and no policy formulation can be meaningful without knowledge of the structure and working of the empirical world - conviction that is discussed at some length in his Banaili lectures in 1940 at the Patna University.

If he has believed in the saying 'knowledge is power', he has also believed in the vital role of social sciences in directing socio-economic behaviour. He has long been associated with various government and private agencies involved in policy making tasks. He has often been a critic of state policy, and has always sought to present alternatives in a constructive manner.

D.R. Gadgil has been more than an economist - he may very appropriately be described as a social scientist. For one, his field of interest and work, as would be clear from the list presented here, is wide, covering politics and sociology. He has written on the problem of federal constitution for India, and has forcefully advocated formation of linguistic states. At the same time, he has written extensively about the social structure in India and Maharashtra, and its role in the process of socio-economic change.

Underlying there is the thinking that economic change in India cannot be thought of in isolation, but has to be a part of the total social transformation. He visualises the full development of the Indian society, in the frame of developed "provincial (or regional) societies" in an Indian federation. His writings about the Indian social scene, his analysis of caste structure, his advocacy of linguistic provinces, his emphasis on the regional language as the medium of instruction at all stages (he was the initiator of the Indian Languages Conference at Poona in 1953), and his discussions about the nature of Indian federation, form a part of this overall view of the social setting and process in India. To be fully understood, his deep commitment to the cause of Samyukta Maharashtra or to the Poona University has to be seen in this wider context.

This also explains his continued and sustained writing in Marathi on various issues from very early days (the first one was written during his student days in England) till now - a significant list, over the decades.

His empirical studies, his analysis of the social-political scene in India, his active participation in a variety of socio-economic institutions, from the Rayat Shikshan Samstha to the Pravara Co-operative Sugar Factory, and his 'judgement' (an expression he frequently uses) based on all these, has given him a faith in a certain form of socio-economic organization, which he presents partly in his address on the co-operative commonwealth at the Punjab University, and more briefly in his concluding remarks in the seminar on economic growth at Poona.

His writings have been many and varied, spread over a wide field, in both published and unpublished form. We, therefore, thought it useful to list all of them to help students of his ideas and writings. We have tried to make this bibliography as complete as we could; but for one who has written widely and in various sources (sometimes anonymously), omissions are possible. We hope to improve at subsequent opportunities.
