NOTES.

The Munitions Case. The Government of India have done wisely in publishing a second statement fuller than the first of the circumstances surrounding the withdrawal of the Munitions case, and in taking the opportunity of stating their own opinion of the procedure adopted. The resignation of Sir Thomas Holland has been accepted by His Majesty, and there is no need, therefore, so far as he is concerned, to dwell on the disclosures contained in the last official statement. But two points are worth noting. The persistent rumour that the cases would be withdrawn, which found expression in the Legislative Assembly, seems to have actually operated as a suggestion on the mind of Sir Thomas Holland who, in his explanation to the Governor-General, stated that up to June last he was himself convinced of the desirability of continuing the prosecution. The consideration which is said to have broken down the last scruple against withdrawal, is significant. Sir Thomas Holland seems to have been long under the impression that the case would be disposed of by the Magistrate. When he came to know that it would have to go to the High Court Sessions, he felt some uncertainty about the issue, his economic conscience was aroused, and he felt the need of consulting two of his colleagues in the Government. The names of these two gentlemen are withheld in the statement on the ground of constitutional practice. We venture to think that these grounds do not apply to the present case where not the action of Government as a whole but the conduct of an individual member of it in relation to two others is concerned. Both these men "agreed to the withdrawal" though for different reasons, and neither of them suggested to Sir Thomas Holland the advisability of consulting the Viceroy on a matter so seriously calculated to involve the power and prestige of his Government. These gentlemen cannot be acquitted, to put it at the lowest, of having exhibited an insufficient appreciation of the seriousness of the matter and of their responsibility to the Viceroy. His Excellency in his generosity may condone the slight consideration to himself, but the public cannot trust the judgment of these two gentlemen who in a matter of such moment, were so completely oblivious of its bearing on the principles of Government and its certain effect on public opinion here and in England. We, therefore, think that they must share in the blame which has rendered Sir Thomas Holland's resignation imperative, and if they choose to regard themselves as vicariously absolved from it, it is necessary to point out that their position is really in some respects even more blameworthy, in that, having been approached for advice by a colleague in perplexity, they gave him wrong advice which has led to the ruin of his official career. As usual, the refusal to give their names has not prevented more or less shrewd surmises at probabilities, and we suggest that, in the interests of the whole Government, which are far more important than those of any two individuals, the constitutional practice, if it does require the omission, may be waived in this exceptional case. To our mind, there is not the least doubt that Sir Thomas Holland should be accompanied by these two gentlemen whoever they may be and whatever they may be, into retirement.

The Reforms Conference. The idea of the "Reforms Conference," which met in Bombay last week, seems to have been suggested by the necessity of finding a common and neutral denomination under which anti-Non-Co-operationists of all shades could find accommodation, and, perhaps, also of signalling the return of Mrs. Besant to India bringing in her sheaves from the law Court at Edinburgh and the famous luncheon at which she talked Indian philosophy to Lord Haldane on her right and Indian politics to Lord Lytton (or is it, Mr. Montagu?) on her left. The chairman of the Reception Committee was that "young man in a hurry", Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas, once the hero, now the bete noir, of Bombay hustings, and the audience consisted of a miscellaneous assortment mostly from the Bombay Legislative Council with the Development Member of Government and the Minister of Education to give it distinction. A comparison of the presidential address with that delivered at the 1917 Congress at Calcutta, is an instructive study in Besantine psychology. It has been our misfortune ever since Mr. Besant's first advent in this country not to be able to take her seriously as a religious teacher, social reformer or politician and her pronouncement at the Reforms Conference left one rather bored. The resolutions passed at the Conference were of the usual official "Liberal" type—longing still to pluck the flower, refuse to sow the seed." Almost every resolution consisted of two parts: the first expressed strong sympathy with the highest aim ever placed before the people on the topic concerned, while the second emphatically condemned the only effort, or the only serious effort yet made towards bringing it within practical politics. As for the Reforms from which the Conference derived its name, the Minister of Education who honoured the occasion by his presence, was a living commentary on its success or failure so far. The sinister obverse of the Reforms, illustrated by increased salaries, more appointments, exchange manipulations and stores purchase, were kept out of the picture, with only a mild resolution deprecating the 7 percent loan. The country has no reason to be jubilant over the net results of the Reforms and, while the promoters of the Conference had every right to express their sentiments, few in India are likely to regard them as an effective contribution to present-day politics.

The Trail of Fire. Foreign clothes were burnt in Lahore, Allahabad and Assam and it may be held that Mahatma Gandhi and his followers, wherever they go, are leaving a trail of fire behind—not of warfare—but of the burning of the much-needed cloth. Khulna, Ahmednagar and Kangra may well cry in vain. On a former occasion, hartals were the order of the day. We then protested against such numerous and unauthorised hartals and, amongst other reasons, it was pointed out that these hartals would only increase the price of the necessities of life, when they were taken up stupidly by the bazars on every occasion. Mahatma Gandhi gave in then, and agreeing with our contention, ordered that there should be no more such unauthorised or such frequent hartals. What applied to hartals applies in a far greater measure to this bonfire of foreign clothes going on all about the country. But that Mahatma Gandhi's Swadeshi is not much of a success is clear if one sees Bombay after he left it. Less khaddar caps and less khaddar coats are seen nowadays and it is only natural considering how artificial and how lacking in solidity and in the elements that go to make its permanence, the movement is; and what little interest the real movement aroused, has been stifled by Japanese and Mill-made khaddar. Again, Mahatma Gandhi wants us all to burn our foreign cloth because of the Turkish Treaty and because of the injustices to Angora. But a careful observer on the last Bakrid day tells us that, in Bombay—not to speak of the increased number of cows that were slaughtered this year as the Times of India report says—not even one Mohamedan in a thousand was dressed in khaddar and that almost all were to all appearances, dressed in fine and costly foreign cloth. When Mohamedans are not very enthusiastic about Angora and the Turkish Treaty as their wearing such fine and costly foreign clothes in utter disregard of Mahatma Gandhi's and Ali Brothers' frantic exhortations, shows, our correspondent wants to know why Mahatma Gandhi is dragging the whole of India unnecessarily in a movement in which even the Mahomedans seem to be so half-hearted. One cannot help pondering on this perplexing study in contrasts, of bonfire in one corner, immediately followed by still greater avidity and necessity to dress in fine clothes—foreign or swadeshi. The gap that Mahatma Gandhi and his followers are creating in the supply of cloth by these bonfires cannot be filled up by Indian-made cloths as the Mills are working to the utmost of their capacity but there will be the inevitable reaction of resorting to cheaper foreign cloth after this present force spends itself. Already, it is said profiteering is going on not only on piece-goods but also on khaddar and we are not sure even that sufficient khaddar has been produced to make up the deficiency caused by the bonfire.

'Pussyfoot' Johnson in Bombay: India heartily welcomes to her shores the great prohibitionist from America, who has come with a message of deep import to her. His visit to India was eagerly expected and not even the visit of a royal personage was so much advertised before-hand as Mr. Johnson's. All the same, it must be confessed that his stay in Bombay has not aroused as much interest as was expected. He delivered two lectures on Prohibition in America in the Sir Cowasji Jehangir Hall on Wednesday and Thursday. At the first lecture, the hall was fairly crowded; but on the second day, only the ground floor was full, the galleries being practically empty. The fall in interest was perhaps due to the difficulty to follow his American pronunciation. He, of course, spoke fairly loud and his gestures were impressive. In his lecture he paid a tribute to India's age-long abstinence policy and pithily pointed out that "they in America had simply adopted the policy of the Indians, as a nation, instead of as individuals." When a country whose people were almost all addicted to drink, could do away with it at one stroke, it should be comparatively easy for a country, the majority of whose people are abstainers, to adopt the policy so successfully adopted by America. He said that their only purpose and all they had done, had been to forbid and stop the business of making men and women drunk for profit. As he said, the only opposition to Temperance and prohibition has been from those engaged in the trade, and as for the Government's fear in the fall of revenue, he showed clearly that that was made up by gain in other respects.

Questions in the Imperial Legislature. Notices of numerous interpellations have been given for this session of the Imperial Legislature but there seems to be no interpellation on the increase of Railway fares and rates. Several Railways have already increased their fares and rates during the last few weeks and others are likely to follow suit. It is clear this is the result of the Railway Conference. But how the Government and the Railway Board allowed such increases before the Railway Committee submitted their report, passes our understanding. The present increases in fares especially under 3rd class will cause immense hardship to the myriads of the poor passengers, on the one hand; on the other, it will simply add to the dividends of Railway Companies. This periodical revision of fares and rates at the will and pleasure of Railway authorities must be stopped and should be made subject to legislative sanction and approval. These recurring increases in fares in a country of long distances, are indefensible. It is to be hoped that some questions will be asked on this matter. Likewise we miss interpellations on the very low proportion of Reparations amount allotted to India and on the £ 6, 500,000 which India is asked to give towards Persian expenditure.

Relief to Forcibly Converted Hindus: We are glad to state that steps are being considered and will soon be announced for taking back to Hinduism those forcibly converted to Islam in the Moplah disturbances in Malabar. The sympathy of some orthodox and influential gentlemen has already been assured. This, we trust, will bring hope to the suffering Hindu families in the afflicted area.

University of Lucknow: The first session of the University of Lucknow commenced on Monday the 18th July 1921 with teaching in the Faculties of Arts and Science. Students are eligible for admission to a course of study for a Degree in the Faculties of Arts and Science, who have passed the Intermediate Examination of an Indian University, incorporated by any law for the time being in force. Teaching in the Faculties of Medicine, Law and Commerce is also to be given.

Index to Volume XXXI. Owing to the price of paper, we are not sending as usual with this issue the index to the thirty first volume which ended last week. But we are printing a limited number of copies of it to be sent free to subscribers who ask for it. It is requested that such applications may be sent as early as possible.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 1921.

THE MOPLA OUTBREAK.

The attempts of some of the leaders and their organs in the press to make out that the Mopla outbreak has no relation to and no bearing upon the Khilafat Non-Co-operation movement, do not carry conviction even with those who, while deploring the short-sightedness of some of its methods, have given credit to its promoters for sincerity and honesty of purpose. The general opinion, so far as we are able to gauge it, is that the outbreak is a most damaging blow to the movement, from the effects of which it can recover only by stern self-examination and prompt abandonment of propaganda calculated to inflame ignorant fanaticism. The Khilafat-Non-Co-operation leaders have sought to throw the whole blame of the outbreak upon the district officials and Government. Unfortunately for them, the Indian newspapers published in Malabar, some of them of considerable repute and long standing, are unanimous in praising the self-restraint displayed by the officials in the face of an organised movement to defy authority. During the troubles in the Punjab, the Indian press of the province, so far as it existed, was severely critical of the actions of officials. The Malabar journals we refer to are quite as independent and as ably conducted as any provincial newspapers. Their deliberate verdict on the situation will naturally weigh more with the public than the ingenious theories propounded by partisan leaders. Nor is there any force in the argument that the preachers of the Khilafat-Non-Co-operation movement had always laid stress on non-violence as the corner-stone of their methods, so long as they had taken no steps to confine their propaganda to minds prepared to accept that condition. If you flout a red rag before an irascible bull, the fact that you are an ardent supporter of cow protection will not save you from the consequences of your fool-hardiness. The Moplas, it is admitted, are an ignorant and easily excited people. The responsibility of those who chose such a people as fit soil on which to scatter about the high explosive of a religio-political propaganda, cannot be got rid of by easy self-satisfied assurances.

More than the damage to the Khilafat Non-Co-operation movement, is the serious embarrassment to responsible Hindu and Mohamedan leaders caused by the outbreak in their efforts to establish a stable Hindu-Mohamedan understanding based on a recognition of a common Indian patriotism. The Hindus of Malabar have suffered much more than the officials not only in life and property, but in things which are dearer than life. It is impossible now to deny that Hindu women have been outraged and Hindu men and women forcibly converted to what the Mopla regards as Mohamedanism. A correspondent, who traversed a part of the disturbed area mostly on foot, in the course of two letters, under dates the 26th and the 28th August, published in the Hindu (Madras) of the 30th August, observes :

Indescribable were the horrors committed by the Moplah upon the civil population. Only I did not hear of loss of life among the latter. This is not merely a revolt against the Government but also against the law-abiding public. The rebels have no leader and no principle and are lawless to the core. Houses belonging to Nambudries, Pattars, Nairs, and Anti-Khilaphates were looted. All articles were taken off from the famous Thrikkaikkad Madam, the abode of the Nambudiri Sanyasis (sages). Many were the agonies I saw on my way. At various places modesty of women had been outraged and rape committed on them without distinction of caste or creed.

Special importance attaches to the statements of this correspondent because not only is he describing what he saw and heard but he seems to have enjoyed to a certain extent the confidence of the Mopla rioters who allowed him, as a Khilafat preacher, to pass freely through the disturbed areas. That he was not disposed to condemn the rioters without cause appears from his further statement that on his way he did not learn that the Hindus were converted to Islam "but," he added, "there is every probability of its occurrence." Subsequent evidence does not unfortunately confirm this correspondent's doubts regarding the killing and forcible conversion of Hindus. The West Coast Reformer (Calicut) writes :

The outbreak which at first seemed political in colour has, of late, been growing dismal in its effect on peaceful inhabitants. The fanatical spirit of aggressive proselytisation has been asserting itself to the despair of the Nambudris in the infected zone. The tragic story of a Nambudri compelled to embrace Islam on pain of instant death and the beheading of the innocent gentleman on his refusal to change faith, reveals the dangerous transfiguration politics has taken in the hands of the fanatic.

In any other religion, faith so heroic would have been hallowed as martyrdom: it is only Hinduism that takes sacrifices such as this as a matter of course, and our contemporary's rather contemptuous reference to "a Nambudri" without the courtesy to mention or, perhaps, even the curiosity to know, his name, is typical of the Hindu attitude of mind.

Any one who knows how rigid are the ideas of the Hindu community regarding the re-admission of persons converted, willingly or unwillingly, to another religion, will understand the feeling of horror and disgust which has taken root in the minds of men and women. The Khilafat leaders have passed the usual condemnatory resolution about violence, but none of them has dared to denounce forcible conversions to Islam. No wonder that the Hindus of Malabar have come to think that Hindu-Mohamedan unity at this price is too dearly bought, and that the feeling is beginning to spread beyond Malabar. The Khilafat to non-Mohamedans is just an Empire like the many that have disappeared and the few that survive. Still out of sympathy with their Mohamedan countrymen, Hindus and other non-Mohamedan Indians made common cause with them in demanding that the Turkish treaty should respect the Khilafat. They never subscribed to Pan-Islamism, and if Khilafat leaders cannot make a stand against forcible conversion, they cannot expect to retain the sympathy of non-Mohamedans for their aim.

The Mopla outbreak has further proved that the Swaraj which the Khilafat-Non-co-operation movement was to bring is a mirage. Three centuries before Christ, Asoka in memorable words proclaimed equal respect for all religions as the fundamental rule of Indian polity. It has since been accepted implicitly by every Hindu ruler. The best Indian Mohamedan rulers accepted it, and their Empire prospered. The moment their successors departed from it, that moment they undermined the foundations of their sovereignty. British rule has followed the old Hindu principle to a large extent. If the future Swaraj means countenancing of forcible conversions, a very large section of Indians would prefer to have the present religious freedom to a millenium where they will have every kind of freedom except that of religion. The linking of Swarajya with the Khilafat was one of the greatest mistakes ever committed by an Indian leader of eminence. The Moghal Emperors repudiated the pretensions of the Khalif so far as they were concerned and Akbar, the greatest of them all, waged unrelenting war all throughout his resplendent reign against Moslem pedants who sought to induce him to mould his policy not according to the needs of the Empire but according to the predilections of Baghdad or Constantinople. The wisest and most patriotic Mohamedans to-day fully realise that this is the right and true policy. Hindus and other non-Mohamedan Indian communities have put forth their best efforts in pleading for a just treaty with Turkey, but they have neither the desire nor the intention to tolerate forcible conversion to Islam or to any other religion on any pretext whatsoever. We should not be surprised if it transpires that to untutored fanatics like the Mopla masses the distinction between joining the Khilafat movement and becoming Mohamedans is not readily comprehensible. If that is so, it is obvious that the Khilafat movement cannot in reason expect further co-operation on the part not only of non-Mohamedans but of all, whether Mohamedan or non-Mohamedan, who believe in perfect religious toleration.

FROM A WAYFARER'S NOTE BOOK.

Mahatma Gandhi's confessions of faith and personal recollections which are published occasionally in Young India and elsewhere are interesting reading. An anonymous correspondent seems to have written to the Mahatma accusing him of imposture in claiming to be politically a disciple of Gokhale and advising him to prove a worthy follower of Tilak. The Mahatma writes in reply that he cannot claim the honour of being a follower of the late Lokamanya. The Mahatma says :

"I had many heroes but no king. It was different with Gokhale, I cannot say why. It was really a case of love at first sight. He was and remains for me the most perfect man on the political field. It were blasphemous to conjecture what would have happened if he were alive today. I know, that I would have been working under him. I thought, I must declare my faithfulness to Gokhale, especially when I seemed to be living in a camp which the Indian world calls opposite, Gokhale had great faith in the sense of justice and fairplay of the British people and it is no wonder that the Mahatma, true to the spirit of his Rajya-Guru, says even now that he has faith enough in the British people to feel that, whilst they will test our determination and strength to the uttermost, they will not carry it to the breaking point.

The Mahatma's Rajya Guru was a staunch and consistent friend of the suppressed classes. The Mahatma himself writes that the families of suppressed classes still live with him as before. The little pearl, Laxmi, still remains with him at the Ashram as dear to him as his own children. All the same, the All-India Congress Committee's omission of the anti-untouchability resolution is as significant as it is ominous. It was Mr. Bernard Shaw who said that in a stupid nation the man of genius becomes a god, and everybody worships him but nobody does his will. Well might an Indian pray with the poet saying "God, do not give us great men but elevate our nation." That is why the Mahatma is painfully forced to write :

I hold it to be blasphemy to represent me as Sri-Krishna. I claim to be a humble worker and no more among many in a great cause, which can only be injured rather than advanced by glorification of its leaders. A cause has the best chance of success, when it is examined and followed on its own merits. Measures must always in a progressive society be held superior to men, who are at all imperfect instruments, working for their fulfilment.

It is a great thing that the Mahatma is alive to the truth that the quickest remedies are always fraught with the greatest danger and require the utmost skill in handling them. He has explained how he was arrested in South Africa when he was marching into a prohibited area with over two to three thousand men and women. "They were disciplined soldiers and all the better for being unarmed..... This was an instance of discipline and non-violence for which there is no parallel in history. Without such restraint I can see no hope of successful mass civil disobedience here." It appears that as Lokamanya Tilak advanced in years, he began to lose faith in the people and their power to immediately work out their own salvation. Just a fortnight before his death, Tilak said that the Mahatma's method was an excellent one "if the people could be persuaded to take to it. But he said he had doubts." The Standard Bearer, a journal edited and inspired by Sri Anurobindo Ghose, concludes a thoughtful article on Non-Co-operation with the remark "Gandhiji cannot, he should not, rest till he has done his splendid bit. But then, the nation must learn the lesson of self-transcendence and divine conversion. In this connection, the Russian parallel has its lesson for us in India. Modern Russia has produced a great prophet in Tolstoy who is also a Guru of the Mahatma.

Mr. H. W. Williams says in his Russia of the Russians.

The "Intelligentsia" of Russia was specially recruited from the students. Among the students of the universiti arose a movement known as "going into the people" which meant that educated young men and women carried the University settlement principle to its utmost limit, that is to say, they tried to bring enlightenment to the ignorant peasants by mixing with them and dressing exactly as they did. At first this movement had a purely educative and humanitarian character. It was only later that it became political."

Dr. A. S. Rappoport in his book "Pioneers of the Russian Revolution" says that the result was but a poor one. "The pilgrimage of these enthusiasts, of the frail women, to the shrine of the people was without real effect.....The chief cause of the failure of the propaganda lay in the apathy of the people, the indifference of the rural population and the monk." Mine is not, however, a plea for inaction. There is a wide field for patient, constructive work among the masses.

It is the suffering and the sacrifices of the millions of our people that, as Sir Jagadish Bose said, are a sort of living bone-dust fertilising the soil of national life in all its varied departments. Not to do all that is as lies, to improve and elevate these people is not only to leave the vital part of the national organism weak and inefficient but to be guilty of the blackest ingratitude. Thus, "mass-response" is quite essential for our national progress. This is the moral to be deduced when a poet like "A. E." (George W. Russell) edits the organ of agricultural Co-operation in Ireland. It was to him that Sir Horace Plunkett pointed when he said that the most practical man in the Irish Agricultural movement was a poet. This is also the secret of Poet Tagore's message to the people which he conveyed years ago in his famous lecture on Swadeshi Samaj:—"If nobody follows thee, go thou forward alone."

Russia offers perhaps the best field for the study of Co-operation under an infinite variety of aspects. Kuroptkin says that in Russia, it is a natural growth, an inheritance from the Middle Ages; the artel makes the very substance of Russian peasant life. As for India, says Mr. Henry Wolff: "of all countries, in the old world and the new, there seems none so specially marked out for the practice of co-operative credit." Moreover, co-operation is a great measure for the improvement of our cottage industries. This is a part of the vast amount of voluntary social service that has to be done in India.

The moral behind Indians' present demoralisation in South Africa is, as the Reformer well puts it, that a community or a class will, under the impulse of a great emotion or the enthusiasm created by a great personality, over-strain its capacity for severe and self-sacrificing effort, but the after-effects of it will always be lassitude and division. I met the other day Mr. C. R. Naidu who has been handling the indentured Indian question in Natal for the last twelve years. I drew his attention to the moral deduced by the Reformer. Mr. Naidu could not but endorse this considered criticism. I see that certain remarks of his, made in a mass meeting at Madras have been contradicted by the Government of India. Notwithstanding the Simla communique of the 5th inst, Mr. Naidu still asserts publicly that even after the Government of India notified the Union Government that there was famine, that repatriates were suffering considerable difficulties in India, the Union Government made no attempt whatever to issue fresh special circulars in all vernaculars contradicting their original circular which raised false hopes. If there is any basis for this serious allegation, the dubious attitude of General Smuts towards the Asiatic problem in South Africa is as intelligible as Mr. Sastri's robust optimism is misplaced. May I venture to remind Mr. Sastri of his characteristic saying:

Mr. Gokhale to the end writhed under unjust attacks; but, like the child whom an angry mother puts away, returned again to her lap. But I can imagine others similarly situated who may retire to their tents like Achilles, or even turn against their country like Coriolanus.

I trust however that when the full proceedings of the Imperial Conference become available there will be ample reason to efface my present anxiety that London, or rather South Africa, is perilously near becoming "the grave of his reputation." Since writing the above, the Hindu has published the letter from its well-informed London correspondent who says:

"Mr. Srinivasa Sastri has not, so far, been able to give much satisfaction to his fellow countrymen (on the subject of the Indians overseas). He has eloquently voiced the claims of India to just and equal treatment in his speeches at the Imperial Conference, but although he has been well supported by the Maharao of Kutch and Mr. Montagu, he has nothing to show as yet in the way of tangible gain."

The third session of the Madras Legislative Council has come and gone. So far as the future distribution of the loaves and fishes of offices is concerned, the Madras non-Brahmin party won a decided victory in this session. Dewan Bahadur M. Venkataratnam Naidu M. L. C., however, in welcoming this as one of the first and richest fruits of the reformed Council explained by saying that the non-Brahmins had been particular about communal representation in an adequate measure not from any undue desire to snatch away the loaves and fishes of offices, but for the reason that under existing conditions it was the most powerful stimulus to education and to civic and social responsibilities. The resolution supporting Dr. Gaur's Marriage Bill was, after much discussion of the usual type, declared carried, 48 voted for the resolution, 23 against it. My friend Mr. R. K. Shaumukham Chettiar M. L. C. who has made a careful study of the Excise question and who is a rising star in the Council effectively pointed out that the whisky bottle was combined with British administration in India. His amended resolution that the Standing Committee which is to be attached to the excise department be required to investigate and suggest means of improving the excise administration of the Presidency was accepted by the House Mr. Patro and the amended resolution was unanimously carried.

LONDON LETTER.

(From our own Correspondent).

London, August 11, 1921.

RAIN AT LAST.

The drought has broken, rain has fallen practically all over the country, the temperature has gone down, and no heat-stroke cases have been reported for days. But the rainfall has come too late to save the crops, and great depression among farmers is the result. On the whole, the wheat crop has suffered the least, for though the wheat did not grow tall or have full growth, it nevertheless was fairly sturdy and gathered in easily. Stock farms have been severely hurt and will continue to suffer. The winter months will be filled with grave perplexity for the dairy farmer, for the root crop upon which they depend for the winter has completely failed, and no amount of rain coming now can make it good.

LABOUR CONDITIONS.

Unemployment is sharply on the down grade. Last week the numbers on the registers of the exchanges fell by 145,000, and during the last month the total reduction is 386,000. The figures are certainly hopeful, but even if the decrease continued at such a rapid rate, it would still be many weeks before the army of two million men could be absorbed. The idle coal mines still remain a problem to be dealt with even though the miners' strike is a thing of the past. There are still 131 pits not opened, thus leaving idle over 25,000 miners in Great Britain. Apart from the above mentioned pits not working at all, there were about 93 pits, normally employing about 29,000 men, in which no coal was brought to the surface up to July 23rd, but in which a small number of workers were employed in clearing away the water and preparing the mines for work. There seems to be a firm hope that very shortly coal will be cheaper, and should this hope be realised, business will revive in earnest, and the trade returns, which have latterly been depressingly low, will go up accordingly.

The ship-yard joiners' strike, however, continues and no hope of a conclusion is held out at the present time. The owners declare their inability to make any new proposals, so that it seems the present deadlock must continue until the endurance of one side or the other is exhausted.

At a recent big labour meeting, Mr. J. H. Thomas, M. P., said "he believed we were now approaching and definitely going to establish a new era in the relationship between the railway companies and the employees. He refused to believe that the men were entering into an unholy alliance with the companies, with a view to fleecing the public, as had been asserted. Nor did he think a huge monopoly was being created. The N. U. R. intended to have a fair deal. He would say that railwaymen, while not denying the right to strike, intended in future to make strikes their last consideration, instead of their first." Such speeches from such sources help to give security to commercial life.

It is reported in a Cardiff Press message that the South Wales colliery enginemen stokers, and surface-craftsmen, whose Associations were merged in the Miners Federation shortly before the recent dispute, are breaking away from that body. The policy of the Federation during the recent stoppage in calling out the maintenance men has been severely criticised, and it is probable this has caused the severance from the main body. There is every likelihood, too, that the Triple Alliance will shortly cease to exist, as it has already ceased to function.

CRIME AND DIVORCE.

It is said that when a nation is prosperous, it is virtuous; but wars produce as an aftermath a great increase in crime. It is easy to believe that when the great stress of poverty is removed from a large portion of the population, pillage and robbery become less, the temptations not being the same. But as virtue is the standing erect in the face of temptation, not the absence of the latter, the saying does not seem a particularly true one. That wars produce an aftermath of crime, history has proved to us. Yet the history of the past does not necessarily mean that it need be repeated to-day. Anyway the Judicial Statistics for England and Wales recently published show that a substantial advance has been made in the direction of order. From the figures given, a remarkable decrease in crime of almost every kind has been going on for years. On a given day, in 1893, there were more than 4,000 men and women undergoing penal servitude. At the outbreak of war there were under 3,000, and on March 1st, 1921, the figure given was less than 1,400. It is believed that one reason for the decrease is the influence of the Borstal system, under which it is claimed that about 73 per cent of the young men sentenced and released on licence are permanently reformed. It is probably owing to this, as well as other reasons, that a large number of prisons were closed during the war. One other big reason for the decrease in conviction has been the fact that in the cases of a fine in lieu of a term of imprisonment for first offences, a longer time of late has been given for the payment of the fine; in addition the increase in wages and the standing at the old rate of fines have made it possible for fines to be paid much more easily, thereby lessening the number of persons sent to prison. On the other hand, the figures for bigamy and divorce for 1919 show an enormous increase over the figures for 1913. In 1913, there were 133 cases of bigamy, in 1919, there were 917 cases. To a very large extent this enormous increase can be directly traced to the disturbance in family life and hasty marriages due to the great war, and is part of its aftermath. It also points to the fact that our present marriage and divorce laws do not meet the requirements of the present day. But the present day's problems are rather abnormal, and rules that have been laid down for social life and found worthy, need very careful consideration ere altering them radically.

TAXPAYERS' SOCIETY.

A new society has been formed to protect the taxpayer, having Lord Inchcape as President. A large number of influential names are given as members of the general council. Sir William P. Treloar is chairman of the General Purposes Committee of the society and in a letter reporting the formation of it, he says: "In view of the present complexity of the income tax, it becomes daily more evident that there is a clear need for the formation of a strong permanent association to watch and safeguard the interests of income and super-tax payers. The first object of the society is to maintain the constitutional principle of control of the administration, assessment, and collection of income tax by the tax-payers themselves, through the medium of their representatives, the Commissioners for the general purpose of the income tax, and their local offices. The subscription has been fixed at five shillings for individuals and a guinea for corporations, companies and firms." The society is to be absolutely non-political and has already a wide sympathy.

MENTAL DISORDERS.

During the war a tremendous amount of attention was directed to mental disorders, and special means of treating such were devised. But mental sicknesses are amongst the most obscure of the evils that mankind can suffer from, so very little is really known about them. Our asylums have for many years received a large amount of harsh criticism, and efforts for acquiring knowledge and commencing reforms have been many and various. As long ago as 1889 a medical member of the London County Council was instrumental in setting up a committee of the Council, to report on the advantage of supplementing the asylum system with hospitals having visiting medical staffs for the study and curative treatment of insanity. The committee reported strongly in favour of the hospital scheme, declaring that "such institutions scarcely fail to be productive of increased knowledge of the subject and consequently increased means of prevention and cure." The report, however, was shelved and later a cry was raised that any attempt to dissociate mental treatment or research work from the hospital must fail. In 1907, a sum of £30,000 was offered to the London County Council by another medical man, if they would establish a mental hospital. After some delay the offer was accepted, but some years elapsed ere a suitable site was found for building. After the site was found, nothing further was done, and the hospital is still not opened for the purpose for which the philanthropic doctor gave his money. Most probably the war had a lot to do with the delay: but the war did one thing for the mentally sick. A demand was made during the war which had the whole force of humane public feeling behind it, that no soldier should be certified as insane until it was shown that the mental disorder he suffered from was incurable. This demand, however, was not made applicable to civilians. So now once again the question has become acute, and demands are made for greater investigation into cases of lunacy.

POSITION OF WOMEN IN THE CIVIL SERVICE.

The question of the position of Women in the Civil Service occupied a large part of the day in the House of Commons on August 5th. The motion put forward suggested that women should have the same chance as men in the Civil Service, that they should be admitted by the same examination, that they should be placed on the same establishment list as men, and should be given equal pay for equal work. A great deal of controversy ensued, showing that the average male still clings tenaciously to what he has believed to be his own ground, and dislikes the idea of feminine competition. But the old barriers have fallen away, and women can no longer, be restricted in any profession or denied opportunities of advancement in any way they themselves select. That part of the motion concerning equal pay for equal work came in for the most criticism. The need for national economy is so great to-day that the present conditions of payment for women cannot be altered hurriedly, for already there is a very large number of women in the Civil Service, and the cry of undue extravagance that has been raised against the administration does not allow of further expenditure at the present time. Anyway, women will have an opportunity to prove themselves in the higher positions and once having done that, the question of equal pay can come up again for a solution. No changes are, however, due to take place for another three years.

LICENSING BILL.

The new Licensing Bill has passed its third reading and control of prices and quality is to go. Hours of opening, however, are fixed for eight hours only all over the country, except in the Metropolitan area, where they remain fixed by the Bill at nine. A big anti-liquor fight is going to be put up by a number of organisations and though no one, even the most sanguine, expects the country is going dry yet, propaganda on a big scale will do much to help along that road.

THE SOCIAL SERVICE LEAGUE, BOMBAY.

The Social Service League, Bombay, having been founded on 19th March 1911, has completed the first decade of its existence. During all these years, the League has been striving to improve the physical, moral, mental and economic condition of the people by adopting various means. The following are the main activities of the League:

LIBRARIES.

The Library movement of the League consists of travelling libraries, standing libraries and reading centres. The total number of books in the Travelling Libraries is about 5,000. These books are kept in 50 boxes, each containing 100 books. Each box is kept at a centre for two or three months, after which period it is replaced by another containing a fresh stock of books. During the period of 19 months under report, these boxes were circulated at 161 centres. The League maintains six libraries for mill-workers, one for the depressed class people, one for Mohamedans and two for middle classes. The League conducts two reading centres for the depressed classes—one at Parbhadevi and the other at Valpakhdi.

EDUCATIONAL WORKS.

At the end of the year 1920, the League had under its management 22 schools of which 16 were Night Schools and 6 Day Schools. The total number of students taking advantage of these schools was 1,655, of which 1,476 were boys and 179 girls. In the 16 night schools under the management of the League, the total number of boys on the roll was 1,101 and the daily average attendance was 781. Students came from backward class communities, depressed classes and some of them were Mohamedans. All of them (except 150 small children) earned their own livelihood. The total number of pupils in the 6 day schools for half time (children working in mills) was 554, of whom 375 were boys and 179 girls. Slates, pencils, primers, etc., were supplied free to all the students. The League possesses about 1,000 slides on various subjects such as, mythology, hygiene, history, sanitation, temperance and co-operation. With the help of these slides, 125 lectures were delivered among the working class people during the period under report. This work is undertaken by the League specially for the benefit of the poor children living in dingy habitations and in the smoky atmosphere of the city. During the period under report about 1,000 children were taken out on excursions to four different places and seven programmes of the open air sports were arranged at different centres. About 3,000 children took part in the sports. The League conducts the two scout troops one in Girgaon and another at Parel. A pack of cubs (children between 7 and 12 years) is also formed in Girgaon. These three troops together comprise about 120 boys. Since the inception of the first scout troop in 1918, the activities of the open air sports and fresh air excursions have all along been managed by the scouts. They also took a prominent part in the child-welfare Fete held in March 1919 at the Prince of Wales Museum.

MEDICAL RELIEF.

The League maintains a small Homoeopathic Charitable Dispensary at Parel for the benefit of the poor people. During the period under report 4,114 patients were treated at the Dispensary out of whom 2,914 were men, 723 women 477 children. Another dispensary known as the Bai Bachubai Charitable Dispensary is also maintained by the League at Parel specially for women and children of the working classes. The Dispensary is conducted in the name of the late Bai Bachubai wife of Shet Kanji Cursondas, who bears the whole expenditure of the Dispensary. During the period under report 23,593 patients were treated at the Dispensary, of whom 13,795 were women and 9,798 children. With the intention of putting the Dispensary on a permanent footing, Shet Kanji Cursondas has offered the League a donation of Rs. 55,000. The Florence Nightingale Village Sanitation Fund was placed at the disposal of the League by its Trustees in July 1919. The League gives a small grant of Rs. 50 from this Fund to any village for sanitation purposes on condition that an equal amount is raised locally in that village. During the period under report 8 villages were given grant of Rs. 50 each.

POLICE COURT MISSIONARY.

The League in co-operation with the Released Prisoners' Aid Society has appointed a Police Court Missionary. His work is to visit the Courts of the Chief Presidency Magistrate Bombay and Third Presidency Magistrate, and to request the Courts to give the first offenders the advantage of section 562 of the Criminal Procedure Code, to keep in touch with prisoners after their release, and to try to prevail upon them to lead an honest life. During the year 1920, 504 first offenders were released on his recommendation. Among them 73 were women.

THE CO-OPERATIVE WORK.

The work of improving the economic condition of the poorer and working classes in Bombay is carried on by spreading the spirit of co-operation among them. The following are the main activities of the League in this direction: The League has 68 Co-operative Credit Societies under its supervision. The total membership of these societies is 3,300. The total share capital amounts to Rs. 26,990. Deposits from members and non-members come to Rs. 34,461. The League conducts three co-operative stores. The total sales of these stores amounted to Rs. 57,569 during the period under report.

SOCIAL SETTLEMENTS.

Tardeo and Chikalwadi Centres.—The programme of work in these centres consists of the formation of Sanitary Committees, which look after the sanitation and lighting of the localities, night schools, co-operative societies and such other activities.

Parel Settlement—This settlement was started in 1917 with the object of bringing educated social workers in actual contact with the inhabitants of the slums and of developing a centre of social work in the labouring class locality of Parel. The Settlement maintains a free Reading Room and Library. Public lectures and street preachings and chawl lectures are arranged from time to time. The settlement has started a new activity in the "Parel Parliament." People meet at the Settlement weekly and discuss among themselves topics of the day. The Settlement undertakes to try to redress the grievances of the working class residents of the locality by sending representations to the authorities concerned.

The Madanpura Settlement.—With the object of doing social work among the Mohamedan weavers of the Madanpura District, a Settlement was started in February 1918. A Mohamedan graduate is placed in charge of this settlement. It maintains a Library of Urdu books and a Reading Room, arranges street preachings and public lectures. It has an employment Bureau, which secures employments for poor labourers in mills, in private firms and Government Offices. A number of complaints are addressed every year by the settlement to the Municipality regarding the insanitary condition of several localities inhabited by poor Mohamedans.

WELFARE WORK.

Since the year 1918 the League has undertaken Welfare Work for the two groups of mills managed by the Agencies of Messrs. Currimbhoy Ebrahim & Sons Ltd. and the Tata Sons Ltd. respectively. Two separate Welfare Institutes have been started for the two different groups of mills and the whole expenditure of the work is borne by the respective Agencies. The Institutes maintain Reading Rooms, Libraries, Night Schools and Day Schools for half-time children working in the mills. They conduct 51 Co-operative Credit Societies and three Co-operative Stores. They have opened Gymnasiums in which members from the working class people are admitted on payment of a nominal fee of one anna per month. They maintain Day Nurseries for the children of the work-women. Lectures and theatrical performances are occasionally arranged for the workers. Under the auspices of the Institutes, Works Committees, on which both the employers and the workmen are represented, are formed in different mills with a view to create mutual confidence and to establish cordial relations between the employers and the employees. The Currimbhoy Ebrahim Workmen's Institute has opened a Social Club where refreshments are provided to the workmen at cost price. This Institute conducts a Marathi monthly Magazine which is distributed broadcast among mill workers free of charge.

THE WORKMEN'S INSTITUTE, PAREL.

The long cherished idea of the League to have a Central Workmen's Institute not patronized by any particular Firm of mill agents has been well nigh realised. The League has secured on lease a plot of ground from the Improvement Trust in a central mill locality at Parel and the construction work of some of Institute buildings has been almost completed. The Institute will house a day school, a night school, a library, a reading room, a dispensary, a gymnasium, a theatre for cinema shows and dramatic performances and a hall for indoor games. The total cost of the buildings is expected to reach about three lacs of rupees and the annual expenditure of the programme of work to be done by the Institute will come to about Rs. 80,000. The League has been able to secure about a lac and a half of rupees for the Building Fund. The Workmen's Institute is the first and the most important attempt that has so far been made by an Indian agency to promote the social, educational and economic condition of the working classes and it is hoped that the public will co-operate with the League in establishing the Institute on a sound financial basis.

THE ORIGIN OF THE WORD "MAPPILLA" FOR THE MOHAMEDANS OF KERALA.

Sir —Mapilla is a Tamil word, the English rendering of which is son-in-law. Lately I had been to Cannanore and stayed there for 8 days. During my stay Sultan Alli Raja of Arakal Kovilakam died. As it generally happens when prominent people die there are discussions about his past life history. I had a talk with a gentleman of position and standing about the history of the Sultan Alli Raja. During our talk the gentleman told me that the Sultan Alli Raja's family and the Chirakal Royal family are the same. 500 years ago or so a wealthy Arab merchant used to visit Chirakal Raja whenever the Arab merchant came to Cannanore on mercantile business and used to present the ruling Raja the rarities of Arabia. The Raja in return used to present the merchant over and above his present and also assisted the merchant in so many ways for his trade (in the shape of spices, etc.) and thus he had a high opinion of the merchant. On one occasion the merchant without looking to the social position of the Raja asked a royal boon. The Raja promised to give anything which the merchant may want and asked the merchant to mention his request. The merchant, though with some hesitation asked for a girl of the Royal family for his wife, then the Raja without any murmur asked the merchant to take the first girl who came across his way in the downstairs of the palace. Curiously enough it was the Raja's own niece that was at the time downstairs. The merchant took the Raja's niece as his wife and the faithful and generous Raja gave half his wealth to his niece and then Chirakal Kovilagam for the Royal family and Arakal Kovilagam to the son-in-law and thus Mappilla.

THIS YAKUTI or life giving nectar has been prepared from the best, choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has wonderful properties of increasing virile power and it rectifies urinal disorders. In fact it makes men a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this so invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to those persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicines. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires. It is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills. Rupees ten only.

NOTES.

The Turn of the Tide: We referred recently to the reception accorded to Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya by Bombay audiences as presaging a turn in the tide that has been flowing for some time past in favour of isolation, exclusion and abstention as the most effective methods of political and national salvation. The enthusiastic reception accorded by the Calcutta public to poet Rabindra Nath's great message which we print today, is even more significant in the same sense. For, what is the sum and substance of the poet's message? It is that, not isolation, exclusion and abstention, but expansion, inclusion, and activation, are the true means of national salvation. "Turn from the West," exclaims Mahatma Gandhi. "Learn from the West," exhorts Mahakavi Tagore. This conflict of ideals is no new thing. It appears in the history of every race and nation and is, in fact, as essential to national life as the expanding and contracting movements of the heart are essential to animal life. The Mahatma represents the Indian heart at its systole; the Poet at its diastole. It must expand in order to contract and contract in order to expand. To vary the metaphor, the Mahatma is India in her extreme introspective mood when even one's nearest and dearest are intruders; the Poet is the same India with her eyes gazing joyously on the world and all mankind—the mood which inspired the glorious opening verse of the Ispanishad: "All this is suffused by Deity!" While both processes are essential to sustain life, either of them carried too long or too far spells death. Excessive introspection leads to morbid melancholia and valetudinarianism. Morality is dissipated in moralising. The mind fatigued by fruitless reflection seeks repose in a few visible symbols—the wearing of khaddar assumes in the eyes of the non-Co-operationist the same significance as the sect-mark on the forehead of a Vaishnava or even that of the trade-mark on the goods of a merchant. There was some imminent danger of the Mahatma's movement passing the bounds of national safety, and we are glad of the signs which show that it is on the turn. One good result of it will be that the Mahatma will find his proper place in the national economy as an inspired social reformer and moral teacher of great power; while as a sort of political hierophant, he had been forced into a position in which he could not do the greatest good to the country of which he is capable. The task of steering the country amidst the deeps and shallows of practical politics, belongs to the statesman skilled in the science of political navigation, well acquainted with the ocean currents marked in history, ancient and modern, along which other nations in similar circumstances have sailed their craft to safety or destruction, and trained to detect swiftly on his own national horizon indications of propitious wind and of menacing tempest.

University in the Melting Pot: The restlessness that has come over the Bombay University bodes no good to the future of higher education in the Presidency. The changes necessitated by Lord Curzon's Act in the constitution, regulations and courses of study, had scarcely been completed, when the University was called upon to carry out fresh changes. Some of these are yet under trial and none of them has been sufficiently long in operation to justify a considered appreciation of their effects. While yet in this transitional stage, the report of the Calcutta University Commission has had a fatal fascination for some members including the Vice Chancellor and the Minister of Education. At the instance of these gentlemen, quite a lot of time and money has been spent in framing a scheme which differs from the Sadler Commission's scheme as chalk from cheese. The financial aspect of the scheme was deliberately left out of consideration as a matter of detail. Having regard to the fact that the Minister of Education has been obliged to throw the responsibility of funding funds for the pressing calls of primary education on a non-official Committee, the chances of finding funds for the scheme, which have yet to be estimated, are not of the rosiest. If the Minister embarks on a costly scheme of unnecessary reform of University education without fully satisfying the clamant needs of primary education, which will absorb for more funds than he is likely to be able to provide in the next two years, he will not only find his position untenable but will deserve to do so. While the Senate's labours are likely to bear no fruit, the discussions therein have had disastrous results. Almost every college in the Presidency, including the most famous, have had fewer admissions this year than ever before. This is only slightly due to the Non-Co-operationist aberration as most of those who left in April have rejoined, sadder and wiser for their experience. We can only account for this fall as the result of the wild statements made by some speakers in the Senate, and by the general uncertainty created by the prospect of vague and far-reaching changes. The Colleges do not know what to do. They cannot undertake much-needed developments because the Damocles' sword of reform hangs over their heads, and the two Intermediate classes from which they derive their largest income are involved in the Sadler scheme. Meanwhile the University at the instance of enthusiasts goes on adding odd bits to the courses of study, and poor Principals of Colleges are driven to distraction by the difficulty of adjusting time-tables, providing class rooms and special lecturers, all at very short notice. To a certain extent, the Principals have themselves to blame for their sisyphian troubles. The Universities Act of 1924 was primarily intended to give them a larger share in University affairs and expressly provided for their election to the Senate and Syndicate. But they have been contented to remain interesting but silent spectators instead of active participators in University deliberations.

The Industries Portfolio: There is a strong feeling in the country that the Joint Committee's recommendation regarding the number of Indians in the Governor-General's Executive Council has not been carried out in its full implication. The vacancy created by Sir Thomas Holland's resignation gives Lord Reading an opportunity to remove this cause of dissatisfaction by appointing an Indian of capacity to the post. We hope His Excellency will avail himself of it. It may be pointed out that the Industrial and Commercial portfolio is one of the four which Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya in his speeches in Bombay indicated as an essential one to be in the hands of Indians in order that the country might prepare itself for the assumption of full Dominion rule in the near future. It is understood meanwhile that the Department will temporarily be in charge of the Hon. Mr. Shafi, the Education Member. The duties of Mr. Shafi, so far as Education is concerned, chiefly consist at present in carrying on a wordy warfare with Sir Asutosh Mukherji regarding the affairs of the Calcutta University. The additional work will not overwhelm him. The fact of his choice would also seem to show that he was not one of the two members whom Sir Thomas Holland consulted about the Karnani fiasco. It has been pointed out to us with reference to our comments last week on the responsibility of the two members, that their responsibility cannot be assessed without knowing exactly how the circumstances of the case were put before them. We admit the force of this correction. We assumed that the case as presented to them could not have materially differed from the version of it in the official notes, but this need not have been so. It is possible that the matter as put before them wore a different aspect. It is for the two gentlemen now to state publicly the circumstances in which and the reasons for which they agreed to the withdrawal of the prosecution, and wherein they differed from those that were placed before the Governor-General. We hope that His Excellency the Viceroy will allow them to make a public statement in justice to themselves. We support the demand for a thorough enquiry into the administration of the Munitions Board and Department.

Ex-officials and Trading: The Hindu of Madras has a timely article calling attention to the increasing practice of high financial and other officers of Government on retirement or resignation, engaging themselves in business in which secret information as to Government's policy and position might be utilised to their profit. Our contemporary gives instances. The Hindu points out that the officials during their connection with the Government know all the secrets of Government and its policy as well as information as to what concessions the Government is prepared to make and what new schemes are to be promoted which may be supported by the Government; and all such information may be made available to the Company promoters at the expense of the tax payers. Moreover, as these retired officials wield considerable influence with their erstwhile colleagues, they are better able to influence the Government in the matter of concessions. Our contemporary further points out that in India schemes sanctioned in one year are put in operation only the next year or may be some more time hence. The general policy agreed upon by the Government of a particular day is in many cases put into force only after the tenure of office of the members of that Government is over so that they may easily profit by decisions which they knew and to which they were a party. We strongly support the plea of the Hindu for putting a limit to a practice which cannot but be highly detrimental to honest administration. The Hindu refers to a statement by a Calcutta Commercial journal to the effect that in a new sugar flotation that has been projected, Sir Thomas Holland is associated and may become one of the Directors. Our attention was also called to the statement but we did not notice it as we could scarcely believe that Sir Thomas Holland would have negotiated, while still holding office as Member for Commerce and Industries, to get a controlling interest in an industrial venture which obviously would need concessions from Government in various ways. Sir Thomas Holland's resignation was not even a surmise when the Calcutta paper made its announcement, and, in fact, the friend who brought it to our notice inferred from it that Sir Thomas' resignation was imminent. Indian capitalists should show more regard for public proprieties than they sometimes do. Business men do not always realise that nothing that affects the integrity of public life can in the long run benefit them, though immediately it may bring them increased profits. The practice to which the Hindu calls attention should be regulated by the co-operation of Government and Indian leaders of commerce and industry, but there is another tendency which Government can on their sole initiative nip in the bud. We refer to the tendency of retired high officials, or those about to retire, foisting themselves on Indian States. Some Indian rulers cannot bear to see their own subjects or countrymen rise to positions of power and trust, and prefer to pick up some super-annuated British ex-official whose presence about them apparently ministers to their vanity in some obscure way. The Government of India can insist on such Indian rulers training up their own men, and in doing so they will be acting in the spirit of the admirable advice which Lord Curzon gave to, we believe, the late Maharaja of Indore.

Architecture and National Character: In his letters during his recent visit, Sir Valentine Chirol propounded some fanciful theories regarding India, her people, and their social and religious institutions. One of these is his deduction from a comparison of the architecture of the great Hindu temples of the South with that of the Taj Mahal. He assumed, as Mr. H. C. Chatterjee shows in the August number of the Indian Review against the most recent authoritative opinion, that the Taj Mahal was built by Moslem architects. It has been repeatedly shown that many of the most famous mosques in India, for example, those at Ahmedabad, were built by Hindu architects, that their very ground-plans are those of Hindu edifices, and that only the superstructure was modified to suit Moslem ideas. But if architecture must be used as a key to national culture and character, if we must seek in it a clue to the central idea inspiring a people's mode of thought and life, we should dive deeper than surface appearances. Mr. E. B. Havell is a student of Indian art in a truer sense than Sir Valentine, and it is interesting to note what he has to say on this point. In his admirable "History of Aryan Rule in India," which every Indian student and statesman should read, mark and inwardly digest, he dwells on the antiquity and continuity of the Indo-Aryan building tradition from the earliest times and shows that the Indo-Mahomedan was truly a development of it. He writes:

The exquisite refinement of contour which Indo-Mahomedan tomb-builders achieved, and their comparative reticence in surface decoration, had their counterparts and prototypes in the marvellous profiles and massive generalisations with which the Indian painter realised his ideal of the divine Buddha at Ajanta: the inspiration of the Trimurti of Elephants and of the bronze Nataraja of the Tanjore temple is evident in the tombs of the Pathan Kings and in the dome of the Taj Mahal.

The Simla Legislative Programme: The Simla Legislative programme would seem to have been drawn up with the object of spending the maximum of time and doing the minimum of work. Beyond half a dozen members being sworn in in the Assembly and the President's statement regarding the programme of work, no other business was done on the first day. There was nothing to do the next day. The Viceroy addressed the joint session of the Legislature on the 3rd, on the 4th again there was nothing to do. On the 5th there was some business, and then the Assembly adjourned to the 15th. According to the programme, meetings are to be held on the 15th, 19th, 22nd and 26th for official business and on the 20th and 21st for non-official business. It would have been better if the members had been asked to come on the 5th instant when, after the new members had been sworn in, the Viceroy could have addressed the joint Session, and the Assembly and the Council of State could have proceeded with the business without wasting five days in Simla. No wonder that members feel that they are wasting their valuable time—"eating their heads off," as one of them puts it—in Simla, while their business needlessly suffers at their own places. The autumn Session, at any rate this year, seems to be a grand picnic, and it is not surprising that some of the speeches of the picnickers smack of the postprandial.

Beggars in Bombay: It is now about five years since on a resolution moved in the Local Legislative Council, a committee was appointed to report on the Beggar Problem in Bombay. The committee took about two years to submit its report and the Government took another two years to consider the Report and publish it. Now, again, it appears from an answer in the last Legislative Council Meeting, that the Government have asked the Bombay Municipality to formulate definite proposals to deal with the beggar population. This sort of exchange of notes and question has gone on for the last few years without bringing us any nearer the solution of the problem. When will this fruitless and provoking process cease, one wonders. Meanwhile, the position is much worse than what it was a few years ago and the number of beggars of all sorts and descriptions has increased enormously. The unusually long-drawn-out rainy season has intensified their sufferings and miseries and the sheltered pavements of Hornby Road look like asylums for these beggars. Cases of extreme privation and starvation could be seen and there is not the least doubt that, during the last few weeks, there must have been some cases of death by starvation. Only, nowadays, we do not hear of such police reports of death from starvation, but judging from the conditions prevailing, there must have occurred some cases of this kind. Cannot the Municipality and the Beggar Relief Committee do something for these poor people? The busy streets and pavements of the Fort are infested with beggars suffering from loathsome disease like leprosy and this should not be allowed to prevail in such a busy locality.

Forced Conversions: The two letters that we publish today show that the forced conversions in the Mopla area, are exercising the Hindu mind in widely separated places. Mr. Gharpure's letter is specially important as the considered opinion of an eminent Hindu scholar and lawyer. The Smriti of Devala which he cites, is one of the original Smritis and not a Digest or Nibandha like the Mitakshara, Mayukha and other more modern treatises. The Smritis record what the sages "saw" and not what they "composed" and, therefore, they are accepted by orthodoxy as guides or evidence of what existed in the times to which they belong. We stated last week that it is under consideration to concert measures to ensure that the forced conversions involve no loss of social or religious status to the victims. Meanwhile, we are pleased to learn that a leading Hindu ecclesiastical authority in the area affected has declared that a simple purificatory ceremony would suffice to readmit the forcibly converted persons to their respective castes. The present trouble will not be wholly without a beneficial result if it leads Hindus all over India to adopt a settled policy in respect of similar cases now and in the future applying alike to men and women. We also suggest that leading Mahomedan divines and laymen should issue a declaration, and have it promulgated in every mosque, that they condemn the action of the Moplas as opposed to Islamic injunctions and that those directly concerned in effecting forced conversions should not be admitted to Islamic communion unless they express their penitence in some approved form.

India and Aden: The Bombay Chronicle has come to agree that the transfer of Aden to the Colonial Office is an injustice to India. The main reason given by our contemporary for its changed opinion is the divided responsibility between the Colonial Office and India and that the Indian share of the expenditure will be maintained as before. On the other hand, the feeling amongst Indians in Aden is against transference to the Colonial Office on any ground whatsoever, and if by such transfer, India's share of the expenditure, is not altogether done away with, India should the more strongly resist any such proposal. India should insist that the present arrangement should continue and that her sons who have built up the prosperity of the settlement should not be penalised for their trouble. It is reassuring to learn from an official statement in the Legislative Assembly that the question of the transfer is not yet finally settled. If we remember, Mr. Winston Churchill stated in the House of Commons that the transfer had already been effected and that only financial details awaited settlement, but he is the author of the famous phrase, "intelligent anticipation of events," and he was, perhaps, testing his own powers in that direction on this Aden question.

Women Suffrage in Bengal: While Bombay and Madras have adopted women suffrage, the Bengal Legislative Council has rejected by a majority a resolution to remove the disability of women to vote in elections. This, in spite of the pleading of Sir Surendranath Banerji, who admitted having held a different opinion in the Southborough Committee. But for his obstinate opposition and Mr. Sastri's politic indifference, women would have been enfranchised at the same time as men and taken part in the first elections. The women of Bengal must hold Sir Surendranath responsible for placing them in an invidious position as compared with their sisters in Bombay and Madras.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, SEPTEMBER 11, 1921.

THE VICEROY ON SOME PRESENT DAY PROBLEMS.

The speech with which the Viceroy opened the Simla Session of the Indian Legislature, was characterised by a sureness of touch naturally wanting in his previous utterances. It shows that Lord Reading has now a clear view of the ground before him and needs no longer the aid of general propositions which may be made to cover all possible contingencies. His Excellency has spent his five months in the country to good purpose. Another quality which will be noticed with satisfaction is that, whatever His Excellency may be able or may not be able to do, he does not shut his eyes to facts or attempt to represent them to himself or to the public as being other than what they plainly are. Yet another feature of the speech worthy of praise, is the judicial fairness with which differences of opinion and points of view are dealt with. On the whole, Lord Reading's speech, so far as it went, was just the kind of pronouncement that was needed in the present disturbed and disturbing conditions in several parts of the country. As typical of all these qualities, may be cited the sentence referring to the forthcoming visit of the Prince of Wales, where the Viceroy pointed out that His Royal Highness is coming, not as the representative of any Government or to promote the interests of any political party, but as the heir to the Throne and in order to become personally acquainted with the princes and people of India and to see as much as would be possible during his visit to this country. In other words, His Royal Highness comes not on a pleasure trip or on a political mission but in the discharge of one of the duties of his position, and it is ungracious not to extend to him the courtesies due to a guest of such exalted status. By the side of the Viceroy's correct and conciliatory description of the character of the Prince's visit, the swelling periods of Sir M. Dadabhoi in moving a resolution relating to it in the Council of State seem forced and Dr. Sapra's accusation that a member of the Legislative Assembly, who thought that the political and economic conditions at the moment were not the most favourable that could be chosen for the visit, was guilty of breaking his oath of allegiance, is ludicrous.

NO NEW APPOINTMENT.

His Excellency in referring briefly to the Muniton embroglio, remarked that the lesson of this unfortunate incident was that it is very desirable that the direction and control of Government prosecutions should be in the hands of a trained lawyer, and that the matter would be considered by Government. In view of the inveterate tendency in this country for everything to end in the creation of a new appointment, we venture at once to enter a protest against any addition to the present top-heavy Government of India in the shape of a Director or Department of Prosecutions. The plea that Sir Thomas Holland or any other member of the Government of India is over-worked at present--the Viceroy, of course, is--is utterly incompatible with the claim that the Reforms have transferred a good deal of administration to Provincial Governments. We did not know until the fact was published that not the Home Department, but the Muniton enclave of the Commerce Department, was dealing with the prosecution in the present case. Then there is the Law Member who should certainly have been consulted about legal matters and there is also the Advocate-General of Bengal who continues by some anomaly to be an officer of the Government of India and its constitutional legal adviser. We do not see any need for another trained lawyer to deal with prosecutions. The Home Department has been relieved of much work that it was doing ten years ago. By the delegation of legislation to the provinces, the Law Department should have some time for looking after the administration of justice which badly needs looking after. We are perhaps not quite correctly informed of the present allocation of functions but, in any case, we earnestly urge that no new appointments should be created and that any defects disclosed in the existing arrangements should be met by a readjustment of work among the present personnel.

FRONTIER AND MOPLA OUTBREAKS.

His Excellency, it is pleasing to know, does not despair of making a friendly treaty with Afghanistan, and that he cherishes the hope of an early end to operations on the North West frontier. Lord Reading, however, foreshadowed the possibility of further expenditure on frontier defence. The creation of the North Western Frontier Province has not brought about the results expected of it. It is well worth re-considering the question. The reunion of the Frontier with the Punjab and the encouragement of the possession and use of arms by the civil population, will be the most effective as well as economical way of dealing with the Frontier problem. It should not be forgotten that India had solved the problem prior to the advent of British rule by the growth of the Sikh State which effectively sealed our northern passes. His Excellency's observations on the Mopla outbreak in Malabar, will be generally approved in the country. The most ugly feature of the outbreak has been the forced conversions of Hindus. A mob may in a fit of frenzy loot, burn and kill, but when it comes to forcing others to foreswear their religion and adopt another, accentuating the apostasy by a painful physical rite, the question assumes a vastly different complexion. The non-Mopla civil population of Malabar is in the same position as the inhabitants of the Frontier districts and they must have the same facilities for protecting their religion and lives as we have suggested for the latter. There would have been no Hindus in Malabar had they always been as powerless against Mopla fanaticism as they are today, and there would have been no occasion for His Excellency's sorrowful speculation as to what would have happened to them but for the protection afforded by the troops and the warship, had they not been disabled from defending themselves by being deprived of the use of arms under the Arms Act. We revere the Prophet of Islam and we have a high appreciation of the great services which Islam has rendered to the world and to India. Forced conversions are absolutely contrary to the injunctions of the illustrious Prophet, and the Mopla rioters are, therefore, renegades from the pure faith, against whose fanaticism true Mahomedans as well as non-Mahomedans should be able to protect themselves. Khilafat-non-Co-operationists committed a fatal blunder in not excluding this ignorant and fanatical sect from their propaganda and the least that they should do is to avow the mistake and undertake not to repeat it. We need hardly add that the utmost care should be taken, when the situation in Malabar has been brought under control, to deal mercifully with the ignorant offenders and to adopt immediate measures to extend to them the refining influence of education. A special department should, if necessary, be created for this purpose and placed under enlightened Moslem guidance.

THE INDIAN STATES AND THE INDIAN PRESS.

His Excellency remarked with reference to the decision to repeal the Press Act that it might become necessary to consider what form of protection should be given in substitution to ruling Princes against seditious attacks upon them in newspapers published in British India. In regard to this question, some points arise for consideration. Do the ruling Princes themselves desire that they should be protected by special measures? It is not enough if one or a few of them, much less if the Political Agents report that they, do so. The question should be openly discussed in the Council of Princes and their Highnesses should be requested to say if there is a consensus of opinion among them that special protection is needed and, if so, what form they would like it to take. For our own part, we do not see why any special measure is necessary so long as a ruling Prince can stop any newspaper, which indulges in seditious attacks on him, from coming into his territory. The next point to consider is whether protection of ruling Princes from criticism in British Indian newspapers, will not operate as closing down the only means that subjects of most of the States now have of ventilating their grievances. There are, of course, no newspapers of any importance in Indian States. Journalism does not thrive even in the most enlightened of them. Few Indian editors care to take up matters connected with the States if only because they lie so far apart from the broad currents of national life. Other reasons are that almost every complaint from Indian States can be traced, if one has the time for it, ultimately to a personal grievance, that independent and reliable confirmation is not easy to secure, and that often the complaints themselves are of a nature with which newspapers, as a rule, can not deal. Nevertheless the fact remains that, if British Indian newspapers are obliged to shut out criticism of ruling Princes who are often their own Ministers, the subjects of these States will be absolutely without the means of invoking public opinion for the redress of their grievances, and will have to subsidise petition-writers, often retired officials pretending to backstairs influence in high quarters, to bring their woes to the notice of the Political Agent or Government. The third point is, will it conduce to the permanent good of the States to be rendered immune from criticism in the British Indian press? To give them special protection against seditious attacks is merely a roundabout way of forbidding respectable newspapers to write about them. The Government policy at present is complete non-interference in the internal affairs of the States. There is no press, no effective public opinion, in them. Their affairs cannot be discussed in the Legislative Councils of India. The British Indian press is thus the only power that can exercise some influence on them, and if this too is to be banned then, in the words of the late Sir T. Madhav Rao, these States must sink under the weight of their own despotism. We may add, in passing, that what some of the ruling princes fear is not so much criticism of their public measures as the exposure of their personal lives which often fall far short of the standards which the various reform movements, stimulated by English education, have established in British India. These movements have found no foothold in the States. The higher type of ruling Princes, so far as we know, do not want any protection and, in fact, are among the inspirers of some of the best and most progressive movements in the country. The protection demanded may not, after all, be so much for ruling Princes as for Political officers who naturally would like to enjoy unlimited freedom of action in Indian States at least. Lastly, if the British Indian press may not comment on the affairs of Indian States, but the British press is free to do so, the protected Princes will be exposed to temptations and dangers which it should not be difficult for a shrewd judge of human nature like Lord Reading to imagine.

FINANCE, THE WEAK PART.

The weak part of the Viceroy's address was where it referred to finance. The steady, unflinching hand with which His Excellency traced the situation, showed signs of faltering here. Said the Viceroy:

The State may have been occasionally forced during the war to do things which must have seemed to be a departure from the severe conservatism which had hitherto characterised the management of India's finances, but when we remember what most other belligerent countries were forced to do and the enormous inflation of currency and credit, leading in many cases to something like national bankruptcy which has followed elsewhere, we may, I think, at the risk of being considered pharisaical, thank Heaven that we are not as other countries.

In the first place, the chief operations which have created the greatest discontent took place not during the war, but after the principal Peace Treaty was signed or, at any rate, after the Armistice which preceded it was declared. The gift of one hundred millions and the other heavy contributions during the war, are not among them. The sale of "Reverse Councils", for instance, could in no sense be said to have been "forced" upon the State by the necessities of war. Sir William Meyer was the last exponent of the policy of "severe conservatism" which,

Lord Reading rightly said, has been the general characteristic of Indian financial administration in the past. And when His Excellency compares India with other belligerent countries, it is right to remind him that, except the countries directly involved, no country has had individually to make as great sacrifices in men, material and money as India; that while the sacrifices of the self-governing Colonies have been recognised and rewarded by mandated territories and large shares of reparation money, India has been awarded the glorious satisfaction of contemplating the copy-book maxim that virtue is its own reward; and that, most important of all, all the belligerent countries with which comparison can reasonably be made, whatever their present financial troubles may be, have had for years a national system of education and had attained a high level in respect of sanitation and other departments which make for national efficiency, while India lacks most of these and that, owing to financial mismanagement supervening on the set-back resulting from the war, even her normal modest rate of progress in these matters has been checked. The poor man who was deprived of his one ewe lamb, might have consoled himself with the reflection that he had at least the use of his limbs, while the owner of huge flocks who robbed him was, perhaps, a victim to gonorrhoea or other diseases of the rich, but the Prophet who denounced the outrage did not advise the victim to thank his stars that he had a good appetite, was free to work with his hands, and that, besides, "the sweet restorer, balmy sleep" was not denied to him. Sir Vithaldas Thackersey, whose election to the Legislative Assembly adds greatly to its strength in financial deliberation, has given notice of a motion to appoint a strong Committee to investigate recent financial policy and to suggest measures to guard against future blunders, and we trust that it will be accepted by Government.

THE REPATRIATION MUDDLE.

It will be remembered that in reply to the complaints made in a Madras meeting about the condition of Indian repatriates from South Africa, the Government of India issued a communique on August 5th. They stated therein

"that no hopes were held out by the Union Government to the repatriated Indians that every one of them would be given a job on Rs. 80 a month. The Union Government gave an assurance to the Government of India that only voluntary repatriates were being provided with passages to India. It was also stated by them that no propaganda work was being undertaken by them to persuade Indians to accept repatriation."

It is difficult to reconcile this with the latter portion of their statement wherein they admitted:

"A pamphlet was issued by the Indian Repatriation Office in which it was mentioned that the Indian Government was making arrangements to receive Indians returning to India and finding them employment, that Labour Depots were being opened at Bombay, Calcutta and Madras and that food was plentiful in India and crops had been very good."

Of course, the Government seek to make out that there is no inconsistency by saying that "they informed the Union Government in June last that owing to few Indians being repatriated from Natal, they were unable to open Labor Depots, that there was famine in several places and that experience showed that repatriates from South Africa, Fiji and British Guiana were in considerable difficulties and unable to find suitable employment." This explanation does not improve matters. The repatriation of Indians began in the latter half of last year and the Government of India were silent in the face of these false and misleading allurements to the Indian repatriates for eight or nine months. They woke up only in the month of June. It is a case of shutting the stable door after the horse is stolen. Have the Government made enquiries as to how many have been sent back to India, how many are in need or in distress and how many of them think they have been misled and want to go back to South Africa?

Government say they asked the Union Government to cancel the paragraphs about cheapness of food and Labor Depots. These protests they made in the month of June only and it is not certain whether the Union Government gave even then immediate effect to these suggestions of the Government of India. There must have been the usual dilatoriness and it might be taken that the repatriates who have come to India up to the month of August, have been victims of gross deception practised on them. That this has been so is clear from copies of statements of three repatriates which are reprinted elsewhere from the Hindu. Greater proof is not needed of the mischievous nature of the whole Repatriation Scheme. The Government of India's indifference or lack of provision is clear from their remark that 'owing to few Indians being repatriated from Natal they were unable to open Labour Depots'. Does it mean that they expected that tens of thousands of Indians would be turned out of South Africa or that the 1500 or 2000 repatriates did not need any help but they were to be left to shift for themselves, and to wander about the country homeless and destitute? Curiously enough we have to gather even the number of returned emigrants from South Africa papers and the Government of India in their expectation of tens of thousands have not cared to publish how many Indians have been deceived into going back to India.

There is only one method of redress. The whole policy of Repatriation should be reversed and the Government of India should send strong representations asking the Union Government to stop further repatriation proceedings. They should at the same time, instead of merely making ineffective representations to the Government, advertise in the Indian papers in South Africa like the Indian Opinion and otherwise spread broadcast the information that conditions in India are not so favourable as represented and that those who sign repatriation bonds must do so at their own risk. There is no reason why the Government of India representative on the spot, whose existence was not felt during the dismal proceedings of the last seven or eight months, should not run an active counter-propaganda depicting the state of the repatriates already here and asking people to desist from accepting the Union Government's offer. Otherwise, it would mean that the ways of the Union Government have not only been passively looked on but are also connived at. Besides, it is only just and proper that facilities should be given for such of those repatriates who believe they have been wronged and deceived, to go back to South Africa. We wonder whether our Government would show sufficient strength or interest to take the course above suggested. While such confusion and hardship prevail, news comes that some more hundreds of Indian Labourers from Fiji have already left for India. And an Indian deputation is to go to British Guiana, consisting of Dewan Bahadur Kesava Pillay and a member of the Servants of India Society, to investigate the possibilities of Indian emigration to that country. This is done in pursuance of a recommendation of non-official members of the Indian legislature. We ourselves hold that no Indian emigration on an organised scale should be permitted at present to any part of the world. The delegation from British Guiana which visited India was unable to give satisfactory replies to our question whether the recommendations made by Messrs. Macneil and Chimanlal in their report had been carried out, and we told the members of it who saw us that the country would not favour their mission at the present juncture. We believe Mahatma Gandhi also advised them in the same sense. In our opinion, it is a waste of time and money to investigate the prospects of Indians settling in Guiana when, as the Government of India themselves state, Indians are returning from that country and find considerable difficulty in securing occupation in India. But the members of the Legislature at Simla and Delhi care for none of these things. And Government is anxious to humour them in such matters so that when it comes to matters nearer home it may remind them how in other things Government has acted in consonance with the wishes of non-official members.

MALABAR—A LAND OF SURPRISES.

(BY MR. N. LAKSHMANAN)

Malabar is par excellence a land of surprises both during normal and abnormal times. In the words of Dr. Slater, "the striking geographical features of Malabar, the coast line with its long tradition of distant trade, trade with Lisbon, with Baghdad, with Rome, with Babylon, the wild mountains and forests, and in between the strip of rich land and convenient cultivation, make the extraordinary intensity of caste prejudice intelligible, if not justifiable." The learned writer who has quoted Dr. Slater's opinion goes on to write, in the course of his articles on the depressed classes in Malabar, that the economic status is closely intertwined with the caste-status among the members of such castes, and the improvement of their status, though difficult, has got to be attempted. The matriarchal system is the special feature of this land of Parasrama. The Nambudiri, the Nair, the Tiyya, the Christian, the suppressed classes and the Moplah form the different strata of society in Malabar. To many outside Kerala, the sociology of beautiful Malabar is yet a sealed book. However some notable modern travellers have given the outside world certain glimpses of unfamiliar Malabar. For instance, as a wandering monk then unknown to fame, Swami Vivekananda travelled on foot all over Malabar with his eyes and ears open, and on returning from America and in the course of his memorable journey from Colombo to Almora, the Swamiji, in one of his Madras lectures, indignantly styled Malabar to be a huge lunatic asylum from what he saw of the absurd extent to which the curse of untouchability and unapproachability has been carried in that country of strange customs and manners. Even a hurried visit to Palghat—the gate of Malabar—was enough to torment the heart and conscience of the Mahakavi Tagore and Professor Andrews with the existence of galling social disabilities in that place. Dr Gilbert Slater has said that the very physical features of Malabar seem to favour or foster the spirit of exclusiveness. Sir Narayan Chandavarkar visited Malabar a couple of years ago and writing on the moods of Malabar he quoted with effect Bishop Heber's lines:

" It is a place where nature smiles,
But only man is vile."

Malabar has evolved a special and peculiar system of land tenure. Under the existing system, the relation between the "Jemmies" (landlords) and "Kudiyans" (tenants) is far from being satisfactory. One generally comes across in Malabar too many signs of extreme poverty in the midst of plenty. Dewan Bahadur M. Krishnan Nair, M.L.C, the Ex-Dewan of Travancore is pledged to bring forward, before long, a tenancy legislation radically modifying the present system of land tenure in British Malabar. It is reported that a gang of 75 Moplabs entered the family house of the Jenmi representative of the Madras Legislative Council and demanded money and arms. Mr. P. Thampan M.L.C. had to surrender a revolver and a sum of Rs.100 as blackmail. It is also reported that about three hundred Nambudiris who have arrived at Calicut as refugees from Ernad and Walluvanad taluks had doleful tales to relate of the diabolical crimes committed by the Moplabs who not only looted their houses but subjected most of them to torture. It is just possible that agrarian discontent and general economic depression are among the deep-seated causes of the Moplah rising though the party politicians have left them entirely out of consideration.

In times of peace, the Moplabs are a most hard-working race: they seem to possess immense powers of physical endurance. But in spite of their infinite capacity for continuous hard manual labour the Moplabs always feel the pinch of poverty in Malabar and are therefore ready to go to any outside place to be able to keep the wolf off the door. A remarkable instance of the utter helplessness of the Moplah to make the two ends meet was noticed by many observers when, a few months ago, thousands of Moplabs men, women and children most of whom were not professional beggars went on foot to Ootacamund on hearing that a very rich Mahomedan planter of the Nilgiris was going to distribute alms and clothing to the poor members of the community. From an economic standpoint, this Moplah "exodus to Ooty" is comparable to the recent 'exodus' of the Assam labourers. With reference to the labour efficiency of the average Moplah, a Malabar friend remarked to me about two years ago that next perhaps to the Tiyyas, the Moplahs are the coming race of Malabar.

But, now alas, the rebel Moplah has become an object of terror to the civil population of Malabar. Is it likely that the disbanded Moplah sepoys, soon after their return from Mesopotamia, were not provided by the authorities with reasonable facilities for employment in useful and peaceful occupations? As the Hindu says, the force which contributed to many of the sinister aspects of the riots is the training, the tenacity of purpose and mischievous leanings which the "demobbed" unemployed Moplahs brought with them from Mesopotamia and other places overseas. That the Moplahs are amenable to the advice or persuasion of their local religious leaders is evidenced by the non-violent example set by the "Thangal" or high-priest of Ponnani. Mr. C. Vijayaragavachariar of Salem and other responsible publicists have advocated that the way of pacifying the turbulent Moplahs is to send peaceful and respected men of their own community, men who will be successful in bringing home to them the need for non-violence. In the light of this opinion and the early but abortive attempt of the President of the Kerala Provincial Congress Committee to pacify the mobs, the step taken this week by the Madras Provincial Conference at Tanjore to send some of the Non-Malabar Congress workers to the scene of the troubles appears to be more theatrical. It is hardly likely that the gentlemen who have courageously undertaken this delicate and thankless task of going to Malabar share the average Englishman's notion that a Moplah fanatic is either easily terrorised by the revolver or gets pacified by the remonstrance of the Moplah woman. Let us however hope for the success of the Congress delegation.

It also augurs well for an early restoration of peace and order in the disturbed areas that Mr. F. B. Evans I. C. S. is the special civil officer with the troops in Malabar. Mr. Evans was the District Magistrate of Malabar during the anxious period of the great war and has won the esteem and confidence of the people by his tactful and conciliatory administration of the District. His knowledge of and insight into Malabar and its people are sure to stand him in good stead at this trying time, and he can be trusted to keep his head cool and, as far as it lies in his power, to see that the work of pacification is accomplished, as the Reformer has suggested, with a minimum of force and with the maximum of prudence and persuasion.

RELIEF TO FORCIBLY CONVERTED HINDUS.

I

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,
Sir,

It was a relief to have read in to-day's issue of your esteemed paper that steps are being contemplated for taking back to Hinduism those forcibly converted to Islam in the Moplah disturbances and that the sympathy of influential orthodoxy has been assured. In matters of religious and social adjustment it is always better to proceed on the lines of evolution rather than of an out and out revolution. And it appears to those thus disposed that the attempts to readmit the erring Hindus would be more successful if a warrant were shown from the Hindu Shastras which, speaking for myself, present one beautiful expanse of an evolutionary national mind. My present object is, however, not to start any controversy but to offer assistance to those who are at work in connection with the unfortunate victims of the Moplah. The occurrences and the daily happenings the news of which is being daily carried to us from the disturbed area, and which have brought to the forefront the question about the status of such of the unfortunate victims as have been forcibly dragged away into Islam, are not, unfortunately, the first contingency of its kind. For India has been having the test of its enforced contact with the foreigners from very early times—from the 3rd century B. C. at least within historical record—and the carrying away of women and men as captives and their escape or discharge from such captivity are episodes which must have been of constant occurrence in those days and must have taxed seriously the capacity of those whose business it was to maintain order in the body politic. Enough will be found in the Smriti of Devala who appears to be specially fitted to provide for a contingency like the present as you will find from the contiguity of the place to the countries overrun by of his abode the early foreign invasions and thus the whole Smriti is an answer to a question put thus

ब्राह्मणाः क्षत्रिया वैश्याः शूद्राश्चैवाहपूर्वकम् ॥ and the answer is given in the several verses beginning from verse 17 to almost the end of the Smriti i.e. the verse 90, and in particular verse 45 to verse 54 some of which I quote to your readers

स्तेच्छैर्हतानां चरेर्वी कान्तारेषु प्रवासिनाम् ।

शुक्त्वा मह्यमक्षयं वा क्षयार्तेन भयेन वा ॥ ४५ ॥

पुनः प्राप्य स्वकं देशं चातुर्वर्णस्य निष्कृतिः ।

कृष्णमेकं चरेद्विप्रस्तदर्थं क्षत्रियस्यरे ।

पादोनं च चरेद्वैश्यः शूद्रः पादेन शुष्यति ॥ ४६ ॥

शुद्धीता श्री बलादेव स्तेच्छैर्गुर्वीकृता यदि ।

शुर्वी न शुद्धिमाप्नोति त्रिरात्रेणेतदा शुचिः ॥ ४७ ॥

योषा गर्भं विधत्ते वा स्तेच्छात्क्रामात्कामतः ।

ब्राह्मणी क्षत्रिया वैश्या शूद्रा वर्णतया च वा ॥ ४८ ॥

I refer to pages 85 to 89 of the Collections of Smriti (स्मृतीनांसंग्रहः) published by Anandashrama of Poona Serial No. 48.)

I may state for the benefit of such of your readers as cannot follow the Sanskrit, that to a question put to the Sage Devala, residing on the banks of the Indus, as to the way for the purification of those carried away by the Mlechha the Sage, expounds in his reply the several purificatory rites and assigns each of these to the kinds of pollutions brought by the Mlechhas covering in this range the comparative paltry case of a mere contact to the most serious case where women were forced into sexual intercourse and had as a result thereof, become pregnant. For all these cases a way out has been presented in the form of purificatory rites.

I need not say I should be extremely happy to be of use to those who are working in this direction, and that I wish success to their noble efforts.

Bombay.

Yours sincerely
J. R. GHARPUA

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

It is reported from Calicut, that in the recent Moplah rebellion, over three hundred Hindus have been forcibly converted to Mohamedanism. The Hindu Sastras had anticipated the contingency of like nature, and have made provision for reconversion of the Hindus converted against their will Matsya Puranam, Chap. 215, verse 62, p. 774 printed at the Bangabasi Press, says as follows:—

“ Let the king restore him to his caste, who has fallen from his religion of birth.”

An outcaste to be restored to his caste has to perform a “prayaschitta,” (an expiation), which costs money. The Hindus all over India ought to contribute their mite for meeting the expenses of the expiation of the three hundred Hindus, who have been forcibly converted. Leaders of the Indian National Congress, the Khilafat-workers, and the Moderates ought to give the widest publicity to the Sastric ordinance above quoted and show their sympathy with the outraged Hindus.

9. Old post office Street, Yours &c.,
Calcutta, 8rd September, 1921. SAILENDRA KRISHNA DEB.

MOPLAHS AND THE KHILAFAT.

A public meeting of the Moulvies of Malabar was held at the Customs Godown, Ponnani, at 4 p.m. on the 24th July 1921, under the presidency of His Holiness, Pudiagath Abdurrahiman alias Kunhi Bava Musader. A very large number of Moplahs from various taluks in the District attended the meeting. The object of the meeting was to convince the Moplahs that the so called Khilafat and Non-Co-Operation movements are not based on religion and are against the true tenets of the Prophet. In spite of the great opposition of the Non-Co-operators, the meeting was well attended, and the audience numbered about 4000. Several Moulvies addressed the meeting, of which the following are prominent; Messrs, K. Abdulla Kutti Musaliar, M. Abdulla Musaliar of Kadagars, P. Avara Musaliar, K. Pokker Musaliar, C. Muhammad Musaliar, A. Ebrahim Kunhi and T. V. V. Iemon.

The following resolutions were proposed by Mr. K. Abdulla alias Koyotti and supported by Mr. M. Katty Hassan Kutty and passed unanimously:

1. This Meeting of the Moulvies, which is attended by a large number of Moplahs of various Taluks in the District, unanimously condemn the so-called Khilafat and Non-Co-Operation movements in the Islamic World, and regret that the Moplahs were led into it by unlicensed and irresponsible men of the country who misread and misinterpreted the religious teaching of the Holy Quoran and sacred Hadis.

2. This Meeting is unanimously of opinion that the movements are against the true tenets of the Prophet and teachings of the Ulemas which enjoin the strictest obedience to God, Prophet and the ruling King whoever he be.

3. This Meeting desires that all Moulvies would follow teachings from the Holy texts which have been read out here.

4. This Meeting condemns the Non-Co-operation and waraj movements which are opposed to the teachings of the Prophet.

5. This Meeting emphatically urges the Moplahs in the whole District of Malabar and elsewhere to dissociate themselves from such movement which are calculated to ruin the unity of Islam and disgrace their Holy religion and their early religious leaders of ages gone by.

6. This Meeting resolves to organise an Association by the name of “Sahakarana Sangham” to spread the views expressed in the above resolutions.

7. This Meeting resolves to communicate the above resolution to the Government of India, His Excellency the Governor of Madras and the Collector of the District; and Khan Sahab V. Attakoya Dungal. The President of the Reception Committee has been authorised to do the same.

THE MALABAR PRESS ON MOPLAH REBELLION.

The revolt was primarily against constituted authority and has been confined to the particular community. The systematic looting of public offices and cutting of communications is distinctly anti-Government. But it has been accompanied with an equally systematic and wholesale looting of Hindu houses in all the affected areas. If murder of Hindus has not been so widely practised as it might have been, it was due to the readiness with which the Hindus surrendered their possessions and purchased their lives. The plunder and injury to which the Hindus have been subjected, the defilement of some of their places of worship and certain other atrocities which are reported, make a tragic mockery of the Hindu-Moslem unity and brotherhood in so far as the Moplahs are concerned. The systematic destruction of documents is another conspicuous feature of the movement. The rebels probably hope to sweep away their indebtedness by this process. Available records in many private dwellings have been destroyed by them as well as the records in public offices. These features combined with the fact that the rebels all belong to one religious community go to prove that the outbreak is essentially one of fanatical violence, for which even the extreme political party can have no sympathy. But Khilafat propaganda had intensified the old fanaticism of Ernad rather than it infused the new spirit of non-violence, as otherwise the outbreak would not have been so widespread.—The Malabar Journal, Calicut.

And this reminds us of attempts that are being made to delude the public out-side Malabar into the belief that the rebellion is not directed against the non-Muhammadan communities and that the reports of outrages on Hindus, their homes, their properties and even their temples and shrines are either fabricated or grossly exaggerated. It is established beyond doubt, however, that numbers of Hindus of substance have been plundered, that there have been number of instances of forcible conversion and of women and girls being either outraged or carried off, no trace of them having yet been obtained. If any one doubts the accuracy of these reports of plundering and outrages, let him go and interview some of the large numbers of Namboodiri Brahmin fugitives who are being harboured and cared for by the Zamorin and by various landlords in and out of the Calicut Taluk.—The West Coast Spectator (Calicut.)

RABINDRA NATH TAGORE'S MESSAGE

On the 15th of August, the poet, Rabindra Nath Tagore was accorded an enthusiastic reception by the citizens of Calcutta at a public meeting held under the auspices of the Bengal National Council of Education. The poet delivered the following message in response:

It is due to no external cause that the West has now occupied a principal place in the history of the modern world. She has gained that eminence because she has realised some great truth in her mind and has carried it out in action.

For this reason only has she been able to assert her will over the rest of the world.

The East will not attain her own eminence by any physical and mental rejection of the West. She will not be able wholly to be free herself from the conditions which have been imposed upon her merely in that manner. The material world with its laws is a great fact, and it cannot be ignored with impunity. The needs of this material world have to be attended to; otherwise they exact their penalties. Those who have not made themselves ready to welcome this fact of the material world and to meet its needs must in the end become bankrupts. Its laws are inexorable. It becomes an obstacle only when our knowledge is either inadequate or incorrect.

The West has recently learnt to master those laws. It has got hold of the engine which enables her to progress rapidly along the road of life. She has been the first to reach the feast, and her share in the feast has come to her before others. Those who have been too slow in their movement and got too late to the feast, have found themselves deprived. In reality, it is a competition in knowledge and skill and training—it is not mere accidental advantage, which has given the West its present position.

Men have never accepted the facts relating to phenomena as final. They have always felt that there was something behind the facts, from which the facts themselves have arisen. It has ever been the aim of man, even from primitive times, to get behind the barrier of facts, and to enter into some relationship, with that creative power which is behind phenomena. Thus, man began his experiments to find a means by which he might come into relation to the creative power which is hidden in the heart of nature. His first attempt was that of Magic. He believed that a certain force, called magic, was at the root of things and that by some happy combination of magical powers he might attain to the mastery of the world.

These experiments in the art of magic have led on, step by step, to Science. Men have discovered by experiments and induction and analysis, that there are these immutable laws of nature. It has now become the mission of man in the universe to establish the harmony of the laws of reason with those of the material world. The regulated intellect of mankind has at last got access into the inner store house of power in nature, and has discovered the laws which regulate the supply of that power. The West has been fortunate enough to find out these great immutable truths of nature first of all. She has been able to utilise them and thus she has had power to attain to her present ascendancy among mankind.

The East has not yet shaken off her belief in magical powers. She still retains her sense of the accidental nature of phenomena. She still believes in the special exercise of the Will of divinities upon the happenings of her daily life and surroundings, which are really subject to these immutable laws. She has in this way not yet been made certain of her position in this great world. The East is still pursued by a thousand imaginary fears and by a deep distrust in the conclusions of her own intellect. This has caused a want of self-reliance, a lack of inner certainty, a divided mind, and a leaning on authorities which are outside the will and understanding. This is a mental condition, which is antagonistic to the attainment of freedom in the social and political spheres.

God Himself has given us our "Swaraj" in this world when He has hidden Himself away behind His own universal law, which can be made use of by any individual who has faith in his own rational mind. Those who do not realise this "Swaraj" which is ready to hand, those who fill the throne vacated by God with pretenders, these are defeated in the race of life and insulted by all the Powers of the earth. Therefore the one true path of attaining freedom in the external world, is the knowledge and faith in these immutable laws which have now been made known to mankind. In order to attain this knowledge we shall have to accept the West as our teacher.

Those students who are angry with their own examiners, only waste their time in venting their rage upon him. The best way to get rid of the examiner is to pass the examination. The East will only be rid of the dominance of the West by accepting the knowledge which must be received at her hands.

I know that the question will be raised, whether in my own experience of the West my mind has been fully satisfied with what I have seen. My answer is that I was not satisfied. The immutable laws of the material world, properly used lead to success, but success itself is not the fulfilment of our humanity. The scientific attitude of mind, which tends to exclude personality from the operations of the universe, ends also to undermine the very basis of all human relationships in the process. Again, the spirit of professionalism has become a prominent motive force in the evolution of society in the West. Therefore, the West appears to me to have gradually lost faith in the infinite variety of human ideals. Thus, with all its efficiency for producing material comforts and even benefits for mankind, the West has taken away at the same time much of that delight which comes to man from the realisation of soul. For the human world loses its inner and ultimate meaning when it abandons its faith in some living ideal as the centre of all creation. Its movements then become unrelated to any final purpose. Its accumulation of things merely expresses the spirit of multiplication instead of that of perfection.

All this failure to reach the inner personal meaning of life has had the effect of raising barriers of exclusiveness between nations; it brings jealousy and interminable quarrels for possession in its train. The late war has made it evident to the West itself and to all the world that some great truth has been lost sight of. For, a sudden and world-wide catastrophe has happened and this could not have taken place without some inner cause. The best minds of the West are now busily employed in seeking for that missing truth which has been forgotten. In doing so, they have instinctively turned their heads towards the East.

The East has its unshakable faith in the infinite living ideal, which gives meaning to all things and fulfilment to our humanity. The time has come for the West to come to the East. For the soul of the West is famished and her social life has been wounded to the quick. This is the point reached in world-history today.

It is the problem of every country of the world to bring to pass the deeper reconciliation of East and West, so that humanity may become one. When, therefore, I think of the education of my own country I keep this problem of reconciliation always before my mind. For, education ought to have this object in view that it may fit us for the great to-morrow, when the meeting of the human races of the world will find its truth in mental understanding and co-operation.

SOUTH AFRICAN INDIAN'S STATEMENTS.

I.

The following is an exact copy of the statement made by, Poonusamy of Veerabathari Street, Vepery, Madras, on the 19th August 1921.

- (1) I went to Natal with my family some 30 years ago under indenture.
- (2) I have 5 sons and one girl, all were born in Natal, South Africa.
- (3) I and my five sons were working at the Flexton Sugar Company, Natal, South Africa, and were earning £4 £3, and £2-16 each with the usual rations and free lodgings.
- (4) I believed the contents of the foregoing pamphlet issued by the Union Government and left for India with my family under the repatriation schemes.
- (5) That there is a rumour in Natal to the effect that the Indian Government shall provide with employment at Rs. 30 per month and food-stuffs are plentiful in India.
- (6) Upon our arrival in Madras we have not been provided with employment by the Government as stated in the pamphlet nor do we find that the necessaries for life are cheap as mentioned in the above pamphlet.

We are prepared to go back to Natal, provided the Union Government places no objection on our landing there.

The following is a copy of the statement of Appalsamy another repatriate residing near Jubilee Market, Madras.

I went to Natal about 19 years ago under indenture.

I went in the employ of the Election Sugar Company, Zululand, on a monthly salary of £6, rations and house were provided.

I was told by a servant of the Union Government of South Africa, that there is a good prospect in India for Indians returning from Natal and Rs. 80 are at least obtainable, that invariably one could get the same amount of salary as he used to get in Natal, at the time of his leaving South Africa.

I believed these statements and left Natal under the repatriations scheme with my daughter about 4 months ago. On arrival in Madras I found things just the reverse. Had it not been for the above mentioned hope I would not have left Natal; I am prepared to go back and refund the passage money for myself and daughter to the Union Government, and willing to pay our return passage to Durban, if the authorities concerned issue the necessary document for our journey.

The following is a copy of the statement of K. Mahomed (No. 11219) who has no fixed abode, but is wandering homeless in Madras:

I went to Natal, South Africa some 17 years ago under indenture. About the year 1913 I joined the steamer S. S. "Islandia" as fireman and proceeded to London and returned the same year to Natal.

About the year 1918 I entered the service of J. L. Hulett & Sons Ltd., and was earning wages at the rate of £4, a month with rations, free quarters and medical attendance in Natal.

Early this year, a pamphlet issued by the Union Government, concerning the repatriation of Indians was brought to my notice by a friend. I believed the contents printed therein and left for Madras, under the repatriation scheme.

Since my landing here I am unable to secure an employment, hence I am left in the streets of Madras, stranded and begging.

Had it not been for the above false information I would not have left Natal.

medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and
gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to those persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility.
Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicines. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires, it is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills. Rupees ten only.

NOTES.

The Mopla Outbreak. We print to-day a courteous remonstrance from a valued Mahomedan friend regarding some statements in our leading article on the Mopla outbreak in the Reformer of the 4th September. The letter was not meant for publication, which makes its appeal more forcible to us. We have from the first emphasised what our friend says, namely, that forcible conversions are against the spirit of Islam and that the action of the Moplas is un-Islamic. Every Indian Mahomedan with any education cannot but view the violent evangelism of the Mopla rioters with abhorrence. Among the Moplas themselves, a considerable section has not only stood absolutely aloof from the disturbance but in not a few cases members of this 'sect have, at imminent risk to themselves, stood between Hindus and the physical force missionaries. We printed last week the report of the proceedings of an influential meeting attended by 4000 Moplas held on the 24th July at Ponnani, where several of their leading men condemned the Khilafat and Non-Co-operation movement itself as opposed to the teachings of the Holy Koran. Our criticism was, as our friend rightly mentions, that the Khilafat-Non-Co-operationists had not condemned the forcible conversions as they ought to have promptly done if religious tolerance was an indispensable factor in their Swaraj. We referred to a meeting at which violence was condemned in general terms and our friend says that it must be taken to include forcible conversions. Forcible religious conversions are a category by themselves, their effects transcend in extent, character and duration those of other forms of violence, and they do not end as other forms of violence do with injury to the victims' life, limb or property but reach beyond to his social and spiritual life and to posterity. With great respect to our correspondent, therefore, we cannot but regard the explanation that forcible conversions are covered by the general condemnation of violence, as a bit of special pleading. Then our friend calls attention to the fact that the Kazi of Calicut and other Muslim leaders in Malabar had publicly denounced forcible conversions. This escaped our notice. Although we have not been able on a somewhat careful study of Calicut and Madras papers to verify the information, we are glad to know that the Mopla leaders had done so. But our criticism referred only to the Khilafat Non-Co-operationists, and the first condemnation by a leading Khilafat leader is that by Mr. Yakub Hussain published last week. He has not thought that a general condemnation of non-violence would cover these conversions, and his denunciation of them is unqualified and emphatic. But the mischief has been done. If he had spoken out two weeks earlier, his words might have had some effect. He not only maintained silence but criticised Government for its measures but for which there would have been many more forcible conversions than there have been. The country does not believe in the capacity of the Khilafat-Non-Co-operationists to secure the Swaraj in which religious liberty will be the absolute right of every subject.

India and the Khilafat. Our friend speaks of Hindu-Mahomedan unity. He knows well that nobody attaches more importance to Hindu-Mahomedan unity than ourselves, but it is obvious that it cannot be built upon a religious or quasi-religious foundation like the Khilafat. That the Prime Minister gave a pledge that Thrace and Asia Minor will not be taken away from the Turks, that he subsequently acknowledged that this pledge was the means of stimulating recruitment among Indian Mahomedans, and that this pledge has not been adhered to in the Treaty of Peace, are deplorable facts. The people of India, without distinction of race or creed, feel that the British Government should do its best to redeem its pledge. The Government of India, it is well-known, has identified itself with this united demand of the Indian people. But to say, as Mahatma Gandhi says in Young India, that the Khilafat is now a national question, is very wide of the mark. Two-thirds of the people of India are non-Mahomedans, and even of the Mahomedans, a large section, the Shiah, do not recognise the Khilafat. As a religious institution, they have no interest in the Khilafat, and to write as if they had, is to lay the seeds of serious misunderstanding between them and the section of Mahomedans who hold by it. Indeed, we think that much mischief has been already done. We are unable to dismiss from our minds the thought that such indiscriminate statements might have had the effect of leading the Moplas honestly to believe that the Hindus were only awaiting some persuasion to adopt the religion of the Khalif. There should no longer be any room for such misunderstanding. The Khilafat is not a national question with Indians: it is a religious question with a section of Indian Mahomedans. What is a national question is that the Indian people, including Mahomedans of all denominations, are distressed that the British Government to which they owe allegiance, has not fulfilled its pledge that the Turks should not be dispossessed of Thrace and Asia Minor. This distinction must be emphasised, as the language sometimes employed by Khilafat leaders often slurs over it. A factitious Hindu-Mahomedan unity based on the Khilafat which to three-fourths of the Indian people is no more than a name, is an obstacle to real and lasting Hindu-Mahomedan unity which must rest and can only rest on a common nationalism which regards religion as a matter of the individual conscience, out of reach of any political consideration whatsoever.

The Future of Ceylon: The Colonial Office is reported in a Reuter's telegram to be contemplating a scheme for the grouping of Crown Colonies according to their geographical position under High Commissioners who will shoulder some of the duties and responsibilities, especially those regarding public appointments and finances, which now devolve on that office in London. Of the suggested groupings the two most important from the Indian point of view, are that of Uganda, Nyassaland, Kenya, Tanganyika and Zanzibar under a High Commissioner at Nairobi; and that of Ceylon, the Seychelles, the Straits Settlements, and Mauritius, under a High Commissioner at Port Louis, the capital of the last-named colony. The former of these is open to no objection and conforms to the principle of geographical contiguity. The second grossly violates not only this principle but every other principle deemed essential in the formation of administrative units. In particular, the proposal to place Ceylon under a High Commissioner in Mauritius, is preposterous. Ceylon has an area of 25,000 square miles and a population of 4 millions. Mauritius is a small island of not more than 713 square miles, with a population of 4 lakhs of persons. The Seychelles is a still smaller island and was formerly a dependency of Mauritius. The Strait Settlements consist of a total area of about 1500 square miles and a population of perhaps 50,000. Ceylon is thus the largest and most important of the group, and the absurdity of placing it under a High Commissioner in Mauritius is self-evident. Commercially and culturally, Ceylon is, of course, far ahead of the other components of the proposed group. If this group is to be constituted—and it is one in which India has a predominant interest—Colombo and not Port Louis will be the most appropriate headquarters of its High Commissioner. This functionary, who will be a sort of Governor-General, should reside not in a secluded part of his jurisdiction but in the part of it where he will be in close touch with the most active currents of political, social and commercial life. The real affinities, racial and cultural, of Ceylon are with India, and no Indian can contemplate any scheme which is calculated to break it with equanimity. Historically, too, India has a deep interest in the future of Ceylon. Like Aden, Ceylon as also Mauritius was occupied at the beginning of the last century by expeditions from India. Colombo is really the principal natural southern port of India in her intercourse with the Far East on the one side and Australia on the other. The integrally complete Indian Empire would be one extending from Kabul to Colombo, which is the geographical and historical unit that it has been the immemorial aim of Indian Empire-builders to consolidate. The most natural political future for Ceylon is to be united to India to which she belongs by every tie that nature and man can contrive.

The Future of Aden: As we surmised last week, Mr. Winston Churchill seems to have been indulging in an "intelligent anticipation of events" when he told the House of Commons that the transfer of Aden to the Colonial office, except for financial details, had been completed. In reply to a supplementary question in the Legislative Assembly by Mr. Samarth as to whether Government knew that Mr. Churchill had stated in the Commons that it had been decided to transfer Aden to the Colonial Office, Dr. Sapru replied "I am not aware of that." Thereupon Mr. Hailey said, Mr. Churchill's statement was premature. Mr. Samarth further asked whether the Government of India had publicly contradicted it. Mr. Hailey replied: "I have now done it." If Mr. Hailey is better informed of the intentions of the British Government than Mr. Winston Churchill, India must, indeed, be making progress in the confidence of that Government. The difference between the Indian Law Member's profession of ignorance and the English Finance Member's disposition to take the Legislative Assembly into Government's confidence, will be noticed. The Times of India thinks that Aden forms an unjustifiable and heavy expense to India and that the Bombay Government would welcome the transfer. If that is so, why was India required to bear the burden all these years? If India was unjustly saddled with the burden, will Great Britain recoup her for her losses on Aden during nearly a century? The question should be discussed in all its aspects in the Legislative Assembly, before a decision is finally taken. As the Western India Liberal Association has aptly pointed out, if Aden is necessary for the defence of India, it will not be less necessary when India attains full responsible Government and the present move is open to the suspicion that responsible Government in India is to be weighted down by depriving her of strategic positions. It has been financially handicapped already in several ways.

The Ali Brothers. The Government of Bombay, acting with the full concurrence of the Government of India, having decided to prosecute Messrs. Shaukat Ali and Mahomed Ali for offences of promoting discontent in the Army, sedition and creating enmity between classes of the people, they were arrested on Friday, the former in Bombay and the latter at Waltair on his way to Madras from Calcutta. While we deeply deplore the prosecution, we cannot in fairness accuse Government of precipitancy. The brothers showed commendable patriotism in signing the statement which enabled the Viceroy to withdraw the prosecutions then pending. If the Viceroy thinks that the terms of the undertaking have been violated, and that Government have no option but to institute these prosecutions, we are not in a position to offer any effective reasons against that view. Nor should we overlook the fact that Sir George Lloyd's Government has, on the whole, been distinguished among provincial Governments by its scrupulous regard for freedom of speech and public meeting, though local officials may have occasionally blundered by excess of zeal in these respects. We are sure that the Government has undertaken this prosecution with the utmost reluctance and under an overwhelming sense of duty, and at this stage, we can only express the hope that the result of the prosecution will be such as to vindicate British Indian justice, to promote harmony among all classes of His Majesty's subjects, and to enhance the strength of Government to do the right even though it may feel itself wronged.

Shishir Kumar Ghose Laper Mission: Mr. Piyush Kanti Ghose and Pandit Kriparam of the above Mission have removed from their former address and are now staying at Lingaya Sayanna's House, Plot No. 22, opposite G. L. P. Ry. station, Dadar, Bombay.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1921.

INDUSTRIAL UNREST.

The pre-war world was in many respects different from the world we live in to-day. The participation of Indian and Japanese troops in the European war broke down the barriers between the East and the West, and threw open the flood-gates through which Eastern and Western thought is rushing and mingling, forming an eddy here and a whirlpool there. The frequent and numerous industrial strikes that we have been witnessing during the last few years are but one phase of this thought-mingling between the East and the West. India with its hoary village communal system based on castes, was exempt for ages from corporate action of labourers in assertion of their rights or privileges. Even the introduction of the factory system which brought together large numbers of people consisting of numerous castes and several creeds, did not break the peace in which Indian labourers were working till the world-war brought about an up-heaval rooting out old-world notions all round. Then an era of strikes even in this ancient country began and we are still hearing of strikes and lock-outs here and there. No province has been exempt from this industrial unrest.

A special Committee was appointed by a resolution of the Bengal Legislative Council in March last to enquire into the causes of recent strikes of workmen in Bengal and to advise what remedial measures should be adopted. A somewhat similar committee was appointed by the Bombay Government but its report has, for some reason not known to us, been treated as confidential, though, we believe, the Labour Bureau that has since been created, was its most important recommendation. The Bengal Committee has recently published its report a copy of which is before us. The Committee did not think it necessary to go back further than the 1st July 1920, as before that time though a certain amount of industrial unrest had been evident in Bengal as in other parts of India, in Bengal strikes had not been resorted to on any large scale as a means of enforcing the demands of the workers. The Committee observe:—"During the last six months of 1920, however, no less than 89 strikes occurred in the Calcutta industrial area, while the last six weeks were marked by an outbreak of 12 strikes in the Bardwan district, affecting both the coal field and some of the industrial undertakings at Raiganj. In addition to these, there were two strikes at Barisal and one at Kharagpur. In the first quarter of 1921 there have been 83 strikes in all, some of which were recrudescences of disputes which had worked out in the previous year, but though the tendency to resort to strikes appears to be diminishing for the time being, the industrial situation is still sufficiently unsettled to demand the most anxious consideration, at the hands alike of the Government and of all engaged in industry, of any measures which are likely to afford a more satisfactory means of settling out standing difficulties than those which have hitherto been adopted."

After going at length into the details of the causes that led to the strikes and how they were ended, the Committee discuss remedial measures. These measures as recommended by the Committee are the institution of (1) Works Committees and (2) Conciliation Boards. The former is to include representatives of both employers and employed, whose chief function it would be to establish and maintain harmonious relations between employers and employed. This is a very loose and a very vague definition of the function of the Works Committee. If the employees have a particular grievance and they place it before the Works Committee, the Works Committee can only report; and this is an admittedly weak point and "lengthy negotiations are necessary before a settlement can be arrived at on the basis of their recommendations." The Conciliation Board is to consist of about twenty members to be appointed by Government and to include a due proportion of all classes of the community—both European and Indian—and representatives of both capital and labour. The chief function of the Conciliation Board is to be the settlement of disputes arising in any public utility company. The weak point here: how is the settlement arrived at to be enforced and by what authority?

These recommendations are nothing new—in fact some of the important works have already created Works Committees. The difficulty has always been the lack of the humane element, and it will continue to remain so long as the employer lives and moves in the implicit faith that he is to be eternally employer and patron and the man or woman who works for wages should eternally be his bondsman; that the latter belongs to a different species from himself; and that he should be satisfied with the minimum of comfort, let alone luxury, which might be vouchsafed to him as a favour by the employer. If an improvement can be effected in this attitude, dissatisfaction will seldom ripen into grievances, being dissolved in the sympathetic understanding which ensues generally as the result of free intercourse between man and man. The fact that in concerns managed by proprietors, where the employer works himself among his workmen and is in constant touch with them, and feels the moods and sentiments that pass over them, strikes are scarce, is the best proof of this truth.

In this connection, we quote below an extract from a letter from Northern India. As such small details go to make a human being's life happy or miserable, we trust the point raised by our correspondent will be taken up and satisfactorily settled by the employers themselves:—

"I have never seen the question of "weekly pay" as against "monthly pay" taken up. In England, all classes of labour receive their pay weekly—nowadays usually on Friday so that goods may be bought conveniently on Saturday, and Sunday is of course a holiday. I should imagine that this applies to every body except those special salaried posts advertised at "so much a year"; in other words, to everyone not in the higher rungs of the ladder of the professional world. One is always running across men who have been out of work for some time and then get a chance of a fresh job. They have often been half-starved, and their wardrobe is reduced to a minimum. They go to their job and in many cases within a week go down with fever. Often, too, within a few weeks a pair of boots has to be bought or a pyjama. Firms in this part of the country usually pay about the 15th of the month; so many have to work for six weeks before getting anything. I have actually found genuine cases of men who could not afford to take a job. They were too poor to get the necessary clothes and to be able to borrow the money to maintain themselves till pay-day came. The holding up of money and the monthly pay system would not be so bad however if men before being dismissed (except in cases of misconduct) were given decent notice or pay in lieu of notice. Here men often get a day's notice. Of course, it will be said that in return they can give a day's notice—or I suppose they can. In England the man who is paid by the week must get a week's notice; the man paid by the month—a month's notice; and the man receiving his pay quarterly (the padre, for instance) a quarter's. Would not men be much better off if they were paid weekly? A monthly pay must put a large strain on the inexperienced or casual housewife and must possibly in a measure which we cannot understand, help to increase the borrowings from the banyas and others. No doubt a weekly pay-day would give more work to a firm—more than it does in England for no pay-clerk there would dare to cheat and so incidentally there is no need to count the sum paid. Here everyone wants to count his pay and also often wants to test the coins to see if they be good or not. The question of paying odd sums should not be a difficult one, for all the world over there are odd sums paid in the matter of overtime. Probably wages would have to be raised, for the month would be a four weeks one."

MR. MONTAGU AND REVERSE COUNCILS.

At long last, Mr. Montagu has come out with his own defence on the sale of Reverse Councils. The London Correspondent of the Hindu in its issue of 13th August writes that Mr. Montagu in reply to Col. Hurst, "circulated a parliamentary paper having an elaborate defence of his policy in regard to the above (Reverse Councils)." It is surprising how this really important and rather belated answer by Mr. Montagu has not been cabled by Reuter then. Col. Hurst in his question has raised whether the loss has been £17,500,000 in 1920-21, whether rich financiers gained by £29,000,000, whether this step did not contribute to the fall in Exchange, and why the Reverse Councils were not sold at competitive tender and has rounded off his question with a very proper demand—which India, in the present political turmoil and confusion, has completely neglected—"whether the Secretary of State would take steps to fix the responsibility for these disasters."

The Secretary of State replied,

The sale of Reverse Councils was not however the real cause of this loss, which would have been incurred whether they had been sold or not in consequence of the decision based on the Currency Committee's Report that the sterling securities in the paper currency reserve, originally valued on a 1s. 4d. basis should be revalued on a 2s. basis. The loss resulting from the sale of Reverse Councils at rates other than 2s. after the adoption of the currency committee's recommendations in February 1920, is about 7½ crores. . . . While I deplore the failure so far to make the currency committee's policy effective, I would remind my honourable friend of the abnormal situation prevailing last year which resulted in an adverse balance of trade of 75 crores. I am unable to accept the view that the sale of Reverse Bills has contributed materially to the present fall in Exchange. Indeed, it would be natural to infer that the sales which in 1920 aggregated to £55,000,000 must have tended substantially to check the fall.

Mr. Montagu also sought refuge under the plea that he acted according to the para 62 of the report where the committee, he said, recommended 2s. gold and not competitive rates. The replies given by Mr. Hailey have been evasive and never satisfactory. Now even the elaborate defence of Mr. Montagu sheds no new light, though the full reply will be awaited with eager interest in India—which the Central Publicity Bureau might republish. As for his plea that the loss would have been incurred even otherwise, on the revaluation of the securities at 2s. it must be pointed out that there was no need to convert a prospective loss into an actual loss by embarking on questionable methods. There is no reason why they should not have followed the practice prevailing in big Insurance Companies and Banks and the Government of India have not been reduced to abject penury and distress to dispose of their resources immediately and without waiting for better times like a bankrupt hemmed in by creditors. What will the shareholders of a Bank or Insurance Company say if the Manager and the Directors sell away all gilt-edged securities when they are very much below par instead of the usual practice of simply revaluing the securities at the market value and writing off the paper loss from the years' profits? A manager of a Bank or Insurance Company who does the same thing as the Government of India, in his management of the concern would be discredited as one afflicted with a temporary fit of madness.

India's contention has always been that apart from the merits of the currency committee's recommendation of 2s., they should have simply revalued the securities and not showed an indecent haste to sell them. Mr. Montagu's jugglery with figures and his trying to make out that the loss was only 7½ crores instead of 35 crores leave us amused. The loss is not confined to his estimate of 7½ crores only. In spite of his trying to shift off the responsibility it must be held that it is the sale of Reverse Councils at high rates that contributed to the "abnormal situation" and to "the adverse balance of trade of 75 crores last year." As for his sententious proposition that the sale tended to substantially check the fall, the present position belies it or the Secretary of State and his advisers were expecting a fall in the Exchange rate. In that case, their action borders on the betrayal of India's interests. The real result of this long-continued sale of £55,000,000 and its effect on substantially checking the fall, were to give an artificial stimulus to the high exchange prevailing, making importers order for goods, for huge sums, especially from Great Britain. No wonder, under this false lure, Indian merchants were tempted to order for more goods than India can consume and no wonder, then, that the favourable balance of trade in 1919 has been mischievously converted into an adverse balance. It is doubtful whether any of his pleas will be accepted by economists of repute. India will wholeheartedly support the last demand of Col. Harat with this modification that, instead of the Secretary of State, His Majesty's Government in London or the Houses of Parliament should take steps to fix the responsibility for these disasters. If not, the people of India must settle themselves a bit. In this connection, it is necessary that a resolution should be moved in the Imperial Legislature, asking that the whole of the correspondence between the Secretary of State and the Government of India on the sale of the Reverse Councils should be published, from December 1919 to September 1920. A notice of a resolution on the Exchange problem has been given but a resolution on the correspondence prior to and during the sale of Reverse Councils is very necessary and is bound to unravel the mystery attending these transactions.

SCRIPT FOR A NATIONAL LANGUAGE IN INDIA.

(By PUSTON.)

The question of a national language naturally preceded that of a script in which the language is to be written. It is evident that in India there are numerous races and creeds and the word "nation" would apply to a conglomeration of these races most of which have got their own dialects. The language called Urdu, Hindustani or Hindi, according to its various stages of developments, is the one which is most spoken or understood in our triangular continent, as the highest and the most unbiased authorities like George Campbell, the author of "India As It Might Be", M. Gracin de Tassej and J. Beams, the author of "Indian Philology", have pronounced (for reference see the Modern Review for March 1921 p. 325-326). This lingua franca of India contains words of Sanskrit, Prakrits, Arabic, Persian and English languages and even of the aboriginal dialects of Tamil and Telugu, in a harmonious blend, and is further capable of naturalising words of foreign origin in a way that no other vernacular can compete with it in this respect. In fact this indigenous language is the outcome of the social intercourse of various races, the chief of which are Hindus and Musalmans. Its basis is Brj Bhasha as almost all the verbs are Hindi, the verbs and the adjectives have gender unlike Persian and various other peculiarities; but Persian and Arabic which began to influence the Hindi from the year 1193, as a perusal of Pritbiraj Basu of Chand Kabi will prove, supply a large number of nouns, adjectives etc. In short this mixed language is most suitable for the needs of a mixed nation and in this lies the secret of its popularity.

It is useless to discuss the name by which it is or should be called. The most developed form is called Urdu, which is a Turkish word and probably therefore unpopular among Hindus. Next to it is Hindustani and the least improved dialect is commonly called Hindi, although of late strenuous efforts are being made by the Hindi Pracharini Sabha to improve Bhasha under the name of Hindi, by introducing words of Sanskrit origin which to the common people are more foreign than their Persian or Arabic equivalents which they are intended to displace. The name Hindustani has been given to the stage of language which contains very few of Persian, Arabic or Sanskrit words. For all that, there are so many Persian and Arabic words blended with the Urdu, Hindustani or Hindi that any attempt to divest the language of these commonly understood words, would mean crippling it seriously and replacing them with words of Sanskrit origin would make it impossible to be understood by the common masses without the help of a Pandit in every village. Language forming is a natural process which extends over several generations and even Kings have failed in introducing words of their choice in Urdu language. For instance Jahangir wanted to name wine as Ramraji and Mohammed Shah attempted to change the word Sangtra into Rangra—apparently a better descriptive name but these words never found favour with the public. It is not a question of introducing any word of foreign origin but its being capable of naturalisation and acceptance by the people. By this time Urdu is a settled language and no words of Sanskrit, Arabic or Persian origin can, indiscriminately, be interchanged. Any such attempt would at once be marked as unidiomatic. The words, 'Bottle' and 'Btal' for instance are now Urdu words and no longer English and any one pronouncing the correct word 'bottle' would not be taken to be speaking Urdu.

When it is proved that Urdu, Hindustani or Hindi is the commonest language in India and it contains words of Hindi, Persian and Arabic origin, it has to be decided what script could be more appropriate for it. Urdu from its very birth is being written in a particular script and the need for omitting that script and adopting another, has to be proved by the advocates of the change, even under the principles of onus probandi. From its infancy upto this time when Urdu language is the most developed vernacular in India and contains books of many ancient and modern sciences and arts, besides having its own vast poetry, there has been no complaint by those who know Urdu that the script has fallen short of the growing needs of the progressive language. The advocates of Devanagiri claim that their script is the most suitable for the common language. In the Indian Social Reformer of February 1911 one S. D. M. says, "I hold that the Nagri as at present in use in writing and printing the purposed lingua franca is by far and away the most perfect of all existing scripts or alphabets in actual use over the world." This is too big a claim which can not stand the light of criticism, as I will show later on. At present my view is limited to India only, as we are discussing the question of an Indian common language and not of a cosmopolitan spranto. I hold no brief for the world and have no ambition to create a perfect alphabet for the Bharat varsh. The alphabets of a language are primarily intended for the use of that language and to represent all the articulate sounds used in that particular tongue. Whether we can write the words of another language in a particular script is irrelevant on this occasion and useless in general. No script in the world, so far as I know can lay a claim to this useless ambition and I will prove that Deonagri is not an exception to this rule. Nay, there is a step further, i.e. Deonagri script cannot meet the requirements of even the present day Urdu or Hindustani. For instance Deonagri contains no letter representing the sound of S and Z as pronounced in the words "azure" and "pleasure" or the common Urdu word "Azdaha" and the proper name "Zind".

Deonagri is a pure script and is quite suitable to the needs for which it was invented. It has the same letters as used in Sanskrit language. The classification of the alphabet is an excellent one but after all it is artificial, as the invention of the first three terminal and nasal letters to correspond with the rest shows and as their omission in the Hindi-dialect proves their uselessness. I will criticize the worth of the Deonagri character later on and here have only to say that this pure character can not supply the needs of a language which is decidedly a mixed one. The present Urdu script contains 14 letters more than the Deonagri alphabet.

The existing system of script can represent all the articulate sounds necessary for the language, as these alphabets have been borrowed from Sanskrit, Persian and Arabic equally and therefore deserve rightly to be called mixed script. I hold that a mixed script is most suitable to a mixed language of which a mixed nation and on this principle the centuries past over the Urdu language in the present garb are enough and uncontrovertable evidences.

With the exception of some of the Deonagri letters which are never used in Hindi pure and simple, Urdu script contains representations for all the Deonagri letters. Over and above, these it contains all the letters peculiar to the Persian and Arabic languages. Of course in the beginning some devices had to be invented in converting the Semetic form of the letters to represent sounds used in the Hindi language but these conventionals have survived for several centuries and are never thought of to be artificial device of the present day. If this can be called a fault of the script, Deonagri alphabets also are not free from blame, for they represent the sound of Z by adding a dot to their letter representing the sound of J and so on. Here again S. D. M. is not speaking the truth when he says. . . . "There is no question either of inventing new alphabets or of perfecting and idealizing those already in use over the world." The Deonagri script has already been perfected in some cases of necessity by finding representations for sounds foreign to the system and hence the addition of a dot to several letters. But for all that artificial device there are no representations for several letters or one representation is supposed to denote 4, 3 and 2 letters at a time.

The advocates of Deonagri say that the several letters of similar sounds do not require different scripts but in this argument they forget that words written with these different letters bear different meanings and the removal of distinction would necessarily give rise to the idea that the same words have different meanings and in this way cause a great confusion in the language and open the door for automatic forgery or misinterpretation. For instance the word "Surat" written in Deonagri character would mean "shape" as well as the name of the famous city; but written in Urdu characters the two words have different forms and can not be misinterpreted. In the same way the word "Arzi" would mean "pertaining to earth" as well as "application." Thousands and thousands of such examples can be multiplied and it is only to be imagined what confusion would be the result. Besides, an independent Urdu prosody based on these scripts and the volumes of Urdu poetry on these principles shall have to be thrown into the depths of the Indian Ocean. The Urdu language has gone so far ahead that it is impossible for it to get rid of its present script which is sure to be retained by those who know its value even if their "numerically far stronger compatriots" formally denounce it as a now national script and adopt another in its place.

THE MOPLAH OUTBREAK.

A valued Mahomedan friend writes: I am writing this to you about your article on the "Moplah Outbreak". I read the article in the train on my way here. I always read the Reformer with enthusiastic interest and great benefit; it provokes thought though the views expressed are not always acceptable to me. Your article on the "Moplah Outbreak" filled me with indescribable sadness and it is to express my sorrow rather than to enter into any controversy that I write this letter to you. The fact that this is the first time I write to you about an article in the Reformer will give you some idea of the pain I feel.

That the Moplah outbreak would be eagerly seized by a certain type of men, even to question the solidarity of Hindus and Muslims was, of course, to be expected. But that you should have written in the vein you have written has given me intense pain. You write: "If the future Swaraj means countenancing forcible conversions, a very large section of Indians would prefer to have the present religious freedom to a millenium where they will have every kind of freedom except that of religion." I have too great a confidence in my countrymen to believe for a moment that in Swaraj they would countenance forcible conversions. But that is not what I want to say. The assumption made by you that Muslims, let alone Hindus, would countenance forcible conversions in Swaraj, is most unjust and, having been made by you, is most unkind. Your ground for making the assumption seems to be that while "the Khilafat leaders have passed the usual condemnatory resolution about violence, none of them has dared to denounce forcible conversions to Islam." Before the issue of the Reformer was published, the Kazi of Calicut and other Muslim leaders in Malabar had publicly denounced forcible conversions. But even if they had not openly done so, why should you assume that "the usual condemnatory resolution about violence" does not cover forcible conversion, which is also a form of violence? Apart from the fact that one of the cardinal injunctions of Islam is that "there is no compulsion in religion," I think the insistence on non violence implies condemnation of forcible conversion.

The Hindu-Muslim unity is, in my humble opinion, the greatest achievement of modern times,—and it should be the most precious thing for every Indian. The Swaraj that Muslims are fighting for with the help of their fellow-countrymen is Swaraj for the latter as well as for themselves. In moments of excitement such as this, it is possible that some of my Hindu brethren may forget this obvious truth—but those who are likely to forget it are those who have no faith in their capacity to govern their country. As for the Muslims, to say that they say one thing and mean another thing is as unkind as it is unjust. I am writing this to you not as a Muslim, but as an Indian. For, I am proud to say that I have trained myself to rise above communal differences.

HIS HIGHNESS THE YUVARAJA OF MYSORE IN POONA.

(From a Correspondent)

During his brief stay in Poona His Highness the Yuvaraja of Mysore, who came here for comparative rest, was pleased to encourage several institutions by his quiet visits. He laid the foundation stone of the Ahilyashram for the boys and girls of the Depressed Classes on the 5th of September and for the second time honoured the Poona Seva Sadan of which he is one of the oldest Vice Patrons, with a long visit on Friday, the 9th instant. His Highness drove to the Institution in company with his Private Secretary and Mr. G. K. Devadhar, the Honorary Organiser and General Secretary. Shet Narottamdas Morarjee Gokuldas and Shet Trikamdas Gowardhandas Khatav also accompanied the distinguished visitor. On arrival at the main entrance Mr. Devadhar introduced His Highness to some of the prominent workers. His Highness was then taken to the Sir Vithaldas Thackersey Hall where Mr. Devadhar gave him a brief account of the present position of the Society. It may be stated that this was His Highness' second visit to the Institution, the first having been paid in the year 1915, when the total number on the rolls was only 205, whereas on the day of his second visit His Highness found the same to have risen to 964, during the intervening period of hardly six years.

Mr. Devadhar then brought to the notice of the Yuvaraja the present two different problems that confront the Society, namely, want of sufficient building accommodation and funds. He also mentioned how the Society has begun to spread its net work outside and how several Indian States in the Deccan have started similar work in their territories with the help of the Society and explained its plan of future expansion which depended on funds. He then took the party round the various classes, which by the way, number about 45; and showed how each room in the present buildings had to be put to two or three different uses during the course of the day. His Highness himself made a good many enquiries during the round of the classes and manifested special interest in the working of the Infant Welfare Centre. He also showed special interest, and naturally enough, in a girl from Bangalore, who has at present been staying in one of the Hostels and receiving instruction in English and domestic industries.

The party having returned to the Hall after about an hour and a half, a brief but choice programme of music was successfully gone through. His Highness was then presented with a gold embroidered cushion and a pair of gold embroidered borders, as mementoes of his visit and was garlanded. Mr. Devadhar then in a very brief speech thanked His Highness for having honoured the Institution with a second visit; and His Highness Yuvaraja Saheb also reciprocated the sentiment and alluded with great satisfaction to the vast strides made by the Institution, expressed a hope that it would receive adequate help from all who wished the all round progress of the country.

Having thus concluded his visit to the headquarters His Highness drove with Mr. Devadhar first to the Woman Medical Students' Hostel No. IV, and inspected the arrangements there. From thence the party drove to the Nurses' Hostel—called the Manubai Nurses' Hostel No. II—and after inspecting the same the party sat down to tea there. His Highness seemed thoroughly pleased with the Society's attempts at providing facilities for medical instruction to high class Indian women. Rao Bahadur Dr. P. V. Shikhare thanked His Highness at the close of the visit. His Highness thanked most cordially the party for the trouble they took and congratulated them all on the success the Poona Seva Sadan Society achieved within such a short period. His Highness spoke to all the women workers and warmly thanked them for their zeal. It is significant to add that His Highness originally intended to spend about an hour at the Institution, whereas he actually spent nearly three hours thus manifesting in unmistakable terms his genuine sympathy with, and interest in, the cause of an all round advancement of Indian womanhood. Three cheers to His Highness and the guests brought this most pleasant function to a close. The schools were closed for a day in honour of His Highness' visit on Friday last.

THE BOMBAY PRESIDENCY SOCIAL REFORM ASSOCIATION.

ELOCUTION COMPETITION FOR HINDU LADIES.

The Bombay Presidency Social Reform Association will hold an Elocution Competition and a Competition in Essay writing for Hindu ladies in the 1st week of October 1921 to encourage public speaking by women and to develop their faculty of expression. Definite time and place will be announced later.

The subjects etc. fixed for the Competition in Marathi are as follows:—

1. Speeches:—

Subject I.

Will be announced 36 hours before the Competition. Prizes 3—Rs. 25, 15, 10.

Subject II.

Will be announced 15 days before the Competition. Prizes 5—Rs. 10, 6, 5, 4, 3.

2. Essay Writing.

The subjects and conditions of writing will be announced a week before the appointed time.

Prizes 3—Rs. 25, 15, 10.

Similar prizes and subjects have been fixed for the Competition in Gujarathi.

Speakers on the 1st subject will be allowed 15 minutes' time, those on the 2nd subject, 7 minutes' time and 3 hours will be allowed for the essay writing.

Ladies and girls wishing to take part in the Competition should send in their applications not later than the 30th September 1921, stating their age, full name, caste, occupation, address and subject, to the Secretaries, Bombay Presidency Social Reform Association, Servants of India Society's Home, Sandhurst Road, Girgaon, Bombay.

Speakers on the 2nd subject must also send a certificate of age signed by their guardian and the Head Mistress of their school.

THE REFORMS CONFERENCE

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

With reference to your remarks regarding the Reforms Conference, will you kindly suffer me to make some frank comments on them? Your personal remarks about Mr. Jamnadas, were quite inappropriate and entirely unnecessary. I cannot say why you indulged in them. That he was very popular once and is not now, ought to be of little consequence to you, if you are fairminded in your criticisms. I have no particular liking for Mr. Jamnadas. But I do necessarily think that your personal remarks are entirely un-called for and the undignified. Your remarks regarding Mrs. Besant, I am sorry to say, are of a very ill-natured. They seem to imply that you take a secret pleasure in her discomfiture, in her suit, and the you feel a certain amount of personal uneasiness at her being honoured by certain high personages in England.

As regards your remarks regarding the audience, they logically mean that Sir Chimanlal Setalwad and Mr. Paranjpye were the only distinguished persons who attended. Members of the Bombay Legislative Council, appear in your eyes, as men of necessarily inferior position. Even in the case of your only two distinguished persons, you seem to recognise them as such, not for their personal worth, but as is clear from your denomination of them, because they hold certain official positions. As regards Mrs. Besant's address, it is unfortunate that in her case you do not seem to recognise that, different situations require different handling, while in your own case, you are prepared to justify your wholesale plunge in politics at present, leaving social reform to take care of itself. I have nothing to say as regards your criticism of opinions and procedure. But your personal remarks, not of a very edifying character, I am constrained to say, are a serious departure from the traditions of the Indian Social Reformer. I remember, you once complained bitterly about what you called 'carping criticism' of yourself by the Bombay correspondent of the 'Capital'. I see that you are doing the very same thing now, that you detect in others!

PUSSYFOOT AND PROHIBITION IN INDIA

The Editor The Indian Social Reformer

Sir,

You have always spoken out your mind with characteristic boldness and independence of judgment coupled with a deep insight and mastery over facts. I read your interesting comments regarding Mr. Pussyfoot Johnson but unfortunately you have missed the real cause of the waning interest in his lectures at the Cowasji Jehanghir Hall, to which you passingly refer.

You must perhaps have observed Mr. Johnson

- (1) Only relating his great experiences in America,
- (2) Studiously ignoring the existence of a like movement in India,
- (3) Carefully selecting the auspices under which to deliver his addresses,
- (4) Systematically going into a wrong channel, which cannot profit the man that really needs his mission.

On my personally speaking to him after his lectures regarding his studied evasion he said:—

- (1) We accomplished prohibition in America by Law,
- (2) Your Government will therefore do it,
- (3) Your representatives at the Council will move in the matter,
- (4) And that I have only come to relate America's experience regarding Prohibition.

I replied to him that

- (1) The Government who feeds fat on this Revenue will be the last to do anything in this matter
- (2) Our Government in India is not ours
- (3) The representatives do not represent the real electorate.
- (4) Over and above relating America's experiences, you should help and profit us by your support and guidance to enable us to fight out our struggle ourselves.

He also told me that he had no experience of non-violent picketing. Will he not take hold of this larger opportunity that he finds for the struggle of Prohibition, study the surroundings and help us? He shall leave a more glorious name not only in the West but in the Eastern world. There is a vast difference between the struggle in America and India. As he is going to interview Mahatma Gandhi (so he told me) we shall perhaps hear from him more inspiring pronouncements on the eve of his return to America.

Yours etc.

R. A. GABRAY.

[Mr. Johnson, in our opinion, is wise in confining himself, as he does, to stating the experience of America with Prohibition, as regards which there is a good deal of erroneous information disseminated in India. The constitutional action by which Prohibition should be incorporated in Indian administration, belongs entirely to Indians and foreign support, except purely moral support, is altogether out of place. Ed. I. S. R.]

THE CHARAK CLINIC.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

In writing the following few lines, possibly I lay myself open to the charge of advertising "intellectual commodities." Advertisement of talents or intelligence offends against good sense and professional etiquette and yet in Europe it is almost carried to a fine art. Western countries never fail to advertise their men. Great achievements and small both are vigorously kept up before the public through the press. There is no doubt it is partly this that sustains the vitality of the nation. But the contrary is the case in India. Even public opinion, until recently was not created. It was lack of vigorous propaganda through the press that was largely responsible for the huge delay in cultivating public opinion in our country. Not seldom do we find men of high intelligence and considerable talents hardly in the eye of the public. Sir, if through this letter I am bringing to the notice of the public the existence of an institution that deserves encouragement and support I believe I am only discharging my duty. I speak of the Charak Clinic (situated near the French Bridge) recently founded by two of our most brilliant men Drs. R. D. Shirwalkar and R. N. Cooper, both of whom have acquired the diploma of F. R. C. S. and the degree of M. S. the highest gifts that could be bestowed on an individual in the science of Surgery. The clinic is hardly a few months old, and speaking personally, already it has done some very useful and beneficent work. The institution embraces all the branches of surgery including such specialities as X-Ray work and Eye work. The clinic is in charge of men of high talents, refined, genial, kind, and courteous. There is no doubt that succeeding generations will remember it with gratitude as generations have cherished with affection the memory of one of the greatest Indians and benefactors of humanity—Charak—after whom the Clinic has been so aptly named.

Bombay,

Yours truly,
P. H. D.

BRAHMIN WIDOW MARRIAGE IN POONA.

We are glad to announce that on the 23rd August last Srimati Krishna Bai a well educated widowed lady of 25, the grand-daughter of the late Vaman Daji Oke, the well known Marathi savant of the Central Provinces was married to Captain Vinayak Jaxuman Sathe of the Bombay Medical Service. He was a widower aged 38 and belongs to a prominent family. The ceremony took place at the office of the local widow marriage association and was attended by a large party of ladies and gentlemen friends of the bride and bridegroom. Prof H. G. Diwekar M. A. of the Women's University officiated as purohit. May the newly married couple long enjoy a happy and prosperous life.

disorders. In fact it makes man a man. This valuable
medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and
gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to those persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen
the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility.
Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicines. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires. It is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills. -Rupees ten only.

—:—

The Prime Minister's Pledge: A correspondent in Upper India sends us a copy of the Literary Digest, an American weekly of high standing and conducted with "conservative carefulness" as to facts, of the 30th July, containing an article on the acquittal by a Berlin jury of the Armenian who killed Talaat Pasha, the chief of the Young Turk party and during the latter part of the war Grand Vizier of the Ottoman Empire. The technical ground of the acquittal was temporary insanity brought on by a vision of Teilirian's murdered mother. But in the course of trial, a good deal of evidence was admitted regarding Talaat's policy regarding Armenians, and official orders issued by Talaat's Government and bearing his signature, were produced to show that it was one of wholesale and ruthless extermination. German official reports were produced showing that the total number of Armenians who had perished was over 1,000,000. The production of the following cipher telegram bearing Talaat's own signature, to the Government of Aleppo, is said to have had a particularly telling effect on the jury:

Collect and keep only those orphans who cannot remember the terrors to which their parents have been subjected. Send the rest away with the caravans.

Our correspondent rather in sorrow than in anger demands to know how, in the face of these terrible revelations, we can plead for the restoration of Turkish Empire. The question is irrelevant as what we have always pleaded for is the fulfilment of Mr. Lloyd George's pledge that Turkey would not be deprived of Thrace and Asia Minor which were predominantly Turk, a pledge which, admittedly, had an effect in stimulating recruitment to the Indian army at a critical period of the war, and which has been totally ignored in the Peace Treaty. The position of Government in regard to the extreme Khilafatists would be immensely strengthened if it was supported by tangible advance in the direction of the revision of the Treaty on the lines of the Prime Minister's famous declaration. We are sorry to say that no evidence of such action is forthcoming. As for the verdict of the German Court, seeing that the Germans themselves were not so long ago accused of unspeakable atrocities in Belgium, no impartial publicist can exclude from his consideration the possibility of Samuel Teilerian's case having been utilised as an easy, vicarious means of rehabilitating German humanity in the eyes of the rest of Christian Europe. The extraordinary latitude allowed for the production of irrelevant evidence regarding the policy of Turkey in a trial of the murderer of a Turkish resident of Berlin, is suspicious. As for documents, historians, no longer put implicit faith in them, because, as one of the most famous of them has observed, documents can be and have been forged. If Talaat's Government had adopted and deliberately pursued the cold-blooded policy indicated by these documents, it must have been really and truly a Satanic Government. But the Prime Minister's pledge related not to Armenians or Armenia, but to lands which were predominantly Turk in Thrace and Asia Minor, and all that we have ever asked, and now ask, is that that pledge should be kept.

India and the Khilafat: With reference to our observations last week we are asked, since the British Government has failed to secure fulfilment of its pledge, what alternative course is there to that propounded by the Khilafat non-co-operationists. We ask our readers to face facts. The Nizam, the premier Indian Mahomedan ruler, assisted by Sir Ali Imam and other eminent Mahomedan Ministers, has prohibited the Khilafat movement in Hyderabad. So far as we know, no single Mahomedan ruler has given his support to it. There are to-day much-respected Mahomedans of light and leading occupying high and responsible positions in the Government and influencing its policy. We have been at some pains to ascertain the views of non-official educated Mahomedans, and they, almost without exception, think that the Khilafat question has been pressed far beyond its legitimate value owing to Mahatma Gandhi's insistence on it as the way to Swaraj. It follows that the result of persisting in this view, can only be to throw the ignorant masses into a state of excitement which, when it passes the limits of public safety as in Malabar, can be put down only by force. We cannot view with equanimity a movement whose ultimate result is bound to be that some hundreds of illiterate, ignorant people would be shot down in the interests of peace and order. Then, is there nothing to be done? We do not say that. We believe something, much, can be done, if the present agitation is abandoned. Our suggestion is that the Indian leaders should leave the matter to be settled in negotiation with His Majesty's Government and if necessary, the Turks, by a Committee of three or four Mussulman leaders of proved ability and patriotism, and should accept as final whatever this Committee recommends as practicable. To persist in the present movement in the face of hard reality, may be magnificent from the spectacular point of view but it is neither politics nor commonsense. Every person is entitled to go to the extremest lengths of personal sacrifice, if he chooses. But no one is entitled to plunge hundreds and thousands in misery for the sake of his idea.

Art and Polity. Mr. Havell in his "Aryan Rule in India", writing of Hindu and Mahomedan political systems, observes:

The difference between the Hindu and Mahomedan systems is well illustrated in their different methods of building construction. In the former the weight of personal responsibility was evenly distributed from the top to the bottom of the political fabric, right down to the foundation of it in the village community. In the latter the stability of the structure depended upon the soundness of the keystones of the arches—if one failed the house might soon become unfit for human habitation. Islam produced many men of commanding ability and fine character, but never a great dynasty, giving to the State a long succession of happy and prosperous years. Under Hindu rule the prosperity of the State, as a whole, was to a large extent independent of the personal character of the ruling monarch; the strength of its foundations, broad-based upon its village life, was proved by the rapidity with which it recovered from the effects of centuries of devastation and tyranny.

The subject is a fascinating one well worthy of the study of Indian reformers. A harmonious fusion of the two, resulting in a combination of strength with grace, unparalleled in the art of other lands, was effected in architecture, as exemplified in many of our monumental buildings, and can and should be effected in national polity by conscious, well-directed effort, grounded on the bed-rock of truth.

The Arrested Sanyasi: It is unfortunate that the Director of Information should have intervened in a case which is sub-judice by publishing his information that the statement in the papers that Shri Shankaracharya of Sharada Pith has been arrested in connection with the prosecutions instituted by Government against certain speakers at the All-India Khilafat Conference, is wrong, and that the person arrested is one Venkatraman alias Bharati Krishna Tirthaji who has assumed the above title. This is distinctly calculated to prejudice the accused person in the impending trial and if the Director of Information is as amenable to law as Editors of newspapers, he should withdraw his statement and apologise for his mistake. At the same time, the Bombay Chronicle's endeavour to raise the cry of "religion in danger" would be unwise even if it were not somewhat gratuitous. The Hindu rubric is inflexible as regards the nomination, succession and functions of high ecclesiastical dignitaries and, so far as we know, it does not recognise any "retiring Shankaracharya" or his right to instal a successor to his office. You might as well speak of a retiring Pope nominating his successor. The business of Shankaracharya is not like that of a shopkeeper, one to be disposed of to a successor during the life-time of a person holding it, and a nomination purporting to be made in contravention of this principle is prima facie of doubtful validity. Our contemporary, we fear, will also find considerable difficulty in establishing that attendance at a Khilafat Conference, is among the prescribed duties of Shankaracharyas, who are bound by the strict letter of the law of their office to adhere to the duties which long-established tradition has attached to it. The religious susceptibilities of the Hindu community centre round principles rather than persons and that is one reason why it has been able to survive the many calamities that have overtaken it.

Capital and Labour in India. A valued English friend writes:—"Can we hope to get rid of capitalism in our own times and in an era of acute international competition? I think all talk of State industrialism has been killed by war and post war experience; the reaction against it here is intense and co-operation has a long road to travel before it can displace the efficient organisation of capitalism. Now the modern factory is by no means a bad thing. If you could visit some of the mine works in England you would be surprised to see how pleasant and healthy conditions of work are. If accompanied by a proper system of housing, they are fully compatible with a high degree of citizenship. It seems to me that we shall be on safer ground if, instead of trying to destroy capitalism, for which I think the world is not yet ripe, we aim by legislation, the pressure of public opinion and Trades Unionism, at robbing it of its worst evils and by the steady expansion of co-partnership paving the way for true co-operative production. In these, as in other ways, it seems to me that Gandhi has the germ of the right idea of a reaction against the worst features of the industrial system as seen in India and greater economic independence. But he is provoking a reaction against it by putting the movement on a non-economic basis which is bound to fail."

Workmen's Breach of Contract Act: Have the official Liberals a coherent social policy? Mr. N. M. Joshi moved a resolution in the Legislative Assembly early this month, recommending the repeal of an ancient act which provides for the imprisonment of a labourer who does not fulfil his contract to work after taking an advance from his employer. Mr. Joshi rightly described the principle of criminal liability for a civil breach of contract as discredited in England from where it was imported into India. He adduced irrefutable evidence to show that it operates in practice as a sort of legalised slavery. We have reason to think it is the vague knowledge of the existence of some such law that among other evil effects, enables brothel-keepers to terrorize, and their victims to submit, by means of bogus contracts. Against the weight of much official and non-official opinion, Mr. B. S. Kamat, the leader of the Poona Liberals, opposed Mr. Joshi's resolution. The answer to Mr. Kamat's arguments, based on his experiences as a contractor, is simple. If the employer cannot be imprisoned for breach of his contract with his labourers, why should the labourers be imprisoned for breach of contract with their employer? Mr. Kamat must have looked small when Government accepted the principle of the resolution, and undertook to introduce legislation, within eighteen months if public opinion in the country meanwhile declares itself in favour of such a course. We are sure that an overwhelming weight of opinion will be against the continuance of this absurd law.

An Unnecessary Committee: We are glad that the Legislative Assembly by a majority has disallowed the sum of two lakhs provided in a supplementary budget present to it by Government, for the visit of Lord Lytton's Committee to India. Indian opinion of all shades was opposed to this provision. It was rightly urged that so soon after the Sadler Commission's report which is on a fair way to be laid on the shelf for want of funds, it was foolish to waste two lakhs on the visit of another Committee. These Committees do more harm than good. They unsettle existing arrangements, without bringing about any compensating improvements. This is due to the fact that, while Government has no objection to destructive measures which cost no money, it will not provide money to carry out constructive recommendations.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1921.

THE MOPLA OUTBREAK AND ITS MORAL.

In one of our articles some months ago dealing with the errors of the Non-Co-operation programme we said that we found ourselves as regards fundamental principles nearer to Mahatma Gandhi than to many other political leaders. The elimination of caste, the equal status of women, the abolition of untouchability and the elevation of the depressed classes, the abolition of drink, the insistence on social and personal purity—these are fundamentals in our conception of politics as a process of social evolution. The Mahatma's unintelligible dicta regarding varnashrama dharma did not disturb us in the face of the fact that he had people of the untouchable caste living with him on the same footing as persons of his own caste. By the side of his resonant declarations on these vital matters which go to the roots of national life, the faint, fitful, uncertain and even reactionary pronouncements of official Liberals who have found in Mr. Montagu a second Moses to lead them to the promised land, were positively depressing. In fact, it is impossible to extract any general principle of social import from the pronouncements of intelligences so widely divergent as those of Sir Sivaswami in Madras, Mr. Kamat in Poona, and Sir Surendranath Banerji in Bengal. We are sorry, however, that the Mahatma's social ideals have weakened in the intensive pursuit of the will-o' the wisp of a negative swaraj within the year. One of these, unmistakably, was the omission of the abolition of untouchability from the working programme adopted by the All-India Congress Committee in Bombay. Another was the acceptance of picketing as a means of weaning people from the drink habit, which, in spite of the criticism of our attitude by two Christian journals, we hold to be a method wholly at variance with sound social reform principles. To convince a man that he is doing wrong, to point to him the right way, and to make him the principal instrument of his own salvation—that is the true social reform method, the method whose results endure without reaction. The insensate burning of foreign cloth when numbers of people were in dire want in several parts of the country, has evoked protests even from the Mahatma's avowed adherents. In a recent issue, Brigadier Dayasagar of the Salvation Army depicted in forcible terms the urgent need for cloth felt by the destitute poor in Gujarat and Dekhan districts in this Presidency. Sir P. C. Ray has sent to the Press a detailed report by Babu Sailaja Nath Roy Choudhry, a member of the Bengal Legislative Council, on the conditions in Khulna, in which the following occurs :

The cloth famine is so great that it is beyond the imagination of the public. I saw many people naked and even women of respectable classes have been compelled to put on threadbare cloths scarcely hiding their shame. Many are altogether shelterless and are exposed to the rains. The recent flood due to the cyclone has completely destroyed the seedlings in many places. Rains are abundant at present and there may be some hope of next harvest if they can be supplied with seedlings even now. This is a matter which deserves immediate attention.

Mahatma Gandhi is still unrepentant. He must realise that at least he has chosen a most inopportune time for his bonfires.

We are sorry that the Mahatma's attitude towards the Mopla outbreak does not show the candour and perspicacity which led to his stopping the Satyagraha movement when the Punjab outbreak occurred two years ago. The Mopla outbreak is a far stronger reason for stopping the Khilafat Non-Co-operation movement, than the Punjab outbreak was for stopping Satyagraha. The Punjab outbreak, as we have always contended, had no visible point of contact with Satyagraha, while the inter-relation between Khilafat-Non-Co-operation and the Mopla outbreak can be denied only by those who will not see it. We do not say that the Khilafat-Non-Co-operationists intended the outbreak. It has been, as the Mahatma admits, the most powerful set-back to their movement, and they are not fools to contrive deliberately their own undoing. We blame them for not foreseeing it when they carried their politico-religious propaganda to the Mopla area. If they knew anything of the mission they had undertaken, they ought to have known that the Mopla mind can apprehend only so much of it as fell in with its inherited and habitual modes of functioning. The plea that the Moplah outbreak occurred in parts to which the Khilafat-Non-Co-operation propaganda had not been allowed to be carried, apart from its variance with fact, can only be described as childish if it is not to be described as dishonest. The message of the Khilafat-Non-Co-operation movement, as it was transmuted in the mind of the Mopla, is thus described in a very interesting letter, published by Justice, of a Nair gentleman who fled from the affected area, in response to an enquiry from Mr. Rangaswami Iyengar of the Council of State. In that letter, Mr. M. C. Udayavarma Raja of Mankada, congratulating himself that he is able to write to Mr. Iyengar as one of his own religion, and not as a Mopla convert "which grim terror was haunting us in all its horrid reality," observes :

The Khilafat movement is to the Ernad Mopla an occasion for playing his old game. He knows very little about the Khalif or his position in relation to Islam or why the Islamic brethren or of the other parts of the world feel so keenly agitated over the question. He is trained under an ignorant and fanatical priest and his zeal for his faith is expressed in his attempt at conversion of others. No wonder, therefore, that when the Khilafat preacher goes and tells the Mopla that the British Government has ever been an inveterate foe of Turkey, it finds ready acceptance at his hands in view of his own experience in the opposition he meets with from the Government in his attempt at conversion, which I am not a little relieved to be told by no less a person than Mr. Yakub Hassan, directly controverts the teaching of Islam and is as such reprehensible. The unreasoning and volatile Mopla became a passionate Khilafat worker and applied himself readily to organising work, deluding himself and others of his ilk into the belief that the success of their agitation and work would result in a plentiful harvest of converts.... They held frequent meetings, I now gather, in their mosques, wherein a programme of work was prepared and circulated for adoption and execution when the signal for action came. The cutting of all communications by wire, rail or road and thus isolating places rendering the movement of the Police or the Military impossible and making it difficult for the people to escape to other lands if they chose, secondly, the thorough and merciless looting of all Hindu houses (only of the Hindu be it remembered) possessing anything worth the name, including the houses not only of the much-maligned Jenmi, but those of the very innocent Kanamdar, of the selfless High Court Vakile and of the most philanthropic money-lender, sparing not even that of the non-cooperator, the twin brother of the Khilafat Mopla; thirdly, keeping them in want and misery for some days, after which offering them succour and protection in case they became willing converts to Islam, or to put it bluntly, forced conversion, and finally establishing Mopla swaraj. These were the items of the precious programme which they had hatched and got ready for use. This is how the Ernad Moplas intended to carry out the four or five stages of the non-violent non-co-operation programme. This is how he had understood the teachings of Mahatma Gandhi and the outbreak is only the attempt on his part to translate into practice the ideals of Gandhi and secure Swaraj as he has understood it before the end of August as contemplated by the Mahatma.

The extract is long but we give it here because it is the best and most dispassionate account that we have come across of the factors which contributed to the present outbreak. The Khilafat-Non-Co-operationists if they knew anything of the Moplas should have known that their movement can have only this meaning for a people so ignorant and fanatical.

But even if their ignorance might serve to excuse their carrying their propaganda to the Moplas, what excuse can avail for their asserting that the outbreak is due not to their propaganda, but to want of a sufficiency of it? It is an easy but dangerous thing to rouse the religious fanaticism of the masses, Hindu or Mahomedan. Indian political leaders had always carefully refrained from touching on any considerations bearing on religion, though they got little credit for their self-restraint from Government, until the Mahatma in an evil moment took up the Khilafat question as a means to Hindu-Mahomedan unity. Let us take timely warning by the example of Malabar. It is a truism of everyday experience, which Bergson puts in philosophical phrase when he writes:

Doubtless we think with only a small part of our past, but it is with our own entire past, including the original bent of our soul, that we desire, will and act. Our past, then, as a whole, is made manifest to us in its impulse; it is felt in the form of tendency, although a small part of it only is known in the form of idea.

The question is not what the Veda or the Koran or the Bible says, but how their teachings have come to be metamorphosed in actual practice. If the Hindus had strictly followed Vedic principles, they would have never lost their political freedom; if the Mahomedans had observed the strict injunction of the Holy Koran against compulsion in religion, they would have been rulers of India still; if the British had adhered to the teaching of the Bible, they would never have established a British Empire among the Hindus and Mahomedans of India. Maulana Mahomed Ali frankly told this writer that until he met the Mahatma he did not trust any Hindu. The distrust of a thousand years may be covered up in the exigencies of a political propaganda, but it is patient, clear-eyed, long-continued and faithful effort alone that can replace it by an equal habit of confidence. The number of men who have trained themselves to rise above communal jealousies, is not very numerous among the masses; though among the educated classes it is steadily on the increase. This gulf is not to be bridged by the Hindus acclaiming the Khilafat or the Mahomedans giving up cow-killing in the spirit of bargain. It is to be bridged only by patient work to educate both classes and all classes into recognising that religion is a matter of the individual conscience and that patriotism is a recognition of a common citizenship based on common interests pertaining to a single motherland. To this work, every reformer should address himself.

SCRIPT FOR A NATIONAL LANGUAGE IN INDIA.

(BY JUSTICE.)

II

In criticising the Urdu script it is sometimes forgotten that diacritical marks are parts of the script and in the beginning they are taught in spelling. The same is the case with Arabic. But Urdu like Arabic having a progressive tendency, the diacritical marks are omitted later on and the reader is supposed to know particular marks of each letter, unlike Deonagri which carries these marks always with it, besides having at the top of each letter useless horizontal bars which have rightly been omitted in Kaithi and other sister scripts of India. Those who know Urdu can denote any long or short vowel with the help of the original three vowel consonants and the corresponding diacritical marks where necessary. S.D.M. or N. further show their ignorance of Urdu script when they think that the words "let and late" can not be distinguished when written in Urdu script.

S.D.M. further denounces the use of silent letters in Urdu script but had he known Urdu he would have found only very rare instances. The words which have the Arabic articles al on them in some cases drop the sound in pronunciation. This and a few others are the only rare examples besides the casual cases of Arabic words which might be quoted in the Urdu language. Silent letters have never been the integral part of Urdu script.

Another objection of the same writer is that Urdu script is written from right to left. This is the most slender objection which is altogether without reason. Why should a script be written from left to right or vice versa nobody can demonstrate. If there can be any reason for either way it should be this that, as writing is always carried on with the right hand, a line should naturally begin from the right and proceed to the left. The Chinese characters are written from top to bottom and probably a Chinaman would object to both the Hindi and Urdu systems and recommend the adoption of his own method. In this connection it is urged that while interpolating Urdu script in the midst of Hindi or English writing one does not know where to begin the right handed script, or when figures have to be written in the midst of Urdu script the same difficulty arises in writing and printing. This may be a puzzle to some but every printer's devil knows his business, in proof of which all the Anglo-Urdu, Anglo-Persian and Anglo-Arabic dictionaries and all the Arithmetics printed in Urdu language and script are voluminous documentary evidences.

I do not say that in Urdu script there is no room for improvement or that it has a perfect system; but at the same time I hold that like Urdu, Deonagri character also has its own defects and is not considered by others as "hall marked gold . . . that precious heritage from our ancient part . . . town script of the gods . . . vehicle of a sacred tongue, etc.," all of which are mere sentiments. Later on S.D.M. asks. "Why should not they (other Asiatics) rather follow our example we, one of the oldest, if not absolutely the oldest of all Asian peoples in civilization and the producers, too, even as the semites of the Arabian Peninsula, of a world religion like Buddhism claiming within its fold one fourth of the human race that look up to this 'Land of Bharat' as their Holy Land, the Land of their Budha,—we more numerous too etc. etc." Are such arguments to be taken as scientific demonstrations or the sentiments of a patriotic Hindu? Are such arguments meant to improve the Hindu Muslim unity or reveal a desire on the part of the majority to absorb the minority in itself. Language and the script could be the only platform on which Hindu and Mussalmans could meet without prejudicing their individual religions and caste system. If our Hindu friends can not tolerate even this much, let the two communities have each their own scripts. Mussalmans do not claim the Urdu script to be "the vehicle of a sacred tongue" and have no desire to enhance the sanctity of another vehicle. They are cosmopolitan Moslem first and then Indian.

It is admitted in History that the Sanskrit and old Persian are sister languages, born of the same Aryan stock. The old Persian—the language of Zind and Avastha—has from time to time immemorial been wedded to the semitic script which has never been found to lack the needs of the old or modern Persian. Why, then, this script should be found defective for the needs of Urdu which is a mixture of mainly Hindi, Persian and Arabic, is for the others to demonstrate.

Then comes the point that Urdu has no punctuation. Here again S D.M. shows his ignorance of the elaborate system of punctuations used in the semitic script (see any printed Qurau) and the principle of their omission like diacritical marks. In fact any alphabetical system of the spoken languages cannot boast of its perfection, e.g., no system can reproduce the tone or accents of a spoken, however rich its stock of punctuation might be. As for the gallant attacks on the insignificant "dots abounding in Urdu script," no advocate of Deonagri can consistently speak about, since he has already adopted dots in "perfecting" the Nagri characters to express the sounds of Z, hard K or Q, guttural A etc. etc. By the use of 1, 2, or 3 dots and a small the inventors of Urdu script have lessened the number of the forms, besides producing an ornamental system of a figure best known to those who know the language. It is unnecessary to mention here the brevity of the script due to this system, as our friends of the national script do not seem to care for the value of time.

In disposing of the letters of similar sound in Urdu-script the advocates of Nagri say that there is no difference in their pronunciation and only a pedant can distinguish them. But they forget the two sh's in Hindi which only the learned can correctly pronounce so as to be distinguishable from each other. In fact the common people pronounce the श as ष in upper India. The first three anunasiks are commonly pronounced in India as ण besides it being a notorious fact that Bengalis pronounce ष as ण and ण as ष while Uriyas pronounce ष as ण. If these facts do not constitute reasons to get rid of the wrongly pronounced Hindi letters, there is no reason to denounce the semitic character and no objection on the ground of incorrect pronunciation can be valid.

But apart from the question of correct pronunciation I have mentioned above that words written with different letters of similar sounds have different meanings and the removal of any distinction would lead to a chaos which can be cured only by banishing such words from the language and leaving the lingua franca, in a primitive nudity.

In his plea for Nagri as the Pan-Indian script, S. D. M. lays down "two essential conditions of a perfect phonetic alphabet" i.e. "first that every letter must represent one individual sound and only one and secondly and conversely (but this is as important) that each sound be represented by one and only one letter." Here the above writer has cleverly worded the second condition, as he ignores the existence of a simple and compound sound which should have been taken notice of when speaking of scientific perfection. In the first five bars the second and the fourth letters are invariably compound sounds, i.e. pronounced with the aid of the hissing letter 'h'. Hence the invention of ten additional letters is strictly superfluous as the same purpose could have been served, as in Urdu script, by adding to the simple sounds. This is actually done in the case of ष as pronounced in the word Kolhan and Kolha. Besides these there are three other compound letters of distinct forms namely ष ष ष which is another revolt against perfect phonetic principles. I have already mentioned the uselessness, for all intents and purposes at present, of the first three nasal terminals which have been invented simply for the needs of the Sanskrit language and also to merge in a line with the remaining letters of their respective bars. Then again there being no separate form for nasal the letter 'd' has been "perfected" by the addition of a dot below it and the same misfortune has also befallen the next following letter. It requires the "master minds" of the Vedic period to understand how ऋ ॠ can be called vowels when the same sound can be produced by adding Hindi diacritical marks to र and ऌ. I enquired from a Pandit on this point and his explanation was that रि has been invented for the sake of later inflection which makes it रः. For all this artificial invention he had to admit the phonetic defect of Deonagri character in this respect and further on that the last three of the so called four vowels are never used except in Sanskrit.

In not less than 8 Nagri letters dots are used below them in order to represent sounds foreign to the region of Hindi language. These must have been later inventions in order to "perfect the existing script", as it fell short of the requirement of the country. For all that one artificial ऋ represents four letters of Urdu script, the letter ऌ represents three, the letters ॠ and ॡ represent two each. Would not the omission of distinctions in these cases lead to confusion? It is for the advocates of Nagri to prescribe the alternative.

I have no mind to disparage the Nagri script of which I am an admirer for its excellent classification and beauty of form but when a question of comparison comes in, both the sides of the question must honestly be placed before the public. The Deonagari script perfectly fulfils the needs of Sanskrit but times and circumstances have changed since its invention by the Rishis who prospered 4000 years ago and the question is how to supply the temporal needs of the present day. After all, the discussion on this subject is devoid of any fruitful result, since the principle of "survival of the fittest will drive the Urdu script out of India, if it is unfit to supply the requirements of the time and is actually a "doubtful commodity tawdry pinch-beck caste but yesterday" as S. D. M. pronounces them to be. Both Muslims and Hindus are aliens to India and its original inhabitants are the aborigines. The difference is only of a first and second conqueror and if conquest gives any rights of preferment, both have equal.

LONDON LETTER.

London, September 1, 1921.

CESSATION OF STATE CONTROL OF RAILWAYS.

Government control over the railways has ended, and though for months past it has been rumoured that with the cessation of State control, a strike would immediately ensue, nearly two weeks have passed now, and anything approaching a strike looks a long way off. Instead of threatened chaos, a tremendous number of changes for the benefit of all workers and users alike, are in the air. Cheaper fares are expected almost immediately; in fact, one line has already lowered its season ticket rate, and mid-week cheap fares to many seaside places have begun. Several companies are considering proposals for electrifying suburban lines and it is likely that schemes will be put in hand very shortly for an electric system of trains running a considerable distance out of London. Mr. Thomas, the railway men's leader, in his address to a meeting of railway men said he saw nothing to worry about in the changes that were taking place, although he was speaking almost immediately after a great revolutionary change in railway administration had taken place. Later on, he said that there were those who predicted a great strike immediately decontrol took place, and that the one certain thing that would happen would be a repetition of the miners' strike. But, reviewing the situation calmly and dispassionately he could say that so far as the men were concerned they had no intention to break the agreement, and he refused to believe the railway companies were less honourable than the men. He wanted the railway men to show that they were fully alive to the fact that only by giving of their best were they entitled to demand the best from the other side.

CARE OF THE INSANE.

On the top of all the talk on the care of the mentally afflicted that has been going on in the press for some weeks, a grave scandal has arisen which brings the matter of the care of the insane to everyone's notice. An inmate of an asylum was to have a bath and the nurse in charge told two other old patients to help to prepare the man for it. She then had to go away for something and was absent about five minutes. On her return, she found the man had been stripped naked in the yard and had had a bucket of boiling water thrown over him. The man died a day or two later from shock and scalds. This case and the publicity given to it have created a great stir. The lumping together of patients in varying stages of mental disease has been condemned wholesale. The overworking of nurses, the inadequate nursing staffs, the lack of proper male attendants for male patients, have all come in for sweeping and complete condemnation, and a new and humaner attitude on the part of all people earnestly enjoined. For, it is urged, insanity is a disease due to many and varied causes, and is one to which any person is liable. It should not be looked upon as though it were some horror to be hidden away and smuggled out of sight; but faced calmly and preventive and curative measures tried and discovered. We must learn to appreciate the fact that nervous disorders are very real states of sickness, and, by understanding them in their early stages, try to prevent the more serious developments.

WOMEN AND DOMESTIC SERVICE.

A short time ago a deputation of women waited upon Dr. Macnamara, the Minister of Labour to protest about the procedure adopted, by officers of the unemployed exchanged, in dealing with applicants for domestic service. It was stated that these officials advised young women not to take service unless the mistress complied with rules that they, the officials, laid down unofficially. Sleeping-in seemed to be the big stumbling block to taking service, and since sleeping-in is an essential in most domestic service, it certainly could not be permitted for a few inexperienced men to attempt to regulate conditions under which domestic work should be undertaken. The unemployed dole was for genuine unemployment and not for people to take and the State to find to please the utopian and arbitrary whims of anyone. The result of the deputation has been that Dr. Macnamara has now issued an order to the staff of the unemployed exchanges, reminding them of the main points of procedure laid down. It is interesting to note how swiftly and emphatically women took up the matter that interfered with their domestic life, and having a real case for protest, they attained their desired end immediately. Domestic service cannot be regulated like a factory, and no woman is going to allow officialdom to stand in the position of authority over her little household. Housekeeping, today, she maintains, is difficult enough without the bureaucratic interference to make it worse.

MINERS' CONFERENCES.

As was fore-shadowed in a previous article, the colliery enginemen and surface craftsmen have broken away from the South Wales Miners' Federation, and are restarting their own organisation. The delegate from the federal executive who was present urged the maintenance of unity, but an overwhelming majority voted for the separate organisation, declaring that the federation stoppage of safety men was a step opposed to the principles of enginemen, and that many were now out of work in consequence.

During the sittings of the Miners' Conference last week, a demand was made for the installation of baths at pit heads, to be installed at mine-owners' cost. Mr. Herbert Smith, who presided, in speaking on the motion, inquired whether, as the men were asking for the compulsory provision of baths, they were prepared to have the use of them made compulsory. Mine-owners were not likely to provide baths if only ten or fifteen per cent. of the men used them. A lot of resolutions were put and many passed, but looking round one fails to see that they are going to have much effect, for resolutions passed by any number of people, without the knowledge, power or will to put them into action are useless. So, though many resolutions may be recorded in the official proceedings, one does not expect to see many changes during the coming year. The Regional Survey Committee appointed by the Ministry of Health to enquire into the question of the distribution and location of houses to be erected with State aid in the South Wales Coalfields has made its report. It recommends the housing of miners outside the valleys and off the coal measures, and suggests fifteen localities as centres for grouped housing schemes to serve particular valleys or groups of valleys. Nearly all the suggested centres are in the vicinity of railway junctions, so that the men could get to and from their work easily. It is specially recommended that the men should be removed from the scene of their labour when work is over, as the monotony of physical outlook tends to create depression and discontent.

HOUSING PROBLEM.

The housing problem has eased itself to some extent; in most parts of the country the situation has improved, although rents remain very high and houses scarce. Glasgow, however, does not seem to have shared in the general improvement. Her position has not even been stationary but has continued on the downward grade. A total of 57,000 houses was stated to be the immediate needs of the city by the town clerk last year. To meet this demand, the corporation proceeded with a scheme for the building of 4,600 houses. They also contemplate another 4,000, meanwhile the Medical Officer for health has condemned 12,000 houses as unfit for human habitation which are still occupied for want of alternative accommodation and are likely to be used for some considerable time yet. The cost of building is dropping slightly, but until the bricklayer and brickmaker realise that by their own idleness their class suffers most nothing of any importance will be done. It is these men who have done more to increase the cost of building than any other section of the building trade. The queer position arises that though the cost of houses being put up under the old contract of six months ago was approximately £1,000 each, these houses to-day are valued at £800, thus making a loss of £200 on each house now being completed. Of course the loss will fall on the rates through the corporation.

VACCINATION AS PRECAUTIONARY MEASURE.

It is very disconcerting to have to realise that facts and figures often have the habit of destroying our cherished illusions or beliefs, and for the conscientious objector to vaccination, the present small-pox epidemic in Nottingham is a case in point. Nearly all the cases of small-pox reported are among the unvaccinated. Of the 46 cases treated 36 are unvaccinated. It has, however, to be remembered, that the majority of people in the afflicted area are unvaccinated. A campaign of vaccination is now going on and vigorous measures are being taken to keep the outbreak under control and stamp it out. Many seaside places and boarding houses are refusing to take people from Nottingham and a suspected case was prosecuted for medical attention. Last year, when an outbreak took place in Glasgow, Edinburgh as a precautionary measure immediately had 80,000 of its inhabitants either vaccinated or revaccinated, and no cases occurred there. Perhaps the disease would not have gone there anyway, but naturally the medical and health authorities put the absence of it down to vaccination. One thing is clear, that when such a dreaded disease as smallpox breaks out anywhere in the country, most people run for vaccination, and the laxity over it, which has become very pronounced during the last few years since the last Royal Commission reported, dies out, until the absence of the disease again brings security.

TREATMENT OF JUVENILE OFFENDERS.

A children's magistrate in a well-known city district has expressed himself surprised that the subject of criminality does not provoke a wider interest among the general public especially in connection with juvenile offenders. "It was", he said, "proved beyond all question that the juvenile offender, when not cared for in time, became the hardened habitual criminal". He gave an instance of a boy of nine stealing and being sent to a reformatory for five years. When the boy came out, work was unobtainable and there was no one to help him, he was already branded, so he stole again. For this offence he was put away for another year. When he again came out into so-called freedom, unable to support himself and having no one to come to his aid, he again stole; and so the story went on. As time passed he became a habitual criminal and spent term after term in prison. At the age of 67 he had spent more than half his life shut away from the outside world, at the cost of thousands of pounds sterling to the State. The conditions of life have altered during the last half century, and such a tragic manufacture of criminals is scarcely possible to-day. But conditions of human life are always in the making and never made, so that there is still ample scope for improvement in the treatment of the child offender. The children's courts are doing much, and women Justices of the Peace a lot more. To-day, if a young person under 14 commits an error punishable by law, the parents in nearly all cases have to pay a fine, as the child is considered too young to be primarily responsible. A young person over 14 brought before a court could be and was fined and from the earnings it was expected that the culprit would pay the fine, easy instalments being arranged to meet the needs of the case. Another method of dealing with the young offender is the industrial school, and these are much better conducted than formerly. But the probationary system has scarcely been worked at all and this should be of tremendous service if worked sympathetically. Above all it is the personal element in dealing with the child delinquents which is so essential to the building up of a strong enough character to resist temptation. If any young person, with all the exaggeration of youth, is allowed to foster the feeling that he or she is fighting long and in a cruel and harsh world, there is nothing for it but to turn such a person into a so-called criminal. This field of labour is essentially a woman's, and belongs preferably to women who had to buy their experience of the child mind by motherhood themselves. When women learn to deal with the problem of the juvenile offender, bringing to bear upon it their knowledge of the impulsiveness of young life, the quickly passing moods that sway the young mind, hardened criminals will really be of the abnormal type, with a probable real tendency to lawlessness that marks occasional individuals all over the world.

SALVATION ARMY

The Salvation Army is a great movement for the social uplift of the masses which every student of social service should carefully study. In the following article, Brigadier Dayasagar gives the reader an insight into its principles, policy and method :

To expect the Salvation Army to be able to continue its gigantic work of Social Reclamation effectively without its Religion, is like expecting a mango tree to continue its beautiful and delicious fruit after being severed from its root. People who object to the Religion of the Salvation Army do so largely on account of prejudice against Christianity or ignorance or both. This prejudice commonly owes its origin to the unchristian conduct of many so-called Christians, who have experienced no real change of heart and life and whose objects in life and spirit are the opposite to those of Christ. The revered and beloved Founder of the Salvation Army once said the Religion of the Salvation Army could be described in four letters—love.

While on one of his visits to this country he advised non-Christians to study the Religion of Christ at its Fountain Head to read with an unbiassed mind the simple records of his life and teaching with that of his early followers as given in the New Testament. General William Booth described The Salvation Army in the following words:—"What is the Salvation Army The Salvation Army is an organization of men and women irrespective of nationality, race, colour or station. It claims (a.) to have been originated by God, and to be maintained in existence by Him. (b) to be possessed by the Spirit of His Son—Jesus Christ. (c) to be under the guidance of His Spirit—The Holy Spirit.

2. The Salvation Army is an organisation constituted and governed after the fashion, though not in imitation of a military force. It has reached its present formation, not so much by direct creation as by evolution. It is a growth, and is rapidly becoming a very important part of God's earthly Kingdom.

3. The Army is constituted for the attainment to the highest purposes to which human beings can devote their energies, namely:—(a.) to make known to men the existence, character, and will of God, especially in the bearing those great truths have on the well-being of the race. (b) to proclaim to men the laws of God made for their guidance and the plan of Salvation He has designed for their deliverance from sin, misery and hell. (c) to bring men to know, love, obey, and serve God, and to be conformed to His image. (d) to unite those who love God in Christ-like service of their fellows. (e) to strengthen the government, and extend the Kingdom of God upon the earth.

Now, while it is not to be expected that any amount of explanation will cause everyone to think alike on religious matters, it is hoped that this series of articles will do something to remove prejudice by showing the reader what the Salvation Army really is, and why it puts so much stress upon the purely religious side of its operations. The poet Tulsidas beautifully says :

"Agejagamaya sab sabit viragi, Prem te Prabhu pragatai jimi agi."

I roughly translate thus :

"As fire in wood, so God in all exists,
As flame the fire, so love Him manifests."

The Salvation Army, then, is one of the manifestations of the boundless and fathomless Love of God.

This Divine love constrains men and women to live Christ-like lives. The Christ-like life is a life of unselfish service, a life of self-sacrifice and toil for the good of others, and the Salvation Army is an organization of this great force, for the spiritual and temporal good of the race. This Divine love cannot take full control of any person until such a person has experienced a real change of heart; hence this is made the first condition of Salvation Soldiership.

It is expressed in the Army Rules and Regulations in the following words:—"The Salvation Soldier must be converted or changed by the power of The Holy Spirit from the old, worldly, selfish sinful nature to the new, holy, heavenly nature. He must have The Holy Spirit living in his heart, possessing it, and working through it to will and to do the good pleasure of God."

Total abstinence from intoxicants, kindness to all animals and simplicity of dress and manner of living, also the insistence upon industrious habits follow as a matter of course, as the tree and fruit partake of the nature of the seed.

BENGAL AND WOMEN SUFFRAGE.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,
Sir,

The decision of the Bengal Legislative Council in rejecting the motion to remove the disqualification of women for the purposes of voting, does not come upon us as a surprise. No doubt the Bengalees are among the most intellectually advanced races in India, in modern times, as we have been accustomed to measure one's intellectuality by the number of University degrees one possesses. From that point of view, Bengal must necessarily be looked upon as great in as much as that Province turns out a large number of University men year after year. We may also concede that the Bengalees are more advanced people in India just at present for another reason also. And that is, its title to lead the National Congress movement, which loomed largely before the eyes of our educated men. I believe it is Bengal that has supplied the Congress with a larger number of its Presidents than any other Province in India. Above all, Bengalees have been the persons mostly known to the people of other provinces as great speakers. By the reason of such splendid examples of orators like Babu (now Sir) Surendranath Banerji, the late Mr. A. M. Bose and Lal Mohan Ghose and lastly Mr. Bepin Chandra Pal, they have been occupying the front ranks among our national leaders. There is yet another reason why Bengalees ought to be considered as an advanced race. And that is, among them were born such great men like Rajah Ram Mohan Roy, Maharishi Dehendra Nath Tagore, Khabeh Chandra Sen, Ramakrishna Paramahansa, Swami Vivekananda, Sir J. C. Bose, Sir, P. C. Roy, Dr. Rabindranath Tagore and Pandit Jawarachandra Vidyasagar. I don't think there is any other province which can equally boast of such a galaxy of great men among them. This alone makes the Bengalees great, even if they cease to be orators and leaders of the Political movement.

Yet Bengalees are not really advanced in the matter of Social Reform when compared with any other Province in India. This may appear to be strange, especially when we remember that Bengal is the Province where all the great social and religious reformers flourished and worked and the great Brahmo Samaj movement has done a great deal to familiarise the Bengalees with the most upto-date and radical social reforms. With all that, the Bengalees outside the Brahmo Samaj have been the most conservative in the matter of social reform, so much so, that even the most highly educated man and a most revolutionary kind of political agitator, is but a pigmy in the matter of social reform. Personally speaking, a Bengalee has no objection to break any or all social restrictions and, in fact, his greatness is due to this adaptability to changed circumstances. Yet on one point, he has been consistently hostile and that is to extend the same kind of privileges to women in the matter of breaking away the social restrictions unjustly imposed on them by custom. Women is still a caged bird in Bengal. In a country where the great Vidyasagar was born and worked, the great social reformer for which he worked and died, stands discredited. No doubt the Bengalees feel proud of that great man, but they would not consider him great for his advocacy of the remarriage of widows. So also higher education among women, is a thing with which the Bengalee has not been able to reconcile himself as yet, most of the lady graduates turned out by the Calcutta University being either Brahmors or Christians. Many Bengalee families have been ruined by the reason of the exorbitant demands of the bride-groom owners in the name of dowries. Even the sensational suicide of a Snehalata could not provoke the otherwise emotional Bengali into righteous indignation and move the avaricious Bengalee father to his sense of responsibility. Yet they are the most advanced people and who can say they are not? Consummation of the marriage of girls had become too numerous at one time in Bengal that the "Satanic Government" was obliged to interfere so that they might put down the more satanic habit of consummating the marriage of physically undeveloped girls by the passing of the age of Consent Act. Still who knows how many tender girls of delicate constitution are sacrificed in the name of a foolish custom, in spite of this Act! After saying so much about the social mentality of an average Bengalee, it does not come upon us as a surprise that they should vote against the enfranchisement of women. In fact, the unpopularity of the Brahmo Samaj is mainly due to their advocacy of the cause of women, more than their religious iconoclasm. Here is an opportunity for the 'sweet warbler of India,' who by the bye hails from Bengal, to devote her whole attention to this one reform, that of emancipating her own sisters in her beloved Bengal before she runs into ecstasy over a swaraj which will in all probability be a swaraj of conservative men like the Bengal Councillors under whose regime, not only women will not have the privilege of voting but perhaps she may have to confine her activities within the holy precincts of a Zanana. To my mind, Bengalees cease to be great when they have refused to walk in the footsteps of their great men who have a better following in other provinces than their own. Even the so-called benighted Presidency of Madras has been liberal enough to recognise the claims of women for vote. One may in this connection exclaim with the poet: "How are the mighty fallen."

BIOGRAPHIES OF PUBLIC MEN IN INDIA.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,
Sir,

History is the record of the lives of nations, movements and institutions; and biography is the record of the lives of the great personalities who make history, direct movements and mould institutions. The lives which great men of the past have led would be fruitless indeed if they were not available to posterity for its guidance. It will be ridiculous on my part to expatiate on what will seem to every one to be so apparent. The irony is that what is so apparent and elementary in other countries is neglected in India with a supineness that is very deplorable.

The necessity of the biography of the great statesmen and politicians of a country to the proper development of its public life cannot be too much insisted upon. It is self-evident. Let us look at the history of English public life. The moment a great statesman or politician joins the majority, the nation is supplied with an authoritative biography of his, written by one whose competency for the task will be beyond question. There is not one figure in that superb galaxy of statesmen and politicians who adorn the parliamentary and public life of the 19th century England, whose life most authoritatively written, is not possessed by the people of that country. Peel, Palmerston, Lord John Russell, Disraeli, Gladstone, Lord Randolph Churchill, Cobden and Bright, to speak of only a few names, are all the subjects of first rate biographies by very competent writers. The fact that the biographies of Gladstone and Lord Randolph Churchill are written by no less personages than Lord Morley and Mr. Winston Churchill, to take two well-known instances, is a clear proof that those who have undertaken the task of supplying the nation with biographies of its worthies are generally most eminently qualified for it.

Now what is the condition of our public life with regard to this aspect?

Indians have been generally accused of the lack of a true historical instinct from very early times. This accusation though sometimes exaggerated or mischievously used to discredit what little of genuine historical literature we possess, is in the main true. Even to-day we are woefully lagging behind. Have we realised the supreme importance of having authoritative lives of those great and eminent Indians of our own time?

Among the great men of modern India those whose biographies are available are religious and social reformers such as Ram Mohan Roy, Kesub Chunder, Swami Vivekananda and Ramkrishna Paramahansa. There is not one great Indian statesman politician or patriot, an authentic record of whose life has been supplied to the nation. The Grand Old Man of India, the late Dadaboy Naoroji passed away more than three years ago, but no record of the life of the great man worth the name has yet seen the light of day. The late Mr. Gokhale departed from this world six years ago and no biography of this eminent publicist has yet been written by his followers and friends. Mr. R. P. Paranjpye in a booklet on Gokhale published soon after his death informed us that an authoritative life was being written by Mr. Srinivasa Sastri, his successor in the Servant of India Society and would soon be published. Till to-day it has not been published. Perhaps the gentleman is too busy with his public activities to find time for this task. But it is time that he is reminded, that he has a duty to discharge to his countrymen in writing a life of his master, a duty as important as any of his other activities. Then there is the case of the late Mr. B. G. Tilak, the greatest Patriot of modern India who passed away last year, honoured by his opponents and beloved of his countrymen, and whose death, we have not yet ceased to mourn. A detailed record of the life of this intellectual giant and patriot-martyr is absolutely essential for inspiring his countrymen in their struggle for freedom. All will agree that Mr. Kelkar is the fittest man for the task. Let us hope that he will bring out the desired volume shortly.

Apart from the unquestioned necessity and utility of such biographies, they will indicate the strength and variety of our intellectual, and the virility and alertness of our national life; the significance of such indications can hardly be over-rated-

RETURNED TO HINDUISM.

Mr. Balkrishna Rajaram Sawant Bhonsale had gone into Christianity about two months ago. He has now returned to Hinduism, and was initiated by the Hindu Missionary Society of Bombay on Sunday the 11th of September in the presence of members and friends. Mr. Sunderrao B. Vaidya, L. M. E. acted as Acharya, and Mr. Vasant M. Kande acted as Fire-warden.

THE MOPLA TROUBLE.

Mr. N. Lakshmanan, whose article on "Malabar,—a land of Surprises," we printed in the Reformer of the 11th September, writes:—

May I remind you that party politicians—officials and non-officials—are all agreed about the agrarian aspect of the rising? My object in writing about the "immediate or exciting cause" was to refer to the indiscretion of Mr. Thomas in having sent his men into the Moplah Mosque with or without boots. I wrote as early as 31st August to the Reformer and my subsequent information is not yet enough to come to any decided conclusion about the immediate cause. I am, however, cocksure of the deep-seated agrarian cause. I am trying to find out how far the Khilafat Non-Co-operationists and the official Non-Co-operationists (Mr. Yakub Hassan or Mr. Thomas) are responsible for the conflagration. I am also enquiring as to whether the storm first began in Tirur or Nilambur.

I had suggested that Mr. Evans is likely to keep his head cool. I was right in so far as he went to the scene of the troubles with an open mind and a conciliatory attitude; but little later when he heard rather exaggerated accounts regarding the Moplah fanatics and their cruelties—the version given by the 'Antis', Jennies, and some toadies—the gentleman seems to have changed for the worse and spent much powder and shot, as the Viceroy's reference to heavy casualties makes us infer and corroborate the version I got from private sources. A certain amount of suffering on the part of innocent Moplahs and others is, no doubt, inevitable under Martial Law, but there is some amount of oppression and avoidable cruelty of the Moplah—inocent and otherwise—on the part of the lesser authorities in spite of Lord Reading's strict instructions to the Local Government to take particular care that the innocent are not harassed. You know that a certain considerable number of so called Martial Law prisoners are brought down to the Coimbatore Jail for hours together the young and old are all huddled together in closed, practically air-tight trucks or goods wagons like cattle or sheep or even much worse. This is brutality pure and simple.

Mr. K. P. Kesava Menon of Calicut and others have appealed for funds. There is, no doubt, wide destitution in Malabar and the appeal for funds is quite timely. The A. P. I. messages would have already conveyed to you this news in Bombay.

CIRCUMCISION.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I have been asked whether the Hindus (men and women) forcibly converted to Mahomedanism by the Moplah-rebels in their recent revolt, were circumcised by them or not? An anonymous correspondent signing himself "Fraternity" has sarcastically written in a leading journal of Calcutta, "we read that the Mahomedan Moplahs are forcibly converting Hindus whole-sale to their creed, promoting Hindu-Mahomedan unity by the gentle process of circumcision." T. P. Hughes in his Dictionary of Islam (2nd edition) at p. 57, says, "Circumcision, Arabic Khitan, Khitana, or, Khataah is not once alluded to in the Quran. The omission is remarkable, and Muslim writers do not attempt any explanation of it. It is held to be Sunnah, or founded upon the customs of the Prophet (Fatawa Alamgiri, Vol. IV. P. 237), and dating its institution from the time of Abraham (Genesis XVII. Old Testament). In the case of a convert to Islam from some other creed, to whom the operation may be an occasion of great suffering it can be dispensed with although it is considered expedient and proper for all new converts to be circumcised. The circumcision of females is also allowed, and is commonly practised in Arabia. (Fatawa Alamgiri, Vol. I. p. 237.)" I am told the Indian Mahomedans do not follow the Arabs' practice of the circumcision of females. Yours &c.,

2/6 WORLD'S CLASSICS 2/6

What is it that your people of education and taste look for in books?

In these days when money is none too plentiful, your ideal is something cheap but lasting and worth keeping on your shelves; something handy to put into your pocket when you are travelling; something GOOD in the way of literature—not trash which is expensive at any price.

There is not one word of trash in the wonderful little WORLD'S CLASSICS edition. There are volumes in this library to suit every mood. Already over two million copies have been sold! Strongly bound in full cloth with gilt lettering, with a silk marker and printed in beautiful clear type on the finest paper—for 2/6 a volume—and many titles run to 600 pages.

How is it done you ask? It only can be done by producing in huge quantities. If the series lost its popularity, up would go the price. Help to keep the price what it is, by buying these volumes not only for your friends for presents but for your own shelves.

Here are six volumes which will show you how wide is the range.

ROYAL YAKUTI.

THIS YAKUTI or life giving nectar has been prepared from the best, choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has wonderful properties of increasing virile power and it rectifies urinary disorders. In fact it makes man a man. This valuable
medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and
gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to those persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen
the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility.
Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicines. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires. It is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin, containing 40 pills. Rupees ten only.

The Turkish Peace Treaty: The Greeks have been completely worsted in their fight with the Turks. The messages of victories won and armies captured by them were mythical. The Powers have been awakened to their duty in respect of the belligerents, by an appeal perhaps from the defeated Greeks, and the question is to be considered by the League of Nations or the Allied Council. His Highness the Aga Khan has sent a message to the President of the Khilafat Committee pointing out that the situation has completely changed owing to the defeat of the Greeks, and that stock exchanges and financial circles in London expect early peace. His Highness adds:

As Moslem who has made his life-long special study of this subject, I implore you and through you my co-religionists, whether co-operators or non-cooperators, also our kind, generous and sympathetic Hindu countrymen of all schools, to immediately concentrate and bring full influence to bear on Indian Government that Indian view should be properly represented at whether the League or the Allied Council, and at least one Hindu and Moslem should officially participate. Our great national sacrifices in the World War deserve at least this. Wise political activity needed immediately so that satisfactory peace may come soon.

We cordially support this suggestion. The Governments in India and in Great Britain have now a golden opportunity to right the wrong done by the omission to give due effect to the Prime Minister's famous pledge in the Treaty of Peace with Turkey. All sections of opinion in India, and all communities, are anxious to see this question settled in a manner which would redound to the credit of the British Government and to the peace and contentment of His Majesty's Indian Empire. As His Highness, the Right Honourable Syed Ameer Ali and the Right Honourable Srinivasa Sastry are on the spot, they should at once be nominated India's representatives. We think there should be two Mahomedans and fortunately there is no difficulty in finding them. It is impossible to think of three more competent Indian representatives to plead the cause of India. There is no time to be lost. All Indian public bodies, especially those opposed to Non-Co-operation, should impress on the Government the necessity of immediate action.

Reform of the Central Government: We have repeatedly stated that the present constitutional reform scheme began at the wrong end and that it should have started with the reform of the Central Government of India. It is inevitable, under the circumstances, that the first activities of the Indian Legislature should be largely directed to bringing the constitution of the Central Government at least on a level with that attained in Provincial Governments. Not only is it inevitable, but it is most necessary and desirable to do this in order to preserve the unifying influence which is the most valuable influence of the British connection. Even a semi-popular Government is in a position of greater constitutional authority than a non-popular one like the Government of India, and the effect of developing popular Government in the provinces while leaving the Central Government untouched, is sure to lead to unequal tension in the body politic resulting in frequent friction. It is no use saying that the Government of India has voluntarily assumed greater responsibility to the Legislature than the strict terms of the law require. The growth of convention and tradition in the same sense as in England is impossible in a Government which has not sprung, as the English Government has, from the people's consciousness and is not fed by the normal social forces of the country. Tradition and convention can grow only in an atmosphere of complete autonomy, and till that comes, constitutional rights which depend upon the forbearance of Government enjoy but a precarious tenure. We should not be taken to mean that the dyarchy of Provincial Governments is good in itself nor that no better system can be devised to develop and strengthen the Government of India. All that we say is that the Central Government cannot be left as it is without grave injury to the natural expansion of Indian political consciousness, and that very early steps should be taken to put it on a definite constitutional basis.

Non-Co-operation and Students: The Vice-Chancellor of the Calcutta University, Sir Asutosh Mukherji, has issued an alarming statement to the effect that between 40,000 and 50,000 schoolboys have given up education in consequence of the now-deleted item of the Non-Co-operation programme, of withdrawal of children from Government and aided schools, and that the University will have to close if public support was not immediately forthcoming to make up the deficit resulting from this large defection of students in the Matriculation stage. Nothing of this magnitude has occurred in any other province and, indeed, in most others the withdrawal from schools has left behind no effect whatever. The Mahatma himself has admitted this was a blunder, though with the proviso that it should have been accompanied by the instruction that boys leaving schools should have been put to work on the spinning wheel. Why is it that the schoolboys of Bengal have rushed in such large numbers where their brethren elsewhere have trodden with wary feet? This is a question which parents and guardians and public men generally in that province, should seriously ponder. Incidentally, we may call the attention of those who would indiscriminately apply the recommendations of the Sadler Commission to other parts of the country, to the contrast between the reaction of Bengal students and that of the students of other provinces to Non-Co-operation, as showing the fundamental difference between the conditions of school and college education in Bengal and elsewhere. The Bengali student is fed upon emotion to a much larger extent than those of other provinces. He wants, therefore, the discipline of the school to be carried to some extent even to the College stage. This is the purpose of the Intermediate Colleges recommended by the Sadler Commission. To miss this fact is to miss the significance of the whole report of that Commission. Bengal has contributed very little to relieve the sufferers in the Punjab whose wrongs were one of the reasons for Non-Co-operation. But the moment schoolboys were advised that they would be serving their country by loafing about the streets, they came out in their thousands as bewailed by the Vice-Chancellor of the Calcutta University!

Midwifery in Indian Medical Education: The Legislative Assembly has bungled the question raised by the British Medical Council's ultimatum regarding the training in Midwifery required of candidates for the medical degree of Indian universities. The members who took part in the debate were indifferently posted up in the details of the question, while the Education Member's speech betrayed absolute ignorance of them. The resolution, as passed, requires provincial Governments and the Universities to make better provision for training in this branch of medical knowledge. What can these authorities do, if Indian women object to be attended by men during child bearing? Is the Legislature prepared to pass a law empowering them to remove pregnant women compulsorily to maternity wards in General Hospitals? Mr. Shafi is reported to have said that it was undeniable that practical training in midwifery in India did not come up to the standard laid down by the British Medical Council. Where does it come up to that standard? In England? More of practical training in midwifery is to-day given in the Grant Medical College, and, we believe, in the other Indian Colleges, and under better conditions, than in London where the medical student is assigned a parish in which to pick up what knowledge he can as best as he may. The British Medical Council has, in this as in other matters of late, constituted itself the mouthpiece of the least reputable section of opinion in the Indian Medical Service, as the manner of the ultimatum, no less than the matter clearly shows. Colonel Gidney did not know what he was talking about when he said that, except in Madras, there was no Medical University which came up to the level of the standard set up by the Medical Council. Mr. Kamat suggested that facilities should be given in England to medical graduates who went there for complete training in midwifery. The most important "facility" for practical training in midwifery is the child bearing woman, and England has not a monopoly of them. The Poona Liberal leader's remarks have, no doubt, suffered in transit. The Indian medical student, as things are, gets, a more complete training in midwifery than his English confrere, and while we should by all means improve it, there is no need to send Indian graduates to England for it.

New India Journalism: We cannot but regard the following which appears in an editorial in New India (Madras) of the 26th September, as infringing the limits of journalistic decency:

It has been stated without contradiction that if Swaraj be not established by the time of the next Congress, Mr. Gandhi intends to commit suicide. Surely he could not commit so cowardly an action. Having brought about so much mischief and misery, he can scarcely slip quietly away, and leave others to repair the harm he has done. We prefer to believe that the statement has been put into his mouth by some unscrupulous enemy.

We have not seen the statement referred to by New India, made by any one who is, or may be reasonably believed to be in the confidence of Mahatma Gandhi as to his intentions, and it is absurd to assume that every statement, by whomsoever made, regarding a public man's intentions, which is not contradicted, is true. The purpose of this double process of sophistry is evident in the comment which follows. We refrain from adding any comment of our own, because it is unnecessary. A public man's acts, principles and programme are legitimate subjects of comment, but not his supposed intentions about his personal future, even were they of a less uncanny character than that predicated of the Mahatma.

Women's Education in Allahabad: In the midst of the turmoil and unrest of the present day, it is refreshing to read in the prospectus published recently, of the progress the Orsthouse Girls' High School, Allahabad, has made during the last few years. It emerged from the middle school stage in which it long continued, during the able principalship of the late Miss Mankar whose untimely death was a great loss to the institution. It has now been raised to the status of a first grade college. Attached to the School and College department is a training class to enable women to qualify themselves as teachers. The accommodation and conveniences provided in the past for residential students in the School were far from ideal, but this state of things has been improved by the erection of a new hostel. The School is open to all classes of Hindu and Mahomedan girls, also to widows and married women, and the education imparted in it is free in the sense that no tuition fees are charged. We are confident that Mrs. Sarlabai Naik, the present Principal, will prove as efficient as she is experienced, in spreading education and enlightenment among her sisters of the United Provinces.

International Child Welfare Movement: One of the important movements which claims the attention of present day social workers is that which recognises the rights of the child. At no period were the sufferings and distress of the children—the aftermath of the terrible war—so acute as now in Europe. The August issue of the Record, the organ of the Save the Children Fund, contains many interesting and informing articles from the pen of eminent men and women, which throw light on what is being done by different nations for the protection of child life. The Save the Children Fund International Union with its headquarters at Geneva, has fifteen national Committees affiliated to it, and constitutes a kind of federation of organisations to help and relieve the sufferings of the innocent victims of war. The appeal for funds to save the suffering and starving children will, we hope, evoke, as it has already done to some extent, in India the response which it deserves.

The Situation in Malabar. The situation in the disturbed area in Malabar seems to be now well in hand. There is great need for moderation in the settlement process, as the least exhibition of over-zeal on the part of the officials entrusted with the task, will only add to the difficulties of their task. We have to say this because we have received from a level-headed correspondent in one of the affected taluks a letter which strongly suggests the need for warning.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, OCTOBER 2, 1921.

MAHATMA GANDHI.

Public meetings are being held in many places to celebrate the 52nd birthday of Mahatma Gandhi on the 2nd October. Hindus reckon their birthdays by the position of the stars under which they were born, and there is generally a few days' difference between the two dates. A whole week, therefore, has been left free for the selection of days suitable to different localities for the celebration. Indians of all shades of opinion, and many who are not Indians, will heartily join in wishing many more years of life and health and strength to the Mahatma for service to his people and to humanity. We were asked the other day by a talented Mahomedan lady, an enthusiastic admirer of the Mahatma, what it is that constitutes greatness in man. Undoubtedly, it is the predominance of the universal over the temporal among the inspiring motives of one's life and conduct. Where the universal illumines the temporal, there is true strength, true beauty, true greatness. It is the predominance of the universal in Gandhi's habitual modes of thought and conduct that attracts the masses to him and constitutes his title to be known as Mahatma—a great soul, a soul which lives in touch with the soul of the Universe. But a soul as such cannot function in the material world except in and through its physical environment. Mahatma Gandhi's part in the drama of our national life has thus been in great part cut out for him. If he was to act upon India, he had to act initially through the role of political leadership for which he is fitted neither by temperament nor equipment. We do not say that the Mahatma consciously and deliberately assumed the garb of politics with the object of enticing the populace to higher things. All of us subserve a great world purpose above and beyond that which we believe ourselves consciously to be advancing. To know the world purpose—"the will of the Father"—and to make it consciously one's own, that is the mark of seership—the Rishi, the Buddha, the Christ. Most of us vaguely feel it, in greater or less measure, in moments of insight, and some of us try in the workaday world to give effect to it according to our capacity and our opportunity. To the extent one does this, one is a Mahatma, and because Gandhi does this more habitually than many others, he is rightly acclaimed by his people as the Mahatma.

Religiously-minded Christians have not hesitated to draw comparisons between Jesus Christ and Mahatma Gandhi. Judea in Christ's time was under Roman rule to which British rule in India bears many points of analogy. Religious toleration and the reign of law were the great gifts of Imperial Rome as they are that of Imperial Britain. In one respect, the older Empire gave a noble lead which the later one has failed to follow. The Civis Romanus sum absolutely transcended colour and creed. The great Roman Empire-builders would have turned with contempt from the cowardice of British statesmen in facing the problem of equal citizenship for all who own allegiance to the Empire. But great and tolerant and just, according to the standards of the time, as the Roman Empire was, it still had the taint of all Imperialism—the denial of man personality except so far as it consisted with the exigencies of the State. Jesus Christ's mission was to assert the indefeasible rights of personality to seek its own fulfilment, and Christianity, in course of time, destroyed the Roman Empire. But in the early part of Christ's mission, many Jews joined Him in the belief that the Swaraj—the kingdom of God—which He proclaimed was to be an earthly Jewish State replacing Roman rule. In fact, scholars like Renan hold that Jesus Christ Himself was actuated originally by a political motive and that it was only when He found that Roman rule was far too strongly entrenched to admit of being displaced, that, in order to silence the importunity of his following, He had to explain that the Kingdom He contemplated was not of this world. This damped the ardour, of a large, worldly-minded section of his followers who thereafter ceased to walk with Him. What is Gandhi's Swaraj? The report published of his statements in his interview with the poet, Rabindranath Tagore, has been repudiated, but it is obvious that so clear a thinker as the Mahatma could never have dreamt that it would be possible to establish Swaraj in India, in the sense even of full Dominion Government, not to speak of an independent Republic, within a year. At the same time, he is too transparently honest to think of drawing on people to his camp by the tactics of company promoters. He meant and means something definite when he spoke and speaks of Swaraj within the year. What is that Swaraj? Owing to the printing-press and newspapers, the invaluable privilege enjoyed by ancient thinkers of keeping their thought to themselves until they felt that it was ripe for promulgation, is denied to modern men. We must now think in public and every stage and process of our thinking is recorded and ready for use at any future time. Each such stage and process is pounced upon by admirers as well as critics as a final decision and the result on the one hand, is a heterogeneous following eager to promote its particular interests and, on the other, a regiment of critics pointing out the inconsistencies between the several stages. Mahatma Gandhi has been the victim of this modern disability. Some of his leading followers already speak of giving him a chance to make good his promise of Swaraj before the end of the year. These men surely have misunderstood the Gandhi Swaraj of which an essential condition is the removal of "untouchability"—the crowning crime of caste and the deadly canker eating into the heart of Hindu social life.

It is the stress which the Mahatma lays on the abolition of untouchability as an essential condition of Swaraj, that gives the clue to the meaning he attaches to the word, and that is missed by those who understand him literally. We have called attention more than once recently to the omission of this item from the programme adopted by the Working Committee of the Congress in Bombay, but we are glad to see that the Mahatma has been emphasising it in his speeches during his present Madras tour. At Dindigul, for instance, he observed in reply to an address from the citizens :

Hindus should put an end to untouchability and embrace their Panchama brethren. I don't want you to eat and drink with them or have intermarriages. But your Hindunism demands you to give an equal right to all human beings. I want you to give the Panchama the same right which any human being has a right to ask of you and which you claim from all the rest. These conditions being fulfilled, I have not a shadow of doubt that we will have Swaraj within this year. May God help us in our attempts.

Those who speak of giving the Mahatma a chance, will do well to ask themselves whether they have done their utmost to have these conditions fulfilled. For our own part, we shall hail with satisfaction the end of the year and the relief of the Mahatma from the political literalists who at present hamper and obstruct his true mission. What is this mission and how is it to be accomplished? That mission is not far different from that of Christ in Judea. It is to strike at the root of the system that rests on the maintenance of a class of panchamas or untouchables, social or political. Hindu society at present is founded on that principle. British rule rests on Hindu society—somebody wrote that the caste system is worth a hundred thousand bayonets to it—and besides, it has its own overweening caste system in its colonies in which Indians have to live in daily fear of submergence. A British General wrote of India containing in its martial races material which, under capable leadership, will shake the artificial society of Europe to its foundations. The same may be said of our depressed classes who, under capable and disinterested leadership, can not only shake our artificial Hindu society to its foundations, but can build upon its ruins a greater, nobler, juster system which will give India spiritual, social and political freedom. The Mahatma's mission lies among these classes. Emancipated from his present thralldom to the political literalists, he will be free to work in this vast virgin field for the complete, the spiritual, the enduring, the true Swaraj which, we are sure, is what he means and wants for India.

THE FERMENT AMONG ADI-DRAVIDAS.

(BY MR. M. R. JAMBUNADHAM.)

Readers of newspapers would have now become familiar with the term Adi-Dravidas frequently used in Madras. An attempt is here made to give a short account of the present ferment among them. Adi-Dravidas (Original Dravidas) is the term preferred by those who are generally classified as Depressed Classes in Madras.

Social workers cannot but be grieved to note the existence of unpleasant relations between the Depressed Classes and the other communities. This has lately taken a regrettable turn which, if continued for some time more, I fear, will lead to serious difficulties.

The state of affairs is such that, if personal opinions are bluntly expressed at present, instead of easing the situation they may tend to make it worse. In the following few lines, instead of giving my own opinion upon the subject, I narrate the events connected with the Adi Dravidas during the last few years. As a social worker who has worked for many years in their midst, I leave the reader to judge for himself and to draw his own conclusions.

In the City of Madras itself there are more than one hundred Paracherries or Panchama hovels or Adi-Dravida hamlets, situated generally in the most unhealthy place, often near burial grounds, on the banks of the river, near factories, mills, etc. Madras Panchamas are generally called Parayas; some of them are cooks in European houses, many of them are labourers in the local mills, factories, etc. A few of them are chucklers; and no doubt there is poverty and ignorance reigning supreme in their midst.

Some ten years ago, apart from missionary organisations, no public attempts by any Hindu Society were made to help these poor, downtrodden people, though there were individual men who were doing earnest work among them. The coming of Mr. Shinde was taken as an opportunity to organise an association to elevate our brethren and an influential committee was appointed. Thus the Depressed Classes Mission of Madras came into existence. Swami Brahmaunda came forward to dedicate his life to the uplift of the Panchamas and he was the first to go to the different Paracherries of Madras, to talk to them on higher ideals of life, cleanliness, health, morality and religion. The first Night and Day School was opened at Vyasar-pady. I can bear testimony to the fact that 5 years after the starting of the school, that place which was once dangerous for wayfarers in the evenings, lost its risky character, though at present I hear that there has been a reversion to old ways. But in those days they acted from ignorance and poverty and directed their hostility towards any wayfarer. But at present they seem to be more educated, and also show signs of respect towards their leaders.

In the beginning, Panchamas themselves were quite reluctant to take advantage of the facilities provided for their improvement. By great inducements they were led to give up this attitude and even the most bigoted, who were dead against this movement in the beginning, began to take interest in it. In course of time many associations were started to work for their amelioration. No doubt there was a healthy competition among them to do better and greater work for them. At this time social workers were always welcomed in Paracherries; Panchamas treated them like brothers, used to enumerate all their grievances to them, sought their help and took their advice and guidance. But the starting of the Home Rule Propaganda, and the Non-Brahmin campaign, changed the atmosphere thoroughly. Social workers also increased and the members of the Depressed classes began to feel that social workers were doing work with ulterior motives. And also they began to put a series of questions to the social workers. Some of them became so much imbued with the anti-Home Rule and Anti-Brahmin propaganda that they wanted statements from many social workers that they did not belong to the Home Rule Party and that they were not supporters of the Brahmin community. I know also a case where in a big Paracherry a school was urgently needed, and the Panchamas of that place who were incapable of starting and maintaining it themselves, refused point-blank to take advantage of the help of a social worker simply because he happened to be a Home-Ruler. The idea of refusal and repugnance towards these classes was so great among them that the result was a big affray between them and the Brahmins at the Spur Tank, Egmore. At that time there were reports to the effect that it was an attack against Brahmins and there were also police cases connected with it. Non-Brahmin leaders who say now that Adi-Dravidas are provoking the caste Hindus, did not condemn the Spur Tank incident, rather they approved it by their silent attitude. But once these people were encouraged in violence towards a particular community, it spread in course of time even to the leaders of other communities who looked on in silence.

The short period after Spur Tank affray was a most critical time to social workers. The nomination of Mr. M. C. Rajah to the Madras Legislative Council arrested the attention of the educated members of Adi-Dravida community who, leaving their ideas of work towards their emancipation by religious, social and moral means, began to take part in politics. The result was a series of organised meetings more for condemning the indifferent attitude of the higher classes than finding remedies for their own many disabilities. Swami Sahajananda, a member of that community, who has also devoted his life to the uplift of his community and who has done real work, has contributed much to the harmony between the advanced and backward classes. But one Sahajananda is a drop in the ocean, and in spite of his work to elevate them with the help of the other communities also, there are other evil forces at work which, instead of aiming at their progress wishes to pull down the higher classes; and the result is a series of misunderstandings, unfortunate occurrences and the widening of the gap between the communities. The organisation of Labour also, in the beginning tended to unify all these people. Especially the advantages it gave to individual members created a good impression of the higher class leaders among them and Mr. Wadia was really worshipped by these men. I have seen at this same Vyasarpady, many Panchamas who would not allow any man to talk ill of Mr. Wadia.

The starting of the Labour Department and the Depressed Classes Officer had given full opportunity to the leaders of that community to do what they like and no doubt some leaders of that community who are always in touch with that Department are thinking that they are doing their duty in emancipating their brethren. In these circumstances an educated member of that community was nominated as a member of the Corporation. The appointment of this educated gentleman, Mr. V. G. Vasudeva Pillai, was a rude shock to the local aspirant. A crusade was started on the ground that he was no representative of the community. Protest meetings were held. Mr. V. G. Vasudeva Pillai's programme is not to pull down the higher classes but to go up. He began to visit many Paracherries, to study problems connected with them with friendly attitude towards other communities. He started an association to improve their status. While this kind of peaceful work was in progress, Dr. L. Natesa Mudaliyar brought a bill that Panchamas should henceforth be called Adi Dravidas as the words Paraya, Panchama were not respectable terms. But Mr. V. G. Vasudeva Pillai opposed it finding no reason why they should be labelled as Adi Dravidas, insisted that it might be changed as Dravidas. As there was a difference of opinion, the question was dropped. This gave rise to a most bitter controversy. Those who are for Adi Dravida contend that there should be a particular name to specify that community, which will give an opportunity to have separate representation in the Councils. They fear that if Dravida is adopted, as non-Brahmins are generally called Dravidas, they will be included with them and thus they will have no separate representation in the Councils. Those who are for Dravida, argue that, as they are the original inhabitants, they are really the Dravidas. Anyhow the present atmosphere is an impediment to our progress. It causes much difficulty to social workers. I hope Madras will not fail to rise to the occasion and do the needful.

TREATMENT OF JUVENILE OFFENDERS.

Among the many proposals of the Indian Jails Committee, the happiest and the one sure to earn the widest endorsement, is that for the introduction into this country of the system of Juvenile Courts and Probation. Both these have behind them the new idea which recognizes a new standpoint for the child-offender, namely that "the child is in court as the result of conditions not of his own making and that he has a valid claim against the state, and is to be saved to it, not punished by it." It is perhaps true that in this country there has not been much of any very strong public sentiment with reference to this and that the present proposal is only an incidental bye-product of the agitation against our system of jail administration. Still, this can be no reason for deferring the present proposals; it will be the first time ever known if any humanitarian proposal should be turned down on the ground that public opinion has not yet asked for it. The only real argument produced against the proposal is that there are not many juvenile offenders in India. The Committee effectually dispose of this by saying that the proposal will be for those children who do go wrong whatever their number. While thus recognizing the existence of juvenile delinquents in India, their extent and distribution must be admitted to be but vaguely defined. The Calcutta children's court in its last annual report gave some figures which showed that they had to deal with, on an average, over 5 cases daily—scope enough for the court. On the whole, however, taking the country side also, the absence of figures, and of any scientific study into the causatives of delinquency in the Indian child, especially the street-arab is a real difficulty in the way of any exact recognition and valuation of this problem. The factors in the delinquency of English and American children cannot obviously be applied wholesale to India, for though human nature is primarily the same everywhere, many of these are altogether absent or powerless in India—no thanks to illiteracy though—and the cinema though spreading does not seem to have taken such a strangle-hold on our children as it has in England or America. The gang-spirit at any rate in its aggressively adventurous form is not very much evident; on the other hand, we have other complications in the existence of differences of caste, custom, of early marriage etc. Consequently the new court will find itself grappling with many factors that are altogether different.

The probation officer is sure to find it more difficult to obtain every information about his wards. In the West, some of his most important sources of information are the teacher, the pastor and the physician. The Indian child, generally has none of these benevolent agents over him. There remain then, the parents, the neighbourhood, the relatives and of course the child itself. But still, the absence of some degree of general education among the people will by no means render the work easier. These are some of the difficulties that the new system may be expected to meet. It will not be difficult to overcome them provided every care is taken to differentiate the court and the probation officer from the police. It may here be suggested that girls should be excluded from the jurisdiction of the courts for many important and obvious reasons special to this country. The Committee rightly recommend the maintenance of paid whole-time probation officers. Volunteer workers are however to be entertained but will be required to work under the direction of the chief probation officer. This is not only a deserved recognition of the volunteer but also a clearly-needed precaution against the probation department lapsing into a semi-lethargic state, entirely bound by red tape, resulting in superficial, haphazard work. The volunteer will undoubtedly infuse into the department fresh enthusiasm and energy. An exception however is proposed for the 'experienced missionary' in whose case it is said to be 'clearly obvious' that he cannot be subordinated to the chief probation officer. Seeing that this subordination in practice is bound to be more and more nominal in proportion to the status and experience of the volunteer and remembering that the officer will be an Indian, it is to be feared that the 'clear obviousness' referred to is only for those with the mentality of Kenya Europeans. No proposals are made for any special training for the judge or the probation officer. Generally strong commonsense and a broad outlook will be sufficient. But yet as Dr. Healy says, "Perhaps . . . if the intricacies of the human individual were shown to be as captivatingly interesting as the solution of a case in civil law, judges would enter with more zest and preparation into this field," and "To this end instruction in at least the fundamentals of social adjustment, and the genetics of misbehaviour, needs to be carried back to the law schools." Some such step will not be superfluous in this country.

It is in an almost casual manner that the Committee make a most important proposal, at the end of the section on this subject. This is their recommendation that provision should be made in the law for non-criminal, children in criminal, vicious or immoral surroundings. It is rightly emphasised that there is great importance in thus cutting off these sources of criminal supply; apart even from this, the incidence of such a provision on two of the live problems of the day—that of professional beggary and prostitution is by itself sufficient reason for its being made. An alternative of either giving up their children to the state or their profession, is certain in some cases at any rate to evoke a response for the latter, provided work or rescue homes are provided. It is complained that there are not enough cases for juvenile courts in this country, but giving them jurisdiction over these cases will give more than enough cases. In fact, the problem of the children of these classes is a much acuter one, and for the first few years at any rate, the new courts will have more to do with them than with their real subject, the delinquents. When absolutely necessary, either owing to the character of the child itself or to the nature of his home and environments the courts will have power to send away children, not to reformatories but to cottage homes in the country which are proposed for establishment. It is to be hoped that these will be the objects of private or public endeavour for, 'making the inmates fit for free life' and the provision of 'home influences' are rather large orders for Government. A matron is proposed for every such institution but there is no reason why there should not be more. The more of them the better. The inception and progress of this system in India will be watched with the greatest interest. The essential condition of success—even in a slight measure—is the amount of popularity the probation officer, who is the pivot of the whole scheme, obtains. If he degenerates into a mere spy over the child, disaster will be the result. The position that should be aspired to for him is that of 'friend, philosopher and guide' for the child, and a welcome adviser to the parents.

Presidentship of the 36th Indian National Congress.
The Honorary General Secretary of the 36th Indian National Congress informs us that a meeting of the Reception Committee of the 36th Indian National Congress was held at Ahmedabad in the Gujarat Provincial Congress Committee Office at 3 p.m. on the 17th instant to consider the final recommendations by the Provincial Congress Committee for the Presidentship of the ensuing session of the Congress. All Provincial Congress Committees having recommended the name of Mr. C. R. Das, the Reception Committee has adopted the recommendation unanimously. The Executive Committee is authorised to fix the date for the sessions in consultation with the Moslem League and the Khilafat Conference.

THE MALABAR FORCIBLE CONVERSIONS.

NAGPUR MEETINGS.

Dr. Moonje writes :—A crowded public meeting of the Hindu citizens of Nagpur was held on the 18th September at the Town Hall to pass a Resolution publicly requesting the Jagadguru Shree Shankaracharya to arrange for the taking back into the Hindu Religion and in their respective castes those Hindoos who have been recently forcibly converted to Mohamedanism in Malabar. The Honourable Sir Gangadhar Rao Chitnavis presided. The resolution was supported by Messrs. Alekar, Fathaley, Krishna Shastri Chule, Professor Rao Bahadur Sadashivrao Jairam, Daji Shastree Chande and Doctor Moonje and was unanimously passed. The Honourable Sir G. H. Chitnavis will convey the resolution to the Shankaracharya. All the elite of the town and high Hindoo Govt. officers also were present.

Another public open air meeting was held on the 22nd inst. on the Maidan of the Town Hall Nagpur to listen to the decision which Shree Shankaracharya Dr. Kurtkoti delivered on the question of taking back those Hindoos of the Malabar who have recently been forcibly converted to Mohamedanism, into the Hindu religion and into their respective castes. The whole assembled audience including the Hon'ble Sir. G. M. Chitnavis and the elite of the town were in anxious mood to know what the decision was to be. When the Shankaracharya opened his magnificently eloquent speech stating in as clear terms as possible that there is ample provision in the Dharmashastra for taking such Hindus back into the Hindu religion and in their respective castes, a long continuous cheer of relief and satisfaction was raised and the meeting ended in vociferous cheers of Shree Shankaracharya Maharajki Jai. A new leaf has been turned over in the socio-religious history of the Hindus and the credit is due rightly to the great Mahabhogwat Dr. Kurtkoti, the Shankaracharya of giving a progressive impetus to the history of socio-religious progress of the Hindus, hitherto lying stagnant for a long time past. In the same meeting the Shankaracharya has appointed a deputation of Dr. Khare M. D., Mr. Bhawani Shankar Niyogi M.A.L.L.M., and *Dr. Moonje L.M. & S., to go to Malabar for making personal enquiries purely and strictly from the Dharmashastric point of view bearing on the question of forcible conversion and to make a report to him in due time. The whole Hindu community ought to be grateful to him for such satisfactory and reasonable solution of the problem, never yet so seriously and scientifically tackled.

To,

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

I am obliged for your courtesy in giving a place to my communication on this subject in your paper. I notice from certain paper that the Shankaracharya of Shringeri is being approached in this matter. As the point has a constitutional importance affecting the Hindu Society I feel bound to write to you again.

I do not see the necessity of referring the matter to the Shri Jagdguru as snob, when it has been provided for in the Shastras. For if this were permissible there would be no end to the trouble which the Jagdguru might be put to in regard to matters for which the Shastras make provisions in clear terms. It is one thing that the Jagdguru interests himself as a member of the great community to which he belongs and which he has been called upon to guide in matters religious, and it is quite another thing for him to be asked to trouble himself as a Religious Head as such. The Smriti of Devata to which has been referred in my last makes enough provision for an event happening like the one in question. Had it been merely the Puranas giving instances of conversions and reconversion the matter would perhaps have been different. But when in addition to the precedents chronicled in the Puranas, clear Rules are laid down in the Smritis which have a binding force there appears to be no necessity for troubling the Jagdguru.

The point if correctly appreciated will save much time that may be unnecessarily spent in approaching the Jagdguru in getting his sanction and then proceeding with the purificatory ceremonies. Further it has a constitutional importance in that the procedure will unnecessarily introduce the Shankaracharya when the rites prescribed contemplate a direct action. I hope our brethren on the Malabar will appreciate this point and proceed accordingly directly.

Thanking you

Bombay,
28-9-1921.Yours sincerely
J. R. GHARPURE.

THE ARRESTED SANYASI

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

Your suggestion that the Director of Information should be asked to withdraw his statement and apologise for his more than dubious statement about Shree Shankaracharya is quite right and in the interest of truth; it is hoped he will do it. It may prejudice his trial at Karachi.

I have known him personally for some time and he was staying in the same building with me in Dewas and I had frequent talks and lots of correspondence with him. The Director's information I have not seen nor the Bombay Chronicle's leader. But I give you facts below which all show that the above title was practically forced on him by his Guru, much against his will. The Director remarks that Bharati Krishna Tirth has assumed the title of Shree Shankaracharya and that his real name is Venkatraman. This is as much as to say that Venkatraman is an impostor, and as an impostor, deserves no sympathy. I don't wish to say anything about the Karachi prosecution. It will stand or fall on its merits. He is not one Venkatraman. He is an M.A. of the Madras University and brought up in Dr. Miller's Christian College at Madras. He was in addition there, a Bille prizeman. After his University career, he had many domestic mishaps. Before he became a Sanyasi—that was within last two years—he stayed in the Shringeri Muth for six years, with the revered old Shankaracharya. He was sought there as a disciple by Trivikram Shastri, Madhavatirtha was the Shankaracharya of Sharda Peet, Dwarka. When he died, he made Trivikram his successor. The Gaikwad, within whose territory Dwarka is did not recognise the appointment of Trivikram as Madhavtirtha's successor and set up, it is believed for political reasons, another Shankaracharya viz., Shantyanand. Even this Shantyanand has got tired of Dwarka for reasons which it is unnecessary to relate here. The Gaikwad went so far as to influence British Judges in Ahmedabad and got the Baroda Political agent to write to Mr. Kennedy, the Ahmedabad Judge to recognise Shantyanand, in an application-matter before the Ahmedabad Judge regarding Shankaracharya's property in Dakore in British territory. The matter came up in the Bombay High Court, Judges have openly remarked on the grave impropriety of the Baroda Political Agent in trying to influence a British Judge at Ahmedabad. Trivikram, who is a Gujarathi, sought to have a learned successor for himself and besought Venkatraman who is a Madraisi to become his disciple. Venkatraman first refused and then on being again persistently sought, became Trivikram's disciple. Trivikram gave Raman a written authority to go round India and foster religion. Raman who had to change his name to Bharathi Krishna Tirtha on his becoming a Sanyasi, as every Sanyasi has to do, obeyed his Guru's injunctions and went round with the written authority of Trivikram in U.P. and the Punjab, orthodox Hindus, Arya Samajists and Sikhs alike came to his lectures and venerated him. The Sikh Guru prostrated himself before him and so did thousands of his Sikh followers. He pacified the quarrels between Sikhs and Hindus, when he was, in Punjab and appointed an arbitrator by both. He was requested to distribute prizes at Gurakula, the stronghold of the Arya Samajists by Swami Shradhdhanand's son and advisers. He won golden opinions of all. He has lectured in Xaviers and Free Church College in Bombay and secured the attention of Catholic and Protestant professors. He can speak only in Sanskrit or English. He is a master of both. While in Bombay, he was suddenly and urgently called away by his Guru in Kathyawad without any inkling as to the object of this sudden call. When with his Guru, he was strictly enjoined to accept the Shankaracharya-ship at once, the old Guru retiring. Bharathi Krishna refused at first, hesitated and got his friend Amritlal Buxi B. A. L.L. B. pleader Rajkot to dissuade his Guru, but the Guru was obdurate and Bharathi Krishna had to yield. Afterwards he returned to Bombay and went to Dakora for Chaturmasya. There the whole populace turned out in his honour, took him in a palanquin, duly recognised him as the Shankaracharya and carried him in a procession to do the duties in the temples as a Shankaracharya. Does the previous history, character and behaviour of Raman make him out to be an impostor? He joined Gandhi in the resolution of sympathy with the depressed classes at Negpur. It is want of accurate information that induced the Director to suggest that he was an impostor. The sooner he apologises the better.

B.

[We did not suggest that Mr. Venkatram was an impostor, and our correspondent's narration does not prove that he was regularly inducted in the position of Shankaracharya. Ed. I. S. R.]

KHULNA FAMINE.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Sir P. C. Roy's opinion that the distress of the famished Khulna will be prolonged much longer than was expected. The blasted district may require aid for at least a year and a half more. C. S. Loch in his "Charity Organisation" at p. 10. says, "We should help the poor to become self-dependent and competent citizens." Charity ought to tend to the social elevation and not to the degradation of the "very poor." For preservation of their self-respect Sir P. C. Roy ought to make an attempt to introduce amongst the distressed people spinning of cotton-threads with charka and weaving of clothes by handlooms and try to induce them to adopt the suggestion of Mr. Hoogewerf, Principal, weaving College, Serampur, on the Future Possibilities of Hand-loom weaving in India, which, had recently been published in the newspapers; and to supply them on hire-purchase system cotton, spinning-wheels and hand-looms. This will at least afford them the means of earning their livelihood, if not, achieving independence.

Yours &c.,

THE DEPRESSED CLASSES MISSION, MANGALORE.

The premier Elementary School at the Court Hill has been raised to the highest grade by opening the eighth class. The teachers of all the D.O.M. schools are very enthusiastic this year, and several activities have been started by them. On Wednesday afternoons the teachers, the senior students and such of the elders of the community as are able to attend, hold informal debates on problems primarily affecting their own condition in life. The debates are very lively, being conducted in Canarese or Tulu whichever language the speakers prefer, and deal with very practical questions. The students keep the minutes of the meeting, and we propose sending these to the Canarese journals whenever important questions are discussed. The Secretaries of the debating society have been advised to place the views of their meetings before the Managing Committee of the Mission, so that the latter may be guided by the experience of the Panchamas themselves in matters dealing with their uplift.

The Panchama teachers have formed themselves into a study group, and arranged for advanced tuition for themselves for better equipment in their work. This very soon led other people in the vicinity, following various vocations like those of peons, carpenters, tailors, etc., to request for opening a night school for them, which was done. Within a few days a number of Municipal scavengers and sweepers came begging to be admitted into the night-school. As the other pupils are not enlightened enough to overcome their prejudices, separate classes will have to be started for them, at least temporarily.

Members of our Mithramandalis rose equal to the recent popular anti-drink propaganda in the district, and did valuable work in popularising effectively the idea of total abstinence amongst their community. Mr. Monappa Thingalaya of the local Jnanodaya Samaj held a Harikatha on 30th July, on the evils of drink, when nearly 300 Panchama men and women attended the performance, and were profoundly impressed by it.

The lack of funds is hampering the work of our Colonies and Industrial section. The handlooms are lying unused. The school boys work at carpentry and the public do generously place their orders at the D.O.M. workshop.

But there are no sufficient stocks of tools and timber to meet the demands promptly. The agricultural Colonies require capital to be developed. The idea is to settle these landless people as peasant proprietors and also train them for a few home industries to eke out their livelihood. This along with the education given in our schools will, it is hoped, considerably assist the alleviation of the present pitiable condition of these people.

The public are earnestly requested to help the efforts of the Mission.

BACK TO HINDUISM.

Mr. Mukut Rao Shreepat Rao Hande Deshmukh had gone into Christianity about five years ago. He has now returned to Hinduism, and was initiated by the Hindu Missionary Society of Bombay on Tuesday the 20th of September in the presence of members and friends. Mr. Sunderaro B. Vaidya, L. M. E. acted as Acharya and Mr. Dinkar V. Kenavinda, B. A. acted as Fire-warden.

ROYAL YAKUTI.

THIS YAKUTI or life giving nectar has been prepared from the best, choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has wonderful properties of increasing virile power and it rectifies urinary disorders. In fact it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to those persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicines. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires. It is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills. Rupees ten only.

A Khilafat-Non-Co-operation Manifesto: The Bombay Chronicle published in its issue of Wednesday a document with the heading "Leaders' Manifesto." The manifesto is issued in the individual capacity of the signatories and consists of three sentences. The first sentence states that it is the inherent right of every one to express his opinion without restraint about the propriety of citizens serving under Government. Many persons, official and non-official, have often deprecated their inordinate longing for Government service and exhorted young Indians to prepare themselves for other and more useful walks of life. No assertion of this right was needed as no one has questioned it. This is quite a different thing from seeking to induce persons in the service of Government to leave their posts, especially in the police and the army. No Government can tolerate attempts to disintegrate the forces upon which, in the last resort, the community depends for protection of property, liberty and life. We are having a vivid object lesson in the Mopla outbreak in Malabar, the omission to make any reference to which in the manifesto does not reflect credit on the candour of the signatories. The verdict of the signatories on British rule will not commend itself to impartial students of history as right and true. It is as sweeping as the opinion of those who hold Non-Co-operationists to be either fools or knaves. British rule has certainly committed serious wrongs but it has also rendered great services to India and her people, the greatest being that of endowing them increasingly with the power to correct wrongs and direct the policy of Government. The irony of the matter is that this verdict proceeds from persons who admire the Turkish Government. The British Indian system is, of course, capable of considerable improvement, and we are not very tender to its faults and shortcomings. But, with all its faults, it is any day immeasurably superior to the Turkish system. A Mahomedan friend of ours who has lived in Turkish territory, is never tired of repeating that, if the Non-Co-operationists lived for a short time under Turkish rule, they would learn to appreciate it and British rule better. The opinion of persons so completely blinded by political prejudice, as to the duty of persons in the service of Government, will be appraised at its true value by everybody concerned. The manifesto would have been mischievous were it not so palpably absurd.

The Signatories: An analysis of the signatories according to communities and localities yields the following results. The signatories number 48, including 2 ladies. 32 are Hindus, 14 are Mahomedans, and the remaining 2 are equally distributed between Parsis and Christians. By Provinces, Bombay including Sind, contributes 21, Madras 7, the United Provinces and Oudh 6, Delhi 4, Bengal, the Central Provinces, and the Punjab (including Kotgarh) 3 each and Bihar 1. Of the 21 Bombay signatories, 4 are Mahomedans, of the 7 Madras leaders 6 are Hindus, 5 of them hailing from Andhra, there are 2 Hindus (both Nehrus,) among the United Provinces' 6, the Delhi 4 are all Mussulmans, among the Punjab 3 there is no Mahomedan. The presence of some names among the signatories is not less remarkable than the absence of some others.

The Working Committee's Version: The Working Committee of the Congress came into prominence some weeks back by its summary method of disposing of certain election disputes over the head of the President and against his ruling. Mr. Vijayaraghavacharya has since ceased to attend it. Even this obsequious body has found it necessary to qualify the absolute doctrine of the manifesto. In the latter document the signatories in their individual capacity called upon all Government officials without exception to resign their posts and find some other means of livelihood. The Working Committee carefully limits the mandate to those "who can support themselves without Congress assistance." As the vast majority of Government servants obviously can not support themselves otherwise, the Working Committee's resolution practically negatives the manifesto. No one can say that the Committee's caution is superfluous after the manner in which students who withdrew from schools and colleges last summer were left in the lurch. Appeals for assistance went unheeded as more than one student complained to us. We explain in a leading article what we understand by the term religious liberty. The resolution of the Karachi Conference, for which certain gentlemen are indicted, is the subject of a judicial trial, and further what may be harmful in one set of circumstances, need not be harmful in another. The shrewd lawyers of whom there are a good many in the Working Committee, no doubt, knew this well. The challenge sounds uncompromising to the lay mind, which it was intended to do, but it is a safe challenge. Simultaneously with the manifesto, Mahatma Gandhi issued a solemn valedictory adjuration as to what his followers should do, if he were arrested. We have never allowed our opinion of the Mahatma's political empiricism to bedim our appreciation of his great personal qualities. But we must tell him frankly that he has dragged the country dangerously near the edge of a precipice, and that it is high time that he took counsel with men who are not content merely to be an echo to him. We quite recognise that the course he has followed so far has circumscribed his choice of methods, but he has the strength of mind, if he wishes, to refuse to follow a path which leads and can lead only to chaos.

The Mopla Rebellion: It was thought last week that the Mopla situation had been mastered, but the later news does not confirm the impression. We have received a telegram from a visitor to Calicut stating that there has been a recrudescence of trouble and the situation is still one of much anxiety. The Moplas' guerilla tactics would seem to baffle the operations of the regular troops. Meanwhile, the first impressions of Mr. G. K. Devdhar who is making enquiries with a view to relief operations in the affected areas, contained in a long and detailed message to Friday's Times of India, reveals an appalling state of destitution and destruction. The "God-fearing" Mopla did his looting thoroughly, stripping his Hindu fellow citizens of grain, money, clothes, pots, vessels, ornaments, even the married women's thali (neck-string) not being spared. Mr. Devdhar estimates that 75 per cent. of Hindus and 50 per cent. of the Mopla women and children need relief in a variety of ways for a period of not less than six months and that a sum of not less than ten lakhs of rupees will be required to meet partially the minimum needs of the people affected. Mr. Devdhar's enquiries showed that the outrages of the Moplas surpassed, in the opinion of the oldest people of the district, in seriousness, if not in extent, the ravages there committed in the days of Tipu Sultan. The greatest need of the disturbed area, it is added, is a larger and stronger military reinforcement, and it is universally believed that that alone will secure the speedier restoration of peace and order and create confidence in the highly agitated public mind. It is worthy of note that the Independent of Allahabad from its Non-Co-operation hill-top safely opines that "regard being had to the general Indian situation we doubt whether Government can afford to permit the concentration of large bodies of troops in Southern India." Since the above was in type, we have received a telegram from Mr. Devdhar which concludes thus: "In my several relief campaign experiences, I have never seen distress a hundredth so terrible. Help absolutely urgent. Shall arrive Bombay about 16th instant. Public meeting Bombay very necessary, as adequate relief without help from Bombay and other parts impossible. Bombay must lead." We are glad to learn that the Trustees of the Wadia Charities have led the way by subscribing Rs. 5,000.

Bombay Development: The initial stages of the launching of the Bombay Development scheme gave rise to much just criticism. It was hatched in secret, and the public was left in the dark as to the necessity, urgency or utility of some parts of it. The inter-connection between the parts and the whole was far from being self-evident. The financial aspect of the subject was kept in the background. There were reasons for this reticence, but we must continue to think that they were not such as to overcome the supreme reason for publicity. Because of this, the actions of Government gave rise to a good deal of unnecessary misapprehension and criticism. Everybody recognised that the object in view was most praiseworthy, but the methods savoured of the ancient regime of the Moghuls, great, small and middling. Many of these defects have now been set right. The public is being kept informed regularly of the progress of the scheme and recently we had a press note giving the estimated cost of different parts of the scheme. Government have profited by the criticisms passed upon their initial action, though they may not have liked them at the time. We think that it serves no useful purpose now to continue the attitude of criticism. Competent opinion is satisfied that the scheme is sound on the whole. Whether it should have been undertaken when it was, is useless to discuss now. For our own part, we take the view that the situation admitted of no delay and that Sir George Lloyd did the right thing when he decided to start it and push it on as energetically as possible. We also think that the decision to do the work departmentally is, on the whole, the best one, all things considered. As for the Development Department being made a transferred subject, while we admit that it would be correct to do so, we see many practical advantages in keeping it as at present, until at any rate Ministers and the Legislative Council are able to establish some stable relations between themselves. A large sum of money has been already spent. His Excellency's term of office has passed its meridian, and it is highly desirable that he should be able to see the scheme, for which he has laboured so hard, well advanced beyond the preliminary stages before he leaves these shores. The need of the population is, above all, acute. For all these reasons, we deprecate further agitation which must retard progress and increase the cost of reform.

Bombay Municipal Amenities: Is it parliamentary to call a member of a public body a monomaniac? Mr. J. A. Wadia twice used this epithet of Mr. N. M. Joshi during a debate on compulsory education on Thursday, without being called to order by the President, Sir David Sassoon. Evidently, a man who has made money has no limits to his vocabulary in the Municipal Corporation as at present constituted. Its narrow, selfish spirit was shown by its repeated refusal to agree to a lowering of the franchise to the same level as that for the Legislative Council. We trust that the Minister responsible for Local Self Government will not be misled by the Corporation's opinion. He will have the full support of disinterested opinion in moving the Legislature to reconstitute the Corporation on a wider franchise. As it is at present, it is a hindrance rather than a help to municipal progress.

The Prince's arrival in Bombay: A Press note says: His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales is expected to arrive at the Apollo Bunder at 10-15 A.M. on Thursday the 17th November 1921. Applications for tickets for the space allotted to the general public should reach the Executive Engineer, Presidency, before 25th October 1921. A later Simla communique states that "His Royal Highness wishes it to be widely known that he hopes that the Corporations and other bodies presenting addresses to him will not incur excessive expenditure on costly caskets and that he would much prefer that public bodies who are desirous of spending money in commemoration of his visit should devote it in the alleviation of poverty and suffering or to similar laudable objects of a public nature."

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, OCTOBER 9, 1921.

CASTE AND UNTOUCHABILITY.

In the passage which we quoted last week from Mahatma Gandhi's speech at Dindigal he, while pleading for the removal of the bar of untouchability against certain classes, remarked that he did not want caste Hindus to eat and drink or inter-marry with members of these classes. "But," he added, "your Hinduism demands you to give an equal right to all human beings. I want you to give Panchamas the same right which any human being has a right to ask of you and which you claim from all the rest." There is a worse disability than untouchability peculiar to Malabar. The depressed classes there are not only untouchable but they cannot even approach high caste persons and their abodes within distances varying for each separate section of them according to custom. An interview at Quilon between the Mahatma and Mr. T. K. Madhavan, Editor of the Desabhimani, and a leading member of the Ezhava or Thiyya community which suffers under the stigma not merely of untouchability, but also of unapproachability, is reported in the Hindu of 30th September, and it brings out the Mahatma's views in a clear light. Mr. Madhavan being concerned both personally and as a social worker for the emancipation of his community from self-imposed as well as externally inflicted disabilities, naturally pressed the Mahatma with questions bearing on definite points. He urged that removal of untouchability was an abstract idea, and a discussion ensued as to what concrete shapes it should or should not take. Mr. Madhavan suggested that entry into Hindu temples being prohibited to his class, it would be a good concrete example of the abstract idea if his caste-fellows asserted their right by entering these temples. The Mahatma agreed but advised that, on strategical grounds, they should postpone temple entry and begin with public wells from which they are not allowed to draw water. This did not commend itself to Mr. Madhavan's crusading spirit. He pointed out that the Thiyyas were not in the same position of economic and educational depression as the Pariahs of the East Coast, and persuaded the Mahatma that the main disability of his community was as regards entry into temples which were supported by grants from the Travancore State. The Mahatma agreed that the question was one of civil right, and said that he would certainly advise them to offer civil disobedience, that they should enter temples and court imprisonment if law interfered, but that they should observe strict non-violence and should enter the temples singly and not in masses. Mr. Madhavan asked and obtained on the spot a statement in writing from the Mahatma embodying this advice and also enjoining the local Congress Committee to take up temple entry by Ezhavas as an item of its practical programme. Worse advice in our opinion could not have been offered by the apostle of non-violence. The caste Hindus are undoubtedly foolish in refusing entry to the temples to their Thiyya co-religionists. Their attitude is as unjust to the Thiyyas as it is injurious to Hinduism. But it is inspired by the superstition, which they honestly hold, that the temples would be polluted by Thiyyas entering them. The attempt of members of this caste to enter the temples is certain to lead to violence, and as they are bidden to do so singly, the result will be disastrous to the daring entrant. You cannot coerce caste Hindus into feelings of brotherhood. If they will not listen to reason, if they insist on following blindly their old superstitions, they should be left to their own course. Hinduism does not require one to worship in any particular temple even at the cost of creating bad blood. The Thiyyas have their own temples and they are entitled to demand that the Travancore State should give the same help to them as to the other Hindu temples. This illustrates how the Mahatma nowadays has often to accept extreme courses against his own better judgment. He is not an autocrat, by any means. He is merely a victim in the grip of circumstances created largely, it is true, by himself.

Encouraged by his success, Mr. Madhavan ventured some questions regarding other aspects of caste.

T. K. M.—Are you for caste, Mahatmaji?

Mahatma.—Yes, I am for caste.

T. K. M.—Are you for caste, Mahatmaji, in regard to inter-dining and inter-marriage?

Mahatma.—I am against both on hygienic and spiritual grounds. Eating is as dirty a business as evacuating, the only difference is, evacuation is a matter of relief. You mix the rice you have to eat with curry. Would you treat it as a clean thing after a few minutes? Would you like to touch it even? It is not good to touch it on hygienic grounds. I will not inter-dine with another and I will not inter-dine even with my son. If one man says he will not inter-dine with another owing to repugnance, I oppose that. You must get rid of that repugnance.

T. K. M.—What is your position in regard to inter-marriage?

Mahatma.—I oppose that on spiritual grounds. Suppose you have to choose your wife among ten million women. You exercise your passion in respect of such a good number. If the extent of your choice is less, you restrict the exercise of your passion to that limited extent. You are benefitted spiritually by curtailing the extent of your choice of women. It is better that you restrict your choice exclusively to your caste.

T. K. M.—Suppose that a man of one caste falls in love with a woman of another caste and that woman reciprocates his love. Will you stand in the way of their marriage?

Mahatma.—I will not stand between them and their marriage on grounds of non-violence. Suppose my son wants to marry my daughter, I will not stand in the way of their marriage. But one thing I will do. I will not allow them room under my roof.

It is probable that the Mahatma's observations have not been correctly reported. The equation between eating and evacuating, and between inter-marriage between two persons of different castes and the marriage of a brother with his sister, is so palpably untenable that we cannot but think that there should be some mistake in the report. In any case, it is scarcely necessary for us to point out the absurdly far-fetched nature of these analogies. Sweeping generalisations of this kind are seized upon by scoffers to throw discredit on th serious and essential part of the Mahatma's propaganda. We can seek an explanation of these extraordinary statements, if they were made, only in the probability that the Mahatma was led to make them as a counterblast to the exaggerated expectations formed by some persons of inter-dining and inter-marriage as factors in breaking down the barriers erected by race and creed and custom. We prefer for the present to regard these statements as intended to be a startling, and as being a grotesque, presentation of the supreme importance of a change of heart in the individual without which inter-dining and inter-marriage cannot have their full social significance.

The important point missed by Mahatma Gandhi in his pronouncements on caste, is that "untouchability" which he so vehemently denounces, is the necessary consequence of caste, that caste is the root cause of "untouchability." The idea that to touch a person of a particular class causes pollution, is but the last link in the chain of ideas to which belong the ideas that to dine with a person of certain castes is wrong, and that to marry a person outside the prescribed circle of one's sub-caste is unlawful. Propinquity, touching, inter-dining and inter-marriage are but different degrees of social intercourse. There are, as illustrated by the instance of the Thiyyas, different grades and degrees in untouchability itself. Even in the same family there are occasions when some members cannot touch others without causing pollution. There might have been originally some sanitary and hygienic motive behind these prohibitions, which made the restrictions worth inculcating, but nowadays we have more definite notions of sanitation and hygiene and more specific means of ensuring sanitary and hygienic conditions. These general prohibitions are, therefore, not needed for their original purpose, and operate merely as irritating restrictions on social intercourse which undoubtedly promotes fellowship between man and man and between different classes and communities. When a Brahmin, for instance, objects to dine with a Maratha of equal education and refinement, there is no sanitary or hygienic consideration involved. Why should not a caste Hindu dine with a Mahar gentleman in the same circumstances? The Mahatma says he will not dine with his own son. Most Hindus, however, dine not only with their own sons but with the larger circle of their caste people, and they will regard his ultra-exclusiveness as an aberration. As for inter-marriage, while we do not hold with the enthusiasts who seem to think that every man or woman has only to marry a woman or man out of a caste or sect other than his own—the more remote, the better—to bring about the millenium in India, we do hold that legal or customary restrictions, which prevent a person from using his own personal judgment in a matter so intimate to himself as marriage, are in the highest degree detrimental to the growth of a free and healthy social life. The removal of the caste restrictions on inter-dining and inter-marriage, therefore, are as important as the removal of untouchability, in order to promote the strength and solidarity of Hindu society. The existence of the depressed classes is a direct consequence of our present perverted notions of caste, and so long as we cling to the latter, we cannot expect to make appreciable headway in improving the lot of the former.

THE VICEROY AND THE MAHOMEDAN DEPUTATION.

The Mahomedan deputation which waited on Lord Reading on the 1st instant seems to have had no object except to give His Excellency an opportunity to explain the change of policy involved in the prosecutions recently instituted against Messrs. Shaikat Ali, Mahomed Ali and other Khilafat leaders. The topics touched upon in the address which it presented to the Viceroy were, with a single exception, familiar, not to say stale, ones and there was nothing distinctive even in the manner of their presentation. The Viceroy in his reply merely recalled what he had said in his speech to the Indian Legislature in opening the Simla session some days ago. The one exception was the reference to the necessity of retaining communal electorates for Mahomedans, which the deputation brought in by pretending that there was danger of their being withdrawn by "Non-Mahomedan extremists" in any further development of constitutional reform. The "Non-Mahomedan extremists" will be the last persons, as the members of the deputation are well aware, to take any step that may militate against the Hindu-Mahomedan unity which they have been at great pains to establish and to maintain. They have made great sacrifices—including the needless sacrifice of truth in regard to the Mopla outbreak—to uphold this unity which they regard and cherish, not without reason, as their most important achievement. On the one topic on which the deputation could and should have offered definite suggestions to the Viceroy and the country, it shrank from doing so, contenting itself with a tame paraphrase of the statements of the Khilafat leaders. The deputation asked that Turkey should be re-instated in her pre-war Empire or, if that was impossible, that Thrace and Smyrna should be left in her possession and that the other countries which formed part of the late Ottoman Empire should be placed under Mahomedan rulers in accordance with the precepts of the Holy Koran. It also asked that the British Government should cease from selling munitions to Greece in her fight with the Anzora Turks. The gentlemen who composed the deputation know full well that Turkey can not be re-instated in her pre-war Empire, if only because the Arabs have broken away from her, and have evidently no desire to return to her yoke again. That the deputation should nevertheless have repeated this impossible aspiration in their address, is the measure of its capacity to give a definite, practical lead to Indian Mahomedans and the country. As regards Thrace and Asia Minor, India has demanded the fulfilment of the Prime Minister's pledge with a united voice which is but feebly re-inforced by the pleading of the deputation led by Major Khan,

The address did not refer to the Karachi prosecutions. But His Excellency very properly took the opportunity, afforded by the deputation, to repudiate the imputation made in a section of the press that these prosecutions were intended as an attack upon the religion of Islam. His Excellency felt the imputation so keenly that he enforced his observations regarding the absolute tolerance of all religions in the British Empire by a reference—an inconvenient one since all Viceroys may not be in a position to use it—to his own appointment as His Majesty's Viceroy of India. The notion that the Government of India are hostile to Islam has merely to be mentioned to be dismissed as absurd by every one who has followed the course of Indian politics during the last quarter of a century. As a fact, we do not think that even the Khilafat leaders have ever brought this charge against the Government of India. What the criticisms to which Lord Reading referred, so far as we have seen them, amount to, is this: that the Khilafat leaders being workers in the cause of Islam, to prosecute them is to persecute Islam. If this argument is accepted, it will be in the power of any person to claim immunity from prosecution by finding some text in his Scripture—no difficult task—as the basis of his offence. A Hindu may on this plea claim that he should not be prosecuted for inciting the mob to burn down slaughter-houses, as his religion undoubtedly obliges him to protect cattle, especially cows, from being killed. From this to violence upon people who include beef in their dietary, is but a short step. Every person is entitled to complete freedom of worship as to place, time and manner. But obviously this freedom cannot extend to actions which involve the like freedom of other persons. Personally, we strongly hold that animal sacrifices are a relic of barbarism and that they are incompatible with what Lord Reading called "civilized religion". But would we be justified in raiding Kalighat during these Durga Puja days when numberless innocent lives are sacrificed in the vain hope of placating the Deity? The Government of India is not a replica of the reputed Rama rajya of old, but it is far from being the Satanic Government that Mahatma Gandhi describes it in one of his rare habitual exaggerations. At any rate, it is the Government to which millions of the people of India look for protection against violence, fanaticism and extortion. The power of that Government to protect them requires for its maintenance a certain reserve of physical force to be employed in emergencies. To endeavour by speech or act to reduce this reserve of physical force, is not and cannot be part of any religion and the prosecution of those who attempt it, can by no stretch of reasoning, be made out to be a persecution of any religion.

His Excellency claimed, with reason that great tolerance has been displayed and great liberty permitted to those who, basing their exhortations upon religion had nevertheless preached extreme political opinions. The Government of India has not been surpassed, he added, in its manifest desire for peace in this direction. This wise policy was fully justified by the fact that Moslem sentiments have been sorely taxed by the happenings in Europe, and at such a time true statesmanship counsels sympathy and forbearance. His Excellency left it to others to judge whether this policy and the more recent efforts made by himself to promote peace have been successful. We have no hesitation in answering this question in the affirmative. Indeed, so conspicuous has been this result to all who can see beneath surface appearances that we confess we were surprised that it has been found necessary to depart from it. We noted some weeks back that there was a turn in the political tide. The extravagances of the Non-Co-operation movement, particularly its latest extravagance, the burning of foreign cloth, had brought about a revulsion in favour of less spectacular methods. The timely and plentiful rainfall had removed the the worst cause of anxiety. The Mopla outbreak had made a considerable section of the public feel that the Khilafat-Non-Co-operation propaganda was being carried too far and too fast for the peace and safety of the country. The speeches of Messrs. Patel and Jayakar were symptomatic of the profound dissatisfaction with their passivity that was gathering head amid leading Non-Co-operationists as the direct result of the policy of forbearance followed by Government. The sober mind of the community was gradually asserting itself and there was reason to hope that the Non-Co-operation movement left to itself would, in the next few weeks, undergo a notable transformation. A small section of publicists, not remarkable for their consistency or foresight, has been egging on Government to adopt vigorous measures, and some of these persons have been, we are afraid, not appraised at their proper rate as forces operating on Indian opinion by those in authority in London and Simla. His Excellency appealed for support and co-operation from all classes in his endeavours to promote the peace and prosperity of the country. We may assure him that the country is as anxious to give him its support as he to get it. Government cannot be embarrassed but by their own mistakes. If reasonable grievances are redressed, there need not be the slightest anxiety as to the effects of unreasonable agitation. In this connection, we must express our deep regret that His Excellency has not yet made up his mind about the Punjab martial law offenders. The public had been led to expect an early decision which has not been forthcoming. Lord Reading knows that a state of suspense is the most fruitful soil for disaffection.

LONDON LETTER.

London, September 15, 1921.

A SOCIALIST BOROUGH COUNCIL.

An extraordinary condition of affairs is happening in Poplar, one of the poor districts of London. The Poplar Borough Council considered the borough too poor to pay the rates demanded of it and refused to levy them. Writs of attachment were issued against the Borough Councillors for failing to comply with the precepts of the London County Council and the Metropolitan Asylums Board, and these writs were put into execution more than a week ago by Sheriff's Officers. Arrests were made and eventually nearly all the members of the Poplar Borough Council were brought up before a Court and are now in prison. Whether the work of the Borough is being carried on or not no one quite seems to know, and this condition looks as though it can drag on indefinitely. Whatever happens the outcome cannot be a very satisfactory one. The Borough Councils were inaugurated over 20 years ago by the Unionist Party to form a check upon the then more radical tendencies of the County Council. But the possibility was not contemplated, at that time, of the Borough Councils themselves becoming extremely socialistic or communistic. The case made out by Mr. George Lansbury—who is now in prison—is that until the problem of unemployment is tackled by the Government and solved by them, and the equalisation of rates in the whole of London takes place, such a protest against existing conditions as Poplar has made is a necessity. In the district itself a tremendous amount of excitement was caused by the arrest of its Councillors, but at no time has there been any real collision with the police, the Councillors themselves appointing the time and place for their arrest.

RELIEF FOR THE UNEMPLOYED.

Probably, now, most people can see how much better it would be to have a central authority for dealing with such questions as levying rates and outdoor relief, rather than leaving it to a district which anyway could not raise the funds needed for its upkeep. Neither is Poplar's demonstration an isolated case. Other socialist boroughs have sought to put into operation a scheme of relief which it would be impossible for them to pay for, and other districts have simply been rushed by extremists into an endeavour to force their views and demands upon the more cautious Boards of Guardians. The latter have certainly been having a most difficult and strenuous time. Rates of relief are being demanded by deputations of unemployed on a scale hitherto undreamed of. In more than one district they have demanded relief equal to a full working wage. For example, at Shoreditch, another crowded and poor district, the demand was made for a weekly dole amounting to £4-13-6 in the case of a man with a wife and six children. This the Shoreditch Guardians refused, but proposed a generous compromise. The compromise was indignantly rejected, and a further meeting of the unemployed was held the following day. The chief speaker then proposed that they should all go in a body to the workhouse, with their wives and families. He calculated that each family would cost the Guardians about £5 per week, and that then the Guardians would comply with their present demand as being the more economical of the two. The crowd, carried away by the emotion of the moment, decided to invade the workhouse, but the invasion did not take place. Perhaps because of what had happened, in another district the previous night, to a body of unemployed who had been advised to enter the workhouse as a protest against the refusal of their demands for high doles. Twenty-five of them did so. They were given beds and food, and the following day were given work, as is usual in the casual wards, to pay for the night's lodging and breakfast. This the men refused to do, became very abusive and 21 of them were then arrested, and taken before a magistrate, the other four deciding to do the work demanded of them. When the 21 were before the magistrate, 14 more of them gave an undertaking to return to the workhouse and do the appointed work. The other seven were sentenced to 7 days' imprisonment with hard labour. So the last few days have seen no wild rush to the workhouses.

PROBLEM OF THE UNEMPLOYED.

Perhaps it is well that these demonstrations, compelling us to focus upon the unemployed trouble, should come now. Whatever steps are to be taken must be taken before the winter is really upon us. It is true the number of unemployed has steadily decreased since the mines started working, but it is still tremendous, and these can only decrease now in any numbers, as trade and commerce improve. Such improvement, we know, must come gradually. In the meantime, people in a civilised, organised country cannot be allowed to starve. The only real remedy seems to be for Government to open works which shall be productive, and, apart from the initial outlay, self-supporting. Doles are a palliative, but rather a sinful one, as they are money spent for no return and have a most harmful effect upon the constant recipient, undermining his natural self-respect. The Cabinet has called an emergency meeting and plans for dealing with the unemployed are to be discussed. But one cannot help feeling that now is the time for a really great constructive Labour leader to come forward and make himself felt. The whole responsibility should not lie with the Government. The work of any leaders of a people is not simply to obstruct or destroy or adversely criticise an existing system, but to put their back into creating a better one, and so absorbing the old, that the latter is transformed. The trade depression certainly cannot be put entirely upon greedy capitalists or the Government, but is the outcome of many different factors arising after the war, not least of these being the loss or great restriction of the oversea trade. And if the organiser and the capitalist have to put their best into recapturing trade, the worker has to do likewise, and it is this need for clear thinking in this direction which is so necessary at the present time. Strikes have been and still are denounced by some of the most responsible labour men, but the insistence upon the rank and file doing their best is not loud enough and the good advice certainly has not yet made much headway.

SUICIDE AMONG SCHOOL CHILDREN.

In the days before the War, we used from time to time to receive lurid reports of suicides among school children in Germany, as a result of the pressure of the education system upon sensitive and immature minds. The New York correspondent of the Central News Agency reminds us that this phenomenon is not confined to Germany. There has been a marked increase in suicides in the United States, and a disquieting feature of the statistics is the number of children who have taken their own lives. Many children, we are told, gave school conditions, especially the fear of examinations, as the cause of their desire to kill themselves. During the first six months of this year, according to the semi-annual report of the Save-a-Life League, in New York City there were 448 suicides, 319 being men, and 124 women. This is an increase of 102 over the same period for 1920. The report also notes that whilst 225 children ended their lives in the United States in the first half of 1920, the number has more than doubled this year. The children reported as having committed suicide in the first half of this year were 214 boys and 293 girls. The average age of the boys was sixteen and that of the girls, fifteen. Most of the girls took poison, whilst most of the boys shot themselves. The report indicates that throughout the country and the civilised world there appears to have been a suicide wave. In the first six months of 1920, there were reported to the League 2,771 suicides in the United States, as against 6,509 this year in the corresponding period. This large increase is attributed to business depression, economic disturbances, and the general abnormal conditions of the aftermath of the War.

NEO-MALTHUSIAN MOVEMENT IN JAPAN.

At a time when census statistics are interesting all who are making any study of social progress in highly populated countries, are entitled to take note of the formation of the Society for Constructive Birth Control and Racial Progress, under the aegis of several noted sociologists. Strangely enough, the formation of this Society corresponds with the establishment of a similar Society in Japan, known shortly as the Birth Control League. The moving spirits of the League are said to be Baron and Baroness Tshimoto. It would be more correct to say that the Japanese Society is still in process of being born, for so far the Japanese Home Office has not signified approval of its formation. In the view of the leaders of the movement in Japan, wars are largely caused by populations overgrowing their home resources of food. The food supply of Japan has been developed to the limit. The alternative remedy, according to the neo-Malthusians, is to reduce the population, and this, they say, is only possible by birth control. Japan has a very high birth rate and the highest infantile mortality rate, it is said, of any country in the world. Baron Tshimoto considers the former fact to be a distinct incentive to militarism and an important cause of the high cost of living. The average Japanese family numbers eight, including the parents. Sixty per cent of the family income is spent on food, and this percentage indicates a very low standard of living. Japan is and has for long been overpopulated, and the remedy has been sought in sending emigrants abroad. By reason of their low economic standards, these are far from popular, and the result is seen in international complications. With birth control, it is supposed that the Japanese economic standards of life would rise whilst the international complications would pass away, particularly as the economic objections would also disappear. The Baroness is likewise of opinion that birth control would result, among other things, in the emancipation of women, who would have more time and money for study, and could prepare for a better position than that of a domestic chattel, which the Japanese woman is declared to be in the eyes of the Japanese law. Doubtless the emancipation of women, due to improved social and economic standards would make the geisha less popular with the class of Dominion European who likes to go to Japan to "amuse" himself, but who protests vociferously against the introduction of the Japanese into the Pacific Dominions because of their lower moral standards.

CHARLIE CHAPLAIN.

So Charlie Chaplain has returned to the land of his birth, and is treated as though he were a hero of the same rank as Foch, Haig, Beatty, or any other who helped to win the great War. Perhaps the crowd is right. Perhaps the mirth maker is just as necessary for the winning of a war and even of a peace, is as necessary as the soldier or the administrator or the legislator or the statesman. Each of us has his place in the scheme of nature, and Charlie Chaplain's great function is to imagine a series of absurd situations, and thereby appeal to the risible faculties of the average man and woman, keeping the balance of sanity at a time when mankind might otherwise be overwhelmed with the gigantic problems of life. He has obtained immortalisation in an appreciative editorial note in the "Times". Who among us ordinary folk can say as much? And, when all is said and done, outside of our speciality, who of us is not an average man or woman? Le Bon tells us that scientists themselves, taken out of their usual orbit, are as unobservant and as much subject to mass psychology as any ordinary man or woman in the street. If, therefore, in his autobiography, we learn that Mr. Lloyd George confesses to having laughed at the laughable antics of this great and universal clown, whose queer genius, palely reflected on the cinema screen, is obviously inimitable, we need not be surprised. For even Prime Ministers must sometimes laugh at something healthier than the follies of their fellow-men. There is probably a great deal of childish laughter in Heaven, and all the children are not under sixteen.

CONFERENCE ON MORAL EDUCATION.

In the city of Geneva, Switzerland, a conference was held on the first two days in September, 1921, in order to lay plans for the Third International Moral Education Conference at Geneva in August, 1922. Previous congresses were held in 1908 and 1912. At the 1912 congress a very popular speaker was the Hon. Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary of Calcutta. On the Executive Council, meeting in London, there are members of Swiss, French, German, Dutch, Italian, Belgian, Hungarian, Danish, and American nation-lities; and the representatives of India are Sir D. P. Sarvadhikary, Mr. A. Yusuf Ali, and Mr. K. Natarajan.

At the Geneva Conference, an interesting and philosophical address was given by Mr. L. Kas of Peking. Mr. Kas was present, at the instance of the Chinese Embassy in London, and as a delegate from the Chinese Educational Mission. His address was delivered in the French language.

The chief topics of discussion at the Conference were only two, namely, the International Motive, and the Service Motive. The International Motive applied to such questions as the League of Nations, the more truthful and humane presentation of history-instruction, etc., and a clause in this part of the programme had been specially inserted at the wish of Mr. Yusuf Ali,—“Correlation of civic and nationalist ideals with the spirit of human brotherhood.”

The Service Motive applied to all spheres of education, from the household and Primary and High-school to the University, civics, economics, science, art, and industrial and professional vocations.

The Executive Council feels that it is most important to secure the views of Asiatic educationalists, and Indian sympathisers with the work of the Congress are cordially invited to communicate with the Hon. Secretary, Mr. F. J. Gould (Armour, Woodfield Avenue, Ealing, London, W. S, England). The basis of the Congress is very wide, namely,—“The Congress does not advocate the views of any society or party, but affords to all who are interested in Moral Education, whatever their religious or ethical conviction, and point of view, an equal opportunity of expressing their opinions and comparing them with those of others.”

F. J. GOULD.

“PUSSYFOOT” JOHNSON IN THE PUNJAB.

(By Mr. S. S. BHATTIA.)

It was an eminently successful tour which Mr. W. E. Johnson, “Pussyfoot” had in the Land of Five Rivers. Escorted by Mr. Nandlal, General Secretary, All India Temperance Council, he devoted a week full of work and pleasure to the cause of Prohibition. Arriving at Lahore, the capital of the province, on 16th September he left Simla, the summer capital, on 24th. And yet what a world of engagements were crowded in this one week, lectures, talks with workers, social gatherings, processions, interview with high functionaries. At Lahore where arrangements were in the capable hands of Mr. K. L. Rallis Ram, a member of the Punjab Legislative Council and a Vice-President of the Lahore Municipal Committee, Mr. Johnson addressed two public meetings presided over by Mahatma Hanaraj, ex-Principal of the Dayanand College and the Rev. Dr. J. C. R. Ewing, ex-principal of Forman Christian College and ex-Vice-Chancellor of Punjab University respectively, both eminent educationists, of highest position and widespread influence, and lifelong supporters of the cause. A highly successful dinner wound up the round of engagements. A flying visit to Gujranwala, the birth place of Maharaja Ranjit Singh was followed by a necessarily crowded programme at Amritsar. Here at a large public gathering Mr. Johnson was presented an address of welcome printed on Ehaddar cloth enclosed in a beautiful sacket of wood carving, the top of which bore designs of a local Hindu temple, the leading Moslem mosque, the well-known Sikh Golden Temple, a local church and the splendid Temperance Hall, bringing out the solidarity of the sacred cause of Temperance. Mr. Johnson responded to the rousing welcome in a telling speech of over an hour. A run at about midnight to Pathankot at the foot of the hills to see the Hall of that indefatigable temperance worker, Miss Mary Campbell, and Mr. Johnson was back the next afternoon to attend a pleasant social gathering where after refreshments he again delivered a vigorous speech. From the city of the Golden Temple straight up to the Olympian heights of Simla where Mr. Johnson hobnobbed with the high and mighty, lunched with the Viceroy, was a guest of the Governor of the Punjab and later of the Punjab Minister of Excise, Lala Harkishen Lal, besides addressing two meetings for Europeans and Indians respectively in Gaiety Theatre and partaking of the hospitality of Bakshi Sohan Lal, a member of the Legislative Assembly, at the Chelmsford Club. The Financial Commissioner of the Punjab Mr. C. M. King who, as Deputy Commissioner at Amritsar, did good work in cutting down the number of liquor shops and turning them outside the city walls, presided at one of the meetings and the Hon'ble Mr. Sukhbir Sinha at the other. Mr. Johnson had also the pleasure and privilege of addressing the legislators of India at a special gathering held in the Assembly Chamber.

The talk with Their Excellencies the Viceroy and the Governor was necessarily of an informal character and their attitude, though sympathetic, was mainly of a non-committal order. But the interview with the Punjab Minister of Excise was of a more businesslike and practical character. He expressed his entire sympathy with the movement and while regretting the slow pace of Government machinery, gave the assurance that the recommendations of the Conference held by him some time ago at Simla in favour of vesting municipal and district boards with power to close two-thirds and one-half of the liquor shops in their respective areas by a resolution of their own, and the remaining one-third and one-half respectively on the result of a referendum to voters at Municipal and legislative council election respectively, would be brought into operation from the beginning of next financial year. All honour to Mr. Harkishen Lal for this assurance and more strength to his elbow. The Amritsar Municipal Committee has already passed a resolution to have no liquor shops within municipal area, as it has excluding the women of ill fame from within the city. But the one is hanging fire as the other so far as the official world is concerned. It is time the officials learnt to respond more quickly to efforts on the part of local authorities to better the lot of the people or to improve their environments.

A MARATHA LADY GRADUATE CONGRATULATED.

(From a Correspondent)

Under the auspices of the Bombay Maratha Deshastha Samaj, a meeting was held in the Raghunath Maharaj Samadhi Mandir Hall near the Crawford Market on the 11th inst. at 5 p.m. to congratulate Shrimati Kumari Shantabai Doundkar on her passing her B. A. examination in the last June from the St. Xavier's College. A special feature of the meeting was a very large attendance of Maratha ladies, who sat side by side with men without any purdah. The chair was taken by Mrs. Chandrabai Powar of Ceylon. While speaking on the resolution of congratulation, Mr. Kelusker said Miss Shantabai Doundkar should devote herself to some social work and presented her with a copy of the "Life of Shiwaji" written by himself which she gratefully accepted. Miss Doundkar was also presented a gold-medal on behalf of the Samaj. In answer to the resolution of congratulation Kumari Doundkar thanked the Samaj for having congratulated her on her having passed the B. A. and said that though she could not say exactly what kind of social work she would undertake, yet she was determined to devote herself to some educational work. The meeting was concluded with garlanding Kumari Shantabai Doundkar and the chairman, and a vote of the thanks to the chair. There was pan supari and light refreshment.

THE KERALA RELIEF FUND.

APPEAL FOR HELP.

At a meeting of the Malabar residents of Bombay held last Sunday in the Servants of India Society's hall, it was decided to start a Kerala Relief Fund towards the relief of the acute distress prevailing in Malabar. A Committee of 13 members with powers to add besides a treasurer and a Secretary was formed and printed receipt books are given to members of the Committee to begin the collections. The collections will be sent to such relief agency in Malabar as may be desired by the subscribers. In the mean time, enquiries are being made to ascertain the nature of the relief work now being done in Malabar by the respective agencies at work which would help us to choose the best agency. Information received from various sources all equally emphasize the urgent need for relief measures. It is earnestly hoped that our efforts will meet with the sympathy and support they deserve from the general public. Enquiries or remittances may be addressed to Mr. E. R. Menon, Secretary, Malabar (Kerala) Relief Fund, (Malabar Residents' Committee,) 7, Krishna Building No. 1, Suparibaug Road, Parel, Bombay.

ROYAL YAKUTI.

THE YAKUTI or life giving nectar has been prepared from
the best, choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has wonderful properties of increasing virile power and it rectifies urinary disorders. In fact it makes man a man. This valuable
medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and
gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to those persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen
the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility.
Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicines. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires. It is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills. Rupees ten only.

NOTES.

The Montagu-Lytton Letters: The letters exchanged between the Secretary of State for India and his Under-Secretary regarding the rejection by the Legislative Assembly of the vote for the visit of the Indian Student's Committee to India, illustrate the peculiar state of mind which overtakes English politicians when dealing with Indian matters. Both Mr. Montagu and Lord Lytton make out that the visit to India of a Committee whose principal object was to remove the difficulties of Indian students in England, was a part of the original programme. If so, why was it not provided for in the principal Budget, and why was it brought up in a supplementary one after one-half of the year was out? Then, Mr. Montagu raises pious hands in horror at the Legislature vetoing a grant for an enquiry proposed by the Executive Government. He has never known in all his experience such a thing to happen in the House of Commons. But has he ever known a British Government to propose such an enquiry? Lord Lytton's letter naively explains what it was that the Committee wished to learn from the proposed tour in India.

We should, had we visited India, have considered how far the existing deficiencies might be remedied by improving the official organisation there but the evidence we have received upto the present has caused us to believe that the needs of the University authorities and the students can only be met by a new organisation which would mainly be unofficial in character and by establishing much closer relationship than at present exists between India and the British Universities. There are reasons to hope that if the requirements of the Universities here could thus be met they would be more anxious to overcome the obvious difficulties of admitting a large number of Indian students but the organisation required would of course have to start in India, and in some respects the Indian part of it would be more important.

In other words, the main purpose of the Indian tour was to improve the Advisory committees in this country which, Lord Lytton and his colleagues were told, were of no value. The last sentence is especially significant. The whole system in India is to be overhauled in order that the English Universities may be "more anxious to overcome" the difficulty of admitting some hundred Indian students! As for Mr. Montagu's pained surprise, it is only necessary to mention that the omission of the grant was moved by such a staunch Liberal as Mr. Samarth and supported by another staunch Liberal, Sir Sivaswami Aiyar. The vote, in fact, is indicative of the disapproval with which every party in this country has come to view Mr. Montagu's policy in respect of Indian finance.

How Experts are made: In the course of his speech in the Legislative Assembly opposing the grant of 2 lakhs of rupees for Lord Lytton's Committee on Indian students in England, to visit India, Sir Sivaswami Iyer suggested that it would be better utilising time and money if it went to Germany, America and Japan to investigate what openings there were in the Universities for Indian students to pursue special courses of study. He went on to give an instance of how the interests of knowledge are sacrificed in the case of India to political partiality. Some years ago, when Sir Sivaswami was in the Government of Madras, he suggested the provision of a research endowment for the investigation of diabetes in India, and the bringing out of experts from Germany or Austria, even mentioning the name of one of the most famous of living experts on diabetes, Professor Carl Von Noorden. The Government insisted upon selecting a Beits scholar from Australia who informed them that he was going to Vienna to consult the same Professor Noorden and to take his advice and also to procure the necessary appliances and instruments! Apropos of the same tendency, is the following from the "Letters from Nobody" by Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson, Finance Member of the Government of India under Lords Minto and Hardinge.

A reputation voce is very easily acquired in India, A youth cribes from a German article on, say, the "beilicosity of blue butterflies," and writes a report thereon. He is at once dubbed the greatest authority on the subject in Delhi, later on in the Punjab; lastly he is pronounced to be the greatest authority on lepidoptera in India, "if not in the world," and no one dreams of questioning his claims to fame. Possibly he is promoted on the strength of them!

Taking Sir Sivaswami's and Sir Guy's examples together it will be no unfair inference to make that quite 50 per cent. of our Anglo-Indian experts are of this bogus type!

A New Non-Party Review: A new arrival in the journalistic world is the Indian Review of Reviews two issues of which have already made their appearance. It is conducted by one who has already made his mark in the field of journalism as an independent and impartial commentator on men and things in the columns of the Karnataka of Bangalore. The Kar- nataka now ceases to exist by itself but is merged in the new monthly to serve, we trust, a greater purpose and a wider sphere of usefulness. While the cessation of the bi-weekly is a great loss to the public in the State and to people outside who found it a reliable and capable exponent of Mysore affairs, the new monthly, in Mr. Gundappa's hands, should prove a valuable addition to our periodical literature. In outlining its objects and policy, it is stated that it is run on the lines of the late Mr. W. T. Stead's Review of Reviews, a better model than which in respect of high standard of excellence and editorial independence, could not have been adopted. Its pages are devoted to politics, literature, education, economics and social and religious reforms; in short, to all things that contribute to the national regeneration of India. The Review while promising to perform its duty "without the least touch of partisan or sectional bias" and "seeking to represent with fairness all the different sides in a controversy," claims to have "a distinctive view-point of its own," independent of any political party. We welcome the growing tendency among Indian journals and periodicals to adopt a non-party policy. This is all to the good, although party people are naturally irritated when they find that an editor refuses to be tied down to this or that particular programme. An editor's duty, first, last and all the time, is to give his readers as impartial, informed and unbiassed a view of affairs on their merits as he is capable of, always putting the best construction possible on the views especially of those from whom he may differ.

Hindu Influence in the Philippines: The October number of Asia, "the American Magazine of the Orient," begins a series entitled "the Philippines before Magellan," by Professor H. Otley Beyer of the University of Philippines, the first of which deals with the Hindus in Malayan. There was from the 7th to the 12th century, a great Buddhist Empire whose capital was Sri Vishaya in South-eastern Sumatra and whose influence extended to the Philippines where colonies were established. This was conquered and incorporated in the greater Empire of Madjapahit which sprang from one of the ancient Brahmanical settlements in Java. Mr. Beyer summarising the general character of Hindu influence upon the Philippines, says that Indian culture made itself most strongly felt in the political, social, religious and aesthetic life of the populations among whom it spread. Economic influence seems to have been less important, except perhaps in metal-working and in the art of war, though modes of dress and of personal ornamentations were also greatly affected. The more cultured Philippine languages contain many Sanskrit words. Except recent European culture, sums up Mr. Beyer, the Indian influences are on the whole the most profound that have affected Philippine civilisation. It should be kept in mind, however, he adds, that these influences did not reach the Philippines directly from India, but came probably through Hindus or Hinduized Malays already long resident in Sumatra and Java.

The Fiscal Committee: The terms of reference and the names of the members of the Fiscal Committee have been published. The Committee is asked "to examine with reference to all the interests concerned, the tariff policy of the Government of India including the question, of desirability of adopting the principle of imperial preference, and to make recommendations." The members are: Sir Ibrahim Rahim-tulla, President, Mr. J. M. Keynes, Vice-President, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, Mr. Ganeshyandas Birla, Mr. J. C. Coyajee, Sir Manekjee Dadabhoy, Mr. Jambadas Dwarkadas, Sir Edgar Holberton, Mr. R. A. Mant, I.C.S., Mr. Narottam Morarji, Mr. C. W.

Rhodas and Sir M. De P. Webb. Mr. H. G. Haig, I.C.S. has been appointed Secretary to the Commission and E. F. Rogers as Assistant Secretary. The Commission will assemble at Bombay in the first half of November completing the taking of evidence probably early in March 1922. The phrase "with reference to all the interests concerned" in the reference, is a curious one. There can be no vested interests concerned in a country's fiscal policy. If vested interests are not meant, the phrase is superfluous as the Committee cannot obviously examine the fiscal policy without considering the interests affected by it. As for the composition of the Committee, we think that there should be more Indian members selected from a wider field. It is impossible to say till we have the report to what extent it would command public confidence.

Wireless Telegraphy: Wireless telegraphy as a spare-time pursuit is said to be rapidly gaining popularity in England. A couple of cigarette tins, insulated with paper, serves as a condenser. Wire wound round an empty whisky bottle has been used as an induction coil, with excellent results. The only parts which it is necessary to purchase are the telephones and thermion valves and one or two batteries. In one of the London County Council schools, we are told, the science master has had in operation for a year a receiving set made entirely by the pupils. The correspondent concludes by saying that there is no reason why every school in India should not have its wireless set. He does not seem to know that Indian Universities were forbidden during the war to give practical instruction in wireless telegraphy and the prohibition, so far as we know, has not been withdrawn! We think also that it is an offence for private persons, under some law or other, to use wireless appliances. No member of the Legislative Assembly or Council of State has thought fit to move in the matter, and Government, of course, is silent.

Punjab Vidhva Vivaha Sabha. The figures furnished to us regularly month by month of the remarriages of Hindu widows under the auspices of the Punjab Vidhva Vivaha Sabha, attest eloquently to the zeal and energy which the Secretary, Lala Lajpat Rai Sahani, is bringing to the humanitarian task of rehabilitating young Hindu widows in the married state. The institution, as our readers are aware, owes its existence to the munificence of Rai Bahadur Ganga Ram C. I. E. who is unsparing in his generosity to get as many Hindu widows remarried as possible in his life-time. The Sabha is willing and, indeed, anxious to extend its services to ever part of India. The zeal of its founder and its Secretary in the great cause they have undertaken, knows no provincial, caste or language boundaries. We draw attention to the advertisement for a Lady Superintendent for Home published elsewhere.

Mysore Communal Controversy: Dewan Sir Kantaraj Urs made clear, what was rather obscure in the original orders, that there is to be no lowering of qualifications for public appointments in case of non Brahmin candidates and that equal qualifications will be insisted upon for all classes. After this explanation, we hope, the Dewan's earnest and sincere appeal to all parties to join together in a spirit, of comradeship to advance the interests of the State will meet with a ready response. We would, especially, emphasise the Dewan's appeal to the press in Mysore to avoid communal acerbity in dealing with public questions. If newspapers regard it as a point of honour, not to raise communal issues on public questions, we shall see the end of all such antagonisms at an early date.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, OCTOBER 16, 1921.

INDEPENDENCE AND DOMINION STATUS.

Our much respected friend, Mr. C. F. Andrews, has again contributed a series of articles to the Indian Press in which he declares it to be his conviction that India's political objective should be independence and that she has no future within the British Commonwealth of nations. His arguments need not be recapitulated as they are pretty much the same as those familiarised by Mr. Stokes' pamphlets and Mr. Andrews' own previous articles on the subject. When about a year ago Mr. Andrews gave expression to similar views, we desired to know whether he meant that independence should be the immediate aim or whether it was to be the ultimate goal. He was good enough to inform us that he did not mean that it should be India's immediate aim and that he would take an early opportunity of making this clear to the public. We are not aware that Mr. Andrews did so, and his present articles seem to show that he means now that independence should be a near, if not the immediate, aim of Indian politics. We can write with some detachment on this question because when Colonial self-Government was first adopted as our political goal after the Surat Congress, we pointed out the incongruity of a country of 300 million people unconnected by race and religion with Great Britain aspiring to be a colony of that country with a population of less than fifty millions. The very idea seemed to us on a par with that of a woman, say, thirty years of age, adopting an octogenarian for her daughter. Mr. Gokhale's answer was that the other party having adopted absolute Swaraj as its objective, the Moderates too had to place some goal before the country and this was the only one that could be thought of. Colonial self-Government of 1908, however, was a very different thing from the Dominion Government of 1921 when Australia sends her own direct representative to the Washington Conference without saying so much as "by your leave" to the British Government. For a fuller understanding of what Dominion Government has come to mean at the present day, we refer our readers to an article in the Reformer of May 22, 1921. Dominion Government now means the fullest self-control over the national and international life of a dominion plus the goodwill, to be translated if necessary into good offices, of the British Commonwealth of nations. Mr. Andrews' objective is thus something less and not more than the Swaraj within the British Commonwealth, which is now the accepted policy of Indian constitutional reform. No responsible Indian statesman can hesitate for a moment to choose between virtual independence with the advantage of the connection with the British Commonwealth, and theoretical independence without it and, perhaps, in antagonism to it.

Mr. Andrews points to the position of Indians in the self-governing dominions and the attitude of the Anglo-Saxon and white races generally towards the coloured races, as the conclusive proof that India cannot grow to her full height within the British Commonwealth. The social and political history of India, however, makes us think that he is hasty in his conclusions. India in the past asserted her right of self-development by assimilating many foreign elements quite as alien originally to her as the British. Even in the case of the Mahomedan conquest India, after a prolonged struggle, ultimately resumed the course of her age-long national evolution. As we have said before, the momentum of three thousand years of a history inspired by a single spiritual ideal, cannot be thwarted by any less deep-rooted and less spiritual force. Further, notwithstanding serious differences of castes and sects in India itself, we have never let go our faith that there is such a thing as Indian unity. The British Indian problem differs from the problems which India has successfully solved in the past and is engaged in solving at the present only in degree. Indians who take this view are not necessarily wanting in faith or imagination. The practical issue raised by Mr. Andrews is: Whether Indians should concentrate their efforts on the pressing problems of internal consolidation, or whether they should leave these problems alone for the present and concentrate on the overthrow or annulment of the British connection. Purely as a matter of practical politics, we think that the first is the more urgent task of Indian statesmanship. Political speculation based on analogies and metaphors can never provide the basis of national policy. The vision of resuscitation of the legendary rural India as soon as the British connection is withdrawn, is unfortunately out of focus with things as they are and have been for many centuries past. Freedom, Mr. Andrews says, rests ultimately in the mind, but immediately it is very much a question of objective realities. It may be that our imagination is rather stunted, but we fail to see how India is to be secured from foreign invasion if she becomes independent immediately. Mr. Andrews forestalls any such question by saying that he leaves to the men of action to settle whether Indian independence is really practicable. We do not see any gain to public life by offering as a goal something the practicability of which is to be tested by men of action. Men of action can only act where the thinker and the statesman show the way, and we should be much surprised if many of the latter class who are acquainted with international politics at the present day, will agree with Mr. Andrews. Our own view is that dominion Swaraj within the British Commonwealth is a sufficient and practical object of Indian aspiration in the present world conditions.

When a high-minded Englishman like Mr. Andrews says that independence is the only true goal for India, it seems craven for an Indian publicist to maintain that not that but evolution within the British connection is the right policy for her. It looks much like hugging the chains to which one has become inned. Nevertheless we feel it our duty to point out that Mr. Andrews' prescription will not prove the remedy that the country needs for her many ailments. His and Mr. Stokes' conviction is the outcome, first, of their sorrow for the falling-away from Christ's ideal exhibited in the establishment and maintenance of British rule in this country, and, next, of their indignation at the treatment of Indians in the self-governing British colonies. Very questionable methods have undoubtedly been employed, but we look around and we do not see any great nation of which the same may not be said. Even the United States of America are not without their evil heritage of Red Indian extermination and Negro oppression. In our own country, we have the untouchable classes and other dark spots of social life. Moral principles are, of course, supreme but the fact remains that no nation has a record which will stand the test of strict moral scrutiny. It is not because statesmen have no morality but because statesmen realise that the interests of morality are best served by pursuing the course of gradual improvement upon, in preference to a violent wrench from, an existing order of things, that they have often to incur the charge of want of patriotism for resisting revolutionary counsels. India has large arrears of social and national consolidation work to achieve, which she can only do in the security from foreign invasion which British rule ensures for her and which it alone can ensure for her in the present world conditions. True, she has had to pay a heavy price for this service and she is entitled to ask as she is asking that she should be treated as an equal partner in the Empire. This claim has been theoretically admitted and its practical acceptance is to a large extent becoming independent of the choice of any British party or Government. Even as a student and thinker, Mr. Andrews should indicate to what sources India may look for security from foreign invasion until she is able to put her own house in order, when she has broken away or has been allowed to secede from the British connection. No country has achieved independence under such conditions without foreign help. The United States were helped by France, Italy was helped alternately by England, France and Germany, Greece was helped by England, France and Russia. The practical question for Indian politicians is whether India stands to gain most in the shortest time by working steadily for Dominion government in the British comity of nations or by inaugurating a campaign against Great Britain in India and in foreign countries. The only other alternative is that Britain should voluntarily grant independence to India and then watch over her until such time as she is able to complete her organisation for internal peace and external defence. We can not see in what essential respect this differs from Dominion self-government. In either case, there would obviously be restrictions on the international position of India.

THE DHARWAR CASE.

On the first of July last there was a collision between the police and a crowd at Dharwar resulting in three of the latter being killed and thirty-nine being wounded by the police firing. On the thirty-first of the same month the Working Committee of the Congress appointed a sub-committee to enquire into the circumstances connected with the firing by the police, consisting of Messrs. Abbas Tyabji, Setlur and Niyogi. The sub-committee had finished its report some days ago, but it was not published pending the conclusion of the prosecution of a number of persons alleged to have been concerned in the disorders. The Sessions Court pronounced judgment on the 8th instant convicting all but four of the accused persons and sentencing them to various terms of imprisonment. We have now before us the Congress sub-committee's report and the summaries of the proceedings in the Sessions Judge's Court as also of his judgment as reported in the daily papers. It may be added that the accused, although all of them were not non-co-operators, thought it fit to abstain from calling witnesses for the defence and from cross-examining those for the prosecution, alleging want of confidence in the authorities of Dharwar district. This, however, did not prevent some of them from making before the Court lengthy general statements repudiating the charge and making allegations against the Police and others. This was the worst line that persons in the position of the accused could have taken. If they had maintained an imperturbable silence throughout the proceedings against them, they would have impressed the public by their resolution. But to profess to abstain from participating in the proceedings and to indulge in long harangues prompted by impulse or inclination at the last moment, converts what was meant to be the solemn tragedy of innocence going uncomplainingly to the stake into a melo-dramatic performance of no serious significance.

The Congress Committee's report opens with an account of the position in Dharwar when the incident occurred. There was acute dissension between Brahmins and non-Brahmins, mostly Lingayats. The Mohamedans sided with the Brahmins from whom the Non-Co-operation and Khilafat movements derive many non-Mohamedan supporters in Dharwar. It is further alleged that owing to the actively hostile attitude of the Collector of the District towards Non-Co-operation and picketing near liquor shops, the relation between the executive authorities and the Non-Co-operation leaders was one of acute antagonism. This general review of the situation is intended to support the sub-committee's conclusion which is, in effect, that there was no disturbance of a kind to justify the firing resorted to and that it was chiefly due to Mr. Shivalingappa, the local sub-inspector of police, who as a Lingayat was actuated by hatred of Brahmins and as an executive officer by antagonism to the Khilafat and Non-Co-operation Movements. The sub-committee base their conclusion regarding the wantonness of Mr. Shivalingappa's action on the fact that only a small number of the crowd before the liquor shop, which was the centre of the disturbance, was actively hostile and that the larger part of the crowd consisted only of passive spectators. This argument ignores crowd psychology. A larger crowd will not lock on passively on the demonstrations of a smaller crowd unless those demonstrations are in the line of its own sympathies. It will either turn away in disgust from or intervene actively to stop such demonstrations. If it does neither, its passive attitude is likely not only to operate as an incentive to the smaller crowd by providing it with a gallery to play to, but may, under a sudden stress of emotion, be transformed into the thing it looks on. All the arguments in the sub-committee's report, however, are not of this character. The discrepancies pointed out by it in respect of time, the damage done at the liquor shop, and other incidents, are serious enough to merit consideration. The fact that one of the accused persons was detained for over twenty days under arrest, bail being refused on the ground that there were seventeen witnesses to prove his presence in the crowd, and had to be discharged later because the Police report from another town mentioned him as having attended a function there at the time of the Dharwar disturbance, shows that the police in making the arrests were not strictly swayed by considerations relevant to the disturbance. The casual manner in which the Judge dismisses this point does not add to the weight of his judgment.

While we cannot agree with the Congress sub-committee that Sub-Inspector Shivalingappa got up the whole gruesome affair out of his Lingayat hatred of Brahmins and his opposition to the Khilafat and non-co-operation movements, we are forced, from his own evidence, to the conclusion that he lost his head from fear of encountering at the hands of the mob a fate similar to that of the Sub-Inspector at Malegaon. When once fear for his own life entered into his estimate of the situation, it might have been reinforced by his other prejudices. This view is entirely compatible with and is indeed borne out by the following passage in the Session Court's judgment :

It is not even suggested that there was any violence on the part of the police before the arrival of Shivalingappa, but on the contrary it is in evidence that they did all they could to persuade the mob to disperse, and though stones were thrown at them not a single witness mentions any act of retaliation on their part. The evidence shows that after Shivalingappa's arrival, there was an outburst of fury and the shouts of the mob and the references to Malegaon, showed clearly that a murderous assault was contemplated and this was followed by an attack on the police with stones and tiles which resulted in one constable being knocked down unconscious and others receiving injuries.

It was the shouts about Malegaon that unnerved Shivalingappa. The Congress Commissioners totally disbelieve the allegation that there were shouts of Malegaon but they give no reasons for their disbelief except that if the crowd had intended to do harm to Shivalingappa, it had enough time and opportunity to do it in before the firing commenced. This again betrays ignorance of crowd psychology. An excited crowd is like a child going into a dark room. Its bravado shouts are meant to conceal its own fear. If the crowd really wanted to do harm, it would not have shouted—it would have done it. The shouts really meant that the crowd wanted to give Shivalingappa a severe fright without doing him any serious injury. The judgment on the whole leaves behind an uneasy feeling that all the persons convicted might not have been guilty of the offence charged against them. In paying a tribute to the forbearance of the Police, the Judge ignores his own estimate of the situation before and after the Sub-Inspector's arrival. The Judge himself does not seem to be quite sure of his own ground. The attitude of the accused during the trial can only be described as perverse but that does not make any difference to the validity of the principle that no one should be punished for an offence of which he is not proved indubitably to be guilty. We take it that in the vagueness surrounding this incident, Government will, as a matter of course, appoint an independent committee to investigate the circumstances in which firing was repeatedly ordered.

THE CASTE SYSTEM.*

(By MR. T. RUTHNAM.)

This is one of the difficult and most important problems the country has yet to solve. It has engaged my attention for over ten years and in my investigations to trace its origin, I followed the methods of the average social reformer and sometimes the Western denouncer, studying the scant literature and history on the subject, and in consequence my conclusions never much differed hitherto from either. All of us invariably traced its origin to the conceited Aryan intruder and got no further. The most plausible and reasonable theory we have been able to deduce from history, legends and tradition is that the Aryans having assumed a monopoly of all the learned pursuits insinuated themselves into the community as dictators and inculcated the caste system with that of religion, obtaining a static condition of social and commercial solidarity. This theory and like theories may be true to some extent, but do not cover the whole ground of the origin of caste and therefore, our attempts to break the system without reckoning the stratum the foundation is built upon, are like treating a patient for cough and fever while the case is one of consumption. In the following lines I will endeavour to state as clearly as possible what the stratum is on which the caste system is built, and also the only possibility of unbuilding it.

To the student of history the caste is not a system confined to India only, but existed in all other parts of the globe in some form or other. Especially in most European countries the divided labour was a hereditary profession, handed from father to son. Palgrave says that the colleges of operatives which, inscriptions prove to have existed in Britain during the Roman period, were practically castes because by the Theodosian Code the son was compelled to follow the father's employment and marriage into a family involved adoption of the family employment. In contrast with the English, true castes were existing in Military Association (Genossenschaften) in early German history which arose from the older classes of Dietmannen in which every member, page, squire or knight had to prove his knightly descent. Castes were also existing in France, Portugal, Spain and Rome. Fortunately the European caste system was without the "untouchability" clause as it were, and that made all the difference between India and Europe. The Aryans who divided themselves between the East and the West were of one great family and this system appears peculiar to the race as the only method of dividing labour for the good of the community at one time, but their modes of life, habits and thinking widely differed from the philosophies they evolved for themselves under widely different environments and conditions of life. The Western Aryan subsisted on flesh in the absence of discovered vegetable food and evolved for himself a theory eliminating the soul in other animals, thus justifying his "struggle for existence", and he still struggles for a luxurious existence. This theory made his conscience easy for all time and his ethical relations are not extended beyond the bounds of his own species. His civilization, sympathy and the humanitarian law of sacredness of life are not, therefore, altruistic. A murderer in European community is a villain, looked down upon as an untouchable reptile. No person knowing one as a murderer would ever consent to associate or enter into matrimonial relations with such a one. So much for the Aryan of Europe for the present. Now we see his brother entering India, a land of perpetual sunshine. He finds himself in a totally different atmosphere, accommodates himself to the new conditions of life, the mixed diet of abundant vegetable and scant animal food of the original inhabitants and evolves a philosophy in conformity with more visible nature and hospitable environments.

For a considerable period there appears to have been no such caste except that corresponding to the "Noble, Squire and Page", of Europe, for, otherwise, the matrimonial alliances with the original inhabitants could not have been possible as had been the case. We can therefore, safely infer that the inserting of the "untouchability" clause was a special measure of a later period warranted by some very extraordinary issue which made all the difference we are trying to adjust. Proceeding on this inference, we discover that the civilization of the Indian grew superior under a benevolent nature and hospitable environments while the state of his European brother on the other side, still continued chaotic and savage. We, therefore, find the Indian first in the field to explore the constitution of human nature and the nature of the human mind with their relations to the external world, seeking to know the ultimate grounds of being or what is that which really exists, a research covering almost the whole of psychology and ontology. We know psychology is the science of the human mind, so also ontology seeks to explain the nature of all things or existence treating of whatever does or can exist. Both these sciences are called metaphysics in the English terminology and are comprehensible to us in Tatwa Gyanas. This is what is known to the world as the culture of the East with regard to which Mr. Bach, M.A., the learned author of "The Spirit of Ancient Hindu Culture" says "A Hindu will place metaphysics first and ethics afterwards. Moral life, therefore, is only an episode in the career of the soul. It is a mediocre life after all. It is merely earthly perfection, it has nothing of Heaven in it. It is dull, life-less and unelevating; the spark of spirituality of higher illumination of philosophic thought is necessary to convert dross into gold.... The philosophical concepts like Karma, Maya, Moksha, Atman, are more prominent in Hindu thought than purely ethical concepts. It is for the East to put soul everywhere to inspire the right mental psychosis. The East looked inwards and emphasized the need of obtaining mastery over self and developing the soul powers of man." This was exactly the case with the ancient philosopher, and that is Indian culture which recognised an immortal soul in all animals including man; and it is perhaps from this time onwards that the Indian philosopher declared killing non-human beings amounted to murder, refused to eat flesh, took to vegetarian diet and constructed his ethical relations on more liberal basis. The observance of all animal life as sacred does not seem to have been confined to the philosopher alone, but on the other hand, it has been made universal, as a religion, under the theory of transmigration of souls—Punar Janma. If all the people had followed the philosopher implicitly in this new theory, there could have been no necessity to bring untouchability in, but apparently the Kshatriyas having become sufficiently powerful as a fighting and ruling class appear to have refused to desist from hunting and abstaining from eating flesh and thus rendered themselves contemptible in the estimation of the philosopher.

FORCIBLE CONVERSIONS IN MALABAR.

I

Mr. Devdhar writes from Calcutt:

I would like to make one point clear about which we all on that side are more or less in the dark and that is with regard to the question of re-admitting in the Hindu Caste again those who are perforce converted to Islam. It must be noted in the first place that the Nambudiris and the Nayars of Malabar do not recognise the religious authority of the Sankaracharya. The only authority they recognise in this matter is that of the Vaidhyans or Vaidikans, who really are the religious heads in these parts. The sanctions which the Sankaracharya are announcing in regard to the readmission into their caste of persons converted to Islamism may go to help these people partially by creating public opinion in its favour but will certainly not count for anything substantial; and I am glad to say that a Vaidhyan with whom I had a talk is prepared to support re-admission on the part of a converted person provided the necessary expiation ceremony is undergone.

But this is really a small matter, because the Mopla, fanatic and rash as he is, will never tolerate the existence of a man or a woman who, even though forced, had accepted Islamism, if he or she proposes to go back to his or her old faith. To kill such a person is, therefore, in his eyes the most glorious and meritorious act, even more than that of converting a kaffir, that is to say a non-moalem, to Islam. This changes the whole aspect of the case. Unless, therefore, the converted person, anxious to be readmitted into the original caste, leaves his place and removes to quite another place and does not too much advertise his or her going back again to Hinduism, he or she would not think it safe to go back to the old religion. Therefore, it is no use advocating re-admission of the converted during these troublous times without extorting entirely those people from their present surroundings. It is no doubt a very sad and unfortunate position in which the forcefully converted find themselves in, but for some time at least there is no help but to wait. Mr. Thomas, the Collector, who was speaking to me very feelingly about this point, asked me to be very clear in my mind and also to make it clear to our friends outside regarding the position of the converted Hindu at the present moment. But pressure of work prevents me from doing it at this moment. More in my next and when we meet.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I find in all the correspondence and even the editorials published so far in your esteemed paper re the re-conversion of the 'forcibly converted' one important principle is completely lost sight of. None the less the principle is as important as it is obvious, only it would seem the principle would not become readily apparent to many, until the Mahatma in a manner so like him drew attention to it in one of his Madras speeches. It might be put like this: 'Forcible Conversion' is no conversion, at any rate in this enlightened age when it would seem that the definition of religion as a matter of the personal conscience is well nigh universally accepted. Ergo there could be no question of the reconversion of the 'forcibly converted.' For so long as the forcibly converted have not themselves voluntarily come to believe in the creed of their 'converters,' they are as good as their unconverted brother of the native fold.—Now while it is significant as a sign of the progressive nature of Islam that Mussalman divines and leaders should have come forward and declared the so-called converts made by the Mopla fanatics to be inadmissible into Islam with its motto, "There is no compulsion in religion," the leaders amongst the Hindus including even the recognised custodians of their ancient faith (like the Sankaracharya Dr. Kurtkoti) have so far owned up by their actions their inability to shake off their heritage of hide-bound prejudice, for they talk of prayaschitta ritual and monetary expenses therefor, even quoting chapter and verse from some effete old Smriti, Purana or the like. I would have no objection to these tactics provided they were avowedly meant as a concession (but only temporary) to unreasoning and suicidally conservative orthodoxy, but the pity of it is that our ecclesiastical dignitaries and their secular advisers should together be blind to the truism that there can be no prayaschitta to talk of—much less needed—for a 'sin' for which one is neither voluntarily nor morally responsible.

Yours etc.,
SANSK.

HYDERABAD SOCIAL CONFERENCE.

The Secretaries of the Reception Committee, Hyderabad Social Conference write:—

At a meeting held on the 7th October 1921, the Reception Committee, Hyderabad Social Conference, resolved to hold the fourth sessions of the Conference at Hyderabad (Dn) on the 11th and 12th November 1921. Members of the Reception Committee and Delegates shall pay Rs. 3 and Rs. 1, respectively. Delegates and visitors attending the Conference from the outside will be provided with board and lodging on payment of Rs. 2 only per diem. Persons interested in the cause of social reform are cordially invited to attend the Conference. All communications should be addressed to the secretaries.

BOMBAY BOY SCOUTS.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

We the undersigned respectfully bring to your notice the appeal for funds made by His Excellency the Governor as Chief Scout of this Presidency in aid of the Boy Scouts Association organised in India. The aim of the Boy Scouts Association is to help Indian Boys irrespective of race, creed or caste to become good citizens of their Motherland and of the Empire, reverencing God, living as loyal subjects of the Imperial Crown, subordinating personal interests to the needs of the Country and of the Empire; to form their character by training in them habits of observation, obedience and self-reliance; to teach them services useful to the public and handicrafts useful to themselves and promote their physical development and health. His Excellency the Governor wishes to invite your hearty support and co-operation in the raising of a sum of money which will be worthy not only of a splendid cause but also of this important and influential presidency. It would be interesting for you to know that the Executive Committee which was appointed to carry out the work of organising Boy Scouts have already sent six Indians to England for thorough training under the care of Mr. A.C. Miller the organising Provincial Commissioner. On their return they will be placed in charge of a camp for training Scoutmasters, the yearly cost of which will be over Rs. 20,000. A central Library for Scout Literature, a Headquarters building and Central equipment store and a Scout Magazine are other necessary items of expenditure. Moreover, poor boys must be helped financially in order that they may receive the same benefit as their more fortunate brothers. It is hardly necessary to inform you that H. R. H. the Prince of Wales who takes a special interest in the Boy Scouts is shortly to visit India. One of the items in the programme of his tour in this Presidency is to afford him an opportunity to see for himself the progress of the Indian Boy Scouts movement. In order to achieve the desired object it is necessary to get subscriptions at an early date and the undersigned would be very grateful to you if you would extend your generous hand and send a handsome donation for this cause which the Indians have all at heart.

Yours faithfully,
Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtulla.

MOKSHA IN THE KURAL.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

Immediately on seeing your editorial note regarding "the view about the omission of Moksha in the Kural" which I controverted in my letter of 26th July 1921, published in the Indian Social Reformer of July 31, I wrote to the veteran Tamil Pandit Mahopadhyaya V. Swaminatha Ayyar Averal, referring the point to him and requesting a lucid reply, which I promptly received this morning in Tamil, of which I give you the purport in English.

"Though mukti (Moksha Freedom) is not separately treated in Tirukkural, its sadanes are treated in "Tirravara-Iyal" and farther, the subject is one which really transcends mind and speech and so incapable of being done justice to by lay mind and in words. Hence its omission is proper in principle, is the opinion held by Great Souls. The commentator's opinion as well as mine agree in this with the above view. Of Mukti it is said: "Those who have seen (realised) have not spoken of it (because unspeakable); and those who have spoken of it have certainly not found it (i. e. realised it truly)." This is the saying of great men. That Moksha-Vidya is a sacred preserve for Brahmins is not the commonly accepted view will be clear from Vyasa Bharata and other ancient works of authority. And that is the truth is borne out by Perim-hachagar, the great commentator of Tirukkural: vide Uraip-payiram of his commentary."

This is the view of those who are competent to speak on the subject from an intimate and accurate as well as acceptable knowledge of the same.

INDIAN UNITY.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

It had been a matter of great consideration to me as how to bring about unity between the Hindus and non-Hindus. I have come to the conclusion that the best way to bring this about is just allowing other religionists free scope to become Hindus without any religious instruction. It is an advice to our brother Sanatan Dharmist to allow a free ingress to the Mahomedans and other religionists of India to become Hindus. There can be no better way of securing unity between one religionist and another.

The demand for unity between several sets of religionists is being deeply felt in India. Nothing is achievable unless this be brought about. If one religion wants to do a thing the other is a trammel to the first and thus disables it from doing what it desires to achieve.

There is no loss to a Sanatan Dharmist if he allows, by performing certain ceremonies, a non-Hindu to become a Hindu. This is a great reform that the present condition of India wants. It is not against Manu's orders and mandates, but it is quite in harmony with the latitude which he gives to a Hindu to make changes in the law whenever expedient.

Towards this direction certain efforts have been made, for example this was before the mind of Dayanand Saraswati when he brought about the passing of the rule that Hindus may freely admit Mussalmans, Christians and other religionists to come into the fold of Hinduism. In my opinion, a pious Sanatan Dharmist though I am, no more substantial work has been done than what Dayanand has done in this direction. May his life have bliss and eternal bliss!

One should unavoidably think and try to think as to what is the cause of unity between several religionists in Japan. They live quite in harmony with each other although they belong to different religions. What reason will you assign to this? The answer is quite obvious. It is that, circumstanced by time the Buddhist law of religion arising in its infancy from India herself, allows that a Mussalman, a Christian or other religionist can adopt Buddhist religion at any time he likes. It is by the unity produced from this circumstance that every thing is capable of being performed by them in union. Remove this law from their country and you will see that the condition of Japan deteriorates to what is the present condition of India.

It is on these reasons that the writer wants every Hindu to just allow with an open mind every non-Hindu to become a Hindu without any restriction whatsoever.

SLAUGHTER-HOUSE HORRORS!

APPEAL TO CHRISTIAN MISSIONARIES.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

I beg to draw your attention to the sad fact that, as editorially stated in the Bombay Chronicle of 26th July, poor animals are cruelly killed in the Bandra slaughter house.

When the slaughter-house of even far-advanced Bombay is a "horrid torture house," and "the scandal of the Bandra slaughter house continues unabated" to such an extent that "many Europeans in Bombay, who have come to hear of the administration, are becoming vegetarians," how much worse things must there be in hundreds of slaughter-houses (Hells upon Earth) in small towns and villages?

I pray that Christian Missionaries in India may kindly realise the above fact, may become vegetarians, may preach to the people the physical as well as spiritual advantages of the vegetarian diet, and thereby earn a multitude of blessings.

Vegetarian literature may be had from the Secretary, Bombay Humanitarian League, 309, Shroff Bazar, Bombay.

Yours respectfully,
LABSHANKAR LAKSHIDAS.

THE NEXT INDIAN NATIONAL CONGRESS, AHMEDABAD.

CLASSES AND RATES FOR VISITORS' TICKETS.

The number of visitors' seats has been limited to 8000; the classes and rates decided by the Reception Committee are as follows:—

First Class...Rs. 5000	Fifth Class...Rs. 50	for persons having domicile in Gujarat.
Second Class...Rs. 1000
Third Class...Rs. 500	"...Rs. 25	for persons not having domicile in Gujarat.
Fourth Class...Rs. 100

Indian States in Gujarat, Cutch and Kathiawar are included in the Province of Gujarat. Rates of fees for lady visitors are the same as above; but separate seating arrangements will be made for them.

The rates of fees for joining the Reception Committee are as under:—

(1) For a person having domicile in Gujarat—Rs. 25 if he is a member of any Congress organization in Gujarat. Rs. 50 if he is not such a member.

(2) For a person not having domicile in Gujarat—Rs. 100. Applications for registering for visitors' tickets or for Reception Committee membership forms should be made to the "General Secretary, 26th Indian National Congress, Ahmedabad". Applicants should send postal stamps for reply.

INDIA AND THE KHILAFAT.

The Khilafat question is as much outside Indian politics as the question of the secular power of the Grand Lama or the Pope. We have both Buddhists and Roman Catholics amongst our countrymen. They are as good Indians as the Mussalmans or the Hindus. Indian nationalism is concerned with them as citizens of India, not as members of any creedal brotherhood which may be within her borders or extend beyond them. True, when any section of the national body is injured, the whole is injured. But it must be remembered that injury must be found directed against the Indian citizenship, not the membership of a church universal. The absurdity of the claim put forward will be evident if we imagine a political situation created by the armed hostility of the Khalifs, the Grand Lama and the Pope, one against another. Not an unthinkable situation altogether. With whom will then the Indian Swaraj side, the Moslems, the Buddhists or the Catholics? With all our sympathy for the Turks, and condemnation for the breach of pledges to the Indian Mussalmans by the British ministers, we are against dragging Indian nationalism to the level of religious antagonism. The Khilafat question may now be a good stick to beat the Britisher with but there is no knowing that it may not in time prove the Afushal to Indian nationalism.

THIS YAKUTI or life giving nectar has been prepared from
the best, choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has wonderful properties of increasing virile power and it rectifies urinary disorders. In fact it makes man a man. This valuable
medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas
Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and
gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to those persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen
the body, refresh the memory and to guard against debility.
Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicines. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires. It is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills. Rupees ten only.

NOTES.

Lord Lawrence's Statue: At a meeting of the Lahore Municipal Council held on the 8th instant, Mr. Santanam moved that the statue of Lord Lawrence should be removed from its present site in that city. He said, according to the report in the Tribune of the 11th instant,

That the proposal to remove that statue did not imply any disrespect to Lord Lawrence's memory, but was meant to protect their own honour. The speaker had nothing against the character of Lord Lawrence. Their objection was to the inscription underneath the statue which said:—"Will you be governed by the pen or the sword." These words were offensive; and the statue, therefore, ought not to be allowed to remain at a prominent public place.

Another member, in supporting the motion observed:

That words inscribed on the statue were extremely offensive and wounded the self-respect of every Indian. The form of the statue was no less offensive, in that Lord Lawrence had a sword in one hand and a pen in another. Such a statue could not be allowed to remain at any public place.

We are surprised that it does not seem to have occurred to any of the members that the offensive element in the statue could be easily expunged by having the inscription effaced and by inscribing in its place some motto, more appropriate to Lord Lawrence's real disposition than the ridiculous Swash-buckling on the statue, such as "Not the sword but the pen". Lord Lawrence was a great and good Viceroy and nobody had less faith in the sword as an instrument of government than he. We earnestly hope that the question will be settled satisfactorily in the way which we have ventured to suggest.

The Corporation and the Prince's Visit: We are glad that the Government of Bombay have rectified the omission to include the President of the Bombay Municipal Corporation among the high officials to be presented to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales on his landing in Bombay. It is explained that the omission was due to the general rule that the President should be with his colleagues of the Municipal Corporation in the place allotted to that body, but His Excellency recognises that there are occasions when it is necessary to mark the importance of the City of Bombay by giving to the President of its Municipal Corporation a position of special and marked consideration, and, therefore, on the occasion of the arrival and departure of His Royal Highness, the President will be invited to be one of the small group of the highest officials to be presented to His Royal Highness by His Excellency immediately after his arrival.

Some Indian Publications: We have received from Messrs. Ganesh & Co. four books, Bharata Shakti by Sir John Woodroffe, The Secret of Asia by Prof. T. L. Vaswani, 'To the Nations' by Paul Richard and 'Drink and Opium Evil' by C. F. Andrews. 'Bharata Shakti' and 'To the Nations' are only revised editions. The new edition of Bharata Shakti has gained by a new chapter, "Postscript" from the pen of Sir John. He says while condemning the excess of legalism, "if as much energy were spent on sanitation and general betterment as is expended on law, the country would not only be free of much of its suffering, but many of its people would be less poverty-stricken." He also speaks highly of the herbal and other remedies and says, "one of the things I most regret is the neglect of Ayurvedic teaching, and the loss of valuable remedies."

The Labour Gazette: The first issue of the Labour Gazette, a monthly published by the Labour Office, Bombay, contains a foreword by His Excellency the Governor of Bombay, in which the aim and function of that Department are defined. "The new Labour Office has been engaged now for several months past upon an energetic investigation of the economic situation in Bombay and upon the preparation of statistics set forth in simple form enabling not only employers and employed but the press and the public to take a better-informed interest in labour problems and to render them less dependent upon the catch words of the crowd or the well-meaning sentimentalities of mere idealists. The aim of Government then by means of Labour office will be to develop this field of investigations until it can furnish up to date and accurate information regarding the realities of the labour world."

The Malabar Relief Fund: We print to-day the proceedings of the preliminary meeting convened by Mr. Devdhar on Thursday to form a Committee to organise a fund for the relief of distressed persons in the parts of the Malabar district affected by the Mopla rebellion. The movement is entirely non-political and non-sectarian, and relief will be given to all sufferers irrespective of sect or creed. We wish the movement every success.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, OCTOBER 23, 1921.

THE POET'S PROTEST.

Rabindranath Tagore's searching criticism of the Gandhi cult in the current number of the Modern Review has stung the Mahatma to the quick. His reply to the Poet in Young India departs noticeably from the general level of his writings, in tone and temper. There can be no doubt that the Mahatma would have much liked to have the Poet's support, and that he is much pained to have him so uncompromisingly opposed to his methods. The opposition of the Poet is the more disconcerting because it is combined with a deep appreciation of the Mahatma's greatness as a man. Says the Poet:

Mahatma Gandhi came and stood at the cottage door of the destitute millions, clad as one of themselves, and talking to them in their own language. Here was the truth at last, not a mere quotation out of a book. So the name of Mahatma, which was given to him, is his true name. Who else has felt so many men of India to be his own flesh and blood?

The Mahatma has given the country the vision of a new truth—sacrifice not for saving our souls hereafter but for advancing a whole people here and now. But for the task of translating this vision into the various moulds of practical, everyday life, other qualifications are needed than those that he possesses in such abundant measure. Says the Poet:

The science and art of building up Swaraj is a vast subject. Its pathways are difficult and take time. For this task, aspiration and emotion must be there, but no less must study and thought be there likewise. For it, the economist must think, the mechanic must labour, the educationist and statesman must teach and contrive. In a word, the mind of the country must exert itself in all directions. Above all, the spirit of Inquiry must be kept intact and untrammelled, its mind not made timid or inactive by compulsion, open or secret.

The Poet is hard on the political literalists who think of "utilising the Mahatma as a secret and more ingenious move in their political gamble." He illustrates the short-sightedness of these men by a striking parable. It is foolish, he says, to whip the political horse into a gallop when the carriage it is drawing behind is of a ramshackle description. He observes:

For such a thing as is our country—a mere collection of jointed logs, that not only have no wholeness amongst themselves but are contrary to one another,—for this, to be dragged along a few paces by the temporary pull of some common greed or anger, can never be called by the name of political progress. Therefore, is it not, in our case, wiser to keep for the moment our horse in the stable and begin to manufacture a real carriage?

We cannot keep the horse in the stable altogether, it must be taken out and given sufficient exercise every day. But the carriage undoubtedly requires to be strongly put together before we can trust it to take us to our destination with reasonable safety. Our ultra-political friends seem to think that if you drive the political horse down a steep road at a break-neck pace, the Swaraj carriage will without any further effort upon our part evolve itself behind it. They, indeed, hold that that is the only way of building up Swaraj.

The Poet's condemnation of the gospel of blind obedience to the Mahatma, as the shortest route to Swaraj is as scathing as it is just. He likens it to the faqir with his gold-making trick. The goal is kept purposely vague to enhance the fascination of the mystery. The whole thing, to the poet, seems dangerously akin to the belief in magic which has been the bane of religion. To the cult of the charaka, the poet retorts that it is as easy to be stunted by small machines as by big ones. "Mind is no less valuable than cotton thread." The burning of foreign cloth, excites his indignant protest. He writes:

The command to burn our foreign clothes has been laid on us. I, for one, am unable to obey it. Firstly, because I conceive it to be my very first duty to put up a valiant fight against this terrible habit of blindly obeying orders, and this fight can never be carried on by our people being driven from one injunction to another. Secondly, I feel that the clothes to be burnt are not mine, but belong to those who most sorely need them. If those who are going naked should have given us the mandate to burn, it would, at least, have been a case of self-immolation and the crime of incendiarism would not lie at our door. But how can we expiate the sin of the forcible destruction of clothes which might have gone to women whose nakedness is actually keeping them prisoners, unable to stir out of the privacy of their homes? We must refuse to accept as our ally the illusion-haunted magic-ridden slave-mentality that is at the root of all the poverty and insult under which our country groans. Here is the enemy itself, on whose defeat alone Swaraj within and without can come to us.

The Poet concludes by bearing witness to the new spirit which he has seen dawning in the West—"a real anxiety and effort of their higher mind to rise superior to business considerations." He has condemned the Indian Reform Councils. But even in these he finds signs of the Time-Spirit which is moving the heart of the West. He writes: "Although the present form is unacceptable, yet there is revealed an aspiration which is towards the truth and this aspiration must not be condemned."

Mahatma Gandhi's reply is in effect that the Poet has no business to meddle with politics and that he would do well to keep to his stars and woods and skies. This would be all right if the Poet, as happens in this case, was not a religious, social and educational worker of much longer standing than the Mahatma.

THE DHARWAR CASE.

The primary issue of public interest arising from the tragic incidents which occurred at Dharwar on the 1st July last, is connected with the firing upon the crowd by the Police. Was it necessitated by the attitude and actions of the crowd and was it impossible for the Police to have dispersed it without recourse to this extreme step? The Abbas Tyabji Committee was appointed by the Congress Working Committee to deal with these issues. If it had strictly confined itself to it, and left the readers of its report to form their own inferences and conclusions as to the motives and attitude of individual officers, its report would have greatly gained in weight and authority. It is the rigorous restraint on wayside reflections in the report of the Congress sub-committee on the Punjab tragedy that stamped it at once as the most authentic account of the happenings in that province. Nevertheless, the Abbas Tyabji Committee's report on Dharwar contains valuable material for forming conclusions on the issue stated above, though it is not always easy to sift it from its setting in the body of the report. The appendices at the end of the report is free from this difficulty and they are, therefore, the most valuable part of it. In appendix IV, we have a statement of persons wounded and killed during the firing, according to caste, sect and religion. The number of killed was 3 and that of wounded 39, making a total of 42 casualties. By caste and religion, 21 of these (including 3 killed) were Mahomedans, 8 were Lingayats, 6 Marathas, 3 Brahmans, and the remaining 5 were non-Brahmin Hindus of different castes. In view of the allegations made on both sides as to the general political atmosphere at Dharwar at the time of the incident, this classification of the casualties is of great importance. There are conflicting statements as to whether all the persons tried by the Sessions Judge were or were not in the crowd but there can be no doubt that all the killed and wounded were in the crowd. Here we have one solid fact to afford us a firm foothold, assuming, of course, that the classification is correct.

The value of this fact is enhanced by the clue that it gives to the composition of the crowd. There is a sentence somewhere in the Tyabji report, which implies that the Police or Military in firing upon a crowd, are entitled to discriminate and mark down particular persons in it. We think that this is wrong. The firing should be directed so as to disperse the crowd as quickly as possible, and the Police and Military are, we think, forbidden to shoot at individuals whether on the ground of their being leaders or on any other ground. The reason of this prohibition is obvious. Not only is it beyond the province of the Police or Military to adjudge the share of each individual in a crowd but, without such a prohibition, private vengeance may wreak itself in the guise of public duty. The Tyabji Committee has laid stress on the Brahmin-non-Brahmin differences in Dharwar as a circumstance leading up to and elucidating the events which culminated in the firing of the 1st of July. The fact that there were only 3 Brahmans, while there were 8 Lingayats and 10 other non-Brahmin Hindus, among the wounded, shows that, however else the Brahmin-non-Brahmin differences might have effected the situation, it did not enter into the firing ordered by Sub-Inspector Shivalingappa who, by the way, is not, we understand, a Lingayat as his name led us to think, but a non-Brahmin Hindu.

We shall, therefore, not be far wrong if we take the distribution of casualties as a rough index to the distribution of the crowd before the liquor shop at Dharwar on the 1st of July. That is to say, quite 50 per cent. of it were Mahomedans; nearly 24 per cent, Hindu non-Brahmins; nearly 19 per cent, Lingayats and 7 per cent, Brahmans. The Mahomedan population of Dharwar Town is less than one-fourth of the total population, and its predominance in the crowd is, therefore, significant. This strongly confirms what appears incidentally from statements in the Tyabji Committee's report, namely, that the picketing of liquor shops in Dharwar was mainly carried out under the auspices of the local Khilafat Committee as a part of Khilafat propaganda. The Non-Co-operationists and Congressmen were largely Brahmans and the relatively fewer casualties among them may be due partly to their being a small minority, and partly, also, perhaps, to their being content to look on from a distance on the scene before the liquor shop. The considerable proportion of wounded non-Brahmins and Lingayats shows that there was a considerable proportion of spectators actuated purely by curiosity in the crowd as there is in every crowd. But, as we said last week, this does not make a crowd from the Police point of view any less undesirable to gather before a liquor shop that was being picketed by Khilafat volunteers supported by a band of hooling and howling youngsters. We have searched the Committee's report carefully without success for evidence that the the Khilafat volunteers or Non-Co-operationists among the spectators made any attempt to persuade the crowd to disperse. The Police and the crowd stood looking at each other, according to the report, for two mortal hours, from 6 to 8 p.m. We consider the following passage in the report to be a tribute to the Police before the Sub-Inspector's arrival.

It is also clear from Mr. Sannis' evidence as well as of those who had gone to the shop earlier than him that the crowd in front of the liquor shop had been irritated on account of the fact that one Police Constable who had got drunk behaved mischievously by throwing toddy, bits of earthen pots and some stones from behind the liquor shop. We feel pretty certain that it was by reason of the knowledge of this incident that the Police did not take any serious notice of the conduct of the crowd. Had the crowd been pelting the Police guard with stones as alleged, they, during those two hours, would certainly have made an effort to arrest some of the leaders.

The italics are ours. It is not clear from the report what the conduct of the crowd, short of throwing stones, was of which the Police should have taken serious notice but for the irritation caused by the antics of their drunken comrade. The Indian police is not a perfect police. Its defects are patent and they are largely the defects of the community from which it is drawn accentuated by the combination of poor pay with disproportionately large powers. It is, therefore, all the more incumbent on the public to mark its appreciation of every instance which shows the possession by these men of more than the average of patience and judgment.

Sub-Inspector Shivalingappa's arrival brought about a dramatic change in the situation. He had got two Khilafat volunteers convicted for having recovered a fine of thirteen annas from a bhangi for having got drunk against the rules of his Jamat

Both the charge and the sentence of six months' imprisonment passed on those two men, strike one as gross instances of executive officiousness and of want of judicial proportion. It is quite obvious that the prosecution was not undertaken in the interests of the poor bhangi, but as a measure of official displeasure against picketting. Shivlingappa was probably only an instrument in this ridiculous affair, but as such he had incurred a good deal of popular odium. The crowd gave vent to its feelings on his approach but that it had no serious intention of doing him physical harm is clear from the fact that he found no difficulty in going through it to join the Police drawn up at the liquor-shop. On this point, the Tyabji Committee's remarks seem to us to be conclusive.

He (Shivlingappa) was able to push his way through the crowd and tell people to disperse. Had the crowd been in a mood to do any such harm as the deposition of Shivlingappa would make it appear, he could not have remained alive for a moment. The people through whom he passed would not have suffered him to pass along without giving effect to their alleged threats.

We differ from the Committee in thinking that the crowd might have uttered the threats, for the reasons given in our article last week. But we agree that the attitude of the crowd, as proved by its allowing him to pass through it, is in favour of the Committee's view. It becomes, therefore, necessary to ascertain by an independent enquiry into the circumstances whether the firing was justified, whether due warning was given before firing, and whether it was strictly limited to the necessities of the occasion.

RIGHT OF SECESSION OF THE DOMINIONS.

(BY MR. A. V. SUBRAMANIA AYYAR.)

Have the self-governing Dominions of the British Empire the right of secession from the Mother Country? Does the question, open the Mother

The Post is herde Dominion status include this right in theory? The question is a very interesting one and deserves a careful study. It is true that it is not of much practical importance so far as the existing Dominions are concerned, since they have not expressed any desire to secede. But the problem has been brought into the fore-front by the Irish negotiations. It won't do for the British statesman to fight shy of it. They must face it with courage and imagination. Some satisfactory understanding, though not a statutory decision is absolutely essential. Otherwise there is every likelihood of the solution of the Irish problem being endangered.

It will be remembered that the difficulty that stands in the way of an Irish settlement is Britain's insistence that Ireland shall always be linked to her. Mr. Lloyd George's proposals to De Valera emphasise this aspect of the matter and maintain that so far as foreign policy, navy and external defence are concerned, Britain must be supreme. The Dominion status which Mr. George has offered to Ireland is in reality a condition of subordinate alliance to Britain in all matters except those of internal administration.

Now, Mr. George's proposals, whatever the extent of freedom they may confer on Ireland regarding its internal administration do not recognise what the Irish have been fighting for, viz., the right to full Nationhood and Freedom. The British as yet are not prepared to recognise that the Irish Nation is entitled to sovereign power. Herein lies the whole crux of the Irish problem. The Irish are not prepared to be unconditionally linked to Britain as a subordinate partner of the British Empire or in other words they dispute the right of Britain to say that Ireland shall not secede from the United Kingdom. Ireland by this does not want to secede from Britain now. It is Mr. Lloyd George, who, by, insisting on Ireland's willingness to be permanently bound to Britain as a necessary condition for any settlement, has provoked the Irish National sentiment which is very intense. The South now definitely maintains that connection with the United Kingdom should not be compulsorily forced on her, but be decided by mutual agreement, the unqualified right of Ireland for which should be recognised by Britain. It is this aspect of the Irish situation that has undoubtedly brought the question into prominence.

What is the real status of the Dominions? For one thing they are not recognised sovereign powers though in practice they have almost all the authority of sovereign states. Constitutionally speaking, all the Dominions are the creatures of the British Parliament. They have to trace their status through definite Acts of the British Legislature. So the Dominion Parliaments are not bodies with an inherent right of sovereignty; they are derivative & subordinate institutions. Secondly, the right to make war or peace with other countries, which is the essential attribute of sovereignty is absent. The dominions have to adopt the foreign policy of Britain whether they like it or not and cannot on their own motion declare war or enter into alliances with any other states.

It has been said that constitutionally and theoretically the Dominions are not sovereign states. Against this position it may be urged that their power though limited by Law has grown to be almost sovereign in practice. In the constitution of the Empire there is no provision for the Dominions to glide into independence if they so desire except through an Act of the British Parliament. Regarding the second point it may also be held, that of late, the Dominions have been consulted by Britain about the foreign policy and questions relating to war and peace. As for the Imperial Conference which is said to enable the Dominions to participate in the making of the foreign policy of the Empire, it must be remembered that it is not a statutory body but only a consultative one to advise the British Cabinet. The fact that the decisions of the Imperial Conference are given the greatest weight and acted upto does not alter its status, which pertains not to the Law but to a Convention of the constitution of the Empire.

It can now clearly be seen that as things are at present the right to secede does not form part of the Dominion status. The alliance of the Dominions with the Mother Country is not in the nature of a treaty or voluntary agreement between sovereign peoples. The British Empire is a Commonwealth of autonomous peoples but not a federation of sovereign states.

What will happen if the Dominions want to secede? What can Britain do if that contingency arises? These are plain questions capable of only one answer at this hour of the day. It is open to the Dominions to declare independence and secede from the British Empire without that act being treated by Britain as an infringement of her rights. Political ideals and moral consciousness of the human race have so much advanced that any resentment on the part of Britain will incur an amount of moral obloquy of the world which it will be impossible for her with all her might to face. If on the other hand, Britain takes such an act on the part of the Dominions to be a hostile one she will be powerless to do anything effective. It is a lurking apprehension of the growing secessionist tendencies, which are, for instance found in no small measure in South Africa, that made Britain draw the Dominions closer and take them into full confidence with regard to the many vital Imperial problems of Defence and Foreign Policy. The Imperial Conference however gloriously it may be boomed, is in reality a makeshift intended to give the Dominions what they do not, now, of right, possess and to make them not to feel that they lack any attributes of sovereignty for being within the Empire.

Such makeshifts, however successful they may be for the present, cannot provide a satisfactory solution for a problem that will some day or other arise so far as the existing Dominions are concerned, though in the case of Ireland it has actually arisen. Speaking generally, there is no Nation which will not desire to be a sovereign one if it can do so. The Dominions have to merge their sovereignty in the Empire only if they have to depend upon Britain for certain advantages. Now, they are attaining a stage when they no longer require Britain's assistance. Therefore the problem is a real one that is sure to crop up at some time or other.

The best thing for Britain would be to make a satisfactory settlement of the question now since it has arisen in the case of Ireland. I have already said that when Ireland wants the right to secede it desires only a recognition of its right of sovereignty to be made thereby and not to actually secede now. This insistence of Ireland is due to the intensity of her National sentiment and there is no use in pretending to discard it.

How can the proposed settlement be effected, it may be asked, without disturbing the Imperial structure? In an exceedingly well-written article on the Irish Peace, the Nation in its issue of July 23rd writes that the Dominions also may guarantee to Ireland that the freedom she may get by accepting Dominion status will not be interfered with by Britain in whom Ireland has no faith. The writer forgets that the problem is wider and may arise even in the case of the Dominions themselves since the right to secede means the recognition, both theoretical and practical, of the unqualified sovereignty of the people. The first essential condition of a suitable settlement, therefore, is the statutory recognition and affirmation of the sovereignty of all parts of the British Empire, including even such of them as are not fully self-governing now. Once this affirmation is made by the British Parliament and acted upon there will be no difficulty in negotiating terms for an agreement on a basis of equality for an Imperial Federation that may finish and embellish the imperfect structure of the present British Empire. No part of the Empire should have any rights or privileges that are not agreed to by all. If this is done the question of the right of the Dominions to secede will lose its meaning and the Empire also will have a more stable foundation.

THE CASTE SYSTEM.

II

(By MR. T. RUTHNAM.)

Now let us examine the Western Culture with regard to which Mr. Henry S. Salt, the author of "Seventy years among Savages" says, "The seventy years spent by me among the savages form the subject of this story, but not, be it noted, seventy years of consciousness that my life was so cast, for during the first part of my residence in the strange land where I was born, the dreadful reality of my surroundings was hardly suspected by me." With regard to the above passage, The Review of Reviews says, "By most of Mr. Salt's fellow savages the "dreadful reality" of their surroundings has not been suspected at all. For the region described in his book is not Papua or Christmas Island, but Great Britain. Until he was thirty, he thought, as most of them think, that he lived in a land blessed by civilization and religion. He awoke through reflection—on diet, and from that was led on to look, with open eyes, at the other relations of the barbarians among whom he lived". With regard to war Mr. Salt does not think, that Westerners have relapsed into barbarism but that they never emerged from it. That is western culture. We have paid much importance to it but western culture like western complexion is only skin deep. Now let us compare this western culture with that of India, with regard to "killing".

Ere now I represented, how a murderer stands in the estimation of the Aryan of Europe—an untouchable reptile a villain unworthy of human association and marriage with such a person as abominable. Well, killer of animals, and flesh eaters, stood in no better estimation of the Aryan of the East, and here arose the momentous problem of placing the Brahmin on the horns of a dilemma as to how he may render himself and his people immune from the imminent contamination of the innocent blood! The continuation of the social compact hitherto existed was impossible and his separation threatened his very existence and the harmony of the community generally, and he was a philosopher indeed who devised a scheme which split the people into castes, on independent and contributory lines made the castes interdependent, rendered the split exceedingly conducive to civilisation and progress holding a divided nation in harmonious relation thus securing his own independence congenial to his philosophy. This must have occurred about 700 B.C., reaching the height of corruption during the life of Manu each caste begetting sub-castes, until it assumed a form of religion in itself as we have it today. The evidences that go to convince one's belief in the theory that caste was the result of recognizing a soul in every animal and killing of animals amounted to murder is unmistakable. The Brahmin up-to-date finds the Vaisya's (Vegetarian's) association more congenial than the Kshatria's, while the carnivorous Kshatria and Sudra, being dissociated by the first and third castes are boon companions in many respects except perhaps with regard to inter-marriages.

The touchability between the four castes is intermittent (not constant) in accordance with certain principles and rituals involving Shudi (cleanliness). To a Brahmin, the touch of a Kshatria or Sudra is more polluting than that of a Vaisya while still that of the fifth class is regarded as extreme and there is no question of untouchability between the second and the fourth. From all these one gathers that diet has more to do with caste than the vocation one follows and that Soul is the stratum on which the whole system stands.

Behind the system and the soul is the philosophy, and philosophy wants unity, with regard to which I quote Mr. Buch again "Unity, it should never be forgotten, is the very goal of philosophy.... in religion the possession of all other realms by the god-idea is the most superb possession; in philosophy the conquest by the Absolute of all other principles is the highest." Thoughts want unity, conduct wants unity, facts want unity," and I say, Society wants unity.

Ours is a land where philosophy and soul are through and through. Great souls come into existence from time to time; greater soul is the Mahatma Gandhi who is manifesting the soul, demonstrating to us and to the world at large, the power of soul at this very moment. All big souls see souls in others and every one of us should see soul in every other animal; caste must break—must inevitably break. If one must follow the Hindu philosophy one must either recognize the soul in all other animals or recognize Caste as established by the philosopher.

LONDON LEITER.

London, September 29, 1921.

THE SECOND WOMAN M. P.

During the last three years, women voters have been steadily on the increase, while men voters in England and Wales have decreased. The increase in the number of women voting shows an increased capacity for public affairs, and an increased desire on the part of women to be an understanding factor in the making of new conditions. The fact of the increase in women voters has been recently made prominent by the election of Mrs. Margaret Wintringham, the Liberal candidate at Louth. After her election, some one looked up the statistics of the polls generally and found that women in increasing numbers take their franchise seriously. Mrs. Wintringham secured a majority of 791 votes, and is the second woman M. P. in this country and the first really British one, as Lady Astor is of American birth. Both women, however, have succeeded to their husbands' seats, and both had a strong Labour candidate in the field against them. Mrs. Wintringham has been well known for years in public life, and although a fluent and experienced speaker, she refused on account of the recent loss of her husband, to enter the arena of a political electioneering campaign and did not make a single speech in favour of herself or her party. For this reason she was called the silent woman in the papers here, and her election came as a surprise to her. Louth is largely an agricultural centre, and agriculturists, male and female, cling to old established ways, sex prejudice in administrative matters being very strong with them, and it was thought that this feeling would prevent anything like success to a woman standing for election, even though she stood for what is ordinarily looked upon as a Liberal constituency. However, it has been acknowledged on all sides that no better qualified candidate could have been put forward than Mrs. Wintringham whose general administrative experience and whose knowledge of agricultural matters and the present difficulty between the Government and the Agriculturists rival that of most men. She has made herself an authority on these subjects in her part of the country.

HOSTELS FOR WORKING WOMEN.

The sub-committee in connection with the Housing Advisory Council has just laid its report before Sir Alfred Moad. In it, it lays the greatest stress on the need for women's hostels. For some time past there has been a growing demand for accommodation schemes for working women. Such organisations as the Young Women's Christian Association and the Girls' Friendly Society have done their utmost to cater for women in this respect. But their resources are limited and more and more women are in the big towns needing and demanding suitable accommodation. It is claimed by the sub-committee that Government must subsidise the building or conversion of houses suitable to accommodate about 20 women in each with the necessary domestic staff. After they are once in running order they will be self supporting, and it is in the interests of the community at large that women should be looked after in this matter.

PROBLEM OF UNEMPLOYMENT.

The Labour Mayors of London paid a visit to Scotland to see the Premier in connection with the unemployed problem which has now reached, we believe, its crisis. The case put forward by the Mayors was to the effect that the problem of unemployment was a National one and should be shouldered by the Central Government. Detailed figures were given by them of unemployment in various districts, and emphasis was laid on the great burden imposed upon the rate-payers in the poor parts of London. A number of important schemes and proposals were submitted. In his reply, Mr. Lloyd George stated that he had given his earnest consideration to the statements put forward by the Mayors but, he said, the Central Government could not shoulder the burden alone. There must be co-operation between all parties, local authorities, manufacturers, traders, bankers, and organised labour. The period allowed for the coal subsidy is drawing to a close, and some anxiety is felt as to possibilities' but it is not thought any serious trouble, such as we had a few months ago, will ensue. In Scotland, the position of the unemployed is more serious than it is in England, for Scotland has no Boards of Guardians and until a few weeks ago, the parish councils, who have hitherto had to deal with the needy, had no authority to relieve the able-bodied. There is less extreme thought among the workers in Scotland, but they, too, are now making the demand that Government shall deal with the problem of unemployment and find immediate means of relieving distress.

RESOLUTION OF THE IMPERIAL CONFERENCE.

The view that appears to be taken, in some quarters in India, regarding that feature of the resolution of the Imperial Conference which contemplates direct negotiations between the South African and Indian Governments, is in strong conflict with that held in well-informed quarters in this country. Here it is generally recognised that, in the first place, a distinct advance has been made in isolating South Africa, and in securing the moral condemnation, by Great Britain and the remaining Dominions, of the Union Parliament and people, as regards the treatment of resident Indians. Whilst, it is true, Great Britain has always in theory maintained the principle of equal citizenship for Indians, she has been compelled to diverge from the standard of equality in the case of the Dominions, with whom she could not interfere and whom she was constitutionally precluded from controlling. But latterly, as we all know, from the case of Kenya, the Imperial Government itself had apparently made itself responsible for a racial policy in those areas of the Empire over which it had direct jurisdiction. We know that the India Office, of its own initiative and under the stimulus of public opinion in India, through the Government of India, had strongly objected to and protested against this new policy, but it was quite uncertain whether, in the long run, the British Cabinet might not rather lean to the Colonial Office than to the India Office point of view. The resolution has made it clear that, in formal terms, the Milner policy has been rejected by the Cabinet, and that the only part of the Empire that cleaves to a policy of racialism is the Union of South Africa. In the second place, it is quite incorrect to say, as have done some of the critics, that the resolution enables Great Britain to shuffle out of her direct responsibility in regard to South Africa. It has to be remembered that Great Britain has no longer, and for a long time has not been able to exercise, the right to compel South Africa to accord what India very properly requires, namely equal citizenship to Indian residents in South Africa. Any attempt upon Great Britain's part to force a policy upon South Africa, in an unconstitutional manner, would result unfaillingly in the disruption of the British Empire, no matter how ethically correct her standpoint might be. The case of Lord Elgin and the Natal Government is still fresh in our memories. But what has happened is that, as General Smuts himself pointed out in his letter to Mr. De Valera, a Dominion or a country within the British Empire enjoying the de facto status of a Dominion, having a dispute with any other member of the Empire enjoying a similar status, not excepting Great Britain herself, is entitled to bring the dispute for adjudication before all the other members of the Imperial Conference, all of whom have the moral obligation of helping to solve the matter in dispute in the interests of the Empire as a whole, and without doubt, in this matter the Indian representatives have, by an act of statesmanship that ought to be better recognised than it has evidently been, succeeded in getting the Indian case before the Conference in such a manner as to secure in advance the general sympathy of every other State-member of the Conference. The fact that India and South Africa will be in direct negotiation upon the subject involves, besides a saving of time and energy, the freeing of India from the trammels that might otherwise have been put upon her freedom of negotiation by the Imperial Cabinet, thereby incidentally recognising the further advance in status that, in fact, India has now gained in the Imperial councils; and it also implies that, in the event of both Dominions' failing to arrive at a satisfactory settlement of a long standing and embittered dispute, all the other parts of the Empire are constitutionally bound to interest themselves in endeavouring to reach a solution, and that they are committed in advance to the principle embodied in the Indian point of view. How, in the face of these facts, it can be suggested that no advance has been made in the direction of solving a problem whose solution cannot reasonably be looked for in the relatively short time during which it has been seriously tackled, is a little difficult to understand. Certainly, bitter impatience, though not unnatural in the circumstances, does not help very much, and is likely to give rise to unreasonable and unjustified criticism of a damaging kind.

THE MALABAR RELIEF FUND.

RELIEF MEASURES IN BOMBAY.

A meeting of the sympathisers of the sufferers in Malabar on account of the Moplah rebellion was held Thursday evening (20th October) in the hall of the Servants of India Society, Sandhurst Road, for an informal discussion to decide the line of action to be taken so far as the work in Bombay and outside was concerned, and to appoint a provisional committee for arranging the details of the programme for carrying out this object. Sir Jamsetji called upon Mr. Devadhar to make a statement with reference to his visit to Malabar.

Mr. Devadhar in explaining the object of the meeting thanked them for the ready and prompt response to his invitation only issued the day before and tendered his apology for it. He was helpless but his friends advised him in calling the meeting even at twenty-four hours' notice. He thought there were many who sympathised with the object of their meeting although they were absent. He did not desire to give them details of what had happened in Malabar, but they must have known the sufferings of both the rich and the poor. Some of them, he said, must have been affected by the harrowing stories of sufferings published in the newspapers, and he did not want, on that occasion, to sadden their minds by giving them any more. He went on to describe how he was asked by his Society to visit Malabar and find out the extent of the distress and the relief to be given to the sufferers, and how his proposals for such relief were acceptable to the committee there. The object, therefore, of the meeting was to appeal to them and through them to the public of Bombay as also all over the Presidency, to enlist their whole-hearted support of the committee to be appointed, as it was necessary to have gratuitous work done in Bombay which was the central place. The committee would have nothing to do with the causes that led to the sufferings, but would have to carry out the work thoroughly in uncontroversial manner for which it was directly responsible and to give relief to the sufferers as it was the need of the hour. He had estimated rupees ten lakhs for gratuitous relief, but that was not only to be raised in Bombay, for he would appeal to the country for it is the name of humanity. He then said that the population of the whole district was three millions, out of which two millions were Hindus and one million Mahomedans (Moplahs) and one-third of the area was affected and the relief was necessary for at least six months, before peace and order could be restored. He then described the work the committee would have to do.

THE RESOLUTIONS.

The following resolutions were carried :—

Resolved that in view of the distressed situation at present prevailing in Malabar as described by Mr. Devadhar, a Provisional Committee of the following ladies and gentlemen with power to add to their number, having sympathy with the objects of the meeting, be formed in Bombay to undertake the work of (a) collecting subscriptions and other suitable help such as rice, cloth, oil, medicines, foods for children, etc., etc., in Bombay, (b) organizing sub-committees in different wards in different bazars and markets of the city of Bombay to secure the above-mentioned help for the relief of the sufferers from the present Moplah rebellion in Malabar; (c) sending the assistance in cash and in kind thus collected to the Malabar Central Relief Committee in Calicut; (d) taking all such measures as may be deemed necessary to promote and carry out the objects for which the Committee is appointed; (e) arranging public meetings; (f) organizing, with the help of local friends, district collection committees in the various districts and Native States connected with the Bombay Presidency, including Sind, co-ordinating their efforts with those of the Bombay Committee and to pool together these various funds thus started in the districts and the Native States with the Bombay fund; and the Bombay Committee to supply them with all necessary help by way of literature on the subjects, posters and such other help and information as may be necessary in the interests of this work (all those who were present at the meeting were requested to be members of this provisional committee).

ROYAL YAKUTI.

THE YAKUTI or life giving nectar has been prepared from
the best, choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has wonderful properties of increasing virile power and it rectifies urinary disorders. In fact it makes man a man. This valuable
medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and
gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to those persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen
the body, refresh the memory and to guard against debility.
Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicines. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires, it is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills. Rupees ten only.

NOTES.

Malabar Relief: We earnestly hope that it will be found possible to co-ordinate the movements to carry relief to the distressed and suffering people of the areas in Malabar affected by the Mopla rebellion. The first and last object of every such movement should be to relieve suffering of the existence of which there is unfortunately no doubt. The utmost that combined official and private efforts can do, can but partly alleviate the miseries and hardships which the people there have undergone and are undergoing. There is need of the utmost economy in organising relief measures in order that they may be of the greatest benefit to the largest number of sufferers. This can only be ensured by strict co-ordination of and co-operation between the several relief movements. Want of co-ordination will inevitably lead to waste, and worse than that, to demoralisation. We have not the least doubt that the promoters of every one of them are actuated by the very best of motives and are anxious to do their utmost for the afflicted people. Let us all put aside our political predilections in one grand effort to enable the fair land of Malabar to regain in the shortest time possible her normal prosperity. We do not mean that we should give up our political opinions. Far from it. There are other platforms and occasions where they can have full scope. We are bound to say while on this subject that nothing can be farther from the truth than to say, as has been done, that Mr. Devadhar's scheme has left the sufferers among Moplas out of account. On the contrary, Mr. Devdhar has given a prominent place in it to the relief of Mopla women and children deprived of their natural protectors. We may add that any relief scheme which leaves the Mopla sufferers out of account will not be worth the paper on which it is written. Not only that, but it is absolutely necessary that we should look ahead and provide for the easy resumption of their normal industrious life by those sentenced to imprisonment on their return. Whatever the immediate sins of the Moplas may be, society as a whole cannot be absolved for keeping them in a state of backwardness in which they became ready victims to a fanatical impulse. No sensible person would wish to see the Mopla-Hindu feud perpetuated, and the only way in which it can be effaced, is by making the misguided section of the Moplas feel that, while aggressive fanaticism will not be tolerated, there is the most anxious desire on the part of all that no stone should be left unturned to smooth their path to progress and prosperity. At the same time, is it not rather ridiculous to make out that the greatest sufferers by the rebellion are the Moplas and that the relief of the despoiled non-Moplas is a secondary matter?

Moral and Social Hygiene: We invite attention to the letter which we print to-day from the Association of Moral and Social Hygiene, which is the British branch of the International Abolitionist Federation founded by Mrs. Josephine Butler in 1875. The report of the Society for last year, which accompanies the letter, is a valuable summary of the work done by it last year and the Society's programme. The Society is doing valuable work. The problems with which it is concerned are problems which have become acute in Bombay, as Mr. Kanji Dwarkadas' able speech at the Poona session of the Legislative Council clearly shows. What is true of Bombay is more or less true of other places. The careful investigations and reports of the Society have made accessible to reformers much valuable material without which there is very great risk in dealing with these problems that any remedies suggested may prove worse than the disease to be cured. To take one instance. We have had with us for some weeks past a booklet by Professor R. D. Karve (late of the Gujarat College) explaining and advocating the extensive use of appliances to prevent venereal infection. The Professor justifies his taking up a subject which does not lie in his sphere of Mathematics on the ground that the books in which such information is given are far too costly for the average reader. He foresees that he will be accused of preaching immorality, but he contends that his notion of morality is that it is best to take no chances where the danger is great especially to other people. As against this view, it is interesting to note that seven eminent medical members of the Special Committee on Venereal Disease, of the British Birth-rate Commission, declared, not only on moral grounds, but on definitely medical grounds that the public advocacy of self-disinfection for the civilian population would fail to arrest and might increase the prevalence of venereal disease. We note from an advertisement in Mr. Karve's book that there is an agency in Bombay which makes a speciality of all articles mentioned in it.

The Dominion Status: General Smuts' remarks on the representation of the Dominions at the Washington Conference, emphasises the vital change that has been made in the status and meaning of Dominion self-Government following on the war. Reuter reports that General Smuts in a speech at Pretoria, referring to the composition of the Empire Delegation to Washington, said that he gathered from the Press that the Dominions had not been invited to the Conference. He added that if the Pacific Dominions attended without a direct invitation from America being sent through the British diplomatic channels, a serious setback would be given to the status of Dominion nationhood achieved at the Paris Conference where the United States alone remained outside the general recognition of the status of the Dominions. If South Africa appeared at the International Conference it would be in her own right and not by cover of the International right of the British Government.

What has happened seems to be that, when Australia declared she would send her delegates direct to Washington, the British Government offered to include the Australian delegates among her own, and thus warded off the raising of the issue which General Smuts raises. His reference to Dominion Nationhood achieved at the Paris Conference, deserves to be pondered over by publicists who preach that India has no future as a component of the British Commonwealth.

India and the Washington Conference: We are glad that India will be represented at the Washington Conference by the Right Hon. Srinivasa Sastry. To discuss the Pacific question (and disarmament) without India being represented at the Conference, would have been an anomaly. India's place will be by the side of Japan as regards the colour question, and we trust that the attitude of the British Dominions especially Australia, will be such as to make it compatible with Indian national self-respect to support it.

The Casting Vote. On what principle should the President of a Legislative assembly give his casting vote in the case of an equality of votes for and against a proposition? We have read of a Speaker of the House of Commons, who confronted by such a situation, got so unnerved that he got up, fumbled for words and sat down without saying anything. In the last session of the Legislative Assembly at Simla there was a tie between two candidates for the Deputy Presidentship. Mr. Whyte gave his vote in favour of Sir Jamsetjee Jejeebhoy. We do not know if he had before him any general principle in doing so, but if he had one, it might well have been that of the two candidates, Sir Jamsetjee and Dr. Gour, the position of Sir Jamsetjee in public life stands more clear of political controversy. In regard to resolutions relating to public questions as apart from persons, the President of the Bombay Legislative Council has had to give his casting vote twice, and on both occasions he followed the practice of the Speaker of the House of Commons of giving his vote so as to enable the House to have another opportunity of deciding the question for itself rather than take into his own hands the final decision and settlement of the question. On the last occasion, there was an equality of votes on Rao Bahadur Chitale's motion for a committee on the separation of Judicial and Executive functions, and Sir Narayan Chandavarkar before giving his casting vote obtained an assurance from the Government member that he would make a statement to the Council on the subject next session. This principle was endorsed by the Presidents' conference at Simla last month. The President's casting vote will be given (a) so as to ensure further discussion of the subject at a future date and (b) as the guardian of the status quo. The President of the Legislative Assembly who presided, explained that the principle was that a proposal to change existing conditions had not received sufficient support of public opinion, if the support of only one-half of the members in the Council could be secured for it.

Oudh Talukdars and Liberals: The Liberals of the United Provinces and Oudh have risen greatly in public estimation by the resolution passed recently by a meeting of Zemindars of Oudh, denouncing the alliance between them and the Liberals on account of the opposition offered by the latter in and outside the Legislative Council to the Oudh Rent Bill. The position of tenants in Oudh is perhaps the worst in all India. Prior to 1886, they were entirely at the mercy of the landlords who "freely used their powers of ejection," but in that year an Act was passed which prohibited the enhancement of rent more than once in seven years! The late Mr. G. V. Joshi in an informing paper, which is printed in his collected writings, rightly described this as a very near approach to the cottier system of Ireland and its moral paralysis. No legislation which does not remedy this state of things can command the support of thinking Indians. The Liberal members of the Legislative Council are prepared to go far to find a compromise, but the Talukdars are obdurate, and Sir Harcourt Butler would seem to have given an undertaking to them that no improvement would be made in the status of their tenants unless it had their approval! His Excellency must have had his reasons, probably political, for giving such a preposterous undertaking, but the country cannot allow a Governor to bargain away the elementary rights of the cultivators for any consideration whatever. We congratulate the United Provinces Liberals on the plucky fight they are putting up against the extraordinary attitude of the "Talukdar of Oudh," to use Lord Chemsford's shrewd and significant epithet, who is at the head of the administration. It will be an evil day for the British Connection with India when it espouses the cause of the wealthy and powerful to perpetuate the serfdom of the cultivating classes who, after all, are the mainstay of the country which can get on without Talukdars, but not without cultivators.

Non-Co-operation its own Antidote: Any one who gives a little thought to the subject must realise that, given sufficient time, Non-Co-operation must destroy itself. The first phase of this self-destructive quality has declared itself in a majority of members of the Working Committee resolving to non-co-operate with their own President for the year, Mr. Vijaya Raghav Acharya. The same process will be gone through with Mr. Acharya's successors and ultimately with Mahatma Gandhi himself. Mr. Vijaya Raghava's fault is that he insists on taking the paper constitution of the Congress as a binding statute, while the dominant party in the movement regards it as having a binding force only when it suits its purpose that it should. Unfortunately, Mr. Acharya is too old to begin to learn the art of drafting grandiose constitutions, on paper, and following in practice the good old rule, the simple plan, of the exigency of the moment. The venerable and nominal President can use his time better than by citing Blackstone to his recalcitrant colleagues. We have had recently the Gita solemnly cited as endorsing the charaka cult, and in a battle of quotations, Mr. Acharya cannot achieve anything so remarkable. The fact is when you are sure of your audience you can say anything that comes uppermost to your lips or pen without fear of contradiction. Pandit Motilal Nehru sweeps aside Mr. Acharya's authorities with the remark that the Congress is a law unto itself, which being interpreted means that whatever the Pandit says is law unto the Congress for the time being. When a publicist has worked himself up to this state of mind, it is idle to argue with him, and he must be left to the operation of the law of Non-Co-operation which ordains that those who rise by it shall fall by it. One of these days, it will be ordered that those who wear more than a loin-cloth are not fit to hold office in the Congress hierarchy, and those who now exult over Mr. Acharya's ineffectual constitutionalism, will have to mourn their conventional adherence to clothes beyond the allotted minimum.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, OCTOBER 30, 1921.

BIRTH CONTROL.

In one of his recent letters our London correspondent, a close student of social movements all over the world, recorded the starting in London of the "Society for Constructive Birth Control and Racial Progress" under the auspices of several noted sociologists. He remarked on the coincidence of this movement in England with the establishment of a similar Society in Japan, known shortly as the Birth Control League. The September number of the Birth Control Review, the American organ of the movement, contains the announcement that an International Birth Control Conference is to be held at Geneva in October next year. A list of sixteen countries, in which there are organizations for promoting this movement, is given, and they include all European countries except Russia, Turkey, Greece and the Balkan states. It is obvious that the movement has received a great impetus as a result of the war. Though the Governments of the countries whose adult male population has been depleted by the war, are making strenuous efforts to make good the loss by offering every incentive to parenthood, the people themselves, and more especially women everywhere, are not responding to them with any enthusiasm. In fact, in Germany the women's protest against having to bear children to be killed in war or broken in factories, has taken an organized form as a strike of motherhood. What is more, advanced social thinkers urge that unrestricted multiplication of population is the main cause of war and predatory internationalism. In the same number of the Birth Control Review, Baroness Ishimoto, the founder of the Japanese Society, places in the forefront of her reasons for espousing the movement, the international menace which unrestricted increase of population involves. She writes:

But what was the real cause of this great war? It was neither the ambition of the Kaiser, nor the skillful diplomatic aim of Great Britain to dominate the world. It was the mutual economic oppression of the peoples of Central Europe. They had simply grown into a mutual menace by the uncontrolled increase of population. Within the last fifty years, more than 100,000,000 people were added to Germany, Austria, Russia, and the other countries of Central Europe. Every one who visits Europe can understand that if Columbus had not discovered America, the great war of 1914 would have occurred 200 years previously—in the seventeenth century, by reason of the unlimited increase of population without the possibility of emigration to the new world. Really the discovery of America played the most important part in solving many of the disastrous problems arising out of the unlimited increase of population.

Another reason which the Baroness gives is that the modern capitalist and industrial system can not be essentially improved so long as population increases without limit. The last reason she gives is that the full development of women, through which only finer children are possible, is obstructed by unlimited child-bearing. In Japan to-day, she says, women spend their time mostly in pregnancy, in delivering children, and in incessant household cares. They do not get time for self-culture. They often break down in health. Week after week, the Birth Control Review publishes "Mothers' Letters" pathetically depicting this aspect of the question. Here is a typical one:

I am a frail little woman of 104 lbs., have three children, youngest 14 months. I am 26 years of age and was badly lacerated at birth of last baby. My husband is a good man and kind to me; is 10 years older and I realize that he will never make any more wages than he makes now. We can only struggle to try to raise and educate the children we have, it would be a tragedy to have more.

The movement to control births by contraceptive means is known as the Neo-Malthusian movement, though the discoverer of the so-called law of population, a pious clergyman, would have been horrified if he had known that his discovery would lead to it. The difference between it and orthodox Malthusian doctrine, is that while the latter advocated as means of restricting births late marriages and "moral restraint", the former, as the more practicable alternative, advocated early marriage and limited parenthood "by means of the deliberate and scientific prevention of conception." Malthus' law rests on the "constant tendency in all animated life to increase beyond the nourishment prepared for it." This tendency and the "law of population" which he built upon it, have been attacked from a purely scientific stand-point in "The Law of Births and Deaths" by Mr. C. E. Pell, recently published by Mr. Fisher Unwin. It follows that Mr. Pell does not approve of the Neo-Malthusian school. His conclusion seems to be that the birth-rate for whole communities cannot be increased or decreased by artificial means, that it depends mainly upon environment, and that the real fault lies in the unsound economic basis of Society. He writes:

So long as Society is run upon the principle of every man for himself and the devil take the hindmost, so long will the principle manifest itself in the problem of the birth-rate. Whether the decline be due to contraceptives or to natural causes, it will be equally useless to exhort the abler sections of the community to produce a number of children adequate to maintain the numbers of the population unless there is some economic guarantee that they shall not be hopelessly penalised in the race thereby, and if they should break down in the struggle, be left to starve in the gutter.

The movement to limit the birth-rate has not been without influence in India. Plague and famine are among the positive checks to population in Malthus' doctrine, and these and others scarcely less efficacious in killing off human beings, have been in full operation in this country since practically the beginning of this century. Malthus' prudential or preventive checks were summed up in late marriages and "moral restraint." The spread of social reform ideas and other causes have led to a slight increase in the marriage age, but owing to the illiteracy of the masses, the caste system and the difficulty of passing and enforcing social legislation, the evil of too early marriages and excessive birth and death rates, with their inevitable consequences in the stunting of women's life and health and intelligence, has not been appreciably reduced. The need for restricting births in India is felt as a necessity by many from different points of view. Mr. Wattal, of the Indian Finance Department, now a member of the Bikaner Council, wrote some years ago a pamphlet in which he advocated the diffusion of a knowledge of contraceptive methods as a solution of the social and economic problem. Mahatma Gandhi's attention has also been directed to it from another stand-point. He is opposed to contraceptive methods as immoral, and his own solution is stated thus in his "Guide to Health," translated into English from the Hindi original, by Mr. A. Rama Ayer and published by Mr. S. Ganesan, Triplicane, Madras. He writes :

The law of nature is that Brahmacharya may be broken only when the husband and wife feel a strong desire for a child. Those who, remembering this law, violate Brahmacharya once in four or five years, cannot be said to be slaves to lust, nor can they appreciably lose their stock of vitality. We are as yet free from this sin (the use of contraceptives) but we do not shrink from imposing the heavy burden of maternity on our women, and we are not concerned even to find that our children are weak, impotent and imbecile. We sing hymns of praise and thanksgiving to God when a child is born of a boy-father and girl-mother! Could anything be more dreadful? Verily we are, in this respect, far worse even than the lower animals; for the bull and the cow are brought together solely with the object of having a calf.

We do not know that the bull and the cow come together solely from the conscious desire for a calf, and unless they do so there does not seem to be much point in the comparison. The bull at any rate seems to have no notion of limiting his progeny and many of them have no other occupation until they become unfit for it. Further, it is rather a perilous undertaking to seek for a solution of our social problems in the ways of the animal world. The sexual relation undoubtedly connotes a far deeper and more intimate relation between cultured men and women than among cattle. It is or ought to be essentially a spiritual relation. Even in the Mahabharat, there are instances of women's instincts revolting against the practice of becoming bearers of children for their deceased husbands by any shaggy and scraggy Rishi selected by their mothers-in-law for his piety and holiness. The institution of marriage, as we understand it, is obviously impossible in a society where the relations between men and women are regulated on the habits of the bull and the cow. The Mahatma's idea of Brahmacharya is not the whole of the ancient Hindu idea. It means absolute celibacy only in the case of unmarried persons and widows. For married couples, it means continence in marriage. The Mahatma is right when he thinks that many of us treat the marriage relation as if it were legitimised debauchery. But his recipe of 'once in a quinquennium', like some of his other recipes for national salvation, is impracticable, and even if it were practicable, it would be harmful. By comparison, total prohibition would be less difficult of realisation. To regard the sexual relation as essentially sinful and then to license it as occasionally permissible, is the wrong way to approach the problem. The right way is to regard it as the consummation of a spiritual relation to be kept undefiled by any thought of self-indulgence. Wherever this is the case, every birth will be a pledge of felicity.

REFLECTIONS ON THE POLITICAL SITUATION.

A valued friend writes :—

In spite of the differences and occasional mutual recriminations between representatives of the Moderate and the Non-Co-operation parties, I do not despair of a settlement, provided an earnest effort is made. The distance between the two camps does not seem to be so great as it is generally made out to be, considering only the demands of the two parties. In respect of the methods for the attainment of their respective objects, they, doubtless, differ by the whole diameter of being. But a method after all is a subsidiary consideration—the attainment of the object is the whole thing. It is only because the older method has not met with success, commensurate with the amount of labour, hard strenuous work and time put into it, that some people feel driven to the other methods. While the demand of the Non-Co-operators is Immediate Dominion status, the speeches of the Moderate leaders and the resolutions adopted at the Liberal Conference show unmistakeably that the Moderates would not be satisfied with less than immediate grant of full provincial autonomy, combined with diarchy in the central Government; full Dominion status (minus control of an imperial army and foreign relation) being at the same time guaranteed within a definite period of three to five years. Mrs. Annie Besant goes a long step farther and says that, even with the present Reforms Act full Dominion Home Rule can be secured at once by some voluntary readjustments. She clearly points out that if Indians were well advised they would agree to such readjustments and secure full Dominion status. How this is to be done, she does not take the trouble to explain and I for one do not share her delectable optimism. But the fact I wish to emphasise is that of her opinion that India deserves the grant of immediate Home Rule of the type of the Dominions of Canada etc. As you know, Rai Bahadur, J. N. Mozamdar has already given notice of a resolution which he wishes to move in the Legislative Assembly asking for immediate Provincial Autonomy, diarchy in the Central Government within two years and full Dominion status within eight years.

Now, if the Liberals would press their demands a little more earnestly than they have done, if they would make it clear to the Government that delay in the satisfaction of their demands would mean (as it certainly would) loss of their position as advocates of popular rights I am sure the Government would see more clearly than they do at present the imperative necessity of conciliating public opinion and coming to a settlement agreeable to all parties. It is simply because the Government does not take the Moderates' demands seriously enough that they do not seem to realise the gravity of the situation.

The Non-Co-operation movement may succeed or it may fail, but the Government will have lost the game in either case. This is one of those cases where failure will be worse both for the Government and the people than success. But the best thing will undoubtedly be restoration of the old conditions of mutual good will, trust and regard between the British Government on the one hand and the Indian people on the other. This can only be assured by one large, courageous act of generous statesmanship on the part of the Government. Delay in meeting the public demands, or making concessions in dribblets will alike fail in their object of conciliations and future hearty co-operation of the people in the administration of the country as a willing and grateful member of the British Empire.

I appeal to you as an old friend and a leading exponent of advanced liberal views, to use your great influence in bringing about a settlement. Small beginnings should not be ignored by statesmen. I can clearly discern some thought-ripples which indifference should not allow to coalesce into big waves. Ideas are, as you know, the hardest things to kill. The only way to set them at rest is to remove the cause and source of them. The people's faith in British justice and the theory of "trusteeship" has been rudely shaken by recent events to which the U. P. Liberals have referred in as strong and sincere words as any Nationalist has done. The King-Emperor has recognised Swaraj within the Empire as the legitimate political goal of India. Let it come with the grace of gift and not as a result of a violent or a non-violent agitation. This is not too much to ask or expect of a nation that gave self-government to South Africa. But the depressing thought comes: the same nation has made inglorious blunders and perpetrated grievous wrongs nearer home. I clearly remember some Irish leaders hipping at an Irish Republic in 1880 or 1881 soon after the failure of the first Home Rule Bill. It was a very mild thought at the time, just as some of our politicians are today speaking of Swaraj with British connection, if possible; without it, if necessary. It is a suicidal thought, I admit; but there it is a part of the tremendous "psychological revolution" which has of late taken place in India.

My hope lies in the fact that all Nationalists regardless of parties or politics are demanding Swaraj with a united voice—the only difference between the two parties being as to the length of the time within which it is to be attained. The Moderates no longer want this time limit to be either long or indefinite. They have clearly defined their position, viz that while they ask for immediate Provincial Autonomy they would not be satisfied with less than a promise of full Swaraj within three to five years, with reservation in respect of an imperial as distinguished from a provincial army, and foreign relations including relations with Native States.

Is settlement so very difficult? What are the Moderates going to do if the Government does not listen to their supplications? We know what has been the fate of all our Congress resolutions and petitions for 35 years. Are the Moderates going to wait indefinitely? Or, are they prepared to tell the Government: "give us what we have been pressing for otherwise our position would be so weakened that our support would not be worth much to you". To my mind this is the acid test of the earnestness of the Moderates' demands; as also of the sincerity of the Government in trying to rally the Moderates round them. A frank and courageous front on their part may possibly save the situation and may even win some adherents from the ranks of the N. C. O. to their side. The difference between the demands of the Moderates and the N. C. O.'s is, in some ways, so small, that the Government might agree to an intermediate settlement in order to avoid the continuance of widespread agitation which is obviously not good for the prestige of England as "possessor" of India. At the same time, it will save India much misery and suffering which will not leave a more readily effaceable impress on the souls of the sufferers and their children and their children's children because the misery and suffering were of their own seeking and borne with patience and eyes cheerfulness.

I am sorry, I have made this letter so inordinately long. Do kindly pardon me for the length and for the substance of the letter if you do not agree with me. I know, you will do whatever you can to ease the tension of the existing political situation. How much do we miss the sage counsel of a man like Ranade or even Gokhale at the present time. The only way to disarm the N. C. O. is to pacify the Moderates by granting their demands, and if the Government is prepared to grant their demands they might as well climb down one further short step and arrive at some sort of settlement which might pacify the Non-Co-operators as well. The solution of the situation thus lies in a sense in the hands of the Moderates. If they do not press their demands at the present time or are satisfied by promises, the public will have just cause to blame them for temporising. You know, as well as I do, what certain high administrators in India, not excluding Viceroys have thought of such sacred document as the Queen's Proclamation which India has regarded through continued disappointments as the Magna Charta of her liberties. Only the other day, a leading English publicist pleaded that Mr. Lloyd George's declaration of Self-Determination and his pledges to Islam were only "opportunist cries". Can such writers increase our respect for England?

THE LINGUA FRANCA OF INDIA.

(By MR. S. V. PHADNIS.)

Without at least the partial solution of what may be called the problem of National education, it is idle to hope to realise the ideal of National Freedom. Hence I purpose here to discuss in brief the problem of National Education. Reserving other items of the problem to another occasion, I shall in the present article devote my remarks to the medium of Education, the language of national intercourse. Two different solutions have been suggested by two different schools of thought. The predominantly emotional school advocates Hindustani; while the rational school goes in for English. All things considered, I endorse the latter solution as being more scientific and less disadvantageous.

In the first place, I am alive to the supreme truth that full attention must be paid to the various Indian languages, and secondly, that rapid development is only achieved by teaching the different subjects in the mother-tongue of the student concerned. I agree, in toto with a large section of Indian nationalists and educationists in increasing vernacular degrees as hall marks of learning. I am perfectly certain that our Tukarams, Kabirs, and Tulshidasas will alone help us to preserve the cream of our oriental culture, tradition, and civilization. It must be borne, however, in mind that mere preservation, renovation, and revival of what belonged to ancient India is not sufficient for us to subsist on as a nation in the modern world. The world is increasingly getting more compact every day and there is no need—as some persons make out, for emphasizing the antithesis between Asia and Europe as separate and distinct entities. These antitheses are only apparent; they must fuse into a workable synthesis. I hold that the only conceivably rational and practical ideal for the speedy regeneration of India would be some sort of healthy fusion between East and West. The present day sons of India are called upon, let us believe, to serve their motherland in a twofold manner, firstly, by learning the message of the West themselves and secondly, by giving their message to the West. English, therefore, should be taught as a living language is taught; and when thus taught, it can be learnt quickly and better than it is now.

Our solution, thus, amounts to a double solution, in conformity with the twofold character of our Nation-making. Firstly, an immense impetus has to be given to the study and cultivation of the different Indian languages in their respective provinces; secondly, we do hold, notwithstanding anything said to the contrary, that universal development of English is necessary to enable India to play her role properly in the near future.

The great Mahatmaji and his school, however, do take exception to the latter part of our thesis on the ground of "infatuation and enslaved mentality". I on my part, do not think that this objection is in any way valid, unless—it is meant to subserve temporarily the ends of the agitation that is going on. The non-Co-operation agitation has a psychosis behind it and with reference to its psychosis, I confess, the objection is justifiable. I cannot conceive of any justification in reality other than the one I have set forth. If English is Swarajya-retarding and conduces to enslaved mentality, may I put it to pro-Hindi people as to how they can consistently insist upon the English-educated community (e.g. lawyers and undergraduates of the Indian University) to join the N. C. O. movement and lead the masses quite innocent of English? Can the enslaved and the infatuated lead the unenslaved?

Further, I claim that if English has not done anything else, it has at least engendered, what we call, the national self-consciousness and awakening.

To assert the claims of English as the common national language of India is neither enslavement nor infatuation but a veritable working of the principle of giving the devil its due. Next the intensification of the nationalisation as is seen in an all-round growth of the vernaculars of India, would not have been possible without the spread of English. I am strong in this belief and hence I request our pro-Hindi friends to study the growth of any vernacular literature after the introduction of the English language. The solution of the language problem must neither be swayed by an "a priori" politics nor by narrow patriotism. It must be co-ordinated and harmonised with the actual political condition obtained in the country and her educational problem. Even from a purely political reason, the English language will serve, as has been the case in the past, far more effectively a weapon against our political opponents and against the drawbacks of European culture than poor Hindustani.

At this stage, I have to sound a word of caution. I do not entertain the slightest idea, however, of making English an eternal lingua franca of our country. Far from that, what I am emphasizing is only that no language of India, at the present stage of its growth, is competent to play the role of the lingua franca without detriment to the nationmaking of India. To conceive to-day of any Indian language as lingua franca is, from my point of view, merely utopian. Hence, leaving this question alone, many patriots as the late Lok. Tilak did direct their attention to a less controversial point of having a common script for the languages of India.

Before I conclude, I owe it to the public to say a few words on what I consider to be the place of Hindustani. In the near place, I fully appreciate its esperanto character among the Indian languages, barring the Dravidian stock. As such it has been very widely used by travellers, pilgrims, naturalized Anglo-Indians and others. The inter-provincial message-agitator may equally find it useful. In view of these reasons, among others, we regard Hindustani as an auxiliary national language in this period of transition.

The Bombay Municipal Corporation and the Prince's Visit: We made a mistake last week in stating that Government have rectified the omission to include the President of the Bombay Municipal Corporation among the high officials to receive the Prince of Wales on landing. The omission and rectification were on the occasion of the Duke of Connaught's visit. The omission will, we are sure, not be repeated and there will be no need to rectify it thereafter.

Misdirected Protest: The public meeting to give expression to the feeling against some of the features and methods of the Bombay Development Department held on the 22nd instant, passed three resolutions. The first insisted on the handing over of the Department to a Minister instead of being, as at present, administered by a Member of the Executive Council. There can be no doubt that the Reform scheme makes Development a transferred subject, and there is actually a Minister for Development in Madras. In our first article on the scheme, we called attention to this Bombay anomaly. While adhering to this view, we are not able, from such experience as we have since had of the working diarchy in this Presidency, to support an attack on the Department on this issue. The second resolution related to the constitution and functions of the Advisory Committee. It was, in fact, inconsistent with the first resolution because the Committee was avowedly intended as a special provision to make up for its not being placed under a Minister. We think that this object is not fulfilled by the present Committee which does not advise the Member in charge but only the departmental head, Sir Lawless Hepper. The third resolution passed by the meeting advocated the wholesale adoption of the provisions of the Town-Planning Act instead of those of the Land Acquisition Act. This resolution stamps the proceedings as not inspired by consideration for the masses. The delays of acquisition after notification, and of payment of compensation after acquisition, under the latter Act, are serious grievances, and ought to be promptly put an end to. But the provisions of the Town-Planning Act, besides involving most of the inconveniences of Land Acquisition, often operate to victimise the poor holder in favour of the sowcar. Under the Land Acquisition Act, the small holder gets the value of his property with an additional percentage for the compulsory acquisition, while under the Town-Planning Act, he may lose half and the best half of his house or holding, and may be further called upon to pay part of the enhanced value of the other half or to sell it on disadvantageous terms to the nearest land-grabber with ready cash.

Bombay Boy Scouts Fund. The Director of Information sends us a list of subscribers and subscriptions to the Bombay Boy Scouts' Fund. The total sum up to the 24th instant, was Rs. 50,706-3-0.

Dharwar Riot Case. We called attention last week to the distribution of casualties during the firing on the crowd by the Police at Dharwar on the first of July; as an index of the composition of the crowd. Of 39 wounded, 3 were Brahmins, 18 Mahomedans and 18 non-Brahmin Hindus including 8 Lingayats. Besides these, there were 3 Mahomedans killed. The contrast between these proportions and those of the men accused of being present in and partaking in the offences of the crowd, is noteworthy. There were 29 accused of whom 15 were Brahmins, 13 Mahomedans and 1 non-Brahmin. The Brahmins, according to this distribution, would seem to have taken the largest part in making the disturbance. How is it then that only 3 of them were among the wounded, while no less than 18 non-Brahmins suffered on account of the offence of a single casual non-Brahmin in the crowd? As we said last week, there can be no doubt that those who were wounded were present in the crowd, and unless the Police directed their fire at the most innocent point of the crowd, it is not easy to account for the vast difference between the numbers wounded and accused of Brahmins and non-Brahmins. Prima facie, the wounded men were all guilty of the offences charged against the unwounded, and yet only 2 of the wounded were among the accused. Were they not put on their trial as the wounds they received were deemed sufficient punishment for their offence? In that case, why should the same consideration not have been extended also to the two who were accused?

IN THE DARK NIGHT OF THE SOUL.

(By MEREDITH STARR.)

We wander in a land accurst,
To us more desolate than death;
And only thou canst quench our thirst,
Lord of the life that quickeneth.

Speak Thou, and in this desert land
The rose will blossom, and the spring
Gush forth; the sad forsaken sand
With the sweet tramp of angels' ring.

Speak Thou, and all our grief is past,
And all our hearts, reviving, sing,
O Spirit of the Eternal Vast,
And Promise of the Eternal Spring!

THE STATE AND THE SOCIAL EVIL

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In sending you our annual report of the Association for Moral and Social Hygiene, for 1920-21, we would ask you to read carefully pages 7 to 37, bearing in mind that to do the work so briefly outlined in these pages necessitated sending out nearly 15,000 letters, many of which were individual letters involving considerable research.

We are glad to record two gains not mentioned in the report, (1) the passage into law of an Act for the suppression of brothels in Burma which will abolish the great segregated vice area in Rangoon, and (2) the placing out of bounds to British soldiers, from August 1st, the recognised brothels in Egypt.

With deep disappointment and no little indignation we have to record a defeat by the deliberate wrecking of the Criminal Law Amendment Bill after it had passed its third reading in both Houses of Parliament. A considerable part of the last four years' work has been devoted to amendment of the Criminal Law, and we now propose to demand that the Government shall itself introduce and be responsible for the next Criminal Law Amendment Bill through all its stages.

In addition to promoting a new Criminal Law Amendment Bill, the Association has for its immediate programme three main pieces of work, and for these it would beg your most generous financial assistance—

The Association's campaign against Venereal Prophylaxis i.e. the teaching, at public expense, of self-disinfection after exposure. (See Report, pages 12-17).

The campaign for the abolition of regulated prostitution within the British Empire, and to obtain a better moral and social environment for His Majesty's Forces. (See Report, pages 20-24).

Abolition of the existing Solicitation Laws and the substitution for them of a law equally applicable to all persons who molest others in public places. (See Report, page 10).

A number of our supporters subscribed last year to the "British Empire Campaign." This campaign has necessarily forced upon us the need for giving sympathetic consideration to the rightful human needs of the men in the Services, and we hope and believe that one result of pressing for a better moral environment for our soldiers will be an improvement in the material conditions of their lives, and an increased sense of responsibility for their welfare among British people both at home and abroad.

We tender our sincere thanks to all those friends who have helped this work in the past, and trust that they will continue and, if possible, increase their support, and that new friends will be interested in our Report and come forward to help.

Yours faithfully,

THOMAS B. FRANKS, Hon. Treasurer.

CHARLES J. TABBING, Chairman.

P.S.—The issue of this Report and postage have cost the Association six pence a copy. We should welcome even that six pence from those who receive a copy.

SALVATION ARMY RESCUE WORK IN BOMBAY.

(By BRIGADIER DAYASAGAR.)

I remember the Salvation Army Rescue Home as a properly established Institution so far back as 25 years ago, but do not remember how long it had been in existence before that time.

All this time a steady work has been in progress with good results although our efforts have been hampered through want of funds and suitable premises.

Seeing the Salvation Army has for so long a time been paying for the upkeep of this work from its general funds, I think it now merits the help of the people of this City to enable it to carry on the work on a larger scale and more efficient manner.

The pamphlet issued by the Bombay Purity Committee should be sufficient to convince any fair minded person of the need of such an institution and I consider the figures given as understated.

Were it a case of physical leprosy spreading in this city to the same extent would not every doctor of ability be called upon to combat the disease? Who would be so wanting in humanity as to ignore his utility because they disagreed with his religion or had a dislike for his caste?

We are now seeking to combat moral leprosy resulting in great mental agony, not only in the case of the victims but all those related to them, and in a physical disease as loathsome and perhaps more painful than leprosy.

The time for trifling is past and now it behoves us to unitedly, wholeheartedly and intelligently attack and wage continual war against this great evil.

Notwithstanding the fact that our work has been hampered as I stated before, the report for the first half of this year shows progress.

On January 1st 1931 there were 10 inmates in the Army's Home. During the period of six months ending June 30th admissions numbered 17 while 18 left during the same period.

For reasons which all will understand I refrain from speaking of the present inmates but as samples of what has been done I will refer to some of those who have lately passed through our hands.

1. A little girl under 14 yrs. of age was led astray. She had been given a good education. When her friends got to know of her condition they cast her off, and the mean wretch who got her into trouble did nothing to assist her. She was sent to the S.A. Home with a baby a month old.

Shortly after, her uncle appeared and asked to take her away and was allowed to do so. He made such a slave of the girl that in order to save her child she left him and walked a long distance back to the S.A. Home. The baby proved to be too ill to be saved and though everything possible was done it passed away to a better and a kinder world.

The poor girl was thoroughly repentant of her wrong-doing and was soon after permitted to work outside as an Ayah, while still remaining as an inmate of the Home. She was such an exemplary servant that she obtained very high testimonials from her employers. After spending some years in the Home she was happily married.

A young girl who was a trained nurse was victimized by a doctor, and for sometime sought in vain for someone to befriend her. She was eventually sent to our Home and her baby was born soon after her arrival. For a time the doctor sent donations for her support, but after a while informed her that he had changed his address and from that time ceased to write to her or send any assistance. She eventually obtained employment in a Hospital while still lodging at the Home and after eleven months her relatives came and took her away as she had proved that her reform was permanent.

The Home Officers, though busily employed with the care of the inmates of the institution, find time once a week to visit the brothels and talk to the poor victims of lust. It is interesting to note that they have visited besides other places every house in "Safed Gally" (Khurshedji Sukhlajes st.) the most notorious street in Bombay.

What is Needed. It is very desirable that S.A. Rescue Officers should be made Police-women; One S.A. Officer in Calcutta has been made a Police-woman already and I see no reason why Bombay should not give our Rescue Officers the same powers. At present they are hampered in their work of rescue as they can only visit the brothels in private capacity.

The S.A. in Bombay is in need of a large triple institution for a Rescue Home. It is undesirable to put all kinds of women and girls together in a Home. There should be a receiving House where the new arrivals are dealt with. There should be apartments for those who though fallen are not hardened in vice; and there should be another part of the institution for those who have been professional prostitutes. This building should be surrounded by a garden and not too far from the city. Gardening might well be one of the industries of the Home.

In addition to this there should be a large Hostel as a preventive measure. This should be adapted for single women and widows with children, and should be near the business centre of the city. The S.A. has many such institutions in all parts of the world. Many a young woman is ruined because her salary will not permit of her paying the present high rents and because of being compelled to live in undesirable neighbourhoods.

I suggest that the Bombay Improvement Trust give this matter their serious consideration and that the S.A. be asked to submit plans and estimates of the cost of running such institutions. The closing of the brothels would make it necessary to provide for those desirous of living an honest life.

In conclusion I would say that we cannot rectify the moral and spiritual machinery of man without the aid of the Maker of Man.

BOMBAY RECLAMATION.

We have received a copy of the preliminary plan of the layout for the Back Bay Reclamation prepared by Mr. W. R. Davidge, F.S.I., A.R.I.B.A., Consulting Town Planner. The Governor in Council is desirous of emphasising the fact that the layout shown on this plan is only a preliminary one. The opinion of the public bodies in Bombay, which have been invited in regard to certain matters connected with the layout, will be considered when revised plans are being prepared.

A PARSI-HINDU MARRIAGE.

A correspondent writes:—

Under the auspices of the Hyderabad (Dn.) Arya Samaj, Miss Bhikoo Bai Rustomji, an educated Parsi Lady of Secunderabad, aged 28, was initiated—after Shuddhi—into the Vedic Religion, in the evening of Monday, the 10th October 1921. She was, later on, the same evening married, according to Vedic rites, to Dr. Ramchander, a leading medical practitioner, also of Secunderabad, who is a Shree Vaishnava Brahmin aged about 32 and a younger brother of Mr. K. Tatarbar B.A., M.L., of the local bar. Mr. Baji Krishna Rao, B.A., B.L., of the local bar officiated as Purohita.

The Dampati gave a donation of Rs. 50 to the Samaj in honour of the occasion and a Dhakshana of Rs. 70 to Mr. Baji Krishna Rao, the Purohita and his 2 assistants, which they, in their turn, gave away to the Samaj.

ROYAL YAKUTI.

THIS YAKUTI or life giving nectar has been prepared from
the best, choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has wonderful properties of increasing virile power and it rectifies urinary disorders. In fact it makes man a man. This valuable
medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and
gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to those persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen
the body, refresh the memory and to guard against debility.
Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicines. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires. It is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills. Rupees ten only.

NOTES.

The Karachi Prosecutions. The Karachi prosecutions have resulted in the conviction of all the accused persons but one, on one of the minor charges, and of Moulana Mahomed Ali on an additional minor charge. At the outset of his able and lucid summing up, Mr. B. C. Kennedy, the Judicial Commissioner in Sindh, told the jury:

The principal charge against the accused are those of conspiracy. It is on the main question of conspiracy that you are asked to give your verdict. It is on the conspiracy that you must make up your minds, and the issue between the accused and the Government, which is to be decided by you, is whether the accused were guilty of the conspiracy referred to in the first two charges.

After a consultation of over two hours, the jury found all the accused not guilty of these first two charges of conspiracy to seduce His Majesty's troops, and the learned Judge accepted the verdict and acquitted all the accused. The offence of which all the accused, except Bharathi Krishna Tirthaji, were found guilty, was publishing a statement, viz., that it was unlawful for a Mussalman to serve in the British army, which was likely to cause Mussalman officers or soldiers to fail in their duty. Moulana Mahomed Ali was also found guilty of abetting an offence by more than ten persons, and was sentenced to two years' imprisonment to run concurrently with the sentence of two years for the other offence. We do not think that a prosecution would have been launched on these minor charges had they stood by themselves, and are obliged to conclude that the Government have been ill-advised in undertaking these prosecutions. While the independence of justice has been vindicated by the result, the general opinion of the circumspection of Government has been subjected to a severe strain. Moulana Mahomed Ali pointed out in the course of his statement that, while the resolution of the Karachi Khilafat Conference regarding the declaration of a Republic, had been commented upon in many newspapers, none had noticed the resolution relating to troops, on which the prosecution was launched. This is true. The fact is that no importance was attached to this resolution which was taken to be merely an impressive admonition to Government to redress the public wrong of which the Conference complained. Government have done the right and the wise thing in withdrawing the further charges of sedition against Moulana Mahomed Ali and Shaukat Ali. They cannot now withdraw the two minor charges on which conviction has been obtained but they can and should, we think, in consideration of the religious feeling which has somehow got mixed up with the question, and which the Jury very properly felt precluded from considering, exercise generously their power to modify, mitigate and remit the sentence. It will show that, although under legal advice they had no alternative but to start the prosecutions, they do not care for the minor offence when the major counts have been held to be untenable by the highest Court of Justice in the sub-province of Sind. We ought to add that Mr. Kennedy's summing-up is a literary and judicial achievement, and that, under extremely trying conditions not of his own making, he has acquitted himself in a manner worthy of the high traditions of British justice.

A Retrograde Plea. The Jury expressly stated that they had not taken the religious convictions of the accused in their verdict which entirely turned upon the facts and the law. The claim of the Maulanas that they should be judged according to the Koranic law is as untenable as would be a claim that a Hindu should be dealt with according to the Code of Manu. The Koranic law evidently makes a deep distinction between Mussulmans and non-Mussulmans as the Code of Manu does between Aryans and Mlechhas and between Hindus of different castes. Both these ancient Codes—we are speaking of them from the juridical stand-point as distinguished from their scriptural authority—are, therefore, strangers to the equality of all subjects in the eye of the law, which is the corner-stone of modern jurisprudence. When India has full responsible Government, she must abide by this modern principle and she cannot in her penal or civil law recognise distinctions of creed or caste. A plea which raises the presumption that she would or could do otherwise, demands prompt repudiation from those who are most earnest about hastening the advent of swaraj. A man is bound scrupulously to abide by his religious convictions, but he should also and in addition obey the law of the land which regulates the secular relations between subject and subject and between subject and the State. The Legislature should be careful not to impinge on the sphere of religion and religion likewise should respect the sphere of the secular State. Social reform among us has been much obstructed by the mixing-up of religion so-called with social customs that grew up according to social exigencies from time to time. Nobody nowadays will defend the ban on sea-voyage or enforced widowhood or the prohibitions relating to interdining or adult marriages on the ground that they are enjoined by Hindu scripture. Nor does religion gain much by being thrust into matters which ought to be determined by the secular reason. We cannot help regarding a plea which mixes up religion and politics or religion and social reform, as calculated to retard progress.

The Labour "Gazette": We have received the October number of the Labour Gazette, published monthly by the Labour Office, Secretariat, Bombay. A section of public opinion seems to regard this enterprise as a useless waste of money, but we think that the Gazette has a place to fill among our periodicals, though we cannot say that it can do so unless it is something more than the scrappy, gumpot-and-scissors affair than it is. The Gazette at present seems to be without a central idea to give unity and purpose to its contents. This is a defect which is inevitable in all official periodicals, and the Gazette can never be wholly free from it. The absence of any reference to the charkha and khaddar movement in this or the last issue, is inexcusable in a Labour Gazette. We do not mean that the Editor should have tilted at the Non-Co-operation movement, but he could surely have placed before his readers a review of the position of the hand-spinning and weaving industry in the country, its relation to the mill industry and to the import trade in cloth, the progress made by it so far as it can be ascertained, and the progress it will have to make for it to supplant the mills and foreign cloth. There is a large marginal section of the public which can be influenced by a reasoned exposition of facts, and the reason for the existence of the Labour Department, as explained by His Excellency the Governor in the last number, is to make a constant supply of reliable facts continuously available to this, which in the last resort is the deciding, section of the public. An exposition of the statistics of prices two months old is of scientific as well as of antiquarian but not of current interest. And that, too, is done entirely without reference to wages, whereas the exhibition of prices and wages in relation to each other is necessary to make the matter of interest to Labour. The Editor's short "Month in brief" does not require a special Gazette to find publication.

Overcrowding and the Death Rate: The only other article of any originality in the October number is that by Dr. J. Sandilands on the relation of death-rate to overcrowding. He takes three districts in Bombay City, Umerkhadi, Parel and Chaupati, and their average annual death-rate during 1913-17 (selected as the only quinquennial period in recent times when there were no major epidemics), and comparing the respective percentages of population living six or more persons to a room and the annual death-rates in these areas, he concludes that he has established the relation between overcrowding and the death-rate. We do not see that he has. Unless it can be shown that the communities inhabiting these localities were in every other respect, than as regards the numbers inhabiting one room, of identical composition, mere juxtaposition of the two sets of figures does not prove proposition. Mr. Sandilands himself says that the Chaupati population consists of "better-class" residents. Umerkhadi is a typical slum of the poorer classes, and in Parel a considerable number of mill-hands dwell. Can he say that relative wealth and poverty have no influence on the death-rate, and that being more than six in one room is not only one of the incidents—the worst—of poverty? He has not even taken the trouble to compare the death-rate in the same locality among those who actually live more than six in one room and those who do not, though this would have been a better test! Dr. Sandilands' way of getting round inconvenient corners is admirable

The low death-rate in Parel from tuberculosis as compared with that in Chaupathi and for Bombay City, would seem to constitute it a sanatorium, though Parel is largely inhabited by mill-hands who work in dusty mills, and Chaupathi by "better-class" people. The Doctor merely gives it up with the remark that "no end would be served by further comment." That is because he set out with a ready-made conclusion, and facts which do not fit in with it are of no use to him. Some one should analyse the death-rate from tuberculosis in the two districts by sexes, and we should not be surprised if it be found that more women die of the purdah in ozone-laden Chaupathi than men and women of overcrowding in Parel. Dr. Sandilands' method of dealing with infant mortality without any reference to birth-rates is very original. His own figures show that the rate of infant mortality in three room tenements is actually less than that in four room tenements, but he seems to think that a different hygienic law operates in the case of tenants of four rooms. Over-crowding does affect health and vitality, but Dr. Sandilands' way of proving it is not the most convincing.

The Indian Institute of Science: We are glad that the Government of India have decided to appoint a Committee of enquiry to examine the working of the Indian Institute of Science at Bangalore during the last ten years, and to make recommendations for its management and future policy and the lines on which the Institute should be developed. But we do not see the need of obtaining the services of Sir William Pope from Cambridge to preside over the Committee. There are two or three Indians one of whom can guide its proceedings far more effectively than any one from an English University, and it is high time, after our experience of English Universities and the British Medical Association, that we stood on our own feet and gave up hanging on to the coat tails of English educationists who do not understand our problems and who suggest reforms which inevitably lay the foundations of another similar enquiry in a year or two. The Chairman of the Committee need not be a scientist but he must have a large outlook on the country's scientific needs. We do not wish to imitate the prevailing method of making recommendations insidiously or bluntly for a post. Mr. Shaffi knows where to look for the right Indian, if he can divest himself of the hoary superstition that an English educationist alone is competent to preside over such a Committee of enquiry. We hope it will be a strong Committee and not made up of nominees of this or that complexion in Indian politics, as Committees nowadays appointed by the Government of India have a tendency to be. A good party politician is not necessarily the best man to sit on Committees which deal with subjects demanding study and application.

Sir Ibrahim Rahimatoola's Successor: We do not, as a rule concern ourselves with official appointments, but in view of the statements made in the Press and of the peculiarity of the political situation at present, we feel it would be unfortunate if it is not found possible to get a competent Mahomedan to take Sir Ibrahim Rahimatoola's place when he joins the Fiscal Commission shortly. We fully realise that the Parsis are as much entitled to official preference as any others, and no Parsi so far has become a Member of Council or Minister. The earliest opportunity should be taken to remedy this omission, but at present it is essential that Government should have the benefit of the advice of an able Mahomedan of high character and independence in its inner councils. It needs some looking-for to find out such a candidate, and newspaper assistance in the matter is useless and a mistake. At any rate, we do not propose to offer any by way of suggestion,

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1921.

SIR PHEROZESHAH MEHTA.

We are glad that the anniversary of the death of Sir Pherozeshah Mehta was celebrated last week by various public bodies. He was a great Parsi, a great Indian, a great statesman and a great man. A considerable section of his own community was inclined to regard him in his life-time as rather unduly subordinating its communal interests in his view of Indian politics. This was true in a narrow sense, but far from the truth in the larger and truer sense. Sir Pherozeshah was never the man to run his head against the stone wall of fact. He realised that numerically the Parsis were an insignificant drop in the multitudinous ocean of Indian humanity and that it was on the quality of their contribution to national life that their right to an equal place with the larger communities could be most securely based. For this it was necessary that they should never separate themselves from the other Indian communities. It was Sir Pherozeshah's insistence on this on various occasions that made him rather unpopular with the masses of the Parsis. But he was so convinced of the importance of this to the community that he never swerved from it in the face of the strongest opposition. As an illustration of his firm adherence to this principle, he opposed the proposal to enroll Parsi volunteers in Bombay—as in Poona—although even Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji was inclined to favour it as a stepping-stone, unless all Indians were included in it. At the same time no one more boldly and firmly asserted the right of the Parsis to be a leading factor in Indian life on the ground of their great innate public virtues. A complimentary banquet was given to him by the Ripon Club on the conferment of the K.C.I.E. upon him in 1904, and in his speech on that occasion he gave some rare glimpses of his inner being. Speaking of the future of the Parsis, he said:

It is an historic fact that the seed of good citizenship was sown in this Presidency by the Parsi community. It may be that, owing to their numbers, our Hindu and Mahomedan friends will, nay must, pass us in the race; but I will ask them to remember in the hour of their success that it is the Parsis who sowed the seeds of which they reap.

We are sure that the community which gave India such leaders as Dadabhai Naoroji, Pherozeshah Mehta, and, still happily with us in his hale old age, Sir Dinshaw Wacha, will never find its claims overlooked by any Indian party and community.

Sir Pherozeshah next to being a great Parsi was a great Bombay man. The Municipal Corporation was for nearly half a century his most cherished sphere of work. In the Bombay University for a nearly equal length of time his influence was dominant. He left his powerful impress on the Bombay Legislative Council. His patriotism thus flowed from centre to circumference. Even when engrossed in great all-

India problems, he was particular not to miss a meeting of the Corporation or of the University. He knew, and every one of us should learn from his example, that the springs of national progress lie most of all in the good administration of the city, town or village, and in the upbuilding of a sound and solid system of education. He would never have cared to impress the masses as being one of themselves by the manner of his dress or diet or speech, but the poor had no stouter champion than he in the City, the University and the Legislative Councils. Non-Co-operators may indeed claim that Sir Pherozeshah set the example of Non-Co-operation when he walked out of the Bombay Legislative Council in protest against the Land Revenue Bill of 1901, which he thought did not go to the root of the indebtedness of the ryots. Official opinion to-day endorses, we think, the view which Sir Pherozeshah then took of the Bill. Having registered his protest in this emphatic, because unusual, way, Sir Pherozeshah did not think that he should for ever more renounce all co-operation with the Council. He was not an one-idea'd man, with a single recipe for all national diseases. He practically retired from his legal practice in order to devote himself fully to his public duties, though he would have snubbed severely any one who ventured to say that he had thereby made a great sacrifice. His sacrifices were not for parade, and he would have resented any imputation of extraordinary altruism to himself. He was a man of tremendous convictions, unshakable as a rock, and the person who aimed the shoe at him at Surat in 1907 knew that Sir Pherozeshah and not any one else, not Mr. Gokhale nor Dr. Rash Behari Ghose, was the implacable barrier that stood between his party and the Congress. It is an open secret that he disapproved of Mr. Gokhale's compromises with Government on the one side and with the Tilak party on the other. The evolution of Bombay and Indian politics from 1907 to 1915 is a chapter which cannot be adequately written without a careful study of the play and counter-play of two such varied temperaments as Sir Pherozeshah's and Mr. Gokhale's. It is as good as certain that Sir Pherozeshah would have stood against the compromise relating to communal electorates as he did against the Press and other repressive Acts and as he did against the compromise which re-admitted the Surat insurgents to the fold of the National Congress with results which he foresaw. He was totally opposed to the Gandhi compromise on the South African question, which he shrewdly prophesied was no solution, only an aggravation of the problem. The fact was that himself a master of phrases, he knew exactly what words meant and insisted on tangible facts.

It was but another side of his tremendous grip upon fact that he refused to indulge in long speculations regarding the future. He closed his great presidential address at the Calcutta Congress in 1890 with the lines from Cardinal Newman's moving hymn: "I do not ask to see the distant scene, one step enough for me," which embodied his deep political as well as religious feeling. For he was essentially a spiritually-minded man, though he wore his idealism no more than his self-sacrifice upon his sleeve. But in the speech at the Ripon Club to which reference has been already made, he permitted himself a little self-revelation on both these aspects of his being. He said: "Gentlemen, in these days we are somewhat materialistic. We sometimes think that we have got nothing to do but to accumulate wealth for our own enjoyment. Gentlemen, that is not all that we have got to do in this world. Life requires something higher and nobler for its full satisfaction. We cannot be content without aspiring at something more than self-indulgence." He proceeded to quote, apologising for it as permitted by the postprandial character of the occasion, the noble lines from Tennyson's "Two Voices" as conveying his own ideal of a public career:

At least, not rotting like a weed,
But, having sown some generous seed,
Fruitful of further thought and deed,
To pass, when life her light withdraws,
Not void of righteous self-applause,
Nor in a merely selfish cause—
In some good cause, not in mine own,
To perish, wept for, honour'd, known
And like a warrior overthrown;
Whose eyes are dim with glorious tears,
When, soil'd with noble dust, he hears,
His country's war-song, thrill his ears:
Then dying of a mortal stroke,
What time the seaman's line is broke,
And all the world is rell'd in smoke.

It may be truly said that Sir Pherozeshah died the death which he coveted. He did not, alas, live to give the new reforms shape, but his quick, intuition, no doubt, told him that the war had made an end of the bureaucracy with which he waged life-long battle. The field was won.

THE POPULATION PROBLEM.

It is an oft-noted fact that the birth-rate and death-rate in a community rise and fall together. It has been sought to be explained on the ground that infant mortality being always much higher than adult mortality, where births are numerous, deaths too are necessarily numerous. But nobody has explained why infant mortality must always be high and why adults should live longer because fewer children are born. Mr. Charles Edward Pell in his very suggestive book, "The Law of Births and Deaths" (Mr. Fisher Unwin), maintains that the birth-rate and the death-rate rise and fall together because they result from the same cause in a given community. A high mortality represents a great deficiency of "nervous energy" in a community and a high birth-rate does the same. By "nervous energy" should not be understood the energy implied in a well-developed liking and capacity for work. The Chinese peasant is well-known for his plodding industry, but he is not conspicuous for nervous energy. "An individual may be of a very indolent disposition," Mr. Pell observes, "and yet possess a highly charged nervous system. Such an individual will usually have a strong aversion to drudgery, but yet be capable of great exertions when stimulated by interest or necessity." He adds that this temperament is often associated with genius, and cites Dr. Johnson as an example. The conditions favourable to the development of such nervous energy among nations and individuals, are stated to be a moderate amount of physical exertion, a plentiful diet rich in nutriment in proportion to its bulk and rich in proteids, a bright and bracing climate, and a bright and cheerful environment generally, with plenty of mental stimulation. Mr. Pell's thesis is that a high development of such nervous energy in individuals and communities, has the effect simultaneously of lowering the birth-rate and the death-rate. He expounds his thesis by a wealth of illustration drawn from vegetable and animal life. But we confine ourselves here to the evidences from human society.

The first piece of evidence is a negative one. It is the futility of all efforts in ancient and modern times to decrease or increase the birth-rate by administrative measures. Pharaoh's drastic measures to put down male births among the Jews in captivity failed. So did those of the Emperor Augustus to increase the birth-rate among the Romans, and Mr. Pell points out with almost indelicate irony, that the Emperor might have known from his own example—he himself obtained only one child from a sequence of three wives—that it has not for want of will that the Roman birth-rate declined. The conditions of life among latter-day Romans favoured a high development of nervous energy which led to the steady decline of the birth-rate. Mr. Pell pokes some gentle fun at the members of the British National Birth-rate Commission of two years ago who, with an average number of children per family among them of only 1.75—sixteen out of the forty-one members being absolutely childless—brought in a verdict that there was no evidence of a decline of fertility due to natural causes! His own explanation of their case is that it was just because they were conscious, in each individual case, that their childlessness was the result of natural causes that they consented to sit on that Commission. Had infertility in their case been due to anything but natural causes, he adds, they would have avoided that Commission. The small success of the efforts of the French Government by means of large bonuses to encourage large families is another illustration. In this connection, Mr. Pell points out that if the fall in the French birth-rate was due, as alleged, to the extensive and habitual use of contraceptives by the masses, it would have necessitated a trade, of which there is no evidence, in contraceptives comparable in magnitude with that in such common necessities of daily life as mustard and salt. Indeed, Mr. Pell's argument is that the very idea of contraceptives appeals only to communities in which the birth-rate has already begun to decline from the operation of the natural law which ordains that when the conditions of social life among a people exceed a certain optimum point, they tend to become longer-lived and coincidentally they tend to produce fewer children. In proof that the lower birth-rate in Western countries is not due to an absence of desire for children among married couples, Mr. Pell cites such an institution as the National Children Adoption Association of England which has received 1500 applications from all classes ranging from miners to millionaires. He observes :

Curiously enough, these are not all from childless couples, but frequently come from people who have one child and want another. Perhaps, they have a boy and want a girl, or vice versa. Girls, it seems, are in much greater demand than boys. This demand for children for adoption is symptomatic of a much larger desire for children, since for every couple who are prepared to adopt the children of strangers, there will be hundreds of couples who keenly desire children of their own, but hesitate to adopt children of doubtful heredity.

Parturition has become more difficult in civilised communities, as shown by the enormous increase in the number of cases in which instrumental aid is given to women in the Rotunda Hospital since the beginning of the nineteenth century. Mr. Pell suggests that this is due to the increase in the relative size of the child's head, due to the development of the brain in response to the increasing complexity of the environment. Still the female pelvis among civilised races is conspicuously wider than that of the average savage woman, and Mr. Pell does not seem to think that the increased pain and risk of parturition may be a factor in inducing many women to avoid child-bearing.

Malthus assumed that the potential rate of increase of the population is geometrical and that the rate of increase of the food-supply can only be arithmetical. Mr. Pell states the position thus :

Food is produced by the labour of the population. Hands will increase in the same geometrical proportion as mouths, and there will be a corresponding increase of the food supply until the resources of the country are taxed to the utmost. Organisation, invention, scientific discovery and foreign commerce would modify the progress of events, and would for a time lead to an increase of the food supply greater than the increase of population. But as the resources of any country are limited, these factors would only postpone the ultimate result, for in an amazingly short time there would not even be standing room.

Malthus, therefore, quite logically from the facts known to him, advised that the birth-rate should be kept down, "that the mass of the people should abstain from sexual intercourse, leaving that as a privilege for the rich." But Nature provides a means by which the catastrophe contemplated by Malthus will be obviated. The birth-rate automatically diminishes as a community grows in prosperity and helps to maintain the equilibrium. Mr. Pell, therefore, concludes that Malthus' idea that the evils from which society suffers are necessary to keep down the numbers of the population, is the reverse of the truth, and that these evils are themselves the cause of a high birth-rate. Even in Malthus' time, Doubleday pointed this out, but he went to the other extreme. While Malthus imagined population to be always pressing on the means of subsistence, Doubleday pictured it as tending to increase the more the less the means of subsistence available to it. He illustrated this by many historical facts showing that exceptionally prosperous periods were accompanied not by over-population but by de-population. The introduction of the factory system in England lowered the standard of comfort of labourers, but increased the birth-rate among them, while the growth of Trades Unions, the passing of Factory Acts, and the spread of education since, have steadily tended in the opposite direction. Doubleday's theory erred in suggesting as an absolute proposition that the less the amount of nourishment the greater the degree of fertility, while the truth is that unduly insufficient as well as excessively sufficient nutriment is alike the cause of infertility. Mr. Pell regards the decreasing birth-rate in progressive countries as a serious problem, but not one to be solved by the use of contraceptive inventions which may benefit individual cases but cannot influence a whole community. The problem is one to be solved by statesmen whom he calls upon to investigate it along scientific lines and grapple with it in a scientific spirit. The pith of the matter seems to be that we must find some formula which, while protecting a people from the physical hardships of poverty, would ensure to them the moral stimulus arising out of the constant need to exertion. The sinister formula which links work to wages and wages to work must be broken. Every person must be assured of the means of living and every person must be wedded to work which he can do with most benefit to the community. Perhaps the caste system was originally invented as a means of meeting the dilemma. In a caste, the poor and the rich, the worker and his work, are never apart, as in a class system.

LONDON LETTER.

London, 13th Oct. 1921.

INDIA AND THE WASHINGTON CONFERENCE.

The Washington Disarmament Conference is looming larger upon the horizon almost daily, and public opinion is becoming increasingly oriented towards the United States in the hope that wisdom may come, if not from the East, then from the West. America having made it clear that, though she regards the British Empire as a single unit, she will welcome the presence of representatives of the British Dominions at the Conference, will doubtless be looking forward with some degree of pleasurable anticipation to the inclusion of British statesmen from the outer Empire, who, many of them, at any rate, will be fairly likely to appreciate the American point of view with more vividness, perhaps, than stay-at-home Britishers are accustomed to do. Being new countries themselves, they will doubtless look upon the great new nation of the Western Hemisphere with sympathetic helpfulness. The British Empire delegation is expected to leave England for the United States about the end of the present month, in order to be present at the opening sittings of the Conference, which are to be held on or about Nov. 11, Armistice Day. I learn that Mr. Sastri has been asked to represent the Government of India in the delegation, and that he has consented to do so. The importance of the appointment is two-fold. In the first place it is an indication, by those who are best fitted to appraise the value of his services to India at the Imperial Conference and at Geneva, that a man of his ability and clear-sightedness is eminently fitted to represent his country in the grave deliberations that are about to be held at Washington. In the second place, the fact of his inclusion in the British Empire Delegation implies a decided change in the view of the highest authorities in this country, who were formerly of opinion that India had no direct interest in a settlement of Pacific problems. How they came to that conclusion it is a little difficult to understand, but it is satisfactory to see that they have arrived at a common-sense decision.

THE LYTTON COMMITTEE.

Whilst people here are not disposed to question the constitutional right of the Assembly to refuse supplies to enable the Indian Students' Committee to complete its work by visiting India and conferring with experts on your side, nobody quite seems to understand why the Assembly should have taken the action that it has done. The general opinion among those who have inside opportunities of studying the Indian student problem here is that its serious importance is not fully appreciated in India, where British conditions are not always understood, and that it would have been of the greatest value if Lord Lytton and his colleagues had had the opportunity that, Mr. Montagu evidently thinks, it was originally intended by the Indian Legislature they should have, of studying the Indian side of the problem on the spot, so that Indian public men should be able to get a bird's-eye view of the situation here in making up their minds as to the best way of tackling a very awkward problem to the best advantage of India. Perhaps, when the facts come out, and the matter is quietly discussed, it will be found that, after all, the best means of dealing with it will be for some sort of inquiry to be held in India and its results collated with those discovered by the Lytton Committee.

SITUATION IN GERMANY.

Lieutenant-Commander Kenworthy contributed an interesting article to the Westminster on his return from Germany just recently. In it he said:—"Among the upper classes a good deal of Monarchist feeling remains, but not many of them appear to want the ex-Kaiser back. On the other hand they admit about 80 per cent of the population are frankly Republican, and opposed to a restoration of monarchy, with which they associate conscription. . . . Disarmament is nearly complete as far as it can be carried out. The Allied Commissions have been busy breaking up cannon, military transport gear, and aeroplanes. The country is well cultivated and there are tremendous numbers of women working in the fields. Prices are terrific; they are thirty times as great as pre-war prices in Germany. For an Englishman, with the rate of exchange, 400 marks to the pound, Germany is a cheap country. For a German, however, it is almost impossible. People living on fixed incomes, investments, and pensions are almost starving. The workmen are not so badly off, as his average wage to-day is about 1,000 marks a month. His standard of living is lower than before the war, and prices are rising again so that he is becoming restless. Berlin is filled with foreigners, Dutch, English, American, Japanese, Chinese and Egyptians. These fill the hotels and make large purchases. The housing shortage is rather severe, as house building by private enterprise has completely broken down."

All these items of information are interesting, and one can see from them how Germany is reconstructing her life. Commander Kenworthy makes no mention of starving thousands and though, as he says, the whole standard of life is lower, there seems to be no chaos, but a determination, wherever possible, to adapt oneself to the day's needs, and overcome the most pressing difficulties slowly but surely. The terrible unemployed question that is ravaging other countries also does not seem to be of such disastrous dimensions in Germany, and to turn from Commander Kenworthy's sketch of that country to the appalling figures of unemployment in America is rather staggering and shows that there is a different psychology in Germany from that of America. According to the New York correspondent of the "Times", between 3½ and 5 millions are unemployed, with many more persons dependent upon them. Several emergency measures for dealing with the problem were announced at the National Conference which has been discussing the question under the direction of the American Secretary for Commerce.

A PRACTICAL SOLUTION OF THE UNEMPLOYED PROBLEM.

Our own unemployed problem is occupying an equal position with Ireland at the present moment. Many important statements from many eminent people appear in the press giving solutions for the present problem. But general statements, however high sounding and however true, are useless unless their foundations are sure and the details of building for any scheme are practicable. We all know that a revival of trade would cure the evil of unemployment, and that the revival is largely a matter of international co-operation, but it is just the working of these two things that we find so difficult. On one point, however, Government, Press, Labour Party and the Public are in perfect agreement, namely, that doles must cease, and that productive work must take its place. Since, in a so-called civilised country such as this, no-one must be allowed to starve to death, it means that the necessities of life must be provided for all, and it is better in every way, that public works needing to be done, such as road-making, should be put in hand, so that men may decently earn that which must of necessity be given to them.

EXTREMISM RAMPANT.

The farming world seems to be in a state bordering on chaos. It was expected that the Conciliation Committees would be able to find bridges over difficult places between the farmer and his labourer. But the drastic cuts that have taken place in the labourer's wages have made him angry, and he no longer cares much about the Committee, for he does not believe in its efficacy so far as he is concerned.

Since the Armistice, extremism has had a greater innings in this country than it ever had before, and as a consequence, has never been so honestly condemned as it is to-day. Mr. J. Havelock Wilson, in his presidential address to the Annual Conference of the National Sailors and Fireman's Union held in London a few days ago, said; "There are some men who do not want things to get better. They want more unemployment and starvation, they want turmoil from one end of the country to the other and then, they say, we will have the glorious revolution. How they can construe that into helping the working people of this country I cannot understand. I want to see a revolution in the conditions of the people, which can only be obtained by getting trade and commerce started, and by keeping our organisations intact. But this is not what the extremists mean by revolution. They want things to become worse. Their ideas are those of fools and madmen, and in no way reflect the feeling of the working classes in this country."

NATIONALISM:—THE CURSE OF EUROPE.

Many right-minded men think things, but it is given to the wise man to put such thoughts into words, and when the words are thrown to the world they nearly always cause great commotion. Such has been the effect of a letter appearing in a big London daily from Lord Hugh Cecil, in which he said "Nationalism is the curse of Europe... National aspiration is not by itself a sufficient ground to justify physical violence; above all, Nationalism does not justify assassination, whether of an Austrian Archduke or an Irish constable, for all the nationalities in the world are not worth a single murder. These propositions, and more like them must be driven home by all those whose function it is to teach morals to the world." The whole of the letter, which is a long one, is so filled with good things that it is difficult to take a small extract and give any idea of its value. Unfortunately, we know the time has not come yet, when men in any large numbers will hear, understand, and act upon its teaching. Yet its teaching is very old—"To love one's neighbour as oneself" being the essence of it. Hitherto, we have sought in the teaching of patriotism "to love one's country as oneself." This was an enormous step from the loving of self and one's immediate dependents to the absolute exclusion of all others. But the passion of love for one's country has bred the expressions of hate and antagonism towards all other countries. And this, too, must be grown out of, if humanity is to continue to advance towards brotherhood. Evidently there are some men who have learned the great lesson through the awful years of war, and they must be the torch-bearers and a beacon for those who shut out the broad light of the Universe by trying to place a wall of iron round their own country.

INDIA AND WAR REPARATION.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I remember sometime back you wrote some trenchant editorials re India's share in the war reparation amounts received from our late enemy countries. Adding facts and figures to prove that whereas India's share in the late war contributions in men and money was the largest of all the countries not directly implicated in the war, her share in the reparation was ridiculously but significantly, enough the smallest possible; you recommended an interpellation thereon to be put in the Indian legislature. Well, the suggestion has been carried out (no matter whether independently or otherwise of your action) as you will find if you turn to the Council of State proceedings of date Sept. 15. It is thus reported by the A. P. I. from Simla:

"Replying to the question of Mr. Raza Ali regarding war reparation Mr. Moncrieff Smith stated that India had received less than Australia and Canada as she was less out of pocket."

Now, Sir, what do you make of that? To my mind the rather colloquial phrase 'out of pocket' has been preferred for its deliberate ambiguity. Obviously it might mean either of two things: viz. 1. that our country is less in need financially than the other parts of the Empire mentioned, and 2. that she has suffered less loss in men and money or either—even relatively speaking—than the latter countries. Now sense (2) is falsified by your own unchallenged finding on the subject. As to Mr. Moncrieff Smith's statement in sense (1) it must be a surprise to the blindest optimist. Well, sir, even granting (1) as a matter of fact, what is the implication? Manifestly that in distributing awards regard must be had not to services rendered in their quantity and quality, but to the 'pocket' or financial condition of the recipient at the moment of the adjudication of his share! And indeed the same principle might be extended to the administering of justice in general, so that the ancient maxim 'Thou shalt be no respecter of persons' shall have to be replaced by its contrary, "Thou shalt have no other than respect of person in judging between man and man as regards the 'pocket,' colour &c. of each!"

Karwar,

Yours &c.,
S. D. NADKARNI.

"The Honourable Saiyid Raza Ali: (a) By what standard has the Imperial Conference agreed to apportion the reparations receipts among the various members of the Empire in the manner recently announced by Reuter? (b) How is it that India is to receive only 1.2 per cent of the total receipts, while Canada and Australia and even New Zealand are to receive much more?"

The Honourable Mr. A. Moncrieff Smith: The standard of apportionment adopted at the Imperial Conference was based on the actual sums by which it was estimated that the States of the Empire would eventually be out of pocket under the headings for which Germany agreed to pay reparation in the treaty of Versailles. India is to receive less than Canada, Australia or New Zealand because she will be less out of pocket than those countries under these headings. The Government of India are not yet in a position to give detailed information of the figures for the various parts of the Empire on which the apportionment was made."

It would not have been amiss if Mr. Smith had informed Mr. Raza Ali what the particular "headings" were for which Germany had "agreed" to make reparation. The right of supplementary questions is a valuable one, but the putting of them is an art which the members of our Legislative Councils have yet to cultivate. It is the official's cue to give as little information as possible, and Mr. Smith was true to his tradition. Mr. Raza Ali might have asked if the losses on account of men, money and material—in fact, the major losses in a war—which India had suffered more than any other country not directly concerned in the war, were excluded from these "headings" and whether the Allies had "agreed" to such exclusion, if Germany had not. On the face of it, it would be preposterous, if that had been the case, and as a matter of fact "the reparation clauses" of the Treaty are so comprehensive and elastic that there are few things that they do not cover. Short of actual invasion, India has shared all the losses and hardships of the war, and as for invasion, Great Britain and the Dominions are in the same case with her. The simple fact is that there was nobody to look after Indian interests in the Reparations Commission, and that is why India has the privilege of enduring much irreparable loss.—Ed. I. S. R.]

THE WASHINGTON CONFERENCE AND INDIA.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

India has been invited to take part in the Washington Conference. But whether it is really a great rise in the status of India and whether it is a matter for congratulation, one doubts. The first question that arises is, whether the Government of India was asked whether it was willing to take part in the deliberations of the Washington Conference and to send its duly accredited representative, or whether this inclusion of India was decided off-hand in London itself. If the former, it is necessary to know what the Government of India's views are on the topics that would come up for discussion in the Conference and whether it has submitted any memoranda. Here it should be said that the personnel of the delegation does not matter except for the previously and perhaps unguardedly and inconsiderately expressed views of the members of the Indian Delegation. The Washington Conference is concerned primarily with two questions, Disarmament and the settlement of outstanding problems in the Pacific. As for disarmament, it has always meant Naval disarmament and the Conference will decide whether the only three great Naval powers, England, the U.S.A. and Japan are to enter into an agreement to reduce Naval expenditure and to stop the competition in ever-growing naval strength or whether those powers are again to enter into an era of increased Naval rivalry. The Pacific problems are about White America, White Canada and White Australia policy as against the demands of Japan and also about the commercial and political entanglements and rivalries of these three Powers in China. Such being the case, we do not see how India comes in here or how she is interested in this Conference. The impending harm does not stop here. Mr. Sastri declared at the Geneva Conference that India was not in a position to join in any scheme of general disarmament owing to the condition on her frontier. There may be some truth in it but does he need to be told that 'disarmament' is at present applied to Naval expenditure only? It is a piece of inexcusable ignorance to say that India is not yet ready for disarmament when her charges on account of the Army are double what they were in 1913-14. What would be the outcome of the meeting of the Sub-Committee of Imperial Defence of which Mr. Sastri is a member, and how have they received the recommendations of the Military Requirements Committee here, composed of men like Sir P. S. Sivaswami Iyer? It is clear that Mr. Sastri committed a mistake by confusing Naval disarmament which is now the point at issue between the Powers with the Land Forces—which mistake is no doubt duly exploited by the shrewd diplomats and Imperialists at London. So then, is Mr. Sastri well advised in representing India in a Conference in which she has no concern? Again, she is certainly not interested in the Pacific problems in which the selfish and exclusive policies of Canada, Australia and America are not only sought to be maintained for ever and ever as against Japan but also the latter's ambitions in the continent of Asia are also to be curtailed. The cat is out of the bag regarding the real nature of India's representation in the Conference by the following telegram:

IF IT FAILS.

The Daily Express understands that the British and Dominion Governments agreed during the Imperial Conference that if the Washington Conference failed to result in an understanding regarding the Pacific, it would be necessary to establish a new powerful Far Eastern Fleet with its strategic headquarters at Singapore. The Express adds that the new fleet, if it comes into existence, will be a joint concern of the Dominions and Britain.

They have till now kept this resolution secret. Mr. Sastri said in a speech that India would be willing to bear her share in the Imperial Navy. Now that his views coincide with theirs, it will be a miracle if he is not exploited or utilised for Imperialistic purposes. The only result of India's part in the Conference, minus the personal and National honour, prestige and status, will be that India will be mulcted to the extent of 4 or 5 millions £ as her contribution to protect Australia and Canada in their All-white policy and to hold Japan under some form of threat. What little saving India is expecting in her Army expenditure will be taken away towards the new Naval expenditure. What dubious and costly honour?

It only remains to know whether Mr. Sastri is playing off his own bat in the views he has expressed or whether he is representing correctly the views of the Government of India or the Moderates. It behoves the unofficial Moderate leaders to declare whether they agree with Mr. Sastri and whether they are prepared to support such demands on India for purposes not her own.

VOX POPULI.

[We do not agree with our correspondent that India has no concern in the Washington Conference. India's concern is as great as that of America or Australia, and greater than that of any other country. Great Britain's concern is itself because of India and Australia. We are glad that Mr. Sastri will represent India at the Conference, and as for what he may do, it is only fair to await the publication of the official report. Isolated sentences from one's speeches are no criterion of one's attitude on any special question.—Editor, I. S. R.]

CASTE AND UNTOUCHABILITY.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

I have read with much interest your article of the 9th October on 'Caste and Untouchability.' You are perfectly right when you say 'Untouchability is the necessary consequence of caste, that caste is the root cause of untouchability.' Behind all the Hindu castes there seems some peculiar ideal of social purity working and splitting us into so many castes and divisions. Some people even today claim that their caste is purer than that of other fellows. Because they have no divorce, no widow-remarriage which the others have. I often hear some non-vegetarian hill-tribes of Jowhar, claiming superiority over some other forest tribes, because the latter eat rats, which the former don't. Thus two standards of social purity creep out from the popular mind. The first is the divorce and widow-remarriage bar and the second is the freedom from flesh-eating. Fish-eating is the falling-off one step, beef-eating is falling-off the whole ladder of social gradation. You will be amused to know that some over-zealous vegetarians at the top don't eat even tomato because it resembles flesh and blood. Caste has produced narrow-mindedness. It is certainly detrimental to the growth of a free and healthy social life. From the present day society I can give a practical illustration. On account of commerce and service, many Hindus have to go away to distant towns far off from their caste-men. When their children grow up, they can not intermarry with the other castes of those towns. They must look to their 'vilayat' and they must marry men and women of whom they know nothing. If such marriages prove unfortunate, treacherous, instead of blaming the system under which they are crushed, they calmly resign themselves to fate and say they suffer for "the sins of past lives." Allow me to say here that even God has no right to punish us for the sins of our past lives, when we are determined to go by the right path. I fear, I am going astray from my subject. Let me say in short, caste does stand in our way of social, healthy life. Those who have eyes can see it.

But the fact must be admitted that the feeling in favour of caste is even now high. And it is impossible to kill caste to-day. The untouchables are humiliated, and their progress is hampered. They badly want light and free air. So we must look at the question, from a different stand point. Interdining and intermarriages are social matters. Religion is higher than these. Religion teaches us that we are all equal before God. God makes no distinction between a Mahar and a Brahmin. A scavenger with a real devotion is as welcome as a Brahmin. The saints of the Bhakti school, have popularized Hindu Gods amongst the untouchables. The untouchables long to worship them. It may be a superstition but are the Brahmins even free from it? The untouchables are Hindus. As Hindus they have a right to go to these temples. To keep them on the list of Hindus and to deny them any entrance in the temples is cheating God. Our religious bureaucrats must know that these Gods are above pollution. They have no right to close them against their sincere devotees. God does not care for caste. He wants devotion and faith. The untouchables have both. If we are sincere friends of the untouchables, we must send a deputation to these religious authorities, to induce them to open, in the name of God, the closed doors of the Hindu Temples to the untouchables. If such deputations fail we must non-co-operate with them. We must quarrel to unite.

Yours sincerely,
KARRAR, K. G.

[While we approve of our correspondent's strictures on the exclusiveness of caste-Hinduism, we think that depressed classes should be taught that temple-worship is not an organic part of Hinduism, that it is really a sort of religio-social kindergarten intended for "women and sudras," and that they should cultivate the spiritual religion, and not trouble themselves about effecting entry into temples. Few educated people who have an unquestioned entree right into the inner sanctuary of temples, care to use it. Let our brethren of the depressed classes concentrate their efforts upon realities. Temple-worship is an illusion.—Editor, I. S. R.]

SLAUGHTER HOUSE HORRORS.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Your correspondent Mr. Labbhankar Laxmidas appeals to missionary gentlemen, who are foreigners, to cease eating animal food because animals are not always killed at the slaughter house which is presumably under supervision, and which they are not likely to visit.

Surely, we Hindus should put our own houses in order before we make appeals to strangers of whatever religion. Here in Calcutta last week hundreds of goats were publicly hacked to death at the different temples; which apart from the cruelty must be very demoralising to the minds of all who beheld it. It does not follow that it is necessary to be cruel in taking life and the whole argument of your correspondent seems to me based on wrong ground.

Calcutta,
19th Oct, 1921.

Yours respectfully,
K. CH. DASS.

disorders. In fact it makes men a man. This valuable
medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and
gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to those persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen
the body, refresh the memory and to guard against debility.
Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicines. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires, it is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills. Rupees ten only.

NOTES.

The Turkish Situation. While the British Government has been waiting events, the French Government have come to terms with the Angora Government. The negotiations leading up to the Franco-Turkish settlement seem to have been carried out as a blot upon nationalism. (2) In the event of mass civil disobedience, a district or Tahsil should be treated as a unit and there in a vast majority of the population must have adopted full Swadeshi and must be clothed out of cloths hand-spun and hand-woven in that district or Tahsil and must believe in and practise all other items of non-co-operation.

Provided that no civil resisters should expect to be supported out of public funds and members of the family of civil resisters undergoing sentence, will be expected to support themselves by carding, hand-spinning and hand-weaving or other means. Provided further that upon application by any Provincial Congress Committee it is open to the Working Committee to relax the conditions for civil disobedience after it is satisfied that any condition should be waived.

About 200 members are said to have attended, but Madras was practically unrepresented. Mr. C. Vija Raghava Charya, the ex-officio Chairman, did not attend, and his place was taken by Lala Lajpat Rai. The resolution was moved by Mr. Gandhi who laid stress on the seriousness of the step they were taking and emphasised the supreme need for a strict observance of the conditions laid down in the resolution if it was not to lead to disaster. Amendments were moved having for their object the relaxation of the conditions, and the last clause empowering the "The absurdity of any condition from a Provincial Commission tests that have been put forward by the Governor of Kenya for acceptance by both European and Indian settlers in that Colony appears, at last, to have struck the Colonial Office, who have apparently begun to realise that they have made fools of themselves in the ridiculous tests that they have endeavoured to set up and which, amongst other things, will cast a slur upon the whole of Indian indigenous culture, and would result in the division of families. I believe that, with the coming of a new permanent head at the Colonial Office, the whole matter is being reconsidered in the light of solid common sense."

The Council of Princes. Judging from the attendance at the opening of the Council of Princes on Tuesday, there does not seem to be appreciable increase in the enthusiasm with which the institution is regarded by those most concerned. The Rajputana and Punjab Princes were well represented. The reasons given by His Excellency the Viceroy for the scant attendance do not seem convincing, considering the important subjects which are on the agenda of the Council. These are, the fiscal policy of India, the reorganisation of the Imperial Service Forces, and the substitution of some measure of protection of Indian rulers in place of the Press Act about to be repealed. Unless the mention of fiscal policy in the Viceroy's address was a sudden inspiration, we cannot account for the omission to appoint one or two representatives of the important Indian States on Sir Ibrahim Rahimtoola's Committee. There does not seem to be any uniform principle followed in relation to the Tariff policy of the States. The only right policy is complete Free Trade within India with a proportional payment to each State of the duties accruing on the traffic into or from it. The reorganisation of the Imperial Service Forces is an urgent need, and when this is carried out, as His Highness of Alwar proposes, in close co-ordination with British India, the result cannot but be beneficial to both sides. As for the Press, we trust that Their Highnesses will declare themselves against any special protection on their behalf. They may and should trust to the soundness of their administration to be their best protection against misrepresentation. We await the result of the deliberations of the Council of Princes on these questions with great interest.

Crime in the Nizam's Dominions: In their review of the administration of the Hyderabad City Police during the last official year, His Exalted Highness the Nizam's Government remark that the most outstanding feature of it was the decrease in the bulk of crime in City and State as compared with the previous year, notwithstanding the very unfavourable general, sanitary, and economic conditions which accounted for a considerable rise of crime in the neighbouring territories. They point out that the rise during 1919 in Madras Presidency and the City of Madras was respectively 13 and 16 per cent, in the Bombay Presidency and the City of Bombay, 20 and 18 per cent, in the Central Provinces 30 per cent and in Mysore 9 per cent, but in Hyderabad City and State there was a fall of 9 and 23 per cent respectively. They have apparently a lurking doubt about the accuracy of the returns, but assuming their accuracy, they observe that the only cause to which this enviable and unique result in Hyderabad can be ascribed is its practical freedom from unrest due to the efficient steps taken by the City and the District Police to nip it all in the bud and their promptness in showing the door to undesirable foreigners. Further the restrictions on export and import of foodstuffs which account for a large number of cases in British India, were so exercised in Hyderabad as to have no practical effect on the crime Chart.

We were told last year when there was an epidemic of crime, that there was a large number of the criminal classes from Hyderabad just then in Bombay City and, perhaps, the other provinces might have said the same. That may be a reason for the reduction of crime in the State coincidentally with a rise of it in the neighbouring provinces. We may take a hint from the above and cultivate more promptness in showing the door to undesirable foreigners. The last observation is cryptic. We are not aware that there was any restriction on the import of foodstuffs in British India. We are glad to read in the review the recognition that "prohibition of intoxicating drinks and drugs is another great remedy (for crime) which is coming more and more within the pale of practical politics".

Lord Sydenham's Damp Squib:—Our London correspondent writes under date the 27th October: "I do not think that anyone need take seriously the House of Lords discussion, initiated by Lord Sydenham on the eve of the departure of the Prince for India. Indeed that, apparently, was the view humorously taken by Lord Sumner, who admitted some difficulty in believing that the patient and placid contentment of India went so far as to take an interest in the Debates in the Lords, when, in fact, nobody in this country ever paid any attention to the words falling lightly from their Lordships. Perhaps Lord Sumner was unduly self-deprecatory. Nevertheless, it is a fact that, although in many matters there is a greater breadth and independence evident in Debates in the Lords than one discovers in the Commons, yet on the whole, the country pays relatively little attention to the views expressed by a body of gentlemen who have no sort of direct responsibility to the constituencies. If people in India would realise that the House of Lords emphatically does not represent public opinion here, something of the sting would be taken out of the painful impressions sometimes conveyed by reports of discussions in that august assembly. Your readers will doubtless have read extended summaries of the proceedings in this Debate and they will be interested to note that nothing more serious occurred than the provision of an opportunity for Lords Sydenham and Amphill to pour forth their vials of wrath upon the devoted heads of those at present responsible for the administration of Indian affairs. A vastly more important speech was, however, delivered by Lord Cnelmsford, who, in a careful analysis of the situation, pointed out that the situation in India did not stand alone but was merely one aspect of the great race problem involved in the challenge by the coloured races of white racial supremacy."

The Late Principal Patwardhan: By the death of Principal Patwardhan of the Fergusson College, Poona, the world of education and scholarship loses a great personality, and Indian social reform one of its most effective advocates. It is a little over a month since this writer had the privilege of meeting Principal Patwardhan in his College and he hardly thought that that would be the last time he would see him in the flesh. Verily, in the midst of life we are in death. In a sympathetic appreciation of Principal Patwardhan's career in the Times of India by a writer signing himself "R. P.P."

we came across, somewhat as if in a dream, an ancient word that we had almost lost sight of for at least twenty years past. The late Principal, we learnt, was an "agnostic." "Agnostic" is a word which was coined by, we believe, Huxley and used to be applied in our college days to Mill and Spencer. Nobody speaks of "agnostics" now. The stream of tendency is now all the other way. As it happens, we first came to know Principal Patwardhan as a sympathiser with the Theism of the Prarthana Samaj and as such, an exception to the Agarkar school of social reformers.

The Two Consenting Councillors: It did not require the revelation of the Calcutta paper to know that the Home Member and the Law Member of the Government of India were the two members whom Sir Thomas Holland consulted in regard to the Munitions case. These were the two Members who were most likely to have been consulted by a colleague in Sir Thomas Holland's position, and not the Member for Revenue or Education or Finance, nor the Commander-in-Chief. It seems that Dr. Sapru, the Law Member, submitted his resignation to the Viceroy when His Excellency disapproved of the withdrawal of the case, but His Excellency did not see his way to accept the resignation. We are glad to know that Dr. Sapru took such a sensitive view of his responsibility and are content to accept the Viceroy's judgment that his resignation was not called for in the circumstances. Sir William Vincent, the Home Member, does not seem to have thought that even a formality of this kind was necessary. The matter is now closed and no public advantage is gained by trying to re-open it either by way of attack or defence.

Bombay Municipal Franchise. We have received a copy of a memorial signed over 1000 tenants residing in different parts of Bombay City, and addressed to His Excellency the Governor of Bombay praying that the right of voting at the Municipal election should be extended to tenants paying a monthly rent of Rs. 10 and above as in the case of the Legislative Council.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1921.

CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE.

On the 4th instant at Delhi, the All-India Congress Committee passed the following resolution :

"Whereas there is not much over one month for the fulfilment of the national determination to establish Swaraj before the end of the year, and whereas the nation has demonstrated its capacity for exemplary self-restraint by observing perfect non-violence over the arrest and imprisonment of Ali Brothers and other leaders, and whereas it is desirable for the nation to demonstrate its capacity for further suffering and discipline sufficient for the attainment of Swaraj, the All-India Congress Committee authorises every province on its own responsibility to undertake civil disobedience including non-payment of taxes in the manner that may be considered the most suitable by the respective Congress Committees subject to the following conditions.

(1) In the event of individual civil disobedience, the individual must know hand-spinning and must have completely fulfilled that part of the programme which is applicable to him or her; e.g., he or she must have entirely discarded the use of foreign cloth and adopted only hand-spun and hand-woven garments; must be a believer in Hindu-Muslim unity and in unity between all communities professing different religions in India as an article of faith; must believe in non-violence as absolutely essential for redress of Khilafat and Punjab wrongs and attainment of Swaraj; and, if a Hindu, must by his personal conduct show that he regards untouchability as a blot upon nationalism. (2) In the event of mass civil disobedience, a district or Tahsil should be treated as a unit and there in a vast majority of the population must have adopted full Swadeshi and must be clothed out of cloths hand-spun and hand-woven in that district or Tahsil and must believe in and practise all other items of non-co-operation.

Provided that no civil resisters should expect to be supported out of public funds and members of the family of civil resisters undergoing sentence, will be expected to support themselves by carding, hand-spinning and hand-weaving or other means. Provided further that upon application by any Provincial Congress Committee it is open to the Working Committee to relax the conditions for civil disobedience after it is satisfied that any condition should be waived.

About 200 members are said to have attended, but Madras was practically unrepresented. Mr. C. Vijaya Raghava Charya, the ex-officio Chairman, did not attend, and his place was taken by Lala Lajpat Rai. The resolution was moved by Mr. Gandhi who laid stress on the seriousness of the step they were taking and emphasised the supreme need for a strict observance of the conditions laid down in the resolution if it was not to lead to disaster. Amendments were moved having for their object the relaxation of the conditions, and the last clause empowering the Working Committee on application from a Provincial Committee to relax the conditions was evidently added as a concession to this demand.

We reprint a selection of opinions from representative Congress and other journals in the several provinces on the resolution. Reading between the lines, it is easy to see that few of them are very enthusiastic about it as a practical proposition. The Tribune of Lahore which, while exercising discrimination, is anxious to put the best interpretation upon the resolution, points out an initial flaw in its wording. It observes :

What is mass civil disobedience? Mahatma Gandhi is reported by our Special Representative to have defined it as disobedience of all laws and all orders. We are almost certain there is a misunderstanding here. Mahatma Gandhi cannot mean that the non-co-operators are to violate such laws—and they form the great bulk of the Penal Code—as seek to punish offences against moral laws. By the very nature of their creed it is impossible for them to violate these laws. The only laws that Mahatma Gandhi can possibly have in view are laws which define and seek to punish what are called offences against the State and the only orders he is probably thinking of are orders which it is possible to violate without being guilty of the breach of any moral law.

Our contemporary is clearly wrong. Civil Disobedience implies the rejection of the authority of the Courts not only in political matters but in all matters. Non-Co-operators may themselves not commit crimes which imply moral obliquity, but it is obviously part of their doctrine that the existing tribunals have no authority to try any offences, whether or no they imply moral obliquity. The Courts cannot exist for one set of crimes and be abolished for another. The tests qualifying an individual for "civil disobedience" are, except in the single item of hand-spinning and the use of hand-woven garments, subjective and vague even at that. What does belief as an article of faith in Hindu-Muslim unity and in unity between all communities mean? Does it mean that they are all one already or that it is the aim to make them all one? What does belief in non-violence mean? Maulana Shaukat Ali has repeatedly said that non-violence is not an article of faith with him, only an experiment. As regards untouchability, no one can know precisely what is meant by showing by personal conduct that one regards it as a blot upon nationalism. Then, again, as regards both individuals and masses, who is to see that the tests are satisfied, and what is to happen if those who but imperfectly satisfy them, disobey some law of their own choosing? The difficulty of laying down an exact ruling on these and other points, no doubt prompted the suggestion that all others should await a practical demonstration which the leader of non-co-operation proposes to give in about a fortnight of civil disobedience.

It is impossible, therefore, to attach any importance to the conditions. As the Independent of Allahabad, almost the only Congress journal which eagerly supports the resolution, observes, the conditions are bound to break down in the working out. Further, the Working Committee has but recently given proof of its readiness to relax any rule, or even to condone its breach, in favour of influential members and the power of dispensation vested in it by the resolution can serve no purpose except to ratify accomplished facts. There is some law or other which is to the interest or inclination of some one or other to violate, and this resolution will be widely interpreted as a sort of charter for general lawlessness. The cry "Gandhi-ki-Jai," has been raised ere now by various kinds of men on various occasions unconnected with the redress of any public wrong. The Independent, as the enfant terrible of Khilafat-Non-Co-operation, promises that in the districts where the resolution is put in force the King's authority will come to an end as surely as it is non-existent in Mopla-nad, with a difference that may be obvious to it but not to many others. It is, therefore, the duty of Government and the public to be prepared for a general outbreak of lawlessness in the name of patriotism. This step, according to the preamble to the resolution, has been adopted with the object of obtaining Swaraj within the next few weeks as scheduled in the Non-co-operation time-table. If there was a chance of this coming to pass, that chance has been but dissipated by this resolution. Madras has broken away from the Congress. Maharashtra has nearly done the same or is on the point of doing so. The Karnatak has played her last card and Sind warned by her experience of Afghan hospitality is to-day the calmest division of this Presidency. Bengal, judging from the severely analytical attitude of the Servant, the Congress daily of Calcutta, is likely to agree with its verdict that, so far as she is concerned, the resolution is "premature." Are the United Provinces likely to be as eager to reproduce the conditions of Mopla-nad as the Allahabad organ of Khilafat-Non-Co-operation is within their borders? Bihar was complimented as having set the best example in the matter of hand-spinning, but she is not among the communities expected to take the lead in Civil Disobedience. The Central Provinces are in the same case as Maharashtra on the one side and the United Provinces on the other; Berar may find herself included in the Nizam's Dominions before she has a chance of practising Civil Disobedience. Lala Lajpat Rai is ploughing a more or less lonely furrow in the Punjab which is far too near the North-Western Frontier to afford to experiment with anarchy. The only two areas where Civil Disobedience may be supposed to have a chance are Gujarat and Andhra. Gujarat is naturally proud of her great son and will sacrifice much to uphold him, but she is also the most business-minded of India's provinces and Civil Disobedience has never been in her line. Andhra gave Gujarat her Vaishnavism, and has acclaimed with fervour the austere gospel of the charka. But she has, after long years in the wilderness, just now ascended to the seats of power and she may feel it hard so soon to be called upon to go into the wilderness again. Moreover, as an article in the Janmabhumi of Masulipatam, the Andhra journal of Non-co-operation, shows, her disbelief in untouchability has not attained the required consistency.

While no part of the country is thus ready for Civil Disobedience, large sections of the people are getting alarmed at the light-heartedness with which programmes have been proclaimed and put aside in favour of the latest novelty in the course of the non-co-operation movement. The pre-amble to the Civil Disobedience resolution avers that the calm with which the country has received the result of the Karachi prosecution is a measure of the longing of the country for Civil Disobedience. There are people in the very inmost circle of the Congress party who know that this is true in a sense the very reverse of what the public are expected to understand by it. The promoters of this new plan know well that they must produce some impression on the country to make up for their blunders and failures, within a very short time, or they would be totally discredited. As we have shown above, there is no probability of the movement spreading widely anywhere in the country. But we have to guard against three things: unpreparedness, precipitancy, and euphuism in the redress of real grievances and the fulfilment of genuine national aspirations. In Malabar, Government was caught napping. Preparations for a determined rebellion could not have been made in a hole and corner manner. If the Government had been prepared, there would, perhaps, have been no rising or it would have been nipped in the bud. Precipitancy is also a danger that should be avoided. Jhallianwala is a solemn warning for all time. The last but not the least item in the scheme of the country's peaceful evolution is the redress of grievances and the fulfilment of aspirations. Thanks to the astuteness of France, Great Britain need only hold her hands now to have her Prime Minister's pledge fulfilled. She would be putting new weapons in the hands of her detractors if she upholds the Sevres treaty against France's statesmanly attitude of discarding the wretched diplomatic principle of not allowing the Cross and the Crescent to prosper side by side in Europe. We call attention in this connection to Mr. Bhurari's observations in his article which we publish. The Government of India do not seem to realise the acuteness of public feeling throughout India at the inadequacy of the measures so far adopted to express Government's repudiation of the excesses of the Martial regime in the Panjab. Why is the Viceroy still delaying his decision regarding the martial law prisoners? Why have some officers guilty of such excesses not been suitably dealt with? This is all that the country wants and Lord Reading has disappointed its hopes by his procrastination over these simple matters. As regard the aspirations of the country, we are emphatically of the view that Dominion status in the British Commonwealth is our proper, sufficient and honourable goal. To those of our countrymen who do not understand the full implication of this status, we commend a little book entitled "Dominion Home Rule in Practice" by Prof. A. B. Keith, the great Sanskritist and constitutional authority on colonial self-government, published recently by the Oxford University Press. This status has already been indicated in several ways as the object of British policy in India, and not merely in words. Write Professor Keith:—

The new status of the Dominions is confirmed by the covenant of the League of Nations, under which not merely is the British Empire a member but so also are the four Dominions and India, the position of the latter being motivated by the fact that she has been assured in due course self-government on the Dominion model.

Those of us who hold that this is the true line of Indian political development are bound to oppose any propaganda which menaces its possibility. Civil Disobedience is such a propaganda. But our power of effectively combatting it will be assured only if the "motive" be translated into a definite, tangible, act. The forthcoming visit of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales offers a suitable opportunity of doing this with the greatest grace and with the most impressiveness.

A MOSLEM VIEW OF THE SITUATION.

(BY THE HON'BLE MR. G. M. BHURGEL.)

The great State trial of the Ali Brothers and other Khilafat Leaders has ended. I wrote a few days before their arrest and prosecution of the unwisdom of such a course, not on the merits of the case itself, but on higher grounds than even the formal vindication of the established law of the land, penal or criminal. My contention was twofold. I showed that the harm arising out of that step,—whether in the case of the very vindication of the law and the maintenance of the authority and prestige of the Government or of coping with the situation and restoring calm and quiet in the country,—would outweigh all other considerations combined together. And therefore, I submitted, that way did not lie the solution.

I now write after the great trial has ended to examine briefly, not the judicial findings of the Judge and the Jury, but the position of the Government with respect to the Khilafat and Non-co-operation movements, during and after the trial. I have carefully watched the proceedings and tried to study the effect of those proceedings on the public mind from day to day of the progress of the trial upto the verdict of the Jury and the Judge, and finally the very partial conviction of the six learned Maulanas, and the acquittal of the Shankaracharya.

The very first question that I would like to ask the supporters of the prosecution is, Have the proceedings in the courts, both the lower and the sessions, added to the prestige of the law-courts and the majesty of the law, or shaken that prestige and brought the ridicule and jeering of the man in the street at that majesty of the law which it was intended to vindicate?

And then what is to be said of the verdict of the "not guilty" of the Judge and the Jury on the main charge of criminal conspiracy and attempt to seduce troops to safeguard against and prove which the whole prosecution, I understand, was prompted. Even where the verdict of the majority of jurors and the judge is "guilty" what is the case? The Government by the prosecution of the seven leaders have incited anybody and everybody in the Khilafat and Non-co-operation movements to issue manifestos or hold public meetings to proclaim and repeat the very resolution which was the sole contention of the subsidiary charges and conviction, and thus defy the Government in their face, and the very law it was intended to vindicate by the prosecution. Has that,

I ask, added to the prestige of the Government, and helped to vindicate the majesty of the established law, or undermined that prestige further and flouted the very law it was intended to vindicate? Let the supporters of the prosecution once again answer after due reflection.

What then is the sum total of the result of the whole trial? Has it abated the fury of our Non-co-operating friends and made them relax their programme? Or, has it been a fresh moral and political victory for the Non-co-operator, and an impetus to him for further drastic action? Has all that brought the solution of the great problems confronting the Government and the well-wishers of the country nearer or, has it made the issues more complex, more bitter, and the situation graver and graver?

And yet I am not quite without hope. I see that there is yet a way to bring peace and harmony in the country so far as the Khilafat and the Turkish Peace terms are concerned on which mainly rests and which fosters the great Non-co-operation movement.

Let the Government of India and through it all its supporters and the well wishers of the country say to the British Government, "Vindicate your pledges to the peoples of India, the pledge which Mr. Lloyd George gave the Indian Mussalmans in 1918, before it is possible for us to vindicate the law in its reality and restore true peace and harmony in the country". That is the great truth which the Government of India themselves have to realise first, and then openly to press it before the British Cabinet. The Government of India are fully aware of the intensity of feeling on the subject of Khilafat and the Turkish Peace Treaty among not only the Mussalmans of India, and the entire Indian community, but also other Asiatic Powers principally Muslim. It will serve no useful purpose, at the present moment, to go into the rightness or otherwise of this feeling. The fact remains that nothing short of an honourable peace, consistent with the dignity and integrity of Islam would satisfy this feeling. The Government of India themselves have from time to time expressed their fullest sympathy with the people of this country on this subject. They and that great champion of the Muslim cause, the Secretary of State for India, have been putting forward the Muslim view before the British Cabinet from time to time. But the reason why their efforts have not brought due recognition from the appreciation of the Indian community is that these efforts have led to little or no appreciable results so far as the early prospects of the honourable settlement are concerned. On the contrary the unfortunate course of events that have followed leading to and in the development of the Turco-Greek War has created a very strong impression in this country that the British Cabinet, though apparently observing neutrality, are flouting the Muslim sentiments by permitting the private supply from England of arms, ammunition and money loans to Greece and thus equipping the Greek Armies with what the Angora troops so badly need but are unable to have.

In this connection it is worth noticing what the attitude of the Prime Minister was, till very lately. He was emphatic in his reiteration of the statement which he first made when approached on behalf of the Angora Government and the Mussalmans of India to intervene in the Turco-Greek war, that the policy of his Government was to leave the issue to be decided between the Greeks and the Turks themselves. His recent statement, after the first reverses sustained by the Greek armies that "the proper moment for intervention had not yet arrived," has, however, given rise to another suspicion that the present refusal may be made the pretext for an intervention of another sort, when the Greeks are completely beaten: Should this suspicion rightly or wrongly gain ground and should an intervention take place at a later stage when the Greeks are actually completely beaten, it would lead to disastrous effects not only so far as the movements of Khilafat and non-co-operation are concerned but also as the various Mussalman States in Asia go. It would be going against the very vital interests of, nay, it would be a death blow to, the British Empire in Asia.

To show that I am no alarmist, that this is not my view alone, but also of those who represent the Government of India, I may be permitted to point out what the Honourable Mr. Bray, Foreign Secretary to the Government of India said in the course of his speech on my motion of adjournment of the Khilafat movement in the Delhi Session of the Council of State:—

"There is a great belt of Islamic countries stretching unbroken from the south of the straits of Gibraltar far away into Northern China. One block of India itself stands within that belt—that great frontier buttress on the north-west made up of the North-West Frontier Provinces and Baluchistan. But it is even more relevant to my present purpose that within that Islamic belt are included nearly all the foreign countries with which India is most closely concerned. It is thus palpable that from an external point of view alone the welfare and goodwill of Islam must in the very nature of things be of paramount importance to India and the British Empire. This fact is in itself a powerful reinforcement of the cause which Muslim India has at heart."

Kenter informed us the other day that the Afghan armies were fighting by the side of the Turks against Greek armies. A later telegram announces the conclusion of a defensive and offensive alliance between Afghanistan and Persia. These are also signs which portend that the problem is assuming larger dimensions and prejudicing friendly relations between England and various Islamic powers which are at present neutral. For the reason that England, being the most important and influential of the Allies wielding the largest influence in the Conferences and Councils of the Allies, is, as I have stated above, suspected at this moment of befriending Greece against Turkey, whereas France and Italy are said to favour the conclusion of the Treaty with Turkey, more or less on the lines laid down by Mr. Lloyd George in January 1918.

I have already pointed above how the recent prosecutions and convictions have given a fresh lease to the grave-discontent and excitement already prevalent in the country. Add to this the further excitement due to the confiscation of the Ulema's Fatwa, and also all kinds of rumours of Mahatma Gandhi's and other leaders arrests, should they resort to civil disobedience or acts of that kind. It is only desirable that the Government, not out of their weakness but strength, should pacify the discontent and excitement as far as it reasonably should be, before it is too late.

The only way by which, it appears to me, the Government of India can do so, and thus avert both the external danger of an anti-British Alliance by Foreign Muslim Powers and internal discontent, riots and bloodshed is for the Government, for Lord Reading himself, and for various Governors and Governments of Provinces to use their personal and official influence with the British Cabinet and move it now and at this stage to conclude an honourable peace with Turkey without waiting for the results of the Turco-Greek War, on the lines laid down by the Prime Minister on behalf of the whole Empire on 5th January, 1918, viz. "not to deprive Turkey of their Capital and the rich and renowned lands of Thrace and Asia Minor".

This surely cannot be characterised as anything like or approaching the 'impossible' demand of status quo ante bellum. What it in fact amounts to is that Turkey should not be treated worse than other enemy powers, that she should retain those provinces which were admitted even by the British and Allied statesmen to be predominantly Turkish, that the Arab Provinces should be granted full autonomy, and finally that the Holy cities of Mecca and Medina may remain under the suzerainty, however nominal, of the Khilafat.

Is this too much to ask of the Indian and the British Government? Will they be so blind or stubborn as not to see facts in their true perspective, and resort to proper remedy at the proper moment? No, I still retain my optimism, my faith in the statesmanship and farsightedness of Lord Reading and his Government, and hope that they will take time by the forelock and press on the Cabinet the necessity of immediate action in the direction referred to above.

THE POONA SEVA SADAN.

(By Miss C. B. POOVIAN, B.A.)

I had often heard of the splendid work that the Seva Sadan Society is doing at Poona and wished to see things for myself. I had the fortunate chance of doing so in August when I was on my way from Jallandur to Coorg, owing to the kind courtesy of Mr. Devadhar. I was three days the guest of the Seva Sadan and had ample opportunity to observe details; the magnitude of the work being carried on there exceeded even my most sanguine expectations. The Seva Sadan is a small colony by itself with nearly a thousand students deriving benefit from the practical instruction imparted there.

There are several distinct branches in it. There is a big Training College for Women where quite a fine number of students, widows mostly and a number of married women and girls as well, are trained to be come teachers. — There is a big school attached to this where the students of the training college teach under the eyes of their instructors and thus acquire a thorough practical training. Then there are very efficient sewing and weaving departments. The most striking feature of this institution is the "Child Welfare Centre." Here every morning at a stated time milk is supplied to poor needy little children from outside. It is a touching sight to watch them coming with eager expectant faces carrying their tiny mugs to receive the milk in. A lady doctor with a calm sweet face and willingness to help—a fine product of the Sadan itself—is ready there to give her services free to her poor suffering sisters and their children who come there from outside for medical help.

Attached to this institution are four boarding houses. Of these two are situated elsewhere outside the main Seva Sadan buildings, and are reserved for medical students. In one, the students who are undergoing a course of nurses' training at Sassoon Hospital and "King Edward Memorial Hospital (?) reside, and in another, the students studying for Sub-Assst. Surgeon's Course. These boarding houses are pretty, neat and cosy, each in charge of a matron, and students are very well looked after. Tennis and Badminton courts are provided within the hospital premises for the medical students to enjoy a bit of healthy outdoor games when they are in a mood to do so. There is a neat little furnished house very close to the main Sassoon Hospital buildings romantically and appropriately called "the nest" for the nurses to rest when off duty. These considerate arrangements made to ensure the comfort of the students in every way reflect great credit on the workers of the Seva Sadan. In the other two boarding houses within the premises of the main Seva Sadan, reside the students of the Training College and of other departments. Here too nothing is wanting as regards sanitary cooking, sick-nursing and other arrangements. The only defect is the buildings are becoming overcrowded and there is no suitable playground. Mr. Devadhar told me that they are negotiating to secure a big building with fine grounds near about the Sadan, and I do hope their attempts will be crowned with success. Students are often taken on excursions to interesting places, which are sure to have a great educative value. The aim of this institution is not to provide educational facilities to the rich and well-to-do girls who want to go in for high school and college courses, but to provide practical and useful instruction to poor and needy women, and it is doing splendid work in that direction. Our iniquitous social system turns out thousands of young widows for whom the future is blasted for ever. They naturally consider themselves as unfortunate beings born under unlucky stars, and life henceforth could not hold any charm for wretched beings like themselves. To put courage into their drooping spirit and infuse into them a love of service, and train them up to earn an independent and honourable livelihood is a noble task and the Seva Sadan is doing this service towards hundreds of young widows. This institution has become a great success owing to the unceasing efforts and enthusiasm of a band of noble and unselfish workers and their helpers. That patriotic wife of a patriotic husband, Mrs. Ramabai Ranade, has devoted her life-work to this Sadan and still is its guiding star. Its immense success is not a little due to the great organising abilities and practical brain of Mr. Devadhar of the Servants of India Society. Among other workers I should not omit to mention the names of two ladies who have served the Sadan for many years and are still doing invaluable work, senior Mrs. Bhatt and junior Mrs. Bhatt. It has really been a great pleasure to me to become acquainted with this band of brave and silent workers.

Social work is generally a thankless job and has not the romance, glamour and excitement of political work to attract able, aspiring and ambitious spirits. But nevertheless the work of building up a solid social structure is equally important if not more, for it will be the back-bone of the country. Thanks chiefly to a brave movement launched by a daring patriot—I mean the Non-Co-operation movement—the country is politically awakened. It has made every true Indian heart feel a keen sense of self-respect and has spurred on the most daring among us to a tremendous soul fight to gain our full political emancipation. But social progress is not keeping pace with our political advance. No strong and sustained attempts are made to do away with much of the abuses and evils of the meaningless caste system that we have in our country, which is still a great barrier towards real healthy progress of the country, for it perpetuates numerous divisions and consequent ill-feelings. It is true, Mahatmaji is crying against the curse of untouchability but that is not enough. If the members of the higher castes condescend to touch the members of the lower castes and do not consider it a pollution, but refuse to eat or drink or mix with them in social functions, refuse to intermarry with them and treat a few who had the courage of their convictions to do so as social outcasts, the question remains where it is, the problem remains unsolved creating perpetual bitterness of feelings.

Then there is the separate question of women's problem to face. Child-marriages are still going on and girls of 12 or 13 are found to accept motherhood, in so many cases the girls are married without their consent and without any consideration to their feelings and in many castes before they reach their age, as it is generally the case with the Brahmins in the South. As a consequence of these early marriages thousands of child widows are still manufactured, so to say, who become marked as unfortunate beings, and life has few pleasures to offer to these poor girls. Women's education in general is still in a very backward condition. The cruel purdah system prevents our Mohammedan sisters and many of our Hindu sisters in the north from being educated, and narrows their outlook by shutting them out from seeing God's world around them.

For a society devoted to social work and chiefly to the upliftment of women, like the Poona Seva Sadan Society, there are vast possibilities open in these directions. Women, because of their ignorance, are the chief supporters of many evil social and religious customs which mean great harm to their own sex. A society like this could do much in the direction of imparting a general education to women to broaden their minds and outlook; it could train up women workers to go out to the streets and villages lecturing on sanitary arrangements, child welfare, first aid and reform of religious and social customs, and work among them and teach them to put those lectures into practical use. India is a poor country subject to frequent famines and pestilence of various kinds and trained women relief-workers would be a veritable blessing to suffering women and children. Because of poverty thousands of our women—women of that sacred land which gave birth to Seetha, Savitri and other immortal women of yore—are obliged to go to places like the Fiji islands to earn a living, and are forced to lead a degrading and sad life. If we could provide such poor women work in our own country and train them to earn an honourable and independent livelihood, such calamities could be prevented from taking place. There is the question of prostitutes. Every big town in India has a den of women given up to leading such a life and this problem stares us in the face as a national disgrace. Gandhiji with his usual sympathy and sincerity of feeling has often dwelt on this problem of fallen women, but the remedy he suggests is inadequate to cure this evil completely. He advises them to take to charka but spinning alone will be scarcely sufficient for a bare living. Women-workers must be ready to tackle this question and they alone could induce their fallen sisters to abandon their infamous mode of living, and train them up to earn an independent living by teaching them different branches of useful industry, by training them to become nurses and such like. Societies like the Poona Seva Sadan ought to be founded in every part of India to train up women workers to tackle these social problems successfully.

I dream of a day when every big town and district in India will have a society like this to carry on social work especially among women in these directions, and which will stand up as guardian of women's inherent rights as human beings and see that they are not oppressed but are allowed to have a free growth, are allowed to have the right of self-determination, so to say. I dream of a day when these societies will form an inter-provincial union to discuss the modes of work, exchange views in friendly co-operation, and carry on work in healthy competition with one another for the upliftment of the country in general and of women in particular. I pray for strength to contribute my little bit towards the fulfilment of these dreams.

SANYASIS AND POLITICS.

Bharati Krishna Tirtha, who was acquitted in the Karachi case, said at a public meeting held to congratulate him that he intended henceforth to devote himself to the Khilafat cause more than before. In view of this statement, the following from a leading article in the Hindu Message (Srirangam) of the 29th September, will be read with interest:—

Attendance at Khilafat Conferences and National Congresses are certainly not among the prescribed duties of Shankaracharyas who are bound by the strict letter of the law of their office to adhere to the duties which long-established tradition has attached to it. This adherence to paramparagata sampradaya—long-established tradition—should be religiously and scrupulously observed without even the slightest deviation if the dignity of the office is to be kept unimpaired. The religious veneration of the Hindus centre round principles and not persons and hence any the least violation of the acknowledged rubric (vyavastha) brings in its train complete loss of prestige and position. Similarly in the present instance when Swami Trivikrama Tirthji heard of this violation of sampradaya on the part of his disciple, His Holiness wrote to the Secretary of the Bharata Dharma Mahamandal as follows:—“That I entrusted my disciple Swami Bharati Krishna Tirtha with the responsibility of the Gadi was due to no other reason than that I did so for the sole cause of my being extremely ill I did not assign to him this position that he might eventually take part in politics. He should not, in my opinion, have mixed in party politics. There is no one but has a wish that his country may improve and his people be free. If the King be a righteous soul then verily has the Lord said “I am king among men.” In the king steadfastly devoted to his own duties reside Indra and other gods and consequently the relation of Sanatan Dharma to politics must needs be very close. But the parliamentary system which is being introduced into India is based on the politics of the West. It is its principle that like temporal heads the spiritual heads must not take part in any case in party politics. The Gadis of the four Sankaracharyas in the four quarters of India are unique spiritual centres, the heads of which should keep their dignity secure.” His Holiness Sri Sankaracharya of the Govardhana Mutt also says that His Holiness never recognised Swami Bharati Krishna Tirtha as the Sankaracharya of Sarada Peeth, that His Holiness never gave him consent to mix in party politics of the national or any other party, and “that His Holiness thinks that the parliamentary system of Government of the West is now gradually being introduced into the country and as the four Gadis of Sankaracharya are recognised spiritual centres of Hinduism in the four corners of India, the Heads of these four Peethas like the temporal Heads should not in any way meddle with party politics. The Dharmacharyas i.e., spiritual Heads should always remain above party politics to preserve the dignity of the Gadi.” The Head of the Sringeri Mutt also, in reply to the edict issued by His Holiness of Govardhana Mutt when he found that some were taking advantage of the present political situation of the country and meddling with party politics in the name of the Order, signifies his unqualified approval to each and every item of His Holiness's impressions and suggestions contained in the said edict and further commands his agent “to communicate to Sri Bharata Dharma Mahamandal his firm conviction that the followers of Sri Sankara Bhagavatpadacharya are at full liberty to take every possible step against the Sanyasis who transgress their asra-nadharmas and thereby render themselves incompetent to remain in that sacred Asrama.”

Under the circumstances we can safely assert that Swami Bharati Krishna Tirthji, though duly installed therein by his Guru, is not acknowledged as the Head of the Dvaraka Mutt by the Sanyasis of Govardhana Mutt and Sringeri Mutt and that both these Swamis, as also his own Guru Swami Trivikrama Tirthji, consider him to have transgressed the limits of his Order, the consequences of which he will have himself to reap without anybody feeling the least pang on that account. The Order of Sannyasa is not only the highest but also the most rigorous of all the Orders and one can never be too careful to preserve it. The least violation of its laws brings untold disaster both here and hereafter and the Order always commands universal respect simply because of its member's scrupulous observance of the extremely hard and rigorous laws. Such being the case it is just in the fitness of things that those who are recognised as the leaders of that Order should act as exemplars in observing the regular sampradaya and shine as beacon lights for the guidance of others leading them on to higher and yet higher spiritual planes ignoring altogether politics and other things mundane.

MALABAR CENTRAL RELIEF COMMITTEE,
CALICUT.

A MISCONCEPTION.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

With a view to fully convincing the public of Bombay and outside and disillusioning the minds of some of our Mahomedan friends of all doubts in the matter, I seek the hospitality of your columns to give publicity to the following statement:

The Malabar Central Relief Committee at Calicut is entirely humanitarian and non-sectarian in its mission of relief, and the only object of our work is to alleviate the sufferings of the poor refugees by giving them first the necessary protection, and then affording them every possible help to tide over the present troubles. We are thoroughly free of all sectarian bias of every kind, and all those who are in need of help and come to us are sure to get the necessary facilities at our hands. Let me specially assure some of my Mahomedan friends who still have vague notions about it that on account of this policy of ours, no difference in the treatment between Muslim and non-Muslim refugees could possibly be made, and none whatsoever is actually done. Our path is very clear to us, of giving relief to all needy refugees, and this we do to all as best as we can without any regard to their caste or creed. I am sure that those who have been following the reports of our work which, from time to time, I have sent to the Press will be convinced that our work bears out our intentions. I will specially call the attention of my friends to a deputation of the leading Moplah gentlemen of Calicut who assisted by some of the prominent Hindu members of our Committee waited upon Mr. E. F. Thomas, the Collector of the district, and the sympathetic hearing he accorded to them and the encouragement they received at his hands. As a result of this step the Committee was enabled to carry out its plan of helping the poor women and children of the Moplaha who needed such assistance, as soon as this need became apparent. Besides, the Committee is thoroughly representative in character, comprising as it does, of Hindus, Mahomedans, Christians and Europeans. The attitude of the Government, then, on this matter is very clear as also the policy of our Committee, and there is no reason to imagine that our Committee's efforts in this direction of affording relief to the Muslim refugees of which I had specially referred to in my last report will be different.

I remain,

Yours Sincerely,

G. K. DEVDHAN,

Vice-President.

INDIAN PRESS OPINIONS ON CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE.

The Tribune, Lahore Daily, (Congress).

But whether the struggle be localised in a small area or assumes a general character, there is not the smallest doubt that it will be a serious thing for both the Government and the people.

Here is a warning both for the Government and for the people; for the former because it is clearly to its interest that it should do everything in its power, while there is time, to prevent things coming to a head both by avoiding the blunders of England in Ireland and by following a policy of conciliation, of which justice and freedom shall be the twin note; for the latter because it is not only to their own best interest but to the best interest of their country to do everything in their power to avoid the sinful quagmire into which things have drifted in Ireland. As we said the other day, an Ireland in India would be an incomparably more serious problem to the British Government than the actual Ireland. But let us not forget that it would be an equally more serious problem to the people. The chaos, confusion and disorder that have made life in Ireland a veritable hell to peace-loving men would assume a much vaster proportion in India, and the misery and suffering that would follow in their train would be proportionately greater. Some of us may think that the price would be fully worth paying for freedom. Others may think that freedom and anarchy are incompatible terms, and may also believe that there is a better way of achieving freedom if only we can get rid of our notion that all will be over if freedom does not come by a particular day. Both must agree that before things are allowed to assume such a character, it is our duty no less than our interest to know what we are about, and to proceed with our eyes wide open that not a step should be taken in ignorance or without fully counting the consequences.

The Hindu, Madras Daily, (Congress).

The All-India Congress Committee has passed an important resolution on the question of Civil Disobedience. The discussion on the subject was animated and thorough with a clear grasp of all the realities of the situation. Mahatma Gandhi has been in this instance the focus to which the influences from all the ardent spirits in the country were directed, and he has been successful, it must be said, in withstanding the pressure from all sides and in reducing the problem to reasonable dimensions. He has put his position clearly not only in the summarised report of his speech wired to us but also in the issue of "Young India," dated the 3rd instant.

Mr. Gandhi has also promised to show by an example in his own Province of Gujarat how to bring about the practice of civil disobedience. From all this it is clear that the Mahatma is more acutely conscious of the dangers, pitfalls and impediments in the way of adopting civil disobedience than many of the impetuous advocates of that course. He fully realises that it is not an immediately practicable question in many parts of India. The conditions attached to the resolution have also to be clearly borne in mind before embarking on such a line of action. While we do not think that the adoption of civil disobedience in many parts of the country is expedient, practicable or imminent, the passing of such a resolution at the present time by responsible public men is a significant indication of the temper of the country, and of its electrified atmosphere.

The Servant, Calcutta Daily, (Congress.)

We are in perfect agreement with Mahatma Gandhi in holding that we have absolutely no right to launch out on the campaign of general civil disobedience until we have indisputably established our capacity to perform at least one united action. Though civil disobedience is the natural goal of non-co-operation, and though nothing would please us better than that the country should be ripe for it, we do not understand this anxiety on the part of some earnest spirits amongst us to rush to general civil disobedience when there is already enough scope for courage, sacrifice, suffering and determined action in the programme of non-co-operation that has been before the country for some time. Readiness to suffer is all right, but what is the meaning of this insistence on any particular form? Have we all given up law courts or used our influence with all whom we know to make up our quarrels amongst ourselves? Have we been able to take the education of our children into our own hands? Have we been able to make sufficient headway in the temperance movement? And last, though not least, the production side of Swadeshi has everywhere come in for so little attention that we have no hesitation in pronouncing it premature in the extreme to risk the defiance of all the demoralising laws of the land.

The Independent, Allahabad Daily (Non-Co-operator).

This then is the heart of the matter. Civil Disobedience is now launched. It includes the non-payment of taxes. It is subject to many conditions—conditions which are bound to break down in the working out. The breach of laws and the consequent filling of the jails, if the penalties are enforced, are part of the programme. A Calcutta critic thinks that non-payment of taxes would be the final term of the case. We do not think so. We hold that the breach of specific laws would matter more. But that is a detail. What is really important is the firmness of will behind the endeavour. We publish elsewhere Mr. Gandhi's own notion of the conditions of the struggle. Swadeshi, Hindu-Muslim unity and the readiness of one to die (if need be on the gallows) without shedding blood. We agree, but with this note:—Swadeshi is a symbol of patriotic determination, the things that count in the middle of the fight being Hindu-Muslim friendship and disciplined courage. We know there are various areas in India which can fulfil these conditions—Gujrat and elsewhere. If such areas undertake the campaign of Civil Disobedience, it is no literal quibbling to say that they would have Swaraj. There may be no visible House of Parliament, there may be no executive official clothed with the symbol of authority; but such areas would nevertheless be free and the King's authority will come to an end there as surely as it is non-existent in the Mopla-land (but with the difference obvious to anybody).

The Bombay Chronicle, Daily, (Congress).

The Indian people do not want to sever the connection with Britain, nor do they want a single Britisher now in India to leave the country or to suffer in any way. But as they love their honour above everything else, they are determined to remain in the British Empire, only on terms of the completest equality with its component parts, and to see that the Britisher in India, remains, not as their exploiter or master, but as their equal. The resolutions passed at the momentous meeting of the All-India Congress Committee, which has a greater volume of public opinion behind it than that enjoyed by any Parliament in the world, will, we hope, make Lord Reading realise, if he has not yet realised, the earnestness and determination of the people. The fact that there was a strong element in the Committee which demanded the relaxation in the conditions which Mahatma Gandhi and majority deemed essential for the exercise of civil disobedience should bring home to him how far the people are prepared to suffer in order to win their birthright.

The Bengales, Calcutta Daily, (Liberal).

The failure of the non-co-operation movement in its bearing upon educational institutions, the law-courts and the programme of arbitration has been deplored by Mr. Gandhi himself. The grog-shop has not been closed, the foreign cloth has not been tabooed, indigenous manufactures do not swell our markets. How then Mr. Gandhi can persuade himself to resort to the last step without caring to make the intermediate stages effective is something that passes our understanding. We do not know what form the first act of civil disobedience will take. But the chances are that non-payment of tax will be the source determined upon. We trust Mr. Gandhi will bethink himself beforehand what a small place land-revenue occupies in the scheme of taxes in British India and how the public exchequer is replenished by revenues from other sources. In the meantime, we wait and see how the ball is set rolling by him from Guzerat. Are we to take it that Guzerat has fully carried out the Swadeshi programme and realized all the items of the non-co-operation movement? It cannot be that the resolution on civil disobedience will be practised on a large scale, regard being had to the fact that only individuals and the Provincial Congress Committees are charged with the duty of making it an accomplished fact. We need not, therefore, take the resolution of the All-India Congress Committee seriously but follow the Aquithian policy of wait and see.

The Leader, Allahabad Daily, (Liberal).

Very few individuals can conscientiously say that they possess these high qualifications. But who is to judge whether an individual who takes to civil resistance possesses the subjective qualities which have been laid down? There are thousands who call themselves non-cooperators but who have no right to style themselves as such in the true Gandhian sense. The result of the sanction accorded by the Congress Committee would be that a number of individuals who do not fulfil the conditions prescribed will take to civil disobedience in a spirit not of love but of hatred, not of self-restraint but of mere license. The condition prescribed for mass civil disobedience will also be found difficult of fulfilment, except in small areas. A district or a tahsil is to be treated as a unit. Nothing has been said about the units in towns. The condition is that a vast majority of the population must have adopted full Swadeshi and must be clothed out of cloth hand-woven in the district or tahsil in which it is to be inaugurated. They must also believe in and practise all other items of non-co-operation. There may be people who may be in favour of charkha and khaddar but who may be strongly opposed to civil disobedience. Such people will, after the passing of this resolution, have to give up both, for they may feel that by encouraging them they will also be promoting the cause of civil disobedience. We are afraid that the Congress Committee by coupling Swadeshi with civil disobedience and by making the success of the former one of the main reasons for the adoption of the latter, had rendered a disservice to the cause of true Swadeshi. We are grieved that the two should have been so vitally connected together.

The Servant of India, Poona Weekly, (Liberal)

The All-India Congress Committee's resolution, with Mr. Gandhi's gloss on it, amounts to this, that Mr. Gandhi will commence civil disobedience in Guzerat and that workers in other provinces will watch the result for some time. It should be noticed that the civil disobedience campaign which Mr. Gandhi will now initiate is not a "conscience movement" like the one which Thoreau and Tolstoy preached. It is not proposed that those laws should be broken which offend against the conscience, but all laws which it may be convenient to break, however consonant they may be in themselves with the dictates of conscience. Mr. Gandhi says in Young India, that "those only can take up civil disobedience who believe in willing obedience even to irksome laws imposed by the State so long as they do not hurt their conscience or religion," but we doubt whether Mr. Gandhi intends to observe this condition himself. We feel sure rather that the movement of civil resistance will not be limited to laws which hurt conscience or religion, but will be extended to all laws which Mr. Gandhi may think it expedient to break. It exemplifies what we have said before that it is on expediency rather than on principle that the movement of non-cooperation is based.

SATRAP AS A SANYASI.

Sir N. D. Beatson Bell, the Ex-Satrap of Assam, after his retirement has settled in a place near Calcutta as a Christian hermit (Deacon) devoted to the service of suffering humanity. The deep humanity which was the deep undercurrent of his life through all his activity and lent such a charm to his personality has come out now that he has thrown off the huge panoply which crushed the soul and has freed himself from all the paraphernalia of high office. It is the just atonement for the support he gave to Kaifia case. We offer our homage to him in his new role. May the blessings of the common Father of all be on his devoted head and on all his work of humanity!

The Indian Messenger (Calcutta).

A WIDOW MARRIAGE.

A correspondent writes: Srimathi Chandravathi Bai, daughter of Dr. Kasargode Krishna Bhat was married on Tuesday the 1st instant to Mr. M. Manjunath Rao M.A.L.T. in Mangalore. The bride is the niece of Mr. V. P. Rao I. C. S. District and Sessions Judge, Tellichery and is aged 25. She had become a widow in her 12th year. The bridegroom is a Professor in Brennan College, Tellichery, and is aged 28. This is the seventh widow marriage in the Saraswat Brahmin community of the Sri Chitrapur Mutt. Rai Sahib K. Ranga Rao officiated as Purohit in the ceremony and it was registered under Act III of 1872.

That Bauble: We hope we are not wanting in a due share of historic feeling, but we confess that the information that the Empire Parliamentary Association has resolved to present a mace to the Indian Legislative Assembly left us in no very reverent mood. What does it matter if a mace is presented from England or is made in India? Why have a mace at all? There are various Indian designs of ornamental staves and, if one is considered indispensable, why not have one of these made of Indian ivory or ebony in preference to a replica of the one which Oliver Cromwell had removed from the British Parliament as a meaningless bauble?

ROYAL YAKUTI.

THIS YAKUTI or life giving nectar has been prepared from
the best, choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has wonderful properties of increasing virile power and it rectifies urinary disorders. In fact it makes men a man. This valuable
medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and
gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to those persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen
the body, refresh the memory and to guard against debility.
Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicines. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires. It is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills. Rupees ten only.

Mob Violence in Bombay: The agitation of the Khilafat and Congress parties to boycott the Prince's visit has had the most unfortunate and deplorable result of leading to a serious outbreak of mob-violence in parts of Bombay on Thursday and Friday. Municipal lamps in the area were smashed, men and women not wearing the Gandhi cap or khaddar cloth molested, liquor-shops and a Police station burnt down and the Police assaulted. The Police and Military had to resort to firing both on Thursday and Friday. The number of casualties cannot yet be definitely stated, but it is considerable. What added to the anxiety of the situation was that the mill-hands struck work and the mills had to be closed. A sinister feature of the outbreak is the racial bitterness engendered by it. Parsis, men and women, have been among the victims of mob hatred for no conceivable reason. Europeans and Anglo-Indians, every one wearing European clothes or even hats, were the objects of mob fury. Mahatma Gandhi's statement, which we print in another column, sets forth briefly but clearly what he himself saw. The only course open to him now is definitely to abandon the methods which have had such disastrous consequences, as he recognises. We take it that whatever may be the decision of the Working Committee of the National Congress, which is to meet next week at Surat, his decision that civil disobedience is out of the question, is irrevocable.

An Unfortunate Blunder: Whoever is responsible for persisting in the face of protests in keeping the paintings of Hindu gods and goddesses on the wooden pillars in the streets through which the Royal procession passed, deserves to be boycotted by the authorities until he develops a little sanity. The question is not, as it has been made out, whether such exhibitions are in accord with custom and practice. It is whether, when a section of Hindus, rightly or wrongly, object to their objects of worship being exhibited in a manner and in places not employed in the case of similar objects of worship in other religions practised in Bombay, it is commonsense to persist in a course which, in these times of tension, no sensible person should have thought of. There is a class of public men grown up in Bombay during recent years, who unfortunately have an undue amount of influence in high official circles. They have made money and their only rule of life is, "he who pays the piper, can call the tune." So long as they limit the application of this principle to matters which concern themselves, no harm is done, but they are utterly out of place as advisers on subjects which are beyond their ken but which enter into the deepest sentiments of the people. We have heard Hindu gentlemen of light and leading remark bitterly on this ill-advised feature of the decorations. We should add that this is not noticed here as a cause of or reason for the disturbances.

The Mulshi Petha Trouble: The Tata Power Company's statement, which we publish, is a frank and full explanation of their attitude on the question of according compensation to the ryots whose lands are required for the lake in which water is to be stored for the hydro-electric project. Their proposals must, we think, strike as fair and even generous to every one who does not hold that under no circumstances should land be acquired for a public purpose except by private negotiation which is cumbersome and impossible when a large area parcelled out into several small holdings has to be taken. No irrigation project can be undertaken and few other considerable projects whose benefits extend to large communities, if this principle were to be accepted. We hope that those who are in a position to advise the ryots concerned will realize that it is not to the interest of the latter to reject the liberal terms now offered by the Company.

Railway Finance: We take the following from a message in the Bombay Chronicle: "The personnel of the Railway Finance Committee which the Legislative Assembly agreed to appoint during the last Simla session to report on the Financial proposals of the Acworth Committee is now almost settled. The Hon'ble Mr. Hailey, Finance Member, will be its President with 16 members appointed from both houses of the India Legislature. The Committee sits in Calcutta from 5th to 10th December." It is hardly likely that this sort of piecemeal examination of the Railway Committee's Report will yield satisfactory results. The report should be taken and discussed as a whole by the Legislative Assembly, and such discussion may be prejudiced by dealing with the report in detail.

To Our Readers: Owing to our Press being located in the centre of the disturbed area, we have not been able to get out the paper on the usual day for the first time in twenty years. This issue goes to press on Monday.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1921.

THE PRINCE IN INDIA.

The Prince of Wales landed in Bombay on Thursday and was accorded a loyal and dutiful welcome. His Royal Highness's first public utterance in India, was the delivery of a message from the King Emperor, which breathed in every line the anxious solicitude of affectionate parents for the success of the visit of their son and heir to this country—the brightest jewel in the British Crown. His Royal Highness' own speech in reply to the address presented by the Municipal Corporation bore ample testimony to his deep desire to get into touch with the thoughts and aspirations of the Indian people. It fully bore out the declaration of Lord Reading to a deputation of Oudh Talukdars last week, that neither His Excellency nor his Government had ever had the faintest intention of using His Royal Highness' visit for political purposes, and his emphatic repudiation of the allegation that they intended to exploit it as a means of disguising from the British public and the world the real feeling and attitude of the Indian people on political questions. All may not agree with His Excellency's view that to have advised against the Prince's visit at this time, would have inevitably produced in the minds of the British public and of the peoples of the Dominions, impressions that would have reacted very unfavourably in them, or even that the Government were right in allowing any consideration except that of the state of the country to sway their judgment. In fact, His Majesty's message delivered by the Prince shows that no extraneous considerations of this oblique kind had a share in prompting the King-Emperor's decision that the visit should take place as originally intended. But we appreciate His Excellency's assurance that he fully acknowledged that there were many matters of public policy upon which serious and even acute differences of opinion obtained in this country. We are sure that full opportunities and facilities will be provided for His Royal Highness to learn and understand at first hand what these differences are.

The Throne is above all parties and politics. This does not mean, however, that the occupant of it is a negligible quantity. It does mean, no doubt, that the Sovereign can have no policy at a given time apart from that of his responsible Ministers. But no one who has read the published memoirs of Sovereigns and Ministers, can fail to see that the former exercise a vast deal of influence, all the more effective for its being hidden from the public view, on the policies which their Ministers pursue. A simple fact explains much of the real authority which the Crown possesses. Ministers come and go, while the Sovereign remains the sole constant and co-ordinating factor in the life of the State. In a hereditary ruler, this advantage is further strengthened by the force of tradition which none but sciolists can deny. We think it therefore, a welcome circumstance that the Prince at an early and impressionable period of his life visits the country of which he will be the future Sovereign so long as India remains within the British Commonwealth. That the British Commonwealth can endure as a single entity without the cementing strength of the Crown, is to us unthinkable. Even as Prince of Wales, His Royal Highness' influence in moulding the policy of the Empire, is not inconsiderable, but whether, it is so or not, it is a good thing that he has the opportunity to learn for himself that India is neither an ancient myth nor a modern fable.

The people of India are men and women of flesh and blood like to those of every other land, and they resent wrongs especially those arising from racial assumptions and cherish the same aspirations to regulate their own administration as those of Great Britain or Ireland. His Royal Highness will note before he is very long among us that, except for the racial factor, the problems of Indian politics differ in no essential respect from that of other countries with which he is more closely acquainted. Whatever, by a lent example rather than by solemn precept, His Royal Highness can do during his short sojourn among us to show that he regards that racial arrogance as the cardinal sin against the British Commonwealth, will be so much immediate service to the cause of India's national development in harmony with the rest of that Commonwealth. We do hope and trust that the Prince's intercourse will not be confined to persons who are sufficiently intimate with the staffs of Government Houses to hail individual members by their Christian names or to the sons and nephews of Indian Chiefs who have been appointed to ornamental posts about him. He must insist on meeting persons whose names may shock official prudens, because India as a whole has never more completely rejected the official code of what is right and respectable. The less the public feel that His Royal Highness is tied to official leading-strings, the more interesting to himself and fruitful of good to India is his visit likely to be.

CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM IN TRAVANCORE.

A Legislative Council for making Laws and Regulations was first constituted about 34 years ago in Travancore. The maximum strength of the Council was eight of whom two were to be non-officials nominated by Government. Twelve years later, the maximum strength of the Council was increased to 15 of whom not less than two fifths were to be non-officials. Though the new Regulation allowed election no rules were framed for such election. Some fifteen years later, the members of the Popular Assembly representing a particular division were asked to recommend a member for that division. This Regulation further detailed the subjects about which the Council could not pass any law. Twenty years later, the maximum strength of the Council was fixed at 25, not more than two fifths of whom were to be non-officials. The Council constituted under this Regulation consists now of 24 members of whom 13 are officials and eleven are non-officials. Of these latter 7 alone have been elected. Thus from 1863 up to now the Council had an official majority. Under the two previous Regulations the Council's power was only to frame laws. They are not allowed the right of interpellation and also of discussing the Budget, though they are not allowed to divide on the budget. These two were privileges conferred together with the right of election. The elected members are returned directly by the people and no sanction of Government was necessary for them to take their seats. This reform was adversely commented upon in that His Highness' Prerogative of independent legislation was explicitly reserved and that the Regulation itself was passed by His Highness directly and not through the Council. In a memorial presented to His Highness the Maharaja early this year this point was again emphasised and objection was also taken to the removal of the subject of coinage and legal tender from the purview of the Legislative Council. The memorial also prayed for an amendment of the regulation to provide for:—(1) a non-official majority, (2) the asking of supplementary questions, (3) the moving of resolutions, and (4) the liberalising of the rules relating to budget discussion. Mr. Raghaviab, the Diwan, in replying to the memorial, promised a sympathetic consideration of the last four points, but pointed out the untenability of the position taken with regard to the prerogative of the Sovereign in the matter of coinage and of making laws in his capacity of Sovereign, and the equally untenable position of a non-sovereign Legislative body seeking to enhance its own powers instead of obtaining them from the Sovereign.

In accordance with the above, a new Regulation has now been promulgated by His Highness the Maharaja. The strength of the Council has been raised to fifty of whom only 15 are to be officials. The remaining thirty five or seventy per cent. are to be non-officials and of these twenty eight will be elected by the people. Looking at it from another point of view there will be 28 elected members and 22 nominated members. The result of this constitution will be that there is not only a substantial non-official majority but a substantial majority of elected members as well and that no measure that has not received the general wishes of the people can be enacted. This is the first item of real popular power conferred by this Regulation, for, till now no law could be passed if it did not meet with the approval of Government. It might, however, be contended that under Section 13 of the Regulation the Diwan may vote against any Bill introduced into the Council or pass any Bill against the wishes of the Council. The action itself will show how restricted is the power thus vested in the Diwan, the exercise of it being limited only to the extreme cases where the safety or tranquillity of the country necessitates such exercise. The provisions of Section 13 follow closely the provisions of sub-section (2a) of Section 67 and (1) of 67 B of the Government of India Act which vests such powers in the Governor-General. The Council is under the new Regulation allowed not only to discuss the Budget but also to vote on the Budget, except with reference to matters that are referred to in sub-section (4) of Section 16. This is the second item of real popular Power conferred by this Regulation on the people of the State, viz., the power of the purse. The Legislative Council in which the popular element is represented by a substantial majority has under this Regulation power to give or refuse grants with which to carry on the Government. Certain items of expenditure and certain matters have no doubt been excluded from the purview of the Legislature, but an analysis of them will show that they relate either to the Prerogative of the Sovereign or his relations with the Paramount Power or to the Military the existence of which concerns the State vitally. In regard to almost all else, the control will hereafter be with the Legislature. This is the power which the British Parliament has so recently conferred on the Reformed Governments in India, a power which the people of Travancore are first among the inhabitants of Indian States to get. As for the exceptional power reserved in the Diwan and Government it is intended as in the case of enactment of laws to be exercised only in very exceptional cases. Similar powers are reserved to the Governor-General under Section 67 (a) of the Government of India Act. In short, the powers conferred upon the Council are similar to those conferred upon the Imperial Legislature of India and their virtue lies in the fact that they convert the Legislative Council from a purely advisory body into a Governing body. The number of questions that may now be put is unlimited and supplementary questions are allowed. Members are now given the right to move resolutions and the rules published under the Regulation have conferred the additional privilege on members of moving for an adjournment of the House to discuss matters of public interest. The new Regulation does not prohibit the appointment of a non-official Deputy President. These are additional privileges conferred by the present Regulation. From every point of view the present Regulation is a marked improvement and gives to the people of Travancore a substantial share in the administration of their country.

LONDON LETTER.

(From our own Correspondent).

London, October 27th, 1921.

EDUCATION FOR SOLDIERS.

The Thomas Atkins of the future is to be a man of brain as well as brawn, for it is foreshadowed that at a fairly early date, the fitness for army enlistment, shall not be only to pass a medical test, but an educational one also. The boy who in the past owing to circumstances beyond his control, has no schooling, or who played truant from school and positively refused the discipline of civil life, will no longer find an outlet for his energy in the army, for the army is no longer to be a trade for the educationally unfit. Many of the youths who have joined since the Armistice must have felt a shock of surprise when they realised, after going through strenuous physical exercises and hopping about like frogs, that they had to sit at desks and learn to read and write and do arithmetic, and their spirit of adventure or mental inertia must have been severely troubled. Yet so important has this aspect of education become to the army sheep, that, even during the recent rising in Mesopotamia and the active service condition in Ireland, instruction in the elements of education has never ceased to be given in the units stationed in these places. This educational experiment in the East and in the British Isles has demonstrated the fact that such training can coexist with military duties, and that the value of a man as a soldier is not lessened but, it is claimed, enhanced. The latter part of the war and especially since the armistice and demobilisation, the fact has been driven home to the State that the business of life is to fit men for conditions of peace and the Army has to come into line with this. Every man to-day is expected to learn some trade that shall fit him for life as a useful citizen, so that when his period of service is over, he can take his place with other men as a qualified worker. Some extremely good work has recently been done by the men trained at the two big training centres in England, which might be looked upon as the finishing school for manual labourers whose period of army life is drawing to a close, and practically all the men who have passed through this training have found good places.

WOMEN IN CAMBRIDGE.

Cambridge has decided against admitting women to full membership of the University by a big majority. Feeling ran very high, and both sides mustered their forces to the fullest extent of their respective powers, but the conservative party won the fight, and so Cambridge is to remain essentially masculine. But women are not content to accept this ruling of Cambridge, and have threatened to appeal to a Royal Commission that is now sitting; and probably even if the Royal Commission does not help them, they will continue to agitate and worry until, either from conviction or weariness the opposing section gives way. Perhaps if they do appeal to the Royal Commission, thus going beyond the Senate House of Cambridge, it may do a great deal to injure their cause with their own masculine adherents, as it would savour of possible future disloyalty to the University. The University certainly wishes to be master in its own domain, and to attempt to bring in an outside force to compel it to any action may retard, rather than hasten, the day of full membership with its accompanying responsibility.

REFORM IN THE CHURCH.

The Church Congress is sitting and it is trying to prove by its catholicity of subjects for discussion that the Church is not divorced from present-day needs. Scarcely any important subject has been left untouched, and the Prime Minister's blunt suggestion a little while ago that the Church should keep out of practical affairs seems to have stimulated it to greater activity in them, rather than compel it to sit with its hands folded as if in prayer and its eyes lifted Heavenwards. The Common Prayer Book has come in for much discussion, it being thought a fit time now for a revision of many of its prayers and ceremonies. The Burial Service was condemned as being "too pagan and mournful", the marriage service "contained expressions which were offensive to modern ideas and could be removed without detriment to its solemnity." The international note needed to be struck, as well as prayers for all those in charge of the commonweal and not almost exclusively for the Royal Family.

CONDITION OF RUSSIA.

The condition of Russia continues to agitate us. In fact we are now linking it with trade depression and unemployment, and are told that if we would save ourselves we must save Russia. Appeals are put forward in big type to save the famine-stricken people, and collections are made, quite big ones, to this end. Then another school of thought loudly declaims against sending money, food and clothing to a country far away, when our own people are in such dire need. And yet others are warning us that our money and food will not reach its destination, but be diverted to the maintenance of the Red Army; and thus while we are pouring assistance into Russia the Russian Government may be pouring money out in order to foment sedition among ourselves. The public are therefore torn with conflicting emotions of sympathy and anger. But all emotions are fleeting, and solid building rests upon solid foundations of thought, and the absolute knowledge that is being driven home to-day is that no nation can stand alone, a truth that will produce the driving power needed to exert ourselves to save Russia. When we fully realise, as we are beginning to do, that Russia's labour and Russia's market are needed for our well-being, we shall probably work out some policy of mutual benefit. Before the war nearly half the food Europe needed to import came from Russia. This supply is now closed and America is looked to, to make up the deficiency. But America does not need our manufactured goods and Russia does so that though the two problems of Russia's starving millions and our own workless seem far removed from each other, yet in reality they are very near together; and therefore, prudence, apart from humanitarianism, will dictate such full help as we can give to save Russia. Were Russia taking our manufactured goods, the work-people now idle and on the verge of starvation would be employed in making the things Russia needs and would take, and so we should see daylight through our dark labour night. If Russia's wheat market were again open, we in this could be able to buy from her much more cheaply than we do from America so that not only would trade revive and unemployment grow less, but the cost of necessities go down. All-round self-interest prompts us to take Russia seriously and earnestly, and if possible help her in her hour of extreme need to save her people from starvation, disease, despair, and death, and in saving herself internally, help her to regain her position in the community of Nations.

FROM A WAYFARER'S NOTEBOOK.

The special correspondent of the Hindu reports that nautch was one of the items of amusement at a garden party at Tanjore, given in honour of the visit of Lord and Lady Willingdon to that historic town in South India. It is not at all likely that their Excellencies, in the course of a gubernatorial tour, would have chosen to disregard the trend of public opinion about a much-debated and thorny social problem if they were already aware that officials and non-officials, ladies and gentlemen among the two races—Indian and British—have in the interests of personal and social purity relegated the institution of "nautch" to the limbo of oblivion. It is, by the way, a fresh illustration of the opinion held in certain quarters that an Englishman's desire or curiosity, on first arriving in the country, to understand and appreciate the strange customs and manners prevalent in his land of adoption is only short-lived and that prolonged residence in India does not serve to augment his knowledge of or insight into, the mainsprings of thought and activity in this great sub-continent. It is a matter for regret that the host in question did not sufficiently realise the delicacy of the situation nor appraise in full measure the nature and number of the issues involved in including, in the item of amusements, nautches by nautch-women as fit subjects for the delectation of distinguished guests of a different nationality. Space does not permit me to chronicle at length the progress of the anti-nautch propaganda, suffice it to say that the movement which began at Madras about thirty years ago has now spread all over India. Sir Narayan Chandavarkar and Dewan Bahadur R. Venkatratnam Naidu are among those who have all along supported this movement by precept and practice.

It will be within the recollection of your readers that the Englishman tried to set the Hugi on fire when, some years ago, a prominent English dancer proposed to give a public performance at Calcutta. When in this connection the question of dress and decency was discussed, it was broadly hinted that a reaction from excessive fondness for dress was only inevitable. Mahatma Gandhi's "Langoti-argument" is a powerful though extreme affirmation of the popular desire to give up prudery about dress in tropical India in the face of an imperious but self-imposed necessity to observe severe economy in the use of clothing during a period of transition. Necessity is very often the "tyrant's plea" but in this case the Mahatma, as a true tribune of the people, as one who knows where exactly the shoe pinches has faithfully given expression to the voice of the people—the "thousand-headed Demos." As professor Keller says, "it is a common place of history that customs and institutions arise, attain strength and vogue, finally to yield to other ways of procedure and to disappear. For the explanation of this rise and fall we do not look to the individual or to the limited group of individuals, except as he or they stand forth as the leading agency or exponent of the societal change. This is the only way in which the sociologist can view the "great man in history" he may sign an Emancipation Proclamation, but he does it only as a delegate or representative. For the causes of alteration in the code we look to more massive factors which have to do with the life of the society as a whole, as, for instance, economic change or the rise of a religion". ("Societal Evolution" p. 55). In the India of today the "massive factor" is essentially economic. This is the secret and the significance of Sri Ramakrishna Paramahansa's saying that you cannot expect any man to listen to a sermon on religion and religious life when he is hungry.

It is obvious that Rabindranath Tagore is not the poet to give to any party what is meant for mankind. In critically examining some of the methods of the non-co-operator he has given a piece of his mind to his admiring countrymen and has also taught how to think aloud. "Thou shalt obey" has been the refrain of the Indian mantra for ages; hence the great need for the Mahakavi to say: "If nobody follows thee, go thou forward alone," for, man does not live by bread alone. While the poet's protest is a timely one, it is amusing to note the desperate attempts made in certain quarters to emphasise the lines of cleavage or magnify the points of difference between Tagore and Gandhi. The illuminating remark of the I. S. Reformer that the Mahatma represents the Indian heart at its systole, and the Mahakavi at its diastole should serve as a necessary corrective to all "men of formula."

What will posterity think and say of two of the greatest Indians now living? If Mahatma Gandhi were to continue in his present role as a political priest the answer is plain. Herbert Paul in his "Life of Gladstone" says that when the Prime Minister and the Poet-Laureate went to Kirkwall, the former made the most graceful of his occasional speeches, contrasting the perishable nature of the statesman's fame with the immortal renown of the great poet. Morley has quoted this speech in his "Life of Gladstone." On the day when India wins "Swaraj" even the Mahatma will cheerfully admit that the song that nerves a nation's heart is in itself a deed.

The Tamils have lost a poet of light and sweetness in the passing away, at an early age, of Subramania Bharati. During his exile at Pondicherry he renounced politics, and, in the company of that great Indian, Sri Aurobindo Ghosh, worked in a higher field with the result that this Tamil bard, as Gladstone said of Tenyson, "Has written his own song, on the hearts of his countrymen, that can never die." When I met Bharati at Madras some months previous to his death he looked the shadow of his former self—such was his grinding poverty. It is once more the sad story of a good and great man leaving his mortal coils for want of bread and his admiring countrymen walking penitently to his grave with a polished stone to perpetuate his memory.

The Rev. Mr. H. A. Popley wrote some years ago in the Christian College Magazine: "I have read as many of the recent Tamil poetical productions as I could come across, searching for the man, who, like the poet Laureate of Bengal, (of Asia) could weave together clean words and high thoughts in the Tamil language into a sweet mystic music, as Thayumanavar, Pattinathar and many others have done," and the new book of Tamil poetry by Mr. T. Lakshmana Pallai B. A. of Travancore made his heart rejoice as he found it was full of clear, crystal gems of verse and thought. Mr. Pillai has been called an Orpheus in music, for he has composed numerous inspiring and melodious "Kirtanams" of a non-sectarian character which are sung by all classes of people. It is said that the music lessons he gives free to all comers have developed a love of music in many a person in Travancore. The Empress magazine of Calcutta has described Mr. Pillai as the Rabindranath Tagore of South India, and in his Protestant Hinduism and wide tolerances and sympathy with young and old, his Buddhistic love for animals, his literary attainments and musical accomplishments, his austere simplicity of life and philosophic outlook, the life of this gifted poet presents a striking resemblance to that of the Sage of Shantiniketan.

A WAYFARER.

MAHATMA GANDHI'S STATEMENT.

The following is the text of a statement issued by Mahatma Gandhi to the Press on Friday :—

The reputation of Bombay, the hope of my dreams, was being stained yesterday even whilst in my simplicity I was congratulating her citizens upon their non-violence in the face of grave provocation, for the volunteers with their captain were arrested during the previous night for pasting posters under authority on private property. The posters advised the people to boycott the welcome to the Prince. They were destroyed. The Swaraj Sabha's office was mysteriously entered and the unused posters, so far as I am aware, not declared unlawful, were also removed. The Prince's visit itself and the circumstances attending the ceremonies arranged and the public money wasted for the manufacture of a welcome to His Royal Highness, constituted and unbearable provocation. And yet Bombay has remained self-restrained. This I thought, was a matter for congratulations. The burning of the pile of foreign cloth was an eloquent counterdemonstration, to the interested official demonstration.

Little did I know that at the very time that the Prince was passing through the decorated route and the pile of foreign cloth was burning in another part of the city, the mill-hands were in criminal disobedience of the wishes of their masters employing them, first one and then the others by force, that a swelling mob was molesting the peaceful passengers in the tramcars and holding up the tram traffic; that it was forcibly depriving those that were wearing foreign caps of their head-dresses, and pelting inoffensive Europeans. As the day went on the fury of the mob, now intoxicated with its initial success, rose also. They burnt tramcars, a motor, smashed liquor shops and burnt two.

I heard of the outbreak at about one o'clock. I motored with some friends to the area of disturbance and heard the most painful and the most humiliating story of the molestation of Parsi sisters. Some few were assaulted, and even had their ears torn from them, no one among a crowd of over fifteen hundred who had surrounded my car denied the charge as a Parsi with hot rage and quivering lips was with the greatest deliberation relating the story. An elderly Parsi gentleman said, 'Please save us from this mob rule.' This news of the rough handling of Parsi sisters pierced me like a dart. I felt that my sisters or daughters had been hurt by a violent mob! Yes, some Parsis had joined the welcome. They had a right to hold their own view free of molestation. There can be no coercion in Swaraj. The Moplah fanatic who forcibly converts a Hindu believes that he is acquiring religious merit. A non-cooperator or his associate who uses coercion has no apology whatsoever for his criminality.

As I reached the Two Tanks I found two liquor shop smashed, two policemen badly wounded and lying unconscious on cots without anybody caring for them. I alighted. Immediately the crowd surrounded me and yelled 'Mahatma Gandhi ki jai.' That sound usually grates on my ears, but it has grated never so much as it did yesterday, when the crowd unmindful of the two sick brethren choked me with the shout at the top of their voices. I rebuked them and they were silent. Water was brought for the two wounded men. I requested two of my companions and some from the crowd to take the dying policemen to the hospital. I proceeded then to the scene a little further up, where I saw a fire rising. There were two tram cars which were burnt by the crowd. On returning I witnessed a burning motor car. I appealed to the crowd to disperse, told them that they had damaged the cause of Khilafat, the Panjab and Swaraj. I returned sick at heart and in a chastened mood.

At about five a few brave Sindhi young men came to report that in Bhandi Bazar the crowd was molesting every passerby who had foreign cap on and even seriously beating him, if he refused to give up his cap. A brave old Parsi who defied the crowd and would not give up his Puggie was badly handled. Maulana Azad Sobhani and I went to Bhandi Bazar and reasoned with the crowd, told them that they were denying their religion by hurting innocent men. The crowd made a show of dispersing. The police were there, but they were exceedingly restrained. We went further and on retracing our steps found to our horror a liquor shop on fire. Even the fire brigade was obstructed in its work. Thanks to the efforts of Pandit Makram Sharma and others, the inmates of the shop were able to come out.

The crowd did not consist of hooligans only, or boys. It was not an unintelligent crowd. They were not all mill hands. It was essentially a mixed crowd, unprepared and unwilling to listen to anybody. For the moment it had lost its head. And it was not a crowd, but several crowds numbering in all not less than twenty thousand. It was bent upon mischief and destruction.

I heard that there was firing resulting in deaths and that in the Anglo-Indian quarters every one who passed with khadder on came in for hard bunting, if he did not put off his khadder cap or shirt. I heard that many were seriously injured. I am writing this in the midst of six Hindus and Mussalman workers who have just come in with broken heads and bleeding, and one with a broken nasal bone and other lacerated wounds and in danger of losing his life. They went to Parel led by Maulana Azad Sobhani and Muzam Ali to pacify the mill hands, who it was reported were holding up tram cars there. The workers however were unable to proceed to their destination. They returned with their bleedings to speak for themselves.

Thus the hope of reviving mass civil disobedience has once more been dashed, in my opinion, to pieces. The atmosphere for mass civil disobedience is absent. It is not enough that such an atmosphere is to be found in Bardoli, and therefore it may go on side by side with the violence in Bombay. This is impossible. Neither Bardoli nor Bombay can be treated as separate, unconnected units. They are parts of one great indivisible whole. It was possible to isolate Malabar. It was also possible to disregard Malegaon. But it is not possible to ignore Bombay.

Non-co-operators cannot escape liability. It is true that non-co-operators were ceaselessly remonstrating everywhere with the people at considerable risk to themselves, to arrest or stop the mischief and that they are responsible for saving many precious lives. But that is not enough for launching out on civil disobedience or to discharge us from liability for the violence that has taken place. We claim to have established a peaceful atmosphere, i. e., to have attained by our non-violence sufficient control over the people to keep their violence under check. We have failed when we ought to have succeeded; for yesterday was the day of our trial. We were under our pledge bound to protect the person of the Prince from any harm or insult. And we broke that pledge inasmuch as any one of us insulted or injured a single European or any other who took part in the welcome to the Prince. They were as much entitled to take part in the welcome as we were to refrain. Nor can I shirk my own personal responsibility. I am more instrumental than any other in bringing into being the spirit of revolt. I find myself not fully capable of controlling and disciplining that spirit. I must do penance for it. For me the struggle is essentially religious. I believe in fasting and prayer and I propose henceforth to observe every Monday a twenty-four hours' fast till Swaraj is obtained.

The Working Committee will have to devote its attention to the situation and consider in the right thereof whether mass civil disobedience can be at all encouraged until we have obtained complete control over the masses. I have personally come deliberately to the conclusion that mass civil disobedience cannot be started for the present. I confess my inability to conduct a campaign of civil disobedience to a successful issue, unless a completely non-violent spirit is generated among the people. I am sorry for the conclusion. It is a humiliating confession of my incapacity, but I know that I shall appear more pleasing to my Maker by being what I am, instead of appearing to be what I am not. If I can have nothing to do with the organised violence of the Government, I can have less to do with the unorganised violence of the people. I would prefer to be crushed between the two.

THE MOPLAH RIOTS.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The Indian Social Reformer has the well-deserved reputation of being an independent, dignified and impartial critic of men and matters and I have learnt to attach much weight and importance to all opinions expressed by you as its distinguished editor. Hence it has pained me considerably to read the comments you have made from time to time on the unfortunate and highly regrettable happenings now going on in my unhappy country, Malabar. Sir, you have erred in having in the first instance attributed the Moplah rising to the activities of the Congress and Khilafat party in Malabar. You have absolutely nothing to gain by unjustly accusing the congress people in Malabar of crimes they are not guilty of. You have written very often on the riots now going on in Malabar. You know perfectly well that during the last 50 years there were over 40 Moplah risings and may I enquire in which particular way is the present outbreak different from its kind of the past? Have the circumstances that made Moplah out-breaks possible in the past materially changed? What steps have been taken by the Government and the Hindus of Malabar to remove the grievances of the Moplah population? Even the Modern Advocates of Calicut which is undisputedly an anti-Congress organ and which, unlike some of its contemporaries in Malabar, can rightly claim to be consistent in its views, of whatever nature they may be, in the course of a recent well-written leading article clearly states that agrarian discontent supplied the fuel for the present conflagration. Allow me in this connection to respectfully draw your attention to an article that appeared in the Bombay Chronicle of the 27th September last in which an attempt has been made by the writer to set forth at some length the agrarian aspects of the riots. What has been done during all these years to remove this fuel as the Modern Advocate terms it? Was any attempt made to reform the wretched condition of the Malabar peasantry? If the Congress and Khilafat propaganda had been responsible for the outbreak, I ask, why was there no trouble in Tellichery, Calicut, Ponnani Town and other Moplah centres which were the hotbeds of non-co-operation and Khilafat agitation? I do not want to disguise the fact that certain well-known mischief makers had got into the Khilafat Committees and in spite of the plea of the Congress leaders in Malabar that they know nothing about these and that they could not check the membership register as their free-movements were interfered with, I am not prepared to acquit them of all blame for this. But I ask you, Sir, in all seriousness whether it was a mere accident that the trouble broke out in those parts of the district where section 144 of the Criminal Procedure Code had been rather liberally applied? It may have been only an accident; but undoubtedly the theory of accident is not unquestionable in this case.

I wish I could trace here the course of events that, in my opinion, led to the rebellion. But the limitation of space stands in the way. In the latest issue of the Reformer you speak of the "more responsible leaders of the non-co-operation-Khilafat movement" having candidly acknowledged that the movement has received a "serious blow" as a result of the rising. I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that these "more responsible leaders" whoever they may be, are as ignorant of Malabar conditions as the worst critics of the Congress party. They are at perfect liberty to make any acknowledgements they like. But in a matter so intimately affecting Malabar, they ought to have heard what the Malabar leaders have to say on the matter before making such declarations. I do not believe that Mahatma Gandhi or any one else are possessed of supernatural powers and I am of opinion that they are lamentably wrong in having made a definite declaration on matters chiefly concerning Malabar without consulting the Malabar leaders. I do not exactly know in which way the rising had been a blow to the Congress movement. But if this acknowledgement of the "more responsible leaders" implies that the rising was due to the activities of the Congress party in Malabar, I have not the least hesitation in saying that they are totally wrong. I might mention for the information of the Congress leaders all over India that the Malabar Congress Committee stands in danger of coming into discredit if it stops relief work for want of funds and the duty before them is not to wail about imaginary blows but to send sufficient money to Mr. Kesava Menon, one Kayfi per day from whose hands would be far more preferable to many of my suffering sisters and brothers in Malabar to all the comforts that may be in the power of any other relief agency to provide them with.

Turning again to the causes of the rising, how often have some of us told the Madras Government to treat with equal seriousness the appeals of the poor peasantry of Malabar as the 'advocates of the rich jermies, birthday and new-year rajas and other big persons? They may wipe off the last trace of the Congress influence from Malabar; they may appoint Special Commissioners and frame special laws in plenty. But so long as the present agrarian situation remains unchanged, there are possibilities of future troubles. I repeat what I wrote full two years ago in the course of a series of articles in the Hindu of Madras on the Malabar Tenancy question that Malabar cannot and will not have peace so long as the agrarian laws remain unchanged.

V. MADHAVAN NAIR.

[We have always distinguished carefully in our comments on the Mopla outbreak between Khilafat non-co-operation on the one hand, and Swadeshi and other non-co-operation, and the Congress. We have ourselves said that Government and the public must bear the ultimate blame for the ignorance and fanaticism of the Mopla community and that the true prevention for similar ebullitions is to provide for its education. Any agrarian grievances which they may have should certainly be remedied. But the immediate duty of Government and all responsible persons is to stop the murders and worse outrages and to give relief to those, whether Hindus or Moplas, who have been rendered destitute by the outbreak. We have not said a word of criticism against the Congress relief arrangements, and we have, therefore, from considerations of space, omitted our correspondent's vindication of them. Similarly, we have nothing to do with what other journals might have said, and we have not out his criticism of them. Our correspondent does not contradict our statement that responsible leaders have acknowledged that the outbreak is a severe blow to Khilafat Non-Co-operation. These gentlemen surely know what they are talking about. Ed. I S. R.]

INDIAN PRESS OPINIONS.

The Citizen, Madras Week'y, (Liberal).

Civil disobedience was bound to come, in any case at the last string in the non-co-operation bow, but the cases against the Ali Brothers and other prominent Khilafat workers have advanced its emergence before its time. Mr. Gandhi has been frankly stating his opinion that the people were not yet ready for it, that there was not yet that atmosphere of non-violence needed for its advent and that self-sacrifice and discipline had not been practised to a sufficient extent to warrant the unfolding of the new flag. If, after this emphatic opinion, repeated over and over again, he himself proposed the resolution about civil disobedience, including the non-payment of taxes, at the last meeting of the All-India Congress Committee the result should be attributed partly to his being egged on by his followers to exhaust the one item that had not yet been put into force, partly to Mr. Gandhi's belief that no violence would result if it is practised by the persons specified and in the manner defined by him and partly to the use which it might be intended to have as a bluff by some of his supporters. It is not possible by any means to foresee what the exact effect of the new programme will be on the course of events, but one thing is certain. There are quite a lot of young men, sincere, self-sacrificing, patriotic and brave who are now camp-followers and who are full-blooded non-co-operators. The conscience of these courageous men will force them to resort to civil disobedience with the inevitable consequences. Mr. Gandhi's injunctions and prayers and threats notwithstanding, this depletion of the ranks of many of the true men will lead to public panic and demonstration and other popular outbursts and blood-spilling may very probably follow, though not necessarily rivers of blood. Mass civil disobedience is practically out of the question owing to the restrictions imposed and the authorities would feel quite able to deal with individuals and even particular tracts. The indirect consequences of this deliberate violation of law will be even more serious than those which have followed from the non-co-operation propaganda in embittering the people and in instilling hatred of the Government into them.

The Sind Observer, Karachi Daily, (Liberal).

The novelty of civil disobedience will also wear out like the novelty of several other short cuts to Swaraj. But it is in the hands of the Government either to make the movement formidable, which like a tidal wave will sweep the country, or to allow it to die on account of its own inherent defects. Non-co-operation has up to now shown that it carries within itself the elements of its own destruction. In some talukas of Gujarat and elsewhere it may go up like a rocket at the beginning but its fall is sure and certain. We were amazed at the spectacle of hundreds and even thousands of boys in Calcutta and other cities coming out of their schools to swell the ranks of non-co-operators but most of them have gone back to their schools on account of non-interference on the part of the authorities. In the beginning there will be a great response, especially when the Mahatma himself is prepared to break the law. Only repression and suppression will spread the movement like wildfire. If Lord Reading allows civil disobedience to burn itself out, he will be wise in his generation.

The Hitavada, Nagpur Weekly, (Liberal).

People have therefore now to consider how far they accept all the implications contained in this statement and how far they are prepared to go with Mr. Gandhi. He himself has advised all who would be his followers to wait and see what he will do in a small Tahsil in Gujarat and profit by his experiment. For ourselves we consider it a piece of mere madness in spite of a certain method which is its characteristic. The resolution passed by the All India Congress Committee regarding civil disobedience under the influence of Mr. Gandhi is hedged round by the many restrictive conditions, that if these limitations are strictly borne in mind there is no untoward consequence likely to result in the immediate future. But it is exactly here that all mass movements fail and whatever apprehensions we have on the matter are simply due to the fact that excesses might be committed which is bound not only to lead to but justify repressive policy. We can only watch and wait, for we dare not hope that Mr. Gandhi will abandon his course. It is evident that Gandhi's only hope now is in doing something which must force the hands of Government. Verily the future is on the knees of the Gods.

The West Coast Spectator, Calicut Tri-weekly, (Liberal).

Some months ago, when one of the Provincial Congress Committees betrayed an eagerness to precipitate the civil disobedience stage of the Congress programme, we took occasion to animadvert, as strongly as we could, on the very grave unwisdom and danger of going forward, whether precipitately or leisurely, with a weapon, the use of which would inevitably involve the country in still more strife and violence, following that which had already resulted, in not a few portions of the country, from the propagation of a movement which, though meant to be non-violent, cannot possibly be other than one of violence and disorder. If, months ago, attempts to rush forward to the stage of civil disobedience constituted a menace to the peace and progress of the country, who that witnesses events which are at the present moment happening in several portions of the country, principally our own unhappy District, and endeavours to see where these profoundly significant happenings are likely to lead the nation to, would have the temerity to declare that the hour has now struck when civil disobedience could be entered upon as a safe and sure step towards the goal of national liberty, advancement and genuine prosperity? Mr. Gandhi himself, as is abundantly evident from the appealing speech which he made the other day at Delhi, at the meeting of the All-India Congress Committee, is most gravely diffident and apprehensive as regards the consequences which would ensue upon a premature enforcement of the principle and practice of civil disobedience, which with characteristic unambiguity, he defined as a civil revolution, which, wherever practised, would mean an end of government authority in that particular area and open defiance of Government and its laws. We, in Malabar, are in a most exceptional position to appreciate the aptness and accuracy of Mr. Gandhi's definition of the most important and formidable weapon in his Non-Co-operation armoury. The Ernad Moplah was advised and egged on to go in for civil disobedience, for revolutionary propaganda and for open defiance of the laws and authority of the Government. He was not slow to act upon the advice offered to him, and the result, as a manifestation of non-violent Non-co-operation, is positively staggering humanity. Mr. Gandhi appears to have made no allusion to the startling effects which have attended precipitation of the successive stages of non-violent Non-co-operation in Malabar, but it would not be rash to assume that the lesson of Malabar has not been entirely lost upon him.

THE MULSHI PETHA LAND ACQUISITION.

We have received the following statement from the Tata Power Company Ltd. explaining the principles and the procedure they have followed in acquiring land in Mulshi Petha:

If in England the cry of "Back to land" is raised, it is because roughly eighty per cent. of the population have turned to industrialism, and England depends for corn and produce mainly from abroad. In India, the conditions are precisely the reverse; and agriculture is the occupation of eighty per cent. of the population. Agriculture alone has never enriched a country and in the modern world a country's progress is always retarded as long as agriculture remains its chief pursuit. A greater diversity of occupation is required to relieve the pressure on the land.

If it had not been for the success of the Cotton Industry sufficient capital would not have accumulated in the country for the initiation of such large industries as the manufacture of Iron and Steel and for the other large schemes that have now been launched in India. The uplift of the masses has never been attained through agricultural pursuits, because the standard of living of the agricultural classes is low, their resources inadequate and the diffusion of ideas impossible where the people are spread over a large area. It is true that industrialism brings with it certain evils. But these can be met and cured in course of time. The great benefits of the rising wage, of increased intelligence, increased industry and superior efficiency all conduce to the benefit of the country and are all therefore for the national good.

If India is far too agricultural in its pursuits, the diversion of some of its land to higher uses must be looked on as a national good. The Government of Bombay take this view and have accorded their sympathy and help to the Hydro-Electric Schemes of the Bombay Presidency which will form the basis of all increased industry between Kalyan and Bombay.

Among the benefits to industry which Hydro-Electric power confers are its smoothness of drive, cleanliness of plant, ease of manipulation, and most important of all the decreased cost. By supplanting coal as a source of energy, as has been pointed out in a previous statement, the full development of 160,000 H. P. of the Tata Power Scheme will save 525,000 tons of coal every year. It has been suggested that this is only a small portion of the total output of India. But it should be remembered that the tonnage of coal referred to is of first class or good second class quality, which is the only quality which can be of any utility to the industries in Bombay, very distantly situated as they are from the collieries, since the cost of freight makes it impossible to use any coal of lower grade.

The wild assertion by those who oppose the scheme that Government have undertaken to acquire land for it because it will enable a conservation of coal for the British Navy can be answered outright by the fact that the best Welsh coal is just now being sold in Bombay in composition with Indian Coal.

Apart from that the saving of this volume of coal means the freeing of 26,250 wagons every year on the Indian Railways for other national needs, making it possible to distribute foodstuffs more evenly through the country and enabling Railways to meet other trade demands more easily.

Another benefit to the country is the fact that the numerous factories which will be converted or worked by electricity, will scrap their steam engines and boilers and will cease to import the large number of spares required for their maintenance. Those who are familiar with the cost of spares or maintenance of steam power will readily realize that the money which goes towards their purchase will be kept in the country. New factories will not import Engines and boilers at all.

The company will also supply power to the Railways for suburban electrification and to the Tramways. This will increase and accelerate communications in Bombay, enable the city to expand, and thus help to relieve the existing congestion, and the insanitation, disease and mortality arising out of it.

It is true that when the acquisition of large areas of land took place for the first Hydro-Electric Scheme, Government valued the land at about twentyfive times the assessment, which was a rough and ready means of fixing market value in places where a ready market for the land did not exist owing to their being far away from any cities of importance. When the Andhra Scheme was initiated, Government were the first to draw attention in 1917 to the fact that acquisition on such a basis was not fair to the evicted population. The Company readily and heartily concurred, but in so far as Government's intentions were to spend a higher contribution from it on works of general utility, the Company endeavoured to secure the benefits of such increased contribution directly and adequately for the evicted Maylas themselves. The settling of these questions of policy, and later, the collection of facts and figures as to the actual yield on each class of land, did not bring these negotiations to a close till March 1921. The figures obtained by Government of the yield on each class of land were, it may be mentioned based on actual experiments on site, and on the average net income of the landowners for a series of years.

The long delay in the solution of the question how compensation should be paid, brought about however an unfortunate circumstance. The Andhra works were carried on with all the speed that only industrial control is capable of, and many lands were submerged before Government had declared its decision on the compensation to be paid. Records of lands and buildings so submerged were, however, carefully kept. In any case this delay in settling the compensation was a serious matter, which the Company has made every endeavour to avoid in the case of Mulshi Petha. There both Government and the Company have taken every precaution to expedite acquisition by the appointment of more than one Acquisition Officer, and strict orders have been issued to expedite the matter. The investigation into the Andhra and the Mulshi Valleys were carried on almost simultaneously so that the figures for the Mulshi Valley were declared by Government within a month or two after the compensation figures were declared for the Andhra Valley. The two previous mistakes of inadequate compensation and very belated compensation will therefore have both been avoided in the Mulshi Scheme.

We shall now explain how the compensation was fixed. The Government officials went into the records of a series of years to arrive at the average yield to the land owners on each class of land. In several villages, actual experiments were made to ascertain the amount of corn that was threshed on a number of plots. This actual average yield was then valued at the price corn prevailing towards the end of 1920, when prices were at their very highest. The income in money was then capitalised. Since Government paper fetches a secure and steady income at six per cent, it will be understood that capitalisation at eight per cent for land extremely liberal in so far as even in Mulshi Petha which has never known famine, the yield from the land falls very often as low as an eight anna crop. It will then be seen that in arriving at these figures every latitude and margin has been allowed by Government. To this the Company have added a bonus of 15 to 25% for all land owners who willingly sell their lands, so that the best rice lands will be paid for at the rate of Rs. 622 per acre, including the extra amount paid by Government for compulsory acquisition and the bonus which the Company offers to all owners who settle amicably.

It may be mentioned that in the Andhra Valley, the compensation was considered so satisfactory that every one of those who had applied for lands in exchange withdrew their applications and took the money compensation instead.

Turning to some misstatements which have been spread far and wide, it has been asserted that the whole of Mulshi Peta with its 40,000 acres will be laid waste by the formation of the Mulshi Lake. The Mulshi Lake will actually submerge only, 10,000, acres out of the 40,000 and more acres of Mulshi Peta. It has been urged that the lake being in the lowest portion of the valley will submerge all the rice lands. Official figures show that the lake will submerge only 3,583 acres of rice land out of the 18,251 acres which produce rice in Mulshi Peta.

Rumours have been set afloat that outside the lake area lands will be acquired wholesale for afforestation purposes. The Company has already notified in Mulshi Peta that no such acquisition was ever contemplated. We believe Government also do not contemplate afforesting any of the lands round the lake.

Every effort will be made to complete the acquisition within the next few months so that compensation will have been paid out to all land owners very early.

The construction of the Mulshi Dam is such that raising the foundations to ground level alone will occupy about two years, so that hardly any land will be submerged during the next two years. Lands will then be gradually submerged so that the bulk of the area is not likely to go under water for the next five years. And the Company has notified land owners that they will be permitted to raise their crop free of rent during such time. This will be, to a very large number of land owners, an appreciable addition to the compensation and the bonus given by the Company. Thus the full income from the land free of rent for several years is assured.

Income from agriculture is always small. The establishment of the Mulshi Works will be able to give the labourers who choose to come and work on the dam nearly four times the income they could get from cultivation. Those who wish to continue their agricultural pursuits will be able to do so for several years to come as shown above. By that time, in the neighbouring valleys, the extension of the irrigation works of the Nira Right Bank Canal will have progressed sufficiently for Government to guarantee enough water for rice cultivation at the usual rates for about 3,000 to 4,000 acres to such of the Mavlas as choose to settle in the irrigated area. The Government have assured the Company that such help will be possible as a special case for such of the expropriated Mavlas as choose to settle in the irrigated area. The number of rice lands in the Poona District will, therefore, not in any way be decreased by the Mulshi Works, nor will the Mavlas find their agricultural occupation gone.

The Company have anxiously done, and will do all it can for the Mavlas. The Company, having paid full compensation and done everything for the benefit of the Mavlas, will arrange by every means in its power to enable them to settle along the Nira Canal in the next few years so that they may take advantage of the assurance given by Government. In this work such of the leaders of the Mavlas as have their true interests at heart can also substantially help.

It will thus be seen that the Mavlas who may be expropriated from their homes can be settled in their ancestral occupation in the neighbouring valleys, should they so desire.

In the acquisition of land for a Hydro-Electric Scheme it is essential that an absolutely perfect title should be assured to the Company. This is only possible through the Land Acquisition Act. This is our only answer to the demand of some of the public that the Act should not be availed of. The public complaint that the Land Acquisition Act does not secure adequate compensation has been fully answered above, by the action of the Company in securing ample money compensation. So confident is the Company as to the adequacy of the compensation, that it is quite willing that the valuation be made the subject of arbitration by arbitrators appointed by the Company and leaders of the Mavlas in equal number with, in the event of a difference arising, a Sar panch or Umpire of undoubted standing, acceptable to both parties, to decide between them.

It may be pointed out that arbitration is only possible under two conditions. The acquisition of land is a matter entirely within the purview of the Government, and it is only when Government have acceded to our wishes by allowing the valuation to be decided by arbitration that the Company is now able to make this offer. Secondly, arbitration would be of no avail unless the Company feels sure that the leaders of the Mavlas have a sufficiently powerful following amongst them to accept the valuation as unreservedly as the Company is prepared to do.

The Tata Power Company trusts that this explanation based on official facts and figures which can be substantiated from records will satisfy the public as to the bonafides of the Company putting through a scheme of un doubted benefit to the Nation as a whole.

It might be pointed out that well over a crore has already been spent towards the execution of this great Scheme, so that the hardship to the shareholders (amongst whom will be found a large number of people of small means) at such a stage by the abandonment of the Scheme would be infinitely greater than the hardship to a few Mavlas in the Poona District for whom adequate compensation and other facilities have been provided.

It has been urged that the Tatas are pressing this Scheme because of the enormous benefits which they are to derive therefrom. The Tatas, as in all other Schemes, consider themselves Trustees of Public moneys entrusted to them, and their own holding in this particular Scheme is not more than about 550 shares out of 45,000 shares issued. The 60 per cent. of the total capital subscribed before the scheme was thrown open to the public was almost all subscribed for privately by such of the public as approached, through brokers or directly, the Agents and Directors of the Company, so that the whole of the Capital should be considered as having come from the public.

The Scheme itself, being one under a license from Government, has its maximum rates, to be charged to the public, fixed by Government, and the experience of the previous Hydro-Electric Schemes has amply proved that though the income from investment in one of these is assured and steady, such income is small. The Tata Hydro-Electric Power Supply Company upto date has not been able to pay more than 7%, and it is only after much time and patient development that the scheme will be made to pay more. So that the shareholders have to take the risk of the development of the Company during the period covered by the license granted by Government, and should the Company at the end of that period have established itself on a satisfactory basis, it will be open to the Government—which will soon be more and more the Government of the people—to take over the concern as in the case of the Railways. The Scheme is, therefore essentially one which is nationalised, as it will be available to the Nation after all the pioneering difficulties have been surmounted by shareholders, and that too, for a low return through the early years of the Company's existence.

Finally it may be mentioned that among the list of forty large consumers of power now actually on the writing list of this company there is not a single industrial concern which has not been capitalised in this country.

disorders. In fact it makes man a man. This valuable
medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and
gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to those persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen
the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility.
Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the 'yurvedic' medicines. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires, it is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills. Rupees ten only.

NOTES.

The Malabar Tragedy. The Government of Madras has had its reputation seriously eclipsed by the terrible tragedy reported from Malabar of 64 Mopla convicts having been asphyxiated to death in an iron goods waggon in which they were conveyed to Bellary where they were to have been incarcerated. Complaints had been published in the Madras papers regarding the callous treatment of Mopla rebels, and attention had been called in the Reformer by Mr. Lakshmanan, writing from Coimbatore, to the specific practice which has led to the tragedy. This gruesome occurrence goes to show that the complaints were not without foundation. The unfortunate victims seem to have bitten each other in their agony of suffering. We think that the enquiry which the Madras Government ordered is utterly inadequate. Mr. Knapp, the Special Commissioner in Malabar, is himself the official ultimately responsible for the administration of the affected tract and he is, therefore, not the proper person to investigate this terrible scandal. An independent Committee of Judges and non-officials should be appointed, as in the case of the anti-plague serum tragedy, to enquire into and report on the affair. Those found responsible for such callous negligence of common precautions should be promptly and severely punished.

The Ulemas on Forced Conversions. The resolution passed after a full discussion by the Ulama Conference which met recently at Delhi, should be translated in Malayalam and read in every mosque in Malabar. The resolution runs:

The Jamiat-ul-Ulema Conference does not admit the truth or falsity of the statements published in newspapers regarding the forcible conversion of the Hindus by the Moplas and the other atrocities committed by them on the Hindus as there has been no proper investigation but if the reports are true then the Ulama condemn all such action of the Moplas as the Koran never sanctioned forcible conversion to Islam.

Unfortunately, there is no doubt about the fact that forcible conversions have been effected, and if the Ulemas' resolution leads to the prevention of these unfortunate victims of the Moplas' misguided zeal being further molested on return to the religion of their fathers, it will not have been passed in vain.

Punjab Martial Law Prisoners: It was announced early last week that out of 86 persons serving their terms under sentences imposed by the Punjab Martial law tribunals two years ago, His Excellency the Viceroy has been pleased to order the remission of the sentences, of seven years and less, on 20. The delay in coming to a decision and the small number of prisoners benefitted by the Viceregal clemency, have caused disappointment which is voiced by the Tribune of Lahore. Our contemporary points out that a policy of clemency was announced in regard to the martial law prisoners two years ago by His Majesty the King-Emperor and a large majority of them were released in pursuance of it. When the Viceroy undertook to go over the papers of the remaining prisoners, it was, therefore, understood that His Excellency's intention was to do justice and not clemency. As a matter of fact, however, the present action is stated to have been taken on grounds of clemency, and the Tribune asks how, on this ground, the differentiation between the 20 who have been released and the 66 who are not to be released, could have been made. The records of the trials by the Martial law tribunals were incomplete and unsatisfactory and the probabilities are that the graver the offence charged against a prisoner, the more were these rough-and-ready courts swayed by the excitement of the moment.

The Police Magazine: We welcome the Police Magazine, the organ of the Madras Police Sub-Inspectors' Association, Vellore, which is a very readable number. The proceedings of the Sub-Inspectors' Special Conference, which occupy a prominent place, are interesting and instructive, especially the presidential address of Dewan Bahadur Parankusam Naidu, the first Indian to act as Commissioner of Police of Madras City. The Dewan Bahadur gave weighty advice, speaking from his own experience of the duty of policemen to win the respect of the public on the one hand, and the confidence of the authorities on the other. The creation of a pride in their profession among the officers of the Police, is the first step towards improving the quality of their work. We are glad that the Magazine has placed a high ideal before itself, and we wish it every success.

Mrs. Besant's Tribute to Mr. Gandhi. We are pleased to read the following in New India: "Mr. Gandhi, in facing self-inflicted death for the sake of winning peace, has won a far greater triumph than if his hartal and boycott had been successful. That accepted martyrdom, not hartals, boycotts, and the stirring up of hatred by furious denunciations, is true Passive Resistance. He conquered the hatreds he had generated by sacrificing himself in silence, and by love made hate to cease. That is the real "soul-force," in which the Inner God shines out triumphant." Amenities like the above sweeten public life and make it worth pursuing.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1921.

THE RIOTS AND THEIR LESSONS.

On Monday the disorders which began on the previous Thursday ceased, and Bombay woke up on Tuesday to pursue the even tenour of her life as if nothing had happened to disturb it. The suddenness of the resumption of the normal life of the city was as striking as the suddenness of the outburst. This may suggest to some minds the deliberate manoeuvre of a disciplined organization acting on the word of command. There was an organization concerned in the matter, but it is not its discipline but its want of it that led to the outbreak. There is not the least doubt that the originating cause was the attempts of the Non-co-operationists, Congress and Khilafat, to prevent people from going to witness the arrival of the Prince of Wales on Thursday, and their insulting interference with those who were returning after witnessing the Prince's procession. The meeting and bonfire of foreign clothes at Elphinstone Road was obviously designed as a counter-attraction. It was inevitable that when the crowds excited by the orations and the sight of burning heaps of clothes, met the crowds returning from the demonstrations at Apollo Bunder and the Prince's route from there to Government House, there should be collision. The Khaddar wearers' arrogance has been denounced by the more thoughtful leaders of Non-co-operation several times during recent months. They indulged in jeers and shouts at those returning from Fort, and, as was to be expected, the verbal limits were soon overstepped. The Parsis went in large numbers to have a view of the Prince's arrival, and that is the only reason, so far as we can judge, of their being specially marked out for opprobrium. They were jeered at, abused and insulted, and some ruffians went to the length of molesting Parai women by tearing off their saris from their persons. This led to reprisals and it is highly probable that some hot-headed Parsis did not stop to distinguish between the innocent and the guilty in their wild efforts to avenge the wrongs of their co-religionists. Something similar happened in Byculla where Anglo-Indians retaliated in somewhat random fashion for the rough treatment to which wearers of hats were subjected by the Khaddar wearers and their camp followers.

Mahatma Gandhi had not intended to come to Bombay but he was urgently called here by his followers with the view, no doubt, of ensuring the success of their boycott of the Prince's visit. The outbreaks on Thursday, it is clear, came upon him as a thunder-clap at the ears of a person in sound sleep. It was reported that he broke down and wept and told his immediate lieutenants that they had betrayed him and that he can no longer continue to lead them. The first-published manifestoes and the rigid fast imposed upon himself, bear on their face of it the impress of this deep disappointment. Stung by their leader's remorse and cast, his followers set about the work of pacification. And it is but bare justice to them to say that they worked hard and spared no pains in the task. It is not right to say that the whole credit of pacification belongs to them any more than to say that no credit whatever belongs to them for it. We are sorry that attempts have been made to fasten the blame of the outbreak on the Police and Government, and it is our duty to state it as our deliberate opinion, formed after seeing the happenings of last week somewhat at close quarters, that while it is possible that individual officers and men permitted themselves to be swayed by partisan motives, the general policy pursued and observed was one of admirable patience and restraint under exceedingly trying conditions. This calm, confident attitude of Government had an excellent effect on the public mind, and to it should be attributed partly at least the rapid resumption of the normal life of Bombay after the most violent disturbance that it has experienced in recent years. The loss of life, the damage to person and property, the suspense and anxiety of the four dark days, were serious in all conscience, but much worse is happening in Belfast to-day and has happened in other great cities. It is the exceeding peace and order of our normal life that makes such outbursts as those of last week so poignant to us. Now that the worst is over, the best thing to be done is not to indulge in unnecessary recriminations but to examine with candid and impartial minds the weak points that have been disclosed in our social and civic and political fabric and activities, and to set ourselves strenuously and honestly to strengthen them at these points. On this point, the suggestion which Professor Patrick Geddes makes in another column, deserves consideration.

The first duty that the outbreak has brought home to us in a very forcible manner, is that we should not delude ourselves and one other into the belief that unity between our several communities is achieved by talking about it on public platforms and writing about it in the Press. Such talking and writing when unsupported by steady, persistent endeavour in the invisible strata of social life to efface deep-lying lines of cleavage, actually do more harm than good. If we talk less about unity, we would perhaps feel the necessity to work more for it. Flowing from this consideration, is another scarcely less important. We cannot produce real unity between the different communities on the basis mainly of a common antagonism to the existing Government. In every country the springs of a people's life lie largely beyond the reach of Government and it is far more so in India. Unity can be securely effected only by operating on the springs of a people's life. With much respect to Mahatma Gandhi, this is where he makes his most serious mistake. Political grievances will be redressed or be forgotten, and a unity built upon them can be kept up only by discovering, inventing or manufacturing fresh grievances, no difficult task under a bureaucratic administration. Also, apropos of the same aspect of the late troubles, is the truth that was indicated by the Mahatma himself when he wrote in one of his manifestoes that Hindu-Mahomedan unity has become a menace to the security of the smaller minorities. Parsis, Christians, Jews, Anglo-Indians and others cannot be expected to contemplate with satisfaction a state of things in which their right to live free from molestation could be ensured only by frequent or occasional admonitions by the Mahatma or Sheth Chotani. The Mahatma realises that the acid test of our fitness for swaraj is that these small minorities should feel complete confidence in the certainty of their enjoying as of right and not by anybody's sufferance, full freedom of citizenship as much as the two major communities, and that these two communities will guard the rights of the small minorities as jealously as their own. The recent outbreaks have seriously imperilled this confidence. Years of comradeship have been expunged from our history by this mad outburst. We cannot build it up again by alluring shibboleths about unity and swaraj. The Non-Co-operation movement has failed, and it is high time that its leaders revised its programme radically in the light of Malegaon, Malabar and Bombay.

MR. JAYAKAR ON NON-CO-OPERATION.

The presidential address which Mr. Jayakar delivered at the third Thana District Political Conference, voiced the opinion of the most intellectual among the supporters of the Non-co-operation movement. After referring with appreciation to the awakening of the people due to the movement, Mr. Jayakar reminded Government that Mahatma Gandhi could not have created it but for the favouring soil created by the unredressed grievances of the people. He dwelt on the disappointing results, so far, of Dyarchy, and then proceeded to appraise in a severely critical manner the results of the Congress programme. He pointed out how the main items of this programme had failed. The boycott of schools and colleges had not only failed but, in the opinion of many loyal supporters of the Congress, had done more harm than good.

"50,000 boys are out in idleness, says Sir Ashutosh Mukerji. Some may glorify in this catastrophe, but there are many who regard this disruptive event with sad dismay. We have experimented too much in youthful sacrifice. Our youth have reciprocated with more love and tenderness than we have shown for their welfare. The few good institutions which Congress workers have created, are suffering from our neglect and apathy and dragging a weary existence. The shadow of a name has, very often, been pursued, to the abandonment of the substance, and we now find a large number of boys in the country, who are practically loafing in the streets, with a vague ambition "to do something patriotic."

The ban on lawyers has also been a failure. Litigation has not gone down; in Bombay, on the original side, it has very much increased. The prestige of British Courts, in civil suits as between Indian and Indian, has not been destroyed. The few courts of Justice, created by Non-Co-operationists, are a mockery. This is not the worst. Mr. Jayakar observed that this part of the Congress programme has created "a foul atmosphere of hypocrisy, intolerance, imposture and conceit in the Congress Camp in which modesty, self-respect and honesty of tentimes find it hard to hold their place." For a movement which calls itself one of "self-purification", this is a terrible indictment by one of its most capable and earnest adherents. That Mr. Jayakar's views are widely held by the more thoughtful Congressmen is evident from the observations of the Tribune of Lahore on the riots in Bombay. Our contemporary writes:—

It is because Mahatma Gandhi has not made these allowances that he has so often made calculations which the event has falsified. He has made no secret of his own disappointment or that of others at the response which the nation made to the first four parts of his programme, the renunciation of titles and honours, the boycott of councils, the boycott of courts of law and the boycott of schools and colleges. Nor has he made any secret of his disappointment at the inadequate response made by the nation even to such parts of his revised programme as those relating to temperance, the removal of untouchability, and Swadeshi, parts in regard to which the country is far more united than it was in regard to the other four. And now the greatest disappointment of all, one which goes to the root of all others, has come.

Our contemporary proceeds to point out that these failures are due solely to mistakes

First, in fixing a date for the attainment of Swaraj without adequate regard either to the subjective or the objective difficulties, and secondly, in relying exclusively upon one single method for the realisation of that end, and that method involving a maximum instead of a minimum of sacrifice both on the part of the average man or woman and on the part of the average worker. Every single failure or disappointment the movement has met with, is due to one or other of these causes. To the first is directly traceable the fact that Mahatma Gandhi has not been able to try any of the earlier items in his programme sufficiently long, and has had to jump from one to another with the speed of lightning. The original understanding was that if and when one part of the programme was fulfilled and yet the bureaucracy did not yield, the next step would be taken. In reality the next step was invariably taken long before the earlier part was even a substantial success, and long before the question of the bureaucracy yielding or not yielding could arise. It is to the same cause that we owe the decision to start the civil disobedience movement itself. Mahatma Gandhi made it perfectly clear in his speech at Delhi that he did not consider the country fit for civil disobedience. Why did he, then, start this part of the movement? For the simple reason, as stated in the preamble to the resolution, that only a month and a half remained for the realisation of the promise made at Nagpur. In other words, just because a promise was made which ought not to have been made, a step must be taken which Mahatma Gandhi himself considers premature.

Our contemporary demands that a halt should now be called and that the whole programme should be thoroughly recast. It avers that the happenings in Bombay "have disillusioned those who, until a few days ago, were thinking that it would be time enough to bring about peace in the country after Swaraj had been attained in January". The Tribune writes:—

They will see that Swaraj itself must wait, until the atmosphere has become free from the present spirit of strife. And they will see by and by that for this it is essential both that the date-fixing habit should be given up and that the basis of the movement should become substantially wider. It is because we look forward to this great good resulting from the recent occurrences that, while deploring them like every one else, we do not take a wholly pessimistic view of them, but consider them a good in the guise of an evil.

There is no question of the movement for Swaraj receiving even a temporary check. Civil Disobedience may go. Some of us think that it ought not to have come when it did, even if it was necessary for it to come at all. The Congress programme itself may be drastically revised. Some of us think it ought never to have been the exclusive thing it is.

Mr. Jayakar's address does not touch upon the Bombay riots. It was evidently prepared before they took place although before it was delivered, Mr. Jayakar himself had personal experience of their virulence. Nevertheless, he also demands a complete revision of the programme including the elimination of the time-table. That programme, he points out, is set at naught by many in practice. We trust that these earnest exhortations will receive the attention they deserve. The omissions suggested by Mr. Jayakar virtually amount to the abandonment of Non-Co-operation as at present understood. He observes:

Why cannot "Non-co-operation," in its proper sense, be practised in the Councils? Sir P. M. Mehta, when he left the Council Hall with his colleagues on a memorable occasion or when he, face to face with the then Home member, mercilessly unmasked the preposterous pretensions of the bureaucracy, was fighting with weapons and a spirit which many non-co-operators of the true and accredited brand may envy in these days. If non-co-operation is an attitude of the mind, as its eminent author conceives it, and not so much a programme or a creed, a Council Hall is as fitting a place for its display as a mass meeting in Marwadi Vidyalaya.

MY TWO BILLS ON HINDU LAW.

(By Mr. T. V. SESHAGIRI IYER, M. L. A.)

I owe it to the kindness of the Home Member and of the Law Member that I was able to introduce two of my Hindu Law Bills in the Legislative Assembly this session. It was not my choice that the exclusion from Inheritance Bill was first in the agenda and ran the gauntlet of an adverse vote from the Assembly. It was pure chance. The second Bill had a smoother passage. The other Bills had to be given up for the time being, owing to the congested state of public business in the Legislature. In passing, I may remark that the procedure of balloting for Bills and resolutions on the same day is not conducive to legislative activity. If separate days are set apart and if different ballots are held, the situation may become easier. I have reason to think that the Law Member is in favour of this suggestion.

On the occasion of introducing the first of the two Bills, I thought I noticed in the pronouncement of the Law Member a somewhat restrained note of benediction. No doubt, he said that the attitude of Government was one of benevolent neutrality; but those that read his speech on the motion for the codification of Hindu Law and compare it with his present utterance could not help noticing a slight change. On the first occasion while deprecating the suggestion that a roving commission to examine all the departments of Hindu Law should be appointed, the Honourable Member hinted at facilities being afforded to those who were prepared to grapple with some of the pressing problems. On the second occasion a warning was conveyed against attempts at piecemeal legislation. It may be that the two positions are reconcilable. It may also be that my "fine radicalism," to use his language, detects differences where none exist. Or it may be that the particular measure that had the good fortune or misfortune to come at the top of the agenda was not favoured by the department. Anyway we must realise that the Government may not be prepared to extend freely the right-hand of welcome to attempts like mine. Their final attitude, as was fore-shadowed, would depend on the degree of support which the outside public is prepared to give to the measure. It is therefore to that public that I address myself in this communication.

Those whose voice counts can be roughly classed under three heads: (a) the orthodox party, (b) the rationalist, and (c) the fence expert. I shall dispose of the last class at once. They are more unorthodox in their ways than the rationalist. They pay but scant heed to the injunctions of the Shastras as to eating, etc., yet they are more loud voiced than the truly orthodox people in speaking of the inviolability of the ancient Smriti writers. Their opposition comes neither from conviction nor from reason. Many factors operate with them. Personal, clanish and other considerations less honourable actuate their speeches and votes. I am not afraid of them. On the floor of the Assembly and outside, I can deal with them effectively enough. The other two classes of people attract more serious thought.

The orthodox party have this in their favour. Their practice and precept coincide. Their outward actions are a real index to their inmost convictions. Such men however much one may differ from them, command respect; their position should, therefore, be examined with care. I do not know whether Mr. Ramachandra Aiyar who presided over the Varnashrama Conference in Tanjore represents fully the views of this party. Very likely he does. I have read that speech with attention. I confess I do not quite appreciate the arguments. One argument is that the deceased from beyond the waters would certainly desire that the Dayadi should come before his son's daughter and sister. This thought-reading about the dead is beyond me. I have a crude idea that the disembodied spirits, if they exist, are actuated by the same likes and dislikes which guided them in this earth; another argument seems to hint at the unorthodoxy of commentators like Vignaneswara who have introduced a qualified principle of consanguinity as the test of heirship: well, until some one more respected than the author of Mitakshara is recognised by the community, smaller men like me must be prepared to act on his theories. It may be that Mr. Ramachandra Aiyar thinks that the law as we find it should be allowed to drift on as best as it can and that it would be irreligious for the legislature to attempt to remove the defects. Now take Manu's stanza about exclusion from inheritance. The very first category of excluded heirs is that of outcastes: yet more than 50 years ago, the Government legislated to remove the disability therein created by enacting the Removal of Caste Disabilities Act. We have submitted to it. Should the legislature supposed to contain the representatives of the people have less power in this behalf? If so, why? Again Judges have held that portions of that stanza are obsolete. We obey these decisions. Is a popular legislature less competent to promulgate the same view? Different meanings have been assigned by different commentators to the text; and the word "from birth" has been shifted from place to place by judicial interpretation. The term "incurable disease," an addition by Yagnavalkya to Mann's toll of exclusions has given Courts no end of trouble. Is the standard of incurability to be measured from the point of view of Yagnavalkya or from that of the advanced bacilli expert of to-day? Whether recrudescence at stated intervals is a sign of curability or not? Are orthodox Hindus content to leave the law in its present state? I would far rather have Mann in its pristine purity than leave the law where we find it to-day. Move for the repeal of the Removal of Caste Disabilities Act if you dare, and to abrogate judicial decisions passed by the Judicial Committee downwards; but do not be under the impression that you are serving religion or orthodoxy by leaving matters where they are.

Take again the Bill relating to the status of some of the female relations near and dear to us. It is a serious argument to say that the laws are based on the theory of funeral oblations? The merest tyro in law knows that this is only a half truth. I would not waste ink upon proving this. The Mitakshara system of inheritance succession is certainly not based solely on that principle. Here again I would draw the attention of the orthodox party to the conclusion reached by the Bombay High Court on the same materials. Would it be presumptuous on the part of the Legislature to try to bring the law into conformity with the views of these eminent Judges—views which reconcile natural love and affection with reason and law. I want the orthodox party to take note of the movement of the times. I am not against their endeavour to conserve all that is best in our traditions and civilisation; but I would warn them against attempts which tend to stop the current of the new life which is coming to us. Admiration, love and respect for the giants of old are not incompatible with respectful but firm demur to precepts and formulas which are unsuited to the conditions of life now around us. On one matter I join issue with them with all my strength. I am not interfering with the religion of the land in introducing these measures. It is a meaningless and puerile charge that is levelled against me. You do not touch religion in the least by giving your son's daughter a nearer place than to a distant Dayadi. Such a suggestion is preposterous. For all these reasons, I appeal to the leaders of the orthodox party—more specially to the men of sanctified lives and of clean habits who are responsible for "The Hindu Message"—to deeply ponder over the problems and to give their considered views.

I now turn to those who are generally in agreement with my views. It is characteristic of Madras life in these days that the lawyer element has retired to the back benches on matters of national importance.

Time was when the legal profession monopolised the platform and guided all political movements. In other parts of India, they are still to the fore. Not that I discount the appearance of leaders from other walks of life, but I do feel regret that those belonging to my own profession whose forbears did so much to awaken the national conscience are not in the brunt of the battle. There are notable exceptions—but the rank and file are apathetic. May I ask them to take the lead at least in effecting legislative reform on the lines indicated by me? Would it be too much to ask of the lawyer in the city and in the mofussil to give a few hours to a dispassionate consideration of the bills now before the Legislative Assembly? It is not much of a sacrifice that I ask them to make. Already one of their class, Mr. Palaniandy, has while paying a left-handed compliment to me personally predicted their adhesion to my views—but it is not silent approbation that I stand in need of. I want my brethren to actively work. I would ask every Bar association to give me their full and reasoned views. I want such associations to convene meetings of the people of the locality and to report to me and to the Government of India the resolutions passed at them. I would like to have a statement of the extent of the opposition to the measures manifested at such gatherings. May I count on such support from my brethren of the Bar all over India?

The womenkind of India have shown splendid perseverance and capacity in recent times. Their message has cheered me up a great deal. The measures I have in contemplation would benefit them most. The one that I have introduced does not go far enough—but a beginning has to be made. When the ice is once broken the flow would be easy enough. I hope my sisters will not feel disappointed—I want them to back me up. I want them to rouse up their husbands, fathers and brothers. A heavy task lies in front of us. Any slackening of effort at this time would render further attempts in this direction impossible. My sisters must face the situation with a determination to carry the reform through successfully. Its inadequacy should not dishearten them. I take this opportunity to offer my respectful thanks to those European ladies who have worked with their Indian sisters in this matter.

Apart from the lawyers and the women-folk, there are a goodly number of thinkers and publicists who have shown keen sympathy with the work that I have begun. I am grateful to them for the encouragement they have given me. I want them to redouble their efforts.

In issuing this general appeal, I have not thought fit to offer explanations regarding the contents of the two bills. I am not wedded to the details. I know that the grouping of the relations may be improved upon and that as regards persons who had been excluded, some one class or other may still be placed beyond the pale of succession. These matters deserve attention from the layman as well as the lawyer. I would be grateful to helpful suggestions on these questions. What I am most keen about is that the underlying principle of the bills should receive general support from my brothers and sisters.

BLACK HOLE ON WHEELS.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The Indian public outside Malabar do not seem to have realised the increasing gravity of the situation in that district and the tragic nature and extent of the events that are taking place there. The shocking news just reported of the death under the most cruel circumstances of 64 martial law prisoners who were being conveyed to their destination at Bellary in a closed goods or luggage van will, I hope, bring home to the public the necessity for turning their attention to the state of affairs in Malabar. It would be a serious mistake to regard the present tragedy as an isolated accident and to rest content with demanding the punishment of those responsible for it. To those who have seen something of the methods of Martial Law administration in Malabar, it is the inevitable culmination of the systematic ill-treatment to which prisoners have been subjected especially when they are being conveyed from one place to another. Such a tragedy as the present was bound to occur sooner or later. More than once, correspondents had called the attention of the public in the columns of the Hindu to the ill-treatment of prisoners and particularly to the practice of thrusting them into goods and luggage vans for transport. But these protests were unheeded and some of the Calicut newspapers in their unqualified enthusiasm for Martial Law administration and in their thirst for vengeance against the rebels went so far as to fall foul of those who had dared to raise their voice in the name of humanity and justice. The Calicut correspondent of the Times of India in its issue of the 28th is at pains to point out that prisoners used to be carried on previous occasions in similar waggons without any mishap. But can he assure us that though death did not actually take place on those occasions the prisoners did not suffer untold agonies for want of adequate accommodation and ventilation?

The distance from Tirur where the prisoners were entrained to Podanur where the tragedy was discovered cannot be much less than 100 miles and the journey must have taken several hours. Did the escort in charge of the prisoners at any time during the journey care to open the van or at least peep into it to see how the prisoners were faring or to ascertain if they wanted water? Or did they open it only after reaching Podanur? The prisoners in the agony of their slow death must in all probability have cried and shouted for help. Did the escort hear any such cries and if they heard did they keep quiet without paying any heed to them? These are questions which call for a frank and unequivocal reply. Upon the reply will depend the issue whether the present tragedy is a mere accident or the inevitable culmination of the methods employed in dealing with Martial Law prisoners.

No amount of explanation, investigation or sympathy can restore to life the unfortunate men who had to meet their death in this most cruel form. But they will not have died in vain if their cruel and untimely death will induce their countrymen in India seriously to enquire whether other tragedies have not occurred or are not occurring in Malabar, whether the methods employed in quelling the rebellion are in practice actuated only by the motive for restoring peace and order and not tainted by any spirit of vindictiveness and whether all possible care is being taken to avoid the perpetration of needless suffering and injustice.

Sir,

Public feeling has been outraged by the news of the death of an incredibly large proportion of the Mopla prisoners who were brought from Tirur to Podanur (on their way to Bellary) huddled together in a closed railway wagon. It is said that out of hundred men who were "loaded" in the wagon, fifty-six were found dead on the morning of the 20th instant. Of the remaining who were brought to the nearest jail and hospital nine more died on the way. Some more are likely to die in the hospital. When I hurried up to the Coimbatore railway station on the morning of the 20th instant, I was just able to see about twenty-five of these Mopla convicts being taken to the local central jail in a motor-lorry. Prompt medical help has been rendered to sufferers. Since writing the above, the Government of Madras have issued a timely press communique stating that out of the hundred convicted prisoners entrained at Tirur fifty-six were found dead of asphyxiation at Podanur. In its leading article headed "Another Black Hole?" the Hindu of Madras says: "Correspondents have more than once complained in these columns of the tendency on the part of officials to treat Moplah prisoners as something not only less than human but as less than the beasts that perish. It is clear that had these complaints been accorded the notice they deserved in the name of the most common humanity this culminating horror could have been avoided." As a matter of fact I myself had to condemn, in the columns of the "L. S. Reformer" some months ago, the brutal or barbarous practice of "packing" the Martial-law prisoners in air-tight waggons. Now the authorities are going to be "wise after the event." The Duke of Connaught said that the shadows of Amritsar are lengthening out and it is most deplorable that the tragedy at Tirur "the terrible loss of life" should have taken place just a few days after the arrival, in India, of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales.

N. LAKSHMANAN.

*Mr. Lakshmanan's letter appeared in the issue of the 25th September. He wrote: "A certain considerable number of so-called Martial Law prisoners are brought down to Coimbatore Jail, for hours together the young and old are huddled together in closed, practically air-tight trucks or goods waggons like cattle or sheep or even worse. This is brutality pure and simple."

"GODS" AS EXHIBITS.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I quite agree with your sincere protest against the exhibition of "Hindu gods and goddesses in the streets through which the Royal procession passed" referred to by you in a note of your last issue. But I wonder if the mischief that you complain of can be successfully traced only to the "class of public men grown up in Bombay recently" about whom you also complain and rightly complain in the same note. May not the inspiration if not the direct mischief, be traced yet deeper to a "higher" circle? Can you be quite sure on this latter point? As for myself I perfectly remember another painful occasion when higher public sentiment was played with in Bangalore when peace was being celebrated after the cessation of this war with a somewhat obtuse indecency. A so-called local leader of the depressed classes, himself a very wealthy Madaliar in the Bangalore cantonment, got together the heads of all the poor panchama communities under his thumb and started a very big show of the idols worshipped by these poor people at their own cost. This most unusual and objectionable parade, proved perhaps even more demonstrative of the loyalty to the dictates of the powers that be, than even the parade of "all the kings' horses and the kings' men" that was held at Mysore and Bangalore elsewhere at the same time. The aforesaid procession of Parish Idols, which was a regular item in the programme of the day deliberately laid down by the local powers, marched the whole round to the order of the police in the streets of a Hindu Rajah. I felt somewhat amused by your righteously indignant threat of boycott against such mischief-mongers disfiguring the sacred name loyalty. I need however hardly remind you that boycott in these days of cheap warfare at other's cost, is more a political fashion than a real weapon in the serious struggle of social reconstruction even now silently overwhelming the yet slumbering world!

TOWARDS HINDU FRATERNITY.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I sincerely thank you for publishing my letter on 'Caste and Untouchability' and expect you to show me the same kindness in publishing the following few lines.

In the foot-note to my letter you remark 'Temple worship is an illusion, and it is not an organic part of Hinduism. The depressed classes should concentrate their efforts upon realities.'

In answer, allow me to say that I am not in love with temple-worship, but unfortunately the Untouchables are, which can be proved by the fact that a large number of them in spite of the humiliations heaped upon them, goes to Nasik, Trimbak, Pandharpur and other sacred places. When the higher classes have not yet shaken off the illusion of temple-worship, how can we expect these ignorant down-trodden classes to rise above it?

I look to other advantages, which we shall have by the untouchables entry into Hindu Temples.

It will lead an era of Hindu Religious Reformation. It may be a small thing in itself, but it is fraught with much future possibility. Socially, we are hopelessly divided, let us at least meet in these temples and prove that we are brothers in Faith.

When once the spirit of equality and brotherhood enters into Hindu Temples, it will work wonders for us. On one hand, it will make the untouchables, clean and self-respecting, while on the other hand, it will make us free, liberal, strong and united.

The Hindu Temples are not the places only for Temple-worship, but they are meant, and ought, to be the centres of Hindu Thought. It is here that they will know what is spiritual reality. In closing the doors of Hindu Temples to the Untouchables, we have debarred them all the means of Hindu Culture and Hindu spirituality. The untouchables are knocking at the doors of Hindu Temples with devotion and faith, if these doors are opened to them, it will give us all common culture which is necessary for Hindu-Fraternity. A few lines more, and I finish. Allow me to show what sort of Unity in religious Faith we have in our spiritual matters. The exclusiveness of Hindu-Caste is not absent here.

Our Gods get polluted by the touch of the untouchables, as if Gods are exclusive, orthodox Brahmins by Caste, terribly frightened of pollution. The Untouchables debarred from the Hindu Temples, the Sudras and other classes driven by the superior airs of the higher classes, all these Hindus, worship Gods after their own fashion.

Their Gods require animal sacrifices, from a chicken to a buffalo. Amongst some Sudra communities, if a man is ill, it is generally attributed to the mischief of a witch or the wrath of a God. Not seldom, is it found due to the wrath of a God to appease which, a cock or a goat is sternly demanded. Bombay people are not strangers to the scenes of 'Baya'.

Thus in our matter of fact life, teaching, of Vedant, and Brahma Vidya being discarded, caste-ridden Gods, some vegetarians and some carnivorous ones, carry the day. Unity of faith is unknown. Narrow mindedness and the unvedantic attitude of our religious heads is responsible for this chaos. We have to make our way through this chaos, towards Hindu Unity and I believe and I firmly believe, that the opening of the closed doors of Hindu temples to our untouchable brethren, will be a first step towards this Unity.

KARRAR K. G.

ENGLISH AND THE VERNACULARS.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In one of your editorials of the 14th instant you warn the educationally backward communities against 'vernacularising' their education.

I content myself with drawing your attention to a few historical facts and let them point their own moral as to whether the case for the vernaculars so obvious on the face of it as you admit it to be is any the less expedient or the less reasonable for the "peculiar circumstances" of India.

1. 'Europe in the seventeenth century adapted the vernaculars to University education and displaced Latin.' (Dr. J. N. Farquhar in Young Men of India.)

2. In Ireland, Irish which is not a dialect of English but a language as distinct from English as the latter is from French, and a language, too, whose literary existence is longer than that of English was but lately a virtually dead language lingering in the mouths of a handful of fishermen and peasants in the remote western counties of Ireland, all others having been forced to change their mother-tongue for the English of their alien rulers. But what a change has the recent political consciousness in its fulness brought about in the position of this pariah of the European tongues. We read how the enthusiasts amongst those Irish vow never to let an English word pass their lips, how man and wife would rather communicate as mutes by signs than own their bondage to the English by speaking their tongue which was forced on them with the political domination of a ruling class. Witness MacSwiney's home life. English was his mother-tongue not as adopted by himself, (as certain English-aping heads of families have done on this side of India) but as handed down in a hereditary succession of generations of his family and neighbours. English was also his wife's home-tongue; but never to his dying day did the couple exchange a word of English! Sinn Fein and Dail Eireann are Irish words. Dail Eireann (the Irish Parliament) conducts its deliberations in Irish and as we could see from the papers the other day the manly and momentous declaration that Dail Eireann made in answer to the English terms of settlement had to be translated into English before it could edify the English speaking world.

There is another misconception that you seem to have easily lent yourself to. To "vernacularise" our education never means for the vernacularists to de-English, "orientalise," or "mediævalise" it. Perhaps and very probably it meant that in Macaulay's time when we hear of the Anglicists and Occidentalists pitched against the hapless Orientalists "Vernacularising" education for the Irish no more means reviving the use of the Ogham characters of old than Irish democracy means renovating the tanistry of the old Irish polity. Japan is none the worse for refusing to give the first place to English.

Lastly English is wedded to a satanic system of spelling—within the time absorbed in acquiring any considerable mastery of which, as the English themselves deplore, no less than three of the more important languages of the world could easily be mastered. It is one thing to take liberal help of English in mastering certain important branches of modern knowledge, (specialised as it is) and another to expect boys and young men, by making them follow instruction in all and sundry subjects and answer questions thereon in the alien English, to make that their "second mother-tongue" at the expense of so much vital energy that it led the late Viceroy on one occasion to characterise the present as a 'vicious system. He then pictured to himself, and asked the English part of his audience to realise, what their own condition would have been if Latin or Greek instead of their own mother-tongue had formed the medium of instruction and expression in their own school and university life.

N.B.—One aspect of the difficulty of English being a desirable pan-Indian tongue of the future has never, I fear, been sufficiently emphasised. It is this; that English in its written form insists upon that stupendous caprice, named English spelling. Indeed this is a case in regard to which one might exclaim: civiliser, civilise thyself!

Karwar,

[We are sorry that the publication of this letter has been delayed owing to pressure on our space. Our correspondent's objections are answered in a single sentence. Neither Ireland nor Japan is India with a score of vernaculars. A common language is needed to compact Indian nationalism, and English, we hold, is a language well suited for the purpose. Ed. I. S. "PRO-BOMBAY" ?

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

Though peace in Bombay is for the time being restored, it is evident that men of goodwill in each section of the community may well be considering ways and means of initiating and maintaining better relations in future. And these not merely for quietness' sake, but towards that cooperation for the commonweal which is the best bond of citizenship. Now therefore is the time for considering how such civic and social inter-organization may be promoted, and in this connection I venture to cite the example of an association expressly for this purpose established three or four years ago in Jerusalem and known as "Pro-Jerusalem". Its membership from the first included leading representatives of the various sections and groupings of the Moslem and Jewish communities and with these the long-separated Christian denominations. These have in the past been estranged from one another, and to a degree exceeding all other cities of East and West, even to corresponding hostilities in action, and these from ancient to modern and even recent history. Yet their active cooperation—as I can testify from two years' experience—has been harmonious and even cordial throughout, and correspondingly productive in good results. These results have been of many kinds, as from conservation and repair of the city's monuments to the improvement of its health, sanitation and dwellings, and from some mitigations of unemployment in existing conditions to the start of new and productive industries, and these of ever increasing kinds.

This example is already being followed in other cities, and I submit that it may be found encouraging, and even suggestive, towards the formation of an analogous "Pro-Bombay" Association. If there be any active response to this suggestion, I shall be pleased to give further particulars, and to obtain full details from Jerusalem.

PATRICK GEDDES.

Bombay, 25th November.

SWARAJ AND SOCIAL REFORM IN ANDHRA.

Mr. M. Durga Shanker writes in the Janabhimani (Mahatma's paper) of the 6th instant: The Andhras are to be congratulated on the appreciation of their N. C. O. work by Mahatma Gandhi. The Mahatma had always considered Bihar to have done the best and he had put Andhra next, but he now finds it difficult to say which of the two provinces will do better. The Andhras still retain much of the plain Indian style of living and it will not therefore be difficult for them to adopt pure Swadesham and they are progressing rapidly in this direction. The success achieved by them in supplanting the Toddy traffic is noteworthy and it is perhaps unequalled.

Although the Andhras have gone ahead of the other provinces in the march towards Swaraj, generally speaking, they are yet lingering far behind the times in the matter of social reform, and what is worse, they seem to be in no mood to tolerate any such reforms. It is not to be supposed that the Andhras propose only to win Swaraj and not to keep it. Swaraj again, is not to be the property exclusively of a particular section or sex. Take, for instance, Drishti Dosham and Sparsha Dosham, while they do no good to society, they serve only to create a breach between man and man and eventually lead to party feelings and hostilities and finally result in the downfall of the people by weakening the bonds of unity. It is, therefore, of great importance to weed out such seeds of illwill and hatred. Mahatma Gandhi is demanding the abolition of untouchability (Sparsha Dosham). Evidently he is not aware that something worse, Drishti Dosham (pollution thro: mere seeing) exists in the Andhra Desa. It is unknown in the Central and Northern parts of India and in the Maharashtra. The Mahatma has since declared that he will not inter-dine with his own son, so that he is in the same boat as the orthodox Andhras whom Mr. Durga Shankar attacks.

It cannot be ignored that among the fighting ranks of Swaraj there are ladies who are doing excellent work perhaps much better work than many of the men. Women have therefore every right to a share in the administration of Swaraj and in order to qualify them to understand and undertake the responsibilities of Swaraj it is necessary to give them sufficient and suitable education. All available strength and power is needed for the maintenance of Swaraj. The assistance that can be had from this half of humanity ought not therefore to be neglected or despised. Moreover what civilized society on the face of the earth can tolerate the idea of its women being kept on a par with the lower animals, while men are progressing in the march of civilization?

We want Swaraj so that we may unrestrictedly enjoy the freedom and privileges which are our birthright. It is preposterous to hold that in politics and society women occupy a lower position than men. Freedom of thought and action are as much the birthright of women as they are of men and it is to be hoped that under Swaraj women will be able to exercise and enforce the right. Thus parents should no longer arrogate to themselves the power to dispose of their girls, as they like, while they are yet children and unable to understand the responsibilities of married life and to make a choice of their life-long companion. It is nothing short of despotism to force matrimony upon innocent and ignorant girls, and Swaraj does not admit of any such domination or tyranny. The duty of parents is only to lend their advice in the matter of selection; they ought not, in the name of humanity and decency to transgress the limits of their duty.

The argument that if girls are allowed to remain unmarried for a long time their morals get corrupted is not only fallacious but also malicious and mischievous. It all depends upon the manner and society in which, they are brought up. If the morality of the parents themselves and of society to which they belong is unimpeachable and if the girl is given the right sort of education, there is absolutely no ground for the fear. It will be more reasonable and just to rectify society if necessary than to sacrifice a child girl at the altar of an old custom. Time there was when it was found expedient to marry child girls. The necessity for that expediency no longer exists in the country, and the old custom may now be safely done away with.

It may jar on the ears of some people but the fact remains that the morality of a society owing a number of young widows condemned to a life-long celibacy, is not of the best. It is an open secret that youth and frailty lead many a widow to corruption and sin. By ignoring this fact and by fostering corrupt widows and discarding those that have the moral courage and honesty to remarry and to lead a virtuous life, society encourages immorality and it works its own degeneration. Immorality and degeneration ought to find no place under Swaraj—the reign of purity and morality. A society rotten within cannot stand long to support and uphold a Raj. Is it not iniquity to give "cattle brand" license to men to marry as many times as they like in their life-time even irrespecfive of age and physique while child and youthful widows are denied the freedom to marry even for the second time? Will Swaraj tolerate such iniquity? If it does it may as well admit of other iniquities and corruptions; in that case it is nothing worth fighting for and winning.

I wish to take this opportunity of saying a few words regarding a custom which will strike any decent and civilized man as cruel and barbarous but which is scrupulously preserved in the Andhra Desha. I mean the custom of chucking a dying man out of doors into the public street, to breathe his last there like a street dog. This custom is I understand based on a belief that if a man dies on an inauspicious day the house in which the death occurs becomes haunted and it has therefore to be abandoned for a few months. If people are yet so credulous as to give any importance to the superstitious belief, they had rather undergo the inconvenience and, for the matter of that, any pecuniary loss involved in abandoning the house than be callous and cruel to a brother in his last moments. Certainly Andhras and humanity have not broken off.

ROYAL YAKUTI.

THIS YAKUTI or life giving nectar has been prepared from
the best, choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has wonderful properties of increasing virile power and it rectifies urinary disorders. In fact it makes man a man. This valuable
medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and
gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to those persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen
the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility.
Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the 'ayurvedic' medicines. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills. Rupees ten only.

NOTES.

The Malabar Black Hole: The Government of Madras have associated three non-official Indian gentlemen with the Special Commissioner, Mr. Knapp for the purpose of investigating the circumstances in which 64 Mopla prisoners died in the goods wagon in which 100 of them were being conveyed to Bellary to serve their terms of imprisonment. They are, Mr. Krishna Varma, of Mankada, Mr. Manjari Ramier and Sahab Bahadur Kalladi Moidutti Sahib. The first two are Hindus and the last name is that of a Mopla. The three gentlemen, we are sure, will be perfectly independent and uninfluenced by their prejudices or prepossessions in the discharge of their very responsible duty. But this is not all that is wanted. The public—we do not mean the Non-Cooperating section of it—must be satisfied that the Committee has left no stone unturned to discover the truth of the matter and to trace the responsibility for it to the right men. As we said last week, the Mulkowal precedent should have been followed. Lord Willingdon should rise above his bureaucratic surroundings, in which he is never happy, and act upon his own strong impulses to truth and justice. An attempt we see, is being made to deny that the deaths were due to asphyxiation on the specious plea that some thousands of prisoners had been despatched before in similar conditions, without loss of life. As the laws of physiology are inexorable, the escape of the previous contingents from the horrible fate of the latest, can only be ascribed to the presence of accidental facilities for ventilation which escaped the notice of the authorities concerned. We are obliged to press upon His Excellency the Governor of Madras that he should allow no consideration to prevent his doing his plain, imperative duty on this serious scandal. It is the duty of his Ministers to accord him all their support in removing this great blot which cannot but affect them as well as the other half of the Madras Government, if measures are not promptly taken to trace it to its true causes and to prevent the possibility of the recurrence of anything similar in future.

Prostitution in Bombay. The Government of Bombay have appointed a committee to consider means for remedying the evils of prostitution in Bombay city. It consists of Sir Jamsetjee Jeejeebhoy (Chairman), the Bishop of Bombay, the Roman Catholic Archbishop, the Commissioner of Police, the Municipal Commissioner, the Surgeon-General, Major Fernandes, Dr. Miss Turner Watts, Dr. Miss Mistri, Mr. Faiz Tyebjee, Mr. S. G. Velinkar, Mr. Kanji Dworkadas, Colonel Evans of the Salvation Army and Mr. K. Natarajan. There was a short preliminary meeting of the committee on the 25th November, when the Home Member of the Government, the Hon. Mr. Hayward, made an introductory speech which is printed in another page. The Committee met again next day to settle the lines on which the enquiry should proceed. It was decided to draw up a list of questions and to send it along with an invitation to persons who are likely to assist the enquiry with evidence, written and oral. The meetings of the Committee at which witnesses appear should be open to the public, unless the witnesses themselves prefer it to be otherwise. Publicity, the light of day upon the sordid and cruel realities of the evil, is the main remedy. Legislation to deal with it, should be backed up by a solid body of opinion, and this can be created only if the fullest publicity is given to the facts and conditions disclosed by a searching enquiry.

Lord Sinha's Successor. Although no official statement has been made, it seems to be a fact that Lord Sinha has resigned the Governorship of Bihar and Orissa owing to the precarious state of his health. The Searchlight of Patna thinks it settled that he will not return to the Province as Governor, and makes certain suggestions regarding the appointment of his successor, as embodying the general opinion in Bihar. They do not, it seems, want a Civil Service Governor. The appointment of a Civilian, says our contemporary, will be frankly resented. They want an Indian. All parties, we are told, are united on these two points. But our contemporary does not say whether they are united as to the third, namely, that a lakh of rupees is insufficient remuneration for the Governor of the Province and that he should get the same salary as the Governors of Madras, Bombay, Bengal and the United Provinces. The salary of the three Presidency Governors was fixed on the basis of their being public men from England, and the recent raising of the salary of the Governor of the United Provinces was understood to foreshadow the appointment of one such to succeed Sir Harcourt Butler. The preference for an English public man originated under conditions which left the Indian Civilian as the only alternative. But now that Indian non-officials are eligible for the place, we do not see why the salary of the post should be increased. We have opposed the popular demand to reduce Ministers' salaries while the Members of Government continued to draw their present emoluments, but we do not see any reason in increasing the salary of a post which has been held by Englishmen on the existing scale of remuneration. By the way, may we enquire whether the Bengal Ministers have fulfilled their promise to make over a fourth of their salaries to public charities? It will be a year next month since they took office, and as the promise was made in the Council, some member may ask to know how it has been kept.

BOMBAY, DECEMBER 4, 1921.

IS IT A CHANGE OF POLICY?

The Viceroy's reply to the address presented to him by a deputation of the Punjab Chamber of Commerce, has been interpreted as foreshadowing a change of policy. On one point, there does certainly seem to be indicated such a change. Replying to a request of a deputation from the Marwadi commercial community some months ago for special representation, His Excellency said that it was not the policy of the reform scheme to have representation of special interests except as a transitory provision and that they should now prepare themselves to enter by the door of the general electorates. The terms of the Viceroy's reply to a similar request of the Punjab Chamber, seem to mark a more temporising attitude. Incidentally, they seem to be intended to convey to all who are hoping for an early extension of the reforms, an intimation that there is no intention to satisfy them. Said Lord Reading:

I cannot in view of the pronouncement of the Joint Committee that the franchise as settled by the rules should not be altered for the first ten years, hold out to you any hopes of any early revision of the rules. At the same time, I have no doubt that if and when (italics are ours) the rules are revised your claims for increased representation on the local Legislative Council will be fully considered.

The surmise that a change of policy in regard to political movements, is indicated, rests upon the concluding remarks of the Viceroy. We do not think that the words necessarily imply that there is to be a change of policy. We quote the passage.

We are sometimes criticised for not having sufficiently exerted it (the power to protect peaceful citizens) and I readily admit that we have sought to avoid action which might either be misconceived or misrepresented as too severe or provocative. But recent events have made it imperative that the full strength of the Government should if necessary be exerted for vindicating the law and preserving order. In some quarters—I shall not designate them, they are too well-known—intimidation and consequent coercion, which is only another form of violence and is of course unlawful, were practised, and it must be said with considerable effect. This conduct cannot be permitted and must be stopped. Proper precautions will be adopted, and all the necessary steps taken to protect the peaceful citizen, to give him that security to which he is entitled and to bring the wrongdoer to justice. The peaceful citizen wishes to carry on his own business, his own pursuits, his own avocations without improper interference or molestation by others with whom he may not be in agreement. We have no desire to interfere with the lawful activities of political parties, however opposed to us, but although that is our view and although we are most anxious, as I have repeatedly said, to redress all legitimate grievances and to remove the grounds of popular discontent, yet we can not allow any political activity to impose its will upon the country by violence, intimidation, coercion or other unlawful means. I have therefore taken this opportunity of telling you what is in this respect in the minds of the Government of India and of assuring you that the Government, of which I have no doubt you are keen critics, will use its efforts to ensure that every man may carry on his lawful pursuits in his own way and at his own will, and you may rest satisfied that all the necessary steps for this purpose will be taken.

The Non-Co-operators have undoubtedly misused their opportunity and the volume of opinion against their methods today is not confined to those who have been opposed to their principles. Mr. Jayakar's address which we noticed last week is a clear indication of what their best men think of these methods. We are sorry that Mahatma Gandhi has failed to read the changed temper of the country and that he has banged the door on a revision of methods in the last Young India where he writes:

Friends have misunderstood the meaning of the peace that I have referred to in my second appeal. The peace I want has to be made by non-co-operators. It does not mean surrender of principle or policy so as to find a common platform for work. That in my opinion is an impossible task, for the methods of the various groups are so radically different. When one party finds it for the good of the country to enter the councils and another to abstain, there is no meeting ground.

This is a slap in the face not only of friends who had "misunderstood the meaning of peace" in the Mahatma's second appeal, but, and chiefly, of workers like Mr. Jayakar who had expressly indicated the method of not entering the councils as one to be discarded in the interests of the Congress party. In the face of this distinct repudiation of any revision of his methods by the Mahatma, in the face of Malegaon, Malabar and Bombay, which are all manifestations of the same cause, it is impossible to maintain that no further measures are needed to safeguard the life, liberty and property of peaceful citizens. But we hope that the Viceroy has some better plan in view than falling back upon the old, indiscriminate Press and other repressive laws. These laws have failed, it is clear. They are, in fact, responsible for adding to the volume of discontent which has now become organised in the Non-Co-operation movement which, whatever its faults, does not foster secret plotting. To stay their repealing programme, would be a great mistake on the part of Government. With reference to the Press, we recently came across a striking experience in a book dealing with the social evil, which is of much wider application. Dr. Flexner writes with reference to administrative and legislative action to combat prostitution:

Curiously enough, the most decisive action on the part of the authorities is feasible only in countries where the liberty of the press is most firmly established; for only in countries thoroughly free in spirit will the public deliberately impose limitations on itself without fear that such restrictions may ultimately be abused to serve other ends than those originally intended.

In India, it has been no uncommon thing for laws made for a special contingency to be used on occasions not contemplated at the time of their enactment. A general reversion to the repressive regime, will, therefore, in no wise improve matters.

Whatever new measures are adopted, they should be effectually safeguarded against operating as a check on anything except the specific evil which they are meant to combat. This will be no easy thing to do, but it must be done, otherwise the remedy will be worse than the disease. Instead of detaching Non-Co-operation of its objectionable features, it will embarrass Co-operation by making it an adjunct of coercion.

It behoves the Government of India to walk warily because they cannot absolve themselves wholly from the charge of having contributed to the present situation by their dilatoriness, on the one hand, and precipitancy, on the other. The precipitancy has been in urging the visit of the Prince of Wales before the political sky was absolutely clear. The dilatoriness has been in remedying grievances and responding to the growing aspirations of the people for an equal status in India and the Empire. The public can judge of the anxiety of Government to redress wrongs only by the extent to which these have been redressed. The disposal of the question of the Punjab prisoners, for instance, ought not to have taken eight months. Men who do not care much for the Khilafat nor desiderate the advent of Swaraj within the year, speak indignantly of the tardy justice meted out to the martial law offenders. Disappointment itself is a less hard-hip as compared to suspense. The two other demands in this matter are the stoppage of the pensions of Sir Michael O'Dwyer and General Dyer, and the dismissal of some four officers guilty of gross oppression during the Martial Law regime. Surely, the peaceful relations of the Government and the people of India, are more important than the susceptibilities of half a dozen persons.

THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

Looking back over the history of the Young Men's Christian Association of Bombay during the last 45 years of its existence, one cannot but be struck by the impressively favourable attitude of the general public to this form of service—an attitude which has at once been an endorsement and an invitation to proceed in strength. The Association, as everybody knows, stands for the all-round development of young men. With this as the guiding principle of all their activities they had set their hearts on a tremendous work of grave responsibility widening their interest as time and general support gave them the necessary strength and confidence until the Bombay Y. M. C. A. to-day is one of the largest and most cosmopolitan of men's clubs in the city. For a city like Bombay the field of work on which such an Association can usefully employ itself, cannot but be great and extensive, both in its scope and nature. In Bombay, the most cosmopolitan of all Indian cities, where thousands of young men of various races and languages congregate together for educational purposes or for purposes of earning their livelihood, it was of the greatest necessity that such conditions of living as would be conducive to the physical, intellectual and moral growth of the youth should be provided for. The success of the work of the Association in this is evident from a brief survey of the various branches among which it has been found convenient to divide the whole work that lies before it. The work for civilians has centred round four modern buildings, each of them built with a careful eye to the special purpose for which it was meant. These buildings alone represent an investment of over 5 lakhs of Rupees. Young men including Hindus of all denominations, Parsees, Mahomedans, Jews and Christians have all been served by these institutions. The long working hours of the average young man in Bombay are such that some sort of healthy recreation is not only welcome to him but is an absolute necessity. Hence, Socials, excursion parties, study classes, debating and Literary Societies, Lectures, Gymnasium Classes, Libraries and Athletics have all been organised in each of these institutions for the benefit of all members. Ample opportunity is thus provided by these means for the different types of men to come together and understand one another's point of view and thus broaden their own outlook on men and life in general. On this natural understanding and friendship depends the future welfare of the country, these young men forming not only a component part of the national life but also becoming the leaders of to-morrow. Among the special features of the Y. M. C. A.'s work in Bombay may be mentioned the facilities it provides in the way of healthful accommodation and recreation for the University students of this city. The Y. M. C. A. on Lamington Road is entirely devoted to this work and is open to any of the 4,000 University students in Bombay. About 50 students of all classes live in the Hostel under the supervision of a Secretary. Attached to the building is the Bowen Memorial Hall, which is used for lectures, socials and concerts. Special study classes and lectures by eminent men are arranged for each term. It is quite a lively sight of an evening to see a considerable number of these non-residential members making use of the Games Room, Library and Reading Room. Much more can be done along these lines and special efforts are planned to develop this side of the work. The possibilities of rendering service to the community at large through this channel are indeed great. It is the students of to-day who are to be the citizens of to-morrow and no work is more meritorious or deserving of more support than that of creating an atmosphere of cordial fellowship, manly character and noble ambition, for the rising generation of India's sons. The work is meant to be a National effort and is commended to the earnest attention of all those who are desirous and willing to join in a common cause for a common good.

As distinguished from the student class, there is the class of Indian young men of various castes and creeds who have flocked to this city in great numbers to earn their livelihood. To provide the best possible conditions of living for a number of these men the Byculla Branch of the Y. M. C. A., on Reynold's Road has been established. There are about 300 members at this branch, of whom about 40 live in the Hostel. These include Parsis, Hindus, Christians, Mohamedans and Jews. In addition to the Library and the Tennis Court adjoining there are also good facilities for indoor games, such as Billiards, Ping Pong, Draughts, etc. Concerts, Socials and Lectures are arranged weekly and are well attended. Teams are organised for cricket, hockey and football and a series of matches are played against outside teams every season. A small room rented in a Chawl in Patel is made good use of by the residents there. It is well provided with reading material, games, etc., and lectures, socials and concerts are held from time to time. There is great scope for work in this direction in a large city such as Bombay, where suitable accommodation with congenial surroundings and at moderate rates is hard to get. Both the Student Branch and the Byculla Branch are always full and one of the hardest duties of the Secretaries has been to refuse regretfully the anxious appeals of young men who constantly ask for admittance to these Hostels. The work among the Anglo-Indians forms part of the activities of the Association. The Procter Branch Y. M. C. A. on Rebsch Street, Byculla, has a hostel with about 45 residents, most of whom are apprentices in the Railway Shops of the city. Indoor gymnastic classes, cricket, Hockey, Football, Tennis, Billiards and other indoor games, Concerts, Lectures, Study Classes and meetings are as common a feature here as in all the other branches. The most significant development during the last few years has been the successful launching of an Educational Department. A full time Secretary is employed for the purpose and there is every reason to believe that in the coming years this will play a large part in the lives of a good many young men in Bombay. It is hoped that it may be the inspiration for similar undertakings elsewhere also. A no less important part of the Association activities is the Army work. During the war especially this branch of the work was greatly extended and developed and both the British and the Indian Army have expressed their appreciation of the work then done. The same work has been carried on even after the cessation of hostilities. On the Marine Lines there is a splendid hut for Indian troops now. The hut endeavours to provide all sorts of healthful recreations, for the ex-servicé men. Ample supplies of literature and well equipped writing tables are provided gratis for the use of men of quiet, studious habits. Education work is also carried on to some extent in order to assist the men who are desirous of preparing themselves to return to their vocations after demobilization. The Branch is an Employment Bureau in itself and much help is rendered to disbanded sepoy and soldiers in the way of finding employments congenial to them. The incoming and outgoing transports have always testified to the warmth of welcome with which they have been received in Bombay by the Army Y. M. C. A. In addition to all this there is a big building of the Association in Wodehouse Road, and it is meant primarily for Europeans. There are about 500 members, about 32 of whom live in the Chambers. For the benefit of the resident members as well as the non-resident a good restaurant is run by the Association itself providing wholesome food at the all times. A Billiard room, a well-stocked reading room with writing tables and an auditorium, where concerts, lectures, religious meetings and socials are arranged every week forms a conspicuous feature. Gymnasium classes are led by the Physical Director.

The Association has thus undertaken a big task. Operating as it does in 80 different centres, the Y. M. C. A. is a National organisation. But it has always depended and must depend on the public at large for the successful carrying out of all its plans. Grants from the Imperial War and Relief Fund, the Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A. Indian National Council and a few firms in Bombay have enabled it to carry on the work on behalf of troops in Bombay. The civilian work is financed largely by the income from members and donations by true philanthropists. The work carried on in the rural areas by the Indian National Council in the way of providing facilities, for agriculturists and in organising co-operative stores has resulted in a large drain on their purse. In order to carry on the work which the Association has been doing till now and in order to contribute their share to the National Council work, the Bombay Y. M. C. A. makes an appeal to the public for a sum of Rs. 50,000. Being an institution organised for public good, it does not ask public support for its own sake. Demands are being made upon it to enlarge its work in order to meet some of the most urgent needs of the young men of this city. An enlarged programme calls for additional support from the community. It is hoped that the people of Bombay will readily avail themselves of the opportunity of doing something practical to meet the spiritual and moral needs of the students and other educated young men in the city, upon whose lives and character the future of the country so largely depends. Surely, it will need the co-operation of all and we therefore appeal to all who are interested to come forward and demonstrate their interest in the most practical way by providing the Association with the necessary funds with which to carry on its work.

LONDON LETTER.

(From our own Correspondent).

London, November 10, 1921.

THE WASHINGTON CONFERENCE.

The eyes of most thoughtful people, all over the world, are just now turned towards the United States and the Washington Conference. The keynote of the Conference will be struck on the opening day by President Harding. So far the omens for a good beginning are auspicious; a feeling of trust in the spirit and power of the Washington Conference is abroad. In America itself, a wave of emotion, approaching a religious revival feeling, is sweeping over the land on the question of the limitation of armaments, and a campaign on the usual lavish American scale is going on. But one wonders, if, which Heaven forbid, the Conference broke up without coming to an agreement on armament limitations, whether America would be prepared to lead the way and disarm as an example to the world. It is true that at the present time, no more money is being voted for battleships, and the naval building is practically at a standstill. It is also true that the hearts of all people are aching for peace, for peace that will be permanent, and we pray that the statesmen and representative men now meeting together will announce, at the end of their deliberations, that the limitation of armaments shall be a definite world-policy of the future. Rather an amusing and, for the Japanese, slightly embarrassing item has already been up for discussion ere the Conference meets officially, namely, the use of alcoholic liquor at official banquets. The United States Government will not modify its prohibition, so there will be nothing but iced water allowed. But official toasts to the Mikado, tradition necessitates, we are informed, three full glasses of wine being drunk, but as there will not be wine in America the Japanese delegates were in a dilemma. However, they have decided to substitute three cheers in place of lifting the wine glasses, so may honour be satisfied.

THE "WESTMINSTER GAZETTE."

The well-known evening Liberal paper, the "Westminster Gazette" issued its final edition as an evening paper on Saturday last, and on Monday appeared as a new morning daily. It aims at being a really national liberal, and when necessary, independent journal of opinion, and should have a solid future, for it is a well-balanced paper. It is a pity that it will not often come into the hands of the working man, as the price is twopence, a penny more than the mass is accustomed to pay for its news.

VILLAGE INDUSTRIES.

A movement, which some little time ago had its beginnings, has recently received new impetus. London has become so vast and so complicated that it is now recognised as being most difficult to manage. Many suggestions have been put forward by various people for the easing of such an unwieldy machine. Inducements have been held out for the setting up of factories outside the City. A few have done this most successfully, but more must be done ere the conditions of life in London improve, or it will become like the frog in the fable—so big that it will burst. The benefits of the revival of village industries would therefore be many. It would help to do away with the unemployed problem, ease the towns of the surplus population, and stop the growth of factory life, hence the new impetus given to it. One fairly successful village industry is the soft toy-making. In fact, so successful has this become that it is claimed, at the present time, it can undercut the Germans, who have hitherto held a monopoly of this trade. But such success is not due to the industry of the workers alone. It was discovered, by the advisor on rural industries, that the women employed in making soft toys, were purchasing their material at 14s. a yard, and were at that time altogether cut out of the market by the German trade. The material, he found, could be purchased from the manufacturers, slightly soiled, at 1s.3d. a yard, thus making it possible to undercut the German product. Some industries, hitherto carried on abroad, are being started with success in England and many more could be. For instance, the Irish horn is bought by the French and German agents, shipped out of the country, converted into combs and toilet articles, and resold in England at fancy prices. This could be made a very successful paying village industry and help to set to work some of the 100,000 partly skilled and disabled ex-service men. But at the present time nothing is being done in this direction.

BISHOP OF MANCHESTER ON IDEALS OF LABOUR PARTY.

A noteworthy speech was recently delivered by the Bishop of Manchester, who has been in his private capacity a member of the Labour Party for some years, in which he said: "What I see is that the Labour Party, with its great ideals of fellowship and brotherhood, is mainly cemented by the fact that it is up against something else, that it is united in opposition to an order of society or another set of people. Its main bond of fellowship is, in fact, a common enmity. That is an extraordinarily perilous state to be in, and if it remains, the triumph of the Labour Party will certainly not be the triumph of the ideals at which it is aiming. In the process of reaching its ideals, it will have made it impossible ever to arrive at them. The positive work of the Labour Party ought always to be the actual practice of fellowship, and its bond of unity independent and free from all kinds of enmity and antagonism." How familiar to some of us in East and West these words seem, but how different to mould is human nature in the mass, for we are always up against the 'unknown quantity' and it is this that wrecks much that the leaders of life attempt.

INDIA IN PARLIAMENT.

The "Die-Hards" have not succeeded in forcing upon the Government, before the prorogation of Parliament, a debate on the present condition of India. They twice did their best to intimidate the Leader of the House (Mr. Chamberlain) but without avail. But a promise has been given that the India Office note shall come up early in the new session—or, it may be, in the new Parliament. Much depends upon the success or otherwise of the Irish Conference, which has now reached its most critical stage.

A SCHEME OF COMPULSORY EDUCATION.

(BY THE HONOURABLE MR. G. M. BHURGRI.)

In the feverish heat and excitement of the politics of the present day, cold calculated schemes of Reform and Reconstruction have little charm for even the student and the statesman. It is therefore not to be surprised at if the Committee appointed to consider the desirability of introducing Compulsory Education in our Presidency has not attracted sufficient notice. Let us not, however, forget that knowledge and therefore Education is the fountain-source of all Reform.

One of the questions that the Committee has invited replies to is as to how far the present system of Primary Education is an effective means of dealing with illiteracy. I hope the question is intended not for satisfying any doubts of the Committee or any one of its members, but only to strengthen their conviction that the existing system is by no means effective. It is almost incredible, in view of the official reports of the progress of Elementary Education in the Presidency from year to year, and quinquennium to quinquennium, to suppose that there is any one single person in this country who can assert with any degree of honesty or conviction that the present system of Education is really an effective means to cope with illiteracy. However, it would not be altogether useless to give a few statistics here as to the rate of progress at which we can accomplish our task under the existing system.

PRESIDENCY FIGURES.*

1. Percentage of boys at school to the total of school-going age, 6 to 10 years, in the quinquennium ending in 1911-1912.....	39
2. Percentage of boys at school to the total of school-going age, 6 to 10 years in the quinquennium ending in 1916-1917.....	44
3. Percentage between the years 1917-21....	50
Increase average in 5 years.....	55

Assuming there is no increase in the population it would take about 60 years to find all the boys of school-going age in the Presidency at schools. In the case of girls it would take no less than 800 years.

FIGURES FOR SINDH. (Boys).

1. Percentage in the quinquennium ending in 1911-1912.....	28
2. Percentage in the quinquennium ending in 1916-1917.....	30
3. Average increase for five years.....	2

On the same assumption as in the case of Presidency even if there were no increase in the population, it would take 180 years in the case of boys and about 600 years in the case of girls at the present rate of progress.

This must dispel any doubts there might be as to the necessity of introducing compulsion in the matter of our elementary education. As to whether this should be done on a universal scale and simultaneously in all localities, or gradually and by stages, I would strongly advocate the introduction of the principle on a universal scale. But taking into consideration the magnitude of the problem, the limited resources at our disposal just at present, and a considerable amount of indifference about and prejudice still prevalent against education in the backward tracts and communities which have smoothly and successfully to be weeded out, I recognise that in the existing state of things, any scheme of compulsory education to be successful, has to be carried out by successive stages but in a manner that a complete system of free and compulsory education may flourish throughout the Presidency within a definite period of time.

* The figures worked out by me show larger percentages than even the official records do, because I have taken only 10 per cent. of the total population as comprising the school-going age.

Further, being painfully conscious of our utter backwardness in the case of female education and of very strong prejudices and conventions such as the purdah system still prevalent in some communities (e.g. Mahomedan) and areas (e.g. Sind), I realize that female education will have to make some headway under any scheme of compulsory education, on a permissive basis before compulsion can be enforced in their case in all areas and communities. Therefore, my recommendations are outlines of an Act operative in the case of boys and permissive for a certain period in the case of girls, after which it will have the same binding effect as in the case of boys.

I would classify the British Districts of the Presidency for this purpose as follows:—

1. All Municipal areas, or which may be denominated as "Municipal School Districts." In case of rural areas or "Rural School Districts."
2. All villages with a population of 500 and over which may be denominated as "First Class Rural School Districts" and
3. All villages with a population of less than 500 and all sparsely populated areas, which may be called "2nd Class Rural School Districts."

N. B.—Each "School District" will be under the jurisdiction of its "Local Authority" which may be Municipality, a District or Taluk Board, or a Village Panchayat as the case may be.

The age limit in most of the Western countries varies between six and fourteen but in India, being predominantly agriculturist and poverty-stricken, boys of 11, 12 and over render active help to their parents in working for most part of the day in the fields or otherwise in factories etc. and thus contributing their mite in adding to the very meagre resources of the family. I have therefore suggested six to ten as the age limit here in India. On this basis I find on a reference to census figures, that slightly over 10% of the total population would come of the school-going age. The total population of the British Districts of the Presidency, according to 1911 census figures is 1,96,26,477 of whom 1,02,14,557 are males and 94,11,920 are females. We thus have approximately a total 10½ lacs of boys and 9½ lacs of girls of the school going age. It will be noticed that the fixing of the age-limit between 6 and 10 considerably simplifies the problem of enforcing compulsion.

COMPULSORY EDUCATION OF BOYS.

The Act being operative in the case of the male population of the school-going age in all "School Districts" I would suggest the following stages in which the process is to be completed in the three kinds of "School Districts" mentioned above so that at the end of the period prescribed sufficient provision will have been made for all the boys of the school-going age resident within the district concerned.

Each Municipal area would form a separate "School District" under the jurisdiction of the "Local Authority" concerned which will be the Municipality. (Functions of the Local Authority will be described later).

There are 197 British towns and cities in the Presidency with a total male population (1911 census figures) of 20, 63, 601 or with approximately 2 lacs 10 thousand boys of school going age. Deducting the figures for the city of Bombay which does not come within the purview of the Committee, we have approximately 1 lac and 80 thousands of boys of the school going age. About three fifths of these are already receiving instruction. Thus we will have to provide for a maximum figure of 75 thousand boys of the school-going age in Municipal areas, or "Municipal School Districts". So far as the financial requirements go, this can easily be done at once, without proportionately additional burden on the resources of the Municipalities. But as the administrative and organising machinery is not expected to run quite so smoothly, I shall concede another two years during which the Municipalities in their capacity as "Local Authorities" could complete their arrangements for making necessary provision for the 75 thousand balance which is to be provided for, or say an average of 25 thousand per year. So that three years should be the period set down in the case of "Municipal School Districts."

Areas coming under this head may be formed into "School Districts" under the jurisdiction of the District or Taluk Board or Village Panchayat as the case may be, which will be the "Local Authority" for the "district" concerned.

There are 10,792 villages in the British District of the Presidency with a total male population of approximately 63 lacs or $6\frac{1}{2}$ lacs of the school going age. About three fifths of these also on an average are receiving instruction already. We thus have a balance of 2 lacs and 60 thousands or maximum of $2\frac{1}{2}$ lacs to be provided for. Fixing the proportion of contributions from Provincial revenues and local funds to $\frac{2}{3}$ rd and $\frac{1}{3}$ rd respectively a very large portion of the additional expenditure will be met from provincial contributions, and so would not in any way unduly burden the finances of the Local Boards.

If, therefore, the whole process of making necessary provision for this $2\frac{1}{2}$ lacs were to spread over a period of 5 years, or say at the rate of 55 thousands per year, in an area of about 45 thousands square miles, or $\frac{1}{4}$ th of the total area, it should not in any manner be considered an unduly extra-burden. Moreover by the adoption of the double shift system both the capital and recurring expenditure, equipment etc. may be curtailed down, if not by one half at least by $\frac{1}{3}$ rd or $\frac{1}{4}$ th.

There are 15,264 villages of this class with a total population of approximately 37 $\frac{1}{2}$ lacs, so that there are approximately 2 lacs of the male population of the school going age. I estimate that at least $\frac{1}{5}$ th of this is receiving some sort of Primary instructions in Alakhs, Angla schools or pathshalas, and a few local board and public institutions. But not taking this in our consideration at all, I shall even assume that we have to make provision for all these two lacs.

With a double shift system in operation, and in addition itinerant schools in very sparsely populated areas all difficulties in the way of making necessary provision would be reduced to the minimum. However, taking into consideration the extensive area of operation (a little less than two-thirds of the total area) I would suggest a ten years time-limit in which to make necessary provision. This would work out an average of providing for about 20 thousands per year.

About 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ lacs is the total male population of school-going age in the British Districts of the Presidency excluding the City of Bombay and Aden. The total number of pupils receiving instruction in all the Boys Primary schools is about 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ lacs. But these include a little over 50 thousand girls and all those boys who are receiving instructions in upper Primary schools, and must therefore as a rule be above the compulsion age viz. six to ten years. It also includes a large number of boys above and below the compulsory age in the Lower Primary Schools. The following are the approximate figures:—

- | | | | |
|--|-----|-----|-------------------|
| (a) girls included | ... | ... | 5% |
| (b) Boys in Higher Primary Schools
(over compulsory age) | ... | ... | 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ % |
| (c) Boys over compulsory age in Lower Primary Schools | ... | ... | 15% |
| (d) Pupils receiving instructions in Bombay & Aden Primary Schools. | ... | ... | 2% |

or say in all about 30%.

Thus out of 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ lacs of boys, we get a maximum balance of 5 lacs to provide for, which is less by 10 thousands than the total by classification and by 50 thousands than the actually provided for maximum figure, therefore the latter errs, if at all, on the side of caution.

PROSTITUTION IN BOMBAY.

The first meeting of the Prostitution Committee was held on November, 25th, when the Hon. Mr. M. H. W. Hayward addressed the members of the Committee on the general aspects of the question and pointed out some of the lines along which the enquiry might be conducted. He said:—

We have had certain legislative powers for some time for dealing with prostitution, that is to say, certain sections of the Bombay City Police Act, 1902. Section 28 provides for the removal and segregation of common prostitutes; Section 120 prohibits the solicitation of prostitutes in public; Section 125 prohibits the permission of solicitation at public entertainments. There is a line which is rather difficult to draw and it has not always been easy to remove certain common prostitutes. But the policy has been for a long time to segregate common prostitutes as far as possible in the neighbourhood of Girgaum. We have also had legislative powers for dealing with foreign prostitutes and procurers. We have deported foreign prostitutes and procurers under the Foreigners' Act III of 1864 in furtherance of the International Agreement of 1904.

Sir Bhalchandra Krishna presided in 1911 at a public meeting that passed resolutions recommending the removal of prostitutes from Girgaum. The Commissioner of Police;

Mr. Edwards, was asked to report upon these proposals. The City Improvement Trust had, he pointed out, already reduced materially the area infested by prostitutes by the building of the Sandhurst Bridge and improving that particular neighbourhood of Girgaon. But he also pointed out that a large measure of responsibility lay upon the landlords who let their houses at high rents to prostitutes in Girgaon. He deprecated giving greater powers to the police as likely to give rise to the greater evils resulting from the state-regulated vice of the Yoshiwara of Japan.

There occurred the case of Emperor-va, Mirza Sayad Khan which in 1917 revealed the depths of degradation and misery in the brothels of Girgaon. The case was tried by the Bombay High Court. The revelations led to a new section 126A forbidding the detection of women and children in brothels being added to the Bombay City Police Act 1902 by Bombay Act VI of 1920. There are also certain sections dealing with children in brothels in the Children Welfare Bill which has since been drafted and will in due course be placed before the Legislature. The traffic in women and children has also quite recently attracted the general attention of the League of Nations.

The Municipal Corporation in March 1921, wrote us a letter recommending the cleaning up of the Falkland Foras Road. The letter was referred to a strong Committee composed of the Commissioner of Police, the Municipal Commissioner, the Chairman of the Improvement Trust and the Director of Development. They reported in August, 1921, and pointed out the great practical difficulty of removing 880 houses occupied by some 6,000 prostitutes to any other quarter of the city. They repeated that the previous policy had been, as already stated, to segregate prostitutes so far as practicable between these limits: North Bellasis Road; South Grant Road; West, Lamington Road and Falkland Road, and Duncan Road. They were of opinion that the proposal to remove them was not practicable without establishing elsewhere a state regulated quarter similar to the Yoshiwara of Japan.

A Committee was suggested by Mr. Kanji Dwarakadas in April 1921, to enquire into the practicability of making brothel-keeping illegal. Mr. Kanji Dwarakadas proposed to make a motion to that effect in the Legislative Council. The Commissioner of Police reporting on this in July 1921, recommended the registration and inspection of brothels, which would no doubt be open to objection as materially increasing in these matters the powers of the police.

A memorial was received in July 1921, from the Social Purity Committee, influentially signed, recommending three things; (a) that brothel-keeping should be made illegal, (b) that landlords should be prohibited by law from letting their houses to prostitutes and (c) that the profession of procurers should be made illegal. We considered the Committee's report on the letter of the Municipal Corporation together with this memorial and decided that a committee of enquiry had better be appointed to go generally into the whole matter. This decision was publicly announced in September upon the resolution regarding brothel-keeping being moved by Mr. Kanji Dwarakadas and received the general approval of the Legislative Council.

Copies have been or will be laid before you of the various papers just mentioned and a perusal of these papers will enable you to obtain some idea of the difficulties of the

It will scarcely be necessary for you to * The figures into the existence of the evil. That is than even the office you will very likely desire to take 10 per cent. of the total. It will not be necessary for going ago: prevalence of this immorality.

There can be no two opinions about that. You will no doubt strain all your efforts to finding some practical remedies. You will perhaps scrutinize the results obtained by special rules under the Cantonment Act XV of 1910 as amended by Act XXII of 1919. Rules have been framed under Section 24 (23) of that Act providing for the removal of brothels and prostitutes from Cantonments and for the prohibition of solicitations similar to the provisions already mentioned in the Bombay City Police Act. But special provisions have also been made for the treatment of persons suffering from venereal diseases at the hospitals. The relevant rules are rules 179, 180, 208, 209, 214 and 215 under the Act. You will also be provided with copies of the Ceylon and the Burma Acts recently passed rendering brothel-keeping illegal. You will find details of similar legislation in England at page 541 of Vol. IX of Halsbury's Laws of England.

Mr. Chairman, your committee will no doubt desire to proceed to business under your guidance without further delay. My duty is done for the present in stating the facts and suggesting the lines of enquiry. Your committee will probably desire to peruse the papers mentioned at leisure and perhaps refer to others. Your Committee will have in the meanwhile to decide the dates and times for your future meetings and possibly prepare a questionnaire for witnesses. You will receive in these matters and in any others the willing help of Mr. Perry, your Secretary. We are very grateful for your help in wrestling with this immemorial vice. You will recognise that it is a difficult matter requiring practical remedies. If it is not impertinent in me, let me remind you of the necessity of recognising the imperfections of human nature and that experience has shown that it is no use legislating too far ahead of public opinion. It is useful to be a little ahead in order to educate public opinion. But moral laws must always be necessarily ahead of State Laws. It is however, my firm belief that determination will find the proper remedies. It is a practical problem for practical men to get rid of the black spot which has for years disgraced the heart of this great city and to remove the long standing evil from the capital of this Presidency and the Gateway of India.

MR. SESHAGIRI IYER'S BILLS.

The following are the two Bills referred to in Mr. Seshagiri Iyer's article we printed last week:—

I.

EXCLUSION FROM INHERITANCE BILL.

Notwithstanding any rule of Hindu Law or custom to the contrary, no person governed by the Hindu Law shall be excluded from inheritance or from a share in joint family property by reason only of any disease, deformity, physical or mental defect.

It shall apply to all provinces of India, except Bengal.

STATEMENT OF OBJECTS AND REASONS.

Certain classes of persons have been excluded from inheritance presumably on the ground that their present condition is due to sins in the former birth and that they are therefore not entitled to share in the patrimony. Without questioning the soundness of this reason of the rule, I am of opinion that in the times that we live in, such grounds of exclusion should not be allowed to deprive a person of temporal rights. These persons stand in greater need of assistance than their more favoured brethren who can earn their living. Public opinion has expressed itself strongly against the disability which the present state of the Hindu Law imposes on them.

My reason for excluding Bengal from the operation of the Act is based on the opposition which the motion for codifying Hindu Law met from the Bengal Representatives in the Legislative Assembly. It may be that the Members who spoke on that occasion only expressed their individual views and did not expound the collective opinion of that province. In that case the clause relating to the exclusion of Bengal may be modified in the Select Committee. If on the other hand Bengal is as orthodox as it has been represented to be, by seeking to apply the provisions of the Bill to that province, the passing of the measure so far as the other provinces are concerned may be jeopardised. This is my reason for excluding Bengal.

II.

HINDU LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

Notwithstanding anything in the Hindu Law to the contrary, the estate of a Hindu, not held in coparcenary, shall in the absence of heirs down to brother's grandson, be inherited in the order by (1) the son's daughter, (2) the daughter's daughter, (3) sister's son, (4) sister, (5) step-sister, (6) step-sister's son, and (7) step-mother, and only on the failure of the above by the father's mother or other heir, coming after her under the Mitakshara law of the inheritance provided that the female heirs succeeding as above shall take only such estate as a female heir would take under the ordinary Hindu Law. 2. Nothing herein contained shall affect any special family or local custom.

A NOTABLE INTERMARRIAGE.

On the 7th instant was celebrated a notable inter-provincial marriage at Towers Gardens, Matras. The bridegroom Mr. Narayan Dewal, son of the well-known religious and social reformer of Maharashtra Mr. Kashinath Dewal, is a distinguished scholar of Maha Kavi Tagore's School at Bolpur. He is now a sculptor in the Mysore State Service after having learnt that art in England and in India. The bride Sowbagyavathi C. N. Sundaribai is the second daughter of Mr. S. Narayanswami Iyer, retired Director of Education in the Pudukota State. Her sisters are Mrs. Muthulakshmi Ammal and Miss C. N. Nallanthu Ammal of the Queen Mary's College. Before a very large and cosmopolitan gathering, the Brahma rites of marriage were performed by Swami Brahmananda.

FOR PRINCES AND RICH MEN ONLY,

THE

ROYAL YAKUTI.

THIS YAKUTI or life giving nectar has been prepared from
the best, choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has wonderful properties of increasing virile power and it rectifies urinary disorders. In fact it makes men a man. This valuable
medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, (aristocracy and
gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to those persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen
the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility.
Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicines. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires, it is

NOTES.

Wholesale Arrests. The week has been signalised by quite a crop of notable arrests in the Punjab, the United Provinces and Bengal. Lala Lajpat Rai and some other leaders, in Lahore, and Pandit Motilal Nehru and his co-adjutors in Allahabad, have been arrested, tried and sentenced to various terms of imprisonment for breach of orders of the Executive Governments under various Acts. In Calcutta Mrs. C. R. Das and two other ladies of the same family were arrested along with a number of men, but were released after several hours' detention on the orders of Government, though they refused to furnish security. We had hoped that this method of dealing with political opponents had disappeared with the advent of the Reforms. We are sorry that we were mistaken. Whatever the wisdom of inviting the Prince to visit India at this juncture, Government, now that he is here, is bound to ensure for him as good a reception as possible, and the Non-co-operationists have shown themselves to be grievously lacking in political perspective by the manner in which they have set themselves to make it appear a failure. We cannot help thinking that it is not altogether just to those who would give a warm welcome to the Prince, to think that they are to be intimidated by opposition, and our opinion is amply borne out by the experience of Bombay notwithstanding the riots. His Royal Highness' reception at any place could not have been marred by intimidation, and is not likely to be improved by these arrests. As it is, the daily swelling roll of arrests in places which he is to visit, cannot but cause pain and sorrow to His Royal Highness. If Ministers, instead of regarding themselves as parts of the Executive machine, had exerted themselves to get into touch with leaders of the people, they might have helped the Governments of which they are members to find a less obnoxious way of ensuring against hartals and other demonstrations of discontent. At any rate, they ought to have tried, and if they had seriously tried, they would, we believe, have largely succeeded.

Policy or Panic? These wholesale arrests, after the masterly passivity, of the past months, do not convey the impression of being inspired by a considered policy. They give the impression of panic on the part of Government who seem to be really at their wit's end how to deal with the situation. Sir Harcourt Butler's excited appearance at the U. P. Legislative Council and his impassioned declaration that Government was determined to see it through are hardly calculated to impart calmness and confidence to those who heard him. How different from the heroic serenity of Lord Hardinge who when the bomb burst upon him with fearful impact and he was being removed to Hospital, told his locum tenens "No change of policy, Wilson." Of such stuff are the builders of Empire made, not of men who allow themselves to be stampeded into opposite extremes by the circumstances of the moment. The coincidence between the passing of the Rowlatt Act on the conclusion of the Armistice, and of these arrests on the heels of the Irish Settlement, have not escaped attention.

The Malabar Black Hole: The Knapp Committee to enquire into the circumstances which led to the death of 64 Mopla prisoners in the railway waggon in which they were being taken to their place of imprisonment, began its work on the 28th November. The evidence so far tendered before the Committee leaves no room to doubt that these men died of want of sufficient air to breathe. The evidence of the Medical witnesses is conclusive. Captain Mathai I. M. S. said that the vans were unfit to carry human beings, Major Forrest I. M. S. was of the same opinion, and Dr. O'Conner deposed that the cause of death was asphyxia due to overcrowding in what was practically an air-tight compartment. The evidence of the surviving Mopla prisoners who were in the compartment, is harrowing. Their pathetic cries for water were ignored or met with brutal response. As regards the selection of the waggon as a suitable vehicle for conveying prisoners, Mr. A. H. Reeve, Traffic Inspector, S. I. Ry, stated that he was at Tirur on September 1, when the question of special arrangements for the conveyance of Moplah prisoners was first discussed. Colonel Humphreys, Mr. F. B. Evans and Mr. R. H. Hitchcock, D. S. P., were present. He suggested the accommodation of prisoners in a carriage in the No. 89 train to Coimbatore, but that was regarded as unsuitable, as it was thought better to have a separate vehicle which would not need a large escort. He then suggested a cattle truck, but that also was regarded as unsuitable, as ventilation was possible only by leaving open all the doors and windows. He then suggested luggage van No. 1716 of the M. and S. M. Railway. It was inspected and accepted as suitable and a batch of 39 prisoners was sent in it to Coimbatore next morning.

It remains to be seen what action the Government of Madras proposes to take on these revelations. That Government has not distinguished itself in its handling of the Mopla outbreak which is not yet settled. This terrible tragedy greatly enhances the disadvantage which its tardy success has placed it in for putting down the outbreak.

The Malabar Relief Fund: Whatever doubts might have been entertained at first of the accuracy of the reports regarding the nature and extent of the suffering and destitution caused by the Mopla outbreak, must have been set at rest by the detailed reports which Mr. Devadhar has been publishing every week in the daily papers. He has refrained, wisely, we think, from publishing all the harrowing details he has received from Malabar, but the one or two incidents which he has disclosed give an idea of the terrible anguish, physical and moral, of the victims. There is suffering, acute and widespread. The number of persons in the 19 camps of the Malabar Relief Fund are, according to the latest figures, approximately 25,000, and the daily expenses amount to Rs. 2500. Mr. Devadhar has appealed for 10 lakhs of rupees to enable 50,000 refugees to be maintained for six months. The sum collected in Bombay so far is about Rs. 80,000. It is urgently necessary that the process of collection should be considerably accelerated for this limit—a minimum one—to be reached. And it can be reached, if those who feel for the distressed people—and they are a large number—subscribe liberally themselves and do all in their power to get subscriptions from their friends and neighbours. It may be repeated that the Malabar Relief Fund makes no distinction of creed or caste. It is for all sufferers, Hindus, Mahomedans and Christians. Every one and every part of the country should pay, generously according to the circumstances of each. Bombay as the wealthiest city in India has a particular duty and we are sure she will worthily discharge it. We earnestly appeal to our readers in all parts of the country to come promptly to the relief of sorely distressed Malabar.

The Ladies' Deputation to Calicut. There is a slight misconception in the comments of some of our contemporaries as to the nature of the task for which Mrs. Bhatt, the experienced Superintendent of the Poona Seva Sadan, and Miss Natarajan of this journal, have gone to Calicut. The policy of the Malabar Relief Fund is to interest and engage local people as much as possible in the relief operations—which, for obvious reasons, is the best policy. The deputation was entrusted with the task of organising, after visiting the several camps and studying their requirements, a Women's Relief Committee locally and framing a programme of work and we are pleased to know that their efforts have been attended with a gratifying measure of success. A Calicut Ladies' Committee has been formed with a comprehensive programme including health and sanitation, occupation, and the education of the children in the Relief camps. Sub-Committees have been constituted to take charge of each separate department. Neither of the two members of the deputation could be spared from their duties for any length of time, and it is at some inconvenience that they have been able to go. While, the local Women's Committee will carry on the operations, there is urgent need for women in Bombay to express their sympathy with their suffering sisters in Malabar in an organised form, as they know how to do so well.

A Message from Calicut. Miss Natarajan wires from Calicut: It is difficult for visitor to relief camps at Calicut to believe that work of Central Relief Committee organised by that indefatigable worker and patriot Mr. G. K. Devadhar and his colleagues, is purely a labour of love and not a regular institution like school hostel or orphanage. The management of camps of which there are seven in Calicut, some small, some big, varying from sixty-two to two thousand are entrusted to a band of honorary and willing workers whose mission of ministering to refugees appears in vivid contrast to the Moplas' deliberate cruelty of inflicting misery and privation on the refugees and mostly women and children. The sufferings which these unfortunate women have undergone, are still fresh in their minds and when asked to relate their miseries vividly they narrate, while tears are falling from their eyes. Children whose inalienable right is to be joyful and free from blame appear to have developed a serious turn of mind. Cheerful faces seem now rare among them. These people are well looked after so far as food and clothing are concerned but with regard to medical relief and sanitation much remains to be done. Health of children has suffered most, chief diseases being measles, dysentery and sore eyes. Dr. C. B. Ramarau who arrived on the seventh instant had a meeting with local practitioners on the eighth. Lady workers also attended to concert measures to improve health conditions of camps. Sanitary Commissioner who was present announced at the meeting that his staff who will soon arrive will be at the service of the Relief Committee. This is great help indeed for the work will then be divided between two sets of workers which will enhance efficiency. The Malabar relief work surpasses in nature and magnitude the famine and other relief works organised from time to time. Hence it presents problems that have not risen before. The problem of suitable employment for refugees is also engaging attention of workers. It is due to dearth of materials and tools that work cannot be provided for many. In some camps you see carpenters busily engaged in making cots and office boxes which, by the way, are much in demand here as handiwork of refugees. In one camp a group of potters are busy themselves in turning out pots of all shapes and descriptions. Attempts to fit up looms for weaving are being made. The problem of employment of women refugees is yet to be solved. They are mostly engaged in looking after their own children and helping in the kitchen. Employment of women and education of children are matters which come under the sphere of women's work. For this purpose ladies meeting was held in which ladies of Calicut evinced much enthusiasm and willingness to work for their less fortunate sisters. This is indeed laudable work and we wish the ladies of Calicut every success in their humanitarian work. Mrs. Bhatt's stay here is absolutely necessary to organise ladies' work in camps.

For Bombay. Two weeks ago, we published a letter from Professor Patrick Geddes calling attention to the Pro-Jerusalem movement which brought together men of different races and religions in work for promoting the common good of the ancient city. The habit of co-operation so fostered cannot but permeate in course of time every part of life, removing time-honoured asperities and fostering the sense of fellowship. This is the true method of permanently eliminating influences which make for estrangement. Some of those who read Professor Geddes letter thought of inviting him to explain more fully the working of "pro-Jerusalem." An invitation was issued, over the signatures of men representing the different communities and political parties, to about three hundred citizens to a meeting at the hall of the Chanda Ramji Hindu Girls' High School, Girgaum, to hear the Professor. It was stated in the invitation that an informal conversation would follow as to whether it is necessary or desirable to institute a similar movement in Bombay. There was a generous response to the invitation, and between two and three hundred ladies and gentlemen, Englishmen, Parsis, Jews, Mahomedans and Hindus, gathered to hear Professor Geddes. Mr. M. R. Jayakar was voted to the chair. Professor Geddes lecture was listened to with deep interest, and at its close, a general discussion ensued. As the result, a provisional Committee was appointed to consider further the question of starting a movement to promote civic ideals in Bombay.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, DECEMBER 11, 1921.

THE IRISH SETTLEMENT AND ITS LESSONS TO INDIA.

There will be sincere pleasure all throughout the world at the agreement arrived at between the Irish Sinn Féin leaders and the British Government. The pleasure is especially great in India because the Irish were likened by a great British statesman, the late Lord Salisbury, only thirty-five years ago to "races like the Hottentots, and even the Hindoos, incapable of self-government." That was said during the debate on the first Irish Home Rule Bill. Mr. Gladstone had in a transcendent degree the great gift of political imagination in which the British governing classes are notably deficient. He had besides moral and religious fervour which is conspicuously lacking in British politics at the present day. His deep insight showed him where the crux of the Irish problem lay, and when well past the Psalmist's allotted span of three score years and ten, he girded his loins to the task of remedying it at its source. Foiled again and again by the obtuseness or selfishness of the British political mind, he retired beaten from the scene of his great parliamentary triumphs, unable to do Great Britain and Ireland the service which would have effaced the bitter memories of centuries of misgovernment. Even the fierce light which the great war has shed upon the hidden foundations of national life, failed to open the eyes of British statesmen to the justice of the Irish demand for the right to live their own life. Coercion, systematic, relentless, brutal, was tried, and only when it was found that it did not and could not answer, was recourse had to negotiations which have now ended happily. And now in the moment of reconciliation when all the world is showering its congratulations on Mr. Lloyd George, let us recall with reverence the memory of the illustrious statesman who first espoused the cause of justice to Ireland and pressed it forward in the face of bitter opposition of wealth and social influence.

His Excellency the Viceroy speaking at a banquet at Calcutta referred to the Irish settlement and drew from it certain lessons for the Indian people. In passing, we may remark that Lord Reading was not quite right as to fact when he said that within the last 30 or 40 years it had not been so much with British people as with two sections of the Irish people that made it so very difficult to bring about a settlement. These differences exist now as strongly as ever before. Sir Edward Carson, who surely knows the Irish situation as well as Lord Reading, is reported to have described the present agreement as abject humiliation for Great Britain. The fact is that the differences, racial and religious, between Ulster and the rest of Ireland were made much of when it suited the British Government to do so, and have been ignored now when there are other interests to be served. To describe this settlement as the outcome of magnanimity may deceive children, but not any one conversant with the history of the Irish agitation during the last seventy years. There are passages in the Life of Lord Randolph Churchill by Mr. Winston Churchill who is one of the first signatories to this settlement, which should dispel any illusion in this regard. The principal lesson which the Viceroy drew for the benefit of India from the Irish settlement, may be quoted in his own words :

But think of the difference between Ireland and India. Ireland has attained this result after long, long years. India without any of the acts which have characterised the history of the movement in Ireland attained a tremendous boon in the grant of reforms which took her already far away upon the road to that complete Swaraj which we all want. Again, India has before it by ordinary constitutional means, by labours, by the efforts of those who are in the Legislative Assembly, the Council of State for India and in the Legislative Councils of the provinces, an opportunity of which they have been very quick to avail themselves, of proving they are the people who would soon be ready for that full grant of self-government.

Did His Excellency seriously mean to convey that the constitutional means available to Ireland which had over 100 members directly elected to the House of Commons, was inferior to the Legislative Assembly, the Council of State, and the Provincial Councils which he thought gave India an advantage not possessed by Ireland? Has India ever received a hundredth part of the attention which Parliament and the British Government have had to devote to Ireland because of this solid block of Irish members? No one is obliged to refer to political history in postprandial speeches, but if one does, one should keep within the limits of history. We do not minimise the value of constitutional methods, but we are not able to say that the present settlement is the outcome, directly or indirectly, of such methods, unless we include the last negotiations between the British Government and Sinn Féin—an utterly unconstitutional body—among them. His Excellency bade us think of the centuries which it took Ireland to obtain justice and the single century or so in which we have obtained Diarchy. Well, the Irish sea is not as wide as the oceans that lie between India and Great Britain. Does Lord Reading think that it would not have been so good for England and Ireland if so many years had not been allowed to intervene between the Home Rule Bill and the Irish settlement?

We are all for patience and have sought to inculcate it in our own way on those who seem to us to be wanting in that great virtue. But the best way of ensuring the patience of the people is for their rulers to be prompt and vigilant in redressing wrongs and promoting their prosperity, moral and material. The chief lesson of the Irish settlement, in our opinion, is for Government. It is the danger of procrastination, delay and the exaltation of vested interests over those of the people. If India ever repeats the history of Ireland, it will be less the fault of the people than of the Government here and in Great Britain. Such a movement as the Sinn Féin is not an invention of certain leaders but the outcome of a distinctive national consciousness compounded of ethnic and religious emotions whose re-action to political influence is constant and unvarying. Antagonism to an alien Government may stimulate (and even simulate) such a consciousness but it is not that consciousness. Mahatma Gandhi's mistake lies in not distinguishing the one from the other, and even more in endeavouring to build up a national unity on communal differences. The power to paralyse an existing system is not the same as the power to erect and operate an alternative one which is superior or at any rate not inferior to it in its outlook and efficiency. On the other hand, because a system is the only one possible for the time being, it does not follow that it is wise to keep it stiff, unbending, impervious to the call for more space and air. Those who feel in this way find that the only honest course open to them at present, is to accord their support to whatever makes for the upbuilding of the nation in the measures and policy of either side, and to oppose whatever in either side is opposed to steady and sure progress in that direction. They are unable to feel that the Councils by themselves, and without the pressure of public opinion (agitation, if you please) outside, can effect much. Even in Great Britain it is the pressure of public opinion on Parliament that makes it powerful, and when such pressure is absent or when Parliament is irresponsive to it, the Press and the platform become the index to the nation's thought and life. We are glad that an increasing band of thoughtful men are coming to realise that the true course for them is to lay down for themselves a programme of social amelioration and the creation among different communities of the habit of mutual co-operation to take the place of that of mutual suspicion, and to utilise every agency in promoting it, irrespective of evanescent political differences. A scarcely less important lesson of the Irish Settlement is that to attempt the role of Ulster in a national movement is neither dignified nor, except temporarily, even profitable.

THE SITUATION IN MALABAR.

The question of Malabar still continues to call for attention. As week after week passes the situation is only growing increasingly acute. Rebels are reported to surrender in large numbers, but the more ferocious and criminal of them are ablaze with a passion born of despair, and are carrying on their reign of terror in an orgy of lust and cruelty which makes one shudder even to imagine. The pathetic tale of burning of flourishing hearths and happy homes, the devastation of fields rich with ripened corn and replete with the new year's hopes, the unspeakably callous conversion of the poor helpless Hindus at the point of the sword, and the brutal way in which the Nair women have been handled in some cases which cannot be described as anything but savage, will make every civilised man irrespective of his race or religion, rightly indignant. The poor people, stricken with panic, paralysed with terror, are fleeing in thousands from their villages in the interior to Calicut and other town centres. The relief camps in these places seem to be overflowing in their numbers, and have been of late reporting an ever-growing influx of refugees. It is a serious crisis for Malabar. A land of plenty failed, for its greenness and grandeur is lying in ruins in a state of utter devastation which makes it sad to contemplate.

The military seem to be doing their best to put down the rising, but the Moplahs are a strong and sturdy race with the vigour of the bracing hills in their limbs, and the hardy blood of their Arab ancestors in their veins. Besides they are clever at fighting having learnt their lesson well during the recent War. The geography of the country is also in their favour, the numerous little hills with which Malabar is studded, being so excellently adapted for guerilla tactics, and huge forests with their far-famed timber, providing convenient hiding places for the tortuous foe. These and such other circumstances have together caused the situation to prolong, though from the recent telegrams it is evident that peace is within sight, and there is every hope that poor suffering Malabar will soon settle down again to her normal condition of law and order. We add our fervent prayer—may that be soon!

But the termination of the rebellion does not end the people's sufferings, and all that is burnt and destroyed does not come back to life the moment the miscreants recover their sanity, and it behoves us therefore to consider as citizens of India and members of a common nation what is our duty, to this afflicted part of our country and these unfortunate brethren of ours in the hour of their grievous need. We include in the word "brethren" the whole of the humanity of Malabar and we do not forget the fact that this consists of two parts in that hapless land, today; "the oppressed and the oppressors". Our sympathy extends to both, though in different ways, though we cannot see any the least trace of bravery or religiousness in their savage fanaticism. Religion to be worth its name must first admit the fundamental fact of Brotherhood, that is regarding all things as the creation of one God, and therefore treating them with respect. Where this first principle is violated, there could be nothing but the passion and fury of crude animal egoism, which may call for our pity, but sympathy is not the word for it. And as for bravery, do we not find it in our daily tasks and common round that it needs often-times a brave man to fear some things, as sometimes it becomes him not to fear others? Humane, by all means, let us be, but let us be just also, and not blind ourselves to facts. We have no bias for any particular religions or other creed, taking our stand on the broad basis of human society, the life of mankind as a whole, but we feel bound to say that the rebel Moplahs deserve condemnation for their action.

Our duty, then, to the people of Malabar clearly is to stand by them in their trial and help them in their need. Mental sufferings are cured by mental sympathies, but physical ailments call for tangible drugs. Even so, if we want to help Malabar, today, the only way in which we can express that wish is by making it possible for those who are conducting relief operations over there to continue and increase it, by letting them have the requisite amount of money.

Mr. Devadhar who went personally to Malabar and toured over some parts of the affected area and has since accepted the responsibility of organising measures for relief with the help of his friends, estimates it, as already reported in these columns at rupees ten lakhs. Of this, even one lakh is not yet full, though it would appear from his reports that his estimate is really very meagre. There are already about 26,000 refugees in the 19 camps of the Malabar Central Relief Committee in Calicut and elsewhere, and the number is daily increasing. These, by the way, represent only the main centres and are wholly conducted by the Central Committee as most of the smaller camps in the interior are self-supporting and get only occasional aid by way of grants. Of such branch committees there are now eighteen but many others are coming in daily asking to be affiliated to the Central Committee, as the refugees grow in number and the consequent increase in expenditure which they are unable to meet, with their slender funds. When it is remembered that all these 26,000 refugees and those others who are still coming in are in a state of absolute destitution, deprived of everything they could call their own and are depending for their very means of existence on the relief that the Committee provides, it will be understood how the sum of ten lakhs is really inadequate.

Add to this, the thousands of refugees that the Congress Committee supports, the thousands who have fled to outside places, and those who are in the smaller camps in the interior, and we get some idea of the vast population who have been disturbed from their normal life and occupation, and who have to be helped to start afresh. That will give us some conception of the work of reconstruction in Malabar. Here of course the Government will have to step in and take the situation wholly in hand, and we have Mr. Devadhar's assurance that he has put this fact very clearly before His Excellency Lord Willingdon and that he has every hope that the Government of Madras will fully do so when the time for it comes.

Now, however, it is for us, people of India to help these unfortunate brethren of ours. Malabar cannot be neglected. The nature and extent of the suffering there has been so great that it has long ceased to be a provincial matter. It is indeed a National Cry. The relief of the distressed and the downcast is not a question of party or politics, it is through and through a humanitarian consideration. We are not at present concerned with the causes that brought about such a situation. There is plenty of time to think of that, when the crisis has passed over. The results are but all too obvious. Some may argue that those who fomented the trouble must make amends for it. But, will starvation and suffering spare human lives until that question is decided? We are asked to sympathise with the Moplahs for the sake of broad humanity. But is there no sympathy for those who have suffered at their hands in such terrible ways? Is Humanity also lame that she must like Progress walk with crutches on either hand? The horrible asphyxiation of the Moplah prisoners has come in for a lot of criticism, and rightly so, for the tragedy of human lives cannot be allowed to be explained away too lightly. But, what of the hundreds and hundreds who have been butchered in all kinds of horrible ways and subjected to the most inhuman outrages? Has the country no sympathy for them?

If it has, there is only one way in which we can express it today, and that is by providing relief for the thousands of sufferers in that land in agony. It is a purely humanitarian question which must evoke the fundamental impulse of charity in the people. Where is the place for party or politics in this living sepulchre of grief? We appeal to the Country's charity. Will not India with her age-long traditions of charitableness and already sympathy to the unfortunate and afflicted, with her far-famed responsive soul sensitive to pain and misery, and a heart brimming with tender human sentiments come to the aid of her own people? Our appeal is to the whole country. Let every feeling heart answer to the call of Malabar.

A SCHEME OF COMPULSORY EDUCATION.

(BY THE HONOURABLE MR. G. M. BHURGRI.)

II.

I have suggested the introduction of Compulsory Education in the case of girls on a permissive basis, to start with, for a certain period, for reasons of comparative backwardness in the case of girls' education, opposition and animosity at present existing against it, for reasons of resources, and further with a view to ensure absolutely certain success in the case of boys' compulsory education by concentrating on it first.

The same classification of areas into three kinds of school districts as in the case of boys would hold good in their case also, the Local Authority also being the same. There should be either special School Committees created or men and women interested in girls' education co-opted to the boys School Committees to assist the Local Authorities in encouraging girls of school-going age in their jurisdiction to attend schools by providing necessary facilities etc., and otherwise in supervising the girls' schools within their areas. (The composition and functions of School Committees will be dealt with in a later article).

Under the permissive scheme it would be open to any local authority desiring to enforce compulsion within its jurisdiction in the case of the girls, simultaneously or at any time within the period prescribed as permissive in its case, by passing a resolution to that effect by two-thirds of its majority, and getting that resolution formally ratified by the Provincial Government. The period during which compulsion may exist on permissive basis may be as follows:—

In the case of the Municipal School Districts, the first three years of the operation of compulsion in the case of boys, wherein it is hoped that the girls' education would expand at least to the extent to which boys education has to-day without any sort of compulsion being applied to it, so that at the end of that period compulsion may be enforced by the provision of the Compulsory Education Act embodying this scheme, if it has not already been enforced by the Local Authority concerned.

In the case of rural areas, both first class and second class school districts, this period may be five years, and it during this period compulsion has not already been enforced by the local authority concerned, it shall be done by the provisions of the statute at the expiry of the permissive period.

The object of compulsory education is not merely to enforce compulsion, but also to make compulsory the provision of schools in unschooled areas, and of adequate schools where they are not so. The latter object can equally be served by the introduction of the principle on a permissive basis. On this basis and in the full belief that the permissive period would be made the fullest use of by the Local Authorities and School Committees for girls in popularising the cause of girls' education, and combating all calumny and prejudice existing at present, and by providing proper accommodation and facilities from time to time, prepare the ground fully for the enforcement of the principle, if not within the permissive period prescribed, at least on its expiry. It would not then at all be difficult to complete the process of enforcing education in the case of all the girls of the school-going age.

In the case of Municipal Districts the period of enforcement in which the process is to be completed may be three years from the date of expiry of the permissive period of three years, and in the case of Rural Districts, with this difference that in both 1st and 2nd classes the process is to be completed within a period of 5 years from the date of the expiry of the permissive period of 5 years prescribed in the case of First Class Rural Districts.

It is not necessary to go into a detailed examination of statistics in the case of Compulsory Girls' Education. Suffice it to say that the total female population being less than the male, the proportion of girls to boys of the school-going age is less, and therefore after the preparatory permissive period, the whole operation could easily be completed within the respective time limit of 3 and 5 years. I gave detailed statistics in the case of boys only with a view to go deep enough to convince that the various time-limits for completing the provision in the respective school districts has been set down not without due caution and consideration. One could go deeper still, into the approximate number of fresh schools necessary for additional provision, the total cost involved in the schemes, and the approximate contributions of the Local Authority and the provincial sources etc. etc. But that would make the statement unnecessarily cumbersome. What is necessary to show that the expenditure involved on the scheme as suggested, is not excessively large, and that has been amply proved from the statistics already given in the first article.

The question has been asked whether there would be any opposition to compulsion being introduced. I believe there would be some opposition from orthodox members of the Moslem Community, specially in Sind, and in connection with Female Education, as a result of their non-co-operation with education for many years, and with everything else running on modern lines. Opposition is likely from some of the rural and working class population who occupy their children of tender ages in lucrative manual work in fields or factories, either in preference to sending them to schools, or as a necessary evil, the children's contribution to the very slender means of livelihood of the family being an indispensable factor. However in formulating the scheme outlined in this series all possible care has been taken to avoid conflict with the oppositionists, and to afford all possible facilities to the rural and working classes.

III

MACHINERY TO ENFORCE COMPULSION.

Time has come when the main control of public primary schools should pass from the hands of Government to what I have denominated as the "Local Authorities" who should be assisted by another representative body chosen from among themselves as well as other persons of merit, status and responsibility resident within its jurisdiction. Below I give an outline of the functions of the three bodies concerned in the provision management and supervision of Compulsory Primary Education :

The duties of the local government in addition to making provision for the inspection and general supervision of schools and for the training of teachers would be :—

(i) to prescribe the "school district" their class etc. and the "Local Authority" which will have control of each such district.

(ii) to contribute their share (vide question No. 23) of the total expenditure.

(iii) to provide for the Local Authority in each district contributing its share of the expenditure (vide question No. 23).

(iv) investigating from time to time whether each such local authority is discharging its financial responsibility and other duties pertaining to the administration and management of schools within its jurisdiction, satisfactorily or not and to take necessary steps for such discharge of their duties as have been neglected.

The "Local Authority" may be the Municipality, or the District or Taluka Board or the Village Panchayat as the case may be. The following among others shall be their duties and powers :—

(i) to take necessary steps for the purpose of collecting statistics of (a) boys and (b) girls of the school-going age resident within its jurisdiction ; (c) of classifying them in the two shifts or sessions ; (d) the number of schools necessary for each sex ; (e) the approximate capital and recurring expenditure likely on the item.

(ii) to formulate and submit to Local Government for necessary sanction ways and means as to how it proposes to make necessary provision within the period prescribed in the Act according as it is a Municipal or First or Second Class School District.

(iii) to give effect to its scheme by providing necessary funds, accommodation, buildings, establishments etc. from time to time, as well as to carry on the recommendations of the "School Committees."

(iv) to see that the buildings etc. are kept upto the mark and to see to their repairs.

SCHOOL COMMITTEES.

The "Local Authority" shall have attached to it a School Committee to assist it in its work. These may be contributed as follows :—

One half of the members may be elected by the "Local Authority" concerned from among those of its members who possess at least the minimum educational qualifications for the membership of such School Committees. The other half may be nominated by the District or Taluka official or officials jointly from persons of merit, responsibility and influence resident within its jurisdiction of the "School District" concerned who also possess necessary Educational qualifications. The minimum educational qualifications may be, candidate himself having studied upto the 4th Vernacular or such other qualification as the Government may think necessary.

The functions of the School Committees may be similar to those of the Committees created under the English Act of 1870. It is also desirable that these Committees should in addition exercise some influence and vigilance in addition over the management, supervision and control of the schools within the jurisdiction of their Local Authorities. Their duties among others may be as follows :—

(i) to make out lists of "certified" schools alone shall be recognised schools for imparting elementary education.

(ii) They will have power to control every parent within their jurisdiction to send his children of the school-going age to school, and to challan before a magistrate such parent as fail to do their duty out of negligence or defiance, the magistrate also having powers to deal with them adequately ;

(iii) they will also distribute books, slates and other materials to such applicants as should in their opinion receive them free. They will also make arrangements for the inspection of those materials from time to time.

THE PROBLEM OF HIGHER EDUCATION.

(By MR. L. G. GANG.)

"He (the student) must go to England in order to have the seal impressed upon him, but while that is necessary, his desire for gaining that education is encircled with greater and greater difficulties."—Mrs. Besant.

"India ought to be able to supply all that she herself needs in education."—G. K. Gokhale.

One of the important problems engaging the attention of the India Office to-day, is the problem of the Indian students in England. Measures are being taken to see that the poor student is not stranded in an unknown land where admissions are restricted. Such measures will only relieve the grievance temporarily and when the entire question of education is under discussion, it is better to go to the root of the matter, by removing the necessity of transplantation to England to qualify for superior appointments, in the several services. All will admit that it is simply unnatural that students of one country should be required for this purpose to undertake a journey of thousands of miles and be ready to spend a lot of money, however necessary it may be in the early stages of the educational development. One way to improve the situation is to impart higher education in India itself which can favourably be compared with European education. Japan followed this method by sending out men to foreign countries with a view to develop indigenous education and by employing foreign experts to secure the end. Secondly, the Government must change its angle of vision. For, as long as there is only one road to higher posts and as long as that implies travelling to a foreign country where the necessary education can be gained, so long the problem of education must embarrass the Government and the people, despite the facilities that may be offered for students in England. The appointment of a Committee to thresh out the whole question is to be welcomed but the terms of reference should not be merely to help the High Commissioner in the discharge of his duty in London, but to deal with the fundamental question with a view to make transplantation to England less and less necessary. Thirdly, there is a movement afoot that English boys in India should get European education in India itself, with the probable result that they would continue to enjoy their privileged position in the Government Services. The question of employment may be considered as a political one, but we can not separate the life of a nation into water-tight compartments.

It is believed in certain circles that the problem of education will be solved by setting secondary education on a new basis proposed by the Sadler Commission. But the present educational muddle does not concern school education alone, and even the colleges must be prepared to share the blame. Education literary or technical should not be merely elementary if India is to be made self-sufficient. The Director of Information hastened to correct certain remarks in the Chronicle as to the staff of the Poona Engineering College, but it is an open secret that the B. Es turned out of that College are not equipped with the standard of education, which students get in foreign countries. This is not an isolated incident but only a single instance out of a hundred. The other day the Bombay University recognised the Royal Institute of Science to prepare students for the B. Sc. Examination, but, it is feared, the news will not be received with satisfaction. The Institute will be doing what the Elphinstone College was doing so long and the Fergusson College is still doing. It is a pity that post-graduate education should not receive proper attention in the University of this forward province. The huge funds spent on the Institute will be only justified by making it an institution for post-graduate studies, and it is only the Government that can cope with the necessary expenditure for scientific research.

To take one more instance, the resolution for abolishing the distinction between barristers and pleaders called forth novel arguments in the lively debate in the Assembly. Whether the students are treated well or ill in the Inns of Court, it is a thing not to be proud of that the invidious distinction should be now kept alive and the transplantation to England should be maintained on the flimsy ground of the healthy atmosphere of a free country. It is not surprising that the privileged class should view with great alarm any encroachment on their enviable position. If the foreign degree continues to fetch the price it does at present, the problem of Indianising the Government will not be satisfactorily dealt with in the near future.

The claims of technical education do not seem to be properly recognised by the University, in spite of the plethora of literary graduates and under-graduates. The problem of education is to prepare a man (and ultimately the nation) for the complete living, as Spenser has put it. The University ought to create a taste for technical education, leaving general political education to the newspapers and the library.

It must also be observed in passing that the parents and students ought to look on education not as preparatory to service but as the means of developing the mind and the body. As one writer once put it, "Universities are built out of thought and hope, not out of mere organisation. For, of life comes forth life; but without quickening of the spirit there can be only death." Those who are in touch with the college atmosphere in India will readily admit that there is a wide gulf between the professors and the students, giving rise to crooked suspicions and misunderstandings. It is doubtful whether such a state of affairs would quicken the spirit. Broadly speaking this is as much true of Government colleges as of private ones. Immediate efforts should be made to set the matter right. England-returned men pay a high tribute to their tutors and the professors and it is a pity that in India things should be otherwise. It may be that both the sides are responsible for this state of things.

In fine, when India becomes self-sufficient in education, it will be possible for her to be self-sufficient industrially and politically also. If India is to cease to be a 'Dependency' really, Indian Universities must not yield the palm to those in other countries and in England itself in the near future.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT.

Legislation of a useful kind relating to workmen's compensation is contemplated by Government and to a large extent it will command the approval of the public at large. At present the question of compensation to workmen killed and injured in the course of employment is left entirely to the generosity of their employers who realise their responsibilities in this connection, but for one who does there are many who evade them. The question that concerns the welfare of the working classes, as Government remark, cannot be left so unsettled. Legislation has become necessary in this connection because there is considerable industrial expansion and because machinery and power are being employed in factories to a much greater extent than ever before. Industries involving great personal risk are also being established in India. Legislation ensuring compensation cannot be delayed in view of the rapid industrial expansion. The Government of India have framed some useful questions and have invited public criticism and discussion. The Bombay Presidency is specially interested in all industrial questions and any measure that will promote the welfare of the workmen will be specially welcome here. Workmen are rapidly becoming conscious of their rights and privileges and this changed outlook is an additional reason for early legislation. There is no need to wait for agitation in this connection. In some cases, it will be better to anticipate and give no room for it.

It is not very creditable to learn that India alone of the chief industrial countries of the world has as yet no Workmen's Compensation Act. At any rate, now that India claims a voice in the management of the world's affairs, it is necessary to remove this glaring defect early. Labour in other countries is sure to be insistent on this point. In one way, late legislation gives us an advantage. We can avoid the mistakes of other countries and compare and contrast the Workmen's Compensation Acts in force in other countries and adopt the best measures suited to this country. It will be a mistake to confine our attention only to particular industries. It will be better to follow Acts which cover all industries. The distinction between manual and non-manual also need not be made compulsory and state-aid also will be welcome. It may be objected that legislation on these lines would act as a clog on industrial expansion and that capital being shy in India, employers' disabilities and risks should be at a minimum. It will be a perfectly wrong view to take. In the first place, such a thing is not possible as India is subject to world-forces and as it will be necessary for her to come into a line with other nations so far as labour legislation is concerned irrespective of the fact whether that is advanced in India itself or not. Even in India Labour is no longer mute or silent. A Workmen's Compensation Act will make for industrial expansion. Only it is necessary that in India, the whole burden of compensation should not fall upon the employers. The employees will no doubt contribute part of the expense. But a State insurance fund also is necessary as in New Zealand. In the particular circumstances of India, State aid is necessary. It is trusted that Indians interested in the question and especially Labour organisations will take an active part in the passing of the Workmen's Compensation Act in India. The Bombay Government have circularised the letter of the Government of India and have invited various public bodies to make suggestions and offer criticisms. It is to be hoped that the Government's move will have a wide response.

FORCED CONVERSIONS.

OPINION OF PANDITS AND ULEMAS.

(FROM New India.)

A summarised translation of the Vyavastha of the Pandits of Benares, published in the Aj, October 6, 1921.

[This was obtained by the good offices of Babu Bhagavan Das Sahab, of Benares.]

Aum

"Listen to and understand the Dharma, the Law, which is followed always by the wise, the virtuous and the learned, who are free from partisan likes and dislikes, and which is acceptable to the heart."—Manu ii, 1.

"To the question whether it is or is not possible for any follower of the Sanatana Arya Vaidika Dharma to be made forcibly to give up his religion and become a convert to any other religion, Islam or another, our reply is that it is not possible; for a forcible change of religion is an impossibility. Therefore in the case of every one, man or woman, who has been subjected to any kind of force, his or her position, his or her status, social and religious, in regard to caste, sub-caste, family, gotra (clan), kinship, relationships, marriage-alliances, etc., remains entirely unchanged, and exactly the same as before the use of such force."

This is our decision, for once religion is a matter of one's inner faith, that cannot be changed by bodily violence; "a person is what he or she believes". As Manu has said "Gifts made under compulsion, food eaten under compulsion, writings written under compulsion, and all acts done under compulsion are as if not done."

"If any person, man or woman, has been compelled to do any act contrary to the rules of his Sanatana Dharma, or to put on any mark of another religion, Islam or any other, it is enough for him to put off such marks, to the best of his ability as soon as possible, and to perform such of the purification ceremonies, suggested in Devala and other Smritis as curative of such misfortunes, as may be possible and within his powers to perform. Such ceremonies would be for the satisfaction of the person's own mind and the removal therefrom of the feeling, "My body has been made impure by these evil sinners with unclean food or drink or in any other way". If any mark has been made on the body of any victim of such violence which cannot be removed, then it ought to be regarded as the scar of a wound received in fight, and not as a mark of another religion.

"A few texts from Devala are given below to indicate the purificatory ceremonies which may be performed:

Here follow verses describing a few more or less simple courses of fasting, shaving and bathing, for purification from the effects of unclean food and drink or sex-contact forced by aggressive men or women of the other religion upon the women or men of the Sanatana Arya Vaidika Dharma. Then the Vyavastha goes on to say:—

"There is much on the same subject in Parashara and other Smritis which need not be quoted here, but can be easily looked up by the learned.

"In conclusion, our clear opinion is that if any of our brethren, being followers of the Sanatana Arya Vaidika Dharma, have been subjected to any violence by evil rioters, then such brethren are not to be regarded as having lost caste, and are not to be allowed to stay out of the caste, but are to be lovingly invited and helped to perform purificatory ceremonies as above, and treated as occupying the same position in the caste as they occupied before."

This Vyavastha is signed by Pandit Devi Prasad Shukla, Pt. Gangaya Narottama Shastri, Pt. Rawkaran Tripathi, Pt. Chandrasekhara Sharma, Pt. Yajna Narayana Upathyaya, Pt. Vijayananda Tripathi, Pt. Ganesha Appaji Mhaskar, Pt. Raghuvira Tripathi Vaidya, and Pt. Rameshvara Datta Iyotishi.

BOMBAY, SEPT. 17.—Hazrat Maulana Abdulbari and Maulana Azad Subhani have issued a joint manifesto which runs as under:

"It is a recognized principle of the Shariat that the propagation of the Faith and conversion of people by force is not permissible and produces no result. No non-Muslim can be converted to Islam by force. Any person who has outwardly adopted Islam under compulsion or is made to perform formal ceremonies of conversion but who, in his heart, likes to stick to his former religion, is not a Mussalman from the view-point of the Shariat.

"After dwelling upon this principle, we desire to express our opinion regarding the report which refers to the detestable action of Moplas in their forcing certain Hindus to adopt Islam. We would like to state clearly that this wrong action of certain mad Moplas done in the name of religion against some afflicted Hindu brethren is an open cruelty and the Islamic religion has nothing to do with it. We express our heart-felt sympathy towards these Hindu brethren, who have been subjected to these cruelties in the name of religion. At the same time we request our Hindu brethren in general not to fall into the error of entertaining any misunderstanding in their mind by considering the mad action of certain Moplas to be the religious or national tradition of Muslims and not to give way to dejection regarding Hindu-Muslim unity which to-day and for ever is indispensable for the welfare and freedom of India. It should be perfectly inculcated on the mind that the end which India has before her is beset with such trials which will come in our way every now and then and both Hindu and Muslim will have to pass through them and will have to prepare themselves with the utmost courage and broad-mindedness in order to meet them successfully. We have expressed our personal opinion on this lamentable event and at the same time have wired Jamiat-ul-Ulema-i-Hind to issue their manifesto jointly. Other distinguished Ulemas are also expected to give satisfaction to the country by their announcement.

A Conference of Muslim Ulemas, at Lahore, at which five to six hundred Ulemas were present, passed the following resolution, on 20th November 1921:

"The Jamiat-ul-Ulema Conference does not admit the truth or falsity of the statements published in newspapers regarding the forcible conversion of the Hindus by Moplas and the other atrocities alleged to have been committed by them on the Hindus as there has been no proper investigation, but if the reports are true then the Ulemas condemn all such action of the Moplas as the Quoran never sanctioned forcible conversion to Islam."

A CIVIC MOVEMENT.

The following invitation was issued to about three hundred citizens over the signatures of Mr. K. Natarajan, the Hon. Mr. Lalubhai Samaldas, Mr. M. R. Jayakar, Sheth Chotani Mr. H. P. Modi, Professor Patrick Geddes, Lecturer in Sociology and Economics at the Bombay University will deliver an address, explaining the movement called "Pro-Jerusalem," started in Jerusalem to promote cordial relations between the various communities, Mahomedans, Jews and Christians inhabiting that city. The address will be given in the hall of the Chanda Ramji Hindu Girls High School at Gurgaon Back Road, on Wednesday, the 7th instant at 6 p.m. The address will be followed by an informal conversation as to whether any similar movement is necessary and desirable in this city. About 250 ladies and gentlemen attended. Mr.

M. B. Jayakar was called to the chair. After Professor Geddes' lecture, Messrs Natarajan, G. K. Devdhar, H. P. Mody, Pantembakar, Mrs. Sarojini Naidu, Professor Hamley, Mr. Hussainbhoy A. Lalji, Mr. Burjor'i Bharucha, and Mr. Abbas Tyebji offered a few observations. The following provisional Committee was appointed to further explore the subject. Professor Patrick Geddes, Mrs. Sarojini Naidu, Mr. Jayakar, Professor Hamley, Messrs. H. P. Mody, G. K. Devdhar, B. F. Bharucha, Hussainbhoy A. Laljee, C. T. Wheeler, Kanji Dwarakadas, and Shankarlal Banker, with Mr. K. Natarajan as temporary Secretary. The meeting lasted for over two hours and was characterised by much cordiality and good feeling.

INDIA AND THE MULTIPLICITY OF HER LANGUAGES.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In my last letter to you on this subject (dated the 15th ultimo.) I drew the parallel between India's case and that of each of the Western nations of Belgium and Switzerland from the linguistic standpoint. I pointed out how in patriotic "un-artyled" Belgium, there is to be found no such language as Belgian, neither is there Swiss in all Switzerland, any more than there is in India a language called Indian. I also referred to a regular 'batt'le of the languages' in the first named country that took place recently as described in the Modern Review for April last, p. 524, as also for Jan. p. 46.

In bringing these parallels to your notice I made a mistake in not mentioning the case of the United Kingdom of Great Britain (and Ireland?) itself first of all. While most of us are inclined to regard the English language as the sole 'vernacular' of the whole of this 'nation,' so much so that some even have been led (thoughtlessly enough) into using England as a synonym for the 'nation' called the United Kingdom in its entirety,* the truth as regards this 'nation' is this:—No less than four literary vernaculars (i.e. languages, not dialectical varieties) obtain in these Isles, besides English which if it prevails in all the other non-English linguistic areas as an official language etc, does so because it is the home-tongue of the "Predominant Partner" in the Kingdom (viz. England). Excluding the Lowland Scots (which though with an independent and high literary development is linguistically speaking only a dialect of standard English) and leaving Cornish (a Gaelic dialect not long since dead through the encroachments of English) the four vernaculars in the British Isles are: Welsh in Wales, Gaelic in the Highlands of Scotland, Manx in the Isle of Man and Irish in Ireland. To remove a possible objection I may say further that all these vernaculars obtaining in the British Isles are as much differentiated from each other on the one hand and from English on the other as are all the Romance languages from each other on the one hand and from the Teutonic English on the other. Or let us say English and these four tongues (which are all Celtic) are in the British Isles pretty much what Hindustani and the Dravidian group in India are to each other. In fine, there is no such language as British in Britain any more than there is Indian in India. Only the speech and literature of the Predominant Partner (viz. England) in the United Kingdom of Great Britain (and Ireland?) has prevailed and may continue to prevail in all the British Isles.

* You might recall the bitter controversy that raged in the early years of the War, being evoked by some luckless writer in England entitling his production 'the contribution of England to the European War' or something like that—wherein by 'England' was palpably meant the whole of U. K. I remember it was the 'Spectator' which then wound up the controversy in this, its typical John Bull fashion: 'Inasmuch as English is the prevailing language all over the Isles, why not let England do duty for the stricter geographical term of the British Isles by way of a homely, affectionate name for the same?'

Next there is the case of Austria-Hungary. This was never a nation strictly speaking. It has been a 'Dual Monarchy'—Austria and Hungary being separate autonomous states with a common monarchical head, but no federal legislature as in Switzerland. Austria is by race and language German; Hungary proper has its own tongue, Magyar of non-Aryan (Turanic) origin, and a batch of other minor vernaculars—both literary and other—share the rest of the territory under the Austro-Hungarian monarch.

Then we come to South Africa. The Boers' language of mixed Dutch origin—called Cape Dutch, Afrikaans, or the Taal—is living a life of continual struggle with the imperial English. In spite of their exclusive nationality the Boers' tongue is invaded and is being improved almost out of existence by the usurping English. Still the South African Union government is principally one of two nations—the Dutch Boers and the English British. In what language are its proceedings conducted and records kept?

Karwar,
Dec. 6,

Yours etc,
S. D. N.

medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and
gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needed to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to those persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen
the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility.
Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicines. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires, it is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per

—:—

Mahatma Gandhi on Mr. Jayakar's Address: Commenting on Mr. Jayakar's striking addresses at recent political conferences, Mahatma Gandhi observes that there is no reason whatsoever why the nationalists may not practise as lawyers or send children to Government schools or seek election in Councils, and still belong to the Congress. There is at least one good reason that we know of, and that is that such men have been, and may hereafter be, held up to obloquy as traitors. Only those who are either far above or much below ordinary human sensibility, will care to remain members of a body with the professions, if not the practices, of the bulk of whose members, they are in such sharp disagreement. The Mahatma adds that he would welcome an efficient and able organisation who believe in using Government institutions. Using to what end? The Congress has declared that its object is to paralyse the administration. Obviously, only those who believe in using Government institutions for the purpose of paralysing Government can remain within the Congress. Those who would use them to promote measures of national benefit, will by so doing be strengthening not paralysing Government, and they cannot feel at home in a body whose set purpose is to discredit the administration. We are inclined to agree, however, that an effective and able party to use Government institutions to advance the national cause, is a desideratum. As a pledge of its absolute disinterestedness, this new party may pass a self-denying ordinance that its members will not accept any salaried positions or titular distinctions from Government, though they will and must enter the Legislative, Municipal and other State-appointed institutions and committees, and do honestly all they can to make them yield their maximum benefit to the country. Those who are already in possession of titles, and who may like to join the party, should be free to keep them. There may be as much snobbery in ostentatiously renouncing titles as in sedulously seeking for them. The Mahatma writes of the majority of the Congress. He knows as well as we do that this is but a conventional phrase for what is an echo of himself. It is largely in the hands of the Mahatma to give a new

Mischief-Making: Some wicked persons have been spreading wild rumours as to expected happenings in Bombay on the 23rd and 24th December, and several sensible persons seem to have been taken in by these. We have made careful enquiries from various sources and have met with the unanimous reply that the rumours are utterly groundless. To allay the apprehensions of nervous persons, prominent leaders might issue notices condemning the dissemination of false and wicked rumours. Mrs. Naidu, as President of the Provincial Congress Committee and Swarajya Sabha, has issued an impressive appeal calling upon all citizens to maintain perfect peace. To the forceful arguments of her appeal, we may add one which ought to be appreciated by all fair-minded people. Almost alone among the Governments in India, the Government of Bombay have shown themselves capable of maintaining a level policy based on an adequate appreciation of their complex duties to the public, and it will be sheer folly to reward their sober statesmanship with stupid and purposeless exhibitions of a disordered temper. Every citizen has been put upon his honour by the attitude of the Bombay Government to countenance nothing that will embarrass them in the discharge of their responsibility to maintain the King's peace, and we have every confidence that every citizen of Bombay will act up to the high obligation which that involves. The Press Note issued by the Government of Bombay last week is, making allowance, of course, for the official point of view, a very fair and impartial statement of the causes, the course and the lessons of the recent Bombay riots. Perhaps, it is not as careful as it might have been to avoid conveying the impression that all Hindus and Mahomedans were rioters or even Non-Co operators. We fully agree with the Government's just observation that there is no evidence to show that riot, arson and bloodshed formed any part of a premeditated design. Bombay merely lost her head for a couple of days and when she woke to her sober senses, she felt heartily ashamed of it all.

Lord Sinha's Resignation: There has been on all sides the deepest sympathy felt with Lord Sinha for his ill-health which has led to his resignation. We do not know the nature of his ailment, but we have a general idea that the conflicting claims of the public positions he held and of his innate disposition to seek the goodwill of his own people, has had a most deleterious effect on his health. Public life was virtually thrust upon him, and what to the outward world seemed additional honours and dignities became really a burden under which he broke down. The passion for and the long training of public service which was Dadabhai Naoroji's, Sir Pherozeshah's, Mr. Gokhale's, and which sustained them in their disappointments and trials, was not his. He was not born to ride the storm. His desire to resign the Law Membership when the Press Act was introduced, was the expression of his own pacific instinct, and with the greatest goodwill in the world, Mr. Gokhale did him a serious disservice when he dissuaded him from taking his own line. We earnestly hope and trust that in his retirement far from the madding game of public life, he will completely regain his health and strength, and become in course of time a Nestor of our public life to whom men of all parties can turn for wise and weighty advice in public matters. That is the part for which he is best fitted, and we wish him many years of happy life to fill it worthily.

The Irish Settlement: The first glowing news of the Irish settlement was a little dashed by the later tidings that some influential Sinn Feiners, including the President Mr. D. Valera, had repudiated it. The trend of still later information is that it has caused a serious split in the Sinn Fein party and that the large majority of it is inclined to support its acceptance. If this is true, the Sinn Fein extremists will have to carry on against a Government composed of their own people, the sort of warfare which they have been waging against British rule. It is to be hoped that the extremists will see the wisdom of giving in to what seems to be a majority favourable to the settlement, and thus bring a black chapter in political history to an auspicious and happy end. A special Session of Parliament to ratify the agreement opened on Wednesday, and simultaneously the Sinn Fein Parliament is also in session. The plight of Ulster is indicated by the absence, noted by Reuter, of Lord Carson from the crowded opening ceremony by the King in the House of Lords.

Railway Finance Committee: A Calcutta telegram states that the Committee on Railway Finance which met at Calcutta last week were unanimous in their conclusions. They recommend that there should be no separation of railway from general finance but, in view of the serious condition of the railways, recommend a capital expenditure of thirty crores annually for the next five years on the rehabilitation of the existing lines with no lapses. This will necessitate supplementing the rupee borrowing by loans in foreign markets on the easiest possible terms. This is a sort of compromise between the unanimous recommendation of the Acworth Committee in favour of a separate Railway budget and the present system when Railway finance is entirely dependent on the exigencies of general finance. Under the existing circumstances, this is perhaps the best recommendation that could have been made. The Acworth Committee's recommendations, however, should be taken as a whole, and if they are so taken, the separation of the railway from the general finance may not be open to the objections to which it may be open at present. Whether we take the majority view in favour of State ownership and management or the minority view of a controlled company management, it makes a vast difference in the general position of railways in the economy of administration, and we take it that the question of a separate railway budget will be reconsidered when the main issue comes to be settled. Following closely on the recommendation, the Secretary of State has issued another loan of 10 millions sterling, at 5½ per cent, which is also open for subscription in India. We trust that there is no condition attaching to this loan as to the last, namely that the whole amount of the loan is to be spent in England.

The British Medical Council's Retreat: A Delhi telegram states that the British Medical Council have, in view of the representations of the Secretary of State and the Government of India, agreed to postpone consideration of their threat to withhold the recognition of Indian Medical degrees unless midwifery training in Indian Universities had been screwed up to the impossible standard insisted upon by the Council. The standard was demanded without a knowledge of the present state of midwifery teaching in our Universities, which is considerably ahead of anything in England, and in utter ignorance of Indian social life; and we are glad that the Council proposes to undertake a fuller investigation of the conditions of midwifery training in India. Such investigation should have preceded the ultimatum.

Sir Ibrahim Rahimtoola's Successor: The following paragraph was left out in our last issue for want of space. It is printed as it stood:—We are not sure that, if it be the case that the second Indian membership of the Bombay Executive Council is to remain unfilled during Sir Ibrahim Rahimtoola's deputation as chairman of the Fiscal Committee, the arrangement is one which should be regarded as altogether satisfactory. The saving will be Rs. 30,000, as the acting Member draws only one-half of the pay of the permanent incumbent. As against this economy, there will be one member less in the part of Government dealing with subjects not under the control of the Legislative Council, which in our opinion is a distinct weakness to it. The trend of Indian evidence so far tendered before the Fiscal Committee makes it seem probable that it will be able to finish its labours within the stipulated six months, but it is the principle that we are concerned about; and, moreover, this is a time when we can ill afford to have Government weakened in its Indian composition. Since the above was in type, it has been announced that Mr. Cowasji Jehangir has been appointed to act in the place of Sir Ibrahim Rahimtoola. We nevertheless keep our comments as a useful hint against a course of action such as was said to have been contemplated in this case. The new appointment is in every way an excellent one, Mr. Cowasji Jehangir's experience of business and civic matters being exceptional. He is, besides, a gentleman of independent judgment and wide outlook. The accident of his belonging to the Parsi community adds to the general excellence of his selection.

Inhumanity to Indians: The following telegram from the Durban Correspondent of the Times of India needs no comment. The Public Health Department in its report for the week ended November 12 says:—"The S. S. Hugh from Trinidad for Calcutta with 1,068 returning Indian immigrants, reached Durban on November 7, having previously reported by wireless an epidemic of influenza of a virulent type on board. There had been 113 cases with 13 deaths. The last case occurred on October 29. The vessel was placed in quarantine, and suitably dealt with. Seven Indians were still sick and 93 convalescent, and it was unnecessary to land any of the sick. Coal and water were supplied under special precautions, and the vessel continued her voyage on November 8." We should like to know how many of the Indians landed in India and in what state of health.

The Indian Social Conference: According to an Associated Press message, the Indian National Social Conference has been fixed to be held on the 26th December at the Premabhoj Hall, Ahmedabad, under the presidency of Mr. K. Natarajan. Dr. Kanuga of Ahmedabad is chairman of the Reception Committee, Mrs. Naidu, Mrs. Sarladevi Choudhrani, Mrs. Sarada Mehta and Mrs. Vidyagavri Ramanbhoj will attend the Conference and will address the audience.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, DECEMBER 18 1921.

THE NEW POLICY AND THE WAY OUT.

Writing on the Viceroy's reply to the address presented by the Punjab Chamber of Commerce two weeks ago, we doubted if His Excellency's words necessarily implied that there was to be a change of policy. In the face of the numerous arrests of the last few days, there can no longer be any doubt about the change, though His Excellency maintains that there is none and that the large number of arrests is but a continuation of the policy followed during the last eight months. The new policy has been described as one to protect peaceful citizens from intimidation and molestation in the pursuit of their avocations. There must be some such because the Viceroy has said it, but it is only fair to note what such a discriminate critic of the Non-Co-operation movement as the Modern Review of Calcutta, has to say on this point. Our contemporary writing of the complete hartal in Calcutta on the 17th instant, observes :

A theory has been started that all this was due entirely or chiefly to intimidation. This is sheer nonsense. Some people may have closed their shops or stayed at home for fear of molestation, but it is not true that the more than a million inhabitants of Calcutta were intimidated by the non-co-operators. But if the theory of intimidation be true, the non-co-operators must be admitted to be a greater terror than the police, the army, the guns and the air-fleet of Government. It is true, non-co-operating volunteers regulated and stopped traffic according to their will in the streets—by intimidation if you like; but why could not the police re-start traffic by counter-intimidation of the volunteers? We speak of counter-intimidation, because after the hartal, non-official volunteering has been declared unlawful, and parties of policemen, etc., have been making a display of strength by parading the streets.

Lord Reading himself seems since to have come to doubt the intimidation theory, because in his latest speech on the subject, addressed to the Bengal Mahajan Sabha on Wednesday, His Excellency more than once spoke of reports and representations made to him.

It is curious that the strongest condemnation of the new policy comes from those most opposed to Non-co-operation. We do not suppose that Justice, the non-Brahmin ministerial organ of Madras, can by any stretch of imagination be said to be afraid of Non-Co-operation intimidation, and yet what does our contemporary think of the policy of arrests and prosecutions? Our contemporary says that its disapproval of the present campaign of wholesale prosecutions is not due to any weakening of faith on its part in the supreme necessity for preserving law and order in the country; nor is it because of any belief that the Government, in proceeding against the non-co-operators, are in any way abusing or transgressing the powers vested in them by the laws of the land. On the contrary, it is strongly convinced that an atmosphere of lawlessness and unrest is prejudicial and it looks to the Government to take all such steps as are necessary for the assured maintenance of law and order. It also concedes that from a purely legal point of view most of the arrests that have been made can also be easily justified.

But these facts should not, however, have blinded the Government to the question of expediency. On the other hand the authorities, we think, should have clearly discussed the question as to what a strict interpretation of the letter of the law and its rigid application would lead them to in the present case; in other words, they should have weighed well beforehand the advantages and disadvantages of the course which they were about to pursue and thus judged for themselves about its expediency or otherwise. It is apparent that this judicious precaution was not taken; and hence it is that we have to witness to-day a phenomenon of increased restlessness all round as a result of these ill-designed arrests. Far from improving matters, frankly speaking, these arrests and convictions have only added to the complexities of the present political situation. Instead of feeling dispirited and discouraged the non-co-operators and their sympathisers only seem to be enheartened and elated by the action of the Government against leaders. It may be a misguided spirit that animates them now, but all the same the fact should be acknowledged that there has now born among a good many of them a stern determination to flout the authority of the Government at any cost.

The Indian Messenger, the weekly English organ of the Sadaran Brahma Samaj of Calcutta, is another journal whose opinion may be quoted. It writes :

Just as we are against coercion and intimidation on the part of the mob so also we are against reckless repression which the Government has been resorting to of late, and in the latest development of which the Government has overdone itself. We have in our previous issues expressed our disapproval of it and in support of our statement we quoted a paragraph from the "Servant of India." We believe with our contemporary that the Government is only "adding fuel to the dying fire" in its attempt to suppress the non-co-operation movement. In fact the N. C. O. movement in Bengal was of late firing very ill and Mr. C. R. Das was feeling his position a bit shaky. His call for volunteers went unheeded. But the latest exploit of Government has given it a long lease of life.

We had ourselves more than once pointed out that Non-Co-operation was having its mind turned inward by its recent failures. His Excellency extolled the virtue of patience in politics. A couple of months more of patience on the part of Governments would have brought about a situation which the present arrests cannot and will not bring.

The protests of the Liberal organs are even more emphatic than those of the non-party press. The Liberal from Allahabad, the Servant of India from Poona, the Citizen from Madras, have condemned in uncompromising terms the wholesale arrests and imprisonments of the last few days. The Bengal Minister, Mr. Mitter, made a flamboyant speech some days ago pledging the support of the Bengal Liberals to any strong measures that Government may undertake to put down Non-Co-operation. His action has been repudiated by Sir Surendranath Banerjee's indirect repudiation of the new policy, and the open protest of leading Bengal Liberals headed by the eminent scientist Sir P. C. Ray, who after deploring the initiation of a repressive policy synchronous with the visit of the Prince of Wales, say coercion is no remedy for political unrest and a repressive policy will defeat itself in the long run and lead to serious results. A peaceful solution of the problem ought not to be beyond the reach of statesmanship. Unless the Government desists from the policy of coercion and makes an earnest effort to find a real remedy for meeting the present crisis, disastrous consequences are sure to follow.

Who supports the present policy? Mr. Jinnah, who had an interview with the Viceroy last month, and who has stood aloof from the Congress since it embraced Non-Co-operation, in a published statement, has condemned in emphatic language the new policy as aggravating a serious situation. At the moment, things seem to have come to a dangerous deadlock, but we trust a way will still be found to ease the situation. A round table conference of men of different shades of opinion, has been influentially suggested. It may be tried. The Irish precedent encourages the hope that out of the present difficult situation, such a Conference may be the means of finding a way of escape. Mahatma Gandhi, of course, is as a consequence of the arrests of the last few days in a much stronger position than ever he occupied before, and a very much stronger one than what he occupied just after the Bombay outbreak. There are one or two sentences in the Viceroy's last speech, which show that the idea has occurred to His Excellency also. By the way, the burden of Lord Reading's speeches of late is that Government regret these arrests which have been forced upon them. In other words, the initiative is no longer with Government, but with those who force these arrests. These men are able to choose their own battle-ground and to compel Government to action, whether they will or no, upon that ground. We venture to think that this is not a very satisfactory position for Government and the sooner something is done to give it back its lost initiative, the better will it be for it. The only way in which this can be done, is for it to take at once the initiative in the way of peace.

LIGHT FOR LIFE *

Moral education is one of the much-discussed problems of education. The trend of informed opinion is against didacticism. As an illustration of the futility of direct moral instruction, it has been stated that the boy who carried off the highest prizes for proficiency in this department, in a French school turned out to be a very bad type of citizen. The method which yields the best results is the method of influence. A deep thinker advises: "Put everything you wish the child to imbibe into its environment." Another goes so far as to say: "Character is nine-tenths environment." The earliest and closest environment of a child is its home. Among the solid achievements of Freudian psychology is the knowledge that, as children, we take in unconscious impressions of the world around us which affect our whole bent of mind. Next to the home comes the school. In the school what is learnt in the class room is not the only things of importance. The more important, because they strike root deeper are the habits and impressions which we acquire from our surroundings. One of the most important features of the school environment is, or ought to be, books. A young man or woman will derive more benefit from a library filled with the widest variety and choice of books to suit every temperament, than from many hours in the lecture room. The habit of reading is in itself a most precious acquisition, as it makes one independent of company for conversation and entertainment. Of those who have acquired this habit in early life, it can be truly said that they are never less alone than when alone. It is sometimes said that the library method unless directed by a competent guide leads to desultory reading. What is called "desultory reading" is often but the effort of the young mind to discover its own particular need by trying many doors. Many of us even in middle age feel a need for certain kinds of reading at one time and for certain other kinds at another. The young do this naturally to a greater extent. Besides, the synthesizing power in our minds organises into a connected whole, knowledge gained from outwardly widely different spheres. Edmund Burke's profound political philosophy was drawn from his wide and varied reading which he himself described as desultory.

Speaking of books, what kind of books is it that most helps moral education? Here, again, the same principle applies. Moral text-books share the fate proverbially attached to copy-book maxims. Those who learn morality from them may write or speak finely on the subject, but are not necessarily better able to face an actual moral crisis than those who do not read them. The kind of book which best inculcates moral truths and makes them part and parcel of the sub-conscious mind of youth, is that which, by placing a high and attractive ideal before us, creates in us a repulsion for lower aims. "We needs must love the highest when we see it," and the book which presents the highest ideals from different points of view and as illustrated in different contexts and characters, is likely to do the most good. The contemplation of the higher ideal creates an emotion which supplants the emotion that drives the mind to, lower things—"the explosive power of a new affection," as it has been called. Then, again, the example of great character in exceptional situations is of less practical effect than the example of noble aims unflinchingly pursued amid the discouragements of every-day life. The old saw that "trifles make the sum of human perfection" is simply the principle that is now a commonplace of ethics as of mathematics—the importance of the infinitesimal. Many books dealing with morality have been published, of more or less merit. But among the half a dozen really good books on the subject, especially those written for Indian youth, Sir Narayan Chandavarkar's "Light for Life" certainly takes high rank. The book is in two parts, written in the straight, simple style of the author. Sir Narayan has all his life been a student in intimate sympathy with younger students. For years the Sunday morning classes of the Bombay Students' Brotherhood was his most cherished weekly engagement. He knows the Indian student thoroughly, his strong as well as his weak points. He has thus been able to adapt his studies in this book to both. The selection and arrangement of the headings, in the different chapters of the work, is itself a proof of this supreme competence. The care of the body is a duty which Indians, young and old, are apt to overlook, and the special section which Sir Narayan has devoted to investigating it in all its aspects, is rightly given the first place in the work. But the headings to which we would point as particularly evidencing Sir Narayan's deep insight into Indian character, are "Power to Decide and Act," "Thought ending in Act" and the subsequent chapters, and also that on Conviction. The Indian, more especially the Hindu, is often afflicted with Hamlet's mental vice of indecision. The duty of conclusiveness is not one which he imbibes from his home or school environment. One of the most intellectual of our public men recently pointed to this quality as that of a mind open to light from all sides. Quite as often, it is but a sign of desire to shirk action. In the life of the average man, the occasions are few which present a clear-cut issue between the indubitably right and the certainly wrong. The choice most often is between the more right and the less right, and ninety times out of ten, it is by no means easy to say which is the one and which, the other. When one has done his best to study a question, the moment comes when his duty is to shut his mind down upon it, and to act, leaving others, to supply wherein he may fail of the fullness of truth. We venture to commend these sections with especial emphasis to Indian readers of Sir Narayan's work.

Sir Narayan dedicates the book with exquisite appropriateness to the memory of "Nachiketa, the model youth of India described in the Upanishads." The choice of this illustrious figure from our ancient classics, for the dedication has an especial significance at this time which Sir Narayan, perhaps, had in view. For Nachiketa was not only the complete model of Indian youth but was also the first and greatest Indian Satyagrahi. His story as told in the Kathopanishad, throws a fascinating light on the passionate love of truth, which knew no limit and no fear, of India's classic figures. Vajasrava, the father of Nachiketas, desiring to obtain the rewards of complete self-sacrifice, made "a gift of all his wealth" to worthy men. But his son, Nachiketas, "young and not possessed of the power of procreating," saw that his father was not doing what he professed. In other words, he was trying to deceive God. Nachiketas noticed that his father, while professing to make a gift of all his wealth, really gave away what was useless or superfluous to him, reserving what was useful. "These cows have drunk water for the last time, eaten grass for the last time, have yielded all their milk and are devoid of vigour. Joyless verily are those worlds; there he attains who gives these."

Anxious to prevent his worldly-wise parent from falling into the heinous sin of hypocrisy, and, at the same time, not to give him offence or to humiliate him by putting the point directly, the lad, half jocosely, asked his father, "Father, to whom wilt thou give me?" Vajasrava understood the innuendo and replied in anger: "Unto Death do I give thee." A father's word is law, and to Death, Nachiketas promptly repairs. Death was not "at home," and Nachiketas had to wait for three days fasting at Death's abode. When Death returned, he apologises to Nachiketas for having kept a Brahman guest fasting for three days, and in atonement, begs him to ask for any three boons. The first boon which young Nachiketas asks, is to be allowed to go back to his father and that his father's anger against him might have passed away. This is granted. The second boon asked and granted has reference to an obsolete Vedic belief regarding different kinds of fire for oblations. The third boon asked by Nachiketas staggers Death. "What becomes of a man after death?" Death begs Nachiketas not to press the question, offering him enjoyments, wealth, longevity, empire. But the youth rejects them all with scorn. "Ephemeral these! Oh Death, these tend to the decay of the vigour of all the senses in man. Even the longest life is, indeed, short. O Death, tell us that in which men have this doubt, and which is about the great Hereafter." Death tries several means to put off his pertinacious questioner, but at last, Nachiketas' doggedness wins him to admiration. Death the Teacher overwhelms Death the Terrorist. He gives Nachiketas the information sought for and with the affection of every true Teacher for a worthy pupil, Death gratefully exclaims at parting: "Oh, thou art fixed in truth. May we find, O Nachiketas, a questioner like thee!" Sir Narayan in his dedication has propounded a parable of absorbing interest at the present moment.

A CALL FOR PEACE.

(BY A PARSİ PUBLICIST.)

That there is real desire for adopting a new line of action is increasingly becoming clear on the side of even the advanced nationalist party in India, and a plea, therefore, for a new angle of vision may not be out of place. A consistent policy of repression invariably results in a cry for "Halt!" or "Disarm." War is not the natural dictum for humanity. Peace is the goal of life. Thanks to Mahatma Gandhi his agitation on behalf of Non-co-operation has succeeded in rousing the people to a new life of political activity unprecedented in the annals of India. One last year of continued political ferment has surpassed a score and a half years of political uplift under the old Indian National Congress. Thanks to the British Government in India as well for the very patient and subdued manner in which it has allowed the birth of a new India to be nursed unhurt. But now both have reached a stage where the one in the extremity of zeal and the other in that of patience are panting for a hand-to-hand encounter. The heads of the Non-co-operation party flung challenge after challenge and now the Government is taking them up one after another. But England has just emerged from a world war and must feel the burden, financial and other, of undertaking new quarrels anywhere in the world, much less within its own Empire. Again, the nerve of the popular party is bound to be exhausted under the iron strength of a strong and well-established Government with an unbending military and naval force at its back and the world's commerce in its palm. We have our doubts if that mighty Government which brought Germany to its knees could be brought to its knees by patriot martyrs allowing themselves to be arrested with a view to hastening Swaraj. However that may be, India is just at present passing through a most critical period of its political existence; and it would be best were Government, as a parent institution with parental generosity, to stretch its hand of fellowship and sympathy towards just and legitimate popular aspirations.

We really felt that in the suggestion for Government opening up overtures for peace lay the real germ of a healthy mutual understanding so much desired to be soon established in our midst. At present political progress appears to be at a deadlock and as time advances it will be more so to the detriment of the popular party, for established as it is on Indian soil to pull down the bulwark of British suzerainty in India in a short time means nothing less than Himalayan effort, and the people are not politically so prepared as to put it forth. In no political deadlocks has history marked out political salvation for the people. Moreover, the British constitution which is more or less like a self-propelling machine is always on the go. Stoppage means death for it, which is not to be. But while Government should be desiring for peace, the leaders of the popular party should be in a mood to receive the good wishes of the Government with mutual feelings of confidence and trust. As, for instance, Mr. Das was called in prior to his arrest by Lord Ronaldsday and Mr. Gandhi long ago by the Viceroy. But neither Mr. Gandhi nor Mr. Das could find himself even in such an agreement with Government that a change in the former's political views was impossible and arrest in the latter's case was the only desperate measure left. A country where the people have not learnt for themselves the lessons of compromise can rarely be left to themselves in the days of Swaraj.

Therefore, first of all, both the parties must concede a little ground so as to open up a possibility to be amenable. It is not in the spiritual nature of the people of this country to eternally look upon the English as a race of Satans; and non-co-operation will rapidly dwindle into mere fulmination of forwardness or political inanity when Government open their arms to receive the people in good trust. But it is impossible to meet on a common ground unless the whole of the non-co-operation programme is carefully revised in an early conference of the non-co-operators. Before such a well-laid scheme as that of Mahatma Gandhi fails in its ultimate object, such a revision should be considered as compatible both with the spirit of the times and the necessity of the present juncture. We do not suggest for a moment that there should be radical alterations—no—for the movement has renovated India beyond all possibilities of doubt and we would not like its cessation; but as is the case with every movement, however good it may be, it has its weak spokes in the wheel and we desire them to be strengthened. We do not desire that India's opportunity, now that it has come, should be neglected; but we are afraid it might be lost with the present paraphernalia of hastings attached to it.

A SCHEME FOR COMPULSORY EDUCATION.

(By THE HONOURABLE MR. G. M. BHURGRI.)

IV

SHOULD COMPULSORY EDUCATION BE FREE?

I have always held that education to be compulsory should also be free. In fact both my study and intuition confirm me in the conclusion that the former is incompatible without the latter, both in principle and practice. I think enlightened opinion on this point is quite definite. Apart from the practical difficulties involved in the actual assessment of the property or the earnings of each family, I consider it wrong in principle that parents should be compelled to send their children to school under a penalty and also to pay the school fees. Whereas it is one of the most fundamental duties of every enlightened State to look after the proper provision for the education of all the children in the State which are of age for receiving it. Moreover, national instinct against 'paid instruction' in India is as old as Hinduism itself. And this tradition as Dr. John Mathai tells us in his "Village Government in British India" has been kept up by the Mahomedan rulers also. The Hindu Pathshalas and the Mahomedan Maktabs and Mulla schools are a living example. "The tradition of gratuitous instruction", says Dr. Mathai "is still so strong in the country that the payment of fees in a village school is regarded with somewhat unconcealed prejudice."

In the Western countries, compulsory education has been successful and its results definitely satisfactory where and when it has been free. With a result that we find today that wherever education is compulsory it is also free. Thus in Great Britain and Ireland, France, Germany, Switzerland, Austria and Hungary, Italy, Belgium, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, the United States of America, Canada, Australia, South Africa, Japan and of lately Phillipine and Russia, education is both compulsory and free. In Spain, Portugal, Greece, Bulgaria, Servia and Rumania it was partially compulsory before the War, but free. In Turkey too, it was free though nominally compulsory.

There can be only one objection against compulsory education being made free and that would be on the ground of expenditure and limited avenues of the resources of the local bodies and the Government. A glance at the figures of receipts and expenditure will however soon disillusion us. In paragraph 190 of the Quinquennium Report of 1912-17 occurs the following table :—

	Amounts contributed in		Percentage in total expenditure in 1911-12	1916-17	1911-12	1916-17
Public Funds ...	33,75,550	44,41,928	81.2	82.7
Fees ...	3,74,858	4,31,637	9.0	8.0
Other Private Funds.	4,04,633	4,97,676	9.8	9.8
Total ...	41,55,041	53,71,241	100.0	100.0

The above table shows how small a fraction of the total expenditure is covered up by fees. The report referred to makes a pointed reference to this fact. Surely no one after digesting these figures would persist in the arguments against compulsory education being made free on the score of expenditure and limited resources.

FREE SUPPLY OF BOOKS, SLATES ETC.

I am further of opinion that as far as possible books, slates and other necessary materials should be provided free. I have not gone in the details of this item as to how much cost it is likely to involve if they were supplied free to all so as to venture a definite opinion one way or the other. I am however inclined to think that if they were supplied free to all, it would be a pretty heavy additional item of expenditure. However, extending the principle on which my answer to the question No. 7 is based, I would suggest that books, slates and other materials should as far as possible be given to those who need them and apply to the Local Authorities in charge of the schools concerned for the same through their parents or guardians. The former can determine a set of rules for the purpose and also devise ways and means by inspection and otherwise of encouraging a habit of preserving the materials supplied with as much care and neatness as possible.

LONDON LETTER.

(From our own Correspondent).

London, November 24, 1921

THE WASHINGTON CONFERENCE.

The Washington Conference will rank among the immortal enterprises of the human race. If all its hopes materialised it would almost seem as if the long looked for Millennium had at last come. So much is being crammed into its sittings, and the issues raised are so big that while one prays with all one's heart for its success, one rather gasps and wonders if the world is sufficiently advanced to be able to carry out the proposals made. That a real earnest desire is being shown by the big Powers there represented for limitation of the implements of war is absolutely evident. The "naval holiday," as it has been called, is already a fact in Great Britain. It was officially stated at the Admiralty last Friday that letters had been despatched to the firms engaged in the construction of the four new war vessels, that they were not to incur any further liabilities on new construction until they had received further instructions from the Admiralty. Of course, the mere stopping of building super-dreadnoughts means at the present time very little in reality. The recent terrible war showed so many horrible forms of destruction, the submarine and aircraft war vessels for instance, that the battleship, however mighty, seemed almost kind by comparison with the death dealing agencies that sprang into activity and yet were kept hidden out of sight. Neither is the limitation of the navies of the big Powers a novel proposal. It was proposed some years ago by the late Tzar, and was later suggested before the Second Hague Conference, but it was then, as pointed out by Mr. Hughes, that the ex-Emperor William threatened to refuse to send his delegates if disarmament were to be discussed. However, the Washington Conference has set out to do more than a merely spectacular thing. It aims at bringing into concord the various differing peoples, and building a world-federation. That the big Powers must lead the way in any action to be taken is quite understood; and it is but right that the first proposal made should directly affect the three great naval Powers of to-day, Britain, America, and Japan.

But while Great Britain gives her absolute support to the naval limitation, and shows her sincerity by immediate action, it must not be forgotten that her position is totally different from that of America or Japan. The very life of Britain within these islands depends on having the seas kept open for her, whereas both America and Japan can be practically self-sufficient in an emergency, and another most important consideration is the fact that Great Britain's possessions are scattered all over the world, and she depends upon the seas for contact. The sea is her high road from one capital to another. So that unless the Washington Conference and the work of the next few years can teach the fundamental truth that the world to-day is inter-dependent, the position of Britain might be terribly weakened. During the next ten years, the other rather formidable naval Powers of yesterday, who are not parties to the present proposals, Germany and Russia, for instance, may grow and thus upset all the present calculations of the peace parties.

PROBLEM OF UNEMPLOYED.

The effect of the limitation of war-vessel building will be felt in the swell of the numbers of unemployed. It was estimated that about 30,000 men would be employed during the next six months. On the other hand, there seems a decided feeling that the economy such limitation will bring about, will do a great deal in enabling money, brain, and energy to be put into peace constructive work. Already a greater feeling of hope seems to be felt, and a slight revival of trade has been shown. It is stated by some employers that the workers are recovering tone, that the slackness and inertia are breaking up, and a better output in work is the result, which means a lessening in the cost of production. Exports have grown and notwithstanding falling prices have increased in sterling value, October's figures being the highest given for 6 months. Unfortunately, our coal trouble continues to worry us. Perhaps owing to the mismanagement on the parts of the miners' leaders themselves and the mine-owners during the last 18 months, the coal trade has not recovered, as it was hoped it would do. Now the big cuts in miners' wages have come into force, the earning of the miner has decreased in, to him, an alarming degree, the present working hours in some of the mines being not more than two shifts a week. It seems that those miners engaged in the export trade are suffering most. A deputation waited upon the Prime Minister the other day to seek his help, asking that the unexpended balance of the subvention, amounting to about £3,000,000 which would have to be raised as it is not money in the Treasury, should be utilised to supplement the low-wages prevailing. Further, the deputation requested the help of the Government to adopt such means as would place the coal industry on a more secure footing. The Prime Minister in his reply said the case had been fully considered by the Cabinet, and they had come to the conclusion that it was not possible to agree to the suggestions made, for it was useless to add further to the national indebtedness.

Many men and women are very willing to accept local and parochial offices in England and yet very few of them know anything about the common law that governs their local expenditure, and therefore many people who read the Prime Minister's interesting reply to the Town Clerk of Deptford last week must have been rather surprised. The Town Clerk had asked for grants in aid of relief works, and the reply he received told him that the relief of destitution in England is a local charge by law, and that this is one of the cardinal points of local government. The whole system of local government would break down if people who were responsible for local expenditure are not also responsible for raising and spending the necessary money. It was also pointed out that relief works in any district are of such a character as to benefit the locality in which such work is undertaken, and that it would be unfair to place the charge for local improvements upon the general taxpayer.

ANTI-INDIAN AGITATION IN KENYA.

It looks as if there is to be a renewal of tension in Kenya, where it had been hoped that the European and Indian communities were coming closer together. The Indians had put forward a moderate programme, upon whose adoption by the Imperial Government they made the acceptance of the Governor's interim proposals to depend. It would now seem that the Europeans have unconditionally rejected the Indian programme and are sending here a deputation to insist upon the retention of the policy of racial inequality of differentiation. If Mr. Churchill succumbs to this pressure, he will certainly help to lay the British Empire in ruins, for India can only consent to remain within it upon the basis of equal citizenship for her settlers in the Overseas Empire. Mr. Churchill is credited, however, with being broader-minded and farther-sighted than his predecessor, Lord Milner, whose acceptable proposals for a settlement of the Egyptian independence question have just been rejected by Lord Curzon. These "soldier" statesmen do not seem to understand that the day is past, and that they can only remain as wreckers and not as constructive influences.

LADIES' DEPUTATION TO CALICUT.

The following statement was made by Miss K. Natarajan, on behalf of the Ladies' deputation from Bombay, at the Ladies' Meeting held at Calicut on the 7th instant:—

I crave the indulgence of a few minutes from the chairman of the meeting to make a statement. Mrs. Janakibai Bhatt, Lady Superintendent of the Poona Seva Sadan and myself have been requested by the Malabar Relief Committee, Bombay, to visit Malabar and study the conditions of the refugees here, as follows:—

1. To visit camps in Calicut, look into the existing arrangements for women and children, see whether there is scope for improvement and if any points suggest themselves and if they are, to practically discuss them with the local ladies and gentlemen.

2. Regarding the question of employment of women, find out what is the ordinary occupation of these women in their homes and see whether they cannot be made to do that in the camps by entrusting the inside management of the camps to the womenfolk there. See whether needle work, weaving, rope making etc. could be introduced in the camps as useful occupations.

3. Regarding pregnant women, women whose health is in a delicate state, and delicate children and babies generally, see whether the medical assistance and the sanitary conditions are satisfactory.

4. To visit the local hospital for women and children and ascertain if it is able to meet all the demands in Calicut adequately.

5. To suggest possible facilities for greater convenience of patients.

6. To find out if the presence of a Lady doctor and nurse in the camps will be conducive to more careful treatment.

7. Will it be satisfactory if these, if entertained, are asked to be constantly moving about from camp to camp?

8. Shall we advocate the addition of special lady workers to the existing staff in the relief Camps.

9. To report as regards arrangements for the employment of children by way of (1) schooling (2) domestic work (3) comforts, games and sports.

10. To visit, if possible, a few easily accessible permanent and temporary mofussil camps and see if adequate arrangements for medical and other relief for women and children is sufficiently provided.

On coming to Calicut Mrs. Madhava Rao joined us and we visited several ladies to obtain the necessary help and information in our work.

So far, the work of relief has been carried on excellently, solely by men workers and volunteers through two agencies. But we think, and I am sure you will agree with me when I say, their efficiency will be considerably increased if the women of Malabar also join them in their work of administering relief; this is more so, because the women and children refugees far outnumber the men. The peculiar needs of this section of the refugees and the means of best satisfying them, are naturally better understood by us, women, than by men workers.

We visited one or two camps in which there are women who are so self-respecting and were so comfortable in their homes as any of us, and who have been deprived of all their belonging and left destitute to seek help and relief at the hands of others. More than their own misery, it is the sufferings of their children that they cannot endure; their utter powerlessness to help them that break their mothers' hearts. Is it any wonder then that they look depressed and dejected and it is but rarely that we come across a cheerful face among them? These people are well looked after as far as food and clothing are concerned. But this is not all. There are other needs such as medical relief etc, with regard to which much remains to be done. Women volunteers to work in the camps are very badly needed; for the women refugees feel shy to talk freely to men about their needs. More than all this, we need women visitors to visit the camps, to cheer up these refugees, to raise their drooping spirits and to bring light and sunshine in the places where they have made their temporary homes. There is much scope for women workers here in matters of medical relief, sanitation, suitable employment for women, and education and comforts for children, and we are confident if the ladies of Calicut interest themselves and devote their attention to these matters, things will be much improved.

We could also strengthen the hands of the existing relief agencies by ourselves collecting money and thus helping them to carry out all these objects.

After careful consideration, we have come to the conclusion that the women's work cannot be carried on altogether independently of the two existing organisations. This independence might really mean independence only in name and may not be conducive to good and effective work, for under existing conditions the scope of women workers will be very limited. Therefore, instead of adding to the already existing agencies of relief work and thereby multiplying the machinery of work, the ladies of Calicut can easily form themselves into an auxiliary organisation to the two existing agencies and render effective assistance in administering relief. To make my meaning still clearer, those of the ladies who wish to work through the Congress agency can do so, and those wishing to work through the Central Relief Committee, may direct their work through that Committee. For example, the ladies should collect money for either of the existing relief agencies, as they like, obtaining authorisation from their respective Committees. Thus, it will be seen that in this scheme of things there is hardly any need for a treasurer. We would, however, suggest that the monies thus paid to the treasurer of the Committees, had better be earmarked for purposes of relief to women and children. The ladies ought to form themselves into batches of visitors, visit the camp twice a week at least and find out the actual needs of the refugees. These needs will then have to be reported to the Executive committees with suggestions for meeting them.

Another fruitful field of work is that of finding out suitable employment for women refugees. This matter is very important and should engage our immediate attention. Those women who were accustomed to work in the fields have no means of occupation now and if they are allowed to drift in this manner they would soon become unfit for any serious work. Many of them are intelligent and we are sure will readily pick up any work taught them.

The urgency of the need for medical relief is only too well known. During our visits to the camps, we found that there are some women and children suffering from ill-health such as fever, dysentery etc. They are being attended to and looked after by the doctors who visit the camps. We feel more attention in this direction will go a long way to improve the health conditions of the refugees, especially children. Camp managers also feel as we do.

These are broadly speaking the lines on which we should work. Our object in meeting to-day is to put our heads together and to see in what way we can be of the utmost service to our less fortunate sisters. Some of us can help by contributing funds, some by actual service and others by suggestions. Whatever may be the nature of the actual work undertaken by each of us, I am sure we all are bent on doing our bit and working in perfect harmony and co-operation in this purely humanitarian work.

WHAT PROPS UNTOUCHABILITY?

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

SIR,

Much has been said and written condemning the inhumane, irreligious untouchability, it remains now to be examined what those people, whose mentality and prejudices are responsible for the lingering existence of untouchability, have to say on this matter. I believe some information from this important standpoint may be of interest to your readers. While working as a volunteer of D. C. M., I often met with some common place questions, the importance of which are as follows:

I. Q.—If the untouchables are educated and uplifted, who will do the dirty work?

Ans.—I must tell these friends who always put this question, that the number of the untouchables is so huge and the work of uplifting so difficult, that if all the reformers of the world were to consecrate their energies on the Untouchables of India, and if they were successful in their mission, a sufficient number would be left out for the work about which our friends are so anxious. The main question is not 'who will do the dirty work?' but 'how to uplift such a huge population, a population five times that of Canada, and greater than that of France.' The dirty work might be done by machinery. 'Honour et Patrie' are the watchwords of France. And French men are anxious for a population to preserve them. We have a huge population in the untouchables, but we are anxious to bury them under rubbish ignorance for dirty work. Is it not the misfortune of the country? It is this attitude of our mind that is responsible for making India a coolie-and-clerk-supplying country.

II. Q.—How did we get such a huge population?

Ans.—It is hundreds of years' accumulation—just as rivers by constant wearing of hills and mountains have formed huge mountains where once there was nothing, so the rigorous, unjust and pitiless caste rules, and customs have heaped this huge mass of humanity, by tearing individuals, families and groups of families from our own different castes to which once they belonged.

III. Q.—Reformers have spread discontent amongst the untouchables. Have they not created a new obstacle in the progress of the country?

Ans.—Country means the people and therefore progress of a country means the progress of the people of that country, not of one community but of all communities. What progress can we expect from those men, who themselves victims to bileous, inhumane superstition hold loaded pistols of hatred and untouchability at their own countrymen to keep them down in ignorance for dirty work? Progress can be achieved by throwing out what is ugly in us and by allowing every community to grow healthy and vigorous. Reformers have opened our eyes to the wrongs which we have done to our own countrymen and awakened a sense of human dignity and honour amongst the untouchables. Is it an obstacle to the progress of the country? Is it not a solid service to humanity and to our country?

THE MULSHI PETHA PROJECT.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

The recent explanatory note issued by the Tata Company, makes it clear once for all that the Company is prepared to give the Mavlas their due, by way of compensation, which may be agreed to by arbitration. Couched as the present note is, it shows the willingness of the Company to cool down matters by peaceful and fair means. But 'a stitch in time saves nine,' and if the Company had the goodness to take a reasonable attitude at the outset, things would not have come to such a pass at all. But now that the Company has assumed a reasonable attitude, it is but fair that the people should not be out for an imposter. Everybody sympathises with the Mavlas, but at the same time, the industrial progress of the country should not be lost sight of. Everybody knows the sentimental value which one sets on the home and the farm. Yet, every thoughtful man will concede that national interests ought to have precedence. It may be that the Mavlas were driven to the present extreme position by the sad memory of the Andhra Valley and the hollow assurances which only added fuel to the fire. Both sides may have committed mistakes, but it stands to reason that some compromise should be arrived at, at this stage.

As regards compensation, the Industrial Commission of which Sir Dorab Tata was a member, as made the following significant recommendation :—

"It should be a sine qua non that, in all cases, where land is acquired compulsorily for industrial enterprises, arrangements should be made to offer cultivators or house-owners so dispossessed, suitable land in exchange or part of exchange. Such a course will mitigate more than any mere money payment the hardship and the sense of unfair treatment caused by expropriation."

It is clear therefore that the compensation should as far as possible be in the form of land in exchange. Otherwise, spendthrift as the ignorant cultivators are, they will squander away the lump sum and will be forced to bid good-bye to the profession of agriculture. The other alternative of being a day labourer on the works is far from alluring. The profession of agriculture may yield the cultivator less in rupees and annas but on the whole his life is happier as a cultivator than as a labourer earning more per day. Besides it is reported that many lands are mortgaged, so much the worse for it, for the money compensation will only swell the pockets of the money lenders. Of course every one is the master of one's own fortune and if the cultivators choose to squander away their money, none can come in their way. But the interests of agriculture and the dictates of humanity require that every opportunity should be given by the State to the expropriated cultivators, to settle down in a different place. Thus the difficulties encountered in, and the money required to be spent on, a new settlement ought to be considered while considering the question of compensation. The Government on their part must come forward with a definite promise to supply land in exchange and a mere vague verbal promise will not carry conviction to the excited Mavlas. The Government may have their difficulties but the people too have their own. Besides, the Mavlas may be offered facilities to invest their money in the Company by way of shares, so that they might get the profits in future if they will. Considering all this, it may be that the Company is made to pay more than what the lands are worth at present, but the sentiment which goes with the word "home" has its value and the hardship involved in deserting the home has got to be evaluated.

"SANYASIS AND POLITICS"—A QUERY AS TO AUTHORSHIP.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

May I be permitted to draw your attention to an excerpt published in your issue of the 13th ultimo, headed 'Sanyasis and Politics' from the Hindu Message of Srirangam of date September 29th. What is curious to note is the fact that many or all of the sentences in the first para of the said excerpt, in their wording, phrasing and sequence are the exact copy (to the comma in their punctuation) of an editorial paragraph headed with the same or similar words appearing in a previous issue of your well-known paper. Yet both the writings in question are evidently meant to pass for original ones from their respective sources. Here, Sir, is a puzzle, unless one and the same hand is supposed to have penned the two passages, and barring the possibility of an unacknowledged borrowing by either of the editorial hands.

Yours etc.,
'CURIOSITY.'

Karwar, 6th December.

[The editorial paragraph referred to by our correspondent appeared in the Reformer of the 25th September under the heading the Arrested Sanyasi. The Editor of the Reformer does not write in any other journal.—Ed. I. S.R.]

THE LATE MRS. BATOHAMMAL.

A correspondent writes :—

The small Brahmo community in Bangalore suffered an irreparable loss in the sudden demise of Mrs. Batohammal, wife of Mr. V. Balasundaram Mudaliar, the energetic secretary of the Samaj. The deceased lady was the moving spirit of the Samaj, in as much as by her genial temperament, winning manners and above all her spiritual hankering to realise the ideal of Brahmic life in her own person and family life, contributed not a little to the progress of the Brahmo community in Bangalore. She was the first lady to attend the weekly congregations and also to sing hymns during service, which noble example has since been followed by many other ladies. She conducted services in the Samaj on two or three occasions, besides organising ladies' meetings in connection with the Bharatha Mahila Samaj. She was also responsible for bringing about the remarriage of young widows among the tamil non-Brahmin community; and in this connection she had been maintaining a number such widows in her house. Her home was an ideal Brahmo home and every one who had the privilege of being received by her as a guest, was impressed with the manner she had tried to assimilate the modern ideas of home and social life, in spite of the fact that she was not an English educated lady. Such a sweet lady passed away on the 11th November 1921, in her 86th year, leaving behind her a sorrowful husband and two children and a large circle of friends to bemoan her loss. An 'In Memoriam' service was held in the Samaj on the 17th November, when Mr. Mahadeva Mudaliar, M. A., conducted service and Rev. G. E. Phillips, Rev. Francis and Mr. Tholasinga Mutalier spoke at length on the salient features of her life. The Adya Sradha ceremony was performed on the 20th November by the bereaved husband and children, when Mr. E. Subbkrishnaia officiated as the minister and dwelt upon her work in connection with the Samaj, and Mr. Mahadeva Mudaliar, M. A., read a short sketch of the life of the deceased, which was followed by speeches by Mr. Hanumanthappa of the City Samaj and Mr. Singh. Her funeral, as well as the other functions were attended by a large number of friends, which included, Hindus, Mahomedans, Christians, both European and Indian.

SISTER ELEANOR MARY.AN APPRECIATION.

A Press Note says: The Government of Bombay (Transferred Departments) have received with regret the intimation that Sister Eleanor Mary of the All Saints Community, who has been Lady Superintendent of Nurses in the J. J. Hospital since 1897, and rendered valuable services on plague duty prior to that year, is now obliged to withdraw her services on her elevation to the position of Mother Superior in her Community. From the small number of five women at the J. J. Hospital Nursing Home when she took charge, the staff (including probationers) has risen to 114, and, during her regime, 209 Medical and Surgical Nurses and 457 Midwifery Nurses have passed out from the Institution. The Government of Bombay desire to take this opportunity of recording their appreciation of the manner in which her duties, for which she has never received any salary, have been discharged. Her work has always been of the highest order and she has gained the esteem and respect of all those with whom she has come into contact. The thanks of Government are also due to the Community of all Saints for permitting Sister Eleanor Mary to devote all her time to the work of the Nursing Association.

CONGRESS AT AHMEDABAD.FOOLISH RUMOURS CONTRADICTED.

The following notice has been issued by Mr. G. E. Chatfield, District Magistrate, Ahmedabad:—

Some uneasiness appears to exist in Ahmedabad City with regard to the preservation of order there during the meeting of the Congress at the end of the year. Several respectable citizens have enquired what arrangements are being made for their protection and similar queries have been received from the representatives of minor communities. On the other hand extravagant and foolish rumours are said to be afloat regarding the severe measures likely to be adopted by the authorities to preserve order: and as a result of these rumours the undersigned learns that numbers of the millhands have left the city and more intended to do so.

The quiet and law-abiding have nothing to fear from any measures taken to preserve order and should pay no heed to alarmist rumours of the sort referred to, which are entirely without foundation. The District Magistrate hopes and believes that there is no ground for the apprehension of lawless behavior on the part of any class of the population. But those who suffer from such apprehension are assured by him that full arrangements will be made for the preservation of order.

medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and
gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to those persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen
the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility.
Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicines. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It restores

NOTES.

Jesus Christ and Present-Day Problems: Dr. Stanley Jones has been giving a series of interesting lectures in Bombay. The following brief note of the first of them appears in the Dnyanodaya:

In the first address on Jesus Christ and Present-Day Problems his audience was with the lecturer entirely, a fact that was expressed by Mr. K. Natarajan, Editor of the Indian Social Reformer, who presided over the meeting, when he said at the close of the lecture he entirely agreed that the pressing problems of society can be solved only by acting on the principles of Jesus' life and teaching.

We may amplify this a little. The Chairman of the lecture went on to ask if it was not remarkable that, in the whole wide world, the only country where a great national movement, with many miscalculations and grievous failures, no doubt, has based itself avowedly on Christ's central doctrines of non-resistance to evil, should be India which did not profess Christianity. He added that the response of Christian men and nations to this challenge will afford a practical test of their faith in the teachings of Christ Jesus. In this season of Christmas, it behoves us all to recall with reverence the central principles taught by the great Nazarene two thousand years ago.

An Abortive Deputation: We do not think much would have been lost if the Malaviya-Besant deputation that waited upon the Viceroy last week had taken more time over its self-appointed task. From Lord Reading's reply it is clear that the implied condition on which His Excellency agreed to meet the deputation was that the Non-Co-operationists should cease their activities. On their undertaking to do so, Government were prepared to give up the policy of wholesale arrests of the last few days. As everybody knows this policy has been welcomed by Non-Co-operation leaders whom, in fact, it has miraculously retrieved from collapse, and we are utterly unable to imagine how any one can expect them to agree to efface themselves in return for a cessation of the arrests. If that was the condition of the reception of the deputation, it was a condition which, in the absence of a clear undertaking in writing from the Non-Cooperation leaders, neither Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya nor Mrs. Besant certainly was entitled to lead the Viceroy to expect. They, with the best of intentions, put His Excellency in a position from which he had to extricate himself as best as he could. If we may respectfully say so, Lord Reading's style of oratory is too involved and intricate to admit of definite interpretation, and while His Excellency's speech has struck some as a generous utterance, it has produced on others a contrary impression. Taking all things together, it would have been better from every point of view if the deputation had not persisted in waiting on His Excellency or if His Excellency had signified to the promoters that he could tell them nothing of advantage in the absence of a definite undertaking on the part of the Non-Co-operation leaders to cease their activities.

The Viceroy's Speech: Both the deputationists and His Excellency failed to recognise the fact that the people whom the new policy has placed in the greatest difficulty are those who are opposed to Non-Co-operation. We quoted in our leading article last week the protests of Justice, the official organ of the non-Brahmin party in Madras. Mr. C. R. Reddy, till recently Inspector-General of Education in Mysore, who has just concluded a political tour in the South in the interests of his party and against the Non-Co-operation, writes a letter in the Hindu in which he remarks:

Well, Government have made it impossible for us to fight N. C. O. So long as it could be done as a warfare between opposing moral forces, policies and opinions, employing the weapons of arguments, reasoning, and persuasion, I braved the odds and did all I could to win back the people to what I honestly believe to be the right view of things. But to go on another Palnad tour now would be hardly consistent with my self-respect. Government is holding out a threat; every word it utters is a menace; there is no place for moral persuasion, which will look suspiciously like an appeal to worldly prudence and cowardice.

We reprint to-day an editorial from last week's Indian Messenger, the non-political organ of the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj, which clearly and forcibly expresses the ideas of a very large number of people who do not believe in Non-Co-operation. Many Liberals and Non-party persons hold that the new policy is a mistake and should be abandoned in the interests not of Non-Co-operationists but in the interests of a policy of co-operation. The deputation failed in an important part of its duty in omitting to emphasise this fact which is evident on all sides. And what does the Viceroy's statements regarding the Punjab grievances, the peace with Turkey and Swaraj come to? They come to this that, while His Excellency does not question the rightness of the Indian views, he has no authority to go farther than he has done to meet and satisfy them. Repression, therefore, is the only course open. The unmistakable

The deputation failed in an important part of its duty in omitting to emphasise this fact which is evident on all sides. And what does the Viceroy's statements regarding the Punjab grievances, the peace with Turkey and Swaraj come to? They come to this that, while His Excellency does not question the rightness of the Indian views, he has no authority to go farther than he has done to meet and satisfy them. Repression, therefore, is the only course open. The unmistakable terms in which Lord Reading emphasised his intense dislike of the new policy, is the one bright spot in an otherwise gloomy utterance. It shows that His Excellency is steadily advancing to the position which, in the judgment of more than one Indian and English friend, is the only one which can effectively bring the Indian view home to His Majesty's Government.

Repatriation Muddle in South Africa: It is now more than one year since the Repatriation scheme was invented and has been acted upon and, all the time, public opinion in India has steadfastly opposed it and has demanded of the Indian Government to put a stop to it. After about 1,500 Indians were, so to say, driven out of South Africa, the Government of India sent out a belated protest, not objecting to the repatriation scheme, but simply to the rosy conditions painted as prevalent here. It was then pointed out how misleading that was and the Government was asked to do some counter-propaganda in South Africa. The Protector of Indian Emigrants does not seem to have realised his duties; on the other hand, it is reported that he is a party to the suggestion that the Indians there should think of colonising British Guiana. The New India of Nov. 23, states that S.S. Umhloti left Durban on October 29 with 714 Indian emigrants arriving in Madras on 19th Nov. and that S.S. Umhloti was to leave again to bring over others. We are surprised to know that, while 1,500 Indians returned in 4 or 5 months' time, one steamer alone has brought over 714 Indians. It looks then that some intensive campaign is going on, on the part of South African authorities to send away as many Indians as possible. The Government of India is strangely silent on this topic. In the prevalent confusion in Indian politics, these important questions are unfortunately ignored. One wonders, so far as the Government's indifference is concerned, whether it is due to the overwork of some official at the top in charge of this portfolio. The evil of repatriation does not stop here. The annual report on Labour in Madras for the year 1920-21, states that 321 repatriates returned from South Africa and they were all sent home except only two who were provided with employment. What became of others and what is their state, the report does not say, and there is nothing to show that they have not swelled the number of listless, unemployed labourers in the country. The typical statements published, a few weeks ago, showed that these returned emigrants were victims of deception or false allurements and were desirous of going back to South Africa. In the face of these statements, it is monstrous that the Government of India should be a party to this in however small a measure. Will they not have the courage to stop or defeat this Machiavellian repatriation scheme? Almost all the emigrants are from South India are non-Brahmins. Strangely enough, the non-Brahmin party now in power, engrossed in one particular object, seem to have ignored other vital problems. They have not sufficiently realised their duties towards their brethren in South Africa; else, this long-drawn out repatriation would have ended long ago.

Government of India's Propaganda in America: A correspondent writes: "It will be remembered that, in the last Budget, the provision for the appointment of a publicity officer in America was refused sanction by the Legislative Assembly and the Government acquiesced in it. But the Hindu of Dec. 3, contains a letter from an Indian in America in which he says that the Government of India had embarked on a propaganda in America. He states that anti-Indian propaganda in America is being carried on in an insidious way and the principal fountains of the activities are directed through colleges, press and pulpits. He cites as an example the appointment of Mr. Horne by the Indian Government to act as a visiting lecturer in all American Universities. Mr. Horne is being paid by Indian money as he is a Professor of Patna University. Mr. Horne, it seems, has gone to a dozen Universities in America, to the knowledge of the writer, to discredit Indian aspirations. May we ask whether the Government of India have appointed Mr. Horne as a lecturer on their behalf in America and, if so, whether they have not circumvented the resolution of the Legislative Assembly? In this connection, we are pained to read that Commissioner Booth-Tucker of the Salvation Army is also actively engaged in some political propaganda in America. It is only latterly that people in this country have come to regard the Salvation Army as an institution with admiration and to accord it support. Hence, all friends of the Salvation Army would greatly like that its members keep themselves aloof from controversial politics and that Commissioner Booth-Tucker does not hamper the good work on which the Army is engaged with the co-operation of Indians, in India, by dabbling in Indian politics in America."

Malabar Relief Fund: The fifth Progress Report of the Malabar Relief Fund contains a detailed account of the work done in spite of the indifference and callousness shown by a certain section of the people towards conditions prevailing in Malabar, and an outline of the still more difficult problems of reconstruction which must follow close on the heels of peace, reported to be in sight. With the view to devise schemes on a co-operative basis and discuss measures of reconstruction, Mr. G. K. Devdhar has undertaken a second trip to Calicut. The report concludes with a stirring appeal to the people to do their duty by the suffering thousands of Malabar by contributing their mite and thereby helping to realise the ten lakhs needed to keep the relief operations going. While joining in the appeal for money with all the earnestness we are capable of, it may not be out of place here to mention that small things in the shape of Soap, oil, comb and other necessities of life, and comforts and games for children will also be a welcome boon and will add considerably to the material comforts of the refugees. We have received the following contributions to the Malabar Relief Fund: Anonymous, Delhi, Rs. 30; A sympathiser, Bombay, Rs. 30; K. G. Karkare, Devlali, Rs. 5 (monthly); S. M. Kaikini, Akluj, Rs. 10; Rev. Mr. McBride, Sholapur, Rs. 50; and a Parsee Zoroastrian, Bhusaval, Rs. 15.

An Indian Candidate for Parliament: The Daily Chronicle announces that Mr. Shapurji Saklatwala has been formally adopted as a candidate at the next election to Parliament in North Battersea. For many years past, it goes on to say, Mr. Saklatwala has been a familiar figure in Labour-Socialist platforms. He has been elected as Parliamentary candidate now by all the Labour organisations in the constituency. There are two Parliamentary constituencies in Battersea, one South Battersea and the other North Battersea. Of these North Battersea is what is called a certain seat. South Battersea is more than doubtful. At the final convention Mr. Saklatwala and Mr. Winfield, J. P., the Mayor were selected for the two seats. Mr. Saklatwala's ultimate selection for the safer seat is an evidence of the confidence in the abilities which he has been able to create among the electors. If Mr. Saklatwala succeeds at the next general election, he will be the third Indian to enter Parliament, and he too, like his two predecessors, is a Parsi.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, DECEMBER 25, 1921.

THE GREAT LIBERAL OPPORTUNITY.

The Liberals are to meet next week at Allahabad in their annual Conference. They have been, from the circumstances of their origin, handicapped from the first in their appeal to the people. They have now a great opportunity before them to retrieve their position. With candour, imagination, and courage they can make themselves the arbiters of the present situation. The first requirement is candour, because without it the next two requirements cannot be met. They must recognise that in one fundamental respect at least the reforms have proved absolutely illusory. Liberal leaders believed and told the country that the introduction of the Reforms would make a policy of wholesale repression impossible. They cannot persist in that belief any longer. Many of them have protested against the wholesale arrests of the last few days in emphatic language. Some of our Anglo-Indian contemporaries have openly accused them of something like treacherous backsliding for not standing up in support of Government. The first thing they have got to do is to make it quite clear that their policy of co-operation is even more absolutely bound up with uncompromising opposition to repression than the policy of Non-Co-operation. To Non-Co-operationists, indeed, the arrests of the last few days have been a Godsend. They have been provided with an effective rallying-cry when their morale was thoroughly shaken by the Malegaon, Mopla and Bombay outbreaks. Their shortcomings and failures are for the moment thrust into the background by the Government policy of arrests all round. The Liberals are involved to some extent in the discredit of the new policy. What several of them have done individually must be done collectively and emphatically by the Party Conference at Allahabad. Peace and Order are important conditions of national well-being, just as health of body is an important condition of peace of mind. But just as to make bodily health the sole aim of life is detrimental to peace of mind, so a Government which makes "peace and order" its sole end is apt not only to miss the higher purposes of its existence, but to fail even in ensuring the one end it has in view. Peace and order will be automatically ensured if legitimate grievances are promptly redressed, if no new grievances are allowed to accumulate, and if Government have a sympathetic understanding of, and strive always to promote, national aspirations to a healthy and honourable life. The peace and order enforced by the policeman's baton and the soldier's rifle are effective and necessary in keeping down crimes which involve moral turpitude, but they fail, and must fail, where the moral sense of the people is not behind them. It was said slightly of an ancient Empire that it made a solitude and called it Peace. To throw hundreds of persons in jail, to prohibit public meetings, to suppress newspapers, may for a time produce a sort of peace. Any fool, said Cavour, can govern a country in a state of siege. There is no statesmanship in repression.

The first thing which the Liberal Conference should do is strongly, completely, uncompromisingly to repudiate the policy of wholesale arrests and to acknowledge that the adoption of it within a year of the introduction of the Reforms has rendered confidence in their sufficiency untenable. The next thing is to demand that the Reforms should be carried forward so as to afford the most complete guarantee against such sudden outbursts. Meanwhile, it should be expressly declared at the Conference that members of the Party cannot accept titular honours or places carrying emoluments, though, as we said last week, those who hold titles ought not to be asked to make a boast of renouncing them. Many Liberals have made great sacrifices in the cause of the country and are capable of making the greatest that any Non-Co-operationist has done or can think of doing. They should now give tangible proof of it to the country which in its present temper is apt to regard the ineptitude of Government as a rehabilitation of Non-Co-operation with all its errors and failures. A flatterer is no friend. Now is the time for Liberals to show to Government and the people that though they are friends they are not the flatterers of either. All the signs show that Government will have to come to terms with the Non-Co-operation leaders, and that an early, though not perhaps immediate, result will be a new election. A golden opportunity of making Non-Co-operationists come to terms with Government, has been lost by the impatience of the new policy. If a Conference is called as suggested, the position of Liberals in it at present cannot be a commanding one. They cannot oppose the demands of the Non-Co-operationists for the dismissal of the Punjab officials, the conclusion of a reasonable Peace satisfactory to our Mahomedan countrymen with Turkey, or the demand for full responsible Government. In fact, on these points they do not disagree with Non-Co-operationists. Where they disagree are in respect of measures of internal policy—in ideals of national progress. Liberals are and must be impotent until Non-Co-operationists are in a position to formulate measures to give effect to their multifarious policy. The country cannot be made to see the essential unsoundness of Non-Co-operation ideas so long as the glamour of repression shines about them. The Liberals in opposition will be far more powerful than in office and Non-Co-operation will in office be as clay in the hands of the Liberal potter. The plight of Ulster should remind Liberals that they cannot expect Government to continue to support them in the face of the country's opposition. By doing voluntarily now what they will have to do involuntarily six months hence, they will retain the right and power of initiative in their hands. If the Councils are dissolved today, quite a large number of Non-Co-operationists will gaily relinquish the part of the programme relating to the boycott of Councils. They may be swept into the Councils by a large majority, but then will come their ordeal. In the situation created by the Government policy during the last few days, we do not see any way out except for the Liberals to accede voluntarily to the plea for a new election. The times call for courage, decision, sacrifice. If the Liberal gathering at Allahabad exhibit these qualities in the measure in which they belong to several individual members of it, the Party will easily become within a measurable distance of time the dominant party in the country.

THE ARUNACHAL MISSION.*

In a well-written and neatly-printed book, entitled "The Master's World Union Scheme," Alokananda Mahabharati gives an account of the origin, history and objects of the scheme of world federation on the basis of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, propounded by his Master, Thakur Dayananda, "a Sannyasin and Friend of the World." Thakur Dayananda conceived about 12 years ago the idea of bringing about a complete reconstruction of human society from the spiritual, political and economic standpoint. We are not told anything about his previous life, except that he was a Sannyasi. His earliest communications seem to have been addressed to the Government of India and the Chief Commissioner of Assam where the Mission has its head-quarters. His first declaration was made to Mr. Boxwell, Superintendent of Police, Cachar, and it was to the effect that Nam-Sankirtan will carry the message of peace and love to the nations of the earth. The ends which the Thakur put before himself, were the abolition of racial and religious, caste and class distinctions, and the equal status of women with men. Spiritual force and love were stated to be the only means of achieving this tremendous revolution, and Nam-Sankirtan as the most potent generator of these forces was enjoined for constant practice by his cult. Nam-Sankirtan, it is explained in a foot-note, is a kind of devotional music and chanting the name of the Lord, in which people move in a circle, singing and dancing to the accompaniment of drums, cymbals, gongs and other instruments. It is claimed that in it "the noblest traits of a man's character are released from grossness and these come more and more into display in his dealing with his fellow-beings." The author states that there are numerous instances of men living lives of drunkenness and lewdness having been completely changed. "The deadliest enemies have embraced each other in Sankirtan and have ever afterwards lived on terms of the closest friendship." Its physical effects are described thus: "His (the devotee's) face brightens up, his body bends, curves and describes beautiful figures, as he dances in joy. All the actions which take place on the physical body as the result of the long practice of Yoga, are quickly and automatically performed in course of Sankirtan." Mahomedans, Jews and Hindus regardless of caste joined in these dances and a European lady connected with the Bahai movement, is said to have been so greatly impressed by the sight that she clasped to her bosom one of the dancing disciples.

To give effect to his ideas, Thakur Dayananda founded in 1906 an order of brotherhood known as the Arunachal Mission, and in 1909, the Arunachal Ashram, its headquarters, was established on a hillock three miles away from Silchar, Assam, on the bank, of the river Barak and overlooking the Assam-Bengal railway. Four branch Ashrams have since been founded. One class of the Thakur's disciples took their permanent abode in these Ashrams, with their wives, mothers, daughters and relations. Others pursued their secular avocations, but kept in constant touch with the Ashrams. The disciples in the Ashram followed their own particular religious beliefs—some of them are said to be Mahomedans—but the one common mode of worship is Sankirtan. "The Mission has no fixed source of income—we never beg, we do not ask for any help, nor do we even expect any. For the maintenance of the Mission, Arunachal depends entirely on God and God alone. And it has been our experience that thousands of rupees have come in a strange manner." In the Ashram, there is no caste distinction and women have the same liberty as men. "They move as freely as men, make Sankirtan separately from the men or join the men in their Kirtan, as they like. They are free to wear the veil or not as they like". It was inevitable that this singing, dancing cult, in which caste and sex was ignored, should have upset the susceptibilities of surrounding orthodoxy. The neighbours complained of the constant Sankirtan in the Ashram as a nuisance interfering with their sleep of nights. Others saw in it a religious and social danger, still others regarded it as a deep-laid political conspiracy. It was also said that the Ashram was a hotbed of immorality. In 1916, Thakur Dayananda was found guilty by the Deputy Commissioner of exercising undue influence over the mind of a female disciple who wanted to give her daughter in marriage to another disciple of his in contravention of caste and custom. When Mahendra Nath De, M. A. B. Sc. joined the Mission in 1910, the agitation against the Ashram grew loud and strong. In 1912, the Dole Gobindo Ashram was founded at Jagatshi, Sylhet, by Mr. De, who had taken the name of Yogananda. A grand Sankirtan was there held for days together, going on without a break during day and night. A hundred men, women and children in the new Ashram divided themselves into groups and carried on the Sankirtan by shifts. One lady in the Ashram is said to have fasted for six days, till the revelation came to her that the bliss which they of the Arunachal were tasting would descend in flood and torrent on the whole world at no distant date. But the outside world was alarmed. A largely-signed petition to the Chief Commissioner demanded the suppression of the Ashram as "an impure, obscene, immoral and indecent institution opposed to public policy and good morals," and the Police was set in motion by a charge of kidnapping of a minor boy against the Thakur. In searching for the boy, a collision occurred between the dancing devotees and the Police, leading to several persons being wounded. The Thakur and his disciples were arrested, and some of them convicted. When the Thakur came out of jail, he had to face another charge of kidnapping, this time of a minor girl, but he was acquitted. The second half of the book contains the Thakur's scheme of renovating humanity, as an alternative to the League of Nations and the Bolshevik schemes, and his correspondence with several leading men all over the world.

The success of such movements as the Arnachal Mission—it is claimed that it has achieved a considerable measure of it in Assam—is a sign of the times of which unbending champions of caste and custom should take note. It shows that in every part of the country and in every grade of society an increasing number of persons is sick and impatient of the cast-iron religious and social creeds among us. They want to bridge the gulf which divides man from man and to pull down the prison walls which keep women ignorant and backward. The idea inspiring such movements is a great one, but the choice of methods does not display an insight into the laws governing the growth of the social organism. Society cannot be reformed by emotional orgies. You cannot dance or sing away the encrustation of ages. Emotion has a place and part in all reform movements. It must provide the driving power. But the direction of reform must be by informed reason. Men and women who are impatient of hard, steady, incessant work attended, as it will often be, by slight and slow results, who want to see the fruit of their fancy in a flash, are as often a hindrance as a help to true reform. The increasing number of persons of all ages who must flit from place to place, must be rushing about here and there every hour of the day, must be the centre of some sensation in order that they may count the day well-spent, is not a happy or hopeful sign. We all need in these days of bustle, hurry, noise and loud speech to study the art and learn the wisdom of sitting still. A Sadhu used day after day to sit still in a temple. An economist who happened to see him, denounced him as an idle beggar who ought to be chucked out of the place. The Sadhu heard him and beckoned to him to come near. When he came, the Sadhu requested the economist to try and sit still for ten minutes by his side. Before two minutes were past, the economist had changed his posture thrice. The Sadhu pointed out to him that to sit still demanded much strenuousness and was not such an idle pastime as he imagined. The course of Indian progress will be less full of jolts and jars, if our leaders cultivated the art of sitting still for a while every day. After all, those who invent short-cuts lack the faith and visions of those who realise that

While the tired waves vainly breaking Seem here no painful inch to gain,

Far back through creeks and inlets making Comes, sudden, flooding in, the main.

Steady, persistent, well-directed work is the only way of reform.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

A valued correspondent writes:—

To day I have sent my contribution to the Malabar Relief Fund. I was thinking for so many days of sending my mite but as there was no direct appeal I postponed doing so till I read your appeal in the Reformer yesterday. I am sure if attempts are made in the moffasil to raise regular subscriptions, you would get a pretty good sum. I really wonder why the District towns like Sholapur have not been touched yet. Sholapur is a very prosperous commercial place and if a proper effort is made, a very good sum is sure to be raised there. So also there are places like Hubli, Gadag, Bagalkot in the Karnatak and Jalgaon, Amalner and others in Khandesh where successful efforts could be made. It is my impression that the Non-Co-operators feel very much crest-fallen at the Malabar affair, and the consciousness that all the atrocities there have their origin in their propaganda keeps them back from giving proper publicity to the actual state of affairs prevailing there. I think this is the very reason why the various Congress Committees have not been able to raise any decent amount in this Presidency for their relief work. If I am not very much mistaken, beyond Bombay and Poona no subscription has been collected by them at all. You will be a little shocked to know that all this time meetings are being held round about here for collecting subscriptions for the relief of the Mulshi Petha Satyagrahis. Really what a narrow vision is shown by these persons! I wish you may be able to excite strong sympathy in Mr. Gandhi about the Malabar situation and through him get a mandate to all the Congress Sub-Committees to collect subscriptions for Malabar.

Now turning to purely social reform questions dealt with in the Reformer, I would request you to write a line in protest about the Prince of Wales being entertained by nautch parties in Native States. You must have read of such an entertainment in Bikaner. Your Madras correspondent protested about Lord and Lady Willingdon having attended such a function in Tanjore. If no timely protests are made, I am afraid in the new flood of revivalist movement, the nautch would also get revived.

I very much wish you would induce some young lawyer to write short notes for the Reformer on the cases disposed of by the various High Courts and the Privy Council and which have a bearing upon social reform matters. Some months back, the Bombay High Court disposed of a case where a gentleman on behalf of the Shankaracharya sought to be appointed the guardian of a minor girl in overriding the claims of her father. The reason of this gentleman's action was that the father was trying to dispose of the girl for money by marrying her to an old man. Although the object was quite laudable, the Courts could not support the man. However, the case shows how society is progressing; it arose in Gujarat.

Then the Privy Council in Gokal Chand & Hackamchand Nathmal (I. L. R. 2, Lahore) have discussed the position of a civilian (I. C. S) who was a member of a joint Hindu family and who got his education in England out of the family funds. He has been now serving in the C. P. His family has been carrying on money-lending business in the Punjab and in the course of such business the other members gave hundis to the respondent. The civilian had nothing to do with this affair. The respondent sued upon the hundis and made the civilian a party to the suit. The Privy Council held that the civilian was liable upon the hundis to the extent of his share in the joint family property, including his official earnings. They further held that his official salary was partible property of the joint family, since it resulted from the special educational training got at the expense of the joint family. The judgment was delivered by Lord Sumner.

At the conclusion of the judgment there is a very significant paragraph. I transcribe it here:—"Their lordships are fully alive to the incongruity, more striking perhaps to Western than to Indian minds, of applying to such an occupation as that of Mr. Gokulchand's an ancient rule, which had its origin in a state of society possibly simpler than and certainly different from the state of society existing in the present day, but this anomaly proceeds largely from the occidental habit of relying on mere analogy in the application of legal rules instead of deducing the application from a logical apprehension of the principle as the best Eastern thinkers do. Be this as it may, they conceive it to be of the highest importance that no variations or uncertainties should be introduced into the established and widely recognised, laws, which govern an ancient Eastern civilization, and least of all in matters affecting family rights and duties connected with ancient customs and religious convictions." The rule referred to is the rule of Hindu Law that acquisitions made by coparceners involving the use of patrimony or by Science or learning obtained "to the detriment of the family property" are joint family property and so liable to be divided among coparceners. The modern decisions are trying to narrow the meaning of this rule. Sir Bhasham Ayyangar had tried to get an Act passed concerning this, but his attempt failed. But the ruling quoted, and that being of the highest tribunal, is likely to have a very retrograde effect upon the future decisions of the Courts in India. As regards this joint family system, I observe that it is almost non-existent among families in which all the members enter into physical labour for their livelihood. It is chiefly found among land-owning people or money-lenders or other business men.

I may also draw your attention to a criminal case which has a reference to the work in which you are now engaged on the Committee for preventing the evils of prostitution in Bombay. It is reported in (1918) I. L. R. 42, Bombay. at page 181. I am sure it would be brought to your notice. When it was being heard in the Bombay High Court, I was there and the Police officer instructing the Government pleader then stated that the accused there who was a pimp was in the high favour of a Maharaja and this Maharaja did his best to see that the man was not extradited from his State. I am sure on the Committee you will come to know a great deal about the connection of such Indian Chiefs and Princes with the evil of prostitution in Bombay and still the Government is anxious to keep such Princes quite free from the comments of newspapers in British India!

A SCHEME FOR COMPULSORY EDUCATION.

(BY THE HONOURABLE MR. G. M. BHURGI.)

ACCOMMODATION.

I believe so much importance has so far been given to buildings and so much money spent on them and yet with a result that not even half the existing schools have buildings of their own. This is not to suggest that no regard should be paid to proper ventilation, accommodation and hygienic conditions. But the procedure adopted for obtaining necessary sanction to school plans has been such as to provoke even such an officialised personage as the Commissioner of a division to make caustic remarks against it. A Commissioner of the Central Division has once decided that it is "a veritable game of departmental battle-door and shuttle cock" (vide Quinquennium Report 1912-17, Chapter on Primary Education). Matters are said to have improved "somewhat" but with little or no appreciable results. I therefore want to urge very strongly upon the Committee the desirability of erecting in rural areas cheap school-houses somewhat upon the plan shown at page 102, of occasional Reports, No. 6 (Educational Buildings in India). It is the plan of a village school in Gonda District and after the standard plan designed by the District Engineer. We may have these school-houses with larger dimensions or two apartments wherever necessary. I believe a school-house of that pattern with an accommodation of about 60-70 boys would cost a maximum amount of Rs. 1000. In Sind where rains are on the whole scarce, Landhis at a cost of Rs. 100 to 200 according to requirements would be quite serviceable. There are already in existence such Landhis which are used as school-houses. Even the urban schools need not have as cumbersome buildings as is the tendency of the P. W. Department to provide. I need hardly point out to the Committee that the ancient ideal of a school-house in India is squatting either under grove of green trees or simple and bare structures to provide protection against the sun, and that the heavy paraphernalia of benches, desks etc. of the Western nation which has been thrust upon the simple village folk here has not yet found favour in our modern village schools. The question of accommodation can best be solved (a) firstly, by adopting the double shift system outlined below. (b) By utilizing all available Dharmshalas, serais and Panchayat Halls in villages, for the purpose of opening schools there or in the absence of these in a village, in rented houses or in houses got as free loans from one of the rich and charitable men in the village or in the verandhas or any side accommodation available in any public building in the village, till permanent arrangement on the lines set out above is secured.

DOUBLE SHIFT SYSTEM.

With a view to minimise the various difficulties in giving effect to any scheme of Compulsory Education, I would recommend adoption of a double shift system whereby children could attend either morning or afternoon session according as it is convenient to the parents. But as far as possible the two sets should be permanently defined, i. e., the parent ought to decide for the whole season or year as to which session would be convenient for his children to attend, otherwise there is likely to be much confusion and inconvenience.

The double shift system may be necessary in Municipal areas but in rural areas it will be a double blessing. While the question of provision, equipment of necessary establishment etc and financial resources would be largely solved in giving immediate effect to the scheme of compulsion, it would also afford a choice to parents when it would be less inconvenient to send their children to schools.

CHANGES IN CURRICULUM.

Certain fundamental changes are no doubt desirable and are almost necessary in the present Primary Curriculum to make it more effective or yield better results. For instance, instead of the present cumbrous curriculum of teaching as many as 6 to 8 subjects, I would in the first place concentrate on the teaching of the three R's. Various subjects like History, Geography, Moral Instructions, Elementary principles of Hygiene and Agriculture may be taught under one group of selected lessons from all those embodied in the Vernacular Text Books of the class. In addition, Kinder Garten may be encouraged in the case of infants and some sort of manual training and practical domestic science according to their sex, in the case of children of IIIrd and IVth Class.

TEACHERS.

Arrangements should be made for at least double the number at present receiving training as early as possible of the introduction of the compulsory scheme, by providing more accommodation in the existing Training Colleges and opening more in such places as may be desirable. If possible the course of instruction should be curtailed. I think the introduction of the shift system will also be an indirect help in this if it is extended to the IVth standard also. A double shift system will involve additional staff for every school working under it but not necessarily double the staff required for one shift school. The additional staff may be so organised that there may not be two teachers for one standard, but as far as possible a set of teachers, each teacher teaching any two out of four hours net in each shift.

While it is desirable that at least the head masters and head mistresses of all primary schools should be trained teachers, and every step that is possible should be taken to produce adequate number of certified teachers, their absence should not as far as possible give a setback to the introduction of Compulsory Education in various classes of "School Districts". I believe as many male trained teachers are already available in the Presidency except Sindh, as would be required as Head Masters for the number of Primary Schools that are necessary to make sufficient provision for all the male population of the school-going age within the period prescribed in respective school districts. In that case, the rule may be relaxed in regard to the schools in Sind where already a number of Mullah Schools exist recognised by the Government and which are under the management of Mullahs who are not only untrained but who may not even have had higher Primary Education.

A question has been asked whether the present scale of pay of Primary teachers is adequate. I think the very fact of such a question arising at all is a proof of the inadequacy of the present scale of pay or at least doubtfulness of its adequacy. Looking to the enormous rise in the price of food-stuffs, cloth and other necessaries of life, the existing scale of pay is quite inadequate. I have seen the Press note No. 560 of the Educational Department of the Bombay Presidency dated the 24th October 1921 giving a revised scale of pay, but even that is not quite adequate. I would suggest a further revision when Compulsory Education is introduced, as follows :—

	Rs.
Unqualified Assistants ...	25 to 50
Qualified but untrained Assistants.	30 to 60
Qualified but untrained Head masters ...	35 to 70
First year Trained teachers ...	35 to 70
2nd year Trained teachers ...	40 to 80
3rd year do do ...	50 to 100

As a rule there should be a fixed scale of pay but special merit and good results also ought to have their due recognition in some form or other so as to give an incentive to teachers, but at the same time sufficient care should be taken to avoid favouritism.

REPRESSION IN EXCELSIS, WILL IT CURE THE DISEASE ?

The campaign of repression that was launched by the Government last week was neither just nor called for. First there was no intimidation, nor any molestation at least none that we know of, and secondly there was no breach of peace. Is it a crime to sell khaddar, shout the name of Mr. Gandhi or request a shop-keeper, a countryman, to keep his shop closed on such and such a day as a mark of disapproval of a certain thing which the Government did in spite of public opposition? We confess we fail to understand if it is. Certainly it cannot be said that Mrs. Das, Mrs. Sen, or Miss Chatterjee molested or intimidated a shopkeeper. Then why were they arrested? The Government harps on the single string that shopkeepers were molested and intimidated on the 17th by the volunteers. Still we do not find in the papers the report of a single case in which the charge was established. Curious enough during the trials of the volunteers not a single shopkeeper or any other man came up as witness to prove the charge of molestation by any registered volunteer. There can be no earthly justification then why the volunteer associations should be declared illegal. It was only when the associations were declared unlawful that the latter threw down the gauntlet.

RETURNED TO HINDUISM.

Mr. Ganesh Sadashiv Patwardhan had gone into Christianity about a year ago. He has now returned to Hinduism, and was initiated by the Hindu Missionary Society of Bombay on Thursday the 24th of November in the presence of members and friends. Mr. Sudderrao B. Vaidya, L.M.E. acted as Acharya and Mr. Vasant M. Kande acted as Fire warden.

Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronised by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to those persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen
the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility.
Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicines. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires. It is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills. Rupees ten only.

NOTES.

The Bishop's Letter: We are obliged to Lord Bishop of Bombay for his letter explaining Christ's attitude to politics and evil generally. On a question of Bible exegesis, we shall not presume to enter into a discussion with one of his lordship's eminence and scholarship. But it is well within the province of laymen to refer to historical facts as providing a practical exposition of doctrines prevalent in times past. The policy of cruel persecution which so tolerant a State as the Roman found necessary to adopt towards the early Christians who, presumably, drew their inspiration from sources not far removed from the illustrious Teacher, is, to our mind, a more certain indication of the practical trend of Christ's doctrines as affecting the social and political conditions of the time than the most learned and conscientious scholarship can deduce from the Bible.

Mr. Andrews on Independence: There are two points in Mr. Andrews' suggestive letter which we print to-day, that require notice. He sees that there may be need for revising his opinion in the light of the Irish settlement and the presence of Australian and Canadian delegates at the Washington Conference, indicating as they do a new ideal of the British Commonwealth in the minds of British statesmen. When he refers to the segregation of Indians in British Colonies as having impressed him as to the necessity of Independence, he overlooks in a way which is impossible to us, that we, Indians, are ourselves practising such segregation in our own country, and that so long as we do not remove this reproach in our own country, we cannot denounce without restraint similar action on the part of the British in another part of the world. Further, Independence will not solve the race-problem which is as acute in the case of Japanese subjects as in that of British Indians. As regards the American attitude to the Philippines, Mr. Andrews does not seem to know the latest news. The Commission that was sent out to examine the fitness of the Philippines for independence, has reported that from the economic and defence points of view, the islanders are not yet ripe for it. It is all purely a question of not flying from the ills we have to others that we know not of. Mahatma Gandhi's forceful opposition to Mr. Hasrat Mohani's proposal in open Congress, precisely represents our own position.

Education and Taxation: We print to-day the last of the series of able and well-thought-out articles on compulsory education in this Presidency, which the Hon. Mr. G. M. Bhurgri has been contributing. In this article, Mr. Bhurgri deals with the important question of new taxation for meeting the cost of education. He rightly places in the forefront of his suggestions, the importance of first examining sources of retrenchment in the cost of administration in all other departments. He indicates a number of them in which retrenchment is possible and necessary. We think that Ministers, when they are asked to propose new taxes to meet educational expenditure, or even when they are forced to cut down their budget, are entitled to demand that before doing so they should satisfy themselves that all possible economy has been effected in the other, more especially, the reserved Departments. For this purpose, they are entitled to look into the budgets of these departments and if they are not satisfied that they are economically managed, they ought to refuse to propose new taxation or to be satisfied with less than their needs, unless all possible retrenchments have been carried out. They will have not only to satisfy themselves but also the Legislative Councils and the public that they have done this part of their duty.

Religion and Politics: The Indian Messenger is the organ of the Sadharan Brahma Samaj of Calcutta, and some readers have been evidently complaining of its vigorous comments on current politics. We used to have some such complaints also from earnest social reformers who had not grasped the larger significance of social reform as a principle and not a mere group of "items". Our contemporary has been moved to make a vigorous declaration of its view regarding the intimate connection between religion, social reform and politics. "We are tempted to ask this class of our friends," writes the Messenger, "Why did we come over to Brahmoism leaving the snug and cosy corner of Hindu Society?" Was it for Truth or for comfort or security? Alas! how far down are we fallen from the Fathers of our Church! Rammohun thou shouldst be living at this hour! We have need of thee! A stern lover of freedom, he did not divide politics, religion and society into watertight compartments. The indomitable soul that sought enfranchisement in religion also broke the thousand years old iron shackles of society, and rejoiced over the freedom of nations in bondage." We entirely agree with the Messenger that social and religious freedom is inseparable from political freedom, and we must oppose all encroachments on such freedom whether on the part of Government or on that of Non-Co-operationists. The religious and social reformers of India have known and tested the worth and value of loving sacrifice in pursuit of a principle, they are trained and disciplined soldiers of freedom, and they are able to bring to politics qualities which are not to be found largely among orthodox sectaries, Hindu or Moslem.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, JANUARY 1, 1922.

THE NATIONAL WEEK.

The National week opened at Ahmedabad with the Indian National Social Conference held on the 26th December. The Conference was held in Premabhai Hall and not in the Congress mandap. The audience had, therefore, the convenience of chairs which were strictly tabooed in the Congress pavilion. Dr. B. N. Kanuga, a prominent local Non-Co-operation leader, was Chairman of the Reception Committee, and that party, in fact, organised and was conspicuous at the Conference. But it must be said to the honour of those responsible for the arrangements that they scrupulously maintained the neutral character of the Social Conference so far as politics was concerned. One or two voices were raised at the Conference against the request to Ministers embodied in some of the resolutions, which were drafted by the Reception Committee, but they met with no support from the Conference. A special word is due to Dr. Kanuga to whom the success of the Conference as a non-political platform for all who are interested in social reform is largely due. He had the hearty co-operation of Rao Bahadur Ramanbhai Mahipatram Nilkant, and between them, they made the Conference as conspicuous a success as was possible in the atmosphere of political excitement which prevailed in Ahmedabad on the eve of a momentous political meeting. The large attendance of women was a most gratifying feature of the Ahmedabad Conference. Ladies prominent in the Non-Co-operation field like Mrs. Motilal Nehru and her relatives were present as also Mrs. Ramanbhai who is the life and soul of women's activities in the capital of Gujarat. The most impressive lesson of the Ahmedabad Social Conference is that the social reform movement offers the most favourable common ground where men and women of all races, creeds, castes and shades of political opinion may meet, work and co-operate with the utmost goodwill. We print a resume of the presidential address delivered at the Conference in this issue.

THE KHILAFAT CONFERENCE.

The proceedings of the Khilafat Conference disclosed, what has been overlooked so far, that some fundamental differences between the national Indian and Mahomedan communal points of view remain to be settled in order to make Hindu-Moslem unity a reality full of beneficent promise to all the communities of our composite population. Mahatma Gandhi himself noted during the Bombay riots that the present Hindu-Moslem unity had become a menace to the smaller communities. Some remarks of Hakim Ajmal Khan, in the course of his presidential address, should not be allowed to pass without comment. The All-India Congress Committee during one of its recent meetings resolved that the foreign policy of India should be moulded in a spirit of sympathetic understanding with the Mahomedan

States of Arabia, Afghanistan, Persia, Turkey and Egypt. This in itself is sound sense, and if the Hakim Sahib had been content to re-iterate it there would have been no cause for comment. But he went much farther and beyond what any responsible Indian statesman can endorse, when, after referring to the failure of European diplomacy in Moslem States, he observed :

The Islamic world was well prepared for a great revolution. The Islamic federation in Central Asia, Caucasus, Egypt, Persia, Afghanistan and, above all, the regenerated Turkey gave promise of a greater future Islam. So to say, India, on the one side, and Asia Minor on the other were but two extreme links in a chain of the future Islamic federation which was gradually but surely joining together all the intermediate factors in one great system of ordered evolution. Likewise, the present condition in Europe clearly indicated the great possibility of the emancipation of Asia from political bondage and economic slavery. In India the work had already begun. The Hakim Sahib asked his compatriots deeply interested in the events taking place outside India to bear in mind the fact, that the success of their efforts in the cause of Khilafat was bound to help the awakening of India, for the regeneration of Asia was closely bound up with the Khilafat question inasmuch as that was, as a matter of fact, the forerunner of a general awakening of Asia. United India could not afford to ignore the developments in the Islamic world, specially because no less than 70 millions belonging to the Islamic faith formed part of the Indian nation and had a share in its destiny.

The Hakim Sahib was perfectly justified as a devout Mahomedan in representing emancipation from political bondage and economic slavery as synonymous with the success of Islam, and we do not propose to enquire how far facts both in India and elsewhere, in contemporary and in historical times, bear out this identification so far as non-Mahomedan peoples are concerned. But we are obliged to demur very strongly to the Hakim Sahib's anticipation that India has no greater purpose than to become a link in the Islamic federation. To suggest this is to ignore the distinctive lesson of India's spiritual evolution extending centuries beyond either Islam or Christianity. It will take us long to enter into this matter fully. Here we need only say that India's position, marked out by her culture and history no less than by her geographical position, is that of the great reconciler between Islam, Christian and Buddhist nations. She herself has ever believed in the efficacy of all great religions to lead their people to salvation. She has never sought to proselytise. Her spiritual affinities, her international sympathies, her economic interests are no less with Christian and Buddhist peoples than with the Mahomedan. She can never enter a confederation, Christian or Mahomedan, whose main aim is religious militancy. Her own religious tradition is one of the broadest toleration and she cannot depart from it without destroying her most precious heritage. The other fundamental difference, which the proceedings of the Khilafat Conference brought to the surface, is as regards the principle of non-violence. Hindu thought as the result of ripe experience of the fatality of objective force, evolved the great maxim which is deep-rooted in Indian faith that "non-violence (or doing no harm) is the supreme law". Mahatma Gandhi is the modern apostle of this central creed of the highest Hinduism. Mr. Hasrat Mohani raised in the form of an amendment at the Khilafat Conference the point that Islam does not forbid resort to violence in suitable cases and the President could only get round the corner by ruling out of order the amendment which he had allowed to be passed by the Subjects Committee previously. Not only non-Mahomedans, but even Mahomedans of sects other than that which holds by the Khilafat of Turkey, are getting estranged by the extreme language of Khilafat extremists like Mr. Hasrat Mohani. The Shia Conference recently held at Cawnpore, may be a straw but it shows which way the wind is veering.

THE NATIONAL CONGRESS.

The length and publicity of the All-India Committee's discussions largely anticipated the short subsequent formal session of the Congress. Two matters in connection with the Congress proceedings have arrested public attention. One of them, the nomination of Mahatma Gandhi as "dictator," however, merely regularised an existing fact, and was besides rendered necessary by the actual or expected incarceration of other leaders. The other is the motion for declaration of independence of the British connection brought forward by Mr. Hasrat Mohani which was strongly opposed by Mahatma Gandhi and was thrown out by the Congress. A motion by the same gentleman in the Subjects Committee to drop the principle of non-violence met with little support. Mahatma Gandhi in opposing the Independence resolution of Mr. Hasrat Mohani, for the first time since the inauguration of Non-Co-operation, publicly threw doubts on the solidity of the present Hindu-Mahomedan unity. He said:

Let us understand our limitations. Let Hindus and Mussalman have absolute, indissoluble unity. Who is there here who can say to me with confidence that Hindu-Muslim unity has become an indissoluble factor of Indian unity with the Parsis, Christians and Jews and untouchables, about whom you have heard this afternoon? Who is here who will tell me that these very people will not rise against any such an ideal? Think fifty times before you take any step which may redound not to your credit nor to your advantage, but which may cause irreparable injury. Let us first of all gather up our strength, sound our own depths. Let us not go into waters whose depth we don't know. This proposition lauds you in depths unfathomable.

According to a telegram in the Advocate of India, he remarked that "the Mahomedans might think that Afghanistan and the Turks were their strong helpers and other minorities might go to seek the help of the British Government." The report is cryptic, but it is clear that the Mahatma was stating something like what we have said in the previous paragraph. While on the subject of Independence, we may call attention to Mr. Andrews' letter which we publish to-day and in which he says he is considering whether he should revise, and if so, how, his views previously expressed as to the necessity, from a humanitarian stand-point, of independence of the British connection, in view of the Irish settlement and the presence of Canadian and Australian delegates at the Washington Conference. The Congress position as explained by Mahatma Gandhi is that Swarajya is demanded, but Swarajya within the British connection is not ruled out by the Congress creed. This elasticity was necessary to enable the more moderate Congressmen to continue within the fold. It also permits of a basis for further negotiation, while the declaration of independence as the absolute objective must mean a final clean cut. Beyond these two matters, the most noticeable point in the Congress resolution which we print elsewhere, is that it allows of a considerable retrogression from the impracticable and harmful parts of the old programme in order to concentrate on the latest developments of the policy of repression. To our mind, the Ahmedabad Congress is a sign of a growing sense of responsibility which was aggressively absent at Nagpur last year. The "dictatorship" of Mahatma Gandhi, as we have said, merely recognizes an existing fact, and the conditions attaching to it make it clear that the Congress is at least as much afraid of his rushing it into a premature peace as of launching it upon a reckless offensive.

THE LIBERAL FEDERATION.

Only very brief reports of the proceedings of the Liberal Federation at Allahabad, with the exception of the address of the President, Mr. Govinda Raghav Iyer, are available at the time of writing. The Chairman of the Reception Committee, Mr. Kunzru, is reported in welcoming the delegates to have delivered a forcible speech, and to have especially condemned the repressive policy and pointed out the failure of dyarchy in the United Provinces in particular. The Presidential address might have passed for an able state-paper some years ago, but as a pronouncement on the political situation of the hour, it is hopelessly out of date. No previous Liberal Federation has had so much anxious and even sympathetic attention concentrated on it even from Congressmen, but unless the subsequent proceedings make up for the tame routine of the presidential address, the Liberal party will lose the great opportunity presented to them. Dewan Bahadur Iyer's political outlook is limited by the Congress on one side and the Reforms on the other. He has no guidance to give to the country except by way of criticising the one or extolling the other, no independent outlook on the weighty social problems that underlie politics, no vision as to the future of India as a nation and among nations. His address is a thinly lucid exposition dealing mainly with the mint and anise and cummin of conventional politics.

LONDON LETTER.

(From our own Correspondent).

London, December 8.

IRISH PEACE SETTLEMENT.

A prayer of thanks-giving has gone up over practically the whole country at the news of the Irish Peace settlement. During the last few months, ever since the Irish Conference was first mooted, people have been in a state of doubt and uncertainty as to its outcome, but, underlying all doubt, and when uncertainty and anxiety were at their highest, we have never ceased to hope that out of evil might come good, that out of the suffering, the agony, the apparently wasted sacrifice of many generations of men and women of both countries, would come perpetual peace between Celt and Saxon within the British Isles. The horrible savagery of the last eighteen months has been alien to the best in both peoples, and perhaps it was the terrible vision of the worse conditions that might otherwise prevail that obliged both sets of negotiators to determine not to separate without reaching an agreement. That they have done so at last seems an answer to our prayers, and is a splendid tribute to the wonderful patience, the courageous firmness, the self-sacrifice, the devotion, and the sane patriotism of the leaders on both sides, who saw great ideals in jeopardy and sought successfully to save them. This has been no party or factional victory. It is not Britain or Ireland that has triumphed over the other. But each has made a great constructive contribution towards world-peace, and all parties (save perhaps Ulster) have united in prayer and in action to achieve a lasting settlement. Thus has an enmity lasting over seven hundred years been finally overcome. It has, if anything, been a triumph of idealism and of the practical common-sense that comes with a realisation of vital and deep-rooted common interests. Presently, when realisation comes to Ulster, she, too, will take a great part in the development and enterprise of a united Ireland. To-day she sulks and stands aloof: but this attitude cannot last, and Sinn Féin, if wise, will spare no effort to convince Ulster that not in aloofness but in close association with the rest of Ireland lies her future.

" GREATER LONDON."

For some time past, the government of "Greater London" has been under discussion; it being perfectly evident that the anomalous position that has been created by the rapid growth of such a vast city must soon come up for review. The old boundaries have disappeared, the speeding up of the means of transit and the growth of the population have stretched London out on all sides many miles from its original area; but the old governing bodies remain, and the old Acts of Parliament regulating a small city's life are still in force. Authority overlaps authority and there is a tremendous amount of inefficiency and waste that could be, without great difficulty, and ought to be remedied. On December 6, a Royal Commission opened its sittings to inquire into the story of how London is governed and to make recommendations for its better government. The London County Council, one of the principal governing bodies, is submitting to it a draft scheme of reconstruction. The Commission will have a fairly heavy task before it in dealing with the many matters that will be suggested for its consideration. Many of these are of the utmost urgency and cannot be shelved in the easy way so often done by Royal Commissions. The equalisation of rates throughout the whole Metropolitan area is one of those matters that must be dealt with without unnecessary delay, as Poplar's financial difficulties have shown us very clearly, and it is possible, that even before the final findings of the Commission are made known, some adjustment of this nature will have to be made.

MARRIED WOMEN AND PUBLIC SERVICE.

A strong protest is being raised in many quarters against the policy of the Glasgow Corporation and the St. Pancras Borough Council in refusing to employ married women medical officers, whose husbands are also in employment. The St. Pancras Borough Council has been especially irritating in its handling of the matter, as it has dismissed from her position a lady who, for some time past, has been in its employ as maternity doctor, and the sole reason given for her dismissal was the fact that she had married. When she entered into the Council's service, she signed no contract undertaking not to marry whilst in its employment, and no rules have been made by it that marriage on the part of its women officers would be followed by dismissal. Public bodies, like any other employer, are at liberty not to engage women at all, or, if such penalties are sought to be introduced into a contract, the women are at liberty to refuse to sign such a contract or accept such a stipulation. But in such pre-eminently suitable positions as those which maternity work offers, it would be rather difficult to shut women out or insist that only unmarried women should be eligible for appointment to or retention of such posts. The dismissal of an efficient public servant is a source of trial to many more than the believers in equality of opportunity for both sexes, especially since the recent legislation removing the statutory disabilities previously imposed upon women. At the present time, in fact, there seems to be a steady subtle campaign, proceeding with the object of preventing the employment of women workers so as to provide for men. It is perhaps one of the natural consequences of after-war conditions. But these sex-antagonisms are now bound to crop up from time to time. During the war, women showed themselves efficient and capable in many fields of work previously denied to them. They were recognised as most valuable co-workers with men. Now men no longer need their co-operation in those fields of labour, and in many cases resent their continuing to occupy posts they desire for themselves. But women cannot now turn or be turned back, and men must obviously learn to adjust themselves to the new conditions. The cry of making room for the ex-service man, whether efficient or otherwise, is being a bit overdone. So many people are beginning to think.

POVERTY OF THE CLERGY.

Three professions have held places of prior importance in civil life, the Law, Medicine, and the Church. The two former have the advantage of enabling those who practise them to earn or receive incomes varying from that of real poverty to that of affluence. But the clergy are in a different position. Often attached to a poor district or parish, their situation is not happy or an enviable one, and whilst it ma carry with it the aroma of respectability and occasionally of sanctity, it certainly also involves frequently the prospect, and even the certainty, of semi-starvation, for no married curate can live on his stipend. Many pitiful cases come before the public of extreme poverty among the married clergy with families. To remedy these ills, a proposal has been made that ordained laymen be appointed, who would receive certain specialised training and be ordained to officiate in the Church ceremonials, whilst at the same time they will be able to earn their livelihood in secular employment.

EUGENICS.

We used to hear a great deal of talk about eugenics in this country, but Denmark seems to have taken the lead in endeavouring to enforce a good physical standing for its intending marriage-couples. Each party must declare in writing that he or she never suffered from certain diseases, or, alternately submit to examination. Both parties are required to provide medical certificates that they are not subject to epilepsy. Legal separation also is to be more easily granted, the following being good grounds for the same: failure to support, addiction to alcohol, vice or serious disagreements. After 18 months of such separation the King may grant a divorce. Divorces may also be claimed after one party has declined to live with the other for two years or suffered insanity for three years after marriage without reasonable prospect of cure, as well as the other and more universal reasons. All these things are done, so far as possible, to ensure the physical and mental, well-being of the coming generations.

SEX-INSTRUCTION.

Dr. Lyttleton, late Headmaster of Eton gave evidence, a few days ago, before the Birthrate Commission of the National Council of Public Morals, on the question of sex-instruction for male adolescents. He said that the boy undoubtedly required instruction on sex, not only to keep him from trouble, but also because he could not otherwise get a true view of nature and natural law. It was a matter of enlightening the boy when he had a right to be enlightened. His first instruction should be at the age of nine. Then he should be perfectly able to understand the facts of paternity. More, however, ought to be said later about paternity, and that should be at about 12 or 13, assuming that the boy had not heard anything wrong from companions: now-a-days it was astonishing how clean-minded the boys were at preparatory schools. But a great many fathers could not tell their boys properly, and he suggested that the boys of such parents should be informed of these elementary facts of sex-knowledge from pamphlets issued by some authoritative and well-established body. In regard to elder boys, there had, he said, been a great deal of scandalous neglect on the part of headmasters. As a result of his experience, he believed that the right motive to appeal to was simply reverence for the boy's own nature and for his parents.

BIRTHRIGHT OF KENYA INDIANS.

I hear that the despatch of the Governor of Kenya on the result of the discussion of the Colonial Office proposals with the European and Indian settlers is expected shortly in Downing Street. It will not be pleasant reading, I am confident, still less because I learn from excellent sources that the India Office has riddled the proposals with destructive criticism in advance. Mr. Churchill is a brilliant man, but he will display his brilliancy to greater advantage if he does not try to whittle away the spirit and purpose of the Imperial Conference resolution. Equal citizenship implies equal opportunities for closer co-operation among citizens and no equality of disability and differentiation. The Colonial Office proposals are absurd and a mockery of right principles, and Mr. Churchill must not be surprised by the Indian settlers. The Europeans scorn them because they appear to confer some suspicion of equality upon Indians and this the white settlers, with the strong anti-Asiatic bias with which they are possessed, cannot tolerate. "Not even the shadow of equality", is the cry of both sides, but with different implications, of course. I imagine that Mr. Montagu will again get busy on the subject very shortly. In the meantime the utmost patience and moderation on the part of Kenya Indians is bound to carry all before it, for the European position is quite untenable, and so it will be discovered if, and when, the Cabinet comes to decide upon the question.

A SCHEME OF COMPULSORY EDUCATION.

(BY THE HON'BLE MR. G. M. BHURGI.)
EXPENDITURE AND TAXATION.

In my previous articles I have dealt with the questions of the machinery to enforce compulsion, and have suggested a new machinery and arrangement to suit the new circumstances and environments. There remains the financial aspect of the Scheme which is the most important screw on which the whole question hangs.

The Government's revenues at present are barely sufficient to meet its present needs. We are having deficit budgets. And then we are carrying on a crusade, both inside and outside the Government, against Excise Revenue, a very substantial item at present on our bill of fare. It will be no use calling upon the Government to retrench expenditure on other heads to the extent of necessary provision for a complete system of Compulsory Education. No doubt retrenchment is desirable and absolutely necessary in our top-heavy administration, made still heavier with the inauguration of the Reforms. Our Executive Councils require to be cut down to their original size which should also include the ministers of the transferred subjects. Shears must be applied to the post of Assistant Collectors and Deputy Collectors in the Revenue Department. We have in Sindh a new species of Revenue officials known as the Attached Deputy Collectors, and this should be at once abolished. The great waste of money in the Public Works Departments on colossal structures must be put an end to, and large sums spent annually on causeways etc. should be saved. Reform is needed in the Police Department also.

It seems to me that there are more officials than men while it should be vice versa, and much economy should be made in the palatial buildings supplied to them even in remote villages. Finally, the Government High Schools which are like white elephants in places where there are very good private institutions should be done away with, or such of them as may be necessary may be transferred in the areas where they would serve much greater purpose; the present Education Department is also top-heavy and as much reduction as is possible should be made in the personnel and establishments.

One cannot by one stroke of the pen sweep away all that might be unnecessary and superfluous in the administration. These things must take their time and come gradually: whereas the necessity for the adequate provision for the rising generation of a democratic India,—and we might here also remember the fact that all democracies are expensive,—which is in making is immediate. It has been grossly neglected in the past: it would be suicidal to do so any longer. New sources of revenue will therefore have to be tapped for any scheme of universal compulsory education to enable us to set the scheme working. Let us appreciate this fact fully and set ourselves to the task of devising ways and means to do so.

NEW RESOURCES.

In the first place it would be necessary to raise the local cess either on a uniform scale of from one anna to two, or on a sliding scale, according to the assessment, from one anna to two annas to three, and four annas in the case of alienated or rent-free lands and jagirs. The choice of the adoption of the uniform or the sliding scale depends upon as to which would be more productive and less embarrassing to its incumbents. Furthermore I am of opinion that the cess should be levied on all Income tax payers also, who at present are exempt from it, and all incomes other than agricultural, above a certain fixed value which are not taxable under the Income Tax Act. I would further recommend the imposition of Death duties on somewhat the same lines as they exist in England. These like the Super Tax may be on a sliding scale (a further description of these duties is given in the Note on Expenditure and Taxation which I herewith submit,) and should be subject to such revisions as may be necessary from time to time to cover up deficits on the expenditure on account of Compulsory Education.

In addition to the Death duties the following taxes could be imposed without any real hardship to the poor on cinemas, theatres and other entertainments, on races; adoption of sliding scale in the case of the present one Anna Stamp receipts and cheques for cash payments, and last but not least, a kind of duty on all transactions at the Stock Exchange.

SOURCES OF MUNICIPAL TAXATION.

As I have explained in the scheme outlined in reply to questions No. 3 and 4, there would be very little additional burden involved on the Municipalities if the provincial contribution were to be fixed to 2/3rds of the total expenditure. Should they still have to spend something in addition to what they are doing now, the following or any one of the following taxation may be imposed, as the necessity of the case demands:

- (i) Imposition of House Tax on houses of certain fixed value, if there is no such tax already in existence.
- (ii) Imposition of or increment in the wheel-tax.
- (iii) Imposition of octroi duties on articles of luxuries.

I understand that sanction has been withheld from such or any of such of the Municipalities as desired to introduce Compulsory Education in accordance with Mr. Patel's Act, on the ground that provision for additional taxation had not been made; as if the latter must be a necessary precedent for the former, I think I have satisfactorily shown that it is not. In any case I strongly object to the imposition of additional taxation being a necessary condition for compulsion in the Scheme.

NATIONAL SOCIAL CONFERENCE, AHMEDABAD.

MR. NATARAJAN'S PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS.

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen,

I beg to offer you my most sincere thanks for asking me to preside on this occasion, because social reform has been very close to my heart almost ever since I began to take interest in public life. And to-day, I consider that social reform more than anything else is the corner-stone of national progress for many reasons. One of them is that on the social reform platform it is possible for all men irrespective of political opinion, irrespective of race or creed, to meet together, as in this assembly, to discuss questions of national well-being. What is it that makes it possible for all of us to meet on this common platform? In religion, we might have differences, in politics we might have differences, but as regards social reform, which really has for its object the raising of the intellectual, moral and economic status of the average man and woman, there can be no two opinions among us. Politics deals with men in the mass. The object of social reform is to ensure for every one a perfect heredity and a perfect environment.

If you take the history of the social reform movement you will find that it was not started on any academical ideas. The first social reform in British India was the abolition of Sati. It was carried mainly by the efforts of the Government although there was a considerable number of enlightened Indians who supported it.

The first question of social reform which attracted the attention of reformers was that of remarriage of Hindu widows, because the prohibition of remarriage caused considerable hardship to a very large number of child-widows. This social reform was intended to relieve young widows of a certain felt hardship. It was only in the interest of freedom that, as there are in our country widows of very tender ages, liberty should be given to such of them as desired to resume married life. That was the beginning of the social reform movement. As we went further, we found that that the question of remarriage was but a part of the larger whole of the social reform movement. Child marriages were the source of child widows for whose relief chiefly the remarriage movement originated.

It was, therefore, necessary to attack child marriages. This reform was brought to a head by the tragic death of a young wife in Bengal, which led to the raising of the Age of Consent. There was a great agitation when the Government proposed to raise the age from 10 to 12 and there it remains still. Although many cases have not arisen under this law, it has had a great educational value in enabling parents to keep their daughters unmarried for a longer time than before. In these early reforms the greatest obstacle encountered was from women themselves. It was felt that the great lever of social reform, therefore, should be the education of women.

Thanks to the efforts of social reformers, thanks to the general influence of English education, the question of education of women has advanced to such an extent that we find large numbers of girls attending schools and colleges at advanced ages. It is a matter of satisfaction that Western India has played a prominent part in these reforms. It was due to the efforts of men like Cursondas Mnlji, Madhavdas Raghunathdas, Mahipatram Ropram, Lalshankar Umashanker, Parmanand, Ranade, Bhandarkar and Chandavarkar that our presidency has taken a very leading part in the Social Reform movement.

The next question we took up was the question of Temperance. English education has done a great deal of good but unfortunately with it came the habit of drink and for a long time the social reform movement was greatly handicapped by this circumstance. Orthodox people thought that drink and eating of meat was included in social reform. But when we began to organise the social reform movement on rational lines in Madras, we stipulated that every member of the Social Reform Association should declare himself to be a total abstainer. The Social Conference also accepted that principle. I am glad to say that to-day no social reformer is known to be a drinker and not only that but most of our leaders in other movements are also total abstainers. The effect of the anti-nauch and social purity movements which were initiated by social reformers, is also visible in the high standard of personal purity of national leaders at the present day.

In these ways Social Reform has been of the greatest service by raising the level of personal and national life. A nation consists of individuals and when the standard of individuals is raised the standard of the nation is also raised.

Other important questions have since come to the front. The Brahmin non-Brahmin movement in Madras and Maharashtra would not have risen if Social Reform ideas had been accepted by our political leaders. When we started the Madras Social Reform Association thirty years ago some of the men prominent in the non-Brahmin movement at the present day were working with us side by side like brothers. Owing to gross neglect the caste question has now become a political question and unless it is solved satisfactorily national progress is impossible.

Then there is the question of the Depressed classes. The awakening among us to our duty to these classes was largely due to the Christian missionary whose numerous conversions from these classes alarmed Hindu leaders. Lala Lajpat Rai was one of the first workers in this field, and among the more recent workers in this movement may be mentioned Messrs. Shinde, Sohoni, Ranga Rao, and others. The cause of the depressed classes has found a great champion in our revered leader, Mahatma Gandhi, who has made the abolition of untouchability an integral part of his programme. Many people who hailed the Mahatma's political doctrines with enthusiasm fight shy of this part of the programme. But as the Mahatma has said on so many occasions, unless each one of us feels in his heart and soul that to regard some classes of our people as causing pollution by mere contact is a national crime and sin, our hopes of Swaraj must be purely illusory.

Within the last few years there have grown up several institutions of Social Service, such as Seva Samitis, Social Service Leagues and others which have done excellent service in times of famine, epidemics and also on occasions of large pilgrimages. This is a very hopeful movement provided that it does not lead people to believe, as it does in some cases, that Social Service is a substitute for Social Reform. Social Reform demands personal action on the line of one's own conviction, which is very necessary to spread social justice in our relations with our fellow-beings. Social Service, on the other hand, has its origin in compassion and in a sense of social duty. Social Service done in the right spirit, however, is the most potent instrument of Social Reform.

There is one thing, however, with regard to Social Service which should not be lost sight of. It requires special training without which one is likely to do more harm than good. Institutions for such training should be started under experienced men and women. For want of trained people, such work as the reclamation of the criminal tribes, rescue homes and beggars' camps, such as the one recently started in Bombay, are at present in charge of the agents of Salvation Army. By way of practical suggestion, I would say that every family in the land should dedicate at least one member to social and national work so that there may be an ample supply of workers. I thank you very much for the kind hearing you have given me and I only regret that want of time and the state of my voice have prevented me from speaking at greater length.

"INDEPENDENCE"

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I have only recently, on my return from East Africa and Uganda, seen a copy of your reply to my papers on 'Indian Independence'. I wish to thank you for the criticism which you have given to them with such characteristic fairness.

I would not wish to leave unanswered, even at this late date, certain points which you have brought to my notice. In the first instance, you are right in reminding me of a conversation which we had together wherein I emphasised the fact, that in the title, 'The Immediate need of Independence', I had really meant the stress of the adjective 'immediate' to fall on the noun 'need' to which it was attached, but that many readers had taken it along with the noun 'independence' instead. I promised to correct this last impression; but my engagement in East Africa prevented me. In my second series of articles, I thought that I had made my own position more clear. It is as a humanitarian, and not as a politician, that I have been writing all along. I have not dealt with methods and plans, and times and seasons, but rather with principles. Indeed I have stated this position so many times, that I am almost ashamed to state it again. But I find it still necessary.

In your second paragraph, you mention that India has assimilated many foreign elements before, and India can do so again in the case of the British. I entirely agree with you that this assimilation of foreign cultures has been one of the outstanding facts in Indian History. I revolt against practices which would isolate India from the rest of the world. Even the faint suggestion of such a policy has always pained me; because it has hurt something in my inner nature. It was this that made me instinctively protest against the burning of foreign cloth. That hurt me.

But what I do not think you sufficiently realise is this. The real isolation policy today is on the part of the British themselves. They insist on Segregation. In India itself this fact may not be so noticeable as elsewhere. But anyone who has seen with his own eyes the treatment of 'Asiatics' in the British Colonies will understand my meaning. I think that it is clear in my own articles, from first to last, that it was this very segregation policy on the part of the White race that made me choose the title.—"The immediate need of Independence." For wherever I have seen in Africa that segregation treatment meted out to 'Asiatics', I have said to myself that we must immediately react against it. We must not go on for a day longer in such a false position, or let people think that we are acquiescent. Surely Shakespeare was right, when he wrote,—

"Who steals my purse, steals trash;

But he who filches from me my good name
Takes from me that which doth not profit him
Yet leaves me poor indeed."

For nothing really durable can be built upon the foundation of subjection and servility. Thank God, the 'servile' days are very rapidly passing away, owing chiefly to the inspiration of Mahatma Gandhi. Who can doubt it, when thousands are ready to flock daily to the prison doors in order to court imprisonment? Thank God for that wholesome change! But that change itself has come to pass because the British connection itself has been fearlessly challenged in its present form. It has not been due nearly to internal reconstruction.

Your last point is one that leaves considerable doubt in my mind. You say, "No country has achieved independence without foreign help. The United States was helped by France. Italy was helped alternately by England, France and Germany. Greece was helped by England, France and Russia."

This is historically true. But France did not insist on the young American Colonies, as the price of such help, becoming an integral part of a French Empire. Greece and Italy today have their full independence. The true parallels to India are Egypt and the Philippines. The United States gained the Philippines by conquest. Just as Great Britain gained India by conquest. But the United States Government is now actually urging the Philippine leaders to claim and make good their independence, and the 'Jones Law' has ratified and legalised that independence as the immediate end in view, approved of by the United States Government itself. It has not asked the Philippines to become an integral part of the United States Empire. I have still a great faith that my own countrymen will not in the end fall short of that brotherhood and comradeship with which the United States have treated the Philippines; that they will not be behind-hand in willingly allowing India to go out of the Empire and even encouraging her to do so, if it is India's own wish that this should be her own destiny.

This letter is already too long, but I cannot refrain from adding one thought more, which has been occupying my mind constantly of late, as I have seen the wonderful dawn of a new hope for the world in the spirit of the recent Irish Agreement. Today, the whole conception of the British Empire appears to be changing, not in word only, but in actual deed. The following sentences from Lord Haldane, which have just appeared in one of the leading English journals, make me pause and think over the whole problem afresh. He says "the keys of the Empire are not to be found in Downing Street. They are of a spiritual rather than of a material nature; and they are constitutional and not legal. At any moment a Dominion might declare itself an Independent Republic. The security against its doing so consists in its not desiring to do so. There is no reason why it should desire, and if the competence to rule itself is recognised, there is no reason to expect any such desire.....The situation is wholly different from what it was half a century ago."

I know very well indeed with what caution and even suspicion such words must be received if we are not to be led astray. There have been high-sounding phrases without number, whose purpose has been merely to deceive and beguile. I know that fact only too well. But the definite agreement by both Houses of Parliament to an 'Irish Free State' is a solid fact, going far beyond the old idea of Home Rule. Again, the presence of Canadian and Australian ambassadors at Washington is a solid fact. Whether such facts as these will obliterate altogether the difference between Independence and Dominion Status remains yet to be explored. If they do then it is clear that a great deal of my argument concerning 'Independence' becomes open to reconsideration in the light of these new facts. I am carefully thinking out that problem, but have not yet come to any definite conclusion.

Yours faithfully,

Sbantniketan.

JESUS CHRIST AND PRESENT DAY PROBLEMS.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Your first note in the issue of December 25th, is headed Jesus Christ and Present Day Problems. I entirely agree with the sentiment to which you have publicly expressed your own adherence that "the pressing problems of society can be solved only by acting on the principles of Jesus' life and teaching." It is therefore important to be clear what these were. You say that a central doctrine of Christ was "non-resistance to evil." I cannot believe that you really mean this. Christ resisted evil all His life. He resisted evil by flooding the world with new streams of good. He resisted evil by denouncing it. He resisted it by cleansing people's minds and bodies of evil. He never said "Resist not evil" although the 1611 English translation of Matthew 5-39 makes Him appear to have said so. What He did say was "Resist not an evil man," and He said that in reference to revenge for injuries. This precept He illustrated by His practice. What is the motive of this precept and practice? The motive is that we are to shew and feel love to all men, even our enemies. If we do not resist them when they injure us, we take the best means of winning them to love us. When others love us and we, them the difficulties of the world vanish, because we shall mutually seek each other's good. So long as we hate each other and try to revenge ourselves on each other, the world must become more and more miserable.

The general purport of your note was that the national movement in India is an exemplification of the principles of Christ, and therefore "the response of Christian men and nations to the challenge" which this movement throws down "affords a practical test of the faith in the teachings of Jesus Christ". The truth of that sentence again depends on what the teachings of the "Great Nazarene" were.

The only thing which you mention as in common between Him and the Non-co-operators is "non-resistance to evil" which, as I have remarked, was not any principle of His. The only kind of non-resistance that He preached or practised was "non-resistance to evil men", and that was not a principle with Him but a method of shewing love towards enemies. Now, is the non-resistance of the non-co-operators a method of shewing their love towards the bureaucracy and winning the goodwill and co-operation of the British? The real truth is that a man may copy a method which is used by another man without accepting any of his doctrines or imbibing any of his spirit. An illustration will make this clear. Many Hindus copied the Mohammedan method of keeping their ladies in purdah. Does any Mohammedan regard those Hindus as exponents of the spirit of Mohammedanism on that account?

The central principle of Christ is not non-resistance, which is only a method, but active love. By this He knew that the world can be saved, and on this alone can society be built. His authority can never be claimed for the preaching of hatred. Nor can it be claimed for any campaign which aims at sowing discord and suspicion between man and man whether by true and by false accusations. Neither can it be claimed for any agitation for vengeance on those who have inflicted injuries on us.

There is another thing for which the authority of Christ cannot possibly be claimed and that is civil disobedience. It so happened that He was asked this very question. Some Jews said to Him, "Is it lawful to pay tribute to Caesar or not? Shall we give or shall we not give?" (Mark 12, 14). He answered to the questioners asking to show Him one of the coins in which the tribute was paid. When it was produced, He said "Whose is this likeness on the coin, and this name inscribed on it?" They said "Caesar's". Then Jesus answered, "Pay Caesar what is due to God." Here again there is no doubt about the motive of the answer. It is to be found in the fact that Jesus recognised the Roman rulers of Palestine, foreigners though they were, as exercising for the time being a power given by God. His words to Pilate put that beyond doubt. As He stood before that worthless Governor, bleeding and aching from the scourging which Pilate had unjustly caused to be inflicted on Him, He nevertheless told the Governor that the power which he had over Him, was "from above," which was the Jewish way of saying from God.

No one could be less prejudiced in favour of Government than He was at that moment; yet His words imply that the respect due to any Government which aims steadily at preserving the order and peace of a country is the respect due to something of divine origin.

Jesus was not a nationalist. Whenever the fanatical nationalism of the Jews was brought to His notice, He discouraged it. For Himself He would have nothing to do with it. Why? Because He knew that God is equally the Father of all men and made them all to be as brothers, whereas nationalism only too often leads to violent hatreds, to wars and to the refusal of that co-operation which every nation owes to every other.

It is just because the spirit of Christ drives me above nationalism that I can think of men as equal. Because of the same spirit I recognise the right of men to freedom. But with Christ freedom never meant freedom to do anything you like, but freedom to do the right; as when He said "If ye abide in my word, then are ye truly my disciples: and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free."

Mr. Editor, I most heartily agree with you, that the pressing problems of society can be solved only by acting on the principles of Jesus' life and teaching. But the most central principle of that life is the love of God, which alone makes it possible for us to follow the next most central principle, the love of all men.

I am, Sir,
Your constant reader,
Edwin James, Bombay.

THE SALVATION ARMY AND POLITICS.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

Your issue of December 25th has been brought to my notice. I find that in it you make reference to some political propaganda by Commissioner Booth-Tucker in America.

I shall be greatly obliged if you will let me know who your correspondent is, and the source of his information.

You will readily understand that as an Organization we keep clear of all political matters, and we cannot for one moment think that Commissioner Booth-Tucker, who is so devoted to India and its people, would make a statement which would in any way reflect on the Indian character. It appears to me that such an allegation should not have been made without absolute proof of its veracity, and we should therefore be grateful if you would kindly let us know the source of your information, and whether it can be relied upon.

Yours faithfully,
COL. STANLEY EVANS,
Chief Secretary.

[Our correspondent was, as he said, referring to a letter in the Hindu of Madras from an Indian in America. He himself wrote as a friend of the Army and with the desire that its good work in India should not suffer.—Ed. I. S. R.]

A CALL FOR TRUCE.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,
Sir,

The Viceroy has spoken. There is a distinct agreeable change both in the tone and temper, and the position taken up lately in his previous utterances. It has removed the breaking tension put upon the present very grave situation, made graver by the happenings of the past few weeks. It is a happy augury that His Excellency and his Government have realized that there is yet another and a surer means of maintaining law and order and that is by handling the whole situation in a spirit of conciliation and mutual understanding. The idea of a round-table Conference seems to have gone home. We may take it that His Excellency is not only impressed with the idea: he is even ready to take it up. His speech signifies his willingness to accept, so far as his Government is concerned, the necessary conditions preliminary to the Conference and essential for a state of truce. The conditions are embodied in the recommendations of the deputation that waited upon him in this connection. These are that the various notifications and proclamations recently issued by Government would be withdrawn, and all persons imprisoned as the result of their operations immediately released. So far so good. But His Excellency asks that the activities which have led Government to adopt the preventive measures be suspended during the truce. It is clear from the speech that what His Excellency wants is not the resumption of practice by Non-co-operating lawyers; nor the resumption of studies by the non-co-operating students, but 'a calm and serene atmosphere for a Conference'. That implies only a suspension for the period of the truce only, of the propaganda of civil disobedience and boycott, by public meetings, volunteer organisations, picketing, calling up general hartals, and the inauguration of civil disobedience on an organised scale. There is a radical difference between this and the position taken up by Lord Ronaldshay. Lord Ronaldshay demanded not only that hartals should not be called up, but that the leaders ought to prevent all voluntary action on the part of individuals. That is not possible. You cannot prevent anybody who wants to give up his practice, who wants to withdraw his children from a Government school, or who wants to close his shop on a particular occasion. All that I understand His Excellency the Viceroy desires is, that there should be no organised effort on the part of various Khilafat and Congress organisations to encourage either, during the period of the truce.

I trust there would be no difficulty on the part of the leaders of the Non-Co-operation movement in accepting these simple conditions. There is no giving in even by an iota. There is nothing to be lost, but every thing likely to be gained by a Conference. Mahatma Gandhi and all other leaders associated with him, want the settlement of the Khilafat, the Panjab and the Swaraj questions. So do we. The Government have expressed their desire to meet us in a conference for the purpose. Is it not incumbent upon every one of us to put aside all minor considerations and afford all possible facilities to each other for the Conference to materialise? I make a personal appeal to Mahatma Gandhi and every Non-co-operationist leader to accept the suggestion contained in the Viceroy's speech and begin working in that direction.

A CONFERENCE BEFORE THE CONFERENCE.

Mahatma Gandhi has already signified his assent to meet the leaders of various shades of opinion in a Conference. It is imperative that this Conference should come off before the round table Conference with the Government does. After all, are not all of us whether Non-co-operators or not, working for the same goal, the same common good? Is it then really altogether impossible for us to come to a common understanding, a common agreement by which to stand or fall together. In any case let us meet, and meet at once, and put our heads together. The Conference will be one step in the right direction—a signal to a common understanding and common agreement. May it not lead to the desired end as a result of its deliberations. I hope and trust it will.

G. M. BHUAGEL

A SELF-DEFENCE LEAGUE FOR MALABAR.

THE SERIOUSNESS OF THE MOPLAH OUTBREAK.

The Moplah rebellion has been raging in Malabar for nearly four months. The rebels have committed all imaginable crimes and atrocities on the lives and properties of persons living in the disturbed area. All Hindu property has been looted; the hard-earned savings of generations have disappeared; men, women and children have been driven out to lead a life of misery and destitution in distant places or pitilessly butchered. Many persons have been dishonoured and forcibly converted to Islam. The outside public is still unaware of the extent of the destruction wrought by the fanatics. They are not able to realise the danger that threatens the future of the Non-Mahomedan communities in this district. But it behoves us—persons who have been living in the very midst of the disturbance and who have witnessed this dire calamity with our own eyes—to reflect seriously on how the sufferers from this catastrophe may have justice done to them and how such catastrophes may be prevented in time to come.

RACIAL DETERIORATION OF THE MALAYALEE.

The Malayalee, particularly the Nairs, are supposed to be a warlike race. Yet except in a few solitary instances they have displayed an incredible amount of cowardice. If one-tenth of the men who ran away from the Moplahs had stood fast and united together, the rebellion would have been quelled in three days or perhaps there would have been no rebellion at all. The Malayalee Hindu has undergone a terrible amount of racial deterioration. Until some radical steps are taken he will, even after the rebellion is over, find it difficult to live with self-respect in the midst of a Moplah population which is now glorying in the terror it has inspired in the Hindu community. Hindu houses have been looted; Hindu women have been ravished; Hindu children have been butchered; and how has the far-famed Nair spirit responded to all this? By running away. It is an indelible disgrace. Is it not high time for the Malayalee Hindus to take steps to assert their manhood. Otherwise their extinction as a race is certain.

FREEDOM OF CONSCIENCE DENIED TO THE HINDUS OF MALABAR.

A large number of Hindu men and women have been compelled at the point of the sword to embrace Islam. Even after the peace is restored they will be afraid to go back to the Hindu fold for fear of Moplah vengeance. Does this not also show the utter loss of manhood that has overtaken the Hindu? In this 20th century, living under a government which assures to all freedom of conscience, if the Hindus are afraid to profess their ancestral faith for fear of a handful of Moplahs, what opinion is the world to form of their self-respect and of their manliness? Either this race should by some means be reinvigorated or it should cease to encumber the earth. To continue to live in thralldom to the Moplah is a disgrace to their ancestors which no self-respecting soul can brook.

HINDUS REDUCED TO SECURARY.

Practically all movable Hindu property in the disturbed areas is now in the hands of the Moplahs. Is there any chance of it being restored to the owners? If immediate steps are not taken to prevent the recurrence of such outbreaks, the Moplahs will rise again within two or three years to loot once more what little the Hindus might have acquired by patient industry in the interval. The lesson that the Moplah has learnt from the present rebellion is that rebellion is a profitable commercial speculation. And if this conviction takes firm hold of the Moplah's mind what hope is there of future peace? Some investigations are now being made at Calicut and a few other centres to find out the losses suffered by the refugees. The result of such inquiries must necessarily be fragmentary. There is little chance of all the sufferers getting a hearing. Unless an efficient, impartial and representative committee appointed by the Government conducts inquiries in amsom after amsom in the affected Taluks it is very improbable that all the sufferers will ever get justice.

DEFENSIVE MEASURES.

If therefore Non-Mahomedans are to live in Malabar after the rebellion in the same manner as they were doing hitherto, the work of social and economic reconstruction must be taken up at once.

(a) The causes that have contributed to the weakness of Hindus in the past must be inquired into and removed. Foremost among these causes stands the rigidity of the caste system. If one section of the Hindu community refuses to touch or even to approach another section how can they show a united front to the common enemy? Therefore an earnest and whole-hearted attempt must be made to grant such concessions to the so-called lower castes, as will make union possible.* An instance of the disorganised state of Hindu society is the preference generally shown by Hindu landlords to Mahomedan tenants. These landlords have now learnt a bitter lesson and it is hoped that they will not forget it in a hurry.

(b) Immediate steps must be taken to see that the losses are fully paid up. The Government must be made to appoint a commission of inquiry to go from amsom to amsom in all the rebellious taluks and make an estimate of the losses suffered by Hindus, Europeans, Indian Christians and loyal Mahomedans and full compensation must be given to the sufferers. The rebels must be made to disgorge their loot.

(c) All Hindu boys and young men must be taught how to defend themselves by undergoing training in kalames of the old type and organisations like the Indian Defence Force must be formed in each village to facilitate united action.

(d) A stable organisation must be formed to achieve the objects and generally to watch over the interests of the non-Moplah community.

6. The work described above is of great magnitude but it is not impossible of achievement, at this time when all the members of the Hindu community have been more or less awakened by the terrible experiences they have passed through, to the urgent necessity for some kind of defensive reorganisation. It will require the wholehearted work of many men working with religious devotion for racial regeneration. This rough outline of the aims of the proposed organisation is now published for the information of the public so that gentlemen who have the well-being of Malabar at heart may help us with their suggestions. Such suggestions may be made publicly through the columns of the press or may be sent privately to the undersigned. We shall also be glad to receive offers of help from gentlemen who are in a position to establish self-defence organisations in their villages. We appeal to all Malaysians to extend to this scheme their sympathy and support and we invite them to correspond with us on the matter. After receiving the suggestions and criticisms of the public a meeting will be convened for formally starting work.

18-12-21.

K. APPU MENON.
E. RAMAN MENON.

NOTE—All correspondence should be addressed to E. Raman Menon, Secretary, Depressed Classes Mission, Calicut—Kallai.

* This will be a rather hard pill to swallow to many even of the sufferers. But severe diseases require painful operations. The following remarks by a writer in the "Malabar Journal" of 14-12-21 in an article on 'Reconstruction' may be of interest in this connection: "All the artificial social barriers of castes and sub-castes should be removed and the temples should be thrown open to all Hindus. The forcibly converted men and women should be restored to their original status in the community and the Hindus should feel that the whole community has fallen on account of the dishonour of their outraged women and the stigma should be borne by the Hindu community as a whole collectively and not by the victims individually. The orthodox Hindu who objects to such organisation on the authority of the vedas and Sastras may be left alone to himself to learn the texts of Koran in his own turn and to modify his views in the light of their teachings."

THE CONGRESS RESOLUTIONS.

The following is the full text of the resolutions as finally passed by the All-India Congress Committee:—

Whereas, since the holding of the last National Congress the people of India have found from actual experience that by reason of the adoption of non-violent non-co-operation the country has made a great advance in fearlessness, self-sacrifice and self-respect, and whereas the movement has greatly damaged the prestige of the Government, and whereas on the whole the country is rapidly progressing towards Swaraj, this Congress confirms the resolution adopted at the special session of the Congress at Calcutta and reaffirmed at Nagpur and places on record the fixed determination of the Congress to continue the programme of non-violent non-co-operation with greater vigour than hitherto, in such a manner as each province may determine, till the Punjab and the Khilafat wrongs are redressed and Swaraj is established, and the control of the Government of India passes into the hands of the people from that of an irresponsible corporation.

Whereas, by reason of the threat uttered by His Excellency the Viceroy in his recent speeches and the consequent repression started by the Government of India in the various provinces by way of disbandment of the volunteer corps and forcible prohibition of public and even committee meetings in an illegal and high-handed manner and by the arrest of many Congress workers in several provinces, and whereas this repression is manifestly intended to stifle all the Congress and Khilafat activities and deprive the public of their assistance, this Congress resolves that all activities of the Congress be suspended, as far as necessary, and appeals to all quietly and without any demonstration to offer themselves for arrest by belonging to the volunteer organisations, to be formed throughout the country in terms of the resolution of the Working Committee arrived at in Bombay on the 23rd day of November last, provided that no one shall be accepted as a volunteer, who does not sign the following pledge:

"With God as witness, I solemnly declare that (1) I wish to be a member of the National Volunteer Corps, (2) So long as I shall remain a member of the corps, I shall remain non-violent in word and deed, and shall earnestly endeavour to be non-violent in intent, since, I believe, that as India is circumstanced non-violence alone can help the Khilafat and the Punjab and result in the attainment of Swaraj and the consolidation of unity among all the races and communities of India, whether Hindu, Musalman, Sikh, Parsi, Christian or Jew. (3) I believe in and shall endeavour always to promote such unity. (4) I believe in Swadeshi as essential for India's economic, political and moral salvation and shall use handspun and handwoven khaddar to the exclusion of every other cloth. (5) As a Hindu, I believe the justice and necessity of removing the veil of untouchability and shall on all possible occasions seek personal contact with and endeavour to render service to the submerged classes. (6) I shall carry out the instructions of my superior officers and all the regulations, not inconsistent with the spirit of this pledge, prescribed by the volunteer boards or the working committee or any other agency established by the Congress. (7) I am prepared to suffer imprisonment, assault or even death, for the sake of my religion and my country without resentment. (8) In the event of my imprisonment, I shall not claim from the Congress any support for my family or dependents."

This Congress trusts that every person of the age of 18 and over will immediately join the volunteer organisations, notwithstanding the proclamation prohibiting public meetings, and inasmuch as even committee meetings have been attempted to be construed as public meetings, this Congress advises the holding of committee meetings and of public meetings, the latter in closed places and by tickets and by previous announcements, at which, as far as possible, only a speaker previously announced shall deliver written speeches, care being taken in every case to avoid the risk of provocation and possible violence by the public in consequence.

This Congress is further of opinion that civil disobedience is the only civilised and effective substitute for an armed rebellion, whenever every other remedy for preventing arbitrary tyrannical and emasculating use of authority by individuals or corporations has been tried, and therefore advises all Congress workers and others who believe in peaceful methods and are convinced that there is no remedy, save some kind of sacrifice to dislodge the existing Government from its position of perfect irresponsibility to the people of India, to organise individual civil disobedience and massed, when the mass of the people have been sufficiently trained in the methods of non-violence, and otherwise, in terms of the resolution therein of the last meeting of the All-India Congress Committee, held at Delhi.

This Congress is of opinion that in order to concentrate attention upon civil disobedience, whether mass or individual (whether of an offensive or defensive character) under proper safeguards and under instructions to be issued from time to time by the Working Committee or the Provincial Congress Committee concerned, all other Congress activities should be suspended, whenever and wherever and to the extent to which it may be found necessary.

This Congress calls upon all students of the age of 18 and over, particularly those studying in the national institutions and the staff thereof immediately to sign the foregoing pledge and become members of the National Volunteer Corps.

In view of the impending arrest of a large number of Congress workers, this Congress, whilst requiring the ordinary machinery to remain intact and to be utilised in the ordinary manner, whenever feasible, hereby appoints, until further instruction, Mahatma Gandhi as the sole executive authority of Congress, and invests him with the full powers of the All India Congress Committee, including the power to convene a special session of the Congress, or of the All-India Congress Committee or the Working Committee, and also with the power to appoint a successor in an emergency.

This Congress hereby confers upon the said successor and all subsequent successors appointed in turn by their predecessors all his aforesaid powers, provided that nothing in this resolution shall be deemed to authorise Mahatma Gandhi or any of the aforesaid successors to conclude any terms of peace with the Government of India or the British Government without the previous sanction of the All-India Congress Committee to be finally ratified by the Congress, specially convened for the purpose, (and provided also that the present creed of the Congress shall in no case be altered by Mahatma Gandhi or his successors, except with the leave of the Congress first obtained.)

This Congress congratulates all those patriots who are now undergoing imprisonment for the sake of their conscience or country and realises that their sacrifice has considerably hastened the advent of Swaraj.

RELIGION AND POLITICS.

(The Indian Messenger, Calcutta.)

What will the reader expect from us—It seems the "Indian Messenger" has again been able to force itself upon the attention of its readers. Anyhow we are being pestered with questions and suggestions as to its policy about political matters. The first suggestion is that a religious and social organ like ours should eschew politics. This is plainly impossible. It is difficult to chalk out the frontier line between the one and the other. No religion however high its ideal may be, can satisfy the cravings of the heart if it keeps silent over questions affecting the vital welfare of a nation or a society and moreover the religion which shirks from the fighting line—the religion which cannot guide its followers in every department of life is not worth the name. Then can one say where society ends and politics begins? Is social freedom possible without the political? And what Church organ is free from politics? The Christian World, the Christian Register, the Inquirer, the Vedic Magazine, and innumerable others—they have all got politics as their important factor. Then the second suggestion is if we want to deal with politics we should be moderate. The third again is that we should be extremist and the fourth is that we should be non-co-operationist in our views. Well, we say to all of them—we are not going to cater for anybody's individual taste. We will give them truth and nothing but truth. We know it is very difficult to do. But still we must do what is difficult. We may fail but God knows our intentions and He in His mercy will pardon us. Some say we should have recourse to diplomacy. We are tempted to ask this class of our friends, "why did we come over to Brahmoism leaving the snug and cosy corner of the Hindu society?" Was it for Truth or for comfort and security? When we come in touch with these people one thought irresistibly disturbs us. Alas! how far down are we fallen from the Fathers of our Church! Rammohan thou shouldst be living at this hour! We have need of thee! A stern lover of freedom he did not divide politics, religion and society into watertight compartments. The indomitable soul that sought enfranchisement in religion also broke the thousand years old iron shackles of society and rejoiced over the freedom of nations in bondage. Even Sivanath whose ashes are yet warm, is dead to us. Have we not forgotten by this time his famous saying?—

"What I shall know as duty I shall do fearlessly. I don't care if my wealth, honour and life perished in doing it".

If there be any need of policy of the present paper it should be commensurate with the creed of the Brahmo Samaj. Truth, Knowledge, and Good should be our watchword. In unequivocal language we shall hold them before our constituents. In this we shall always remember that great saying: "I will be as harsh as truth, and as uncompromising as justice. I am in earnest—I will not equivocate—I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch—and I Will be heard."

The Social Conference like the Congress ought to have Provincial and District and if possible Subdivisional committees which will propagate the ideas among the masses. An All-India fund should be raised and sympathetic but earnest and self-sacrificing workers should be appointed, and already existing social serving bodies should be subsidized. These bodies and workers should be made responsible to the Provincial bodies which will watch and guide the activities of the former. If this can be done, something surely can be achieved. Time has come when we should cease talking and plunge head-long into work.

THE ROYAL YAKUTI.

THE YAKUTI or life giving nectar has been prepared from
the best, choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has wonderful properties of increasing virile power and it rectifies urinary disorders. In fact it makes man a man. This valuable
medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and
gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to those persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen
the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility.
Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicines. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires. It is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills. Rupees ten only.

NOTES.

—:01—

An American View: We call attention to the article headed an "American Missionary's view of the Situation" which we publish to-day. The writer, whose goodwill towards India is evident, seemed to feel that he was asking us to do a risky thing in sending us his communication for publication. We may assure him that absolutely no courage was needed to give our readers the opportunity of perusing his interesting observations. While all will agree that reason and argument are most desirable means, few, we think, will appreciate the appositeness of some of his illustrations. For instance, it may occur to many that the Englishwoman is likely to know best what the Englishman's peculiarities are, as the American woman knows best what the best way of approaching the American man is. As for the American revolution, the distinction that he draws between George III and the British nation is too fine for us; and, in any case, we have not had anything like the "Boston tea-cup" in Bombay harbour. We are unable to accept the idiosyncracies of Englishmen and Americans as ultimate facts to which all other peoples should accommodate themselves or—go to the wall. It is as well to recognise that Indian politics has passed that stage.

The Bishop's Letter: With reference to the two letters that we print to-day headed "Jesus Christ and Present Day Problems," in reply to the letter of the Bishop of Bombay in last week's issue, we may say that both Mr. Zacharias and Mr. Parekh are Christians belonging to the Church of England. The following excerpt from an editorial note in the Christian Missionary journal, the Dnyanodaya, has some bearing on this topic:

If only Mr. Gandhi will eliminate all destructive items from his creed, and concentrate upon constructive items such as this one (abolition of untouchability), he can lead a fifth of the world's population to one of the grandest and most peaceful revolutions in history. It is one of our deep convictions that, despite the law-breaking he proposes—a feature which every true Christian can only condemn—Mr. Gandhi is being used by Divine Providence for the purification of India's religious life and as an agent preparing India for Christ, just as clearly as were the Old Testament prophets in Israel. Anyone whose sleep may be disturbed by worrying about 'the catastrophic preening of Gandhism' may well be recommended to remember how the Brahmins of India fear this growing campaign on behalf of India's fifty or sixty million untouchables. Everything in India is invested with religious values and that is why India's political evolution is a slow and sure factor helping to effect her religious revolution, for if Mr. Gandhi remains 'dictator' for ten years, caste will have to go, or will have gone.

The Prince in Calcutta: According to the Indica Messenger of Calcutta, the visit of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales to that city was a notable personal success. The shops and bazars of Calcutta were almost entirely closed on the 24th but a fairly large number of people went out to see the Prince. His Royal Highness's personality seems to have won over the people's sympathy in a large measure for, says our contemporary, while on the first day the crowd was, even according to most optimistic calculations, moderate, it grew considerably in size and enthusiasm as the day passed on.

The Library Movement in Baroda: Baroda has made such splendid progress with its Library movement that we do not think there is any other State or province which approaches it. We are, therefore, pleased to get the excellent "Handbook" compiled by Mr. Newton M. Dutt, the enthusiastic Curator of the Libraries of the State, which gives a full and detailed account of the Library scheme in Baroda and the districts. The Book will be a valuable guide to similar efforts elsewhere in India.

The late Mr. Ardesir Framjee Vakil: By the death of Mr. Ardesir Framji Vakil, Bombay loses one of her most cultured sons who was also a pioneer in the field of social reform, especially the higher education of women. In these days, the art of conversation is a dead one, but the late Mr. Ardesir was one of the few whose conversation was as interesting as it was edifying. He represented a type which is not very common among Indians and especially among Parsis at the present day.

Why Bombay? As regards the proposed Conference, it is being suggested that it should be held not in Bombay but in Delhi. This shows a misconception of the purpose for which the Conference is called. That purpose will be best served in a place of meeting which has so far remained out of the circle in which the repressive measures complained of have been put in force. There are other reasons too, but this, to our mind, is conclusive.

Veerasingam Memorial Hall: We are glad to learn that the laying of the foundation stone of the Veeresalingam Memorial Hall in the Brahmo Samaj premises, Bangalore Cantonment, will take place on Sunday, the 8th instant. Sir M. Kantaraj Urs, K. C. I. E., C. S. I., Dewan of Mysore, has kindly consented to lay the stone.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, JANUARY 8, 1922.

THE CONFERENCE.

We print in another column the letter of invitation for the Conference to be held on the 14th instant in Bombay. It clearly sets forth the purpose for which the Conference is being called. The Ahmedabad Congress by rejecting the proposals to adopt separation from the British connection as its objective and to drop the insistence on the peaceful character of its means, has shown that it does not regard the political situation as having transcended the limits of settlement by agreement. Nevertheless it has lent its countenance to civil disobedience, though hedged in with qualifications which, if strictly enforced, will militate against its adoption on any considerable scale. The very idea of civil obedience, however, is one from which every thinking man would shrink with horror. In plain words, it means civil war. Loss of life and property, stagnation of trade and industry, are concomitants of all war. But civil war, in addition, involves the disruption of ties of fellow-citizenship, and its after-effects are worse and take longer to heal than those of war between two nations. France recovered from the effects of the Prussian war in about thirty years, but the wounds inflicted by the Wars of the Roses on England were not healed in a hundred years. Those who are calling the Conference feel that any sacrifice, short of national self-respect and honour, will not be too high a price to pay in order to avert civil war which at present must be the inevitable outcome of civil disobedience. As a fact, the country already suffers from the general dislocation incidental to civil war to a considerable extent. Everybody is anxiously watching the further development of the situation, with the result that practically all public activities, except the political, are in a state of suspended animation. We are sure that Mahatma Gandhi feels this and the fact that he has readily agreed to join the Conference shows that he too will be delighted if an honorable settlement of the differences between Government and the people can be brought about by some better means. The Conference has for its main object to find out if there is any better means of attaining this end, and if so, what.

The letter of invitation has been criticised for stating that the wholesale arrests and imprisonments of recent weeks, under repressive laws which awaited scrapping, are the great difficulty in the way of finding an alternative method. It has been said that, if Government and the people ought to strain every nerve to arrest civil disobedience, it is inconsistent to condemn this means which Government have adopted with that view. The answer to that is given by the resolution of the Liberal Federation held in Allahabad last week, which says that this policy has defeated its own end by alienating popular sympathy and aggravating the general unrest. A policy of which this can be said with truth, is obviously not a right policy, apart from its justice. It is a blunder worse than a crime from the point of view of the prestige of Government. It is also unjust. If persons against whom intimidation or violence was proved had been imprisoned, no one would have complained of repression. A number of persons concerned in the Bombay riots of November last, are being prosecuted and punished, and no one says this is repression. What all sections of Indian opinion complain of is the proclamation of the whole organisation of voluntary workers for the Congress as illegal and sending them to jail merely because they do not abide by this proclamation. Hundreds have been arrested and imprisoned for no other offence than that they belonged to this organisation. Many of them are men of high character and held in great respect by the people. When a Government finds itself antagonising any considerable number of men of character formed in the fire self-sacrifice in the public cause, it would be wise to consider whether, after all, all is right with itself. A great opportunity is now open to Government, and if they grasp it, they will greatly facilitate the work of the Conference. Even if they still believe their policy is right, they would be improving their own position enormously, and placing a corresponding responsibility on Indian leaders, by withdrawing, in deference to their almost unanimous opinion, the recent repressive measures. They may well say: "We are still of the opinion that we have no alternative but to go on with these measures. But we recognise your good intentions and your earnest desire to effect an honourable settlement, and we wish you success. As an earnest of our good wishes, we shall remove what you describe as the great difficulty from your path." It is easy to see how greatly Government will be strengthening their position by adopting this attitude. We are not without hope that they may do so.

It is likewise to be expected that Mahatma Gandhi, who has been constituted the sole executive authority of the Congress for emergency purposes, will help on the work of the Conference by suspending all action likely to embarrass the calm and unbiassed investigation of all possible methods of reaching an honourable settlement. A section of Congress workers is doubtful whether it would not have been the better course in the interests of the country to have fallen in with the Viceroy's call for a truce as a preliminary to a Round Table Conference. Here, however, there is no question of conditions, but a free, voluntary suspension in deference to the desire of the large marginal class of Indians who, while keenly alive to the national grievances and the need for an immediate settlement, dread the contingency of civil war involved in the practice of civil disobedience at this stage of Indian evolution. Many persons are asking what the Conference will do. It is impossible to forecast its decisions, but they will, we trust, be such as to commend themselves to all sections of our countrymen and the world at large as inspired by principles which are essentially right and righteous. It is pretty clear to all careful students of the political situation that the real difficulty now is not that the Government of India have not the will but that they have not the power to meet us. This difficulty can be overcome, and can only be overcome, if the Government of India are able to say to the authorities above them that such and such represent the united sentiments of the Indian people and that they, as responsible for the Indian Government, must press for an early and substantial compliance in the interests of India as an equal member of the British Commonwealth of nations. This proposed Conference is one step, perhaps, the first step, towards bringing about such a unity of sentiment. It has, therefore, a clear claim on the goodwill of all sections of political opinion as well as of Government, and we hope and trust that it will be extended to it in full measure. If the Conference succeeds, the country will be the great gainer. If it does not succeed, nobody will be responsible for its lack of success except those who have convened it.

LONDON LETTER.

(From our own Correspondent).
RELIGIOUS REVIVAL IN SCOTLAND.

London, December.

Students of psychology are having quite an interesting time in watching, and trying to account for, the fever of religious revival that has fastened upon the North and East of Scotland. It almost seems as though the mind is subject to epidemics even as the body is, and just as the fever conditions of the body bring about sick conditions of the mind, so the fever conditions of mind bring about sick bodies. The beginnings of religious revivals are, as a rule, rather difficult to trace, for they often seem to spring spontaneously into life fully grown and active and as suddenly lose all momentum and pass away. The present one, however, seems to be traced to an intensive mission that had been conducted in some of the large fishing places off the coast of England, and unlike many of its predecessors, is a very serious one. In some places the lives of the people have been so affected that the whole of the normal life is suspended, the people having given themselves over entirely to religious manifestations. Everything of a worldly nature is being ruthlessly put aside. At one place, where there are a thousand converts, a huge pile of tobacco pouches, pipes, playing cards, dancing shoes and such like implements of pleasure, has been made in front of the organ in the Mission Hall and these are to be given a glorious bonfire. People are to be seen kneeling in prayer on the cold wind-swept beach. Even the children have ceased to play and are found gathering together in little circles praying and singing hymns. All this mental excitement has made work for the doctors. Already some people have had to be removed to mental hospitals, and very many cases of illness, due to nervous excitement, are under medical treatment. As the fever shows no signs of abating, the doctors are getting a little anxious.

ABATEMENT OF SMOKE AND NOXIOUS VAPOURS.

The final report of Lord Newton's Committee on Smoke and Noxious Vapours Abatement has been made and it brings home to the uninitiated how important has been the work of this Committee. At the present time our atmosphere is charged with fine particles of soot and waste fuel and our lungs and nostrils are accordingly irritated and injured. Since we exist as a manufacturing people chiefly, and our climate is such that domestic heating is a necessity, we must devise some means by which we can keep the things we need, but destroy that which is injurious. Two members of the Committee in the course of inquiries visited the principal industrial towns of Germany and reported on their return that smoke pollution is very much less there than here. One reason for this is that Germany's industrial life is of more recent growth than ours, and her factories are equipped with more modern smoke-consuming appliances, but the other and greater reason is that there has been an intelligent co-operation of all parties, both in the interest of economical and effective use of coal and also the general amenity of life. Waste of fuel alone in this country is a serious consideration. It is estimated that about £6,000,000 is lost in waste annually from domestic and industrial chimneys. The Committee has made several recommendations and it is to be hoped that some of the existing legislation that the war more or less kept in abeyance, will be enforced. Certainly, gas and electricity for domestic use will be more and more strongly advocated, and new housing schemes will have to consider smokeless ways of heating generally.

GERMAN ALCHEMY.

A great deal of fuss is being made by the reported discovery on the part of a German chemist of the manufacture of gold out of baser metals by means of an electric vacuum furnace. All scientists seem to admit the possibility of this being done and further seem to believe that in the not very distant future gold will cease to be a precious metal. But ere that time comes we shall probably have other means of exchange value ready at hand. The anxious note struck by the press at the present moment by Germany's possibility to manufacture gold is that, should she be able to do so, she could pay her debt laughingly, and flood the world with manufactured metal. In fact, Germany could become rich beyond dreams while other countries remained struggling in poverty.

MATERNITY AND CHILD WELFARE.

Municipal clinics have met in conference and have put forward resolutions which have been passed by a conference of the British Medical Association and Medical Officers of Health, the first of these being "that the object of maternity and child welfare centres should be educational, preventive and advisory. No medical treatment should be given at the centres as it is against the best interests of the centres that women should go for what they can get, rather than what they can learn." The value of the foregoing resolution is in the fact that it is recognised that the people themselves must be trained in the laws governing good health, and that in proportion as knowledge in this direction grows, so will many of the ills common to ignorant humanity disappear.

CENSORING OF FILMS.

The London County Council made an important decision yesterday, when it decreed that licences are to be granted to picture palaces in London on the following conditions:—

“No film shall be displayed which is likely to be subversive of morality;

No film (other than photographs of current events) that has not been passed for ‘universal’ or ‘public exhibition’ by the British Board of Film Censors shall be shown without the express consent of the L. C. C.”

“Films passed for ‘public’ exhibition shall be exhibited only to adults, and no child not accompanied by parents or bonafide guardians shall be admitted” (child being defined as a person under 16 years of age). We have not yet heard what the public and cinema owners have to say to the action of the L. C. C. It will probably be resented by very many people as being an attack on liberty. But for a long time past there has been an agitation on foot for a much stricter censorship of films than has hitherto been the case. Many outrageous acts of quite young people have been traced to cinema visits. Children are notorious mimics, and anything that makes a strong impression upon the plastic matter of the young mind is apt to be reproduced in some form by them.

ASIATIC MIGRATION.

Among the problems fit for discussion by the Washington Conference is that urged upon its attention by Dr. Ritter, Director of the Scripps Institute for Biological Research, California, namely preparation for the study of the world's population, fifty-four per cent. of which, he reminds us, lives in the Indo-Pacific area, on about 25 per cent. of the earth's land surface, and the remaining 46 per cent. lives in the Atlantic area, on about 75 per cent. of the earth's land surface. “From the density of the Asiatic population, from the type of their culture, from the higher standards of living, and the facility of communication and travel, the tendencies of these people to overflow into all the meagrely populated lands of the Indo-Pacific area, which are similar to those they have been accustomed to for a score of centuries, is bound to be tremendous. These facts, coupled with the fact that no more vacant or heathen lands remain for their migration, and with the fact that both the Orientals and the Occidentals primarily concerned are highly but differently civilised, a momentous truth gradually takes shape in our minds that the instinct of self-preservation is here developing a problem, some of the elements of which have never before confronted mankind.” If such problems as these are carefully studied, and their implications are honestly accepted, there is an increased probability of peaceful relations and the removal of misapprehensions and suspicions between the nations and races concerned. In their own way, Sir Valentine Chirol and Lord Chelmsford have lately pointed to the same facts and the urgent need for their thorough study and understanding.

INDIAN EMIGRANTS.

It is a little difficult for some of us here to understand why, when it is found impossible to secure adequate supervision of the welfare of the Indian emigrants to Assam, which is within the Indian Empire, to Ceylon, which is next door, and to Malaya, which is not far away, Indian public opinion contemplates the possibility of sending emigrants to British Guiana, were the Government of India cannot exercise any control, and where the emigrants will be so far away that, with insufficient means of direct communication with India, it will be extraordinarily difficult for dissatisfied emigrants to return to the Motherland, and will tend, therefore, to sink into the depressed classes of the Colony. However, it is encouraging to note that the two Indian members of the delegation that is to proceed to British Guiana, about the middle of January, are two such shrewd and experienced public men as Dewan Bahadur P. Kesava Pillai, who is the chairman, and Mr. Tiwari, of the United Provinces branch of the Servants of India Society. It may be assumed that they will keep their eyes carefully open and will analyse the so-called colonisation scheme with considered judgment.

GENERAL SMUTS' COUNSEL.

The British Guiana Government are spreading their net afar, for they are trying to capture the dissatisfied coolies of Fiji—which, in itself, clearly indicates the real nature of the colonisation scheme—as well as in South Africa. It appears that lately the Natal Indian Congress has been formally approached by the Union Government with a view to sending a delegation to British Guiana to report on the scheme so as to induce Natal Indians to go there and surrender their Natal rights. It is on a par with the recent repatriation scheme that has resulted so disastrously for a number of South African Indians. General Smuts seems to have been tackled by the Natal Branch of the South African Party on the Indian question, for at its Congress at Maritzburg, on the 20th instant, he warned his hearers not to push the Indian question too far, as to do so might have repercussions that might be felt far outside even the Empire and might exert an influence that might even shake the Empire's foundations. He counselled the Indians to avoid trying for a settlement which might do them no good and the Empire incalculable harm. He warned people not to exaggerate the seriousness of the Indian question, and admitted that the Whites were more than holding their own. Finally, he is reported to have said that the best thing they could do was to induce the Indians in ever-increasing numbers to leave South Africa and go back to their own country, a solution that he felt to be fundamentally sound. After the repatriation experience and the recent approaches with regard to British Guiana, Indians will do well to be on the watch as to the new methods that will be devised to “induce” them to leave South Africa and go elsewhere. The fact is that the South African Indians will have all their work cut out, not to achieve a settlement, but to retain the few rights that they still possess. The “Freezing-out” process seems to be pretty effectual.

EXPENDITURE AND TAXATION.

It is very desirable that under a scheme of Compulsory Education, Government should contribute a fixed portion of the total expenditure on Primary Education necessary in each "school district" from time to time. The portion should be two-thirds of the total expenditure. Government should not grudge this little additional burden in the matter of the introduction of Compulsory Education in the Presidency. If one were to calculate the proportional rise in various heads of expenditure whether provincial or imperial, and compare it with the rise in the expenditure on the promotion of Primary Education,—and for that matter the whole head of Education,—the latter would be negligible in comparison, and would reflect little credit on the British Rule in India, especially if one were to further compare the negligible progress made in this country in the last decade with the long strides taken by some of the foreign countries more backward comparatively than this country then. One's blood curdles when one contemplates the deliberate connivance, indifference and negligence of the past Governments of this country in this matter, on the plea of "no funds."

The average expenditure per annum per head to-day on elementary education in the case of boys is about Rs. 12. It was Rs. 9-3 in 1916-17; Rs. 9-6 in 1917-18; Rs. 10-9 in 1918-19 and a little less than Rs. 12 in 1919-20.* It must be remembered that the average attendance per school is much less than the maximum average capacity of a school; it is a little over fifty while taking an average of 20 boys per class, or 80 boys per school under the Compulsory Scheme without much additional expense, the average expenditure per head is bound to come down appreciably. Add to this the provision of a double shift system which alone should be able to reduce the expenditure per head if not by $\frac{1}{2}$, at least $\frac{1}{3}$ rd or $\frac{1}{4}$ th. I, however assume that all the saving thus effected would be utilized in carrying out various improvements necessary for a free and compulsory scheme and which I have suggested, e. g. remission of existing fees (about 5 lacs); additional cost on inspection about 3 lacs; training of teachers about 5 lacs; supply of free books and materials; and enhancement of salaries providing more public buildings for schools; and with the advent of time carrying out further improvements such as provision of reading rooms and libraries in every town and village etc., etc., for which a Reserve Fund may be built from the very start. The average cost per head in the Municipal areas is greater than the average in the rural areas. A portion of the savings will thus have to be utilized on adjustment, if the average is fixed at Rs. 12 even with greater numbers of pupils in rural areas. The average cost per head in the case of girls to-day is Rs. 17. Double the present number could at once be provided without any additional expenditure in their case. However, the average expenditure per head in the case of girls' education must continue to be more than that of the average per head in the case of boys. And so I assume that a portion of the savings effected as above in the case of boys, would also be available for an adjustment of the average expenditure per head in the case of boys as well as girls, if Rs. 12 were fixed as an average expenditure per head universally. I have therefore assumed for my calculation of the total cost on the scheme, Rs. 12 per head per annum on an average.

*The expenditure as shown in the official figures in the chapter on General Primary Education is slightly more than in those worked out by me, because the official figures include the average per head in the case of girls' education which is higher than the average in the case of boys. For instance in 1919-20 while the average per head per boy is less than Rs. 12, in the case of girls it is over Rs. 17 per head; the official figures take the mean Rs. 15.

MUNICIPAL SCHOOL DISTRICTS.

Expenditure on Boys' Education.—Present cost.

The total expenditure on Primary Schools in Municipal areas excluding Bombay in 1919-20 was as follows:—

(1) Municipal funds ...	Rs. 11,97,749
(2) Provincial grant ...	Rs. 8,34,581
(3) Local funds ...	Rs. 55,277
(4) Fees ...	Rs. 83,667
(5) Miscellaneous ...	Rs. 16,618

Total ... Rs. 21,87,892

In 1920-21 this expenditure has gone upto Rs. 27 lacs in round figures, out of this the Government grant amounts to Rs. 13 lacs (in round figures); Municipal contributions Rs. 12 lacs; and 2 lacs from fees and miscellaneous. Calculating at the rate of Rs. 12 per head, the expenditure on 75 thousand boys who are to be provided will be Rs. 9 lacs. But as three years is the time limit in which the process is to be completed the expenditure in 3 years will be 27 lacs which might be spread in the following proportion:—

8 Lacs in ...	1st year.
9 Lacs in ...	2nd year.
*10 Lacs in ...	3rd year.

*I have added one lac more to provide for upper higher education as a sequence to the adoption of lower Compulsory Primary Education.

GIRLS' EDUCATION IN MUNICIPAL LIMITS.

The total number of girls receiving education in Municipal limits is 55 thousands in round figures. There are 1 lac and 50 thousand girls of the school going age. Of the 55 thousands under instruction some will be over and under the compulsory age and so we assume that provision will have to be completed for 1 lac of girls within 6 years; 3 permissive and 3 operative years.

Calculating at the rate of Rs. 12 per head, we require Rs. 12 lacs extra for their complete provision. I estimate that this figure would be reached in 6 years as follows:—

4 to 5 lacs extra on an average in each of the first 3 permissive years and Rs. 10 lacs on an average in each of the 3 years of the operative period.

Thus the total extra expenditure on Primary Education in Municipal Districts per annum in the first

3 years will be Rs. 13 lacs and in the next 3 years 20 lacs. And a maximum average of Rs. 21 to 23 lacs yearly after this period.

Or in other words the total annual expenditure in the first 3 years in Municipal Districts will be Rs. 27 lacs (present expenditure) plus Rs. 13 lacs (additional expenditure)—Rs 40 lacs per year. And a maximum average of Rs. 48 to 50 lacs annually after that which in the proportion of 2/3rds and 1/3rd would be borne by the Provincial and Local authorities as follows:—

Rs. 26 and 14 lacs respectively per year in the first 3 years. and Rs. 32 to 33 and 16 to 17 lacs respectively per year in the subsequent 3 years and after.

FIRST CLASS RURAL DISTRICTS.

Present annual expenditure in round figures is as follows:—

55 lacs	Provincial funds.
6 lacs	Local cess.
4 lacs	Fees and other sources.

Calculating on a similar basis as in the case of Municipal Districts with due regard to the 5 years permissive period in the case of girls, we get the following estimates of the total expenditure in the case of First Class Districts.

Rs. 1 crore average per year in the first 5 years.

Rs. 1/4 crore average per year in the next 5 years and after and in the case of 2nd class Rural Districts—

Rs. 25* lacs average per year in the first 5 years and

Rs. 50* lacs average per year in the next 5 years and after.

Thus the whole scheme will involve a total average cost of Rs. 1 crore and 75 lacs per year in the first 3 years; 2 crores in the 3rd to 5th years; and 2½ crores in the 5th to 10th year and after; which shall be borne in the proportion of 2 : 1 by the Provincial and Local sources respectively.

AN AMERICAN MISSIONARY'S VIEW OF THE SITUATION.

(By N. L. R.)

The attitude of many intelligent and zealous Indians toward the "Foreign" Government and Europeans generally, reminds me forcibly of a couple of cartoons which I saw several years ago in an American magazine. The question which was then dominating most other public interests was whether the voting franchise should be given to women or not. The same question was troubling the statesmen of Britain. The matter had been strongly to the forefront when the great war burst upon Europe and put all other things for the time being aside. At that time England had been troubled, perplexed and almost distracted by the plots and depredations of the militant "Female Suffragette." American women had already come into their own in many of the forty-five independent states of the union and were exercising equal rights at the voting booths with their husbands and brothers. But as a national issue woman's suffrage was still far from a solution. These rights had been granted to women only in the more progressive Western states.

New York, New England and the slower moving East were still dead-set against giving votes to women and even a large representative minority of the women of the East were positively against the idea of going to the polls to vote. The national Government at Washington was still undecided. "Uncle Sam" had not yet determined to admit his daughters into full partnership in legislative affairs. Thus matters stood at the time of the armistice; women suffrage had been still a question of interest throughout the war but was being held in abeyance by weightier matters. As soon as the war was over, this old time question was again to the fore and became a leading issue in both political parties. In Great Britain too militant suffragettes had again begun to make themselves unpleasant. It was at that time that this cartoon appeared in several of America's leading papers. There was a pair of them. The first was labelled: "The American Woman's way." The second was headed "The English Woman's way." In the first picture, old Uncle Sam (representing America) is standing in meditation. A pleasant-faced young woman steps up to him and with her right hand she gently chucks him under the chin while she says, "Uncle, Please! Votes for women!" In her left hand held behind her, is a roll of paper,—petitions for Women's Franchise to Uncle Sam's Congress. The Old Uncle smiles indulgently upon her and says "Well, Miss, we'll think about it." In the second picture John Bull appears. He is out for his morning constitutional. A determined, sour-faced woman way-lays him, comes up from behind and strikes him over the head with a bludgeon marked "Votes for Women!" John Bull staggers under the blow and sees shooting stars; but he sets his jaws squarely and blurts out "Not a blooming vote b'George" and he fights on. The American woman won her cause long before her English sister did. Her method was the better way. It's the old story of Aesop's Fable. The wind and the storm trying to force the traveller to yield his cloak, attempts to tear it from off his shoulders but he grasps it all the firmer. Then the gentle sunshine breaking through the clouds soon causes him to discard the cloak.

India has a cause that is as dear to her as was women's rights to the women of England and America. It is a just cause. It is self-government—"Swaraj". It is bound to come. Justice decrees it. Americans and a very large part of the greater empire are sympathetic and are watching the contest with keen interest. Christian missionaries and their followers here in India are interested and in full sympathy with this laudable desire, but no thoughtful friend of India can approve the present plan of campaign to bring about this desired end. It must fail until it gives way to sane methods, carried on entirely by worthier men. I use that word worthier most advisedly. It is a fact that there was a time when women were not worthy of the franchise. They were ignorant slaves of custom, not interested in public affairs and willing that men should do their thinking for them. Until the middle of the nineteenth century, there was hardly a woman poet or writer or philosopher of distinction

But a change came. Female education became as universal as was that of the other sex. Women had begun to think. In school, in society, in medicine in every profession she began to prove herself the equal of her former liege lord and he began to consult her more and more, not only in the home, but in church and business and state. Then came the war. There by meritorious service in every department she won her crown, her right to be counted free and equal. The new world is woman's world. She won it by first becoming, and then by proving herself worthy of the honour she sought. Compulsion did not bring it. Demonstration of her ability to think, to campaign, to exercise self-control and to show that she was needed, and could not be spared from the counsels of the public, made men give her the ballot and equal power with themselves; and all men,—all gentlemen, though perhaps slow to discover her, when discovered gave her this freedom gladly. Let India learn the lesson that woman's struggle for political freedom has taught us. India has been trying force on John Bull. But John Bull is John Bull—bull-headed somewhat slow to get started on a new idea; yet he is a really "bully fellow" who means to do right and does it as soon he sees it to be right. I admit that he has blundered often. I too dislike not his Government but his individual ways and his offishness. But—As a historic fact who ever knew John Bull to yield to coercion? Is it not true that the centuries have never seen England defeated by brute force? This world has several times seen him overwhelmed and almost decimated, with his back to the wall but he was still fighting and in the end he won the contest. It has always been so. The spirit of Alfred the Great dominates the nation. It rallies from every calamity and fights to the finish. That is how John Bull became John Bull.

There is a mistaken idea in India that America won her independence by force. America never fought the English nation. She fought a crazy, tyrant, pig-headed king, his sycophants and his German hirelings, but never England. George III never had the nation back of him. At heart it was with the colonies, as at heart it is with India today. He could muster only pitifully small armies to his contest and had but little parliamentary backing. His troops never had any heart in the fight and thousands of them after the war was over, remained in America and united with Americans to make an honourable, a strong nation. America had won the fight with the English common people before Bunker Hill was a battlefield. She won England by the justice of her cause, her patient self-control, her arguments and her valor. Had Edward VII. or George V. been her king at that time there would have been no war and no separation, for there would have been no need of it and no desire for it. What can India hope to obtain by this insane campaign of compulsion and intimidation? Surely John Bull seeing all this violence, this inter-race war, these injudicious factions, this clamor for justice to Turkey &c. must and will squarely set his jaw and say "Sawraj? Not another blooming bit of it b' George. You've got a'l you've prove you're worthy of. I'm needed here yet for a while and I'll stay." Is it not a fact that the element in India that stood by the Government in the great war is not the element that is to the fore in non-co-operation and intimidation and these rash methods. While all India is interested, is it not the hasty, the injudicious, the party that lack self-control and control of the better class, that is raising all this clamor? Is the way to prove worth demonstrating itself by insult to the Prince of Wales, the Viceroy and his officers? Are they demonstrating worthiness by teaching school boys disrespect for authority and village children and city hoodlums to insult gentlemen and ladies and to throw mud, loot shops and over-ride every law of right? Can such methods ever prevail? If they do then India's woe is at hand. Who will bring the rabble to sober sense? It has never been done in any land without great bloodshed and internecine war nor can it be done in India.

Leaders of India, stand by the Government where right; vote against it where wrong. It is amenable to reason. Abandon storm and bluster. Try the sunshine method. then you will prevail because you will have proved yourselves worthy of "Swaraj."

THE BOMBAY CONFERENCE.

The following invitation has been sent to representative men in the several provinces:

DEAR SIR,

The Ahmedabad Congress, by rejecting the motion for "Independence" and by relaxing the mandatory character of the Non-Co-operation resolution, has gone some way towards conciliating the large section of the public, which is opposed to forced marches in politics. This section has been recently not very articulate, but its influence on that account is not the less decisive.

While the position of the Congress has been thus strengthened on the one side, the countenance given to the early adoption of aggressive Civil Disobedience cannot but cause anxiety.

It, therefore, behoves us all, both the Government and the people, to strain every nerve to see that Civil Disobedience is not resorted to, until at least it is far more obvious than at present that the resources of reason and statesmanship have been exhausted.

The great obstacle in the way of attempting this at present is the policy adopted by Government, within the last few weeks, of extending and applying the Criminal Law Amendment Act and the Seditious Meetings Act, eventuating in wholesale arrests and imprisonments, including those of many men of high character and integrity. This policy is, in our opinion, both unjust and unwise, the more so as it comes on the top of the discontent created by the failure on the part of the Government to satisfy the demands of the people with reference to the questions relating to the Punjab, the Khilafat and Swaraj. As the Liberal Federation, which met the other day at Allahabad, rightly pointed out, this policy has defeated its own object by alienating popular sympathy and aggravating the general unrest.

A considerable body of opinion in the Country is anxious to see a settlement effected, which would make it possible to secure the redress of political grievances and the satisfaction of national aspirations in an atmosphere of peace and harmony. The Ahmedabad Congress, in rejecting the proposal for severing India's connection with the British Empire, has reflected the opinion, still retained by the bulk of thoughtful people in the country, that it is possible to achieve full national development within the orbit of the British Commonwealth. It is, therefore, necessary at this juncture for all those who realise the evil consequences bound to ensue on a continuance of the present deadlock, to confer together and devise means whereby it will be possible to open wide the door to an honourable settlement. It has been suggested that with this object in view a representative Conference should be called to consider the situation in all its aspects and to decide upon a course leading to a satisfactory solution of the present difficulties.

If you are in favour of such a Conference, please let us know, at your earliest convenience, preferably by wire, whether you will be able to attend the Conference, which is proposed to be held in Bombay, at the Presidency Association rooms, Esplanade Road, Fort, on Saturday, the 14th instant, at 3 p. m.

Yours very truly,

JESUS CHRIST AND PRESENT DAY PROBLEMS.

I.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The first "Note" in your issue of Christmas Day, which has called forth a reply from the Lord Bishop of Bombay in your succeeding number, was one with which I so thoroughly agreed that I beg to be allowed to meet his lordship on that ground of exegesis, where you so modestly disclaim any locus standi.

To begin with, I suggest that the passage Mt. 5.39 ("anti-stenai to ponero") is happily translated neither by "resist not evil" nor by "resist not an evil man," but that the true sense is "tit for tat." "Do not knock out one's tooth, because he has just knocked out your own; do not give a man a black eye, because he has just given you one; do not act on the principle of tit-for-tat when you suffer evil"—that I think is a free and accurate rendering of the whole passage in which Christ lays down a fundamental principle of His ethics.

Now the application to Mr. Gandhi and his Non-co-operation movement.

Mr. Gandhi contends that the alien bureaucracy in power is inflicting evil on India: but to counter it, he does not say, "Let them have it," he does not advise bombs, insurrection; he does not say, "They make us suffer, now let us make them suffer too." No, he says exactly what Christ said—do not render evil for evil, violence for violence. Be non-violent in deed, word and thought (as far as the latter is possible to you). Give not tit for tat. Mr. Gandhi's famous dictum "I will kill untruth with truth and unrighteousness with righteousness, and in doing so I will put up with all suffering": what else is that, but a magnificent paraphrase of Mt. 5-39?

I am here not concerned whether British rule in India is fact is evil or has inflicted evil; the point is that Mr. Gandhi and his followers believe it and that to counter it he enjoins the methods of Christ and of none other.

The next passage quoted by his lordship is MK 12-17—"Give Cæsar what is Cæsar's, and God what is God's." I put it, that this passage has little to do with civil disobedience: it refers to people, who were so "patriotic" that they would not pay taxes, but Christ with fine irony lays bare their avarice. Their patriotism, their religious fervour was going "to pay"—that is what our Lord so trenchantly brings home—"If all this foreign money issued by Cæsar is so anti-Jewish, unhallowed, idolatrous—why try to amass it? Why not be glad of the chance of getting rid of it by paying your taxes?"—that is the obvious paraphrase of it. For Civil Disobedience we must go to the Acts of the Apostles, who answered stubbornly to the authorities' order: "Whether we should obey men rather than God, judge ye!" and who rejoiced being deemed worthy to be sent to prison for their convictions' sake.

Is this not an exact parallel of Mr. Gandhi's "Roll of Honour" of those sent to prison for obeying their own conscience rather than a Government order? Again, I don't say that their conscience is rightly informed, but I do say that going to prison does not "pay" these men, as it should have "paid," to keep one's money rather than pay it away in taxes. The moment Civil Disobedience does not entail suffering, it ceases to be a Christian method; but all the Christian persecutions under the Roman Empire, entailing sufferings untold, were due to the civil disobedience of citizens who refused to "salute the flag" (burn a pinch of incense to Cæsar, was the classic way of doing it), because it implied the idea of "My country right or wrong" (or "Cæsar is God," as the ancients put it).

I am happy to see that the Bishop abominates patriotism; so do I. Only I hope he does not call other people's patriotism "jingoism" and his own jingoism "patriotism"! So many people I find are up in arms against "Nationalism," when it is Indian or Irish or Egyptian; are they equally good internationalists (i. e. Catholics), where their own country, say, England, is concerned? Let me repeat that I do not doubt it of the Bishop himself. In any case it seems to me that Nationalism is not to the point at all.

What is to the point is that ever since the Sermon on the Mount was preached, there have not been lacking individual Christians who have met evil by suffering it willingly, rather than by inflicting it. Christ taught that this was the only common sense way of extinguishing evil; but apart from individuals there has never been to my knowledge any Christian Society, State, or Nation whose faith in Christ was sufficiently strong to prompt them to venture a trial of this method. (The Quakers of course are a shining example—but they are not a whole country, but only a tiny minority.) Mr. Gandhi of all statesmen, leaders, politicians, rulers, call them what you like, has come forward and adopted Christ's method and urges a whole nation to adopt this method of Christ, viz. to counter the infliction of evil by suffering that evil in oneself; to sterilize evil, by refusing to serve as its instruments.

Once more I would repeat that I do not hold that Mr. Gandhi is justified in his estimation of the present Indian Government: but the fact remains that believing himself opposed by evil, he has chosen Christ's method of countering it. That is the point, the punctum saliens of the whole controversy.

Here is a Hindu and a Hindu Nation led by him: and they have made the venture of faith in the practicability of Christ's methods, where so far not a single so-called Christian nation has ever gone further than to pay lip service to these same methods, gone further than to treat them as pious aspirations for a few cloistered saints, but as utterly unfitted for the market-place. Here we have a Hindu who takes our Master au pied de la lettre and who is confident that our Master's method is meant for politics and for private life, and not merely for Sunday Schools. As a Christian I feel hot shame—but, surely, I can find this hardly an occasion for belittling Mahatma Gandhi.

On the contrary, I ponder on our Lord's parable of the two men who were asked to do a thing: one said "Yes, Sir" but never did it; the other replied "Not much, why should I?"—yet he went and did it. "Which of the two," asks our Lord Jesus Christ, "did the will of their Father?".....

I am, Sir, &c.

H. C. E. ZACHARIAS.

II

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

I have not seen your issue of December 25th, but from what I have read in that of January 1st, I beg to write the following on the above-mentioned subject.

With regard to the present movement of non-violent non-co-operation in India which is the most pressing problem of today with which we are immediately concerned, I used to think some time back that it was almost wholly based on the teachings of Jesus Christ. But of late I have come to believe that the movement can not be called a Christian one, understanding that word to mean what is in accordance with the precepts of Christ. I fully agree with the Lord Bishop of Bombay in this that though the movement adopts the method advocated by Jesus under certain circumstances, it lacks in the essence of his teachings which is active love, love, forgiving love for even the enemy. This is so far as the movement may be judged from the highest of human standards.

But short of this, it would be but fair to say that the present movement of non-violent non-co-operation is the greatest attempt hitherto made by any nation or people to solve the problem of its enfranchisement from the hands of its conquerors in a peaceful manner. This is its distinctive character, and in this it is Christian, at least in its inspiration. Mahatma Gandhi has again and again acknowledged his debt to the precepts of Jesus and his immediate Guru or teacher who has taught him the wonderful art of Passive Resistance is no other than Tolstoy. One has but to read his writings in English and in Gujarati to be convinced that Mr. Gandhi is saturated with the spirit of Christ. Now inasmuch as this movement is a distinct advance on all the other past movements of national enfranchisement, and that advance is in the direction of a truly Christian solution of such problems, all those people who profess themselves as Christians are bound to sympathise with it and even help it. If England were a Christian country that it professes itself to be, it can not but make peace with those who though not Christians would fight only with Christian weapons. All that India and even the whole of Asia demands from England and Europe is that they should be given Christian treatment from professed Christian nations and peoples. Who will say that this is not a most legitimate demand on the part of Asiatic people? The European nations should have so acted in the past that there should have been no necessity for such a demand on our part. But as they have not acted in a truly Christian manner but unfortunately acted even in an un-Christian manner, the Indian people have to take to such methods as they have been at present employing to force the English to act in a Christian manner. Under these circumstances should they not come forward and show a true Christian example?

We, Indians are required to-day to show an example of active love, such as is the essence of Christianity. Let us say that we are not showing it, though there is no doubt that in putting the very great emphasis that we do to-day on non-violence we are at least following the negative part of the teachings of Christ to a much greater extent than has been done hitherto by any nation or people. Now we have gone so far in this race and if we fail in the positive part i. e. the active love, should not England set an example to us in this direction? And in this is it not the duty of all those who are the proposed disciples and servants of Christ such as the Archbishops, Bishops and above all Christian missionaries to urge England and other European countries to do only what is their Christian duty? The first essential of the spread of true Christianity in India and Asia is a real and not nominal Euro-Asiatic unity. If ever there was an opportunity to bring about this great unity it is to-day, and under no circumstances it should be missed.

More than fifty years ago, one of the greatest sons of India, viz. Keshub Chunder Sen in his first great lecture, "Jesus Christ, Europe and Asia" said things which are well worth remembering to-day, and may well be quoted here. He said:

"It is the bounden duty of all Europeans in India so to prove their fidelity to Jesus Christ in all the avocations of their private and public life, that through the influence of their example the spirit of true Christian righteousness may leaven Indian Society. I regard every European settler in India as a missionary of Christ, and I have a right to demand that he should always remember and act up to his high responsibilities. But alas! owing to the reckless conduct of a number of pseudo-Christians, Christianity has failed to produce any wholesome moral influence on my countrymen. Yes, their muscular Christianity has led many a native to identify the religion of Jesus with the power and privilege of inflicting blows and kicks with impunity! And thus Jesus has been dishonoured in India, and that, alas! the true spirit of his religion has been lost upon the natives through the recklessness of a host of nominal Christians. Behold Christ's Church in danger! Behold Christ crucified in the lives of those who profess to be his followers!"

Is it not time that this crucifixion should come to an end now?

CAUSERIE ON UNTOUCHABILITY.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

The heinous untouchability hampers and humiliates a large section of our own country-men. Its removal has therefore become a national question. Befitting the enormity and importance of this subject, may I be permitted to encroach upon your hospitable columns for a few lines more.

Anti-Reformer:—Mahatma Gandhi is against untouchability. So was the Saint Ekkath. These are saints. They aspire after Moksh and Heaven. We are ordinary men. We have to live in the world. We should give up untouchability only if we want to go to Heaven, otherwise not.

Reformer:—If we want to live on the earth, and do not want to go to Heaven, it is we who must care more than the saints that the earth does not become a hell. Untouchability makes a hell on the earth. It is we who must kill it for our good and for that of our neighbours. Whether we are saints or worldly men, we all love happiness. But saints being large-hearted and intelligent fix themselves in humanity, justice and truth. They are calm, fearless and cheerful. We, being blinded by selfishness, refuse to be guided by these higher principles and for stability seek shelter on the slippery grounds of fatalism and old customs.

Anti-Reformer—Humanity is all right, but the untouchables are dirty scavengers, how can we touch them? They suffer for the sins of their past lives.

Reformer.—Just as all Brahmins are not priests, so all the untouchables are not scavengers, most of them are farmers, shoe-makers, weavers, railway-servants, domestic servants and labourers etc. If they are dirty, we are responsible for it. They are segregated out of towns, and desire the use of public wells and temples. They are never allowed to move amongst us (gods) for fear that the gods may be polluted. Well now, you say, they sinned in their past lives as you know their sins of past-lives, you must also be knowing your own meritorious deeds of your previous life, pray tell us, so that we may preach them to do the same for the good of their next lives.

Anti-Reformer—It is not a matter of sins of past lives, but of the present. We object to their certain ways of eating.

Reformer—The key to its solution lies through sympathy and never through hatred and tyranny. Let us work for their salvation and the untouchables will give up their objectionable ways of eating. On this side, (Devial) the untouchables themselves tell me that there is a movement amongst them in that direction. Our Moslem brethren in response to our sympathy for Khilafat are trying to put a stop to "Cow Sacrifice". Show the same sympathy to our own millions of untouchable Hindu brethren and you will receive the same response in sympathy. Mark that old customs die hard, we must be patient, the solution lies through sympathy, never through hatred and tyranny. Open the closed doors of Hindu temples to the untouchables and keep the public wells open to them and you will see in a few years that the untouchables become clean and give up their objectionable ways of eating.

Anti-Reformer:—If the untouchables enter our Hindu Temples, our temples will be polluted and God will be enraged.

Reformer—Are our temples not polluted, when prostitutes enter them? God who puts up with all the pranks of the priests gets enraged only when the untouchables come in. It is not that God is so small but the ideas of our priests are small, and narrow. You know if you believe in the tradition of the great temple at Pandharpur, that God Vithoba took his untouchable devotee in. His name was Chokha. Read Mahipati's Lives of Saints. God was not enraged but pleased with the poor, untouchable's devotion. Is the idea of Fatherhood of God and brotherhood of man foreign to Hinduism?

AHMEDABAD SOCIAL CONFERENCE.

RESOLUTIONS.

After Dr. B. N. Kanuge, Chairman of the Reception Committee, delivered his address, Mr. B. B. Ramanbhai Mahipatram Nilkanth of Ahmedabad formally proposed Mr. K. Natarajan to preside over the Conference. This was seconded by Pandit Arjunlal of Lahore. The President then delivered his address a summary of which we printed in our last issue.

1. In view of the immense political progress, visible all round in the country, this conference is of opinion that in order to bring about a harmonious all-round national development, it is essentially necessary to make strenuous efforts to bring about higher social efficiency for the Indian Nation.

Proposed by H. V. Divetia of Bombay,

Seconded by Mrs. Saroj Mehta, B. A. of Bombay.

2. This Conference is of opinion that the existing caste system in the Hindu society is a great barrier both to individual and National development and therefore the Conference calls upon all the workers in the field of Social Reform to make strenuous efforts to break down the rigidity of caste system by free inter-dining and intermarriages.

Proposed by Prof. Ruchi Ram Sahni of Lahore.

Seconded by Mr. C. Bhattacharya, M. A. of Lahore.

3. This Conference is of opinion that artificial restrictions against inter-caste and inter-racial marriages must be abolished and therefore it supports the principle, underlying the Civil Marriage Bill, introduced by Dr. Gour in the Legislative Assembly.—From the Chair.

4. This Conference fully supports the abolition advocated by Mahatma Gandhi, of untouchability and calls upon every worker in the field of Social Reform to make efforts to remove all the disabilities under which the depressed classes are labouring including that of untouchability.

Proposed by Swami Shradhdhanand,

Seconded by Mr. Kalyanji of Surat.

5. This Conference recommends the employers of labour especially the owners and managers of Mills and Factories to provide schools for the children of the labourers, sanitary lodgings, for the labourers and their families, and to create in their mills and factories healthy and moral environments with a view to save the labourers from falling victims to drink and other vices.—From the Chair.

6. This Conference welcomes all movements started with a view to promote public opinion in favour of prohibition of the manufacture of and import of intoxicated liquors and drugs and requests Indian ministers in charge of the Excise department to declare such prohibition to be the goal of their Excise policy.—From the Chair.

7. This Conference notes with satisfaction the efforts made in all directions to improve the condition of Hindu widows, such as starting for their benefit widows' Homes, Vanita-Vishram, Seva Sadan &c. but at the same time the Conference is firmly of opinion that it is nothing but bare justice to widows that all obstacles should be removed from the path of those widows who wish to remarry.

Proposed by Pandit Jagalkishore of Lahore,

Seconded by Dr. Khandwala of Bombay.

8. This Conference notes with satisfaction that much of the prejudice against the education of women has been disappearing but the Conference notes with regret that as yet sufficient facilities are not provided for girls and grown up women to receive all round education and therefore the Conference earnestly requests all public bodies and wealthy citizens to provide ample facilities for girls and grown up women for receiving all round education by opening for them various kinds of institutions.—From the Chair.

9. This Conference views with great alarm the deterioration in national physique, which in the opinion of the Conference is mostly due to—

- (1) Early Marriages,
- (2) Insufficient regard for physical culture,
- (3) Want of open grounds for play and recreation,
- (4) High prices and inferior quality of food stuffs,
- (5) Insanitary Buildings.

The Conference therefore requests the public, and corporate bodies like the Municipalities and Local Boards to do their best to remove these causes.—From the Chair.

10. This Conference places on record its satisfaction that the Mahomedan divines have emphatically expressed their view against forcible conversions and that Hindu Pandits have declared that such conversions do not deprive a Hindu of his religion or caste. It further expresses its satisfaction that the Hindus of the castes concerned in Malabar, have shown their readiness to accept such forced converts back into their folds without any difficulty. And it wishes to express its deep sympathy for the victims of the Malabar riots without distinction of race or creed, and to accord its support to the Relief Funds started for their benefit.

Proposed by Mrs. Vidhyagauri Nilkanth of Ahmedabad, Seconded by Miss K. Natarjan of Bombay, Supported by Mr. N. B. Pardey of Nandod.

11. This Conference earnestly desires that such important social movements as the reclamation of criminal tribes, the relief of destitute beggars, and rescue homes for fallen women, should be placed in charge of Indians, and that efforts should be made forthwith to train Indian men and women to take charge of such and suitable institutions.—From the Chair.

12. This Conference strongly disapproves of
- (a) Early Marriages,
 - (b) Marriages of old men with young girls,
 - (c) Polygamy,
 - (d) Extravagant expenses at the time of deaths and marriages,
 - (e) Public exhibition of grief on occasions of death.
- From the Chair.

Mrs. Sharada Mehta of Baroda proposed a vote of thanks to the President which was seconded by Dr. Khandwalla of Bombay and supported by Mr. P. K. Desai of Ahmedabad.

THE ROYAL YAKUTI.

THIS YAKUTI or life giving nectar has been prepared from
the best, choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has wonderful properties of increasing virile power and it rectifies urinary disorders. In fact it makes man a man. This valuable
medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, Aristocracy and
gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to those persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen
the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility.
Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicines. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires. It is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills. Rupees ten only.

NOTES.

10:

A Hint to Government. Government can have no more conclusive proof of the universal condemnation of their recent policy of wholesale arrests and imprisonments, than the resolution of the Indian Christian Conference to be found among the principal resolutions of the Conference, which we print to-day. This and the similar resolution passed by the Bombay Non-Brahmin Conference—both bodies totally opposed to Non-Co-operation—should convince them that this policy is without a single supporter in the country beyond the small group of Dr. Annie Besant's followers.

Over-Much Protestation: The Leader, the Liberal newspaper of Allahabad, has the following biting comment on Sir Harcourt Butler's recent attempt to justify the policy of wholesale arrests in the United Provinces.

His Excellency stated that the situation was so acute and critical, as the 'disorderly elements had come in, ruffians were hired or collected together,' that if Government had not taken prompt action against the 'ringleaders' the province would undoubtedly have passed through a period of bloodshed and misery which would have been remembered for many years to come. The peaceful and law-abiding citizens must feel grateful to his Excellency for saving it from a sanguinary calamity, but they should be excused if they entertain a shrewd suspicion that it was the impending visit of the Prince of Wales to these provinces which made the situation 'acute and critical' in the eyes of Government and necessitated that prompt action which resulted in producing effects that were not perhaps anticipated. They should also be excused if they positively refuse to believe that Pandit Moti Lal Nehru, Mr. Jawahar Lal Nehru and some other eminent leaders of the non-co-operation movement were the ringleaders of a gang of desperate ruffians and that their incarceration was necessary to prevent widespread disorder and bloodshed.

Roman Catholics in Conference. Among the functions of the national week, was the All-India Roman Catholic Conference held in Bombay under the presidentship of Mr. T. Arimanathan Pillai, member of the Madras Legislative Council. Mr. Pillai brought his thoughtful presidential address to a close by exhorting his co-religionists to do their part in the national movement. He said:

As the Chairman of the Reception Committee had said a challenge had been thrown out to them as to what they were going to do in the present state of affairs. He would say that they would be committing the worst sin possible if the Catholics were to take up a stand against any of the reforms coming in. However much they might complain and murmur, and say that India was not fit for these reforms, still the reforms were going to come in. They had to recognise that fact, and if they were not prepared to take their share in the affairs of the country, they would be absolutely washed off and would bring about their own downfall as a community and also that of their Church. Hitherto the Catholics had neglected their duty in this respect and not taken their proper share in public affairs. In proportion to their numbers they had more educated men than any other community, and it was up to them to direct the affairs of the country in a saner manner than some people sought to do at present and save it from ruin.

Archbishop Goodier in his address clearly explained how the Roman Catholics could do their part in the national awakening. His Grace's observations are of wider application than the Catholics to whom they were especially directed. The Archbishop said that if they were to stand up for political representation alone, then they were nowhere whatsoever. He did not say that they would lose it; but what he said was that if they looked at politics alone they had no chance. Whether the future Government of India be Hindu or Mahomedan, or both combined, he said if they got such Government, it would respect the Christian community and recognise it as a distinct asset to the country, if they did such charitable and social work for Indian communities as providing education for their women, taking care of their orphans, looking after their depressed classes, etc. He thought that if they impressed upon the other communities that they were essential for the social progress or any other progress of this country, they would think that the Christians must be protected at all costs and must be given a voice in the highest of their Councils. Their future hope, Dr. Goodier concluded, lay in the strength of their charity.

Sir Sankaran Nair: With reference to the choice of Sir Sankaran Nair to conduct the proceedings of the Representative Conference which began on Saturday afternoon in Bombay, a valued friend writes that the conveners are to be heartily congratulated on the choice of the President. "I have only just seen one of his minutes of dissent re salaries to Indians and Europeans. It was his lot to wage almost incessant war almost single-handed in the Government of India to safeguard Indian interests as far as one man can do so. A man of sturdy independence!"

Lady Reading's Fund. Lady Reading, following the precedents of Lady Dufferin and Lady Hardinge, has started a Fund for the medical relief of the women of India. The first object of the Fund is to complete the Lady Hardinge Women's Medical College at Delhi. It is an object which must commend itself to all, though we have all along thought that such a College would have been more useful in Bombay than it is at Delhi. As regards the second object, namely, the erection of a Hill Hospital for Indian Women, we have very serious doubts as to the need or utility of such a Hospital. Very few Indian women of the Hospital patient class go to the hills during summer, and we can not think that it is intended to transport women patients from the plains to the hills during the hot weather.

Self-Disinfection: In the issue of the 30th October, 1921 we noticed a booklet by Mr. R. D. Karve advocating the popularization of methods of personal prophylaxis against venereal diseases. In doing so, we pointed out the wide divergence of opinion as to the efficacy of such propaganda. The current number of the Shield, the journal of the English Association for Moral and Social Hygiene, puts the following questions for the advocates of personal prophylaxis to answer.

We want to know why it is, if "venereal disease can be prevented with almost complete certainty" by methods of self-disinfection, that one in five of the male venereal patients recently treated at the London Lock Hospital became diseased after using these very methods? We want to know why the British Army on the Rhine and that of the Black Sea, both instructed in self-disinfection, have got the highest venereal rates recorded in the British Army for nearly twenty years, and a rate four times higher than that of our Army without self-disinfection? We want to know if Mr. Charles Gibbs, Venereal Surgeon to the Charing Cross and London Lock Hospitals, is right or wrong when he gives it as his opinion that gonorrhoea is frequently infected directly into the urethral canal, and is therefore quite unaffected by outside application?

The point is likely to arise in the course of the enquiries of the Bombay Prostitution Committee, and the questions raised above should be borne in mind.

An Indian Religious Teacher in South Africa:—Indian Opinion writes: "We deeply regret to learn that the Union Government has not seen fit to grant a further extension of three months to Pandit Ishwar Datt who is at present engaged in preaching on religious and moral subjects in this country. He is also devoting some of his time to explaining some of the Hindu religious scriptures which could not possibly be completed within the one month that the Union Government has been kind enough to grant him at the urgent request of the community. Pandit Ishwar Datt first entered the Union with a permit of three months and after that period an extension of one month was granted each time. Thus the Pandit was able to spend about five months in the Transvaal for which opportunity the community is grateful to the Union Government. During that period the Government must have been able to see for themselves that Pandit Ishwar Datt has not proved economically or in any other way a menace to this country. It could not possibly be said that he is a menace, for he has not come to this country with the intention of earning a livelihood. His mission here is purely a religious one and he takes part in no other affairs but religious. By his preaching he is elevating his own people from their religious and moral degradation, a service for which not only the community but every good Government ought to be thankful. His lectures have been so interesting and instructive that they have attracted all classes of the community. From what we have been able to see we consider Pandit Ishwar Datt not to be a menace but an asset to the community and even to the public in general. The Indian community are by right entitled to ask for the permanent stay of a person like Pandit Ishwar Datt and in asking for an extension of only three months they have, in our opinion, made but a considerably small request. We earnestly hope that the Union Government will reconsider their decision and will be generous enough to grant the extension as requested by the Indian community."

The Irish Free State: By a majority of seven votes the Dail Eireann decided to accept the settlement agreed upon, constituting the Irish Free State, whereupon Mr. De Valera resigned. Mr. Griffith who was the head of the delegation which negotiated the settlement was elected President of the Free State and a new Cabinet was formed to take over the Government immediately. The constitution of the Irish Free State is an immense advance in the evolution of dominion Self-Government in the British Commonwealth, and, as Mr. Andrews has rightly observed, a great encouragement to those who think that India can have the fullest scope for self-expression within the orbit of that Commonwealth.

The Excise Committee: After a long delay, Government have appointed the following Committee "to consider and report in all their aspects upon the questions of drink and drug traffic in this Presidency and its total prohibition."—Rao Bahadur G. K. Sathe, (Chairman) and Messrs. H. P. W. MacNaghten, B. F. Madon, Jehangir B. Petit, Ambalal Sarabhai, the Revd. N. Macnicol, Mr. Hoosainbhoj Abdoolabhoj Lalljee, Rao Sahab D. P. Desai, Mr. B. V. Jadhav, Dr. S. W. Patil, Mr. Jamshed N. R. Mehta, Mr. P. J. Mead, Chief Secretary to Government, and Mr. W. C. Shepherd, Commissioner of Customs, Salt and Excise.

The Khilafat Conference and the Moplah Atrocities We publish in another column a letter from Messrs. K. P. Kesava Menon, Secretary, Kerala Provincial Congress Committee, K. V. Gopala Menon and K. Karunakara Menon, Treasurers of the same Committee, K. Madhavan Nair, Secretary, Calicut District Congress Committee and Mr. T. V. Mahomed, Secretary, Ernad Khilafat Committee, commenting upon the manner in which the Moplah atrocities in Malabar were dealt with at the Khilafat Conference held at Ahmedabad.

Lady Lloyd on Museums. The immense educational value of libraries, museums and such other silent instructional agencies, is not sufficiently appreciated. The idea of education that is most widely prevalent is that through the medium of lectures. Lectures are excellent as accessories but they are no substitutes for active, original thinking on the part of scholars. Lady Lloyd made a very suggestive speech in performing the opening ceremony of the Prince of Wales' Museum of Western India, on behalf of His Excellency the Governor who was prevented from doing so owing to indisposition. Lady Lloyd brought out in her speech the important fact that these institutions of self-education were the true means of national education.

Swami Vivekananda's Birthday: We are asked to state that the sixtieth Birthday Anniversary of the Swami Vivekananda will be celebrated by his disciples, friends and admirers at the Math, Belur, Howrah, on the 19th January, 1922. The seva of the poor will be as usual an important item in the programme of the celebration.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, JANUARY 15, 1922.

THE CONFERENCE.

Any doubts which the conveners of the representative Conference, which began its session in Bombay yesterday afternoon, might have felt as regards the number and quality of the attendance, have been dispelled by the acceptances which have been received. The Conference is not representative in the sense that the members have been elected by certain constituencies, but it promises to be fully representative in the more important sense of reflecting the best thought of the country. Some eminent men whose presence would have been of great value to the Conference, could not be invited as coming in the category of officials. Some others of high calibre are in prison and the Conference has to do without their advice. Nevertheless, among those participating in the Conference are several men of sterling character, high patriotism, ripe administrative and political experience, and intimate knowledge of the needs of the country and the people. The Conference is exceedingly fortunate in securing for its Chairman, Sir Sankaran Nair whose independence of character is only equalled by the strength and courage of his convictions. The postponement in the Legislative Assembly at Delhi of discussions bearing on the present political situation, has been a disadvantage. It would have been very useful to the Conference to have had some statement from Government as to their intentions in respect of the almost universal condemnation of the policy of wholesale imprisonments and arrests. There is some compensation, perhaps, in the concentrated interest in the Conference induced by the absence of any prior discussion in the Legislative Assembly.

Another and even more promising circumstance is the feeling on all sides—no less on that of Mahatma Gandhi and his colleagues than on that of Sir Hormusjee Wadia and his Liberal friends—that no stone should be left unturned to find a way to a settlement which will ensure peace with honour. In their recent policy of wholesale arrests, Government have presented Indians of all shades of political thought with an issue on which difference is impossible. That Government are bound to adopt measures to prevent as well as to punish crime, is not in question. That the non-violent part of non-co-operation has failed to arrest itself in Malegaon, Malabar, Bombay and, it seems, also in Madras, is a fact. But it is not a fact that non-co-operation has always led and is bound to lead to violence. In Calcutta where the volunteers were first proclaimed, it did not do so. In many other places, it has not done so. Government would have certainly declared non-co-operation illegal if they felt sure that its natural and inevitable consequence was violence. Repeated assurances have been given that no political opinion will be penalised if it is dissociated from violence. Compared with the Partition agitation ten years ago, the Non-Co-operation agitation has been singularly free from crimes. Many like ourselves, who do not hold by non-co-operation, fear that the indiscriminate and wholesale attack upon its organisation must lead to the recondescence of the secret societies of the anti-Partition time. Open warfare is always better than secret burrowing. In the present political temper of the country, the one or the other is inevitable. The small section in Indian politics which supports the wholesale arrests, does not realise this danger. The policy of wholesale arrests is the policy of sitting upon safety-valves.

Of course, the ideal condition is to have neither non-co-operation nor secret societies. But this can be ensured only by the dawn of political peace. The causes of the present political unrest have been defined in three categories—the Punjab, the Khilafat and Swaraj. We think ourselves that these three are ultimately reducible to one, namely, the racial element in Indian administration and politics. Mistakes every Government will make, mistakes of judgment, of fact, of policy. These are capable of correction sometimes. More often their consequences are past correction, and then the main thing is that they should not recur. Unfortunately, in India every question has a racial root. The Punjab excesses were deeply tainted by racial poison. The Khilafat matter is complicated by prejudices of race and religion. Swaraj, or full responsible Government, is again, in the case of India, influenced by the racial factor. If we could by a strong effort wipe out this racial element, Indian politics will become far more amenable to reason and justice than the politics of any country in the world. The Government of India moves slowly while political passions operate with the speed of forked lightning. They are not an independent Government. They cannot come to any conclusions unless they are assured beforehand of the concurrence of the Secretary of State. A Round Table Conference has been suggested, and the best there is to be said for it is that no better means has been suggested by any one, for bringing Government and the leaders of the people together and to make them consider in a frank and friendly way all possible ways to a speedy adjustment of their differences. If the Malaviya Conference does no more than bring about a sufficient interval of deliberation to enable all parties to ponder deeply on the real causes of the present discontents and to devise sure means of allaying them, it will have served no small purpose at the present juncture.

Education among Parsis. We have received a copy of an exhaustive "note" on the education of Parsee children by Mr. Cavasji D. Mahaluxmivala. Mr. Mahaluxmivala has made suggestions for the reform of education among Parsees "in accordance with modern educational ideals and principles." We do not think there is much difference between modern and ancient educational principles, and where there are any, we are not sure that the modern is better than the ancient. Besides, we do not think that a separate system of education for Parsees is necessary or desirable. There is much that is sound and sensible in Mr. Mahaluxmivala's suggestions, but we dislike its communal spirit which, in our opinion, is retrograde.

THE PRINCIPLE OF SWARAJ.

(By Mr. H. C. E. ZACHARIAS.)

In submitting to the Representative Conference the following lines, embodying a proposal which I believe may be of use in its coming deliberations, I feel of course a sense of presumption for obtruding myself in this manner. Yet it has come to me that in all that has been said, whether on the side of Mr. Gandhi, or of the Liberals, or of the Government, there has hitherto been lacking the expression, in clear and explicit terms, of a fundamental principle. This principle perhaps is being held implicitly by all; but unless it is expressed and formulated and deliberately accepted and recognized by all parties, there seems to me to be every ground for fear that no agreement will be reached, just as there seems to me every hope of agreement, once this basic idea is enounced.

Since, then, I attach such importance to the expression of this principle and since nobody so far has actually expressed it, I beg your forbearance for my rushing in where angels and my betters—perhaps wisely—have refused to tread.

The point I wish to make is that Swaraj is not a boon, but a right: a right inherent in India as a nation, as it is inherent in every nation; a natural right based on the law of nature that government depends on the consent of the governed. Swaraj therefore does not mean to extort by coaxing or bullying from an outsider a boon which it is his to grant or to withhold. Swaraj is not something which depends on any extraneous assent to come into being; it exists already, it always has existed, objectively, whatever, subjectively, ruler or ruled may have thought about it.

The denial of this natural right of a nation implies as its only alternative the theory that might is right and that government depends not on the consent of the governed but on the physical strength of the governing. I have no doubt that many cynics in the Anglo-Indian camp do indeed hold this latter theory and the good old maxim of a "strong rule" ("and when I say 'rule' I mean 'shoot'"); but I do not believe that in the present British bureaucracy in India there is left a single representative who would avow his faith in this theory itself, apart from its practical application. What the modern bureaucrat says is: "I am here with the consent of those I govern—not of course with the consent of a few noisy agitators and their dupes; they only form a small minority. I am here because the great bulk of these people would rather have me than anybody else." Tacitly they likewise therefore base their rule on the concurrent consent of those they govern: in fact, no other basis is possible.

The trouble is, that this point seems never to have been formulated in so many words on either side. On the one part we hear advice to behave nicely, so that the British Parliament may be kept in good humour and feel disposed for generous concessions. On the other we are exhorted to earn Swaraj by suffering, etc. Both look upon Swaraj as "coming," neither apparently realize that it not only has come already, but that it cannot go away or be taken away. One or the other party may fail to recognise that fact, but such failure does not obliterate the objective fact itself.

This is not an empty play with words. It is a principle of the utmost psychological importance. For what does its recognition mean? It means that the present Government would agree in so many words that India has Swaraj, the inalienable right of self-determination; that they are not intending to rule India against its will, but with its free consent. Let them say clearly that this is the only principle on which they rest British rule in India, that India in itself is a Free State. It goes of course without saying that such a frank recognition of fact should satisfy Mahatma Gandhi's demand for Swaraj in 1922; he would have gained his point and thereupon not only could, but ought to, liquidate the whole policy of "non-co-operation." Thus a calm atmosphere would have been created; a common basis for mutual understanding discovered.

Yet let nobody imagine that thereby Mr. Gandhi would have secured unconditional surrender on the part of the British Government in India. The latter—ex hypothesi—admit a fact. There yet remains the application of the principle. What do the thirty and odd crores of India really want? The status quo? A dictatorship? A gradual, if accelerated, Indianisation? Does anybody imagine that any Indian (except perhaps a few Pan-Islamists) really desires to see every European quit India by the next P. and O. mail—with the whole of their army, police and administrative machinery? Indians are really not such utter fools as some Anglo-Indians seem to think as not to see that this would mean chaos and anarchy on a staggering scale. On the other hand, both sides bring agreed upon the principle of Swaraj, the modus vivendi would become a matter for true deliberation.

For no longer would a Round Table (or any other) Conference resolve itself into a company of hucksters, each of whom is trying to beat down his neighbour and gain most by giving least—as must necessarily be the case, as long as the principle is not conceded that India can only be governed with India's consent. But once that is conceded, a Conference will concern itself with the discovery of what India really does want. The present administrators will hear what Liberals and Nationalists, Brahmins and non-Brahmins, Caste and Out-caste, Capitalists and Labour, Zemindars and Tenants will each of them maintain is India's desire to-day; they may point out to them certain, perhaps disagreeable, consequences of fulfilling too literally such desire on any one point; they certainly will try to inform that Indian desire to the best of their ability—but in the end of course, it is agreed beforehand, that if it can really be shown on any one point that the bulk of India cannot consent to it, that point will have to go. The subject matter of such a Conference would be, "What does all India really want?" and not merely, "What do I believe would be good for India?" Such a Conference would depend on persuasion, not threats; it would generate light, and not heat; its guiding star would be reason, not interest.

Above all, the negotiators would really meet as equals. This Mr. Gandbi had very definitely in his mind, when he stated at Ahmedabad that a Round Table Conference, to be real, had to be one "where only equals are to sit and there is not a single beggar"; but he failed to go back to the underlying principle of an inalienable right being theirs already. The Montford Reform Act similarly implies such an inherent right residing in the nation, but also never explicitly formulates it. Both sides are talking about the practical aspect, of how much British aid India exactly does want, without having yet formally agreed to the theory of which such practical considerations are but the outcome.

What to my mind is most urgently needed now is, I repeat, mutual recognition of the fundamental principle at stake; recognition that Swaraj is not a boon, a gift bestowed or bestowable by a generous outsider, but a right inherent in India itself, as in every nation. Let Britain acknowledge that fact, that India is inherently a Free State of an individuality of its own, let it acknowledge that this freedom of ordering its own individuality is a Natural Right, which can never be extinguished. India, on her part, I feel sure, will exercise that freedom by wisely consenting to further extraneous help; and how much of that help there is to be at varying times, is a true matter for negotiation. But in any case no negotiation will to my mind hold the smallest promise of success, unless it starts from the principle that India is essentially free; and only because free, also free to limit her freedom.

The total expenditure on Primary education in 1919-20 was Rs. 1,13,59,722 and in 1920-21, 1½ crores approximately. We shall thus require an additional half a crore per year in the first 3 years; ¾ in the 3rd to 5th years and 1½ crores per year in the 5th to 10th years and every year after.

TAXATION.

Local Cess :—

In the budget estimates for the year 1921-22 the ordinary land revenue is expected to yield 489 lacs. Making due allowance for remission etc. and calculating the Cess at the rate of 2 annas in a rupee, this will yield about Rs. 55 lacs. In case a sliding scale is adopted this may increase by about 5 lacs. At least 20 lacs more could be realized from the alienated lands which are of the assessable value less quit rent of 94 lacs.

Out of all these receipts may be deducted 36 lacs which are at present disposed of by the Local Boards for other purposes. We will thus have an average balance of Rs. 42 lacs from this source available to the Local School Authorities in the case of Local Boards for this purpose.

A CESS ON INCOMES OTHER THAN AGRICULTURAL.

I have suggested imposition of the Cess on incomes other than agricultural also. If on the same basis as in the case of agricultural land the Cess is levied on all income-tax payers, it will yield about 50 lacs. In addition, the additional Cess may be levied on Super-tax payers as well as on non-agricultural income above a certain fixed sum (say Rs. 1,000) which are not taxed even under the Income Tax Act.

DEATH DUTIES.

Death Duties—It will be seen in my written statement that I have suggested imposition of death duties also. I am aware that there are already 3 kinds of death duties existent in India, viz. Probate Administration Duties and Succession Certificate Duty. These are on a scale of 2 per centum of the net value of the estate and in certain cases 3 per centum. It should however be noted that these duties are levied not on all kinds of estates and legacies but only of specific nature i. e. g. on Probates or Certificates of administration and Succession Certificates for collecting duties.

In England however there are seven kinds of Death Duties viz. Estate Duty, Settlement Duty, Legacy Duty, Succession Duty, Probate Duty, Account Duty, and Temporary Estate Duty. In each case the duty is on a sliding scale of 1 to 15%. Each and every estate does not pay each and every duty but every estate must pay one or more of these duties according to the circumstances under which the estates are inherited (e. g. according as the inheritor is a direct or indirect descendant, and the nature of the estate). I want as many of these duties as are possible or as may be necessary for the purpose of covering the deficit in the additional expenditure, to be levied here also. It will not be possible to vouch for or even give a rough estimate of the income likely to accrue from this source. One could work out very crude figures by taking the proportions of the wealth of England to that of this Presidency and working out the proportional yield for the Presidency, the annual yield from all Death Duties in England being known. But that will be on the assumption that all the seven duties are accepted in India. The actual receipt from this source therefore ultimately depends as to what new duties in addition to the three are levied here.

I have also suggested in addition to the above forms of taxation, the following taxes :

4. A Tax on Cinemas and Theatres
5. A Tax on Races
6. Adoption of sliding scale in the case of present one anna receipts and cheques on cash payments, and
7. Some duty on all transactions on the Stock Exchange.

It is not possible without the necessary material to calculate how much each one or all would yield. But it is quite safe to ascertain that each one will yield quite a decent portion of the additional expenditure that is required for the promulgation of a free and Compulsory Scheme of Primary Education.

THE MOPLAH OUTBREAK AND THE KHILAFAT CONFERENCE.

The resolution passed by the Khilafat Conference at Ahmedabad about the Moplahs of Malabar and the telegrams sent by Maulana Abdul Bari Sahib from Lucknow on 18th December and published in the Servant of Calcutta on 20th December compel one to doubt if the Mahomedans or even Hindus outside Malabar have any correct knowledge of the happenings in this unhappy district. In the minds of even the generous Hindus of Malabar the attitude of Mussalmans outside Malabar creates a painful feeling that the Hindu Muslim unity is not as deep as it ought to be. The sufferings of the Moplahs of Ernad and Valluvanad at the present time are indescribable. Stories are heard which if true cannot but stagger humanity. The death waggon tragedy must have opened the eyes of the outside world to the possibilities of Martial Law regime. Many innocents have suffered and suffered terribly. One's heart bleeds to hear of the tragic scenes enacted in Ernad. The difficulties in entering the rebel area and getting authentic statements from the Moplah survivors—most of whom are terror-stricken—stand in the way of our giving due publicity to the stories that are reaching us from time to time. Maulana Abdul Bari Sahib therefore rightly demands an independent enquiry and the Khilafat Conference has rightly passed a resolution of sympathy with the sufferings of Moplahs.

But one would have expected a kind word from our Mahomedan friends for the unfortunate Hindu victims of the Moplah atrocities. Maulana Abdul Bari Sahib who commands the respect of every true Indian—whether he be a Hindu or a Mussalman—declares that the atrocities committed by the Moplahs on the Hindus are fabulous and the Khilafat Conference, while congratulating the Moplahs for the sacrifices of their lives in the cause of their religion, has not a word of condemnation for the atrocities committed by them on the Hindus or a word of sympathy for their sufferings. Maulana Sahib, we are sure, would not have made such an astounding statement if he had known the true facts and it is most unfortunate that a leader of such eminence should make a statement so untrue at a time when every endeavour should be made to demonstrate the reality of the friendship that the two communities have for each other. Maulana's unfortunate ignorance of the actual affairs has produced the same results that a mischievous suppression or distortion of facts is bound to have. The truth has to be acknowledged and faced irrespective of consequences. Even if the publication of the misdeeds committed by the Moplah rebels on the Hindus in Malabar cuts at the root of the Hindu-Muslim Unity—not that we believe that the action of a crazy and fanatic section of the Moplahs in Malabar will have any such disastrous effects—and dashes to the ground the fond hopes that we all are cherishing for Swaraj in India, a true Satyagrahi has no option but to proclaim the truth. Truth is infinitely more paramount importance than Hindu-Muslim Unity or Swaraj and therefore we tell the Maulana Sahib and his co-religionists and India's revered leader Mahatma Gandhi—if he too is unaware of the events here—that the atrocities committed by the Moplahs on the Hindus are unfortunately too true and that there is nothing in the deeds of Moplah rebels which a true non-violent non-co-operator can congratulate them for. What is it for which they deserve congratulation? Their wanton and their unprovoked attack on the Hindus, the all but wholesale looting of their houses in the Ernad, and parts of Valluvanad, Ponnani, and Calicut Taluques; the forcible conversion of Hindus in a few places in the beginning of the rebellion and the wholesale conversion of those who stuck to their homes in its later stages; the brutal murder of inoffensive Hindus, men, women, and children in cold blood without the slightest reason except that they are "Kaffirs" or belong to the same race as the policemen who insulted their Tangles or entered their Mosques; the desecration and burning of Hindu temples; the outrages on Hindu women and their forcible conversions and marriage by Moplahs; Do these and similar atrocities proved beyond the shadow of a doubt by the statements recorded by us from the actual sufferers who have survived deserve any congratulation? On the other hand, should they not call forth the strongest condemnation from all right-minded men and more especially from representative body of Mahomedans like the Khilafat Conference pledged to non-violence under all provocation? Did the Moplahs who committed such atrocities sacrifice their lives in the cause of their religion?

We know that there are many Moplahs in the disturbed area who have not taken any part in the rebellion and that even among the rebels there are a few who have not been guilty of the savageries detailed above. We can understand the Moplahs rising in rebellion in defence of their religion or under provocation. But we cannot understand why they should turn against their innocent Hindu brethren, loot them, convert them and murder them. We can pardon them even for this, because they are fanatics, they are ignorant and credulous; and because they become desperate when rightly or wrongly they come to believe that no Moplah in the affected area whether innocent or guilty was safe. But what we cannot understand is the attitude of the Mussalmans outside Malabar who certainly would not like to be judged by the same standard as we would apply to the Moplah rebels of Ernad and Valluvanad. A few prominent Mussalman leaders, it is true, have condemned the Moplah atrocities and the Central Khilafat Committee and a few Mahomedan gentlemen have subscribed liberally for the relief of the distressed. But, how far have Mussalmans in general exerted to undo the wrongs committed by their co-religionists in Malabar and create a feeling in the minds of the Hindus that they can look to them for help and sympathy and the protection of their religion when events such as have disgraced Malabar happen in other times and in other places? The Khilafat Conference has not a word of sympathy for the Hindu sufferers and though they condemn the forcible conversion of Hindus by Moplahs they do not condemn any other acts of theirs such as looting, murder, outrage upon women and burning of Hindu houses and temples. We firmly believe even now that they have been guilty of this gross omission because of their ignorance of facts. Let us hope that this letter will open their eyes to the real truth and that they will rectify the wrong done by them to the Hindus and the cause of Hindu-Muslim Unity. Let us also hope that the prominent leaders among them would go to Malabar, educate the Moplah opinion and take such steps as would ensure the safety of lives, religion, and properties of those unfortunate Hindus who had been forcibly converted into Islam but who have returned of their own accord to the Hindu faith.

JESUS CHRIST AND PRESENT DAY PROBLEMS.

I.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I agree with your editorial note. The prosecution of the early Christians by the Roman Government is the best answer of the layman to the Bishop of Bombay's statement, that "The authority of Christ cannot possibly be claimed for civil disobedience." The subject is so important, that I would venture to make still clearer the historical situation.

The political rulers with whom Christ came into immediate contact were (i) the Jewish Saabedrin, which had jurisdiction in Judaea; (ii) Herod, who had jurisdiction in Galilee. These authorities had power of life and death under the Roman suzerainty.

Christ was both a Jew and a Galilean. When Herod sent officers to fetch Jesus, he refused to attend him. "Go, tell that fox . . ." he said, using a terrible word of contempt. There was civil disobedience and also sedition in that answer. It must be remembered that Herod had beheaded John the Baptist for a similar plainness of speech. But the most prolonged civil disobedience in Christ's life lay in his attitude towards the Jewish rulers at Jerusalem. He determined to make their legalistic system of authority impossible. He therefore broke the letter of the Jewish law quite openly whenever he had an opportunity. He forced the issue again and again. He was known as a 'breaker of the law.' He left the rulers no means of compromising with him. Two flaming examples of Christ's conduct may be quoted, which serve as beacons to his life and character. The former is his denunciation of the Scribes and Pharisees—"Ye vipers! Ye hypocrites! How shall ye escape the damnation of Hell?" Christ knew well what it involved to speak out thus against the Jewish Rulers. The second is the scene where Christ took a whip of small cords and drove the money changers out of the Temple. I cannot explain it here, but by this act Christ threatened at its very centre an important financial asset of the Jewish system of government at Jerusalem; for this depended in a measure upon the receipts from the Temple. With tremendous reiteration Christ put before the Jewish rulers the alternative. Either they had to abandon their evil system of government, or they had to kill him. They chose to kill him.

It was the same with Jesus' disciples. They at once came into conflict with these same Jewish authorities. The latter employed every weapon of force to put an end to their acts of passive revolt. They imprisoned again and again the apostles of Jesus. Many disciples, including Stephen, were put to death. The only defence which these followers of Jesus ever made was this,—“We must obey God rather than man.”

Let us turn, in conclusion, to the last pages of the New Testament. We find that the Roman Imperial system had now become hostile to the young revolutionary church. The Christians refused to fulfil all kinds of State regulations. They would not enlist in the army, where Cæsar worship had to be performed. They were non-co-operators. They passively resisted. As a direct consequence, they were thrown to the wild beasts and burnt alive. The Book of Revelation gives a lurid picture of this supreme passive resistance. The Roman Empire, in this book, is called Babylon, the centre of the evil of the world, the city that 'trafficks in the souls of men'.

I would ask, therefore, the Bishop of Bombay to reconsider his position. Mahatma Gandhi now regards the imperialism of Great Britain in India as the evil thing,—as 'Babylon,' the 'trafficker in the souls of men'. He believes that racial arrogance and commercial greed lurk at its very centre. The way to meet such a position is surely not to foreclose discussion by quoting any isolated texts concerning civil disobedience, but rather by a humble examination of the challenge itself, which this new prophet has thrown down to the world. Is British imperialism in India the hateful thing that must be resisted unto the death? Is racial arrogance so deep that it cannot be eradicated? Is the pride of empire so overpowering that repentance for the sins of the past is impossible? These are surely the questions to answer.

Personally, if I may make a confession, my hopes and fears have belied one another for very many years with regard to these very questions. Even in the last month our longings have been raised by the Irish agreement only to be dashed down again by this terrible Egyptian memorandum, which Viscount Allenby has presented. Is Great Britain ready to be magnanimous only to the French in Canada, the Dutch in South Africa, the Irish in Ireland? Is Great Britain determined to keep an iron hand outside the area of the white races, only giving specious promises of equality and independence elsewhere. My own recent experiences in East Africa have not reassured me on that point, nor has the news that I have continually received from South Africa and Fiji and other places. I seem to understand also more and more, year by year, the terrible guilt of the exploitation of India itself and the crime of her prolonged subjection. Can the Bishop of Bombay take up these issues? Can you also, Mr. Editor?

Yours faithfully,

C. F. ANDREWS.

II.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In your note in reply to the letter of the Bishop of Bombay, you state that you do not feel that you could presume to enter upon a matter of exegesis of the teachings of Jesus in challenging any interpretation put upon them by the Bishop. The present writer certainly has little disposition to enter upon an exegetical controversy, but as my lecture gave rise to the discussion I feel it but right that I make my own views a little clearer in a brief note.

I think if the Editor had used the term "passive resistance" instead of "non-resistance" he would have come nearer the position of Jesus. Jesus certainly resisted evil. His whole life was an exemplification of that. But his method with evil men was passive resistance—an active love that could passively suffer and bear and conquer and win the heart. He believed that the ultimate power of the universe was not physical force, but love. The cross is the symbol that love, shown through passive resistance, stands at the centre.

In regard to the question of paying tribute to Cæsar, it would seem at first sight, that Jesus did put his stamp of approval on standing by whoever was in authority, even though it be a Cæsar. If so then it is disappointing and puzzling and it cuts across what we know of the Christ spirit that resisted evil everywhere even when it should be in authority. But a little closer examination would show that another emphasis is not only possible, but necessary.

The method of Jesus was quiet, but penetrating. The Duke of Argyll says: "There is no method of reform so powerful as this. If alongside any false or corrupt belief, or any cruel and vicious system we place one incompatible idea then without any noise of controversy or clash of battle those beliefs and customs will wane and die." Alongside of the cruel and prevalent custom of slavery Jesus laid down the incompatible idea of brotherhood. And slavery waned and died. Alongside of the cruel Caesar idea he put another incompatible idea, the reign of God. He said, "Render to Caesar, that which is Caesar's, and to God, that which is God's." Then He began quietly to enlarge the sphere of what belonged to God. In His idea of the Kingdom of God all life was to be held sacred for God. As He thus enlarged it and as men began to catch his emphasis upon this, they soon saw that there was no standing room for Caesar. All life was to be rendered to God and as the Caesar idea clashed with that it had to go, and it had been going ever since. Instead of this passage being the bulwark of autocracy, in reality it has been its death-knell. When we put upon the second half of the statement the emphasis that Jesus put upon it then the spirit of autocracy in personal, social, religious, economic and political realms will wane and die.

You can no more keep the spirit of Jesus apart from political than you can keep it apart from the social and economic. It must go through all life including the political, not with a set and dried programme, but with principles and a spirit. Anything in any of these realms incompatible with those principles and that spirit must wane and die. When they do we will have the Kingdom of God over all life. We will be rendering to God what is God's.

In regard to whether the position of Government or the position of the Non-co-operation movement is more compatible with the idea of the Kingdom of God as expressed in the principles and spirit of Jesus each man must judge for himself. Whatever is found in either opposed to those principles and that spirit must be condemned. This, it seems to me, to be the position of Christianity.

Yours faithfully,
E. STANLEY JONES.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

May I take this opportunity to correct a slight mistake that you have made while speaking of me in your editorial notes? You say therein that I belong to the Anglican Church. With regard to this I beg to say that though I have been baptised and am an orthodox believer in Christ Jesus, I do not belong to any Church whatsoever. I belong to the Catholic Church, and to no particular body thereof. But lest I might be taken as a member of the Roman Catholic Church, I call myself an Oriental Catholic, and it is as such that I have returned myself in the last census. Besides this I have returned myself as a Hindu by race. My feeling is that until Christianity spells Euro-Asiatic unity in the real sense of the term, all over Asia Christian Churches should be national (of course in the best sense of the term), and together with this they should unite into an Asiatic or Oriental Church. This would act as the greatest peace-maker between Europe and Asia.

THE KHILAFAT CONFERENCE.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

With reference to your leading article in your issue of January 1st, I write just to suggest a correction of fact in one matter of detail referred to therein. To any careful reader of the proceedings of the Khilafat Conference, the National Congress, and the Muslim League, it must be evident that Mr. Haerat Mohani was an advocate of freedom being allowed at least to Mahomedans to have recourse to "all possible and proper means" in place of "all legitimate and peaceful means" and also strongly advocated a change in the goal to be attained,—in the form of "complete independence free from all foreign control" in place of the undefined word "Swaraj" in the present form of the creed of the Congress. Both these changes, however, were urged by him in the Subjects Committee of the National Congress, and as you have correctly stated in the second para on page 287 of your paper in the said issue, the motion by the said gentleman to drop the principle of non-violence met with little support and had thus to be withdrawn. But you have made a little confusion and have incorrectly stated that "resort to violence" was advocated and even passed in the Subjects Committee of the Khilafat Conference. This mistake of fact is required to be brought to your notice, as you have argued out a point on the basis of this wrong notion. You refer to this as the second point of difference between the 'national Indian' and the 'Mahomedan communal' points of view, brought to surface by the Khilafat Conference. To quote you in full, you have said beginning somewhere at the end of page 286, and continuing in the first para of page 287:—"The other fundamental difference which the proceedings of the Khilafat Conference brought to surface is as regards the principle of non-violence.....Mr. Haerat Mohani raised in the form of an amendment at the Khilafat Conference the point that Islam does not forbid resort to violence in suitable cases, and the President could only get round the corner by ruling out of order the amendment which he had allowed to be passed in the Subjects Committee previously."—

But all this is absolutely a mistaken statement. The resolution which was wrongly allowed to be passed in the Subjects Committee of the Khilafat Conference and which the President Hakim Ajmal Khan had later on to rule out of order in the open Conference, was the resolution not about dropping the principle of non-violence, but about declaring complete independence. This you will find clearly mentioned in the account of the final sitting of the Khilafat Conference on Tuesday night (27th December.) published in the Bombay Chronicle of Thursday 29th December in column 4 on page 8 (morning edition). In the proceedings of the Khilafat Conference as published hitherto, there has been no mention of any motion brought forward to allow resort to violence. A motion to that effect was contemplated by Mr. Haerat Mohani, but it was in the Subjects Committee of the Congress itself, and as correctly noticed by you it was withdrawn as he did not get support. (Vide Bombay Chronicle, same issue column 5 on page 7). Will not the above correction of facts with regard to the proceedings of the Khilafat Conference, necessitate a change in your remarks pertaining thereto, to be fair to the 'Khilafat extremists' as some choose to call them?

Yours truly,
K. R. HALDIPURKAR,

AN INTER-CASTE MARRIAGE.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

The wedding of Mr. P. S. Mani, Accountant, Messrs. Laljee & Co., with Miss Nagabhushanam was celebrated on Monday the 9th instant at 6-30- P. M. in the Bangalore Cantonment Brahma Samaj Mandir according to Brahma rites. Mr. E. Subbukrishnaia officiated as the minister and the marriage was registered under Act III of 1872. The bride-groom an Andhra was Brahmin and the bride a Velsa. This is the sixth reformed marriage that took place in Bangalore under the auspices of the Brahma Samaj.

AGENDA OF REPRESENTATIVE CONFERENCE.

The following agenda of the Representative Conference to be held at the Sir Cowasji Jehangir Hall, Royal College of Science, Mayo Road, Bombay, on 14th January 1922 at 8 p.m. was issued on Saturday.

Pandit M. M. Malaviya will open the proceedings with a statement of the circumstances in which, and the purpose for which, the Conference has been called, and will request Sir Sankaran Nair to take the speaker's chair.

The Speaker will call upon Mr. M. A. Jinnah to place draft proposals before the Conference for its consideration.

He will then call upon Mahatma Gandhi to open the discussion.

The speaker will next call upon Sir Hormusjee Wadia to speak, and will then invite a general discussion.

When the Speaker is of opinion that the proposals have been sufficiently discussed, he will close the general discussion, and will call on the Conference to deal with specific proposals.

The Conference will then proceed to adopt definite proposals, and if necessary for the purpose, it will appoint a Committee, with the Speaker as Chairman, to frame such proposals in the light of the discussion to be placed before the Conference at its adjourned sitting on the same or the following day.

THE REPRESENTATIVE CONFERENCE.

INDIAN PRESS OPINIONS.

The Tribune, Lahore Daily, (Congress.)

We need scarcely say that we are in complete agreement with much that is said in the letter issued by Pandit Malaviya and six other leaders, inviting the representatives of different provinces to a conference to be held in Bombay on the 14th instant. The only point as to which we are not free from doubt, is the wisdom of calling a conference of party leaders before bringing about a truce by means of a direct appeal to the two parties. Undoubtedly if the whole country could be of one mind, the appeal to Government would carry much greater weight than it is likely to do now, but then the very uncertainty of the Government's probable attitude is likely to be a disturbing factor at a conference like the one proposed and may not improbably make a settlement difficult if not impossible. It is for this reason that we have been strongly urging from the first the supreme necessity of bringing the two principal parties to the present controversy to a common table, preliminary to the convening of a regular Round Table Conference. But if this is not to be, a Conference like the one convened by Pandit Malaviya and others is clearly the only other alternative. Let us hope it will produce the desired effect.

The Citizen, Madras weekly, (Liberal).

A great responsibility rests upon Mr. Gandhi in this matter. He has often expressed himself in favour of a conference and a settlement. Reason and experience should suggest to him that constitutional progress achieved without throwing the whole country into disorder and chaos, which will assuredly follow a widespread resort of civil disobedience, would be very much better and more honourable than what he hopes to get by the other way. He possesses great influence over his following and a man of peace as he calls himself, he should throw the whole weight of his authority on the side of an amicable settlement. There is the Government to consider. An attitude of non-possumus is impossible. The Government must realise that they are faced with a crisis the logical outcome of which would be terrorism and anarchy on the one side and naked repression on the other.

The question is whether Lord Reading has secured the necessary credentials for holding a Conference. The presumption of course is that he has, because he has expressed his willingness and his eagerness to meet the representatives of all shades of public opinion in the country to discuss with them the measures necessary to remove the root-causes of the present discontent. That means Lord Reading is prepared to move the Secretary of State to scrap the Government of India Act for effecting further constitutional development. Of course, there is the Parliament and especially the House of Lords to be taken into account. If either the British Cabinet or the Parliament should deny the satisfaction of the demands unitedly and unanimously put forward by the Conference in India, then the issue would become quite clear, each party being at liberty to pursue its own path.

Janmabhumi, Machilipatnam weekly, (Nationalist).

There is going round another suggestion that a conference of party leaders ought to be held beforehand. This suggestion seems to have been received in responsible quarters with certain favour. The object apparently of those who put it forward is that the party leaders may present a united demand. In the first place there cannot be much of unity of demand between such widely divergent bodies as the Congress and the South Indian Liberal Federation. Nor did the united Congress-League scheme, progress beyond the stage of presentation. It was doomed from that moment forward. Say what you will, we believe that the Congress represents the Nation. There is the Muslim League and there is the Sikh sabha and these three bodies must have the determining voice in the negotiations. We cannot be beaten down by political parvenus.

The Dnyanodaya, Bombay weekly, (Christian Missions).

We deplore as being unhelpful to India's perplexing situation in the present hour some of the articles being published in the European press. We know only too well the difficulty of writing on public events in such times as these, but to ridicule the efforts of Indian leaders who are most nobly seeking a way out of India's present impasse is not a Christian thing to do. For ourselves we entirely approve of the present effort to focus into one the different view-points of India's political parties, which we take to be the aim of the coming conference, and we think the organizers have done well to secure Sir Sankaran Nair as the chairman. 'Blessed are the peacemakers' is our message to this conference and we commend it to the prayers of all earnest people.

INDIAN CHRISTIAN CONFERENCE.

The following are the principal resolutions of general character passed at the 8th sessions of the All-India Indian Christian Conference held in Lahore from December 27th-30th both days inclusive.

THE PRINCE'S VISIT.

All-India Conference of Indian Christians accords a very hearty and respectful welcome to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales on the occasion of His Visit to India. The Conference prays that His Royal Highness's stay may bring peace and good will to the three hundred and thirty million people inhabiting this land.

THE PRESENT SITUATION.

In view of the gravity of the present political situation in the country and also in view of the possibility that the situation may become still more acute in the near future, this Conference resolves:—

(-) That in order to restore peace and harmony in the country it is necessary for Government to adopt a policy of conciliation by ceasing to put into force the Criminal Law Amendment Act 1908 and the prevention of Seditious Meetings Act of 1911 and such other measures as have a repressive effect and by releasing those arrested and imprisoned under these Acts, while on the other hand, the campaign of Non-Co-operation should forthwith be suspended by the leaders of Non-Co-operation so as to facilitate a sane settlement under conditions essential for mutual understanding.

(b) That in order to facilitate a sane settlement, a Round Table Conference be arranged of some leading Non-Co-operators, Moderates and Government Officials to see on what grounds a compromise can be brought about.

A Committee of the following six gentlemen be appointed:—

The President, R. B. A. C. Mukerji, Mr. Nundy, Mr. K. L. Ballia Ram, M. L. C., Mr. K. T. Paul and Prof. Cornelius.

This Committee is empowered to co-opt others and also to draw up the findings in the form of resolutions to be sent to the bodies mentioned below.

(c) That copies of these Resolutions, the Findings of the Round Table Conference (when ready) be forwarded to the Government of India and the Provincial Governments, the President of the Indian National Congress and the All-India Muslim League.

CHRISTIAN MISSIONS.

This Conference is of opinion that the time has come:—

(i) That Protestant Missions as such should be completely merged in the Indian Church and that in future all Foreign Missionaries should be related to it.

(ii) That in the meantime Missions should appoint Indians of ability and character on an increasing scale as their Lay and Ordained Missionaries.

(iii) In view of the complaints made by the various Missions that educated young Indian Christians of character are not available to take up positions of trust and responsibility this Conference recommends that the policy of finding young men who are suitable, from other Missions, be adopted by all Missions instead of allowing denominational barriers to stand between such young men and responsible positions.

SWADESHI.

(i) This Conference is strongly of opinion that a true Swadeshi spirit should dominate every sphere of Indian Christian life which would, in its turn, serve to give a real impetus to all indigenous enterprises in the country.

(ii) That as an expression of our Swadeshi spirit we must forthwith start wearing clothes of Indian manufacture.

(iii) In view of the fact that the Indian Christian Community has been very frequently and severely accused of lacking the Swadeshi spirit, this Conference recommends that all Provincial Leagues make strenuous efforts to find ways and means of inculcating the swadeshi spirit in the Indian Christians through the local leagues and lose no time in putting such a programme into effect.

FRANCHISE FOR WOMEN.

This Conference is of opinion that the time has come when franchise under the Reforms Act should be extended to the women of this Country, on the same terms as those of men.

SPREADING KNOWLEDGE OF PUBLIC QUESTIONS.

Realising that public work in the country should be based upon sound knowledge of present-day problems and with a view to cultivate such knowledge:—

(a) The All-India Indian Christian Conference institute six graded prizes annually amounting to Rs. 800 for the best essays on important public questions to be written by Indian Christian young men and women.

(b) A Board of Representatives be appointed to arrange and carry out the scheme.

(c) Indian Christian leaders be appealed to for finances.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT.

Resolved that this Conference, while expressing its appreciation of the endeavours made by the Government for the Industrial development of the country, feel that the measures hitherto adopted are sadly inadequate to meet the acute economic situation and expresses its conviction that for removing the industrial backwardness of India it is necessary:—

(i) That definite endeavours be made to materialise the schemes formulated in the various "Blue Books" and suggested by Indian economists for the imparting of industrial and technical education to the students of the country.

(ii) That far greater provision than at present exists be made for industrial and technical education by the establishment of the Technological Faculty at the principal Indian Universities.

(iii) That artificial and unjust barriers like the Preferential Tariffs and Excise duties on cotton goods and Railway Preferences on imports as compared with exports which favour the foreign manufacturer at the expense of the indigenous manufacturer, be removed.

PROHIBITIONS.

This Conference reaffirms the resolution on total prohibition which was passed in Calcutta 1919. That in view of the world-wide interest at the present time, in the cause of temperance and the growing volume of public opinion in India against the use of intoxicants the All-India Indian Christian Conference earnestly request the Government of India to prohibit the import, manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors and drugs in the country for other than medical purposes. And it further resolves that as the first minimum instalment the principal of local option be introduced in case of Municipal areas.

RESOLUTION ON RESPONSIBLE SELF-GOVERNMENT.

This Conference is of opinion that as a result of one year's working of the Reforms Scheme, a much larger measure of Responsible Self-Government should immediately be given to the people of India by asking the Provincial Governments to a greater extent responsible to the legislature and by making such modifications in the Government of India Act as would introduce the principle of responsibility in the Central Government.

INDIAN SOCIAL CONFERENCE.

The affiliated Associations be urged to send delegates annually to take part in the Indian Social Conference.

INDIANS OVERSEAS.

Resolved that this Conference

(a) Expresses its gratification at India being placed on a par with the self-governing dominion in the League of the Council of Nations.

(b) But at the same time it declares its deep disappointment at the attitude of the South African Representatives at the Imperial Conference in regard to the position and status of Indians domiciled in South and East Africa.

(c) And appeals to the Church in Africa to use its influence to bring about a satisfactory settlement of the present issue and to the Church in all Self-Governing Dominions in the British Common Wealth to use their influence in all such places where a similar spirit prevails in order to avoid the creation and growth of a spirit which will inevitably lead to disaster.

LABOUR PROBLEMS.

(a) The special attention of the affiliated Associations and individual members be drawn to the labour unrest in the country urging them to study carefully the problems in their respective areas and to render help in establishing right relationships among all parties concerned, and

(b) The Conference urges that the following are the particular needs of our labour:—(1) Hours of work of males, females and children; (2) wages; (3) Housing, (4) Education, (5) Compensation for Injuries, (6) Sanitation, (7) Abolition of drinking habit, (8) Old age pensions and maintenance, (9) Co-operative Societies and Trade Unions.

DEFENCE OF INDIA.

(a) The All-India Indian Christian Conference urges strongly that the time has come for the authorities to initiate and carry out a liberal military and naval policy to enable India to attain as early as possible the status of a self governing colony.

(b). This Conference strongly protests against the gradual disbandment of the 71st Panjabis.

(c) This Conference while protesting against the allowances urged upon the Indian Christians to enroll themselves in large numbers in the Indian Territorial Force.

INDUSTRIAL TRAINING.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

May I bring to the notice of the Princes and Chiefs and the people of India the great importance of training their people in Industrial arts, which can be successfully carried out with a mechanical knowledge of modern machines. This knowledge is helpful not only in manufacturing industries but also in handling and local repairing of machines required even for agriculture. As a large mass of our people are agriculturists, the importance of technical training of the people cannot be overstated.

To bring down the dully-rising prices of food-stuffs, clothing, etc. within the means of the people, it is necessary to increase the output from land and other sources, and to cheapen the costs of production. Both these can be achieved by the use of scientific methods and labour-saving appliances. These appliances cannot be introduced until and unless the people know how to handle and locally repair, the modern machines. This art can be acquired only by a technical training for which purpose, we need technical schools with an equipment of machines, within an easy reach of the people. The provision of independent Technical Schools would be expensive, whereas a school can be established along with railway workshops at a comparatively small cost. As the Indian states have already provided railway workshops at many centres it is an easy matter to open Technical schools along with such workshops. Thereby the people of India will be quickly trained in all mechanical arts which are so necessary for the material advance of the country, both in agriculture and in manufacturing industries.

The importance of railway workshops as a place for technical school has been brought out in paras 86 and 155 of the Report of the Indian Industrial Commission 1918, and I have dealt with the matter in full detail in my books: "The Agricultural Co-operation in Denmark and Hints for its adoption in India" and "The Indian Railways". Both of them can be had from Mission Press, Ajmer. The books have been written after an extensive experience in India and travels in Europe, and have been published at a heavy expense, with the object of rendering a service to the Motherland. It remains with the Princes and the people of India to take advantage of the valuable information thus brought to their very door at a trifling cost.

THE

ROYAL YAKUTI.

THE YAKUTI or life giving nectar has been prepared from
the best, choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has wonderful properties of increasing virile power and it rectifies urinary disorders. In fact it makes man a man. This valuable
medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and
gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to those persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen
the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility.
Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicines. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that much is not that which a perfumer admires. It is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills. Rupees ten only.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, JANUARY 22, 1922.

THE CONFERENCE.

The Conference of representative persons to which reference has been made in the two previous issues of this journal, was held in Bombay on the 14th and 15th January. From the official statement, it will be seen that the representative character of the Conference was unimpeachable. The Conference met at 3 p. m. on the first day. Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya's strenuous exertions to arrange the details of the Conference during more than a whole week left him absolutely no leisure to compress his introductory remarks. But for this drawback, his opening speech was an eloquent exposition of the circumstances in which and the purpose for which the Conference was called. He ended by requesting Sir Sankaran Nair to take the chair as Speaker. Mr. Joseph Baptista promptly asked if the conveners of the Conference had exercised their legal right to nominate the Chairman, adding that if that was not the case, he had another proposal to make. Mr. Jinnah on behalf of the conveners replied that the conveners exercised their legal right and nominated Sir Sankaran Nair to preside over the Conference. Sir Sankaran on taking the chair at once called upon Mr. Jinnah to place the proposals drafted by the conveners before the Conference. Mr. Jinnah did so in a brief business-like speech. When he sat down, the Speaker invited Mahatma Gandhi to speak. The Mahatma's speech on this occasion was not as clear and definite as his speeches usually are, which led to his being asked as he was resuming his seat whether it was to be understood that, in the event of the Government carrying out what was required of them in the draft resolutions, the Mahatma on his part would advise his friends to carry out the things that were required of them. The Mahatma in reply made another longish speech which failed to convey to many of his hearers what exactly he intended to do in the case put to him. The speech of the evening was by general consent that of Sir Hormusji Wadia whom, as the leader of the Poona Liberals, the Speaker requested to follow the Mahatma. Sir Hormusji's speech was one of the most cogent, clear and outspoken that this writer has had the good fortune to listen to for many a long day. Sir Hormusji's condemnation of the Government repression was as uncompromising as his denunciation of the violence of non-violent non-co-operation as illustrated in the Bombay riots. He told Government that law and order were precious things but that the country could not pay the price of loss of freedom demanded of it even to secure them and, speaking as one who has supported the Reforms, he made the admission that they had failed inasmuch as they had not prevented the adoption of the recent repressive policy. We had three Indians in the Government of India and Indian Ministers in Provincial Governments, but the policy of wholesale arrests and prosecutions, which was driving the country to desperation, went on. Turning to Mahatma Gandhi and speaking as an old friend, "if I may call him so"—Mahatma: "A privilege a privilege."—he exhorted him in earnest tones to confine non-co-operation to educated men who understood it, and not to expose the ignorant masses to sacrifices which they could ill afford. When Sir Hormusjee sat down, every one felt that the Conference had touched a very high level. It was a happy coincidence—entirely unintentional—that the three first speakers in the proceedings should be representatives of our three great communities—the Mahomedan, the Hindu, and the Parsi. Among the speakers who followed, Professor S. C. Mukerjee, who presided at the recent All-India Indian Christian Conference, made an excellent impression. An Anglo-Indian gentleman of Calcutta, Mr. Moreno, had insisted on an invitation being sent to him, but before he could get the reply, he had left for Bombay. His speech had a great effect on the Conference. He began by saying that he was of mixed parentage, Indian and English, and that he had always felt that the right policy was for his community to identify itself with Indians as sons of the same soil. He went on to speak of the duties and responsibilities of Indian leaders in a well-balanced and impressively spoken speech. His presence, demeanour and speech was one of the influences which moulded the inner mind of the Conference somewhat obscured by the set phrases of the resolutions. There were other good speeches, especially one by Mr. J. A. Wadia, which impressed the Conference. After over five hours, the Conference closed on Saturday with a resolution appointing a Committee to revise the draft resolutions in the light of the day's discussion. This Committee met on Sunday at 10 a. m. and it was only after 6 p. m. that the Conference could be resumed to receive the revised resolutions. When the Conference met late on Sunday evening, Sir M. Visvesvaraya occupied the chair which Sir Sankaran Nair had abruptly left a few minutes ago when the Committee's discussions were nearing their end. The resolutions were passed without much discussion, and a Committee was appointed to carry out the resolutions. The Conference closed at 8 p. m.

THE SANKARAN NAIR INCIDENT.

The retirement of Sir Sankaran Nair from the Speaker's chair after presiding over the Committee stage the whole of Sunday, has naturally attracted much attention. It has been exaggerated on the one side as a blow to the Conference, while, on the other, inferences have been sought to be drawn from it as to Sir Sankaran's motives. To us, Sir Sankaran's action can be simply explained as due to his having somehow felt after the first day's meeting that a public dissociation from the Conference over which he had come to preside, was imperative on his part. Sir Sankaran arrived in Bombay on the 13th and had a full opportunity of discussing the subject matter of the Conference with the conveners and Mahatma Gandhi who made no secret of the fact that, as Non-Co-operationists, he and his friends could not participate in the voting at the Conference. It was a surprise when Sir Sankaran made this one of his grounds of thinking of withdrawal on Sunday, because this had been known all along and had, indeed, been emphasised at the first day's sitting in the Mahatma's speech. The Mahatma met this objection by undertaking to obtain from the Working Committee of the Congress a resolution complying with the requirements of the Conference. Sir Sankaran next turned to the release of prisoners convicted under the ordinary law for non-violent political offences, and he was backed up by other members of the Conference Committee. The Mahatma after the luncheon interval on Sunday, when things seemed to have come to a definite breach, agreed to the substitution of a Committee to investigate these cases, instead of the release of the prisoners, as a condition precedent of his party entering the Round Table Conference. After these important concessions, it was a painful surprise to see Sir Sankaran fasten upon the case of "the fatwa prisoners" as the one point on which he could not brook any compromise. We have made no secret of our firm belief that the Khilafat extremists' disclaimer of responsibility for the Mopla outbreak was untenable. The dignified remonstrance which we printed last week from the Secretaries of Congress and Khilafat Committees in Malabar, against the misleading resolution of the Khilafat Conference, conveys its own moral. Sir Sankaran Nair naturally feels deeply for the wrongs done upon innocent men and women by Mopla ruffians, and no one who knows the facts can feel otherwise. But to argue from these distressing facts that "the fatwa prisoners"—those convicted of circulating a fatwa or declaration by Mahomedan divines—should not be released, is a bit of forced reasoning which no one else in the Conference Committee was able to follow. The matter might have been left there but for the statement which Sir Sankaran Nair published in the Times of India on Tuesday. That statement must have given pain to many sincere admirers of Sir Sankaran Nair. He was called as a friend to give the Conference the benefit of his guidance. Because it did not follow it in every respect, he not only left the Conference after taking note of all its proceedings in Committee, but he actually indited a severe denunciation based upon these notes of the whole Conference with the object of discrediting it and defeating its purpose. Sir Sankaran Nair must have been as much surprised as ourselves to see that, as far as Indian opinion goes, his action has done more harm to himself than to the Conference. Sir Sankaran has done distinguished service to India and deserves well of his countrymen. It is a pity that it has not been possible for him to appreciate the position of those who differed from him at the Conference. We respect his courage of convictions, his independence, and his patriotism. The conveners fully trusted him. A word of praise is due to Sir M. Visvesvaraya for the readiness with which he stepped into the breach literally at a moment's notice. He was not consulted about it, first, because there was no time, and, secondly, perhaps, if he had been consulted, he would have hesitated. Within a couple of minutes of Sir Sankaran's leaving the chair, Sir M. Visvesvaraya had been proposed into it, and was leading the proceedings as if there had been no interruption at all. The nation no longer lacks able and willing men to take the place of those who are called away by circumstance or inclination from it. Whoever may fall out of the ranks, the country goes forward. The nation's cause is no longer the concern of a few towering personalities. The average man has come into his own. As a patriot, Sir Sankaran cannot but rejoice that this has come to pass.

THE RESULT.

What has been the result of the Conference? We print a collection of opinions of newspapers published in India, as complete as we can make it, on the Conference. For our own part, we prefer to leave the events of the next few days to answer the question.

Social Reform among Vysyas. The Vysyas are the mercantile caste among Hindus and they are also the mainstay of orthodoxy. It is, therefore, with much pleasure that we notice the liberal principles of social reform embodied in the resolutions of the Arya-Vysya Conference held at Vizagapatam, which we print this week.

EXPENDITURE AND TAXATION.

RETRENCHMENT OF PUBLIC SERVICES.

While writing about Education and Taxation in the issue of the Reformer of the 1st instant, you remark that the Ministers when they are to meet educational expenditure are entitled to demand that they should satisfy themselves that all possible economy has been effected in the other, more especially, the reserved departments. This is, no doubt, essential; but, don't you think that before the Ministers interfere with the reserved subjects, they should see that the various posts in their own department which are not at all necessary are abolished at an early date? In this matter the Press and the general public should help them and point out the uselessness and superfluity of many of these posts.

There is a saying in the vernacular to the effect that when a big drum is required, a buffalo should be killed and not thousands of rats, for what can be achieved by the hide of one buffalo cannot be achieved by the hides of thousands of rats. So when the question of retrenchment is to be considered, not much saving could be done by reducing a number of menials or depriving them of their blankets or umbrellas hitherto given to them once in two years. If the Minister in charge of Excise and Forests, the two earning departments which are not reserved, were to closely study this question, he is sure to find that there are some big posts which could easily be abolished. I am sure that if he goes through the correspondence which passed when new posts were created in these departments, he would come to know that their creation was justified and urged more on the ground that the revenue brought by the particular department was enough to maintain the new posts created. Not much attention was paid to the question whether instead of creating a new higher post but only a subordinate one the same revenue could not be secured. I shall make my point clear by one illustration. Kanara yields a large amount of forest revenue. At one time there were only two Divisional Forest Officers. Their number has been gradually increased and now I think that there are some five or six of them there. Is it absolutely necessary that there should be so many of them to produce the present revenue? Cannot at least two of them be abolished and the sub-divisions reduced and more extra assistants created? After all the work required of the experts of the I. F. S. is general supervision; a wider area would not much affect it. Do not some of them spend four months in a year far away from their sub-division? If I am not mistaken, during the monsoon the Yellapur and Halyal officers have their camps in Belgaum.

Similarly the Excise Department contains more Superintendents than are absolutely necessary; even the abolition of one of the posts of the Deputy Commissioners would not affect the efficiency of the department. Except the coast districts and Kaira, in Gujarat, the vice of drink is not much prevalent in the Presidency. All the ghat districts and the Dekhan districts are really very temperate and there need be no fear of any illicit distillation here. Opium smuggling is to be guarded on the railway lines near Rajputana. So for all these districts one Deputy Commissioner is more than sufficient. The areas in charge of the Superintendents can without any risk be extended.

Now, turning to the department in charge of the Minister for Education, there is the post of the Destroyer of Rats. It is difficult to understand whether all the large amounts spent on this work is properly spent. The public have not at all been informed what substantial work has been done by that highly-paid officer. The publicity department published a statement of the number of rats killed; but surely the mere destruction of rats does not require such an officer. There was already a medical graduate of the local University who was looking after this work. In what way has the new officer improved the situation? Now that he has gone on leave and Dr. Fisher is in charge of the department, has the work in any way deteriorated? If a separate officer is required for this work, cannot Dr. Fisher look after it in addition to his own work at the Vaccine Institute at Belgaum? If Dr. Strikland has special knowledge which would be useful in dealing with plague, can he not be appointed Deputy Sanitary Commissioner and benefit of his knowledge utilised when he occupies this post? All these questions require close study. Again, is Dr. Fisher's whole time required at the Vaccine Institute? During the war, he very often acted as Civil Surgeon at Belgaum and was also in charge of the German Prisoners' Camp; now he is in charge of Major Strikland's duty supervising the rat destruction work. So, cannot both these posts be amalgamated?

Is it necessary that Major Strikland should have a typewriter and a highly-paid typist? For a layman this expense appears to be quite unjustifiable; not much writing and correspondence would be required for a bacteriologist. As regards the hosts of labourers engaged in the campaign of rat-catching, I may only remark that even the Commissioner of the Southern Division could not understand it and expressed surprise at their number. Again, why engage so many Assistant Surgeons and sub-Assistant Surgeons in this work? Mind you, the work is confined to a small area.

If the Civil Veterinary Department and the Agricultural Department are closely examined, there also many posts would be found near the top which could be conveniently reduced.

Now turning to the minor posts there are some of these which have no justification at all. I had already written to you about the Assistant Deputy Educational Inspector for the Depressed Class schools. So far as I could observe his work, it consisted of paying flying visits to these schools and drawing the full travelling allowance. As regards real inspection, he has no time at his disposal. Can this work not be entrusted to the general officer and that with better results? So also the Urdu Inspectors. By all means, let us have gentlemen belonging to the Depressed classes as general Assistant Deputy Inspectors and so also men knowing Urdu. Just as officers are encouraged to pass vernaculars which are not their mother tongue, let these Inspectors be encouraged to pass the Urdu test and let there be only one class, not separate classes, one for Urdu the other for depressed classes.

Indian leaders in a well-balanced and impressively spoken speech. His presence, demeanour and speech was one of the influences which moulded the inner mind of the Conference somewhat obscured by the set phrases of the resolutions. There were other good speeches, especially one by Mr. J. A. Wadia, which impressed the Conference. Can this work not be entrusted to the general officer and that with better results? So also the Urdu Inspectors. By all means, let us have gentlemen

The school-masters will supply a very good agency for publicity work. Let them be properly trained in their Training Colleges and then they would very usefully do this work. The publicity that I refer to is specially about Sanitation and Hygiene. The other day, I came across a person who is, I think, styled water demonstrator. He has to lecture to the village officers on the manner of keeping the water supply of the villages pure. I found the manner in which this work is done is quite useless, not being in actual touch with the village life, and having learnt his work in a laboratory his lessons are all of a type of laboratory lessons with the glass tube and glass tumbler. How many villages possess such glass vessels? I am afraid not more than one in a hundred. This demonstrator is expected to lecture to the village officers: how many of these village officers have the leisure or the inclination to teach the same lesson to their villagers? I am afraid few. So instead of spending money on the travelling allowance of this demonstrator, it would be better utilized on paying the school master an extra remuneration and the same work with infinitely better results could be extracted from them.

Don't you think that much of this multiplicity of posts and their continuation hitherto is due to the fact that the work done in the Educational and Medical departments is judged more by the money spent on it, calculated per head of the population than on the substantial work achieved by these departments?

The other department, transferred, in which much saving could be done is the Public Works Department. It is a very technical department and layman cannot suggest with confidence the methods of retrenchment. A Committee of our M. L. C's presided over by Dewan Bahadur Godbole might be very helpful in this respect. It should be asked to suggest both the ways of reducing the number of posts as also the ways by which much waste in the spending of money could be reduced. I have seen often concrete stored for miles and miles of a road and all the money sanctioned for a particular year for that road spent on this process; then for the subsequent years no further amount is sanctioned and so all that metal already collected is allowed to be washed away by the rain, the road not benefitting in the least by all that large amount spent on the metal for it. There must be several other instances of this kind. The Department in the case above mentioned could have improved a part of the road if, instead of taking 30 or 40 miles of it, they had concentrated their efforts on 10 or 15 miles of it and completed the whole process of macadamising of this.

* PRINCIPLES OF COMPARATIVE ECONOMICS

(Contributed.)

Dr. Makerji claims to "have attempted a re-orientation of economics in the light of recent advances in biology and psychology as applied to sociology; this has resulted in fresh economic theories and concepts concerning the problems of production and distribution, consumption and value, labour and population. (Preface p. xxiii)

We are, however, unable to find in this work an essentially new law of economics or new theory though, of course, there is plenty of novel, hyphenated nomenclature to hypnotise the reader into believing a achieved what the author claims to have attempted. It would be idle to deny that economics would gain enormously by a truer understanding of psychology which, under the guise of motives and stimuli, has not always been correctly understood by the still predominant school. But we doubt if Dr. Makerji in the volume under review, has succeeded in providing the student with a sort of Rontgen ray to analyse and interpret psychological factors in their economic reactions. The author depends for some of his basic propositions, e.g. the law of equivalence and substitution, upon the proper creation of a science of energetics which has yet to be developed; and he is accordingly forced to add:

"Experimental psychology has not proceeded far enough to supply us with an independent measure of effective or satisfactory value, on which we can build a calculus of utility. This is bound to come with advances in the direction of vitalistics and energetics, and of psychological experiments based thereon. The formulas we have stated are empirical generalisations which must await scientific elaboration and experimental verification." (p. 25)

We venture to think, however, that the promised elaboration and verification are as likely as not to prove illusory, since, from the nature of the subject-matter dealt with, the evolution of an objective standard of values seems almost impossible if economics is to remain a science. In any case the proper re-statement of the economic theories will be delayed unconsciously if we are to wait until psychology has evolved and perfected objective standards to test the strength of subjective stimuli and their reactions. The Weber-Fechner laws, even with the modifications of Makerji, leave us where we were.

The central theme of the author seems to be that Communalism would be an effective solution of socio-economic questions, and that proper attention to regional peculiarities would make economics more precise. We are unable to accept the proposition that Communalism, as defined by the author, is an effective substitute for collectivism, or that it is a cure for uncapitalism-cum-competition regime of to-day. The author considers his patent prescription as representing "The highest development of the principle of co-operation" wherein "groups are organised on the basis of natural and human relationships, not in fragments or specific functions as in polymorphism, nor as semi-independent particulate jurisdictions as in the third stage, but as epitomes of the full life of the community interwoven with one another in one comprehensive web of social life." (p. 43). The author is perfectly at liberty to indulge in a highly coloured picture of the origins of Communalism and of its working as "Seeking to satisfy the totality of individual interests and life-values" (p. 217), and "checking the development of class egoisms antagonistic to the communal welfare" (p. 218). He must recognise for mere consistency with his own other idea of adequate consideration of regional factors that communalism, however snugly it can be fitted into the Indian picture, would be entirely out of place in other societies which have not been so fortunate as to develop on Indian lines and have not got the Communalism of India. Even in those parts of India, which are rapidly going through a transition completing the industrial cycle, there may be reasonable doubt as to the efficacy of Communalism as an antidote to the growing forces of capitalism. In fact, were we soured by the anti-Brahmin feeling prevailing in Madras, we would read Mr. Mukerji's eulogy of Communalism as an entirely unconvincing apologia for the perpetual tyranny of specially favoured groups. In any case it is impossible to accept the author's differentiation between his communalism and the commonly accepted notions of Socialism. Dr. Mukerji has entirely misunderstood the aim of socialism if he believes:

* By Dr. Radha Kamal Makerji M.A. PH. D. (Published by P. S. King & Son Ltd. London)

"In Socialism the state seeks to replace industrial competition by the exercise of a coercive authority through a bureaucratic organisation that discourages individual functioning by standardising social functions, and thus tends to stop individual variation in the species." (p. 44).

The introduction of the term "Bureaucratic organisation" is an astute bid for popularisation of the idea in a country suffering for centuries from unrestrained bureaucracy. But because the bid may have been unconscious we cannot acquit the author altogether of unfair tactics. A certain amount of coercion is inevitable in any society that pretends to have an organisation for uniting and co-ordinating. For our part we have serious misgivings if the pet idea of the author would really involve less coercion, for, under Communalism, on his own reasoning, "There is little room for the unattached individual or the social rebel." As a matter of fact a good deal of healthy regulation in socialised communities will not be in the nature of coercion, but rather to serve as a guide and a standard, for the want of which the generality of mankind would be at sea in deciding complex questions of social relations and values. In any event, even admitting the possibility of coercion under socialism of a disagreeable sort to some extent, we cannot agree to consider it as anything more than temporary measure to suit a stage of necessary transition, when mankind is sufficiently educated to dispense altogether with coercive and compulsory regulation for guiding its unavoidable co-operation in the common effort to make life more beautiful, more liveable, and enjoyable. Coercion, even if necessary, is certainly not an end in itself or even an invariable concomitant of socialism.

Dr. Mukerji is quite right in stressing the importance of a proper study of regional environment for a truer conception of economic problems of a given section of humanity. He is also right in declaring that the prevailing school of economists had ignored this factor, though the criticism might have been less severe if it is meant to apply alike to the dogmatic exponents of the Manchester School and the more flexible doctrine of the German Historical School. The passages describing the constituents of a regional unit are as interesting as they are instructive, and the attempt to demarcate sub-regions display a creditable amount of learning. The requirements of the regional groups are analysed with the meticulous though ponderous precision characteristic of Dr. Mukerji's work at its best. We doubt, however, if he has really made out a convincing case for the sweeping assertion:

"In different economic zones the schemes of life values are different, and accordingly the proportions of moral and social justice suffered in the relative valuation of different grades and kinds of social functioning and services generally."—(p. 12).

The law of gravitation cannot be believed to be different in India because the South-West monsoon will not permit of aerial navigation in Indian regions by machines now in use for a considerable portion every year.

It is perhaps an unjustifiable criticism on a work apparently purely of an abstract scientific nature to urge that the reading leaves us disappointed at the absence of any constructive suggestions for some of the crying evils of the day. The writer does not aim in this work primarily at constructive economics in aid of practical statesmanship. He must therefore be immune from any tests of efficacy which his suggestions would have otherwise called forth. As it is, we must congratulate him on the production of a work, which, though not free from criticism, must be universally admitted to be original and striking enough to give rise to a violent fit of thinking, an absolutely indispensable preliminary to proper investigation.

THE BOMBAY CONFERENCE.

THE RESOLUTIONS PASSED.

CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE OUGHT NOT TO BE RESORTED TO.

The following resolutions were passed at the Representative Conference on its second day, Sunday, 15th January:—

RESOLUTION I.

This Conference is strongly of opinion that the policy adopted by Government within the last few weeks of extending and applying the Criminal Law Amendment Act and the Seditious Meetings Act to various parts of the country and of misusing the ordinary law in connection with political offenders, leading to wholesale arrests and imprisonments, including those of some of the most respected leaders and citizens, constitutes an unwarranted encroachment upon the elementary rights of citizenship, of the freedom of the Press and liberty of speech and association, has defeated its own object by alienating popular sympathy, and aggravating the general discontent and ought to be reversed without delay.

RESOLUTION II.

This Conference is further of opinion that, until it is clear beyond any doubt that no other means will secure a redress of the country's grievances and the status of full responsible government, the civil disobedience contemplated by the Ahmedabad Congress ought not to be resorted to.

RESOLUTION III.

In response to the sentiments expressed by H. E. the Viceroy in his speech at Calcutta, on the 21st December, 1921, and in order to explore all methods of reaching a harmonious and honourable settlement of the important issues now before the country, namely, the Punjab and Khilafat wrongs, and the demand for swaraj or full responsible government on the Dominion basis, this Conference supports the proposal for a round table conference between the Government and popular representatives; and is of opinion that, in order to provide a favourable atmosphere for the dispassionate consideration of the points in controversy, all notifications issued and orders passed by Government under Act 14 of 1908, Part II, and the Seditious Meetings Act, should be withdrawn and all prisoners convicted or under arrest or prosecution under the aforesaid notifications or orders should be released, as also the Fatwa prisoners, and that, inasmuch as persons have been convicted for non-violent activities and other activities of an innocent character under cover of the ordinary laws, a committee should be appointed by Government, consisting of two persons, one to be nominated by Government, and the other by the Committee of the Conference, appointed by resolution no. 5 with power to them to appoint an umpire to investigate the cases of the person hereinbefore referred to and that such of them as might be recommended by the said committee, or umpire be released and that pending the results of the said conference, all hartals, picketing and civil disobedience should cease.

RESOLUTION IV.

This is likewise of opinion that, having regard to the critical situation in the country and the desirability of effecting an early settlement, the round table conference should be called as soon as possible and that His Majesty's Government should clothe His Excellency the Viceroy with the authority necessary for the purpose of arriving at a settlement.

RESOLUTION V.

Without at present going into the particulars of the demands of the country with reference to the Punjab, Khilafat and swaraj questions, this Conference hereby appoints a committee of the following persons to carry on all communications with the Government on the one hand and the important political organisations in the country on the other with the view of arranging the composition, the dates and other details relating to the holding of the said round table conference, and for all purposes incidental to the carrying out of these resolutions, including, when necessary, the convening of another representative conference. The committee to consist of:—

Sir M. Visvesvaraya, Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, Mr. Seabegiri Iyer, Sir P. O. Ray, Mr. M. A. Jinnah, Mr. M. B. Jayakar, Sir Dinshaw M. Petit, Sir H. Wadia, Mr. C. B. Reddy, Mr. Satyamurti, Professor S. O. Mukerjee, Mr. Joseph Baptista, Mr. Rai Zada Bhatram, Mr. G. M. Bhurgri, Mr. B. Chakravarti, Mr. H. S. Gour, Pandit H. Kuzru, Mr. K. Natarajan, Mr. Hasan Imam and Pandit Gokarnath Misra, with power to co-opt.

CONGRESS WORKING COMMITTEE'S RESOLUTIONS.

The Working Committee of the All-India Congress Committee met at Mahatma Gandhi's residence, Laburnum Road, Bombay, on the 17th instant, with Mahatma Gandhi in the chair and nine members attending.

The Committee sat from 2 p. m. to 6 p. m. and passed among others the following resolutions:—

The Working Committee places on record its thanks to Pandit Malaviya and his fellow-conveners for convening the Conference of persons belonging to the various political parties in the country, for the purpose of considering the existing tension and having considered the resolutions of the conference the Committee resolves that the offensive civil disobedience contemplated by the Ahmedabad Congress be not started till the 1st day of January, 1922, or pending result of the negotiations undertaken by the Committee of the Malaviya Conference for a Round Table Conference whichever may be the first date.

The Working Committee considers it necessary for the purpose of creating an atmosphere favourable for a successful Round Table Conference that, (a) All notifications and notices declaring illegal and prohibiting the formation of volunteer corps, public meetings, picketing and other normal activities of the Congress or the Khilafat Committee be withdrawn and prisoners undergoing prosecution or conviction in respect of such notices be discharged or released as the case may be. (b) All Fatwa prisoners including the All Brothers and their companions be released. (c) All other prisoners already convicted or under trial for non-violence or other innocent activities be dealt with and discharged in the manner appointed therefor in the third resolution of the conference and (d) that simultaneously with the performance of the foregoing acts by the Governments concerned and in the event of a Round Table Conference being called and pending such conference all hartals, picketing and civil disobedience should cease.

In order to avoid any misunderstanding about the Congress demands the Working Committee desires to draw the attention of the Committee appointed by the Malaviya Conference to the Khilafat, the Punjab and the Swaraj claims as stated publicly from time to time from the Congress platforms and to state that, therefore, the Congress and the Khilafat representatives will be bound to demand full settlement of the three claims.

THE BOMBAY CONFERENCE.

PARAS OPINIONS.

The Hindu, Madras daily, (Congress).

The Bombay Conference of leaders, whose proceedings are detailed elsewhere, certainly better deserves its name than did the Calcutta Conference. It was more comprehensive and more representative in personnel. It seems to have set itself to work really with a will to win. Above all, rid of parasitical views, it struck the right chord at the very commencement. Its conception of its duty was on a higher level than that which actuated at least some of the leading members of the Calcutta Conference. The latter, some of them at least, sought to play the role of disinterested peace-makers instead of that of patriots. They failed, and their failure is regretted by none. To the credit of the Bombay Conference, it must be said that it proceeded on patriotic lines. It did not pose as a disinterested, superior person. Its members did not think it a crime that they had a stake in the country. On the other hand, they realised that the unjust, the illegal blows which are now being mercilessly administered on the sacred rights of the citizen, the right of speech, of writing and of association are blows directed, not against the Non-Co-operation movement as such, but against the rights of citizenship in general.

Swarajya, Madras daily, (Congress).

The conference at Bombay is itself a sign that the conscience of the Moderates has been stung to the quick by the repressive policy of the Government. It is a sure sign of awakening that so many Moderate members of the Delhi Assembly have preferred to attend the Bombay Conference. They have now realised that when the nation's fundamental liberties are attacked, it is idle to sit and discuss futile resolutions. Nothing more is needed to convince the public that the Moderates have become restive as a result of the Government's present policy. They have failed to stem the tide of repression in all the provinces. The Moderates now perceive that the Reforms which they thought would advance the interests of the country, have not been able to check the uncontrolled exercise of bureaucratic authority.

New India, Madras daily, (Breant).

The Conference seems to have ended without much result, as might have been expected from the beginning. Mr. Gandhi proved to be determined to yield nothing, while he talked self righteous nonsense about penitence in the Government. Things would be more hopeful if Mr. Gandhi showed "a change of heart," and some penitence for the bloodshed he has caused, and the ever-growing danger into which he is luring the country. We are all suffering under the tyranny of his supporters, their insolence and brutality. We shall comment on the resolution and speeches in our next issue.

Bombay Chronicle, daily, (Congress).

The results are such as indicate an honourable way out of the present crisis, provided Lord Reading and his Government are genuinely anxious for a satisfactory settlement and are prepared courageously to rise to the occasion and immediately take the action that is demanded. Mahatma Gandhi made it clear at the Ahmedabad Congress that the door was open for Lord Reading to come to a settlement with the people. Only he demanded a change of heart as the essential condition precedent. The Conference which ended last evening has shown Lord Reading definitely and clearly how this change of heart of the part of his Government has to be manifested. The only satisfactory manner in which this change of heart can be manifested is, of course, for the Government to yield to the demands of the Congress unconditionally by transforming themselves into a truly Indian Government. However, the next best method, in the circumstance, is that pointed out by the Malaviya Conference.

Advocate of India, Bombay daily, (Anglo-Indian).

Evil associations corrupt good manners, and the Liberals are likely to find that this will be the only result of the Conference held in Bombay with the Non-Co-operation party during the week-end. A study of the resolutions adopted would indicate that the general political position remains unchanged, and the fact that a number of individuals present refused to vote for the resolutions, being content to let them be passed in silence, was very significant. Rightly or wrongly it seems that the majority of those present at the Conference recognised the futility of the resolutions. The object of the Conference was to find the means whereby an honourable peace with the Government could be obtained. Mr. Gandhi was the leading representative of the Non-co-operation party, and at the very outset of the Conference said that if there was to be peace it must be on his own terms. After this it was almost useless to continue, because it is well-known that his terms are impossible to fulfil.

The Leader, Allahabad daily, (Liberal).

The first resolution condemns the present policy of the Government and doing so does nothing more than express the view that has been widely expressed by men and associations belonging to various shades of opinion in the country. That the present policy of indiscriminate arrest has weakened the moral position of Government by further alienating popular sympathy and aggravating general discontent, and has pari passu strengthened the position of Mr. Gandhi, admits of little doubt. We do not know whether the Government realises this fact. If it does, the obvious course open to it is to retrace its steps as gracefully as possible. The prestige of no Government, in the sense in which Lord Reading interpreted the term in replying to the deputation of Liberals that waited upon him some months ago, can suffer by the rectification of a mistake. The spirit of non-co-operation can neither be suppressed nor effectively combated by creating an additional grievance of a more or less acute nature. The remedy that has been applied has only aggravated the disease. The question is not so much, as the Indian Social Reformer recently pointed out, whether the policy adopted is just, as whether it is right. Is the Government prepared to arrest all those who have enlisted as volunteers and who have thereby committed the breach of the non-co-operation? If it is not, then what becomes of enforcing the law? The Conference expressed the view that until it is clear beyond doubt that no other means would secure a redress of the country's grievance, civil disobedience should not be started. We are in entire agreement with this view.

The Tribune, Lahore daily, (Independent).

If the Conference has done nothing else, it has certainly thrown a flood of light on the attitude of a very large section of the people in regard to the vitally important questions of civil disobedience on the one hand and the repressive policy of the Government on the other, and has also brought into existence a machinery for the purpose of arranging the preliminaries in connection with the holding of a Round Table Conference. As regards the first, the Conference, which represented all that is good and true in our public life outside the ranks of those who have either accepted office under the Crown as ministers and members of the Executive Council or are in prison as a result of the present collision between the Government and the non-co-operators, made it perfectly clear that on the one hand it is absolutely opposed to the present policy of the Government, which in its opinion should be reversed without delay, and on the other hand it is definitely of opinion that the civil disobedience contemplated by the Ahmedabad Congress should not be resorted to "until it is clear beyond any doubt that no other means will secure a redress of the country's grievances and the status of full responsible government for India." Subject to one single reservation, we can think of no difference of opinion on either point among patriotic and self-respecting Indians. Unhappily that reservation touches the only practical issue involved in the controversy. What is the criterion by which we are to judge whether the time has or has not come for the country to conclude that no other means will secure its object? The non-co-operators, at any rate, believe that the time has come already otherwise they would not have decided to start civil disobedience. On the other hand, there are others, including not only the Liberals, but practically the whole of the Independent Nationalist party among whom we count ourselves, who believe that the time has not come. It is perfectly obvious that so long as an objective standard of judgment as between these contending claims is not evolved, all suggestions for the suspension of civil disobedience will fall on deaf ears, except on one basis.

Young India, Ahmedabad weekly, (Mahatma Gandhi).

The Conference was both a success and a failure. It was a success in that it showed an earnest desire on the part of those who attended to secure a peaceful solution of the present trouble, and in that it brought under one roof people possessing divergent views. It was a failure in that, though certain resolutions have been adopted, the Conference did not leave on my mind the impression that those who assembled together as a whole realized the gravity of the real issue. The mind of the Conference seemed to be centred more on a round table conference than upon asserting the popular right of free speech, free association and free press which are more than a round table conference. I had expected on the part of the independents to declare their firm attitude that no matter how much they might differ regarding the methods of non-co-operation, the freedom of the people was a common heritage and that the assertion of that right was three-fourths of Swaraj; that therefore they would defend that right even with civil disobedience, if need be.

However, as the attention of the conference could not be rivetted on that point but on a round table conference, the discussion turned upon the essentials of such a conference.

My own position was clear. I would attend any conference as an individual, without any conditions. My purpose as a reformer is to convert people to the view I hold to be right and therefore to see everybody who would care to listen to me. But when I was asked to mention the conditions necessary for an atmosphere favourable for a successful conference, I had to press some certain conditions. And I must own that the Resolutions Committee approached my view point with the greatest sympathy and showed every anxiety to accommodate me. But side by side with this I observed an admirable disposition on its part to consider the Government's difficulties. Indeed the Government's case could not have been better presented, if it had been directly and officially represented in the Conference.

The result was a compromise.

Servant of India, Poona weekly, (Liberal).

Nor are we satisfied that the part which Mr. Gandhi took in the conference as an outsider was exactly of the kind to help create the favourable atmosphere for a Round Table Conference which it was the desire of the promoters of this preliminary conference to create. He demanded as a condition precedent to the holding of the Round Table Conference that the Government should show themselves penitent for the measures of repression which they have recently called into operation. Now, we are among those who have condemned these measures, but when you wish to confer with your opponent with a view to an amicable settlement of the dispute, you do not secure that result best by first insisting that he should confess his error. The promoters of the conference likewise call for a reversal of the present repressive policy of Government, but they do it, not so much because it is wrong in itself, as because it is calculated to impede their efforts to bring about a settlement. It is not their present purpose to consider the question of repression on its merits, but merely to take steps likely to produce a favourable atmosphere for negotiations as regards the points which are in issue between the Government and the people. It is necessary for such a favourable atmosphere to be produced, not only that the repressive policy should be discontinued in future but that those who have suffered in consequence of it in the past should be released. This demand we heartily endorse, but in connexion with the proposal for a Round Table Conference, on a ground entirely different from the one advanced by Mr. Gandhi. The Viceroy took the correct line in this respect, that, if any action is to be taken by Government or by non-co-operators preparatory to the holding of the conference, "no advantage or triumph should be claimed on either side and no reproach should be made by the one to the other." The conference, of course, did not support Mr. Gandhi in his position, but the fact that he took such a position did not facilitate the work of the conference.

Indian Mirror, Calcutta daily, (Reactionary)

The proceedings of the Bombay Conference are not without a strong Gilbertian flavour. Mr. Gandhi is found seated, not at but on the table, and laying bare his heart. The heart is aglow with satisfaction with the non-co-operation movement. It refuses to yield to the entreaty of Pandit Malaviya and others to attend the Round Table Conference. It will, says its owner, require as the first propitiatory offering the release of all his disciples who are in jail. To be serious, one does not see what earthly good can result from the proposed Round Table Conference. The Government of India have clearly and definitely explained their policy—not once but many times over; and the gentlemen who are anxious for a 'settlement' know or ought to know that practically remains to be settled. Unless and until Gandhism makes its exit from the political arena, there is no chance of maintaining peace by normal measures. Violence must be restrained; loyal and law-abiding citizens must be protected; the country must be saved from the grip of Bolshevism. These are the outstanding issues.

The Times of India, Bombay daily, (Anglo-Indian)

We were led by the conveners of what has been called the political conference in Bombay to believe that the main purpose of this gathering was to devise means whereby it would be possible to open wide the door to an honourable settlement of the political issues which now beset the country. With a view to attaining this end Mr. Gandhi and some of his political associates were invited to be present. The expectations of those who thought, or who professed to think, that an honourable settlement was possible with Mr. Gandhi must have been based either on ignorance of the speeches and articles in which he has declared his political faith, or else on an amazing misreading of those speeches and articles. Now, however, the situation has been made clear beyond the possibility of doubt, not only in the report of the proceedings which has been published, but in the letter from Sir Sankaran Nair explaining the reasons which induced him to withdraw, which appears in this issue. The conveners of the Conference said they sought an honourable peace. Their word is accepted, for they are honourable men. Does Mr. Gandhi seek an honourable peace? Sir Sankaran Nair tells us as the fruit of his experience what in effect we all knew before, that Mr. Gandhi is bent on the humiliation of Government. What conceivable basis of an honourable peace is to be found here? Mr. Gandhi repeats in parrot fashion in his writings and speeches his three shibboleths, the righting of the Punjab wrongs, the redress of the Khilafat grievances and the immediate attainment of swaraj.

The Sind Observer, Karachi daily, (Independent)

The gentlemen who have invited the general political conference which is now being held in Bombay are men of great respectability and patriotism, and have behind them a good record of service to the country. They do not belong to the official Liberal party nor have they any sympathy with the disruptive doctrines of Non-co-operation. They are Nationalists with a strong constitutional bent of mind. Their abhorrence of repression is only equalled by their repugnance of all political methods of warfare which are in the nature of short cuts to Swaraj. They find that Government are not only too slow to move at a time when the world is moving in the track of centuries, but that they are following a distinctly reactionary course, thus belying all the promises of the reformed era. They find, on the other side, the N. C. O. movement strengthened and consolidated by the recent policy of Government and are anxious to avoid a stern conflict between the two opposing parties, which is bound to work ruin for the country. They want to arrest the progress of repression and civil disobedience by acting as mediators in the interest of the country and of Government.

Justice, Madras daily, (Non-Brahmin).

Some three hundred people are reported to have attended the Conference held in Bombay on Saturday last "in order to arrive at some understanding to bring about a Round Table Conference between the Government and the people." We do not know what right or authority these estimable individuals who had taken the trouble to attend the Conference have to speak and act in the name of the country and on behalf of its people. For aught we know, many of these so-called "political leaders" are self-appointed, and possess no mandate from any appreciable body of our countrymen to assume the role of peace-makers as between the Government and its would-be subverters. Nor are they such disinterested individuals as they would fain have the public believe. Some of them were at the Conference, it is easy enough to surmise, mainly with a view to secure for themselves an opportunity for cheap self-advertisement and self-glorification. Barring these notoriety-hunters, there were, of course, a few others present at the Conference, but it is extremely doubtful as to whether all of them had gone to the Conference with unbiased and open minds.

THE ARYA VYSYA CONFERENCE.

The Eleventh Session of the Arya Vysya Maha Sabha was held at Vizagapatam on the 10th, 11th & 12th December at the Sri Raja Rajeswari Theatre. The proceedings commenced at 8 p.m. with prayers and the singing of Vande Mataram by a choir of ladies. There was a large attendance of delegates from various parts of the Presidency including a number of ladies. Sjt. Pasumurti Veerbhadraswami Garu, B.A., read his welcome address. Sjt. T. Adinarayana Chetty, Bar-at-law was duly proposed and on his taking the Presidential Chair he delivered his address.

The Conference continued its sittings on the 11th and 12th December. The following resolutions, among others were unanimously adopted. Resolution 1. In the opinion of the Conference it is desirable that girls ought to be married only after attaining puberty. This was proposed by Sjt. W. Bangarayya Setti, B. A., B.L. (Vizag); and supported by Vinakota Jagannatha Gupta (Vizag), Poliseti Adinarayan Gupta (Guntur); Pandit Namburi Venkatagopal Row (Rajmundry). A declaration giving assurance that the signatories would obey the resolution and actually promote post puberty marriage and undertaking not to put obstacles on the way of those who promote post puberty marriages and continuing in the community was signed by the delegates present.

Resolution 2. That in the opinion of this Conference the remarriage of Vysya Virgin Widows is not prohibited and the people who have already contracted such re-marriages should be considered as not having lost their place in the community. This was proposed by Sjt. K. Suryanarayana Gupta (Viza); seconded by Sjt. Balam Subbarao Gupta (Cocanada) and supported by Pandit Nambur Venkatagopalarao (Rajmundry); Sjt. P. Adinarayana Gupta (Guntur); and Sjt. Vinakota Jagannatha Gupta (Vizag); Sjt. S. Ramaswamy Gupta (Guntur) and Sjt. S. Subramania Setty (Madras) spoke against the proposition. This was carried by a very large majority. The General Secretary then read out the names of the committee of the Arya Vysya Maha Sabha for the ensuing year. This was adopted by the Conference with the exception of the creed of the Sabha and to report to the Conference on the following day. That the constitution of the Arya Vysya Maha Sabha be altered as reported upon by the sub committee. (Put from the chair and carried unanimously).

Resolution 3. That the conference recognises that Lingadhars are Arya Vysyas coming under the 102 clans (Gotras).

This was proposed by Sjt. S. Ramaswami Gupta (Guntur); seconded by Sjt. W. Bangarayya Setti (Vizag); supported by Pandit Grandi Rangaraju (Vizianagram); Sjt. Majeti Ramachandara Row (Ellore); Sjt. K. Suryanarayana Gupta (Vizag) and Sjt. S. Bapanayya (Rajmundry). The President also made a speech in bringing the discussion to a close. This was then put to vote and carried unanimously.

Resolution 4. The question of Thoorpu Nadu Vysyas was raised. The undermentioned gentlemen took part in the discussion.

After a prolonged discussion it was resolved that a Committee consisting of Sjt. Poosale Pedabrahmaji Chodavaram; Kaka Appalanarasimha Gupta (Parvatipur); Boddu Bangaru Setty (Vizianagram); Maidela Acharyulu (Anakapalle); Vinakota Durgarao (Viza) with P. Verabhadraswami of Vizianagram as President and convener be formed.

The above committee is to go into the question, take evidence and report the President of Northern Circle of the Arya Vysya Mahasabha within three months.

Resolution 5. In the opinion of this conference the Arya Vysya committee should take steps to promote the removal of untouchability from our society. This was proposed by Sjt. Achom Varasimhamurty (Palacole) and Seconded by Sjt. S. Ramaswami Gupta (Guntur). This was carried unanimously.

Resolution 6. In the opinion of this conference it is desirable that Vysya Seva Samithies should be established in every town, and district for the good of the community. This was proposed by Sjt. P. Adinarayana Gupta (Guntur) and seconded by Sjt. Darsi Chanchaib (Nellore) and supported by Sjt. S. Subramaniam Chetty B. A. (Madras). This was carried unanimously.

Resolution 7. In the opinion of this Conference it is the duty of every Vysya to promote Swadeshi by wearing Khaddar, by using Khaddar exclusively on both auspicious and inauspicious occasions and by introducing hand spinning in every house. This should be brought into force by Sankaranthi day. This was proposed by Sjt. S. Bananiash B. A. B. L., (Rajamendry) seconded by Sjt. P. Adinarayan Gupta (Guntur); supported by Sjt. W. Bangarayya Setti B. A. B. L., (Vizag) and Sjt. Acham Narasimhamoorty (Palacole). This was carried unanimously.

Resolution 8. In the opinion of the Conference the employment of coolies, porters and servants who have not given up the use of intoxicants by Vysya merchants is highly advisable. This was proposed by Sjt. Pandit Kollur Jagannadham (Vizag) and seconded by Kandula Ekarambaraswara Rao (Ellore). This was carried unanimously.

Resolution 9. In the opinion of this Conference the employment of nautch girls in temples and on marriage occasions should be discouraged and that steps ought to be taken to induce them to abandon the wicked life they were leading. This was proposed by Sjt. Majeti Ramachandra Row (Ellore) and seconded by Acham Subbarao (Cocanada) and this was carried unanimously.

Resolution 10. It is desirable that arrangements should be made for starting a journal at Vizag bearing the name "Vysya" with the help of the Arya Vysa Maha Sabha. This was proposed by Sjt. V. Dargareo (Vizag) and seconded by Sjt. S. Venkatrao. This was carried unanimously.

Resolution 11. In the opinion of the Conference the accumulate Vysia Educational Fund should be utilised for the promotion of Educational, Industrial and National progress. This was proposed by Sjt. K. Lingamarthi B. A. L. T. (Rajamendey) and seconded by Sjt. V. Terapatti (Vizianagram). This was carried unanimously.

Resolution 12. In the opinion of this Conference the establishment of Vysia Chambers of Commerce and Vysia Banks in important centres is desirable. Proposed by Sjt. S. Venkatrao (Coonada) and seconded by Sjt. P. Verahadr-swami B. A. (Vizianagram). This was carried unanimously.

The title of Vysya Ratna was conferred on Sjt. Senezapalle Rameswami Gupta of Guntur for his invaluable services to the Community.

The President in bringing the proceedings to a close urged on the leader of the Community the early publication of the Conference Report and steps being taken to see that the Resolutions did not remain a dead letter. He welcomed the idea of Seva Samethis being established for carrying out the object. He would also urge on the desirability of the minorities loyally and cheerfully carrying out the wishes of the majority as the present critical time was not one for cherishing of private differences but for whole-hearted and zealous work for the good of the Community.

THE MOPLAH OUTBREAK.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Your correspondents, the Secretaries of Congress and Khalifat Committees of Malabar have done a distinct service to truth by putting real but useful facts before the public. They seem to be disappointed that the Khalifat Conference of Ahmedabad while passing a resolution of sympathy for the Moplah sufferers, had not a word of sympathy for the Hindu sufferers, victims of the Moplah atrocities. They doubt if the Hindu-Moslem unity is as deep as it ought to be. Allow me to suggest them that the Hindu-Moslem entente is only two years old. It is impossible for both the communities to forget the differences of some centuries in so short a time. It means that the wind has begun to blow in that direction and nothing more.

What we outsiders wonder is this: what is it that has made our Malabar Hindu brethren so unworthy of life that when their houses were plundered, their women were outraged, their children massacred, they could not make even a semblance of resistance? What is it that enabled our Parsi brethren to stand as one man in Bombay riots? Study of this question will benefit the Hindus of Malabar and of other places more than any amount of soothing words from Mahatma Gandhi and Khalifat Committees. Malabar Hindus have no right to claim Swaraj. Swaraj is the power of self-defence. It seems again they want to hang on the Moslems for protection. It only means a change of masters. In such miseries the tears we shed towards Heaven, fall on our own cheeks. A few words on Hindu-Moslem entente, and I finish.

It was fondly believed by some that the real point of disagreement between the Hindus and the Moslems was only a question of 'Cow-Sacrifice.' But thanks to the Moplabs, they have brought the long forgotten matter to the front. It is the question of forcible conversion. What does past history enlighten us on this point?

The entente between 70 millions of Moslems united on the solid principle of fraternity and worship of one God, and thrice the number of Hindu divided by hundreds of castes and worship of hundreds of gods is an alliance of a giant with three dwarfs jealous of each other. Honourable alliance is only possible, if corresponding to Moslem fraternity, there is Hindu fraternity. The menace of forcible conversion must be answered by killing caste and untouchability and by nothing else.

Yours etc.,
KARAKK K. G.

CHRISTIANITY AND ITS DISTINCTIVE CONTRIBUTION.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I gather from papers that the Rev. Father Goodier, the Roman Archbishop, has said in the Catholic Conference recently held in Bombay that the distinctive contribution of Christianity in India must be Social Service. With all due deference to such an authority, may I take the liberty to say that if Christianity is going to hold its place, not only in India but in the whole world, it will not be so much by its Social Service as by its spirituality, i. e., conquest of sin and experience of salvation? True Christianity, which is the life in Christ, has always meant this and will always mean the same. It will be said that this is not a new thing peculiar to Christianity. This may be admitted, though with this reservation that Christianity has deepened this experience for man and given it an emphasis which is rarely to be met with elsewhere. It is due to this and this alone that Christianity has had comparatively the largest missionary agency all through its career. No doubt, Social Service must be there, but only as a necessary consequence and fruit of this higher spiritual life. Apart from that, Social Service is bound to degenerate into proselytizing or patronising work, which is very often unfortunately so, whether among Christian Missions or Indian Social Service Leagues etc. It is at best but a patch-work and a half-measure, and the world is weary of all such. What the world really wants is a new creation, the divine life, and it is this which Christianity of the true stamp promises to give. There is always room for such divine life in India, where possibly it will have to pass through a much more severe test than it has hitherto, a process which will be purificatory of much of what passes under the name of Christianity but what is only dress. It may be that Christianity itself will come out of this a purer thing than it has been hitherto for ages and will be more after the mind of Christ Himself. Thus while serving India the Christians will serve themselves and the whole world. Could there be anything more welcome than this to those who call themselves disciples and followers of Christ Jesus?

ROYAL YAKUTI.

THIS YAKUTI or life giving sector has been prepared from the best, choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has wonderful properties of increasing virile power and it rectifies urinary disorders. In fact it makes man a man. This valuable
medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and
gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to these persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen
the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility.
Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicines. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires. It is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills. Rupees ten only.

NOTES.

Whose Freedom First? A. G. M. writes:—"I believe that Mr. Gandhi has rendered India a great service. All his methods do not approve themselves to one, yet he is teaching India a great lesson in self-control. Unfortunately comparatively few have learned the whole lesson. However, success in this matter has surpassed our hopes and all should be thankful for the progress made. On the other hand, I fear that Mr. Gandhi is in danger of an almost complete failure in regard to one of the principles for which he is contending. I mean the principle which he puts first in his programme, namely the striking from off the lives of sixty millions of his countrymen, the shackles by which they have been bound, for these many many centuries. Many of Mr. Gandhi's followers are putting this last, rather let me say, they are giving this no place at all in their pretensions of carrying out his programme. The Indian Social Reformer is to be commended for its attitude toward this matter and I hope that it will raise its voice yet louder until Mr. Gandhi at least will be unable to rest for the burden of it. As a young man, Abraham Lincoln chanced to see a negro slave on the auction block being sold as an animal. The sight stirred the blood of this young man to a passion and he vowed in his heart that if ever he got a chance he "would smite that thing, and smite it hard." His chance did come, as the President of the United States of America, and he penned his "Emancipation Proclamation" setting free several millions of slaves. There are ten times that number of serfs, practically slaves, in this land of India today, the great majority of whom are dreading the coming in of Mr. Gandhi's "Swaraj." How in the name of ordinary common sense can any one hope that India can be one in its desire for Home Rule so long as these millions are being depressed and deprived of the most ordinary of human rights? I am a great admirer of Mr. Gandhi, but to an American, it seems that some of India's internal conditions, which date back to ages before the English came, are so diametrically opposed to Democracy that to advocate the latter seems a travesty. May we not appeal to India's great leader to prosecute this revolution among and against his own followers before pressing to a crisis a revolution against the Government? Not a few of India's own sons are regretting that the latter transference of power by the powers that be, seems to be so much nearer of realization than the former. Some of us who know the disabilities of the "Untouchables" would like to see the removal of these blotches emphasized a very great deal more than is being done."

Sir Sankaran Nair and the Fatwa Prisoners: The most weighty criticism on Sir Sankaran Nair's defection from the Bombay Conference comes from the Madras Liberal Journal, the Citizen. Says our contemporary:

His objection to the release of fatwa prisoners, especially the Ali brothers, is that they are real adherents of the violence party and that after they are free they will continue their agitation. The Ali brothers and the fatwa prisoners are not going to remain perpetually in gaol. As soon as their terms are over, they must be released and then they will be at liberty to follow their avocations. The object of their being granted freedom is to create a favourable atmosphere, and when Lloyd George shook hands with Irishmen whose hands were reported to be stained with blood, we cannot see why, in view of an amicable settlement, the fatwa prisoners should not be set at liberty in order to ease the tension. It is of course quite open to the Government to clap them into gaol again if they should preach violence. As regards those convicted under Part II of the Criminal Law Amendment Act, Sir Sankaran Nair feels doubtful whether all of them can be released because some of them might have belonged to Associations for the Commission of acts which, in the opinion of the Government, were bound to lead to violence. It is a dangerous power which Sir Sankaran Nair wishes to give the Government, of pronouncing upon the probable results of even peaceful and legitimate activities of associations which, in conceivable circumstances, may lead to violence. If so, a social service league may be dangerous. The responsibility of Government to take measures to prevent the commission of those acts which would in all reasonable probability lead to violence which would cause suffering would really, take them to lengths which might vitally affect the liberty of individuals. It would not be the rule of law, but the enthronement of executive discretion, as the guiding factor.

Dr. Gour's Civil Marriage Bill: The Legislative Assembly has rejected by a majority the motion to refer Dr. Gour's Civil Marriage Bill to a Select Committee. Dr. Gour, perhaps, was not wise in exaggerating the probable effects of his measure if passed, but the rejection of it by the Legislative Assembly shows that the majority has not understood freedom except as a political formula. We shall revert to the subject when we have the official report of the debate before us. Meanwhile, we should not omit to express our surprise at the opposition offered to this modest measure by Mahomedan and Parsi members.

Malabar Relief Fund: We have received the following contributions to the Malabar Relief Fund: Mr. K. G. Karkare, Devlali Rs: 5 (monthly), Mr. A. G. MCGAV, Etah, Rs. 17-2-0.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, JANUARY 29, 1922.

GOVERNMENT AND THE CONFERENCE.

The Conference held in Bombay of representative Indian politicians met on the 14th January and concluded next day. On the 16th January, Rai Bahadur Pandit J. L. Bhargava asked in the Legislative Assembly at Delhi if Government proposed to hold a Round Table Conference as early as possible and invite thereto men of all shades of opinion including Non-Co-operation leaders. The Honourable Sir William Vincent, the Home Member, replied as follows:

The Honourable Member's attention is invited to His Excellency's speech of the 21st December, 1921, to the Calcutta Deputation in which the attitude of Government was clearly explained.

In the speech referred to by the Home Member, the Viceroy made plain that all discussion between himself and Pandit Malaviya preliminary to the deputation, which His Excellency was addressing, proceeded upon the basis of a genuine attempt, a disinterested and honourable attempt, to solve the problems of unrest by means of discussion and consideration at a Conference and that meanwhile there should be a cessation of activities on both sides, of unlawful operations on the part of the non-co-operationists and of Government prosecutions and imprisonments. The Viceroy went on to say:

I wish with all my heart that it had been possible to deal with these problems in a large and generous spirit worthy of such an occasion in the history of India. Had there been indications to this effect before me to-day in the representations which you have made in your address on the part of the leaders of Non-Co-operation, had the offer been made to discontinue open breaches of law for the purpose of providing a calmer atmosphere for the discussion of the remedies suggested, my Government would never have been backward in response. We would have been prepared to consider the new situation in the same large and generous spirit and I would have conferred with the Local Governments for this purpose. I should have wished, and I know that I speak not only my own thoughts but those of Pandit Malaviya in this respect—that, if such conditions had supervened, no advantage or triumph should be claimed on either side and no reproach should be made by the one to the other of having been forced to yield or of not having the courage to proceed with its campaign.

His Excellency deeply regretted that those were not the conditions present and "the discussion, which, I thought, was to have proceeded on the high level of a patriotic desire by temporary mutual concession and forbearance to the finding of a solution of India's present problems, takes the form, in its present aspect, of a request to the Government to abandon its action without any guarantee that the action which has led, or as we believed, forced the Government to take such action, would also cease." The Viceroy, therefore, could not comply with the request of the deputation, but His Excellency added:

But I should be sorry, indeed, if any observations I have made could be construed into a refusal for all time to consider the convening of a Conference. Certainly I have not intended by the language I have used to convey that meaning to you. I have too great a regard for the value of discussion and for the consideration of suggestions and recommendations that may be made. I am not one of those who think that all wisdom is to be found in those who happen to be in positions of authority. I have had too great an experience of life not to appreciate that advantage may be derived from discussion and consultation with others who see from different angles and who may have views to put forward which had not occurred to us. But I can only act, at the moment, in view of the present existing circumstances and as they stand. For the reasons that I have given you, I must express my great regret that the essential conditions for peace are not forthcoming.

The conveners of the Bombay Conference were obviously encouraged by Lord Reading's speech to make an effort to bring about the conditions owing to the absence of which in December, His Excellency could not comply with the request to call a Round Table Conference. They got together at very short notice over two hundred representatives of the several schools of political opinion in the country. The net result of the Conference has certainly been substantially to bring about the supervision of the main conditions which His Excellency required. "Had there been indications to this effect before me to-day, in the representation which you have made in your address, on the part of the leaders of Non-Co-operation, had the offer been made to discontinue open breaches of law for the purpose of providing a calmer atmosphere for the discussion of the remedies suggested, my Government would never have been backward in response." Such an offer has been made on the part of the leaders of Non-Co-operation in the resolution passed by the Working Committee of the All-India Congress Committee in pursuance of Mahatma Gandhi's undertaking at the Conference. The resolution reads:

The Working Committee places on record its thanks to Pandit Malaviya and his fellow-conveners for convening the Conference of persons belonging to the various political parties in the country, for the purpose of considering the existing tension and having considered the resolutions of the conference the Committee resolves that the offensive civil disobedience contemplated by the Ahmedabad Congress be not started till the 31st day of January, 1922, or pending result of the negotiations undertaken by the Committee of the Malaviya Conference for Round Table Conference whichever may be the first date.

The Working Committee considers it necessary for the purpose of creating an atmosphere favourable for a successful Round Table Conference that, (a) All notifications and notices declaring illegal and prohibiting the formation of volunteer corps, public meetings, picketing and other normal activities of the Congress or the Khilafat Committee be withdrawn and prisoners undergoing prosecution or conviction in respect of such notices be discharged or released as the case may be. (b) All Fatwa prisoners including the All Brothers and their companions be released. (c) All other prisoners already convicted or under trial for non-violence or other innocent activities be dealt with and discharged in the manner appointed therefor in the third resolution of the Conference and (d) that simultaneously with the performance of the foregoing acts by the Governments concerned and in the event of a Round Table Conference being called and pending such conference all hartals, picketing and civil disobedience should cease.

Here is a distinct offer "to discontinue open breaches of law"—His Excellency's phrase—"for the purpose of providing a calmer atmosphere for the discussion of the remedies suggested" on the part of the leaders of Non-Co-operation. Certain conditions are attached to the offer, but the Viceroy himself had suggested "a cessation of activities on both sides, of unlawful operations on the part of the Non-Co-operationists and of Government prosecutions and imprisonments." His Excellency declared that he hated the making of numerous arrests and prosecutions, and here is an offer to suspend actions which have led Government to resort to them, simultaneously with their cessation. In the wise words of the Viceroy "no advantage or triumph should be claimed on either side and no reproach should be made by the one to the other of having been forced to yield or of not having the courage to proceed with the campaign." This is as far removed as anything can be from Sir Sankaran Nair's random talk of "humiliating" Government. By the way, some of Sir Sankaran Nair's dissenting minutes, since published, while he was still a member of the Government of India, are not exactly calculated to enhance the prestige of Government!

If, as Sir William Vincent said, the Viceroy's speech to the Calcutta deputation last month continues to represent the attitude of Government to the proposal of a Round Table Conference, it is inconceivable that they should not call one now that the result of the Bombay Conference has been substantially to produce the conditions His Excellency desiderated. If they should not do so, the only conclusion possible is that though Sir William Vincent's statement might have been correct on the 16th of January, it is no longer so now when lengthy and more or less accurate reports of the Conference are before the Government of India. We should not be surprised if Sir Sankaran Nair's withdrawal and his subsequent statement in the Press of his reasons for so doing, have had the effect of embarrassing Government in carrying out its desire to call a Conference. Mahatma Gandhi, too, needlessly adopted a tone of peremptoriness in his references to Government, which, besides being out of keeping with his innate respect for his fellow-men, might provoke to irritation where conciliation to compliance is called for by the country's interests. We trust that the Viceroy will not let the ill-humour of Sir Sankaran or the didacticism of the Mahatma, swerve him an inch from the bold and statesmanlike course outlined in his Calcutta speech. We are firmly convinced that this is a most favourable opportunity for calling the Round Table Conference, and we earnestly trust that it would be made full use of.

Treatment of Political Prisoners. Statements have been published of the harsh treatment of political prisoners in some places, which have created much indignation. We trust that these cases will be enquired into and steps taken to punish those responsible for them. We are meanwhile pleased to know that there has been an improvement in this respect—at least so we understand the following passage in a letter from Mr. Mahadev Desai, now in the District Jail at Agra: "This is hardly a Jail. It is almost like the internment camps we had in war time. I am talking of course of Agra. I do not know if the conditions are different at Lucknow, Bareilly and Benares where also the District Jails have been converted into jails for political prisoners."

THE NEW SPIRIT IN INDIA.

(By MR. N. S. S. IYENGAR.)

The New Spirit is, I believe, an apt expression for denoting the subtle and many-sided character of the remarkable life-movement frequently described simply as Non-co-operation which began to make itself felt in so many ways throughout in India soon after the Special Session of the Indian National Congress which met at Calcutta in September 1920; when for the first time in modern history, India has been trying to prove her superiority over the West both in her spirit of self-sacrifice and patriotism. It has now been demonstrated, to the astonishment alike of East and West, that India which owing to her state of dependency and subjection, had come to be regarded as a negligible factor in modern world politics, might well bring about a state of things that would seriously affect the present balance of world power and necessitate a new order of national and international relationship. An Indian Nation might be able, I hope, in the course of three or four decades thoroughly to emancipate herself from the disabilities of years of dependency and subjection and to claim a place for herself in the world's programme by holding her own effectively with the progressive nations of the West. Such at any rate is the inference that may be drawn from the results of the Great European War and the present New Spirit in India. In dogged determination, in organising ability, in leadership, as well as in his humane treatment of the sick and the wounded, the Indian has proved himself, I believe, superior of his Western opponent. The year 1922 thus opens a new era in the modern History of India and in world politics. Momentous changes have taken place in the West and there can be no doubt as to the fact that Western nations have been called upon to revise all their conceptions with regard to India. She is no longer stagnant and impassive but throbbing with a new life-movement which is impatient of expression in every direction that makes for progress and confident of her ability to fulfil a great destiny. There has thus come to India a new consciousness of self-respect, a new vision of national responsibility, a new ambition for a recognised and honoured place in the world's programme and a new sense of spiritual mission to the human race. In India the presence and influence of this New Spirit has been most marked. It has already manifested many of the inspiring characteristics of a great movement and has completely transformed the political outlook. True political missionaries are deeply conscious of and thankful for the change which has taken place.

The most striking characteristic of this new movement in India is an intense patriotism, a passionate desire on the part of young men of the rising generation to be worthy sons of Hindustan and to devote their strength and manhood to the service of their 'beloved mother' for whom no sacrifice is too great. How intense this passion is can scarcely be understood by those who have not risen to the same level of consciousness.

The New Spirit in India may be best described as a great aspiration in several directions—political, social, educational and religious. It expresses the strong deep desire now felt by the people of India and more especially by students of the rising generation that the India of the future—New India—may enter into a truer and richer life and a life which shall be peculiarly her own. Before proceeding to deal with the various kinds of aspirations which are to be embodied in the national life of the future, a few words of general introduction may be necessary. It must already have been recognised by every thoughtful mind that there is a close correspondence between the national movement of the 19th century and this new movement of the 20th and that the present movement in India is but the complement of the former, the two making one great movement for the regeneration and enlightenment of India. In fact the struggle has been going on in deadly earnest for some time past and the unrest of which we have heard so much, is, in its ultimate analysis, simply the outward expression in various forms of the life and death struggle now going on in India between truth and error, light and darkness, with its strong purifying and uplifting ideals of human life.

It is now time that I should deal in turn with the five great aspirations which may be said to form the main contents of the New Spirit.

THE POLITICAL ASPIRATION.

The political evolution to which members of the Non-co-operation party look forward is representative government on a national democratic basis i.e. a basis which will include all sections of the peoples of India, irrespective of race, colour or creed. This party, so far as I am aware, does not desire the retirement of the British or any weakening of the ties that at present bind the British to India. It readily acknowledges all that India owes to the British and speaks in no grudging terms of admiration and loyalty of the 'Pax Britannica,' and all that it means in the way of efficient administration, impartial justice and public security. The great feature of the Non-co-operation programme is that it stands for the burying of all the old historic animosities, jealousies and divisions which in the past have rendered anything like national action impossible. There is to be an entente cordiale throughout Hindustan. The peoples of India, whether Indian or British, whether Hindoo or Mahomedan, are no longer to strive against each other for supremacy or place. All sections of the people of whatever race or creed, are to sink ancient feuds and unite in a holy federation of brotherhood for the development of the highest national well-being of India. Such an ideal does not necessarily imply a general acquiescence in and full approval of the political and administrative system which prevails at present. In the hearts of the young Non-co-operators there beats a strong patriotic desire that their beloved motherland may soon cease to be regarded as a mere dependency of the British Crown and may be granted the privilege of becoming an integral and responsible part of the great British Empire. And farther there exists the hope that, as time goes on, the sons of India as they qualify for positions of trust and responsibility by virtue of higher education and by strength of moral character, may be given an increasingly large share in the administration of their Motherland.

THE SOCIAL ASPIRATION.

Much more interesting to the reader than the previous consideration, is the question as to what shall be the character of the new social order which shall prevail in New India. I take it for granted that however much one may agitate for it, there can be no return to the past. The caste system, which has held India in bondage for so many centuries, can no longer be allowed to continue. But while rejecting the caste system, it does not follow that New India will accept 'ready made' any one of the social systems that prevail in the West. The coming social order will be one which will be peculiarly her own, and one which will best promote the great ends of Indian Nationalism. The adoption, without modification, of a Western system would be, as the Rev. Bernard Lucas has pointed out, 'to exchange one tyranny for another'. The Non-co-operators in constructing their political ideals, were greatly influenced, I believe, by two principles which had been already successfully observed by Japan when engaged in her task of political and social reconstruction about thirty years ago, viz:—(a) The principle of preserving all that was good in the past, and of incorporating with it all that is good in the present, and (b) the principle of adopting only such measures as would unite all sections of the people into a national whole. Applying these principles the new social order must be one which has lost nothing Eastern that is of value and it must be one in which there shall be no invidious distinctions as to race or caste or creed.

THE EDUCATIONAL ASPIRATION.

With regard to the character of the present system of education in India to-day, there is a remarkable unanimity of opinion, whether the critics are European Viceroy's, Government officials in high position, heads of college or missionaries—or whether they are Indian gentlemen of any political party who have themselves received Western education—all are agreed that the present system of University education, based upon the model of London University, and introduced into India in 1857, with the very best intentions and purest motives, has altogether failed either to import culture or to produce a high type of manhood. The system has been too Western—'outlandish' as an Indian writer has styled it—and its non-religious basis has had a most debilitating effect upon moral and spiritual character. And it is a remarkable fact that from the time of the rise of this New Spirit of patriotism and self-sacrifice, national institutions have steadily grown in popularity and influence. It is the students who have begun to think for themselves and are feeling the pulsation of the patriotic spirit, deliberately select national institutions for their place of education, because their moral and spiritual tone appeals to them and because they prefer to receive their education at the hands of teachers who are themselves actuated by high ideals and with whom they can come into the closest personal and affectionate relationship. In view of this fact the importance of national education becomes supreme at the present time.

THE RELIGIOUS ASPIRATION.

We come now to consider the supreme question of the New Spirit; what is to be the character of the religion which will satisfy the great spiritual heart of New India and inspire it with such self-sacrifice and devotion as shall enable her to fulfil her great mission to her own people and to the world at large. We cannot believe that India's new national consciousness shall end in failure, nor can we think of Indian Nationalism as resting upon a non-religious basis. Mere Nationalism, on a materialistic basis, will never move the masses of the people or produce any great change. What then is the kind of religion that will satisfy and hold the heart of New India? It must be a religion (a) that is able to unify all classes of the people of India into a strong and enthusiastic brotherhood with a spirit of love and self-sacrifice which will express itself in humanitarian service on behalf of the people of India and of mankind in general; (b) that can provide for such work whether it be for the enlightenment of women and the elevation of the depressed classes in India or for the witness and ministry of the oriental religious consciousness in the world at large. Religion of the soul, as preached by Mahatma Gandhi, is such a religion and the only one that can meet the situation that has arisen in India at the present day.

The new movement is not a gospel of hate, as has been characterised and characterised wrongly by some; it is the gospel of self-sacrifice, patriotism and true love for our dear Motherland. It offers a new ideal of manhood. It stands not for the destruction of human nature but for the sanctification of every faculty of human life. It offers a high ideal of what National education can effect in the training of moral and spiritual character when given in the inspiring atmosphere of a national institution. It offers social unification for the national life which always leads to progress and freedom. It offers above all a living example of a man (Mahatma Gandhi) contact with whom makes a divine life possible even to the weakest human being. And if one desires to have a glowing vision of India in the future when transformed by a national acceptance of Mahatma Gandhi as the consummator of Indian Nationalism one must see it, not through the eyes of a foreigner, however sympathetic but through those of one who is both an Indian patriot and a devoted servant of the Motherland. Mahatma Gandhi, the great-hearted and high-souled leader of the movement. India is no longer the India of the past but a New India, inspired with a great ideal and determined to overcome by strength of purpose and self-sacrificing devotion to the Motherland whatever obstacles may stand in the way of her regeneration and of the exalted destiny which awaits her. India, Young India, will surely give a hearty response to the call of the Nation and be free. For independence is happiness and dependence misery.

Vande Mataram.

LONDON LETTER.

(From our own Correspondent).

London, January 5, 1922.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR!

We are hoping that the year 1922 will be a happier one than 1921 proved to be. There is ample need for a change for the better, since the past year has been so largely one of disappointment and disillusionment. Promise is perhaps the sign and symbol of the old year—promise unfulfilled, however. Perhaps the New Year may give us performance instead. It will be vastly more useful. Possibly we are ungrateful to the year upon which we have just turned our back. Possibly, too, we are too hopeful of the year that we have just welcomed in. If so, we are but human. Nevertheless, it would be real ingratitude to have nothing good to say of a year that has given us both a successful Irish Conference and a fairly successful Washington Conference, even though the Dail has not yet ratified the Treaty put forward by the first and Mr. Eugene Debs, upon his release from prison in America, has anathematised the second because, in his opinion, it is useless to discuss disarmament or limitation of armaments without discussing the causes of war.

LET US THINK WELL OF OURSELVES.

To Ibsen, if we may judge from one of his best-known plays, among the greatest offences against human nature is to destroy a man's belief in himself. To believe that he is working for some ideal and that some day he will attain it—though in our heart of hearts we know well that he is not doing the one or will ever do the other—is his mainstay and often the rock upon which his self-respect is established. To destroy this belief is to destroy his foundation and to cut him off from the future. Hence the danger and desolation of disillusionment. But it is not everyone that has that belief. Too many of us work with our noses to the grindstone. We lack imagination. We cannot see the forest for the trees.

"A primrose by a river's brink
A yellow primrose was to him,
And it was nothing more."

The following story illustrates what I mean. It is told in the "Literary Digest," which asks: "How do you visualise your job?" Three stone-cutters were working on a stone. A stranger asked the first what he was doing. "I'm working for seven dollars a day," he replied. "And you?" the stranger asked the second. "I'm cutting this stone. Can't you see?" growled the latter. As for the third, his face lit up as he replied to a similar question: "I'm building a cathedral!" One raises one's hat, after this, to the fly on the wheel! So let us hitch our wagon to a star.

EDUCATION AND THE FUTURE.

We are suffering so severely from over-taxation that what is known as the Geddes "super-axe" Committee has been appointed to examine into the possibility of lopping off great branches of expenditure in our State Departments in the name of economy. There is no doubt that there are some departments which overlap badly or which are greatly overstuffed for the real needs of the country, or which are far too big and expensive judged by the idealism and democratic reactions that have followed in the wake of the war. But it is, unfortunately, believed that one of the important economies recommended by the Geddes Committee is in the Education Department. This country has never really believed in sound education. It has never been too confident that it was right when it experimented in mass-education. Undoubtedly many of the products of that education are of a very dubious character. What, however, is wanted is not less, but more education and that of a higher quality. Yet if the Geddes report attacks the expenditure on education and is acted upon by the Cabinet, it will result very probably in the torpedoing of the Fisher Education of 1919 upon which reformers built so hopefully. In that event, 1922 will be a black year in the history of this country. The reformers and the educationists are already raising cries of alarm, and perhaps some heed will be given to their protests and premonitory warnings. Professor L. P. Jacks, the well-known editor of the "Hibbert Journal" and the Principal of the Unitarian College at Oxford, where he succeeded Dr. Euclid Carpenter, had some interesting things to say last week in his inaugural address to the delegates at the annual conference of Education Associations. He thought that in future the Minister of Education should be Prime Minister and that no Education Minister should be allowed to do odd man's work in the Cabinet. When our statesmen were educationists and our educationists were statesmen we might hope for a restoration of European civilisation and the stabilisation of social order. In the meantime, he demanded Dominion Self-Government status for Education, and would be content with nothing less. The Irish settlement had set the standard to be aimed at. Education should no longer be the handmaiden, the Cinderella, of politics and economics. It should be an equal partner in the association of national essentials, if not the dominant partner.

THE BLACK MAN AND HIS VIRTUES.

Germany has been making great play with the fact that France has quartered black troops in large numbers in the occupied territory west of the Rhine. France, of course, is anxious to economise and to free as many of her white troops as possible for the reconstitution and reconstruction of her ravaged provinces. This is, too, the origin of her official reasons for insisting upon her right to build large numbers of submarines and accessory ships. She needs them, she says, in order to convey her African troops and to protect her lines of communication. The argument is not convincing, but it has some basis in reality. But that is not at all the reason why Germany has raised loud protests against the black troops of France, alleging against them various horrible offences which independent British official observers have thoroughly disproved, especially by a comparison with offences of a like nature known to have been committed by German troops in the same areas before the war. Germany, however, is hoping to rely upon public opinion in Britain and America to rid her of the French Army of Occupation by arousing the colour-antipathy she believes to be very near the surface in both these countries. Lately, too, American susceptibilities have been aroused by the choice of a full-blooded African negro as the recipient of the world-famous literary prize offered at regular intervals by the Academie de Goncourt. Such a choice would be impossible in America. It would be very difficult in England. But France has always been colour-blind, like Islam. She recognises no differences amongst French citizens, and she distributes her prizes and gifts upon black and white alike, without racial predilection. General Mangin must have disgusted our British and the American negrophobes by his whole-hearted praise of the African negroes, among whom he spent some of the most fruitful years of his life. He regards them as being as teachable and as responsive to cultural environment as the white races and demands that they should be afforded an equal opportunity with the latter of expressing their natural gifts and of contributing their special effort to the whole and universal culture of mankind.

ROLLESTON MEMORIAL LECTURE.

The first Rolleston Memorial Lecture arranged by the India Society was given at the Victoria and Albert Museum last week by Professor Strzowski, who spoke on Indo-Persian landscape in Northern art. Mr. Laurence Binyon, the chairman, said that this was the first of a series of lectures under the memorial scheme designed to recall the great work done for the India Society by the late Dr. T. W. Rolleston. The object of the Society was to stimulate interest in Indian art. Chinese and Japanese art had taken a permanent place in the minds of Englishmen, and India's achievements in that sphere should not hold a subordinate place. The lecturer defined Northern art as the Iranian art which grew up under the influence of Mazdaism (the religion of Zoroaster), and gave examples taken from Italy, India, and China to show that Iran was the centre from which had come landscapes in pictures in which no attempt was made to reproduce the actual forms of nature. He claimed that the source of this artistic direction was not Hellenistic, but Eastern Aryan art, which attained its development under Mazdaism, and afterwards exercised an influence over Christian as well as Buddhist and Chinese painting. In support of this claim he drew parallels between the landscape in the mosaics at Ravenna, the wall painting in the cave temples of Ajanta, and the shrine of Tamamushi at Nara.

THE PROPOSED ROUND TABLE CONFERENCE.

(By POLITICUS).

The idea of a Round-table Conference is going round. Here at the seat of the Government of India it has got a definite expression in a number of resolutions notice of which has already been given in both houses of the Legislature. The notable of these are, Maushi Sahwar Saran's resolution in the Assembly and the Hon'ble Mr. Bhargava's in the Council of State. There are two aspects of the demand behind the resolutions. The first is the abandonment of the present policy; the second is the calling of a Round-table Conference. I am not in a position from all that I have seen and heard in private and open discussions, since my arrival here among official and Non-official members, to make a forecast of the ultimate fate of these demands. But I can submit certain important observations and impressions regarding them. It seems to me that the adverse results of prohibitory proclamations under the Seditious Meetings and the Criminal Law Amendment Acts and the promiscuous arrests and prosecutions following upon a cool, calculated infringement of these orders which culminated on the one hand in an impetus to the spirit of civil-disobedience, and on the other in an emphatic demand by the sober section of the people outside the Non-co-operation fold for immediate withdrawal of that policy,—which demand was reflected in the resolutions now before the Indian Legislature have made the Government, if not altogether realize the utter futility of the present policy, at least to stay their hands for a while and pause and think whether they should not take counsel with some responsible leaders of public opinion with a view to end the present breaking tension of the situation by more acceptable and effective methods. Thus far the notice of the resolutions and amendments about the present situation some of which amount to a censure of the Government Policy have had the desired wholesome effect, viz. reconsideration of the present policy. But it seems to me that there is little clearness and more confusion and conflict about the other and more important aspect of the resolutions regarding a Round-table Conference. The question is not one of mere calling forth a Conference; call a conference, but how and for what purpose? It is the fructification of such preliminaries and programmes for the Conference as would give it possibilities and potentialities of success and settlement. The absence of a positive working programme is due to Government apathy, Gandhi's obduracy of which the resultant is our legislators' present embarrassment. I believe this will also be the position at the Bombay Conference which has been convened by Pundit Malaviya, Messrs. Bhargri, Jinnah and others. But I hope the results of the joint deliberations at Bombay will give the country and our embarrassed legislators here a working basis for the Conference to materialise. If it does the postponement of Munshi Ishwar Saran's resolution will not have gone in vain, and will change its present dull and disheartening aspect into a bright and hopeful one.

What should this programme be? My submission is that between Gandhi's hard and rigid demand of status quo for Turkey in the matter of Khilafat, complete redress of the Panjab grievances and an incomprehensible Swaraj, and the Government's placid attitude and pious declaration that they have done all that was possible for the Khilafat and the Panjab, and that any further advance on the present reforms would jeopardise them and would be inopportune, there is yet a royal road with possibilities of a just and reasonable settlement which would rehabilitate the relations between the Government and the people. That royal road lies in the representatives of the people and the Government meeting in a Conference with clean hearts and open minds, and compare notes with each other on the question now at issue in a spirit of mutual forbearance, trust, goodwill and confidence. In that spirit each will have to make concessions, each one will have to accept the maximum—that is reasonably possible, viewpoint of the other and then see if a satisfactory settlement is not possible. The only essential condition for this is that, the plenipotentiaries who will sit at the Conference table will go to it not committed or pledged to their parties' programmes, but with open minds ready to go the maximum length possible with the other, and with power to negotiate and conclude a settlement which will be binding upon the parties concerned only after proper and formal ratification by each one of them. Besides the three questions now at issue, viz. Khilafat, Swaraj and Panjab Grievances, the following three, in my opinion, may also form the subject of discussion at the Conference table:—the status of Indians abroad, the rehabilitation and recuperation of the present insolvent position of the country's finances and trade, and last but not least, Indianisation of the Army.*

Would Gandhi accept the above composition and terms of reference for the Conference? I have still faith in him that he would. But even if he doesn't, let not that be an excuse or apology for the Government against the holding of the conference. Let those who do, meet. Let them do their utmost to fulfil the legitimate wishes of the country, and let their deliberations be like an open book for all. That will prove the bonafide of the object of the Conference, and then there can be no possible excuse for the greatest Non-co-operator, if he be true to his creed and professions to boycott the Conference. In any case, if the enquiries and negotiations at the Round-table Conference, no matter by and between whom carried on, lead to a sound, just and reasonable settlement, the ground under the present discontent will have been cut, the wings of disaffection clipped, and there will be scope and resources to deal and deal effectively with those who disturb the peaceful and orderly progress of the country, for other than present legitimate causes.

THE BOMBAY CONFERENCE.

PRESS OPINIONS.

Rangoon Mail, Tri-weekly, (Congress).

The Leaders' Conference in Bombay stands apart from other great Conferences of the country as being the first of its kind in the annals of the history of British occupation in India. This is the first time in which great leaders have sat together in all seriousness to find a way out of the crisis which their own country is heading to. The resolutions of the Conference are specially significant. According to them: (i) The New Repressive policy ought to be reversed without delay. (ii) Other means are to be exhausted before Civil Disobedience is resorted to. (iii) A Round Table Conference ought to be called for to explore all methods of settlement of the issues of the Panjab and the Khilafat wrongs and demand for Swaraj or full responsible government. (iv) A committee of two ought to be appointed with power to choose an umpire to investigate into the present cases of repression pending which investigation, hartals, picketing and civil disobedience to cease. The conference has further appointed a committee of influential representatives to arrange the speedy bringing about of the Round Table Conference. To the question whether the conference has found a way out, it is rather somewhat early to venture an answer. All that we can say is that the Conference is fraught with infinite possibilities and it may even bring about a speedy settlement whose success or otherwise rests on the shoulders of the Committee itself.

The West Coast Reformer, Calicut Tri-weekly, (Liberal).

The Round Table Conference is the valuable product of Moderate wisdom! The surging spirit of hostility to Government among the Non-Co-operators should have been a clear warning to all who feigned to have discovered a golden way to peace in this conference against the futility of attempting the impossible. The moderates worked themselves to a frenzy over the inevitable arrests and legal incarceration of law-breaking 'politicals' and attempted to carry co-operation to absurd lengths by courting the non-co-operator's co-operation. The result has been a sudden bloating of the non-co-operator with his own importance in ordering the destinies of India. The conference held at Bombay reveals the impossibility of bringing round the non-co-operators to the proper angle of political vision.

* The personnel of the Conference may be constituted as follows—6 representatives of the Government and non-official European Community; 2 members elected by the Indian Legislature; 2 by the Liberal and Nationalist Federations and 3 by the Congress.

The Wednesday Review, Trichinopoly Weekly, (Reactionary).

Sir Sankaran Nair's reputation for sturdy commonsense has been considerably enhanced by his manly protest against Mr. Gandhi's dictatorship. Sir Sankaran Nair is not a blundering, sentimental politician who falls a ready victim to charlatanism. Mr. Gandhi's political cult, if it can come under any definition of politics, is unmitigated charlatanism, and we are surprised that Sir Sankaran Nair did not succumb to its glamour. On the other hand, our surprise was that he should have at all consented to preside over a non-descript gathering of politicians, amateur and other whose slave mentality is so complete that there could be no prospect of their discussing any matter with their wits about them. A group of men who have surrendered their understanding to another cannot be of much purpose at a conference where independent thinking is necessary. A Conference that is willing to be led by one who deliberately told the members that he would not be bound by what they might say and he was there representing no one but himself, courted failure at the very outset and, of course, it failed. But it did one piece of good in spite of itself to the country, it provoked Sir Sankaran Nair into a forceful denunciation of the Gandhi cult.

Rangoon Daily News, daily, (Nationalist).

The Bombay Conference at which more than 800 leaders of all shades of opinion attended is a distinct step towards the bringing up of the differences of opinion between the various schools of Indian politics.....From the materials to hand, we realise, that it is too soon to prophesy as to the exact stand the Conference will ultimately take. It seems to us that most of the 800 members in the Conference will agree that repression must stop if the proposed Round Table Conference is to come off. On the other hand, they will almost all agree that mass civil disobedience must, at any rate temporarily, be given up before the Round Table Conference could sit. The Conference at Bombay is the last straw on which all our hopes are centered. If the Government will not come half way to grasp the hands of the Moderates and would persist in their career of repression the future of India will be dark indeed. But we have yet some faith in the statesmanship of Lord Reading, and we think that he will listen to Moderate counsels. The psychological moment for a reconciliation will soon pass off and the task of peace may be rendered as difficult as was the case with Ireland.

The Praja Bandhu, Ahmedabad weekly, (Independent).

The Conference of the Representatives of the various political parties in the country that met in Bombay towards the end of the last week has taken an important step for effecting an "honourable settlement" between the people and Government. It has appointed a Committee for convening a Round Table Conference, and urged upon Government to reverse its recent policy of repression and release prisoners including the Fatwa prisoners and others that might be recommended by a Committee consisting of a nominee of Government and of the Committee of the Conference with power to appoint an Umpire. It has also urged upon the Non-Co-operators to suspend all hartals, picketing and civil disobedience pending the results of the Conference. The Working Committee of the Congress has already advised the suspension of offensive Civil Disobedience till the 31st of January or pending results of the negotiations of the Committee. It now remains to be seen what action Government takes.

The Maharashtra, Poona Weekly, (Congress).

The conveners of the Bombay Peace Conference deserve hearty congratulations for their efforts to act as a bridge between the two contending parties in the country—we mean the Congress and the bureaucracy. In the first place the Conference was representative of all sections of political opinion in the country and had there been some authorised Government representatives, this very Conference could have constituted itself into a Round Table Conference. Since the adoption of the unfortunate and short-sighted policy of secession from the Congress by the Moderates, there was not a single occasion when the leaders of different political thought in the country met together or exchanged ideas freely, always respecting the honesty of opinion in others. The Conference was a complete success in this connection as it succeeded in bringing all parties together and revealed to the bureaucracy and the world, the fundamental unity of Indian thought in matters of vital importance to the Nation, namely its right to Swarajya and its right to enjoy full freedom in the matter of speech, of thought and of association.

The Hitavada, Nagpur Weekly, (Liberal).

Has the Conference which met at Bombay during the last week at the invitation of Pandit Malaviya, Jinnah and others under the presidentship of Sir Sankaran Nair proved altogether abortive? The answer to the question is both yes and no. The Conference has failed in its immediate object viz, that of arranging the so-called terms of truce preliminary to a Round Table Conference with the Viceroy and Government of India in order that a way out may be found out of the present tangle to an honourable settlement. It has however, cleared up many collateral issues which in the present acute political crisis through which the country is passing cannot be said to be altogether fruitless. Mr. Gandhi and his followers have now stated in clear terms what it is they are out for. Mr. Gandhi himself in his individual capacity is prepared to attend any Round Table Conference which may be arranged with the Viceroy. But so far as the minimum demands under the three heads are concerned viz, the Punjab, Khilafat wrongs and Swaraj he, as the representative of the Congress party, has no open mind as regards them at all.

Can anybody imagine after this that there is any the slightest use to bring about a Conference with Government if this is the frame of mind in which Mr. Gandhi's party is going to approach the task?

The Citizen, Madras Weekly, (Liberal).

The Conference of two hundred representatives of all shades of opinion in the country held in Bombay on Saturday and Sunday last passed five resolutions and appointed a Committee. The question is where do we stand after this Conference. The outlook is not at all hopeful, and Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya again stands practically discomfited. Mr. Gandhi and his followers were not parties to the resolutions, though they were framed with the help and guidance of the former. Before we refer to his attitude and the decisions of the Working Committee, it is necessary to examine the resolutions themselves. The first of them was an expression of opinion regarding the recent policy of the Government in regard to the application of the Seditious Meetings Act and Part II of the Criminal Law Amendment Act and almost the very words of the Allahabad Federation were used to describe the results of that policy, and to demand its reversal. The second resolution is ambiguous in language. It says that "until it is clear beyond any doubt that no other means will secure a redress of the country's grievances and the status of full Responsible Government, the civil disobedience movement contemplated by the Ahmedabad Congress ought not to be resorted to. Does that mean that the Conference contemplates a time when it may be necessary to have recourse to this weapon? The absence of any strong condemnation of the civil disobedience movement gives some support to the view that the Conference is of opinion that circumstances might compel the people to disobey all laws. And yet, looking to the composition of the Conference, it seems almost incredible that such a view was prevalent or contemplated.

The Searchlight, Patna Tri-weekly, (Independent).

It is not possible to essay at the present moment, with any degree of accuracy, the influence which the deliberations of the Bombay Conference will have on the direction and trend of political activities of the people on the one hand and the attitude of the Government of India on the other. Nevertheless the fact is that the Conference will remain as an important event in the political evolution of the country and it is undoubted that sooner or later the Conference will have a profound and far-reaching effect. It was a representative gathering in every sense of the term and it would be futile to ignore or minimise its importance. The defection from the organization of Sir Sankaran Nair is indeed unfortunate and will have, to a certain extent, an adverse effect on the utility of the Conference Committee. Sir Sankaran Nair's sturdy independence, patriotism and capacity are national assets and have never been questioned and it is a real pity that a public man of his position should have felt impelled to express his strong disagreement with the resolutions adopted by the Conference. The event, unfortunate and regrettable as it undoubtedly is, ought not to be magnified out of all proportions, for after all Sir Sankaran does not differ materially on the broad issues before the conference.

The Express, Bankipore daily, (Zemindar).

It seems that the Bombay political Conference had no plain sailing. A rift in the lute is not long in coming and men like Sir S. Nair and Pandit H. N. Kunzru left the Conference in utter disgust at the demeanour of Mr. Gandhi. Thus ends the Conference upon which so much hope had been built. It is true that the resolutions of the Conference are still there and there is also a Committee which has been appointed to negotiate with Lord Reading's Government on the one hand and Non-co-operators on the other. But the whole affair seems to have an ominous bearing because of the secession of Sir Sankaran and Pandit Kunzru and of the causes thereof. We have now very grave doubts that, in the first place, the proposed Conference, under the present circumstances, will be an accomplished fact, and in the second, the Conference, if it materializes, will lead to any satisfactory solution of the problem. We would however like to see that Lord Reading's Government should give the matter their best consideration and demonstrate to the world, beyond any shade or shadow of doubt, that they did not leave unexplored a single avenue which might lead to a satisfactory settlement.

NO TAX CAMPAIGN IN GUNTUR.

Mahatma Gandhi has addressed the following letter to Mr. Venkatappayya with reference to the movement in Guntur district to refuse payment of taxes, as a part of Civil Disobedience.

Dear Venkatappayya,—I have given much anxious thought to the 'no tax' campaign going on there. Apart from the possibility of suspension of Mass Civil Disobedience by reason of a Round Table Conference ever forthcoming, I think that you are not yet ready for non-payment of Taxes. Fifty per cent of the population of the area of experiment, has not yet, I apprehend, got rid of 'untouchability' nor is that proportion of population accustomed to ways of non-violence, nor to Khadder manufactured in the respective areas. I omit the other items such as the unity between races and creeds. In these circumstances I think it is the bounden duty of all of us to refrain from Mass Civil Disobedience till the masses have undergone the necessary discipline and self-purification. In any other case mass disobedience will be not civil but criminal and will, therefore, render us unfit to conduct our own affairs as an orderly civilized nation. I, therefore, strongly suggest that you advise the ryots in all the districts to pay up at least the first instalment and devote the whole of the time and the energy of all the workers to acquiring the necessary qualifications. This opinion, I know, will disappoint many ardent spirits, but I am sure our success lies in that disappointment, for if the people are really eager for Swaraj, and eager for Civil Disobedience, they will make the necessary mental change, under the pressure of that strong desire. The inimitable attitude of Andhra women for artistic spinning and of Andhra weavers for artistic weaving should make the production of Khadder in the respective areas easy of accomplishment. But whether the acquisition of these qualifications is difficult or easy, we dare not avoid it without endangering the attainment of our cherished goal.

Yours Sincerely,
(Sd.) M. K. GANDHI.

GIFT OF A KICKING COW.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The Madras Government seems inclined to favour the members of the Depressed Classes. The land of the Non-Co-operators, refusing to pay taxes, which would have no bidding, would be bought and given to the D. C. members. The D. C. members must thank the Government for this their solicitude. But this action smells of the charitable spirit of a Hindu miser who would dispose of his wicked, mischievous cow which had begun to give kicks instead of milk, by making a gift of it to a Brahmin. Can not the Government find a more hard and tough Brahmin for this? The D. C. members have long suffered for their so-called sins. Charity of such a kind would bring them in conflict with the people. The D. C. members have to look to both the Government and the people for their salvation. Can not the Government select other land for them? Instead of exploiting social differences, the best way for the Government is to hold a Round Table Conference. If Mahatma Gandhi makes impossible terms and plays De Valera, I believe Griffiths will not be wanting.

A DEPRESSED CLASSES WORKER.

To,

The Editor, Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Mr. Rudrappa Basappa Chawadi of Nidagundi District Bijapur belongs to a depressed class. He throughout the district all the year round, calls meetings of the depressed classes in all the villages and advises them by lectures to send their boys to schools, to abolish the system of becoming Basavis, to allow the Basavis to remarry, to dine among their different sub-castes. The result of these lectures during these five years is also good. Many boys about thousand among depressed classes are now attending schools. They are now abolishing the system of becoming Basavis. Many young ladies have now married and are now leading a good life as married ladies instead of leading a bad and debaucherous life. All this he is doing voluntarily. He does not care even for his family. At the cost of his own pleasures and at a great sacrifice he is doing this piece of benevolent work. He takes with him another lecturer and also two attendants who gather the people from the neighbouring villages at the place of lecture. He will have to support all these men by means of scanty subscriptions he can get from the sympathis. As the vast mass is illiterate the public do not appreciate his work and do not help him much, although I am of opinion no reforms will be beneficial to the people unless the depressed classes are reformed and are educated. The Government also has appreciated his work. Although it has appreciated his work it has informed him its inability to help him financially. It may help him next year. Under these circumstances it goes hard with him to continue his work. Yet he is working at great odds. The public should appreciate such work and help him by means of money. Still as he is working and reforming the depressed classes under the difficult circumstances mere words are not sufficient to thank him for his benevolent work done very silently. The great leaders should work also in this way and with the help of the lecturers and workers among the depressed classes should reform there.

Your faithfully,

VIRESALINGAM MEMORIAL HALL.

The function of laying the Foundation Stone for the Viresalingam Memorial Hall proposed to be raised under the auspices of the Bangalore Cantonment Brahmo Samaj came off on the 8th January 1922. A beautiful pandal was temporarily put up in the Compound of the Brahmo Mandir (7, Ganga-Chetty Road) with suitable arches, festoons and ever-greens to receive the invited guests. The Dewan Rajasevadhuriah Sir M. Kantaraj Urs, K. O. L. E., O. S. I. accompanied by his private Secretary Mr. C. Ranganatha Rao Sahib, arrived at the place punctually at 9-33 A. M., when the Boy Scouts received him with a salute, while the naga-waram was being played by the musicians employed for the purpose. At the gate he was received by the Members of the Managing Committee headed by Messrs. Mahadeva Mudaliar and V. Balasunderam Mudaliar and conducted to a raised seat on the platform. The proceedings commenced with a hymn sung by Misses Mahadeva Mudaliar and a prayer offered by Mr E. Subbukrishnaia, after reciting a few texts from the Upanishads. Mrs. Lalita Bai Subba Rao read the address expressing the gratitude of the Samaj to the Dewan on behalf of the members for kindly consenting to lay the Foundation Stone. After the reading of the address, Mrs. Lalita Bai Subba Rao presented the same enclosed in a beautiful velvet casket while the two youngest daughters of Mr. Mahadeva Mudaliar garlanded the Dewan.

Sir Kantaraj Urs, after replying to the address, laid the Foundation Stone and declared that it was well and truly laid.

Mr. Mahadeva Mudaliar proposed a vote of thanks to the Dewan for his kind solicitude for the social well being of the people in the Mysore State and observed that as Jinaraja Das said that if Mysore is heaven for having a civic and social progress association, it is bound to be a centre of social and religious reform for having this memorial for Viresalingam in their midst. Three cheers were called forth by Mr. Mahadevan to His Majesty the King Emperor, His Highness the Maharaja and the Dewan which were heartily responded to by the audience. The meeting terminated with the distribution of flower and sprinkling of rose water.

"NEVER-GET-ILL."

In this book the author wants to make clear his position by saying that the subject requires practical demonstration in the absence of which his book should be taken as a testimony heralding the happy message of the possibility of attaining the Never-Get-Ill standard of health with the help of the physiological knowledge of the present day. The reason of the loss of health being the heavy tax on the intellect, the author expresses doubt whether addition of Physiology to the encyclopedic curriculum would improve matters. Nor does he think that going to Nature solves the real problem. He advocates the necessity of having a clear vision of the Body-Ideal.

The complex problem of digestion is explained to the reader in two chapters—Key to Digestion which is reduced to the sensation of pleasant taste, and Why milk is not digested. On the subject of exercise the author urges that it is misunderstood to include only muscular exercise while all functional activity is equally necessary for the oxydisation of the living matter in order to keep the current flowing. In the matter of dress he prefers Dr. Jaeger's all wool or silk wear which does not absorb the volatile products of perspiration as cotton does. The personal experience of the author in successfully banishing illness which, he says, is miraculous when compared to his former ill-health, described in a separate chapter, forms the characteristic of the book. His attainment is thus backed up by theoretical considerations and his theory in its turn is illustrated by personal example. The author laying stress on his 'never getting ill' declares in case the claim is true, it is, in the interests of the public, a duty of the general public and especially the leaders to make full use of him and declare him at least 'Not Guilty'.

INDIAN ARTS AND CRAFTS.

The Art Section of the 1921 Club has decided to hold an Exhibition of Indian Arts and Crafts on the premises of the Young Men's Indian Association, Armenian Street, George Town, Madras, opening on Saturday, February 25th, and closing on Saturday, March 4th. The Exhibition is intended to be a demonstration of the work which is being done to-day in painting, sculpture, wood-carving, ivory work, metal work, weaving and dyeing, with a view to stimulating interest in indigenous craftsmanship and to restore certain crafts, which are in danger of extinction from want of support. Examples of the work of the modern Bengal School of Painting will be included, together with examples of the Moghal and mediæval Hindu styles of painting. The promoters of the Exhibition invite offers, in writing, of exhibits from artists, manufacturers, merchants and owners of Indian pictures and art-objects. A selection will be made in accordance with the available space and the affinity of the offered exhibits with the purpose of the Exhibition. Provision will be made for the protection and care of the exhibits, but the Club cannot make itself responsible for damage or loss through accident or theft. Exhibitors will have to make their own arrangements for sending and removing exhibits, except in the case of private loans and a few special cases of work by distant village craftsmen. For the expenses of the latter and for providing show cases, almirahs and picture stands, and the general expenses of the Exhibitions, offers of subscriptions are invited from persons interested in the development of Indian Arts and Crafts. Accounts will be published at the close of the Exhibition. It is intended to have lectures by prominent persons identified with the movement each afternoon, but full particulars of arrangement will be announced later. Meanwhile, intending exhibitors and subscribers will kindly write to the Secretary, Indian Arts and Crafts Exhibition, Y.M.I.A., Armenian Street, George Town, Madras.

THIS YAKUTI or life giving nectar has been prepared from the best, choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has wonderful properties of increasing virile power and it rectifies urinary disorders. In fact it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronised by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to those persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicines. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that much is not that which a perfumer admires. It is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills, Rupees ten only.

NOTES.

An Unfortunate Blunder: Since our leading article was in type, Mahatma Gandhi's letter to His Excellency the Viceroy in the nature of an ultimatum has been published in the Bombay Chronicle of Saturday. We can only say to-day that the manner of the letter is even more objectionable than its matter. The endeavours of the Malaviya Committee to bring about an atmosphere of conciliation cannot but be greatly hampered by the letter which falls far short of the lucidity and temperateness of the Mahatma's writings. We understand that the Committee has communicated to the Mahatma its strong disapproval of the step he has taken.

The Turkish Question: His Highness the Aga Khan arrived in Bombay on Friday and gave an interview to the Times of India on the present position of the Turkish question. He said that during his stay in Europe his public activities were mainly devoted or confined to the solution of the Turkish question in a way acceptable to them and if his countrymen wanted to know how the great problem stood today he would tell them that he was exactly in the position of the man who was swimming across a deep and dangerous lake and had gone half way and was then still as far from one shore as he was from the other. They were in mid-stream with deep waters with cross-currents hindering the progress. That is how he felt about the question personally and he was doing all he could not to sink but to reach the haven of safety. He thought that owing to various difficulties the question would not be settled one way or the other for several months but he for one was determined neither to lose heart or to recede in the least from the line of action that he had been pursuing and working for so far. He counselled patience and perseverance, adding that an influential section of the British public was in sympathy with the Indian point of view.

A Queer Arrangement. In a recent issue, we called attention to the deputation of an English member of the Indian Educational Service on a mission of political propagandism in the United States, though the Legislative Assembly had refused to grant the sum asked for for that purpose. In reply to a question from Professor Kale in the Council of State on the 17th instant, it was stated on behalf of Government that Professor Horne, who is Professor of Political Economy at Patna College, was placed on deputation "to enable him to take up a temporary lectureship in Harvard University, at the invitation of the authorities of that University." The cost of his deputation, however, was borne by Indian revenues, "as the appointment enabled the Professor to lecture on Indian conditions generally, with a view to counteracting the false and mischievous reports regarding India appearing in a section of the American Press." Professor Kale in a supplementary question asked what special qualifications were looked for in Professor Horne that he was selected for this work. The answer was that "it was because he was well acquainted with conditions in India."

An English View of the Indian Problem. As a specimen of the kind of political propaganda carried on by English professors in America, may be cited the following passage in an article entitled "The Outlook for Civilization" by Professor W. M. Flinders Petrie in the current number of the Yale Review. He writes:

In Egypt the only real grievances of the people against the British Empire have been due to oppression by their native officials, who have profited in the name of the British.... The case is much the same in India as in Egypt. The peasantry do not wish for a change of management; only by appeals to religious fanaticism can they be stirred. The push comes from the upper classes: in some from ignorance of the real difficulties of governing and the self-sufficiency of their acquired culture; and in others from a wish to exploit all below them. The splitting off India and Egypt would mean either a gradual shifting back to harder conditions, or a complete bondage to a new Power. The Sudan would willingly conquer Egypt if it were left alone, and he would run the country better than the Egyptian. The Afghan would gladly rule India and rule it for plunder if he might.

The native Egyptian or Indian is the eternal exploiter, the Englishman never! He always suffers for the sins of the native! The Indian who aspires to self-government is ignorant or conceited or self-aggrandizing. As for the Afghan peril, surely Professor Petrie should know that the Sikh Confederacy had effectually countered it before the advent of British rule.

The Vices of Bureaucracy. Yet, in the same article, Professor Petrie when free from the racial obsession could write as follows of the vices of bureaucratic rule.

The growth of bureaucracy in quantity and dominance has laid a heavy burden upon us. The temperament needed and cultivated in a public office is directly uneconomic; it favours routine rather than initiative; it dreads responsibility; it seeks the life of ease instead of improvement; it shelters oppression under official procedure; it becomes a conspiracy against the public.

If a native bureaucracy is all this, what should be said of an alien bureaucracy? The very fact of the excellence and efficiency of the Anglo-Indian bureaucracy, coupled with the backwardness of India after a hundred and fifty years of it in all nation-building activities, is the most conclusive proof that no nation can ever thrive under foreign rule.

The Blight of Vested Interests: A lurid illustration of how the vested interests of the British liquor trade have wrecked the wise policy of the League of Nations to prevent the alcohol-poisoning of the races of West Africa, is afforded by the article headed "A lost opportunity in West Africa," by Mr. A. E. Blackburn in the current number of The East and the West. The policy of total prohibition in Africa was accepted by France, which and Britain together rule two-thirds of the African continent, and received strong support from the Belgian, Portuguese and Liberian authorities. Lord Milner did his best to give effect to it. But, says Mr. Blackburn, British trading firms "were able to bring such weight to bear upon the Governments that the flag that had been so bravely unfurled, with its emancipating motto of prohibition of the liquor traffic in West Africa, was lowered, and what might have been a victory that could have added to British prestige throughout the world was allowed to be sacrificed on the altar of trade gain."

Indians in East Africa. Mr. Winston Churchill has at last declared what his policy with reference to Indians in East Africa is to be. There was much of the usual high-sounding generalisations, but the pith of the whole matter is that the highlands of East Africa are to be reserved exclusively for white settlers. The decision must be regarded as final and it is not intended to depart therefrom. Future immigration of Indians is to be strictly regulated, and only such Indians as pass a test in civilisation, approved by the white settlers, are to be given full citizen rights. Mr. Churchill added amid cheers that he did not contemplate any system which would prevent British East Africa from becoming characteristically and distinctly a British Colony, looking forward to the position of Self-Government. Kenya, Uganda, Tanganyika and Zanzibar are to be amalgamated, and Mr. Churchill anticipated in a few years the creation of a great East African Federation taking its place in the Empire on equal terms with the great West African Colonies now so prosperous. Lord Delamere representing the most reactionary type of white settlers in East Africa is said to have expressed his pleasure at Mr. Churchill's confirmation of the constitution of Kenya as a white Colony with the gradual evolution of self-Government. He hoped that the control of Indian immigration would mean its practical prohibition. We agree with Mr. Andrews who telegraphs to us that the news is incredibly serious to Indian interests.

British Policy in Egypt: It is not easy to follow the vicissitudes of British policy in Egypt or to refer them to any settled or intelligible principle. One day it is announced that a settlement on the basis of independence is in sight. A few days later, the Egyptians declare for Non-Co-operation and a number of them is arrested. Still a very few days later, these men are released, and the High Commissioner is called to London. The latest version of the terms offered to Egypt comprise the establishment of an independent sovereign state but closely controlled as to defence, foreign policy and jurisdiction over foreigners in the country. These conditions would necessarily be a constant source of friction between the two Governments. The independence offered will, in practice, be nothing more than freedom for the Egyptian Government to oppress its own subjects. Defence, foreign policy and complete jurisdiction over its inhabitants are the vital breath of a Sovereign State. Without these a state is not sovereign but servile. Why not trust the Egyptians and grant them real independence, safeguarding by a treaty conferring mutual advantages, the Suez Canal route to India and Australia? India and Australia as well as Great Britain and Egypt will have to be parties to such a treaty.

The Colour Bar in England: For some years past, as the result of Colonial influence in the English Universities, an increasing tendency to create a colour bar has been noticed. One of the ways in which this is crystallising, seems to be indicated in a Reuter's telegram regarding Indian and Chinese medical practitioners in parts of London. As usual it is sought to be made out that these men are more or less quacks preying upon the credulity of ignorant Englishmen, taking advantage, it is said, of "the superstition current in the working class districts that colored men are good doctors." There is often some truth behind a superstition, and we should not be surprised if the real reason for this new cry is that the Indian or Chinese doctor is really more painstaking and attentive to the poorer class of patients.

Sir Ramkrishna Bhandarkar. The current number of the Indian Review contains an excellent biographical sketch of Sir Ramkrishna Bhandarkar from the pen of Professor M. S. Ramaswami Aiyangar. Professor Aiyangar has not omitted any important contribution made by Sir Ramkrishna in the realm of Sanskrit research. He has wholly set out, however, what many would consider the best part of Sir Ramkrishna's life-work—his work of religious and social reform. The following appreciation of Sir Ramkrishna's career is nevertheless apt: "Accurate in scholarship, always sound in judgment, of pleasant manners and yet possessed of an indomitable will, Dr. Bhandarkar's early life and career is a source of deep inspiration to younger men of India. Thoroughly patriotic in the best sense of the word, Dr. Bhandarkar's life is a living example of what can be achieved by patience, perseverance and singleness of purpose."

Prohibition of Charas: We congratulate the Government of Bombay on their resolution to prohibit totally the consumption of Charas in the Presidency from the 1st April 1922. Charas, a product of hemp, is produced in large quantities in Chinese Turkistan, whence it is imported into India via Panamik on the Khurdang Pass (where all consignments are registered at the Preventive Post maintained by the Punjab Government) and Lahore. Here all the charas imported by this route is deposited in a warehouse and distributed to bonded warehouses in the Punjab, whence the Bombay Presidency receives its supplies. The consumption of charas is prohibited in all the districts of the Presidency proper, except Ahmedabad, and the town and island of Bombay. The consumption in Bombay last year was 6776 seers and in Ahmedabad 723 seers, while the revenue realised in the Presidency proper amounted to over Rs. 300,000.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1922.

THE POLITICAL SITUATION.

On the 16th January, Sir William Vincent the member of the Government of India in charge of the Home Department, said in the Legislative Assembly at Delhi, in reply to a question, that the attitude of the Government to the proposal of a Round Table Conference to bring about a settlement of the present political discontents, was clearly explained in His Excellency the Viceroy's speech to the Calcutta Deputation on the 21st December, 1921. It was no unwarrantable presumption on our part to infer that this meant that the conditions laid down in Lord Reading's speech, continued to be the conditions desired by Government when the reply was given. On this assumption we pointed out in our leading article last week that the Malaviya Conference, which met in Bombay on the 14th and 15th January, had succeeded in bringing about a substantial supervision of the conditions outlined in the Viceregal pronouncement of December last. The Tribune of Lahore, in its issue of the 31st January, independently expressed the same opinion. "It must at any rate be admitted by all fair-minded persons," it wrote, "that they (the assurances contained, in the resolution of the Working Committee of the Congress at Mahatma Gandhi's instance in response to the Malaviya Conference resolution) do amount to the substantial fulfilment of the condition insisted upon by Lord Ronaldshay and the Viceroy as a preliminary to the suspension of activities on their own side, and the making of arrangements for a Round Table Conference." If Government are of a different opinion, they should in fairness state wherein the conditions stipulated by the Malaviya Conference are in excess or in defect of those defined in His Excellency the Viceroy's Calcutta speech, so that a further effort may be made to meet as far as possible the wishes of Government. If the terms of the Viceroy's speech have ceased to hold good, they ought to say so, in order that the public may not be left under the impression created by Sir William Vincent's reply to the question in the Legislative Assembly.

The Working Committee of the Congress in its resolution declared that the offensive Civil Disobedience contemplated by the Ahmedabad Congress, would not be started till the 31st day of January 1922, or pending the result of the negotiations undertaken by the Committee of the Malaviya Conference for a Round Table Conference, whichever might be the first date. We do not think that the last clause is strictly within the terms of the understanding arrived at between the Malaviya Conference and Mahatma Gandhi. Negotiations in regard to such an important subject as a Conference to discuss and settle the complex political situation at present, could hardly have been expected to end within ten days or a fortnight, and the only interpretation of the clause which would make it fit in with the understanding, is that it referred to the starting of negotiations as the result of the Malaviya Conference representations. When once such negotiations had been started, we understood that the suspension of Civil Disobedience would continue till the Malaviya Conference Committee declared that they had broken down. The Malaviya Conference Committee will have a right to complain if, when it was endeavouring to obtain from Government of India a further statement of their views in order to avert the collapse of the Round Table Conference proposal, Mahatma Gandhi should take any step calculated to hinder the free and open consideration of its representations. With the concurrence of Mahatma Gandhi, though he did not actually vote, the Malaviya Conference resolved that "until it is clear beyond any doubt that no other means will secure redress of the country's grievances and the status of full responsible Government, the civil disobedience contemplated by the Ahmedabad Congress ought not to be resorted to." Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya has sent from Benares to Mahatma Gandhi a telegram which shows that he takes the same view. He says that, though circumstances may be unfavourable at present, he believes that a Round Table Conference must yet take place. He adds that the Bombay Committee will persevere towards that end. "In my opinion," he concludes, "country's interest demands you should postpone civil disobedience until Committee exhausts its efforts."

It has been objected, by the way, that by its resolution the Malaviya Conference committed itself to the acceptance of Civil disobedience as permissible in an extreme contingency. On the abstract principle, we are unable to see wherein lies the difference between a religious reformer discarding the injunctions of his religion, which he has come to regard as superstitious and degrading, or a social reformer refusing to obey the mandates of caste and custom, which he feels to be absurd or cruel, and facing the ecclesiastical and social penalties of such disobedience, on the one hand, and a citizen adopting civil disobedience to the State in regard to a law or order which he regards as unconscionable and oppressive. What one man may do, a body of men cannot be condemned for doing. But in the latter case it is a practical question how far each individual is prepared by conscience and conviction to undergo the ordeal which all established institutions offer to the dissenter as a test of his personal sincerity and of the worth of his innovation. In an ancient State, every Senator who proposed a change in the constitution, brought forward his proposal with a halter round his neck. If his proposal was accepted, he was acclaimed as a hero. If it failed to get acceptance, he was strangled as a traitor. This is a symbol of what happens to every reformer, religious, social or political. On principle, therefore, we can not and do not rule out civil disobedience as inadmissible in any circumstance whatsoever. But, as we have repeatedly declared, and as Mahatma Gandhi himself will not deny, civil disobedience on any appreciable scale in the present political conditions of India, spells ruinous civil war the result of which is incalculable. A large section of Indians, and that by no means not the least intelligent or patriotic, while keenly feeling the grievances of the country and strongly holding that the Government policy is utterly unjustifiable, is at the same time seriously apprehensive of the consequences of civil disobedience which, it believes, is a remedy worse than the disease that it is intended to cure. Mahatma Gandhi will be making a serious mistake if he thinks that he need pay no heed to these men so long as he has got a large following among the masses. We have much respect for the Mahatma. But the interests of the country are paramount. Those who are striving to bring about a peaceful settlement can not turn back because Government or Mahatma Gandhi are at the present moment not amenable to their advice. They must persevere seeking by every means to conciliate differences, but determined in any case to avert methods which can only breed strife and disaster.

THE CIVIL MARRIAGE BILL.

The motion to refer Dr. Gour's Civil Marriage Bill to a Select Committee was lost in the Legislative Assembly by two votes, 25 voting for and 27 against it. The ruling of the President at the outset that the acceptance of the motion would commit the Assembly to the principle of the Bill, frightened some timid members into opposition. The most remarkable feature of the debate was the nearly unanimous opposition of Mahomedan members. Only one Mahomedan member voted with the minority, while at least there were nine who went into the opposition lobby. Sir Jamsetjee Jeejeebhoy opposed the motion but he was the only Parsi who voted against it, while three others of that community supported Dr. Gour's motion. The weight of responsible opinion was in favour of the motion, though, of course, some of the Hindu supporters wished some points relating to succession, family worship and so on made clear in the Select Committee. The oppositionists had for their sole argument the old familiar cry of religion in danger. It is as painful as it is surprising to find foremost among such reactionaries, a gentleman so prominently known for his advanced political views as Mr. T. Rangachariar. Mr. Rangachariar's speech in opposing the motion bordered on the hysterical. His description of the Hindu marriage, however true it might have been in old Vedic times, is hardly true today of at any rate the English-educated class of Hindus.

The two best speeches in the debate were those of Munshi Iswar Saran and Mr. Seshagiri Iyer. Both these gentlemen are sincere Hindus but they recognised that social conditions, and social opinion with it, have changed and are changing. As Munshi Iswar Saran put it, if we take into consideration the changed conditions, it is necessary for the preservation of Hindu society itself to make some change in the marriage laws. Mr. Seshagiri Iyer clearly showed that the declaration required by the present Special Marriage Act has become in practice a mere subterfuge. He said:

Last December I attended a marriage between two persons who were undoubtedly as good Hindus as anybody sitting in this House, and they had to go through the formality of declaring that they were no longer Hindus before contracting the marriage; unfortunately I was one of those who had to sign the register of this marriage as a witness. I know that subsequently and before the marriage the couple have been living as any good Hindu can be expected to live. Now, the result of saying that as Hindus they cannot contract these mixed marriages is to drive these people to a subterfuge. Is it to the good of the country, is it to the good of the community that these people should be obliged to have recourse to this kind of subterfuge?

Dr. Gour was prepared to make large concessions to meet objectors. If the bulk of Mahomedan opinion was against the Bill, he was prepared to exclude Mahomedans from its purview. So also with Parsis and all other castes and communities. As regards Hindus, he gave a clear undertaking that he would leave the question of collateral succession, the question of adoption, the right of residence in the family dwelling houses, and the question relating to religious endowments, to the Select Committee to decide. He even took exception to the President's ruling that referring the Bill to a Select Committee would commit the Assembly to the principle of the Bill. But all in vain. Bigotry is blind to reason, and bigotry carried the day.

The small majority by which the Bill was thrown out is full of hope. It was admitted at the Assembly that the outside opposition to Dr. Gour's Bill was both in quantity and quality less than that offered to Basu's Bill and Patel's Bill. The Legislative Assembly as at present constituted does not adequately represent the vital, progressive elements in the country. Many of the members have been elected on the strength of their social conservatism, and for them to give a vote in favour of the Bill would have meant political extinction. The next Bill, we hope and trust, will be introduced by a Government which will feel no need to shelter itself behind the meaningless plea of neutrality. It is a hardship and a disgrace that men and women should be obliged to resort to subterfuge to contract marriages beyond the narrow circle of their sub-castes. Those who say that the passing of a permissive civil marriage law, would revolutionise Hindu society, greatly under-rate the enduring principles in which that society is rooted. Hindu society will be the stronger, not the weaker, for a liberalisation of its present cast-iron customary codes of social conduct. With caste and untouchability gone, with child marriages abolished, with women given the fullest opportunity for education, Hindu society will become a great power for good among the nations of the world. A reformed Hindu society alone can give steadiness and strength to the Indian national movement. A divided, weak Hindu society is a source of danger to the body politic, a snare and a temptation to all other communities.

LONDON LETTER.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

January 19, 1922.

LABOUR PARTY'S UNPREPAREDNESS.

If any one had asked, about two weeks ago, whether or not, at an early date, there was going to be a general election, the would-be far-sighted politicians would have answered in a wise and knowing way, certainly, most certainly. It is true that events were all pointing in that direction, and, in consequence, a break-up of the present Coalition was prophesied. The Coalition Liberal Press assumed for certain a General Election in February and Parties were mustering their forces. Labour was apparently preparing for a big struggle and intended to contest about 400 seats out of a possible 602 seats in England, Scotland and Wales. Then a big cry was put up that before the present Ministry went out of office it must complete its present task in Ireland, and an important and totally unexpected hitch occurred at Cannes. At once overwhelming arguments were given against an immediate election until at the present moment responsible opinion is quite against it, and it looks as though the present Ministry has still a longer life to run, even though it be but a few months. Labour could not have been very sure of itself or of its preparedness for an immediate struggle for preponderating parliamentary power, for little seems to be said by its leaders against the postponement of the great day of trial.

WASHINGTON CONFERENCE.

The Washington Conference is drawing to its close, and though the big humanitarian ideals which brought the Conference into being are not likely to be realised in their entirety this year or, perhaps in the lifetime of the present generation, so much has been done, that we may rightly rejoice at the work of the Conference, and feel fresh hope stimulating us for a further working out of desires and plans for a World Peace. The discussions at Washington have not been all smooth sailing. Many difficult situations have arisen and sometimes it looked as though the real spirit of the Conference was going to evaporate, but in each trying situation the better heart has prevailed, and a working part of the ideal arrived at. The limitation of navies and the ban on the most horrible engines of destruction in war are worthy pacts; and though, when the first flush of enthusiasm dies down, there may creep out from their hiding places the old horrors, it is for the world to see that the pacts now entered into are kept. And the responsibility for keeping these pacts in the spirit and the letter of honour depends not upon one nation alone, but upon all those who have taken part in the Conference, and have accepted the principles there enunciated as being true and right, and what is more, possible for human life in its present stage of development.

IRISH LABOUR PROBLEM.

It looks as though Ireland is going to have her domestic problems angrily thrust upon the notice of her new Parliament even before she settles into her work of Home Rule. A few days ago a labour deputation waited upon Dail Eireann and claimed attention. It appears that Labour's views on the Treaty were not publicly expressed during the time of the negotiations, and it regards the present settlement with little favour. Its avowed aim, so says the Irish Labour correspondent to a big London daily, was to establish a "Workers' Republic." What actually took place between the deputation and the Dail Eireann we do not know, but we do know that a Workers' Republic was not promised by the Dail.

Of course the reason underlying the deputation was the same in Ireland as elsewhere, unemployment; the latter also being the cause of Labour's strength in Ireland at the present time, these being about 900,000 organised workers and the misery and discontent caused by the scarcity of work and consequent lack of life's necessities. But this incident shows that the new Irish Parliament will have immediately to see about constructing a policy to enable the workers to improve their conditions, otherwise the mass of the workers will be against the Government whether it happens to be Irish or English, for to them it will spell capitalism either way, and exploitation.

GEDDES ECONOMY.

What is now known as the Geddes economy axe is threatening education and, as a result, a storm of protest has arisen. It is claimed by the fighters for education that the Council classes are already too large and that smaller classes are necessary; that teachers' salaries must not be decreased, for teaching requires the best of the best people and must be paid for; that schools must be airy, well-built and well-equipped if we would build a worthy people; that one of the fundamentals of a modern nation is the dispelling of ignorance. In short, wherever cuts are made, they must not be made in education; that must be kept inviolate. The Educational Associations Conference met a few days ago at University College. Sir Charles Stewart, Director of Marconi's Wireless Works, who presided, said that in Germany no firm would consider itself properly equipped without seven or eight chemists; the result was that in definite directions they had reaped their reward in research work. He could see no better means of reinstating trade and commerce than through the young men and women who entered on a business life. But at the present time they were not given a fair chance, so far as he could see there was no real machinery for providing for the great mass of young persons leaving school at the age of fourteen. We ought not to be satisfied with this state of things, and great industrial concerns should make themselves sure that those young people were made thoroughly useful to the nation. It was absolutely necessary that the industries themselves should enter upon this work. Continuation and trade schools should be fully and freely used and the curriculum of such schools should be studied with interest by employers, and where it seemed necessary, suggestions should be made as to the subjects. Every factory should either possess a library, or co-operate with a public one.

Professor Gilbert Murray in his speech, dealing with the League of Nations and international Education, at the same Conference, uttered a diatribe against the general newspaper. "The essential trouble", he said, "seemed to be that the newspapers which gave the information on which the country depended for its most vital public and political action, provided it, in a form which, with its twisting and exaggerations made it attractive to an uneducated public."

INDUSTRIAL WELFARE SOCIETY.

It is now three years ago that the Industrial Welfare Society made itself heard in the cry "Humanity in Industry". Evidently it was heard, and, what is more necessary, understood, for the response was sure and effective. To-day, notwithstanding all the troubles in the English Industrial world, there are about 1,000 welfare workers in the employ of manufacturing firms throughout the country. A short time ago, the society received an enquiry from the Italian Government for details of the movement. Welfare work is indeed very varied and calls for much tact and sympathetic understanding on the part of its workers. There is sick-visiting to be done and first aid treatment in emergency cases, rest rooms to be arranged for, canteens to be organised, sports grounds to be supervised and in every department of activity to make the worker feel that his or her welfare is a matter of concern of the employer. The people chosen by large firms for this work are, as a rule, chosen very carefully. They must be people of about middle age with a good, but not necessarily higher, education. They must be sufficiently conversant with the dangers and temptations besetting youth to guide and advise wherever possible, and sufficiently broad-minded to recognise that an error of youthful ignorance, while it must be paid for, must not be allowed to spoil the whole chances of a life.

KENYA INDIAN DELEGATION.

There is now in England a Deputation, headed by Lord Delamere, representing Kenya European settlers. This Deputation is taking a strong stand for the most outrageous European point of view. In order to counteract its activities, the Eastern Africa Indian National Congress has appointed to represent Kenya Indians a delegation consisting of Messrs. A. M. Jeevanjee, Hy. S. L. Polak, and Colonel Wedgwood, M.P., who will be acting in co-operation with the India Office.

THE CONVERSIONS OF EARLY CHRISTIANS.

(By MR. K. G. KARKARE)

In the Angelus of the 15th January, a well-informed article has appeared on this subject. The article is too long, I therefore wish to give only important facts from it. Rev. Manuel de Sa, who has written it draws his own conclusion; I give the facts on which he bases his conclusion, and leave it to your readers to draw their own conclusions.

The Vicar-General of Goa, Fr. Michael Vaz returned from Portugal in 1546 with a letter containing orders from the king to destroy all heathen places of worship, their idols and pagods. Dr. Gerson de Cunha gives a summary of the more important of the twenty-five spontaneous or memoranda into which Bishop Albuquerque divided the said letter:

1. It is the duty of Christian Princes to prevent or put a stop in the dominions to their worship of idols.

2. The king has learnt with regret that the heathens are allowed to perform freely their religious ceremonies in his dominions.

4. He commands the idols to be broken to pieces, and the individuals who make the idols to be punished.

6. That the converts be granted privileges of all sorts, among others that of exemption from forced labour.

10. That a Church be built of the invocation of St. Joseph at Bassein at the expense of his Treasury.

12. That from duties paid at the Custom-house 300 fanegas (a corn measure) of rice be for ever distributed among the new Converts made by the Vicar General Miguel Vas at Chaul.

18. That protection be afforded under the advice of Mestre Francisco to the trade on the Fishery Coast avoiding all aggressions and extortions.

21. That he forbids the heathens to make Christian images for sale.

23. That colleges be built for the instruction and religious education of the Catechumens and also for the heathens, that the latter may receive the light of the Gospel.

25. That the new Christians be well treated in order to gain their affection.—(Origin of Bombay, pp. 136-7).

Fr. Alexander Valignann, the Visitor of the Jesuit Province of Goa, wrote in September 1795:

"As to the first regarding the conversion of infidels in these parts it is not commonly by preaching and teaching, but by other just means, as, by forbidding their idolatries, and by punishing them for such, by denying them favours which can justly be refused, and by giving them to new converts, and by honouring, helping and assisting in need the latter that the former may be converted by these means."—(Archivo Port Or, F. V. No. 1022-II).

Of a like nature were the orders of the Governor of Goa, Francis Barreto (1555-7). Four Jesuits approached the Governor and told him that he would acquire more glorious and immortal renown than he could deserve by the force of his arms in great and famous battles, if he took efficacious means to convert to Christianity all the vassals of the State. With their advice, orders were published with great solemnity in Goa and afterwards extended to the other Portuguese possessions.

"Those orders (provisions) forbade the infidel vassals of the State under grave penalties, all the rites, ceremonies and feasts of the gentiles in our lands; all the offices of the state; to serve as ministers or officials of the king; to administer taxes, there being a Christian, to bid equally on them; it was ordained that the wives of pagans after conversion should have half shares in the property of the house, according to the Laws of Portugal; that the orphans of pagan parents before having the use of reason should be seized and baptized even in case there should be the mother or any direct older relation, and that after they came to the use of reason they should be under Christian guardians until they came to the age of 14 years."—O. C. P. I. O. I. D. 11 S 28).

These laws of Governor Francis Barreto were repealed in 1677 and though they had been passed at the instance of Jesuits, two members of the same order voted against them. In their place a new law we made that orphans who had no direct relations on the paternal or maternal side should be baptized or taken care of by the Pai dos Christaos.

A third way of bringing the heathens to the Faith was to hold grand and imposing ceremonies on the occasion of the conversion of some important person who was in turn expected to exert his influence towards the conversion of others. Such a thing happened on the occasion of the conversion of the Brahmin Procuniochi in Basseln.

The fourth way which was very fruitful in making conversions was the above law of Francis Barreto whereby the Pai dos Christãos at once baptized the infant children of a deceased father even if there was a mother or older direct relations to protest against it. Those who had the use of reason were kept in seminaries or Colleges until they were 14 years old and then baptized if they wished it, else they were sent home.

The Jesuit Father Manoel Godinho, who had been the Pai dos Christãos in Thana says that these 'Fathers of the Christians' baptized every year between three hundred and four hundred souls.

Another important ordinance of the Government of Goa which helped the conversions was that "if any brahmin or person prevents a pagan or any other infidel from becoming a Christian or should give advice to this effect, shall be made a prisoner and sentenced to the galleys of the King, my master, and shall forfeit all his property in favour of the works of the blessed Apostle St. Thomas." (Ordinance of D. Constantino de Braganca of the 17th February 1560 Arch P. O. Fix S. Part I No 334.)

The result of all this legislation, which was carried into execution, was that some Brahmins and Pagans fled from the Portuguese possessions leaving their property behind. Commerce suffered. In Salsette of Goa the most fertile fields remained uncultivated for want of persons to farm them.

The immediate successor of Dom Constantino found that the Ordinance of his predecessor should be mitigated and in 1561 passed another that the pagans who had fled on their return should have their houses and property restored to them. Dom Constantino had ordered that 'If all the pagans who had gone out of this and because they said that they made them Christians by force, did not return within a certain time they should lose all their property' (lb No. 391).

The legislation with regard to the Conversions was communicated from one part of the Portuguese possession to the other parts. The following is the royal order on the subject dated 1st March 1571 :

"I the King, make it known to those who see this alvara (order) that I find it good and it pleases me that my orders, which are passed in favour of Conversion and Christianity of some parts of India be communicated, fulfilled and kept in all the other parts where there is Christianity, in those matters, which can be applied to them." (B. I. No. 710).

CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

With many others I regret to see such a sane judgment as yours, and a man so level-headed, taking the side of those who in the least degree countenance civil disobedience, and give a place even to the probability of adopting a course which will result in breaking the laws of the land. Surely you are aware that you are heading straight for civil war with all its horror, and for the postponement of the opportunity and even of the capability of self-government. Are the Reforms so lately introduced unworthy to be tried and used as means of progress? They are meant to be such. Are they to be scorned and thrust aside for the delusion of some swifter method of attaining what your countrymen prove in countless ways they are not yet capable of performing? Turn back from being a mere copyist and from following with the hot-headed crowd. Give your readers safer and cooler advice. Keep to Social Reform and avoid the extreme of Politics.

I would commend to your remembrance the words of the poet:—

"How few of all the ills that men endure

Are those that Kings and Crowns can cause or cure."

and the wise saying of one of India's great sons, now I fear being forgotten, "The longer one lives, observes and thinks, the more deeply does he feel, there is no community on the face of the earth which suffers less from political evils and more from self-inflicted, or self-assumed, and, therefore avoidable evils than the Hindu community."

RAJA SRI T. MADHAVA ROW, K. C. S. I.

and also the opinion of one of the sincere lovers of India, who worked and thought for her good through long years,

"The permanent remedies for the poverty (and other evils) of India rest with the people themselves."

SIR W. W. HUNTER, L. L. D., C. S. I.

There is no objection whatever to the wise criticizing of Government. Government would welcome such. It is the way of constitutional Reform and advance. But to suppose that any Government on earth will in any way allow its laws to be flouted and its measures to keep peace and order for all its peoples to be called 'repression' is to suppose that Government will cease to perform its functions.

Dear Mr. Editor, try to walk on the slope that leads to a precipice.

I am not acquainted with Mr. Gandhi, nor have even seen him or heard him. So I have formed no decided opinion as to his character or intentions. He may be a very well-meaning man and a sincere patriot. I don't know. But I do know that it is possible for me to form an opinion as to his methods; and I don't approve of them. He is no true reader of human nature. He has no clear vision of the future, still less has he planned out a clear course to reach it. He has no real conception of what Swaraj means. His cry for Swaraj within a year, for khaddar and charka, as the panacea for the evils of the present state of things are all mere child-like whims, and have nothing of the vision of a statesman. How could he come within 1000 miles of guiding India in all the complexity of its relationship? He may have beautiful ideas but they are not to become fact not by the methods he advises.

Urge your readers, Mr. Editor, to cease vain aspirations. Tell them to keep on the path of steady progress by constitutional means. Let them observe strict self-control, and the promotion of brotherhood; let them seek to eradicate social wrongs, caste unfriendliness; to ally accept all methods of co-operation,—which is the law of life,—and so, strongly the power and knowledge gained through years of increasing experience, find the greater reforms to be acquired by self-development.

Madras,

31st January, 1922.

G. H. M.

[Our correspondent writes under a misapprehension. We have repeatedly declared that in the present state of the country, civil disobedience means nothing less than devastating civil war, and we are doing our best to avert such a disaster in any shape or form. But we do feel that a people may be driven by bad Government to civil disobedience as a last desperate resort, and what we are anxious about is that that may not happen in India under British rule. Our correspondent is good enough to give us credit for sane judgment, and we hope he does not think that we have suddenly lost our sanity. If he understood the situation as we do, he would not think very differently from us. —Ed.—I. S. R.]

SELF-DISINFECTION.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I hope you will allow me some space to reply to the extract from the Shield which you quote in your issue of the 15th instant. I must begin by saying that the article in the Shield seems to be written by an extremely careless writer and this makes me very doubtful about his statements. I shall point out only one instance of this. He wants to know if Mr. Charles Gibbs is right or wrong in his opinion that gonorrhoea is frequently infected directly into the urethral canal and is therefore quite unaffected by outside application. Obviously Mr. Gibbs is entirely right, but who ever advocated any outside application against gonorrhoea?

This simply shows that the writer has not studied the subject on which he undertakes to write an article. These moral people are so anxious to prove their point that they do not think it necessary to obtain information, or perhaps they think it immoral to obtain it! The disinfection methods which are considered safe by the greatest authorities include an irrigation of the urethral canal, which is intended to reach gonorrhoea germs. The kind of misstatement this writer indulges in prevents one from believing even in his statistics, especially when they differ from other peoples'. Here are some.

Dr. Sabouraud (St. Louis Hospital) wrote in 1918 in the Presse Médicale: From previous statistics it appears that, in peace times, from 7 to 8 p. c. of American Soldiers who had chance intercourse were contaminated. The proportion rose to 12 and 15 p. c. during the Cuban and Philippine wars. With the prophylactic measures now in use, it is only 1.2 p. c. In one prophylactic surgery at Bordeaux which I know, 1,000 soldiers submitted to prophylactic treatment between July 25 and November 10 of last year, without their afterwards exhibiting a single case of contamination due either to gonorrhoea or soft chancres or syphilis.... By quite analogous prophylactic remedies, the Australian army has presented only one case of contamination out of a thousand men (British Medical Journal).

Dr. Salmon (Institut Pasteur) wrote in the Bulletin Medical (1906): Krauss of Vienna has practised preventive instillations in some regiments of the Austrian Army, and venereal morbidity has decreased. Lesser, Tandler have published observations collected on German ships. While the sailors thus treated preventively nearly all escaped, others caught venereal disease. A medical student, being convinced of the efficacy of the method, offered himself to be experimented upon. Inoculated with the pus of two syphilitic chancres, then rubbed with calomel ointment, he did not catch the disease.

Dr. Chastang, Fleet-Surgeon, wrote in 1914 (Presse Médicale): So far, indeed, to my knowledge, no man who has been submitted to preventive treatment under medical control, has presented a specific chancre case.

Dr. Frank Kidd states (Report of Royal Commission on Venereal Diseases). If within one or two hours of connection the man injects into the urethra a little 10 p. c. protargol in petroleum jelly, he will never contract the disease. Dr. Balzer (Physician to St. Louis Hospital) wrote in 1915: This excellent preventive prophylaxis, practised by the doctor, has yielded the best results in the United States, in Italy, and in France, in the Army Corps in which it has been adopted.

Sir William Osler, the greatest authority on medicine at present in England, and author of a standard work, says:

The evidence before us (Report of the Birth-Rate Commission) is that these measures carried out in a proper way, are effective. It has been shown in the Army—in the American Army—that prophylaxis immediately after the act is a measure that can be effectively carried out..... I do not think there can be any question in view of the experience of such an expert as Colonel Walker and others. He quotes from a letter from Colonel Bullock of the American Army (a clergyman): Upto the present there has been no authenticated case where either V. D. G. or V. D. S. has developed after the use of the prophylactic tube and the medicated irrigation within twenty-four hours after exposure to infection.

In the same report we find even Dr. E. B. Turner who takes a moral point of view admitting that if he wanted to kick over the traces, he believed he could succeed in protecting himself from any risk whatever (p 234).

In the same, Sir Bryan Donkin says: My opinion is that permanganate of potash is sufficient to rely upon as a prophylactic for both diseases used if immediately after the act.

A question for Moralists: In order to safeguard the doubtful morals of the few who are deterred by fear from illicit intercourse, are we to endanger the health and the lives of those innocents who are infected without intercourse or illicit intercourse, whose number, as Sir William Osler, says, far exceeds that of the guilty so far as syphilis is concerned?

None but a confirmed traditionalist can approve of this cruelty.

Yours sincerely,
R. D. KARVE.

[Why does Mr. Karve ignore the statistics referred to by the Shield of the extraordinarily high percentage of infection in the British Army on the Rhine and the Baltic, instituted in self-disinfection? Ed, I S R.]

INDIANS ABROAD.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The present time is critical not only in the history of India but also that of Indians abroad. Efforts are being made by the Union Government to get rid of the Indian population there, our countrymen in Kenya have to face a great agitation by the European Colonists, while the condition of our brethren in Fiji is growing worse every day. The troubles and difficulties of these people are too numerous to be related here.

At this time when India is passing through a crisis, it cannot be expected that the Indian public will be able to devote a great deal of attention to the problems of Indians abroad, still it is our duty to do something for these unfortunate countrymen of ours. We cannot neglect them altogether.

With this view in our mind we have decided to do propaganda work for the colonial Indians in an organised way. We shall be thankful if our countrymen in the colonies will send to us regularly accounts of their difficulties, which will be circulated here through the English and Vernacular papers. Any suggestions for proper organisation of this work will oblige us.

UNTOUCHABILITY IN THE WEST.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Lynchings, burnings and lootings of the 'Niggers' on the slightest pretext—their segregation—denial to them of the commonest civic rights—much less equality of civic opportunity—separate hotels (even for the 'Hindus')—separate trams—separate compartments in trains—separate schools, colleges and what not—separation and segregation all round to this day! Is this not untouchability enough and to spare? And this going on in your self-righteous correspondent's own jolly 'democratic' country! Are pogroms in Russia and S. Africa entirely things of the past? In Europe, it is enough to mention the Jewish ghetto, and in America, the Indian reservations. What are these but rank forms of untouchability, etc., and unapproachability too? Surely it does not lie in A. G. M.'s mouth (though he patted you, Sir, a thousand times over) to harp on the mote in his Hindun neighbour's eye whilst he is blind to the beam in his own.

Yours etc.,

S. D. NADKARNI.

(The Modern Review.)

We consider the object and deliberations of the Conference to be very important. . . . It has been objected that only the Liberals and the Independents present thoroughly identified themselves with it, that the Non-co-operators did not at all take part in it; and that Mr. Gandhi, who attended on behalf of the Non-co-operators adopted an attitude of aloofness. Mr. Gandhi has fully explained his position and attitude in his speeches and in Young India. Our opinion is that the settlement desired to be arrived at is really and practically to be effected between the conflicting views, aims and attitude of Government on the one hand and the Congressists or Non-Co-operators on the other. Therefore, if the absence of one of the parties, etc., the Non-co-operators, be brought forward as an objection, we do not see why the absence of a representative or representatives of Government is not also to be considered an objection. Perhaps the objection under discussion is based on the conception that Government stands in the position of an Earthly Providence and, therefore, anybody representing the People or any section of it, who wants to have anything to do with Government, must "approach" it as a suppliant. That is not the opinion of Non-co-operators, as we understand it, nor is it ours. Whoever speaks for the People is an equal of anybody else. Mr. Gandhi, we take it, meant to say this in effect, when he said some time ago that there should be no leggar in the Round Table Conference. If our view is correct, the function of the gentlemen who met at Bombay at much sacrifice of time and money arranged the preliminaries of a Round Table Conference between Government and the people's representatives. That neither official delegates nor Non-co-operators attended the Conference does not take away a jot from the usefulness and importance of the Conference, and is therefore, no valid objection.

Another objection brought forward is that Mr. Gandhi refused to suspend the enlistment of the People's Volunteers during the truce. We do not see the force of this objection. Has Government been requested by the objectors to keep in abeyance the appointment of policemen and other officials, who in addition to their ordinary duties, may be employed for purposes of repression, should the Round Table Conference not come off or should it be infructuous? The objectors forget that the Conference must be between equals, and, therefore, whatever condition is laid down for one party, must be laid down for the other party too; we mean the identical condition or an equivalent condition.

THE SADHU AND MR. GANDHI

The Sadhu has authorized us to state that he received a very kind invitation from Mr. Gandhi to pay the latter a personal visit at his ashram in Gujerat and that he spent two days there on his way to Bombay. It would be beyond our province to speak of the personal fellowship between these two great sons of India but it is permissible to report that there was genuine admiration for one another, that Mr. Gandhi investigated for himself the motives leading the Sadhu to a full consecration of himself to Christ, and that the Sadhu had equal freedom in cross-questioning Mr. Gandhi concerning his methods of agitation. After the evening meal Mr. Gandhi introduced the Sadhu to his household and ashram students and asked the Sadhu to speak to all assembled in whatever way he might desire, the Sadhu giving a plain Gospel address, followed by intimate fellowship with individual students. Concerning the problems of the hour, Mr. Gandhi sends to West through the Sadhu the message that he desires India to have nothing but friendship with the world on an equal footing with all other countries, while the Sadhu made quite plain his profound disapproval of Mr. Gandhi's present methods, telling him in so many words that they can lead India to nothing but ruin and useless suffering.—The Dayanodaya.

WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.

Miss Sadie Miller writes to us:

The Women's Christian Temperance Union of India has just had its triennial convention, one of the most successful that has ever been held by the ladies of that organization. The last one was held in Lucknow. This one was held in Madras from the 26-31 of January and marks a great epoch in the history of the W. C. T. U. for India.

Many of you know Miss Mary Campbell, the W. C. T. U. World organizer, who has been to so many parts of India and done such successful work. At this convention it was decided that she return to U. S. America for the national convention of that country which has seen prohibition for several years. This will be held in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania in the month of November 1922. The ladies of America are known the world around for their great leadership in this worthy cause.

The Presidential address given by Mrs. F. R. Price who is the national President was one of great credit to her as well as the splendid way in which she conducted the entire convention throughout. She enumerated the various ways in which women of to-day are doing their part in the progress and betterment of conditions everywhere in the world.

In this address we were reminded of the fact that the W. C. T. U. was born in prayer. In the State of Ohio, U. S. A. one woman who was tremendously interested in the welfare of the boys and men of her country as well as her own sons and her husband, began this good work by praying that the saloons should be wiped out of her town. She soon had others following her and in the course of time several scores of Godly women and mothers were joining in this splendid work.

This mother's little girl had a grand part in it too for she requested her mother to read, at the prayer meeting, the 146 psalm. The W. C. T. U. had made this one of its most favorite psalms ever since.

These earnest women did more than these Temperance workers are doing today, in that they went in couples to the liquor shops, prayed for and pleaded with hardened rum-sellers to throw away their intoxicants and close down their public houses. You would perhaps call that picketing today in India.

A power beyond all human effort or expectation was in those prayers to the God of heaven and earth and great barrels of alcoholic drinks were rolled out of the shops, their heads burst in and the streets literally ran red with wine and other liquors.

The business was given up by many rum-sellers, never to be resumed again. This spread to twenty-five towns in the State and then from State to State until in the city of Cleveland, Ohio, in 1871 it crystallized in the organization known as the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. From the United States it spread from nation to nation and in 1883 it was proposed to have an international organization. Mrs. Margaret B. Lucas of England was its first President, Francis Willard was its founder. Miss Willard was President from 1891-98, Lady Henry Somerset from 1900 to 1906. The Countess of Carlisle was elected in 1906.

Lady Carlisle died in 1921 the middle of the year. She was a most capable woman. After the birth of a daughter who was not given the welcome as a son would have received by near friends, Lady Carlisle decided she would do more than she ever had for the uplift of womanhood and bring her status where she felt it belonged. The W. C. T. U. has been the means of giving woman her place and not putting a discount on her simply because she is woman. Some one told Lady Carlisle she should have been Prime Minister for England to which she replied—I lived too soon for that.

A memorial service was held for these splendid ladies who had done so much for the temperance cause, especially in the W. C. T. U. Ladies Carlisle, Somerset, Mrs. Donald Sunder and Mrs. Stephens, all having passed to their reward since the last national convention. Mr. Donald Sunder, husband of Mrs. Sunire, very thoughtfully and graciously sent greetings to the convention, as well as presenting beautiful banners to both the Bengal Divisional and National conventions, in behalf of his wife. He is one of the best friends of the W. C. T. U. in giving splendid financial help to the association from time to time. We need more such friendly gentlemen for the work we are proposing to do as a forward movement in this great cause.

Many excellent papers were read showing what work has been done the last two years. One kind gentleman has kindly presented a lovely Union Jack to the Association to be given to the Division which makes the greatest progress in gaining numbers from one convention to another. The Bombay Division has been a back number until the last year and a half some have wakened up, been busy, so that the Union Jack came to them as a prize to be held until some other division outdoes them. Will not the people all over Bombay Presidency lend a helping hand in this great work of Temperance and help to form new W. C. T. U., Young People's Branches, Loyal Temperance Legions, and Blue Ribbon Units so as to get all informed as to the evil effects of Alcohol on the human body? You will be helping make the empire prohibition by helping this organization.

There is a place for every boy and girl, man and woman, in these different divisions. No excuse for any one to be exempted. He who is not for temperance is against it. In union is strength, the higher the number the greater the strength.

The second evening Mr. Legh, I. C. S. was chairman of the convention and gave a splendid address. We sometimes hear people say government opposes the work against the liquor traffic but feel sure this is a mistake. Mr. Legh constantly uses his influence against liquor and showed in candid terms the evils of alcoholic drinks. Miss Campbell who meets government people everywhere wants all to know that government lends a helping hand to any sane method of procedure against the use of liquor.

Rao Bahadur Kandaswamy Chetty gave a good paper also on what the W. C. T. U. stands for, the work of women in these modern times and how we can help to bring about prohibition. He believes firmly in the education of women. The men are what women make them therefore theirs is the greater mission in life, with such a wide influence. He believes in prayer and the fact that the W. C. T. U. was born in prayer has much faith in what this organization accomplishes. He felt the fact that women had done so much good in the world, it is a pity they did not begin sooner, especially in India.

The Sunday services throughout the city, some ten different churches, were conducted by ladies of the conference, each on giving a temperance address about half of these being given in either Tamil or Telugu, so that Madras has received much new information on Temperance through this convention. The report of the proceedings, with two separate leaflets containing the president's address and the address of Mr. Kandaswamy Chetty will be printed so that any one wishing these can receive them by ordering from headquarters of the Literature Dept., Deaconess Home, Lucknow, conducted by Miss Joan Davis. Don't fail to get these for they are full of good things and first hand information.

There are now eight different divisions organized and others will be added as the work progresses. They are Assam, Bengal, Bombay, Central Provinces, Madras, Punjab, Rajputana, United Provinces. South India has yet much to be done. The help of all who are interested and willing is solicited.

The efficient help of several lady doctors has given the W. C. T. U. literature on the evil effects of alcohol, narcotics and the many other drugs that are doing so much ruin in India today. These together with a well outlined course for scientific teaching in schools, has been adopted and mission schools are taking it up as fast as possible so as to get the young properly informed about the effect of these on the human body. Some of the ladies go home with the thought and hope of getting it introduced also in the Government schools that no one need be ignorant any longer concerning these poisons and what misery and ruin they really do cause. All who know about prohibition in U. S. A. know that this was the largest step toward winning the day for the States. If such a course could be made compulsory in schools to be taught there it would be very agreeable indeed and give all interested a great hope for the same results that were forthcoming there.

OFFICIAL

The Temperance Record organ of the W. C. T. U. for India, has been very ably edited by Miss M. E. Archibald, of Chicago, Madras Presidency. At this meeting the Record and Indian Temperance news submerged and will hereafter be known as Temperance News and White Ribbon. It will be edited by the W. C. T. U. but a number of pages in it furnished by a member of the staff of the former Temperance news, a gentleman, so that the magazine, a monthly, will be one of greater interest than either has been hitherto. This Magazine is printed at 41, Lower Circular Road, Calcutta.

AN INTER-PROVINCIAL MARRIAGE.

The marriage of Shrimati Sushila, B. A. grand daughter of R. B. Diwan Kearamai with Mr. Sachindra Nath Sarcar, nephew of Sir Nil Ratan Sarcar took place at Karachi on the 28th January according to Brahma rites. Bhai Sitaram of Lahore acted as a Minister. The marriage was registered under Act 3 of 1872.

A RESOLUTION IN A FOREST.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Kindly spare a short space of your esteemed weekly for the following:—

I am in a forest, where love, joy and freedom blow freely and profusely. The hills which surround me, cover themselves in green 'sarees' like bashful maidens. The high cliffs which stand at the furthest end expose shame-facedly their baldness and nudity wishing perhaps to pass for sages. The birds soar up high in the sky. They bathe their silky wings and tender limbs in the bright rays of the morning sunshine. The purest mountain air fills up their lungs. They drink deep the splendour and vigour of the God-created world. Beauty and joy burst on them. They break into music and love pours down from their eyes. They descend slowly and settle themselves on the branches of a neighbouring tree. I am convinced that God has created this world neither as a prison nor as a hell to make us suffer for the 'sins of the past lives.' Here comes no priest with his old Sanskrit books to kill God's laws and to poison their joie de vivre. I uttered the word 'Priest' in such a disgust that it caught the ear of one of the birds. The bird asks another bird "Ma cherie, what is a priest?" 2nd Bird:—Suppose my jahan (a pet name for a male young one of a bird) loves your mimi and your mimi also loves my jahan the priest blesses them.

1st Bird—Oh! let us have him, but my mimi is only one month old! How can I say she will love your jahan, when she grows up.

2nd Bird:—When a priest marries them, she must love my jahan.

1st Bird:—And your jahan will not love my mimi, what has the priest to say?

2nd Bird:—He says my Jahan can have ten mimis, if he wants, but your mimi must have no other jahan. If my Jahan dies before your mimi begins to love him, her God-given silky wings are to be pecked out. She must mourn and she must die.

At this answer, mimi's mother got so much frightened that she fainted and fell on the ground. This created a sensation amongst all the birds. They came to hear the frightful account. When mimi's mother recovered her senses, to calm her motherly heart, they all said "This lovely forest is out of bounds to all priests and our heartiest sympathies go to the victims of so-called religion."

ROYAL YAKUTI.

THE YAKUTI or life giving nectar has been prepared from
the best, choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has wonderful properties of increasing virile power and it rectifies urinary disorders. In fact it makes man a man. This valuable
medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and
gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to these persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen
the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility.
Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicines. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires. It is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills. Rupees ten only.

NOTES.

10:

The Latest Non-Co-operation Tragedy: In a leading article we point out the bearing of the murderous outbreak at Chauri Chaura in the Gorakhpur district of the United Provinces, on the contemplated civil disobedience at Bardoli in the Bombay Presidency. The outbreak seems to have had for its proximate cause the frustration by the police of an attempt on the part of Congress volunteers to picket the bazar and to prevent the sale of fish, drugs and liquor. It is reported also that an Ahir, a Government pensioner, an ex-convict who had become a volunteer was called up and threatened with deprivation of his pension. The volunteers determined three days later to picket the bazar forcibly and overawe all opposition by numbers. They attacked the police station with bricks, burnt it down, and murdered all the twenty-one policemen and officers at the station, and threw their bodies on to the fire. Two of the rioters are reported to have been killed. A noteworthy feature of this incident is that there is no disposition on the part of the local Congress officials to dispute the facts as given in the official version. In fact, the messages sent out by the latter, are much more lurid and they frankly acknowledge that non-violent Non-co-operation has been absolutely discredited in Gorakhpur. In a foot-note to a statement signed by several citizens who visited the scene, including Syed Sobhanulla, President of the District Congress Committee, this gentleman says that he had witnessed the affair himself and "it was really such a horrible scene that non-violence in this district appears to be impossible and, therefore, I append my signature to this report."

The Malaviya Committee and the Gorakhpur Affair: In spite of the discourteous response of His Excellency the Viceroy the explosive epistles of Mahatma Gandhi, and the scoffing of a section of the Press, the Malaviya Committee in Bombay persisted in its work of finding a means to facilitate a settlement. The Gorakhpur tragedy gave it an unexpected and undesired opening of which it has not been slow to avail itself. The indelible veteran, Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, had been called up from Benares for consultation on the situation created by the Mahatma's ultimatum to Government and the Government reply to it. Mahatma Gandhi had also been invited to come to Bombay, and the whole of Thursday the members of the Malaviya Committee and the Mahatma had a very frank and full discussion from which fruitful results are expected. A meeting of the Working Committee of the Congress was to have been held at Bardoli yesterday, and the Pandit and some other members of the Bombay Committee had been invited to attend it. There is every reason to hope that the projected civil disobedience at Bardoli will be practically abandoned and the whole programme of Non-co-operation revised so as to facilitate the endeavours of the Malaviya Committee to devise a means of conciliation consistent with the best interests of the country.

The East African Debate in the Legislative Assembly: Though Mr. Agnihotri's motion in the Legislative Assembly on Thursday related to the position of Indians in all parts of Africa, it virtually narrowed itself down to a discussion of Mr. Winston Churchill's recent speech to the East African deputation in London. The two remarkable features of the debate were the opposition to the motion, of the two representatives of British Commerce in India in sympathy with their fellow-Whites in East Africa, and the absolute silence of Government as to whether Mr. Churchill spoke for himself or for the Cabinet. Mr. Sarma's speech on behalf of Government does not at all make it clear whether the Government of India itself had been consulted in the matter. Surely there was sufficient time for Government to have ascertained by cable the real inwardness of the Colonial Secretary's pronouncement, and we can hardly imagine that it had not done so. Mr. Sarma's reticence, therefore, leaves on us the uneasy feeling that Mr. Churchill spoke not for himself but as the mouthpiece of the Cabinet. Mr. Sarma's plea that the political situation in India made it difficult for Government to plead the cause of Indians in East Africa, is palpably absurd, considering that in the most peaceful times, representations on behalf of Indians received no better consideration. It is more true to say that the speech of the Colonial Secretary has worsened the political situation in India than that the political situation brought about the speech.

The Mopla Waggon Tragedy: A Reuter's telegram contained the comments of an English newspaper on the report of the Knapp Committee which enquired into the circumstances of the death by asphyxiation of some sixty Mopla convicts in a railway waggon on the South Indian Railway. The Madras papers thereupon strongly criticised the action of the local Government in not publishing in the country a report of such importance simultaneously with its publication in England. The Government of Madras has now published a telegram giving a summary of the findings of the Committee which they sent to the Government of India for transmission to the Secretary of State. They naively state that they had no idea that publication in England was contemplated in advance of publication in India. The use of vans for the conveyance of prisoners is justified, but the failure to submit each van for inspection before use is condemned, and the responsibility for such failure assigned to the Railway Company (which has no soul to be damned nor body to be kicked) and its local representative, the Traffic Inspector. May not the Railway Company urge in its own justification what Government urge in justification of its officials that over 2,000 prisoners had been conveyed in similar vans (without separate inspection for ventilation) on 32 different journeys! No wonder the London paper calls this "sickening, shuffling hypocrisy"!

India in Parliament: It is announced that an amendment relating to India to the address in reply to the King's speech, will be moved in the House of Commons on Tuesday next. We hope that Mr. Montagu and the Prime Minister will have something to say upon their policy in India which will be less of a declaration of bankrupt statesmanship than Lord Curzon's declarations in the House of Lords. The ex-Viceroy practically closed the door of conciliation and opened wide the portals of repression as the sole remaining expedient for the pacification of India. There will be no further constitutional reform. Repression and suppression are to be the order of the day. We wonder that Lord Curzon has not learnt the lesson of the Partition agitation which owed its origin to his imperious imperialism. He does not understand the temper of the country which has vastly changed since he drew his memorable contrast between the veracity of the East and the West. It is most unfortunate that His Majesty's Government should have no better spokesman in the House of Lords than this ex-Viceroy who may be said with truth to have originated the policy of exasperating the Indian people which has borne such bitter fruit under his successors.

Cow Protection in Canada: The excellent monthly, the Social Welfare of Toronto for December, is a child welfare number. In the course of an important article on milk as an essential food, we read: "The people of Canada have gradually been learning the value of having healthy milk. They have, however, been sadly lacking in an appreciation of the value of milk as a food, as a food for adults but more especially for children. This appreciation can only be gained by a movement of popular education—hence the milk campaign. People were gradually getting out of the habit of drinking milk. This was especially true of children. A survey of 14 schools in a Canadian city revealed the rather astounding fact that only three-fifths of the children were milk-drinkers. The need of correcting this condition was obvious to organizations and individuals interested in child welfare, so the co-operation of the leaders of the milk industry was secured to re-educate the public in a revived appreciation of the value of milk. These health workers did so at the risk of being accused of boasting what is supposed to be a closed and lucrative combine. The movement was justifiable and justified. Canadian boys were taught that milk makes muscle; their sisters that milk was the true secret of that "schoolgirl complexion." You see it was necessary to cater to both sexes. Cabinet ministers milked cows at public meetings. The return in milk was scanty but the publicity was excellent—for the movement if not for the cow. The cow bids fair to regain her ancient prestige as a sacred animal. This is fitting, for she is the fountain of one of our most essential foods." The progress of the movement in a very modern country like Canada to restore "the ancient prestige" of the cow as "a sacred animal," ought to be of great interest to us in India where, happily, the sanctity of the cow is yet a living faith though often sadly neglected in practice.

A New Version of Caste: No apologist of the Varnashrama Dharma, not even the Maharaja of Durbangab, has ever put forward such an absolute and uncompromising plea for a rigid, iron-bound caste system as President Harding did in the remarkable address on the Negro question which we print to-day by the courtesy of Professor Hannum of the American Foreign Press Service. "Politically and economically," said the President, "there need be no occasion for great and permanent differentiation, for limitations of the individualist's opportunity, provided that on both sides there shall be recognition of the absolute divergence in things social and racial." He would inculcate in the coloured race the wish to improve itself as a distinct race with a heredity, a set of traditions, an array of aspirations all its own. "Out of such racial ambitions and pride will come natural segregations, without narrowing any rights, such as are proceeding in both rural and urban communities now in southern states, satisfying natural inclinations and adding notably to happiness and contentment." Our American Christian missionary friends, we trust, will have something to say to this new Hardingian Varnashrama, while our upholders of caste, we are sure, will hail the President as a modern Rishi endorsing their own inveterate prejudices.

A Pioneer Women's College. Along with the bright and sprightly quarterly which records the sayings and doings of the Isabella Thoburn College, Lucknow, we have received a copy of the Lal Bagh Review containing a record of the progress made by the Pioneer Women's College in India during the twenty-five years, 1896-1920. The Review is a brief history of higher education for women in upper India, and should find a prominent place in any list of publications relating to social reform. The Hon. Mr. Chintamani, speaking at another Christian College in Lucknow the other day, paid a high and well-deserved tribute to the work of educational institutions conducted by Christian Missions. Among such institutions the Isabella Thoburn College will always occupy an important place. We wish the institution a long life of ever-increasing usefulness and prosperity.

Malabar Relief Fund. We are requested to announce that there will be a musical concert in aid of the Malabar Relief Fund, Bombay, under the distinguished patronage of Lady Meherbai Dorabji Tata on Sunday the 12th instant at 5-30 P. M. in Sir Cowaji Jehangir Hall. The infant musician, Master Manbar Barve who, we are told, is a musical prodigy, will entertain the public of Bombay with his music. The Hon. Dr. Sir Narayan Chandavarkar, Kt., L. L. D., will make an appeal on behalf of the Malabar Relief Fund. The rates of tickets are Rs. 10, Rs. 7, Rs. 5, Rs. 3, Rs. 2 and Re. 1. Tickets can be had and seats may be reserved at the Sir Cowaji Jehangir Hall on Sunday the 12th instant from 12 Noon to 5 P.M.

Treatment of Leprosy. The January issue of "Without the Camp," the quarterly magazine of the Mission to Lepers, records progress in many directions of the work of the Mission during last year. It calls attention to the definite advance made in the medical treatment of leprosy, adding that while it is not possible so far to say if permanent results have been obtained, undoubtedly advance has been made of a most encouraging character. We print today an account of the hopeful results obtained under the Mission's auspices in Korea by Dr. Wilson of Kwangju.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1922.

CHAURI CHAURA AND BARDOLI.

We had just time last week to indicate in a few sentences our general impression of the open letter which Mahatma Gandhi had addressed to the Viceroy. What strikes one most unpleasantly on first reading it, is its pragmatic tone which accentuates the general confusion of issues throughout the letter. The sum and substance of it is that Bardoli is to refuse to pay taxes in order to vindicate the freedom of the press, freedom of speech and freedom of association that have been infringed by recent Government measures. The Bombay Presidency, and Bardoli, have not been subjected to these measures. The only reason for the selection of this Taluka for the first adoption of civil disobedience, is that Mahatma Gandhi believes that the movement has the most chances of success there because, let it be frankly said, the Bombay Government may be relied upon to deal with it with due regard to justice and humanity. Thus, for its virtues the Bombay Government is to be penalised by being made to bear the first shock of civil disobedience. The unfair, unjust and ill-judged choice of a Taluka in the one Presidency where Non-Co-operationists have been treated with the most consideration, must be evident to all thinking men. The Government of Bombay has been harrassed beyond all other provincial Governments by the random efforts to capture the machinery of municipalities for Non-Co-operation purposes, and this choice of Bardoli as the scene of the first experiment in civil disobedience caps them all. That Government has been virtually forced by the erratic action of the non-co-operationists in the municipalities of Sarat and Ahmedabad to suspend these bodies. What action they may have to take to deal with the civil disobedience at Bardoli, we do not know, but whatever it may be, if it is characterised by the same strength of patience and forbearance as their attitude in the case of the municipalities, they may be assured of public support in the same measure.

We have condemned in unsparing terms the policy of wholesale arrests and prosecutions adopted in other provinces since November last, and the procrastination in redressing the grievances of the people. In view of these serious delinquencies of Government, the essential unsoundness and weakness of many of the items of the non-co-operation programme have for the time being been forced into the background. We have urged the reversal of the repressive policy and the adoption of early steps to settle all outstanding questions by a Conference, as a necessary step in the process of averting civil disobedience and other non-co-operation methods. The refusal of Government to call such a Conference has greatly embarrassed efforts to this end, but the consequences of civil disobedience at present are bound to be so disastrous to the country as a whole that we cannot allow the failure of Government to affect our attitude towards it. When civil disobedience was proposed to be undertaken in November last, the disgraceful Bombay riots came as a rude reminder that the line between non-violence and violence in movements affecting large masses of people is so thin as to be imperceptible. The Bombay riots came as a thunder-clap on the fond hopes of non-co-operation leaders, and they were obliged to cry halt for the time being to the movement of civil disobedience. The brutal murder reported last week of seventeen policemen at Chauri Chaura in the Gorakhpur district in the United Provinces exceeds in its calculated ferocity anything that has happened before. If the Bombay riots were a reason to postpone civil disobedience, the Chauri Chaura massacre is a strong reason for abandoning it altogether. We trust that Mahatma Gandhi and his colleagues on the Working Committee of the Congress will take immediate steps to stop the contemplated action at Bardoli. If they do not do so, they will discredit themselves finally in the eyes of all thinking persons in the country.

It is high time that the fallacy that a mass movement originating in and depending for its momentum on the persistence in and repetition of wrongs by Government, can be non-violent for any length of time, is recognised and abandoned. Malegaon, Malabar, Bombay, and now Chauri Chaura, cry aloud against it. Insatiable, indeed, should be the thirst for slaughter which in the face of these terrible precedents, asks for further proof that non-violent non-co-operation has failed repeatedly as a practical programme. Mr. C. F. Andrews in one of his illuminating addresses to students, has well pointed out that there may be certain forms of violence far more terrible than that which is physical. He has shown how absurd is the limitation which only thinks of violence as meaning the use of physical force. He has given illustrations of "mental violence far more deadly than a blow with the fist." As a matter of fact, physical violence almost always is but the manifestation of mental violence. The most noteworthy exception is the surgeon using the knife as a means of healing. Even the administering of physical chastisement to children by parents has become inadmissible because in practice few parents are able to prevent their filial love for the moment from being clouded by the angry passion which is subjectively invoked by the administration of violence. Persistently to provoke violent emotions in the mass-mind and preach non-violence at the same time to the crowd, can have no effect except that of deluding oneself into a sense of false security. Mr. Hasrat Mohani had logic on his side when he said at Ahmedabad that either non-co-operation should be given up or non-violence because the two can never function together except in a few highly disciplined minds. It is better to acknowledge that violence is admissible and strictly control and regulate such violence, than to proclaim non-violence which, in effect, has meant uncontrolled and insensate violence in Malegaon, Bombay, and Chauri Chaura. As between the violence of the organised force of Government and that of unorganised mobs, the former, with its many shortcomings and failures, is the lesser evil, if only because its moment of starting and cessation at any rate is capable of exact determination. Non-co-operation leaders would be standing in their own light if they force the country, by their thoughtless persistence, to face these alternatives.

THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA AND THE MALAVIYA COMMITTEE.

The Committee of the Malaviya Conference received on the 30th ultimo the letter of the Private Secretary to His Excellency the Viceroy, stating inter alia, that His Excellency had considered the proposals of the Conference, but was unable to discover in them the basis for a profitable discussion on the subject of a Round Table Conference and that no useful purpose would therefore be served by entering into any detailed examination of their terms. On the same day, the Committee telegraphed in reply, stating inter alia, that the Committee were anxious to know why His Excellency was unable to discover in them the basis of a profitable discussion on the subject of a Round Table Conference and that the Committee would be grateful to know which terms of the Conference proposals were not acceptable, because the Committee would, in that case, endeavour to meet His Excellency's wishes. No reply to this request has been received up to date. Meanwhile, however, in the communiqué issued by the Government of India, in respect of Mr. Gandhi's manifesto, there is a paragraph animadverting on the proposals put forward by the Malaviya Conference. In the fourth para of the Government's communiqué it is said:—

It remains for the Government of India to deal with the allegation that His Excellency summarily rejected the proposal for a Conference, although the terms put forward by the Conference at Bombay and accepted by the Working Committee of the Congress were quite in keeping with His Excellency's own requirements as indicated in his speech at Calcutta. How far this is from being the case will be manifest from a comparison of His Excellency's speech with the terms proposed by the Conference. His Excellency in that speech insisted on the imperative necessity, as a fundamental condition precedent to the discussion of any question of a Conference, of the discontinuance of unlawful activities of the non-co-operation party. No assurance on this point was, however, contained in the proposals advanced by the Conference. On the contrary, whilst the Government were asked to make concessions which not only included the withdrawal of the notifications under the Criminal Law Amendment and Seditious Meetings' Acts and the release of persons convicted thereunder, but also the release of persons convicted of offences designed to affect the loyalty of the army, and the submission to an arbitration committee of the cases of other persons convicted under the ordinary law of the land, there was no suggestion that any of the illegal activities of the non-co-operators other than hartals, picketing and civil disobedience should cease. Moreover, it was evident from the statements made by Mr. Gandhi at the Conference, that he intended to continue the enrolment of volunteers in prohibited associations and preparations for civil disobedience. Further, Mr. Gandhi also made it apparent that the proposed round table conference would be called merely to register his decrees. It is idle to suggest that terms of this character fulfilled in any way the essentials laid down by His Excellency or can reasonably be described as having been made in response to the sentiments expressed by him.

The communiqué says that "no assurance on this point (discontinuance of the unlawful activities of the non-co-operation party) was, however, contained in the proposals advanced by the Conference." In the very next sentence, however, it is admitted that there was the assurance that hartals, picketing and civil disobedience would cease. These have all along been considered as the principal offensive activities of the non-co-operationists, and the fact that the resolution of the Conference provided for their cessation does not bear out the Government's statement that no assurance on this point was contained in the proposals of the Conference. The only other activity specified in the communiqué to which exception has been taken, is the enrolment of volunteers in prohibited associations and preparations for civil disobedience. It was part of the proposal of the Conference that the notifications prohibiting these associations should be withdrawn, and when this was done, enrolment of volunteers for them could be no longer illegal. If, after that, they were engaged in any unlawful activity by way of preparation for civil disobedience or otherwise, they would be liable for their actions under the ordinary law.

It will thus be seen that in respect of all the important offensive activities of the non-co-operators, the Conference had secured the promise of cessation simultaneously with the reversal of the repressive policy of Government. Then it is said that Mr. Gandhi made it apparent that the proposed Round Table Conference would be called merely to register his decrees. The Conference obviously cannot be held responsible for anything outside its resolutions. But as to this inference from the appearance of what Mr. Gandhi said or did at the Conference, it is relevant to cite the following from a note to Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya in which Mr. Gandhi has explained his real meaning. It was read by Mr. Seshagiri Iyer in his speech in the Legislative Assembly:—

What I mean is that until I am convinced that my demands are unreasonable, unjust or impossible of fulfilment, I would not recede from them. I would not consider the unwillingness of the Government or Parliament to grant any of these things to be a ground for reducing the demands. The value of a Round Table Conference consists in understanding each other's difficulties and of making allowances for them. Hence my insisting that Government must change their heart. If they entrench themselves behind their armed forces, the Conference would be not only fruitless but unachieved. They must try to appeal to our intellect just as we must appeal to theirs. If the Government or anybody, therefore, shows that any particular demand is unreasonable or untenable, I would certainly give in as I did yesterday on the question of the motion of securing the release of political prisoners other than the two classes mentioned in the resolution No. 3.

It may be added that though Mr. Gandhi in the speech at the Conference said that volunteering would continue, he qualified it by saying that "the preparation will not be of an offensive character, nor of a hostile character." He explained this further in an article in Young India of the 19th ultimo:

We could not take up new offences, whilst the negotiations for a Conference were being conducted by responsible men. I further undertook to advise the Committee, on the event of the proposed conference coming off, to stop all hartals, pending the Conference. This I hold to be inevitable. Hartals are a demonstration against Bureaucracy, we cannot continue them if we are conferring with them for peace. Workers will bear in mind that as yet no activity of the Congress stops save general Civil Disobedience. On the contrary, enlistment of volunteers and Swadeshi propaganda must continue without abatement. . . . Civil Disobedience being an indefeasible right, the preparations for it will continue even if the Conference comes off. And the preparations for Civil Disobedience consists in:—(1) The enlistment of volunteers (2) propaganda of Swadeshi (3) removal of untouchability, (4) the training in non-violence in word, deed and thought, (5) unity between diverse creeds and classes. I hear that many are enrolled as volunteers in various parts of India, although they do not wear Khadi, do not believe in complete non-violence or if they are Hindus, do not believe in untouchability as a crime against humanity. I can not too often warn the people that every deviation from our own rules retards our progress. It is the quality of our work which will please God and not the quantity.

We cannot help thinking that these and other points, might most suitably have been communicated to the Malaviya Committee in response to their request of the 30th ultimo. in reply to the letter from the Viceroy's Private Secretary. We regret the omission of Government to do so in a direct manner, because the task of endeavouring to secure a peaceful atmosphere in which to consider the questions arising out of the present situation, has been thereby rendered more difficult than it would otherwise have been.

PHYSICAL EDUCATION IN INDIA.

(By MR. A. O. BUCK).

I am sure we all realize the necessity for scientific Physical Education as an essential part of any well-thought-out system of education. Physical exercise is as necessary as the air we breathe but it must be based on physiological principles, it must take cognizance of rules of hygiene and sanitation, and it must be under the direction of educated and specially trained experts if it is to serve its highest purpose. Lala Lajpat Rai in his book "The Problem of National Education in India" says "I want my country-men to realize that the problem of Physical Education is a national problem of the first magnitude and they should apply themselves to its solution with all the energy and the force of soul they possess". It is not only a national problem, it is a world problem, and each and every nation must take more seriously the old statement that "Only as a nation is physically fit can that nation long endure". India in her national aspirations must realize this truth and must devote herself more strenuously to making herself physically fit in order that she may be better able to cope with the exigencies of the many and varied international relationships which are bound to devolve upon her. India's future depends upon her boys and young men and in order to insure a successful and happy future those boys and young men must be physically fit. As we study history from the viewpoint of Physical Training, we find that practically every nation in the world in its early development carried on some form or forms of physical activity. We note also, however, that these early activities were in connection with the preparation of men for war, for the hunt, and for but very few games. It is plainly evident, as we study the oldest writings and inscriptions, that various races realized the value of physical training when national life depended on physical stamina and training in arms. Also in early times it was forcibly thrust upon the minds of the people that nations rose or fell as they practised physical training.

In ancient India physical training was practised chiefly by the Kshatriya or warrior castes, and not by the masses. In fact, we find no record of a conscious attempt on the part of India as a nation, either empirically or scientifically, to raise the physical status of her entire people. A certain amount of indigenous games and indigenous exercises have always been prevalent throughout India, numerous games and sports have been introduced here by the English, exercises in the schools have been conducted by so-called drill masters, and games and sports have been one of the prominent features of Y. M. C. A. work in India, Burma and Ceylon for many years; but it was not until 1908 that the broad modern programme of physical education and welfare, as typified by the work of the specially trained physical director, was inaugurated. It was in 1908 that the International Committee of the Y. M. C. A., sent, from America to Calcutta, Dr. J. H. Gray as Y. M. C. A. Physical Director and Adviser to the Government of Bengal on matters pertaining to physical education, to pioneer this work of scientific physical training in India. As a servant of the Y. M. C. A. and in an attempt to carry out their policy of "All sports for all," or the programme of both body-building and character-building by means of wholesome games and physical activities for everybody, the first years had to be spent in demonstrating just what was meant by physical education—a process fairly well completed, so far as Calcutta was concerned, by 1911. By means of Dr. Gray's efforts a realization of the value of scientific physical training was brought home to other parts of India so that by 1914 the Imperial Government and the Madras and Punjab Governments, in addition to Bengal, sanctioned substantial grants for the extension of the type of work which the Y. M. C. A. physical department had been demonstrating.

The work done in connection with the various Governments has consisted of lectures and demonstrations in the school and at Training Colleges; classes for drill masters, of whom hundreds have been thus trained: school inspection of hygienic and sanitary features and physical activities—meeting the problem of the weak boy with no desire for exercise, improving gymnastic drill methods and apparatus work, introducing purely recreative programmes and stimulating interest in physical training; standardising of school athletics, and the framing of standard physical efficiency tests for Indian boys: inspection tours and miscellaneous advisory duties to Government. Special services have also been rendered from time to time, e. g. advising as to physical welfare facilities at the Dacca University, testifying before the Calcutta University Commission on physical education and welfare in colleges. Physical training drill textbooks in English and Urdu have been produced for the Bengal and Madras Governments. Assistance has been given to various municipalities in connection with the initiation and development of public play grounds, notably in Calcutta, Madras, Colombo and Hyderabad. Several notable exhibitions have been carried through, by way of demonstrating the possibilities of mass play and of giving adequate and enjoyable exercise, not merely to a few picked boys but to large numbers who have no special inherent capacity along these lines. The Department has also been able to render aid to Mission Schools by means of special training classes during holiday seasons. Twice at Mahableshwar, once at Sat Tal and once at Hyderabad, such classes have been conducted with from seventeen to fifty in attendance.

In the regular physical department activities of the Y. M. C. A. itself emphasis has throughout been laid on encouraging regular habits of normal, recreative exercise among the rank and file of the membership through gymnasia, swimming, out-door games, individual physical examinations and the prescription of corrective exercises, and general instruction in personal physical welfare. In the Calcutta Student Hostel Playground much has been done toward the solution of the problem of providing adequate opportunity for exercise to student communities living in the midst of a congested city. The various members of the staff have been able, in their personal relationship to a large number of students and others, to impart wise and much-needed education and advice in matters of sex. Particularly in Lahore and Madras a study of indigenous games has been carried on as to the relation of the weight and height of boys to athletic achievement. Many demonstrations of mass play and physical training have been given in various parts of the field. Some inter-high school track and field meetings have been held; also inter-collegiate tennis tournaments and other similar activities. Some of the local Associations, notably: Lahore, Calcutta, Madras and Colombo have engaged in the International Hexathlon contests.

The outstanding problem of the Physical Department is the training of Indian, Burmese and Ceylonese physical directors. Only so can the great opportunities for service in this aspect of life be met. Foreign physical directors can never be secured in sufficient numbers, even if that were desirable. Adequate plans must be made for all such training which can possibly be secured in India and Ceylon: even then it will be desirable for at least some years to send picked men abroad for additional study. The beginnings of a school of Physical Training were made in August, 1920, in Madras under the leadership of Mr. Noehren and Mr. Buck. Five men were given instruction in the following subjects: Principles of Physical Education, Methods of Physical Training, Play and Playgrounds, Anatomy, Physiology, Hygiene, First Aid to the Injured, and Sex Hygiene, etc. The Y. M. C. A., National Council have provided the necessary funds. These five men are now conducting physical training programmes in Y. M. C. A. and schools in various parts of India and four men are undergoing training this year. The school of physical education is open to educated young men of good moral character with a desire to serve God and country. In some cases we might accept men who are only passed Intermediates, but we prefer to recruit men who are college graduates.

PRESIDENT HARDING ON THE NEGRO PROBLEM.

One of the most striking utterances on the race question made by any public man within a generation is that recently made by President Harding in Birmingham, Alabama, a city in the heart of the south, in which he gave voice to the principle of political and economic equality for the Negro, with racial and social separation. This manner of meeting the race issue is recognized as a challenge of the greatest importance to both the white man and the Negro in all parts of the United States. It has its political implications, however. It will be remembered that the Southern white man through fear of Negro domination in parts of the south where white men are in a minority, is almost invariably a Democrat. The southern Negro is almost invariably a Republican asset. The effect of this alignment is virtually to eliminate the party system in a large section of the United States, for the nomination of a Democrat assures his election, irrespective of the broader issues at stake. As a result, the action of the south is regularly discounted and its influence is circumscribed. The negation of political freedom is bent in such a situation can readily be comprehended. Republicans before this have tried to change it, and it is the prevailing opinion that the President's main purpose in his recent expression of principles in regard to the Negro race is to break the so-called "Solid South" by doing what he could to make the southern white man feel that there is a place for him in the Republican party. The racial and political phases of the President's speech came after an eloquent tribute to the remarkable progress of the south in industrial development, especially since the opening days of the Civil War. "If the Civil War marked the beginnings of industrialism in a south which had previously been almost entirely agricultural, the World War brought us to full recognition that the race problem is national rather than merely sectional," he said. There are no authentic statistics, but it is common knowledge that the World War was marked by a great migration of colored people to the north and west. They were attracted by the demand for labour and the higher wages offered. This slow movement had been in progress for decades before, but it was vastly accelerated because of the war, and has continued at only a slackened pace since. It has brought the question of race closer to north and west, and I believe it served to modify somewhat the views of those sections on this question, has made the south realize its industrial dependence on the labor of the black man and made the north realize the difficulties of the community in which two greatly different races are brought to live side by side. In another way the World War modified the elements of this problem. Thousands of black men, serving their country just as patriotically as did the white men, were transported overseas and experienced the life of countries where their color aroused less of antagonism than it does here. Many of them aspire to go to Europe to live. These things lead one to hope that we shall find an adjustment of relations between the two races, in which both can enjoy full citizenship, the full measure of usefulness to the country and of opportunity for themselves, and in which recognition and reward shall at last be distributed in proportion to individual deserts regardless of race or color. Politically and economically there need be no occasion for great and permanent differentiation, for limitations of the individual's opportunity, provided that on both sides there shall be recognition of the absolute divergence in things social and racial. When I suggest the possibility of economic equality between the races, I mean it in precisely the same way and to the same extent that I would mean it if I spoke of equality of economic opportunity as between members of the same race. In each case I would mean equality proportioned to the honest capacities and deserts of the individual. Men of both races may well stand uncompromisingly against every suggestion of social equality. Indeed, it would be helpful to have that word 'equality' eliminated from this consideration, to have it accepted on both sides that this is not a question of social equality, but a question of recognizing a fundamental, eternal and inescapable difference. We shall have made real progress when we develop an attitude in the public and community thought of both races which recognizes this difference.

Take first the political aspect. I would say let the black man vote when he is fit to vote; prohibit the white man voting when he is unfit to vote. Especially would I appeal to the self-respect of the colored race. I would inculcate in it the wish to improve itself as a distinct race, with a heredity, a set of traditions, an array of aspirations all its own. Out of such racial ambitions and pride will come natural segregations, without narrowing any rights, such as are proceeding in both rural and urban communities now in southern states, satisfying inclinations and adding notably to happiness and contentment. On the other hand, I would insist upon equal educational opportunity for both. This does not mean that both would become equally educated within a generation or two generations or ten generations. Even men of the same race do not accomplish such an equality as that. They never will. The providence that endowed men with widely unequal capacities and capabilities and energies did not intend any such thing. But there must be such education among the colored people as will enable them to develop their own leaders, capable of understanding and sympathizing with such a differentiation between the races as I have suggested leaders who will inspire the race with proper ideals of race pride, of national pride, of an honorable destiny, an important participation in the universal effort for advancement of humanity as a whole. Racial amalgamation there cannot be. Partnership of the races in developing the highest aims of all humanity there must be if humanity, not only here but everywhere, is to achieve the ends which we have set for it. And so I would wish it might be in this matter of our national problem of races. I would accept that a black man cannot be a white man, and that he does not need and should not aspire to be as much like a white man as possible in order to accomplish the best that is possible for him. He should seek to be, and he should be encouraged to be, the best possible black man, and not the best possible imitation of a white man. Just as I do not wish the south to be politically entirely of one party; just as I believe that is bad for the south, and for the rest of the country as well, so I do not want the colored people to be entirely of one party. I wish that both the tradition of a solidly Democratic south and the tradition of a solidly Republican black race might be broken up. Neither political sectionalism nor any system of rigid groupings of the people will in the long run prosper our country. With such convictions one must urge the people of the south to take advantage of their superior understanding of this problem and to assume an attitude toward it that will deserve the confidence of the colored people. Likewise I plead with my own political party to lay aside every program that looks to lining up the black man as a more political adjunct.

Let there be an end of prejudice and of demagoguery in this line. Let the south understand the menace which lies in forcing upon the black race an attitude of political solidarity. The greater hope, the dissipation of hatred, the discouragement of dangerous passions lie in persuading the black people to forget old prejudices and to have them believe that, under the rule of whatever political party, they would be treated just as other people are treated, guaranteed all the rights that people of other colors enjoy, and made, in short, to regard themselves as citizens of a country and not of a particular race."

MALABAR RELIEF FUND, BOMBAY.

A public Meeting of women was held on Thursday the 2nd February, 1922, in the Vanita Vishram Zaverbai Hall, Sandhurst Road, Girgaon, Bombay.

Mrs. JAIJEE J. PETIT presided. After the President's introductory remarks, Mrs. Janakibai Bhat (Lady Superintendent of the Poona Seva Sadan) made a statement in Marathi on the circumstances which led the Council of her Society to send her to Malabar and the work the Bombay Ladies' Deputation did there. The following resolutions were passed.

1. Resolved that this meeting of the Women of Bombay in full sympathy with the objects with which the Malabar Relief Fund is started here accords its whole-hearted support to the Resolution passed at the Public Meeting of the said Fund held on January the 6th, 1922, dealing with the special needs of women and children refugees in Relief Camps and itself resolves that:—"In view of the fact that a large majority of the sufferers that are being helped by this Fund in Calicut and other parts of Malabar are women and children, this meeting appeals specially to the women of this Presidency to come forward in large numbers to support this Fund in all possible ways."

Proposed by—Dilshad Begum.

Seconded by.—Dr. Miss Nowrange, B. A., L. M. & S.

Supported by.—Miss Engineer, M.A., LL. B.

2. Resolved that in pursuance of Resolution No. 1 and in order to organize the work and carry out the proposals embodied therein this meeting hereby constitutes and appoints a ladies' Sub-Committee of the Malabar Relief Fund, Bombay, in accordance with the proposal made at the preliminary meeting of October 20th 1921, the said Sub-Committee to be composed of(1) all the lady members of the permanent Committee of the Fund; and

(2) all the conveners of the present meeting, with power to add such other ladies as are in full sympathy with the objects of the Fund and are willing to promote its work.

Proposed by—Mrs. Sonabai Jayakar.

Seconded by.—Miss Reuben, B.A.

Supported by.—Mrs. Mackenzie, B.A.,

8. Resolved that the ladies' Sub-Committee thus constituted be requested to approach the various Women's Associations in this City and Presidency of the Bombay and the Indian States generally and request the Presidents and Secretaries thereof to interest themselves in the work of the Fund and help to facilitate its collections.

Proposed by.—Mrs. Rasikmani Desai.

Seconded by.—Shrimati Satyavati.

Supported by.—Maganbai Manekehand.

9. Resolved that the contributions both in kind and coin secured through the labours of the Women's Sub-Committee may be set apart preferably for the relief of the women and children while they are in camps as also when they repatriate in view of the fact that they form a large majority of the refugees.

Proposed by.—Miss K. Natarajan, B.A.

Seconded by.—Mrs. Ratanbai Pauri.

Miss Javeri proposed a vote of thanks to the President.

THE MALABAR QUESTIONNAIRE.

Malabar disturbances appear to be well nigh at an end. We, therefore, desire to solicit your co-operation in framing some adequate scheme of reconstruction. These questions have been framed to facilitate a clear understanding of the problems involved in the process of moral and material reconstruction.

We are fully conscious of the limitations of this questionnaire; but we should be glad if we succeed in arousing the interest of the public in this important matter so that all the people and the Government alike, may co-operate in rehabilitating Malabar. In compiling this questionnaire, we beg to acknowledge the valuable help received from gentlemen of all shades of opinion resident in Malabar.

The questions are designed to cover the whole field of enquiry, as far as it can be outlined at this stage. It is not, therefore, necessary that all the questions should be answered. If any one wishes to give his views on any points relevant to the enquiry which have not been included in the questionnaire, it would be convenient that such points are dealt with in a supplementary statement.

I. ECONOMIC.

(a) Grants and Loans.

1. Will it be necessary to make free grants of money to the poorer classes of the people so that they may purchase cattle and seed; build or repair houses; store provisions until the next principal harvest? If so, what amount will approximately be required for the several amounts? (You may state approximate figures for the amount with which you are familiar).

2. Would you recommend long or short term loans? If so, specify for what purpose and for what classes? On what conditions should such loans be issued?

3. How far do you consider it possible for private enterprise, Co-operative Societies, Local Bodies, Charitable Institutions and Government to provide the necessary funds?

4. Would it be feasible to utilise the Co-operative Societies (the Urban Central Bank, the District Banks, and primary societies) for the distribution of loans, Government supplementing their financial resources?

5. Would you suggest loans in cash or in kind?

6. Through what agencies can this work be best administered?

7. At what rate of interest are loans generally available to the various classes of tenants in Malabar?

8. What steps should be taken to assure the villager obtaining loans at reasonable rate of interest?

b. Land.

9. To what extent can Jemias help in the reconstruction process affecting the position of the tenants?

10. Do you anticipate any dearth in agricultural labour owing to present troubles? If so, what is the remedy?

11. Do you consider it advisable for Government or some Government agency to manage for a time the estates of Jemias who express their desire for this course? If so, can you suggest the best way to do so in the interests of both Jemmi and tenant?

12. Have you any improvements to suggest in the present system of land tenure?

II. INDUSTRIAL.

13. Has the rebellion created in the district any serious increase in unemployment?

14. Should any industries be organised in order to absorb the unemployed? If so, what industrial development is most suitable?

15. How far can co-operative production be organised for this purpose? Suggest a workable scheme.

16. What facilities will be required for developing cottage industries as a subsidiary occupation?

III. EDUCATIONAL.

17. Will a better understanding among all communities be created by starting common schools for their children? What difficulties do you find in such a scheme?

18. How can education be popularised among the Moplahs?

19. Are you satisfied with the present type of Moplah Education?

20. How far can Local Boards and Government finance any new scheme?

21. Would vocational and adult education be useful and practicable?

22. To what extent can private organisations in India help in the work of civic and moral education?

IV. CIVIC.

23. Do you think the inauguration of any scheme like the village patrols by young men, with some training and discipline, will help to create the amount of confidence necessary to check temporary local outbreaks in the future?

24. How can a healthy feeling of common citizenship, irrespective of caste and creed, be created?

V. GENERAL.

25. What measures do you propose to ensure the safety of the Hindus who have been forcibly converted and have reverted to their faith?

26. Do you consider that there are any areas in Malabar where there is likelihood of famine?

27. What facilities should be provided for the re-building of houses destroyed during the rebellion? Do you think there is scope for co-operative housing scheme for this purpose?

28. What schemes are necessary for the immediate development of communications, roads and railways, in the affected areas of Malabar?

29. What urgent reforms are necessary in the present relations between the landlord and the tenant in Malabar to remove agrarian discontent?

30. What development of industry in the affected areas would help the general advancement of the district?

31. Are there any other grievances which will have to be removed to promote permanent contentment of the people?

A MESSAGE TO THE INDIAN PEOPLE.

We are requested to publish the following message from the General Assembly of the Indian Presbyterian Church to the People of India:

Fellow-Countrymen,

At this crisis in our history we, the members of the General Assembly, extend to you the hand of sympathy of our Master. The General Assembly is the supreme representative body of the Indian Presbyterian Church, and is composed of different nationalities—Indian, English, Scottish, Welsh, Irish, American, and Canadian—the large majority being Indians. Marked by different shades of opinion, both conservative and radical, they are yet harmonised and reconciled through faith in one common Lord and Master, the Lord Jesus Christ, and devotion to Him. As His disciples we cannot but feel that for all concerned—the Government and the people alike—a larger measure of His spirit will alone evolve peace out of the present strife and give form to the hopes and aspirations struggling within us at this hour.

We rejoice at the cleansing and the purifying which marks so much of the life of to-day, and at the deep concern for all that make for the welfare of the Motherland. We would like to take this opportunity of assuring our countrymen that the Christ stands for the fulness of life, and in His name we claim the right for our development to the fulness of our stature in every department of life. As followers of the Prince of Peace we cannot but believe that the path of law and order, and of friendly co-operation with the lawfully constituted Government of the land, is the one by which this development for us will be best attained. We cannot but tremble to think of the disintegrating and calamitous consequences that may arise as a result of treading the other course. And we appeal, at this juncture, to you, our fellow-countrymen, to do everything in your power to bring about an atmosphere which will help to remove misunderstandings; let each of us see the strong points of the other, and thus hasten on what we have been taught to pray for, the coming of the Kingdom of God, when His will will be done on earth as it is in heaven.

On behalf of the General Assembly,

J. A. GRAHAM,
Moderator of the Assembly.
YOHAN MASIH,
Clerk of the Assembly.

A BRAHMO MARRIAGE IN BANGALORE.

An intercaste widow remarriage was solemnized between Mr. K. Sanjeeva Rao, Salt Sub-Inspector, Bhadrachellam and Sreemathi Lakshmikantam, daughter of Mr. T. A. Girkrishna Pillai of Manaparai, in the Cantonment Brahma Samaj Mandir on Friday the 3rd instant at 6.30 p.m. The marriage was done according to Brahma rites, Mr. E. Subbukrishnaiah, Brahma Missionary, officiating as Minister. The marriage was as usual registered under Act III of 1872. This is the seventh reform marriage celebrated in Bangalore under the auspices of the Bangalore Cantonment Brahma Samaj.

SUCCESSFUL TREATMENT OF LEPROSY IN KOREA.

The following from a Report by Dr. Henry Fowler, is reproduced in the current number of "Without the Camp," the quarterly magazine of the Mission to Lepers:

The treatment of leprosy has for ages been most unsatisfactory. Leprologists in modern times, in many lands, have been endeavouring to help to prevent the ever-increasing spread of leprosy by experimental work of all kinds. In the absence of a suitable medium all attempts at the culture of the bacillus lepra have so far proved unsuccessful. So-called sera, vaccines, or specifics, have from time to time been before the medical world and as often have been discredited.

Experiments in recent years have again been made with the old Indian remedy, Chaulmoogra oil. Unfortunately the real oil has at times been difficult to procure—a much inferior article having been substituted for it. Failure to secure any positive reaction or curative results may in some cases have been due to this. The chief hindrance to the use of the drug, however, has been its irritating effects on the mucous membrane of the intestinal tract. Intense nausea follows its repeated use per ora, and naturally lepers in our institutions have rebelled against it.

Dr. Heiser, now of the Rockefeller Foundation, working in the interests of lepers segregated in the Philippines, some few years ago recommended a method to obviate this irritating property of the oil and to secure a larger quantity of it being taken by the patient. We ourselves with many other workers among lepers in the Far East, gladly undertook to faithfully administer the suggested formula in the manner prescribed. Inter-muscular injections of chaulmoogra and camphorated oils, with resorcin, given week by week, gave but little success. To avoid the possibility of technical errors we ourselves prepared the formula and administered the injections, but all without much purpose. In the main we got little but negative results.

From Korea, however, came reports of wonderful results from this same formula. We were the more puzzled to understand why we were so unsuccessful with our cases. Was it possible that in different districts there were varying degrees of virulency of the disease, and that in Central China, for instance, we had a specially active bacillus, which offered resistance to all attempts at treatment?

Paying a visit to Korea a few weeks ago, we looked forward with some eagerness to a critical examination into the whole matter. Arrived at Fusan and Kwangju, we secured confirmation of all we had heard. The treatment was certainly having remarkable results. Even advanced cases of anæsthetic and nodular leprosy were being helped. What did it all mean? Not till we were returning to the coast did we by accident learn the cause.

Our Korean friends, failing to secure any rapid results from the original formula, had tried an heroic dose of the drug and found that it could be tolerated and give startling results. Ultimately, instead of using camphorated oil, camphor was simply dissolved in the chaulmoogra oil itself and full doses prescribed for the original formula given. Ultimately even the resorcin was omitted with equally good results. It was found that the majority of the lepers could stand the larger quantities of the oil for some considerable time. For this experimental work we have to thank Dr. Wilson of Kwangju.

For the sake of those who, like ourselves, have been disappointed with the action of the drug, we give herewith the method of preparation of the oil and its dosage.

Bring 1 lb. of chaulmoogra oil to the boil in a water bath, then add 100 grains of pulverised camphor. Keep it in the water bath with the cork of the bottle partially closing its mouth until all the camphor is dissolved. Then tightly cork the bottle and all is ready for use. The number of the bottles which can be dealt with in this manner will depend upon the size and character of the water bath.

With some hundreds of cases to inject weekly it will be convenient to have a specially large water bath made, or the ordinary large koh, or boiling pan used by the Chinese everywhere, could be substituted for it.

Directions for injecting the oil into the deep gluteal muscles. Procure say a dozen Japanese or home Record syringes permitting the injection of at least 6 c.c., preferably all glass with stout steel or better still, platinum needles. Boil these each time they are used for at least 15 minutes. While they are in course of being used place them in a tray of boiling olive oil or any allied substitute. Prepare the patient by a dab of Tr. Iodine on the point selected for the injection; fill a syringe, taken from the tray with a pair of forceps, with the required dose of liquified Chaulmoogra oil and camphor and inject. After withdrawal of the needle apply a pledget of cotton wool to the spot. Keep the patient resting thereafter for say 15 minutes, then permit him to go about his usual occupation.

DOSE.

Start with 2 c.c. once a week for the first month, then give 3 c.c. " " second month,
" " 4 c.c. " " third month,
" " 5 c.c. " " fourth month,
" " 6 c.c. " " fifth month.

If the patient can stand it continue to give 6 c.c. If on the other hand he feels ill, return to the smaller dosage and again increase it until it is tolerated. It is found convenient at Kwangju in Korea, to give the injections every Saturday afternoon and for the patient to rest as much as possible on the Sunday.

If the open ulcers are difficult to heal the following ointment should be applied to them:—

R Ichthyol	2 per cent.
Chaulmoogra oil	5 "
Resorcin	1 "
Fuchsin	$\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 "
Sulphur	2 "
Vaseline	q.s.

Under such treatment in three or four months patients say they feel stronger and more cheerful. As sensation returns to previously anæsthetic areas patients are encouraged to continue the treatment, with results which often are both astonishing and pleasing. The patient becomes rid of his thickened nodular appearance. In case of an anæsthetic patient it is sometimes difficult even for a specialist to tell that he has been a leper subject.

It should of course be stated that equally good results seem to be reported from India, Honolulu and the Philippines, where other preparations of Chaulmoogra oil are being used. This modified form of treatment described above has however proved so successful, and is so easy to prepare and administer to large numbers, that I confidently advocate its extended use in the Far East.

THIRD INTERNATIONAL MORAL EDUCATION CONGRESS.

The Congress will be held at Geneva from Friday, the 28th July, to Tuesday, the 1st August, 1922 under the distinguished patronage of the Swiss Federal Council and of the Council of State of the Republic and Canton of Geneva.

Since the two International Moral Education Congresses held at London, 1908, and the Hague, 1912, the War has taken place and has moved the problem of moral education to the very front rank. The material and moral injury produced by the conflict is not merely the result of an unalterable past, but also foreshadows a future which may be disastrous to civilization unless all men of goodwill unite in opposing the menace. To repair is not enough; we must reconstruct. We invite you to aid this constructive work.

The Organizing Committee of the Third International Moral Education Congress has placed two important subjects on the Agenda:—I. The International Motive, with special reference to the Teaching of History. II. The Motive of Service.

The importance of these subjects at present time must be obvious to all. As the future depends upon the present, so the present is the result of the past; hence we ought to learn the laws that have governed this past, and ascertain the ways along which humanity has evolved, in order that we may direct it towards an era of larger justice. On the other hand, educators should foster in our young people the spirit of mutual help. Theoretical instruction will not suffice. Practical exercise avails more than words in rebuilding the ruins and preparing a nobler future. By way of example, we give a few items, which show what the Committee has in mind regarding the two leading Subjects on the Agenda.

THE INTERNATIONAL MOTIVE, WITH SPECIAL REFERENCE TO THE TEACHING OF HISTORY.

From local history to national history, and thus to the history of mankind. How the civic and national ideal may be brought into relation with the spirit of human brotherhood. Mutual aid in the early ages of civilization. History of governments and history of peoples, history of industry; history of freedom. Adaptation of history-teaching to various school grades. History text-books and historical truth, etc.

THE MOTIVE OF SERVICE.

The idea of co-operation in theoretical moral instruction. Mutual help in home education. Means to be adopted, both at home and at school against the dominating influence of money. Mutual aid in the work of the school (e. g. mutual instruction). Manual training at school with a view to social service. Self-government at different stages of school life, and especially in adolescence. Practical service of others in Leagues of Kindness, Boy Scouts, Girl Guides, Junior Red Cross, Leagues of Youth, etc. Conception of social service and choice of profession. Adolescent individuality related to the idea of social service, etc.

In choosing these topics, the Committee's desire has been to limit discussion, and to give the first place to facts and actual experiences. It is better to deepen knowledge than to extend it superficially. The Committee will be greatly obliged if you will fill in, and return, the annexed form of application for membership as soon as possible, should you (as we sincerely trust will be the case) wish to receive further announcements, and to take part in the Congress (Address:—Secretariat du III^e me Congrès International d'Éducation Morale, Institut J.-J. Rousseau, Taconnerie, 5, Genève, Suisse).

The following Memorandum on the Basic Ideals of a Reformed History Teaching is drawn up by Mr. Frederick J. Gould.

History is the most important medium of moral education—personal, civic, and international. A general view of world-history is an indispensable constituent of education. Such an outline of world-history should be framed on a general plan for all nationalities, with local modifications. History-teaching is essentially a description of the process of civilization. Cultural elements should be so emphasized that the elements of mistrust and strife may be subordinated, but without explicit insistence on this subordination. Patriotism, considered as loyalty to the national civilization, should naturally prepare the way for the larger loyalty to human civilization. The civilization complex implies Industry, Art, Literature, Science, Morality, Civics, Religion: these being the elements to which mistrust and strife are subordinated. We should study methods by which the teaching-body preserve living touch with social institutions and forces represented by artists, philosophers, scientific thinkers, industrial organizers, travellers, statesmen; it being recognized that history-teaching is, in a sense, a critique of experience, and therefore to be kept free from pedantry. It is necessary to survey text-books and varieties of apparatus, including aesthetic and dramatic aids. The possibility might be considered of a World-book for Youth, in which the leading communities are portrayed in their best aspects of civilization; each nationality being depicted by a non-member of that nationality; the whole being edited on a uniform plan, and destined for many translations. Educators should study William James's principle of the Moral Equivalent of War,—i.e., combat of evils menacing human life and development. A few lines may here be quoted from James' essay (1919):—"I do not believe that peace either ought to be, or will be, permanent on this globe unless the States peacefully organized preserve some of the old elements of army discipline. A permanently successful peace economy cannot be a simple pleasure economy..... We must make new energies and hardships continue the manliness to which the military mind so faithfully clings..... Patriotie pride and ambition, in their military form, are, after all, only specifications of a more general competitive passion. They are its first form, but that is no reason for supposing they must be its last form."

ROYAL YAKUTI.

THIS YAKUTI or life giving nectar has been prepared from
the best, choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has wonderful properties of increasing virile power and it rectifies urinary disorders. In fact it makes man a man. This valuable
medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and
gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to those persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen
the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility.
Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicines. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires. It is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills, Rupees ten only.

India in Parliament: The vote of censure moved by a member of Parliament on the Secretary of State for India in the House of Commons, was defeated by an overwhelming majority. The debate on both sides, however, was not such as to satisfy Indian aspirations. Mr. Montagu's speech showed insight into and sympathy for the Indian point of view, but even he had to indulge in not a little rattling of the sword in the scabbard in order to conciliate Junkers of his own party. Mr. Lloyd George's speech was, perhaps, just the kind of Parliamentary fencing that was needed for the occasion; but where it was not meagre and inconsequential, it was an ostentatious banging of the door upon all early hope of full responsible Government in this country. There is practical unanimity among Indians that the early grant of full responsible Government is absolutely essential to national well-being, and the Prime Minister's refusal will only harden that feeling in this country. There is, indeed, already a growing volume of opinion which favours concentration of the national energies on the speedy attainment of Swaraj, to the exclusion of all other questions which it is inclined to regard as subsidiary. Full self-government is the key to all other problems. The argument that Indians should train themselves for it by rehearsing in the course of a conveniently long series of years the whole drama of English history from Canute to King George V, is as silly as it is selfish. Nature compresses ages of biological evolution in a few weeks of early embryonic life in the mother's womb. Mr. Lloyd George, if he had the ordering of Indian life, would evidently require every child to live for years like a monkey in order to prove its right to be a man like himself. The case for Swaraj is simple. It springs from the psychological fact that an environment which constantly suggests dependence, incapacity, inferiority, to the men and women who live in its midst, has the effect of depressing, debilitating, and degrading them in their own estimation. This is a defect which the best foreign rule can never be free from. The daily, hourly, conscious and subconscious suggestion of inferiority, is, when all is said, the ineradicable defect of an alien domination. By incredibly painful and reluctant steps, have many countries, who started public life with far fewer advantages than the British. That even it has been able to preserve this trust, is the most important argument for full self-government whether on form or any other.

Treatment of Political Prisoners: In the Reformer of January 29, we quoted from a letter from Mr. Mahadev Desai, now serving a term of imprisonment in Agra jail, showing that the treatment of political prisoners in that jail had been greatly improved. The Leader publishes a summary of the revised rules laid down for the treatment of political prisoners. Their principal features are that political prisoners are exempted from solitary confinement, penal diet and flogging among measures for enforcing jail discipline. They will be allowed to have their own clothing, bedding, cooking utensils etc.; will be allowed special diet similar to that given to European prisoners, will be at liberty to purchase extra articles of food at their own expense, and to cook their own food if desired; will not be put to any labour except such exercise as will keep them physically fit; will be permitted to retain the hair and beard or allowed, if desired, to shave; they will not be required to wear neck and ankle rings, will be allowed to put on caste marks, if desired, and also such religious and other books as are not considered objectionable by the Superintendent. Interviews will be allowed once a week with not more than five persons, and letters may be received and written once a fortnight. These arrangements, it is stated, are independent of the special scrutiny to which all political cases are being subjected in order that the government may satisfy themselves that the proceedings are legal and exhibit no undue straining of the law and that the sentences are not excessive. Bitter complaints have been made regarding the stripping naked of political prisoners for examination, and the requirement, which seems to be peculiar to the Bombay Presidency, that every prisoner should open his mouth, raise his arms, and cry "Sarkar eh hai" whenever any European official visits the jail. We trust that the new United Provinces rules provide against such practices calculated to wound the self-respect, personal and national, of political prisoners. We should be glad to know that the Bombay Government propose to introduce improvement in the treatment of such prisoners.

Gratuitous Criticism: The Associated Press in summarising certain correspondence which passed between the Malaviya Committee and Mahatma Gandhi introduced a sentence containing its own estimate of the Committee's sentiments. Some of our contemporaries have commented on this sentence as if it were the Committee's. As a matter of fact, the Committee's feeling was, as precisely stated in its letter, one of regret that the Mahatma should have sent the letter to His Excellency the Viceroy when he did. The best proof that there was no basis for the Associated Press' exaggeration about the Committee's last ray of hope having been extinguished by the letter, is that the Committee continued and continues to exist, and that Mahatma Gandhi promptly acknowledged that he did not think that the despatch to His Excellency of his letter of the 4th instant, would be regarded by the Committee as hampering its work.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1922.

THE BARDOLI PROGRAMME.

We print to-day the text of the resolutions passed by the Working Committee of the Congress at Bardoli, the Malaviya Committee's resolutions thereon, the views expressed by Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya and others, not of the non-cooperation party, who attended on invitation the meeting of the Working Committee at Bardoli, and opinions of leading newspapers representing different schools of thought and shades of sentiment. The magnitude of the change wrought by the Bardoli resolutions in the political situation in India, was reflected in the debate on the vote of censure in the House of Commons in London on Tuesday, when it was announced that orders issued for the arrest of Mahatma Gandhi had been suspended as a result of the Bardoli programme. The almost unanimous consensus of responsible Indian opinion hails the Bardoli decisions with unalloyed satisfaction. The Anglo-Indian Times of India regards the new programme as one with which all can sympathise, even if they can not actively co-operate. The newspaper which Mrs. Besant edits, and which is seldom blind to the faults of Mahatma Gandhi, is for the moment melted into appreciation of his leadership at Bardoli. The Liberal Servant of India writes of the momentous event with a warmth of generous eulogy for a political opponent, which does it honour. The eyes of the country are turned anxiously to the Government of India. The prompt suspension of the order for the arrest of Mahatma Gandhi, clearly shows that they are sincerely anxious to avoid such measures. A month ago, Sir William Vincent told the Legislative Assembly that the attitude of Government to the proposal of a Round Table Conference remained as explained by His Excellency the Viceroy in his reply to the address presented by the Malaviya deputation in the previous month at Calcutta. As pointed out by the Committee of the Bombay Representative Conference, the Bardoli resolutions go farther than the conditions laid down in His Excellency's speech. If the All-India Congress Committee endorses the Bardoli resolutions, it will be impossible for Government, even if they wish to do so, to postpone further the summoning of such a Conference.

Meanwhile, it is relevant to point out that the Bardoli development has a strength and vitality of its own apart from the All-India Congress Committee. On the surface, the resolutions passed by the Congress Working Committee at Bardoli, were the direct result exclusively of the Chauri Chaura tragedy. Mahatma Gandhi and the other members of the Working Committee have said so and no doubt they honestly think that that is the case. But really the Chauri Chaura murders were merely the last in a chain of circumstances which brought about this radical change of the Congress programme. The riots at Bombay and Madras, to which reference is made in the resolutions, and those at Malegaon and the Malabar outbreak, to which reference is not made, have had their share in shaping Congress opinion. But more potent than these exhibitions of violence, has been the gradual, to a large extent silent, but nonetheless effective change in opinion as the result of reflection within the body of the Congress and even of the Non-Co-operationists that has been growing within the last few months. The numerous negations of the Congress programme have provoked something like disgust in the more virile minds of the Congress. This was voiced in a remarkable speech by Mr. M. R. Jayakar some months ago at a Conference at Akola. A comparison of the several suggestions made in that speech, with the modifications of the Congress programme adopted at Bardoli, shows that the new programme, though to all appearance it is a sudden inspiration born of the burning and bloodshed at Gorakhpur, has really a deeper and more solid cause for its coming into being. If this were not the case, we should be inclined with several hostile critics to doubt the permanence and reality of the conversion of the Congress to constructive methods. Because we know that the new programme has not been called into existence in any such happy-go-lucky fashion, because we know that it has the deep thought and solid sentiment of many thoughtful Congressmen behind it, we do not share these suspicions and we look upon the revised programme as permanently and truly reflecting the real sentiments of the country. There can be no going back upon it. The All-India Congress Committee to which it is to be submitted in less than a week, and even the Congress itself, can only improve upon it. They cannot revert to the negations of the old programme, dead and buried at Bardoli. It would be strange, indeed, if some taint of the old does not cling to the new. It will take some time for the Congress and Congressmen wholly to cast off every vestige of the discarded programme. It depends entirely on the efforts of patriotic Indians who can look above and beyond party politics, how soon the Congress will completely assimilate the spirit in which the Bardoli programme has been conceived and adopted.

Both appreciation and criticism have naturally fastened upon Mahatma Gandhi but for whose courageous love of truth, the revision of the Congress programme in keeping with the views of the riper mind of that party, would have taken longer time. An English paper has written of the Mahatma as one whose eyes are fixed upon the dim past of India. As a fact, however, there is no more English-minded leader in all India today than the Mahatma. His virtues as well as his faults are almost all not Indian but English. His rigorous punctuality, his passion for time-tables, the scrupulous and almost superstitious regularity of his daily routine, are all un-Indian and almost wholly English. English his disbelief, amounting to contempt, of slight regard for and knowledge of his faith in muddling through as the best method of conducting national affairs. The Servant of India has compared him with admirable insight to Mr. Lloyd George. The resemblances between the British Prime Minister and the Mahatma, with one fundamental difference, is so striking as to be uncanny. There are people going about mysteriously whispering to the credulous their prophesy that the Mahatma as an Indian political leader is as good as extinct. These pessimists will soon realise their mistake. If the Civil Disobedience programme at Bardoli had come off, the Mahatma's leadership would have suffered a severe check. The stopping of that calamitous project at the moment of its being launched, is the strongest proof that could have been given of the Mahatma's inborn gift of leadership. We are warned that there may be difficulties in carrying the Bardoli resolutions through in the All-India Congress Committee next week, with so many of the front-bench men of the Congress in jail in different parts of the country. This is undoubtedly the most serious difficulty which the Mahatma and his friends will have to face and overcome.

We are told that we can not expect the Government of India in their present mood—it is only in India that a Government and its head are spoken of as subject to moods of which wary politicians should take account—to move their little finger to make smooth the path of the Mahatma. It is doing an injustice to the Government of India to represent them as being likely to be swayed by personal bias in the determination of a question of such enormous public importance. But, assuming that the pessimists are right, we would ask those who rightly sympathise with the imprisoned leaders—the Malaviya Committee has placed on record its opinion that they should be promptly released—how the resumption of the old programme would in any way benefit these leaders. Farther, the members of the All-India Congress Committee should remember that they should not approach the question of doing right in the spirit of bargain either with Government or the official Moderates. If they do so, they may not succeed. Even if they succeed, a large part of the educative and moral value of their effort at self-purification would be lost. Civil disobedience might have embarrassed Government; but Government could have found means of getting out of the embarrassment. But if the popular leaders do right even when Government do wrong, they would be putting Government in a position from which they can emerge with credit only by heeding the wishes and interests of the people. Let Indian leaders take warning by the example of Government. Let them swerve by an inch from a settled policy under the pressure of anger. Emotion is a luxury for which we have no present use in this country. The khaddar that should wear next our skins is not the cloth of the Sabhas, the reason spun and woven out of the public and hard necessities of our everyday

THE FIRST SOCIAL SURVEY OF AN ORIENTAL CITY.*

(By PROF. PATRICK GEDDES.)

I.

Before this substantial and readable volume, with its label as above, the Indian and European reader—in a country long filled with great Universities and their colleges, all more or less laying increasing stress on Economics, and in cities accustomed to think themselves more progressive than any in the land of historic and social conservatism—may well pause for reflection. And surely most of all in Bombay, most western of oriental cities, oldest and foremost of great marts and meeting-places of East and West. Without going into the wider discussion of the current transformation of China, one definite point of explanation of this striking publication is manifest. It is the fruit of wise and generous American policy. For, after the ruthlessly German-led Boxer war of which the Kaiser's "Attila" speech is not forgotten, and the heavy exaction of indemnities in which all the great powers had shares, the Americans gave up their part in merciful fashion, which has proved not a little shrewd as well. For by this to them small sacrifice they surprised the Chinese by a vision and hope of helpful friendship or amid a world seen by them as too much a vast wolf-ring of barbarian enemies. So after the crisis of their internal revolution, the main tide of students from China to the West has streamed eastward across the Pacific and into the States; and each returning scholar has not only sent two and more to fill his place in their universities, but has inevitably continued to act at home as an emissary of American culture as well. How this is affecting imports and exports, economists and even politicians in the West were beginning to see; and now the Washington Congress, with its disgorgement of Shantung by Japan, has made the widest issues plain. This book is a notable contribution to the same enlightenment: for it shows not only the American Missions but the American colleges at work in China on a great and growing scale, and with a wholesale work of education primary and secondary, higher and adult, under a leadership which not even our good and progressive Sadler, Hartog and colleagues could rival here, had powers and funds been given them—that of John Dewey, today perhaps the world's foremost type of teacher and psychologist in one. Our authors are justly proud of this, but are too modestly sparing of details of his great work.

Their object and method are, however, social survey a movement we know here mainly from Dr. Harold Mann's initiatives in Deccan villages, and later ones as of Professors Slater and Makerjee; but which has been for these past thirty years struggling for foothold in Britain. Its most notable expression is of course in the ten volumes of Charles Booth's great "Survey of London;" and the schools of geography and social study of Edinburgh and Oxford, the London school of Economics as well, have been increasingly applying and spreading its methods, though the old statistical and census routines, directed mainly towards taxation estimates, everywhere remain bureaucratically stereotyped in power. All this backwardness is essentially due to that idea-tight state of British education to French methods which lasted so firmly up to the war, and still holds on after it, and as American science has been perhaps even more sub-Germanic than our own, it was in the British form of the nineties that the Americans acquired their impulse to social surveys some full twenty years ago, and have developed it to nation-wide proportions, until the "Know-your-City" movement is as well nigh familiar a phrase as "the three R's" in England, and its literature runs to hundreds of volumes, thousands of papers and graduation theses. Some of it is rough and ready, much of it is careful and detailed, but all as yet is too empirical, too simply absorbed in the collection of facts, in general useful categories no doubt, but not standardised for comparison, and still less digested to interpretation of each type and sample of social evolution selected. It is needful indeed to say, at a time when social surveys are coming in to India, that it is not enough to start again as Frederic LePlay did three generations back, but to work out as he gradually did, and as his disciples Demolins and others have increasingly done, the ways in which survey of place and its advantages, survey of work and its conditions and progress, survey of people and their developments and institutions, qualities and defects, have to be correlated and interpreted; and all these in their interactions in their past and present, in their possibilities as well.

* Peking, a social survey conducted under the Princeton University centre in China and the Peking Y. M. C. A. by Sidney D. Gamble, M. A., and John Stewart Burgess, M. A. Geo. H. Doran & Co New York, 1921. Price Net, Rs. 15.

This is the aim of perfection: but it is also time to be appreciating that our authors have at any rate set their faces in the right direction and gathered a mass of reading of genuine value and interest under each of their headings—History, Geography, Government, Population, Health, Education, Commercial life, Recreation, the Social Evil, Poverty and Philanthropy, Prisons, Type section of town, nearest Neighbours, Church survey, Religious work, and Peking community service group—and each chapter with its share of details in the appendix. Here then is certainly a book with which the social enquirer in India can begin to look into his own town or village, be it great or small: though he would do well to look into other survey exhibits and literature—as of the Cities and Town planning Exhibition now in Bombay—for clearer correlations of them, though everywhere still too imperfect.

II

But at last to the book itself. It shows us clearly the strange medley of the great old capital with its long and not uneventful history, its many quarters, yet of simple and orderly planning, its population of 8 lakhs and more, congested of course, indeed thrice as much as in American cities, yet less badly per acre and mile than the bazaar quarters of Indian cities. The writers make us realise something of the difficult political transition from ancient empire to modern democracy, the yet more economic strain and tension between ancient hand-workers' guilds and modern factory methods, the passing of an old education and the coming of a new. They realise too the need of further and fuller work alike for social studies and constructive programmes. They strongly emphasise that "there are two movements in Peking and China: the Renaissance and New Thought movement among the educated classes; and Protestant Christianity reaching all classes; and both of these movements have been taking an increasing interest in practical community service enterprises." Their discussion of each of these movements is sane and temperate, sympathetic and hopeful; and their initial summary of these chapters offers far more for quotation than space can afford. Thus for the correction of our traditional impression of the backwardness of China in general and Peking in particular, it is not a little interesting to learn and on such first-hand authority that "though the government of Peking is a Chinese puzzle—and with many and various boards whose powers are determined by custom rather than law . . . each official claims to know what to do in any emergency, while the police, whose organisation is modelled after that of Germany and Japan, exercise beyond the usual functions those of Board of Health, Fire Department and Census Bureau, and manage the most of the charitable institutions, so that Peking is well called one of the best-policed cities of the Orient" and with many improvements, begging greatly restricted, city cleaned up and sewered, and sanitation greatly improved—death rate only 25.8 per thousand! This is of course greatly helped by the enormous excess of men, who number a round two-thirds of the population—largely of young men, as students, and office-seekers in absurd numbers—again a factor towards social change. A vast educational city too as of old, and now with wide diffusion of popular and university extension teaching, as well as of all ordinary and extraordinary school and college kinds, and with technical and vocational instruction as well even for the blind; and often with new phonetic script replacing the old Chinese characters which took a lifetime to learn.

Our authors' account of the Renaissance or new intellectual movement will specially interest the Indian reader, with its bold aim "to re-make civilization" and for which "we emphasise democracy and science." Its attitude is critical, the transvaluation of all values; Chinese customs, Confucianism, old learning and thought, being all challenged to justify their value for society in the present age. Yet the long characteristic conservatism is not forgotten: old customs, theories and ideas are to be arranged and investigated in character and in effects; yet all in face of the modern outlooks and enquiries we find in America or Europe—social, governmental, religious and literary. Each too in characteristic detail; thus under the social heading, we have reconstruction, emancipation of women, parity, Confucianism, educational reform, the relation of father and son, econo

"labour problems"—a formidable list, and with reference to current authors in all countries from Russia to America.

To bring us back, however, from speculative thought to survey proper, no chapter is better than that of commercial life. The outstanding features of the business life of Peking—still hardly touched by modern industry and not yet admitting foreigners—are the merchant and labour guilds, the chamber of commerce and a few factories. Every trade has its guild of employers and employees together, and entered by three years' apprenticeship. "Centuries of experience have proved to the Chinese that competition is not fitted to their system of life. . . . They combine rather than compete." The power of resistance of these guilds to excessive taxation, their development of internal settlement of disputes without reference to public law, yet their loyal co-operation with all reasonable administration, taxation and justice make up an attractive picture. Curiously enough the oldest of all the guilds, which claims to have records reaching back 2000 years, is that of the blind, with their business of singing, story-telling and entertaining; and their organisation and procedure are of striking complexity, and a whole local government in itself. Yet with ritual, concert and feast to follow reports and court proceedings. Besides fixing prices, wages, hours, apprenticeship, it has been the guilds, not the government, which have established and maintained trade standards of weight, measure and quality; and relations between the traders and the public, among merchants and between employers and employed, are all covered by guild rules. Industrial troubles are usually short, and quickly settled by discussion and compromise; but when questions can not be settled in this way the strike and the boycott are the weapons used, and the genius of the Chinese for organisation and the power of the group are such that the strike is 100 per cent effective, and the boycott nearly so. Public interests are looked after by the Chamber of Commerce, and it steps in as mediator between employers and employees, but wages disputes are rare. And so on, through a whole web of life in which antique usage and modern adaptations seem striving to settle down anew, though how they will stand the strain of the mechanical age when it fully comes to bear on them has still to be seen. Does it not seem, however, as if this wise old China may get through its changes with less difficulty than Europe, America or India and even with suggestiveness to these?

Here then space compels us to leave the fascinating volume with congratulations to writers and recommendation to readers.

P. GEDDES.

RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT IN THE NATIVE STATES.

(By MR. L. G. GANU B.A., LL.B.)

The reports of the State Assemblies or Dhara Sabhas or Praja Parishads, ought to attract more public attention, than they usually do. At the inauguration of the New Regime in British India, a pious wish was expressed that the heads of several states would introduce proper reforms in the administration so as to harmonise with the administration obtaining in the neighbouring British territory. Some of the progressive states had already begun the work and it was merely a question of time with them to develop a full responsible Government. There are others who have only made a beginning and there are still others who are yet to begin. The subjects of the states have not been sitting idle all the while, and fortunately or otherwise, the present tension in the political atmosphere in British India, has given an impetus as it were to the demands of the people. Demands of the subjects in some cases may have been extravagant or premature in others, just as there may be monarchs, and absolute monarchs, in the year of grace 1922. Leaving aside both the extremes, there can be no two opinions as to the ideal of responsible Government engaging the attention of both the rulers and the ruled, in the near future. Theoretical grounds apart, history tells us that a well-governed country cannot afford to have as its neighbour a country which is ill-governed and the M. C. Report reiterated the same truth. It is high time therefore that the rulers bestir themselves and play their honourable part in the evolution of responsible Government in their States.

If the States are not personal estates and the institution of Government is not merely a farce, then there can be no better foundation of it than public opinion. Just as extremism is said to spoil a case, so also over-cautiousness on the part of those in power may retard the progress of society. The report of the Baroda State Assembly shows that, under the presidency of Nek Namdar Diwan Sahib, a resolution was moved to the effect that, in addition to the expansion of franchise in Municipal and other bodies, an appointment of an elected representative to the State Executive Council, was also proposed. Discussion followed and the President giving an assurance that the matter was under consideration, the resolution was withdrawn. Even this assurance is an index to the progress of events in the State. It need hardly be said that such assemblies ought to meet more often than they usually do, if they are to effect any good at all. The rulers ought to adapt themselves to the changed times, as H. E. the Viceroy said on one occasion and must put up with the ideal of responsible Government, as one, if not desirable, yet inevitable, from their own point of view. Unfortunately the significance of the warning seems to have not been brought home to many a prince; but the sooner it is realised the better.

It is not to be supposed that the responsibility of evolving a modern form of Government rests on the shoulders of the rulers only. The ruled in their own way, ought to educate themselves for the proper discharge of the new responsibility that is cast on them by a modern form of Government. Just as removal of the root-causes of the grievances of the subjects is the only way to win over public opinion, so also agition, as far as the present stage is concerned, ought not to transgress all reasonable limits of legitimate constitutional agitation. Just as it behoves all well-meaning rulers to rid themselves of the old idea that they should keep who have the power and they should take who can; so also people ought not to resort to short-cuts in this field of politics. The bitterness of the struggle between the two forces may well be avoided if both put their shoulders to the wheel in all seriousness and reasonableness and sincerity. It must be said in all fairness to the rulers that time has not come to stand at bay and the challenges given by some subjects of the States leave much to be desired. It lies in the hands of the rulers to keep the subjects contented and happy and the spirit of desperation exhibited by the subjects has its origin in the policy of the rulers. The report of the Bhor Praja Parishad, shows that even the subjects of the Native States are electrified by the tension of feelings in the political atmosphere of the country but it cannot be ignored that the subjects of the States are feeling their pulse for the first time.

The Pant Pratinidhi of Oadh has set a fine example in this part of the country, by laying the foundation of responsible Government in the State and the Chief Sahib ought to be congratulated on his being the pioneer in this field. The Singli Praja Parishad or Dhara Sabha, is said to meet very shortly. Let us hope that an early opportunity will be taken by the enlightened Chief Sahib to lay the corner stone of the fabric of responsible Government. It need hardly be said that people have got to be trusted in order to deserve the trust, just as the proper use of liberty can only be learnt by breathing in a free atmosphere only. The Indian Princes have been represented in the Imperial and Inter-National Conferences, it is but meet therefore that they should be the respecters of western political thought in their own territory. Would that both the parties leave aside the extremes and come to a common understanding as to the ways in which each is to play its part in building up a responsible Government. Let a beginning in that direction be made before it is too late, so that the ill-feelings and misunderstandings may be avoided.

PRESIDENT HARDING ON THE RACE PROBLEM.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

"Politically and economically," you quote President Harding as saying, "there need be no occasion for great and permanent differentiation, for limitations of the individual's opportunity, provided that on both sides there shall be recognition of the absolute divergence in things social and racial." And you proceed to criticise and reject this doctrine in the most uncompromising manner.

May I remind you that Booker T. Washington also preached the same doctrine over and over again, using on one memorable occasion the picturesque image that the two colours might be united as the hand in things political and economic, but must nevertheless be separate as are the fingers of the hand in matters social and racial?

If you want to oppose this tooth and nail, you are free to do so, of course, but you should at any rate realise what it is that you are up against: it is one of the deepest instincts of human nature, an instinct common to representative and self-conscious races of all the principal colours—white, black, yellow, and brown,—and one that is as strong today as it was in the dawn of human history. If we, the reformers of the world of today, are to wage a war with the one object of ending all war for ever, one of the campaigns which we must wage incessantly must be against racial intermarriages. The Aryan Ramachandra and the un-Aryan Ravana-rama cannot possibly bury the hatchet and settle down together as friends and brothers, as long as there lingers the slightest suspicion of promiscuous intentions, conjugal or bestial, on the part of the male-folk of either race towards the female-folk of the other.

SURAT MUNICIPALITY.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I am so glad to read your mild condemnation of Surat Municipal Non-co-operationists. But I wish the condemnation had not been so brief and mild.

In this letter, I intend to show you how the Non-co-operationists of Surat work up the people's passions.

(1) When the Surat Municipality delegated—I believe unlawfully—its entrusted task, the management of primary schools to an unauthorised, unregistered association, and closed the schools to avoid an inconvenient situation, the authorities requested the Non-co-operationists to open the schools so that the authorities may take peaceful possession of the school buildings.

It was not till last Thursday that the people were told about the request. Thus the breaking open of the schools was allowed to appear, and also deliberately represented, as the blackest act of violence on the part of the authorities.

(2) But I draw your serious attention to the following facts and I hope you will write disapprovingly of them.

On the suspension of the Municipality on Wednesday, a public meeting was held on Thursday evening. It was to be held in the Queen's Garden which was Municipal property. But the Collector had put up a notice that the property had lapsed to the Government, and that permission should be previously obtained on all occasions when a meeting was desired to be held there.

So there was a meeting on the beach. What hurt me most was the speech of Mr. Vithalbhai Patel. He said: "The suspension of the Municipality had clearly demonstrated that local Self-Government was a sham because the Government would not allow the people's representatives to do what they chose in the matter of local primary education!"

Will self-governing India allow such defiance of law and provincial authorities on the part of municipalities? Does local self-government mean city States?

Before I could find time to put these questions to Mr. Vithalbhai, the meeting had dissolved. When I approached him and requested him to allow a question I was told to see him at his place.

So this suspension is made a local grievance, and non-payment of local rates is advised. Mr. Vithalbhai also said that he could not help advising an unpermitted enjoyment of the garden!

Yours sincerely,
GATULAL, D. BARFIVALA.

UNTOUCHABILITY IN THE WEST.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

'Two wrongs do not make a right';—much less, I suppose, do three wrongs make a right.

There is (1) untouchability in unhappy, benighted India, along with (2) untouchability in the jolly 'democratic' West and there is too (3) the Pharisaical self-righteousness—the cheap, handy Mrs. Jellyby spirit impatient of setting one's own house in order first, but only too ready to patronise Borrioboola Gha. (A dose of Dickens cannot but be salutary to such as are apt to lose sight of the counsel: 'First cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye,' as also the saying, 'Charity begins at home.') Well might the cynic suspect: Does it 'pay' to grasp at a neighbour's faults? By all means let us fight the untouchability at our doors,—but, Sir, it was wrong No. 8 that I ventured to expose in my last, with the result (I am sorry) that you have entirely misunderstood me. In further proof of wrong No. 2 you will please turn to your own London correspondent's remarks thereon in your issue of the 29th ult., and his mention of how American susceptibilities have been aroused by the choice of a full blooded African negro as the recipient of the world-famous literary prize offered at regular intervals by the Academie de Goncourt (in France).

Yours etc.,
S. D. NADKARNI.

A HISTORIC SCENE.

The completeness of the reversal of British policy towards Ireland was well illustrated on Monday when executive power was formerly transferred from the British authorities in Dublin to the Irish Provisional Government. In the first official announcement of the new Administration it was bluntly stated that "the members of the Provisional Government received the surrender of Dublin Castle at 1-45 p. m. to-day. It is now in the hands of the Irish nation." The word "surrender" must have given a twinge to many a disillusioned Unionist when it appeared. Nevertheless it seems to describe what actually occurred. Mr. Michael Collins and his colleagues were privately received by the Lord Lieutenant, who proceeded forthwith to acknowledge, formally and officially, the authority of the new Government. The machinery was at once set in motion for transferring the control of all departments to the Irish Ministers, one of whose first effective strokes was to secure a temporary solution of a menacing railway strike. It is significant that there was no swearing in of the newly installed Ministers, and in the King's telegram to the Lord Lieutenant there was no reference to 'My Government in Ireland.' His Majesty simply expressed his gratification at the successful establishment of the Provisional Government and his confidence that Lord Fitz Alan would do all in his power to help its members to accomplish their task. Dublin Castle is to be put to the purposes of a museum. It would be no home for a free Irish Government. Patriotic Irishmen look upon that ugly building very much as the French regarded the Bastille.

THE BARDOLI PROGRAMME

THE CONGRESS WORKING COMMITTEE'S RESOLUTIONS.

The Working Committee of the Congress met at Bardoli on the 11th and 12th instant and passed the following important resolutions:—

CHAURI CHAURA AFFAIR.

(1) The Working Committee deplores the inhuman conduct of the mob at Chauri Chaura in having brutally murdered constables and wantonly burned the police thana and tenders its sympathy to the families of the bereaved.

SUSPENSION OF MASS CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE.

(2) In view of Nature's repeated warnings—every time mass civil disobedience has been imminent some popular violent outburst has taken place, indicating that the atmosphere in the country is not non-violent enough for mass civil disobedience, the latest instance being the tragic and terrible events at Chauri Chaura near Gorakhpur—the Working Committee of the Congress resolves that mass civil disobedience contemplated at Bardoli and elsewhere be suspended and instructs the local Congress Committee forthwith to advise the cultivators to pay the land revenue and other taxes due to the Government and whose payment might have been suspended in anticipation of mass civil disobedience, and instructs them to suspend every other preparatory activity of an offensive nature.

(3) The suspension of mass civil disobedience shall be continued till the atmosphere is so non-violent as to ensure the non-repetition of popular atrocities such as at Gorakhpur or hooliganism such as at Bombay and Madras, respectively on the 17th November, 1921, and the 13th January last.

CONGRESS ACTIVITIES TO BE RELAXED.

(4) In order to promote a peaceful atmosphere the Working Committee advises till further instructions all Congress organizations to stop activities especially designed to court arrest and imprisonment, save normal Congress activities, including voluntary hartals, wherever an absolutely peaceful atmosphere can be assured, and for that end all picketing shall be stopped, save for the bona fide and peaceful purpose of warning visitors to liquor shops against the evils of drinking, such picketing to be controlled by persons of known good character and specially selected by the Congress Committee concerned.

DEFIANT MEETINGS AND PROCESSIONS.

(5) The Working Committee advises till further instructions the stoppage of all volunteer processions and public meetings merely for the purpose of defiance of the notifications regarding such meetings. This, however, shall not interfere with the private meetings of the Congress and other committees or public meetings which are required for the conduct of the normal activities of the Congress.

ZEMINDARS AND RYOTS.

(6) Complaints having been brought to the notice of the Working Committee that ryots are not paying rents to the zemindars, the Working Committee advises the Congress workers and organizations to inform the ryots that such withholding of rents is contrary to the resolutions of the Congress, and that it is injurious to the best interests of the country.

(7) The Working Committee assures the zemindars that the Congress movement is in no way intended to attack their legal rights and that even where the ryots have grievances the Committee desires that redress should be sought by mutual consultations and by the usual recourse to arbitrations.

VOLUNTEER RULES.

(8) Complaints having been brought to the notice of the Working Committee that in the formation of volunteers corps great laxity prevails in the selection and that insistence is not had on the full use of hand-spun and hand-woven khaddar and on the full observance by Hindus of the rule as to the removal of untouchability, nor is care being taken to ascertain that the candidates believe fully in the observance of non-violence in intent, word and deed in terms of the Congress resolution, the Working Committee calls upon all Congress organizations to revise their lists and remove from them the names of all such volunteers as do not strictly conform to the requirements of the pledge.

(9) The Working Committee is of opinion that unless Congressmen carry out to the full the Congress constitution and the resolutions from time to time issued by the Working Committee, it is not possible to achieve its objects expeditiously or at all.

(10) The foregoing resolutions will have effect only pending the meeting to be specially convened of the All-India Congress Committee, and thereafter, subject to confirmation by it, the secretary to call such a meeting as early as possible after consultation with Hakim Ajmal Khan.

INSTRUCTIONS.

Whereas the Gorakhpur tragedy is a powerful proof of the fact that the mass mind has not yet fully realized the necessity of non-violence as an integral, active and chief part of mass civil disobedience, and whereas the reported indiscriminate acceptance of persons as volunteers in contravention of the Congress instructions betrays want of appreciation of the vital part of Satyagraha, and whereas in the opinion of the Working Committee the delay in the attainment of the national aim is solely due to the weak and incomplete execution in practice of the constitution of the Congress and with a view to perfecting the internal organization, the Working Committee advises all Congress organizations to be engaged in the following activities:—

(1) To enlist at least one crore of members of the Congress.

Note.—(1) Since peace (non-violence and legitimacy) and truth are the essence of the Congress creed no person should be enlisted who does not believe in non-violence and truth as indispensable for the attainment of Swaraj. The creed of the Congress must, therefore, be carefully explained to each person who is appealed to join the Congress.

Note.—(2) The workers should note that no one who does not pay the annual subscription can be regarded as a qualified Congressman. All the old members are, therefore, to be advised to register their names.

(2) To popularize the spinning-wheel and organize the manufacture of hand-spun and hand-woven khaddar.

Note.—To this end all workers and office-bearers should be dressed in khaddar and it is recommended that with a view to encourage others they should themselves learn hand-spinning.

(3) To organize national schools.

Note.—No picketing of Government schools should be resorted to. Best reliance should be placed upon the superiority of national schools in all vital matters to command attendance.

(4) To organize the depressed classes for a better life, to improve their social, mental and moral condition, to induce them to send their children to national schools and to provide for them the ordinary facilities which other citizens enjoy.

Note.—Whilst, therefore, where prejudices against the untouchables is still strong in places, separate schools and separate wells must be maintained out of the Congress funds, every effort should be made to draw such children to the national schools and to persuade the people to allow the untouchables to use the common wells.

(5) To organize the temperance campaign amongst the people addicted to the drink-habit by house to house visits and to rely more upon appeals to the drinker in his home than upon picketing.

(6) To organize village and town panchayats for private settlement of all disputes, reliance being placed solely upon the force of public opinion and the truthfulness of the panchayat's decision to ensure obedience to them.

Note.—In order to avoid even the appearance of coercion no social boycott should be resorted to against those who will not obey the panchayat's decisions.

(7) In order to promote and emphasize unity among all classes and races and mutual good-will, the establishment of which is the aim of the movement of non-co-operation, to organize a social service department that will render help to all, irrespective of differences in times of illness or accident.

Note.—A non-co-operator, whilst firmly adhering to his creed, will deem it a privilege to render personal service in the case of illness or accident to every person, whether English or Indian.

(8) To continue the Tilak Memorial Swaraj Fund and to call upon every Congressman or Congress sympathizer to pay at least one-hundredth part of his annual income for the year 1931; every province to send every month 25 per cent, of its income from the Tilak Memorial Swaraj Fund to the All-India Congress Committee.

(9) The above resolutions shall be brought before the forthcoming session of the All-India Congress Committee for revision, if necessary.

(10) In the opinion of the Working Committee a project is necessary for the purpose of finding employment for those who may give up Government service and to that end the committee appoints Messrs. Mian Mahomed Haji Jan Mahomed Chotani, Jamanlal Bajaj and V. J. Patel to draw up a scheme for consideration by the said special meeting of the All-India Congress Committee.

MALAVIYA COMMITTEE RESOLUTIONS.

At a meeting of the Committee of the Representative Conference, held in Bombay on Tuesday evening, the following resolutions were passed:—

1. (a) The Committee of the Bombay Representative Conference places on record its profound satisfaction that the Working Committee of the Congress, at its meeting at Bardoli on the 11th and 12th instant, adopted resolutions suspending the contemplated civil disobedience, suspending aggressive non-co-operation activities and modifying the Congress programme so as to emphasize its constructive moral, social, and economic, as well as political aims.

(b) The Committee confidently hopes that the All-India Congress Committee will confirm the resolutions at their meeting, which has been specially convened for the purpose.

(c) The Committee wishes further to express its appreciation of the high courage and patriotism with which Mr. Gandhi and his colleagues of the Working Committee have acknowledged the significance of the deplorable events at Chauri Chaura, and of the promptitude with which they have revised the Congress programme.

(d) The Committee conveys its thanks to Mr. Gandhi and the Working Committee for their courtesy in inviting the members of this Committee to attend the meeting of the Working Committee at Bardoli, and in giving Pandit Malaviya and Messrs. Natarajan and Jayakar, who attended it, the opportunity of expressing their views before the Working Committee.

2. The Committee feels it its duty to record its considered opinion that the resolutions passed by the Working Committee of the Congress at Bardoli, when they are confirmed at the meeting of the All-India Congress Committee specially convened for the purpose, will ensure an even more favourable atmosphere than that contemplated in His Excellency the Viceroy's speech to the Deputation which waited on him on December 21st at Calcutta, for convening a Representative Conference to consider the grievances and demands of the people.

3. In view of the new situation created by the resolutions of the Working Committee of the Congress, this Committee is of opinion that the Government of India should give immediate effect to the recommendations, contained in Resolution 3 of the Bombay Representative Conference, for the withdrawal of orders and notifications and the release of prisoners.

MAHATMA GANDHI'S PENITENTIAL FAST.

Mr. Gandhi is announcing a fast of five days which commenced from Sunday evening and ends on Friday at 6. p.m.

Writing to Young India on the Chauri Chaura tragedy, he states that as the author of civil disobedience he feels specially responsible and must do additional penance. He says all fast must be secret, but he announces the present one, because he regards it both as a penance and a punishment. It is a punishment for those who have committed the brutal murders, which he contends no amount of provocation could possibly justify. He says "Love can only punish by suffering."

He advises the criminals voluntarily to deliver themselves to the authorities and make a clean confession of their crimes. He dissuades Congress workers from copying his fast, but strongly urges them to prosecute the new constructive programme mapped out by the Working Committee. Mr. Gandhi regards the Chauri Chaura tragedy as the third warning of God against hasty embarkation on mass civil disobedience. He describes the crimes of Ahmedabad and Viramgam in 1919 as the first warning and the Bombay riots of November last as the second.

Following as it does, immediately upon his letter to His Excellency the Viceroy and his rejoinder to Government's reply, he calls his third retraction the bitterest cup of humiliation. But he says such humiliation, ostracism and even death are preferable to any countenancing of untruth or violence. He says in his article that he feels stronger for its confession and is sure that the country will gain by starving for truth and non-violence.

Mr. Gandhi pays a tribute to the members of the Working Committee and those who were with him on Saturday for co-operating with him in his desire for suspension of mass civil disobedience and minor kindred activities.

PANDIT MALAVIYA'S TRIBUTE TO MAHATMA GANDHI.

Before leaving Bardoli, Panditji addressed a public meeting there, which was attended by several hundred persons. Mahatma Gandhi was also present, so also were Mian Haji Chotani and almost all the other leaders who were at Bardoli. Panditji congratulated the people of Bardoli on their readiness to undergo, in the interest of the national cause, the very serious sacrifices, and hardships which civil disobedience must involve. He explained why under Mahatma Gandhi's wise and large-hearted guidance the Working Committee had decided to suspend civil disobedience. The decision would disappoint those who ardently desired that it should begin. But in view of the tragedy at Chauri Chaura the decision was both patriotic and righteous, Panditji warmly admired

Mahatma Gandhi for having come to that decision. Panditji said that it was only a truly high-souled man like Mahatma Gandhi who could calmly arrive at that decision, after having so recently expressed his intention in his letter to the Viceroy to start civil disobedience at Bardoli. It proved beyond dispute that Mahatma Gandhi was absolutely opposed to violence. He also stated that Mahatma Gandhi had arrived at that decision purely from the point of what was right and righteous, and without any reference to the attitude of the Government in the matter of civil disobedience.

Panditji explained the programme, namely, the enrolment of a crore of members for the Congress instructed in the purest patriotism, free from any taint of ill-will towards Englishmen, but which would teach them to regard it a matter of deep shame to continue to live under a foreign bureaucratic system and inspire them with an unshakable desire and unflagging endeavour to establish Dominion Home Rule in the country at the earliest possible date; the promotion of the use of hand-spun and hand-woven Khaddar or Swadeshi cloth which would contribute materially to the economic uplift and independence of the people at large; the total prohibition of the use of intoxicating liquors; the uplift of the depressed classes by education and all other reasonable means, the discouragement of the spirit of litigation, and the establishment of arbitration courts in villages and towns; and the promotion of national unity not only between Hindus and Moslems but amongst all sections and classes of the people and cordial co-operation between persons of all shades of political opinion for the purpose of achieving a redress of the Punjab and Khilafat wrongs and the early establishment of Swaraj and strongly recommended that all the lovers of the Motherland should sink or obviate differences and unite in giving effect to the programme and thereby hastening the advent of Swaraj.—The Bombay Chronicle.

A LETTER TO MAHATMA GANDHI.

Messrs. Jayakar and Natarajan have addressed the following letter to Mahatma Gandhi under date the 14th instant:

Dear Mahatmajji,

We feel we ought to write a line to tell you how highly we value your rare courage and statesmanship in putting through the Bardoli Resolutions in the Working Committee. Neither of us, as you know, has the bump of hero-worship inordinately developed, but we assure you that the pure motive and high principle of your leadership which we witnessed at Bardoli have moved us deeply. That your action has saved the country from what, in our opinion, would have been a dreadful calamity, is a matter for which we are grateful. But we feel still more grateful that our country has had the high privilege of learning from your example what true patriotism is and how it meets situations where right seems to conflict sharply with the claims of personal prestige. You have taught us all by your attitude and conduct at this eventful crisis, that the highest truth is also the highest expediency in national as in personal affairs.

We earnestly pray that you may have health and strength vouchsafed to you for many years to lead the country through honourable and self-respecting ways to the goal of Swaraj, in all the height and width of individual and national self-conquest. For ourselves, we shall ever feel it a great privilege, in such small measure as is given to us, to do all we can to help the prosecution of your high mission. The differences in regard to the several items of the Congress programme, have been reduced to a minimum by the Bardoli Resolutions which we trust will be endorsed and amplified in one or two respects by the All-India Congress Committee. With a few more modifications in the direction of the Bardoli proviso, the Congress programme will closely approximate to what, we believe, is the most suitable and advantageous programme in the present circumstances of the country, and the Congress will in a larger measure than ever come to represent the living forces at work among us.

With deep respects,

Yours Sincerely,

(Sd.) K. NATARAJAN.

(Sd.) M. R. JAYAKAR.

PRESS OPINIONS.

The Times of India, Bombay daily, (Anglo-Indian).

There is little in the new programme of the Congress on which we cannot all unite, if not in joint work then at least in benevolent sympathy. The use of khaddar and the popularising of the spinning wheel embody great and beneficent ideals. They hold before us the ideal of a stern and uncomfortable simplicity in life and living, in contrast to the slothful materialism of the day; they embody the equally fine ideal of domestic industries and laborious living, in contrast to the miseries of the factory system and an indulgent leisure. If we cannot wholly subscribe to them it is not from lack of sympathy with the ideals they embody, but from the conviction that no movements of this character can be permanent unless based on sound economic considerations, and the spinning wheel is not economic and we doubt if it ever can be. The organisation of schools goes to the root of one of the greatest Indian problems, her illiteracy; there is room and to spare for every form of educational activity, provided it is constructive and not the mere disruption of the established system of education with nothing better to put in its place. The promotion of temperance is one of the greatest needs of the day. But temperance was never promoted nor ever will by importing the hired bravo with his latbi to threaten the man who wants his dram; it demands long and painful education, in which legislation and administrative reform should march hand in hand with the temperance advocate. The organisation of village and town panchayets for the private settlement of disputes is a cause we all have at heart, so as to reduce the waste of substance involved in litigation. We are all one in the cause of social services. Here then is a programme of constructive social work which will unite instead of dividing, which will heal the wounds of India and not inflame them. If that is the programme of the Congress, then we can say All's Well; India can go straight ahead, working with zeal and confidence to full self-government, to an Indian State in which we shall be happy to live, which we shall all be proud to serve. But if we are to live all the time on the borderland of revolution, then our last state will be so infinitely worse than the first that it is far preferable to have the fundamental issue between the two vitally opposed policies of evolution and revolution, law and no law settled at once, no matter what the present cost may be.

The Bombay Chronicle, daily (Congress)

Our opponents will doubtless describe the Working Committee's decision as another admission of failure by the Mahatma. Nor will they be wrong. But in their further conclusions they will most assuredly deceive themselves. For every such honest admission of failure hastens the advent of Swaraj and the defeat of our opponents with their "Politics" and Repression. The copy books of the West are prone to give instructive little stories about people who surrender present advantages—even life itself—rather than compromise with sin. These people are called martyrs and their refusal to have truck with evil is hailed as a great moral victory of the most immense benefit to their cause. So it is with the Bardoli decision. It has strengthened our cause—the cause of Swaraj. The evil of Chauri Chaura has been discounted, and, though they will not admit it yet—indeed they will hardly realize it—our opponents have been discomfited. The Mahatma's wise words we quoted yesterday must remain the only and the most complete justification of the Working Committee's decision. "Stubborn and impleacable resistance against internal corruption is enough resistance against the Government. As soon as the process of self-purification is complete, we shall miss the system we appear to be fighting."

As to the lines on which the process of self-purification should develop the Working Committee's resolutions are clear and unequivocal. Merely condemning the Chauri Chaura is not enough. Nor is our mere dissociation from those who do violence all we must do. We must convert the rioters and all potential rioters to our view. To do this we must live the Truth we preach. We declare and believe that our movement is irresistibly strong and put our faith in its power to win Swaraj. To prove its strength to the sceptical we must give evidence of our self-restraint by suspending certain activities. It may seem a hard task after Repression has been rampant. It may seem to hurt our pride. But we cannot claim to be masters over ourselves if we fail in so simple a test. For the misjudgement of our opponents—their eager but miscalculating jubilation at what they deem our failure—must be things too small to move us. And if they cannot hurt us we must pity them in their impotent malevolence. When we can all do this, Swaraj is ours indeed. The Working Committee's resolutions are more than advice. They constitute a profession of faith and a moral code. And since the faith and the Code is one to which every good Muslim, Hindu, Christian or Parsi must subscribe, India will most certainly act as the Working Committee decrees. It is the only way to that Swaraj for India which is already in the possession of each one of us waiting for us to realize the fact of our ownership. And so simply honest are the Working Committee's resolutions—so crystal clear—that none need expounding. Granting that we are honest men, fighting an honest battle with the weapons of honesty we cannot help but act in the only way open to us—honestly.

The Hindu, Madras Daily, (Congress).

To those who, like ourselves, had serious misgivings as to the wisdom of embarking on civil disobedience at the present time the decision of the Working Committee to suspend the programme of offensive Non-Co-operation will come as a great relief. The horrible affair at Gorakhpur has shown that the necessary atmosphere of non-violence, without which mass disobedience is fraught with terrible results, is emphatically not present over some parts of the country. We are aware that the Mahatma is not the man to launch on civil disobedience unless he was perfectly satisfied that it was possible nay, certain, to preserve non-violence in the area of his selection. While it is therefore probable that non-payment could have been pushed to a successful issue in Bardoli, we must not overlook two important considerations. One is the practical certainty of the Mahatma's arrest the moment the campaign begins. How far in the natural indignation such a step is sure to evoke it would be possible to ensure against violence even in places which have assimilated the true spirit of Non-Co-operation must remain open to doubt. In the second place it would be impossible to avoid elsewhere in India the repercussions of the struggle in Bardoli. Bardoli itself might suffer in peace but there are areas which might attempt to translate their sympathy and enthusiasm into unpleasant shapes. The decision therefore, as we said, is a
