Residential Universities: The Bombay Samachar, while recognising the force of our arguments against the premature and forcible conversion of Indian universities into residential universities, thinks that they are not so weighty as to deter it from wishing success to the Madras project. First, as to our view of the propagandist work of colleges, the Samachar naively observes that, as this work has been undertaken by Non-Co-operators in the outlying parts of the country, the present Universities should confine themselves to the capital cities and their immediate vicinity. It says:

The propaganda work for education forms no longer a part of the function of the Universities. That forms part of the work of colleges and political parties. The Non-co-operators have developed a desire for education and better education amongst the most outlying portions of India. The older Universities had better turn their attention now to consolidating their work in a more permanent and national shape instead of continuing in their present hybrid and exotic forms.

We do not believe in educational propaganda by political parties. As, consequently, we have never had much faith in the Non-Co-operation brand of education, the reason given by our contemporary for the Universities retiring from the districts, appeals to us in quite an opposite sense. As for the Hostels, it may be, as our contemporary says, that the secular western form is responsible for their evil effects, but we are unable to share its satisfaction that the Gurukuls, &c., have solved the problem. Now, we come to the crux of the matter, referring to the educative value of family life, the Samachar writes:

We wish the Reformer's remarks about the value of family life were true. We state with regret they are not. In Calcutta, Madras and Bombay true family life does not exist in the middle class and the poor. The problem of the educationist in these cities is more to save the student from the vitiated atmosphere of his home—degraded, commercial, money-seeking, irreligious and unconventional than to keep him in it. You cannot have a family life in tenements of two rooms in a chawl amidst the noise and dust of this city, with the harlots' hive staring at you in the neighbourhood the sharebazar tempting with promises of untold wealth earned without labour, the ale-house flaunting its degradation and vulgarity at every second chawl. The student must be withdrawn from these contaminating influences as soon as possible and we wish the Madras University will try to bring into existence an institution as near to the ideal as it can.

Would our contemporary say that a student who lives with his people even in Bombay is in a worse atmosphere than one who puts up in a hostel? We cannot jump away from our own shadows. The evils above-mentioned can not and are not evaded by segregating students in hostels. Students' hostels cannot and do not settle problems which an active and aggressive spirit of social and civic reform alone can solve. It may be that our observations last week were somewhat sweeping as regards the Hostels, but we are only confirmed in our opinion as to the utter impolicy of the "forcible conversion" of our Universities into so-called "residential ones". Our educational system is about the only thing that has shown some sign of growth and vitality under British rule. We ask our Ministers not to meddle with it until at least they are sure that their diarchic souls are really their own.

Disintegration of the Non-Brahmin Movement: While recognising that there were some solid grievances underlying the non-Brahmin movement in South India, we have again and again urged upon the leaders the need of extending it in depth and breadth. No merely anti-Brahmin movement can be a national movement one of the essential conditions of which is that it should jealously guard the rights of minorities. Evidence is accumulating that the Non-Brahmin movement is getting the same measure meted out to it as it has to the Brahmins. The representative of the Depressed Classes in the Madras Legislative Council has repeatedly repudiated in public the claim of the non-Brahmin movement to the allegiance of his people. The President of the Thiyya Conference the other day called upon his fellows to apply to non-Brahmin caste Hindus the same formula as Sir Theagaraya Chetti has devised for the attitude of the latter to Brahmins. Even more significant, is the protest in a recent issue of the West Coast Spectator against the oligarchic tendencies of the party now in power in Madras. Our contemporary writes with reference to a suggestion to boycott a Minister who is to visit Malabar:

The Nayers owe it to themselves as much as to the Government that they should place their case before them and seek redress. This obviously represents the first line of approach and must be attempted before working out the general boycott idea which must be reserved as the very last weapon. But nothing need prevent a representative body of Nayers from meeting the Minister and representing to him, emphatically, that the Nayers believe that they have not been treated fairly by the Non-Brahmin leaders and that they cannot tolerate certain aspects of the policy of the present Government. We do not plead for special treatment for Nayers but their prospect should not be adversely affected through the existence of the Non-Brahmin movement.

Difficulties of this kind are bound to multiply unless the non-Brahmin party unites upon a national programme embracing every caste and creed.

Management of Indian Railways: The Indian Merchants' Chamber and Bureau has addressed a vigorous representation to the Government of India urging that the East Indian Railway and the Great Indian Peninsular Railway, the contracts with the companies that work which expire on the 31st Dec. 1924 and the 30th June 1925 respectively, should on these dates be taken over and managed thenceforward by the State. The Chamber, in order to make sure of its position on the question, called a Conference of commercial representatives from several places and the conclusions put forward in the present representation were arrived at unanimously at the Conference. The principal conclusion was that the management of the East Indian and the Great Indian Peninsula Railways should, on the expiry of the present contracts, be taken over by the State, no private capital being allowed to be mixed up in any of these railways on any account. The two railways should be completely State-owned and the management of these railways should not be entrusted to a Company even though domiciled in India. All except a fraction of the capital spent on the railways has been found by the State, and the Chamber very pertinently asks why it is necessary to entrust State capital for, say, 90 crores to representatives of private capital of 5 crores! The other arguments advanced by the Bureau in answer to the advocates of Company management are equally cogent. The fact is that the Company management of Indian railways has worked detrimentally to Indian interests, and Indian opinion is practically unanimous that it should give place to responsible State management. This view received weighty support from the Acworth Committee which investigated quite recently Indian railway policy. The Government of India's way of dealing with the recommendations of this Committee, has not been fair to it. The unanimous recommendation of that Committee regarding the separation of the Railway from the General Budget was summarily rejected. On the main question of State or Company management, Government, as pointed out by the Chamber, are not adopting the straightforward course of asking the opinion of the Legislature. It is well that the Chamber has placed before Government in unmistakable language the strong feeling in the country on the question.

Bombay Compulsory Education Bill: The draft Bill for the introduction of compulsory education in this Presidency has been published. Generally speaking, it seems, on a hasty perusal, to be conceived on right lines. The proposal to place education in charge of special School Boards instead of leaving them with the Municipal and Local Boards as at present, will commend itself to every one who has had experience of the absolutely unintelligent way in which many of these bodies fulfil their educational functions. It is not quite clear from the draft Bill how it is proposed to elect the School Boards. Unless some special qualifications with an educational flavour are prescribed for membership of these Boards, they will be no better than the present School Committees which, except in a few local bodies, are hopelessly incompetent. Provision has also been wisely made in the Bill to enable local bodies to vary the official curriculum to suit local needs, with the sanction of the Educational Department. We do not think that the differentiation proposed to be made in the matter of grants between Municipalities and Local Board areas, is justified by actual circumstances. There should be one uniform rate for both classes, and after all, many of our towns are only more or less large villages. The only preferential differentiation that is necessary in the case of local bodies which apply the compulsion principle to both boys and girls. It is more costly to maintain girls' than boys' schools, but the higher expense is more than compensated for by the more abiding and elevating effects which women's education has upon society. We have not been able to find in the Bill any indication of the source from which the scheme is to be financed. The present haphazard system in which education gets whatever is left after meeting the demands of the reserved and other departments, cannot obviously be relied upon to place the scheme on a certain and permanent financial basis. Either the proceeds from some head should be definitely ear-marked for the compulsory scheme or a cess or tax imposed specially for it. It is better to face the question boldly at once. We are glad that the Bombay Minister of Education has begun at the bottom and not given way to the ambition of his confreres elsewhere to build the tower before the foundations are broadly planned.

Dr. Annie Besant in Bombay: We are glad that Dr. Annie Besant had a large and respectful audience to listen to her address on the way to Home Rule on Thursday. She is a great and earnest worker, and should be sure of being received with deference by any Indian gathering. As regards the substance of her address, it is much the same as she elaborated in a little book some years ago, namely that we must begin with the village and build upwards. Only, she has now not actual Home Rule in view. Mr. Srinivasa Sastry in his speech at the Bombay Liberal Conference suggested a deputation of members of the present Legislative Council, that is, of his own party, to England to press for an advance in swaraj. Dr. Besant's Convention not be confined to Council members or Liberals. Only, she omitted to say how members of the Congress could join the Convention without the leaders being released at least for the purposes of the Convention. If some one had suggested what Dr. Besant was interned that she should be left in internment and that others should call a convention to nominate a deputation to England to secure Home Rule, her friends, and even many who will have not that honour, would have thought a very shabby suggestion. And yet Dr. Besant speaks for an hour, and not a word about the political prisoners, the legality of whose conviction has been seriously questioned! We suppose a deputation goes to England. It will, of course, be respectfully received. Will there be any other result? Mr. Lloyd George who certainly knows his British public as well as Dr. Besant, would not have spoken in the vein of utter abandonment that he did recently, if he had felt that the British elector is capable of any sequence of thought on Indian matters. We note that Dr. Besant expressed it an open question, whether India is or is not to continue a part of the British commonwealth thus getting into line with the modified Congress Creed. Every suggestion to get out of the present depressing dead-lock is worth consideration, and we do not by any means rule out definitely the one Dr. Besant has made.

The New Volume and Index: With this issue we begin the thirty-third volume of the Reformer. The index for the last volume will be shortly ready, and will be sent free to those of our subscribers who intimate to us within this month that they desire to have it.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, SEPTEMBER 3, 1922.

THE BEGINNINGS OF FEMALE EDUCATION IN INDIA.*

Part II of Selections from Educational Records of the Government of India from 1840-1859, published recently, contains an interesting chapter on "the Beginnings of Female Education." Unlike in the case of boys' education, there were no indigenous institutions for imparting instruction to girls. For many years the Government of India and the Court of Directors scrupulously avoided making any reference to the subject as they were of opinion "that any attempt to introduce female education, when there was no demand for it, might be regarded by the people as an interference with their social customs." In June 1825, a society of ladies (the Calcutta Ladies' School for Native Females) for the promotion of female education in Calcutta and its vicinity, applied to the Government for the sum of Rs. 10,000 to enable them to purchase a site on which to erect a Central School. Two of the Members of the Governor-General's Council were for complying with the request. But the Governor-General, Lord Amherst, although Lady Amherst was Patroness of the Society, "having ascertained that it had been publicly avowed in the hearing of many native gentlemen that the object of the ladies' society was the propagation of the Christian religion, interposed his authority and the grant was negatived." The Court of Directors upheld the action of the Governor-General. In 1832, during the enquiry by the Select Committee of Parliament into the affairs of the East India Company, the question of women's education was touched upon. Sir Charles Trevelyan, in answer to a question, said that he thought that the primary and main reason for the hostility to female education among Hindus was that, in order to keep the women in subjection and seclusion, it was necessary to keep them ignorant. In a subsequent enquiry in July 1858 Mr. J. C. Marshman stated, speaking of Bengal, that there was only one school under the auspices of the Government, appropriated to the education of girls, namely, the school that was established by Mr. Drinkwater Bethune, who was then dead, to which he devoted "of his own personal funds" the sum of £10,000. That, remarked Mr. Marshman, was within the past three years. Another witness before the same Committee (1858) testified that, as regards the Government, female education had been wholly disregarded till Mr. Bethune came out. The Governor-General, he added, "has taken up Mr. Bethune's school, but I am not aware that the Government has rendered any assistance as a Government." There had been some sporadic efforts made in earlier years to promote female education in Bengal, but to Mr. Bethune and Lord Dalhousie belongs the credit of being the pioneers of women's education in India outside Christian Missions.

The letter in which Mr. Bethune officially communicated to Lord Dalhousie the results of the working of his school some ten months after it had been started, is given among the selections, and is one of the utmost importance in the history of Indian social reform. It shows with what anxious care and solicitude, Mr. Bethune thought out every detail of his institution. The high principles by which he was actuated are illustrated in the following passage. He writes :

At this time the question was agitated whether or not I should offer stipends to the girls who attended, as was done on the first establishment of some of the Government Colleges and I was assured that if I would offer 5 or 6 rupees a month to each, I might count on immediately recruiting the School to any extent that I might think desirable from Brahminical families of unquestioned caste and respectability. I considered however that by administering an artificial stimulus of this kind, I should not bring fairly to the test what I was anxious to ascertain whether any real desire for the education of their daughters exists in any respectable class of the community, and I decided against it.

The only allowances which he had made, he went on to say, were for carriage hire, and "occasional presents of dresses, when any of the little girls appeared in rather too primitive a state to correspond with my notions of decency." He had lately built a carriage which held twelve children expressly for the purpose of the school and would probably require soon to build another. Mr. Bethune concluded by stating that, with respect to his school, he had no other wish than to continue to defray the expense of it as he had thereto done so long as he remained in the country, and when he left it, he was hopeful of being able to interest others to supply his place. But he requested that, to show publicly that Government sympathised with the cause of female education, Lord Dalhousie should use his influence with the Court of Directors to obtain Her Majesty's leave to call the school by her name and to consider it as placed especially under her patronage. The Governor-General warmly supported Mr. Bethune's request, but the Court of Directors did not think that the then state of female education was such as to warrant "the unusual proceeding for applying for the sanction of Her Majesty's name to the Female School at Calcutta." Lord Dalhousie is chiefly known to Indians as a breaker of Native States, but his earnest desire to promote women's education shows that he had the real good of the country at heart. "It is the opinion of the Governor-General in Council," we read in one of his despatches, "that no single change in the habits of the people is likely to lead to more important and beneficial consequences than the introduction of education for their female children." And this was no empty sentiment. Mr. Bethune died in 1851 and the Governor-General at once took upon himself the cost of maintaining the School, and although in 1854 the Court of Directors sanctioned the appropriation of funds for the purpose, Lord Dalhousie declined the offer and declared that he would continue to bear the cost so long as he remained in India. In the masterly minute in which the great Governor-General reviewed his work in India on the eve of laying down his office, he referred with justifiable pride to his part in founding the School.

His (Mr. Bethune's) unexpected and lamented death in 1851 seemed likely to be fatal to the benevolent and novel undertaking in which he had engaged. Unwilling that any chance of success in so desirable an object should be lost, I adopted and have myself supported the school from the time of Mr. Bethune's death until now (1856).

There were no Bethunes in Bombay and Madras where the work of pioneering female education was done by Christian Missions. The first attempt to establish an Indian Girls' school in Madras was made in 1821, under the auspices of the Chnrroh Missionary Society. Most, if not all, of the girls' schools started up to 1850 belonged to Christian Missions. In Bombay, the American Missions Society had the credit of introducing female education, the first girls' school in this Presidency having been opened by them in 1824. The Church Missionary Society and the Free Church were next in the field. The movement however caught on. In 1851 there were two girls' schools in Poona, lodged in two small houses. The Hon. Mr. Warden who visited the school that year, described his experience in the following terms :

The School-mistress, the wife of a gardener, who educated her in order that she might be the means of elevating her country women from their state of miserable ignorance, drew her saree over her face, and was with difficulty persuaded to examine a class in my presence, and a band of young matrons, who had formed themselves into a normal class, refused to see me on any terms.

In about three years a great change had taken place. In 1854, the same Mr. Warden "assembled in the court yard of the Poona College, in the presence of the Governor, the Bishop, and a host of others, a collection of more than a hundred girls, who were publicly examined, and we heard stories of one girl having read herself blind and of another who had died from the effects of study." In that year, Mr. Warden records that there were at the Presidency eight girls' schools, three Marathi, one Gujarati and four Parsi, the total number of girls being 500. They had no official return of the girls' schools in the mofussil. They were principally at Poona and Ahmedabad, and Mr. Warden estimated them roughly at 500 more, thus giving one girl for every 16 boys who were being educated. "So effectively is the leaven spreading," he noted, "that although we might appropriate part of our new grant to girls' schools the general feeling at the Board seems to be that we should leave well alone." The tradition has been handed down since then in this Presidency of Government doing as little as possible for the education of girls. It is interesting to note that there was a member of Lord Dalhousie's Council who opposed the Governor-General's proposal to issue instructions to district officers to encourage female education. He was alone in his opposition and the Governor-General scoffed at him in a private letter for an old fogey.

Major-General Sir J. A. Littler took up the position that the work of the district officials was to maintain peace and order. "Magistrates and other Judicial authorities are at all times prepared to do their duty, and protect those who may make known their grievances or demand their assistance." He regarded it as dereliction of the principle of neutrality to which the Government, he had always understood, was pledged in like cases, to encourage female education. Ill-disposed natives might consider it a step towards proselytism. "Individually I wish him (Mr. Bethune) every success, but having always been of opinion that Government should not interfere in such cases, I have deemed it incumbent upon me to record my sentiments accordingly". One cannot but feel a sneaking admiration for this ancient exponent of bureaucratic bigotry, for his courage in standing up single-handed to a powerful Governor-General like Dalhousie, when all his colleagues joined in pouring encomiums on the policy of the great pro-consul!

LONDON LETTER.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, August 17, 1922.

THE MEDICAL CONGRESS AND ALCOHOL.

The Medical Congress recently held at Glasgow gave much of its time to the discussion of the influence of alcohol on the human organism, and though the closing resolution, which was carried unanimously, showed an open mind on the subject, nevertheless the bulk of opinion as evidenced by the speakers was that alcohol was not a food, that it did not repair, nourish, or renew wasted tissue, but did apparently give some energy in the same way as the cup of tea or coffee may do. A great deal was made of the medical evidence which has been gathered together over a long period, that children of drinking parents are seriously handicapped through a bad inheritance and further, that the waste in child life, and infant mortality, as the result of alcohol-taking parents could not be over emphasised. One big employer of labour, speaking at the Congress, said that the change in opinion of the value of alcohol during the last few years had been very great. A few years ago, he said the man who went without his beer for two days was looked upon as a wonder, it being firmly believed that a working man needed beer to keep himself fit. To-day, however, the question asked by employer and employee alike was, can I take alcohol and retain my efficiency, and the answer given by many investigators into the question was that alcohol reduced efficiency in a marked degree.

THE IRISH REBELLION.

The Irish rebellion seems well on the road to an end. The capture of Cork by the Nationalist army marks the closing chapters of one of the most painful episodes in the history of Ireland, for Cork was the base of the Irregulars and therefore essential to the for any protracted resistance. With the closing of the civil war, the commencement of the work of the new Government was to begin. Irish Labour had threaten to resign its seats if the Provisional Parliament was not called for August 20th, and all eyes turned to Mr. Arthur Griffiths as the big essential figure who could bring into being the new order in parliamentary life. Then came the news of his sudden death, and Ireland received one of its biggest shocks. It was known he was not well, that he had been rather ill, but no one thought his end was near. That Mr. Griffiths was a great man, a born leader, one who combined idealism with practical ability, all classes of men unite in saying. The British Press has been unanimous in deploring this loss not only to Ireland, but to the British Isles of one of its great men. It is said he had few illusions about his own country or countrymen, but he worked for a future that was to him real and possible. He saw not only the goal, but the road with its many obstacles, that Ireland had to tread and overcome. He did not think the new state could be born in a day and was content to travel and lead others along the road to the promised land, even though he himself might never hope to enter it.

POPLAR AGAIN!

How one evil begets another is amply shown by that much-advertised borough of Poplar. The Poplar Board of Guardians, as a great part of the world knows, considered that every person living within its province was entitled to support either through earning a living wage or receiving a bonus sufficient for maintenance. To get sufficient money, however, to maintain the poor of Poplar, meant amongst other things raising very heavy taxes, and this is today reacting upon Poplar's financial resources to the detriment of Poplar itself, and the further swelling of the unemployed of that borough. Last week it has been announced that owing to the exorbitant taxes, at least six big firms are either closing down or moving their whole business to country districts, where, their working expenses being less, there is a possibility of carrying on a business, without incurring a loss in so doing. Many more thousands of workers by the action of these firms will thus be thrown out of employment, and have to rely upon the already over-burdened tax-payers for support. There seems nothing in front of Poplar but bankruptcy, unless drastic measures are taken by the borough, taxes are reduced, and enterprising men can be encouraged not only to continue to keep their business firms going, but the best men be induced to open up new concerns in a district where labour is so plentiful.

THE ECONOMIC OUTLOOK.

The fear of the winter is already haunting the masses of working class people. The knowledge that the lessening of unemployment during the few so-called summer months, is but a temporary improvement, destroys all sense of security in life and gives a restlessness and irritation to all concerned. Two committees are sitting to consider measures for dealing with unemployment during the coming cold weather. That conditions will not be quite as terrible as they were last year is probable, but with over a million of workers on the unemployed list, and some trades without any hope of a revival for years to come, the outlook is still very serious. The events happening on the continent will also adversely affect the hopes of better times coming here. Mr. Clynes, president of the National Federation of General Workers, in addressing a Labour Party meeting, dealt with the European economic situation as affected by the failure of the Allied Conference in London. The collapse of the Conference, he recognised as a lamentable thing, and would, he said, have serious effects upon the workers of Europe. That the collapse of the Allied Conference is lamentable is acknowledged by all parties; it is the most serious European happening since the armistice. Possibly we are not overwhelmed by it, because the attitude of France through all the conferences that have taken place, has not led us to think that aught but failure, or at best an unsatisfactory compromise would be arrived at. British public feeling here seems opposed to France's attitude towards Germany, for the making bankrupt of that country will neither help France nor us.

INDIANS IN EAST AFRICA.

News from Kenya and Uganda is not unfavourable. The alarm of the local Indian community at the speeches and statements of Mr. Winston Churchill and Major Wood is natural, but not altogether justified if the information that I have received from official sources is, as I believe it is, correct. The Kampala segregation scheme, in any case, is likely soon to be withdrawn, and nothing in the nature of a settlement of outstanding Kenya questions is likely until the end of the vacation and Mr. Churchill's return. The retirement, at his instance, of the Governor, Sir Edward Northey, is to be welcomed, and his successor, Sir Robert Coryndon, the Governor of Uganda, is a man of a bigger mould altogether. Sir Edward Northey has been a failure for the last three years, and his anti-Indian bias is notorious.

INTERNATIONAL MORAL EDUCATION CONGRESS.

OBJECT:—To enlist the active co-operation of all, irrespective of race, nation and creed, in promoting the work of Moral Education.

BASIS:—The Congress does not advocate the views of any society or party, but affords to all who are interested in Moral Education, whatever their religious or ethical conviction, nationality and point of view, an equal opportunity of expressing their opinions and comparing them with those of others.

At the City of Geneva, in Switzerland, from 28th July to 1st August, 1922, the third International Moral Education Congress was held in the principal hall of the University. About 500 persons had been enrolled as members, and they belonged to about 30 different countries, including China, Japan, India, Egypt and Turkey. At the opening session, an address was delivered by the Chairman of the Executive Council, the Rt. Hon. Sir Frederick Pollock, a philosophic lawyer who is familiar with India and its literature, and who has written an important work on the philosophy of Spinoza. Another address on the opening day was given by Professor F. W. Foerster, who, in 1914, opposed the German war policy, though he is himself a German by birth and in ideas.

The two chief subjects of discussion were :—

I.—The International Motive, with special reference to the Teaching of History.

II.—The Motive of Service.

The first of these excited most attention, and were contributed by Indian, Polish, German, Spanish, Japanese, and English writers. From the paper sent by Mr. Abdullah Yusuf Ali, on History Teaching in India, the following may be quoted :—

At the time of Akbar, it became the fashion to translate the Vedas, and to draw the Hindus into closer and closer touch and Unity with the Moslem system. This movement, it is true, received a set-back in the declining days of the Moghal Empire; and it was almost completely lost sight of in the early days of the British rule. The revival of Anglo-Moslem unity now stands on a political and therefore narrow basis, which will probably not permeate the inner thoughts of the people. The recent controversy, as between Maulana Hasrat Mohani and his school and Mr. Gandhi and his school may appear to shatter the ideal of Hindu-Moslem unity; but it only shatters a false ideal, based on a shallow and negative foundation. The real Hindu-Moslem unity, based on a mutual study by each side of the history, thought, and institutions of the other, is still to be developed. It will be one of the principal objects to be pursued in moulding the methods of teaching and of study of history in India.

I may also mention that a very interesting meeting of the Congress was held at the Secretariat of the League of Nations, and was welcomed by Dr. Inazo Nitobe, the Japanese Under-Secretary General of the League. I was one of the speakers myself, and I said that the European teacher of history should never forget Asia. Another speaker on the same occasion was Mr. D. N. Banerjee.

The Congress decided,—

1. To pursue the study of History Teaching and present the results to the next Congress, in 1926.

2. To establish a Bureau, with library, etc., at Hague in Holland; and Mr. S. L. Veenstra will be pleased to receive gifts of Indian books dealing with education, history, etc.. His address is 196, Loanvan N. O. Indie, Hague, Holland.

3. To form a Permanent Association of Educationists all over the world, to help in creating a universal conscience of mankind. A number of Indians already belong, among the latest adhesions being Professor Radhakrishna of Calcutta University.

THE PRAYER OF A SOCIAL REFORMER.

How shall men stablish their rights?
How shall they combat the wrongs, black as night,
That crush down their lives in despair?
How shall they win, for the future,
That fuller and ampler life,
That radiant freedom, that joy,
Which now so sorely they lack?
How shall the Kingdom be built
Where none is oppressed or despised,
Where all are brothers, and equal, and free?
I know not, Master:
This only I know,
I must follow Thy way, by Thy grace:
For over the passions and plottings of men,
As swiftly the centuries glide,
There looms for me, silent, compelling, Thy Cross.
All I know is Thy generous love,
Which recked not of insult and wrong to itself,
Nor of shame and despair:
Which forgave, and trusted, and toiled, to the dark bitter end
In humility, poverty, pain:
Which strove for the poor and the slave,
Forgetting itself:
Which sought not its own,
Neither justice, nor freedom, nor rights:
But laboured and died,
And, dying, forgave all the blackness of wrong it had borne.
Yet so dying built by its death
A Kingdom immortal of freedom and hope,
Wherein I, even I, may abide.
Teach me to work for that Kingdom,
O Master,
To work for its amplest coming on earth,
To tell men Thy goodness, Thy Love:
So that none may be ground in injustice and shame,
But all men be brothers, and equal, and free,
Because they know Thee,
Their Father, their Saviour, their King,
Because they rejoice in Thy will and Thy way,
Which is freedom and friendship and hope.

WHITHER ARE WE DRIFTING?

(By T. M.)

Whither are we drifting, my countrymen? This is the query that vexes every thinking active head in this ancient land to-day. On every side it is visible that we are caught in a titanic struggle and may be stranded on the very brink of civil strife. Men's minds are not in a peaceful static mood as they used to be. New ideas and fresh ideals have crept into the minds and hearts of some, but at the same time there are yet others who are totally blind or uncomprehendingly opposed to the New Order and are trying to hold fast to the Old with all their might and main. Under such circumstances perhaps a clash is inevitable and in its train must follow all the suffering, the dislocation, the waste of energy and loss of effort that is in its very nature inseparable from it. This is nothing new or surprising, and I have no desire to waste the readers' valuable time in vainly philosophising over it. My aims are severely practical. The Congress Executive have appointed—in imitation of the much-abused and denounced system of the Bureaucracy—a commission to enquire into the fitness of the various local centres and of the country in general for undertaking Civil Disobedience at an early date. This body is already touring and gathering evidence in camera, and will soon be writing their report and tendering their final advice to the country. Nobody can say just now what their advice would be, for that would amount to accusing the members of the commission of being biased in a particular direction. I have no desire to cast any doubt on their impartiality, and while I do believe the personnel of the commission was capable of improvement, I think even as it is it may be trusted to sift and weigh the evidence before it carefully and impartially. But much will depend upon the evidence tendered, and there are reasons to fear that the opinion opposed to the resort to Civil Disobedience at an early date will not receive adequate representation before the Commission. It may be useful therefore to claim some public attention to a sane view of the situation at this juncture.

That thorough organisation alone can justify our taking up Civil Disobedience with any human chance of keeping it non-violent and at the same time crowning it with success is, I should think, a truism. I shall not waste time in arguing this proposition as I believe no sensible man will dispute its obvious truth, and if there be any such as think otherwise I can only pity their foolhardy optimism and want of capacity to learn even from repeated experience. Taking this truism for a guide, then the only question for the Civil Disobedience Commission to answer is whether in their opinion the various local Congress committees are so thoroughly organised as to justify embarking on civil disobedience, without the risk of heralding a chaos in most parts of the country, in the near future. It is not enough for these committees to say that they have collected a few thousand rupees for the Tilak Swaraj Fund and picketed foreign cloth shops and arranged a few lectures on temperance or untouchability. All this is not organisation. It is merely hap-hazard work and more often than not the achievement of one or two individuals, who being removed from their places the work is left to look after itself. What organised efforts, one should like to know, have been made for instance, to remove the curse of untouchability from this fair land? To any pair of critical eyes, I mean of friendly criticism and not envious looks, the work so far achieved by the D. C. C. is very fragmentary, almost negligible. This is what our Liberal countrymen insist on calling the failure of Non-co-operation and what I should prefer to call its want of good efficient organisation. That the Congress is better organised to-day than ever before in its history is not enough; it should be perfectly organised if it means to combat successfully with the 'most determined people on earth'. It is doubly necessary for the Congress to organise perfectly because it has under the prophetic guidance of Mahatma Gandhi resolved not to allow room for violence in its programme. The progress hitherto made with the schemes for the removal of untouchability and foreign cloth are patent evidence to any unprejudiced mind of our want of sufficient organisation. The details about these and other parts of the Bardoli programme will doubtless be placed before the Congress Commission and I am sure it will be an eye-opener to many. The success so far achieved is not even one per cent of what should be considered the minimum requisite for embarking on civil disobedience. Under the circumstances, it will be noticed that embarking hastily on civil disobedience will clearly be an unwise policy and plainly speaking playing into the hands of the enemy by giving battle before the ranks are fully drilled and arranged. Looking forward into probable developments, if civil disobedience is adopted in the near future, it will mean a clear clash with the authorities, strong and crushing repression by the Government, and complete alienation of feelings with that group of our own kith and kin who do not yet see eye to eye with the Congress. Blame the Moderate as you will, he will not turn to your side and even if he did, he will not be of any use to you. He can at best resign his place in the government and be a helpless witness of events. He cannot co-operate with you and would lose any influence he possessed with the government the moment he showed any sympathy for you. It will doubtless lead to wholesale arrests on an unprecedented scale, and confiscation of property could not be avoided. It may probably lead to large military demonstrations and loss of life and cause unthinkable suffering to thousands of innocent citizens. Some will perhaps be inclined to say that if it comes to that, it will be the government to blame and not the Congress. But this is a gross fallacy. The Congress will be equally to blame for it, not by commission perhaps, but certainly by omission to organise every nook and corner of the country and getting a firm hold on the sympathies of all those groups of our countrymen who, though they may not be prepared to suffer with us, should at least be convinced that we are suffering not from any mercenary or revengeful motives but purely because we believe rightly or wrongly that this is the only way left to us by a cruel Destiny to serve our motherland. In such an atmosphere alone is success practicable for us. And then it is not the government that is preaching the Gospel of Success through non-violence but the Congress, and it is up to the latter to demonstrate the utility and practicability of its evangel.

Going to jail and putting up with temporary discomforts are no tests of the capacity for good government, however much they may mark out an idealistic nature or an ascetic character. Therefore no one should attempt to argue that because so many persons have readily gone to jail the Bureaucracy should immediately be convinced of our fitness for Swaraj and grant it by a stroke of the pen. Let us not forget that we have so far shown only our enthusiasm for Swaraj and not any additional capacity for it beyond what we possessed a few years ago. In all items of the constructive programme we have not shown, to be quite frank and candid, much ability for good organised administration. And the Bureaucracy is not blind to this. If the object of embarking on civil disobedience in the immediate future be, as it appears in the view of several leaders, only to answer the repressive policy of the government and perhaps to overawe them by your capacity to suffer, then I shall venture to say it is sheer madness to expect it. For if anything is true it is this that the British are a very determined people and the Englishman, though he would tamely submit to the logic of accomplished facts, would under no circumstances be bluffed. And we shall forget this trait of his character at our peril. Let us ponder well and be wise in time and concentrate at once on a perfect organisation for the Nation through the Congress, abandoning all thought of offering civil disobedience for some time to come.

FIRST DIVISION PRISONERS.

The special treatment meted out to first class misdemeanants in English Prisons has been frequently referred to recent in connection with the non-official demand for Indian political prisoners. What are the special privileges allowed to the prisoners in the "First Division"? In a book just published, "English Prisons to-day, being the Report of the Prison System Enquiry Committee," edited by Messrs. Stephen Hobhouse and A. Fenner Brockway, these privileges are summarised as follows:—

Like the man in the second division, he is supposed to be kept apart from other classes of prisoners. Beyond this, he has, or may have if he has the means to pay for them, peculiar advantages which are shared by no other class of inmates, except the unconvicted prisoner awaiting trial. (The rules for "trial prisoners" are to a very large extent verbally identical with the first division rules; but, as indicated elsewhere, most trial prisoners, owing to their poverty, are unable to secure these "privileges"). Thus he may wear his own clothing. He may have "such books, newspapers or other means of occupation as are not considered to be objectionable" by the authorities. He may be visited once a fortnight for a quarter of an hour by three friends and may write and receive one letter in each fortnight; for special reasons the visiting committee may increase this allowance of letters and visits. Further, he is not required to work and "may be permitted, if practicable, to follow his trade or profession," receiving the whole of his earnings, if he is not maintained at the expense of the prison. If he has the requisite means, he may arrange to have his own food supplied and even have a limited quantity of beer or wine, "subject to such restrictions as may be necessary to prevent luxury or waste." Finally, the visiting Committee may, "if having regard to his ordinary habits and conditions of life, they think such special provision should be made," permit the first division prisoner (1) to occupy at the rent of 2-6 weekly a superior and specially furnished room or cell, (2) to have the use of private furniture and utensils suitable to his ordinary habits, and (3) to have at the charge of 6 d. a day, the help of another prisoner, "relieving him from the performance of any unaccustomed tasks," such as e. g., the cleaning of his cell and the washing up of his crockery."

Though the regulations are silent on these points, first division prisoners are apparently sometimes allowed an hour's open air exercise in the after-noon, as well as in the morning, with the opportunities of unrestricted conversation with some other first division inmate of the same sex, should any be found in the prison—a rare occurrence. In most cases, too, a visiting minister of the prisoner's own denomination is allowed free access to him for at least an hour each week.

The first division offenders are the aristocrats of the prison world. The rules affecting them have a class favour about them, and are evidently intended to apply to prisoners of some means, who are in the habit of keeping servants. A poor man, who had no trade by which he could earn in prison, would hardly be better off in the first than in the second division, except that he could have his own clothes and books, and enjoy a visit and letter fortnightly instead of monthly. But almost all first division prisoners have doubtless the means to take full advantage of the privileges allowed. They have, however, to forego the use of tobacco and, unless they can show that "writing" of some kind is their profession, they have no opportunity of recording their thoughts on paper beyond their fortnightly letters.

These may be serious deprivations, and, in any case, the essence of the punishment of first division prisoners is in the denial of almost all freedom to communicate with their fellows and in their perpetual confinement within their cells or other parts of the prison precincts. Apart from these severe restrictions upon their movements, first division prisoners are not subject to anything in the nature of "discipline" or "treatment." They have merely to undergo a rather right form of internment, the severity of which doubtless varies very much in accordance with the dispositions of the officers who administer it.

The object of this internment is presumably either to deter such offenders, and others also, from repetition of their offences, or else to isolate them temporarily from society, inasmuch as their liberty of action is regarded by the Government as being dangerous to itself and to the community.

In addition to the above, the orders direct that medical examination and the searching should not be made in the presence of another prisoner; but this rule has not always been followed, according to our witness. Offenders of the first division, of the second division if not previously convicted, and offenders sentenced to less than a month, are exempted from the examination for "distinctive marks." No attempt is made to encourage decency in personal appearance. The use of razors is forbidden, except in the case of those awaiting trial and of offenders of the First Division.

"SHAH JEHAN"

THE EDITOR, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I am interested in Indian plays and Indian music for our College girls; and am trying to find out where such can be bought. I have heard of a play called "Shah Jehan" by D. L. Roy, but I don't know where to get it. I wonder if you or any among your readers can tell us where we can get Indian plays and Indian music.

Yours truly,

AN ANCIENT UNIVERSITY CONVOCATION

THE EDITOR The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

With reference to your suggestive Editorial Note in the Indian Social Reformer dated the 20th instant, on An Ancient and Modern University Convocation it will interest you to know that the passage in the Taittiriya Upanishad mentioned by you is a part of the Convocation charge to graduates at the Benares Hindu University. At the Annual Convocation of the Benares Hindu University, the Vice-Chancellor repeats the solemn exhortation to the graduates assembled before him to receive the respective degrees in the same measure as the Ancient Kulapati did to those leaving the Asrama.

Hindu University,
28rd August, 1922.

Yours faithfully,
P. SEBHADIN.

SACRAMENT OR SALE?

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I am sorry you should have been so harsh with the young prospective bridegroom whose letter you partly published under the bold title 'Sacrament or Sale?' You thought, perhaps your readers will lay the motion to their souls and echo your feeling of puritanical horror with real or even pretended disgust; but the fact is many will agree with me that you have done injustice to the young aspirant, by laying a little too much emphasis on the monetary side of the matter. For, however sacred and sacramental marriage may be in theory, in practice 90 per cent of matrimonial alliances are at least marriages de convenance, as the expression goes, if not purely commercial transactions. Where is the father who does not move heaven and earth to secure for his daughter, by hook or by crook, the best son-in-law in the market, the greatest from the point of wealth, social position etc.? Poor parents who cruelly sell their daughters do not do so because no person is ready to marry their girls without hunda or vardakshina, but because they are needy or avaricious; and those that buy are generally unregenerate old men with one foot in the grave. While those parents who have enough try their utmost and willingly offer any amount of bribe to secure the best man in the marriage market. The young men who accept the offers only supply a demand and their qualms of conscience are set at rest by elders solicitous about their welfare, that the father-in-law was only giving them a start in life and that it was no bribe or hunda and so on. So that the parents of girls seldom sacrifice their girls to the 'damnable egoism' which, you say, is characteristic of the poor hostel-bred college student. That would not have been very bad.

While actual sales are tolerated in Kashiwar and S. India, neither the boldest reformer nor the most foolish conservative is so disinterested, and it is foolish to expect him to be so, as not to secure for his daughter, the comforts and luxuries which wealth and social position can give, why, the girls themselves where they are educated and have or supposed to have a voice in the matter, would rather go in for an I. C. S. man than a poor graduate like your correspondent, for example. So that on the side of the girl, where there is so much scrambling for other desirable things of life, it is quite natural that some selfish bridegrooms take a similar view of the matter. 'Perchance there may be a rich Vakil or even a modest Head-clerk who has a girl of not very enviable features, of not very fair complexion, perchance even of somewhat indifferent looks' thinks he; and if a young man ready to sacrifice good looks and aesthetic tastes is available, I do not think the father would be unwilling to take off the girl from his hands by just fitting the son-in-law for a foreign voyage, or say giving him a start in life either through influence or money. I mean—not that I have such a daughter—but that one witnesses such instances by the score. But surely no rich man who has a girl that can pass for something in the marriage market will sacrifice his worldly wisdom to do a philanthropic act of lifting up a young man. I wonder whether you think such a tendency exists among parents of girls unless the latter are very defective or ugly. If it does not, as I believe it does not, the foolish dream of the young man is very harmless and did not deserve so severe a condemnation. And if he sacrifices self-respect, is ready to have a monster for wife, and agrees to be indebted to her for a home, his own lot in conjugal life will be all the more pitiable, as it has been with similar people. Because there is such a lot of exaggeration in the popular sentimental twaddle about the oppression of women by men that if it were possible to take a census of it, there will at least be as many oppressed husbands as wives. So that I consider the young man is not after all so unregenerate a materialist as most fathers of girls who selfishly sacrifice other considerations of age and fitness merely for wealth. I do not think the number of foolish parents who value a University degree more than other things or sacrifice other material considerations for the glamour of academic trappings and letters is not so vast as to render you apprehensive about the future of girls.

Of course, an ideal marriage in the present state of society in India at any rate, is inconceivable, and will perhaps long remain an ideal; hence the somewhat selfish idea of well setting in life expressed so frankly by the latter may be pardoned. I do not think that this tendency is in any way peculiar to the youth of this country, nor that it is directly traceable to the exotic system of education. Only the state of our society which does not give scope before marriage for the formation of affections between parties, and our custom which excludes the conscious exercise of choice by them, are responsible for all evils. In other countries the desire for self-advancement by marriage is neutralised by the play of formed affections, while here there is no such influence. Hence the frank expression by your correspondent attained a magnified importance in your columns; and hence the danger of a few unfortunate and cruelly ill-gifted girls being sacrificed at the altar of this 'damnable egoism'. Even there you can not say that all the unhappiness will be for the girl and not for the other party.

As for your being solicited to help in the matter, for aught I can imagine, it must be a mischievous joke perpetrated on you by the collegian and may have a pointed reference to matrimonial advertisements that you publish. I think you could profitably have charged him the usual charges and inserted an advertisement with the fantastic conditions and your witty comments.

I am,
B. R. R.

[We can hardly believe that our correspondent writes seriously. There is a wide difference between parents from prudential motives desiring to be assured of a comfortable home for daughters with their husbands, and a man putting up to auction his masculinity and "B.A. Honours" for the purpose of getting a "Western education" or a partnership in a prosperous firm. We remember to have heard of at least one case where a matrimonial adventurer utilised the money he obtained from the parents of his Indian bride, to set up a second establishment in a Western country with a Western bride. The Indian parent is the victim of a social custom which unscrupulous graduates like our "B.A. Honours" correspondent exploit for their utterly selfish ends without a thought of the girls' happiness. Many parents, to our knowledge, would gladly keep their girls unmarried but for inexorable custom and "the talk of neighbours" which non-compliance engenders. The letter that we published is the grossest that we have had, but we have had several others conceived in the like spirit. We were not, therefore, generalising from a single instance. Our correspondent seems to think that young men like our correspondent are the victims, the oppressors being the girls whom they marry out of regard for their fathers' money. There would be some poetic justice in this, but unfortunately in the generality of cases that has come to our notice, maltreatment of the girls was systematically practised as a means of blackmailing the unhappy parents. Even a worm will turn, however, and even Hindu parents have at last begun to refuse to send their daughters to their husbands, bidding the latter do their worst, either by going to court or by marrying a second or third wife! The Seshagiri Act enabling parents to bequeath property to their daughters' children over the heads of their sons-in-law, was evidently necessitated by the utter demoralisation of some of our "Honours" graduates'. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to those persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicine. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires. It is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. NOTES.

The Turkish Triumph. While Lord Reading was assuring the Indian Legislature that India's views would be carefully considered in the revision of the Treaty of Sevres, the Kemalists had crumpled up the Greek Forces in Asia Minor, and the latest news is that Greece has offered immediately to evacuate Asia Minor as the price of an Armistice. It was not more than a month ago that Mr. Lloyd George told the House of Commons that the Greeks, if left to themselves, could settle the Turks in a very short time! The invitation of the British Government to the French and Italian Governments to intervene between the belligerents, has not been acceded to by the two latter, and the British Cabinet too has, therefore, wisely decided that it did not appear of any use for the interested Powers to place their good offices at the disposal of the belligerents.

Indian Press and Princes. It has been announced that a Bill will be introduced in the Indian Legislative Assembly to protect Indian princes against attacks in the Indian press. The Act of 1910, now repealed, for the first time extended to these Princes the same protection as to the Government in British India. The Viceroy argues that though British India has decided to dispense with protection, the Princes are entitled to have it. There is here no question of Treaty rights, as has been sometimes suggested. We hope that the Legislative Assembly will show circumspection in dealing with the measure. If it has proof that the important Princes do really require and desire any protection, it should afford such protection under proper safeguards. If, as we believe, they do not need and do not want any protection, the Assembly should throw out the Bill. Our leading Princes have behaved handsomely in the matter of Indian constitutional reforms, and the Assembly should mark its sense of their services by leaving no loophole of misunderstanding between the States and British Indian public life.

The Guru-ka-Bagh Situation: The Leader writes: "The Guru-ka-Bagh situation shows no signs of improvement. A trial of strength is going on there between soul force and brute force. Passive resistance, if well organised, is always most difficult to deal with. The Punjab authorities have found the Akalis a hard nut to crack. Elated with religious fervour the Akalis are showing a supreme spirit of endurance and self-control which cannot but place in the wrong in the popular eye the authorities engaged in vindicating the supremacy of the law. The greater the force used to disperse the jathas the more will be the amount of sympathy felt for the non-violent resisters and the greater will be the revulsion of feeling against the Government which sanction the use of force. It appears from the various non-official versions published in the press of the manner in which the police are dispersing the jathas that the Akalis have been in some instances mercilessly beaten, although they remained perfectly non-violent."

A New India Criticism: New India writes: "The bad examples set by Lord Lytton has been followed by the Governor of the Central Provinces. All resolutions relating to the Premier's speech, which were proposed to be moved in the Central Provinces Legislative Council, have been disallowed, on the ground that the matter is not primarily the concern of the Local Government. We are afraid that the Governors of Provinces are using their powers in an arbitrary manner in the present instance. The popular Legislatures in the Provinces have every right to discuss such a speech as that made by the Premier, and we fear the action of the Governors amounts to needless encroachment on the rights of the Legislatures." The Bombay Government has also followed the example of Bengal and the Central Provinces. It is a curious doctrine that a thing which affects the whole country, does not affect any part of it!

A Grave Social Danger. We are glad that the publication of the letter of a B. A. (Hons.) matrimonial aspirant in a recent issue of the Reformer and our comments thereon, have attracted wide attention. We trust that the discussion will lead to some practical result, and we would particularly commend the suggestion thrown out by Mr. S. Sadanand that a league of young men should be instituted consisting of those who realise and are ready practically to counteract this evil tendency.

Sir Ali Imam's Resignation. The news published last week that Syed Sir Ali Imam, the President of the Council of Ministers of His Exalted Highness the Nizam, had resigned and left Hyderabad, was certainly sensational in its suddenness. None, however, who are acquainted with the course of ministerial careers in Indian States, will be surprised by the suddenness. Few, moreover, will credit the reason given by the Associated Press of a personal difference with another Minister as a sufficient one to explain the resignation.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

THE POLITICAL OUTLOOK.

The speech with which His Excellency the Viceroy opened the Simla session of the Legislative Assembly and the Council of State is the speech of an eminent lawyer but hardly that of a statesman. Lord Reading's brief was to the effect that everything is progressing in the most satisfactory manner possible under his inspired guidance, and the only danger to the country lay in the Non-Co-operation movement. It has been officially affirmed that this movement had collapsed with the imprisonment of Mahatma Gandhi, and it is somewhat surprising to see the Viceroy vehemently urging the members of the Indian Legislature to throw all their strength in killing the serpent whose funeral was announced in the House of Commons by Lord Winterton in a famous speech. "You hear around you," said His Excellency, "propaganda against the reforms; your rights are assailed by misrepresentations; your privileges and prospects are attacked; your achievements are belittled; your sins (or sons?) are vilified." This is the language of the hustings and, as a fact, Lord Reading added that the next election was within sight and that those whom he addressed should not be content with defensive tactics, but "with the fullest co-operation of Government and of the Civil Services," must lead and guide the country "upwards and onwards." There was never a time within our recollection when the Civil Service was less criticised in the Indian Press, and we find it, therefore, somewhat difficult to find justification for the Viceroy's allegation that these Services have, "in the face of much misrepresentation and hostility, freely co-operated to work the Reformed constitution and continue to labour for its success." The memorial or representation recently addressed to the Secretary of State by the English members of the Indian Civil Service in the Central Provinces, is perhaps to be understood as the most conclusive confirmation of Lord Reading's tribute to the co-operation of the Services. Ministers and Members of the Executive Councils are in a better position than the Viceroy to appraise the measure of the support they receive from the Services, and such revelations as we have had from them do not wholly bear out the viceregal panegyric.

As regards the Viceroy's renewed endeavour to make out that the Prime Minister's speech was not inconsistent with the Reform Act, we can understand it only as a strong suggestion to Indian Liberals that they should revise their beliefs as to the implications of that Act. This only makes matters worse. An indiscreet speech even by a Prime Minister may be set right by another speech. But, when the Act itself is sought to be shown as sanctioning the "steel frame" and perpetual trust arguments of the Premier, the situation becomes far more serious. Has the country been sitting in a fool's paradise all these months? Mr. Kale's motion in the Council of State expressing the apprehensions created in the country by Mr. Lloyd George's speech was thrown out without a division, but this was to have been expected. Notwithstanding the depressing result in the Upper Chamber, the Legislative Assembly the very next day adopted, in the face of strong Government opposition, a stronger resolution by a substantial majority. In both Houses, Sir William Vincent, the Home Member, was the principal spokesman for Government, and he adopted in both places a tone which was over-bearing and offensive. His remarks about Mr. Pheroze Sethna in the Council of State were disingenuous and insolent. If, as has been reported, he used the phrase "biting the hand that fed them" of the members in the Legislative Assembly who condemned the Prime Minister's speech, he ill repaid the courtesy and consideration which his Indian colleagues have extended to him notwithstanding his anti-Indian antecedents going back to the Rowlatt Act. In his speech in the Council of State, the Home Member improved upon the attack of the Viceroy on Non-Co-operationists, and indulged in a personal and spiteful attack upon a man who was now in jail and who could not answer. He maintained that Mr. Lloyd George's speech had been satisfactorily explained by the Viceroy and the Services were the best friends of the Reforms. He proceeded to say: "I said repeatedly and I say it again that the greatest enemy of political progress, industrial progress, and, in fact, of every progress in this country, is Mr. Gandhi." And there was not a man in the Council of State to protest that the Home Member was not showing political decency in thus hitting a man who was shut up safely in prison for six long years!

The political situation to-day is one of deadlock. But happily there are gleams of hope that this will not last long. We have authentic information that Mr. C. R. Das, the President-elect of the next National Congress, favours the entry of Congressmen into the Legislative Councils at the next elections. In the plea for united action, which we print to-day and in Dr. Annie Besant's speeches explaining the scheme therein formulated, an important point is made which really reduces the difference between the Congress and the Home Rule party to a mere matter of words. It is that the constitution which the country will accept must be one framed by the leaders of the Indian people. The preamble to the Reforms Act has been the stumbling-block in the way of all serious constitutional thinkers and Dr. Besant has, by insisting on India's right to settle her own constitution, removed it from the way of their co-operating with the Home Rule party. We have already called attention to a significant observation in her Bombay speech in which she virtually endorsed the Nagpur Congress creed, leaving the future of India an open question, though she personally like most Indians favours, if that can be secured consistently with the nation's self-respect, a place within the British Commonwealth of nations. If our information, which comes from an unimpeachable source, regarding Mr. Das's views as regards entry of Congress men in the Councils, is correct, there should be no insuperable difficulty in the way of their co-operating with the Convention which Dr. Besant is desirous of calling. The path would be made still easier, if it is agreed that the Convention should have for one of its principal ends the procuring of the release of political prisoners and of the removal of the disqualification for standing for the Councils of Congress leaders, like Mahatma Gandhi, Mr. Das, Pandit Motilal, Lala Lajpat Rai and others, owing to their having undergone sentences of imprisonment. Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas speaking in the Legislative Assembly on the resolution on the Prime Minister's speech called upon Non-Co-operators to enter the Councils. The Prime Minister's speech, with its politically immoral attempt to intimidate Indian electorates to return a particular type of members at the next election, is a challenge to all, Co-operators and Non-Co-operators, and we earnestly hope and trust that it will be answered in the only way in which it can be answered by a self-respecting people.

Mulshi Petha Compensation: A Press communique says: "In June of last year a special officer was appointed to select suitable land to be granted as compensation to cultivators whose fields were being acquired for the Nila-Mula Hydro-Electric works. Mr. Indolikar, the officer selected for this duty, had served for five years in the Mulshi Petha area and was familiar with the rice land that was to be acquired. The land finally selected by him is situated in the Dindori Taluka of Nasik District, about 150 miles from Mulshi Petha and after necessary improvements (which would be carried out by Government) would be in no way inferior to the lands that are to be submerged. Every effort has been made to induce the expropriated ryots to take up this land. A notice was issued in September 1921 and widely circulated in all the affected villages by the patils and talatis, pointing out that good rice land was available. The acquisition officers explained the position to all owners who came to them for compensation and offered to accompany them to Dindori area, and assist in the selection of the lands. It was also notified that Government would pay the expenses of the patils of the villages who went to see the land. Not a single villager from Mulshi Petha has visited Dindori. Not one has asked for compensation in land. All desire to take advantage of the liberal cash compensation that has been fixed. Government has therefore decided that no further steps with regard to the finding of suitable land for the cultivation of Mulshi Petha need be taken."

The Late Sir Vithaldas Thackersey. A public meeting to honour the memory of the late Sir Vithaldas Thackersey and to devise measures to perpetuate his name in a suitable manner, will be held on Tuesday the 12th instant at 6 p.m. in Sir Cowasji Jehangir Hall, Mayo Road, Bombay. The Honourable Sir Narayan Chandavarkar has kindly consented to preside.

Bombay Prostitution Committee's Report: All the spare copies of the supplement to the issue of the Indian Social Reformer of the 27th August, containing the Bombay Prostitution Committee's Report, having been sold out, we are sorry we are unable to supply any more copies of it.

NOTES FROM MADRAS.

(From Our Correspondent.)

SOCIALISM Vs. BOLSHEVISM.

That the Bolsheviki in their apostolic zeal to convert all the world to their socio-economic religion founded on the gospel according to St. Karl Marx, are devoting part of their precious time to preaching the true faith in India, we had known for a long time past. That some of their literature had by some surreptitious and almost ghostly means penetrated into our fair province, was also a matter of common knowledge. The Hindu stated recently that it was being favoured from time to time with Bolsheviki publications which it invariably places in that receptacle of all the rejected wit and wisdom of the race, the waste paper basket, which forms such an indispensable and invaluable adjunct to every editorial sanctum sanctorum. The Madras Legislative Council at its last Budget session sanctioned the appointment of a special Police officer to track and to trace out Bolsheviki influences in this part of India so that the wise old adage might be fulfilled and Bolshevism crushed in the bud before it assumed uncontrollable dimensions. This special officer has evidently not allowed the grass to grow under his wary feet, judging by two comparatively minor but highly significant incidents that recently took place here. One of these was the arrest of a man believed to be a native of Tinnevely, calling himself Neelakanta Brahmachari, and the other was a raid carried out by the Police in the house of Mr. M. Singaravelu Chetty, a man well-known in local Non-Co-operation circles and until lately President of the Madras District Congress Committee. The reason alleged for these Police actions were that they were in possession of Bolsheviki publications for the purpose of secretly distributing them broadcast. Arrested originally on this score, the former is now awaiting his trial before the Chief Presidency Magistrate for attempting to murder with a revolver the head constable who effected his capture.

But it must be said that the Police raid on Mr. Singaravelu Chetty's house created something like a sensation locally, for Mr. Chetty is, as I have stated already, a non-violent Non-Co-operator. In spite of the superficial comparison often instituted by shallow foreign observers between Mahatma Gandhi's Non-Co-operation movement and the Bolsheviki movement in Russia, we in India know that there can be no greater, more determined or more powerful foe of Bolshevism and Bolsheviki principles, social, economic, political or religious, than Mr. Gandhi and that there can be no better safeguard against the onrush of the stream of Bolshevism into this country than his non-violent Non-Co-operation movement—pace the furious fulminations against him in the "Vanguard of Indian Independence" published by Indian Bolsheviki in Berlin. It is, indeed, doubtful whether Mr. Gandhi, an upholder of the caste system and Varnashrama Dharma, has any intellectual or emotional sympathy left for even Fabian Socialism which, as the veriest tyro knows, is a far different ching from Leninian Bolshevism. Truth to tell it has been one of the biggest surprises of my life to find more than one Socialist in various parts of India giving their whole-hearted adherence to Mr. Gandhi's movement. Their devotion to Mr. Gandhi can be only explained in terms of the admiration and veneration they feel for his personality and character in the contemplation of whose lofty grandeur they have lost sight of or overlooked much that is rankly, nay, rabidly reactionary in his doctrines especially in the social and religious spheres of human life. Be that as it may, the fact remains that Mr. Singaravelu Chetty, who is supposed to have some socialist leanings, happens to be a non-violent Non-Co-operator and a devoted follower of Mahatma Gandhi and as such, he took care to point out to the Police at the time of the search, that all his actions had always been quite peaceful and above board. The search, needless to say, resulted in the discovery by the Police of nothing more incriminating than a letter written to the gentleman in question by a friend of his giving a bibliography of standard works on socialism, which the Police rightly thrust aside as useless for their purpose. Mr. Chetty is, therefore, still a free citizen.

This is, I believe, the first incident of the kind in India and should give all observers of current socio-political tendencies here as well as elsewhere some food for thought. While the new attitude of "seeing red" of officialdom and its proneness to hunt after a new kind of mare's nests is worthy of condemnation, it is idle to shut our eyes in ostrich-style to the existence of certain Bolshevik influences in our midst. The rapid growth of the Agrarian movement alongside of the Trade Union movement which has already attained gigantic proportions, is a portent and an omen—whether good or bad, events alone can show. These movements are undoubtedly signs of a new life, a new vigour, a newly-found health in the body politic but it behoves us to see that the germs of disease are not implanted in it which may yet reduce them to the putrefaction of Bolshevism. It is idle for any one to imagine that what is called "the genius of the race," the deeply-ingrained conservatism and the long-suffering patience of the Indian masses, is in itself an adequate safeguard against the evil, for were not the Russian masses equally conservative, equally long-suffering and patient? But let them beware who harbour any design of leading our people along the Russian path, for it can only lead us all to the Russian hell. The only remedy, the only adequate safe-guard against the danger of Bolshevism is, in my humble opinion, the timely growth of a healthy Socialism. This may sound like a daring paradox or a glaring contradiction in terms to those who cannot tell the difference between the two and who believe with Dean Inge and his dismal school of cynics that the one is only the extreme practical application of the other. My answer to all such critics is that Socialism is no more accountable for Bolshevism than Christianity was responsible for the Great War.

Let us be wise betimes. India is certainly not going to prove an exception to the experience of the whole modern world in this respect. With the advent of Swarajya—or even before its advent—a Socialist party is bound to emerge and take its legitimate place in the politics of all provinces in India as it has done in every other civilised country under the sun. The part of wisdom lies in assisting its growth and development along constitutional lines and not in confusing it with Bolshevism and seeking to prevent or to delay its rise Partington-wise.

TRADE UNIONS.

(By MR. S. H. JHABVALA.)

A combination of causes has started a few reflections in the mind of the present writer which, thinking as he does, will be of use to the general class of readers he has ventured to put them here.

The causes are firstly, a general interest evinced by both the Government and the people, secondly, an awakening among the labourers and thirdly, the adoption of more practical measures by the different parties concerned in the effort to do more tangible good to the labouring communities in Bombay. The Government has prepared certain legislation as well with the obvious intention of developing a healthy trend of Trade Unionism in India and directing the efforts of the masses on the right lines. Therefore, it is worth our while just to look into the actual state of affairs prevailing at present in Bombay. All those who must have read Mr. Findlay Shirras' address delivered some months ago before the members of the College of Commerce, must have felt a sense of appreciation for Government's endeavours in the direction of solution of a very grave industrial problem facing it. The establishment of the Labour Office in Bombay has its own advantages which cannot lightly be overlooked. The problems facing Government in matters pertaining to Labour are briefly noted as Registration of Unions; Workmen's Compensation Act; and the foundation of Conciliation Boards. The weight of Labour's opinion on the above questions is not likely to over-balance that of the opinion of the employers of labour as the latter may not still be said to have organized itself on right lines. What efforts have been made in this direction by way of founding the men's Unions may not still be said to have achieved the purpose in view in the absence of willing aid and support given by other related agencies. But now that the Government has moved it is likely to foster a spirit of good-will and amity between the employers and the labourers which is bound to go a great way in making it easy for Trade Unionism to grow on healthy lines. In the absence of certain useful legislation, the independence of certain Unions has grown so intolerable that their recognition by the employers has been quite difficult if not impossible and when that margin of tension is reached the Unions became feeble and impotent.

But I am not here solely to plead for Government interference and the maintenance of the rights of the employers. These two have inherent rights vested in them which they can exercise at any moment and with sufficient power ; but as I am a man of the workmen and also a believer in the potentialities of Unionism I am here to urge the claims of the labourers which under the existing system, have been greatly nullified. That there is scope for a workable machinery needs no proof and again there is no gainsaying the fact that a healthy growth of Unions established in our midst will go a great way in rightly solving the difficulties undoubtedly arising in the working of the machinery if left all to itself. A number of Trade Unions need to grow up just now and for that a number of well-meaning, selfless persons need to come forward. There is a class tyranny in our midst, and what great efforts are needed to end it will be experienced by those who desire to have an inkling into the labour conditions prevailing in our midst. Their dwellings are unfit for human habitation, no provision is made for their future well-being, stark ignorance envelops their present life and they know nothing of domestic or social happenings. There are millions like these in our own town alone. I appeal to the educated communities to think if we can tolerate such an unbearable state of affairs to continue in our midst. If a few were to come forward to form Unions and conduct them in the interest of the men there is much alleviation possible to be achieved which will lead us forward a step in the road to Self-Government. The men are anxious to form Unions provided they get leaders and helpers. They are desirous of having even paid service if some care to have it. But failure on the part of the educated classes to evince an interest in the well-being of the labouring masses has kept them lingering after the fulfilment of their righteous hopes. Again, those who are actually working need a certain amount of training which is possible to get in England. They are personally not able to go in for such training and Government will certainly be aiding Labour by volunteering to send young scholars on its own initiative to proceed to England in order to learn the science of Unionism as well as to gather some of the more useful Labour principles which are bound to be useful to the labourers in this country.

LIMITATIONS OF SOCIAL SERVICE.

A valued friend writes : In his address at the Ahmedabad session of the National Social Conference, the Editor of the Indian Social Reformer called pointed attention to the danger of regarding Social Service as a substitute for social reform. It is a sign of the times that protests regarding the limitations of Social Service are being made from different sides. In the Challenge, the Christian democratic paper of the 24th February, the Rev. Roland Allen, who is contributing a series of articles on "Spontaneous Expansion in the Mission Field," points out that social work has tended to supplant the religious purpose of Christian Missions. He observes :—

It is extremely easy to divorce social reform and the alleviation of suffering from religion. How easily they can be divorced is proved by the common fact that both at home and abroad the Church is being supplanted in these social activities by Governments which promote education, and support hospitals and schemes of industrial reform subsidised from public funds without any religious purpose. Social reform is not necessarily Christian, and schemes for the amelioration of the conditions of life certainly do not necessarily lead men to Christ, even if they are set on foot by Christian men with the most serious Christian intentions. Both at home and in the mission field the change in our thought was more important than any change in our method of work. In the mission field the more we emphasised the gospel of enlightenment and social reform, the more these things tended to take the first place in our thoughts. In the beginning we put Christ first. Belief in Christ was the one thing needful. Out of that belief, health and enlightenment and reform would inevitably grow. If we were not quite sure of that, we were at least sure that these things were secondary, and must follow. Conversion to Christ was the first thing, the only thing that really mattered, and our attention must be given first and before all else to leading men to Christ. But more and more as we developed these social activities, they became first in time, and two serious consequences followed.

It is not without significance that one of the prominent social workers in Bombay has publicly declared that all religions are frauds. The World To-morrow is a monthly Review published in New York on nearly the same principles as the Challenge in London. It describes itself as "a journal looking toward a Christian world." In its February number, it prints an article by Mr. Roger N. Baldwin with the startling heading "Immorality of Social Work." Speaking of social work as a whole in American life, Mr. Baldwin writes :—

Social works' difficulty as a solvent of anything is its utter dependence on moneyed interests for its very existence. If it is not the charity of the rich that maintains it, it is the tax-payers, who represent property per se. Social work is hamstrung in achieving any thorough-going reform by the very nature of its livelihood and its class character. It is in essence a class institution. It is work done by one class for another—the propertied for the propertyless. There is no social work for the rich or the well-to-do, much as it is needed. This is the immorality of social work, that it pretends to service to society as a whole, when in fact it is used anti-socially to buttress the class interests of private capitalism.

In the passage quoted above "social reform" and "social work" are used as synonymous terms, and that is so in Western countries, where they are applied to the relief of the poorer by the voluntary service of the better-to-do classes. But here in India, social reform is not a class affair. It relates to the reform of abuses in one's own home, caste, society, religion. The social reformer has first to reform himself and it is to the extent that he does so that he can reform others. Social reform, in this sense, is not liable to the drawbacks pointed out with regard to social work in the Western sense, of making the worker a reactionary in economic and political reform. There is exaggeration in both views quoted above, but it is well to take them as a warning not to miss the essence of reform in the cloud of social programmes. An allied question which is much discussed in America, and has given rise to diametrically opposite opinions, is whether social workers should or should not form a profession.

THE SOCIAL SERVICE LEAGUE, BOMBAY.

The following is the summary of the work done during the year 1921.

Education.....Schools :—For the promotion of mass Education the League has had under its supervision 30 schools with a total of 1839 working class pupils on the rolls, of whom 1216 were boys and 123 girls and women. Out of the 30 schools 18 are night-schools with a total of 754 on the rolls, 6 day schools for half-timers with 365 on the rolls, and three classes for women in the Currimbhoy group of Mills with 68 pupils on the rolls. There were also 8 special English classes for clerks in the Currimbhoy Mills. Music, sewing and drawing formed part of the instruction in the day schools.

Libraries :—There were 6 libraries and reading rooms as well as 50 boxes of Travelling Libraries. The total number of books was 13174 and the total issues of books during the year came to 26638, while the total attendance in the reading rooms was 68435. Books were supplied to prisoners in the House of Correction, Byculla, and to the patients in Gokuldas Tejpal Hospital. One of the libraries is specially meant for the depressed classes.

Lantern Lectures :—19 lectures were delivered with the aid of magic lantern slides mostly on co-operation and Temperance.

Excursions and Sports :—The League arranged facilities for healthy recreation of workmen by organizing fresh-air excursions, 19 times during the year, and by means of open-air sports at 37 different places, and the number of persons who participated in the former being 1812 and in the latter 1675.

Boy Scouts :—The first troop of boy scouts was organised by the League in 1918. During the year under report two more troops were being trained, one at the Tata Sons Workmen's Institute and the other at the Currimbhoy Ebrahim Workmen's Institute. Each of the three troops has now about 40 scouts.

Medical Relief :—The League maintains two charitable dispensaries. The Bai Bachubai Dispensary for women and children is located at the Bombay Working Men's Institute, Elphinstone Road, Parel, and the Homeopathic Dispensary is situated in Nabob Buildings, opposite to Byculla Station, Parel Road. The total number of patients treated at the former dispensary during the year came to 9852 and at the latter 2426. Sheth Kanji Carsondas has contributed Rs 55,000 as a permanent fund towards the maintenance of the Bachubai Dispensary.

Police Court Agent :—In co-operation with the Released Prisoners' Aid Society, the League has been maintaining the services of an agent in the Esplanade Police Court to give assistance to the first offenders by recommending them to the Magistrates for being given the benefit of Section 562 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

Spread of the Co-operative Movement :—With a view to securing the economic amelioration of the poorer and working classes, the League has had under its supervision 84 co-operative societies during the year. Of these 78 were Credit Societies, 4 were Stores, a Medical store on co-operative lines and a laundry on a co-operative basis. The total membership at these 84 societies at the end of the year was 5675; their capital Rs. 1,30,000 and they carried on business of over Rs. 3,20,000.

Welfare Work :—The Tata Sons Workmen's Institute and the Currimbhoy Ebrahim Workmen's Institute have been steadily carrying on welfare work for the operatives of the respective groups of Mills. At both these centres there are day schools for half-timers and night schools for grown up boys. There are also special classes for women workers and clerks. Co-operative Credit Societies and Stores form part of the work of the economic improvement of the workmen. There are Gymnasiums attached to both centres as also two Creches or Day Nurseries for children of women workers.

The Parel & Madanpura Settlements :—The League's Settlements at Parel and Madanpura were started with the object of assisting the poor people in those localities in their difficulties. Both the Settlements maintain reading rooms and libraries and help the people in representing their grievances to municipal and other authorities. The Madanpura Settlement has four Urdu night schools attached to it, while the Parel Settlement supervises over 22 co-operative societies.

Administration of the Florence Nightingale Village Sanitation Fund :—During the year co-operative societies of 6 villages in the mofassil were helped with grants from the Florence Nightingale Village Sanitation Fund, the administration of which has been vested in the League from 1920. Upto December 1921, in all 11 villages have been helped by the Fund.

The Bombay Working Men's Institute :—This Institute is intended to serve not the workmen of any particular group of mills but for all working class people in the Parel locality. The scheme was formed three years ago, a plot of ground was secured and an appeal was made for funds for the buildings. Two of the buildings, including a spacious hall capable of accommodating about 1500 persons, were completed at the end of the year at a cost of about Rs. 1,80,000. Two more buildings, one for the school and the other for a gymnasium and social club, will complete the necessary accommodation.

Propaganda Work :—To disseminate correct ideas regarding social conditions and social work, the League is conducting an English Quarterly Magazine called the Social Service Quarterly and a Marathi monthly called the Samaj Sevak. A Register of Institutions doing social work in India is being printed.

Representations to Government :—During the year the League on being requested by the Government of Bombay sent its views to them on :—(1) Amendment of the Indian Factories Act (2) Employment of women before and after child-birth (3) Registration and Protection of Trade Unions and (4) Workmen's Compensation Bill.

The League's Finances :—The total number of members at the end of the period under report was 723, of whom 9 were patrons, 35 supporters, 47 life-members, 26 members paying Rs. 50 each, 1 paying Rs. 30; 36 paying Rs. 25; 1 paying Rs. 15; 25 paying Rs. 12; 84 paying Rs. 10; 43 paying Rs. 6; 297 paying Rs. 3; 47 paying Rs. 2 and 87 paying Rs. 1. The total receipts and expenditure for the period for all the branches amounted to Rs. 8,00,978-12-10 and Rs. 2,83,455-6-9 respectively. Of these Rs. 89,870-14-7 were the receipts towards the General Fund of the League and the total expenditure came to Rs. 82,668-6-11. The total contributions received during the year toward the building fund of the Bombay Working Men's Institute came to Rs. 1,30,000 out of which Rs. 1,23,000 have been spent. The Tata Sons Workmen's Institute, the Currimbhoy Ebrahim Workmen's Institute, the Bai Bachubai Dispensary and Florence Nightingale Village Sanitation Fund have their respective funds. The most pressing and urgent need of the League is a sum of Rs. 75,000 in order to be able to have a building for a gymnasium and a club as a part of the Bombay Working Men's Institute. The League hopes that the generous public of Bombay would enable it to begin the work of the building without delay.

A PLEA FOR UNITED ACTION.

THE EDITOR, The Indian Social Reformer.

SIR,

All who love India and work to gain for her full Dominion status, or Home Rule, must see with dismay the growing tendency towards a kind of political guerilla warfare, which shows widespread discontent with present political conditions, but is spasmodic and irregular, without concerted action towards a definite end, or agreement as to means. Yet beneath this disturbed surface there is a fundamental unity as to the goal to be reached, Self Rule, Home Rule, Responsible Government, whatever the label may be. The real and deep division is only with regard to the means; can Home Rule be more quickly and easily gained by Non-Co-operation with the present mixed Governments of Indians and English, standing completely aside from all Government institutions, or by what the late Mr. Tilak happily termed Responsive Co-operation, i. e., Co-operation between the Governments and the elected members who form a majority in every Provincial Council, in the Assembly and the Council of State? That is the one difference of principle which divides the country into two parties, and it is clear that it is fundamental; it is the difference—to borrow terms from western politics—between Parliamentary and Direct Action. The remaining differences are details, like those which divide ordinary political parties in free countries. They will still exist after India becomes a Self-Governing country; some will be with the Government of the day, others will form the Opposition; or, as in France, there may be several groups, uniting or dividing from each other, according to the exigencies of the day. But that is in the future.

The question of questions for Indians to-day is: can all those who believe in Parliamentary Action unite together so far as to seek election to the Councils, in the autumn of next year, in order to obtain a mandate from the electors to take concerted action for the gaining of Home Rule in the shortest possible time? The Political Sections of the 1921 Clubs of Madras and Bombay believe that such a temporary agreement is possible, and they are therefore addressing leaders of parties who differ much in detail, but are willing to seek election after agreeing on a common election programme, which might be hammered out at a small Conference, but the broad outlines of which should be accepted as a basis of discussion at such a Conference, all taking part in it being free to form their own parties and policies within the Councils, subject to their uniting to formulate a draft of the changes necessary for the gaining of Home Rule.

The following broad outlines are suggested as a basis of discussion:

1. The future Constitution of India should be framed by bodies consisting of members of the Provincial and of the Indian Legislatures, such bodies having power to co-opt a small number of non-members, whose aid is thought to be desirable.

2. That within a stated time after the meeting of the new Legislatures, the members shall elect such component bodies, or Conventions, to meet outside the Councils for the purpose of framing such a Constitution.

(Question. Should each Legislature form a separate component body?)

3. That apart from these component bodies, meeting outside the Legislatures, every member shall be free within the Legislatures, as stated above, to join any party or group.

4. That these component bodies shall formulate a scheme of Home Rule, that shall comprise complete Provincial Autonomy, the placing in the hands of Ministers responsible to the Legislature all subjects now controlled by the Governor-General in Council, except foreign affairs, army and navy, the two last-named being taken over by the Indian Cabinet, when India is sufficiently consolidated for Home Defence. It is further suggested that the Secretary of State for India should bear the same relation to India as the Secretary of State for the Colonies bears to the Self-Governing Dominions, and that the India Council shall cease to exist. Further, that foreign affairs should be relegated to an Imperial Council, in which all the Self-Governing Dominions, including India, should be represented.

The proposers of this Conference suggest that the Conference might be held at Delhi in November, when the Indian Legislature is in session, and the assistance of some of its members might be sought; that the months before the general election might be utilised in organising the electorates, pointing out the importance of selecting suitable members, and of giving them a mandate to carry out proposals 1, 2, 3, 4, as approved by the Conference; that the various groups in the country should organise themselves and form political committees to select candidates whom they would support, to call meetings of electors to hear and question proposed candidates, etc.

This letter is sent to the gentlemen whose names are on the enclosed list, and the Secretaries of the Political Sections in Madras and Bombay would be glad to receive names of other leaders, who accept Parliamentary Action as the means of winning the changes suggested, so that the letter may be sent to them also. Representatives of the National Home Rule League and the Liberal Leagues will be invited. The invitations to the Conference should be signed by well-known leaders of different schools of political thought, who are in favour of entering the Councils.

Secretary, Political Section,

KANJI DWARKADAS, M. L. C.

P. S.—The Secretaries would also be glad to receive any suggestions which might ease the present situation, and facilitate the convening and the work of the proposed Conference.

SACRAMENT OR SALE?

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

SIR,

In your footnote to a letter from "B. R. R." published in your last issue on the above subject, you say that "maltreatment of the girls was systematically practised as a means of blackmailing the unhappy parents." This is quite true and I have known of instances where so-called B. A.'s and M. A.'s have been the culprits. Especially if the brides happen to be fatherless and there is some property left, vagabond husbands play this mischief. Some typical instances occur to my mind in South India as I write. Allow me also to say that in publishing the scandalous letter of the B. A. (Hons) student, you have done a service, as it served to bring to light one of the most notorious ways of of bride-banting. I should not say this were it not that your judgment has been criticised by 'B. R. R.'

II

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I have read with painful interest the letter of 'B. R. R.' in the Reformer of September 3rd on the above subject. The correspondent ridicules your 'puritanical horror' at a graduate of one of the leading Indian Universities offering himself for sale as a husband and thinks that many will agree with him "that you have done injustice to the young aspirant" and that in practice 90 per cent of Matrimonial alliances are at least "Marriages de convenance."

Your correspondent is mistaken. It is difficult not to share with you your 'puritanical horror' and still retain any sense of right and wrong opinions or likely to differ as to the contribution hostel life has made towards the building up of the character of the 'young aspirant.' But there cannot be two opinions about such men, young or old, who will deliberately traffic in marriage, of all institutions, being great social pests. Your correspondent may be right in his assertion that the sacramental character of marriage is fast losing its hold on Hindu Society. I hope he is not. But if he is right, then his course of duty as that of every right-minded person is clear, namely to band together to fight the canker that is eating into the vitals of our society. Instead, your correspondent indulges in some cheap sneers at women. Certainly, the lesson of Snehatala who immolated herself in the flames at the altar of the damnable egoism of our young men cannot have been so quickly lost upon us. The spirit of Snehatala is the spirit of Hindu womanhood which is manifesting itself daily, unostentatiously, unrecognised and unhonoured in countless ways. Consistently with our self-conceit, where the spirit of Snehatala which embraced the flames in righteous scorn, in humility, forgiveness and love, patiently subjects itself to the petty tyrannies and persecutions of the husband and Hindu household life, we attribute it to cowardice, fear, absence of economic independence and everything else but the true Love Spirit that animates the mother and the wife.

The holy fire that burnt in Snehatala until it consumed the physical body that enveloped her spirit is unquenchable. It still burns in the sisters of Snehatala. If we will not cherish it and nourish it, instead of being a life-giver, it will become a life-destroyer and burn us, as surely as it did Snehatala. She in her immortal glory and to our eternal shame stands over us, ever watching us, whatever we may do to keep the flame of Grihastha life pure and in its fullest sacramental character. If we will not listen, we will be sounding our own death-knell. There can be no other escape. What is wrong with the young aspirant owes its origin not to the conservatism of Hindu Society, so much as to the enthronement of material values over moral and spiritual values as a result of an exotic culture and civilisation.

By this, I do not defend all the Hindu customs. I am fully alive to the vicious working of some of them. But your correspondent, however, in his desire to draw pointed attention to them, makes too sweeping allegations. He also makes a fetish of the need of 'scope before marriage for the formation of affections between parties and our custom which exclude the conscious exercise of choice by them' which, he says 'are responsible for all evils.' Any close study of marriages under Hindu customs and the conditions of Western society will show that the percentage of marriages proving unhappy or treated in a purely utilitarian manner is much less under Hindu customs than under the western conditions of courtship and conscious exercise of choice by the parties. I feel strongly as anybody ought to, that the superstitions of every marriage, intercaste restrictions and the glamour of academic qualifications should disappear completely and instantaneously, if Hindu society is not to perish. But I think it must also be admitted that the conservatism of the Hindu society in regard to marriage has also helped greatly to preserve the traditions of Savitri, Sita and Damayanti, and maintain a high level of Sati Dharma otherwise aptly called, Pathiv-ratha Dharma. The Hindu Dharma of Marriage is, properly speaking, known as the Sati-Pathi Dharma, the husband also contributing equally to the maintenance of the high traditions of marriage as the wife. I must, however, confess that while I have come across innumerable cases of the family or Kula Dharma being maintained in the face of utilitarian husbands of the type of the 'young aspirant' by the high sense of duty of a Sati, cheerfully and consciously lived up to, by the wives, I have been struck by a general lack of the sense of duty on the part of husbands, owing to an unhealthy obsession as to their so-called rights. If these Hindu husbands were paid back according to the Jewish law of a tooth for a tooth and an eye for an eye, a majority of the Hindu marriages will have been deservedly wrecked and disintegration would have set in long ago. It is a sign of the times, that in an age of Reason, Hindu women are slowly growing to be neither contented with being willing chattels nor with immolating themselves like Snehatala either literally or figuratively, but to build an independent scheme of life. The pioneers amongst them are living proofs of what women can achieve, independent of the 'young aspirants' who would sell themselves, so cheaply for tin.

III

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

There appears in two issues of your journal correspondence entitled "Sacrament or Sale", from which I gather that a South Indian B. A. (Hons) addressed you a confidential letter with the request that he be recommended for marriage if a daughter of the wealthy, respectable parents approach you with a proposition of marriage. He has explained in unambiguous language his objects. One is to enable him by the fruition of such marriage to take a journey on to the West to prosecute his further studies (perhaps the further portion of "Bachelor of Askance") and the other is to enable him to enter the parlour of a merchant prince. A proposition very charming and attractive indeed! I have noted your comments thereon and on the correspondence of one 'B. R. R.'

This correspondence and your comments thereon have brought in controversial matters and an impartial observation is required to do justice to either party. Where the correspondent (B. A. Hons) errs is on the side of his making marriage a shift to quick fortune. Possessing as he does a good education, if he, instead of taking this mendicant course, had earnestly endured the battle of life and by courage, character and perseverance had come out successful as young men both in the West and East do (for instance in the East, of Rama, to win the hands of Sita, bending the giant bow) he could have laid more claim to his Honours Degree than he does now in the eyes of all thinking men.

Now as for your comment. You cannot honestly charge him of degeneracy because you happen to have come across an instance of setting a double establishment in the West (where our friend incidentally wishes to go) on the money thus accrued of a marriage in India. The blunt fact is this: that in this country in recent times some men under the attractive caption of "Social Reformer" have been not only inserting in newspapers fantastic matrimonial advertisements, but also directly aiding innocent educated girls to enter into clandestine marriages. There goes an advertisement "wanted bridegroom England or American returned, possessing Ph. D., M. A. or L. C. S. if possible, girl well accomplished, educated beautiful, aged 25. Preference given to candidates below thirty." Here goes another "A Tamil Brahmin of moderate means wishes to marry Brahmin girl of Bombay or N. India of a respectable beautiful and healthy family, etc. etc.". These advertisements without a head and tale, naturally give an impression to the general public that possessing of a Degree of a University will easily bring into the recipient marriage of the daughter of wealthy parents who will provide the husband a "Palace of Pearls". Therefore, it is not the social customs that are to be blamed, but the so-called 'social reform' marriages; and the system now obtaining among the Indian social reformers, if I am allowed to say, is nothing short of "Sale", at any rate not "Sacrament".

Hughes Rd. Bombay.

Yours sincerely,
T. S. GOPALKRISHNA.

[We have already stated that we were not generalising from the letter that we printed, but had received other similar letters though not so shameless as this. As for advertisements, few social reform marriages are arranged through advertisements in newspapers or through friends, touts, obliging school masters and College professors. Social reformers, besides, have throughout condemned the purchase of brides or bridegrooms. The evil is rampant among people who, professing orthodoxy, and even non-co-operation, have trampled under foot the dictates of the ancient Hindu lawgivers who denounce the making a merchandise of one's own flesh and blood in terrible terms. We have received a letter from Madras giving names and particulars of some scandalous cases, which we do not publish because of the law of libel, though it may become a duty to risk it in the interests of public morality if there is no other means of calling public attention to this grave social danger.—Ed. I. S. R.]

PROSTITUTION IN BOMBAY.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

From your reference to the "limited publication" given by Government to the Bombay Prostitution Committee's Report and from your own restrained comments on the same in your issue of August 20, your readers might have well been apprehensive about the whole affair. I, for one, am all the more thankful to you for your so generously publishing the report in toto in your very next issue. Still I feel unable to grasp the propriety of the Minute of Dissent, with all the well-intentioned arguments in it. For even in the most laissez faire countries in the West the consensus of opinion is not entirely regulationistic; on the contrary I personally know some very enthusiastic abolitionists who think practically on this subject in the West. In countries therefore like ours, which are yet novices in the ways of the so-called modern civilization, dogmatic regulationism in this respect would be rather out of place. Though one may have to admit that the evils of prostitution and drink are the cursed twins born and brought up all along with civilization itself, why should there be, I wonder, two opinions as to the immediate abolition as far as can be, of a third consequent evil, viz., commercialization of either of these? This is the very crux of the problem and one cannot sufficiently sympathise with the Committee in their tribulations over it! With regard to drink, a fashionable regulationist, or for that matter a Government may plead with, whatever conscience, for the national finance. But can even that lame excuse come to the deliverance of a 'let-alonist' or a regulationist in the matter of commercialized prostitution and of the extent to which it is carried on with impunity in cities like Bombay and Calcutta? If this matter is to reach the anvil of our councils, it is, I am sure, now high time that it be discussed thoroughly and yet practically even more outside the Councils than inside.

There is again one important point which I fear the Committee has least discussed so far as I can gather from its published report; and that is "Sex Education in Schools." I understand the Director of Public Instruction is referred to in this matter and he has done well to invite some opinions.

ANNIVERSARY OF RAM MOHUN ROY.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The 27th September is sacred to the memory of Ram Mohun Roy, who is universally accepted as the father of modern India. Hindus, Mahomedans, Christians and in fact, all find in him a soul congenial to them and have even gone to the length of claiming him as their own from the religious point of view. But it is not only in the field of religion that he has rendered unique service to modern India, but he has done so in almost every field in which we in India today are engaged in working e. g., social, political, educational etc. One has but to study his life to see how deep and broad is the foundation that he laid of new India almost exactly a century back, and to find that our efforts since, including the great work accomplished by Mahatma Gandhi, are only directed towards raising a fitting building for such a foundation.

Under these circumstances, may I request all your readers in all the parts of India to celebrate the coming anniversary of this great man in a worthy manner? Hitherto wherever his anniversary is celebrated, which unfortunately is not in many places, members of all the communities united together in paying their tribute to Raja Ram Mohan Roy. But this requires to be done all over India, in all the cities, towns and even villages, and here I appeal to all the public-spirited men and women of the country, of whatever community they may be, to unite this year and all succeeding years in paying their due to this father of New India.

Blessed is a country that knows its great men.

SIR SANKARAN NAIR.

STATEMENT OF PLAINTIFF'S CLAIM.

The following is the material part of the Plaintiff's claim in the above case:—

8. Throughout the months of March, April, May and June, 1922, the Defendant in the said book (which was widely and extensively circulated throughout India and the British Isles) falsely and maliciously wrote, printed and published, and caused to be written, printed and published, of and concerning the Plaintiff, and of, and concerning him in the way of his said office, and in relation to his conduct there, in the following words:—

"The recruitment of non-Mahomedans also went up and both were due to the terrorism of Sir Michael O'Dwyer (meaning the Plaintiff) very useful in this instance."— (Page 26.)

"THE PUNJAB ATROCITIES."

"Before the Reforms (meaning a period during which the Plaintiff held his said office) it was in the power of the Lieutenant Governor, a single individual (meaning the Plaintiff) to commit the atrocities in the Punjab we know only too well."—(Page 47.)

"Above all, it will be remembered that it was necessary to pass an Act of Indemnity to save the delinquents (meaning the Plaintiff and his subordinates) from proceedings in civil and criminal courts"—(Pages 47-48.)

"Many high-handed proceedings (meaning proceedings by the Plaintiff) were taken under the Regulations of 1818 the provisions of which were applied for which they were never intended" (Page 48).

"I realise that the eulogium passed by the English Cabinet on Lord Chelmsford and Sir Michael O'Dwyer (meaning the Plaintiff) was an outrage on Indian public opinion." (Page 49).

4. By the said words the Defendant meant and was understood to mean that the Plaintiff in his government of the said Province had employed methods of terrorism and had enforced illegal orders and had been guilty of crimes for which but for the passing of an Act of Indemnity to protect him, he would have been convicted and punished and that his methods of government were vicious and oppressive and were in fact the cause of the said disturbances and that he had grossly misconducted himself in and proved that he was unfit to hold the said office.

"THE TREASURE CHEST."

A new 24 page monthly magazine for boys and girls in India, dating from July 1922.

It is printed in English and contains illustrations drawn from Indian life. Each number contains several first-class stories, a poem or two, an Indian biography, sections on nature study, social service, current events, "something to do", and a prize competition.

Subscription Rs. 2 a year. For the six months of 1922 the subscription is Re. 1. If paid in advance for eighteen months to the end of 1923 it is Rs. 2-8-0. Back numbers of the magazine are available, so those who order now will receive a full set from July.

Rates for foreign countries, if paid in this country, 12 annas additional a year, or Re. 1-2 for eighteen months. Subscriptions sent from abroad, four shillings a year or five shillings for eighteen months.

What teachers and parents say of it :

"I have long been looking for just this kind of a magazine for the boys and girls of India."

"Should you be able to maintain the high standard you have adopted from the very outset, the success and popularity of your magazine are assured.....Paper, printing illustrations, and cover, all will appeal to the young folk. But above all, the freshness, local colour and graceful style of your articles, poems and stories."

"It is a charming magazine. How our kiddies love it!"

ROYAL YAKUTI.

THIS YAKUTI or life giving nectar has been prepared from the best, choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has wonderful properties of increasing virile power and it rectifies urinary disorders. In fact it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to these persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicine. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires. It is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills. Rupees ten only.

NOTES.

Sir John Woodroffe: We reprint the appreciation of the career as citizen, judge and lawyer of Sir John Woodroffe who retired last month from the Bench of the Calcutta High Court. His most important contribution to oriental scholarship bears on the Shakta doctrine of worship, which for many years was regarded in and outside India, as a degraded cult, because of the orgies associated with a single sect of Shaktas. It required much moral courage to undertake to expound this discredited system, and for many years the identity of Arthur Avalon, the pseudonym under which Sir John issued his books, was a great literary mystery. He has, we think, succeeded in establishing that the Shakta doctrine embodies a great principle and should not be judged by the obscene perversion of it. Replying to a farewell address presented to him by the Vakils of Calcutta High Court, Sir John Woodroffe said:

You have also spoken of my work in the propagation of a right understanding of the great civilisation of India. This also is a work of justice though in another sphere. I have been moved to undertake it by reason of my affection for the country as also because of my great debt to it both material and intellectual. This is, to use a Sanskrit term, my "Arsha Rina." Justice is here also correct judgment, that is the discrimination of what is true and false, of what is worthy of praise or reprobation with complete impartiality and freedom from all racial and national prejudice. What I owe to India cannot be fully expressed here.

Sir John belongs to a race of Englishmen who cared for something more than what they could get in the way of pay and pensions out of her. The race is almost, though not quite, extinct but its few surviving representatives no longer sit in the seats of power. Sir John Woodroffe is one of the last of the Romans.

Parsi Charity Organisation: The total sum represented by the several Parsi Charities in Bombay must amount to several crores. If it is equally distributed among the 50,000 Parsi inhabitants of Bombay, it will, we think, work out at some hundreds of rupees per head. It is well, therefore, that a Society has been formed to work for the organisation and co-ordination of these Charities so as to give the greatest relief to the most deserving cases. Such a Society is the Parsi Charity Organisation Society whose third annual report has been issued. The Society is fortunate in having for its Hon. Secretary, a trained economist like Prof. P. A. Wadia. The most important Parsi Charities are already co-operating with the Society. The report on Parsi Poverty which the Society has drawn up and which we publish to-day, will be read with interest. According to it a single Parsi requires for food alone a sum of Rs. 24 every month. The several necessary items of his dietary given in the report, show that the term "poverty" as applied to the Parsi differs widely from what it means with reference to other people. Mutton, which is the most expensive single item, and eggs, every day, is more than what many middle class persons of other communities can afford in these hard days and there are several thousands of people who keep physically fit on more frugal fare. We mention this because as the other communities of the country come up, poor Parsis cannot but be much handicapped in the race of life by believing, on the authority of the Society, that they cannot keep physically fit on a less expensive dietary.

Inscrutable! Commenting on our remark last week that Dr. Annie Besant virtually endorsed in her Bombay speech the Nagpur Congress Creed with, for its goal, Swaraj within or without the British Empire, New India of which she is the Editor, remarks: "It is a mistake to say that Dr. Besant endorses the Nagpur Congress creed. What she has always insisted on is that India is entitled to choose for herself, as the Dominions are recognised to have the right of choosing, whether she would remain within the Empire. But she is a firm believer in the future of an Indo-British Commonwealth and in the value of co-operation between England and India to the world. She can therefore be no party to a creed which leaves this question open." Dr. Besant, we believe, is not in Madras, but her words, as reported in the Times of India, did not seem to us to differ materially from the Congress creed. Since writing the above, we have seen in the next issue of New India a note by Dr. Besant written from Simla with reference to our comment, in which she says that for her, the question whether India should or should not remain within the Empire, is not an open question but that India should have the right of self-determination like other nations. The position of many in the Congress, including Mahatma Gandhi who rebuked Mr. Andrews for his writings on the subject, is the same, so far as we know. But the point is that Mrs. Besant left the Congress because it adopted a creed which asserted this right of self-determination, and now she is anxious that those with whom the connection with the Empire is an open question, should join her Convention!

A Great Indian Journalist: Babu Motilal Ghosh, Editor of the Amrita Bazar Patrika, died on the 5th instant at the age of 75. He and his elder brother, Babu Shishir Kumar Ghosh, started the paper as a small vernacular sheet in their native village 55 years ago. In a few years the Patrika was established as an English newspaper in Calcutta, and for many years it occupied a position of unrivalled influence in the Indian press. Its enterprise and daring in exposing official secrets, its skill in steering clear of the law, its inimitable use of political parables, also its attitude of narrow bigotry towards social and religious reform movements, made it for years the most popular journal in India. The Ghose brothers did not, like their contemporary journalist, Mr. Surendra Nath Banerjee, appear on public platforms as political leaders. Their work was always done behind the scenes and it was done exceedingly well from their point of view. The Partition agitation and the political developments which followed, on the one hand, and the comprehensive Press Act, on the other, created a situation where the Patrika's peculiar talents could not show to as much advantage as before. Babu Motilal Ghose too, we believe, had practically retired for some years from the active conduct of the paper. His name will remain famous in the history of Indian journalism and politics during the last century.

Indian Princes and the Indian Press: The Press Association of India has sent the following telegram dated the 14th instant to the Government of India: "After the experience of and the repression and harassment suffered under the Press Act of 1910 the Press Association of India is emphatically of opinion that the proposed Bill for the "Protection of the Princes against seditious attacks upon them in the newspapers published in India," is absolutely uncalled for and will be interpreted by the public as an indirect attempt to revive the Press Act of 1910 under a new garb and considers that any such fresh enactment to restrict the freedom of the Press will not only check the growth and expansion of a free Press but will kill honest and independent journalism. If, however, the Government of India persist in introducing the Bill in the Imperial Legislature, the Press Association of India demands that full and adequate opportunity should be given to the public to consider the Bill and that for this purpose all the papers connected with it, including the requests from Princes for such protections, recent instances of attacks on Princes, the opinions of the local Governments and of the Princes in regard to the proposed measure, should be immediately published and that its detailed consideration should be postponed to the next session of the Legislature."

Vidya Sabha Punjab Rupa: A deputation of this Sabha is visiting Bombay for the purpose of collecting funds. We had an interesting talk with the members, who are Non-Co-operators. The scheme of the Rupa Sabha avoids the mistakes of the Non-Co-operation National Education schemes elsewhere, in that it carefully avoids setting up rival schools where there are Government or Local Board schools, and so orders the courses of study that, while they are somewhat ahead of the Departmental courses, the scholars attending the Sabha's schools are able and free to appear for the Departmental and University examinations. In other words, the Sabha's aim is to supplement the official provision of schools and not to destroy them. As we have often said, there is ample scope for work of this kind. We are, therefore, surprised that the District officials have issued orders to the Rupa Taluka officials not to lend any countenance to the Sabha's schools which are more in number than the Local Board schools. The late Director of Public Instruction, Mr. Richey, has borne testimony to the efficiency of the Sabha's scheme, and we are sure that so liberal-minded a Director as Mr. Anderson will view with sympathy every effort to enlist public sympathy and support by way of supplementing the none too abundant resources of Government. We commend the Sabha's appeal to the generous support of wealthy men.

A Dissertation on Painting: We have received a copy of a well-printed book entitled "Dissertation on Painting" by Mr. Mohendra Nath Dutt. Mr. Basanto Kumar Chatterjee, who has edited it, very indifferently we must say, informs us that Mr. Dutt is next brother to the late Swami Vivekananda and has travelled alone through almost all the countries of Europe and Asia as an itinerant scholar. He has written a number of books which he has handed over to the Seva Series Publishing House for publication, the proceeds of their sale to go to educational work. The volume before us has a foreword by Mr. Abanindra Nath Tagore whose pupil Mr. Dutt seems to have been at one time. Though named "Dissertation on Painting," the book is really one on the fine arts as it deals with sculpture, music and poetry also. The chapters seem to us to be of very unequal merit. Profound observations occur side by side by others which strike one as rather banal. The Editor has in many places done nothing to repair the broken English of the author. We are sorry we cannot commend this book at any rate in its present form to readers.

Dewan Bahadur R. Venkata Ratnam Naidu: At a public meeting held at Cocanada, it was resolved to celebrate the 60th birthday which falls on the 29th September of Dewan Bahadur R. Venkata Ratnam Naidu, the distinguished social and religious reformer, by collecting a sum of Rs. 20,000, to present an adequate purse to him in token of the general affection and esteem; to endow in his name a University Gold Medal; to found in his name a monthly scholarship of Rs. 20 in the Cocanada College, and to celebrate the Day at Pithapuram, his present place of residence, by a public meeting for the presentation to him of an address with the purse as a souvenir. We are sure the many friends of the Dewan Bahadur will be glad to subscribe liberally to the fund. Remittances may be sent to the President, V. Rama Krishna Rao, M.A., L.T., Principal, P. K. College, Cocanada.

The Theosophical Society: We have received a copy of a pamphlet containing a statement by Mr. B. P. Wadia, the well-known Theosophist who did good work in connection with the Labour movement in Madras and who was one of those interned with Mrs. Annie Besant by Lord Pentland, explaining his reasons for resigning from the Theosophical Society with its head-quarters at Adyar. These are summed up in the sentence that the Theosophical Society has proved disloyal to Theosophy and its holy cause. Although he has left the Society, he will continue to work for Theosophy loyal to the true founders and their message, at Los Angeles, California.

A New League: We have received from Mr. P.V. Iyer, Honorary Organiser and General Secretary, the prospectus of an Indo-British Empire League, the object of which is the rather familiar, not to say hackneyed, one of enabling Englishmen and Indians to understand each other. Incidentally, the League "while engaged in its work of propagating the Empire idea among the Indian people, will also be able to carry on alongside educative work among them, teach them the blessings of sanitation and hygiene, the evils of untouchability and purdah, and the benefits to be derived from co-operation in agriculture." It is a pity that we have no Charles Dickens in India to write some New Pickwick Papers. Mr. Iyer's address is, the Indo-British Empire League, Simla.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1922.

GURU-KA-BAGH.

Within the last few days Guru-ka-Bagh has become a famous name in Indian politics. For several days past, newspapers have had almost every day some sensational news headed Guru-ka-Bagh. What and where is Guru-ka-Bagh? Guru-ka-Bagh is situated at a distance of about 12 miles from Amritsar in the Ajnala Tahsil. There are two Gurdwaras there, one sacred to the memory of Guru Arjun, the fifth Sikh Guru, and the other to that of Guru Tej Bahadur, the ninth Guru. According to the official account, in August 1921 this Gurdwara was "taken possession of" by the Akalis, who may be compared to the early Protestant Christian reformers, but the fact, as stated by the special correspondent of the Tribune, is that "as a result of mutual understanding, it was agreed that while the lands and residential quarters remained in the possession of the Mahant, the Gurdwaras were to be in the possession of the Parbandhak Committee." We call attention to this here, because it is typical of the language of the Government communique which, where it cannot definitely allege anything aggressive or illegal on the part of the Akalis, uses words and phrases that are less accurate than suggestive in a sense adverse to the Akalis. The trouble began when, at the beginning of August in the present year, five Akalis, living in the Gurdwara, under instructions of the Gurdwara Parbandhak Committee, cut down a tree on the "Gurdwara lands"—the phrase is in the communique—"ostensibly for use as fuel in the langar or public kitchen of the shrine." The use of the word "ostensibly" suggests that this was not the real motive which was something else, but the communique refrains from saying what that was. Mahant Sundar Das complained to the Police of the theft of this property from "his land"—the land described in the previous sentence as "the Gurdwara lands,"—and on the 9th August the five Akalis concerned were arrested and sent for trial. They were convicted of theft and were sentenced to undergo six months' imprisonment and to pay a fine. The Akalis persisted in cutting trees and otherwise using the land and by the 24th of August no less than 110 of them had been arrested on the complaint of the Mahant. So far the Police seem to have been acting merely to protect the Mahant's property rights. We have so far seen no explanation from the Akali side of how if, as stated by the Tribune correspondent, they had come into possession of the Gurdwara by mutual agreement on the condition that the Mahant should have possession of the lands of the Gurdwara, they came to violate it by cutting trees and squatting on the lands without the Mahant's permission.

On the 25th August the matter took a different turn. "An attack was made on a small body of the Police on the afternoon of the 25th August," says the communique, "and they were stoned by the Akalis. The attack was repelled and the rioters were dispersed." This communique, dated the 1st September, is "attested"—whatever that may mean—by Mr. P. Wood Collins, Senior Assistant Secretary to the Punjab Government. Another communique, dated the 2nd September, and "attested" by Mr. R. A. Matthews, Superintendent on duty, Punjab Civil Secretariat, gives the "true facts" in contradiction to certain allegations made in the Press as to the occurrences on the 25th August. The first of these facts is a letter dated the 26th August from the Shiromani Gurdwara Parbandhak Committee. How incidents of the 25th August are explained by a letter of the 26th and what happened afterwards, is not clear. The scene so far is Guru-ka-Bagh. It now shifts to Amritsar. The Wood-Collins' communique states that "simultaneously with the despatch of Akali Jathas to Guru-ka-Bagh, meetings were arranged, morning and evening, at the Akhal Takht in Amritsar, which were attended by the leaders of the Parbandhak Committee. At these meetings violent speeches were made inciting Sikhs to continue the lawless resistance to authority at Guru-ka-Bagh." The district authorities, evidently of their own motion and without any complaint from Mahant Sundar Das or any one else, instituted proceedings against the leading office-bearers and members of the Committee, and the President and seven members were arrested on the 26th August. There were, we are told, between three and four thousand Akalis at Guru-ka-Bagh by this time, "the efforts to squat on the Mahant's land continued, and the trespassers had to be forcibly removed." The communique proceeds:

In consequence of the continued influx of bands of Akalis into the Amritsar district, which was becoming a source of embarrassment alike to the local public and the district authorities, Police pickets have been placed upon the roads in order to turn back parties as they arrive. Most of the bands so stopped have obeyed the orders and turned back. But on 31st August a Jatha from Tarn Taran attempted to force their way through a Police picket, and had to be forcibly dispersed. The Jatha suffered 18 casualties, none of which are believed to be serious.

The authorities have after ten days' experience withdrawn this order preventing the Akalis from going to Guru-ka-Bagh. Most reasonable people will be of the view that it should never have been made. How and with what hardships this simple truth was brought home to them, remains to be told.

The authorities for the first time in India had to deal with a body of people whose organisation and discipline were as complete as their acceptance of the creed of non-violence. The Jathas were sent from Amritsar in batches of from 50 to 100 Akalis. Motor lorries and doctors accompanied them to treat the injured and take them back home. Each Akali had instructions drawn up with military precision to march straight to Guru-ka-Bagh, not to allow himself to be stopped till he was disabled, and not on any account to repel violence by violence. When the Jatha was stopped by the Police it sat down on one side of the road, leaving the other side clear for traffic, and sang hymns. When the Police withdrew, the Jatha resumed its march. Then the Police came back and beat down the Akalis with lathis, the Akali passively receiving the blows with invocations to the Guru. The disabled Akalis were removed in the lorries. The special correspondent of the Tribune writing of the non-violent behaviour of the Akalis at Guru-ka-Bagh observes :

Less than a couple of years ago when the annual session of the Sikh League was held at Lahore and the No-co-operation resolution was duly passed, people were not wanting both among the Sikhs themselves and others, who warned Mahatma Gandhi and the League against the "dangerous" experiment on which they had embarked. The Punjabees, and Sikhs in particular, it was argued, were a highly inflammable people. They were different from the people of the rest of India, it was said. Sir Michael O'Dwyer's remark that with the Punjabees there was very little interval between thought and action, was freely quoted in support of their contention. But the step was taken and non-violent non-co-operation was inculcated among the martial mind of the Sikh masses. If one is anxious to see and verify for himself whether the seed of non-violence was thrown away on barren soil or has firmly taken root and fructified, let him go to the Golden Temple at Amritsar or pay a visit to Guru-ka-Bagh and he will find in the sight of the injured an ocular proof of the fact that the Sikhs as a people have accepted non-violence as an article of faith and have exemplified it in their conduct during the present struggle.

One of the issues of the Tribune gave a long list of names, with addresses, of Akalis who had been injured in these encounters. After some six or seven Jathas consisting of men had been thus dealt with, the Akali leaders organised a Jatha of women, and the authorities withdrew the order preventing the Jathas from marching to Guru-ka-Bagh. The story of the patient behaviour of the Jathas has thrilled the country, and constitutes one of the most effective illustrations of the power of non-violence pitted against physical force methods. And it has a lesson to the rest of India. The excellence of the Akali organization may be due, as has been suggested, to several Sikh ex-soldiers returned from the war, co-operating with the movement, but the perfect exhibition of non-violence is possible only to a people who, like the Akalis, have a deep and abiding faith in an overruling Providence. It is by inculcating this faith that the Sikh Gurus were able to train the sparrows of the Punjab peasantry to face the soaring eagles of the Moghuls in the plenitude of strength. It is by a renovation of that faith alone can India achieve her great goal of self-knowledge, self-reverence and self-control, summed up in the word Swarajya, through the path of perfect non-violence in thought, word and deed.

SHOULD BROTHELS BE ABOLISHED?

At a well-attended meeting held under the auspices of the Social Service League on the 8th instant, the Rev. R. M. Gray, one of the members of the Bombay Prostitution Committee, opened an interesting debate on the Committee's Report which we published with the issue of August 27. A number of speakers took part in the discussion from several points of view. The general sense was that the Committee's recommendations did not cover the most important causes of prostitution, such as poverty, the disproportionately small female population of Bombay, the housing question and so on. But the sense of the meeting was unanimous in favour of the Committee's principal recommendation that brothels should be suppressed. The Bishop of Bombay, also a member of the Committee, introduced the report at a recent Missionary Conference in Bombay and that Conference also unanimously approved of the recommendation. We hope other meetings will follow and show that the chief, if not the only, reason given in the minority report for its opposition to the abolition of brothels, is unfounded. That reason is that there does not exist at present among all sections of the inhabitants of Bombay a definite recognition of the fact that prostitution is undesirable and that every effort must be made to reduce its volume. The minute quantum of moral sense required for this recognition already exists and has not, as the minority think, hereafter to be created among our citizens. It does not follow from the existence of hereditary prostitution in India that the virtue of chastity is not highly valued. Everything in this country has in the past tended to be hereditary. There are castes whose hereditary occupation was thieving. It would be absurd to infer from that that security of property was not appreciated in India. The little knowledge of Indian society of many present-day Anglo-Indians, is a dangerous thing. If it is too much to expect them to study Indian literature, they might at least study the writings of their own great predecessors who knew infinitely more of the people than they are ever likely to know. What struck Sir Thomas Munro as especially noteworthy in Indian civilisation was the high regard in which woman was held. Giving evidence before a Parliamentary Committee in England in 1813, he said :

I do not exactly understand what is meant by the 'civilisation' of the Hindus. In the higher branches of science, in the knowledge of the theory and practice of good Government, and in an education which, by banishing prejudice and superstition, opens the mind to receive instruction of every kind from every quarter, they are much inferior to Europeans. But if a good system of agriculture, unrivalled manufacturing skill, capacity to produce whatever can contribute to either convenience or luxury, schools established in every village for teaching reading, writing and arithmetic, the general practice of hospitality and charity amongst each other, and above all, a treatment of the female sex full of confidence, respect and delicacy, are among the signs which denote a civilised people, then the Hindus are not inferior to the nations of Europe, and if civilisation is to become an article of trade between the two countries, I am convinced that this country (England) will gain by the import cargo.

Surely a century of British rule, English education, Christian Missions, and our own reform movements, have not made Indians a worse people than in the days of Munro. Within the last twenty-five years, there has been at work a movement to do away with the institution of nautch girls attached to temples, and it has been attended with some measure of success. In the Chapter on Prostitution in Bombay, in his report on the recent Census of cities in this Presidency, Mr. L. J. Sedgwick observes that the remarkable increase in the number of persons returning as procurers, seems to indicate that the character of prostitution in Bombay has changed a good deal, "the Indian or domestic type giving way to the International or Brothel type." Social reformers who have done much to put down hereditary prostitution, cannot see it replaced by the brothel type, which is a worse type, of the evil. The main ground of the minority for its opposition to the principal recommendation of the majority report, therefore, falls to the ground.

We regard it as axiomatic that so long as the brothel is tolerated, there will be a steady flow of girls from the mofussil to the Bombay brothels, and, under present economic conditions, so long as the supply of professional prostitutes equals the demand, the bulk of prostitutes will have to live in the most degraded physical conditions. Our objection to the brothel, however, does not end here. First, the public display and advertisement of a facility or product must increase the demand for it. Any man knows at once where he can go to satisfy his primitive instincts. Some expose themselves to unnecessary risks through curiosity, though we doubt if this is true of any considerable number of Indian inhabitants, whom we are mainly considering. Secondly, though we are far from wishing that the prostitute should be continually exposed to harassment because of her calling, we think that the entrenching of prostitution behind a ring fence does help to encourage an inert state of public opinion.

The minority does not controvert these statements. All that it does is to draw an imaginary picture of what will happen if brothels are made illegal. To begin with, such a step, it holds, would increase the number of clandestine prostitutes, that is, women who carry on the trade secretly. The answer is simple. No trade can be carried on secretly on the same scale and with so much profit as it can be publicly. Publicity, advertisement, are well-recognised adjuncts of prosperous trading. Every tradesman knows it. The majority, indeed, have laid stress on the injurious consequences of the public display and advertisement of brothels. The clandestine prostitute has to take precautions which make her trade precarious, dangerous and costly. Most of the inmates of the present brothels simply cannot afford to be clandestine prostitutes, and it is monstrous to suggest that women who are not such now will come forward to take the place of the inmates of the suppressed brothels. The next contingency feared by the minority is that the five thousand inmates of the brothels will come out on the public streets and ensnare the industrious and virtuous male citizens of Bombay on their way to business. The evidence given before the Committee went to show that most of the inmates of the brothels had been inveigled from distant towns upcountry by the brothel-keepers or their agents. If there were no brothels in Bombay the probability is that these 5000 and odd women would not be here at all. "The steady flow of girls from the mofussil to Bombay brothels," cannot be checked unless these institutions are suppressed.

The remedy of the minority, namely, the levelling up of the brothels to the superior class of them, we are told, "may result in a considerable enhancement of the fees charged by prostitutes, but this would be a step in a right direction rather than the reverse, provided the enhancement was not so great as to drive all the women from the lower class brothels on to the streets." From the evidence it appears that in several brothels the fee charged does not exceed annas 4 while in the superior brothels it may go up to Rs. 50. Rupees 5 to 10 may be taken as about the average between the two extremes. If Government undertake the object which the minority sets them, "to produce in all classes of brothels conditions similar to those already existing in the better class," they will have to find the difference between annas 4 and Rupees 5 or 10 per visitor if the women at present in the lowest class of brothels are not to be cast upon the streets !

The minority observe: "In view of the general toleration of prostitution in India, we should have been prepared to support proposals for recognising and regulating the traffic, but the medical evidence which has been brought before us has convinced us that for the present at least the weekly medical examination is impracticable". We have already shown that there is no general toleration of prostitution in this country. State Regulation has been a hideous failure wherever it has been tried. The medical examination is a farce, and as the men who use the prostitutes are not examined, the enforcement of examination on women alone is useless as a means of preventing the spread of the disease, even if it can be made effective. There are other more serious objections to State Regulation which have been repeatedly exposed. While the minority professes that, for the present, it does not propose such regulation, the course it recommends will in effect involve almost all its incidents except the weekly compulsory medical examination. It will involve inspection of brothels; it will involve the laying down of a minimum sanitary and efficiency standard for brothels; an agency will have to be set up for this purpose, which will be exposed to extraordinary temptations to black-mail and oppress. The moral police in some Belgian cities, said the Matron of the Salvation Army Home who had worked in Brussels, are worse than the ordinary police. The minority recommendations are but a step to the introduction of State regulation and all that it connotes. So far as they can be carried out, they will make brothels more lucrative, and as a consequence, the hand of the brothel-keeper will lie harder upon his proteges. Men with large capital will enter the field, though they will keep in the background, and the institution will develop into a greater social danger than it is in its present condition. More girls will have to be got into them in order to make them pay the larger returns that the increased expenditure would entail. The trade will increase instead of decaying. We regret that the majority, in a spirit of compromise, have recommended that the abolition should be gradual, the sanitarily worst brothels being suppressed first, the less bad next and the better class brothel last of all. This, in effect, will not be very different from the course recommended by the minority. The worse brothels will try to emulate the better, in the hope of staving off abolition. A standard of brothel will have to be laid down in this as in the other case, to enable the agency, whatever it is, to judge between the better and the worse. The compromise shifts the stress of the majority arguments as quoted above to sanitary considerations.

REPRESSIVE LEGISLATURE ABOUT INDIAN STATES.

(Contributed.)

The speech of His Excellency the Viceroy on the occasion of the opening of the autumn sessions of the Central Houses of Legislature was very disappointing from the standpoint of Indian States. The speech adumbrated a measure of legislation for the protection of the Indian Princes as enjoyed by them under the repealed Press Act, in defiance of the considered opinion of the Committee presided over by the Hon'ble Dr. Saprú, the present Law Member. The Press Laws Committee had investigated this question thoroughly. It had invited the Indian Princes to assist them with their views. The Princes declined to give any evidence before this Committee and thus treated with scant courtesy a responsible Committee chosen from both the Houses of the Central Legislature. The announcement therefore of the Viceroy is another proof of the retrograde policy which has been set in motion by the Prime Minister. The extremely indiscreet speech of the Premier and the unsatisfactory and irrelevant commentary on the same by the Viceroy have not been in any way useful in restoring confidence in the country. The Viceroy specially referred to the preamble of the Government of India Act and to the proclamation of His Majesty the King Emperor, but he studiously omitted the only point which called for an explanation.

No sane man was out of his wits because the Premier characterised the reforms as an experiment as every political change is by its very nature bound to be so. It was not even necessary to remind the people that the Premier cannot unmake an Act of Parliament. The only statement which deserved an explanation was about the "steel frame" and it is this which has filled the public mind with grave apprehensions. The crucial point was about the Indianisation of the Services. The Viceroy in spite of his long and irrelevant commentary in his reply to the deputation, which appears to be inspired or in the opening speech of the Councils, has not said one word about this important subject. The Public Services Commission sent in their report some seven years before. Five years have elapsed since the proclamation of August 1917. We put it to His Excellency to state, from how many places, till now the monopoly of the Europeans, have they been ousted? How many of them have been allotted to Indians? We know the tendency of the last five years has been to create new places for the Indians; but this is entirely opposed to the policy of Indianisation. The relevant issue is how many European officials have been divested of their posts in pursuance of the pledges given for Indianisation? If His Excellency had been pleased to place a statement before the public instead of shirking this responsibility ingeniously, he would have certainly received respectful hearing. He has been talking of justice ad nauseam. Does he not see any justice in the demand of the Indians for a substantial share in the services? Has he not seen the fitness of Indians for a real share in the services from his experience of last 18 years? If he will not do any justice to Indian aspirations in this respect, his name would go down to posterity as a miserable failure.

His Excellency has not given any reasons for going counter to the Press Laws Committee. Has any new evidence been adduced to support the demand (?) of the princes in this respect? Will His Excellency be pleased to allow the publication of this new evidence before this new measure is introduced into the Councils? Will the Government be pleased to publish all the correspondence between the Local Governments and the Secretary of State? The unanimous findings recorded by the Press Laws Committee may be briefly summarised as below. That there was no protection given to the Princes prior to the Press Act of 1910; that during the course of nearly 12 years of the existence of this pernicious enactment hardly any necessity was apparent to take action under this Act; that only three cases were instituted of a very insignificant character during these 12 years; that these facts support the conclusion that the Indian Princes are not in need of any protection; that there does not exist any free and independent Press in any of the seven hundred Indian States; that the criticism appearing in the British Indian Press has never been of a disloyal character; that no Press criticism has till now advocated the dethronement of any Prince from his State; that the worst that the criticism in the British Indian Press amounts to is the advocating of the introduction of the British standards of administration in the Indian States; that the subjects of Indian States have no means whatever of ventilating their grievances and the hardships which they suffer in their States; that the forms of administration in Indian States are purely those of despotism; that the autocracy of the Indian Princes stifles all criticism emanating from the people. Witness after witness condemned the policy of giving protection to the Indian Princes. Those who were in favour of giving protection distinctly made it a condition precedent that the subjects of the Indian States should be given the right of free criticism along with any form of protection. The speech of His Excellency does not state that it is intended to secure the right of free criticism to the subjects of Indian States and to provide them with legitimate facilities for the same. This new piece of legislation therefore, is fraught with serious danger to the liberties of the subjects of Indian States, and we earnestly appeal to all newspapers to strongly condemn this measure which is entirely opposed to the recommendations of the Press Laws Committee.

PARSI POVERTY.

Professor P. A. Wadia, Hon. Secretary of the Parsi Charity Organisation Society, has written an interesting report based on an analysis of 156 cases into which careful personal investigation had been made by voluntary workers; and which were selected as typical out of a total of 570 cases that were brought to the notice of the society. The society has consistently discountenanced the system of periodic doles except for the old and decrepit who are absolutely helpless.

Taking the figures of single widows in the first instance we note that out of the 18 single widows who live in Ashrams, 10 are unfit for work, and get an average help of Rs. 14/8 per month; that the three widows who are fit for work earn an average of Rs. 8 per month, and receive an average help to the extent of Rs. 12 per month. These widows pay a nominal rental of 8 annas a month. We note further that the 85 single widows who do not live in Ashrams pay an average rent of Rs. 4 per month, that out of these 85, 19 are unfit for work and have no earnings and receive an average help of Rs. 14 per month, and that the 16 others who are fit for work earn an average of Rs. 9 per month and get help to the extent of Rs. 18 per month. It will thus be noticed that out of the total of 46 single widows who figure in our analysis, there are 29 who are unfit for work, and that they receive an average help of Rs. 14 per month, and that out of these 29, 19 have to pay a rental of Rs. 4 per month for occupying dark ill-ventilated rooms which our committee believe are unfit for human habitation, which leaves them a bare Rs. 10 per month to be spent on food and other necessaries of life. The remaining 19 widows who are fit for work have a total income including help of Rs. 20 to 22 per month, and as 16 of them have to pay a rental of Rs. 4 per month, they have a total income including help, of Rs. 18 per month which they can spend on food and other necessaries. We also note that out of these 46 single widows 27 are over 55 years in age. We have also noted that 29 of them are found unfit for work. These figures bear out a conclusion which may be corroborated by other considerations—that normally a person gets incapacitated for work at the age of 55—more especially a woman amongst the classes that are helped from charity Funds, whose sole occupation on account of illiteracy is either cooking or doing sewing-work of a simple character.

Turning in the next place to widows who have children and who are dependent on charities we find that their plight is in no way better than that of single widows. Out of the 76 cases analysed we find that there are 14 widows with children who have no earnings of any kind. The average help in these cases is Rs. 28 per month. The average rent is Rs. 7 per month. This leaves to the widow and her children an average of Rs. 18 per month. We find further that the average number of persons in the family including the widow herself in these 14 cases is 8. Thus the help which is given in these 14 cases after deducting the rent amounts to a bare Rs 5 per head. This is all that is left to be spent on food and other necessaries. It must be remembered that in these cases the help from charity Funds constitutes the entire source of maintenance for the family.

Taking the remaining 62 cases of widows with children who receive help, and who are found to have earnings we note that the average help per family is Rs. 17 per month. The average earnings per family amount to Rs. 15/8 per month. The total average resources of a family thus amount to Rs. 32/8 per month. These 62 families pay an average rental of 7/8 Rs. per month. Thus the amount that remains after deducting rent to the family including help to be spent on food and other necessaries of life is Rs. 28 per month. The average number of persons to a family in these 62 cases including the widows and dependents is 8.5. Thus the amount per head that such a family can spend on food and other necessaries of life is Rs. 8 per month. We also find that in the majority of these cases the children are below 18, that is, still schooling, that the widow and children are to a large extent suffering from some ailment or another and are chronic invalids—the complaints most frequent being fever, rheumatic complaints, diarrhoea, etc.—and that in very many cases the ailments are traceable to unhealthy surroundings and bad accommodation. If we deduct the number of school-going children in these 62 families, the average earnings do not exceed Rs. 9 to 10 per month. And as in the case of single widows so in the case of widows with children and their dependents who are capable of earning, we believe that these small earnings, are due to 2 or 3 causes, viz:—

(1) The limited character of the occupations in which women of these classes can be employed—either cooking or sewing of a simple kind.

(2) Even the income which they could thus obtain by work being considerably reduced by chronic ailments due to bad housing.

(3) With regard to the grown-up men to be found associated with these cases, their earnings being limited owing to their being usually illiterate, and working only 15 to 20 days in the month, on account of chronic troubles, as fitters, turners, or carpenters.

Turning to the 20 cases of married couples who are helped, we find that there are 9 couples who get an average help per family of Rs. 19 per month, and who have children dependent on them, the average earnings per family in these 9 cases are Rs. 20 per month, the total resources, including help, in each of these 9 cases thus come to roughly Rs. 40 per month. The average number of children in these 9 cases is 3. Thus each family consists 5 souls. But of the Rs. 40 the rent absorbs Rs. 7 per month, thus leaving Rs. 38 per month to be spent on food and necessaries of life; or counting 5 persons to a family the amount that such a family can spend per head on food and other necessaries is Rs. 6/8 per month. There are 4 couples out of these 20 who are helped that have no children, and who are unable to work, husband and wife alike being over 55. They have no earnings and the help they receive is Rs. 24 per month. These 4 couples pay an average rent of Rs. 5 per month. Thus the amount they can spend on food and other necessaries is Rs. 10 per head. There are 7 couples out of these 20 who have no children, but whose average earnings come to Rs. 16 per month. They pay an average rental of Rs. 7 per month, and they get an average help of Rs. 10 per month. Their total resources including help thus come to Rs. 26 per month; deducting the rent of Rs. 7 per month, the amount that remains to be spent on food and other necessaries comes to Rs. 10 per month.

The number of spinners helped is 12. 11 out of these are below 40 in age. They pay an average rental of Rs. 5 per month. Their average earnings come to Rs. 5 per month, and the average help they receive is Rs. 9 per month. Many of these spinners are weak in mind or chronic invalids, hence their low earnings. Their total resources including help are thus Rs. 14 per month. Deducting the rental of Rs. 5 per month, the amount left to be spent on food and other necessaries is Rs. 9 per month.

Taking all these 156 cases into consideration we find that there are 3 single widows living in Ashrams, whose help and earnings give them Rs. 19 per month; and 16 single widows not living in Ashrams whose help and earnings after deducting rent come to Rs. 18 per month. But barring these 19 cases, in the remaining 137 cases the amount to be spent on food and necessaries of life, even when this amount is supplemented by earnings, works out at a pittance varying from Rs. 5 to Rs. 10 per month per head. Now we are in a position to ascertain the minimum expenditure on food alone for a single individual which will suffice to keep him or her physically fit. The following Budget is fairly representative of the amount required in a month under various heads:—

| Tea | 1 | 0 |
| Milk at 6 sa. a seer quarter seer, per day ... | 2 | 13 |
| Sugar 5 seers | 0 | 12 |
| Eggs 1 per day | 1 | 14 |
| Ghee 4 seers | 3 | 0 |
| Oil for cooking, 2 seers | 0 | 10 |
| Rice | 1 | 14 |
| Daul, 5 seers | 1 | 3 |
| 3 coconuts | 0 | 6 |
| Onions, 10 seers... .. | 0 | 10 |
| Spices | 1 | 0 |
| Mutton quarter lb. per day | 3 | 12 |
| Vegetables 1 anna per day | 1 | 14 |
| Fuel-wood for cooking and bath | 3 | 0 |
| Flour | 0 | 9 |

Thus a single individual requires for food alone Rs. 24 per month to keep him or her physically fit. Even supposing there might be some saving in the cost of items like fuel, wood, ghee, rice, etc., in the case of families consisting of 3 or 4 persons, the amount required per head for food alone will not be less than Rs. 20 per month. Now in 19 out of the 156 cases we have analysed—and these 19 cases, are cases of single widows—the total resources never go beyond Rs. 19 per head, and in the larger majority of the cases they do not go beyond Rs. 10 per month. We have not included in our monthly budget items like clothing, oil for lighting, washing charges, medicines, etc. The majority of these families thus live on starvation rates getting barely enough to keep alive, still less to keep physically fit. They live in the most unhealthy surroundings in dark ill-lighted ill-ventilated rooms, some of them in open verandahs, others in windowless garrets. The majority suffer from chronic diseases which prevent them from earning to their full capacities. Their earning capacities further are limited not only by illness but on account also of illiteracy.

It is these cases that require greater help. The resources of our charity Funds which are ample enough to meet the requirements of such cases are unfortunately scattered and spread over a large field, which include very many cases in which the need for help may not be as urgent, and in which pittances of 4 and 5 Rupees a month only lower self-respect while they serve no useful purpose. We desire expressly to draw the attention of charity Funds to the need of applying their resources to cases like those that we have analysed. Much of the help given in such cases may be regarded as old age pension. In other cases where parties are capable of earning, we believe that a normally healthy woman doing sewing-work at home for 6 hours a day cannot earn more than Rs. 15 to 18 a month. That if she does cooking-work she would earn Rs. 80 a month if she works all the days in the month. We find, moreover, that these are about the only occupation in which women receiving help are found engaged, and that considerable interruption in work takes place on account of chronic ailments. These facts point to the desirability

(1) of providing sanatoria equipped with medical facilities, where people suffering from such chronic ailments would get a chance of cure,

(2) of providing facilities for training the women in such other occupations as would increase their earning capacity,

(3) of providing above all better housing in all these cases.

Our committee believe that the last is the only radical method of getting rid of diseases and ailments which are so largely responsible for diminished earnings and consequent destitution.

It is possible to meet these requirements by starting an institution where (1) families might be housed in healthy surroundings and under sanitary conditions, (2) they might be fed on simple but wholesome food good enough to keep physically fit, (3) they might have proper medical advice and treatment when ill, (4) they might have proper facilities for the education of their children, and for their own training in such occupations as would increase their earning capacity. In order that such families may not lose their sense of self-respect nor have their finer susceptibilities benumbed, the members of such families who are fit for work, should contribute out of their earnings towards their own maintenance a sum not exceeding a certain percentage of their earning or not exceeding a fixed sum per month per head.

We believe that such an institution based upon the principle of self-help for its inmates to the extent of its possibility can be easily started, equipped and maintained if our charity Funds will only join forces, and instead of running on in present grooves and helping the poor to prolong their miserable existence in revolting conditions, agree to contribute towards such an institution to the extent of their resources for such purposes as would fall within the scope of the objects for which the charities have been founded. Should there be any deficit the flow of Parsi charity is still full and strong enough to make up for it.

SACRAMENT OR SALE ?

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I share your gratification in the fact that your publication of the letter by the B. A. (Hons) student and of my letter criticising your comments thereon, has evoked certain serious interest among your readers. But I am sorry to note that your correspondents Messrs. Sadanand and 'V.N.' have not fully penetrated into the spirit of my letter.

As regards my ridiculing your 'puritanical horror' at the letter, you were right in remarking, after careful perusal of my letter, that it was couched somewhat lightly, and that I am bound to confess not quite unintentionally. I wish to make it clear that far from ridiculing you, my object was to call forth severe condemnation from your readers, and I am heartily glad to see that my light attempt at justification has evoked the serious thought of several people. My purpose in writing the letter, therefore, was not to justify the B. A. (Hons) student; but the arguments I advanced to mitigate the severity of his crimes were based on an analysis of conditions as they obtain at present. Indeed I do not dispute the sacramental character of Hindu marriages, and I am one with your correspondents in believing that that is the right ideal; but what I say is that in practice the ideal is 'fast losing its hold' upon the minds of people as Mr. Sadanand admits though haltingly. It was needless to recall the pathetic example of Snehalata as of one who maintained the ideal of Indian womanhood, while each one of us can give scores of examples of women who are undergoing, not self-immolation in Death as Snehalata did, but in living self-immolation. I am no less an admirer of the high ideals of Indian womanhood than Mr. Sadanand; but I wish the women were a little less idealistic and more self-assertive.

When I ascribed 'all evils' to the conservatism of the Hindu Society, you will agree with me that I was not far from truth; because by intolerance of any departure from customs, the society makes the actual conditions intolerable. The old ideal is fast losing its hold; so far as my experience goes, young men and women are successfully evading the joint-family system also. Much as we may dislike it, the fact remains that 'material values' have been enthroned over the 'moral and spiritual values'—may be as a result of exotic culture. What then is the remedy? We should either idealise the real or realise the ideal. While the latter is difficult, the former is easy. Hence the methods suggested by some social reformers with whom your correspondent Mr. Gopalakrishnan seems to be disgusted; they desire somehow to accommodate themselves to the actual conditions. If I make a 'fetish' of 'giving scope before marriage for formation of affections', it is due to the desire that the progressive commercialisation of marriages may, somehow, be checked. Even if it were desirable, as I admit it is, it will be difficult to go back to the times when boys and girls of marriageable age emerged fresh from their natural surroundings of Ashramas and contracted perfectly spiritual ties on the initiation of parents. I am no less ardent an admirer of the family virtues of Hindu women than Mr. Sadanand, but, I am not obsessed with the idea that the spirit of self-sacrifice which characterises them is always a conscious exercise of the virtue. If the number of unhappy marriages amongst us seems to be less than in other countries, it is due to the blind docility and uncomplaining endurance of our women as also to the mechanical exercise of family duties by men. If I have referred to the share of husbands in the usual sufferings by saying that 'there are as many oppressed husbands as there are wives,' there is not mere poetic justice in it, but real truth; and I think Mr. Sadanand scarcely does justice to me when he says I indulged in cheap sneers at women. In fact it is useless to indulge in sneers or to blame one set of people or one sex, when the whole society is moving in a vicious circle. I know of lot of cases where both parties are convinced of the unhappiness of their lot, but none of them would venture to confess it except to himself or herself in secret. So that while some husbands complain of ignorance, superstition, foolishness, and incapacity of their wives, the latter, of course, have real long-standing grievances which every one of us should try to get redressed. It is all well to talk of Kula-dharma, Stri-dharma, and Pati-dharma; but are these being practised by people as living ideals?

To come to my previous letter, what I wished to point out was that each individual, being a member of the Society, is sure to be affected by the latter which is moving in a vicious circle; and that the B. A. (Hons) student was influenced, in this matter, not so much by the hostel-life as by the Society of which he is a member. The Society tolerates certain pernicious customs and gives opportunities and offers temptations to self-seeking individuals. Not that this is a justification but that much radical reform has to be made in the actual conditions, before we can expect a really healthy view of marriage from the Hindu youth.

I hope I have made myself clear so as not to be misunderstood, and that you will kindly pardon me for the length of the letter.

Bombay,

18th September, 1922

I am, Sir,

Your's truly,

B. R. R.

THE EDITOR, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

May I say a few words about the controversy on a B. A. (Hons) 'matrimonial letter' to you? You and your critics have certainly been unduly harsh, so far as I feel. The conditions and requirements, that the gentleman wished to be advertised, (letter was not one asking to advertise.—I. S. R.) are really sought for by so many, whether of orthodox or reformed ideas; in arranging for a marriage. This is every day experience. Simply because he was outspoken—perhaps he was caricaturing some Alnaschars ideas—he is put to strictures by Reformers and others. These are not days of romances wherein millionaires pick up a destitute girl in rags and make her their consort, nor a princess Beauty marries any man on whom the elephant puts on a garland. If the girl expects a comfortable home in the husband, it is equally expected of her to contribute to the comfort. If she comes empty handed, empty headed and empty hearted, it will be a real conjugal life! As for empty handedness, let me not be misunderstood. It is really a shame to depend upon any one's—especially on wife's—property, or help. But in case of education it is said that a man may even beg from any one. If so, where is the immorality or degeneration in a young man's accepting the help from the father-in-law provided it is a voluntary one, and there is no extortion of any sort. Have not even Rajas given 'Stridhan' while giving away their daughters in marriage. If some rakes squandered away the wife's wealth, it does not form a rule. My point, therefore, is that so long as the intention of the B. A. (Hons) is bona fide towards the advancement of education, there is nothing objectionable in that advertisement (sic). Or else, any marriage which is the outcome of advertisement, is doubtful in its nature of sacrament.

One word more. One gentleman condemned social reformers wholesale. There are number of middle aged bachelors or widowers who can't get but child girls for marrying; if they remain in the orthodox fold, Will this contribute to morality? Let him answer honestly.

Cawnpore,

12th September, 1922.

SIR JOHN WOODROFFE.

The Bengalee writing of the retirement on the 31st August of Justice Sir John Woodroffe from the Bench of the Calcutta High Court, observes:

His retirement will be keenly regretted by the Indian community among whom he was vastly popular for his deep erudition in law, his great scholarship, and above all his strong sympathy with Indian ideals and traditions. For nearly three generations, his family has been connected with Bengal. His father was the late Advocate-General of Bengal, and his maternal grandfather was at one time, the Chief Presidency Magistrate of Calcutta. Before his elevation to the Bench he was a distinguished member of the Calcutta Bar and was once appointed Tagore Professor of Law in the Calcutta University. As a Judge, he was respected for the even-handed justice that he was always at considerable pains to dispense, and the keen intelligence and comprehensive grasp that he brought to bear upon the adjudication of cases before him. But, more than all this, he has earned the esteem and regard of the Indian community by the unflagging zeal with which he set himself to unfold the truths of the Tantras among English-speaking peoples. In fact, he may be regarded as the discoverer of the Tantra to the West. He is well versed in Indian philosophy and has sympathetic insight into the thought and culture of India. His translation of the tantras into the English language under the pseudonym of Charles Avalon has earned for him the heart-felt gratitude of the Hindus, for it has brought within the easy reach of the West the principles embodied in a whole system of Hindu theological literature, which were so long lying as a sealed book both to the East and the West. Not only the tantras, but the Upanishad, the wisdom and civilization of the Hindus, their educational ideals, the outstanding features of their theology and religion have all been explained by him with sympathy. Sir John Woodroffe is leaving these shores amid the universal regret of the Indian people among whom his life was cast for so many years. It will be long before the void left by a man of such culture and sympathy can be easily filled.

THE INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

The Reformer has entered its 33rd year from this month and on this occasion we are grateful to acknowledge the following words of good cheer from friends in the course of letters received since:

....."The Reformer enables me together with the Indian Witness to keep up-to-date on India. You are doing a good service to India by leading out on social reform as you do."—(Letter from Rev. G. B. Thompson, Hartford, Conn. U.S.A., dated 12th August 1922.)

....."No paper is more welcome in our home."—Letter dated 15th August from Rev. Frank Hart, Bradford, (England).

"Recently read a book by Mr. Daniel Johnson Fleming, 'Building with India', with great interest and profit. In that work, the Author makes mention of your paper and its practical Aims and Ideas, recommending it to Individuals in United States of America as a means to come in closer touch with the tremendous spiritual, moral and social needs of India's Men, Women and Children. Being a firm believer in the ultimate delivery of India from all its moral and social evils through the practical application of the glorious Gospel of Jesus Christ, and its ultimate triumph over all evil, sin, error and miracle, superstition and ignorance, I do most sincerely approve of your noble and effective work for the uplift of India's Millions."—Letter dated 24th July from J. Ziniker, Ocean Park, Washington, U. S. A.

"I have enjoyed reading the 'Social Reformer,' because I believe it gives me a fair idea of what the best people in India think and what they strive for. Thus I hope to be made better fit to help India to rise to higher levels."—Letter dated 6th September 1922 received from Rev. John Theissen, Landour, Mussoorie.

....."Let me once again express how highly I appreciate the Reformer from year to year. Your attitude towards the non-co-operation movement is one which entirely meets with my approval. Wishing you all success."—Letter dated 7th September from a Hindu Reformer at Coimbatore.

"Congratulations on the high tone and good sense of your paper.".....Letter dated 10-9-22 from Rev. H. G. Hanson at Sitapur.

"I am very glad that your paper has entered the 33rd Year of its most useful career. To you belongs the credit of giving a rational basis to the social and other movements in India. Yours is the only paper which takes dispassionate views of men and institutions. I wish a brilliant career to the Indian Social Reformer."—Letter dated 11th September from Mr. B. A. Khandekar at Cawnpore.

ROYAL YAKUTI.

THIS YAKUTI or life giving nectar has been prepared from the best, choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has wonderful properties of increasing virile power and it rectifies urinary disorders. In fact it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to those persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicine. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires. It is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills. Rupees ten only.

The Turkish Situation: The broad facts relating to the Turkish situation seem to be that Mr. Lloyd George's bellicose pronouncements have met with little support from the Allies, the Dominions and in Great Britain itself. France and Italy have refused to co-operate in fighting the Kemalists. The frenzied appeal to the Dominions has been met by cold replies from Canada and South Africa, Australia is non-committal, and New Zealand is the only Dominion which seems to have entered into the plan with any enthusiasm. The Labour Party in Great Britain has plainly declared that Mr. Lloyd George is a danger to the peace of the world. As a result of all these, the Prime Minister has had to draw in his horns, and Lord Curzon has settled with the French Premier to call a Conference to settle the terms of peace between Greece and Turkey. The first sensational messages about Kemalist atrocities have been qualified in important particulars by subsequent corrections. The auguries are in favour of a satisfactory settlement of this problem in which India is so deeply interested, and the only thing needed to make it a certainty is the retirement from the political stage of Mr. Lloyd George who has clearly outstayed his usefulness. We hope we shall have news of it soon.

A Woman's Appeal: We have received a copy of a lengthy memorial submitted by Mrs. Sunderbai Palshikar of Indore, now residing at Cawnpore, to His Excellency the Viceroy, appealing to him to restore to her her husband, a hereditary Sardar of Indore, who, she alleges, has been obliged against his wishes to marry another wife and to adopt an adult son, and who would be glad to live with her in his estates in British India—he, it appears, is also a holder of extensive Inam lands and a Bardar of the Deccan in British India—if he were free to do so. A similar representation made to the Viceroy by her father was recently rejected on the ground that the Government of India saw no reason to interfere in the matter. The young lady's personal appeal to His Excellency may not meet with any more favourable result. Indeed, much as we sympathise with her, we should be sorry if the Government of India started a practice of intervening between the rulers and subjects of Indian States.

But we venture to urge upon the Maharaja that His Highness should withdraw unconditionally and absolutely any restriction placed upon Sardar Krishna Rao Ram Rao Palshikar's freedom to come to and to live in British India. Mrs. Palshikar says: "If the Dewan (her husband) were free himself, he would gladly make application. If he were free he would gladly live on his estate in British India. The only question is who can release him from Indore." His Highness can and ought to do so as the simplest and most effective way of rebutting the serious statements of this representation. We do not by any means accept these allegations as established but they are there in black and white, circumstantially stated, and friends of Indian States, who wish them to prosper and to grow great, cannot view with equanimity such allegations remaining undisproved in the clearest manner possible. We would add that, though there may exist as relics of an obsolete feudalism some quaint rights of rulers to interfere in the domestic and personal affairs of their Sardars, it is ridiculous to take them seriously and act upon them in this twentieth century. We are told that the alleged acts of the Indore authorities have been sought to be justified on the alleged ground that the unfortunate gentleman, whose matrimonial affairs have caused all this pother, is "an imbecile and an idiot" while, according to Mrs. Palshikar, he is only liable to occasional epileptic fits. But surely he is not the only imbecile, idiot or epileptic in Indore and if His Highness undertakes to regulate the affairs of all such, he will, we fear, have little time to attend to the affairs his historic State.

Women Student's Hostels: Speaking at the prize distribution of the Poona Girls' High School, His Excellency the Governor referred with gratification to the success attained by the Boarding Hostel attached to it. He added: "Such schools are not as a rule appreciated in India but their value in education and the formation of character is to my mind very great, and I hope the success of your hostel here will serve to encourage and inspire others to follow the example it gives." We have had occasion recently to say some severe things about men brought up in our College Hostels and of the influence of the Hostels, but there is a general consensus of opinion that Hostels for girl students have been remarkably successful wherever they have been established in India. A valued friend, writing from Madras, where there are several such, observes: "I have not much experience of Boys' Hostels, but I know personally that Girls' Hostels are doing famously and they are practically breaking down the barriers of caste and that too among our women. I will, therefore, request you not to forget this great good, fraught with the greatest benefits to our social life and country, which the Hostel system is doing." Our strictures on Hostels as regards men students were too sweeping, as the root of the evil influences which we had particularly in view extends deeper than these institutions. Several examples have been furnished to us of this fact by correspondents whose letters are not intended for publication. But there are special reasons for the conspicuous success of Girls' Hostels. First among them is that the Indian girl inherits an instinct for self-suppression, which acts as a break on any tendency to a swollen head. Secondly, the girls who attend High Schools and Colleges are generally those who have proved that they possess more than ordinary strength of purpose by successfully struggling against the powerful influences which operate among us against a girl's progress in her studies. There are several other reasons, but these two are plain even to superficial observation.

Guru-ka-Bagh: In our leading article last week on the happenings at Guru-ka-Bagh, we remarked, with reference to the statement of the special correspondent of the Tribune that by a mutual agreement between the Akalis and the Mahant, the Gurdwaras were taken in charge by the former while the lands attached to them were left with the latter, that no explanation had been forthcoming as to how the Akalis cut trees on the lands in contravention of the agreement. The explanation is given in the Gurdwara Committee's reply to Sir William Vincent's statement in the Legislative Assembly. The Committee state:

The true facts are that the Mahant of the historical Gurdwaras of Guru-ka-Bagh was induced in January 1921 to reform himself. He also got himself baptised as a regular Sikh publicly at the "Akali Takht," and was renamed Jogindar Singh. What is most important is that he willingly signed a paper in which he agreed to work under the full control of a Committee of eleven Sikhs appointed by the Shiromani Committee. After the Nankana Sahib massacre, however, when Sikhs began to be arrested in large numbers, this Mahant like so many others felt encouraged to defy the Panth and went back on his pledges. Therefore, on August 23rd 1921, the Shiromani Committee was obliged to take charge of the institution into their own hands. In this they were quite justified in accordance with the previous agreement with the Mahant as well as by the inalienable right of the Panth to control the Gurdwaras.

The Gurdwara Committee in this document makes another striking statement. It says that when the Police Superintendent, Mr. Macpherson, went to Guru-ka-Bagh, at the request of the rejected Mahant, he, after studying the facts, confirmed the possession of the Sikhs and left a body of Police to protect the Akalis in charge of the place. In corroboration of this, the Committee mentions that, after some time, when the danger of an attack from the Mahant's party was over, the Superintendent of Police wrote to the Gurdwara Committee that he wanted to remove the Police guard unless the latter wished to retain it at its own cost. Another point made by the Committee is that the portion of land from which wood was cut, has always been attached to the Gurdwara and that it stands in the name of the Gurdwara in the Revenue records and not in the name of the Mahant as stated in the official communique. These are all facts that are easily capable of verification and if they are found to be as the Committee states, the main reasons given in the official communique in justification of the action of the District and Police officials fall to the ground. On the other hand, the Committee's statement that the Police originally were left at Guru-ka-Bagh to protect the Akalis against a probable attack from the Mahant's side, shows that the Police at any rate were perfectly neutral as regards the religious aspect of the dispute.

Sir George Lloyd and Non-Co-operators: His Excellency the Governor of Bombay opened the current Legislative Council Session on Thursday with an address reviewing the political and economic conditions in the Presidency. Sir George Lloyd is entitled to take full credit for acting within the ordinary laws in dealing with the Non-Co-operation leaders, but His Excellency, we think, might have spared a generous word or two in recognition of the high principles inspiring them and especially Mahatma Gandhi, whom it is an abuse of language to charge with "exploiting" national feeling and patriotism. His Excellency referred to the rumour that Congressmen intend to seek election to the Council and, unlike the Prime Minister who threatened to reconsider the Reforms if Non-Co-operators were returned, Sir George Lloyd declared that he "looks forward with confidence to the time, when all sections of political thought who are bent on constructive work will seek election to the Councils and thereby enhance their value not only as a legislative but as an educational machine in the art of self-Government for the people at large." This is the statesmanlike way of looking at the question, and we trust that, when the time comes, His Excellency will be able to remove every obstacle from the way of the all he electors' exercising perfect freedom in the choice of their representatives in the Council.

An Unconstitutional Precedent: When the gaps in the Reforms scheme were pointed out, the answer was that it was intended that they would be filled up by the growth of usage and precedent. Injurious precedents seem to be growing up more vigorously than wholesome precedents—constitutional tares faster than the wheat. The Bombay Government, for instance, proposes to re-introduce in the forthcoming Session of the Legislative Council a Bill to tax entertainments which was rejected in the last Budget Session. The constitutional result of the rejection, in a responsible system, would have been the resignation of the Ministry which introduced the Bill. This, of course, is provided against by the Reform scheme under which Finance is a reserved subject. But surely, it is an astonishingly unconstitutional procedure to bring in the rejected proposal before the same Council in less than twelve months. It has the appearance of an attempt, on the part of the Executive Government, in its entrenched position, to weary out the Council into passing a measure which it has set its heart upon. The Bombay Bill is a small measure, and on its merits it should not have been rejected by the Council when it was first introduced. But having been once rejected, it is wrong to bring it up again as an isolated proposal before the next Budget.

A Defect in Marriage Registration:—In annulling a marriage registered under the Indian Christian Marriage Act on the ground that the girl-bride was in a state of bewilderment and was not in a consenting mood when she went through the formalities, Mr. Justice Coutts-Trotter of the Madras High Court made some observations which apply as much to registration under the Special Marriage Act as under the Indian Christian Marriage Act. His Lordship said:

I confess I am utterly at a loss to understand why the Act contains no provisions for the communication of notice of the intended marriage to the parent or the guardian of the minor concerned. A provision that the notice of the intended marriage shall be posted up in the Registrar's Office seems to me to be no protection whatever. It can only serve at best to verify a suspicion already entertained by the guardian, and obviously the case to be provided against is one where the whole business is deliberately kept from the knowledge of the guardian till the mischief is done. In this country Indians and Anglo-Indians of mixed race, such as are the parties in this case, are familiar with the notion of marriages at an age repugnant to European sentiment. I trust that this case will induce the legislature to take some steps to secure by amendment of the Act that it is made a part of the duty of the Registrar to endeavour to communicate notice of the intended marriage to the parent or guardian of any minor who is about to be married.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1922.

SOME PENDING SOCIAL LEGISLATION.

Quite a number of Bills has been introduced in the Indian Legislature during this Session and a few of them relate to social matters. The Bill to amend the Parsi Matrimonial Act is intended to obviate a difficulty felt in the trial of Parsi matrimonial cases. The present Act requires eleven delegates in the Chief, and seven in the District, courts to assist the Judge trying such cases. It has been found difficult to secure the continued attendance of so many delegates when a case is prolonged beyond one day. The amending Bill permits the trial to proceed if nine or six delegates are present throughout the proceedings in a Chief or District Court respectively, and also, in consequence, it gives a casting vote to the presiding Judge if the delegates are equally divided on an opinion on the facts. Mr. M. K. Reddy's Bill is the same as his original draft which we published on the issue of the 18th June. It is officially entitled 'a Bill to amend the Hindu Law of Succession.' The more correct description of it will be a Bill to extend the Hindu Law of Succession. We reprint the draft Bill for convenience of reference and the statement of objects and reasons appended to it. The pre-ambule seems to require radical revision. The second clause regarding the application of the term, Sudras, implying as it does that it is rightly applied to some but not to others at present, should not find a place in an Act, and is, in any case, unnecessary in a Bill which aims at a uniform law of succession for all Hindu castes. The third clause of the preamble affirms that it is desirable that in the Hindu Law of Succession there should not be any distinctions based upon caste. The question really, however, is, to what castes does the Hindu Law of Succession apply? Does the Hindu Law of Succession include any local or caste customs which, according to the well-known maxim, over-ride the written law? Is it possible to assimilate the Law of Succession of all Hindus without assimilating their Law of Marriage? The second and operative section lays down that "the illegitimate son of a Hindu of any caste shall not be entitled to inherit &c." We have stated before the objections on principle to this wide disinheriting measure. We have also stated the practical objections to it in view of the wide variety of marriage customs among the castes not coming at present within the scope of the Hindu Law. The yoke of the Hindu Law of Succession sits heavily on the shoulders of those who are subject to it and several attempts have been and are being made to lighten it and make it more in accord with modern ideas. Instead of co-operating with those who are trying to do this, Mr. Reddy, in the supposed interests of a class, has introduced a Bill for penalising unborn generations for the acts of their parents. It is quite true that the castes comprehensively grouped as Sudras have much advanced socially and that the marriage tie among them is as rigorous as among other Hindu castes. Mr. Reddy thinks this is a reason for the Bill, but it is clearly one and a strong one against it. With the strengthening of the marriage tie, the right of illegitimate sons to inherit will not affect any considerable number of persons, and it will be a wholesome check on those whose passions can be controlled only by considerations of property. The Bill is now before the public and we trust it will be carefully discussed from all points of view.

Of quite a different type are the Bills for the amendment of the Special Marriage Act so as to leave out the offensive and inquisitorial declaration regarding religious belief, for the abolition of imprisonment as a penalty for enforcing a decree for the restitution of conjugal rights on women, and for the admission of women to the legal profession, all of which stand to the credit of Dr. Gour. The motion to refer the first Bill to a Select Committee was carried by a majority of only one. This, it will be remembered, was refused at the previous session by an identical majority. The opposition to the Bill was of the stereotyped kind, and we doubt if all the objectors were serious. The opposition of the Mahomedan members to the Bill is altogether beyond our understanding. They themselves enjoy the benefit of what is practically a civil marriage law, and it is inexplicable why they should be anxious to prevent members of other communities from having a similar law passed for their use. As for the Hindu opponents of the Bill, we would ask them to consider seriously to what plight the Hindu Marriage sacrament has been brought owing to blind opposition to salutary reforms calculated to preserve the spirit which animated the ancients who formulated it. If there is a simple Civil Marriage Law, such as that proposed by Dr. Gour, there will be greater chances of the Hindu sacramental marriage being restored to its original purity. A Mahomedan or a Christian or Buddhist can practically marry any one he likes without professing to give up his or her religion. A Parsi also can do the same, although a section of that community is opposed to intermarriages. Thus, although the declaration under the Special Marriage Act is drawn up so as to seem to apply to all religions, in practice it is only the Hindu who is affected by it. The Hindu Missionary Society, we think, should be now convinced that its device to overcome the difficulty is not legally valid in any case where the parties can not marry under the ordinary Hindu law and usage. It is impossible not to regard those who oppose the passing of a simple Civil Marriage law as active agents in the progress of the social disruption which is visible in Hindu life today. We trust that public opinion in the country will find such expression in the interval between now and the next Session of the Assembly as to shame these men into acquiescence. The legal procedure known as the restitution of conjugal rights, is utterly repugnant to Indian ideas and is an importation from Christian ecclesiastical practice. It has been abolished in England, and should have disappeared long ago from the Indian statute book. At the present day, it is chiefly used by vindictive young men as a weapon to coerce fathers-in-law who wish to keep their young married (betrothed) daughters, until they are of proper age, under the parental roof with a view to give them a good education. We are glad that the motion to refer this Bill to a Select Committee was accepted by a substantial majority in the Assembly. The Bill to admit women to the legal profession needs no comment. It is rank injustice to deny women who qualify themselves for the legal profession the right of putting their training to profitable use. Another measure now before the Bill of a social character is the one to do away with the prescriptive right of Hindu priests to exact payments from residents of their villages, whether or no they officiate for them. The Hon. Professor Kale made an excellent speech in the Council of State in support of this Bill. The practice it seeks to put down is an anachronism and it is a good deal responsible for the misunderstandings between Brahmans and non-Brahmins in Maharashtra. It is a flagrant infringement of the sacred principle of religious freedom, and must go.

BOMBAY PRIMARY COMMITTEE'S REPORT I.

The Committee of the Legislative Council, appointed by the Government of Bombay to consider and report on the question of the introduction of free and compulsory primary education in this Presidency, has made an illuminating report. It had for Chairman, Sir Narayan Chandavarkar, the President of the Council, and the value of his guidance is visible in many parts of the report. It recommends that universal compulsory education for both boys and girls should be the goal aimed at, and it holds that free education is the natural corollary of compulsory education. The practicability of introducing free and compulsory education is discussed both from the point of view of the popular opposition such a step might have to encounter and from the point of view of finance. On the first point, the Committee is of opinion that in the Deccan, Konkan and the Karnatak—that is, the Marathi and Kanarese speaking districts of the Presidency—a good deal of propaganda work has been done by social and political leaders to pave the way for compulsory education and that its introduction in these districts for boys will not meet with serious opposition and that the people generally are ready for such a measure. As regards Gujarat, in view of the evidence of many witnesses and of the general conditions, the Committee thinks it will be necessary to proceed with caution. As Gujarat, to use the words of the Committee, "is educationally the most advanced area in the Presidency," in point of literacy, very little behind Baroda where compulsory education was introduced 15 years ago, this recommendation comes rather as a surprise. The Committee observes :

We consider, however, that the conditions in Gujarat are far less favourable for the introduction of compulsory education than in the Deccan. The population is far less homogeneous, and the wealth of Gujarat has produced a far larger proportion of dependants on well-to-do cultivators than is to be found in any Deccan village. Disturbed political conditions may have also temporarily affected the attitude of the people, but the root cause is undoubtedly ethnological and economic.

As Gujarat is educationally the most advanced area in the Presidency, the conditions mentioned in the above passage can not be said to have led to less appreciation of the value of education there than in the Marathi and Kanarese-speaking districts. It is, then, as conditions likely to result in greater opposition to compulsion that they must be understood. The Committee dismisses the effect of "disturbed political conditions" as temporary and negligible and describes the "root cause" for its apprehension as being "undoubtedly ethnological and economic." On the other hand, it seems to us that "the disturbed political conditions" are almost wholly responsible for the impression formed by the Committee from the evidence before it and that as these are temporary, they do not form a sufficient basis for the differentiation made between the conditions in the other parts of the Presidency proper and Gujarat. Two circumstances, both of them telling against the Committee's "ethnological and economic" reasons, led to the persons who tendered evidence before the Committee believing that the opposition to compulsory education would be greater and that, therefore, a more cautious approach should be made to it in Gujarat than in other parts of the Presidency proper. These are, the greater success of the non-Co-operation movement in the districts speaking Mahatma Gandhi's own mother-tongue and the absence of the stimulus of Brahmin-non-Brahmin rivalry. The witnesses from Gujarat all belonged to the political party which has had a hard struggle for existence against the influence of the greatest Gujarat leader of our time. They were likely by a natural metathesis to conceive opposition to them as opposition to all good causes, including that of compulsory education. They might have also reasonably apprehended that the Minister for education being one opposed to the Non-Co-operationists, a scheme of compulsion initiated by him might encounter strong opposition from the Non-Co-operationists who are strong in Gujarat.

The strongest demand for compulsory education in the Deccan and the Karnatak came from the non-Brahmins who have realised that it is their want of education that has left them behind Brahmans in the public Services and in public life generally. There is no such Brahmin—non-Brahmin emulation in Gujarat. The Committee's observation that the population of Gujarat is far less homogeneous than in Maharashtra and the Karnatak, strikes one as startling in view of the remarkable absence of acute communal controversies such as the Brahmin-non-Brahmin and Brahmin-Lingayat controversies in the latter provinces. Other and positive grounds may be advanced in support of the opposite view, namely, that there is greater homogeneity among the people of Gujarat—cultural and ethnological—than in Maharashtra or the Karnatak or the Konkan. As for the economic ground, stated by the Committee, there are two considerations which militate against it. In Bengal where there are big Zemindars, agricultural wealth has undoubtedly led to a lot of supine dependants. The land tenure of Gujarat, except to a very limited extent, is calculated rather to breed a sturdy peasantry such as the Patidars are. Then, again, the strong trading tendencies of Gujaratis are a powerful counteracting influence against a life of dependance. With due deference to the greater experience of the members of the Committee, the two grounds specially stated by them for their opinion that compulsory education will meet with greater opposition in Gujarat than elsewhere seem to us to be singularly ill-chosen. Sind, of course, stands in a category by itself. It is a curious fact that the most advanced Mahomedan communities in India are to be found in provinces where they are a comparatively small minority. Where, as in the Punjab, East Bengal and Sind, they form the bulk of the population, they are backward in all the elements of progress. In the Presidency proper, the proportion of Musalman children, boys and girls, attending school, is much ahead of all except Brahmans. In Sind, where Mahomedans constitute three-fourths of the population, and the Brahman-non-Brahman division among Hindus has no educational significance, there are proportionately less Mahomedan children attending schools than non-Brahmins in the Presidency proper. This is a point worth consideration by advocates of the communal principle in politics. This principle may be paraphrased as leaving every community to stew in its own juice.

MRS. BESANT'S TWO VOICES.

Mrs. Annie Besant delivered an address in Bombay on the 31st August on "How to win Home Rule." In that address, referring to the question whether India should have Swarajya within or without the British Empire, she said, according to the report in the Times of India of the 1st September :

We only ask you to pass our constitution that it may become an Imperial Statute as the Australian Convention made the constitution that was turned into an Imperial Statute in Westminster. In saying that, the speaker continued, she was leaving open the question whether or not they wanted to remain in the British Commonwealth. She herself believed that India and England together could do for the world and humanity what neither of them could do alone. She believed that the greatness of both nations depended on their connection, but the only way that connection could endure was if India was an equal partner in the Commonwealth and helped in ruling the Commonwealth as well as in ruling herself. Indians had a right to rule their own affairs, and they had been promised that the right would be theirs.

The Bombay Chronicle report of the address was reprinted in Mrs. Besant's New India of the 5th September, and in it her remarks on this point were summarised thus :

If they wanted to remain in the British Commonwealth, then India should be taken as an equal partner in the Commonwealth and help in ruling the Commonwealth as well as ruling India.

We were not able to attend Mrs. Besant's lecture. But these two versions in the two Bombay English dailies of what she said, seemed to us, and we said so, to approximate to the amended Congress creed adopted at Nagpur, which runs thus :

The object of the Indian National Congress is the attainment of Swarajya by the people of India by all legitimate and peaceful means.

Mrs. Besant repudiates this vehemently in a note which she has sent from Simla to New India of the 13th instant. She writes :

I said, as I have said all along, that I do not presume to dictate to India whether she shall not remain within the Commonwealth, but that I shall use whatever power I possess to persuade her to remain therein, that I believe she will ruin herself and England if she leaves it, and that I will not co-operate with any who seek to break that connection fraught with good to the whole world. I left the Congress when it left that connection an open question in its policy, and I am not in the least coming into line with it. The Right of Self-Determination I am bound to admit in every Nation, and, as I have always said, I cannot deny it to India. But the matter is not to me "an open question," and never has been.

Even in this note she does not repudiate the reports of her address, but, on the contrary, says "it is charitable to believe that the writer in the Reformer had not seen the report of the lecture." Well, we have given above the relevant passages, as reported in the Bombay papers, and reproduced in New India without comment or correction, and the reader can judge for himself how far the Simla version of the speech is borne out in the reports of it in the Times of India and the Bombay Chronicle. From Simla she writes that "the matter is not to me an open question and never has been," and "I will not co-operate with any who seek to break that connection" between England and India. The Times of India report, on the other hand, explicitly affirms that, "the speaker continued, she was leaving open the question whether or not they wanted to remain in the British Commonwealth" and, further, she said that there was no reason why even those who were for the boycott of the Councils and for strict obedience to the National Congress should not come to this conference and discuss with others what would be the best way of winning home rule for India very rapidly.

Mrs. Besant is not a young amateur platform athlete, but a world-famous speaker of mature powers. One can understand the former blurring out what comes uppermost to their lips, and then, finding fault with the reporters for misrepresenting them. Not that the reporting in Bombay is distinguished for its accuracy, but neither is the speaking in Bombay. If Mrs. Besant has not been correctly reported, she should say so. If, on the other hand, things in Simla appear in a different perspective than the same things in Bombay, she should say so. She has no right to say one thing in Bombay and try to make out from Simla that it was just the opposite of what she said. It is very difficult to co-operate in a Conference, the chief promoter of which, "it is charitable to believe," changes her mind according to the altitude of the place she happens to be in.

LONDON LETTER.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Aug. 31st, 1922.

MURDER OF MICHAEL COLLINS.

The death of Mr. Arthur Griffiths came as a tragic blow to Ireland, and the question as to who would replace him was not answered, when the murder of Michael Collins, the Commander-in-Chief of the Free State Army, shook that country from end to end. That Mr. Collins's life had been in danger for weeks was well-known, that he was marked down for dispatch by the Republican party was also known, for more than one attempt had been made on his life, ere he lost it, caught in an ambush near Cork. His last words were for the men who had killed him, and for them he asked forgiveness. Of all the figures that have come to the front during the last few years in Ireland, Michael Collins was the most romantic. Fine in figure, with a handsome face, fearless in manner, frank and courteous to all, he was a man in very truth to win the hearts of his people. He was accordingly beloved by his followers, even as he was feared by his enemies. Perhaps the greatest compliment the Republicans paid him was when they singled him out for death; they knew his power, and knew he was a leader not easily replaced. Messages of condolence, and expressions of horror at the wanton cruelty of killing in ambush one of Ireland's most heroic figures, have been sent to the Irish Free State from all parts of the world. Mr. Hughes, the Australian Premier, in his message, called the Republican party in Ireland, a band of cowardly murderers, and said; "If any man had proved himself a lover of Irish liberty, it was Michael Collins. I cannot think for one moment that the Irish will ever condone this shocking and brutal crime."

It is difficult at the present moment to estimate the effect of the loss of Michael Collins on the immediate course of affairs in Ireland. That there will be a stiffening of the Free State Party is certain, and though the order has gone forth that there must be no reprisals, the fighting will certainly become more bitter, and no attempts at a compromise will now be possible. The loss of Arthur Griffiths and Michael Collins will mean the necessity of enlisting new blood in the Irish Government, and it is possible and probable that Irishmen, who many years ago ceased to take part in purely domestic affairs and who took service in other parts of the British Empire, will rally round Ireland now, return to her, and place their years of experience and knowledge at the service of the Free State, so that the dreams of the two lost leaders, Arthur Griffiths and Michael Collins, shall come to full fruition.

PEOPLE'S VOICE LEAGUE.

The statue of Liberty ought to be transported bodily across the Atlantic and placed in Liverpool harbour, said a well-known American anti-prohibitionist to a press representative on Saturday last in London. "You are one of the few free countries left," he went on. "You treat Bolsheviks, for instance, as they should be treated, by letting them talk as much as they like and not attaching undue importance to them." He then gave a few facts showing what he considered to be the absurdity of American cranks. A Bill is to be introduced in the Congress to prohibit totally the selling or growing of tobacco in any shape or form. Already in Kansas it is illegal to smoke in public. The State of Texas has made it illegal to tip. "Altogether," said our American visitor, "a strong movement is being made to enforce the old Puritan laws, which, among other things, would make it illegal to publish any Sunday newspapers, or even for a man to kiss his wife on a Sunday, even in private. The only way to combat this repression is by letting the people themselves voice their wants, and the way to do this is by using the People's Voice League. We, of this League, are out for liberty, not licence, and when I get to Washington with 25,000,000 of voices behind me, the Gamshoe Reformers will find their jaws a little muzzled," concluded the anti-prohibition leader.

WOMEN MAGISTRATES AT SCHOOL.

Women magistrates from all over England are meeting this week and at school at Oxford, to learn the art of dispensing justice at petty sessions. There are between 60 and 70 of them gathered together, many being women of title, and the others women who have graduated through public service and come originally from working-class homes. All are of mature age and most are married. With very few exceptions all are used to the bench, but they are taking their work seriously, and wish to investigate the difficult problems of treatment in reformatory schools, the enforcement of maintenance orders when husband and wife are separated, the case of the prostitute and the value of putting first offenders on probation. Each day, informal conferences are held where the women assembled to exchange experiences and talk over difficulties, and a course of lectures has been arranged in which the vital problems of J. P.'s are dealt with. It is suggested that a similar Congress for men-magistrates would be an advantage to the country. At the present time there is too wide a discrepancy in sentences passed by different benches for the same offence, and much more use might be made of the first Offenders Act than at present is made of it.

REVIVAL OF RURAL INDUSTRIES.

On the recommendation of the Development Bureau, the Treasury have made a grant towards the establishment of a Rural Industries Intelligence Bureau. The Committee is composed of representatives of associations and bodies, including the Board of Trade, Ministry of Health, Ministry of Labour, Ministry of Pensions, etc. The Bureau is to pay special attention to the revival and extension of rural industries, and crafts, which, with proper organisation and development, can be rendered sound and profitable; the establishment of new industries, which up to now have not been carried on in this country, provided that such industries are suitable to rural districts, and that handicrafts form the chief element in them, and that they will yield a fair reward to the worker. In connection with the Bureau, a co-operative trading society is to be established. There will be show-rooms and warehouses and all will be entirely free of Government control. The functions of the trading society will be to supply raw material of every description, or half finished goods, or parts of goods, at wholesale prices to isolated or groups of workers, engaged in rural industries and handicrafts; and also the hiring out of plant and equipment such as looms, sewing machines, tools, etc. The Development Commissions have been particularly impressed by the opportunities which a revival of village industries would offer to many disabled ex-service men.

FRANCE AND REPARATIONS.

The Reparations Commission established under the Treaty of Versailles is endeavouring to find a solution of the difficulty presented by Germany's failure to fulfil her financial obligations under the Treaty. The French Government has been borrowing money from the French people for the purpose of reconstruction in the devastated war zone upon the guarantee of German reparation payments. Now Germany demands a moratorium for cash payments, and France demands against Germany productive guarantees as the condition of such a moratorium. The question facing the Reparations Commission is how to satisfy France without injuring Germany so vitally as to precipitate a financial catastrophe that would immediately involve all central Europe and ultimately almost all the other European countries, France not excluded.

MR. SASTRI'S DISAPPOINTMENT.

News from Vancouver, British Columbia, indicates that, so far from repeating the success of his tour in Australia and New Zealand, Mr. Sastri is unlikely to be able to persuade the Government of the Canadian province to the acceptance of the doctrine of equal treatment for domiciled Indians. The Provincial Government, which is a liberal one, appears to be dependent upon the Labour vote, which it is fearful of alienating. Evidently Labour in British Columbia, has yet a lot to learn; and Mr. Sastri is fully justified in publicly proclaiming his disappointment, at the attitude of the Provincial Ministry which he has found to be unfriendly to the Indian cause.

PRAYERS OF A SOCIAL REFORMER, II.

Master,

Here are my heart and my soul today,

Here is my deepest love,

Here is all the frail loyalty in me,

All the feeble and wavering will,

All the zeal, all the power of work, all the devotion:
Take Thou these gifts.

Poor gifts are they, and unworthy:

Yet, such as they are, they are thine.

Take me today,

And rule me:

Keep me, ah keep me,

Close to Thyself.

Teach me to serve, in secret and humble ways,

Thy brethren, the needy and lost.

KASHMIR.

MADRAS NOTES.

(From a Correspondent)

A SOCIAL DEMOCRATIC PARTY.

In my last letter I stated that with or before the advent of Swarajya a Socialist party is bound to emerge in all the provinces of India. At least in one province the prospect of such a party arising is not so very remote. Of course, I am referring to Madras. The nucleus of such a party is not to be found in the ranks of the Congress organisations in this presidency. Nor should it be sought in the local Labour Unions even. Undoubtedly, these bodies contain a great many democratic elements which will coalesce with the Socialist party when it comes into being as naturally as ducks take to water. But the nearest approach to a Socialist party, is the nucleus round which such a party may be expected to develop in this part of India is supplied by the "Justice" or the Non-Brahmin party.

To none will this statement come as a greater surprise than to the leaders of the "Justice" party themselves and by none will it be more vehemently denied. The evolution of the Non-Brahmin movement presents one of the most curious psychological phenomena of contemporary Indian history. It is one of the most misunderstood, if not the most misunderstood, of modern movements. Of it may be said with truth that it has been misunderstood and misrepresented by no one more than by most of its own sponsors and spokesmen. To its opponents as well as to many of its exponents it always was and still is nothing more than an attempt to secure what is known as Communal representation in the public services and in the Council chambers of the land for the Non-Brahmins. This is in no way surprising when we remember that Mahatma Gandhi himself, who possesses like all great leaders an intuitive faculty for penetrating into the heart of most things, stated some months ago that so far as he could see the Non-Brahmins of the Deccan and Madras only wanted to get the fishes and loaves of office! Nowhere else has the Mahatma gone more sadly astray than in his failure to perceive the real inwardness of the Non-Brahmin movement.

But of late it is coming to be recognised, that, despite the sayings and doings of some of its own champions, the Non-Brahmin movement is essentially a movement which aims at raising all the castes of the Hindu community as well as its so-called Out-Castes to a position of social, educational and religious equality with the Brahmins and that its present attempt to capture political power through the Councils and the public services is only a means—a necessary means—towards achieving that larger and higher end. The present writer has come in for a good deal of friendly ridicule in various quarters for pointing out that social democracy is the distinguishing characteristic of the Non-Brahmin movement, that its aims are more cultural and spiritual than materialistic and that it stands for the destruction of the hereditary caste system which constitutes the direct negation of Democracy. But the fact remains that the Non-Brahmin party is the only party in the whole of India the fundamental plank of whose platform is the breaking-up of the unnatural, anti-social, immoral and Godless system of Varnashrama Adharma. And that is my reason for believing that it supplies the nucleus of a Socialist or a Social Democratic Party in a far greater degree than the local Congress and Labour organisations which, although in the vanguard of the political movement, have failed up to this minute to formulate their attitude as regards "Caste" the principal, if not the sole, obstacle to the advent of a true

Some of your readers may know that the "Justice" party has been latterly taking delight in dubbing itself the "Social Democratic Party", I fear, without fully realising all the implications of that term. Even Mr. C. R. Reddy who has done more than any other individual to popularise that phrase among the members of the party (although he is not the author of the new nomenclature which, as he himself has acknowledged, is the invention of another individual who shall be nameless here) is not, I am afraid, prepared to admit all its socialistic implications as is proved by an interview with him published sometime ago in one of the local dailies. But the new appellation is becoming more and more popular among the rank and file of the party most of whom, thank God, are Social Democrats to the marrow of their bones in the fullest sense of the term. The voice of these younger men is bound to assert itself more and more in the counsels of the party—if there is any truth in the claim often put forward by the leaders of the party that they stand up for social justice. Social justice means economic justice. It does not stand to reason to suppose that a party which set out to destroy the paramount influence of Sacerdotalism in the State and in Society will indefinitely tolerate the by no means lesser evil of the supremacy of Capitalism. In my last letter I appealed to the official hierarchy to encourage and assist the growth of a healthy Socialism in India as that alone will act as an adequate safeguard against the rise of the demon of Bolshevism in our midst. May I similarly appeal to the leaders of all parties here and elsewhere, whether they are for Socialism or against it, to profit by the example of countries like England, France and Germany where the chief, if not the only, force that is keeping Bolshevism at bay is a Constitutional Socialist Party?

THE CURSE OF UNTOUCHABILITY.

THE EDITOR The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

When a powerful current of electricity passing through a wire, the bits of iron lying by it become magnets, but the moment the current stops, they exhibit themselves nothing more than cold bits of iron. This very strange phenomenon was witnessed when Mahatma Gandhi led a powerful movement against untouchability, and when since his incarceration, the crusaders i. e. his followers have lost all zeal. This has been true as far as untouchability is concerned. But thanks to his powerful advocacy and the steady and continuous work of reformers, there is a wide awakening amongst the untouchables themselves.

To trace back, it is the saints of Middle ages and not the Christian Missionaries, as mistakenly supposed by some, who deserve much credit for launching a movement against untouchability. It was Eknath in the Deccan, Ramanuja in the South, Narsi Mehta in Gujrath, Lord Gauranga in Bengal and Ramananda in the North and a bright galaxy of many other saints who led a fight against the dull-headedness and stone-heartedness of Orthodoxy. Is it any wonder therefore if the untouchables, in spite of the degradations and humiliations, cling to Hinduism? They are attached to Hinduism because of the solid and self-less work of these saints. The flag is hoisted long ago by these saints, we have to fight under their banner for the glory of these saints. The glorious day must dawn, when these persecuted men and women will be admitted into Hindu temples to crown the work of these saints.

One wonders how is it that the work of so many centuries could not drive the cursed untouchability from Hinduism? The reason is very plain. When boys are of impressionable age, when their minds are full of enthusiasm, this poison of untouchability, this poison of hating their own fellow-men is instilled into their minds as one of the gospel truths under the broad name of religion.

Boys are taught to hate Shudras, they are taught to hate the Pariahs. When they grow up, they in their turn bestow the paternal legacy on their tender children. Thus this legacy of hatred is handed down from one generation to another. This phenomenon can well be seen in our holy places. These holy places are the castles of Orthodoxy, where religion means hatred of Shudras, Pariahs and widows. The best way to get rid of untouchability is to purge the religion of such heinous godless teachings.

GOD OR CAESAR?

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Some months ago, there was an interesting controversy—perhaps initiated by the Bishop of Bombay—as to the correct interpretation of the Biblical passage, "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and unto God the things that are God's". The Reformer was the battlefield, and you made, if I remember right, your own contribution to it. Some argued that in this passage Christ insisted on allegiance to temporal authority in matters temporal, and that He was against "mixing religion, with politics." Very recently a correspondent of the Manchester Guardian in his narration of his interview with Mahatma Gandhi in the interval between his arrest and his trial, mentioned Mahatmaji's interpretation of this passage.

It will perhaps be not uninteresting to know what a great man of the 19th century, one who had set himself to found, "not a sect, but a religion of patriotism", Joseph Mazzini, the Italian patriot thought of this passage. His remarks occur on page 80 of his "On the Duties of Man" (published by S. K. Lahiri & Co.). He wrote:—

"Thy kingdom come on earth as it is in heaven. Let these words—better understood and better applied than in the past—be the utterance of your faith, your prayer. O my brothers. Repeat them and strive to fulfil them. No matter if others seek to persuade you to passive resignation and indifference to earthly things, if they preach submission to every temporal authority, however unjust, by quoting to you without comprehending them the words "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's and unto God the things that are God's."

"Nothing of Caesar, unless it be such in conformity with the law of God. Caesar, that is to say, the temporal power or Civil Government, is but the administrator and executive as far as lies in its power, of the design of the Almighty. Whencever it is false to its mission and trust, it is, I do not say your right but your duty to change it."

The last statement exactly expresses Mahatmaji's own view of the attitude of the individual towards the State. But perhaps it will be argued that Mazzini was no Christian!

THE THIYYAS OF MALABAR.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I have been closely watching the movements of the Thiyya community for the last few years and their steady advance and improvement have been a source of inspiration not only to myself but to all who have a sincere desire to see them on a footing of equality with all the other so-called higher communities of Malabar. But I am extremely grieved to find that there are some among them who profess themselves to be the guides and leaders of their community, but who are really out to exploit their sympathy and generosity to achieve their own small ends. Any one who was present at the meeting held at Vattampoil Krishnan's house the other day under the auspices of the 'Thiyya Maha Yogam' of Malabar cannot and will not have the slightest doubt with regard to the veracity of my statement, if only they would view the proceedings of the same with absolute impartiality and without prejudice. I do not mean to give a detailed account of the meeting or the motives underlying it, but only some of the outstanding facts which go to show that the sole object of its conveners was to hoodwink their ignorant and illiterate brethren who could be easily led away by enthusiasm and noisy demonstrations. The very fact that only Thiyyas were admitted to the meeting and no other community higher or lower than themselves were allowed to take part in its proceedings, is a clear indication that it was not any noble motive that prompted them to do this. If it was really meant for the uplift of their country, for the advancement of their community and for the betterment of their society, I am at a loss to understand why the whole thing was done so secretly. One of the principal speakers in the course of his speech said that the object of the meeting was not to satisfy the personal aggrandisement of any particular person, much less that of Mr. O. Krishnan, but was for their own benefit and it would certainly be a sin if any body took it otherwise. He also said that each and every one of them should be a subscriber to the Mitavadi since it was the only paper in Malabar that stood entirely for their cause and it would be an unpardonable breach of trust on their part if they denied it their due patronage and support. I leave this entirely for men of sense to judge whether the object of the meeting was narrow or not. Do not such, 'guides and leaders' really forfeit their claim to have anything to do with their country or community? Are they not working with some small motive for selfish ends? It is understood that the speaker has appealed for funds to carry out their work. I would seriously advise all the Thiyyas of Malabar to think twice before they do anything. Let them also bear in mind to guard themselves against being employed as catspaw by their so-called leaders.

Calicut 8th Sept. 1922.

[We publish this letter with some hesitation. So far as we can see, there seems to be no justification for the correspondent's strictures on the conveners of the meeting referred to. Ed.—I. S. R.]

CHRISTIAN MISSIONS AND SOCIAL REFORM.

(The Indian Witness, Lucknow, Sept. 13.)

A large number of missionaries and Indian Christians from the Central Provinces and Central India attended the various Mid-India Conferences held in Jubbalpore, September 5-8. The principal address was given on Wednesday morning by Mr. K. Natarajan, editor of the Indian Social Reformer, on the subject, "How can Missions Co-operate in Social Reform in India?" The straightforward, sympathetic presentation of this vital theme excited the greatest interest and enthusiasm. At the close of his address, Mr. Natarajan very kindly offered to answer questions, and for three quarters of an hour a most profitable discussion followed. The more complete the understanding among the various agencies working for the uplift of India, the more effective will the work of each become. Mr. Natarajan's presence in this meeting, and his inspiring address, will go a long way towards bringing about that co-operation of which he has spoken, and which is so earnestly desired by all.

The following resolution was unanimously adopted by the Association :

Resolved, that we have listened with great interest and profit to the address of Mr. K. Natarajan. We are thankful to him for his frank and sympathetic expressions. We feel sure that the cause of Social Reform has received a great impetus from this time spent together, and we have learned many things that will help us in our future work. We wish Mr. Natarajan all success in his work, and we pledge to him whole-hearted support in every way possible. We trust that he will continue to let us know where we can work together in the cause of India's social emancipation.

A HINDU LAW OF SUCCESSION AMENDMENT BILL.

The following Bill was introduced in the Legislative Assembly on the 12th September 1922 :—

No. 25 of 1922.

A Bill to amend the Hindu Law of Succession.

WHEREAS there is difference of opinion as regards the right of illegitimate sons to succeed and their shares in the case of Sudras ;

And whereas the term Sudra is indiscriminately applied to various communities who do not come within that category, and attempts to determine the caste in certain cases are likely to lead to harmful and acrimonious disputes which are not desirable in the public interests ;

And whereas it is desirable that in the Hindu Law of Succession there should not be any distinctions based on caste ; It is hereby enacted as follows :—

1. This Act may be called the Illegitimate Sons' Rights Act, 1922.

2. The illegitimate son of a Hindu of any caste shall not be entitled to inherit or claim any share in the property belonging to the putative father at his death either solely or jointly along with other coparceners, nor shall he be entitled to take the property of the legitimate sons or other descendants of his putative father, either by inheritance or by survivorship.

3. This Act applies to all illegitimate sons whose right has not either been admitted or made the subject of a claim in a Civil Court having jurisdiction to entertain the suit.

4. The right of illegitimate sons to maintenance is not in any way affected by this Act.

STATEMENT OF OBJECTS AND REASONS.

THE difference in the Hindu Law of Succession between illegitimate sons of the three regenerate classes and of the fourth, having been based on the indefiniteness of the marriage sacrament, and looseness of the marriage tie among the latter in ancient times, and they having very much advanced socially, so that the ceremonial and marriage tie among them now is as rigorous as among the first three classes except in the case of a very few communities, it is necessary that this difference should be removed and this Bill is introduced, with the object of making the Hindu Law of Succession uniform for all classes to whom it is applicable.

It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to those persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicine. Its works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires. It is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. —:0:—

The World's Six Greatest Men: The Strand Magazine for September contains an interview with Mr. H. G. Wells. The interviewer wished to ascertain from Mr. Wells the names of the six men whom he regarded as the greatest in history. The eminent writer gave the following in reply: Christ, Buddha, Aristotle, Asoka, Roger Bacon and Lincoln. Christ and Buddha occupy a position of unquestioned supremacy because of the universality of their message, and their inclusion needs no justification. Confucius, Mr. Wells would not include in the list because too little is known of him, and Mahomed, because "there is too much of the clay of human weakness mixed with the finer elements of his character." Mahomed, Mr. Wells added, was the immediate cause of calling forth a power much greater than himself—the Spirit of Islam which, he holds, grew out of the character of the Arab people. "It was, and is, something vastly more significant than the man who made itself its spokesman." This is hardly convincing as the character of the Arab people required the Prophet's advent to produce the Spirit of Islam. Islam has overleapt the barriers of race more completely than either Christianity or Buddhism, and the Founder of that religion is clearly entitled to a place in the universal type of human greatness. Mr. Wells gave as his reason for preferring Aristotle to Plato that while the latter said "let us take hold of life and remodel it," Aristotle said "first of all, let's get the facts." But is not life the biggest fact, and did not Christ and Buddha hold on this point with Plato rather than with Aristotle? Asoka's inclusion in the list was justified on the ground that "he is the only military monarch on record who abandoned warfare after victory." Asoka was a great Emperor, but the reason given by Mr. Wells is neither clear nor convincing. Asoka himself would not have claimed credit for a policy which he adopted under the influence of the teachings of the Sukyamuni. If Mr. Wells had said that Asoka belonged to the world's greatest men because he first proclaimed the principle of religious toleration, he would have been nearer the mark. This he did not even mention among Asoka's claims to greatness. Roger Bacon is included in Mr. Wells' list because he insisted on experiment as the test of truth and that he anticipated by six hundred years the possibility of steamships and aeroplanes. Undoubtedly, he was a great intellect but he is not on the same plane as Christ or Buddha. Mr. Wells hovered for a moment between Washington and Lincoln for his sixth name, and decided for the latter because "America might have imported Washington, full grown, from the old world: she had to grow her own Lincoln." The common test which Mr. Wells applies to all his great men is whether they gave most to or took most from the world in which they lived. He recalled Emerson's observation that the mass of men worry themselves into nameless graves, while here and there a great unselfish soul forgets itself into immortality.

The Problem of the Untouchables: Rao Sahib C. Madurai Pillai, himself a member of one of the depressed castes, speaking at a Conference of these castes at Chingleput, sharply criticised those who urged his community to press forward aggressively their claims to equal treatment. Mr. Pillai pointed out that they had much to gain by not antagonising any party, and that those who favoured a spirited forward policy were responsible for much of the friction between the non-Brahmin party and the untouchables in the Legislative Council. After this it is somewhat surprising to see him condemning the removal of untouchability insisted upon by Mahatma Gandhi as going only skin-deep. The following passage in his address, will be read with interest:

It is put forward in some quarters that Panchamas should be allowed entry into Hindu temples. Here once again let me impress on your mind the necessity of cultivating clean habits. I have seen in several temples especially in Mysore Kapaleshwarar temple (Brahmotsavam) several Panchamas cleanly attired get ingress and egress into the temple without any objection being raised. So long as you are clean in thought, action and body, you could fight out this case with the temple authorities in a constitutional manner and have your grievance redressed in this respect.

It is well that occasionally some one among these classes comes forward to preach the gospel of self-reliance. Mr. Pillay's method combines the innocence of the dove with the wisdom of the serpent in true Biblical proportion as the following shows:

If you separate from the Non-Brahmins, you lack in support and strength with the result that you would be washed away by the rising tide of political parties of modern days. Take care, you are still Panchamas, though you now call yourself Adi-Dravidas or Dravidas and the stigma of this name has not yet been removed. We are just coming forward and have not yet reached the top rung of the ladder. Let us take care of the ladder until then at least. When our position is safe and you feel you stand on Terra Firma, you are free to do so and no one will object to it. Safeguard your main interest first and then fight to obtain more, from those who possess more than you.

Is Lord Reading Going? A Simla correspondent, to whose information our contemporary evidently attaches special importance, writing last week in the Tribune of Lahore, refers to a rumour that Lord Reading is leaving India next month and that Lord Willingdon is to act as Viceroy till a permanent successor arrives in this country. The reasons mentioned for His Excellency's resignation relate to health and differences with the Secretary of State on matters of importance. When Mr. Montagu resigned, we said that the Viceroy's position had become untenable. Mr. Lloyd George's speech in the House of Commons did not improve the position, and the polite refusal of the country to accept Lord Reading's explanation of it, voiced in the resolution of the Legislative Assembly, amounted to a formal expression of want of confidence in His Excellency's stewardship. The certification of the Princes' Protection Bill by a Viceroy who had refused to use his certification powers on the much more important matter of the Budget proposals of his Government, has accentuated this sentiment, and Lord Reading might well think that his further continuance in office would serve no useful purpose. The Tribune correspondent states that Sir Malcolm Hailey, the present Finance Member, will take the Home portfolio on Sir William Vincent's retirement, Mr. Howard who was lately Financial Secretary, relieving him of a charge which he has held with conspicuous ill-success. The correspondent also states that the Law Membership, in succession to Dr. Sapru, was offered and refused by Sir Binode Mitter, and that Sir Chimanlal Setalvad is probably the most likely selection. With regard to the last, a categorical statement was made in a message from Poona in Wednesday's Advocate of India to the effect that Sir Chimanlal has been appointed to the post and that he will leave Bombay on the 15th instant to assume charge of it. This was contradicted in Friday's Times of India. Apparently somebody in Poona will be glad to see Sir Chimanlal promoted out of his present place.

Protecting Indian Rulers: The Government of India have been very anxious to protect Indian Princes from attacks in the Indian Press. We hope that they will be equally anxious to protect them from such executive actions as that taken against Shri Gopaldas Ambavidas Desai who is a sixth class Chief as well as a Talukdar in British India, for co-operating with non-Co-operators. The charges against him are that he refuses to remain on friendly terms with His Majesty's Government in India, associates himself with persons who refuse to co-operate with the Government of India, and that he refused to meet His Excellency the Governor of Bombay within the limits of the Kathiawar Political Agency, and made allegations, by way of explanation, of arbitrary and oppressive acts on the part of the Government of Bombay. The notification proceeds to declare: "A person who adopts deliberately an unfriendly attitude towards Government cannot be allowed to remain in his position of Ruling Chief of State or Estate in India. The Governor in Council has accordingly decided that he must be removed from his position as 6th class Talukdar and consequently from enjoyment of his estate." We thought that there was a rule to the effect that no ruling chief should be deposed without the charges against him being investigated by a commission on which there should be representatives of his order. Especially, when the chief makes allegations of oppression against the Bombay Government, that Government is hardly the proper authority to judge of his conduct. The position of an ordinary ryot would be enviable by comparison with that of a Talukdar, if the latter's estate and status can be disposed of summarily by a Provincial Government on such grounds as those given in the notification.

The Late Sir Bhalchandra Krishna. Sir Bhalchandra Krishna, whose death occurred last week, was one of the few eminent medical practitioners who have distinguished themselves in public life. He attained a prominent position in the Bombay Municipal Corporation and in the old Legislative Council, and was esteemed by all sections of the public for his sound judgment and sober views. He was the first to call attention to the housing problem in Bombay, and if his advice had been acted upon, the question would not have developed to the extent that it has. In all social questions, the weight of his support was thrown on the side of well-considered progress. Temperance, education of women, and social purity, were subjects in which he displayed strong interest. In a composite community like that of Bombay, the need is always great for men like Sir Bhalchandra who deserved and enjoyed the respect and confidence of all. He had one of the biggest practices in Bombay in his own profession, and it was a wonder how he managed to find the time that he did for his manifold activities outside it. He was for many years a sort of general consultant in all public affairs, and ungrudgingly he gave his advice to all who sought it. For some time past, he was not able owing to failing health to take his accustomed share in public life. His death effaces a landmark in the public life of the city.

Mahatma Gandhi's Birthday. The fifty-fourth birthday of Mahatma Gandhi, now imprisoned in Yerrowda Jail, was celebrated in many places all over the country on Monday the 2nd October. The most noteworthy feature of the celebrations was the procession of about three hundred ladies who went to the jail gate and sought permission of the Superintendent to be allowed to see the distinguished prisoner. The Superintendent very politely expressed his inability to grant their request as he said it was beyond his powers. The ladies then requested him to send their offerings of flowers and part to Mahatma Gandhi. After this they gathered at the jail gate, where a birthday song was sung and prayers were offered in total silence for his release. This being over, the party retraced their steps. Mrs. Gandhi was to have had the usual three-monthly interview with the Mahatma on the 3rd next day.

The Press Law in Mysore: The Dewan of Mysore in his address to the Representative Assembly on Monday, announced that action is proposed to be taken for the repeal of the existing Press Law and the enactment of a new Bill more in keeping with the general public opinion of the country. Its main features are:—(1) Permission of Government to edit, print or publish a paper will be dispensed with; (2) The nature of the matter, the publication of which offends against the law, will be categorically defined; (3) No action will be taken against a newspaper without a judicial enquiry; and (4) Any order passed after such enquiry will be subject to appeal to the Chief Court. If it is the idea that a judicial enquiry is to be simply a preliminary to executive action, the new law will be open to serious objection. The whole matter should be left to the judicial tribunal.

Social Reform among Oriyas: We are glad to publish the prospectus of a Oriya Social Reform League signed by several well-known gentlemen of that community. We wish the movement every success.

Manager's Notice: The Manager begs to request subscribers whose subscription has fallen in arrears to be so good as to remit their dues promptly, as much inconvenience is caused, besides expense owing to the enhanced postage, by having to send frequent reminders.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, OCTOBER 8, 1922.

FISCAL COMMISSION'S FALLACIES.

We are indebted to the Associated Press, Simla, for sending us what is called a "long summary" of the Indian Fiscal Commission's Report and the minute of dissent by Sir Ibrahim Rahimtoola, President of the Commission, supported by Messrs. T. V. Seshagiri Aiyar, G. D. Birla, Jamnadas Dwarkadas and Narottam Morarji. The Commission was required by the terms of its appointment "to examine with reference to all the interests concerned the Tariff policy of the Government of India, including the question of the desirability of adopting the principle of Imperial Preference, and to make recommendations." On the main question of the policy to be followed in respect of tariffs, the majority of the Commission, after considering the subject in all its aspects, "recommend in the best interests of India the adoption of a policy of protection to be applied with discrimination along the lines indicated in their report." The adoption of a policy of protection, plainly means that all industries are to be protected, and that if any exception is to be made in case of a particular industry it should be shown that the granting of protection to it is opposed to the general interests. This, however is not what the majority want. Under "the policy of protection" recommended by them, no protection is to be given to any industry which does not satisfy three conditions! It is for the industry concerned to claim protection and to establish its claim to it before a Tariff Board by proving (1) that the industry possesses natural advantages, (2) that without the help of protection it is not likely to develop at all or not so rapidly as is desirable; and (3) that it will eventually be able to face world competition without protection. It is not surprising that Sir Ibrahim and the four others who have signed the minute of dissent, cannot subscribe to this policy which, described by the majority as one of protection, is really the old policy of Free Trade, with a little relaxation in favour of infant industries. That the three conditions prescribed by the majority, which are virtually those required by Mill for the protection of infant industries, are impracticable, is conclusively shown by the fact that in India where the Free Trade policy has been applied with a theoretical refinement unknown even in Great Britain, no industry has been up to now deemed to satisfy these conditions. The recommendation of the majority that the country should adopt "a policy of protection" beset with these conditions, looks a little too much like an attempt to befool the Indian public.

Under an honest policy of protection, the conditions would be exactly the reverse of those contemplated by the majority report. Every industry will have a right to protection unless it is shown (1) that facilities—not necessarily advantages—natural or acquirable for it are markedly absent (2) that protection cannot appreciably help its establishment, (3) and that other countries possess such special advantages for it as to make it hardly worth while for India to think of being able to protect it. In other words, while the majority's "protection" discriminates against Indian industries, true "protection" would discriminate in their favour. This, we think, is what the minority desire, though the Associated Press summary of the minute of dissent, is hardly as clear and convincing as its summary tries to make out the majority report to be. The Industrial Commission of 1916-18 found that India is a country rich in raw materials and in industrial possibilities but poor in manufacturing accomplishment. It also found that when merchant adventurers from the West made their first appearance in India, the industrial development of this country was, at any rate, not inferior to that of the more advanced European nations. Though that Commission was obliged by its terms of reference to make only such recommendations as were "not incompatible with the existing fiscal policy of the Government of India", its condemnation of the laissez faire policy as being responsible for the present backward industrial and economic position of India, cannot but be held to cover also the fiscal policy which is the most direct manifestation of the laissez faire policy. Of the three conditions laid down in the majority report for the purpose of establishing that a certain proposed industry is entitled to protection, the first, if "natural advantages" are interpreted in a reasonable sense, has no practical significance in India. India possesses more "natural advantages" for all important industries than any country that is an actual or may be a possible competitor with her in them. If this condition stood by itself, few industries would be disentitled to protection under the majority scheme. But this does not stand alone. A prospective industrialist must prove before the Tariff Board that without the help of protection the particular industry he wants to start is not likely to develop at all or not so rapidly as is desirable. All that he can do obviously is to show that he cannot carry out his idea without protection, but nothing can be more easy for interested and influential competitors than to produce experts to testify before the Board that not only is protection not needed, but that it will be positively harmful to the industry and to the country. This second condition is a farcical one and it makes one seriously doubt if the majority were in earnest when they designated the policy which they recommend as one of protection.

The third condition, namely, that an industry must be able to show that it will eventually be able to face world competition without protection, in order that it may get the benefit of protection in the home land, is an even more extravagant demand than the second. Who can undertake to say what will be the "eventual" state of "world competition," say, thirty or forty years hence? Supposing, any one has the hardihood to undertake such industrial prophesying, what would be the practical value of his opinions to the administrator or statesman? It is evident that the majority of the Commission have used the word "protection" without a clear idea of its underlying implications. First and foremost of these is that "protection," absolutely rejects and repudiates "competition" as a beneficial principle in international politics or economics. The protectionist or nationalist view of economics is radically different from the Free Trade view. To use the words of List, national economy is "that science which, correctly appreciating the existing interests and the individual circumstances of nations, teaches how every separate nation can be raised to that stage of industrial development in which union with other nations equally well developed, and consequently freedom of trade, can become possible and useful to it." India is yet a long way off from the stage of industrial development in which freedom of trade on equal terms is possible to her with the advanced countries of Europe and America. The majority assume that protection will work injuriously to the Indian masses. On the contrary, it is the masses that stand to gain most in the long run by the industrial development that is sure to follow the adoption of an honest protective policy. Take the necessary article of cloth. The Lanchashire manufacturer may give cloth cheaper than the Indian manufacturer, but the latter gives not only cloth but work and wages too to thousands of the Indian masses. The majority would not impose their condition in the case of industries essential for purposes of national defence, but men are essential for national defence, and every industry which provides work and wages for men in times of peace, is an essential industry for the defence of the country. The majority suggest legislation against dumping, but where is the line to be drawn between dumping and other under-selling? The phrase "with reference to all the interests concerned" in the terms of reference, has, as we expected, complicated the task of the Commission. Imperial Preference is altogether a different question, and should not have been mixed up with the question of the most suitable Tariff policy from the point of view of India's industrial development.

THE NON-BRAHMIN MOVEMENT IN SOUTH INDIA.

Presiding at the first Adi-Dravida Congress held at Chidambaram, Mr. O. Kandaswami Chetti, the veteran social reformer of Madras, reviewed with reference to its attitude to the depressed classes, the history of the Non-Brahmin movement in Southern India, of which he was one of the first promoters, its present degeneration from its original aims, and the course which the depressed classes (and others) should now pursue in order to safeguard their own interests and also to restore the Non-Brahmin movement to its original purpose. Mr. Kandaswami narrated a conversation with the late Dr. Nair in 1917 when the latter wished to rally the depressed classes to his Non-Brahmin movement, and in doing so, he described what his own idea was of how a compact between the Non-Brahmins and the depressed classes would inure to the benefit of the latter. Hindu Society he conceived as being constituted somewhat like the performers in a circus; the Brahmins rode on the shoulders of the Non-Brahmins and the Non-Brahmins rode on the shoulders of the Adi-Dravidas. Thus the Adi-Dravidas had to bear the weight of both the Brahmin and the non-Brahmin. Mr. Kandaswami thought that if the Adi-Dravida helped the Non-Brahmin to rid himself of the weight pressing upon him, that in itself would diminish the pressure upon him, and that the Non-Brahmin would not find it easy to oppress him as he had done in the past, since the very same arguments which he used against the Brahmin would hold good against him if he should persist in his oppression. Some of the leaders of the depressed classes had doubts about this line of reasoning, but the majority accepted it and the compact was made. "It was the support of the Adi-Dravidas," added Mr. Kandaswami, "which gave to the Non-Brahmin movement, if not a democratic character, at least a democratic complexion. If the leaders of the movement persist in their antagonism to the Depressed Classes, the Non-Brahmin party cannot claim to be a democratic party." He showed by references to the speeches and actions of the non-Brahmin party leaders how deeply opposed to the interests and just aspirations of the Depressed Classes, their attitude has become. The greatest act of hostility which the Non-Brahmin majority in the Madras Legislative Council committed towards these classes, was the abolition of Assistant Commissioners or Protectors of these classes in the districts. Mr. Kandaswami recalled that a few days after this resolution was carried, a crowd of Adi-Dravidas appealed to Dewan Bahadur R. Venkatratnam Naidu to intervene between a landlord who was about to evict them from their tenements and were told by a friend who was standing by: "Do not speak of the Non-Brahmin movement. When that resolution was passed on Saturday, the Non-Brahmin movement breathed its last."

Mr. Kandaswami passed on to enquire how this transformation had come about in a party which seemed to have started with the very best of intentions. The three planks on which the movement was built were, he said, (1) Social Justice, with its antagonism to caste in all its manifestations, and its espousal of the cause of the Depressed Classes; (2) Democracy, with its antagonism to class rule, and its advocacy of the equal distribution of the benefits of Government to all classes of people; and (3) redress of the grievances of the non-Brahmins as against the Brahmins. As one who was in the inner councils of the movement when it was started, Mr. Kandaswami was no doubt speaking from positive knowledge when he spoke of these having been the original objects of the Non-Brahmin movement, though in the public utterances of the leaders only the third of these was emphasised, the other two possibly having been uttered in stage whispers to those who were keen about them. However that may be, we cannot help thinking that Mr. Kandaswami rather overshot the mark when he attributed the present degeneration of the movement into a non-Brahmin caste movement to the uncontrolled operation of the reactionary social mentality of Sir P.

Theagaraya Chetti, its leader since the death of Dr. Nair. The very fact that the late Dr. Nair was obliged to seek or accept an alliance with Sir Theagaraya of whose wide divergence from his own public ideals he had had abundant proof, shows that he was prepared to subordinate those ideals temporarily at least to the exigencies of party politics. The truth is that Sir Theagaraya, with his social and religious ideas, more nearly represents the mind of the bulk of his party than Dr. Nair ever did or could have done. The Non-Brahmins in the mofussil districts would never have rallied to Dr. Nair's leadership as they have to Sir Theagaraya's. We do not think that, if Dr. Nair had been spared to the country, the derogation of the party from its high aims would have been prevented. It might have been less precipitate, but the gravitation of the mass would have exerted its steady pressure in favour of Sir Theagaraya's leadership, and Dr. Nair, with his impulsive independence, might have found himself in a cave of Adullam in the party which he did so much to push into power. Dr. Nair drew his intellectual and political inspiration from Western sources. The non-Brahmins as a whole have been very little influenced by Western ideas owing to their backwardness in taking advantage of English education. Sir Theagaraya, although himself a graduate of the Madras University, has been always, it must be said to his credit, a consistent upholder of custom and tradition in his personal and public life which, even political opponents acknowledge with pride, has been distinguished by purity and single-mindedness. He has never fallen down before and worshipped the idol of Western civilization and has always borne himself in the spirit of self-respecting nationalism which has drawn to him the confidence of the people, friends and opponents alike, in such a marked degree. There was a touch of true greatness in the feeling which prompted him to stand aside in favour of younger and less tried men when the reward of victory was in his hands.

While, therefore, Mr. Kandaswami, in our opinion, has laid undue emphasis on Sir P. Theagaraya's leadership as accounting for what are really the inherent defects of the Non-Brahmin party, there can be no two opinions as to the fact that these defects exist and that they seriously militate against the claim of that party to represent a national or democratic principle. It is primarily a movement based on birth as much as the Brahmin caste which it excludes. Its social outlook, as illustrated by the only piece of social legislation as yet initiated by a member of it, is to assimilate the Non-Brahmin position to that of the Brahmin, without any regard to social justice. Mr. Kandaswami's probing criticisms of the weaknesses of the Non-Brahmin party in power, are contemptuously dismissed by Justice, the official organ of the party, as "the ravings of a rebel" but the fact that one of the non-Brahmin Ministers has been obliged to reply to it in a public speech not particularly marked by restraint or dignity, shows that they are regarded more seriously by the leaders of the party. It was really unfortunate that the party, within a few months of its formation, and before it had time to settle down to a considered programme, should have been rushed into office under reforms that had been secured by a movement in which Brahmins had held the helm in Southern India. A few years spent on the opposition benches would have enabled it to throw off its crudities, to base itself on principles rather than on accidents, and to evolve a constructive programme of national regeneration. What is the right course and wise course to adopt for those who wish that South India should come into line with the true national movement? There are two other political parties in that part of India. One of them, the Liberals, consists mostly of Brahmins with a more lively feeling for the maintenance of caste exclusiveness than for the advancement of nationalism. They are really responsible to a large extent by their hostility past and present to social reforms, for the evolution of the non-Brahmin party, and they are the sole justification for its existence. The other, the Congress party, reckons among its adherents Brahmins and non-Brahmins inspired by a higher and broader outlook than the Brahmin or non-Brahmin party. The basic principles of this party are truly democratic in political and social life. The elevation of the status of women to one on equal terms with men and the removal of the invidious rule of caste which more than any other has directly led to the degradation of the depressed classes, are first principles with it. But this party is hampered by the Non-Co-operation prohibitions. When—we hope it will be soon—the Congress removes its ban on the Legislative Councils, its adherents in Madras should decide that the largest proportion of seats possible should be given to non-Brahmin nationalists not as a matter of tactics, but as of right, inasmuch as non-Brahmins are the most numerous section of the community. Brahmin Congressmen in the South, from what we know of them, will rejoice to do so, and that will be the end of the present non-Brahmin party which, having served its purpose, will have no further reason for its existence. Even if some Brahmin Congressmen object, the weight of all-India nationalism will be too strong for them. Mr. Kandaswami seems to suggest that Brahmins and the depressed classes should ask for special representation in the Councils. That is the way to perpetuate and strengthen the present disruptive tendencies.

Bombay Presidency Social Reform Association: We have received the report for 1921 of this Association to be submitted to the General body on Sunday the 8th October at a meeting to be held at the Servants of India Society, Bombay, at 5 p.m. Among the institutions maintained by the Association, is the Hindu Ladies' Hostel, opened in June 1918, to meet the great need felt to provide suitable boarding and lodging accommodation for lady students hailing from the mofussil and studying in colleges and high schools in Bombay. It is working successfully under the superintendence of Mrs. Laxmibai Moghe. On the 31st December 1921 there were on the roll of the Hostel 13 lady students all of whom were studying in colleges. Each boarder is charged Rs. 20 per mensem for boarding and lodging expenses; while the Association has to spend an average of Rs. 40 a month for each boarder. The Hostel is situated in a rented house belonging to Dr. V. G. Rele at Parekh Street in Girgaon and the demand for admission is great and growing. The Council feels greatly the need of greater accommodation and also of housing the Hostel in an independent building of its own and strongly hopes that the generous public of Bombay will enable it soon to do so.

LONDON LETTER.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Sept. 21st, 1922.

THE TRADE UNION CONGRESS.

The Trade Union Congress commenced its sittings on September 6. About 700 delegates were present. As the President made the opening speech under the shadow of a very painful colliery disaster, the note of sombre despondency running through it was understandable. But the colliery disaster was not alone responsible for the despondency. The large reduction in numbers in the strength of Trade Unionism during the last twelve months was responsible for much also. A great part of the Chairman's speech was the old-time tirade against Capitalism and the bogey was trotted out that Capital had a widespread conspiracy to deny the worker every measure of control and freedom, and of course, the speech ended with a call to the people to unite and fight Capitalism to the death. That there is something very rotten in a system which has over a million of its workers idle and living on doles is true, but there is an enormous tribute to be paid to a State or community which realises the bonds of humanity sufficiently to pay for the upkeep of this same million people, who in return do not and cannot, of their own initiative contribute anything to the State that supports them. The Westminster Gazette is right in its criticism of the presidential address when it says that Labour would be well advised to turn its attention from the fighting with Capital which the President called it to, and concentrate upon the larger statesmanship of getting the world's industrial machinery to work properly.

THE BRITISH ASSOCIATION.

Another Congress that has called for a good deal of attention from thinking men and women has been that of the British Association which commenced its sittings about the same time as the Trade Union Congress. At the British Association meetings, many men bearing names well-known in the world of science were present, and many countries were represented. Most of the papers read before it were of a close scientific nature and would fail to convey much to the lay mind, yet the members of an intelligent public must have been sufficient to allow for columns and columns of material called from the British Association papers to be published in daily press, such a paper as "Mind and Matter" occupying nearly three columns of the Times in small type. Beside the invective and show of human passions in the Trade Conference, the slow, calm-reasoning and super-physical atmosphere that surrounded and emanated from the British Association was welcome. It is a relief to turn from the concrete physical matters to the intellectual plane of speculative philosophy and feel the coolness of a larger stream of thought bathing one in its waters.

THE IRISH PARLIAMENT.

After frequent postponements, the Irish Parliament has at last met and this week enters upon its real and principal task, that of passing the Constitution of the Irish Free State. The Bill to enact the Free State Constitution and implement the Treaty was presented by Mr. Cosgrave, the Dail Eireann President. Mr. Kevin O'Higgin, Minister for Home Affairs, who formally seconded the motion that leave be granted for the introduction of the Constitution said that the latter was one which he held to be distinctly fair. Later on he said that "the law and practice of constitutional usage governing the relations between the Crown and Canada should be those governing the relations between the British Government and the Parliament of the Irish people. You come up against that peculiar thing known as the British Constitution which is largely a bundle of fictions, largely a collection of things which have a theoretical existence and which have no existence in fact, and it is only when that is thoroughly grasped that one can read in cold blood without any particular tremor some of the things which are set out in the Irish Free State Constitution. An examination of the Constitution in working will convince the people that we are in supreme authority here. We did not drive the British out of the country and there was little prospect that we should ever be able to do so. They had abandoned some of the inscriptions that were written on their battle standards because it was the best thing that could be done for the Irish people in the circumstances."

Dail Eireann has had to acknowledge that, for the present, the only means of obtaining order is by the military. But in the places where comparative quiet reigns, the Civic Guard is to take control and with the establishment of the Civic Guard will come the newly-appointed stipendiary magistrates. The Irish postal strike is complicating matters very seriously at the present moment in that country and the New Irish Parliament has its hands full of more than one grave difficulty.

A TERRIBLE EXAMPLE OF "MOB-JUSTICE."

Whenever mob-rule breaks loose humanity seems to rush back to barbarism. Such a case, fortunately rare in present-day Britain, occurred just over a week ago in Scotland. A sea-cook had adopted a little orphaned boy of seven years of age, and placed him in the hands of some people to be cared for during his absence at sea. On his return from a long voyage he called for his adopted son, and found the people in whose charge the child had been left absent and the boy dirty and looking uncared for playing with other children in the road. He thereupon took possession of him and boarded a tram-car. The boy was recognised as belonging to the neighbourhood by some people in the tram, and seeing him in the company of a decently-clad man, it was suggested that the man was kidnapping the child. Soon matters became serious in the car, and the man alighted from it leaving the boy in the care of the people who were threatening him. But for some unknown reason the people went mad, the man was hounded down, and stoned and kicked to death ere the police could get the mob in hand. Several arrests were made, but the affair remains a sordid, brutal tragedy and a terrible example of mob "justice."

THE NEAR EAST DISPUTE—BRITON'S DEFECTIVE STATESMANSHIP.

Perhaps the less said of the morality of any of the parties affected by the Near East dispute the better. In all the controversy little if anything is heard about international brotherhood. It is scandalous to think how near we are or have been to a new war without, apparently, the slightest necessity and simply, if the truth were known, to cover up the tragic diplomatic errors of a group of politicians whose claims to statesmanship appear to be singularly defective. These errors ought to put an early end to the present Ministry and its conflicting policies. Coalition can be bought at too high a price. We may not like the Turks; but what right have we to back the Greeks against them, leave our proteges in the lurch in a crisis, and then involve all the world in a dispute that will set the nations by the ears and end in nothing but disaster and misery to vast populations, besides breeding racial and religious hatreds that must inevitably bring forth in their turn fresh wars? When the present crisis is past and we count the cost, we shall have to take a severe reckoning of those responsible for it.

"GURU-KA-BAGH" AND "KURUKSHETRA."

(By MR. S. SADANAND.)

"Kurukshetra" has a religious significance to every student of Indian thought. This is apart from its historical importance as the place where the war of Mahabharata was fought. Each age has its special Message which supplies the spiritual needs of the hour. "Kurukshetra"—the place and the hour of battle saw the birth of the Message of Sri Krishna. The Gita is the bible of millions of Indians. It offers to myriads of souls, an active principle of life. That principle can be summarised in one sentence: Action is thy care and not the fruits thereof. It is immaterial that translated into action, at that time, the advice led to a violent war.

The principal teaching of the Gita is not about a particular act as of the attitude of mind. Arjuna, to whom the advice of the Gita was given, was torn by a conflict between attachment and duty. He wished to subordinate duty to attachment. But Krishna killed the illusion of the attachments. They are the trappings which hold mankind in mock bondage. The soul transcends them. Only duty in service of righteousness matters. The only true relationship of the soul is towards God. Believe in God and Do the Right. That was the Message of Krishna to the distressed Arjun. Arjun's distress was but the culminating effect of the doubts and despair that were shaking his contemporary Humanity.

The Message of Krishna was the message of Freedom for his age. 'Kurukshetra' saw the birth of that message, with the further assurance that whenever Evil grew and Righteousness waned, the Divine Teacher would be reborn and carry the torchlight of Truth again and again as the occasions arose. Thus 'Kurukshetra' stands for the birth-place of Hope and Freedom. The sway of Pagan Rome starved Mankind spiritually. Charity, Faith and Love waned. As Evil predominated, the world grew ripe to receive the Divine Teacher, and Jesus came with His Message of Love.

The Calvary that saw the crucifixion of Christ is but another "Kurukshetra." So is the Buddha Gays that gave the world Buddha. Even in the times of Buddha and Jesus, Duty gave place to Rights which degenerated into the enthronement of Passions. Strength—Power became an instrument of oppression instead of an instrument of service. The result we know. Righteousness was dethroned. There was no Right apart from Might. Force became the arbiter of Destinies. Love that was enshrined under the shelter of Duty was discarded. Love and Duty no longer supplied the motive force.

The supreme need of the hour was complete self-abnegation in the service of Love and Charity. Jesus Christ offered it in His own person. He underwent crucifixion to redeem Mankind. The Truth was dimly perceived. But His message of Universal Love got restricted in its application, to individuals. Political, social and economic organisms continued to be founded on the basis of Force. Individual souls received the Message and attained realisation, but Mankind went on in organised communities in its own way. What happened to the Message of Christ happened to the Message of Buddha. The way of emancipation pointed out by Buddha and Christ became narrowed to individuals in practice, with lip-homage through Churches and Monasteries. That is the lesson History has to teach. In the name of Religion the Catholic Inquisitions were held. In the name of Liberty the horrors of the French Revolution were perpetrated. In the defence of Religion, Crusades were fought. In the name of Civilisation a ruthless colour war has been carried into all countries occupied by the non-whites. The Evil has gathered momentum from century to century that today, even after undergoing the horrors of the great War, the calamities of the Bolshevik Revolution and with famine stalking abroad in Europe, Force still sways the realms of the world. We are far away from any lasting peace.

The terrorism of the oppressor has been succeeded by the fratricidal wars of the oppressed in Ireland and Russia. Qua Vadis—Whither are we drifting? Mankind has no answer but to stare at the next war on the brink of which it stands. At an hour like this, a 'Kurukshetra,' the place, hour and message is wanted. Mankind is eagerly expectant of the promised message and freedom. Certainly Evil has overgrown itself. The hour for the Message of Hope and Freedom has come. But where, when and how? The answer is still in the womb of the future. In a world of darkness, there is just one gleam of hope, one ray of light, that is of great Promise. That is Mr. Gandhi, the person and his teaching of Love or active Non-violence. Have we in Mr. Gandhi's teachings, the real message that the present age needs? There is no conflict as to what Mankind wants. Humanity wants a world where peace and goodwill will reign. How can it be established? Christ and Buddha preached the way but we have rejected it as only the way to individual emancipation. Can societies and Governments be organised on that basis? Is not Love or active Non-violence, the refuge of the weak? Is really Love a greater force than the brute force? Can Love dethrone Force as the final arbiter of Destinies and rule in its stead? It is these doubts of humanity that Guru-ka-Bagh is answering. Bardoli which was chosen for the scene of a great Non-violent combat was to have offered the proof. But Fate has willed it otherwise. The great leader is in prison. The scene has shifted to Guru-ka-Bagh. The Sikh veterans of the war, the violent brave, have succeeded the veterans of the South African Passive Resistance at Bardoli. The issue has also changed. It is not the right of Swaraj, the heroes of Guru-ka-Bagh are fighting for, but the right of religious autonomy. There were many that were sceptical of the success of Mr. Gandhi's contemplated offensive at Bardoli, if it ever materialised. "Guru-ka-Bagh" has vindicated Mr. Gandhi beyond cavil. It is a revolution, more far-reaching than the Revolutions of France or Russia that Guru-ka-Bagh is giving birth to. This great moral revolution is born not like the world convulsions in the midst of fratricidal rapine, plunder and violence, but in the midst of prayer, free from anger, and excitement. Today Guru-ka-Bagh is the Kurukshetra of the world. May we have the wisdom to know the Message and follow it!

SACRAMENT OR SALE?

THE EDITOR, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Something is certainly grievously wrong with Hindu Society. It has great traditions of Brahmacharya, Grihastha and Vanaprastha ashramas of life but it does not live up to them. The true Brahmacharya life in which the young man seeks for knowledge as the way to Truth and an instrument of service has disappeared. All education has become purely utilitarian and a bread-winning problem. Education has even become a cloak with many to extort prohibitive dowries or Sri Dhan from hapless parents of girls in the marriage market. Still the Hindu Society is unconcerned. Education has lost its cultural aspect and marriage its sacramental character. Whatever advantages early marriage might have had, in the Hindu scheme of life, it has become meaningless and an instrument of extortion at the hands of calculating young men. I know of several cases in which parents have been stampeded into marrying their daughters to any good, bad or indifferent young man, because the arbitrary age limit of 12 or 18 for marriage of girls has been reached.

In one case, the father of a girl, who could have afforded to pay the usual dowry for a graduate husband, running to a couple of thousands of rupees, refused to purchase a husband on principle. The poor father continued his searches for a decent-minded young man that would marry his daughter for her own sake and not for her money. He searched in vain for two years and could not succeed. In the meanwhile the girl attained puberty. The ladies of the household were considerably upset and an ultimatum was given to the grandfather by a grandmother of the girl that, if he did not secure a husband for the girl within a week's time, she would marry the girl to the first poor Brahmachari that came abegging. The father was nonplussed. He tried to persuade his daughter to be courageous enough to flout the tyranny of society and remain unmarried and go for higher education. The daughter had not the courage to follow the advice. The result was that an unscrupulous family which knows the father's weakness not to give dowries as such came forward to give one of their sons in marriage, without Vara-dakshina. The young man was holding a nominal Government post which he gave up soon after marriage. The post was obviously only a catch for unwary prospective fathers-in-law. The young man had no healthy constitution. The moment, the marriage was celebrated, the son-in-law and his people revealed themselves in their true colours. Every kind of exorbitant demand for money, and presents of jewelleries were made. What was most objectionable was the way in which the demands were made. The father refused and defied the son-in-law and his people to do their worst which they did. The girl was badly ill-treated and once when she had an attack of typhoid and the girl lay hovering between life and death, the father was informed that he could see the girl if he came with some jewelleries as a present. The father elected not to see his daughter on these terms. To make a long story short, after eleven years of married life, the girl met with a premature death at the age of 24, leaving three children motherless behind. The husband has married again.

This happened in my own personal experience. I have not the least doubt that if the girl had chosen to remain unmarried and pursued her higher studies, she would have lived to an old age and been a greatly useful member of Society. The father of the girl above referred has two more daughters yet to be married. In spite of his past experience and his own liberal outlook, I have no doubt he will once again be stampeded into marrying his daughters as he did in the case of his first daughter. I have never been able to forget the tragedy of the early death of the girl and have entered my complaint of wilful murder against the husband. I have now adopted non-violence as a creed. Otherwise, I should have no hesitation in recommending the forcible elimination from the community of those young men who disgrace the womanhood of our race by their shameless barter.

But the responsibility is not theirs only. It is that of the parents also. The evil of commercialisation of marriage is deep-rooted in the community. Since the Reformer drew pointed attention to this evil, I have discussed with many friends, the problem of this social pest. Everybody recognises the evil. But there is a general apathy to any practical action on the ground that it is too chronic to be remedied. This is to be deplored. There is much scope for an organisation of young men and women and of parents, members of which would primarily pledge themselves to actively combat the social evil in their respective individual spheres. The organisation can also carry on an active propaganda on the subject. Many great organisations have had small beginnings. Let not, therefore, a poor beginning stand in the way. A famine or an epidemic disease has less disastrous effects on the healthy growth of a society than the degeneration of marriage into commercial barter involving the soul suicide of countless women who are the mothers of future generations. I would suggest that all people who would co-operate in a practical attempt to prevent an abuse of the institution of marriage should communicate their names to the Editor of the Reformer.

"A WOMAN'S APPEAL."

THE EDITOR, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

It is really most gratifying that you should have referred in your editorial columns, in the Reformer of the 24th instant, to the memorial submitted by Mrs. Sunderbai Palshikar of Indore, now residing at Cawnpore, to His Excel-lenoy the Viceroy, appealing to the latter to restore to her her husband, who is a hereditary Sardar in the Indore State. My object in writing to you is merely to point out that it would be dangerous to carry the doctrine of non-interference in the affairs of the Indian States too far—especially in the present stage of their development. I for one would equally support with you, on theoretical grounds, the doctrine that as a general rule it would be unfair and perhaps iniquitable on the part of the Government of India to interfere in the internal affairs of Indian States. But one has at the same time to remember that there is no constitutional government in the Indian States—barring a few exceptions—and that everything depends on the mere whim or caprice of the Ruler. So long, therefore, as the Indian Rulers refrain from associating themselves with their people in the government of their States and thereby giving them a practical voice in the administration, some sort of guidance—if we may not use the word interference—from the Paramount Power, which is as much responsible for the welfare of the people residing in the Indian States as of those residing in British India proper, is obviously necessary and desirable. As regards the actual form which such guidance (or interference) should take, opinions may vary. But those who like myself are residents of Indian States feel that the Government of India can do a lot of good on account of their intimate relations with the Indian Princes, provided only that they are careful not to infringe upon their fundamental rights and status as sovereign Indian Princes.

2. Apart from this, as Sardar Palshikar holds a position in British India as well and has got property there, the Government of India have a responsibility of their own as regards the Sardar's welfare, and in any case the Maharajah has certainly no right to restrict his personal liberties in any way. I, therefore, conclude in the hope that the memorial submitted by the unfortunate and harassed lady will receive sympathetic consideration at the hands of the Government, and justice surely demands that they should advise the Indore Darbar at least to remove the fetters placed on the person of the Sardar and give him full scope to follow his own inclinations and wishes.

THE CASHEW AND ITS USES.

Our valued correspondent whose notes on the subject we published in the Reformer of the 26th February writes to us as follows with reference to Mr. A. J. Turner's note which we published in our last issue:—

I read the note by Mr. A. J. Turner on the Cashew as published in your issue of the 1st instant. I must state at once that it does not disclose any very serious attempt on the part of the Bombay Industries Department to help and encourage industries. It speaks of the export of nuts, but it does not show that any attempt was made to find out how in the best possible manner these nuts would be utilised in industries in this country itself. The report admits that the nuts do not always reach England or Europe in proper condition. Then, was there any attempt made about seeing whether there is any market there for Cashew Butter? The demand noted in the note with reference to vegetarians for this nut is surely not for chocolate. It is well-known that these vegetarians do not use milk-butter but go in for fruit-butter and in the West an industry for such fruit-butter has been started. Has any attempt been made by the Industries Department to encourage this industry there? No one can deny that there is a very large scope for this Industry. There are so many edible nuts which could with advantage be utilized for manufacturing butter. Coconut, Cashew and Ground-nut would be the principal.

The report is quite silent about the usefulness of the bitter pericarp oil. It notes that it is used for sprinkling the nuts with before exporting them. Even to a layman it seems to contain large potentiality for paints and dyes.

As regards the juice of the fruit, the note does not show that full justice has been done to it. This juice has a history of its own. Large quantity of liquor is manufactured from this juice in Goa and that liquor is very popular there. It is supposed to contain some medicinal properties also. However, in British India it is an offence to manufacture the liquor as also to import it or even to possess it. In order to prevent its being imported into British India, a strict watch is maintained in the ports in British India, and ships and passengers passing through Goa are put to an amount of inconvenience in these places by the preventive staff of the Customs department. The only justification for all this, including legislation against possession of Cashew liquor, is that it is a deleterious drug containing too much of alcohol. If that is so—and in this matter it is obviously Government alone that can give the real state of affairs—we should expect that such liquor would have great commercial potentialities. The newspapers contain articles giving the potentialities of Mhowra liquor as a substitute for motor petrol. Mhowra liquor is allowed to be manufactured as a drink and so it must be less strong in alcohol. When that is so, Cashew liquor that is banned as containing more alcohol would be better suited as a substitute for motor petrol.

In conclusion one cannot but complain of the working of the Industries Department. Why is it working in parade? Is it proper that the department should divulge the results of its investigations to one or two firms only? Is it not in the interests of the public that it should publish these results for the benefit of one and all, so that new openings would be made for young men with ideas? The right to collect silk, cotton, myrabolams, catechu and other forest products are sold by auction by the Forest Department. Why should the same procedure be not followed regarding Cashew gum? In the first few years no high price would be fetched; but, when the public will begin to realise the value of this commodity, they would surely pay more price. This method should be followed not only in this matter but as regards several other articles like honey and bees-wax. Of course, the public should first be informed where the market for these things is and this is the business of the Industries Department.

UTKAL SOCIAL REFORMERS' LEAGUE.

The present age calls every son of India to reconstruct the modern society on the basis of ancient Indian ideals. This is a tremendous task, no doubt. Still the problem has to be faced. Hence we propose to start a society called the "Social Reformers' League" with a view to bring our present society in consonance with the dictates of the highest reason consistent with the spirit of the times.

Persons, who are earnestly desirous of becoming members of the society, shall have to subscribe to its creed and follow it in spirit and letter. In other words, the society enjoins every one to do his duty. Mutual good-will and co-operation among the members is to be evinced throughout. The strength of the society will entirely depend on the character of its individual members and the work turned out by them in due course of time. "Action and not words" shall be the watch-word of the society.

The tenets of the creed are as follows:—

- i To remove untouchability.
- ii To effect inter-dining.
- iii To allow inter-marriage.
- iv To discontinue early marriage.
- v To allow early widow-remarriage.
- vi To promote female education.
- vii To discourage "Purdah-system".

To discuss and decide upon the creed a meeting will be convened at a convenient place and date which will be published later on.

NATIONAL PERSONALITY.

H. H. THE POPE AND AN INDIAN CHRISTIAN LADY.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Does the world know what great importance even the West attaches to convention? It deserves to be known, at least by the Indian, who believes the tearing off of one's conventional personality consisting of one's dress, customs, manners &c is modernization, which is another word for progress. No real Indian reformer standing as he does for real social reform, would stand for this vandalistic spirit.

The occasion for this letter, Sir, is an account sent by a Fredericton correspondent to the Hindu of Madras of Miss Lazarus, a Christian lady pledged to wearing only her own Native costume, asking for an audience with the Pope and being told in reply that she "must be dressed in the conventional European dress or an audience would not be granted. Her reply was that under those circumstances she would have to forego that audience." A most refreshing thing to hear. And righteous result was, as it must be of all honest self-respecting endeavours, the objection withdrawn and audience granted.

Now, I ask, would the Indian seek audience with the European and at the same time make it plain to him that he would visit him, be he ever so high, in the same costume as he would visit an Indian friend?

With the new national movement of Mahatma Gandhi, the Indian has been fast ceasing to be ashamed of himself, his dress, his religion, his customs and his manners. Strong mentality shown by Miss Lazarus is a token of true national re-awakening. Sir William Vincent, in his speech at the Council of State the other day on the Premier's famous pronouncement, said that the greatest enemy of political progress, industrial progress and every progress in this country is Gandhi. If by progress is meant progress in national enslavement leading to national effacement, Gandhi is emphatically an enemy to progress. But that by the way.

S. V. SARMA.

What Mr. Andrews Saw: In the second of a series of articles in the Hindu of Madras of the 23rd September on the Guru-ka-Bagh affair, Mr. C. F. Andrews describes what he personally witnessed in the following terms: "There were four Akali Sikhs with their black turbans facing a band of about a dozen police including two English officers. They had walked slowly up to the line of the police just before I had arrived and they were standing silently in front of them at about a yard's distance. They were perfectly still and did not move further forward. Their hands were placed together in prayer and it was clear that they were praying. Then, without the slightest provocation on their part, an Englishman lunged forward the head of his lathi which was bound with brass. He lunged it forward in such a way that his fist which held the staff struck the Akali Sikh, who was praying just at the collar bone with great force. The blow which I saw was sufficient to fell the Akali Sikh and send him to the ground. He rolled over, and slowly got up once more, and faced the same punishment over again. Time after time one of the four who had gone forward was laid prostrate by repeated blows, now from the English officer and now from the police who were under control. The others were knocked out more quickly. On this and on subsequent occasions the police committed certain acts which were brutal in the extreme. I saw with my own eyes one of the police kick in the stomach a Sikh who stood helplessly before him. When one of the Akali Sikhs had been hurled to the ground and was lying prostrate, a police sepoy stamped with his foot upon him, using his full weight; the foot struck the prostrate man between the neck and the shoulder. A third blow almost equally foul, was struck at an Akali when he was standing at the side of his fallen companion. This blow hurled him across the body of the fallen man, who was unconscious, at the very time when he was being taken up by two ambulance workers. The intention of such a blow was so brutally insolent, that I watched for the Englishman in command, in this case,—as also in other cases,—to rebuke the police sepoy who did the deed, but as far as I could see, he did nothing to check or rebuke his men. I told all these things that I had seen to the Governor and to every officer whom I met the next day. The brutality and inhumanity of the whole scene was indescribably increased by the fact that the men who were hit were praying to God and had already taken a vow that they would remain silent and peaceful in word and deed. The Akali Sikhs who had taken his vow, both at the Golden Temple before starting and also at the shrine of Guru-Ka-Bagh, were, as I have already stated, largely from the army. They had served in many campaigns in Flanders, in France, in Mesopotamia, and East Africa."

THE ROYAL YAKUTI.

THIS YAKUTI or life giving nectar has been prepared from the best, choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has wonderful properties of increasing virile power and it rectifies urinary disorders. In fact it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to those persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicine. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that which is not that which a perfumer admires. It is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills. Rupees ten only.

NOTES.

The Conscience Clause in Schools: The question of a conscience clause in schools and colleges in which religious instruction is regularly provided, has been variously solved in several provinces. In Madras, the Legislative Council threw out a resolution to insert a conscience clause in the grant-in-aid code. The Indian Witness (Lucknow) of the 27th September prints a letter from the Hon. Mr. C. Y. Chintamani, the Minister for Education in the United Provinces, to the Bishop of Lucknow, in which he gives the text of the conscience clause, as finally approved by Government, as below:

(a) No one shall be compelled to attend any religious instruction or observance, as a condition of his admission into, or continuance in, an aided educational institution, if he, or his parent or guardian if he is a minor, objects to it and informs the authorities of the institution of his objection in writing.

(b) The time or times during which any religious observance is practised, or instruction in religious subjects is given at any meeting of an aided educational institution, shall be in the beginning or at the end, or at the beginning and end of such meeting.

NOTE.—Exemption from religious instruction or observance shall take effect from the commencement of a school or college term. Applications for exemptions should, therefore, be made at the commencement of a term. But with the sanction of the headmaster or principal, exemption may take effect at any time during the currency of a term.

This clause will come into operation from 1st April 1924. At the last Session of the Bombay Legislative Council, the following resolution was passed, the portion italicised being moved as an amendment by the Hon. Dr. Paranjpye, the Minister of Education, and accepted by Mr. Bhate who moved the original proposition:

This Council recommends that the Government should see its way to introduce the following rule in the Grant-in-Aid Code: "That in all schools and colleges, which are the only institutions of their kind in the neighbouring area, which are not purely denominational in the sense of refusing admission to pupils not belonging to any particular denomination, and which receive Government aid in any form whatsoever, the attendance by students at any class of special religious instruction which the parents or guardians of such students shall not have sanctioned, should be perfectly voluntary and that no payment of grant-in-aid should be made to any institution which will contravene the provisions of this rule.

The resolution is clumsily worded. The Dnyanodaya which is the organ of the seven important Christian Missions working in the area of the Bombay Representative Council of Missions, observes with regard to the Bombay resolution that it believes every missionary could vote for it.

The Meaning of the Difference: The different ways in which this important question has been dealt with in the three important provinces, represent with rough accuracy the educational and other conditions in them. In Madras where Christian mission schools have been longest in existence, there has been a mutual adaptation between the people and the educational missions, which makes a conscience clause of no practical urgency in that Presidency. In the United Provinces, the influential American Missions, with their traditional ideas of religious freedom, have facilitated the introduction of a full conscience clause which was also demanded by the fact that the Provinces contain many strongholds of Hindu and Mahomedan orthodoxy. The conscience clause, as adopted in the Bombay Council, is characteristically a compromise, not very logical, but sufficient, we trust, for working purposes. For our own part, we hold that the innate nobility and beauty of the life and teachings of Jesus Christ—not the Churchianity that goes by His name—are such as to commend them the more to men of all religions the less there is of compulsion in the methods of their propagation. Professor Deussen speaking of the Vedanta, has observed:

The Gospels fix quite correctly as the highest law of morality: "Love your neighbour as yourself." But why should I do so, since by the order of nature I feel pain and pleasure only in myself, not in my neighbour? The answer is not in the Bible, but it is in the Veda, in the great formula tat tvam asi (that thou art), which gives in three words metaphysics and morals altogether. You shall love your neighbour as yourself—because you are your neighbour, and mere illusion makes you believe that your neighbour is something different from yourself."

Other devout Christian students of Hinduism have similarly acknowledged that they have derived from it light enabling them the better to understand their own religion. In the same way, Hindu students of Christ's life and teachings have found in them, summed up so that the least instructed may readily understand, the net conclusions of the ethics and metaphysics of their own religious culture, enforced by a character and personality for which there has been no parallel in human history except for our own gracious Lord Buddha. The more Christian Missions concentrate upon Christ the less will they find compulsion helpful to their mission in this land.

Misplaced Retrenchment: Although the President of the Bombay Legislative Council discovered practically after the debate had closed, that the motion to restore the grants to secondary schools to their normal scale, was not in order and could not be put to the vote, this extremely unusual lapse on the part of the most alert member of the Council, afforded Government the opportunity of gauging the strong public feeling against their ill-advised raid upon the grants to aided schools and colleges which are hard put to make both ends meet in these days of high prices. No more absurd argument could have been advanced than that advanced from the Government benches—but not by the Education Minister—that as Government had to reduce their expenditure by a certain amount, they could do so only by making a proportionate cut from every department. This overlooks the fact that the departments differ in their incidence on the life of the people, and that commonsense, not to say, political prudence would dictate some discrimination between them in effecting retrenchments. If the income of a family shows a sudden decrease, the head of the house, if he is not born a bureaucrat, will not think of reducing the expenditure on the food, clothing and education of his children in the same proportion as that on his own food, clothing, and comforts. The reason is that while even a sharp reduction in his own case would result only in a present and temporary deprivation and discomfort, in the case of children it would permanently retard their development and prove detrimental to the future of the family. The same sort of principle should be observed in a State and is observed in every State to which the future of its people is as much an object of concern as its own present comfort and convenience. Education is the last department that should be brought under the retrenching scissors, and every other department should show that it has done its utmost, before education is touched. Even in the most extreme case, retrenchment in education should be made in the most sparing fashion and in the most cautious way, remembering that while the tree of national life could stand, and even thrive better for, some pruning and lopping off if its over-ground manifestations, it would be irretrievably destroyed if the knife be applied to its hidden roots in health, education and industry. But these are the things that appeal least to our rulers who have more faith in the big stick than the large head and heart as an instrument of good government. Open a school and close a jail, is an old saying. Close an old high school, and curtail as much as possible the others, though you may have to open more jails, is our present policy.

Ill-judged Criticism: Our Travancore correspondent is a publicist of long experience, but we do not agree with him in his condemnation of the action of the public meeting presided over, promoted and attended by Ezhava leaders, in passing a resolution to the effect that members of that caste who continue to tap palm trees for toddy, should not be socially associated with, as an effective way of weaning their community from a traditional occupation that has degraded it in the eyes of other castes, because it is accessory to the drink evil which degrades all who indulge in it. Wherever a caste still enjoys certain disciplinary powers, we cannot think of a better or more legitimate use of them than in such a case, and if all castes had used their influence in the same judicious manner and to similar wholesome ends, the caste system would not have become so discredited as it is at the present day. We offer whole-hearted support to the Ezhava and Shanar leaders who are striving to divert the energies of their caste people to more wholesome and reputable occupations. We do not share our correspondent's fear that if they cease to tap for toddy, they will not be able to find other remunerative occupations. Even if that be the case, it is far better for themselves and for the people at large that they should desist from an evil occupation. An occupation whose profits arise out of the degradation of one's fellow-men is not a legitimately remunerative one, but one essentially predatory. But no man or caste or nation ever starved or suffered by ceasing to do wrong. Our correspondent says drink must be first abolished. By whom? The refusal to produce the poison is one of the most effective ways open to a people, especially one which has no responsible Government through which to operate, to abolish drink. It has been a growing conviction with us that the future of India rests largely with the despised "untouchables," and we rejoice to see such evidences of the awakening of these classes as this great movement among an important section of them to renounce a degrading, though ancestral, occupation. If the "higher" castes cannot help in such movements, for God's sake let them not hamper and obstruct them by ill-judged and often ill-informed and prejudiced criticism.

Mysore Constitutional Reforms: We print to-day the main features of the constitutional reforms which the Dewan of Mysore announced on the 7th instant at a meeting of the Representative Assembly. These are, first, that the District Boards are to have their functions enlarged and local subjects relegated to them. The Representative Assembly is also to be enlarged both as to numbers and functions, the former being increased to 200 and the latter to include previous consultation with regard to the levying of any new tax and all important legislative measures, the right to move resolutions on administrative matters and also on the Budget. The Legislative Council is also to be enlarged in a similar manner, the number of members being raised from 40 to 50, and given power to vote on the Budget by major heads. The resolutions of both bodies will have effect only as recommendations to Government. A Committee of official and non-official members has been appointed to work out the details of this scheme. The Committee has practically everything to do. We trust that, for the elections to the Representative Assembly, a trial will be given to Lord Morley's original plan of electoral colleges which provided automatically for the representation of minorities. The Committee has also got to consider what the functions of the Representative Assembly and the Legislative Council are to be in respect of Legislation. There is no hint of any approach to responsible Government. The scheme seems to lay little store by the emphatic condemnation by constitutional authorities, and not least in the Montague-Chelmsford report, of popular bodies possessing powers of criticism without responsibility. And yet, Mysore is in some respects in a better position even than British India to take a substantial step in responsible Government.

The Public Library, Bangalore: We attach very great importance to the establishment of public libraries all over the country. In no part of India, has the importance of public libraries been better realised and more organized effort made to propagate them than in Baroda where the library movement has attained conspicuous success. We are glad to see that in Mysore also the matter is being earnestly taken up. The latest report of the Bangalore Public Library that has been sent to us, is a record of gratifying growth and is creditable to those concerned in its management.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, OCTOBER 15, 1922.

THE LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY AND THE PRINCES' PRESS BILL.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas, the distinguished Sindhi member of the Legislative Assembly, has written a well-reasoned letter to the daily papers on the action of that Assembly in refusing leave to the introduction of the Government Bill relating to criticisms in the Press on Indian Princes and their administration. On the day after the rejection it was officially announced that the Viceroy would use his certification powers to pass the Bill with the help of the Council of State. Mr. Ranga Chari, a Madras member of the Legislative Assembly, moved thereupon the adjournment of the House to consider the contemplated action of His Excellency. The adjournment was ruled out of order but, acting on a suggestion thrown out by the Home Member, four members, representing two conventional Parties in the Assembly, had an interview with the Viceroy. His Excellency, it is understood, asked for a guarantee that the Assembly would pass the Bill, and as it was not possible for the four members to give it, Government adhered to their intention to get the Bill through the Council of State, as the Indian second Chamber is called, on the Viceroy's certificate, and to pass it into law over the head of the Legislative Assembly, the Lower House. The motion for adjournment and the interview of the four members of the Assembly with His Excellency the Viceroy, have been represented in some quarters as showing that the Assembly repented of its action and tried to find a way out of it. Mr. Harchandrai denies that the Assembly repented of its refusal of leave and gives reasons to show that under the circumstances it could have acted only thus and in no other way.

In order to appraise correctly the significance of the Viceroy's action, it is necessary to point out that the procedure about moving for leave to introduce a Bill, is not obligatory in the case of Government Bills, publication in the official Gazette being sufficient to dispense with this stage in their career through the Legislature. Government frequently avail themselves of this alternative which has the advantage, in the case of important measures, of making available to them and the members of the Legislature at the time of introducing the Bill, the trend of public opinion on the proposals contained in them. It has been suggested that the reason why Government did not publish this Bill in the Gazette beforehand, which would have saved them the preliminary stage in a short and crowded Session, was that the volume of public criticism provoked by it would have been so large that the chances of the Legislature accepting the Bill would have been remote. This suggestion derives some colour from the fact that Government brought in their motion for leave when there was hardly four days left of the Session. The President of the Council of State in allowing the introduction of the Bill after its rejection by the Assembly, reiterated his view that there should be no rush of legislation at the end of a Session. It may be urged that Government themselves had not made up their minds as to whether they should introduce this Bill at the last Session, and that they had to do so at the last moment. But against this there is the Viceroy's definite statement in his opening speech on the 5th September that a Bill would be brought before the Legislature in that Session.

Nobody who knows the feeling in the country regarding this so-called Protection of Princes Bill, which might be more aptly called the Persecution of the Press Bill, can have the least difficulty in accepting Mr. Harchandrai's plea that the Assembly could not possibly have acted otherwise than it did in refusing leave for its introduction. In the last issue we gave our own reasons for regarding this measure less as one of protection to the Princes than as a fresh illustration of Lord Ripon's observation in a letter to Lord Hartington that "the Indian official regards the Press as an evil, necessary perhaps, but to be kept within as narrow limits as possible; he has no real feelings of the benefits of free discussion." The bureaucracy is jealous of the increasing influence of the Press and its sensitiveness has been aggravated by its fear, more pretended than real, that its power and prospects are fast waning as the result of the Reforms. The Prime Minister's egregious speech was avowedly made to allay this fear, and the poor Princes have been made the pretext for a measure which is calculated less to protect them than to make the Indian-conducted Press feel that the bureaucracy, although the old Press Act has been repealed, has succeeded in forging a new one which, besides its penal provisions, has the additional effect of suggesting to the world at large, and to some of the Princes at any rate, that the Indian Press is their inveterate enemy and the Political Department of the Governments in India their traditional protectors. The Services, and especially the Indian Civil Service, have been loudly complaining of the attitude of the Indian Press, though that attitude today is one rather of indifference than antagonism, to them, and if this new Press Law reassures them that the Indian Press is to have no freedom as a part of the Reforms, it will only be in consonance with the Prime Minister's declarations regarding the limitations of the Reforms. The Council of State, in consenting to the Bill with scarcely a day's debate, showed little consideration for the Legislative Assembly which in every constitution, is the more important, because more representative, Chamber, apart from the total disregard displayed to the feeling in the country. We had from the first insisted on the need of a second chamber of the Legislature differing herein from some Liberal Indian politicians of the most conservative complexion. We still believe in the value of a second chamber though the action of the Council of State in this case lends considerable force to the objections urged against it in this country.

In view of the fact that the Government of India are under no obligation to ask the leave of the Assembly for introducing their Bills and that they would have given the public an opportunity of expressing its views on the measure if they had adopted the alternative course open to them, and which they often use, of publishing Bills in the Gazette before introduction, the charge that the Legislative Assembly was guilty of gross discourtesy to Government in voting out the motion for leave has very little substance. The motion for leave has some meaning or it is a meaningless waste of valuable time. If it be the latter, why did Government choose it in preference to the one open to them? In the House of Commons, "the motion for leave" has been practically dispensed with in the case of Government as well as of private members since 1902. In India, it is still a serious affair for a private member who is required to give one month's notice of the motion for leave, submitting at the same time—what in the House of Commons is not needed even at the first reading—a copy of his Bill and a full statement of Objects and Reasons. Acceptance of a motion for leave, in such circumstances, would obviously have committed the Assembly in some way to the principle of the Bill, which is not accepted by any responsible body of public opinion in the country. It has been said that by refusing leave, the Assembly tore up the Bill without giving Government the opportunity to bring its contents to its notice and to explain why they wanted to pass it. As a matter of fact, the contents of the Bill were well known to the members, and Sir William Vincent in his speech on his motion for leave, explained at length why Government wanted to pass it. Further, the Viceroy's power of certification is not confined to the case of one of the Chambers of the Legislature refusing leave to introduce a Bill, but also when it "fails to pass (the Bill) in a form recommended by the Governor General." The passing of the motion for leave would thus have made no difference so far as the Viceroy's right of certification is concerned, and the rejection or substantial modification of the Bill at a later stage, would not have saved the Assembly from the criticism of those who criticise its refusal of leave. The Assembly by the course it adopted, saved public time and has secured the public confidence.

Then, we are told that solemn pledges had been made by Queen Victoria and her successors and that they had entered into written agreements which required that a Bill of this kind should be passed. Her Majesty Queen Victoria died in 1901, and Lord Reading stated in his opening speech on the 5th September to the two Houses that "this protection to the Princes was first given by the Act of 1910." Did Her late Majesty pledge herself to have introduced, ten years after her demise, a Bill to afford the promised protection to the Princes of India? Where were these treaties and pledges when the Sapru-Vincent Committee but a few months ago recommended that no legislation was needed to afford special protection to the Indian princes? His Excellency said: "We have decided that we are bound by agreements and in honour to afford the Princes the same measure of protection as they previously enjoyed under the Press Act." That shows that the question has had to be discussed, that there had been differences of opinion, but that that is the conclusion at which Government have finally arrived. So that there is no question of definitive pledges as has been sought to be made out. If tomorrow the Government of India decide, on the same reasoning, that they are bound in honour, owing to pledges as to non-interference in religion, to pass a law restoring to every Hindu husband the immemorial privilege, which he enjoyed prior to the Widow Marriage Act, of his widow or widows being consigned to perpetual widowhood or even to the funeral pile on his death, should the Assembly be bound to give leave to introduce it? The pledges as to religious neutrality, it can be argued with far more plausibility, were violated by the Remarriage Act than the pledge to the Princes by the repeal of the Press Act. The repeal of the Remarriage Act would rally to the side of Government the orthodox community including some shining lights of the Assembly and the Council of State. The Viceroy can, with at least as clear a conscience as in the case of the Princes' Act, certify that a Bill to repeal the Widow Marriage Act is essential to the security of British India in these non-co-operation days. If His Excellency does not know it, we may mention for his information that the Widow Remarriage Act was held responsible by, among others, no less a person than Mr. Benjamin Disraeli for the Indian Mutiny. The protection likely to be afforded to Indian Princes by this Act is as illusory as the satisfaction supposed to be enjoyed by defunct husbands at the perpetual widowhood of their relicts. But the affront and the humiliation to the Press are very real and they are such as to place an intolerable obstacle in the way of an honourable collaboration between the Press and Government which is so desirable in the best interests of both.

THE FISCAL COMMISSION'S REPORT—I.

We dealt last week with the main recommendation of the majority* of members of the Indian Fiscal Commission, from the summary of their Report supplied by the Associated Press. Since then we have procured a copy of the Report. The Commission was appointed in October last year with Sir Ibrahim Rahimtoola as President, and Mr. J. M. Keynes as Vice President. Sir Maneckjee Dadabhoy, Sir Edgar Holberton and Sir Montagu Webb, and Messrs. T. V. Seshagiri Iyer, Ganshyamdas Birla, J. C. Coyajee, Jamnadas Dwarkadas, Narottamdas Morarjee, C. W. Rhodes and R. A. Mant, were the other members. The President, Mr. Mant, Mr. Coyajee and the Secretary, Mr. H. G. Haig, were officials and the rest were non-officials. Sir Ibrahim Rahimtoola, before he became a member of the Bombay Government four years ago, was one of the leading figures in Bombay business and Indian politics. Mr. Keynes, of course, is the well-known Cambridge Professor, who was the first to expose the financial futilities of the Treaty of Versailles. Mr. Seshagiri Aiyar is a retired Judge of the Madras High Court and a nominated member of the Indian Legislative Assembly. Mr. Birla belongs to the firm of Birla Brothers of Calcutta, Mr. Coyajee is Professor of Economics in the Calcutta Presidency College. Sir Maneckjee Dadabhoy, though officially described as a Barrister-at Law, Nagpur, has been, we believe, more concerned for many years with the management of mills and collieries than with the practice of law; Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas is the leading Besantine politician of Bombay, Sir Edgar Holberton is the Chairman of the Burma Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Mant is a Secretary to the Government of India, Mr. Narottam Morarjee is a leading Mill-owner of Bombay, Mr. Rhodes is a prominent Anglo-Indian merchant of Calcutta, and Sir Montagu Webb is an Anglo-Sindhi merchant and publicist with pronounced views on many subjects. For the benefit of those who are interested in communal affiliations and are not sufficiently familiar with Indian names, it may be added that Sir Ibrahim is a Mahomedan, Messrs. Aiyar, Birla, Jamnadas and Narottamdas are Hindus, Sir Maneckjee and Professor Coyajee are Parsis, and the rest Britishers. The terms of reference to the Commission were "to examine with reference to all the interests concerned the Tariff policy of the Government of India, including the question of the desirability of adopting the principle of Imperial Preference, and to make recommendations."

The Commission was not the most competent or the most representative in respect of Indian opinion that could have been appointed. The withdrawal of Mr. Keynes before the Commission began its work, left Professor Coyajee of the principal Government College at Calcutta, as the sole exponent of fiscal theory on the Commission. Those who know how very orthodox Indian Universities are in their economic studies, will easily realise the disadvantage to the Commission of having no economist on it of the nationalist, non-official school. Mr. Coyajee has, of course, tried his best to supply the omission but that best cannot but be a weak substitute for the convinced and convincing presentation by an unofficial professor of the fiscal science, lending colour to the complaint of the Minority that the language of the Majority in recommending Protection is half-hearted and apologetic. As a fact, what the Majority advocate is not Protection at all, but rank Free Trade artfully painted to look like Protection. Three of the Indian members are Bombay men to whom India is merely a patch upon the first city in the Empire. There should have been a strong Minority report instead of a halting, scrappy, incoherent minute of dissent, and there would most probably have been one, had their opposition not been hamstrung by the concession about the repeal of the excise duty on Indian mill-made cloth by the Majority—in itself an absolutely indisputable factor of a just fiscal policy. The Minority declare that the outlook of the Majority is different from theirs. If so, the right course for them would clearly have been to develop their views from their own point of view in a separate report. Mr. Seshagiri Aiyar's judicial training must be of much value in almost any public enquiry but this was one of the few exceptions where it could have advantageously given place to a grasp of and training in the science and art of political economy. Mr. Birla from all accounts is a successful business man, while what the Minority lacked was a statesman who could formulate a national fiscal policy from an all-India stand-point. It was expected all along that the British members would stand together.

The appointment of this Commission last October was an attempt to snatch a verdict for Imperial Preference, in the first flush of the introduction of the Reforms, before their actual scope was understood in their limitations, from those who had accepted them as meaning much more than what subsequent developments have shown them really to mean. The narration in the introductory chapter of the report of what are represented as the several stages leading up to the appointment of the Commission, are neither logically nor chronologically convincing. After an irrelevant reference, as a compliment no doubt to the President, to an ancient and, so far as fiscal policy is concerned, infructuous resolution moved by Sir Ibrahim Rahimtoola in 1916 when he was a member of the old Indian Legislative Council, a non-committal passage is quoted from the Montagu-Chelmsford Report recommending that Indian opinion should decide what Indian fiscal policy should be. Then follows the recommendation of the Joint Select Committee on the Government of India Bill of 1919, that "India should have the same liberty in framing a fiscal policy to consider her interests as Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand, Canada and South Africa" and that "the Secretary of State should as far as possible avoid interference on this subject when the Government of India and its Legislature are in agreement," and that "his intervention, when it does take place, should be limited to safeguarding the international obligations of the Empire or any fiscal arrangements within the Empire to which His Majesty's Government is a party." No careful student of the course of Indian politics can fail to see that this recommendation purporting to recommend complete fiscal autonomy in one sentence completely takes it away by the right of interference it concedes to the Secretary of State in phrases which cover every possible and impossible contingency where he may feel called upon to do so. Furthermore, the condition about the Government of India and its Legislature being in agreement, as we all know and none, perhaps, more than the present Government of India, cannot in practice eventuate except when the Secretary of State does not prohibit such agreement, as he has ample power and opportunity to do, as illustrated repeatedly in the ordering of Indian fiscal policy. Still, weak as its recommendation was, the Joint Select Committee would not embody it in the statute on the paradoxical ground that it could not be done "without limiting the ultimate power of Parliament to control the administration of India, and without limiting the power of veto which rests in the Crown." It added that "neither of these limitations finds a place in any of the statutes in the British Empire"—which, even if correct, is not a right reason since none of the statutes in the British Empire vest the Government of a Dominion in a member of the British Cabinet.

Next follows a reference to a resolution proposed by the Hon. Mr. Lalubhai Samaldas in the Council of State in February 1921, asking that the Government of India should be granted full fiscal autonomy. This was amended at the instance of Mr. Srinivasa Sastry, who has all along felt an ineffable complacency in and a special responsibility for the Reform Act, by the addition of words which reduced it to an absurdity. There can be no fiscal autonomy "subject to the provisions of the Government of India Act" because for the paradoxical reason given by the Joint Select Committee it could not be, and was not, embodied in that Act. The resolution so emasculated was sent to the Secretary of State, and Mr. Montagu, who in the episodes of the Reverse Councils, the 7 per cent. loan, and others had himself paid slight heed to India's fiscal autonomy, no doubt on the grounds provided by the Joint Committee for intervention, replied quite honestly that His Majesty's Government had accepted the principle recommended by the Joint Committee, which, as we have shown, meant little. It is pathetic to see the hard-headed businessmen who form the Minority deduce from these recommendations, resolutions and despatches that "India has now attained fiscal autonomy," and that the appointment of their Commission is the result of such freedom! Whatever excuse there might have been in October 1921 for this complacent conclusion—and there was very little then—there was none at all on the 5th September 1922 when the Minority report is dated, after Mr. Montagu's fall, the Indian Budget, Lord Winterton's reply to the Lancashire Deputation and the Prime Minister's "steel-frame" speech which strictly defines the conditions under which India is allowed to jingle the small change of Diarchy in her pocket—the principal of them being that she shall spend them strictly according to the instructions given to her by the perpetual trustee in London. To return to the Introductory chapter. In 1920, on the motion of Government, the old Legislative Council recommended to the Government that a Committee should be appointed to consider the question of Imperial Preference. An amendment was accepted adding to the terms of reference the words "the best method of considering the future fiscal policy of India." The Committee was appointed and made its report containing "provisional conclusions" on the subject of Imperial Preference. With regard to the best method of considering the future fiscal policy, it recommended of course, the appointment of another Committee. One Committee always leads to another as cause to consequence! This is the genesis of the Fiscal Commission as given by itself.

THE STATUS OF CHILD LABOR IN THE UNITED STATES.

(FOREIGN PRESS SERVICE).

Washington.

The recent decision of the United States Supreme Court to the effect that the Federal child labor law of the United States was unconstitutional, and the consequent movement to supplement existing state laws, of more or less stringency, with a federal amendment or law that will survive the constitutional test, has increased the natural interest in the status of child labour in the United States. As a result the authoritative interpretation of the census figures on this subject, by Raymond Fuller, associate director of the National Child Labor Committee, within a week of the publication of the official figures, is being carefully studied and widely commented on. On the face of the census returns for 1920, child labor in the United States was cut almost in half during the decennial period since the census of 1910. But though the recently published figures for children from ten to fifteen years of age engaged in gainful occupations show improvement, valid conclusions can be drawn from these figures only after careful consideration of some important facts in addition to the figures, Mr. Fuller says, and points out that census statistics and the nature of child labor stand rather far apart. Child labor is the work that interferes with the life of childhood and the best preparation for adulthood. Neither ages nor wages are proper criterion of child labor, he says. "The economic value of a working child—his present, immediate earning power—small though it is—is what gets him into the census classification of gainful employment. His future value, his future earning power, is not considered. It is well to emphasize that the earning of wages does not of itself make a child a child laborer—other factors are the factors that count. There may be child labor without any wages at all." In the census data 'children spending more than half their time at school are not classified as gainfully employed.' It happens that thousands of children whose work outside school interferes seriously with their school attendance and school progress are excluded from the census returns. Many of these children, with their school work and outside work, have a working day of ten to twelve or fourteen hours. In agriculture children on the home farm are reckoned as gainfully employed only if their work constitutes a material addition to the labor income, but for an adequate picture of the extent to which farm work interferes with schooling we should have to look elsewhere than to the occupational census. In rural regions generally the farm work of children is one of the chief causes of the shorter school term, the more irregular attendance, and the greater retardation of pupils compared with urban communities.

Children under ten are not included in the occupational returns. Hundreds of boys and girls below that age are suffering irreparable injury in one way or another from tenement home work and from labor in the cotton and sugar beet fields. The census takers learn of few children of higher ages engaged in tenement home work; The number of children in tenement home work nobody knows, because there is no way of finding out; but it is very large. Information given by parents to the census takers leaves the number of children engaged in other occupations underestimated—street trades, for example. The seasonality of certain occupations affects the census returns. The census of 1920 was taken in January, when agricultural operations are practically at a standstill, the same being true also of canneries. The census of 1910 was taken in April, when there is much more activity in these occupations. But neither month gives adequate returns for seasonal work. A host of children who work in the beet fields, the onion fields, the melon fields, the cotton fields, the tobacco fields, the berry patches, the truck gardens, the fruit and vegetable canneries, do not appear in the census returns. Despite the limitations of the census figures as a measure of child labor in the United States, they are not without significance from the child labor standpoint. It is worth while to compare the figures for 1920 with those for 1910. In 1910 the number of children ten to fifteen years old engaged in gainful occupations was, according to the census, 1,990,275. In 1920 the number was 1,060,858. The percentage of decrease was 46.7. In the same period the total population of these ages increased 15.5 per cent. The proportion of children in this age group was 18.4 per cent in 1910 and 18.5 per cent in 1920. The number of working boys in 1910 was 1,353,189; of working girls, 637,086. The corresponding figures for 1920 are 714,248 and 346,610.

Most of the statistical decrease of working children from 1910 to 1920 was found in agriculture, animal husbandry and kindred occupations. In these occupations 1,432,580 boys and girls ten to fifteen years old were engaged in 1910; 647,309 in 1920. Largely, this decrease was due to the fact that the census of 1920 was taken in January instead of April. Child labor law, by the way, does not apply to the agricultural group of occupations. Agriculture is either omitted from the language of the statutes or specifically exempted. In 1910 the juvenile farm workers constituted seventy-two per cent of the total number of working children; in 1920, sixty-one per cent. In 1910, more than a quarter of a million of them, or 259,813, 'were working out' (i. e., not on the home farm); in 1920, 63,990. Decreases in other groups of occupations must be noted. In 1910 the number of children ten to fifteen in manufacturing and mechanical industries was 281,947; in 1920 it was 185,337. Mining and quarrying industries, showed a decrease from 18,699 to 7,191. All other occupations (including stores, street trades, transportation, domestic service, ect.) a decrease from 255,003 to 221,021. The decrease in all pursuits outside of the agricultural group of occupations is from 557,644 in 1910 to 413,549 in 1920. Of special interest are the figures for children under fourteen. In 1910 the working children ten to thirteen years of age, inclusive, numbered 895,976. In 1920 the number was 278,063. Of these 378,063 children 328,958 were in agriculture and 49,105 in non-agricultural occupations. The number in non-agricultural occupations in 1910 was 95,832.

THE BOMBAY LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

(By MR. G. B. TRIVEDI, M.L.C.)

The third session of the current year was remarkable in many ways. It was for the first time that the Governor addressed from the "throne" his Reformed Council. The President was approached by a leading M. L. C. with a request that he might allow discussion on the address as was done in the House of Commons. But the request was disallowed on the ground that there was neither provision nor precedent for it. The address did not create any enthusiasm in the House and was soon forgotten amidst the heavy official work which lasted for full eleven days. There were two non-contentious bills which were passed for all the three readings at once; there were four bills put down for second reading of which one was withdrawn by Government as the Government were not satisfied with the Select Committee's report, one was non-contentious, one passed the second reading with some opposition and passed the third reading without a murmur; but the fourth that for control of transactions in cotton was well contested both at the second and third reading and passed by a small margin of votes.

Of the four remaining new bills, one for Taxation on Entertainments was discussed not on its merits but on its utility as a source of revenue for Primary compulsory Education. The Bill for the amendment of the Rent Acts evoked the sympathy of the House for the tenant class while only two or three members pleaded for house-owners.

But the most important bills of the session were one for the expansion of Local Boards and the other for providing a machinery for compulsory Primary Education. Both of them were discussed for three long days each. The first evoked much opposition on account of the extension of the principle of communal representation to rural areas. But the two Mahomedan members of Government with the help of their co-religionists, and of the non-Brahmins who have but taken a leaf out of the book of the Mahomedans in this matter, carried their point; and the Minister in his anxiety to secure this, refused to take in his Select Committee, members who have worked on Local Boards but were opposed to his new fad. A question is asked in some quarters whether the Khilafat leaders approve of this step of their co-religionist co-operators. If they do not, is it not their duty to raise their protest against this step which is antagonistic to their professed faith in Hindu-Mahomedan unity?

The bill was welcomed as a measure for training rural people in local self-Government on account of the wide franchise it proposes. But the machinery was pronounced expensive and, even with extended powers of taxation, grave doubts were felt by the Presidents of Local Boards sitting in the Council as to their being able to find money for education, medical relief, roads, sanitation &c. unless Government gave a fixed share of Provincial revenue or allowed powers to levy cesses on Forest, Salt, Income Tax &c.

But the more momentous measure was the Bill for Compulsory Education. It was admitted by the Minister in charge as well as by his supporters that it did not introduce compulsory Education at once. It moved cautiously. It merely provided a made road. The rails, rolling stock and the engine can be brought in as money came, and as people showed their desire and readiness. This disappointed those who thought that the Minister was going to give them compulsory Education at once. The Minister's speech, both opening and closing, showed clearly that the Reserved Government was applying the brake too tightly. They would not admit the State's whole responsibility to provide Education as they provide Police protection. The Municipalities are to find half the money and the Local Boards 1/3 to 1/4 and the burden of the speeches of the non-officials was that the Local bodies would find it difficult to find their share and so the bill would only give a paper constitution and the Act would not be better than Patel's Act. Non-Brahmin members showed their disappointment by asking for its withdrawal but refrained from going to a division.

Both these bills are now in the hands of Select Committees and would come up for second reading in December. In the mean time, if public agitation is carried on, the hands of the Progressives in the Council will be strengthened. Supplementary grants were uncontested and even so Government work took full eleven days.

The next three days were given to non-official work. One non-official bill was granted leave for introduction while the other—for taxing the Race Course—was disallowed much to the disappointment of the non-officials who were eager to give Government new sinews of war. But Government desiring to do the operation with their own tender hands, refused the help of non-official surgeons.

There were 50 non-official resolutions of which only 11 got the chance of being discussed. Of these 5 were withdrawn after Government assurances were given, two were negatived, two were amended and passed, one was disallowed after being discussed for an hour and a half, and only one was passed as it was. The non-officials feel very strongly that unless they are given fixed days in the middle of official work and are given more than 3 days, they have no chance of influencing Government by their resolutions. The obstructionist attitude taken up by official members and one or two non-officials to break up, by purposely reducing the quorum, was severely criticised by the President and the Leader of the House who complained openly of certain officials who would not respect him when he entreated them to come in. The complaint of the official members was that the term was unnecessarily lengthened by non-officials taking 6 days on two bills. Looking to the importance of these bills the complaint is unjustified and if anybody had a right to complain, it was the President who had to sit on, continuously without breaks which members enjoy. When the complaint was made to the President informally, he did not support it. On the contrary he gave his tribute to the excellence of the debates which, in his opinion, were of a high level and quite satisfactory.

Some members of the Legislative Assembly who watched our debate from the Gallery, endorsed the President's opinion. They, however, regretted the absence of organisation amongst the non-officials. They recognised that there were groups amongst us but they said that even groups could be organised.

The one thing that causes anxiety to thoughtful members in the Council is the growing annoyance of the non-Brahmin Members who are developing their communal instinct on quite unhealthy lines. The House is prepared to support their claims for special consideration as in the case of Mahomedans in the old Councils, but when they develop an anti-Brahmin spirit to such an extent as to shut the door of help to all but themselves they overstep the limits. They are now becoming fanatics and unless wise men of the party check and regulate their activities in the Council, they would hamper the progress of this progressive Presidency. They are already driving some of us to pessimism but let us hope that wiser counsels will prevail and that they will keep their fanaticism within bounds.

MYSORE CONSTITUTIONAL REFORMS.

On the 7th instant, the Dewan of Mysore speaking in the Representative Assembly, said:

His Highness the Maharaja feels that the time has now come for taking a further definite step in the policy of associating the people more and more with the Government, and increasing the popular element in the administration. He has accordingly been graciously pleased to sanction the reconstitution of the Representative Assembly and the Legislative Council with enlarged functions and has commanded me to communicate to you the main features of the contemplated developments. After further examination and elaboration of the details, these developments will be promulgated in due course by a Proclamation under His Highness' Sign Manual.

THE REPRESENTATIVE ASSEMBLY.

- (1) The Representative Assembly will be given a definite place in the Constitution.
- (2) The qualifications prescribed for voters will be substantially reduced, so as to extend the franchise to a considerable extent. The sex disqualification for voters will be removed.
- (3) No new tax will be levied without previously consulting the Representative Assembly.
- (4) The Representative Assembly will be given the right to move resolutions on matters relating to the public administration, and also on the annual State budget.
- (5) It will be consulted in regard to all important legislative measures. The legislative programme of the year will be placed before the Representative Assembly in the Dasara session and the general principles of the bills will be discussed there. In cases where legislation is introduced in the Legislative Council before discussion in the Assembly, His Highness the Maharaja will ordinarily (i. e., except in urgent cases) reserve his assent until the close of the next session of the Representative Assembly.
- (6) The strength of the Assembly will be fixed at about 200, provision being also made for the representation, if necessary by nomination, of minorities and special interests. The Dewan will continue to be the President of the Assembly, and the Members of Council will be Vice-Presidents.
- (7) Details as to the constitution of the Assembly, the electorates, whether all the elected members should be chosen by primary or direct election or partly primary and partly secondary as is now the case, the length and frequency of the sessions, the procedure of the House, and the order of business will be worked out and submitted for the consideration of Government by a small mixed committee of official and non-official members.

(8) Local subjects will not, as a rule, be allowed to be brought up before the Representative Assembly, but will be relegated to the District Boards whose functions will be enlarged.

THE LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

(1) Its strength will be increased and fixed at not less than 40 and not more than 50 members. The number of members elected from the Representative Assembly to this body will be substantially increased. Provision will be made for the representation of special interests, such as industries and commerce, planting, educational, and of minorities. The details of the constitution of the Council will be worked out by the mixed Committee referred to above.

(2) The number of interpellations and resolutions that may be brought forward at a session will be substantially increased.

(3) The Legislative Council will be given the power of voting on the annual State budget by major heads in respect of all items of expenditure, except those affecting the Palace, the Military, pensions of public servants, and the relations of the State with the British Government under the Treaty. In any case where the Council refuses its assent to a provision in the Budget or reduces it, it will be competent to Government to restore the provision, if they consider it necessary for the carrying on of any department.

GENERAL.

(1) The present list of subjects that are excluded from the purview of the Legislative Council and the Representative Assembly will be curtailed so as to admit of the discussion of all matters relating to the administration of the State, the only subjects to be excluded being those relating to the Palace, the relations of His Highness the Maharaja with the Paramount Power or with other States, and matters governed by treaties, conventions and agreements now in force or hereafter to be made by His Highness the Maharaja with the Paramount Power.

(2) The functions of the Representative Assembly and the Legislative Council in respect of legislation will be subject to the provisions embodied in the existing Legislative Council Regulation regarding emergency regulations.

(3) Resolutions of the Representative Assembly and the Legislative Council will have effect only as recommendations to Government.

(4) In order to enlarge the opportunities of non-official representatives of the people to influence the everyday administration, one or more Standing Committees consisting of members of the Legislative Council and the Representative Assembly will be appointed in an advisory capacity on the model of the Standing Committees of the Indian Legislature recently constituted. The members will be selected from a panel to be elected by the members of the Representative Assembly and the Legislative Council respectively from among themselves. Meetings of the Standing Committee will be held under the Chairmanship of a Member of Government and summoned at such times and as frequently as may be decided by the Dewan. All major questions of general policy on which the Member in charge of the department concerned desires the advice of the Committee will be placed before the Committee. The present Budget Finance Committee consisting of officials and non-officials will be abolished.

Gentlemen, these are the general lines of constitutional advance decided upon, which His Highness commands me to communicate for your information. The mixed Committee will be appointed immediately to go into the details and submit a report by the 1st December next so that the new Representative Assembly and the new Legislative Council may be constituted in time for the discussion of the budget of the next year.

In regard to the administrative machinery of the Central Government, representations have been made in this Assembly and elsewhere for the introduction of the non-official element into the Executive Council of His Highness the Maharaja. With reference to this, I am commanded by His Highness to say that there is nothing in the announcement I have made to you to-day giving enlarged powers to the constitutional assemblies of the State, that need stand in the way of the appointment, at His Highness' pleasure and when circumstances permit, of any member of this Assembly or of the Legislative Council to a seat in the Executive Council; but such appointment must always be left to His Highness' unfettered judgment and selection.

TRAVANCORE LETTER.

(From our Correspondent.)

THE TEMPERANCE QUESTION.

I am glad to report that the Temperance movement has caught on here. The drink evil is no doubt present here as in other parts of India, and the fact that the license liquor shops are increasing in numbers in towns and that they are made more and more attractive by the licenses by the provision of every sort of convenience to the worshipper Bacchus is conclusive proof of enormous proportions to which the evil has grown. It is, therefore, a very welcome sign of the times that some earnest attention has begun to be bestowed on the question. The other day a large public meeting attended by more than 3,000 people was held at Karthigupalli with Mr. N. Kumaran, a Member of the Travancore Legislative Council, in the Chair for the morning session, and Mr. M. R. Madhava Warier, another Member of our Legislative Council as President for the afternoon session. Both these gentlemen are prominent citizens and are valuable acquisitions to the sacred cause of temperance. It is also worthy of mention that several Ezhava gentlemen, including Mr. Kumaran, were the prime movers of the big meeting and the leader Alumtil Channar, a wealthy man of the Ezhava community, met the whole of the expenditure, including the feeding of those who were present. But the meeting went the wrong way in proceeding with the business. The meeting passed a resolution concerning tappers and recommending their boycott from the society. It is no doubt true that Ezhavas form the mainstay of the tapping industry and that has been their ancestral profession. That they should be condemned as poison to the society and their boycott should be recommended for adoption is a most misguided step which is sure to lead them to an economic distress of great magnitude. If all of a sudden tapping is to be stopped and the tappers turned out of society, what are they to do to find a living? Again, labour—whatever form it may take—has its own reward. It is strange that two well-known and educated gentlemen who are High Court Vakils should have encouraged this idea. Such a large and well-attended meeting of the masses should have been utilised to create an opinion in favour of the abolition of drink in the first instance. The well-intentioned workers will do well to think over this aspect of their work.

RAJA RAM MOHAN ROY.

Last week the members of the local branch of the Y. M. C. A. celebrated the anniversary of the death of that great patriot of India, Raja Ram Mohan Roy. A large and distinguished gathering was present and it was a cosmopolitan meeting of gentlemen from different classes and communities of His Highness the Maharaja's subjects. Mr. K. G. Sessa Iyer, High Court Judge and a scholar of wide culture and erudition and a lawyer of eminence, well known in South India presided. Messrs. E. J. John, leader of the High Court Bar and Parameswara Iyer, Secretary to Government and a distinguished scholar of eminent literary abilities, delivered speeches on the life of the great Indian reformer.

A CHILD'S VIEWS ON EDUCATION.

(By PARRIE ATHERTON DICKEY.)

The writer of this article in the World Tomorrow (New York) for September, is a thirteen-years-old boy who, on seeing in his home several new volumes on child development, one day handed his mother a typewritten sheet, with the following comment: "I see you have been reading on child training. Here are the ideas of a child on the subject." We know our readers will agree that they are interesting and worth while:—

Much has been written, much has been read, on so called child development. These books have been written by parents for parents, and I believe that it is advisable to get another's point of view, but what I think is more expedient is to make a careful study of the child's personality. A child is an individual, so much so that what others say of their children is not so important for a parent as a careful study of the child's individual character. I proffer a paper written by the child himself, the really important object of all this ado. He should be the guide, and his opinions are of more value than strange pamphlets. As Agassiz says, "Study nature, not books."

A great deal has been said about stimulating environments. I think that a stimulating environment is a necessity in the correct bringing up of the older child, but not only a stimulating environment is needed; a little sauce, a little pepper, should be added. It seems to me that a right stimulant is responsibility. Put the child on his own responsibility and he will work wonders. Make him responsible for something and he will hold to it to the last gasp. One of the most forcible threats to an older child is to tell him that he is an example to other children. This is one of the few arguments that can never be overworked. If he fails in his responsibility his grief is terrible. Many poets have written of the joys of children, but few have sung of their grief. This is probably because their joy bubbles over but their grief they always hide. I have known of one instance when the parent painted in most vivid tones the effect of a neglect, and then she sent the child to bed. In time for the evening chores she woke him and when he looked down-hearted she accused him of sulkiness. The problem before most parents is that of conduct. This use of responsibility will help to remedy that. Responsibility is most properly made the watchword of one of the most progressive schools in the United States—the Francis Parker School in Chicago.

Another problem is that of obedience. I say here that no parent should ever let his child argue with him. That, if anything will spoil a child's obedience. This, however, should not be overdone. A child's side should always be heard to the end, and then a quick obviously impartial verdict should be spoken. Forcing a child to the wall in an argument and holding so that if he answers in one way or the other he should be convicted, is what we schoolboys call a "dirty trick" and should never be resorted to. If a child disobeys, the order should be repeated until he goes and does it. This may not sound possible but it is so. But there is nothing a child resents so much as being ordered around like a little child, so beware of overdoing.

Confidence and trust placed in your child will do more to make him love and respect you than any terrorisms, scoldings or punishments. Treat him like your fellowman and he will treat you the way a parent ought to be treated. A young child will bring a toy or work in his hands and show it to his parent, who is writing or engrossed in some other occupation. The mother will say "Oh? how splendid!" without taking either her eyes or her mind off her work, and the child will depart contented and pleased. The older child works hard on a piece of real work and then brings it to his mother for her to inspect and she also says, "Mother thinks it's just fine," without paying any real attention. The child goes away feeling terribly hurt. He notices every mood or temper and he can see by your face what you think. He would a lot rather that you say to him, if you are very busy, "I shall look at it later if I have time," and that you treat him like a man.

Conduct is the greatest and most serious problem of child life. Unselfishness is at the base of all good conduct, selfishness is at the base of all bad. And since these qualities come from the heart nothing but the heart can change them. And you parents know, almost better than anyone, how hard a child's heart is for a grown person to get at. Punishment will change the outward aspect for a time but it only embitters. An appeal to the higher emotions, such as responsibility and joy, will usually improve the conduct by opening the heart to unselfish motives. But far be it from me to pretend any knowledge where so many great scholars have failed.

As I said before, give him a share in your occupations, consult him in important things and he will be radiant, and no end of a comfort.

My object in writing this is not to tell how to raise a child, not to be presuming or impudent or fault finding, not even to tell how I would like to be raised. But just to set down my opinions on the great business of supplying the world with its next generation.

SOUTH INDIAN NAMES.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Will you kindly allow me to put forward, through your column, a suggestion for the consideration of your readers, especially in South India? A year ago, an enthusiastic social reformer from Malabar and myself were discussing a scheme, at the house of a distinguished Indian leader of Madras, for starting a league with a view to bring about a reformation in the matter of pronouncing Indian names. I shall explain more clearly what I mean. The idea was that all South Indian names must be pronounced without their suffixes. For instance, we must call Ramasami, Subramanian, Srinivasan, Govindan etc. omitting the suffix Pilai, or Ayer or Ayengar or Nair etc. At first, there will be some prejudice against this move but one of its advantages would be to promote caste unity to some extent. At least a good deal of surface difference would be removed and there would be no such thing as prejudice or prepossession even before considering a man's work, or worth. Those only can realise the need for this small reform who know how much mischief the application of these suffixes causes in South India. If people begin to adopt this reform, it would not be difficult eventually to persuade Government to follow a similar line in all their publications.

"THE TREASURE CHEST."

A new 24 page monthly magazine for boys and girls in India, dating from July 1922.

It is printed in English and contains illustrations drawn from Indian life. Each number contains several first-class stories, a poem or two, an Indian biography, sections on nature study, social service, current events, "something to do", and a prize competition.

Subscription Rs. 2 a year. For the six months of 1922 the subscription is Re. 1. If paid in advance for eighteen months to the end of 1923 it is Rs. 2-8-0. Back numbers of the magazine are available, so those who order now will receive a full set from July.

Rates for foreign countries, if paid in this country, 12 annas additional a year, or Re. 1-2 for eighteen months. Subscriptions sent from abroad, four shillings a year or five shillings for eighteen months.

What teachers and parents say of it:

"I have long been looking for just this kind of a magazine for the boys and girls of India."

"Should you be able to maintain the high standard you have adopted from the very outset, the success and popularity of your magazine are assured.....Paper, printing illustrations, and cover, all will appeal to the young folk. But above all, the freshness, local colour and graceful style of your articles, poems and stories."

"It is a charming magazine. How our kiddies love it!"

ROYAL YAKUTI.

THIS YAKUTI or life giving nectar has been prepared from the best, choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has wonderful properties of increasing virile power and it rectifies urinary disorders. In fact it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to these persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicine. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires. It is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills. Rupees ten only.

NOTES.

Mr. Lloyd George's Manchester Speech: It is impossible to understand what purpose Mr. Lloyd George could have had in mind in making the speech which he made at Manchester, on the eve of a Conference for concluding peace with Angora. There was not a single word in the whole of the lengthy speech to indicate that the Prime Minister remembered that there was such a part of the Empire as India and that the people and Government of India held very strong views on the question of his policy with regard to Turkey. He also attacked France and, inferentially, Italy. In fact, politically speaking, Mr. Lloyd George ran a Malayan muck against all and sundry who dared to disagree with him. Statesmen in responsible positions at times commit indiscretions with a calculated purpose, but such indiscretions are carefully confined to the particular issue which they wish to raise. Mr. Lloyd George raised no issue except it be that of his own continuance in the Premiership. His concluding observations are those of a man who has made up his mind that his position has become untenable. Friday's morning papers announce that Mr. Lloyd George's Government is resigning on account of the decision of the Conservatives (there are no Unionists now) to act separately. The General Election is expected to take place on the 11th November. Lord Reading's resignation, we think, can no longer be postponed.

The Punjab Government and Congress Amenities: The Punjab Government sought to score off the Committee appointed by the Congress Working Committee to enquire into the happenings at Guru-ka-Bagh, which, through its Secretary, invited that Government to depute any official or the Public Prosecutor to cross-examine the witnesses to be examined by the Committee. No reply was, we believe, vouchsafed to a similar invitation issued by the Congress Enquiry Committee in 1919, but this time, perhaps because Government saw a good opportunity of turning the tables on the Committee, a polite reply was sent pointing out that as the Congress Working Committee had, in their resolution, condemned beforehand the brutality perpetrated by the Police and congratulated the Akalis on their self-restraint, Government regretted their inability to accept the invitation. The Congress Enquiry Committee on its part, has returned the compliment by its refusal of the invitation to give evidence before the official Committee of Enquiry on nearly the same ground as that taken by Government on the Congress enquiry.

Non-Brahmin Politics in the Bombay Legislative Council: We call attention to the earnest words of remonstrance which Mr. G. B. Trivedi felt constrained, in his article on the last Session of the Bombay Legislative Council which we printed last week, to address to his Non-Brahmin colleagues regarding the increasing tendency among them to view every administrative question through a coloured communal medium. There are, of course, non-Brahmin members who take a larger view, but they find themselves overwhelmed by the tide of communalistic politics. Special importance attaches to Mr. Trivedi's earnest exhortation, because, though himself a Brahmin, he belongs to Gujarat where there is no Brahmin-non-Brahmin antagonism, and even more because as a practical social and religious reformer he, in his own personal life, sets little store by caste distinctions. His sympathies are all with the classes which are at a disadvantage in the social scale of Hinduism, and in the Council and outside his support may always be relied upon for measures for the benefit of such classes. It should not be difficult to have an informal conference between Brahmin and non-Brahmin members to decide upon a common course of policy on broad national lines.

Mr. Bhabha's Convocation Address: The veteran educationist, Mr. H. J. Bhabha, delivered the annual convocation address at the Mysore University. Having served in the Educational Service of the State for many years in various capacities including that of the Inspector General of Education, he knows Mysore educational problems intimately and from the inside, and the several suggestions he threw out in his address merit and will, we are sure, receive careful consideration. If we may venture, however, to differ from one so experienced as Mr. Bhabha, we would deprecate any immediate changes in the system of the University. The older Universities have developed a certain conservatism which resists precipitous innovations, but a new University like that of Mysore is exposed to the danger of attempting to run too fast. Further, owing to the comparatively small area of the State, it is desirable as far as possible for the Mysore University, at least for some years to come, not to deviate widely from the systems prevailing in Bombay or Madras. Much difficulty, for instance, has been felt about the status of those who pass the Mysore School Leaving Examination in relation to the University courses in Bombay, which might have been avoided with a little adjustment. We hope, however, that Mr. Bhabha's suggestion that a Medical Faculty should at once be added to the Mysore University will be carried out. The Medical colleges in British India are not able to admit students from outside, and an enlightened State like Mysore should not lag behind in contributing its share to the limited professional education available.

Marriage and Citizenship: A communication from the American Foreign Press Service says: "American women will no longer lose their citizenship rights through marriage to foreigners if President Harding signs the bill recently passed by a large majority in the United States Senate. This Equal Citizenship bill provides also that "the right of any woman to become a naturalized citizen of the United States shall not be denied or abridged because of her sex or because she is a married woman." It stipulates that a foreign woman who marries a citizen does not, as heretofore, become a citizen merely by such marriage, but must comply with the naturalization laws. The five-year residence required of foreign men is however reduced to one year in the case of foreign women married to citizens. The passage of this bill was brought about largely through the efforts of the National Women's Party which has been investigating and carrying on an active campaign to remove the discriminations against women as citizens. War conditions were particularly effective in calling attention to the fact that a woman's loss of American citizenship through marriage often brought about a situation palpably unjust, as in the case of the Countess Szecheny, who, though of American birth, lost large estates under the Alien Property Act because married to an Austrian. Under the old regulations women teachers in the public schools became ineligible to teach if they married a foreigner, since this caused the loss of their American citizenship. While the new law may, in the first years of its application, cause a few difficulties in matter of property adjustment, it is a logical sequence of the Suffrage Amendment."

The Bombay Entertainments Bill: The Director of Information writes: "I notice in a recent issue of the Indian Social Reformer in a note dealing with the Entertainments Bill that you refer to the action of Government in bringing forward the Bill as an astonishingly unconstitutional procedure, the suggestion being that at least twelve months should have elapsed from the time it was rejected. May I point out that under the Standing Orders of the Legislative Council (Part VIII, Order III) a Bill which has been rejected may be introduced after six months have elapsed from the date of its rejection? The procedure of Government, therefore, was not unconstitutional. Moreover, the Bill is not likely to become law before the end of the year and, without being certain on this point, I do not think that the revenue to be derived from it will start coming in to any extent until the next financial year. Having regard to the Compulsory Education Bill and the necessity for finding funds to finance the proposals made therein, it was necessary to bring in the Bill as soon as it was constitutionally possible, so that the money to be derived from it might be available when the Education Bill was passed into law. That, I believe, was the reason why Government brought forward the Bill this September rather than next February when the Budget will be discussed." The procedure adopted by Government was not illegal. But it was unconstitutional in that it violated the constitutional principle that new taxation should, except in sudden emergencies, be undertaken only at the time of the Budget. There is a difference between what is legal and what is constitutional. The English system furnishes examples of this at every step.

English Translation of Professor Deussen's Upanishads: Mr. Arnold Eilort, Meadley Down, Hants, England, writes in New India that, by arrangement with the German publisher of the late Professor Deussen's Sechzig Upanishads des Veda, he is preparing an English edition of that great work. In order, he writes, that this edition may have as wide an appeal as possible, it will differ from the original in two important points. (1) Among the many valuable notes contained in the original, many are of interest only to the scholar. They will be omitted and only those notes retained which illuminate the text and make it of more vivid interest to all enlightened readers. (2) The original does not give the Upanishads in chronological order. Now that this order has been established by the labours of Deussen himself, this knowledge will be utilised to present the Upanishads in the order in which they came into being.

Caste in College Hostels: Mr. V. V. Oak, 2026, Center Street, Berkeley, California, U. S. A., sends us a copy of a letter which he has addressed to Principal Balkrishna of the Rajaram College, Kolhapur, deprecating the provision of separate Lodges for Marathas, Lingayats and other castes as a direct encouragement to caste prejudices. The University Inspection Committee has in its last inspection report drawn attention to this undesirable feature of the Rajaram College. They observed: "There is no College Hostel as such; there are Hostels managed by the state and the various communities spread over the town meant both for college and High School students. There is not that free intercourse of students belonging to various communities which obtains in college Hostels elsewhere." Mr. Oak writes:

It is time now that we should be awake to the evils which this caste system is causing. Even the Fergusson College does not foster such spirit though it is mainly managed by Brahmins. People blame the Brahmins because they generally keep themselves aloof from other castes but if the Marathas and others also follow the same policy and keep down the people who are next to their rank they have no reason whatsoever to complain of the aristocracy of Brahmins. A time there was when the Caste system had its advantages but its days are numbered. Under the circumstances it passes my imagination to believe that you need to accommodate the Marathas, the Prabhus and what not, separately even for lodging, let alone Boarding. It is this fostering of castes and sub-castes, it is the unbecoming way in which we the Brahmins, the Marathas and the Prabhus treat the so-called untouchables that prevents us to feel, to think and to act as a nation.

The Gauthami Library, Rajahmundry: We have received an appeal influentially signed by leading gentlemen of all parties for contributions towards the building and otherwise for the Gauthami Library, Rajahmundry. We referred some time ago to the magnitude of the services rendered by this important library in the Madras Presidency and we commend the appeal to the generous public. Contributions may be sent to Mr. Nayapati Subbarao Pantalu, B. A., B. L., Rajahmundry or to Mr. K. INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, OCTOBER 22, 1922.

THE INDIAN STATES BILL.

A well-attended public meeting of the citizens of Bombay was held, under the auspices of the Press Association of India, on Wednesday, to protest against the Indian States Bill. Mr. M. A. Jinnah presided. At the outset of his observations, the chairman made it clear that the protest against the Bill and the manner in which it has been passed through the Council of State, did not imply any antagonism to the rulers of Indian States, many of whom cherished the same aspirations for the country as the people of British India. Mr. Jinnah struck a timely note of warning to the Princes on the one hand and Indian publicists, on the other, that they should be on their guard against the policy of causing a division between them. The people of the Indian States, so far as they have expressed themselves, view the passing of the Indian States Bill with consternation as closing the only avenue open to them to call public attention to their grievances.

THE PRESS COMMITTEE'S RECOMMENDATION.

The official reports of the proceedings in the Legislative Assembly and the Council of State were received last week, and it is even more clear from them than from the summaries of the debates in the daily papers that the Bill was brought in and pressed forward without any valid or serious justification. The speech of the Home Member, Sir William Vincent, in moving for leave to introduce the Bill was not that of a convinced supporter of it. He began by explaining why, although he signed only a few months ago the Press Committee's recommendation declaring that such a measure was unnecessary, he had come forward with the motion for leave to introduce the present Bill. He said :

The point is that very few instances were brought to the notice of the Committee in which the Press had excited disaffection against, or had attempted to bring into hatred, Princes or chiefs of States in India. We had before us a witness from the Political Department who was cross-examined by various members of the Assembly, including myself, on this subject, but he did not adduce evidence of a satisfactory character in our opinion on that point; we were, therefore, not convinced that there was every justification for such a law.

Sir William Vincent had since been told, and he accepted it, that the case had not been fully put before the Press Committee, and there had been a number of cases in which protection of this character had been justly required and demanded.

MR. THOMPSON AND SIR WILLIAM VINCENT.

Mr. J. P. Thompson, who has succeeded Sir John Wood (who gave evidence before the Committee) as Political Secretary, introduced the Bill for consideration in the Council of State after it had been rejected by the Lower House. This is the Mr. Thompson who had come into unpleasant prominence in the Punjab Martial Law regime, and had been promoted to the Government of India by Lord Reading in view of the clamour against his continuance in that province! As might have been expected, his advocacy of the measure lacked nothing in warmth and vigour. The officiating Political Secretary repudiated the statement of the Press Committee, and of the Viceroy in his opening speech, that protection to Princes was first given by the Act of 1910. He maintained that it was given so long ago as 1823 by a Regulation—a position which the Home Member demolished in a stinging speech in which he censured Mr. Thompson for his attack on the Assembly. Sir William observed :

I had little thought that any one would have referred to the old Press regulation of 1823 to refute the statement that we (the Press Committee) made. The Press Regulation of 1823 itself contained no reference to Indian Princes at all, though they were protected by rules made under that Regulation. I cannot regard the Regulation of 1823, which was in fact repealed in 1885, as affording any support for the proposition that legislation of the present kind was needed at the time the Committee reported.

Sir William Vincent might have added that many of the States, whose rulers were protected by the Regulation of 1823, had been since annexed on various grounds, misgovernment being the most common one alleged!

THE PRESS ACT AND INDIAN PRINCES.

Mr. Thompson also said that the Press Committee's statement that the Press Act of 1910 had only been used on three occasions with reference to attacks made on Princes in the Press, was incorrect. That Committee, no doubt, took that figure from Sir John Wood who appeared before it for the Political Department. Since then Mr. Thompson had made enquiries from Local Governments and he found that, during the 12 years that the Press Act was in force, "no less than 13 newspapers were warned for attacks of this nature, one of them on several occasions; one press was put on the maximum security and the security of another press was confiscated." That does not seem a formidable number, considering that there were 847 newspapers, besides 2988 periodicals, in 1914-15, which may be taken as the average during the Press Act period. About one newspaper in a year called for a warning during the twelve years. Mr. Thompson also mentioned that "in the year ending May 1922 there were not less than 170 attacks made on Princes and their Administration in the public press." The Press Act remained in force during the greater part of that year, and if these "attacks" were such as to need the protection of a special law, there should have been at least 130 warnings in the twelve months, instead of only 13 in twelve years! The inference is obvious. Mr. Thompson had raked up for the purposes of bolstering up the Bill a large number of "attacks" which could not be brought even under the infinite sweep of the Press Act of 1910.

THE TWO WORST "ATTACKS."

This is borne out by the specimens of "attacks" cited in the Assembly and the Council of State. Sir William Vincent in the Assembly cited four, as articles which "transcend all the limits of decency and are a dangerous source of disaffection to the Governments of the States which are attacked in this manner." "It is against such insults, it is against the fomenting of such disaffection," he said, that the Princes were to be protected by the Indian States Bill. Mr. Thompson, rummaging more zealously in the garbage—for we have our gutter press, to be sure—presented eight samples to the Council of State, including two out of Sir William's four. We may reasonably assume that the two which both the Home Member and the officiating Political Secretary selected, were the worst, and that the remaining six were the second worst, specimens. One of the two said that "the people will see to it that the present system of administration is smashed to pieces within five years," if things do not improve. It is a perfectly innocent observation—the people of every State have an undoubted right to change a bad system and secure a good system of administration for themselves. Whether the word to use is "smash" as in the sentence quoted, or "scrap" as in the Montagu Chelmsford report, is merely a matter of temperament. There can be no better proof of the danger of the proposed legislation than that this should have been selected by both the Home Member and the Political Secretary as a crowning specimen of calumny of Indian Princes. The other is more offensive, but is scarcely more "indecent" "dangerous," or "insulting" than the first. One editor, evidently a raw young man fond of airing the editorial "we," wrote: "We call upon the 700 odd gilded puppets in India to put their house in order, to liberalize their administration, lest the flame of the popular movement should gut the old and moth-eaten fabric of indigenous but autocratic rule in India." Puppets, whether gilded or plain, cannot renovate a moth-eaten fabric, and the invocation shows that the writer in calling the Princes "gilded puppets" merely wanted to sting them out of their acquiescence in the moth-eaten fabric. The idea of sending an editor to jail for five years for what at most is a tactless reference to Princes whom he wants to do well and save themselves and their States from a cataclysm which he foresees, will strike all reasonable men as monstrous. Sir William Vincent found one newspaper "suggesting that Indian States are cursed by absentee despots." That the rulers of most Indian States answer to no political category so nearly as to despotism, is a palpable fact, for stating which it is absurd to punish any writer. When some Chiefs habitually live in foreign countries and draw upon the resources of their often not very affluent subjects to maintain them there in costly extravagance, it is, of course, a curse to the States concerned. Lord Curzon, as Viceroy, established a wholesome rule about absentee princes, and we are sure that his lordship would not have considered this particular criticism very heinous. Sir William Vincent's fourth instance was a reference to another Maharaja, "a man of great weight", as "an impatient new-fledged detective in search of sedition and is worth no more than an ordinary detective who is a traitor to swaraj." This, whether said of a Maharaja of much weight or of a citizen of a few maunds only, is undoubtedly vicious, especially the last clause, and the Maharaja, if he cared to take notice of it, would have been justified in preventing that journal from entering his territory.

MR. THOMPSON'S INSTANCES.

Now for Mr. Thompson's instances. The inhabitants of a well-known State in Southern India were invited to imitate their predecessor who 200 years before 'packed away' an oppressive Dewan, "whatever" added the Political Secretary, "that euphemism may mean." Why call it 'euphemism' if you do not know for certain that it meant something horrible or outrageous? Is a man to be sent to jail on such presumptions? A Prince is charged with having married a foreign lady "from among those whites, unfit even to clean an earthen pot." This criticism only gives expression to the general feeling in India that women of the highest European families as a rule do not marry Indians, and that the Indian Prince demeaned himself by raising a woman of inferior social status to the rank of a Princess. The lady concerned might have brought an action for libel against the newspaper if she felt aggrieved by the criticism. A well-known Prince, said Mr. Thompson, is told that his heart is as black as his skin and that his "rotten brain" cannot see that the bureaucracy think him a fool. The "rotten brain" of the writer of such stuff deserves pity more than punishment. We say again that the Prince referred to would be justified in excluding the paper from his territory, and no one elsewhere would be interested in such sorry trash. States in India, continued Mr. Thompson, are described as boils on the body politic of India. A general statement of the kind can hardly be made a reason for recasting the Criminal Law. It is a matter of opinion what exactly is the place and function of the States in India at the present and in the future. A Prince, said Mr. Thompson, who was suspected of an intention to arrest a prominent agitator was warned that "the man who is not afraid to twist the lion's tail will certainly not mind the bark of the dog." This is in execrable taste, but the Prince was certainly not deterred, we hope, by it to give up his intention, and no part of the affection of his subjects that he previously enjoyed could have been taken away by it. To imprison the writer would be to emphasize his view of the Prince in relation to the Government of India. One of the principal Indian rulers, said Mr. Thompson, is given a year's notice that if he does not set up responsible Government he will be ejected. We should much like to know in which newspaper this notice was given. In another case, he said, a whole pamphlet was devoted to a largely imaginary account of the action taken to suppress what might have been a dangerous rising. We cannot take on trust Mr. Thompson's opinion as to the imaginary character of the account given in the pamphlet.

TREATY RIGHTS.

There remains the argument of Treaty Rights. This argument was fully placed before the Press Committee on which sat the Law Member of the Government of India (as Chairman) and also the Home Member. That Committee unanimously reported as follows on the point :

It has been argued that the Government of India is under an obligation to protect Indian Princes from such attacks, that the Press Act alone affords them such protection and if it is repealed it is unfair, having regard to the constitutional position of the Government of India vis a vis the Indian States, that the Press in British India should be allowed to foment disaffection against the ruler of an Indian State. On the other hand, various witnesses have protested in the strongest terms against any such protection being afforded to the Princes. It is alleged that the effect of any such provision in the law would be to stifle all legitimate criticism and deprive the subjects of such States of any opportunity of ventilating their grievances and protesting against mal-administration or oppression. We understood that before the Press Act (1910) became law it was not found necessary to protect Indian Princes from such attacks.

No new treaties have been made since July 1921 when the Press Committee report was signed. Sir William Vincent stated in the Assembly that, except for the number of cases in which the Press Act was used, he could not say that in any other respect the material in support of the proposal had substantially increased since the report of the Committee. Mr. Thompson in his speech in the Council of State gave a complete conspectus of the treaties and pledges which, in the view of Government, required the passing of this measure, but none of them is later than July 1921.

SOME TREATY PROVISIONS.

A group of 20 States, including some of the most important in the country, said Mr. Thompson, had treaties, some of them of very old standing, which provide that "there shall be perpetual friendship, alliance and unity of interests between the two parties between generation to generation, and the friends and enemies of the one shall be the friends and enemies of both." Another important State has a treaty, also of old standing, which provides that "the honour and rank and dignity of the Raja shall be estimated by the British Government in the same degree as that in which they were estimated by the former Emperors of Hindustan." Another important group of States in Northern India have Sanads dating from 1860 which provide that the British Government "will likewise continue to uphold their honour, respect, rank and dignity in the manner it is done at present." There are some small States in Central India which have a century-old assurance that "if any person shall be convicted of calumniating them, he shall be treated as he deserves." More than 80 years ago a treaty was concluded with one of the great Princes of Rajasthan, which provided that "the British Government would permit no diminution of the honour and reputation of the Maharaja at the hands of others, "and it becomes guarantee for the same." Then Mr. Thompson quoted Royal pledges from the time of Queen Victoria to King George V, declaring that they would uphold the privileges, rights and dignities of the Princes of India. The fact that till 1910 nobody understood these treaties and pledges to mean that the Government of India undertook to send to jail any writer whose writings were resented by Indian Princes, must convince every impartial observer as it convinced the Press Committee, that they were not and could not be so understood. We have already quoted Sir William Vincent's reply to Mr. Thompson's claim that the Princes have been protected by a Press law so early as 1823. In the Queen's Proclamation of 1858, the Sovereign declared that she would respect the rights, dignity and honour of native Princes as her own, but it did not occur to any one that this required that the Indian Penal Code should be amended so as to make it seditious to criticise Indian Princes.

MISRULE IN INDIAN STATES.

In that same Proclamation, Her Majesty expected that there will be good government in Indian States. What is Mr. Thompson's testimony on the point? He said :

I believe that much of the feeling which exists against this Bill is due to a conviction on the part of the members of the Legislature that there is a good deal of oppression and misrule in some of the Indian States. That feeling is a feeling which is based on humanity and it is a feeling which I honour and respect. I regret that I cannot deny the charge and I do not think that Ruling Princes themselves would deny it. It is true too that Government cannot always intervene even in the cases which come to its notice.

Sir William Lee-Warner in his Life of Lord Dalhousie remarks that he, Dalhousie, saw clearly enough that "the principle of non-interference, combined with a guarantee of protection, entailed a responsibility for misrule which no civilised power could accept." Mr. Thompson admits that the Government of India is unable to prevent misrule in Indian States. The present measure, in shutting down the only means open at present of bringing public opinion to bear upon the affairs of Indian States, perpetrates a great wrong to the subject of these States.

THE FISCAL COMMISSION'S REPORT—II.

The second chapter of the Report is entitled "The History of the Tariff in India." In the tenth chapter dealing with the Indian Cotton Excise, there is a more detailed narrative of the circumstances in which import duties come to be abolished altogether in 1882. Readers of Datt's books, "Economic History of British India" and "Economic History of India in the Victorian Age", will find but a faint suggestion in the Report of the injustice and political immorality of the fiscal policy which culminated in the abolition of the customs duties. But for one or two casual words, the Report would seem to regard the history of the Tariff in India as evolved in consonance with the economic needs of the country. In paragraph 16, we read that the cotton duties controversy had cast "its ill-omened shadow over the tariff policy of India." Again, in paragraph 159, we read that the Secretary of State had mainly pressed upon the Government of India the desirability of removing the duty for political reasons. Except for these two, there is, so far as we can see, hardly any sentence in the Majority report to show that they appreciate the fact that the Free Trade policy in India was not conceived in the interests of her economic well-being. Our reason for making a point of this is that the Majority accounts for the "sentiment," in favour of Protection in India, partly as fostered by old traveller's tales about the pre-British wealth of India, based upon superficial impressions of Courts and Capitals without reference to the state of the general population, and partly by the new spirit of national pride, and, in either case, without any clear conception of its economic incidents. As a matter of fact, the Indian conviction, not sentiment, in favour of protection, is rooted in the circumstances in which Free Trade was forced upon India, the consequences of that policy on our industrial life, the fact that every free country in the world—except Great Britain and not even that consistently of late years—has adopted Protection as the only policy under which their industries could prosper, and the obvious reasons which support that belief. The report of the Industrial Commission of 1916-18 was by its terms of reference precluded from making any recommendation contravening the present policy, but that report at many points provides the most effective criticism of several of the positions taken up by the Majority of the Fiscal Commission.

Any body of responsible men who are called upon to examine the fiscal policy of a country, would first ask themselves whether and how far the prevailing policy had been a success or failure. The Majority report—and the minute of dissent by the Minority is no better—hardly touches upon this important aspect of the question. The results of the policy of Free Trade in India may be tested in two ways. The first by its absolute consequences to the industrial and economic life of the people. The several Famine Commission reports bear testimony to the dire consequences of the congestion on land caused by the destruction of the village industries of India. The Industrial Commission Report, and even, unconsciously, the Fiscal Commission's Report, furnish evidence of the industrial set-back to the country coincident with the regime of Free Trade. The one exception of the Cotton Mill industry if carefully analysed, shows that it is, in spite of Free Trade, and owing to the enormous natural advantages which India possesses for cotton manufactures, that this industry has been able to lift its head above the waters of unrestricted outside competition. But the crowning proof of the unsuitability to this country of a system in which there is no place for customs duties, is the fact that in spite of Lancashire, in spite of the political subservience of the English political parties, these duties had to be restored within fifteen years of their abolition and that they have had repeatedly to be raised, until to-day we have a system which has the advantages neither of Free Trade nor of Protection and only the disadvantages of both. The Fiscal Commission observe:

Since 1913 the tariff has become less and less consistent with purely free trade principles. It gives protection, but it gives it in the least convenient and the least beneficial way. The protection is not calculated on the needs of the industry, nor does it carry any assurance of permanent policy. It is casual and haphazard.

No one would extend an existing industry or establishing a new one depending for protection on duties which are liable to vary from year to year and according to the political proclivities of different Secretaries of State. There is no such thing as "casual and haphazard" protection. The present system can only lead to profiteering and encourage gambling, and we hold that the orgies of speculation that we have been witnessing are directly traceable, in part at least, to the policy of drift without any principle of the Government of India. Free Trade has thus become a social and moral danger, and is no longer merely a drag on Indian economic progress.

The Majority damn Protection with faint praise. One of their fears is that it will lead to political corruption. The kind of Protection they recommend undoubtedly will. If every person who wants to start an industry has to appear before a Tariff Board, in which, of course, communal, provincial, Indian States and imperial interests will be represented, to show that his project satisfies the three abstract conditions laid down in the Majority report, in order to obtain a modicum of protection for it, it is easy to see that there must be an enormous amount of log-rolling, graft, personal and family influence and all the other incidents of direct and indirect corruption. For this very reason, it may be said, the Majority recommend that no protection should be given to new industries! According to them, protection should be given only to industries which have established themselves without any protection! This is indeed Free Trade with a vengeance. Even Mill did not go so far. The Majority say that they endorse the policy advocated by Lala Harkishen Lal, "Nurse the baby, protect the child, and free the adult." Mr. Harkishen Lal certainly meant by "Nurse the baby", that something more than the protection which was sufficient for the child, was needed for the baby; whereas the Majority deny even that protection to the baby! This is typical of the Majority report which uses protectionist catchwords to cover anti-protectionist recommendations much to the bewilderment of the Minority who feel that all is not right but are unable to localise what is amiss. The Majority report, even for the trained economist, is an elusive document. Positions ostentatiously taken in the mass are quietly abandoned in detail. There is not a word about the evil effects of forced Free Trade in India, while the disadvantages of Protection are meticulously catalogued, indexed and emphasised in the Report. The Majority recommends Protection in capitals, while in small type and in brackets, it adds in effect, but not to any industry which cannot show that it can do without it!

LONDON LETTER.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, Sept. 28th, 1922.

THE PREMIER AND THE NEAR EAST QUESTION.

The trouble in the Near East has put, for the immediate present, the problem of the Near West in the shade. Yet the problem there remains as acute as ever. The threatened break last week in the negotiations between Belgium and Germany was only averted at the twelfth hour by the Bank of England going to the rescue of the German Reichsbank and giving guarantees. But that only puts off the day of reckoning; the reparations problem remains. The great value, however, of the present moment's pause, is that it may give time to settle the trouble in the Near East and also, will allow America again to think well over her position in the world's commerce ere the Allies meet again in Conference over their joint financial trouble.

Apart from South Africa, the Dominions seem almost more excited about the war in the Near East than Great Britain herself. The people of these islands say they are opposed to any more war of any kind with anybody; but it is somewhat different in some of the Dominions, especially Australia and New Zealand, who are still desperately conscious of their losses at Gallipoli during the Great War and would like to assuage the feeling of consuming anger against the Turks from which they still suffer. The Labour leaders here, in stirring bursts of oratory, say "No more War". But one wonders what would happen should men again be called for. Mr. J. H. Thomas M. P., at a meeting of railway-men a few days ago, declaimed loudly against the Premier's appeal to the Colonies for support, and expressed the hope that the Government was sincere when it said that it desired that the Straits should be open and controlled by some super-authority such as the League of Nations. The Miners' Federation also, on behalf of the Miners of Great Britain, declares it will oppose by every possible means any step taken to involve British workmen in further bloodshed. Rumours have been about that Mr. Lloyd George has been responsible for the furnishing of the Greeks with arms, equipment and advice. This rumour was of sufficient importance to call for a reply from the Premier, and this morning an emphatic official denial was published in the Press. The Premier says "there is no foundation for the suggestion that this country has assisted either the Kemalists forces or the Greek forces by the provision of arms, equipment or advice. The British Government has maintained an attitude of strict impartiality between the two combatants since the declaration of neutrality issued by the Allied Powers in March 1921 and has not helped either in any way to continue hostilities." The unfortunate thing is that few people today attach any value to any affirmation or denial by the present Government.

EFFECTS OF THE FALL IN THE PRICE OF PETROL.

When all the world seems crumbling up in its present form, to be remade in some other form, it is astonishing how much comfort people find in lesser things. The announcement that petrol has dropped 5d. a gallon has given rise to long articles in the papers showing how tremendously such a drop will affect every thing. Trade, according to the general view, should immediately show a great increase, transport should become cheaper, and as the cost of transport means about 20 per cent. of the cost of goods, lowering the rates of transport means lowering the selling price of articles and produce not only in this country but also overseas. Travelling will be cheaper, and engines can be run more cheaply. Municipalities will be able to economise at least on their large motors, and this means the lowering of rates, perhaps. Altogether, the effect of a decrease in the price of petrol seems as though it might save Europe from disaster, but no doubt the plain man in the street will look in vain either this week or this year for the benefits that are supposed to be coming to him. Yet hope is worth something, and if his share in the general rejoicing is only that, it is nevertheless worth while.

THE NEW AMERICAN TARIFF LAW.

The discussions between Great Britain and the United States regarding the provisions of the new American Tariff Law, authorising search of foreign vessels suspected of being rum-runners outside the three-mile limit and extending the American jurisdiction fourteen miles into the high seas, continue. The outcome of the discussions will be important, as Canada may be tremendously affected by them. Hitherto discussions concerning the three-mile limit have taken place because of Canadian fishing rights and the present discussions may affect many important rights that Canada now claims she possesses in waters near America. The unfortunate thing is America believes she has definite proof of a tremendous amount of illicit liquor traffic taking place from the Canadian side of the water and the difficulty of dealing with this situation has produced something in the nature of a minor crisis in the relationship between the two peoples.

THE GEDDES' AXE AND WOMEN TEACHERS.

A little while ago the Education Board of the London County Council, acting on suggestions made in the report of the Geddes Committee, determined to engage 100 women, not qualified teachers, to take charge of the infant classes in schools, these classes to consist only of children under six years of age. The 100 women engaged were to undergo a three months' intensive course of instruction, and the candidates for this work had to be between the ages of 18 and 30. They were to be on a 7 years' time limit, with a salary not to exceed £155, and with no retiring pension. The headmistresses and staffs at present in schools were asked to co-operate in the scheme and to assist in the training of the new selected candidates. At the time of the proposal no special protest was voiced by the National Union of Women Teachers. But later on the National Union of Women Teachers advised its members not to accede to the Education Authorities' request and not to render any assistance to the people presented to them. The result was that when the 100 young women presented themselves at the beginning of the week at their respective centres, they were boycotted and they were refused assistance altogether. The next day a deputation from the National Union of Women Teachers waited upon Sir Robert Blair, the Education Officer, to protest against recruits for infant teaching. The deputation was with Sir Robert for nearly three hours and it was announced at the end that the National Union of Women Teachers would withdraw their advice to the headmistresses and staff for the present. A crowded meeting of those engaged in teaching was held in the London Halls and further deputations are to wait upon the London County Council and the Board of Education, but the latter have not signified yet their willingness to receive any further deputations. Were it not serious it would be amusing to note how loudly each body protests as soon as the Geddes' axe touches it. It is useless to cry out for economy and then for everyone to refuse to have economies made in his direction. Of course some sacrifices have to be made, and these must be made with the view that they shall hurt the least number of people and that not in fundamentals or permanently.

MISS ROYDEN ON THE MISSION OF WOMEN.

The Annual Conference of the National Council of Women of Great Britain and Ireland was opened on September 26th at Cambridge. There were over 600 delegates present. The Bishop of Ely approved of Miss Mand Royden being allowed to preach in the Church where a special service for the Conference was held. The preacher said that to men in the mass the use of force seemed to be inevitable in human affairs and that they could not imagine any other means of governing. The true mission of women was to substitute moral power for material force in the Governments of the world. A few rather important resolutions were put forward on the opening day and carried. Two of these could be emphasised in nearly every public meeting with benefit to the people assembled, the first being that the people themselves are responsible for the open conduct of international affairs, and the maintenance of a peace policy by their governments; the second being the need for an organised system of impressing on children the vital necessity of the maintenance of peaceful relations between nations.

MARRIAGE AND SACRAMENT.

(COMMUNICATED.)

A conversational meeting of the members of the Bombay Students' Brotherhood, was held on the evening of Sunday the 15th instant, at its premises. Mr. Burjorji Framji Bharucha was the principal guest of the evening. Over 80 members were present. Light Refreshments were also served. The conversation turned on the subject of Marriage and Sacrament. Mr. S. Sadanand started the discussion by summarising for the benefit of the members, what had appeared in the Reformer on the subject and drawing attention to the paper's advocacy of practical action. He said that in Southern India, where the arbitrary age limit of 12 or 13 for marriage of girls, and insistence was laid on the celebration of pre-arranged marriages, the system of Dowry or Stri-Dhan had to-day we greatly degenerated into an instrument of extortion and reduced marriages to affairs of convenience and in some cases, of pure barter. A member stated that the conditions in Deccan also were no better.

Mr. R. S. Parbidri enquired if the Editor of the Reformer had suggested any practical action. It was the duty of veteran social reformers to give a lead in such matters. If they did, it showed that the problem was so complicated that it was difficult to suggest a suitable remedy. Later in the course of discussion, he gave the instances of a girl of 10 or 11, who looked not older than 8 years, being given in marriage, in tears because she could not bear the weight of the ornaments and garlands on her body. This was performed by a father of professed social reform views. He also cited a case of an aged gentleman of 50 years, holding a high responsible Government post, marrying as his third wife, a girl of 14 years. Mr. Parbidri said that in cases of such outrageous marriages, the least that a person could do, was by signifying one's disapproval and resentment by abstaining from attending any of the ceremonies or functions connected with them. This suggestion was warmly approved by the members present, although an objection was raised to the use of the word of 'boycott' in that connection.

Mr. S. A. Dange said that economic causes were at the root of the social evils. Until the root cause was removed, no effective reform can be carried out.

Mr. Bharucha said that he considered one of the chief contributory causes to the wide prevalence of Dowry system in India was the costly system of education and the utter dependence of young men on parents or fathers-in-law for completing their studies or starting on any professional career. In the West, a young man received an education that made him self-dependent in however small a way, at the age of 16 and 17. Mr. Bharucha also suggested as one of the essential reforms in Indian marriage customs, the practice of economy and simplicity in the celebration of marriages. Now-a-days, it was the practice to incur ruinous expenditure to perform marriages amidst great pomp and show.

It was then pointed out that from as early a period as 1906, attempts have been made to fight the dowry system and child-marriage but only very little progress has been made. That progress will continue to be made with the growth of female education, without an active organisation to combat the evils of dowry and child marriage.

But the general consensus of opinion was that the fact of the failure of earlier organisations in the same direction was no reason for not renewing the attempt, however small the beginning may be, especially as there was an unanimity of opinion about the existence of the evil.

It was then put to the meeting that each member should pledge to fight the anachronism of the Hindu Marriage customs in all possible ways by individual precept and practice, and particularly (1) by not giving or accepting any dowry in connection with any marriage (2) not to encourage, assist or participate in marriages in which the age of the girl was less than 14 and the age of the boy under 21, dowries were extorted, or in any other way reprehensible, (3) to encourage removal of inter-caste restrictions.

Mr. Sadanand suggested that the age limit for girls may be fixed at 16.

General approval was given but as it was getting late, further consideration of the practical action was postponed to the next meeting.

THE SCOUT MOVEMENT IN MYSORE.

His Highness the Maharaja of Mysore delivered a speech on the occasion of the presentation of the Maharaja's flag to the Prabhada Troop of the Mysore Scouts on 2nd October 1922, in the course of which he said:

The rapid growth of the Scout movement in the Mysore State has been one of the healthiest and most encouraging events of the time. The movement has shown already of what excellent stuff Mysore boys are made. They have shown steadiness as well as eagerness, and their scouting has brought out the best that was in them. But many boys who would make excellent Scouts have not yet enrolled. Every school boy should be a Scout if he wants to make the most of himself, and no doubt all Scouts realise that it is a very important part of their duty to bring in others—not only the active popular boys, but also those who are shy and retiring, and perhaps rather weak physically, for these are the very boys who are most in need of the friendliness and the strenuous training that are to be found in the troop.

Deep gratitude is due to all those who have instructed and led the Scouts during these early stages of the movement—to the past and present Scout Commissioners, and to all those who have worked under them. No praise is too high for the Scoutmasters, usually hard-working men with but little leisure, which they have cheerfully devoted first to their own training and then to the training of the boys in the troops which they have formed.

I do not wish to give you any advice, for you do not need it. All the best advice in the world is contained in the Scout Law, which, no doubt, you all know by heart. It is very simple, yet as you grow older, you will ever find new and deeper meaning in it. In fact, life itself is the best interpreter of the Scout Law, and it is through trying hard to obey it in all we do that we find out how much it means and how much happiness it brings. Two general points in that Law seem specially noteworthy. The first is that it is nearly all about doing, and contains hardly anything about talking. This shows what an admirable Law it is. A Scout is a person who does things instead of talking about them. He has to make a promise when he becomes a Scout; after that he never makes any more promises, but spends all his energy in active service. We must not, of course, disparage speech, and there are many whose wise speech is true service, but in the case of the average man it is no bad plan to speak as little as possible and act as much as possible. It is the Scout's duty to speak words of helpfulness and good cheer, but nearly all the stress of his law falls upon strenuous action.

The second point (which is connected with the first) is that the Scout Law does not trouble much about telling you what not to do, but keeps telling you, instead, what to do. An English Scout Commissioner was writing in the spirit of this Law when he said to the Scoutmasters:—"Let the root idea of your discipline be positive rather than negative, in other words, to influence the boys to do right rather than to prohibit them from wrong doing." A boy, or a man for that matter, who is taught and stimulated to do good will instinctively avoid what is bad. The Scout who devotes himself to helping other people, as the Scout Law demands, will not do evil either to himself, or to others. And the Scout doctrine is that even an innocent life is not a good life if it fails to do positive service to a neighbour, and to the State.

I suppose that no Scout in this assembly will be satisfied until he has passed the first class tests, and also secured the Ambulance badge. These certificates mean that a boy is a fine all-round citizen, a really useful person. But it is rather interesting to find that when a Scout has gone so far as this he has really just begun his studies. The Boy Scout movement has adopted the much-maligned examination system, though in this case at least there seems no cause to grumble. No doubt you have all looked through the list of tests which it is open to a Boy Scout to pass. They are all practical. I find that Scouts may obtain badges for passing tests in nearly every handicraft, and as to the friend to animals badge, I think this might well come first in the studies of our young enthusiasts. Every one of these studies means knowledge and a new sense of worth and power. The Scout movement is, of course, still in its infancy in the State, it may be some time before this test idea is adopted in its completeness, but meanwhile the official volume on "Boy Scouts Tests", which gives all the necessary instructions for each of them, ought to be in the hands of all Senior Scouts.

It only remains for me to wish you all continued success in your laudable desire to improve yourselves and to further the well-being of your fellow-citizens.

THE POONA SEVA SADAN.

A correspondent, intimately acquainted with the educational activities in Poona, writes:

I am sure none can have a thorough idea of the work, which the Poona Seva Sadan Society—that institution, established in Poona by Mrs. Ranade and Mr. G. K. Devadhar, in the year 1909—has been carrying on against heavy odds. I recommend every sympathiser with the cause of women's education and their general elevation to embrace every opportunity of paying a prolonged visit—for, it is not now possible to gather any genuine impressions within an hour or a half—whenever he or she happens to be in Poona, and satisfy himself or herself by seeing and watching the work on the spot. The vast expansion of the work and the great practical utility of the various instructional branches of the institution will greatly impress any visitor. The women themselves have not been slow in appreciating the opportunity afforded them by the Society and they have been utilizing the same in ever-increasing number—a testimony, if indeed one were needed, that goes to prove the success of the endeavours that are being made for their elevation by the Society. Thus the number of women students, which was only about 15 at the starting has now gone over 1000, including about 200 duplications. The Society has begun to establish its branches in out-side places—urban as well as rural—and two have already been opened, one at Satara and the other at Baramati, both named after Lady Thackersey. This extension of work outside Poona is made possible only by the generosity of that great departed champion of the cause of education in general and that of women's education in particular—I mean the late Sir Vithaldas D. Thackersey. "The Nurses Settlement" of the Poona Seva Sadan Society, recently established in Bombay itself, bears eloquent testimony to the Society's solicitude for the spread of medical relief amongst women and children. The Settlement has been doing splendid work in the matter of maternity and infant-welfare amongst the Bhatia community of Bombay, thus helping to reduce the high death-rate amongst them.

Amongst the recent distinguished visitors may be mentioned Sir Hormusji Wadia, the Hon'ble Sir Narayan Chandavarker, Dr. R. P. Paranjpye, Mr. Lory, the Director of Public Instruction, and the great post-patriot of Bengal Dr. Rabindranath Tagore. All of them speak of the work of the Society in most eulogistic terms. Mr. Lory confesses himself to be a "profound admirer" of the work and says: "What the institution has done is stupendous. But the movement it has set on foot will need continually expanding funds and it is to be hoped that the public will realise the enormous value of the work that is being done and will generously support the Seva Sadan in its endeavours to extend the scope of its usefulness."

It is worth mentioning that nearly the whole instruction in the various branches is being imparted without charging any fees. Moreover, in cases of extreme helplessness, women-students, nearly 70 per cent. of whom are widows, are even fed and lodged at the expense of the Society. One can, therefore, easily imagine what a heavy financial responsibility the Society has to shoulder from year to year; and it is to be hoped that the earnest appeal for monetary help, which the Society has issued with a view to "collection" during the Devali Holidays and the following few days, will receive a ready and liberal response from the general public.

A PRINCE'S WAYS.

(The Servant of India.)

Some years ago the following facts relating to a very well known Indian Prince in Western India were related to us by a person of unimpeachable authority. They are only a few out of many actions of that description. A sirdar of his State happened to marry with the full consent of her parents, a girl who belonged to a slightly higher caste than himself. The Prince who considered himself the special guardian of the girl's caste, arbitrarily declared the marriage void, forced the girl to marry a creature of his own and drove the sirdar out of the State, confiscating all his property. The sirdar had submitted a petition to the Political Agent, but at the time the incident was related to us, had not succeeded in obtaining justice. The same Prince coveted a beautiful house built in his capital by a subject who had made money in Bombay. As the owner was not willing to part with it, one fine day he was suddenly arrested on some pretext and imprisoned in a cell without trial for several months; and was released only after pressure was brought to bear on the Prince from high political quarters. The prisoner's health was so shattered that he died shortly afterwards. His widow wanted to give away the coveted property in charity, but the Prince stepped in to prevent it and passed a rule that no properties should be devoted to charitable purposes in his State without his sanction. Yet another achievement of this enlightened Prince—he has had British university education—was when his State was in the grip of a famine. He called a meeting of the citizens for organising relief and promised to contribute a sum equal to the amount subscribed by them and became their treasurer. About Rs. 25,000 was collected and passed on to the treasurer, but it never again saw the light of day. And the citizens dare not complain, though the famine naturally was most severe in the territory of that Prince. A system of government under which such misrule is possible is certainly rotten to the core. But in saying so and in giving publicity to these incidents, shall we not be bringing the administration of that Prince in contempt and would thus come under the new law?

TEMPERANCE CONTESTS.

Instructions for temperance contests have been drawn up for students, teachers and others desiring to write essays, stories or songs on any subject pertaining to intoxicating drinks and drugs. The object of these contests is "to promote a study of the harmful effects of intoxicating drinks, and drugs, encourage active interest in the temperance cause, and secure useful material for the preparation of temperance literature. Provision is made for a young people's contest calling for essays and stories in either Marathi or Gujarati, an adult contest calling for Gujarati or Marathi essays and stories, and for an English contest, calling for temperance essays and stories written in English, also original temperance songs in either Gujarati or Marathi are desired. Prizes amounting to a total of nearly Rs. 100 will be given to the various winners. Full particulars in Marathi, Gujarati or English are available by writing to the Rev. A. J. HOFFERT, Bulsar.

THIS YAKUTI or life giving nectar has been prepared from the best, choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has wonderful properties of increasing virile power and it rectifies urinary disorders. In fact it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to those persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicine. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires. It is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. NOTES.

The Bonar Law Ministry: The British Coalition Cabinet has ceased to exist and a Conservative Ministry has been formed with Mr. Bonar Law as Premier. Parliament has been dissolved and the General Election will take place in the middle of November. Whether the Bonar Law Cabinet will survive the General Election does not seem to be certain. The new Prime Minister as well as his Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Stanley Baldwin, are Tariff Reformers, and Mr. Bonar Law had expressed the opinion several years ago that the relinquishment of Free Trade by Great Britain would not be a reason against its continued imposition on India for the benefit of the Lancashire manufacturer. Viscount Peel continues at the India Office. So far as India is concerned, the only difference between the Lloyd George and the Bonar Law Ministries, is that, while it was impossible to say what the former would do, it is possible to say that the latter will do nothing to increase the freedom or the prosperity of India. It is always well to know the worst, and this is likely to be the new Ministry's best service to this country. She will not be long left to dream in a Fools' Paradise.

The Government of India: A London newspaper says that Lord Reading will lay down his office shortly, not because of the change of Ministry but because of an understanding when he came out that he will serve only two years as Viceroy of India. If there was such an understanding, there will be no difficulty in giving effect to it on account of Lord Peel's insistence upon His Excellency continuing to guide the destinies of this country. The job has been too big for him. We are sure that Lord Reading meant to do his best for the Indian people. But the Indian people no longer wish things to be done for them. They want to do things themselves. If His Excellency had grasped this fact, his short course in India would not have been marked by such violent zigzags as they have been. Lord Reading's resignation will mean a considerable change in the personnel of the Indian Government two other Members of which are also due to go out in the next few weeks. It seems to be settled that Sir Malcolm Hailey, the present Finance Member, will take the Home Department from Sir William Vincent. If, as stated, an English economist is to be appointed to the Finance portfolio, the next Law Member will have to be found from among persons who have served ten years under the Crown in India. Sir Asutosh Mukerji, in that case, would probably, it is stated, have the best chance for the post, if the Calcutta University can spare him, or rather if he can spare the Calcutta University.

The Indian States Bill: We print the memorial addressed by the Kathiawar Hitavardak Sabha to Parliament praying that the Indian States Bill may not be approved. We hope the prayer will be listened to. But we must point out that the stress laid in the memorial upon the prevalence of autocracy or even misrule in Indian States is not relevant or necessary to justify the opposition to the present measure. As a fact, it is incorrect to say that all States without exception, or even as a general rule, are autocratically misgoverned. There are a few States which are quite well governed and some others of which it would be incorrect to say that they are actually misgoverned. The Press Bill is objectionable because it is an attack on the liberty of the Press. We showed last week that the arguments advanced by Mr. Thompson in the Council of State on behalf of Government were unsubstantial. The liberty of the press is an essential of all good and civilised Government whether that Government is an autocracy or democracy. While on this point, we should like to repudiate the pretension that the Indian Press Act of 1910 was repealed as an act of grace by the Government of India. That Act would have stained any statute-book in which it found a place, and it would have been an act of gross political indecency to keep it side by side with an Act professing to initiate India in responsible Government. This Bill is no better, indeed it is much worse. The journals which make a business of Indian States will not be affected by it. It is independent and honest criticism that will be hampered by this hasty and ill-considered measure.

Mrs. Sarojini Naidu: We are glad that Mrs. Sarojini Naidu has recovered from her recent illness. She has been delivering addresses to large audiences in Ceylon and Southern India, and has been unsparingly using her woman's privilege of speaking home-truths without giving offence. We need hardly say that we entirely agree with her in holding that without reconstructing the social life of the people there can be no Swaraj. This is the fundamental principle of the Bardoli programme the four broad items of which are but hints of the vast amount of social spade-work that remains to be effected. Mrs. Naidu quite realises this. That is why we find it difficult to follow her when she speaks of the Legislative Councils as Temples of Maya and entry into them as soul-destroying. Is not the Congress itself a temple of Maya? Is not Non-Co-operation a grand illusion—seeing that the whole Universe is interwoven together and that every part is in sure co-operation with every other part? Consciously or unconsciously, we needs must co-operate with each other either in sympathy or in revulsion. Hate, says the poet, is but the mask of love. Non-Co-operationists have unconsciously co-operated with those with whom they profess to non-co-operate to much greater effect than the Co-operators have consciously done. They may if they like stand aside, but the country is quite sick and tired of erecting inertia into a faith and a policy.

The Late Sir William Meyer: The last years of the life of Sir William Meyer, who fell dead in a London street the other day, were shot with tragedy. His son, his wife and his daughter died within a few years under painful circumstances. The triple calamity, to all outward seeming, did not affect at all the even tenour of his life. When this writer met him five years ago, Sir William told him that he looked forward when he retired to resuming his historical studies—this with reference to a striking address which he delivered several years ago in Madras comparing the Roman and the British Imperial systems. If he had carried out his intention—instead of breaking his heart over the purchase of stores for the India Office—he is sure to have left behind him some monumental work, or at any rate, the materials for one. For he was endowed with rare qualities as a scholar and writer. As Finance Minister, he fought conscientiously for the interests of India until he was overwhelmed by sheer authority. His attitude towards Indian political aspirations was described by an Indian colleague thus: "Sir William will admit Indians to the highest appointments under the Crown, even the Viceroyalty, but he is opposed to constitutional changes to transfer power to the people." The utter demoralisation of a certain section of our public life is shown by the fact that the end of a high-hearted career such as Sir William's, seems to interest some publicists chiefly as an opportunity for more or less intelligent or interested speculation about his probable successor. When one reads one of these, one is tempted to tell him: "Thou almost persuadest me to be a Non-Co-operationist."

Mr C. R. Reddy on the Reforms: Mr. Rama Linga Reddy in an address delivered last week at Poona claimed that the Reforms have been a success. In what way, he did not stay to answer. Is the country today better or at least more economically administered than before the Reforms? Has it more freedom? Have they brought more peace and harmony to the people? The answers to these questions must be in the negative. The huge deficit this year promises to be exceeded in the next. The ordinary criminal law has been stretched in many parts of the country to penalise actions to which it was never before applied. The Indian States Bill, as the Indian Messenger, the Calcutta Brahma organ, observes, is practically a revised edition of the Press Act of 1910. The manner in which it was enacted in the teeth of the Legislative Assembly, is the utter negation of constitutionalism, though, of course, it was sanctioned by a regulation. That, in our opinion, marks the final collapse of the Reforms so far as the Central Government is concerned. As for the Provinces, Mr. Reddy is a member of the Madras Legislative Council whose unanimous demand for a revision of its contribution to the Central Government, was unceremoniously rejected. What distinctive achievement of Ministers is there to support Mr. Reddy's claim that the Reforms have been a success? But we need not labour this point as he himself admitted that his experience of the Madras Council "awakened him to the obvious limitations of diarchy, whose cessation at the earliest opportunity should be demanded by all parties in the country." This tribute to a scheme which he claims to be a success, is in the vein of Gilbert Chesterton with whom Mr. Reddy, we are sure, will not feel hurt to be compared. Non-Co-operation may be dead as Queen Anne as Mr. Reddy declared, but the Reforms are not much more alive. The only persons who have benefitted by them are the Ministers whom Mr. Reddy described not along ago as crawling forward on their bellies under cover of the Gandhian guns!

The Akalis at Guru-Ka-Bagh: The Akali Jathas continue to march to Guru-Ka-Bagh, but they are no longer beaten by the Police, but arrested. A very large number, nearly 3000, have thus been arrested, but the cry is "Still they come." The Government of the Punjab have issued an extraordinary statement to the effect that they have made arrangements to receive and accommodate 10,000 additional prisoners! This shows that they have lost confidence in their own capacity to deal with the situation which is developing seriously. One of the recent Jathas was composed entirely of retired Sikh Army men, officers and soldiers. We reprint a thrilling account of their march, contributed to the Tribune of Lahore, by Professor Ruchi Ram Sahni, late of the Government College, Lahore. The conversation between the Deputy Commissioner and the leader of the Jatha, is especially interesting. The Tribune account leaves off at the arrival of the Jatha at Guru-Ka-Bagh. An Associated Press message of the 26th states that the pensioners' Jatha, one hundred and one strong, were arrested on the previous afternoon. The Jathadar, Subadar Amar Singh, after arrest was offered a seat by Mr. Beatty, but he declined it saying that he preferred to remain with his men.

Depressed Classes in Cochin: There seems to have taken place a complete reversal of the policy of the late Dewan, Mr. Vijayaraghava Charya, of Cochin, of emancipating the depressed classes from degrading and servile restrictions. His successor, Mr. Narayana Menon, is reported in the Swarajya of Madras to have told a deputation of these classes at Cranganore, which asked for the removal of the prohibition on them to use a certain public road in that town, that personally he had no objection to their doing so, but as a Dewan he could not give them the required permission and that an executive order will not avail against a long-standing custom! He is further reported to have advised them to fight out the case in a court of law. It is stated that the prohibition to use certain public roads by the so-called unapproachables was enforced by "the local authorities." In that case, the Executive head of the Government is not the proper person to advise the Eshavas to fight the case in a law court.

The Rajasthan Patrika: This is the name of a new Anglo-Gujarati weekly, published at Rajkot, in the interests of Indian States, especially in Kathiawar. The policy of this journal seems to be based on the belief that if the Ruling Chiefs and their subjects be left to evolve their own political future independently of the British Indian Government, the prospects of good Government in the States will be assured. The Rajasthan Patrika is of opinion that the Bill for the Protection of Indian Princes will have consequences quite the opposite of those intended.

For the Inchcape Committee: The changed political conditions cannot but adversely affect the enquiry entrusted to the Inchcape Committee on Retrenchment. However, we pass on a suggestion from a correspondent who knows something of the matter, that the Committee should consider whether the Marine Department of the Government of India serves any useful purpose commensurate with its cost.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

POLITICS IN THE BOMBAY CENSUS REPORT.

Census Reports pertain to the literature of social science and those who write them should scrupulously observe the mental detachment and freedom from ulterior purposes of the scientist. Mr. L. J. Sedgwick, the Bombay Superintendent, however, would seem to have conceived his duty in a contrary spirit. He has thought it quite the right thing to bring his political prejudices, as a member of the Indian Civil Service, to the elucidation of the statistics of the Census. In his introduction, under the guise of answering some distinguished persons who questioned the value of the Census, he indulges in the following reflections the bearing of which on current politics is obvious:

The human mind leans ever to crank ideas; and the pleasantest form of crankhood is to start hurling epigrams at the nine-pins of civilisation. Abolitional crankhood is easier than constructional crankhood. There are people who advocate the abolition of intoxicants, the abolition of titles, the abolition of monarchies or per contra democracies, and a million other things. Why not the abolition of the Census? One can never argue with the crank. These remarks are, therefore, addressed to the possible waverers, who are still able to give intelligent consideration to the problem.

As the man who doubts the value of the Census is not likely to read Mr. Sedgwick's Report, he might have spared himself the trouble of reproducing such commonplace arguments to prove the utility of it. At the end of these, he triumphantly concludes that "so far from doing away with the Census it would be desirable to have one every year". After this promising exordium, calculated to convey the impression that in India the idea of a Census was unknown till Mr. Sedgwick appeared to expound it, the learned Superintendent refers to the complaint of the Industrial Commission that there was little information of economic value in the reports, and declares his intention to give such information in preference to ethnographic information, for which previous reports had been commended, for the profound reason that "it is impossible to please everybody." We agree with Mr. Sedgwick that the graphic method of representing figures has not been very happily used in this Report. It may be, as he says, the first time that graphs are used in Bombay Census Reports, but the method itself is by no means a novel or original one, and in any case their sole purpose is to present more and not less vividly than literary description the comparative significance of statistics. Some Provincial Census Reports have been admirable models of investigation and exposition—pure hard fact presented in all the fascination of consummate literary art. Neither this Bombay Census Report, nor the previous one which, however, was free from any pretentious padding, can be placed in this category.

A striking illustration of bureaucratic bias in the Report is the section headed "Attitude of the Public Towards Education" in the chapter on Literacy. In this section it is sought to establish the thesis that "the idea entertained in some western countries that India is pining for learning, which its Government refuses to provide, is ridiculously wide of the mark." "Apart from all questions of finance," Mr. Sedgwick proceeds, "before there can be any marked advance towards general literacy there must be the will to learn. That will seems at present to be lacking among large bodies of men, and among the large majority of Indian females, and those who represent them". In support of this position, it is sought to be made out by a comparison of the literacy figures for Baroda and British Gujarat that, in spite of the existence of a system of compulsory education in Baroda for over 20 years, British Gujarat, where there is no such system, has a higher proportion of literates. Mr. Sedgwick rightly observes that, as the Baroda State is interspersed with one portion of the Presidency only, namely, Gujarat, the Baroda figures may fairly be compared with those of Gujarat only. He gives a table showing the progress of literacy in Baroda and in the rest of Gujarat from which it appears that, while the numbers of literates per 1000 of the population at the recent Census were 210 for males and 40 for females in Baroda, the corresponding figures in British Gujarat were 223 and 42 respectively. Even on the basis of these figures it is evident that the progress made in Baroda which had only 163 male and 8 female literates, as against 206 and 16 respectively in British Gujarat, at the Census of 1901, is proportionately greater. Starting with a heavy deficiency, Baroda has very nearly caught up British Gujarat in twenty years. One has only to turn to the literacy figures for these years to the other Gujarat States to see that without compulsory education Baroda could not have achieved this result. In Kathiawar the proportion has remained stationary for males at 186 in 1901 and 185 in 1921 per 1000, while that for females has risen from 13 in the former to 36 in the latter year. (The other Gujarat States are negligible for purposes of this comparison.) Mr. Sedgwick, nevertheless, will not allow that the educational administration of even the Kathiawar States is behind that of Baroda territory, though in the Baroda districts of Kathiawar there are 264 male and 63 female literates for 1000 of the population of over 5 years of age against 213 and 41 respectively in the rest of Kathiawar, "because a good deal depends on the character and composition of the population." "There is," he infers "some element in the population (of Dwarka and Okhamandal which constitute Baroda-Kathiawar) which lends itself specially to education," which element "may be less pronounced in the rest of Kathiawar." It may be similarly argued that when one place has a larger proportion of children in schools than another, it is because the former has a population more prone to go to school than the latter. The argument only shows that Mr. Sedgwick is resolved to show that a compulsory system of education does not do more for the spread of literacy than a voluntary, haphazard system such as we have in British Gujarat and such as they have in a more aggravated form in the Kathiawar States.

What is the actual fact? It is plainly that Baroda is fast overtaking British Gujarat in education and literacy as the direct effect of her compulsory system. Though compulsory education was first introduced tentatively on a small scale in Baroda so long ago as 1893, it was not till 1906 that it was nominally extended to the whole State, and even in 1911, it was stated that it had yet to be introduced in one-third of the villages of the State. We take these statements from Mr. Sedgwick's report. It follows that the only fair comparison as regards literacy is among persons of the ages covered by the compulsory scheme during the years it has been applied to the larger part of the State. If we take these ages to fall between 10 and 20, we find that the proportion of literates in Baroda in these ages is higher than in British Gujarat and much more so, of course, than in Kathiawar. The figures are: Baroda, male 281 and female 99 literate and British Gujarat 264 and 83 respectively per 1000 of the population between the ages 10 and 15. For the age period 15-20, Baroda has 355 and 105 against British Gujarat 342 and 94 per 1000 of the population. At ages of 20 and over the Baroda figures are 265 and 84, while those of British India are 299 and 39. But these ages, of course, are those of men and women most of whom were of school-going age before compulsory education was thought of in Baroda. Mr. Sedgwick has to admit—though he does so without enthusiasm—"that these figures show possibly a more progressive state of things in Baroda," but he contends—though he does not say why—that "the gradual approximation of Baroda to the Gujarat figures is not a phenomenon of so marked a character as to demonstrate satisfactorily the success of the compulsory system." Then, again, taking the figures by castes, Mr. Sedgwick is forced to admit that in Baroda "on the whole there is certainly a tendency for the lower social strata to be better educated than in British territory." It is much more than a tendency as will be seen from a comparison of the figures. There are per 1000 persons, 43 Bhanghis, 72 Dhodas, 58 Chodras—to take three typically backward castes—literate in Baroda as against 28, 21 and 27 respectively of these castes in British India. But nothing will satisfy Mr. Sedgwick. "The wide gap separating these strata from the higher (and educated) strata though possibly diminished," he writes, "still remains. And the diminution is too small to be regarded as a valid argument for the spread of education among the masses through making it compulsory." None is so blind as he who will not see. Even as regards general literacy, the Census figures fall somewhat short of the real position of Baroda. The Census Superintendent, Mr. S. Mokerjea, with a view to a severely accurate estimate of the effect of compulsory education on the general literacy, introduced a special column for persons who can read but cannot write, the definition prescribed by the Census Commissioner of India for "literate" being "those who were able to write a letter to a friend and read his reply." As Mr. Mokerjea observes there are in India "learners who have turned their instruction to some little account beyond signing their names, and adults who can read and understand books usually of a semi-religious nature without being able to write." But such persons seldom regard themselves as illiterate, and are likely to return themselves as "literate" unless a middle place is found for them, as at the last Baroda Census, exactly describing their attainment. Nearly 20,000 persons were returned as being partially literate in this sense, and if this number is added to that of full literates, the proportion of general literacy in Baroda will, we think, be very little if at all less than that in this Presidency. It was no part of his duty to utilise the Census Report as a vehicle to propagate his antagonism to compulsory education which, Mr. Sedgwick well knows, is a question which is an acute one in present-day Indian politics. The whole section is a digression and not a very illuminating or informing one at that.

THE FISCAL COMMISSION'S REPORT—III.

In the two previous articles on the Fiscal Commission's Report, reasons were given for thinking that the policy of Protection recommended by the Majority was substantially the same as the policy now followed, with the added encumbrance of a costly Tariff Board. The differences of the Minority from the Majority view are fundamental, and a separate report would have afforded more scope for the reasoned exposition of the policy which the former wish to see adopted. A Minute of Dissent is suitable only when the differences which it is intended to express do not affect the main recommendations of a Report. No one, however, who reads the Minute of Dissent of the Chairman and four other members of the Commission, can fail to see that the differences between the Majority and the Minority are fundamental. The outlook of the former is altogether different from that of the latter. The goal to be aimed at is defined by the Minority in unmistakable language. "India should", they declare, "attain a position of one of the foremost industrial nations in the world, that instead of being a large importer of manufactured goods and exporter mainly of raw materials, she should so develop her industries as to enable her within a reasonable period of time in addition to supplying her own needs, to export her surplus manufactured goods." India, as they point out, has an abundant supply of raw materials, a plentiful supply of labour, adequate capital and a large home market. They accordingly insist upon "a policy of intense industrialisation" based upon a complete identification of Government with the people. It would have added to the value of the Minute if the policy thus recommended had been elaborated in some detail. What is evidently intended may be illustrated by a few concrete examples. Two-thirds of the cotton cloth used in India is produced in the country. There is no reason why the remaining one-third also should not be swadeshi. The Government and the people should resolve that within, say, the next five or six years, the country should completely supply its own needs as regards clothing. A plan should be thought out as to how this can be done. Protective duties will, of course, be one part of the plan and, in this case, there may not be need for any other. But in the case of other industries such as sugar, iron and so on, the resources of the State should be applied to the creation of all the conditions the absence of which keeps India dependent on foreign countries for these commodities. A list of, say, ten or twelve such industries should be made out at once and it should be announced that the State will afford all facilities, including Protection from foreign competition, that may be needed for establishing them successfully in the country.

A cognate question on which there is a sharp difference of opinion between the Majority and the Minority is the place of foreign capital in the new regime. The Majority, in effect, would put foreign capital on substantially the same footing as Indian capital. Capital has no country, neither has it patriotism apart from the men who own it and employ it. The whole effect of the new policy will not only be nullified, but it would be turned into a most powerful engine for reducing Indian ability and skill to hewing wood and drawing water, if foreign capital is allowed to exploit the resources in the raw material and cheap, unorganised labour of the country. The whole country would become a huge plantation as in Assam or Champaran. Political pressure will come on the heels of financial exploitation as it has always done. The Minority would allow foreign capital to establish industries but under certain conditions, namely, that such companies should be incorporated and registered in India in rupee capital; there should be a reasonable proportion of Indian Directors on the Board; and reasonable facilities should be offered for the training of Indian apprentices. These conditions may be sufficient when India has attained the same self-governing status as Canada not on paper but in fact, but they will be utterly insufficient in India till then. The rupee capital is no guarantee so long as the currency policy can be manipulated by the Secretary of State; too many Indian Directors are easily dominated by their white-skinned colleagues, and some of them actually hold their countrymen in less estimation than Europeans; the position of Indian apprentices, in firms where they are not desired, can be made in insidious ways so utterly intolerable as to enable them to say that they were ready to take such apprentices, but that these men would not stick on. There have been so many piteous examples of the culpable indifference, if not worse, of Indian Directors and of the injustice done to Indian apprentices, that it is impossible to regard these conditions as in any way satisfactory. The Minority's hope that by these means they can keep in the country the profits of industries established by foreign capitalists, is likely to prove illusory. In order to keep the profits of industries in the country, it is necessary to limit the return on foreign capital to the interest at which it is raised. In the present circumstances of the country this can only be done by the State borrowing all the foreign capital needed and lending it to any industry whose prospects or national importance, justify that course. If this cannot be done it is more economical to pay a high rate of interest for Indian capital, than to pay a nominally lower rate of interest for foreign capital with freedom to take away not only the profits of an industry, but the cost of management, skill, all, in fact, except the wages paid to unskilled labour.

Two other questions on which the Minority have recorded their dissent from the Majority, are the levying of excise duties on industries supplying mainly articles consumed in the country, and Imperial Preference. The Commission unanimously recommend that the excise duty on cotton cloth made in the Indian mills, levied originally to countervail the duty on imported cotton goods, should be repealed. The difference between Majority and Minority concerns the desirability or otherwise of the State taxing home industries generally for the purpose of revenue. The Majority would not prohibit such taxation, while holding that it should be confined as far as possible to articles like liquor and tobacco whose consumption should be controlled, while the Minority would lay down a hard and fast rule that excise should be strictly restricted to such articles only. The difference is mainly an academic one, and we incline to take the view of the Majority, which is sufficiently definite without being inelastic. As regards Imperial Preference, the Minority hit the nail on the head when they observe that the question can only become a matter of practical politics when India attains the full status of responsible Government in the Commonwealth. This, they rightly urge, is practically the unanimous view of the people of India. It would have been well if they had stopped there. They go on, however, to remark that "the Indian view would be favourably inclined to accept the immediate application the principle provided conditions are created to place India at once on the same footing as the self-Governing Dominions in this matter"! This, in their opinion, can be done by vesting by statute the power of determining questions relating to Preference exclusively in the non-official members of the Legislative Assembly! It does not seem to have occurred to the Minority that this is exposing the non-official members of the Assembly to influences and temptations the more powerful because of their greater insidiousness. No influence, whether official or other, is so dangerous as when it is exercised from behind the screen. To prevent officials from voting—to prevent them from speaking would be absurd, as they will have necessarily to supply the information required—is not to prevent them from using their influence on questions in which they feel a strong interest one way or another. No. The question of preference must wait till India is able freely to exercise her own judgment, that is, till a full responsible Government is established at Delhi. Another reason for postponement is that, owing to the total dislocation of pre-war conditions, it will be difficult to judge a priori how a protectionist policy in India will shape the course of her foreign trade. We can only do this from experience, and it is only when the new policy has had a free field for some ten or twelve years, that we shall have reliable data for judging of the effects of a Preferential Tariff on the country's fiscal policy.

MARRIAGE AND SACRAMENT.

The institution of Marriage has a honoured place in the Hindu scheme of life. It is an act of solemn obligation, an evasion of which, whether by man or woman, is considered to be a serious dereliction of duty. The offence is held to be aggravated when the evasion is by women. Marriage is enjoined on a Hindu as an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace. Marriage is the pivot on which Hinduism turns. According to Hinduism it is an essential experience through which every person must pass before reaching the height of spiritual knowledge and realisation. The theory of evolution and incarnation underlying the active principle of Hinduism has invested the Grihasthasrama, or the state of a householder, with a deep religious significance. The Ashramas of Brahmacharya, Grihastha, Vanaprastha, and Sannyasa have each their honoured place in Hinduism. The first Ashrama everybody necessarily passes through. The second stage everybody must pass through. Otherwise ordered progress is not assured. Even a stigma as guilty of a breach of solemn obligation attaches to its omission. The progress from a Grihastha stage to that of a Vanaprastha and ultimately to an ascetic stage is commended but not urged with the same gravity as the entrance into a Grihastha life from the state of a Brahmachari or Brahmacharini. Nor does any penalty attach to a failure to reach the Vanaprastha or ascetic stages of life. The claim of marriage upon every Hindu is further strengthened by the dictum that no domestic rite of worship is complete without the wife taking part in it.

Mr. C. F. Andrews, writing in the October issue of the Modern Review, on the Hindu and Buddhist ideals of marriage, says that three elementary and primary factors in traditional Hinduism, as practised by the common people and embodied in their religion, can be defined by the terms 'Marriage, Caste and Incarnation.' He also sums up the Hindu conception of marriage thus :—

The Hindu religion's genius, at a very early date indeed, came to regard marriage and the married life and the propagation of children as altogether sacred and sacramental. This to me is one of its very great achievements and also one of its noblest gifts to the world. It has made the women of India amongst the most devoted to their husbands and the most religious in their domestic life. It has enshrined religious worship in the centre of every Indian home and in every Hindu woman's heart. India can never lose its idealism and become materialistic, so long as the married life holds this place of worship among Hindu women and also among Hindu men.

Mr. Andrews is keenly alive to the aberrations of the Hindu ideal of marriage. He adds :—

I know that there have been penalties to pay, and that gross injustices are as yet unresolved. Child widowhood, enforced by social custom, where the boy-husband dies, is one of these ; and there are many others. I am not upholding these evil customs for a moment. As you know, my whole heart revolts against them. But all the same I can see that they are human exaggerations, which have grown up along with a great ideal.

Along with the institution of householder, grew that of caste, intimately connected with marriage. According to a modern writer, Sir Herbert Risley, "caste is marriage and marriage is caste." Mr. Andrews here observes :—

Caste offered a social life with a wider range than the family, but of one and the same texture as the marriage ideal itself, fortifying that ideal and keeping it religious. For caste became, as it were, a larger religious 'marriage family.' Within the caste marriage was possible and therefore blood relationship. That these boundaries of caste have to-day become far too narrow and from a eugenic point of view highly intolerable is generally admitted.

In his article Mr. Andrews has represented the Hindu ideal of marriage and he combats the ideal of celibacy commended by Mr. Gandhi as a desirable state in itself, if perfection were to be reached for the higher work of humanity. The immediate point before the Hindu Social Reformers is not the question of a choice between the ideals of celibacy and marriage but the preservation of its sacramental character for marriage. Celibacy may be, or it can be even admitted that it is, a necessary equipment "for the higher work of humanity." But the Hindu Society is today confronted with a deterioration of marriage into an affair of commercial barter. In many communities of the Hindu Society, the girls preponderate and the demand for eligible bridegrooms is greater than the supply. The narrow restrictions of caste are so inelastic and rigid in their incidence, that prohibitive prices rule the marriage market for brides and bridegrooms. The generality of a Hindu's experience is the payment of exorbitant dowries on the part of parents of girls, as an incentive to young men to marry their daughters. Then there is the superstition of the loss of the sacramental character of the marriage, if a girl is not married, before the attainment of puberty. An Indian girl ordinarily attains her maturity at the age of 12 and 13. The insistence laid on pre-puberty marriages is so great that a parent would get his daughter married within the arbitrary age-limit, at the cost of not only money but even the character or position of the prospective bridegroom. It is contended that, by insistence of marriage for every Hindu, especially the girls, and the emphasis on the need for marriage before maturity, Hindu society has secured for every woman in its fold an economic protection and also preserved the chastity of its womanhood. The first claim is partially true but the price paid is too great. It is forgotten that greater than the need for economic protection, the need of womanhood is for the protection and development of its soul. What happens is that a parent barter the soul of his daughter for an unstable economic protection, paying a premium to the so-called protector. If at all marriage is to be talked of in terms of economic law, it is desirable to admit that a Hindu wife is a great asset, in her discharge of the several functions that are assigned to her. If a Hindu woman would apply even half the energy and skill she applies in the domestic sphere, in other channels, she would not only assure her economic independence but also secure her self-development to a much greater extent, than she does as a wife. As to chastity, a purity that can be attained only by the enforcement of child-marriage before both the parties, or at least the girl, understood the full implications of wifehood and motherhood, can have no practical value. An enforced submission to the lustful desires of a man, even though he be a husband, involves an equal amount of unchastity, if not greater than what goes conventionally by that name. Judged by this standard, many have to regretfully admit that, in many cases, marriage has become synonymous with regulated or legalised prostitution. The language may appear to be harsh but none the less it is true. If one eliminates the imaginary economic protection and the insurance against unchastity of compulsory marriage for every Hindu woman and that at an early age, many evils of the Hindu marriage customs will disappear. Let not parents allow themselves to be stampeded by so-called social opinion into the marriage of their girls in obedience to the arbitrary injunctions about marriage and the age-limit. If eligible husbands, not considering themselves as commercial commodity are not available, let the girls remain unmarried, interest themselves in useful activities and follow their bent of mind, guided by the broad principles of Right and Wrong. The consecrated services of a Nightingale, an Edith Cavell, a Jane Addams are but the forerunners of what womanhood, unfettered, can independently achieve. The ideal of marriage as a sacrament must be upheld but not the superstition that the mere form of marriage under one condition however ignoble. In this connection Mr. Gandhi has said:—"Woman is the companion of man endowed with equal mental capacities. She has the right to participate, in very minutest detail, in the activities of man and she has an equal right of freedom and liberty with him. She is entitled to a supreme place in her own sphere of activity as man in his. Instead, by sheer force of a vicious custom even the most ignorant and worthless men have been enjoying a superiority over women which they do not deserve and ought not to have." Mr. Gandhi has appealed to the young men to take the lead in the matter. But the parents and young women also ought to bear their share.

All must unite together, and educate public opinion on right lines and boycott marriages of barter and otherwise reprehensible character. There is room for parents, young men and young women, married and unmarried, all to join in this work. The discussion, at the Bombay Students' Brotherhood, the other day, promises to materialise into practical action. If persons willing to join in the cause write to the Editor of the Reformer, it will be highly helpful.

MADRAS NOTES.

(From our Correspondent.)

Madras, 14th October 1925.

INTER-MARRIAGES IN CHETTINAD.

Chettinad which lies almost at the Southern end of this presidency is the last place where one would look to for any intensive effort at social reform, as the Nattukottai Chetties, who resemble the Marwaris in their wealth acquired through long years of money-lending, also resemble the latter in their orthodoxy. But the Dravidian, the daily Tamil organ of the "Justice" party, has recently given prominence to an inter-marriage contracted in Chettinad between a Nattukottai Chetti and a Cholva Vellala girl. The most significant fact about this "social reform" marriage is that the parties thereto have publicly justified their conduct in the aforesaid newspaper by quoting as a precedent the fact that once before in the long past, the Chetti community took no less than 500 brides from the Cholva Vellala community, being driven to that step by the paucity of brides in their own community, and that, therefore, there is nothing new in what they have now done. Whether and how far this is historical, the present writer has no means of ascertaining at present but the example set by the parties in question has already emboldened another individual belonging to the Chetti caste to come forward publicly and appeal for a Cholva Vellala bride through the correspondence columns of the Dravidian. It is certainly a novel method of searching for a bride but its moral effect is bound to be stimulatingly healthy on the other members of the Chetty clan in particular and the Hindu community in general. It is claimed by the Dravidian that all this is proof of the efforts made by its party towards bringing about inter-caste marriages despite Rao Bahadur O. K. Chettiar's statements to the contrary. But such instances should become more general before its efforts in that direction could be characterised as being successful.

THE ADI-DRAVIDA PROBLEM.

Speaking of Mr. O. K. Chettiar's address, I am reminded of the revolt of a section of the Adi-Dravidas against the Non-Brahmin party which took place recently at Chidambaram and the subsequent quarrel between them and another section of the Adi-Dravidas who, as was seen at the Chingleput Conference, are against seceding from the Non-Brahmin party at least for the time being. The former are being led by Rao Bahadur M. C. Rajah, M. L. C., who was a prominent member of the Non-Brahmin party until recently. The latter have found a leader in Rao Saheb Madurai Pillai, M. L. C., who is becoming a prominent member of the "Justice" party and is in fact being vigorously pushed forward as the leader of the Adi-Dravidas by the Non-Brahmin leaders including the Ministers. With the prospects of the fratricidal strife before us, it may be said that the depressing problem of the Depressed Classes which was nowhere else so depressing as in this presidency has now reached its most depressing stage. The masses of the poor Adi-Dravidas themselves do not know who is their friend and who is their foe. The Chingleput Conference repudiated the Chidambaram Conference. Now, a local meeting of the Adi-Dravidas has no less emphatically repudiated the Chingleput Conference. Of course, in due course of time its proceedings will in turn be repudiated by another meeting of the local Adi-Dravidas. So, the ball of revolt started by Mr. M. C. Raja at Koilpatti and vigorously kicked forward by Mr. O. K. Chettiar at Chidambaram has met and is meeting with many ups and downs. The general opinion here among all classes of people regarding all this is that, if this kind of internecine strife is carried on for a long time within a community so weak, disunited, down-trodden and exploited as the Adi-Dravidas, its results will prove disastrous for them. In my humble opinion, Mr. Raja would have done well to have waited before deciding to unfurl the banner of revolt against the "Justice" party at Koilpatti and to have given the latter a chance to rectify their mistakes. He as well as Mr. O. K. Chettiar, if they had been sound party men, should in any case have appealed to the next Non-Brahmin Confederation before raising the standard of secession. After all is said, the truth remains that no other political party as a party has done so much for the Adi-Dravidas as the "Justice" party especially in the political and civic spheres. The present dissensions in the Adi-Dravida Camp are, therefore, as unfortunate as their effects are bound to be injurious to that long-suffering community. It is to be hoped that the leaders of the rival sections will soon find a way out of this morass if indeed they love their people more than they love their own personal advancement.

DR. TAGORE AND MR. C. F. ANDREWS.

Dr. Tagore's recent lecturing tour in this presidency, I am reliably informed, was not so successful financially speaking as he expected. The visit was memorable for the number of engagements which the poet had to cancel owing to ill health. On one occasion, says rumour, a High Court Judge was turned away from his door although he had made an appointment to meet the poet at the time. The cancellation of his proposed visit to Alwayseems to have been a great disappointment to hundreds of people who had gone there from the surrounding villages to see him. The student population here and in the Mofussil are, however, the most disappointed people whom he has left behind. Not one of their numerous invitations to him to lecture or recite to them was acceded to. Besides his ill-health, another factor that contributed to the poet's unwillingness to see people is said to be the immersion of some of his lands which he had earmarked for his beloved Viswabharathi in the recent floods near Calcutta. Mr. C. F. Andrews' visit to us will be long remembered for the great and inspired sermon which he preached last Sunday in the Danish Mission Church taking as his text Christ's saying: "I have compassion upon the multitude." It was the most stirring, elevating and inspiring sermon preached in a Madras Church for a long time past. Although his theme (untouchability) and his manner of treating it were more secular than religious, his sermon was a living one which contrasted vividly with the dead formulae and pious inanities which we are accustomed to hear from the pulpits of our churches. Mr. Andrews hoped that at least one amongst his hearers—never was the Danish Mission Church so packed with an audience as on Sunday last—would be touched by what he said and go and live among the untouchables for their uplift. I feel sure more than one among his audience would have been stirred to his depths and inspired to follow his advice. One thing, however, Mr. Andrews did not make clear. He mentioned the fact that Mahatma Gandhi hated untouchability but he did not pause to explain how it was that Mahatmajee is a supporter of the hereditary caste system of which untouchability is only the extreme manifestation.

A WOMAN LECTURER.

Mrs. Mayadoss, a Punjabee Christian lady, has been lecturing to students and others in Travancore and Cochin for some days past. Judging from the brief reports of her lectures appearing in the local papers, she seems to lay special emphasis on the social side of national activity in all her speeches. She is also trying to inculcate the virtues of self-reliance and manliness into her student listeners. She told the students in Trivandrum in so many words that the Indian student, although the intellectual peer of his fellows in the other parts of the world, is inferior to the latter in physique, in frankness and in manliness. I do not know how her young hearers relished it, but it is good for all of us to have plain speaking once in a way and that too from a cultured country-woman of ours.

MILITARY PENSIONERS' JATHA.

Professor Ruchi Ram Sabni writes in the Tribune (Lahore) of October, 24th:—

The Akali struggle in connection with Guru-ka-Bagh continues with unabated vigour, and nobody can say what the end of it will be and when it will come. The Government has shown that it is in no mood to soften down, by announcing, quite unnecessarily and almost provokingly as many people think, that arrangements for the accommodation of ten thousand more Akali prisoners were being made. Similarly, there are no signs of weakening or wavering on the part of the Akalis. The tremendous enthusiasm created by yesterday's (Sunday 22nd October) military Jatha will certainly greatly add to the determination of the Shromani Committee and lend much strength and support to the Akali movement. It were much to be wished that a solution was found of the 'impasse' thus created, but, judging from the present temper of the parties, no solution is in sight.

To come to the retired soldiers' Jatha, I reached the Akal Takht when the vow of non-violence had been taken and the men were going, one by one, from the Akal Takht to the Golden Temple opposite to it to pay their homage to and ask for the blessings of the Guru Granth Sahib before forming the Jatha and marching on to Guru-ka-Bagh. The proceedings were watched by some ten to fifteen thousand persons who were not only packed on every inch of the open ground in front of the Akal Takht but who were also occupying every bit of space available on the buildings all round. All the men had a magnificent bearing. They were all calm and cheerful. In a Jatha of 100 men I counted 22 men who had a white beard, a somewhat smaller number had a grey beard, and the rest were men of 40—50 years with black beards. They all had two turbans tied on their heads, a small yellow turban underneath and a black turban tied over it. They wore a long black coat with only a Kachha for their loins. A bright yellow sash tied gracefully round their waist and a Kirpan hanging down from a yellow Gatra completed their uniform. Three or four had medals on. But, it should be added that, apart from the dress, each man wore a wreath of white jasmine flowers round his head much like the marriage wreath and a garland of fresh pink roses round the neck. The dress reminds one of the Akali Dal of Phoola Singh's times. Two scenes were very touching. There was one Akali Havaladar Charn Singh, with a wooden leg, as he had lost his own leg in the war. He was the recipient of additional garlands of flowers from the spectators as he walked down the narrow passage left through the crowds from the Akal Takht to the Darbar Sahib. The other scene, which was at least equally touching, was the sight of three ladies dressed in black 'eay a pie' slowly getting up from the squatting crowds and garlanding their dear ones, as they were leaving the Akal Takht. One of these ladies I could guess to be the mother, and another the daughter of the Akalis whom they garlanded. Coming out of the Golden Temple, they formed themselves into a Jatha in the rows of four and marched slowly headed by hand to the Clock Tower. Here they were photographed. A Muhammadan gentleman, who said he had travelled for four days to see the Akali Jatha, addressed them for a few minutes. It was a spirited speech, but, as I could not follow it closely I would not attempt to tell your readers what he said. Her again, some more Akali ladies, as was clear from their black dress, went up to the Jatha and garlanded each, her own dear one. The Jatha then started from the Clock Tower followed by not less than fifty thousand persons. It was headed by Subedar Amar Singh who was in the middle of the first row and contained 58 non-commissioned officers and 46 sepoy and sowars. There was a surging sea of humanity as far as one could see before or behind, and in order to get ahead of them it was necessary to make a long detour through the side streets. As was to be expected, unlike the other Jathas, the retired soldiers marched in very good order in steps and even when they stopped, they were marking time with their feet. Of course, there was a good deal of showering of flowers from the balconies of houses. The band accompanied the Jatha throughout and played inspiring tunes every now and again. A black banner was carried in front of the Jatha.

Near the District Court, the Jatha was stopped on the road by the Deputy Commissioner who was accompanied by three or four other Europeans. About two hundred Indian Policemen with rifles, not lathis, were sitting behind the hedge in the Court compound. From their appearance I would take them to be Mussalmans from Jhelum, Shahpur and Rawalpindi Districts. Some European soldiers were also seen standing by the side of three motor lorries at a distance on a side road.

The Deputy Commissioner had an interesting conversation with the Jathedar (Subedar Amar Singh) in the vernacular, which Mr. Dunst spoke uncommonly well. He was very gentle in his attitude towards the Jathedar and argued with him more as a friend who was anxious for a settlement than as an officer. Perhaps it would be best to reproduce here the gist of the conversation, which was full of repetitions on both sides, in the direct form.

Deputy Commissioner:—The Sarkar and the Sikhs have been great friends for 70 years. Why are you now trying to break that friendship?

Jathedar:—Yes, we have been great friends for 70 years. We have given our lives freely for the Sarkar. We starved ourselves for ten days at Kut Amara, we lived on horse flesh in the war. We gave up our dharma and aman for the sake of the Sarkar. But the Sarkar rewarded our friendship by beating our brethren mercilessly.

Deputy Commissioner:—This is not correct. The Sarkar cannot allow the Sikhs to take illegal possession of the Mahant's land at Guru-ka-Bagh. If you want to go to the Gurdwara the Sarkar would not prevent you from doing so. But the Sarkar cannot allow you to go and take possession of another man's lands. What is your intention in going to Guru-ka-Bagh?

Jathedar:—Sahib, we do not want to take possession of any body's land, and we have no need to do. Wahiguru has given us enough for our needs. It is the Guru's land and the Guru is in possession. We are going there merely for service (Seva). We want to cut fuel from the Guru's land for the Guru's kitchen.

Deputy Commissioner:—The Sarkar is only against those who create disturbances.

Jathedar:—We have no arms with us. Have we? We cannot create disturbance, we are willing to be beaten as our brethren have been beaten before. We have never gone to your churches and interfered with your men. Why do you interfere with our Seva?

Deputy Commissioner: We can settle the dispute in one of three ways (1) through a court of law (2) arbitration (Panchayat) and (3) by means of a Gurdwara Bill. Which would you prefer?

Jathedar:—Sahib, we do not understand these things. You had better talk about these matters with the representatives of the Panth or the Committee (Shromani Gurdwara Parbandhak Committee). Our own part is to do our 'seva' and we must do it.

Deputy Commissioner:—If you don't listen to me I will declare you an illegal assembly.

He then in a loud voice declared them an illegal assembly. A Sikh gentleman present there asked those who were not members of the Jatha to move away from the Jatha. The request was at once followed.

Most people understood that the Jatha had been arrested there and then, but as they still marched on with the band in front of them, followed by a smaller crowd than before, it was obvious that they were not under arrest. I could not follow the Jatha further and up to 8 p. m. no news had been received as to what had happened to them after leaving the Kacheri Road. (Later information shows that Jatha reached "Guru-ka-Bagh" without further difficulty and, as arranged previously, the men propose going forward for arrest after resting at "Guru-ka-Bagh" for two days. This has been the usual practice with previous Jathas also. The military Jatha will thus present themselves for arrest on the afternoon of 24th.)

INDIAN STATES BILL.

The Kathiawar Hitwardhak Sabha, has sent the following memorial to Parliament:

That the Province of Kathiawar contains Indian States large and small with powers varying from complete autonomy of internal administration to jurisdiction of trying only very petty criminal offences. These States are at present under the political supervision of the Government of Bombay. In the Presidency of Bombay there are other large and small States with similar varying powers. In the matter of internal administration, all these States are purely autocratic and arbitrary governments. In almost all of these States, the people have no voice in the administration. The laws, taxation etc. emanate from the arbitrary will of the Ruler and are administered or collected by a body of officials whose tenure of office depends upon the will of the Ruler. The people in these States have many grievances but are unable to give expression to them within the States owing to repression open or disguised. In many of these, public meetings are prohibited and in hardly any a newspaper worth the name exists. The only outlet open for criticism or expression of their grievances which is open to these States' subjects is the Press in British India. The people are now, by the Protection of Princes Bill passed by the Council of State at Simla, going to be deprived of even this outlet. The Sabha is respectfully of opinion that there is no necessity to pass this measure and that the ordinary law of British India is sufficient to give such protection to the Princes as they may require against seditious or other libels or any other offences which may be committed against them in the newspapers in British India. The Sabha requests you to bear in mind that in the present system of government under which the Indian States are governed, it is impossible for any independent newspaper to exist, nor is it possible to ventilate in writing grievances of the people regarding education, sanitation, medical relief, Development of Industries & trade, to which little attention is paid in these States. The action of His Excellency the Governor-General under the circumstances has the effect of stifling the voice and aspirations of nearly seventy millions of subjects of Indian States and to create distrust and misgiving regarding the attitude of the supreme Government towards their legitimate needs and aspirations. It is not the function of this Sabha to criticise the action of the Governor-General in granting a Certificate for the Bill under Section 67 B of the Government of India Act after the Legislative Assembly had considered it inadvisable to give leave to introduce the Bill in the Legislature. It concerns the public of British India who no doubt will represent their views before you. The Sabha wishes to bring prominently to your notice the great injustice that will be done to the millions of subjects of the Indian States if the Bill were sanctioned by Parliament.

The Sabha does not find in the treaties and engagements entered into by the British Government with the Rulers of Indian States and especially the engagements with the Kathiawar States, any warrant for protecting the Princes as contemplated by the Bill, much less protecting them against the interest of their subjects who are helpless and defenceless against the arbitrary will of their rulers. The Sabha also begs to state with all due deference that there is no ground to hold that the newspapers in British India have been used for any unjust, unlawful, violent or seditious criticisms of the Indian Rulers or their administrations.

The Sabha therefore humbly and earnestly prays that Parliament will be pleased to withhold their assent to the Bill.

FORCED LABOUR IN JAWHAR STATE.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I am trying to write this letter more from the point of view of a worker amongst the masses, in the spirit of the broad-minded humanity of Mr. Andrews, the great Christian, than from the point of view of a bona-fide State-subject, a tax-payer who has a right to ventilate his grievances. Jawhar State is the oldest state in the Deccan, with a population of 45,000 souls of whom not one out of a hundred can be called educated. The town, Jawhar, is about 40 miles from Dahann Road, on the B. B. & U. I. R. I generally walk this distance on foot six times a year and am in close touch with the farmers living in the villages on Dahann to Jawhar Road. The farmers are more frank with a voyageur a pied than with a man en motor. They have plainly told me that forced labour is more in the State than in the adjoining British territory.

First I will talk of forced labour used by the State. In and out of the busy seasons of harvest and transplantation, the farmers have to carry parcels and luggages from Kardoh, the Mahal Station of the State, to Jawhar a distance of 34 miles. And what are they paid for it? One pice per mile, i.e. 8 as. 6 pies for 34 miles, without any bread or water. The farmer must come back home, to his village. So, for 8 as. 6 pies he has to walk 68 miles. If he is caught at Talwada, another Mahal at 20 miles from Jawhar, he has to carry the load 20 miles for 5 annas; but again he must come back home. So, for 5 annas, he has to walk a distance of 50 miles on a road, muddy and full of sharp-pointed stones.

In the last month, i.e. September, I was at Jawhar. I saw with my own eyes nearly 40 farmers in the temple of Mahalaxmi where they came for shelter at night, engaged in erecting a "Mandap" for Ourus Festival! They brought the materials for the 'Mandap' that day, and next day they were to erect it. Now what are they paid for it? 2 Rs. So each man cannot get even an anna for his two days' labour. Equally low are the rates for grass cutting. These farmers pay all the taxes to the State. Why then should they be paid so low for their hard labour?

Now I will talk of forced labour used by the State servants under the name of "Sarkari." It is freely talked in Jawhar of some houses built on forced cheap labour, but I shall never be a party to such gossip. I shall only write what I have seen with my own eyes. In May, four of my own cultivators at 'Tadachimachi' were caught. When? At one or two o'clock at night. They were taken to the police-gate as if they were thieves. Next day I saw them at the gate. I was told they were brought for 'Sarkari' work. Two were employed on the work of Jawhar Municipality and sent home at 2 o'clock in the afternoon with one anna each. The very day I saw the other two cultivators at a Mahomedan's house who at my intervention (I believe so) paid them fully. The question is 'what right has this Mahomedan to use this forced labour? Oh, it is because the house was occupied by a big official. Thus a land-lord of an official gets this right of forced labour. The Secretary of the Municipality, whom I approached, being against this forced cheap labour promised to pay fully my other two cultivators.

Farmers have told me of this forced labour with tears in their eyes. I owe it to God to expose these facts. I have mentioned a few things only with the hope of drawing the attention of His Highness the Rajah Sahab of Jawhar. The population of the State is falling down and I honestly believe that forced labour is one of the reasons.

Yours &c.,

KARRABE K. G.

ANTI-DOWRY CAMPAIGN.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The Bombay Students' Brotherhood deserves to be congratulated upon its laudable action of launching a movement against the irreligious and inhumane custom of dowry. This association has given a lead and we hope other societies of students will not lag behind in taking up the matter for their causeries in their periodical meetings. We want every young man to put a gallant fight against this and other social evils. Such discussions will develop genuine healthy spirit of generosity and chivalry amongst us, which is the life and soul of every movement of regeneration. I don't attach so much importance to the oath of not accepting any dowry as to the spirit of gallantry and chivalry. I know one case wherein a young man pledged to non-acceptance of dowry had both dowry and the fulfillment of his oath by asking the other party to put on gold ornaments worth the amount of dowry on his would-be wife. The dowry, as I have said in my last letter, is the present from a father to his daughter at the time of her marriage. It is her property. The son-in-law, if he has any sense of honour, should neither dictate the amount nor claim it, but leave the matter to the girl and her father.

The question of dowry is partly dependent on the question of ornaments. In many cases fathers-in-law while giving dowries, dictate their own terms of ornaments, which equally deserves to be condemned. It is the duty of our educated women to set on foot a movement against ornaments amongst themselves if they want fair and just treatment for their sisters. Some women slaves to ornaments of gold and pearls get dazzled at the jewelry of the rich and readily consent to sell their daughters to old men (without) teeth, sans eyes, sans taste, sans everything but not sans wealth and jewelry.

Yours, etc.,

JAWHARIAN,

Deolali, 22nd Oct. 1922.

INDIAN STATES BILL.

(The Mysore Patriot.)

Mr. Raza Ali proposes in the Council of State to ask for the publication of the papers and communications in connection with the "Princes' Protection Bill." It is worth while knowing who are the Princes of such importance who require the protection. We had read somewhere that the bill is on account of two Indian Princes. We wish the member good luck.

PROHIBITION IN NATIVE STATES.

(The Akbari.)

We rejoice to learn from the "Indian Social Reformer" that Bhavnagar and one or two other Kathiawad States have endorsed the policy of total Prohibition. We read that "the people are contented and happy, and a notable reduction in crimes has already been observed during the past year." We observe, however, that foreign liquors are exempt from Prohibition—probably in deference to the powers claimed by the Supreme Government. We object to this differentiation, whether in the Native States or in British India, because it is evident that the purpose of Prohibition will be ultimately defeated if the importation of foreign liquors is allowed to continue. The consumption of the latter is bound to increase in such circumstances, as the well-to-do classes who have contracted the habit of drink will resort to the imported article irrespective of its cost.

THE PUNJAB VIDHYA VIVAH
SAHAIK SABHA.

The Hon'y Secretary of the above institution writes: Reports of 33 widow marriages have been received from the different branches and co-workers of the Vidhya Vivah Shaik Sabha, Lahore (Punjab) throughout India during the month of September 22. The total number of marriages held in the current year i. e. from 1st January to the end of September 22, has reached to 293, as detailed below: Brahman 60, Khatri. 77, Arora. 68, Aggarwal. 28, Kaisth 18, Rajput, 12, Sikh. 18, Miscellaneous. 27, Total, 293.

THE INDIAN PATRIOTS CALENDAR.

We have received a copy of the Indian Patriots Calendar for 1923 from Messrs. N. D. Sahgal and Sons, Lohari Gate, Lahore. The Calendar contains the portraits of Indian national leaders, men and women, and it will be found interesting.

"THE TREASURE CHEST."

A new 24 page monthly magazine for boys and girls in India, dating from July 1922.

It is printed in English and contains illustrations drawn from Indian life. Each number contains several first-class stories, a poem or two, an Indian biography, sections on nature study, social service, current events, "something to do", and a prize competition.

Subscription Rs. 2 a year. For the six months of 1922 the subscription is Re. 1 If paid in advance for eighteen months to the end of 1923 it is Rs. 2-8-0. Back numbers of the magazine are available, so those who order now will receive a full set from July.

Rates for foreign countries, if paid in this country, 12 annas additional a year, or Re. 1-2 for eighteen months. Subscriptions sent from abroad, four shillings a year or five shillings for eighteen months.

What teachers and parents say of it:

"I have long been looking for just this kind of a magazine for the boys and girls of India."

"Should you be able to maintain the high standard you have adopted from the very outset, the success and popularity of your magazine are assured.....Paper, printing illustrations, and cover, all will appeal to the young folk. But above all, the freshness, local colour and graceful style of your articles, poems and stories."

"It is a charming magazine. How our kiddies love it!"

ROYAL YAKUTI.

THIS YAKUTI or life giving nectar has been prepared from the best, choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has wonderful properties of increasing virile power and it rectifies urinary disorders. In fact it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to these persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicine. Its works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires. It is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills. Rupees ten only.

NOTES.

Bloodless Revolutions: Two "bloodless revolutions" have been carried out in the course of the last few weeks: the Turkish by Mustapha Kemal Pasha and the Italian by Signor Mussolini. The Sultan's Government at Constantinople voluntarily offered to resign in order not to embarrass the Angora Government's negotiations with the Allied Powers, and the King of Italy vetoed the martial law proclamation issued by his Ministers, and when they resigned, sent for the leader of the Fascisti, against whom the proclamation was directed, to form the Ministry. In both these revolutions, there was no violence, but the absence of violence was ensured not by vows of non-violence but by so organising the forces of violence as to impose non-violence on the existing systems as the sole remaining path of safety. As a practical demonstration as to the best way of securing absolute non-violence, without any possibility of incidents such as Malegaon and Chauri Chaura, this method has proved better and more effective than the non-violent Non-Co-operation method in India. In both, the importance of non-violence is recognised, but while in the one it is only a means to an end, in the other it is itself the end. Apart from this, there seems to be a close parallelism between the Turkish and Italian revolutions. They are both avowedly inspired by a race rather than a national consciousness, and in neither does religion appear as a prominent motive. The Italian Fascisti look back to the ancient Romans for inspiration. They are republicans at heart though they do not propose to deprive the King of his Crown. "How like he is to a Roman tribune" an officer is said to have exclaimed, as Mussolini stretched out his arm to the crowd, saluting the people in the Roman manner adopted by the Fascists. Kemal Pasha's attitude to the Sultan bears an obvious resemblance to the Italian leader's to the King. That accomplished scholar, Mr. G. K. Nariman, calls attention in the Chronicle to the Turanian tendencies of some of the Young Turk revolutionists. The tribal distinctions of ancient communities were obliterated by the great religions. Nationalism broke up the unity brought about by religion, and it seems that the world is now looking for a more workable formula in race. Locked at in the light of its unforeseen consequences, the great war would appear to be a bursting of over-mastering forces which had accumulated behind the dams of Western civilisation rather than the outcome of the decisions of statesmen.

Church and State in Turkey: If, as foreshadowed by the telegrams from Constantinople, the Caliphate is to be relieved of its temporal powers as a step towards the new constitutional regime to be established by the Angora nationalists, both Turkey and Islam will be great gainers. Every modern State, as the result of the evil experience of an established Church primarily on the Church itself, has adopted the principle of neutrality in religion. All religions are free and no religion enjoys any special favour or protection from secular authority. England and Japan seem to be exceptions, but in practice they are not. The Roman Catholic Church is a standing example of the strength which accrues to a religion from freedom from State control and interference. Islam, will not suffer in the least by the Caliphate being left free to devote its whole energy to the offices of religion. As for the Turkish Government, the separation of the religions aspect of the Caliphate, will facilitate its functioning as a constitutional Government unhampered by medieval political principles. We are surprised that the Central Khilafat Committee in Bombay should have intimated to the Angora representatives that Indian Muslims are opposed to this wholesome change. Mustapha Kemal Pasha's immediate task, however, is to establish a constitutional Government in Turkey which will be in harmony with modern ideas, and will be recognised as such by the other Great Powers, and though, we are sure, he will not undervalue the good opinion of Mr. Chotani and his colleagues, he will expect them to realize his position and his responsibilities. In an interview, the great Pasha disclaimed any motive of Pan-Islamism and declared that he did not want to interfere with the new autonomous Arab States, and that he was a Turk and wished to see a strong national Government in Turkey. This is an object with which men of all races and religions can not but freely sympathise. So far as the Angora Government was concerned, Kemal told another interviewer, the Sultan had ceased to exist.

The Immigration Problem in Canada: The Rev. F. W. C. Kennedy contributes an illuminating article to the October number of the East and the West, the well-known quarterly review for the study of missionary problems. The population of Canada at present is about 8,769,489 and as the area approaches 3,620,000 square miles, there are only 2.4 people to every square mile in the Dominion. A country so thinly-peopled must have immigrants, and even if it will not, it cannot permanently close its doors to them. Mr. Kennedy, therefore, advises that a wise policy of selection should be adopted, and he insists that "the all-important thing for us to remember is that it is not wealth nor power that determines our future, but the character of the citizens we create." Applying this test, he points out that statistics show that in New York, Italians lead in crimes of violence, kidnapping and blackmailing. The Russians and Poles are conspicuous in robbery, larceny and receiving stolen goods. The Hebrews are prominent in white slavery and prostitution. The Chinese are addicted to drugs and gambling. Now, these are the communities which supply the largest number of immigrants to Canada whereas the Japanese who make the best citizens from every point of view, are banned. During an interview with the authorities in Vancouver, writes Mr. Kennedy, the questions "which alien countries provided us with the fewest criminals? Which are most advanced from the stand-point of cleanliness? Which are most law-abiding and make the best citizens?" brought the answers, "Japan and the Japanese." Nearly 20,000 Japanese are now in Canada, and very seldom has a Japanese been found guilty of any crime. And yet, Mr. Kennedy remarks:

Australia has always kept her doors tight closed against the Japanese, and Californians are erecting insurmountable walls round themselves, and adopting a hide-bound policy of exclusion against them. And we, who are clamouring for more and more immigrants to fill the unoccupied places in our Dominion, bring in Mennonites and Doukhobors, and other peoples from Europe who cause no trouble and anxiety, and try to keep out a people which is spoken of in the highest terms by the authorities as being polite, thrifty and law-abiding.

Mr. Sastry, however, assures us that there is no racial prejudice, but only economic considerations, behind these prohibitions!

The Handloom Industry: From a statement in the compilation of the statistics of the Inland trade of India in 1920-21, it appears that there has been a marked decrease since 1913-14 in the import of cotton piece goods into the provinces from the seaports. In 1913-14, 241,000 tons were sent into the country from the sea-ports, while in 1920-21, the quantity was only 148,000 tons. The decrease was solely in foreign piece goods which declined from 208,000 tons in the pre-war year to 51,000 tons in 1920-21. During the same period, the quantity of Indian piece-goods passed inland from the sea-ports increased from 33,000 to 97,000 tons. The outstanding fact here is that the sea-ports sent inland 93,000 tons less in 1920-21 than in 1913-14, of foreign and Indian piece-goods taken together. Allowing for the effect of high prices and hard times on consumption, the decrease is too large to be explained without an increased production of cotton cloth in the interior. The increase in the output of power-looms in the whole country since 1913-14 is about 50,000 tons. Of this, more than one-half was in Bombay city which has more than 50 per cent of the power-looms in India. Assuming that the mills in the interior produced all the remaining 25,000 tons, there is still 68,000 tons to be accounted for. Supposing that owing to the hard times there was a real decrease of 18,000 tons in the consumption—a large allowance for a prime necessity—the conclusion seems to be inevitable that the remaining 50,000 tons was supplied by hand-looms. This is as much as the increase of the power-looms, and it brings out the fact that while there is a definite limit to the expansion of the power-loom industry, the hand-loom industry seems to be capable of practically indefinite expansion at a time of international crisis. If the hand-loom industry had been extinct in India as some of our more ardent advocates of modern industrialism would wish, large classes of the population during recent years should have gone without a rag to cover their nakedness. While, therefore, it is possible to overdo the cult of the charka, there is even more danger of under-estimating its importance in this country. From the broad national stand-point, the Indian statesman should ever extend a protecting hand to the hand-loom weaver in his cottage home.

Hindu-Mahomedan Unity: A valued Mahomedan friend writes: "The problem of Hindu-Moslem unity has been always, as you know, one of the chief political problems that have exercised my mind. I feel that the present entente, an outcome as it is of temporary political conditions and feelings, has not the basis of permanence. Is it not possible to discover this permanent basis in directions somewhat like the following:—(a) The Hindus to bring the Mussalmans in their fold as Hindus in the same way as they have practically brought the Jains and Buddhists. This is possible, as really speaking "Hindu" is a term of ethnological and geographical rather than of credal content. I would therefore deprecate the attempts that are being made to give the term "Hindu" a religious significance. (b) The Mussalmans should consider their non-Moslem brethren in India among the followers of the Book and Krishna and Buddha as among their prophets. I do not know whether you are aware that there are already amongst the Musalmans important sects, especially the Mystic sects who honour these personalities as such, and it ought not to be difficult for men like Hakim Ajmal Khan, Moulana Abdul Bari and others in the present temper of Indian Moslems to bring about this feeling." The first suggestion of our correspondent is practically adopted in Canada, America and elsewhere where all Indians are known as Hindus. The Hindus can have no objection to the connotation of the term being extended as suggested by our correspondent. The greatest difficulty, however, is the Indian Census and other official publications in which differences and distinctions are emphasised, exaggerated, and even sometimes discovered when they have been forgotten or never existed. As regards the second, it is not quite clear how such a recognition would serve to bring about Hindu-Mahomedan unity. The Jews and Christians are recognised by Islam as people of the Book, but that has not brought about their unity with Mahomedans. The question is not a theological one except superficially. We agree with our correspondent that an entente based on the Kbilafat question does not contain in it the elements of permanence, but it should not be forgotten that behind it is the close common evolution of the two peoples together for centuries, of which our correspondent himself gives a striking illustration in the recognition by the mystic Mahomedan sects of the great seers of Hinduism. There is also the tremendous fact of racial identity which religion cannot and does not efface, and to which, indeed, it often finds it necessary to adapt itself.

Fifth Music Conference: We are asked to state that the Fifth Music Conference of the Gandharva Maha Vidyalaya will be held in Bombay from Wednesday 6th December 1922 to Tuesday 12th December in the Shri Ram Chowk of the Vidyalaya at Sandhurst Road. With the Conference the sixth Exhibition of Musical Instruments will also be held, which will be opened on Sunday the 3rd December and will remain open to the public till the close of the Conference. The programme of the Conference will consist of the reading of papers, lectures and discussions on the theory of Music, concerts of vocal and instrumental music by well-known musicians, a musical concert of amateurs and two competitive concerts of children. Those who wish to read papers or deliver lectures on any subject connected with music should correspond with the Secretary of the Conference up to 30th November 1922.

BOMBAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1922.

THE CONGRESS CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE ENQUIRY COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

The eagerly expected Report of the Committee appointed in pursuance of a resolution of the All-India Congress Committee in June last, is being issued on Sunday. By the courtesy of the General Secretary, we were supplied with an advance copy on Thursday, which enables us to comment upon the recommendations in this issue. The Committee, it will be remembered, was appointed in view of a widespread feeling that "in view of the extremely unfair manner in which the policy of repression is being carried out by the Government the country should be advised to resort to some form of civil disobedience to compel the Government to abandon their present policy." On this, the main issue committed to them, the Committee are unanimously of opinion that the country is not prepared at present to embark upon general Mass Civil Disobedience. But "in view of the fact that a situation may arise in any part of the country demanding an immediate resort to Mass Civil Disobedience of a limited character e.g. the breaking of a particular law or the non-payment of a particular tax for which the people are ready," they recommend that the Provincial Congress Committees be authorised to sanction such limited Mass Civil Disobedience "on their own responsibility if the conditions laid down by the All-India Congress Committee in that behalf are fulfilled." Stripped of ifs and but's, this means that a Provincial Congress Committee can ask the people to break an unpopular law or to refuse to pay an obnoxious tax, if it feels assured of success. Recent experience should have warned the Committee that an enterprise of this kind has absolutely no chance of success unless backed by the bulk of public opinion in the country. The recommendation is tantamount to the delegation by the Central Government of the power of declaring war on their own account to Provincial Governments. No arguments are necessary to show that such delegation must inevitably lead to disruption and defeat. If every province is entitled to start Mass Civil Disobedience on its own account, the declaration that the country is not prepared to embark on it, has no meaning. The limitation indicated, of a single law or a particular tax, is perfectly useless. So far as Government are concerned, one tax is as good as another, one law as valid as any other so long as they remain upon the statute-book. The proviso will be most likely to be utilised in protest against the by-laws and the cesses levied by Local Bodies which Congressmen everywhere are recommended to capture. The engineer should beware lest he be hoist on his own petard.

This recommendation is the more remarkable as the Committee unanimously recommend that all existing disqualifications on practising lawyers in the Congress organisation should be removed. In view of the strong opinions expressed regarding the demoralisation caused by Law Courts by prominent members of the Enquiry Committee, the uncompromising condemnation in the body of the report of the "unpardonable discourtesy" with which practising lawyers have come to be generally treated in Congress circles, is as surprising as it is just. "There is no reason," observe the Committee, "why a wholesale importer of foreign cloth should be freely admitted into all Congress organisations and even to responsible offices under it, whilst respected practising lawyers, known for their special aptitude for public work, were studiously and sometimes offensively excluded. We trust that the All India Committee will pay immediate attention to this matter and make the amende honorable to a deserving class which in the past has furnished the backbone of public life." It is on this very reason, namely, that lawyers have had a longer training in public life while traders are, comparatively, newcomers into it, that Mahatma Gandhi justified his call to the former to boycott the Courts without calling upon the traders in foreign goods to desist from doing so. That was hardly a sound reason. We are glad that the Committee have put their feet so firmly down upon the insensate belittling of experienced lawyers by juvenile Congressmen who form so large a proportion of the personnel of the present provincial and district Committees. But we are unable to understand their observation in the same paragraph that "it should be clearly understood that we suggest no change in the boycott of Government educational institutions by students or of Courts by lawyers and litigants as it stands in the Congress resolution." In other words, the Committee, while recommending that the Congress resolution should be rendered practically obsolete, recommend also that it should nevertheless be left intact as a counsel of perfection on the Congress tablets. The main point which we wish to urge in regard to this and the resolution about Mass Civil Disobedience is this: The lawyer's duty is to uphold the law, and not to pull it down. No practising lawyer can possibly countenance the breaking of laws, even if only one particular law is involved. An importer of foreign cloth can go on importing it, while at the same time belonging to an organisation which has sanctioned and is engaged in an act of civil disobedience. Obviously, this course is not open to the lawyer who may find one morning that the practice of his profession has been rendered suddenly impossible to him by the decision of his Congress Committee to break a law!

The same lack of co-ordination is discernible in the recommendations regarding entry into the Councils. The Committee are equally divided on this question. Hakim Ajmal Khan, Pandit Motilal Nebrun and Mr. V. J. Patel favour entry with the set purpose of creating a deadlock. Dr. Ansari and Messrs. Kasturi Ranga Iyengar and Rajagopala Charya are against entry on the ground that it is wrong, even if it be possible, to go to the Councils deliberately to break them up. As between these two views, we unhesitatingly favour the latter, though we know that the idea of the former cannot in practice be carried out. It is more honest and more honourable to refrain from going into a public body which you are precluded by your policy or principles from assisting to function as it is intended to do, than to enter it with the declared purpose of preventing it from doing so. This is nothing more than to repeat in the Councils the rowdy's method of breaking up public meetings. The Hakim Sahib candidly remarks in a separate note that he consents to this recommendation only because, with the exception of a few provinces, not only is very little progress being made with the constructive programme, but "we are actually going backwards." He, therefore, recommends entry into the Councils "with the sole object of showing that the Reform scheme is useless, and with a view only to make its working impossible." With great respect for Hakim Sahib, we suggest that you cannot prove that the Reform scheme is useless by making its working impossible. You cannot prove that a certain medicine is useless by snatching it from the patient and throwing it into the gutter. The only way—and it is the sure way—to prove the worth or worthlessness of a scheme—is to give it a fair trial. We have never had a very great opinion of the Reforms, and recent developments have disillusioned even many determined believers in them. Our reasons for recommending entry into the Councils are simple: The first is that the constructive, social programme of Bardoli must be pushed forward by every means in our power, and the Councils can, we believe, be utilised effectively for doing so, in addition to outside propaganda which can, in no case, be dispensed with. Secondly, as Hakim Sahib, Pandit Motilal and Mr. Patel forcibly point out, Measures affecting the daily life of the people are being enacted year after year, fresh taxation and huge liabilities are being imposed and will continue to be imposed and volens volens the people will have to submit to them.

These measures, we may add, cannot be stopped by mere obstruction. By going into the Councils, you can help to make good laws and to repeal or improve bad laws, so that there will be no need to consider the conditions in which they should be broken.

The report is a disappointing one. It does not give a clear lead to the country, which it was intended and expected to give. "If the trumpet give an uncertain sound, who will prepare himself to the battle?" We recognise that the Committee had a very difficult task before them, and very little time to do it in. It is no easy task to persuade thousands of people to whom no other argument is needed in favour of following the old Non-Co-operation programme than that it was drawn up by Mahatma Gandhi. The Committee rightly urge that if this view is to prevail, it means that for the next six years not a word or syllable should be changed in the Congress programme while the circumstances which gave it birth are rapidly changing. The Committee have tried to indicate how these conditions have changed, but they have not referred to one vital change—the most important of all. The Khilafat question is practically solved, and with it one of the tripods of the Non-Co-operation programme will soon disappear. Prominent Mahomedan publicists have told us that this is bound to have an important influence on the Moslem support to Non-Co-operation. As regards the Punjab martial law grievances, they will soon be raised in a definite form before a judicial tribunal. Swaraj cannot be attained by boycotting the Councils. Hakim Ajmal Khan and his two colleagues who are in favour of entering the Councils, realize that fewer voters can be persuaded to abstain from going to the polls at the next election than at the last. Non-Co-operation has been a success in a general way, but in all the specific items it set before itself, it has failed. A complete change of programme alone can save the Congress movement from collapse and we regret that this Committee of which much was expected has darkened counsel by its uncertain and divided recommendations.

The day of publication of the Indian Social Reformer will be henceforth Saturday instead of Sunday. But in order not to forestall the publication, fixed for the 5th instant, of the Congress Civil Disobedience Committee's Report with which we deal in our leading article, this issue will not be posted to local and inland addresses till Saturday evening.

Prefixed to Mr. Rushbrook Williams' "India in 1921-22" is a note bearing the following legend. "Except where otherwise mentioned, the pound sterling is taken as the equivalent of ten Rupees." No one desiring to get a pound sterling would have got it for less than fifteen rupees in the period covered by Mr. Williams' book. This fictitious valuation is not restricted to rupees and pounds sterling. It pervades the whole book in which a grain of fact is embellished by half a grain of fancy. This production has taken the place of the "Statement exhibiting the Moral and Material Progress of India" which used to be presented to Parliament by the Secretary of State for India. According to the Statute, this "statement" must contain an account of the broad financial features of the year's administration, and this account "must be accompanied by a statement prepared from a detailed report from each province in British India in such form as best exhibits the moral and material progress and condition of British India in each such province." Mr. Rushbrook Williams' book is described on the title-page as "a Report" prepared for presentation to Parliament in accordance with this statutory requirement. What the Statute demands is "a statement" and not "a report." The difference is obvious. A "statement" is a document in which the personal equation is reduced to a minimum. Its purpose is to enable those who read it to form an impartial judgment of the matter treated of. A "report," on the other hand, allows and, indeed, requires the reporter to assist the reader with his own appreciation of the facts comprised in a "statement." Mr. Rushbrook Williams' is not a "statement" nor even a "report" but a review of India in 1921-22 in the interests of the Government of which he is a subordinate. We regard the devolution of this important duty, which the Statute lays upon the Secretary of State in Council, upon a irresponsible minor official in this country, as a flagrant violation of the intention of Parliament. No Secretary of State would have put his name to speculations of the kind scattered throughout this Report. If it is desired that the Statement should be in narrative form, and have a background, an independent writer of position should be specially requisitioned for the work.

We may cite a few instances to show how Mr. Rushbrook Williams' position has affected his "report" to its detriment as a fair and judicial "statement" of events in India, such as can convey to Parliament an adequately correct impression of their reaction on Indian life and sentiment, which is, after all, the most important object of the statement. In his section on "South Africa," Mr. Williams, extolling Sir Benjamin Robertson's able presentation of India's case before the Asiatic Enquiry Commission, omits even to mention his "Repatriation" idea, which was promptly taken up by the Union Government. Hundreds of Indians domiciled in the Colony were induced by misrepresentations to come to India—which many of them only knew by name. The Government of India repudiated the misrepresentation, but the mischief had been done. The hardships suffered by the “repatriated” Indians, are well-known. Mr. Williams, so far as any reference to this disastrous incident is concerned, might have been an inhabitant of the moon. He mentions “as an augury of better things” in South Africa, “the recent veto” of two Natal Ordinances which seemed likely to endanger “still further the position of Indians.” The Imperial Citizenship Association has recently been informed by the Government of India that the Bills have not been vetoed. In regard to East Africa, again, Mr. Williams states that, owing to the representations of the Government of India, “certain interim measures beneficial to the Indian community have been introduced.” The following incident of which we heard only last week may throw some light on these beneficial measures. A few months ago, an important firm in Bombay, which has a branch at Mombasa, sent an Indian accountant of high standing in his profession, to audit the accounts of their Mombasa branch. The English manager of the branch had arranged to receive the visitor as his guest, but it was found that some clause of the lease of the house in which he lived, prohibited its occupation, even temporarily, by non-Whites. The Indian gentleman was obliged to find quarters during his brief professional stay in the Indian quarter. The friend who gave us this information, mentioned it as a grim comment upon the large sum of 25 lakhs which, in a year of unprecedented deficit, the Legislative Assembly voted for an Empire Exhibition. The Director of Information will have no difficulty in ascertaining the identity of the firm and the Indian accountant if he cares to have them. Though he has inclined to over-estimate the results of the efforts of the Government of India, Mr. Williams, it must be said, has, on the whole, succeeded in reflecting Indian opinion on the subject of Indians overseas with substantial accuracy.

The three chapters relating to Mr. Gandhi and the Non-Co-operation Movement may be smart political pamphleteering, but they are hardly a “statement” of moral and material progress such as the law requires. Mr. Williams has sought for and found recondite reasons to explain events which arose from causes too obvious to be missed. Mahatma Gandhi, we are sure, will be interested and amused by the elaborate analysis of his mentality by the Director of Information. But it is news to us that “leaving South Africa, he (Gandhi) returned to India with the intention of employing on a still larger scale, and for still more comprehensive ends, the device which he had tested in South Africa”, of passive resistance as a means of obtaining redress of the outstanding grievances of his domiciled countrymen. Parliament is further informed that “the late Mr. Gokhale went so far as to bind Mr. Gandhi by a solemn promise that he would refrain from launching his scheme until he had thoroughly satisfied himself of its practicability” and that “accordingly, not until after Mr. Gokhale’s death, did Mr. Gandhi devote himself once more to exploring the chances of success which were offered by an enterprise so hazardous.” Mr. Williams leaves no room for mistake as to what he means. “The War supervened”, he continues; “Mr. Gandhi was engaged in many activities of a social character; and only with the coming of the year 1919 did he seriously resume his interrupted project.” Mr. Gokhale died in February 1915. Supposing, Mr. Gandhi felt bound by his solemn promise to him for a period of twelve months after his demise, Mr. Williams’ statement would suggest that the Mahatma began to lay the train for Non-Co-operation in 1916 or 1917. What is the fact? In his statement before the Court in March last, Mr. Gandhi summed up his activities in South Africa, for which he added, he was given by Lord Hardinge a Kaiser-i-Hind gold medal. In the following passage, he gave his own account of his attitude to Government and his public activities since he left South Africa :—

When the war broke out in 1914 between England and Germany, I raised a Volunteer Ambulance Corps in London, consisting of the then resident Indians in London, chiefly students. Its work was acknowledged by the authorities to be valuable. Lastly, in India when a special appeal was made at the War Conference in Delhi in 1917 by Lord Chelmsford for recruits, I struggled at the cost of my health to raise a Corps in Khera and the response was being made when the hostilities ceased. In all these efforts at service, I was actuated by the belief that it was possible by such services to gain a status of full equality in the Empire for my countrymen. The first shock came in the shape of the Rowlatt Act, a law designed to rob the people of all real freedom. I felt called upon to lead an intense agitation against it. Then the Punjab horrors, beginning with the massacre at Jallianwalla Bag, and culminating in crawling orders, public flogging and other indescribable humiliations. I discovered too that the plighted word of the Prime Minister to the Mussalmans of India, regarding the integrity of Turkey and the Holy places of Islam, was not likely to be fulfilled. But in spite of the foreboding and the grave warnings of friends at the Amritsar Congress in 1919, I fought for co-operation and working the Montagn-Chelmsford Reforms, hoping that the Prime Minister would redeem his promise to the Indian Mussalmans, that the Punjab wound would be healed and that the reforms, inadequate and unsatisfactory though they were, marked a new era of hope in the life of India.

The quotation is long but it has to be put against Mr. Williams’ extraordinary assertion that Mahatma Gandhi had a scheme of non-co-operation in his pocket when landed from South Africa, and that the late Mr. Gokhale kept him back from giving effect to it! Mr. Williams’ account is written for a Report which he was writing for the Government which employs him: Mr. Gandhi’s account was given from the prisoners’ dock where he pleaded guilty of exciting disaffection against that Government and asked the Judge that the severest sentence for the offence may be passed on him. The historian, even in the Historical School which Professor Williams has founded at Lucknow, will have no difficulty in appraising the relative value of these conflicting statements.

LONDON LETTER.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, October 12th 1922.

THE DISCREDITED PREMIER.

Probably Mr. Lloyd George, at the summit of his fame was never more popular than to-day he is unpopular. The grave trouble in the Near East with all its Imperial ramifications, has brought into entire discredit a man who, even by his political opponents, was considered a clever if impulsive statesman. In 1918, Mr. Lloyd George obtained a victory in this country almost unprecedented in our Parliamentary history; there had been no other man considered able to carry the war to a successful issue. But to-day he stands discredited. The Great War ended in a victory for the Allies, but peace was not restored, constant war clouds continued to hover over Europe, until the climax was reached last week, when it seemed as though once again the world was to be bathed in blood and horror. For this last anxiety the country blames the Premier. Even Mr. Garvin of the Observer, who has always sought to deal fairly and pay tribute to his genius, says: "Mr. Lloyd George must now give his political life to save it, and any attempt to prolong the present system can only mean the maximum of friction abroad and of confusion and political disintegration at home." He was a great leader, and at a time of great crisis served his purpose, but that crisis over, he should have retired, for new conditions require new leaders. Perhaps had he resigned two years ago, this country, if not the Empire, would have considered him one of her greatest men: but he has overstayed his time and power, and to-day the country is heartily sick of Lloyd George and all its disappointed hopes. One thing is quite evident—the present Parliament is nearing its end. An overpowering unanimity of opinion is abroad that we want a new Parliament with new men in it. Several names have been put forward as the probable successors to the Premier, and it is possible the position may fall to the lot of Mr. Bonar Law. The latter is looked upon as the most likely man for the task, and he has himself, in the form of a letter recently published in the Press, practically put himself forward as a candidate. Should he be called upon, it is very evident that he would view much of Mr. Lloyd George's policy as something to be thrown upon the scrap-heap. Even a breach with France he seems to contemplate, and a reversion to a form of isolation appeals to him. There is certainly a growing school of thought that considers the possibility of binding the Empire closer together and of cutting itself off, whenever possible, from foreign entanglements.

PANEL DOCTORS.

Once again our system of panel doctors has come in for a great amount of adverse criticism. One big health insurance committee alleges grave neglect of duty against certain practitioners and is making representations to the Minister of Health, who, it is hoped, will take action. The lock-up surgery is probably the worst evil complained about; it is claimed that a panel doctor should be compelled to reside at, or quite near to, his surgery or have a qualified assistant residing there. The amount of ill-feeling the absentee doctor produces, is quite understandable. Illnesses are often sudden, and to be debarred from calling in the medical man, to whom one is taught to look for help and succour, is a grave injustice to the hundreds of poor patients that come under this system. The fact is, most panel doctors have many more patients on their books than they can possibly attend to, so that most of these patients are scamped and neglected. Especially is this true where a panel doctor has also a private practice. The ideal of this system is good, the health of the individual is to the benefit of the whole community of which that individual forms a part, but the system needs reorganisation, and unless this is done the only people in the State who will benefit by its continuance in its present form will be the panel doctors themselves, for the public will refuse to go to them. All panel doctors are not equally callous to their poor patients; there are still many who take their work seriously and conscientiously, but the bad ones bring the whole system into disrepute and discredit upon the medical profession.

SITUATION IN IRELAND—ACUTE FINANCIAL CRISIS.

The new Irish Parliament has received its first big shock in domestic affairs. At the close of its financial debate last week, it was estimated that 27 millions sterling were required for the year, but as far as anyone can see at present, Ireland cannot produce such a sum. The largest item in the total is ten millions for compensation, and this huge figure only represents a part of the damage done, for President Cosgrave has made it clear that local resources must pay largely for local damage. The Army is to cost 7½ millions, this figure representing one equal to nearly 300 millions for Great Britain. To add to the seriousness of the situation, agriculture is in a very bad way, with prices extremely low and a large number of people still, for political reasons, refuse to pay income tax. Altogether, the position is none too happy, but President Cosgrave has courage and a large faith, and works steadily on. The relations between the Free State and Northern Ireland are much more friendly than they were a short while ago, and it is possible, on the next occasion that the North and South meet together, that the atmosphere will be less electrical and therefore productive of much good to Ireland as a whole. It has been suggested that a declaration made by General Richard Mulcahy, Commander-in-Chief, foreshadows the possibility of intention on the part of the authorities to bring forward at some time in the future a scheme of compulsory military service in Ireland, but the Irish newspapers are silent on the matter, and nothing at all definite by any statesman has been said to make such a proceeding likely. The Government has offered to transfer certain civil servants from Whitehall to the Irish Free State and though many Irishmen in the British Civil Service feel they ought to be patriotic and return to their own corner of the earth to serve there, they are, nevertheless, very chary to send in applications for transfer. This diffidence is largely a question of money. Though the salaries in Southern Ireland may be on a level with that which they receive here, the questions of superannuation and pensions are still unsettled, and after a man has spent many years in the service here, he does not like to throw away his human certainty for something problematical. But no doubt, when this difficulty is settled, there will be a fairly large exodus from Whitehall, and this may ease the position there. The retrenching of large numbers of junior men, apart from low salaries, has given rise to a very discontented junior branch of the English Civil Service. But all the disabilities members of the Civil Service may suffer bring forth no sympathy from the general public. At the mass meeting that was held a few weeks ago by low-paid clerks, no enthusiasm or sympathy on the part of anybody else was shown, and the protest they wanted to raise fizzled out.

THE SCOUT MOVEMENT.

The big annual rally of the Boy Scouts took place last Saturday. It was a huge success. The Prince of Wales, wearing a Scout uniform, was present, and about 60,000 boy scouts took part in the celebration. Sir Robert Baden-Powell seemed very happy, and well he might be, for, as he said, no one took the movement seriously when he proposed it 14 years ago. Most people were mildly amused, and looked upon Sir Robert as a trifle with social experiments. Today there are 30 nations that proclaim him the "Chief Scout of all the World," and the followers number about 300,000. The Scout movement has no doubt done more to turn boys into decent self-respecting youths than any other scheme that has been brought into modern existence. It teaches a boy to be fearless, self-reliant, and to work for the common good. The Scout movement also being international, it can, if properly understood and worked, help to make for a feeling of international relationships, and may do much to help to solve the difficulties that the next generations will have to contend with.

THE CHURCH CONGRESS.

The Church Congress opened at Sheffield on Monday, the Archbishop of York, preaching an inaugural sermon. The spiritual heart of this present generation, he said, was restless not only because its nerves had been overstrained by the stress of the dark days of war, but because it was suffering from a sense of disillusionment. The war had shaken not nerves only, but ideals. It had broken the old confident faith in an ever-advancing social progress. The drinking of its dregs in these post-war confusions had left a taste of moral failure. Mists has clouded the vision, the hope of the better world, and there had come on all sides a reaction from the ideals, so prevalent in the 19th Century, of a merely material civilisation, an instinct that spiritual values were the only measure of true wealth, spiritual ideals the only power of true progress. But the instinct was vague and uncertain of itself. Men had come to yearn for religion not from motives of fear or superstition, but because they needed the highest truth and power which it could give them. Men wanted a true religion as never before—that was the hope. They did not find it in the Church—that was the trouble. "To put the matter bluntly," the Archbishop said, "religion attracts; the Church repels. Let us face the fact honestly. That it is a fact can anyone doubt who knows what is passing through the minds of the men and women, especially the younger men and women, who eagerly desire a spiritual religion and yet stand apart from the Church? To these the Church is not a witness of the truth of its gospel, but it is, in its divisions, its dullness, its unreality, an obstacle, a stone of stumbling, an offence. If, therefore, the Church is to preach the eternal gospel to this generation, not in word only, but in power, it must evangelise itself. It must present a new reality of experience as its warrant to all men of the truth of its great assertion."

MR. SASTRI OPTIMISTIC.

Mr. Sastri will soon be back in India to make his statement to the country in the Council of State on the results of his tour in the Dominions. He never expected to do more than break the ground for others to cultivate after him, but he is sanguine that good results have followed and will follow his representations to public men in the Dominions and elsewhere, who will have less excuse than heretofore to forget their Imperial obligations to a state aspiring to early equal partnership in the British Commonwealth. Mr. Sastri indignantly repudiates the suggestion in certain quarters that he has given up a single legitimate Indian claim, or that anything that he has said or done has been injurious to his country. But besides being an idealist he is a realist, and he did not forget either what was the purpose and object of his mission or what they were not.

BOMBAY STUDENTS' BROTHERHOOD.

DISCUSSION ON MARRIAGE AND SACRAMENT.

A conversational meeting of the members of the Bombay Students' Brotherhood was held at its headquarters on Sunday the 22nd October. Light refreshments were served. The adjourned discussion on the subject of "Marriage and Sacrament" was resumed. Mr. S. Sadanand placed before the members draft proposals for the formation of a separate organisation for the purpose of carrying out the requisite reforms in the Hindu marriage customs for the preservation of the sacramental character of marriage. The discussion centred round the definition and place of Dowry in Hindu marriages, the need for amendment of the Hindu law of inheritance as to ensure the right of daughters to inheritance of ancestral properties along with sons and the place of civil marriages in any marriage reform movement. It was pointed out that there were several ways of evading pledges to refuse to accept or give dowries. Mr. J. Natarajan suggested that one way of minimising such evasions would be to introduce the custom of a public declaration on the occasion of the religious ceremonies by the parents of the bridegroom and the bride and also by the bridegroom that they have neither received nor given any dowries. Mr. S. V. Lalit suggested that in the case of all marriage reforms, the spirit of the Hindu Scriptures should be followed.

After much discussion, a committee consisting of Messrs S. V. Lalit, J. Natarajan, S. A. Dange, L. S. Bhandare, R. S.

Paddidri with Mr. S. Sadanand as convener, with powers to add, was appointed to consider in detail the proposals placed before the meeting and to submit its report at the next meeting of the Brotherhood on Sunday the 29th October. It was also decided to request Mr. K. Natarajan, Editor of the "Indian Social Reformer" to help the Committee in its deliberations with his advice and guidance.

As stated above, the adjourned discussion on "Marriage and Sacrament" was resumed at the conversational meeting of the members of the Bombay Students' Brotherhood at its premises on Sunday the 29th October when Mr. L. G. Khare was the chief guest. Light refreshments were served. Mr. S. Sadanand reported the findings of the sub-committee appointed at the previous meeting to examine the draft proposals for carrying out marriage reforms. The Committee in all sat for 5 hours and decided that the activities relating to the carrying out of marriage reform should, for the present, be carried on by the formation of a new Association to be called "The Hindu Marriage Reform Association." After a lengthy discussion, the Committee also resolved not to fight for the elimination of the system of Dowries wholly but to fight against the extortions only. The Committee debated the question of inter-caste marriages and agreed to restrict its advocacy to inter-sect marriages. The Committee also recommended that it should be made clear that the Association did not aim to advocate any reform that was contrary to the spirit of the Hindu Law. Mr. Sadanand next read out the proposals as finally proposed by the Committee.

At the outset, Mr. Khare put before the meeting the question as to whether the proposed activities should not be carried as part of the activities of the Brotherhood. It was pointed that there will be some practical technical difficulties in doing so. After discussion, the meeting unanimously resolved that a separate Association should be formed. Then the proposals were taken clause by clause and passed with changes wherever found necessary. Following are the proposals as finally accepted by the meeting :

(1) That an Association be formed for the elimination of anachronous customs of Hindu marriage, while strictly preserving its sacred character.

(2) That the Association be styled "The Hindu Marriage Reform Association."

(3) That admission to the Association be open to all members of the Hindu community, irrespective of sex, caste or sect, of the age of 16 and over, who subscribe to the objects and pledge themselves by personal example and influence to help in carrying out the objects in the manner enjoined in the following clauses.

(4) That it shall be considered essential

(a) to treat as reprehensible the extortion of dowries on the side of either one or both of the parties to the marriage, either on the occasion of the marriage or any other religious ceremony connected with it (e. g. the consummation ceremony).

(b) to encourage the marriage of boys and girls only after they have fully attained to manhood and womanhood and are capable of entering into Grihastha life with a full realisation of their duties, rights and responsibilities and to recognise as the age limit for marriage, 21 years for boys and 16 years for girls, as the indispensable minimum of age.

(c) to recognise the need and to encourage the removal of inter-sect restrictions on marriage.

(d) to recognise the institution of widow re-marriage and to encourage it especially in the case of child-widows.

(e) to eliminate the compulsory disfigurement of women on account of widowhood,

(f) to treat as reprehensible the second and third marriages of men involving great disparity in age of parties to the marriage.

(g) to refrain from participating or assisting in the conclusion or the celebration of or any religious ceremonies connected with marriages going contrary to the spirit of marriage as embodied in any of the above clauses.

(h) to recognise the need for and practice abstention from consummation of marriage in cases of child-marriages that have already happened and come within the definition of sub-clause B.

It shall be obligatory for persons wishing to join the Association to agree to the creed and to the above explanatory clauses and to sign a pledge which shall run as follows :

"Believing conscientiously that it is essential for the true well-being of Society, to eliminate anachronous customs of Hindu marriages, while preserving its sacred character, I accept the creed of the Association, as explained and defined in the undernoted clauses and solemnly pledge myself to do all in my power by my own personal example and influence for carrying out the objects of the Association in its letter and spirit."

Mr. S. Sadanand was appointed as Provisional Secretary of the Association, for carrying on the further activities of the Association. Several members joined the Association at the conclusion of the meeting. Persons who are in sympathy with the objects of the Association are requested to write to the Provisional Secretary, the Hindu Marriage Reform Association, care of the Bombay Students' Brotherhood, Settlement House, Girgaum Back Road, Bombay.

THE FASCIST MOVEMENT.

Mr. G. Rayner Ellis, writes in the Challenge (London):—

To most Englishmen the name of the Fascisti suggests a reactionary organisation in the nature of a white guard, formed to defend the interests of the bourgeoisie against the proletariat, and as much a class organisation as a trade union. It is true that the Fascist movement is intensely nationalist, that it makes systematic use of reprisals, and that it has in many cases arrogated to itself the duties of the forces of the Crown. Neither can it be denied that up till now it has been engaged in conflict almost entirely with the communists and Unified Socialists. Yet it would not be correct to conclude from this that it is merely a violent movement on the part of a sort of bloc national, representing the possessing classes against the unpossessing. It is as much opposed to certain elements of the wealthy bourgeoisie as it is to the communists, and as it develops further is certain to come into conflict with them. Its theories have more in common with the socialism of Sorel than with bourgeois conservatism or liberalism.

It is not generally realised how greatly the Treaty of Versailles disappointed Italy. Unlike England and France, Italy had not entered the war by the practically unanimous desire of its people. The socialists, the catholics and the followers of Signor Giolitti were strenuous in their efforts to prevent Italian intervention. The interventionists had, therefore, to point to some positive gain in order to justify the cost in lives and money, and they were unable to do so.

Nationalism, and with it everything that had had to do with the war, was completely discredited. The prestige and morale of the army were at a low ebb, and the peculiar condition of Italian parliamentary life at this time added to the general discontent. For years it had been in the hands of political cliques, whose leaders set up and deposed ministries from the background. But in November, 1919, the carefully erected system gave way before the popular feeling. A hundred and fifty-six socialists were returned, that is, nearly a third of the whole chamber; and, inebriated by the success, the socialists thought the realisation of their aims at hand. At this time, the Unified Socialists were affiliated to the Third International. Every step preliminary to the actual revolution was taken. Bombacci, one of the most prominent of the communist leaders, gave the bourgeoisie three months to hand over their property. Red guards were formed in industrial centres and revolutionary leagues exercised a pitiless despotism in the agricultural districts of Emilia, Romagna, and Tuscany by the murder of seigniorants or the destruction of their farms. Political strikes succeeded each other with growing frequency and diminishing excuse, even in the services of the State. In Milan, officers and those decorated for valour in the war were chased through the streets, beaten, and sometimes killed. Systematic boycotting made almost impossible for members of the bourgeoisie to obtain the necessities of life, and bomb outrages were committed daily with the object of paralysing industry and terrorising the bourgeois. The government took no steps to terminate so unsatisfactory a condition of affairs. Repeated amnesties protected the criminals after each outrage; everything was pardoned in the hope that things might settle down. Naturally they became worse. The culmination of this movement was the seizure of the factories by workers, who proceeded to run them by means of their own committees. Signor Giolitti, who was then Premier, chose, perhaps wisely, not to turn them out by force. They had fortified the factories, and the temper of the army was not at all certain. Besides, Signor Giolitti had other opponents to beat. By allowing the workers to remain in possession of the factories he forced the manufacturers to come to terms; then he arranged a compromise by which the factories were evacuated and the workmen given a share in the management of the works. The revolution, which had been promised to follow the occupation of the works, did not take place, and the communists thus threw away their best chance of success.

As early as 1919 the first Fasci di Combattimento were formed by Signor Benito Mussolini, editor of the Popolo d'Italia, and of the two or three great personalities of Italian political life. The Fasci were groups of young men organised in military fashion, determined to restore to the country the peace and order necessary for her prosperity. Greatly augmented in numbers after the occupation of the factories they decided to reduce the communists to parliamentary activity. Their method was one of retaliation; to violence they opposed violence, to killing killing. A system of punitive expeditions enabled the Fascisti of the big cities to counter the red power in the agricultural districts. For months a fierce struggle took place; ambushes and reprisals were of daily occurrence all over the north and centre of Italy, but gradually the Fascisti gained the upper hand. After a while the leaders of red organisations were to be seen asking the protection of the troops who had been an especial object of their hatred, and of the laws they proposed to overthrow. The peculiar organisation of the red forces contributed in a way to their downfall. The leaders had become surrounded by a band of extremists who pushed them forward and prevented communication between them and their followers. This extremist nucleus being defeated, more moderate counsels began to prevail. In the agricultural districts, where the Fascisti offered a solution of the land problem better than that of the communists, numbers of red leagues went over to them bag and baggage. Thus the red dictature was destroyed, and with the restoration of order Mussolini saw it was time to embark on a more constructive policy. At the present time Fascism is easily the greatest power in Italy; its strength, in fact, is such as to give rise to the belief that it must inevitably take over the task of governing the country. It is certain, at any rate, that the party will capture a great number of seats at the next general election, and, owing to the change in public opinion, the present chamber is unrepresentative.

The strength of Fascism lies in the fact that it offers a solution, other than communism, to the large body of Italian opinion which is thoroughly dissatisfied with the capitalist regime as it exists at present, but realises the futility of attempting to force such a solution as communism on a country so obviously alien to its spirit as Italy. After all, Italy is one of the most individualist of countries, and any political system to succeed there must take this fact into account. The Fascisti reject as unnatural and utopian the idea of internationalism. The very basis of their theories is the conception of the nation, almost a personality. From Mazzini they have inherited certain moral and intellectual standards which, though they would be unacceptable to a great many people, yet give them a dynamic force such as has not existed in Italy since the Risorgimento. Their idea of the nation is not aggressive, in the French manner, but aims rather at the development than the expansion of the country. Private property is justified by its utilisation for the benefit of the community: when its owner ceases to use it for that purpose it should pass to other hands. All individual capacities should be used in the way which will bring most benefit to the community, that is to Italy. These conceptions of the nation would be dangerous in the hands of many nations, but it is unlikely that the Italians will pursue them to that point. The philosophy of the Fascisti like most Italian political philosophy is rather intuitive than strictly formal, and there are at the head of the movement men such as Mussolini whose energy is tempered by clear perception, men who have the national enthusiasm of Garibaldi but a greater political insight. Had it not been so, the Italian Government would have been overthrown, perhaps forcibly when it attacked d'Annunzio in Fiume. The Fascisti naturally sympathised with him, but their leaders restrained the tendency to violent action. When the party takes over the government of the country, its policy will probably be more constructive and economic than political. There will be no attempt to drive the workers from the position they have obtained, but energy will be concentrated on what may be called the modernisation of the country, all of whose resources will be developed as far as possible.

MILITARY JATHAS' STATEMENT.

The following is the written statement put in on the 27th October, by Subedar Amarsingh with the concurrence of the other members of the military pensioners' Jatha in the court of Mr. L. Amar Nath:—

"We avail of this opportunity to make it clear to the Government how the Sikh mind feels in regard to the Gurdwara reform movement generally and the Guru-ka-Bagh affair especially. The members of this Jatha are glad they rendered services to the Crown of which no loyal heart need feel ashamed. We fought on the battlefields of Tirah, Chitral, Afghanistan, Burma, China, East Africa, the Soudan, Egypt, Persia, Mesopotamia, Palestine, Gallipoli, Russia, France and other fields less worthy of note. This service was done in extremes of climate, while in France thousands of Sikh soldiers stood entrenched for days together in icy water. They also saw service at Rumades in Mesopotamia, where the thermometer stood at 135° and there were no fewer than 190 deaths from thirst in one single day. The world seriously doubts if the onrushing tide of the victorious German hordes would have been stemmed but for the hand to hand bayonet fight by the Sikhs at Nenvachapelle and Ypres. At Kut-el-Amara, we held out when all chances of help became entirely remote, when all communications were cut off and we had no provisions save the flesh of horses and mules to feed on.

Twenty-four of us were wounded in action and having been incapacitated for further military service retired on pension, while one lost his leg and two got their eye-sight injured by gas. Almost all of us possess medals of one distinction or other in addition to two I. O. M. S., I.D.S.M., and one M. S. M. Most of us belong to families who have seen continuous military services since the unhappy times of the Indian mutiny, when the British flag stood tottering on the soil of India. We did nothing more than what our duty to the Crown demanded and that we did to the utmost of our ability and strength.

But since the Gurdwara reform movement began, the official attitude towards it has given rise to painful misgivings in our mind, which as the days pass have acted severely on our feelings. We have witnessed the Nankana Sabib massacre, the official sympathy for the aggrieved party in the forms of jail and of unsullied lives and the justice of the High Court in an unparalleled case of most barbarous and cold blooded massacre. We have seen the Government's solicitude for inviolability of their solemn pledges not to interfere in the religious liberties of their subjects in the matter of Kirpan, black turbans and the Golden Temple keys affair. All this we have seen, heard and felt like a Sikh, felt like a friend rudely disillusioned from his loving and blind faith in the honesty of others.

On the top of all comes the Guru-ka-bagh affair. During the two months or so since this struggle began, we have seen our brothers beaten most brutally and illegally. We have seen their beards and hair pulled by sacrilegious hands, beard of our holy Gurus being spoken of in terms most insulting and provoking, seen things done by the Police in the name of "law," in a manner most lawless and all this anxious concern for law and order having no real basis for it. Our patience having thus been tried to the utmost, we have come forward to prove our devotion to the Guru and the Panth as if to give a true idea of the humiliation to which our brothers are subjected. The Police were good enough to give us a taste of it. We were first searched naked like the meanest criminals, then kept under such severe and close guard as not to allow us to answer calls of nature from 11 in the night to 6 in the morning the next day.

We shall now be pleased to see handcuffs fastened on our wrists by those whom we have been considering our friends for so long and in whose service we have been so little calculating of our own interests. To-day we consider ourselves doubly fortunate in having been arrested for going out to cut wood from the Sat Guru's land for the Sat Guru's langer and having been put into jail for the liberation of our religious shrines and the Gurdwara Reform.

ALL BUT ONE CONVICTED.

The Military Pensioners' Jatha was yesterday convicted of an offence under section 45 of continuing to be members of an unlawful assembly after order to disperse and all the 100 men were sentenced, 26 men by reason of old age to 6 months' simple imprisonment and Rs. 100 fine or in default to 3 months' further simple imprisonment and the remaining, to 74 to 2 years' rigorous imprisonment and Rs. 100 fine or in default to 6 months' further rigorous imprisonment. Detailed proceedings follow. Subedar Sirdar Amar Singh, the Jathadar, was, because of his position, directed to be treated in jail as a special class prisoner. The trial took place in the court of Lala Amar Nath, Magistrate. The case against one Sepoy, Chatar Singh, was withdrawn as he had lost one leg in the war.

A HINDU MISSIONARY SOCIETY MARRIAGE.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The Hindu Missionary of the 16th October devotes two and a half columns to describe "A Hindu Marriage" performed in Bombay, under the auspices of the Hindu Missionary Society, on the 8th instant, according to the revised ritual of the Hindu Missionary Society. The parties to this marriage were Mr. Dayandeo Lahoo Kaotekar, a member of the Mahar community of Kurla and the bride Shrimati Madhumalini, a born Christian, who about two months ago renounced Christianity and embraced Hinduism. Mr. Kaotekar was an inmate of the Hostel for boys conducted by the Bombay Branch of the Depressed Classes Mission when I was its Superintendent. This young man was then already married, and from enquiries made, I learn that his first wife is still living. She could hardly be 15 years of age and Mr. Kaotekar has not divorced her nor has she left him. I do not know the circumstances under which the present marriage was settled. The Hindu Missionary says: "Mr. Dnyandeo settled his marriage with Shrimati Madhumalini and came to us to solemnize the same. We settled Sunday as the most convenient day to celebrate the marriage and printed invitations and distributed them among the friends and relations of Mr. Dnyacadeva." What I would like to know is if the "Hindu Missionary" made enquiries before issuing the invitations as to whether Mr. Kaotekar was already married and whether his wife was living or dead. I know the "Hindu Missionary" defends bigamous marriages and has no scruples to solemnize them. But the excuses advanced for solemnizing a bigamous marriage before, do not hold good in this case, and after the chorus of condemnation of that marriage one would have expected the "Hindu Missionary" to refrain from solemnizing such marriages in future. Among the Depressed Classes a man can go in for any number of marriages in the life time of one or more of his wives. But should not we expect persons like the educated Editor of the Hindu Missionary who acted the fire warden and Mr. L. B. Raje who officiated as minister to set a better example to these people by refusing to solemnize such marriages? I am afraid the Hindu Missionary Society which has such a bright future before it, is marring the cause to which every one would wish prosperity, by solemnizing bigamous marriages.

Bandra,
24th Oct. 1922.

Yours etc,
V. S. SONONI.

THE LATE MR. GADKARI.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I should like to offer my grateful tribute of sincere appreciation to the departed and valued soul of Mr. Gadkari for making a valuable addition to the poor Marathi literature by the writing of a marvellous play by name "Raja Sanyas." It is a history of Sambheji's misrule, his misdeeds and misconduct, written in most chaste and beautiful Marathi. During 1½ short space of a decade, Gadkari wrote out five wonderful Marathi plays, of which this is the only historical, the rest being all quite original social plays of rare merit in Marathi or any other literature. He has surpassed all the old as well as new writers and eclipsed all Maharashtra writers by his luminous writings, prose and poetry. All the plays of Gadkari are full of wit and humour and his character sketches are quite exhaustive and well developed. He was a most consummate playwright, a star of first magnitude, eclipsing the glory of all the rest by his transcendental lustre dominating the dramatic firmament with unique brilliancy. He swam into the ken of discoverers almost after his death. Though all his plays are full of human, there is not a single wit, which his low, obscure or dirty. Had such a man been born in appreciative England or inquisitive America, they might have been resounded with his praise. It was ever either England or America that discovered our Vivekanand, Tagore or Bose and it redounds greatly to their glory. When we begin to inquire into the causes of the inert state of the public mind in India, we cannot but be astounded at the vast extent to which a sort of inertia holds sway over the lethargic state of the public mind and must have from time immemorial paralysed the germs of greatness and lopped the wings of ambition. We lament over the scarcity of master-minds in the field of Science and literature, but are not conscious of the fact that it is owing to the absence of an appreciative public.

At last we have a worthy play, published in attractive form, one of the greatest monument of dramatic literature. This play conclusively proves the merit of Mr. Gadkari and that his death was a national loss. For years, dramatic literature in Marathi was the despair of the stage and the public. Throughout this marvellous play are discernible the traces of a powerful and independent mind, emancipated from the influence of authority and devoted to the search of truth. The corrupt habits and dirty practices of the clerical line are most vividly brought to light in the character of "Jiwaji" and they are held forth to the ridicule and hatred of the public. The divine love and devotion of "Shiwaganga" has been skilfully depicted. The fiery patriotism and deep loyalty of the old Sardars "Jiwaba Mohite" and "Hiroji Farjand" has been nicely delineated. Gadkari not only revolutionised but evolved and purified the stage as none other had done before.

It was by his poetry and humorous writings that Gadkari was first known to the public. His articles "Thakiohan Laguna" and poem "Rajahames Maaza Nijala" have been immortalised. By the general suffrage of the educated youths his place has been assigned among the greatest masters of the dramatic art. There are many critics, who extol his works and deery the writer. The works, they acknowledge, considered in themselves may be classed among the noblest productions of human mind, but they would not allow the author to rank with great writers. Gadkari, it is said, inherited what his predecessors like Agarkar, Keshava Suta, and Kolhatkar created; he lived in an enlightened age, received good education (I mean dramatic education) and we must, therefore, if we form a just estimate of his powers, make large deductions in consideration of these advantages. But I say, there are for the present many young men possessing all these advantages and a longer life than of Gadkari to boot, yet why are they not enabled to write equally good plays? At the time of his death Mr. Gadkari was only 35. Was it not a positive disadvantage, counterbalancing all the other petty advantages?

G. K. SHIRSAT,

CASTE IN COLLEGE HOSTELS.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

My attention has been drawn only today to Mr. Oak's letter and your comment thereon in your issue of October 22. It is undoubtedly a deplorable fact that an old institution of forty years' standing like the Rajaram College should not have a hostel attached to it, but it does not follow that the institution fosters caste distinctions.

There are several denominational hostels in Kolhapur for providing boarding and educational facilities to the sons of the various communities and they are serving that purpose very admirably. I find that in many of these boarding houses even college students can get accommodation, furniture, light and food by the payment of such a ludicrously small sum as ten rupees per month. This has been possible on account of the large amounts donated by the communities to which these hostels belong. But for these charities and institutions, I am sure, scores of students would have been deprived of higher education. There is deep poverty in these parts and it is impossible for the sons of the middle classes even to go in for secondary and college education.

It is well-known that the backward classes have been deprived of higher education in all the Western countries even. It is, however, highly gratifying to see that here the State is following a very enlightened policy in providing educational and boarding facilities for the backward classes. In the Rajaram School and College, more than 20 per cent of the students are being educated free of charge. May I ask whether there is any other college in British India affiliated to the Government Universities which has popularized higher education among the poverty-stricken masses to the extent that the Rajaram College has done through the liberal policy of the State? Can anyone deny that His Late Highness Shri Shahu Chhatrapati of Kolhapur devoted himself heart and soul to the amelioration of the backward and depressed classes and to the removal of caste prejudices? Is the same rational policy not being followed by the present Maharaja? In the face of these facts, how can the State be charged of fostering caste divisions?

Then the Rajaram College has been managed by the Arya Samaj for the last three years. This body is universally known to be the most fanatical iconoclast of all castes. It has been preaching the doctrines of the equality and fraternity of all men and women and working in earnest to remove the untouchability of the sixty millions of the depressed classes by raising them to a higher standard of education, character and economic life. The Samaj is pledged to break down all barriers of caste and is working on these lines in Kolhapur too.

In short, the State and the Samaj are dead against castes and communal divisions, but the latter can not be obliterated in a day. We are anxious to have a college hostel. In these days of financial stress and retrenchment, a new building worth more than a lack of rupees can not be begun off hand. Still arrangements are being made. I am positively sure that the Rajaram College will have a decent hostel from the beginning of the next session.

BAI. KRISHNA,
Principal, Rajaram College.

"THE TREASURE CHEST."

A new 24 page monthly magazine for boys and girls in India, dating from July 1922.

It is printed in English and contains illustrations drawn from Indian life. Each number contains several first-class stories, a poem or two, an Indian biography, sections on nature study, social service, current events, "something to do", and a prize competition.

Subscription Rs. 2 a year. For the six months of 1922 the subscription is Re. 1. If paid in advance for eighteen months to the end of 1923 it is Rs. 2-8-0. Back numbers of the magazine are available, so those who order now will receive a full set from July.

Rates for foreign countries, if paid in this country, 12 annas additional a year, or Re. 1-2 for eighteen months. Subscriptions sent from abroad, four shillings a year or five shillings for eighteen months.

What teachers and parents say of it:

"I have long been looking for just this kind of a magazine for the boys and girls of India."

"Should you be able to maintain the high standard you have adopted from the very outset, the success and popularity of your magazine are assured.....Paper, printing illustrations, and cover, all will appeal to the young folk. But above all, the freshness, local colour and graceful style of your articles, poems and stories."

"It is a charming magazine. How our kiddies love it!"

ROYAL YAKUTI.

THIS YAKUTI or life giving nectar has been prepared from the best, choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has wonderful properties of increasing virile power and it rectifies urinary disorders. In fact it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to these persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicine. Its works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires. It is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills. Rupees ten only.

NOTES.

Non-Co-operation and the Legislative Councils: Mr. Sadanand's article on "The Way to Freedom," which we publish to-day, was written before the publication of the report of the Congress Civil Disobedience Enquiry Committee. But its arguments are not affected by the fact that, not the whole Committee, but only one-half of it, recommend the entry of Non-Co-operators into the Legislative Councils, or that they do so solely for purposes of obstruction. To be consistent, however, Mr. Sadanand must object as much to Non-Co-operators entering Municipal and Local Boards, which are creations of the Legislature, as to their entering the Legislature. It is now a settled policy with Non-Co-operators that they should obtain control of these civic institutions by getting themselves elected to them in large numbers. Apart from all other considerations, this alone renders untenable the position of those who would continue the boycott of the Legislative Councils. It is like the position of a man who finds enjoyment in contemplating the heavens from the top of a tree, while his opponent is vigorously wielding the axe on its stem with a view to bring him and it to the ground. The real difficulty in the way of self-Government, whether independence or of the Dominion model, is the absence of unity and combination among the Indian people. In the Punjab, educated Hindus and Mahomedans are quarrelling as bitterly over Government inspectorships of schools, as their illiterate co-religionists over tasias. In the United Provinces, a pitched battle was fought in the Legislative Council the other day between Hindu and Mahomedan members, Ministers and Members of Council joining in the fray, over the reservation of seats in Local Boards. In Madras and in Maharashtra, the non-Brahmins, that is, the bulk of the population, regard the Brahmins as more foreigners than the British, and the Brahmins themselves are divided in the rival camps not only of Co-operators and Non-cooperators, but, now, as between absolute Non-Co-operators and qualified Non-Co-operators. Bengal never showed more than a platonic love for Non-Co-operation. It is obvious that the first task of Indian statesmen is to bring about a composition of these distracting differences.

This is the central idea of the constructive social programme of Bardoli. The Legislative Councils and the civic bodies offer a field where all castes and creeds may work together for the common good to promote which is to promote unity. The British connection with India is not altruistic, and was never so, but all the same many Englishmen have been altruistic in the past and are so now in regard to Indian well-being; and it is worth an effort to get as many of them as possible behind our work of national reconstruction. There is ample field outside the Councils too for national work and, in fact, the fruitfulness of the Councils is entirely dependent upon the public life without them. All that is asked is that there should be harmony and continuity between the work in the Councils and outside, which there cannot be if entry into the Councils is regarded as a sin against the country.

Secondary Education in the Central Provinces: We print to-day a considered criticism by Mr. T. R. Gadre of the provisions of the Central Provinces Secondary Education Bill. Mr. Gadre dwells rather more upon the constitution than upon the functions of the proposed Board as factors in the efficiency and success of the scheme. While we quite realise the importance of remedying the defects which he points out in the proposed constitution of the Board, we think it is even more important that the functions and powers of the Board should be wide enough to ensure its control of secondary education, not only at its final, but in its initial stages also. Mr. Gadre refers to the Joint Board in Bombay for conducting the combined Matriculation and School Leaving Examinations. That Board was called into existence, tentatively for five years, in circumstances totally different from those of the Central Provinces where the University as well as the Secondary School Board is yet to be started. During the five experimental years, the Bombay Board has been able to do little more than carry on the routine of holding the combined examination, owing to lack of resources commensurate with the functions entrusted to it. The Department distributes grants, inspects the schools, and in fact runs the whole show; while the Board, besides prescribing text-books and appointing examiners, is able to do very little. Unless the Board is placed in effective charge of secondary education by the administration of secondary education, including grants-in-aid, being handed over to it, it is likely to be an encumbrance rather than a help to the University as well as the Department. We understand from Mr. Gadre's article that the Central Provinces Bill provides for such a transfer, though he is not very clear on the point. This, we think, is the most vital part of the proposed scheme, and the Legislative Council should see that this is secured effectively. As for the proportion of officials and non-officials on the Board, while every effort should be made to give the largest field for non-official co-operation, it has to be recognised at the same time that non-official persons who are able to take a sustained and detailed interest in educational questions, are nowhere very plentiful.

The Bombay Compulsory Education Bill: With reference to the letter which we print to-day on the Bombay Compulsory Education Bill, we do not agree with our correspondent that the present Bill should have asked the Municipalities and Local Boards to introduce compulsory education, leaving the change of machinery to be introduced later. So far as the Municipalities are concerned, they had sufficient time to prove their desire and their willingness to introduce compulsory education under the Patel Act, and very few of them have taken advantage of it. The Local Boards are likely to be no more enthusiastic in the matter. Moreover, it is necessary in order to give the scheme a good start that it should be started under the most favourable auspices. The new machinery of School Boards is quite a simple one to work. Our correspondent himself admits that the present administration of primary education is by no means efficient, and the sooner it is handed over to more efficient hands the better. The question of the pay of teachers has nothing to do with the compulsory scheme. It is one purely of finance, and we daresay that Government are fully alive to their duty to this important and deserving class of its servants. It is our earnest hope that the scheme will be rendered so elastic as to admit of all agencies working together in the non-political cause of national education. A child receiving education in a school managed by Non-Co-operationists, cannot be said to be receiving no education, and would be exempted from the compulsory provisions, as a matter of course.

Church and State in Turkey: His Highness the Aga Khan has voiced the opinion of enlightened Indian Mahomedans in justifying the action of the Angora National Assembly in relieving the Caliphate of its temporal powers. A valued Mahomedan friend writes to us to the same effect. He says: "With regard to your note upon Church and State in Turkey, I wonder if Mr. Chotani realises that Kemal Pasha's attitude is the only possible one consistent with the rights of other Muslim States and the paramountcy of the Khilafat. Kemal Pasha does not want Turkey to go beyond the boundaries which it can administer with efficiency nor to sink large sums of Turkish money for ruling over Yemen, in which the holy places are situated. He, therefore, desires to live in amity with the Arab kingdom which holds now these places. The only logical and possible way open to him, therefore, is to make the Khilafat independent of actual political tenure of those places and yet to make the Khilafat paramount over those places as well as over all Muslim countries. This can be done only by dissociating the Khilafat from the temporal power at Angora and Constantinople in the same way as it is disassociated from the temporal power ruling in Kabul, Isphahan, Khiva, etc. Of course what I have said about Kemal Pasha's justification is my own reading of his intentions. I have not seen them anywhere stated in that form. It would be worth while ascertaining the pros and cons from the point of view I have sketched out."

The Indian States Bill: Following the example of the Kathiawar Hitavardhak Sabha, the Dakshini Sansthan Hitavardhak Sabha, has addressed a representation to Parliament against sanctioning the Indian States Bill passed by the Council of State on the certificate of the Viceroy after its rejection by the Legislative Assembly. The Dakshini Sabha quotes from the evidence of Mr. Rushbrook Williams, the Director of the Central Bureau of Information, to the effect that the criticisms in the Indian Press of the affairs of Indian States are rarely of a seditious nature. We give below an extract from his evidence.

Question:—Now as regards the prevention of disaffection concerning Indian States?

Answer:—I can only base my statement on my personal experience. During the course of my study I have not come across anything which in its substance went beyond the grounds of legitimate criticism.

Question:—You have not seen anything beyond legitimate criticism and therefore you did not think any protection necessary?

Answer:—Yes.

Question:—You have said something about the protection of Indian Princes. If any very strong and virulent article was written in the vernacular Press about the Indian States do you think it is likely that it would be brought to your notice in your official capacity?

Answer:—Yes. I certainly think so. The major portion of the more important newspapers passes through my office.

Question:—May I take it that you have not come across any article so far written against the Indian States which in your opinion would justify the introduction of any provision in the ordinary law of the land?

Answer:—So far as my experience goes, Sir, that is so I should be inclined to say that while the tone of some of the criticisms which have been directed against the Indian Princes can only be described as regrettable, the subject matter of the articles has been, to the extent of my knowledge, as a rule unobjectionable.

Control of Sikh Gurdwaras: The Government of the Punjab has introduced into the local Legislative Council a Bill to help in the reform of Sikh Gurdwaras. It was prepared in accordance with the wishes of the Sikh members of the Council expressed in July last. Under this Bill there will be a Board of three Sikhs, one appointed by the Shiromani Gurdwara Parbandhak Committee, one by the Sikh members of the Legislative Council and one by the Government. This Board will have power to take possession of disputed Gurdwaras and to provide for the conduct of religious or charitable duties, ceremonies and observances. The members of the Board will hold office for two years only: but all arrangements made by the Board will continue in force until altered by the consent of parties or by the order of a Court. Under this Bill, when it becomes law, it will be possible to remove bad Mahants and to provide for the proper use of Gurdwara properties and funds. Thus the Government Press Note. An Associated Press message, however, states that four Sikh members of the Punjab Legislative Council have issued a statement recording their "strong repudiation of the Punjab Government communique, dated the 6th instant, stating that the Third Gurdwara Bill has been introduced in the Legislative Council with the consent of the Sikh members." They disown all responsibility for the measure and urge that it should be withdrawn.

Social Reform in Andhra: A correspondent writes with reference to the statistics of civil condition at the recent Madras Census: "I think that ten years have done practically no good in the matter of social reform. In Andhra districts the number of child widows has been steadily increasing. Among the Kalingis, for every 1000 children under 10 years of age about 664 are married. There is an increase of 50 per cent. in the number of infant marriages and girl widows. These figures speak volumes for the work of the social reformers in Andhradesa which is clamouring for political rights in the face of such a scandalous state of things!"

THE AWAKENING OF ASIAN WOMANHOOD.*

Is there an Asian womanhood? Has it been asleep all these centuries? These are the questions which one asks oneself on reading the title of Mrs. Margaret Cousins' little book with the above heading. Lord Curzon in his "Problems of the Far East", declared that Asia, in spite of her differences, had a certain homogeneity. After visiting almost every part of Asia, he observed "a certain homogeneity of expression, a certain similarity of character, certain common features of political and still more of social organisation, certain identical strains in the composition of man, that differentiate her structure from anything in Europe or even in America, and invest her with a distinction peculiarly her own." The sensation is strengthened, he went on to say, by the impression left upon most minds since the days of childhood by "the two best books that have ever been written upon the East",—viz. the Old Testament and the Arabian Nights! Further analysing his impressions, he wrote:

In scenery the dominant note of Asian individuality is contrast, in character a general indifference to truth and respect for successful wile, in deportment dignity, in society the rigid maintenance of the family union, in government the mute acquiescence of the governed, in administration and justice the open corruption of administrators and judges, and in everyday life a statuesque and inexhaustible patience, which attaches no value to time and wages unappeasable warfare against hurry.

Lord Curzon was wrong in stating that the Old Testament and the Arabian Nights confirmed the impressions formed by him during his travels in Asia. He had doubtless read these books long before he started on his travels, and took with him his impressions gathered from them. He noted or distorted all that he saw to confirm these impressions and did not note or merely ignore others. The mind sees, it has been truly said, what it brings with it the means of seeing. The young Imperialist was out to find in Asia, as a justification of the unchecked European domination and exploitation of his early years, qualities which marked her out as the natural and legitimate inferior of the people of Europe. And he found or discovered or invented them, of course. Neither the Old Testament nor the Arabian Nights, by the way, had any relation to India or the Far East to which Curzon's book relates.

The corrective to this tendency to assign qualities to people according to geographical limits, is the historical method which sees the whole human race following one long line of evolution, some branches of it being at stages left by some others of it at a longer or shorter distance behind. Mrs. Cousins, notwithstanding the title which she has given to her book, realizes that there is no hard and fast line dividing the Asian from the European or the American. "Generally speaking," she sums up, "the status of the Indian woman of to-day is very similar to that of the woman of early Victorian times in England. She has better rights of property, however, more respect from her religion for her sex, a greater reverence shown her for her motherhood, and no man-made legal barriers to her public activities under Hindu law whose principle seems to have been—She may do what she can do." Some years ago we read a book by a Japanese artist who had spent many years in England. As the result of his observations, he came to the conclusion that there was practically little or no difference between the actual position of the average English and the average Japanese woman. He summed up his views in one of those epigrammatic sentences which stick to the mind like a burr. The Englishman, he wrote, kisses his wife in public and kicks her in the privacy of his home; while the Japanese kicks her in public and kisses her at home. This, no doubt, is merely a rhetorical way of saying that things are not quite what they seem either in England or Japan. Mrs. Cousins' book has much value as showing how women inhabiting the countries of Asia are reacting to the impact of Western ideas. But the characteristics which she mentions as marking off the Asian as a distinctive type from the Western woman, are hardly fundamental. There are even greater differences between women of different Western countries and even between women of different classes in the same country. "The Eastern woman," writes Mrs. Cousins, "is unaccustomed to any form of individual initiative." And yet John Stuart Mill, from his many years of experience of the affairs of the Indian States at the India Office, bore testimony to the high administrative capacity of Indian women in a letter to Mrs. Manning in 1870. He said:

You ask me for information respecting the administrative capacity shown by so many ladies of ruling families in India, and especially whether these ladies are Hindoos or Mahomedans. They are almost all Hindoos..... One of the most remarkable, however, of these ladies, the late Sekunder Begum of Bhopal, was a Mahomedan.... Her own mother, too, was a remarkable woman. As the Native States were in my department in the India House, I had opportunities of knowing all that was known about the manner in which they were governed, and during many years, by far the greater number of instances of vigorous, forceful, and skillful administration which came to my knowledge were by Ranees and Ranees as regents for minor chiefs.

In the humbler sphere of their households, Indian women exhibit the same qualities of management as those noted by J. S. Mill in their administration of their States.

It would be more correct to speak of the widening of the horizon than of the awakening of Indian or Asian Womanhood, because that womanhood had never gone to sleep. Whatever its hands found to do that it has always done with all its might. What Indian and Asian women have lacked is literary education which enables one to get to know what is happening in the world outside of that which they see or hear about. While we deprecate the comparison of the ideals of Western womanhood with the crudest realities about Asian womanhood, we cannot but admit that there is much—too much—in Mrs. Cousins' criticisms of the existing marriage and other conditions in India, that is just and true, and requires to be promptly remedied. We agree with her when she suggests the starting of an organisation to support young men and women who are penalised for their protest against the evil effects of some prevailing marriage customs. Mrs. Cousins, who belongs to the Theosophical Society, gives proof of her fairness of mind in bearing testimony to the large part which the Non-co-operation movement is playing in the awakening of Indian women. The Liberals have entirely neglected them, and Indian women reciprocate the compliment. The weakness of present-day Liberals lies, in fact, in their perfect indifference to the great social problems which, and not constitutional screws and bolts, constitute true politics. Mr. Surendra Nath Banerjee as a member of the Southborough Committee vehemently opposed the enfranchisement of women, and another great Liberal leader, Mr. Sastry, acquiesced in his opposition. No wonder that few women find anything to attract them in the Liberal programme!

THE CENTRAL PROVINCES' HIGH SCHOOL EDUCATION BILL.

(BY MR. T. R. GADRE.)

This Bill provides for the establishment of a Board of High School Education. It is in keeping with the Sadler Commission's recommendation that Secondary education should be excluded from University control. To achieve this object, the Bill proposes to organise instruction preparatory to admission to Universities, to certain employments and to educational institutions other than universities. We further learn from the preamble of the Bill that the proposed Board is to be established "to regulate and supervise the system of High School Education in the Central Provinces, to prescribe courses for Middle School classes and to examine and award certificates to those pupils who have completed a High School course." Apparently the Bill in hand is drafted on the model of the recent Allahabad enactment in the matter, which includes the Intermediate instruction as well. Our C. P. Bill, however, restricts itself to Secondary education only.

We believe that the Calcutta University Commission must have suggested this exclusion of Secondary education from University control with a view to relieve the University from this burden, and thus enable it to devote all its attention and energy to the higher collegiate instruction. But we submit that the Universities should be given a large voice in the Board sought to be created to control the High School and Intermediate instruction, and that to achieve this end they should be allowed to send an adequate number of their representatives on such a Board. If we examine the composition of the proposed Board under the Bill, we find that the Board is to consist of a very large number of official and Government nominated members. The Director of Public Instruction, three or five Heads of High Schools chosen by the Government, five more nominees of the Government, besides the members representing—to a maximum of three—the minorities who are to be nominated by Government: these are the members belonging to the official or nominated class without any assurance of a certain fixed non-official element. As against these members we have four representatives of the University two-thirds of whom are again required to be from the teachers, as well as two members to be elected by the non-official members of the Legislative Council. Thus there is going to be a clear and overwhelming Government majority on this Board with a small voice left for the representatives of the University and the Legislative Council. We emphatically protest against this over-officialisation of this new Board and we very strongly urge that the chief underlying principle of the constitution of this Board should be that the non-official members should always be in a clear majority. The Bill under the disguise of a democratic and high-sounding form proposes to make the Local Government absolute masters of the new Board by vesting in the former the power to compel the latter to adopt any action proposed by them. Clause 8 of the Bill lends support to our remark and we hope it will be modified to such an extent as to remove the complaint stated above.

We may profitably examine here the composition of the Bombay Board which has been established by an executive action of the Government to control and regulate the School Leaving examination in the Bombay Presidency. This Joint Board consists of ten members only. Of these, five including the Chairman are elected by the University, three members are nominated by the Government and two more are co-opted by the above eight members. The course of studies is prescribed by the Bombay University and if any change is required in it, previous sanction in the matter has to be obtained from the University. On the other hand, our proposed Board covers a more extensive area as already pointed out in the beginning of this note. As regards the composition of the C. P. Board also, it differs materially from that of the Bombay Joint Board which gives a dominant voice to the University of Bombay.

We are, therefore, going to submit here some important changes in the various provisions of the proposed measure in order to bring it under non-official control. And to realise this aim we suggest that the constitution as provided in clause 3 should be very largely liberalised by providing a distinct non-official majority of members on the proposed Board. The Head Masters of High Schools should also be allowed to send their elected representatives in proportion to the respective numbers of Government and private institutions. The proposed Nagpur University should be allowed to send 40 or 50 per cent of the number of members on the Board. Clause 3 sub-clause (h) provides that two thirds of these representatives should be teachers in the University or in Colleges affiliated to the University. We strongly urge the entire removal of this sub-clause (h) and allow the University a free choice in the election of its members on this Board. The Board so constituted will consist of twenty three or twenty six members including the Director of Public Instruction, three or five Heads of High Schools, two members elected by the non-official members of the Legislative Council, about nine representatives elected by the Court of the Nagpur University, one to two members elected by the Local Bodies and Registered Societies maintaining High Schools, and a representative of each of the Training College, Engineering, Agriculture, Commerce and Industries, and Medicine and Public Health nominated by the Local Government.

As regards the Chairman of the Board, we submit that he should be one who is a non-official and who does not belong to the teaching profession. The first Chairman, satisfying the above conditions, should be nominated by the Local Government for a period of four years. As regards the representatives to be nominated by the Local Government from amongst the minorities, we submit we fail to see any justification for the same. The Local Government can nominate any such member from among the several groups already mentioned. We further submit that the Secretary of this Board should be called a Registrar and that the Director of Public Instruction should hold this office ex-officio.

Regarding the powers of the Chairman, we submit that he should be authorized to take speedy measures in urgent circumstances. Of course, such measures will have to be ratified by the Board at its subsequent meetings provided that such measures do not violate the express directions of the Board. Suitable changes therefore should be made in clause 10 (3). Clause 12 (1) also requires modification in order to enable the Board to organise local advisory committees to help forward and to co-operate with the working of the proposed Board.

We have to bring to the notice of the Educational authorities of C. P. one or two more points of vital importance. According to the Sadler Commission's recommendations, the High School Department should be run by such a Board. (Vide, in this connection, paras 31—39 of chapter 31 of the Sadler Committee's Report). From clause 7 (9) of our Bill we gather that the High School Department is going to work with the new Board somewhat in the above spirit. But sub-clause 13 of the same clause 7 gives rise to a doubt in this connection. We, therefore, hope that the Hon'ble the Minister of Education will make this point clear. The wording of the preamble and that of clause 7 (B) will have to be suitably modified if the recommendations of the Sadler Commission in this matter are to be followed. We submit that the ideal pointed out by the Sadler Commission should be placed before our Board in the discharge of its duties. We have also to suggest that clause 8 sub-sections 1, 2, 3 should undergo drastic changes and we submit that the power of the Local Government under these sub-clauses should be strictly restricted to the remedying of any gross mismanagement or omission of duty discovered or reported.

Lastly we hope the Member in charge of the Bill will take notice of the friendly suggestions made by us and suitably amend it. In case such changes which are of vital importance are not accepted by the Local Government, we would rather like the Bill to be rejected by the Legislative Council. We strongly hope that the members of the C. P. Legislative Council will be alive to the grave responsibilities in this connection and make up their mind to throw it out altogether if the Local Government is not prepared to modify the Bill. It merely makes a show of bringing the Secondary education under non-official control and it further pretends to carry out the recommendations of the Sadler Commission on the point by trying to create by a legislative act a Board wholly under departmental control. Better not to have any such Board than to have it of a such a character of doubtful utility as proposed under the C. P. Bill.

MARRIAGE. I.

(By Mr. G. A. SUNDARAM).

I have carefully read and thought over the article dealing with the Hindu view of Marriage contributed by Mr. C. F. Andrews to the Modern Review of October. I have also read Mr. S. Sadanand's article on the subject in the Indian Social Reformer of the 29th October. Mr. Andrews is right when he maintains that traditional Hinduism regards married life as a very necessary experience. In this it has steered clear of the insurmountable difficulties against which Buddhism and Roman Catholic Christianity knocked and continued to knock ineffectually. Flesh is weak and a high resolve taken at a time of exaltation may prove much too severe later on. Under the scheme of life as planned by Roman Catholic Christianity a man or a woman renounces the world at a very early age or continues to lead a worldly life till old age. Traditional Hinduism has emphatically set its face against such an ordering and insists on a man gaining a good experience of the world as a householder before renouncing the worldly life.

But I am not sure that the view of traditional Hinduism is the same as that of the Shastras. No doubt, as Mr. Sadanand points out, there are several passages in the Smritis and the Itihasas speaking highly of Grihasta Dharma. But it is not safe to conclude from this that the Shastras consider Grihasta life as obligatory especially when it is remembered that the Smritis and Itihasas have a way of emphasising the particular aspect upon which they dwell at a particular place. The Shastraic viewpoint is ably considered in a judgment of the Madras High Court by Justice Sadasiva Iyer. I am not just now able to give the citation but I can give the conclusions arrived at by him. The question before the Court was whether marriage is a sacrament in case of men and whether consequently money spent on a younger brother's marriage is "necessary" expense binding on the other members of the coparcenary. Sir (then Mr.) T. Sadasiva Iyer examines the Shastras and answers the question in the negative. He maintains that the Shastras speak of married life as a lower state, as "Jhaghanya Ashrama." The higher path according to Shastras, he says, is the life of a "Naishtika Brahmachari" i. e. a life-long bachelor. He further contends that even in the case of women, marriage was originally not a necessary samskara as according to him women too had to undergo Upanayana. But he admits that in the case of women it is now too late to maintain that marriage is not a sacrament as undoubtedly nowadays marriage is regarded as standing in the place of Upanayana. But he has no doubt in saying that the ideal life according to the Shastras is that of life-long celibacy, for women as well as for men. I may, therefore, conclude that while traditional Hinduism, as understood by the average Hindu, undoubtedly regards married life as obligatory it is not safe to say that the Shastras take the same view.

In my view all the disquisition as to whether marriage is a sacrament or not is not of much practical value. The upper and the middle classes marry largely because of the force of tradition. To the larger mass of lower classes marriage has a value predominantly economic. A husband or a wife is a valuable economic asset to the agricultural labourer. Learned men do dabble in talk about "Samskara." But that talk has not prevented inhuman abuses. I know an instance of a widower holding the office of a Subordinate Judge marrying a child of 10 when he was over 53 years old "because the Agni must be kept up." I know more than one instance of men with a bewildering learning about Samskara remarrying on the 13th day of widowhood. In one case a member of the Bar, over 35 years old, lost his wife and was seen discussing the eligible brides for himself on his way back from the burning ghat after the cremation of his first wife. Even the haggling about varasulkam commenced then. This man also indulges in the talk that marriage is a sacrament. The innumerable cases of people pretending to hold marriage sacred but making lists of compulsory presents to the bridegroom weighing and testing the "presented" vessels etc. with all the nicety of a Bania, I need not pause to dwell on here. Nor is it necessary to refer to the well-known facts about the alleged original of the hero of the story entitled "Santamoorthi Esq. B.A., B. L, High Court Vakil" in Kusika's short stories (Second Series.) He too swears by the sacrament cant. While on the one hand the talk of "sacrament" has not guarded marriage against a host of abuses, it is responsible for what can only be described as the worst abuse—I mean compulsory widowhood. Children of 10 and 12 are condemned to lead a life of misery and positive humiliation, being considered 'bad omen' because they went through the Samskara of a doll's marriage with some male beings (even in cases where on the day of the Samskara the males were widowers of over 60 and nearer to the final Samskara) and then lost their husbands.

More than 15 years ago when I was a student, I shocked the bulk of my audience in a meeting at Madras when I said that I could see nothing religious in marriage, using the word religious in its stricter sense. Speaker after speaker followed me and spoke in terms of horror at my heterodoxy and flung at me text after text from our sacred books. The president of the meeting, the Rt. Hon. (then Mr.) V. S. Srinivasa Sastri, after listening to the whole debate, quietly summed it up saying that he was not convinced that my view was erroneous and that he too could see nothing religious in marriage. I repeat the statement now and I do not find any ground to revise the view I expressed then, making it clear once again that here I use the word 'religious' in its stricter sense. I am aware that I am in a bad minority and that a larger number of people do in some way or other believe that marriage is a religious "sacrament." But the fact remains that the mere consciousness that it is a sacrament is insufficient for practical purposes. As I stated above the peasants marry because marriage secures certain economic advantages. To them the "samskara" idea is more or less unintelligible though they have a vague notion that marriage is a quasi-religious act. Can any one assert that the abuses of the marriage institution are more prevalent among them than among the middle classes? On the other hand, is it not even possible that on the whole happy marriages are more common among peasants? I suggest that the "samskara" idea has not been of any help in raising aloft the ideal of purity in married life and in marriage itself. I suggest that all appeal to Shastras and Shastraic ideals which are no longer live ideals are waste of effort. The wiser plan is to emphasise the social and human aspects of marriage and endeavour to lift it to its proper level.

THE WAY TO FREEDOM.

(BY MR. S. SADANAND.)

Great interest attaches to the forthcoming meeting of the All India Congress Committee at Calcutta on the 20th November, to consider the report of the Civil Disobedience Inquiry Committee. Civil Disobedience has been long looked forward to as the ultimate weapon in the armoury of Mr. Gandhi's programme of Non-co-operation, that will wrest freedom for the country, from the willing or unwilling hands of British Imperialism. It emphasised the militant aspect of Non-co-operation. It represented the supreme act in the moral non-violent revolt of spiritual East against material West. Civil Disobedience and Non-co-operation became interchangeable terms. The seeker after Indian freedom sought in ultimate Mass Civil Disobedience, the panacea for all evils. The collection of a crore of rupees, the introduction of 20 lakhs of charkhas, the enlistment of lakhs of volunteers willing to suffer imprisonment, became the essential conditions of success. A fulfilment of them was expected to secure to the Nation the requisite strength to deliver the supreme blow which would bring down the bureaucratic citadel as even a house of cards.

To Mr. Gandhi formerly Civil Disobedience was not so all-important, as Truth and Non-violence. To him, the spiritual background underlying the movement was the only phase that mattered. The war-cry was only incidental and an essential part. But as it happens, in all great movements, the formulas were understood more than the deep Truth underlying them. The crore was collected. The twenty lakhs of charkhas were introduced. The challenge to Civil Disobedience in proclaiming Congress volunteers was taken up successfully and the jails were filled. The tragedy of Chanri Chaura showed that the essence of the movement has not been well understood. The onward march of the movement was brought to a standstill. Mr. Gandhi sacrificed all objective triumphs that were within his reach, for the vindication of Truth and Non-violence as the essential characteristics of his philosophy of action. Finally Mr. Gandhi's imprisonment followed. The Civil Disobedience Inquiry Committee was appointed at the first meeting of the All-India Congress Committee held after Mr. Gandhi's imprisonment. It started with the declared intention of surveying the conditions in the country and deciding if they permitted the inauguration of the aggressive part of the movement. After months of dilatoriness, unpardonable in the midst of a National crisis of the present magnitude, the Committee are reported to have advocated Council entry. It is tried to lay the unction to the soul by claiming that Congressmen are to enter the Councils, for purposes of Non-co-operation from within. It ought to be very pleasing to a Non-co-operator's vanity to think that he can be true to his leader's creed and still be within the Council Chamber. The Calcutta meeting of the All-India Congress Committee and the Gaya Congress will put to test the Nation's loyalty to Mr. Gandhi's principles. The question of Council entry is the pivot on which Non-co-operation hangs. The true essence of Non-co-operation, when denuded of its war-cries and objective shibboleths is the acquisition of the self-discipline, unity, and sacrifice necessary to make either a foreign or despotic rule impossible, the requisite strength to be attained by all means not inconsistent with Truth and Non-violence. A study of all movements for freedom will show that discipline, unity and sacrifice are the minimum indispensable conditions of success. The triumph of the Sinn-feiners and the Kemalists and the Fascisti, to take events within recent times, bear ample testimony to this. Only, Non-violence is not necessarily a concomitant of triumph. But the history of what has followed in Russia and Ireland, the triumph of organised force, even in righteous causes ought to warn us against the abandonment of the condition of Non-violence in any programme that may be planned for Indian freedom. There can, however, be no compromise on the indispensable conditions of discipline, unity and sacrifice. These conditions can never be fulfilled by any plan of action within the Councils. There is room for Indians in the Councils only if they accept either that the character of the British rule in India is really altruistic in spirit or that freedom can be won only as a free gift, in such instalments and on such terms as it may please the British Imperialists. Mr. Lloyd George has given us an idea of the pace and conditions of the gift of freedom Britain may make, in case of India's good behaviour. There is no illusion about the altruistic spirit of British rule. There ought to be no illusion about the latter part also. However, it is for each individual to choose and to answer according to his conscience. Let there be no confusion between Power and Freedom and what India wants. The country wants freedom first and foremost and cannot barter it for power, entrusted to a few Indian hands. Indian Ministerships and Governorships have their place in the scheme of Indian National life but only with Freedom, in its fullest sense and not as a substitute for it. Then there is another familiar cry, that the required discipline, unity and sacrifice coupled with Non-violence cannot be achieved in the immediate future. There is nothing that a Nation with a will cannot achieve. But even granting that it will take time, the choice will then be, between achieving freedom by discipline, unity and sacrifice, with violence or without it but not within the Councils as 'boons.' India may achieve freedom without Non-violence in short time or in some distant time with Non-violence.

MADRAS NOTES.

(From Our Correspondent.)

Madras, 4th November.

MADRAS SOCIAL SERVICE LEAGUE.

The Madras Social Service League celebrated its eighth anniversary on the 30th ultimo. It is the premier Society of the kind in this city, having been started by Mr. A. Ranganatham Naidu, a then member of the local branch of the Servants of India Society, in 1913 and has been steadily growing in members and usefulness ever since. The League which had long been a kind of appendage to the Madras branch of the Servants of India Society is at present quite an independent body. This is not wholly an advantage to the League in as much as it has thereby lost the services of enthusiastic whole-time workers such as Mr. A. Ranganatham Naidu and Mr. D. Hanumantha Rao who were its secretaries while they were of the order of the Servants of India. But its present Secretary, Rao Bahadur T. Varadarajulu Naidu, a retired Sessions Judge, makes up by his energy and his influence for what the League may have lost in enthusiasm and devotion as a result of the resignation of the two gentlemen above mentioned. So also Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Iyer, M.L.A., a retired High Court Judge of Madras, who has now been re-elected President of the League, (for the second time, I believe) is maintaining the tradition of active work handed down to him by his predecessor in that office, Mrs. Whitehead, wife of the well-known Dr. Whitehead, a former Anglican Bishop of Madras. I see that besides Mr. Seshagiri Iyer, Messrs Varadarajulu Naidu and D. Dandapani Iyer have also been re-elected Secretaries of the League. Re-elections of this kind, no doubt, are necessary and even advisable in the public interest at times, but there is always the danger that if they are persisted in year after year they tend to make of any League or Society (even for charitable purposes,) a sort of monopoly. It is not in a carping spirit that I say this but I am only giving expression to the fears entertained by the general public in this connection. So far, I am glad to be able to say, these fears have proved groundless. In Mr. Varadarajulu Naidu, especially, the League possesses a Secretary whose passion for Social Service particularly in respect of making elementary education free and compulsory in this city fully justifies his re-election. The finances of the League were never in a flourishing condition nor are they so now, judging from the annual Report presented at the anniversary meeting. Mr. Seshagiri Iyer stated in his speech that, so long as he was a High Court Judge, the League was receiving much assistance from the members of the legal profession but this assistance had automatically stopped after his retirement! The League has always been dependant on donation from public-spirited rich men but we all know a Society cannot successfully be for long maintained on such a slender and precarious financial basis. The Secretaries of the League will, therefore, do well if they devote the next year (or at least a great part of it) to the work of creating a permanent fund for the League such as the Bombay Social Service League, I believe, possesses, thanks to the exertions of its indefatigable Secretary, Mr. N. M. Joshi of the Bombay Branch of the Servants of India Society. Unless and until the League has such a fund of its own, its future will always remain uncertain. As a preliminary step they should labour to bring about a union and an amalgamation with their Society of similar small Leagues and Brotherhoods and Unions which are scattered in various parts of this city at present. Such a consolidation will prevent dissipation of energy and overlapping of work besides paving the way for the financial strengthening of the parent League. Some such attempt was, I think, made by Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Iyer in the early days of his presidentship and I do not know why it has not been persisted in. Of course, it is no easy thing to persuade similar bodies to amalgamate with the premier League, but if it is persevered in, it will of a certainty yield satisfactory results in the long run to some extent at least.

There is one danger ever lurking in all Social Service against which the Madras Social Service League will, it is to be hoped, guard itself always. Social Service should never be allowed by its members to take the place of Religion or to act as a handy substitute for the wider work of Social Reform in their lives. It has been pointed out by more than one observer of civic and social movements that very often social service is the last resort of the social reactionaries. By a species of patch-work charity it acts as a safety-valve for social discontent and delays the work of social reconstruction wherever and whenever it cannot effectively prevent its being carried out, thus illustrating the old maxim that small reforms are the enemies of great ones. I hope the Madras Social Service League will not harbour such reactionaries and enemies of Society in its midst in the guise of "social service." What is wanted in India more than in all other countries in the world is not mere social service but thorough-going Social Reconstruction. Root and branch Reform alone will save us as a social or national unit and not mere patch-work philanthropy. The Madras Social Service League and every other League of its kind in India will do well always to remember this vital truth.

THE RAMAKRISHNA HOME.

Their Excellencies Lord and Lady Willingdon visited the Madras Ramakrishna Vivekananda Mission Home in Mysore to which a High School for boys was attached on the 30th ultimo and expressed their delight in everything they saw there. His Excellency was good enough to say that it was the best Home of the kind he had ever come across either in India or in England. From very small beginnings it has grown to be one of the best public institutions in the whole Presidency owing to the devoted labour of a little band of Sanyasces who are members of the Ramakrishna Vivek-ananda Mission. It is gratifying to note that its present financial position is secure, although it requires more in the way of financial support if it is to achieve all that it can achieve for the good of the youths of our province. Their Home may be described as a blend of Dr. Tagore's Bolpur School, the Gurukul at Haridwar and a modern Anglo-Vernacular High School recognised by the Government and receiving grant-in-aid. Here a number of our young men (and it is a growing number) are given up-to-date education, are enjoying the benefits of a residential school, living in communion with nature and brought up in the good old tradition of Bramacharaya. May it ever grow in strength and usefulness!

BACHAMMAL WIDOWS HOME ASSOCIATION.

AN APPEAL FOR FUNDS.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

It is a known fact to many in Bangalore and elsewhere that the late Mrs. Bachammal Balasundaram Mudaliar had been for some years sheltering young widows in her house, giving them elementary education and arranging for their remarriage. Since her unfortunate and premature death in November 1921, her beneficent work has come to a stop, as there is none to take up and pursue it further. In order to fill up the gap left by her untimely death and provide for a much-needed institution for the relief of helpless widows in Southern India, in an organised manner, it has been proposed to open an association in Bangalore after her blessed name. The Memorandum and Articles of Association relating thereto have been drawn up and registered under Act XXI of 1860. According to these Rules, the objects of the Association shall be (1) to maintain a Home for sheltering, and promoting marriages of, young widows belonging to those castes that do not by custom allow remarriage of widows, (2) to create and maintain a class of Sisters of Charity and Mercy, (3) to afford shelter and protection to such widows who having remarried find themselves in helpless condition or destitution, and (4) to do generally all such things as are incidental or conducive to the attainment of the above objects or any one of them.

Separate action is being taken to collect the necessary money to form a "Permanent Fund" for the maintenance of the Association, by enlisting members who shall consist of four classes, viz., (1) Patrons who give a donation of Rs. 1,000/- in a lump or in four instalments, (2) Supporters who give a donation of Rs. 500/- in a lump or in five instalments, (3) Life Members who give a donation of Rs. 100/- in a lump or in ten instalments, and (4) Ordinary Members who pay a subscription of Rs. 12/- annually or in twelve instalments.

In the meantime, this appeal is issued for the collection of the necessary money to form a "Building Fund" as provided for in the Rules. It is needless to say that a building is very necessary in order to give a permanent habitation to the proposed Home and to relieve the current or recurring expenses from the heavy charge of a house rent. About Rs. 10,000/- will be required to purchase or construct a building to start with. In view of the usefulness of the proposed institution, the undersigned hope that a generous response will be made to this Appeal. The rules and regulations of the Association will be printed and issued shortly.

Mr. T. P. Neelakanta Mudaliar, Municipal Commissioner, Civil and Military Station, Bangalore, has consented to give a plot of land measuring 100 feet by 80 feet near Cox Town, worth about Rs. 1,500, for the construction of the proposed building.

The donations will be thankfully received and acknowledged by the Secretary, Mr. E. Subbukrishnaiya.

SACRAMENT OR SALE?

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

मनुः भार्या पुत्रश्च दासश्च मय एवा वनाः सृताः ।

From the above it is clear why Hindu Law, all over India excepting Bengal where Dayabhaga has been generous enough to interpret it somewhat in favour of women, has left her little right of the absolute use of property, if by good fortune or misfortune any falls to her share. How can property possess property and manage it too?

As a matter of course, the only thing left to her who is fortunately admitted to possess mind and intellect, is to learn from her girlhood, with the help of her natural charms, by submitting her will to that of her guardians and by several other devices, the art of winning their favour which is the source of all her happiness in this world as well as the next. Taking advantage of the same favour and knowing that gifts especially in the form of jewels are recognised as her absolute property, she tries to secure for herself as many jewels as she can. Thus she has learnt to love jewels not only as ornaments but for their use too. But whatever height of perfection her art might have reached, having been left in the dark long, she has not been able to see that the law is only man-made and hence it can either be interpreted in her favour as regards her rights of property or it can even be reformed to suit the times. With the advance of education, her craving for unnecessary jewels, both as ornaments or as property must disappear. But before that, her rights of property as daughter, as sister as wife and as mother will have to be secured.

A SISTER.

THE PANDHARPUR ORPHANAGE AND FOUNDLING ASYLUM.The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The Pandharpur Orphanage and Foundling Asylum are two old institutions, well known to the public. They were started as far back as 1877, the year when a famine of unprecedented severity devastated Maharashtra. Since then, these institutions have been quietly doing the work of saving the lives of foundlings and orphans of whom hundreds have been brought up and settled in life. The present number of inmates for whose feeding and upbringing the institutions are responsible is 75 infants under one year and 45 over that age. For a number of years the foundlings were fed on fresh cow's milk. The experiment of feeding them direct from the goat was also tried. But both these methods, inspite of the best care taken, did not prove quite satisfactory. For the last two years, the infants are being brought up entirely on a patent food and this has yielded excellent results. This, however, is much more costly than cow's milk and the institutions have to spend rupees 400 per month on it alone. The Orphanage and Asylum are both dependent on public charity for their maintenance and the charitable public of Bombay have nobly supported them so long. The needs of the institutions are growing and funds are urgently needed now. The Committee of the Orphanage and the Asylum most humbly appeals to the public of Bombay to assist them. The institutions also require warm and cotton clothing for the inmates. The Committee appeals for that also. Help in kind such as cloth, grain, ghee and money, however small, will be most gratefully accepted and acknowledged by the undersigned. The need of the institutions is acute and urgent and this appeal, it is hoped, will be promptly and liberally responded to. Help should be sent and communications addressed to the undersigned C/o The Prarthana Samaj, Girgaum, Bombay.

D. G. VAIDYA,
Hon. Treasurer,
Orphanage and Foundling Asylum,
Pandharpur.

THE INDIAN STATES BILL.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

As a State Subject, allow me to express my feelings of gratitude to you and to others who have out of humanity championed our cause. From the population point of view, the problem of Indian States subjects is as important as the question of the removal of untouchability. It affects nearly seventy millions of souls. The lot of a State subject is exactly the lot of a girl in the higher class Hindu Society. If she gets a sensible and kind husband, it is all well and good, but if otherwise, there is no power on earth to whom she can appeal. She has no freedom to give out a word of sorrow to her neighbours. In her agony of grief there comes that tom tom of irreligious religion to sting her. It says "you suffer for the sins of the past life!" In our helpless condition here comes the Bill to gag and smother us. The British Government who have in their own territory started a kind of responsible government, seem to be out to gag us instead of giving a solid advice to these princes to follow their example. This reminds me of those Hindu leaders who, though at home educate their girls, come out in public to oppose a resolution on Female Education.

The administration in many States is half the imitation of the British, and half of our old ancient rule. Let our princes follow the old way of their ancestors, who were certainly kind to us and respected public opinion which can be clearly seen in the case of Rama. Let them follow either the old rule of Rama Rajya or the whole constitution of the British Rajya.

In the great war, the princes helped the British with money and men, because the subjects were ever willing to do so. But after the war the subjects in British India get a kind of Responsible Government and we get this Bill! I am inclined to say 'we cry for bread but they give us stones'.

Yours etc,

A STATE SUBJECT.

THE ADI DRAVIDA SCHOOLS, BANGALORE.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The Young Men's Brotherhood of Bangalore which is a registered Association, with its offices at "Brahmo Mandir," 7, Gangathara Chetty Road, has taken over the management of the Adi Dravida Schools in Bangalore.

These schools, till now known as D. C. M. Schools, were originally started by Mr. K. N. Dewal, a member of the Brahma Samaj, and were subsequently taken over by the Depressed Classes Mission Society of India. The Mission had to cease work in Bangalore on account of paucity of funds and workers. For a few months, Mr. G. Virupaksha of the Mysore Hindu Depressed Classes Mission undertook the responsibility and has had to give it up for the same reason. The Young Men's Brotherhood, consisting as it does, of men living mostly in the locality and interested in the uplift of the community, have considered it their duty to undertake the management of these schools in the firm belief that the public of Bangalore would contribute generously and liberally for the support of the schools.

There are at present two day-schools and four night-schools with a total strength of about 300 pupils. The annual expenditure on the schools, excluding grants from Government, amounts to about Rs. 1,000. As funds permit, it is proposed to start more schools for the Adi Dravida community. The educational uplift of the Adi Dravidas being a matter of great importance, the Brotherhood is issuing this appeal with the full confidence that it would meet with a hearty response from the public of Bangalore. Donations and monthly subscriptions for these Schools will be thankfully received and acknowledged by the Treasurer Mr. M. Kothandaram or the Secretary, Mr. E. Subbukrishnaia.

THE COMPULSORY EDUCATION BILL.

THE EDITOR, The Indian Social Reformer.

SIR,

The compulsory education bill, if successfully piloted through the Legislative Council, will earn for its author the Honourable Mr. Paranjpye, the everlasting gratitude of the people of this presidency. Such a bill was sorely needed for the uplift and the amelioration of the condition of the ignorant masses of this presidency.

It would have, however, been much better had the present bill been merely confined to the question of the introduction of compulsory education in the presidency. But the bill also proposes to bring about some changes in the existing machinery of the administration of primary schools. The proposed changes in the machinery of administration, though necessary, were by no means so imperative, and they could have been made to wait for some time. The present bill ought to have asked the present administrative agencies to introduce compulsory education. The change in the administrative machinery could have been brought about only after the scheme of compulsory education had worked for some time under the guidance and supervision of the existing machinery. The effort to bring about both the reforms simultaneously will have the only effect of delaying the introduction of compulsory education for some time. The new machinery will take some time to be familiar with and fully grasp the details of administration. It is only after they have fully settled down that they can devote their attention to the question of introducing compulsory education. Moreover, the present administration of primary education, at least on this side of the Presidency, is by no means, in too efficient a condition. Complaints from teachers from various places, that they do not get their pay according to the prescribed scales and from some places that they do not get any pay at all for months and months together, are daily pouring in. At certain places there are even occasional strikes. It is but natural that under such an unsatisfactory state of affairs, supervision over schools must be very slack and the efficiency of schools must suffer to a very great extent. It is not fair to transfer the administration of primary schools to new and inexperienced agencies at the time of such crisis. Again the Non-co-operation movement has greatly upset and disorganized Primary Schools in three of the most important major Municipalities of Gujarat. An unhealthy and undignified rivalry for pupils is going on in these towns between the Municipal and National Schools. So long as Schools are conducted merely with a view to advertise success for a particular party propaganda and the number of pupils is the only thing cared for, education is bound to suffer and no far-reaching educational reform has any chances of success. It is, therefore, mainly in the interest of education, that I take this opportunity of appealing to the Director of Public Instruction and the Honourable the Minister of Education to make earnest efforts to bring about an honourable reconciliation with the organizers of National Schools in these towns. I think such a reconciliation can easily be brought about if the National Schools be amalgamated with the Schools under the educational boards to be created newly and the teachers in the National Schools be taken up in the service of the new boards. Such an act of conciliation will be a graceful commencement of a new regime. Far from lowering the prestige of the Government, such an act of grace will highly enhance their reputation. I also appeal to the organizers of National Schools that they should join hands with the newly-created educational boards and whole-heartedly co-operate with them to bring about the expansion of mass education in our country. I am not one of those who are enamoured with state-aided and state-controlled education. I would welcome any new experiments in education. But I firmly believe that primary education is such a huge problem that in a vast and varied country like India it is impossible to solve it without substantial financial assistance from the State. There is ample scope for all sorts of new experiments without state-aid and state-control in the spheres of secondary and higher education; why not then leave the question of Primary education in the hands of those agencies who have no objection to conduct Primary Schools with state-aid?

Yours faithfully

One interested in Education.

SALVATION ARMY TESTIMONY.

(New York Times)

Evangeline Booth, Commander of the Salvation Army in the United States, in a statement issued yesterday declared that since the enactment of the Volstead Act, drunkenness among the poor has almost entirely disappeared. The announcement, she said, was based on facts reported by secretaries of the Salvation Army in all parts of the country to whom she sent a questionnaire regarding their observations in Salvation Army headquarters, shelters and hotels.

"Our social-secretaries replied that cases of drunkenness are now the exception among men who frequent our hostels, shelters and industrial homes", the announcement said. "More than two-million beds were supplied by the Salvation Army last year, and it is on these two million cases that our secretaries base their answers. In one hostelry it was reported that 120 men who have never been known to keep a dollar more than twenty-four hours now have banking accounts of considerable size. In another hotel twenty-five men of the sort who before prohibition could not keep a dime now have deposits ranging from $100 to $500. These are unusually bright instances, but everywhere the workers of the Salvation Army have found a marked increase in thrift and prosperity and a decrease in drunkenness. In refutation of the charge that drunkenness has increased since prohibition, Commander Booth cites the fact that the Salvation Army's annual 'Boozers' Day,' when drunken men and women were collected from the streets, fed, clothed and prayed with, has been abandoned and the day given over to entertaining the new boys and poor youngsters of the city. Because prohibition has cleared our park benches of drunkards, we are able to entertain 5,000 boys under 14 years old in New York City on this day, these boys being benefited because one of the greatest curses of humanity has been placed beyond the reach of men and women."

THIS YAKUTI or life giving nectar has been prepared from the best, choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has wonderful properties of increasing virile power and it rectifies urinary disorders. In fact it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to these persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicine. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replenishes lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires. It is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. NOTES.

The Vedanta and Christianity: In the issue of October 15, writing on the question of a conscience clause in the educational grant-in-aid codes, we incidentally quoted Professor Deussen's observation that the Gospel precept regarding love of neighbours, was explained by the Vedantic doctrine of the unity of Being. In a contributed article in the Dnyanodaya of the 9th November, this is treated in a spirit of controversy on the ground that "in the minds of some of our partially educated Christian people we have come across this tendency to confuse the thought of the Vedanta with that of the solidarity of the human race in Jesus Christ." We do not wish to enter into a theological dispute, and we do not question the claim of the writer that Professor Deussen could have found the reason for the love of neighbour in Kant and in the Bible itself. But there are two points which call for remark. The writer in the Dnyanodaya suggests that Professor Deussen was lacking in experience of living India when he said that the Vedantic text inculcated the love of neighbours. Venturing into deeper waters, he says that he sees no incentive to morality in the formula sat tvam asi. As for the first, we would like to ask if the experience of living Europe impresses any one today with the neighbourly love of Christian peoples? And yet would any one be justified in doubting that Christ's teaching does inculcate love of neighbours? As for the second point, Professor Deussen in the lecture from which we quoted expressly gave his reasons for holding very strongly that the Vedanta is the strongest incentive to morality. "People have often reproached the Vedanta," he said, "with being defective in morals, and, indeed, the Indian genius is too contemplative to speak much of deeds; but the fact is, nevertheless, that the highest and purest morality is the immediate consequence of the Vedanta." And his parting exhortation was: "And so the Vedanta, in its pure and unfalsified form, is the strongest support of pure morality, is the greatest consolation in the sufferings of life and death—Indians, keep to it!" Morality is incidental to all true religion—it follows it as the night the day. But religion does not end with morality, or it will be no more than a sort of moral police, a glorified Penal Code. The end of religion is Truth in all its fulness. The doctrine of the identity of the Brahman, the Cosmic Soul, with the Atman, the individual Soul, is admitted to be the mightiest achievement of human thought, and it is the central doctrine of the Vedanta, whether of Shankara or Ramanuja. We are glad that Indian Christians are coming to see that they can be true to Christ without turning their backs on their own great national heritage. The article which we print to-day from Mr. T. Rathnam, headed "The Eternal Quest," shows how the Indian Christian mind is working out the synthesis.

The Turkish Sultan and Angora Nationalists: The telegrams which convey the impression that there is acute antagonism between the Sultan of Turkey and the Angora Nationalists must be taken with more than a grain of salt. The current number of Asia, "the American magazine on the Orient," commences a series of articles headed "How the Turks feel," to which General Townshend and other European and American experts are announced to contribute. The first article is by Mufty-Zade Zia, son of Reshid Pasha, the Turkish Ambassador in London, and nephew of a former Turkish Ambassador in Washington. He has other near relatives occupying high official positions in the Angora Government. He is thus in a position to know both sides of the Turkish question, and the impression left on reading his article is that there is a perfect understanding between Constantinople and Angora. The Government of Turkey, he says, endorses the National Pact as well as the Government of Angora. The Turkish Crown Prince, Medjid Effendi, despite his delicate position as heir to the throne of the Sultan, openly sided with the Nationalists by declaring that "the Treaty of Sevres is as fragile as the porcelain of the same city." Zia Bey speaks of the position of the Sultan at Constantinople as being dictated by a high sense of duty to the Turkish nation. "If he had left his capital," he writes, "this act would have entailed on new Turkey the added burden of reconquering Constantinople as well as Smyrna and Adrianople." He cites the case of the Sultan as illustrating how, under certain circumstances, it takes greater strength of character to hold a position than to give it up. He writes:

The strain imposed on him (the Sultan) has literally bent him. Week after week, I have seen him, pensive and stooped, prematurely grey and aged, attending the regular Friday prayers in the small Mosque of Yildiz. By his mere presence, he holds Constantinople for Turkey.

His Majesty, it should be explained, moved his abode to the hills of Yildiz to avoid the affront of a Greek warship which was permitted by the Allied authorities to come close to the windows of the Imperial Palace of Dolma Baghcheh. The message that the Sultan attended the usual Friday prayers in an open carriage last week shows that he has returned to the Imperial Palace, thus showing his revived confidence in the new order of things. Zia Bey states that Italy has already given up entirely her imperialistic dreams in the Near East, and is on most friendly terms with Turkey—this was written before the Fascisti revolution—and that the Turko-French entente, concluded by M. Franklin Bouillon, is based on community of interests and has, in addition, a sentimental basis—its historic roots. He earnestly pleads for an understanding with Great Britain.

Reform Apologists: The Servant of India remarks with reference to certain tests that we suggested to determine the result of the Montagu reforms: "These questions should be addressed to the supporters of Non-Co-operation, not to those of the reforms. Self-government is not synonymous with either good or economical government. It could be either or both but everything depends upon the people themselves." Which is the party in power? Non-co-operators or supporters of the reforms? We venture to suggest to our contemporary that a party which holds and enjoys offices and power has to justify its tenure by proving that it possesses administrative capacity and public confidence in a larger measure than others. No one heard of a Liberal government laying the blame of its failure on Conservatives or a Conservative one on the Liberals. The Servant of India's plea comes simply to this: if all parties will help, the party in power will have no objection to be credited with the results! Even the bureaucracy can justify itself on this easy ground. Another Liberal apologist, the Leader of Allahabad, observes: "Let the Reformer calmly and impartially consider how a political situation such as that which has existed in India during the last three years, would have been handled by the unreformed Governments. Let it compare the conduct of martial law in the Punjab in 1919 and in Malabar in 1921 and 1922. If the Reforms have not been to India all that they could have been a portion of the blame must go to those who refused to co-operate in their working and tried to destroy them." The unreformed Government could not have handled worse the situation during the last three years. In the worst days of the Partition Agitation when bombs and bullets were much in evidence, there was not a tenth as many persons cast into jail as during a period when, even Mr. Rushbrook Williams admits (India in 1921-22, page 272.) anarchical crime had practically ceased, the violence party of the Partition days, having been largely captured by the idealism of Mr. Gandhi's movement. We do not yet know enough of the operation of the Martial law in Malabar to institute a comparison of it with the Punjab episode in 1919. There are those who maintain that it was not in any way an improvement, though the Leader may not agree that the Mopla waggon tragedy was in its way quite as good an exhibition of callousness as Jallia-wala. The Madras Ministers will not thank our contemporary for ascribing to them by implication a leading share of responsibility for the martial law Administration in Malabar.

Bombay and its Suburbs: For nearly thirty years now, since the outbreak of plague, persistent efforts have been made to induce people to settle down in the suburbs to relieve the congestion in Bombay City. The policy of Government, in fact, had been to regard the growth of suburbs along both the railways as the natural line of Bombay development. For this purpose cheap and quick railway communication is, of course, essential, and it is admitted that for forty years there has been no increase in the cost of the season tickets issued for suburban traffic, though the through traffic fares have been repeatedly raised. Now, however, Government, against the opinion of a very large section of the public, have resolved that the development of Bombay should be mainly through reclamation from the sea, and crores of rupees are being spent upon the project. The policy of suburban development has become a side-issue. Perhaps as a reflex of this change of policy, within the last few weeks, it was announced that the price of season tickets will be raised by 25 per cent. Coming on the top of high prices and hard money, the announcement has created, as the Railway Company admits, much natural dissatisfaction, and meetings are being held to protest against the increase. One argument advanced is that the development of the suburbs has all along been a part of Bombay development, and that the action of the Railway Companies is calculated to cut across that policy. It has been suggested, therefore, that the Development Department should, in the last resort, take over the suburban traffic in its hands, crediting the gain or loss thereon to the Development scheme. We are surprised to see the Times of India's comment upon this suggestion. There is no objection to its calling it a plea for "subsidising" the suburban pass-holders. What is the Development Department doing except to subsidise various agencies in the hope that it will be ultimately repaid, if not in money, in the improved health and sanitation of the city? As for two Companies running trains over the same lines, there are not wanting cases of this being done without inconvenience, especially in the vicinity of great cities. Moreover, in the G. I. P. the suburban traffic is already carried on separate lines, and in the B. B. C. I. also this is being done to some extent on the section that has been quadrupled. As for the repayment of the capital and interest on the sums that the Development department may have to invest, there is at least as much chance of their being recouped by the extension of the suburbs as by the conversion of the sea into land.

The Marriage Problem in Gujarat: The Praja Bandhu of Ahmedabad states that several castes in Gujarat are suffering from a terrible paucity of brides. "During every marriage season," writes our contemporary, "harrowing tales of sales and exchange of brides are brought to light, and yet no remedy is found to check the evil which is growing with alarming rapidity." The Praja Bandhu calls attention to the conclusions arrived at by Mr. Fresckow after making some investigations during the War, as offering a solution for the problem. "Lowered vitality on the part of the mother," says the Professor, "has a tendency to increase the number of male births." This is no new discovery. The phenomenon was noted during the siege of Paris by the Germans in 1871. It is seen in every famine year. "If we examine the statistical figures which some of the castes have made," continues the Praja Bandhu, "we shall find the truth of this theory. In the castes which complain of paucity of brides there is a slight excess of male over female births as well as a heavy mortality of young mothers. Early marriages, insanitary surroundings, domestic discord and several other health-destroying factors lower the vitality of our females which increases their deaths and decreases their births. This produces that paucity of brides of which everybody complains but nobody finds remedies. But now the remedy is clear. We must increase the vitality of our women by providing for them means of recreation and rejuvenation. The city-life has proved a veritable death-trap for them. We must improve if not destroy it if we want to avert the racial extinction that threatens us." All this is very good, but a simpler remedy is at hand. There are parts of India where the bridegroom problem is as acute as that of brides in Gujarat. Intermarriage offers an immediate solution. What stands in the way but caste and custom?

GREATER INDIA.*

In the Commemorative volume published by the London University Press on the sixcentenary last year of Dante, there is an essay entitled "the Italy of Dante and the Italy of Virgil," by Mr. J. W. Mackay, which is of profound interest to Indian readers. Geographically, India like Italy is one of the most striking instances of a country with natural boundaries. They both lie, to use Mr. Mackay's description, with but one gap, within a ring-fence of sea and mountain wall. That gap, in the case of Italy, is the open gateway on the North-eastern frontier through which from time immemorial the peninsula has again and again been invaded and repopulated. These words apply equally to India, with the single difference that the open gateway in our case is on the North-Western frontier. The analogy does not end here. Notwithstanding her distinctive geographical unity, Italy was not a single nation or a single state until the unification of the last century.

"Italy, throughout history," writes Mr. Mackay, "has been the seat of kingdoms, republics, principalities, confederacies, which were all local and partial, and generally in acute conflict, racial and cultural, as well as political, among one another. When it approached unity most nearly, it was not as a self-developed and independent state but as a portion or province of a larger empire."

The dawn of history finds Italy divided between four large ethnically distinct groups, besides many smaller ones among whom there was no trace and no sense of unity. In Dante's time, that is the 14th century, there were fourteen distinct regional dialects, while the local sub-dialects ran to not less than a thousand. Italy as one country and one nation was the dream, first, of Virgil and then of Dante. And that dream came to fruition after many vicissitudes many centuries after the dreamers who in their poems laid the firm foundations of that unity. Mr. Mackay observes that the immense power of words over human affairs is nowhere shown more remarkably than in the influence exercised on later history by their great and glorious poetry.

India, too, has had her dreamers who dreamed to good purpose of her fundamental unity. Following her special line of evolution, this unity was first worked out in the sphere of religion and philosophy. In a little book entitled "the Fundamental Unity of India," Mr. Mokerji, whose historical researches have helped so much the Indian renaissance, has shown how the different places of pilgrimage seem designed to impress this great fact of Indian unity on the minds of the people. Buddhism from the North brought on the revival of Hinduism from the South. Political evolution also tended steadily to enlarge the sphere of unity. The Mahomedan and Moghul empires but carried forward this ancient impulse which in the British Empire reached its fullest consummation. On the first shock of Mahomedan conquest, the movement towards political unity was severed from the movement towards cultural unity. As Mahomedan rule tended to become national the gap was in the way of being closed. British rule re-opened it, and owing to the fact that British rule has persisted so long in remaining foreign, while at the same time reaching out deeper into the national life than the previous Governments, the task of bringing up cultural unity to the level of the present political unity has become unprecedentedly complex. The mere politician with his limited vision cannot help us much. The poet with a large vision alone can show us the way to the goal. We have before us a little volume of four essays written by Rabindranath Tagore in connexion with the Swadeshi movement in Bengal during the years 1905 to 1910. Since then the Poet has written much on national problems, but in these four essays are enunciated with all the force of his simple directness the essential aims which the national movement should keep in view. In the very first essay, entitled "Our Swadeshi Samaj," he strikes the key-note of his Indian ideal. He writes:

The realisation of unity in diversity, the establishment of a synthesis amidst variety—that is the inherent, the Sanatan dharma of India. India does not admit difference to be conflict, nor does she spy an enemy in every stranger. So she repels none, destroys none, she abjures no methods, recognises the greatness of ideals, and she seeks to bring them all into one grand harmony.

The Poet shows how, under the most unpromising conditions, the genius of India for synthesis never deserted her. These reactions have even now not ceased to work. The Poet remarks on the fact of all the great religions being together in India as evidence that she is destined to be the home of a supreme religious synthesis. That is also our belief. The Poet puts Christianity as the last to come to India. As a fact, it was one of the first. Syrian Christianity in Malabar came earlier than any other great non-Indian religion excepting perhaps the Hebrew.

The leading idea of the second essay, "The Way to get it done," is that the motive of foreign rule—in our case, British rule—has little abiding effect on its actual consequences to the people ruled. "In a disunited country", the Poet says, "foreign domination is a unifying agency. This process of unification will go on even though England does not like it." Nay, the more it is opposed, the greater will be its momentum. "May I make a personal confession?" writes the Poet. "I do not worry myself over much about what the Government does, or does not, do for us. I count it silly to be a-tremble every time there is a rumbling in the clouds." Lest our Non-Co-operationist friends understand this to support them, we hasten to quote another sentence from the essay. "Let no one think," writes the Poet, "that I am advocating a policy of sullen aloofness. That would be another form of sulking, which may have its place in a lover's quarrel, but not here." When we said something to a like effect the other day by way of showing that the Non-Co-operators were really co-operating with Government more than many avowed Co-operators, a contemporary sneered at the remark as being too profound for it. The Poet's words may explain it to our contemporary: "We must not", he writes, "found our political work on dislike of, or dependence upon, others. This dislike and dependence may seem to be opposite states of mind, but they are really two branches of the same tree of impotence—" This was written more than fifteen years ago. The last essay, to our mind, is the most important. In it the Poet impresses upon us the fact that India does not belong to any caste or creed, but to all who have made their homes here. He writes:

In the evolving History of India, the principle at work is not the ultimate glorification of the Hindu or any other race. In India, the history of humanity is seeking to elaborate a specific ideal to give to general perfection a special form which shall be for the gain of all humanity; nothing less than this is its end and aim. And in the creation of this ideal type, if Hindu, Moslem or Christian should have to submerge the aggressive part of their individuality, that may hurt their sectarian pride, but will not be accounted a loss by the standard of Truth and Right.

The Poet's ideal is the same as that of Raja Ram Mohan Roy who, he says, "did not assist India to repair her barriers, or to keep cowering behind them,—he led her out into the freedom of Space and Time, and built for her a bridge between the East and the West."

THE ETERNAL QUEST.

(BY MR. T. RATHNAM.)

Man's belief in God is as old as humanity but his quest of truth is comparatively of recent evolution. The idea of God and the truth about God, although correlated, are two distinct concepts. Every man instinctively believes in the existence of a Creator but that belief alone has not been sufficient to gratify the craving of the soul. It is the truth about God, His creation and the ultimate goal of humanity that the human soul is in quest of. There is a spiritual kinship between what is human and what is divine and it is this kinship that agitates the soul to raise it to a higher plane of divinity. It is in the endeavour of the soul to rise to that plane of divinity that religions came into existence and that indeed is a natural evolution. Great souls in the history of man endeavoured to express themselves intelligibly to those around them but the generality of human beings, being incapable of comprehending matters spiritual, fell victims to superstitions, and by imitation lost the original. All religions, therefore, are superstructures built on the strata of superstitions, and even Christianity is not an exception to this rule. Although many of us profess to know all about the ultimate goal of the soul, yet when it comes to be stated, what definite conception of the life beyond death have we, except give out unverified scriptural quotations couched in borrowed phraseology? The fact is, the truth is as far away from the average man as it ever was.

Judaism, Christianity and Islam as religious systems have dispensed with the quest of the eternal truth as unnecessary in the erroneous belief that God had finally revealed Himself to man through their respective founders and there is nothing more to go in quest of. In Christianity, owing to the primitive idea of God of the people nineteen centuries ago, the revelation of truth has been miscomprehended resulting in superstitious belief obtaining the so-called first truths on which Christian theology is built up much in detriment to the independent thought of the individual man. At the risk of incurring the displeasure of the learned churchmen, it must be stated, in the interests of the religion of Christ, that the western clergy are labouring under an impressed psychology having been predestined to conform to the religion they are born into. Religion was forced into them when they neither needed it nor were capable of understanding it. This infusion of religion goes on from childhood to manhood, through school and college and they naturally never at any time suspected either their parents or their teachers as to the genuineness of the religion that was being forced into them. Then, a few years of theological course argues out some seeming doubts, although, probably, such doubts had never occurred to the students, and reasons out the religion for them in which the students receive the wooden cross without the crucifix-sacrifices. With this blank wooden cross, the clergymen go out, not to learn of Christ, but to teach, nothing of their own knowledge and experience of Christ, but something of their parents, their teachers and book-makers—the theological Christianity—a compromise between things earthly and things Godly.

But in India, amidst a maze of grossest superstitions, diverse religious beliefs and idolatry, the quest is alive as it ever was, for the religions in this country are not confined to a code of ethics to bind men in the harmonies of social and domestic intercourse only, but on philosophy, however speculative, and metaphysics, which obtain the freedom of the individual soul to discover for itself the eternal truth. To theological minds, this soaring of the soul in the higher realms of God-idea appears as a chaotic state of the mind, but a deeper study of it would reveal that it is fundamentally the Christ-idea in all its essential bearings. If training is essential for proficiency in all natural sciences, both physical and mental, the development of spiritual capacity is also dependent on training peculiar to the soul. The academic and theological training develops only the intellectual capacity of man and even that only to a certain extent, which while enlightening the soul, does not affect the soul-capacity. The body or the physical power and the soul or the spiritual power in the average man are more or less balanced; and one power is naturally developed at the expense of the other. If man consciously refuses to indulge in the physical cravings of nature and represses the animal in him, the body suffers while the soul gains. But if he represses the dictates of his conscience and indulges in the animal cravings, the soul suffers while the body gains. The soul is a distinct entity from the body, and attains its individuality when completely detached from the body, and while encased in its individuality is proportionate to the assistance it offers to the cravings natural to the body. On this is based the celibacy and asceticism which are indispensable in the cultivation and development of the soul-capacity and Jesus Christ Himself passed through these essentials expounding the science to His disciples in quite an explicit and literal manner.

A careful study of the Gospels would convince us that Christ has revealed nothing except the way to the realization of the eternal truth. "The Kingdom of God cometh not with observation", He said, "for behold, the Kingdom of God is within you." It is to the soul that Christ here refers; self-realization is therefore essential for the realization of the truth involving quickening of the soul, for, "It is the spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing." Again, He has not revealed God, but only revealed the spiritual capacity requisite for obtaining that revelation. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." The purification of the heart again involves the development of the soul-capacity, to realize the "kingdom" within. The doctrine that Christ propounded to His disciples is that which when practised will purify the soul, develop its capacity and elevate it to the plane where humanity meets divinity. "If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed, and ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free." One has to continue in His word to know the truth. "I am the door"; at the entrance of this door is also the cross; "take up my cross and follow me" and, "take my yoke upon you and learn of me." Accordingly, learning is under his yoke for the discovery of the eternal truth. "I am the way, the truth and the life, and no man cometh unto the Father but by me." He is the way; His followers must go by that strait way through which He Himself had passed; He is the truth, for in that way He is, and where He is, there is Life also. "My doctrine is not mine," said Jesus, "but His that sent me; If any man do His will, he shall know the doctrine." This statement made 2,000 years ago remains to this day, unchallenged, unbelieved and unverified. All this teaching of Jesus should be enough to convince us beyond all doubt that the realization of the truth involves the course of training through which Christ Himself had passed. He set us an example in terms: "He that wishes to train up his child in the way it should walk, must walk in the way he would train up his child." Without such a training no man can pretend to know either the mysteries of the Gospel or the mysteries of the soul or the mysteries of the doctrine of Christ or the will of the Father.

THE DOWRY QUESTION FROM A WOMAN'S POINT OF VIEW.

(By A HINDU LADY.)

In accordance with our joint family system, a bridegroom being under the protection of his father or older male relations, has no voice in the question of dowry. And according to Hindu law the father of a bride is under an obligation to get his daughter married. Hence whatever is given by her affectionate father is only a present in the form of dowry to the bridegroom's family perhaps for their life long care of her and kind treatment to be meted out to her.

But our society having lost its sense of dignity on account of costly education, growing economic strain, the rigidity of castes and their splitting up into several subcastes, the preponderance of the number of women over men in certain communities, and the complications of horoscopes, the bridegroom's father goes to the length of demanding dowry from a needy bride's father, some times not only to cover the cost of University education in India, but also in foreign countries or even to cover the cost of marriage expenses of a bridegroom's sister. The bride's father too lowering himself to the same level as the bridegroom's father, does not hesitate in his turn to demand jewels equal in value to the amount of dowry, God only knowing whether the bride gets possession of the jewels under adverse circumstances. Thus the bride's father fearing social as well as religious ostracism succeeds in unburdening himself of his economic responsibility with the help of money and throwing it upon the bridegroom or his party. To speak plainly he purchases a bridegroom from the marriage market and the bridegroom quietly allows himself to be sold.

Now if a middle class bride's father has to bear the expenses of his grown-up daughter's education to suit the times as well as his position, and if the question of dowry is left to be settled, as is suggested by some, between the father and his daughter, naturally he will shirk bestowing the same amount of dowry upon his daughter and his sons will thank him for saving that amount for themselves. The daughter too out of modesty as well as being conscious of the fact that whatever is done for her is only a favour, will not dare to claim much. This dowry question will perhaps settle itself when her rights of property as daughter, sister, wife and as mother are recognized by law. But till then a fair amount of dowry fixed by both parties, without endangering mutual kindly relations, may be allowed to be settled upon the bride in addition to the jewels given her as stridhan instead of allowing it to be added to the common property of the bridegroom's party or spent over the joint family.

Now as regards educated, young, enthusiastic students, whether rich or poor, it will really be highly creditable on their part if, rising to their sense of dignity, they take vows of not accepting dowries, whenever it is left to them to decide, and thus to put a stop to the bartering that goes on freely every year in marriage markets.

But when the question is not left to them entirely, they may take vows to use their influence with their affectionate parents either not to demand dowry or if it is demanded or offered, to get it settled on their brides in addition to their jewels as their absolute property. And if they fail in this they should take vows, making it their first duty, when they get settled in life to bestow the same amount upon their brides. Nay, they may even go so far, if their means allow them, as to return the demanded dowry, as has been done in one instance.

Since according to our old custom गृहस्थाश्रम can follow only after ब्रह्मचर्य that is, the period of education, every parent is in duty bound to educate his or her children. It is unjust on the part of a bridegroom or his parents, to burden the bride's parents with the cost of education, or make money out of the disadvantageous position of the bride and her parents. The best jewel that a bride can get for herself is a husband who is fully alive to the sacredness of the marriage tie and the responsibilities of a married life. The best dowry that a bridegroom can get is a bride who in her turn is alive to the same sacredness of her union with her husband and the responsibilities of married life and not a helpless creature falling a prey to adverse circumstances.

In Southern India things seem to be getting still worse although there is not so much talk of dowry. Often times the sense of dignity of the middle class and poor parents is deadened to the extent of allowing a bridegroom to go somewhat under the control of his bride's parents after marriage, the bride's parents offering to bear the cost of his further education. The bridegroom proudly accepts this condition. Thus, instead of demanding dowry after education, such men demand education itself after marriage. Under such circumstances the bride's party succeeds in keeping both the bride and the bridegroom under their own control. While in the Deccan it is the bridegroom's party that keeps both under their control after marriage.

But if bridegrooms (or their parents) in easy circumstances do not lay claim to huge dowries at the time of marriage, or are not required to accept the control of bride's parents for their education, they can make exorbitant demands at the time of the consummation ceremony before which a bride does not go legally to her husband's roof. Readers can only imagine in what an awkward position a bride's parents are placed if they ever think of not fulfilling the unjust demands of the other party. To be plain, a bridegroom can drive a bride's parent to a corner by threatening to go in for a second marriage, while a betrothed bride will have to occupy a position more pitiable than that of a widow.

But are not women, the inspirers and shapers of manhood above domestic animals or inanimate objects of comfort, the market value of which can go on fluctuating and in the barter of even which—higgling and gigling is looked down upon? How can matrimonial happiness be secured or hearts be united when the union is based upon hard cash payments? How can cash unite hearts where we are conscious of the fact that the same medium has got power of separating hearts and bringing about discord in families?

THE BENARES HINDU UNIVERSITY.

[By MR. RAMAGYAN DWIVEDI, B.A., (HONS.)]

It was early in July last that I gave the readers of the Reformer a brief account of the activities at the Hindu University of Benares. It was satisfying to note that the Editor wanted for publication in his columns, a fuller account of the Engineering College of the University, for it bespoke a general interest of our countrymen in the welfare of the great institution and the good repute for efficient work that it has already acquired. But before entering into details of the College of Engineering, it is desirable to give a short sketch of the Science College and its establishment.

Besides over several hundred students taking up Science courses for their undergraduate careers, the majority of the Post-graduate students in the C. H. College—about 60 in all—belong to the Science side; post-graduate study is carried on in over half a dozen different scientific subjects. There are about a dozen research scholars, besides the researchers in Mathematics. The two Chemical and Physical laboratories, besides that for Industrial Chemistry, were very highly spoken of by a European visitor early in this term. On the staff are Professors N. K. Sethi, M.A., D.Sc., K. R. Gunjekar, M.A. (Cantab) and P. Dutt, M.A. (Cantab) for Physics, Prof. S. S. Bhatnagar, M.A., D.Sc. (London) and K. K. Mathur, B.Sc., A.R.S.M. for Chemistry, Prof. R. S. Inamdar, B.A. (Cantab) for Botany and Prof. N. P. Gandhi, M.A., A.R.S.M., D.I.C., F.G.S., A.I.M.I.M. for Geo-mine-metallurgy. The two laboratories are very well-fitted and there is a good Museum attached to them and containing a large number of fine botanical and biological collections. Students are also trained in Industrial Chemistry the head of which department is Prof. N. N. Godbole, M.A., B.Sc., a young enthusiastic man of much experience in Japan and several parts of India. This department has already been manufacturing Ink, Soaps, Candles etc. We hope there will be more improvement in all these directions in the near future.

The Engineering College recently sent over a dozen of its students to the City and Guilds Examination of London. It is happy to learn that one of the students from our Engineering College, Mr. Nishit K. Bhattacharya, has stood first at that in the whole of the British Empire; the College on the whole also ranks very high in the list, showing a result of over 70 per cent. successes and standing third therein. The College is under the able principalship of Prof. C. A. King, B.Sc. (Hons.), A.R.C.Sc., A.M.I.M.E., M.E.I. etc., who was formerly in the Sibpur College. Besides being an expert at his subject Principal King takes an enthusiastic interest in the private social life of the students and is a true well-wisher of the University. Amongst the many efficient professors are Professors L. D. Coneslant, B.Sc., (Hons.), A.M.I.M.E., B. C. Chatterjee, M.A., A.M.I.E.E. and R. S. Jain, B.Sc. (U. S. A.), A.M.A.I.E.E. For proper guidance of the Engineering studies there is an Advisory Board consisting of a number of experts in India as well as in other parts of the world.

Besides mining and motoring, the special branches of engineering taught here are Electrical, Mechanical and Civil Engineering. Here are three degrees of classes also; Artisan classes being meant for boys knowing a little of elementary mathematics and Vernacular as well as English, Diploma classes which admit students who have passed the Matriculation, and the Degree classes meant for advanced students who have passed their I.Sc. or B.Sc. examinations with Physics, Chemistry and Mathematics. The subjects taught in all these classes are the same, the difference being only of grade. All the three run for a period of 5 years, for four years of which a man has to undergo training in the college, the last year being devoted to, practical work somewhere in the country. It is only after a student has secured a testimony of his successful practical work that his degree is given to him.

In the College itself they have to do fitting, carpentry and blacksmithery, besides the theoretical class-work. Although they have not been able to compete with the market outside, the College manufactures small machinery pieces, motor-car instruments and lathes too. They manage to supply electric light to the city of Benares, which will bring an income to the University. In spite of all possible difficulties, we hope the College will go on improving and enlarging its sphere of work.

We have immense possibilities before us and practically every day the University adds to the number of its members and working institutions. It was very recently that a University Seva Samiti was organized and a Post-graduates' Association and Hindi Sahitya Sabha were established. We regret to record the sad and sudden death of Prof. C. Guleri, B.A., Principal of the Oriental College, whose deep learning and scholarship was a pride to most Indians. He was only about 40 years and we are afraid the place vacated by his demise will hardly be filled. However, we have had additions to the staff, the most recent of them being the appointment of Prof. R. D. Gulethi, B.Sc (Manchester) to the Engineering College and of Prof. E. H. Solomon, B.A. (Cantab) to the Economics department of the C. H. College.

Recently their Highnesses the Maharajas of Mysore and Alwar resigned their offices of Chancellorship and Pro-Chancellorship respectively in order to give other able people their chances. We must thank their Highnesses very heartily for their long services to the University and hope they will continue to take the same lively interest in the affairs of the institution. The two offices have fallen into the able hands of their Highnesses the Maharajas of Baroda and of Bikaner respectively. We hope that the University will continue to grow and flourish without losing sight of the ideals before it, placed as its destinies are under the guidance of such eminent men. The Ayurvedic, Law, and Agriculture Colleges are yet to be started, and it is hoped that in their term of office their Highnesses will try their best to bring them into existence and thus fulfil the hopes of the University and the country at large.

LONDON LETTER.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, October 26th, 1922.

THE END OF THE COALITION.

The Coalition is dead. The news that startled London last Thursday must have echoed throughout the world, and a Ministry that saw Great Britain through the last years of the terrible War and the few years of turmoil and intense struggle that succeeded it is now at an end. It was a great experiment in the Parliamentary history of Great Britain, whose people are said, and with much truth, to hate a Coalition. The Coalition, however, undoubtedly, for some time served its purpose, even if, to-day, it is un mourned. Its end came with dramatic suddenness. One day negotiations were being carried on in connexion with the Near East peace and the Reparation problem. The next, there was no longer a representative Cabinet to carry on the King's Government or foreign negotiations. A curtain of finality seems to have fallen upon the events of the past, and a new era has opened, with the blessing of all except the staunchest supporters of the Coalition. With its death has come the retirement from office of Mr. Lloyd George, of whom the future historian may speak in epic terms but of whom now the whole country seems very tired, in spite of flashes here and there. Immediately it was known that he was to retire, the eyes of all England were turned towards Mr. Bonar Law, the soon-acknowledged head of the Conservative Party, in view of the allegiance to the ex-Prime Minister declared by those stalwart Conservatives, Lord Birkenhead, Lord Balfour, Mr. Chamberlain, Sir Robert Horne, and the other Coalition Conservative leaders. Scarcely any other name occurred to men's minds as the successor of the doughty Welshman. But Mr. Bonar Law himself, having scarcely regained his health, and remembering that only eighteen months ago he was next in command to Mr. Lloyd George at the head of the Coalition Cabinet, held back. He was by no means anxious to take up the burden of office that his predecessor was just laying down. However, after much pressure, he finally decided that it was his duty to prevent the smashing of his Party and to accept the high office to which the King had invited him, and on Monday His Majesty appointed him Prime Minister and First Lord of the Treasury. He at once advised the dissolution of Parliament, and the proclamation will be issued to-day. From now onwards events will march rapidly towards the General Election which will be held on November 15th. The new Parliament will probably assemble on the 20th, so all parties are now hard at work to get their candidates in. Labour, against which Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. Bonar Law, and Mr. Chamberlain, from different points of view have wished to save the country, will, with its 400 candidates, make the most strenuous efforts to capture the constituencies, but though some optimistic Labour men predict a sweeping Labour victory, more moderate observers do not anticipate that Labour will capture the seats of the mighty just yet. Moreover, the best of the Labour leaders realise that the country is not ready for a Labour Government yet, with its full programme of taxation and reform, and they realise the present immaturity of the Party itself. For the first time the women's vote is going to be a decisive factor at the elections. The 1918 elections gave little indication how women would vote. It is expected that the women's vote will be rather conservative than otherwise. In some divisions there are practically as many women voters as men, and in one London constituency, the women voters outnumber the men. This being the case, it is quite understood how eagerly the women will be canvassed. Several women, too, will be standing as candidates. Of these, two are fairly well-known in India, one of them being Miss Alison Garland, who some years ago undertook a lecture tour in India and afterwards raised a large sum for famine relief, the other being Mrs. Annie Swan, the novelist, who has given to Westerners some beautiful ideas regarding Indian life, before that country was as well-known to the West as it is, by comparison, to-day.

The Liberal fight is to be on the platform of economy and an end to all military adventures. The Liberals intend earnestly to support the League of Nations and to work for real disarmament.

MR. BONAR LAW.

Mr. Bonar Law is, at the moment of assuming office, threatened with a miners' strike. On the evening of Mr. Lloyd George's retirement, a miners' deputation waited upon him at Downing Street, and were, of course, refused an interview. Strike notices, however, have not received the unqualified support of the people mainly concerned, as was apparently expected. It is being made increasingly clear that a strike just now will not be very popular with the miners themselves. Probably the early advent of winter, the continued heavy unemployment roll, and the low funds of all the trades union organizations, are all factors in postponing a strike that will effect not only the mining industry, but the many others that rely upon coal for their very existence. Anyway, the new Premier may have to come to grips at an early date with a labour crisis of some magnitude, and we shall see how he handles it.

UNEMPLOYMENT.

So far, about 370 schemes for the relief of unemployment for the winter have been approved by the Committee specially set up to deal with unemployment. These schemes involve large sums of money, but at least there is some return somewhere by the working of them, and respectable workers are spared the demoralization of receiving doles without work.

THE IRISH SITUATION.

With the expiry of the Act of Amnesty and the opening of the military courts in Ireland last week, an important new phase has been reached in the conflict between the Irish Free State and the followers of Mr. De Valera. From letters written by him and captured by the Free State authorities, it is clear that the Republican leader finds that the situation has slipped out of his control. He admits that he finds it impossible to set up a rival Government, because he has no force to control or maintain it. He also admits that the Republican cause has not sufficient adherents to do anything constructive. Ireland seems very undisturbed over the political changes taking place here. Nobody seems afraid that the Treaty or its results will be endangered by the change of Government and this sense of being outside our affairs is probably the biggest tribute yet paid to the Treaty by the Irish people themselves, for it proves their claim to an independent life, and their belief that they have now got it. In the late Premier's speech at Leeds, last week-end, he made special reference to the work that the Coalition had done in making peace with the Irish people. It was one of the things, he said, of which he was most proud, for it had been one of the most difficult things to do.

CONDITION OF BRITISH AGRICULTURE.

The present condition of British agriculture is extremely precarious, and it looks as though that great industry were in danger. The fact that the majority of the population never thinks seriously about the conditions of food-raising in this country does not alter the equally important fact that these are giving cause for most serious concern in thoughtful quarters, for, the cost of living is largely affected by them. Farmers in all districts and of all classes are in severe financial straits, and those whose available capital was small have no alternative but to sink further and further into debt. The cost of producing any of the standard rotation crops is out of all proportion to their realised value. The farmers admit that they cannot see how the labourers can accept a lower wage unless the whole cost of living drops considerably, but they declare that present prices for farm produce cannot be reconciled with existing rates of wages.

LANDLORD vs. TENANT.

The termination of the Rent Restriction Acts, that was to take place next year, has been postponed. There has been a strong and widespread feeling of anxiety concerning the future of these Acts and the thousands whose homes depend upon the goodwill of their landlords have a respite, for they will not be turned out of their houses arbitrarily, nor will their rents be enhanced unconscionably. That in not a few cases the continuance of the Acts will operate adversely to the interests of the house-owner has to be recognized, and many people who invested their small savings in house-property, in order to provide a secure income against old age, now find themselves in the position of having the responsibility of the upkeep of their property at enhanced charges and yet to receive no real profit upon their labour or their investment, for the rents received are only too often completely absorbed in rates, taxes, and repairs. One of the greatest objections to the retention of their Acts, however is not this. It is that it prevents the speculative builder from building and providing houses for the enormous number of folk, especially newly-married people, who are at present compelled to live in the most cramped and expensive circumstances. Moreover, it acts as a preventive of marriage. Thus, in so many ways, we have still to pay for the cost of the Great War that was to advance social progress and improve economic conditions.

THE LATE SIR WILLIAM MEYER.

The sudden death of Sir William Meyer, the High Commissioner for India, at the time that the mail was closing last week, came as a great shock to all who had known the excellent work that he had done during his incumbency of the office which was one of the most tangible signs of the reality of the Reforms. Sir William heartily believed in the Reforms, and, to the best of his ability, he advanced them. His personal qualities and intellectual gifts were appreciated most by those who had the amplest opportunities of knowing him. His high character and sense of personal responsibility, in spite of overwhelming domestic losses that would have broken most men, increased the respect in which he was held. It was a singular coincidence that, simultaneously at the week-end, there were no High Commissioner for India, no Secretary of State for India, and no Parliamentary Under Secretary of State. The first and third offices are still vacant, but Mr. Bonar Law has reappointed Lord Peel as Secretary of State.

"The very existence of this factory at Ghazipur," says the report, "is an insult to all true medical science. In the face of all the light that has been poured on this question during the past century and a quarter it should be immediately closed." The example of the British Government in India has been fatally bad on the rest of India, and the report quotes a statement made by Sir Havelock Charles, President of the Medical Board for India at the Third Session of the League of Nations Provisional Health Committee in Paris last May, as reported in the League's White Paper C. 866 M. 217 to the effect that in the whole of India "only 9,000 tons of opium is produced" or ten times that of the Ghazipur Factory. On page 10 of this report Sir Havelock Charles says: "Opium is taken in India as tea and tobacco are taken in other countries. It is a stimulant for workers engaged in arduous labours, for soldiers who have to take long marches, and even for animals. No Government has more at heart a struggle against the abuse of opium than the Government of India." Regarding this the Friends' report comments: "The pigeon holes of the India Office are filled with answers to these misleading statements of Sir Havelock Charles. Habitués of opium are not only bright and active whilst under the influences of increasing quantities of the drug. Without it they collapse in India as everywhere else, and it is the cruelest of disgraces to our country that we should still be mixed up in this central way in the world's traffic in this drug."

The report concludes:—"The conscience against the use of this drug except for medical purposes is more or less keen in most parts of the world, and the League of Nations documents reflect this fact. That the League should have given way to the representative of the India Office in the manner indicated is a grievous calamity, and we should concentrate on any practical efforts that may be made on the India Office itself, through the usual Parliamentary channels."

THE U. P. PROVINCIAL SOCIAL CONFERENCE

A very largely attended United Provinces Provincial Social Conference was held at Debra Dun on the 31st October. Mrs. Sarojini Naidu presided. The following resolutions were passed.

(1) a. This conference proposes that efforts should be made to educate and qualify our women folk so that in the reform of the Hindu community and the service of our country they may be able to partake equally with men.

b. This conference proposes that in order to give a practical shape to resolution No. 1, female education should be spread in all the cities and towns in proportion to the requirements of the community, and that the pardah system, as it is in vogue among the higher classes, be abandoned.

(2) This conference proposes that practical steps should be taken to educate and uplift the depressed classes so that they may be able to work for the betterment of the country equally with the higher classes and that the present treatment accorded to the depressed classes by the higher ones by reason of mere accident of birth be totally abandoned in view of our social advancement.

(3) This conference is of opinion that in order to put a stop to the increase in the number of widows, the practice of child marriage prevalent among the various communities contrary to the direction of the shastras be abandoned.

(4) a. This conference is of opinion that the widows of marriageable age be induced to remarry and institutions for the remarriage be encouraged.

b. This conference is of opinion that widows who may not wish to remarry should be maintained in widow homes so that their lives may prove useful for the advancement of the community.

(5) This conference puts on record its approval of the practice of intercasts marriage that prevails in certain communities and invites the attention of other communities among whom this practice does not yet prevail to the advantages of intermarriage.

(6) This conference proposes that efforts should be made to induce those communities in which the custom of drink prevails to put a stop to that custom altogether and that the good work done by temperance societies in this direction be encouraged.

THIS YAKUTI or life giving nectar has been prepared from the best, choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has wonderful properties of increasing virile power and it rectifies urinary disorders. In fact it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to those persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicine. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires. It is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills. Rupees ten only.

NOTES.

The Church Freedom Bill: Those who are inclined to think that the separation of religion from the State, is an act of irreligion, should note the movement in the Church of England, in India to free it from the shackles of official control. We take the following from the Dnyanodaya: In the August number of the Bombay Diocesan Magazine the Bishop in Tinnevely gives an account of the proposed Bill to secure the freedom of the Church of England in India. He shows how the necessity for some reconstruction of the Church has become more and more apparent with the passage of time. Conditions, he points out, would be anomalous enough if they applied only to British-born members of the Church. "When it is further added that the majority of the members of the Church of England in India are converts and the descendants of converts from among the Indians themselves, the anomaly becomes a scandal. Whatever view may be held about political self-government, a man's religion is his, and a system which imposes on an indigenous Church Bishops, appointed in an office in London, laws framed for a totally different set of conditions in a country, six thousands miles away, and a liturgy and articles framed nearly 400 years ago.....is clearly in need of some modification." Further "reconstruction has become a vital problem because the vast number of Indian members of the Church are filled with national self-consciousness and an earnest desire to use their powers and give their best to the Church of Christ in their own land and throughout the world." The crucial points in the new Bill as set forth by the Bishop are as follows:—(1) It secures to the Church in India the freedom it desires: to elect its Bishops: to its synods to determine its statements of belief and methods of worship: and generally to manage its own affairs. (2) The Bishop and Archdeacons of Calcutta, Madras and Bombay cease, after the death or resignation of the holders at the time of the passing of the Bill, to be appointed or to be necessarily paid by Government. (3) It is contemplated that Government will continue to appoint Chaplains to "provided" Churches, i. e. Churches over which they retain control.

The Fascisti Movement: The Catholic Leader (Madras) has an informing article on the constitution and character of the Fascisti party which has attained such a dramatic victory in Italy. The Fascisti party was formed to combat the tyranny of the Socialists who were the strongest and best organised party in the Italian Parliament where the Fascisti had only an insignificant twenty out of five hundred members. The triumph of the Fascisti is entirely the result of their powerful outside organisation which includes the higher and the middle classes, soldiers and especially students. "Socialists so far," writes the Catholic Leader, "had found only intellectual adversaries—the street was their own dominion and every one who was opposed to them had either to fight or to hide." In the Fascisti, however, they met their match.

They met the Reds in the street, not with orations and debates, but with stick, dagger and revolver. They met force with force, violence with violence. For such tactics the Socialists were not prepared, especially when they saw that the Fascisti were determined and stopped at nothing. Red Labour organizations were attacked, fired, their registers destroyed. Red Municipal Councils were deposed, their chairmen exiled after having tasted sufficient punishment to make them think twice before returning. Socialist papers were suppressed, their presses destroyed, their editorial offices confiscated. The Fascisti might come anywhere, by day or by night. Their concentration was astounding. All of a sudden motor busses and trucks full of well-armed young men, appeared from all sides—and the Reds were crushed. The black "fex" black shirt, grey trousers and puttees, revolver and dagger in belt—the uniform of the Fasci—were awe-inspiring to the populace wherever they appeared.

And the result? "The tyranny of the Socialists has been permanently destroyed," ruefully remarks the Catholic Leader, "but now the tyranny of the Fascisti is equally unbearable." The Socialist—Fascisti reaction has a moral for all parties in India. Violence provokes violence, whether it is the violence of Government or that of the people. The Fascisti, by the way, called themselves so, after the "fasci," bundles of scourges and axes, which the victors of ancient Rome carried before the prefects of the city as the emblems of criminal justice. In other words, they proclaimed themselves to be the party of physical force to meet and put down physical force.

Lord Reading and an Italian Journalist: The Swarajya, the intrepid Non-Co-operationist daily of Madras, called attention in its issue of the 6th instant to certain personally offensive references to Mr. Gandhi, which the Italian journal, La Stampa, published as having been made to its representative by the Viceroy. His Excellency was represented as saying that the Punjabees regarded the Mahatma with contempt. "They expected a god," Lord Reading was reported to have said, "and received instead a scrawny, shrinking little fellow, who advocated passive resistance instead of force and who then departed on one of the railways that he bitterly denounced in his exhortation." A Government of India Press communiqué dated Delhi, November 12, states that they (the Government) have ascertained that no regular interview was given to Major Arnolde Cippola, the journalist in question, though he lunched at the Viceregal Lodge and afterwards had a short conversation with his Excellency. "The observations about Mr. Gandhi attributed in those articles to his Excellency," it says, "are entirely without any foundation and no such remarks were made and on many other matters, and especially those relating to the early life of Lord Reading, the alleged account gives a wholly misleading and inaccurate version of the conversation." The representative of La Stampa spoke of the Viceroy as a broad-minded man who "although a Jew, he attends the Christian service every Sunday, believing that all great religions are equally good for the souls of those who believe in them." Is there no Synagogue in Simla? Major Cippola's errors may be forgiven as he confesses at the outset that "this country (India) has a trick of utterly confusing the mind of even the most experienced observer."

The Viceroy's Exhortation to Indian Rulers: We are sure that Lord Reading meant his words for others besides the Maharaja of Rewa when, on the occasion of investing him with ruling powers at Indore, His Excellency in grave words impressed upon His Highness the necessity of giving heed to the spirit of the times. The Viceroy said:

Events in the world have given birth to new ideas. Forces are at work which have awakened a new consciousness every where among the masses. New aspirations have been engendered. New standards are being created. New tests are being applied to the old order of things. These forces cannot be ignored or excluded from consideration. They must be faced and dealt with. You have the priceless heritage of the devotion of your subjects. In these times of change and difficulty, they will look to you for guidance and for sympathetic insight into those new influences which cannot fail to stir them. The best advice which I can give you in these difficult circumstances is to hold the welfare of your subjects constantly in your thoughts, keep in touch with their hopes, try to understand and meet their difficulties attempt to win their confidence and take them into yours. When you are convinced that in any direction a reasonable desire for advance has been established and expressed, let a wise hand guide wholesome and reasonable development on lines best suited to your local need.

The Bombay Census Report: A valued correspondent writes: "I wish to bring to your notice a remark made by the Census Superintendent of the Presidency concerning the educated classes in the Karnatak. It is at page 121, paragraph 348. "In the Karnatak," writes Mr. Sedgwick, "where sexual relations are very lax and a large proportion of the educated classes keep a concubine either alone or in addition to a wife, the danger of this error is considerable." The error referred to is that of enumerating unmarried or widowed women living with men, as married. I don't know whence the Superintendent got his information and what justification he had for making such a sweeping generalization, selecting one particular Division. And as regards the educated classes it is an insult to which they should not meekly submit. The remark only reveals the prejudices of the writer." We may add that, though in the sentence quoted, the Census Superintendent observes that the danger of the error is considerable, in the next sentence he says it is not likely to be large "since some of the concubines, if widows, will be correctly returned as such, and others will be actually married women who have deserted their husbands or been deserted by them." It is clear that the remark about the laxity of educated classes in the Karnatak has been brought in merely to air the writer's pretended knowledge of the Karnatak, and not to clear up any real statistical difficulty.

The New British Cabinet: The General Election have resulted in the Conservatives getting a clear majority over the Labour and Liberal parties of 80 in the House of Commons. This majority, however, does not represent a majority of voters. It has been pointed out that the total number of votes cast for Conservatives was only two-fifths of the total polled, and that for the first time since the Reform Act, the majority in Parliament has been returned by a minority of voters. The new Government, if it uses its majority in the Commons without regard to the majority against them in the country, would imperil the Parliamentary system. Its task, therefore, will be to convert the Conservative minority in the country into a majority by making judicious use of its majority in Parliament. The policy of tranquillity announced by the Prime Minister, Mr. Bonar Law, will, therefore, suit him best. Among the new members returned are some old friends of India. Special interest attaches to the election of Mr. Shapurji Saklatvala as a Labour member by a large majority by Battersea. Mr. Shapurji is said to be an advanced Socialist, but whatever his political views, Indians of all shades of opinion cannot but be gratified at the success achieved by him by sheer force of character. In some ways, Mr. Shapurji's election is an event of even greater significance than that of Dadabhai Naoroji and Sir Muncherji Bhavnagaree.

Mr. Sastry's Return: The Right Honourable Srinivasa Sastry returned yesterday from his tour in Australia and Canada. That it has done some good, goes without saying. Whether that good is commensurate with the loss to the country from the absence during six eventful months of a leader of his capacity, is a doubtful point. There will be much curiosity felt as to what he has to say in his presidential address at the forthcoming Liberal Conference at Nagpur, as regards the position of Indians in the Dominions.

The Bombay Industrial Housing Scheme: The Director of Information writes: "The programme for the construction of 50,000 one-roomed tenements for the poorer classes, which was commenced by the Development Directorate in April 1921, has now made considerable progress, and a large number of tenements will be available for occupation in December. The buildings are being constructed at Naigaum, DeLisle Road and Worli, and His Excellency Sir George Lloyd has consented to inaugurate the scheme on Wednesday the 6th Dec. The ceremony will take place at Worli at 4.15 p. m. (S. T.) on that date. After the ceremony, guests will have an opportunity of inspecting the completed buildings and also a museum which is being prepared to illustrate other activities of the Directorate."

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1922.

THE CONSTRUCTIVE PROGRAMME AND THE COUNCILS.

It is unfortunate that the members of the Congress Civil Disobedience Enquiry Committee and the witnesses who favoured the removal of the ban on Congressmen to enter the Legislative Councils, have mostly supported their opinion either by alleging the failure of the Bardoli programme or their own disbeliever in it to set India politically upon her feet. When Hakim Ajmal Khan said in Bombay that the Bardoli programme would not bring us Swaraj but Swaraj would knock at our doors if we carry it out thoroughly and whole-heartedly, we felt that he at any rate had grasped the full profound significance of that programme. Hakim Sahib, Pandit Motilal Nehru and Mr. V. J. Patel say that the solid fact cannot be ignored that the Bardoli-Delhi resolution and the subsequent incarceration of Mahatma Gandhi were followed by general depression throughout the country. They add: "We have carefully investigated the causes of this apparent (?) setback and have unhesitatingly arrived at the conclusion that it was due almost entirely to a want of adequate faith in the constructive programme on the part of a large number of workers whose business it was to carry it out." They themselves do not expressly state anywhere what the amount of their own faith in the Bardoli programme is, and it does not seem to be much seeing that they speak of it as "the wet-blanket thrown upon most of the workers." They seem to forget that it was intended as a wet-pack to bring down the fever temperature of politics. We do not care to make this or any other question depend upon an interpretation of what the Mahatma said or wrote, and we rather regret the publication at this juncture of a collection of his writings in Young India, as it is likely to aggravate the existing tendency to split hairs over his most casual remarks as scholiasts over ancient texts. But it is quite clear that he fully anticipated that the sudden calling-off of mass civil disobedience would have a chilling effect upon those who were counting upon a big spectacular exhibition of Non-Co-operation at its greatest intensity. Even apart from what the Mahatma thought, only persons totally unconversant with the workings of the human mind, can think it possible to embark upon a policy of high tension unattended by the danger of depression. Even in individuals, moods of exaltation are succeeded by moods of depression and, unless safe-guarded by previous training, the man who ventures rashly on the heights of being is sure to be hurled down to its depths without hope of redemption. In crowds and masses, the danger is terribly greater. The present depression is largely a natural reaction which in its turn will lead to its own reaction. What these three gentlemen now recommend is that this dramatic exhibition which was put off by Bardoli should now be reproduced, since mass civil disobedience is clearly impossible, in the Legislative Councils for the purpose of inspiring "enthusiasm" in the people. The Hakim Sahib was never a Council man, and Pandit Motilal Nehru, we understand, has no intention himself of seeking election to the Legislative bodies, Provincial or Central. On Mr. Patel alone of the three signatories will fall the responsibility of showing in practice how to give effect to the recommendation to enter the Councils with the set purpose of obstruction.

The most important reason advanced by Dr. Ansari, and Messrs Kasturi Ranga Iyengar and Rajagopalacharya against seeking entry into the Legislative Councils, is based upon their great concern that the Bardoli programme should receive the concentrated attention of the country without the distraction of the Councils. "The constructive programme of the Congress," they observe, "has received insufficient attention and requires intensive effort, especially on the part of the leaders, to bring up the country to the level of preparedness for undertaking civil disobedience. A campaign of entry into Councils at the present time would have the certain effect of relegating the constructive programme in the cold shade of neglect." We may pass by the shibboleth of preparedness for civil disobedience as the goal of the constructive programme. The Mahatma himself used it in order to give a semblance of continuity to the Bardoli programme. Really, however, the result of a whole-hearted working of the constructive programme will make civil disobedience superfluous. It will not bring Swaraj, to use the Hakim Sahib's present phrase, but Swaraj will knock at our doors as its consequence. The British connection with India will cease to function as an alien domination the moment that Hindu society sets about seriously to re-organise itself on the basis of brotherhood, to which the conception of "untouchableness" as applied to certain classes is the root obstacle; and that there is perfect unity between Hindus, Mahomedans, Christians, Parsis, and other creeds domiciled in this country. "The moment India began really to show herself what we so idly imagine her to be, a conquered nation, that moment we should recognise perforce the impossibility of retaining her." Thus wrote Seeley half a century ago. "If the feeling of a common nationality began to exist there only feebly, if, without inspiring any active desire to drive out the foreigner, it only created a notion that it was shameful to assist him in maintaining his dominion—from that moment almost our Empire would cease to exist." The constructive Bardoli programme, with its roots in non-violence, was designed and is the best yet devised for creating this sense of national unity. So long as men do not hold it wrong to think in communal terms on national issues, going into the Councils will but aggravate their differences, as it is already doing. "Refuse to give expression to a passion," says the psychologist, William James, "and it dies." On the other hand, increasing the ways of giving expression to a deep-rooted sentiment, only helps to endow it with greater strength and power. Seeking election to the Councils as a short cut to Swaraj is destined to be futile. It must aggravate caste and communal differences and thus postpone to an indefinite future the attainment of full responsible Government. It will create controversies and schisms among Congressmen and destroy whatever unity there is among them at present.

But—and this is what Dr. Ansari and his two colleagues have not adequately considered—going into the Councils with the object of advancing the constructive programme and of preventing measures detrimental to that programme, seems to us to be the plain duty of all who believe in its infinite potentialities for national unification. Those who believe in it have no right to leave any avenue unexplored in their efforts to give effect to it. So long as there was but a negative programme of 'leave this' and 'give up that', it was perhaps a necessity to act upon the principle that he who is not with us is against us. Now that there is a positive programme, which it is laid upon all those who have faith in it to carry out, the principle to go by is that he who is not against us is with us. Nothing can be plainer than that, say what official apologists may, the Mahatma's life and the non-violent principle have captured the imagination of many outside India who do not agree with the Non-Co-operation Programme. An English friend sent us two days ago a cutting from the London Times containing the report of the proceedings of a religious Congress at which Lord Astor spoke. One of the other speakers, the Rev. Garfield Williams, deploring the party spirit in English politics, remarked that the appearance of a man like Gandhi in India was a most hopeful sign. And no one contradicted him. There are hundreds, if not thousands, of men and women in all parts of the world to-day who have been brought to take a sympathetic interest in India by the refulgent personality of the weaver and farmer of Sabarmati. The proposal to go into the Councils with the object of wrecking them, is calculated to convey the impression that the Congress has fallen away from the great ideals of Gandhi. On the other hand, going into the Councils with the Bardoli programme as a mandate, will be the most natural and reasonable thing to do. If a thing is essentially right, we should not allow the consideration of what others may think of it, to deter us from doing it. But we fully agree with the Mr. Rajagopala and his colleagues when they say that, in their opinion, "entry into the Councils for the avowed purpose of obstructing all measures whether good or bad and of wrecking the reforms is obnoxious to the principle and the spirit of the movement as conceived by its great leader." Not only that but, as we have more than once stated, a politician who starts with wrecking as his ideal is almost certain in a short time to become absolutely unfitted for any constructive work. Cromwell is the type of a great political wrecker, and the people got so tired of his wrecking methods in a short time that they were glad to recall such a hopeless reprobate as Charles II and put him at the head of the State as a hereditary ruler. We agree with Mr. Kasturi Ranga Iyengar and his friends that if Congressmen enter the Councils with a wrecking programme, the effect would certainly be to relegate the constructive programme to the cold shade of neglect. But there will not be the least danger of that, indeed the public interest in the Bardoli programme will be greatly enhanced, if Congressmen seek election with that programme emblazoned on their banner.

GERMANY'S FINANCIAL POSITION.

(By MR. A. S. VENKATARAMAN B. A., L. T.)

The problem that engages the attention of statesmen, bankers, economic thinkers, merchants and traders, in fact, a large section of the thinking public, is that of the German Reparations. Germany offers now a unique instance of a country, which by entering on the course of issuing large amounts of inconvertible paper, causes disturbance in the financial world by reason of the fact that the close relation between the economic conditions of various nations is becoming ever closer and closer under the influence of the growth of commerce. The manner in which one great nation attends to its economic interests may have important results for many other nations. There is no domain in which the truth is more clearly manifest than in that of currency.

Germany's capacity to pay foreign debts does not depend so much on her power to produce wealth as on her power to extend her export trade in such a way as to exceed the imports—after all this is the only means of payment—at a time when there is a corresponding increase in her imports and when the foreign nations are obliged to enter into a severe competition with Germany in the export of manufactured goods. The indispensable imports, say of food-stuffs and iron and coal—forming a first charge on the proceeds of the German foreign sales, the balance only is available for reparations. It remains to be seen whether such a balance is procurable.

The amount available for reparations may consist of interest received from foreign investments and payment for external services such as shipping, besides the balance of exports over imports. Most of Germany's foreign investments have disappeared, (not less than 5½ million dollars) either sold, or seized by the Allied governments or lost their intrinsic value. Hence the interest on foreign investments has become more or less a negligible factor, if not a vanishing quantity. Her shipping having been confiscated, payment on account of external services has shared a similar fate. Besides, Germany has been deprived of her most productive areas, eg, Alsace-Lorraine, the Saar Basin and the Polish provinces. Again in her payment of Reparations so far of the value of 2 billion dollars, the amount paid in cash has only been 375 million dollars. Even this small payment in cash has resulted in the decline of the Mark, in the excessive issue of inconvertible paper in order to avoid social unrest at home and in the depreciation of currency which has begun to affect the money-market of the world considerably. Germany's attempt at an extension of export trade has brought about a competition with other nations.

Now, two explanations have been offered for the present financial position in Germany. The French government or public opinion favours the view that the situation has been the result of a deliberate and adroit manoeuvre by Germany in order to escape payment of reparations while in other quarters it is regarded as having been caused by a lack of wisdom and firmness on the part of the German government.

It is however difficult to believe, whether any other government could have handled the situation with greater skill and tact. Admitted that Germany's only method of paying indemnity consists in increasing her exports, the question that crops up is trying, difficult and dangerous. Being purely a manufacturing nation, she must extend her sale of manufactured goods in the teeth of foreign competition, while foreign nations will not and can not acquiesce in a situation fraught with probable, and in some cases, actual disastrous consequences of growing unemployment and trade losses. The whole manufacturing interest of the rest of the world will be pitted against Germany, if it is desirous—as it should be, when the very breath of existence depends on foreign trade excepting perhaps the U.S.A. where internal trade is of greater importance than external trade—of retaining its hold on neutral markets. In addition to this, Germany has been reduced to the condition of importing her food-stuffs and iron and coal ore for consumption in her factories, as a result of her deprivation of productive areas.

In her present condition, Germany has found the means—the only means—of payment by the sale of Marks. The German exporter does not want marks, but dollars or pounds sterling to meet external obligations and he sells away the Marks offered by the Government. If we add to this, the further sale by Germans who mistrust the stability of their own currency and the large accumulations of Marks in the hands of foreign speculators, we are in a position to account for the tremendous fall in the value of the Mark. It will be seen, therefore, that in the form prescribed in the Treaty of Versailles and under the conditions imposed on her by the Allies, Germany is unable to pay the reparations and the question now is whether Germany can pay at all. Many Germans still own foreign assets in the shape of investments or balances in foreign banks. They can sell them or may be induced to sell them to the German Government which may in turn hand them over to the Reparations Commission. To a very large extent, these have been the proceeds of sales of Marks flung by the Germans on the foreign market, under the fear that the pressure of Reparation payments would bring about a depreciation in their value. Once this pressure is withdrawn, the Mark will immediately improve. If Germany is given breathing interval and when the fall in the Mark is arrested, the world, as a whole, would be a gainer in the matter of stabilisation of exchanges and Germany will subsequently be in a position to pay off the indemnity. The financial experts are going to Germany and there is no knowing what will be the further developments in her financial position. In all probability, the declaration of a moratorium will be the inevitable outcome and we understand it is being proposed.

TEMPLES AND SOCIAL PROPAGANDA.

(Contributed.)

“Even the commonest street is given order and beauty by the simply pillared ‘mantapam,’ with which its vista often terminates; or is raised to dignity, even to sublimity when it leads up to a mighty many-storied ‘gopuram,’ with its manifold exuberance of sculpture or towering dark behind its lofty, central lamp series, a light house of the night. The lofty walls running so straight and far on either side of these colossal pylon gateways, and with their plainness in perfect contrast with that enrichment, are in turn relieved by pillared palms, and their swaying crowns give life and brightness to the whole.”—Prof. Geddes on Indian Temple-cities.

Turning from this picture of our ancient cities to our great cities of more recent growth, what do we find? In the two great cities of Calcutta and Bombay—and they may be taken to be fairly typical of the rest—the great religion of Hinduism is represented by temples not remarkable for their size and setting. Small buildings whose only external claim to sanctity and distinction is based on miniature towers capping their stunted proportions—distributed at odd nooks and corners without the least attempt to set themselves off against the surroundings, are the representatives of Hindu religion and of Hindu architecture. Daily the crowds gather and stagnate about these centres at the Paja hour, overflow on to the pavement jostling and perspiring or shivering and half stuck in the slushy pavement In spite, however, devoutness is the order and nobody grumbles—except perhaps the priest. They are quite ready to ignore every defect in the general idea that it is a Hindu temple.

It is not the object of this article to put in a plea for the repetition of our mammoth temples in modern cities as has been done in Madras with the result that many parts of that city vie with the oldest towns in the province in point of a certain sleepy-hollowness. What is wanted is, not a multiplication without limit of such temples, but rather an emergence of a new type of temple both in style and organisation more suited to the surroundings and the life of restless progress that exists in modern cities. It is well-known from past experience, that we, Hindus, are peculiarly and intensely susceptible to religious influences—good or bad. The caste system was, in early days, foisted on us in the name of religion. Early marriage, the prohibition of widow re-marriage and several other rules intimately regulating daily life, were placed over us in the guise of religion. On the other side of the picture we have such virtues as charity, hospitality, cleanliness etc. which the Hindu practises to this day because they have all come down to him as part and parcel of his religion. Every civic and social virtue or duty—has been made to assume a religious garb for him, and it ought to be possible to do the same thing over again. It has often been said that Hinduism is not a missionary religion but there is no reason why it should not undertake missionary work among its own following. It is an admitted fact that the influence of large temples—that are almost institutions—is exceptional to a degree, on the surrounding population. The Hindu Pantheon is sufficiently large and varied for many virtues—civic and social—to be able to be correlated to a deity. Is it wanted to spread education? Start a temple, then, say for Saraswati with appendages of numerous primary schools. Get hold of important and focal centres in the city for it. Let it depart as much as possible from the customary ideas of style and work—yet not so much as to make the lay mind see anything in it destructive of its creed—so as to suit itself to the new conditions. Organise the work of the temple so as to focus attention and devotion not so much on the daily 'pujas' or personal offerings as on the educative work being done. Let the atmosphere be made such that every Hindu feels it a point of religion to send his boy and girl to the schools; and—well, there are the masses grasping at education voluntarily and with eagerness.

Then take another instance. Suppose it is desired to spread sanitation. Instal then, in another temple—the supposedly deadly goddess of smallpox—though put thus in English it sounds ridiculous and absurd. But any Hindu whose training in the least has been what it is to millions of his co-religionists, can vouch for the fact that this particular goddess is, far from being held in fear, is actually loved in the same sense as a real—if somewhat stern—mother would be. The idea that cleanliness and sanitation are her specially favourite virtues is already present in the popular mind, and it will only be necessary to expand more on this to bring it more into line with modern and more scientific ideas on the same subject.

What now could be the objections to such a plan? The first to be made very obviously is that the old child-like faith in our countless deities is gone or largely going. The writer makes bold to assert that this is altogether a wrong estimate. It exists, at any rate among a large section of the people—that very section whose conservatism and suspicion of new innovations is altogether the despair of every reformer in India, it exists ever ready to take up anything that is brought to it in the old form.

Another and more serious objection would be that this is nothing but the introduction of fresh superstitions or the doing of evil that good may come of it. Not at all. With the wider spread of western education and the application of more scientific criteria, the old superstitions are bound to disintegrate—so far as their religious form is concerned. Those among them that really have a useful and scientific basis will only gain added strength by such a test. The new 'superstitions' proposed to be introduced will come under this latter category.

Leaving other and minor objections, here then is the opportunity—nay, the proper function of all those old sleepy but potentially influential institutions of Hinduism that lie thickly scattered in parts of the country. The Shankaracharyas of the various orders, the orthodox community in their various county strongholds and last but not least their financial supporters, the Chetties, the Marwaris and others should shake off their state of old world sleepiness, and take up the work that modern India demands and Hinduism invites. It is of no use for the Hindu Liberals to take up this work, for rightly or wrongly they will be suspected of attempting to found another of those Samajas of which we have already too many. That way lies failure. For success, the orthodox must take the lead in this matter and start the new temples—not of God alone—but of godly service where their need is sorest—in the cities.

MARRIAGE—II.

Though in this series of articles I confine my attention to the question of marriage reform, it is really only a part of the wider question of social reform. Hindu society has become rigid and lost much of its capacity to readjust itself readily to changing environments. That, in fact, lies at the root of all social evils. As it regains that power in other branches of social reform, it will automatically regain a correct attitude with respect to marriage reform. Many thinking men believe that till one century ago we had sufficient vitality to go on readjusting. In this connection I may be permitted to cite the thoughtful monograph by the late Justice Telang given as an appendix to Ranade's "History of the Marathas." One telling instance given in it may be reproduced here. Parasuram Bhanu, one of the commanders of the first rank under the Peshwa Baji Row II, during the Peshwa's minority was a Brahmin and an orthodox Brahmin. His daughter was widowed within a very short time after her marriage. Parsuram, who was a pillar of orthodoxy, made up his mind to get the girl remarried and sought the opinion of learned Pandits from Benares. It is said that the opinion given by the Benares Pandits was in favour of remarriage. The fact that an orthodox Brahmin of those days seriously thought of widow remarriage and that, at any rate, some Pandits gave their opinion in favour of the step shows that Hindu society was then far less rigid than now. Telang's position was that Hindus were rapidly changing many of their evil practices when the superimposition of British rule arrested that progress. Ranade also seems to agree with him. The suggestion is not that British administrators consciously stopped that progress. But the highly flexible customary law was replaced by rigid codes and rules of English common law and the result was to stop spontaneous growth. Such permissive legislation like the Widow Re-marriage Act could not stop the mischief. Very often well-intentioned efforts in social legislation lead to positively harmful results. An instance in point is Mr. Sastri's Post Puberty Marriage Bill. The introduction of that Bill gave rise to a furious controversy and the Bill had to be dropped. There is left a general impression that post-puberty marriages are against law.

It is not possible to say that there has been any advance in the matter of social reform within the last 10 years. On the other hand, there seems to have been a setback. This view is strongly supported by the debate in the Legislative Assembly on the question of raising the "age of consent." To a certain extent, perhaps this is a result of national revival. But to any thoughtful nationalist it will be clear that this is but a passing phase. For, with a better understanding of the real genius of Hindu culture, it will become amply clear that its true aim is synthesis rather than elimination. The non-Brahmin revolt is also found to exercise a healthy influence. Hitherto the non-Brahmins were under the belief that their advance consisted in adopting the practices of the Brahmins. Now they, or at least some of their leaders, have cast off the glamour of Brahmin ways and it may be expected that those classes among them who have adopted the customs of the Brahmins will find it easier for them to allow remarriages of widows and post-puberty marriages. A spirited protest on their part against Brahmin supremacy is bound to be wholesome to them and also to the Brahmin. For the non-Brahmin's imitation of Brahmin customs was and is a good plea for the Brahmin's belief in the superiority of his own customs. The non-Brahmin leaders have not yet turned their attention to large measures of social reform. But they may be expected to do so soon and when they do, their way must be easy.

My scheme is that marriage reform being but part of the entire social reform scheme, it is necessary to create a general atmosphere of tolerance towards necessary changes. This is best done by propaganda, practice and example. Resort to legislation is proved to be unwise.

THE MORAL EDUCATION CONGRESS.

A great concourse, representing some twenty nationalities, crowded the assembly hall of the University of London in September, 1908, under the presidency of Sir Michael Sadler. They had come to discuss the moral education of children and adolescents. Not only had they travelled from many countries; they belonged to many schools of thought and faith. The energetic secretary, Mr. Gustav Spiller, was a lecturer and writer on behalf of the Ethical Movement. There were Roman Catholics, Anglican Catholics, Free Churchmen, Unitarians, Jews, Moslems, Hindus, Rationalists, and others. Dr. Felix Adler, of New York, affirmed (and events have since proved) that interest in ethical education was keen, and likely in civilized countries to increase. Marked varieties of view were expressed. Mr. G. P. Gooch commended History as "a judge, juster and wiser than any one man." The Roman Catholic Father, Michael Maher, affirmed that the Doctrines of the Fatherhood of God and the sacred character of Christ were of supreme importance. M. Buisson praised the French system of moral, of civic instruction. Professor Mackenzie considered it possible to lead the youths in the direction of social order, purity and beauty, without distinction of creed. These brief notes indicate that the desire of the Organizing Committee not to exclude "references to religious and philosophical points of view" was realized; and yet it may be truly maintained that in all the eight sessions the debates were conducted in a spirit of frankness and mutual courtesy. The opening experiment had been successfully made, and the hope was general that another such assembly might be held four years later.

The Second Congress took place at the Hague in August, 1912, under the patronage of the Queen of the Netherlands, the president being Mr. R. A. Van Sandiek, and Miss Attie G. Dyscrinck secretary. The Object and Basis of the deliberations were now affirmed.

In the large hall of the Zoological Society were gathered delegates from nearly all the nations, including Argentine, Australia, Chili, China, Egypt, Hayti, India, Dutch Indies, Japan, Peru and Tunis. In allusion to the Eastern visitors, Dr. Moulton (deceased president, whom Mr. Van Sandiek succeeded) had observed: "These Congresses have come at a happy moment, on the eve of the advance of Oriental minds, which, confined for ages in the crystal vessel described in the Thousand and One Nights, are about to enter the open road, international, inter-creedal, and social." Point was given to this remark by the eloquent speeches by the Hindu representative, Dr. (now the Hon. Sir) D. P. Sarvardhikary. Diversities of thought were illustrated by the Roman Catholic Canon von Langendonck, the Rationalist Bruno Meyer of Berlin, the Positivist M. Corra of Paris, and the anarchist Domela Nieuwenhuis. The co-ordinating ideal, however, was stated in Mr. Fox Pitt's uncontroversial declaration that the formation of high character, so far from being a by-product of the educational process, should be recognized as the supreme aim. The number of papers presented to the Hague Congress was so immense that they not only filled a volume of a thousand printed pages, but overflowed into a special volume containing the papers contributed from the United States.

It was resolved to hold a third Congress at Paris in 1916. The Great War frustrated this intention, but also enforced the gravity of educational issues, and added a more intense value to the work of international co-operation. Under Sir Frederick Pollock's chairmanship the International Executive Council revived the work of the Congress after the conclusion of peace, and its pioneers in all parts of the world encouraged one another in a fresh effort.

At the suggestion of the Paris Committee, the seat of the next Congress was transferred to Geneva. The Third Congress assembled accordingly at the Aula of the University of Geneva, July 28 to August 1, 1922, under the presidency of Dr. Adolphe Ferriere (chief advocate on the European Continent of the bracing and creative methods of "Les Ecoles Nouvelles") with M. Henri Reverdin, Professor of Philosophy, as secretary. About five hundred names, from some thirty nationalities were enrolled in the Congress membership. No small proportion of the inspiration and success of the Congress was due to the service rendered by the staff of the famous Institute J.-J. Rousseau, of which Professor E. Claparede was the founder. One remarkable session was held at the Secretariat of the League of Nations, and the voices that addressed the eager audience were those of a Japanese, a Chinaman, a Hindu, a Pole, a German, a Spaniard, and an Englishman—all speaking on the need of a purer method of History-teaching, considered in its international and moral aspect. This topic and that of "Social Service" were the only subjects discussed in the eight sessions. Among those who took part in the proceedings were Professor Foerster of Zurich, Sir R. Baden-Powell, the Chief Scout (who spoke on "Education in Love in place of Fear"), and M. Albert Thomas, Director of the Labour Office of the League of Nations.

On the proposition of Francesco Orestano, Professor of Philosophy at Palermo, it has been decided to hold the Fourth Congress at Rome in 1926. The situation may now be summed up as follows: (1) About thirty groups of sympathisers (National Committees) were inaugurated, and the Geneva Congress resolved that these should combine in a Permanent Association, assisting to form a "universal conscience"; (2) an International Moral Education Bureau has been established in Holland (communications may be addressed to Mr. S. L. Veenstra, 196 Laan van N. O. Indie, the Hague); (3) the Geneva Congress resolved:—

To circulate in all the countries associated with the Congress the "Vœu de Genève" on the subject of the moral reform of History Teaching, conceived in an international spirit, that is to say, of justice and sympathy; to stimulate the best known historians in all countries to work in harmony with this ideal, and to prepare text-books for schools, for popular reading, or with a view to general culture, inspired by it; and to direct the International Executive Council to appoint a Permanent International Committee of Experts to co-operate with the International Moral Education Bureau at the Hague. This Committee will prepare a general plan, to be liberally interpreted, for historical works; judge history books submitted to them by authors or publishers; award prizes to the best, or select any for honourable recognition; and promote their translation and world-wide circulation.

From the preceding accounts, short and simple as it is, it should be evident that very fruitful and beneficent results may be expected if the work is supported by adequate means. For that purpose we appeal, and all the more confidently, since we rent no offices and pay no officials.

MADRAS NOTES.

(From Our Correspondent.)

Madras, 11th November.

TAMIL NADU CONFERENCE.

A provincial Social Reform Conference used to be held in the pandal of the provincial Political Conference in the good old days, but the practice seems to have been given up since the ill-fated Social Reform Conference was broken up by the advanced politicians of the orthodox School at Tinnevely three or four years ago. So, we in Madras who have the cause of Social Reform at heart and who wish to see our dear country advance along the path of social and political reform simultaneously were not a bit surprised when we learnt that no Social Conference was held along with the Tamil Nadu Political Conference which met at Tiruppur in Salem district on the 5th instant. But it is really a matter for deep sorrow as it tends to confirm the suspicion created in the minds of all social reformers here by the events of the last few years that our advanced politicians do not at all care for Social Reform wherever and whenever they are not bitterly determined to oppose it. Of course, the Tamil Nadu Conference passed a resolution on the political necessity of abolishing untouchability but it had apparently neither the time nor the inclination to discuss larger and deeper questions of social reform such as caste of which untouchability, as I have said in a former letter, is but the most extreme manifestation.

So long as a Social Conference was held alongside of the political Conference the plea which some people used to indulge in that a political conference had nothing to do with caste and other social questions might have had a degree of justification but that plea does not hold good at the present time. It is to be hoped that the Tamil Nadu Conference will not rest satisfied with having passed a resolution on paper on the need for the removal of untouchability but that it will devote to the work of attempting to effect its removal at least a tenth part of the time, energy and money which it now spends on, say, Khaddar propaganda. So far as this presidency is concerned, the abolition of untouchability is a more pressing social and political need than the adoption of khaddar or any other reform.

A KHILAFAT CONFERENCE.

One would have thought that a Khilafat Conference in Madras when the Kemalists themselves had deposed their Sultan and deprived him of all temporal power in Turkey was quite a superfluous affair but, strange to say, the Tamil Nadu Khilafat Conference held its annual session as usual in the pandal of the political Conference above referred to on the 6th instant and, stranger still, passed a resolution congratulating Gazi Mustapha Kemal Pasha, the very man who had brought about the separation of the Khilafat and the Sultanate, praying for his long life and further triumphs and exhorting the Muslims of Madras to contribute liberally to enable the Central Khilafat Committee to present him with two aeroplanes and a sword of honour! If this is not an irony of fate, I should very much like to know what exactly is meant by that phrase. It is remarkable that this Khilafat Conference had no opinion of its own to offer on the mighty politico-religious changes that have recently taken place in Turkey although all of them had taken place long before the Conference met at Tiruppur. This fact, taken together with the views expressed by some leading Muslims of Madras in an interview published yesterday by the local Daily Express, tend to produce an impression that the Muslims of this presidency at any rate will gracefully acquiesce in the fait accompli reported from Stamboul and that this will mean the end of the Khilafat agitation so far as this province is concerned, unless our Khilafatists decide to direct their activities in future against Mustapha Kemal Pasha and to send the local limbs of the Angora Legion (if any) to fight against the forces of the Angora National Assembly! The Hindu Khilafat agitators in Madras and elsewhere who have often shown themselves in the past to be more Islamic than Islam will do well to ponder over these events calmly. Mustapha Kemal Pasha has proved that he is as great a statesman as a General and that he has his full share of the Time-Spirit which, ever since the dark ages were over, has tended towards the separation of the Church from the State and the establishment of a democratic form of Government in every country under the sun. And now the Time-Spirit has had its way in Turkey, despite the Ali brothers and a greater man than they, Mahatma Gandhi, and despite the hundreds of thousands of medieval-minded folks in India grievously misled by them (with the best of intentions no doubt) in this respect. The very fact that Kemal Pasha hitherto acclaimed by them as the "Savior of Islam," has been chosen by the Almighty as his instrument for the bringing about of this long over-due reform in Turkey will, I hope, provide them with some food for thought.

SADHUS IN CONCLAVE.

The increasing interest displayed by the Sadhus and the Snyasins in all parts of India in the political affairs of the country is no doubt a big portent but whether the portent is for good or for evil time alone will show. There are those who view with alarm the growing association of the Sadhus with the extreme phase of the Indian political movement as likely to result in religious and social reaction in the long-run. Their fears are not altogether unfounded for those who have vested interests in Religion and Society are not likely to differ entirely from those who enjoy vested interests in other spheres and to subordinate their interests always to the true interests of the masses. But the present writer is optimistic enough to believe that so long as the Sadhus' movement is in the hands and under the direction of comparatively educated and enlightened Sadhus of the type of Sree Sankaracharya of Saradapeeth and Swami Arpudananda, the organiser and the guiding spirit of the South Indian Sadhus' Conference which met at Tiruppur on the 4th instant, there is no reason to despair. When I met him about three years ago, Swami Arpudananda impressed me as a man of liberal views in religious and social matters and if his fellow-Sadhus hold equally liberal views on these questions, they can, indeed, do much to help the country's real progress in all directions instead of helping to retard it as some of us fear. All the same, it must be said that the proceedings of the Tiruppur Sadhus' Conference were far too political. Why should these new Anandas of this modern Ananda Mutt—for most, if not all, of them call themselves some Ananda or other—bother themselves so much about Non-Co-operation and Swaraj when the social and religious life of the country in general and their own ancient order in particular is seething with corruption? While, therefore, they have done well in passing a number of resolutions for doing away with the foul and evil practices at present in vogue in the temples and Mutts of Southern India, truth compels me to say that they will do still better if they confine their attention and activities in the future mainly, though not exclusively, to religious reform and social service for, in my humble opinion, this ought to be the primary function of a religious order like theirs and not the fleeting political changes that come over the land. To them may be addressed the unforgettable words of the Prophet of Nazareth: "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and all else shall be added unto you." As for any attempt they are likely to make to take India back to the Middle Ages, I am sure Modern India will know how to deal with it.

CONGRESS AND THE COUNCIL ENTRY.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The C. D. Committee have ably and impartially reviewed the political situation of the country from the inception of the movement of purification down to its present day of depression and have suggested some sagacious additions and alterations in the present programme. The Maharashtra Party deserves its well-earned congratulations of our countrymen for advocating and at last gaining necessary changes in the programme in the best interests of the nation, hearing silently all the criticisms of the raw-recruits to political warfare and of the do-nothing and demented sponsors of the programme. The members of the Committee are one on many recommendations. The question of Council-entry has been the apple of discord. This question has been ably advocated refuting successfully all the arguments of its opponents by the Nehru-Party. The Committee has rightly reported that the present councillors are not the true representatives of the nation and the Councils are instrumentalized for the era of repression. So the Councils are responsible for injuring the cause rather than its promotion as its boycotters presumed. Mr. Rajgopalachar with his colleagues consider the writings of his master as the hagiography to be followed like Casabianca irrespective of the on-rushing consuming fire, and consequently he has sounded a dissentient note to the call for the Council-entry. This question has called forth heated and acrimonious criticisms from various journals and persons. It must be said that leaders of great eminence and eloquence are in favour of this item. It would be lawful to discard the advice of these adepts in politics.

It is an experienced fact that the Councils have been made cheap instruments for defeating the successful working of the items of the constructive programme, so it would be very difficult to make the items of the constructive programme a success without entering the Councils.

I request the Maharashtrians to take action independently if the no-changewallas succeed in their canvassing exploitation. Even to-day there are two parties, viz., change and no-change. Why should the Maharashtrians make much of the divisions in the Congress Camp. It should not be forgotten that even Mahatma declared when he was enunciating his principles of N. C. O. that if the Congress will not accept his proposals he will start the movement without it. It would be better to work in the Councils according to your lights rather than waste the time in reading pious sermons to the people with these purified stick-to-it's.

I ardently appeal to all the independents to try their level best for this politic change and save the ship of the nation from being tossed about.

Let those who are disqualified to enter the Councils and those souls purified by the saintly movement who consider Council-entry a sin, work from without and let others do their best in the Councils.

WOMEN'S UNIVERSITY SETTLEMENT.

HOLIDAY HOUSE.

Some time ago an appeal was issued in the Times of India by the Women's University Settlement of Bombay for funds to build a Holiday House at Jahbordi-Gholvad and a permanent Settlement Hostel for women students in Bombay.

The first part of the programme has been accomplished and on Monday, November 6th, in the presence of some women students and a number of other friends, Miss Susie Sorabji, head of St. Helens's, Poona, unveiled the memorial tablet which bears the following inscription: "To the glory of God, this Holiday House was built by friends and supporters of the Women's University Settlement, Bombay in the years 1921-1922. The Sanad lease for the land was granted by the Government of Bombay in October 1920."

Professor Hamley of the Wilson College presided and after a Marathi hymn had been sung by the women students, Miss Gedge gave a short account of the building of the house. Mention was made of the generous help given by Chambers and Co., architects, and Richardson and Cruddas; and of the assistance rendered locally by Mr. Musale and other friends. Mr. Zack, the builder, was complimented on the success of his work.

Miss Sorabji congratulated the Settlement on the fulfilment of an idea and hoped that the house would be a meeting place for women of every community where a spirit of goodwill and friendship would prevail and many be benefited by the beautiful climate of Bordi.

She was asked to plant a chikkoo tree, which was presented by Mr. Masani, in memory of the occasion. The Holiday House is specially intended for the use of the women students of Bombay, and other ladies. All applications for the use of the bungalow should be made to the Secretary, Women's University Settlement, Rebeck Street, P. O. Jacob's Circle, Bombay.

THE LATE Mr. GADKARI.

THE EDITOR, The Indian Social Reformer.

SIR,

I agree with your correspondent Mr. G. K. Shirsat in appreciating the brilliant services of the late Mr. Gadkari to the Marathi literature. I admit that he was a star of the first magnitude in the firmament of our Marathi literature. But whether he was the marvellous Sirius of dazzling brilliance is certainly a matter of controversy and taste. What I fail to appreciate is his peculiar way of writing. Let him extol his works as much as he can, that will be a service to the great departed soul. But in order to do that, is it necessary to disparage the works of other great Marathi writers and call the Marathi literature a poor one? This ill suits a man who laments over the lack of appreciation in others. If there is no appreciation in the public, how is it that according to his own testimony "his place has been assigned amongst the greatest masters of the dramatic art on the general suffrage of the educated youth"? How is it that "he swam into the ken of discoverers almost after his death"? How is it that in Bombay and in other places, theatres are packed, when his dramas are being played? The Marathi stage is well patronized by the princes and the people. And dramatic art is held in high esteem. But it requires only Mr. Shirsat to condemn us for our lack of appreciation and raise to the sky the spirit of appreciation amongst Englishmen and Americans! If England is the utopia of appreciation, how is it that some of its best writers had to live and die in garrets? How is it that Goldsmith had to part with his immortal novel, the "Vicar of Wakefield" for a paltry sum and to die in debts and agony? Does your correspondent know that it was the Raja of Ramnad who sent Vivekananda to the Chicago Conference? The Raja of Ramnad's liberality is to be forgotten and America is to be extolled to the sky for its spirit of inquisitiveness! If Vivekananda, Bose, and Tagore are known in those countries, they are known only amongst the intellectual classes, while in this country both the masses and classes honour them and love them.

In France, in the flag-nation of the world, Moliere, the God of Comedy had to flee before his creditors and to play a nomad comedian for 12 years before he got the patronage of Louis XIV. Corneille the founder of French Tragedy, had no better fate. English education which has no doubt done much good to us is partly responsible for this bad spirit amongst us. Some young men look upon England as the utopia of every virtue, while this country is mentioned only to be damned. Let them extol those countries, we have no objection, but why so much praise to them at our cost?

The late Mr. Gadkari possessed those natural gifts which immortalized Moliere. I believe he was his reader. The scene of quacks in his drama 'Ekach Pels' or 'only one glass' leads me to believe that. But he was in no way his imitator. He had his own originality, flash of genius and brilliant wit and humour. His death was a heavy loss to Maharashtra and Marathi literature. The question arises what made him die so young at a time when his genius was blossoming. Let Maharashtra and the community which gave us this brilliant dramatist find out those causes. I believe Mr. Shirsat will not play Shelley and say that Adonia died of "the shaft which flies in darkness" or of the cold indifference of the people. Some say they are to be found in the above mentioned drama. Is it so?

AN APPEAL.

THE FREE ELEMENTARY SCHOOL FOR THE BLIND AT SUTHAMALLI VILLAGE, (SOUTH INDIA.)

The undersigned P. Shanmugha Ratnam Pillai, a blind man who, by his industry and perseverance learned in Miss Askwith School for the blind at Palamecottah and passed the Primary Examination and after undergoing the training for the teachers obtained the required certificate. He also knows weaving and the art of making mats. After leaving Miss Askwith's School, he was engaged as a teacher for ten years under the C. M. S. Mission at several places. Since 1918 he has started for the blind a free Elementary School, in his native village of Suthamalli and it is working very satisfactorily. The strength of the school is nearly 20 poor blind boys and is maintained by subscriptions from time to time. The yearly grant from the Government is Rs. 150 (One hundred and fifty) and other income is Rs. 85 per month. The expenses are Rs. 100 per month. He has collected Rs. 2,000 upto this date. To place the school on a more permanent basis, the undersigned intends to raise substantial buildings and to secure a permanent fund. He has already purchased a suitable site for the building. The estimated cost of the building amounts to nearly Rs. 3,000 and the fund for the permanent establishment is Rs. 10,000. The undersigned therefore prays that the public will be pleased to help him to carry out the intended object.

Contributions specially marked for the above object may be addressed to the Manager, the Indian Social Reformer, Fort, Bombay, who will remit the amount to the proper authority.

A new 24 page monthly magazine for boys and girls in India, dating from July 1922.

It is printed in English and contains illustrations drawn from Indian life. Each number contains several first-class stories, a poem or two, an Indian biography, sections on nature study, social service, current events, "something to do", and a prize competition.

Subscription Rs. 2 a year. For the six months of 1922 the subscription is Re. 1. If paid in advance for eighteen months to the end of 1923 it is Rs. 2-8-0. Back numbers of the magazine are available, so those who order now will receive a full set from July.

Rates for foreign countries, if paid in this country, 12 annas additional a year, or Re. 1-2 for eighteen months. Subscriptions sent from abroad, four shillings a year or five shillings for eighteen months.

What teachers and parents say of it:

"I have long been looking for just this kind of a magazine for the boys and girls of India."

"Should you be able to maintain the high standard you have adopted from the very outset, the success and popularity of your magazine are assured.....Paper, printing illustrations, and cover, all will appeal to the young folk. But above all, the freshness, local colour and graceful style of your articles, poems and stories."

"It is a charming magazine. How our kiddies love it!"

ROYAL YAKUTI.

THIS YAKUTI or life giving nectar has been prepared from the best, choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has wonderful properties of increasing virile power and it rectifies urinary disorders. In fact it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to those persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicine. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires. It is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills. Rupees ten only.

NOTES.

The Civil Disobedience Committee's Report: The All-India Congress Committee was unable to come to a decision on the recommendations of the Civil Disobedience Committee's report after a protracted discussion especially of the recommendation relating to entry into the Legislative Councils, and has postponed them all, except the one relating to Civil Disobedience, to be settled at the Congress session during Christmas week. We trust that these questions will be adequately discussed and satisfactorily settled at the Congress session at Gaya. Meanwhile, at the election of a new Maharashtra Provincial Committee, the pro-Council party has been routed; the new Committee being on the face of it a strong anti-change one. The advocates of Council-entry in the Civil Disobedience Committee gravely compromised the chances of their recommendation gaining acceptance by indicating "wrecking" as the main object of the change, though in the All-India Committee meeting, the "wrecking" policy would seem to have been kept as much as possible in the background.

Is there a Call for a New Party?: We invite attention to a weighty letter which we print today headed "Wanted a Swaraj Party." The feeling represented therein seems to be working in other parts of the country also, as evidenced by the following paragraph in the Bengalee, the Calcutta Liberal organ, of which Mr. Surendranath Banerji was editor till he accepted a Ministership:

We understand that, with the collapse of the non-co-operation party on the one hand and the fatuous ineptitude of the ministerial moderates on the other, an attempt is now being made in Bengal to gather the forces of independent nationalism and to organise their resources under a definite party. We think that the psychological moment for the establishment of such a party has now arrived—a party that will not betray national interests—and we hope it will come into being in time to send forth its candidates at the next general election both for the Provincial Council and the Indian Legislative Assembly.

For our own part, we feel that the point of view from which we support entry into the Councils has not been sufficiently pressed upon the consideration of Congressmen. The question of Council entry has so far been discussed as one only of two alternatives: to go to the Councils to wreck them or not to go to them at all. The third alternative of entering the Councils as an additional avenue for prosecuting the constructive programme, has not been given sufficient consideration. This writer did his best in his written statement and in a five hours' oral examination before Hakimji's Committee to exhibit this view, but he seems to have failed to make any impression except, as remarked against his name in the analysis of evidence in their Report, that "he has a distinct scheme of his own." Now that the two alternatives of the Report are both unacceptable, there is a possibility that as a compromise at least all may accept the third alternative which but continues the constructive programme. Meanwhile, it would be advantageous to have our correspondent's well-thought-out scheme discussed from all points of view.

Progress Backward: The Behar Herald has written a thoughtful article headed "Back to Status" in its last issue. The modern movement had been defined as a movement from status to contract. As our contemporary points out, we seem to be going back again to status, if ever, indeed, we had reached the goal of society based upon complete freedom of contract. We do not think that any country had attained this limit. The recently appointed President of the Colgate University in the United States in his inaugural address, a summary of which is printed today, spoke of democracy as an unrealized ideal because of the glaring inequalities, moral, mental and material, which exist in every country. "The divine right of the people," he declared, "has no more foundation than the divine right of kings—and both are wrong. Manhood suffrage has been our greatest and most popular failure, and now we double it by granting universal adult suffrage". The four-anna franchise has made the Indian National Congress more popular, but has it made it more democratic than when A. O. Hume ruled it with a rod of iron?

Success and Failure: The Right Honourable Srinivasa Sastry in his address at the Liberal Conference in May last pronounced Gandhi's movement a failure. He claims now that his mission in the Dominions has been a success though not such a success as he would have wished it to be. It would be interesting to know what Mr. Sastry's tests of success and failure are. What has Mr. Sastry achieved? He has enabled Indians in Australia to engage in banana cultivation, to get the benefit of the irrigation system, and in Canada to get a wife and child admitted. Of this last, we are not sure, but we assume that it has been allowed. What has Gandhi done? According to Sir Chimanlal Setalvad, he has awakened the political consciousness of the people of India and created in them a sense of self-respect. According to Mr. Rushbrook Williams, Gandhi's idealism has captured minds given to political violence and put an end to anarchic crimes in India. Again, we ask: what is Mr. Sastry's test of success and failure? "Whether of the two did the will of the Father?"

The Guru-ka-bagh Muddle: It was stated some time back that Sir Ganga Ram, the philanthropic Punjab gentleman to whose munificent encouragement of the remarriage of Hindu widows we have referred more than once, had taken on a lease from the Mahant the land attached to the Guru-ka-Bagh shrine, and had allowed the Akalis to cut the trees thereon for the Gurudwara kitchen. The legal knot being thus untied, Government ceased to make arrests and withdrew the Police. The Mahant has since denied having executed any lease in favour of Sir Ganga Ram. He states that a subordinate revenue officer of Government obtained his signature to certain papers without his knowledge of their contents and that the announcement that they contained a lease has not been made by his permission. The Leader of Allahabad rightly observes: "The device adopted by Government to hide its surrender was very clumsy. The Mahant ought to have been advised from the very beginning either to concede the right claimed by Akalis, or to seek the aid of a law court to establish his right, the authorities taking every care, however, that there was no serious breach of the peace. But instead of doing so they mixed themselves up in a religious quarrel and resorted to shocking methods to protect the disputed land from trespass. While thousands of Akalis have suffered in various ways it is extremely doubtful if a single one of the responsible officials who mismanaged the whole thing and created a huge problem, and thereby estranged a most loyal section of the population of the Punjab, will be called to account." Sir Edward Maclagan has got the Punjab into a hopeless mess which requires a different type of Governor to clean up, and it would be well for the Province if His Excellency decides to retire upon a proportionate pension on the latest scale. But no English Indian Civilian is ever cashiered for incompetence. The legend about the greatest Civil Service in the world must be kept up at all costs, however outworn facts may show it to have become.

Railway Exploitation in India: The Servant of India writes as follows under the heading, "Socialist Propaganda": "The Chairman's speech at the Annual General Meeting of the Barsi Light Railway Co., Ltd., on the 10 October throws an interesting light on the exploitation of India by "Indian" railways. The gross earnings of the company for the year under review had only once been higher; the traffic receipts for the last half-year indeed had beaten all records; working expenses, though showing "a tendency to increase," could be balanced by "increases in the maxima rates for goods traffic sanctioned by Government with effect from April last." As a natural consequence, the company once more distribute a dividend of 12 per cent. to their shareholders—as indeed they had done for the previous two years: free of income tax, of course. In the face of all these facts, the Chairman not only is not ashamed to admit having applied to the Indian Government for permission to increase their passenger fares still further, but actually makes a grievance of it that the Government has so far not sanctioned it! The "nationalization of railways" may be a bugbear to some classes in England, but there is nobody in India anyhow who is not convinced of its necessity—and we thank the Chairman of the B. L. Ry. Co. for having so forcibly demonstrated that necessity." An analysis of the earnings and expenditure of some other railways which have raised their fares, will also reveal similar anomalies.

An Expensive School: Some months ago, the Hon. Mr. B. N. Sarma said in a speech that before he became a member of the Government of India he rather distrusted the motives and the capacity of that body but since becoming one he had formed the highest opinion of both! In a similar vein, Sir Chimanlal Setalvad averred at an Engineer's dinner last week that during his membership of the Bombay Government in the last two years he had learnt a good deal about the great work that engineers were doing in this country though his mind was a blank in this respect before, and that the public scarcely realised its magnitude. Why not make the public "a member" of Government, thus giving it the same opportunity as Mr. Sarma and Sir Chimanlal have for learning to appreciate the worth and work of Government!

The Story of a Statue: The Leader of Allahabad tells an interesting story regarding a contribution of Rs. 50,000 for a statue to Sir Harcourt Butler, the retiring Governor of the United Provinces. The question of the contribution of Rs. 50,000 by the Balrampur estate for a statue of Sir Harcourt Butler, writes our contemporary, was the subject of interpellation in the local Council. "The Maharaja of Balrampur was not alive at the time the question of erecting a statue of His Excellency was decided or even discussed, but it appears that the deceased had with commendable foresight made a promise before his death, without any apparent occasion for it, that if at any time a statue was raised in honour of Sir Harcourt Butler, he would give Rs. 50,000. He forgot to make any provision about it in his will. Was the promise contained in any letter? Not at all. It was merely a verbal promise—To whom was it made? To the hon. the Home Member."

The Governor at Sangli: The Chief of Sangli well deserves the cordial tribute which His Excellency the Governor of Bombay recently paid to that State in the Southern Maratha country. The pomp associated with Oriental rulers is entirely absent in his case, and the cleanness and simplicity of his personal life are set off by the enlightened and progressive solicitude that he evinces for the well-being of his people. No wonder that his personal popularity among his subjects is great. The Chief Sahib is keenly interested in education and Sangli bids fair early to become a great educational centre in this Presidency.

A Poet's Poet: Mrs. Meynell, whose death was announced last week, was a poetess, but she inspired much greater poetry than what she wrote. She and her husband reclaimed the starving, opium-broken author of that glorious epic, "the Hound of Heaven," literally from the gutter, and his gratitude and admiration for her inspired all his later poetry. To her was dedicated the group of poems bearing the title "Love in Dian's Lap" of which an eminent critic wrote: "Was woman ever more exquisitely sung? I do not know in the whole realm of English poetry a more noble tribute to noble womanhood."

The Rev. M. T. Titus: We print today some interesting notes sent from Cairo by the Rev. M. T. Titus. Mr. Titus belongs to the American Methodist Episcopal Mission, and he was posted till he left for Egypt at Moradabad. His object in going to that country is to study and understand the Mahomedan point of view at such a great centre of Islamic learning and culture as the famous University of Cairo. Such enquiries cannot but be fruitful of good, as they must lead to a sympathetic understanding between the followers of the two great religions, which is sadly needed to-day. We are obliged to Mr. Titus for sending us these valuable notes.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, DECEMBER 2, 1922.

THE POET ON THE PLATFORM.

There can be no more striking proof of the extent to which culture and wealth have become divorced in India than that a thinker and poet of the transcendental eminence of Rabindranath Tagore should have to undertake lecturing tours in order to raise funds for the noble University he is creating at Calcutta. It is impossible to appreciate adequately the spirit of utter self-abnegation to what is felt as a compelling national duty, which alone could have persuaded him to adopt the role of an itinerant lecturer. The incongruity is emphasised when his audiences are restricted to a single community or to persons who can pay a price for admission to them. The Poet belongs to all India, indeed to all the world; and when he speaks it must be to all without distinction of race or creed. The Poet, we are sure, would have winced when Sir Jamsetjee Jeejeebhoy introduced him to his audience on Monday as the Nobel prize-winner for poetry. His own address was not in tune with the universalism of his poetry and philosophy. Some of the general statements to which he committed himself in that address have no other reason for them except the psychic necessity which every speaker feels to get into sympathetic touch with his audience. Indeed, they represent lapses from the habitual thought of the Poet as it appears not only in his poems and stories, but also in his reasoned expositions of his view of human, and more particularly Indian, history. We refer especially to his references to the Indian climate as tropical and enervating, and as lending itself to the contemplative, introspective life that characterised India. Also, the number is increasing of Indian students of history who do not accept the theory—for it is no more than that—of the Aryan immigration or of the Aryans having been immigrants of a superior race and culture.

The enervating influence of a tropical climate is one of the many suggestions thrown out by a school of western historians of civilization, of which Buckle is the best known, to account for the subjection of tropical countries. Another, since disproved by the rise of Japan, is that rice-eating races are doomed to be dominated by wheat-eating and meat-eating ones. At a certain stage of English education in this country, we swallowed with avidity every generalization of Western writers that appeared to shift the responsibility for our condition from our character and capacity to climate and environment. We did not pause to consider that the data from which these generalizations were deduced, were mostly limited to a small area of the earth and to a small space of time and that, even within these limits, they were by no means extensive. Mahatma Gandhi's onslaught on English education as inducing slave-mentality, is largely misplaced, but it holds true of these debilitating suggestions which have had the effect of making us think of ourselves as doomed by natural laws to a national life devoid of energy and initiative. It is not the tropical climate but such theories that are enervating. The Indian thinker and teacher has to wage unceasing and implacable war against them. Take the very case of Persia whose climate is not tropical and, therefore, according to this theory, not enervating. Arabia, on the other hand, is a land of tropical deserts. How is it that the Arabs, when they came under the influence of Islam, developed the energy and activity which conquered not only Persia but nearly half of Europe? The Sun is an energising, not an enervating, influence. The ancestors of the Parsis as well as of the Hindus did not worship the Sun from ignorance or superstition. The most vigorous growth in the vegetable and animal world is to be found in the tropics. Why should a tropical climate be an enervating influence on man alone? Further, history tells us that wealthy and powerful empires were founded in the tropics and great civilizations flourished there. On the other hand, people in temperate climates have not always been remarkable for energy and activity. Sir Henry Maine held that the idea of progress was born in Greece. "Except the blind forces of Nature," he wrote, "nothing moves in this world which is not Greek in its origin." The climate of Greece is probably much the same as in classic days, but Progress has made her home elsewhere.

You have the Pyrrhic dance as yet,
Where's the Pyrrhic phalanx gone?
Of two such lessons why forget
The nobler and the manlier one?

So lamented Byron nearly a century ago. To-day Greece, betrayed by her own statesmen, turns savagely upon them and shoots six of them dead by order of a military tribunal! Yet the same Sun shines to-day on Greece as when Athens was the mother of Arts and Eloquence.

The fact is that it is not the climate which affects the body, but the ideals which inspire the mind, that make individuals and nations strong and great. Even Western thought is fast emerging from its nineteenth century opinion of the mind being subservient to the body. Contempt for metaphysics is affected only by men who have drifted out of the main stream of European life and thought into glittering and comfortable places in Asia and Africa. Medical science to-day is recognising Psychology as of at least equal importance to it as Physiology. The recognition of the influence of suggestions and auto-suggestions on capacity and character, is revolutionising our ideas of Education. Everyone can observe for himself that temperature and environment affect him most when his inner being is least sustained by ideals. The present depression of India is due not to the climate but to a falling off in faith and ideals. Our forefathers, while they did not court poverty, pain and death, did not stand in such abject terror of them as we, the so-called educated men of India, do to-day. They loved something, even were it a superstition, better than a comfortable life. They longed to live but not on any terms imposed upon them. Even if the physical climate has a depressing influence, if the mental climate is maintained at its proper temperature, its effect can be prevented. The late Prof. William James wrote an essay on "the moral equivalent of war" in which he showed how the state of mind in which the martial virtues grow and thrive, can be cultivated without the devastating medium of war. Even so a temperate mental climate can be created and maintained in a torrid physical climate by a well-ordered social and national economy. The Poet seems to suggest that the metaphysical and contemplative life of India is the outcome of her enervating, tropical climate. On the contrary, we think that the truly contemplative life is the most intense form of human activity. It is impossible to persons in a depressed state of mind or body. A Tamil sage likens the state of absorbed contemplation to the top which seems to be at rest while at the height of its spin. India was great morally and materially when she was great in contemplation and produced metaphysicians whose thoughts sublime pierced the night like stars. And she will be great again when she casts aside her trammels of custom and caste and lets her free spirit soar as in the days of old when Death itself could not deter her from the high-hearted, fearless pursuit of Truth. No Indian thinker has inculcated this so persistently and consistently as the Poet, and it is because his words (as reported in the Press) seemed to imply some temporary deviation from his own teaching, that we have thought it our duty to make these observations.

FREE FEEDING OF BRAHMINS.

(By E. R. M.)

Free feeding of Brahmins in temples, irrespective of their health, wealth, profession or character, out of temple funds, is a custom prevailing in the southern districts of the Madras presidency. With the advance of rational ideas on religious matters and the consequent feeling that this custom is nothing short of a gross abuse of charity, it is gradually disappearing. In the good old days when the Brahmins pursued the profession prescribed for them, viz., the learning and teaching of Vedas, it might have been a necessity as a sort of religious obligation to feed them out of public funds. But in these days when Brahmins have entered all vocations of life, there is hardly any such obligation. The funds belonging to the temples include religious offerings received from members of the various castes and communities in the Hindu fold, not excluding the untouchables and unapproachables whose entry into the temples is supposed to pollute the temple and its Deity. It is, therefore, gratifying that the Madras High Court has held that the expense incurred for the free feeding of Brahmins out of funds entrusted to the heads of Mutts is not a legitimate expense binding on the Mutts. The following is a brief summary of an interesting appeal on which judgment was delivered by Mr. Justice Krishnan and Mr. Justice Ramesam at the Madras High Court on the 8th November:—

In the Udipi taluka of the South Kanara district, there are eight Mutts having properties of their own and there is in addition the famous Sri Krishna temple with the famous idol installed by Madhwachari, the founder of the Madhwa sect of Brahmins. The management of the temple is carried on by rotation by the eight Mutts, each managing the temple for a period of two years. In addition to its own income which is considerable, the temple receives grants both from the British Government and from the Mysore Government, and the Matadhipathi (head of the Mutt) in charge of the temple for the time being also brings with him the income of his particular Mutt for bearing the expenses of the temple during the period under his charge. From 1914 to 1916 the head of Sirur Mutt was in charge of the temple and he spent Rs. 1,40,000 on its management. Of this sum Rs. 1 lakh was derived from the income of the temple and the balance he borrowed from the head of the Admar Mutt. The head of the Sirur Mutt subsequently died and a successor was appointed by the Sodai Mutt. The head of the Admar Mutt thereupon brought a suit against the new head of the Sirur Mutt for the recovery of the moneys due to him from the previous head. The Subordinate Judge of South Canara held that the expenses that had been incurred by the deceased head of the Sirur Mutt for the management of the temple were legitimate and the debts were therefore binding on the present head of the Mutt. An appeal being preferred to the High Court, their Lordships in their judgment held that the expenses had been mostly for feeding Brahmins at the rate of 2,000 per day. There was no evidence to show that the feeding of thousands of Brahmins daily free, gratis and for nothing, was a legal obligation that had rested on the late head of the Sirur Mutt. There was evidence on the other hand to show that the heads of Mutts were to regulate their expenses according to their status, and economy was to be exercised in the matter of feeding Brahmins and incurring other expenses. Thus taking the evidence into consideration their Lordships were of opinion that the debts of the deceased head of the Sirur Mutt were not binding on the properties of the Mutt and so set aside the decision of the Subordinate Judge. At the same time, their Lordships held that the head of the Admar Mutt should have a decree on the personal assets, if any, of the late head of the Sirur Mutt, now in possession of his successor.

The lesson conveyed in the above judgment is obvious. No doubt, the head of the Sirur Mutt must have been actuated by the desire to preserve the prestige of the Mutt by strictly following the traditional custom. The judgment of the Madras High Court shows that the influence of certain customs is gradually declining. This as well as the acquittal of Dr. Choyi, a member belonging to the unapproachable community in Malabar, in the Tali Tank pollution case some time ago, must serve as an eye-opener to those in power—like the present Dewan of Cochin who recently advised the Ezhavas to fight out their case (grievance due to the prohibition of using certain public roads in Oranganore) in a court of law,—who still cling to custom without any regard to the advancing tide of rational ideas on religious and social matters.

Sir John Salmond in his book on "Jurisprudence" begins the chapter on "Custom" by saying that

"the importance of custom as a source of law continuously diminishes as the legal system grows." According to this eminent Jurist, "Custom is the embodiment of those principles which have commended themselves to the national conscience as principles of truth, justice and public utility," and "as those customs develop and alter with change of circumstances and the growth of public enlightenment, the State is wisely content to allow such development and modification to reflect themselves in the law which it administers." It cannot be denied, however, that custom still exercises a very great influence in the administration of law. But it does not mean that all customs, however immemorial they may be, must have the sanction of law, and their Lordships of the Madras High Court have done a distinct public service in holding that "the feeding of thousands of Brahmins daily free, gratis and for nothing" is not a legitimate expense binding on the Mutt responsible for the management of the temple. The privilege of getting meals free and for nothing is enjoyed by able-bodied men belonging to the Brahmin community most of whom are strangers to the Brahmanical ideals. This is a social evil as it tends to increase the number of idlers and vagabonds in society. The Hindu law is mostly based on the texts of Manu and Yajnavalkya. These are not the days of Manu and Yajnavalkya and the condition of society today is certainly not the same as it existed during the days of those learned law-givers. "That which is true to-day may become false to-morrow by change of circumstances, and that which is taken for wisdom may to-morrow be recognised as folly by the advance of knowledge." It is doing a grave injustice to the ancient law-givers to think that they had thought that the laws expounded by them to suit the then conditions of society would outlast eternity. There is a growing public opinion on the necessity of modifying some portions of the Hindu Law. That such persons having wide juridical experience like Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Aiyar, an ex-Judge of the Madras High Court, have come forward to effect legislation to reconstruct portions of Hindu Law, is itself a welcome sign of the times. The Editor of the Indian Social Reformer had suggested the need for the formation of an association for the promotion of legislation on Hindu Law topics and that suggestion was earnestly taken up by Mr. Seshagiri Aiyar some time ago. I do not know how far the idea has developed and whether it has been given any practical shape. Law is only a means to an end, viz., Justice. The function of the judiciary is the administration of justice. The decisions of such liberal-minded judges like the Hon. Mr. Justice Krishnan and the Hon. Mr. Justice Ramésam of the Madras High Court and the Hon. Justice Sir Lallubhai Shah of the Bombay High Court, although they are practically helpless to use their individual discretion where the existing laws point to the contrary, will give a great impetus to the much-needed reform of the existing Hindu Law.

NOTES FROM EGYPT.

IMPRESSIONS OF PALESTINE.

My trip has not been very extended, but still I have seen many things that have been full of interest for one whose life-work keeps him in India. The first thing that impresses one everywhere in loud contrast to India, is the well-to-do condition and appearance of the people. Poverty is scarcely known in these lands as we see it in India. On the barren lime-stone mountains of Palestine and Syria the people somehow manage to make what appears to be a comfortable living. Here is an Olive grove, there a vineyard, or an orchard of fig trees, and in spite of the almost indescribable scarcity of water, these evidences of husbandry yield their fruits in their season, the people of the land make a living. Of course, wheat is a common crop, and in the fall of the year one sees the farmers making extensive preparations where there is any soil at all for the winter sowing. But many of the Syrians, both Christian and Mahomedan, find themselves forced off the soil owing to the scarcity of the latter, and so find their way to America, where they work in Steel Mills or other factories, or do small business in shops or by carrying their wares around from house to house. One can scarcely go into a village of Palestine or Syria, it is said, without finding some one who speaks "American."

The hospitable nature of the village people of Palestine, whether Arabs or Christians, was very surprising. They received us gladly, and even though we were just passing through, they would often invite us to come and have "qahwah" (coffee) with them. But there was one thing that one could not help noticing and that was how much more advanced the Christian villages were as a rule than the Arab villagers, both in worldly goods, sanitation and education. This is explained by the fact that they have naturally been more susceptible to Western influences, with which they have had direct contact for centuries.

The Arabs and the Christians of Palestine seem to get along quite happily together, and according to them there is no place for the large number of Jewish immigrants who are invading the land. In fact they have joined hands in political opposition to the Jew; and Moslem-Christian Associations have been formed in different parts of the country to assert the validity of their position. Many of the Jews who formerly lived in the villages on isolated holdings have given them up, and fled to the cities for safety. But one cannot help being impressed, as he sees Jewish colonies purchasing land, building the waste places, planting trees, vineyards, and sowing the good seed of industry and modern improvement wherever they happen to be, that for better or for worse, and in spite of all opposition, the Jews mean business and are in the country to stay. In time, as soon as the necessary psychological adjustments can be made, one can well expect that the heat of the moment will die down, and that Palestine will be the better for their coming and their enterprise.

The women of these lands are the greatest surprise to one, I mean the pardah women. In India one is accustomed to think of pardah and seclusion as synonymous terms. But they are not so here. Whether the yashmak or veil be black and cover the whole face, or whether it be white and so thin that it is but the faint suggestion of a veil, it does not hinder the "pardah" woman of Damascus or Cairo from going about the streets of the city unescorted to do her own shopping in the bazaars. From the height of her skirt and the make of her shoes, and the tailoring of her dress you would think she had just stepped out of a train from Paris, but the veil is a hasty reminder that she is a resident of the Near East and not of the bold and daring West. Nevertheless she has gone far, and she is gradually casting off the things that hamper. Would that the clumsy burkha in India might be exchanged for the less hampering veil of Damascus or Cairo.

But perhaps the most interesting speculations that one can venture upon are those that have to do with the future of the Khilafat. Everyone, Westerner, Christian and Mahomedan is saying, "Well, what is going to happen? Is Kemal Pasha right or is he wrong? Has the time come to separate Temporal and Spiritual power in Islam or not? Is it orthodox or is it an innovation pure and simple? If it is not orthodox will it be possible to get an Ijma, or Agreement from the Islamic world that will make it right and proper?" We asked these questions of the Sheikhs of the Azhar University in Cairo, the great intellectual centre of Islam; but they, too, are seeking for the light. The world has been promised a fatwa from the leading Ulema of Egypt on the subject; but for the present everyone is hunting for an answer. Still at least, every one admits that a crisis of far-reaching importance has been reached in the world of Islam.

One cannot make a trip to the Near East in these troubled times, and especially to Syria and not see very visible evidences of the terrible ravages of War. All through the Near East the American people by free-will offerings are keeping tens of thousands of refugee Armenians from starvation, death and degradation through the Agency of the Near East Relief. In Beirut alone I visited a refugee camp of some 6,000 people who had come out of Anatolia because there was no place for them there any longer. They were living in tents made of blankets, in shacks made of store boxes; in caves in the side of the mountain, in arches under the railway, all on an old dumping ground of the city of Beirut between the city and the sea. Then I visited an orphanage where there were a thousand boys and girls from 5 to 18 years of age; and all of these—the men and women and the orphans—are practically without means of support. It is a terrible tragedy to see these poor, wretched, homeless people to whom life holds out nothing but anguish and distress, except as the Near East Relief can bring help and hope. Once they had homes, land and business—now they have nothing—and they cannot go back to what were once their homes, for they are wanderers on the face of the earth. This is the great tragedy of the Near East, and of the world today.

LONDON LETTER.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, November 9th, 1922.

SMALLPOX IN LONDON.

The temperature of London has been rising rather rapidly during the last two weeks. The Parliamentary elections are naturally very unsettling and the feverish activity of each party does not lend calm to the atmosphere. Then the blow of the Near East upheaval has been a tremendous shock. We did think that this was on its way to a peaceful settlement. And lastly, the smallpox scare which is agitating this mighty and congested city is sending the temperature up to fever point. The last named trouble is very real one, and though urgent measures are being taken to localise the outbreak to Poplar, where it arose, other parts of London are taking all necessary precautions to deal with cases should they arise there. Everywhere people are being urged to be vaccinated as a precaution against the spread of this terrible disease, and large numbers of people are availing themselves of the services of the public and free vaccinator. The origin of the outbreak is not yet known, but the rapid spread of it was due to the fact that the victim, a washerman at the Poplar workhouse, who first contracted it, had it so mildly that he was walking about among his fellow-inmates for over a week before the case was diagnosed, thus spreading the infection. Altogether 43 cases have been notified and twelve have proved fatal. It is nearly twenty years since London has been troubled by a real attack of small-pox, and it is estimated that about forty per cent. of the population were unvaccinated at the time of the present outbreak and very few of our present medical practitioners have seen the disease.

LABOUR AND WOMEN.

Labour suffered a severe defeat last week in the Municipal Elections, people having got tired of what they regarded as wasteful expenditure and the unwarrantable heavy rates resulting from the administration of those boroughs and municipalities where Labour had a majority or overwhelming influence. But in addition, the party is going to the polls with a capital levy in the forefront of its programme and the 'Nationalisation' of all essential services and undertakings involving an attack upon private ownership. People in this country are not prepared to adopt such a drastic programme, whatever intrinsic merits it may have, and those who are most opposed to wastefulness in expenditure and most attached to private undertaking are women whom the Conservatives accordingly confidently hope to poll heavily. It is true that the woman's vote, being so new and so vast, is yet incalculable, but there seems to be a general impression that on the whole it is Conservative rather than extreme. At the same time, the women leaders realise how "far" behind is the political education of the enfranchised woman. The women's societies are endeavouring to get the new Prime Minister to pledge himself to an extension of the franchise to women upon the same terms as it is enjoyed by men.

So far, Mr. Bonar Law has not committed himself. There will be nothing very picturesque about the next administration, but, at the same time, it is not expected that it will be a reactionary one. Indeed, Mr. Bonar Law says that no Government of which he is a Member will be reactionary. So that it is generally anticipated that, whilst the next administration will be conservative and cautious, it will not be Die-hard. Some of the criticisms of the new Government, that it is composed so largely of peers or their eldest sons, seems a little bit out of place. If men like Mr. Edward Wood and Mr. W. Ormsby-Gore may be taken as representatives of the new type of young Conservative, then it will be desirable rather to multiply them and peers of their type. For they are as far as any Liberal from holding Die-hard views.

POOR RESPONSE TO GOVERNMENT OF INDIA LOAN.

There was a poor response to the appeal of the Indian Government for twenty millions sterling, upon what the share market regards as good terms. This is not a good time to borrow, and the amount asked for was large, but it is believed that though the underwriters have had to take over the great bulk of the loan, it will eventually be well-floated.

PRISON REFORMS.

The Commissioners of Prisoners have made and are recommending in their last Annual Report a number of modifications in prison life. The convict crop, for example, has been abolished, and all men's hair is now cut as in ordinary life. Broad arrows are being removed from the outside of prison clothing and a new style of prison clothing which will give a better chance to self-respect, is being advised. Prisoners on being transferred from one prison to another, wear civilian clothes to avoid exposure to the public. Wires and bars are being removed as far as possible from the compartments in which visits are paid by relatives and friends, and suitable exercise is given daily to men under close confinement. The Commissioners make the following reply to their critics: "Pampering is not the object, nor is it the result. It is our duty, as custodians of those who are for a time forcibly separated from life in the civic community, to restore them to it at least as fit as when we receive them. To this end we should feed and exercise their minds as well as their bodies."

THE NEED FOR REFORM IN DIVORCE LAWS.

The decision of the Law Lords on Friday last in what has become famous as the Rutherford Divorce Case, a case in which an innocent woman is tied for life to an insane murderer, will do more to crystallise public opinion and induce an alteration in our Divorce laws than anything that has happened during the last few years. It brings into prominence the whole question of the morality of a man or woman being bound for life to a husband or wife who is a hopeless, incurable, and, in not a few cases, criminal lunatic. At present, as the law stands, should a young man or woman become incurably insane a few days after marriage, the legal tie remains unbreakable even though the victim of insanity may live to be an old person. Some years ago the Divorce Law Commission recommended a reformation in the basis of divorce, but the Church and a large section of the public was strongly opposed to any increase in the facilities for divorce. Since then, however, opinion has grown in favour of freedom in cases of continued insanity, and the Judge's summing up remarks on Friday last, will do much to make this question a very definite one again, when once the elections are over and foreign affairs enable us to get on with our domestic difficulties. The number of incurable married lunatics in the United Kingdom has been estimated at about 40,000. This problem has produced one of those anomalies in English life which is difficult to understand. It is quite well-known that two fickle people, fairly 'cute and clever, with a little money, can get round the Law in this respect and gain their freedom. It is done almost every day, but there is no such possibility for the person tied for life to a lunatic or a life convict, and a great wave of sympathy is making itself felt for the 40,000 spouses condemned to a life of loneliness or legal sin. Lord Buckmaster's Bill has twice been passed in the House of Lords, but Mr. Lloyd George's Government were so busy plunging us into trouble in Europe that they could grant no time for its discussion in the Commons.

MANHOOD SUFFRAGE—AMERICA'S GREATEST FAILURE.*

"The word 'democracy' has become a fetish in America," the recently appointed president of Colgate University declared in his inaugural address, "To criticise it is considered not only poor form but futile. We are permitted to do the utmost violence to democracy in our actions," he continued, "so long as we extol it with our words. By 'democracy' I accept the ordinary meaning of the word, the rule of the people, of the majority. Better still, the definition of Lincoln's Gettysburg speech, 'Government of the people, by the people, for the people.' This seems to be the ideal, especially on this continent, but as yet unrealized. It is true that we have had government of the people, but never by the people, and only incidentally and unintentionally for the people. If all people were born free and equal, democracy would not only be possible but very desirable. Whether fortunately or unfortunately, this is not so. The mental tests recently made on one and three-quarter million men in the United States Army showed us not only inequality, but revealed larger proportions in the extreme classes than we thought possible. With only 13 1/2 per cent of the population able to get through college well, fifteen per cent unable to get through at all and only twenty-five per cent able to comprehend the significance of the ballot, democracy is out of the question. The real tariff experts of this country could probably be counted on the fingers of one hand, and these do not agree, and yet we calmly submit the subject of the tariff to the people as a whole, twenty-five per cent of whom are mentally subnormal, with an average mentality of slightly over thirteen years. It may be a wise course to treat the people like children and let them play at governing themselves, but would it probably not be as wise to recognize the truth? The play goes on until a problem arises and then we call for a leader.

* The Foreign Press Service, Inc.

What we mean, of course, is a ruler. The ruler thus called rules autocratically during the period of difficulty, and then lets us play again. The most autocratic ruler of the war period was the ruler of the greatest democracy, Mr. Wilson. The divine right of the people has no more foundation than the divine right of kings—and both are wrong. Manhood suffrage has been our greatest and most popular failure, and now we double it by granting universal adult suffrage. The melting pot figure so often applied to America has been incorrectly interpreted. There is no alchemy in the melting pot. Some, apparently, thought that if we put gold and silver and copper and iron into the pot the product of the furnace would be gold. We find that we did not get rid of an ounce of iron. In fact, we find after a few generations more iron and less gold."

HINDU-MAHOMEDAN UNITY.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

It has been a great joy to me to have read your note on this subject in the issue of November 4. I, who have always called myself a Hindu disciple of Christ and who believe that all Christians in India can legitimately call themselves and ought to call themselves Hindus, rejoice to find your "valued Mahomedan friend" saying therein that all the Mahomedans too should call themselves Hindus. As he says, the term "Hindu" is more a term of ethnological and geographical significance than a creedal one. It is true it has a cultural and even religious meaning, but it is of such a catholic and cosmopolitan character that all who live in Hindustan can call themselves Hindus. This becomes the more easy for them to do since the Khilafat has been separated from the temporal power, which is a step most necessary for giving Mahomedanism a truly spiritual character, and as such it ought to be welcomed by all, Mahomedans as well as Hindus. In these days, any religion or church that wants to function properly must be disestablished, and it is only when it stands before the world in its own spiritual power, absolutely free and unhampered by any material or temporal power, that it can do its work properly. One often despaired of Mahomedanism ever coming to this state, but Kemal Pasha has cut the gordian knot in a really remarkable manner, and thereby has rendered the whole Moslem world and incidentally the whole of Humanity a great service. In course of time this is sure to make the Indian Moslems feel themselves more at home in India than they could have ever been with their loyalty being divided between their own country and the Sultan of Turkey as the Khalif. However, what is needed to-day in India to bring these two great communities, the Hindus and the Moslems, together is a sort of social and semi-religious rapprochement such as Keshub Chunder Sen thought of in the year 1878 when he held a sort of conference with men like Sir Syed Ahmed and Swami Dayanand Saraswati in Delhi. What was impossible then may be quite possible to-day in these times when everything is changing and the old prepossessions and prejudices have given way. I would request all religious and social liberals among both Hindus and Mahomedans to come closer together in all things, political, social, cultural and even religious, so that that great day when all the children of this great land will be one in mind and spirit as well and may come close to us, and we might witness a true Hindu-Moslem Unity.

Yours truly,

WANTED—A SWARAJ PARTY.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In your leading article in the issue of 25th November you took a very sane line of thought, and I am sure many persons besides myself are whole-heartedly in favour of your view. To enter Councils with a view to smash them from within, leaving aside the ethics of the action, is impracticable for many obvious reasons. It is more than doubtful that, constituted as at present they are, the constituencies will return in any appreciable number pledged wreckers, and if they do, I for one shall have little respect left for their political intelligence and capacity for Swaraj. One can understand a deliberate attempt at keeping a huge percentage of voters off the polling-booths, and if it succeeds it will denote to friends and foes alike a great moral victory, though to be generally recognised as such, the percentage of abstainers must be preponderating and definitely ascertained by holding simultaneously some other public functions confined to such voters alone. This will completely dispense off the argument that low percentage of polling is mainly due to the general apathy of the electorate. If this method had been adopted at the 1920 elections, many a successful candidate—at least such as really matter and lend the Councils the weight and dignity they possess—would have thought twice before taking his seat as a legislator. But to advise the voter not to exercise the franchise as a protest is one thing, and to ask him to record his vote in favour of one whose policy, avowed and definite, would be to reduce the Council to a farce is quite different.

But this is besides the point, and the pros and cons have been sufficiently discussed in the press. Certain it is that at the Gaya Congress the matter will receive further attention from both the sides, and to whichever view the great assembly leans, the question whether the Councils should be utilised for an active propaganda in favour of the Bardoli programme will remain unanswered. And this is a very important question as you have pointed out in your leading article.

It is up to you, sir, to form and lead a Swaraj party that will seek neither to smash the Councils nor to boycott the Congress as the leading Liberals have done, but to have one single aim in view and that to be the speediest possible establishment of Swaraj in India by any and every practical means excepting individual or mass violence. Such a party is surely needed at this moment, and can easily be organised with a little effort and able leadership. It can and must start with a definite, clear-cut programme for immediate guidance and should contest the next elections as an organised political party on the basis of its programme. It shall enter the Councils fully determined to utilise all the resources of the 'Reformed Constitution' in order to push on its own programme. Nor should it neglect to join the Congress with a similar view: to utilise it fully with its immense hold on the sentiments of the people, for the furtherance of its own programme. Such a party, I am sure, can do immense work, and will, if the effort is genuinely made, bring the country appreciably nearer Swaraj if not actually within sight of it. It is surely worth while for a Jinnah or a Jayakar to throw his weight into the scale, and to form and lead a party along such lines. The chances of success are quite clear.

The next and more important point is: what is to be the programme of the 'Swaraj Party'? It can be discussed and drafted at a preliminary meeting of all those persons who are in general agreement with the proposal. I may, just to initiate and provoke discussion, mention roughly what I should like it to be so that a maximum of support may be insured for it among all the classes and sections of thoughtful Indians. Broadly speaking it shall include:

(1) Active propaganda to revive and encourage the cottage industry of hand-spinning and hand-weaving, where natural conditions permit.

(2) Active propaganda to foster and protect against foreign competition all important industries that can be developed advantageously.

(3) Active campaign to organise Banking and Commerce on co-operative lines.

(4) Active campaign for removal of all facilities for the sale of intoxicants except on medical advice in small doses.

(5) Active campaign for promoting the sentiment of national solidarity between different faiths and communities on all purely political, social or economic questions.

(6) Active campaign for securing to every individual full rights of participation on equal terms in all political gatherings irrespective of his caste, sex or creed.

(7) Active propaganda to compel the Central Government to become wholly and solely responsible to the public opinion in India, ceasing to be a subordinate division of Downing Street.

(8) Active campaign for the abolition of the existing anomalous system of provincial administrations, replacing it by a federation of autonomous Districts, each governed by a Cabinet chosen from and responsible to its popular Council.

(9) Active campaign against the acceptance of any marks of favour at the hands of the existing bureaucracy such as titles, offices, decorations etc.

(10) Active campaign for the pursuit of these objects through every available medium.

I venture to think, Sir, that with some such programme, a Swaraj Party could utilise the momentum and energy of Non-co-operation as also the practical advantages of Council-work in order to gain their final aim, the speediest establishment of Swaraj. Is it too much to expect that a live leader of the first rank will see the obvious utility of this suggestion and come forward to essay the task? I hope not. That he will easily have a fairly large following is almost certain. And even if for the present he does not get encouraging support from the rank and file, there need be no despair. There are still 12 months for the next elections, and by that time the Swaraj party will have received into its folds many supporters, if only this period is utilised in educating public opinion and placing before the country their programme in a tangible, plain and easily understood form. Surely the attempt is worth making, but some one with a recognised status alone can set the ball rolling. Who shall it be? Let your readers answer.

Bombay,

RECORD MAKING QUEEN HONEY BEE.*

From North Dakota comes the news that a half interest in one of the most valuable queen honey bees in the world has been sold for $150, and that this price establishes a new record for bee values. The queen left by mail recently for Alabama, one of the southern states, where she will spend the winter, returning to her home in North Dakota next spring. According to the culture records, she was a member of a colony which last summer set one of three world's records for honey production.

HINDU WOMEN'S RIGHTS.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

SIR,

I am extremely glad that a Hindu lady has courageously come forward to put forth her views on the dowry question. I believe and firmly believe that Hindu Women's emancipation must come through themselves. It is they who must fight for their rights.

In both my letters I emphasised the point that the dowry is the bride's property. The bridegroom if he has any sense of honour should neither extort it nor touch it but leave the matter to the girl and her father to settle it between themselves. Our learned sister does not appreciate it. She fears that the girl out of modesty will say nothing and the father will play in his sons' hands and their poor sister will not get that amount which would have been extorted from him by the unscrupulous son-in-law. Anyhow the girl's father is to be forced. But now the money instead of going to add to the common property of the son-in-law, will remain on the girl's account. No doubt there is some consolation. But what guarantee can our sister give that the girl who out of modesty could not claim her dues from her own father, will not allow her husband to squander it?

She thinks that a millennium for women would come in case their rights of property as daughters, sisters, wives, and mothers are recognized by law. How many rights?

Moliere's Harpagon would have exclaimed "Better to be women, how much money and how many legatees? All without work" If all these rights are granted what havoc will it do to the Hindu Society! Our small holdings of land will be still subdivided. A girl will get $\frac{1}{2}$ of an acre at

Baroda from her father and $\frac{1}{3}$ of an acre at Poona from her husband. Both good for nothing. But the country will suffer. Besides such rights will be ready tools in the hands of unscrupulous sons-in-law to bring suits against their father-in-law's property. To-day they have to devise means. This law will give them a desired weapon. I know one case of a farmer queen, who was a farmer's daughter but married a prince and thus became a queen. She had as many jewels as any woman, slave to ornaments, would like to have. She had been given some villages as her own private property. One day in her full glory when bedecked with jewels and gold ornaments she was visited by a Hindu lady who, being dazzled with the lustre of jewels "began to admire them. The queen exclaimed "my dear sister, happiness is in farmer's cottage, this is all tinsel." This is not an imaginary story but a fact. Farmer's women are happier than all those women with big legacies with necklaces of pearls and jewels. It is because they have freedom. Let our women cultivate the spirit of freedom and independence, they will find therein richer dowries. Let them fight for education. Hindu parents neglect their daughters' education and spend all the money on their sons' education. It is this state of things which is responsible for their wretchedness. The country demands women, not slaves to jewels, but full of fire of freedom, who will give smacking blows to the institution of child marriage and knock it down to liberate themselves free for ever, free to work out for God's glorious India. What rot is being practised under the name of religion. An old man buys a girl in broad day light, the religion allows it, the society grants it. Is it not a slave trade? What matters if it is under the name of sacrament? That day will be the glorious day for my country when a girl will sling the jewels and ornaments to an old bridegroom's face and will say "I am free for ever, free, there is God within me, you get away ugly thing." Our women lack this spirit and they suffer. In many papers I have read women's articles. But many of them are about rights to property as daughters as wives, as sisters and what not. I suspect they dare not talk against religion, which is in some way responsible for their miseries. I sympathise with their fight for Rights. But I think that when they have to fulfil the duties as wives, they must get equal rights. But as daughters and sisters, they have no responsibility nor any duty. They, therefore, should cast less greedy eye on their properties. What I condemn is that instead of the spirit of service there is greed for gold and jewels.

Yours etc.
JAWHARIAN.

TAGORE AT ALWAYE.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

On Saturday the 21st November, Dr. Tagore opened the new Hostel Buildings of the Union Christian College, which is a purely residential institution. Mr. Varki, the Principal, in welcoming the Poet, who was accompanied by Mr. Andrews, referred to the fact that India had found her voice again in Rabindranath and pointed out how on account of the Poet's being a golden link between the East and West, he was better fitted than any one else to lead our country in matter, educational, wherein a nice harmonizing of the best in the East and the West was essential. Dr. Tagore, who seems to have been greatly struck by the possibilities of the College, replying, said: "From what I have heard about the ideal of this institution and the methods which you have adopted for carrying on education in this College, I find that it has a great resemblance to the institution I have started. You have the same ideals which we have in Shantiniketan." In explaining his ideals, Dr. Tagore then referred to his mission, which dawned on him, on feeling, during his late tour in Europe, how completely the West had accepted him as its Poet. His mission, he said, was to open up the heart of India to intellectual and spiritual communication with the outer world. He denounced vainglorious patriotism and political catch-phrases, and advised all true patriots to release India from her spiritual and intellectual imprisonment, by learning more about her than they did, by realising national unity and by then offering their culture to the other cultures of the world. Mr. Andrews who followed expressed great satisfaction at the methods of the institution, adding that he felt as if he were in Shantiniketan itself. During his visit to Travancore in the near future, he has promised to spend a few days at the College. Dr. Tagore and Mr. Andrews were then asked to plant two mango-plants to commemorate their visit. Amidst cheers, the Principal next announced an anonymous donation of Rs. 300/ to the College for the formation of a special Library of Poetical Literature with books in as many languages as possible, to be called after the name of Dr. Tagore. With cheers to the distinguished guests, the meeting terminated.

ROYAL YAKUTI.

THIS YAKUTI or life giving nectar has been prepared from the best, choicest and richest vegetable drugs. It has wonderful properties of increasing virile power and it rectifies urinary disorders. In fact it makes man a man. This valuable medicine is used in large quantities not only by our Rajas, Maharajas, Nawabs and many of the nobility, aristocracy and gentry in this Country; but it is greatly patronized by people in all countries of Europe, America, Asia and Africa. It is needless to expatiate upon the magical qualities of this our invaluable medicine. We recommend it especially to these persons who desire to tone the nervous system, to strengthen the body, refresh the memory, and to guard against debility. Suffice it to say that the use of this medicine is recommended to those who have any faith in the Ayurvedic medicine. It works like a charm and the effect is lasting. It replaces lost power and rejuvenates the emaciated and it is enough to say that musk is not that which a perfumer admires. It is that which diffuses fragrance of its own accord. Price per tin containing 40 pills, Rupees ten only.

Avoid a Split at all Costs: We publish today the first half of an article by Mr. S. Sadanand who is against Congressmen entering the Councils. The other half will appear next week. Mr. Sadanand's reflections have been provoked by what he calls 'a national dilemma'. In our opinion, there is no dilemma, unless we choose to make one. There is absolutely no conflict between the Bardoli programme of the National Congress and the proposal to enter the Councils. On the contrary, we think that the latter easily and naturally connects with the former, if we remember that Hindu-Mahomedan unity, the removal of "untouchability," liquor prohibition and swadeshi, can be advanced from within the Legislative Councils as also from without them. The earlier Non-Co-operation programme was designed to paralyse Government: the constructive Bardoli programme, if faithfully carried out, would transform Government into the image of the nation. We recognise that those who had accepted the original Non-Co-operation programme, find it difficult to efface all recollection of it in interpreting the Bardoli programme. But, in the interests of the country, they should make an effort to distinguish between the negative Non-Co-operation programme and the later constructive social programme. Those on the other hand who favour entry into the Councils—we are of the number—should also understand and sympathise with the point of view of those earnest and zealous souls who feel it their duty to abide literally by the Mahatma's injunctions. Above all, both sides should avoid a split at all costs. The harm done by a split will be infinitely greater than the good that may ensue by entering the Councils.

Malabar Forcible Conversions: An Associated Press telegram from Lahore dated 5th December states that, in the course of his speech before a large audience at the Islamia College Hall, Mr. Gopala Menon, Secretary of the Calicut Congress Committee, referring to the forcible conversions of Hindus in Malabar during the Moplah rebellion, maintained that there were three kinds of conversions:—(1) By the riff-raff of the Hindus, who thought that the time of loot had arrived and looted the people in the garb of Moslems; (2) Hindus who cared more for their money and property than religion. There were thousands of this class who embraced Islam willingly; (3) a few cases of real forcible conversions. The cases of the few had been much exaggerated. Nobody could convert the Hindu forcibly. If they had cared for their religion and temples, they would never have been converted. If they were not towards such things would not have happened. The Hindus never cared for their religion, or temples, but they cared more for their property. Hence they were converted.

Mr. K. P. Kesava Menon is the Secretary of the Kerala Provincial Congress Committee at Calicut. We do not remember to have come across any statement regarding converts of the first and second types mentioned by Mr. Gopala Menon. Even granting that certain Hindus "looted the people in the garb of Moslems" we are unable to understand how they can be classified as converts. Mr. Gopala Menon says that there were thousands of Hindus "who embraced Islam willingly" for the sake of their money and property. This is a statement to which we are able to offer a direct and unqualified contradiction. It is difficult to take statements of this sort seriously and we do not understand why the Associated Press attached so much importance as to telegraph them.

The Bombay Compulsory Education Bill: The Bombay Compulsory Education Bill, as revised by a Select Committee, is to come before the Legislative Council during the current Session. The Select Committee has effected some improvements in the original draft, such as allowing a larger proportion than one-half of the expenditure to be paid by Government at their discretion to Municipalities. But the main defect of the Bill remains, that it holds out no inducement to Local Bodies to press on with the compulsory principle. Even where a Local Body wishes to do so, the power is left with Government to put a damper on its enthusiasm. This is absolutely wrong. The best thing would be for Government to finance the whole Compulsory scheme, requiring all Local Bodies to introduce it within, say, the next five or ten years. If this is too drastic, Government should at least undertake to finance every compulsory scheme satisfying its reasonable requirements, which a Local Body proposes. This, of course, requires that a progressively large amount should be secured for primary education. If there is no guarantee that the sums needed to finance education will be forthcoming, a Bill of this kind is merely a bit of administrative window-dressing. We shall have a Paranjpye's instead of a Patel's Act upon the statute-book, but the blight of illiteracy will in no way be affected.

Compulsory Education in the Punjab: The Punjab Government have, according to a Press Communiqué, recently sanctioned the introduction of compulsory primary education in five municipalities and ten school areas under the District Board, Lyallpur. It is gratifying to note that amidst her political troubles, the Punjab does not allow her interest in education to flag. By the way, we gather from some enquiries that in no Province except advanced Bombay was the Educational grant allowed to be curtailed on account of the financial position, though it was quite as acute in some of them as in this Presidency.

The Madrased Co-operative Hostel Society Ltd. According to the Bombay Census Report, 1921, the number of Madraseds in Bombay is 15,156 as against 8,278 in 1911, or in other words, the Madrased population in Bombay during the last decade has nearly doubled. If statistics of the number of Madraseds in Bombay during the last two years were available, they would show a tremendous increase. Most of them have come to Bombay with the idea of finding a means of living. Considering the large number of Madraseds in Bombay, several of whom are sufficiently educated to understand and appreciate the value of a healthy organisation which would be of service to the community, the absence of any such proper institution is not creditable to the community. The greatest disadvantage under which the Madraseds, especially the middle-class people, are labouring is the lack of facilities for boarding and lodging. It is, therefore, gratifying to see from the copy of the report forwarded to us of the Madrased Co-operative Hostel Society, Ltd. for the half year ending 30th September 1922, that the promoters of the Society have for their main object the removal of this great disadvantage. Mr. Otto Rothfield, I. C. S., Registrar of Co-operative Societies of the Bombay Presidency, has borne testimony to the good working of the Society in the course of his remarks in the visitors' book of the Society: "I was very glad to see this admirably managed Society, the first of its kind in India and so much required." Although the Hostel managed by the Society is not strictly cosmopolitan in character as the membership is now confined only to Caste-Hindus, and although the benefits of the Society are not enjoyed by many outside Dadar, it promises to be a very useful institution having ample scope to extend its usefulness to the community at large. The Society has been running a hostel for the last one year. The progress of the Society as recorded in the balance sheet and profit and loss account for the period under review is satisfactory. It is stated that the Society has taken up new premises in Ollengal Building, Lady Jamsetji Road, opposite Hasali Tank, Dadar, which would accommodate about 50 more members and which would be ready for occupation from 1st January 1923. As the Society consists of mostly middle-class men, for whom of course it is intended, the success achieved so far is really encouraging. We wish the Society a successful career of much useful service to the South Indian Community.

Dominion Status: Canada has now appointed her own Ambassador to the United States. This event, the far-reaching consequences of which are obvious, has provoked the following comment from the Manchester Guardian: "That she should do so if she cared to, has been for some time agreed by both America and Britain. But considerations of the departure in international affairs which the step would signify have till now delayed its accomplishment. An Ambassador is a commonly accepted symbol of a sovereign State. Are the British Dominions to be granted that status in diplomacy by general consent? They have signed the Versailles Treaty for themselves, and they have their own seats on the League Assembly. But a Dominion Ambassador is a startling precedent to the juris A British Commonwealth Conference on Imperial relationship which would survey and regularise the changes in Imperial relations since the war is overdue." New India is the first paper in this country to call attention to this momentous development. Reuter's Agency did not evidently consider it of sufficient importance to cable to India.

A Protest Against Communalism: We are glad that the Punjab Indian Christian Conference passed a resolution at its second annual Conference held in Lahore on the 25th November, declaring against the principle of Communalism in political and civil life. The resolution reads:

This Conference is of opinion that the principle of communal electorates in general and the consideration of religious and communal interests in the matter of Government appointments and admission of students into the Government colleges in parties are detrimental to the best interests of the mother land. It is emphatically of the opinion that in these matters ability and efficiency should be the chief test.

The example set by the Punjab Indian Christian community will, we hope, be followed by other communities.

The Rent Act: The Bombay Legislative Council has passed the Rent Act Amendment Bill as revised by the Select Committee. The Committee introduced a graduated scale of permissible increases of rent, which makes the incidence of the increase proportionate to the capacity of tenants. But we are not sure of the wisdom of two other changes introduced by it. One of them is the differentiation between residential and business premises. In many buildings the two exist side by side and often in such close contiguity, that it is hard to distinguish the one from the other. The distinction is made for the duration of rent restriction under the Act, the period ceasing a year earlier for residential premises. Landlords, we fancy, will hasten to earmark a many premises as possible as residential in such localities as Kalbadevi, Pydhownie, and Nul Bazar. The other objectionable change is the provision giving Government power to exclude any premises from the scope of the Act. The Select Committee indicate two classes of buildings, those owned by Charitable Trusts and Co-operative Societies, but the provision is not limited to these. The devolution of power to set aside the provisions of a law, partly of a penal character, on the Executive Government, is highly objectionable in principle.

Dr. Barnardo's Homes, London: We have received a pamphlet containing the particulars of Dr. Barnardo's Homes in London. The Home has been rescuing destitute children for the last 56 years. During this period it has trained 94,000 children to earn their living as healthy, honest, upright and God-fearing citizens. The Home is now maintaining 7,319 children out of which 1,268 are babies under 5 years. It has issued an appeal for funds in support of the Homes. The cost of maintaining a child for a week is estimated at 10 shillings. The Director, Rear Admiral Sir Harry Stileman, hopes that the generous public, who realize that the children are the Empire's greatest asset, will contribute liberally and send him Christmas gifts to be distributed among the little ones under the care of the Homes. Gifts or remittances may be sent to the Director, Dr. Barnardo's Homes: National Incorporated Association, 18 to 26, Stepney Causeway, London E. 1, (England).

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

THE INCHCAPE STAND-POINT.

In the speech which he made at the St. Andrews' Dinner in Calcutta on the 1st instant, Lord Inchcape, who has been called over to advise the Government of India as to what retrenchment should be made in their expenditure, expounded for the benefit of Europeans in general and Scotsmen in particular, his views about India and its future. He had to propose the toast of "the Viceroy and the land we live in." He said a few complimentary words about past Viceroys and Lord Reading who, he said, worked some fourteen hours a day—only two hours a day less than Lord Curzon—and fewer words still of a doubtful character about "the land we live in." "I have been all over the world and my conviction is," said his lordship, "that for a young man there is no country equal to India, and when you have done with India, there is no country to equal Scotland." Well, Lord Inchcape had "done with India" and we have never been able to understand why he should have been requisitioned to advise the Government of India in the matter of retrenchment. That Government boasts of having the greatest Civil Service in the world. Was there not a single man in this great Service who could have shown Government the way to retrench? Indians, of course, are out of the question. No Indian in the eyes of the Government of India is competent enough to advise it, and after the experiences of Sir M. Visveswaraya in Bombay and Sir Ibrahim Rahimtulla in the Fiscal Commission, no self-respecting Indian would care to preside over a Commission which was not predominantly Indian in its composition. Lord Inchcape thought that Lord Reading's task was more difficult than that of any previous Viceroy. No doubt the Indian administration has grown in complexity, but while Lord Reading has all the experience of his predecessors to guide him, the latter had to make practically all their own experience, with far fewer facilities. Lord Mayo's task was in every sense at least quite as difficult as Lord Reading's. But he did not send for a man "who had done with India" to come and advise him. He set himself to the task of reorganising Indian finance, and did it too with much success.

One of the important means adopted by Lord Mayo to bring expenditure, and the administration generally, under strict scrutiny, was the inauguration of classified statistics on a systematic basis and with an extended scope. Lord Inchcape dropped a hint that he has an eye on this system as a source of retrenchment. "I don't know yet," he remarked, "whether many offices in India are occupied by functionaries who are filling up antiquated forms which nobody reads." These "antiquated forms" have already been largely given up, and even before the war, the amount of accurate and detailed statistical information available to the public, was being steadily curtailed. Since the war, of course, many of the familiar reports have ceased to appear and the public are served up, instead, with highly spiced summaries by the Directors of Information, Provincial and Central. Gokhale used to say that the Report of Moral and Material Progress presented to Parliament, was, both as regards matter and manner, much superior to any of the reports issued by the Governments in India. This has now been superseded partially at least by Mr. Rushbrook Williams' annual political pamphlets as to the cost of producing which there was a question in Parliament last week. It may be that "nobody reads" these forms, but if any body wants to have any certain information about any part of the administration, he will be totally without the materials for it, if these forms cease to be filled up. The average English official, we all know, hates to have to fill up forms. His ideal in India is personal rule, riding about shooting game and incidentally settling village disputes by knocking together the heads of the contending parties. Another item of expenditure which attracted Lord Inchcape's notice was the travelling charges allowed to members of the Indian Legislature. "When I went to Simla to attend meetings of the Legislative Council," he said, "I got nothing." We have an idea that the members of the old Legislative Council got a lump sum of Rs. 10,000 or so, and had, besides, a chobdar or two, with scarlet coats and silver maces, to stand at their doors. These were stopped on the introduction of the Morley-Minto Reforms and a daily allowance and railway fares substituted. We doubt if the average member of the Legislative Assembly or the Council of State draws by way of travelling and halting expenses as much as was paid to the members of the old Legislative Council, who, by the way spoke sitting, in a lump sum. Rs. 10,000 may be a flea-bite to Lord Inchcape but it must have been something for Mr. Mackay. As regards Lord Inchcape's advice about fiscal policy to Indians, we should have attached more weight to it if his lordship was not the Chairman of the Shipping Company about whose operations Mr. Narottam Morarjee made some feeling remarks at the last annual meeting of the Scindia Steam Navigation Company. Mr. Narottam said:

Last year, we requested the Government to give us merely an opportunity to quote for the carriage of 2 lakhs of tons of coal from Calcutta to Rangoon. What was the result? Even the opportunity for tendering for the business was denied to us in defiance of promise from the proper official authority and the contract was made elsewhere for 10 years at rates which the Government did not think it proper to disclose in the interests of the public.

Lord Inchcape, we trust, will take up this clue and we feel sure that it will help him and his colleagues in threading the labyrinthine maze of Government methods.

Family Budgets: It appears from a Reuter's message that some members of the English Services in India have sent their "family budgets" to the Secretary of State to substantiate their claim for increased emoluments. We trust that that gentleman will send for the family budgets of typical Indian families of all classes before he sanctions any further increases of pay or pension. The country will not stand any addition to her burdens on behalf of the Services. If you must increase their salaries, you must reduce their number so that the total spent on them is not exceeded.

Compulsory Education in the Punjab: The Punjab Government have, according to a Press Communiqué, recently sanctioned the introduction of compulsory primary education in five municipalities and ten school areas under the District Board, Lyallpur. It is gratifying to note that amidst her political troubles, the Punjab does not allow her interest in education to flag. Visvesvaraya in Bombay and Sir Ibrahim Rahimtulla in the Fiscal Commission, no self-respecting Indian would care to preside over a Commission which was not predominantly Indian in its composition. Lord Inchcape thought that Lord Reading's task was more difficult than that of any previous Viceroy. No doubt the Indian administration has grown in complexity, but while Lord Reading has all the experience of his predecessors to guide him, the latter had to make practically all their own experience, with far fewer facilities. Lord Mayo's task was in every sense at least quite as difficult as Lord Reading's. But he did not send for a man "who had done with India" to come and advise him. He set himself to the task of reorganising Indian finance, and did it too with much success.

One of the important means adopted by Lord Mayo to bring expenditure, and the administration generally, under strict scrutiny, was the inauguration of classified statistics on a systematic basis and with an extended scope. Lord Inchcape dropped a hint that he has an eye on this system as a source of retrenchment. "I don't know yet," he remarked, "whether many offices in India are occupied by functionaries who are filling up antiquated forms which nobody reads." These "antiquated forms" have already been largely given up, and even before the war, the amount of accurate and detailed statistical information available to the public, was being steadily curtailed. Since the war, of course, many of the familiar reports have ceased to appear and the public are served up, instead, with highly spiced summaries by the Directors of Information, Provincial and Central. Gokhale used to say that the Report of Moral and Material Progress presented to Parliament, was, both as regards matter and manner, much superior to any of the reports issued by the Governments in India. This has now been superseded partially at least by Mr. Rushbrook Williams' annual political pamphlets as to the cost of producing which there was a question in Parliament last week. It may be that "nobody reads" these forms, but if any body wants to have any certain information about any part of the administration, he will be totally without the materials for it, if these forms cease to be filled up. The average English official, we all know, hates to have to fill up forms. His ideal in India is personal rule, riding about shooting game and incidentally settling village disputes by knocking together the heads of the contending parties. Another item of expenditure which attracted Lord Inchcape's notice was the travelling charges allowed to members of the Indian Legislature. "When I went to Simla to attend meetings of the Legislative Council," he said, "I got nothing." We have an idea that the members of the old Legislative Council got a lump sum of Rs. 10,000 or so, and had, besides, a chobdar or two, with scarlet coats and silver maces, to stand at their doors. These were stopped on the introduction of the Morley-Minto Reforms and a daily allowance and railway fares substituted. We doubt if the average member of the Legislative Assembly or the Council of State draws by way of travelling and halting expenses as much as was paid to the members of the old Legislative Council, who, by the way spoke sitting, in a lump sum. Rs. 10,000 may be a flea-bite to Lord Inchcape but it must have been something for Mr. Mackay. As regards Lord Inchcape's advice about fiscal policy to Indians, we should have attached more weight to it if his lordship was not the Chairman of the Shipping Company about whose operations Mr. Narottam Morarjee made some feeling remarks at the last annual meeting of the Scindia Steam Navigation Company. Mr. Narottam said:

Last year, we requested the Government to give us merely an opportunity to quote for the carriage of 2 lakhs of tons of coal from Calcutta to Rangoon. What was the result? Even the opportunity for tendering for the business was denied to us in defiance of promise from the proper official authority and the contract was made elsewhere for 10 years at rates which the Government did not think it proper to disclose in the interests of the public.

Lord Inchcape, we trust, will take up this clue and we feel sure that it will help him and his colleagues in threading the labyrinthine maze of Government methods.

Family Budgets: It appears from a Reuter's message that some members of the English Services in India have sent their "family budgets" to the Secretary of State to substantiate their claim for increased emoluments. We trust that that gentleman will send for the family budgets of typical Indian families of all classes before he sanctions any further increases of pay or pension. The country will not stand any addition to her burdens on behalf of the Services. If you must increase their salaries, you must reduce their number so that the total spent on them is not exceeded.

THE ARYAN INVASION OF INDIA.

(BY DRAVIDIAN.)

"The Aryan invasion of India," writes Mr. P. T. Srinivas Iyengar in his essay entitled "Life in Ancient India in the age of the Mantras," "is a theory invented to account for the existence of an Indo-Germanic language in North India." It is thus one of the many by-products of Comparative Philology which, owing to Max Muller's genius, enjoyed a pre-eminence much beyond its merits for a short time. Almost all his generalisations from language to race have gone by the board, except this of the Aryan invasion of or irruption into India. The earliest European Orientalists did not accept the theory. Muir, for instance, observed that the Aryans could not have entered from the West, because it was clear that the people who lived in that direction, were descended from those very Aryans of India; nor could the Aryans have entered from the North-West, because there was no proof from history or philosophy that there existed any civilised nation with a language and religion resembling theirs, which could have issued from either of those quarters at that early period and created the Indo-Aryan civilisation. In a question of this kind, tradition is much more important than critical scholarship. Every immigrant nation or race has preserved the memory of the land it emigrated from with jealous care. The Jews and the Parsis, among ancient races, and the Americans and Australians among moderns, are conspicuous examples. The Vedic bards, however, either did not know of any such event or took extraordinary care to keep out of the Vedas any reference to it. "The Mantras," says Mr. Iyengar, "do not contain any traces of traditions of such an invasion or the remotest allusion to any foreign country which was the first home of these tribes or recollections of the route through which they came." In the introduction to his "Vedic Reader" Professor A. A. Macdonnell who, of course, is an "invasionist," states that from the geographical data of the Rig Veda, especially the numerous rivers there mentioned, it is to be inferred that the Indo-Aryan tribes when the hymns were composed occupied the territory roughly corresponding to the North-West Frontier province and the Punjab of today. The references to flora and fauna bear out this conclusion. Hymns, however, do not usually confine their allusions to the natural scenery of the places where they are composed. If the Rig Vedic bards had memories of an ancestral land from where they came, they would certainly have not omitted all recollections of it in their prayer and praise. Not only, however, is there no reference to a motherland which they had left, but their love of the country where they dwelt amounted to a passionate adoration only possible to persons whose most intimate thoughts, memories and associations centred solely upon it.

An allied theory which is of even more questionable validity is that the people of India before the supposititious Aryan invasion or immigration was of inferior civilization and culture. Economists distinguish between four stages of civilization: the hunting, the pastoral, the agricultural and the manufacturing. Cattle-breeding, writes Professor Macdonnell, appears to have been the main source of livelihood of the people of the Rig Veda hymns. In other words, they were mainly in the pastoral stage of civilization. Where did they learn cultivation from? Agriculture, observes Mr. J. Hewitt, in his "Ruling Races of Pre-historic Times" was first systematically practised on a large scale in the forest lands of Southern India, and was emigrants from thence who carried the rules of the village communities with them as they progressed northward. He maintains that he has proved conclusively that rice-cultivation flourished in Central and South India in the early Stone Age, countless ages before the Veda was composed, and that it was the growing of rice which led to the formation of permanent villages. As distinguished from the Vedic Indians of the North, the South Indians made the village, and not the family, the national unit. It was this agricultural race which first founded a system of national education, the lessons they had to teach being "not the rules of the art of war or the mysteries of religion, but those which embodied the results attained by the long series of experiments which had formed a national science of agriculture." If further proof were wanted to show that the non-Vedic people of India, were not inferior to the Vedic tribes, it is to be found in the glowing descriptions in the Ramayana itself of the prosperity of the enemy country. Thus Rama gazing across the Godavari from his hermit's hut at Nasik, the then southernmost Aryan settlement, sees:

Boundless fields of wheat and barley are with dewdrops moist and wet,
And the golden rice of winter ripens like the clustering date;
Peopled marts and rural hamlets wake to life and cheerful toil
And the peaceful happy nations prosper on their fertile soil,

And beyond them the shining domes and towers of a magnificent city—Janasthan. Nor is there any indication in the Ramayana that the Dravidians were considered to be an inferior race. Ravana who could so disguise himself as to be completely mistaken in broad daylight by Sita for a holy Brahmin, could not have differed much in his features from the race with which she was familiar in her native Behar or in her adopted Oudh.

As for colour, both Rama and Krishna are expressly described in the texts as dark-hued, and in popular paintings even to-day they are given a blue-black complexion. "Look not upon me, because I am black, because the sun hath looked upon me", says the adored in the "Song of Solomon." "I am black, but comely." The poet of the Ramayana has in the interests of Aryan morality given a forced explanation of the episode, discreditable even upon his showing, of Sarpanakha. But cutting off of women's noses is a frequent offence at the present day and the motive of it is almost always jealousy on the part of the man. The incident anyhow shows that Sarpanakha had a nose to be cut. Occidental Orientalists have concluded from the word "anasa" which occurs in one solitary context in the Rig Veda, that the non-Vedic Indians were a "noseless" or "flat-nosed" people. The great Hindu commentator, Sayana, having never heard of "Anthropometry" and, relying only on tradition, translated the word as meaning "of rude speech." The tests of Anthropometry, supposed to have been unerring, have been roughly assailed by the discovery that the shape of the cranium and the nose can be, and often are, moulded by manipulation by parents and nurses, sometimes consciously, during the period of infancy. Ravana was not a rude worshipper of stocks and stones but was a great devotee of Siva whom Rabindranath Tagore takes to be a non-Aryan deity adopted by the Aryans. If that be so, it is curious that this adopted deity has come to be the supreme deity of the Hindu pantheon. At Rameswaram in the South, tradition still points to a Linga which Rama worshipped before crossing over to Lanka. High up in the Himalayas the deity worshipped at Badrinath is Siva. In fact, Siva's abode is Mount Kailas and his consort is the Maid of the Mountain, Parvati. Three-fourths of the Brahmins of India are worshippers of Siva, which would be strange if Siva was originally a Non-Aryan deity. It is also worthy of note that the Siva cult has assumed a special character and pre-eminence in the two extreme ends of India—Kashmir and Dravida. The fact is that the Ramayana in its present form is a historical novel written to celebrate the triumph of a prince and a people by a poet whose literary language was Sanskrit. It is well-known that in Rama's story, as Buddha knew it, the propagandist additions of the present version are absent. The main motive for the Aryan invasion of the South was the same as at the present day—to exploit the labour of an industrious and docile population.

INDIAN CHRISTIANITY AND THE NATIONAL AWAKENING.

I

CHRISTIANITY AND INDIA.

The Indian Christian population of India is microscopic; its paucity of numbers is no evidence, however, of the newness of the Christian faith in India. It is true that Indian Christianity at present labours under the drawback of being looked upon as an European importation, and as it is generally identified with the white peoples and their culture, Indians are likely to ignore the fact that Christianity in India has a hoarier antiquity than Islam. If we are to believe tradition—and tradition is as important a guide to history as any other source,—Thomas, one of the Apostles of Jesus, the Christ, brought the teachings of his Master into India, in the first years of the Christian era, spread them over a considerable part of the South and finally suffered martyrdom at Mylapore. Whether we accept this traditional account or not, the indisputable fact verified by history remains that from the first centuries there were Christian communities in India, especially in the South—the complexion of their Christianity appearing orthodox or otherwise from the standpoint from which it is viewed. We have positive evidence to show that as early as the second century of the Christian era there were Christian settlements in India. Such being the case, Christians in India can claim to have existed in India some centuries earlier than the very birth of Islam. How comes it then that the Indian Christian born and bred on the soil of India and of ancestry purely Indian, has not learnt to cherish the ancient history of his country, its culture and to look upon its people, however different in their religious persuasions, as bone of his bone and flesh of his flesh? Whence is it that unlike his Hindu or Mahomedan fellow-citizen he has not watched for, aspired to and eagerly welcomed every stage that adds a cubit to the cultural, social or political stature of his motherland? Why is it that Vande Mataram is a national outpouring of the Hindus and Mahomedans only and till now ignored by the Indian Christian? The writer of this feels convinced that the above appreciation of the attitude of the Indian Christian towards the growth of national consciousness is not unwarranted. Again how comes it that both Hindus and Mahomedans regard the Indian Christian sentiment towards their aspirations as lukewarm if not positively hostile, and conversely why is it that the ever-growing height of the national spirit in India makes the Indian Christian feel dwarfed and helpless and suspicious of his security in the future?

It is no answer to say that the difference of a religious conviction or persuasion accounts for this defect of goodwill or confiding sympathy. It would be hideous to contemplate that Christianity which is so insistent on the brotherhood of man and his duty towards his neighbour, could make its adherents indifferent to the claims of patriotism or the reasonable aspirations of its fellow-citizens. No, no religion can make its members indifferent to love and reverence for one's country, its history, traditions, its glories of the past and its anticipations of the future. To say otherwise, one would have to explain how in a Europe broken up into so many nationalities, each in its turn again split into varying religious sects, Christian in their culture and leaven, if not in a strict observance of the Creed, every national entity pulsates with the desire for its national advancement. Every Christian nation in Europe is broken up into varying sections of Christian belief, even in an age when we are so proud to air our modern conceptions of tolerance. Religious bigotry and hatred are not unknown in Europe; but in every question that affects the self-respect of the people or its safety or liberty it speaks and acts with no feelings of detachment or division or difference. The Roman Catholic as much as the Anglican, the Lutheran as well as the Methodist or Presbyterian, rallied to the colours when the nation's trumpet sounded the call to fall in.

But one might very well retort and say: "well, after all they are Christian communities and though doctrinally divergent they have all been influenced by a common leaven". There is no denying that there is truth in this though not the whole truth for we have an instance of how the Arabs and the Christians, both children of the same soil, have joined hands in their protest against the encroachment of the Jews on their country, Palestine. Nay, whatever else may be charged against the body of Christians whose fate has wrung so much commiseration from large sections of mankind, disloyalty to their country or their lukewarmness as regards the interests of their land, has never been laid to the doors of the Armenians. How then can we explain the anomalous position of the Indian Christian who, as we have said above, though descended from Hindu ancestors, shrinks from identifying himself as much as might be expected of him with the interests of his motherland and refuses to feel the exaltation of and share in its spiritual and civic progress or political growth? Mahomedans who are members of a creed as alien to India if not more so than that of the Christians have in union with their fellow countrymen, the Hindus, realised a common consciousness and a common will. The Indian Christian has not. Why? We shall attempt an answer to this in the next article.

THE NATION'S DILEMMA. I.

(By MR. S. SADANAND.)

A grave decision, that will affect the course of history rests with the Gaya sessions of the congress. A decision can no longer be postponed on the issues that face the country. The need for a decision arose as early as February last when on the occurrence of the Chauri Chaura tragedy, Mr. Gandhi suspended practically all the operative parts of the Non-co-operation programme, as adopted at the Calcutta, Nagpur and Ahmedabad sessions of the Congress and popularly understood by the people. Mr. Gandhi presented the country with the constructive programme in their place. It is essential for a right understanding of the issues to see, in their true perspective, the events, that followed the launching of the Non-co-operation Movement in August 1920 up to February 1922 and again from the time subsequent to the Bardoli decision resolving upon the constructive programme, up to the last meeting of the All-India Congress Committee that met at Calcutta last month.

The foremost striking event during the period under review is the Bardoli decision. The Chauri Chaura occurrence, by itself, pales into insignificance, but for what followed upon it. It is only two months before, at the Ahmedabad sessions of the Congress, that Mr. Gandhi was appointed to act as the Dictator, if an emergency arose. If the Civil Disobedience campaign had not been suspended in spite of the Chauri Chaura occurrence and if Mr. Gandhi had launched the country in a wild conflagration of arrests, imprisonments and martial law regimes, he would have been morally justified and vindicated. The Ahmedabad Congress gave Mr. Gandhi that power over the life and death of the nation. But when Mr. Gandhi abdicated that position of a militant dictator and preached an abandonment of the tactics of war and urged a nation-building campaign, it was resented. Mr. Gandhi's personality has a magical influence over all that come into contact with him. It did not wholly avail him when he had to explain his position to the All-India Congress Committee that met at Delhi on the 24th February. Mr. Gandhi was told openly at the meeting that he was on his trial. And many carried in their hearts the feeling that Mr. Gandhi had betrayed the cause, the country and the patriots that were languishing in prison, at his bidding. It is with great difficulty that Mr. Gandhi secured the acceptance of his Bardoli decision at Delhi.

It is an open secret that appeals were sent to him from within the prison walls by many of his eminent colleagues, before the Delhi meeting of the All India Congress Committee, protesting against the Bardoli decision. Mr. Gandhi would not listen. He was adamant. The self-same leaders that protested from within the prison against the Bardoli programme, urged Mr. Gandhi to be unbending, when in the first weeks of December last, the Viceroy was prepared to bargain for terms of peace between the Government and the Congress, to ensure a welcome for the Prince of Wales. Mr. Gandhi then listened to their counsels. He published some of their messages also in Young India. But when he found the dictates of conscience unerringly pointing to the other way he had no hesitation in rejecting the leaders' counsels and advising the country to adopt what he believed to be the right course. He said that prisoners were under civil death and they ought not to influence outside activities. Mr. Gandhi was right in his view. People who are free and in charge of national affairs are bound in honour to take their decisions, guided solely by dictates of Right and Wrong and national interests and absolutely unfettered by the fate of patriot prisoners, however eminent and however numerous. Mr. Gandhi, now that he is in prison, asks for no more. But the fact remains that, at the rejection of the counsels of the leaders, the resentment is there, and also a feeling, not of personal betrayal but that of the cause. Now what is the cause that all Non-co-operators have at heart and for which Mr. Gandhi stood?

The Social Service League, Karachi: The annual report of the Social Service League, Karachi for the year ending 30th June 1922 records much useful work done by the League during the year under report. There has been a slight increase in the number of members and the League has been, among other things, encouraging female education by awarding prizes for sewing and by rendering small pecuniary help to Mai Hardevi Bai's Girls' School, arranging lectures on social subjects, making representations to the authorities on public grievances and distributing blankets among the poor. The number of members on the roll, viz. 56, is not a good figure considering the importance of the work before it. The League, as is the case with most institutions of the kind, is in need of more members and money. It is to be hoped that, with the increase of public interest in constructive social work, enthusiastic and generous men will not be found wanting to support such a useful institution.

PRINCES' PROTECTION BILL.

(BY MR. G. R. ABHYANKER)

A Gazette extraordinary publishes the despatch of His Excellency Lord Reading to the Secretary of State for India giving the reasons for the exercise of the emergency power by the Viceroy. The despatch admits that the case for the Princes was not put before the Press Laws Committee in a complete form. Except stating this in a bald manner, we ask whether the present despatch exhaustively states the case for the Bill. Is it vouchsafing to the public any new information which is in the custody of Government? We fail to see why the Government is so anxious to keep the views of the Princes completely shrouded in mystery. That the Government should be averse to lift the veil and should show solicitude to observe purdah and try to keep back all relevant evidence undoubtedly lowers the reputation of Lord Reading's Government for fairness and justice. The Hon'ble Mr. Niyogi asked for the publication of all the correspondence which had passed between the Government of India and the Provincial Governments and between the Secretary of State. The Government declined to grant this very modest request. The Government of India publishes this despatch which studiously withholds even the slightest item of any new information which would lead the public to judge of the wisdom and foresight of Government in rushing this measure through the Council of State and in adopting the new unconstitutional procedure of certification. The despatch further contains some misleading statements. It mentions that several of the witnesses, who were themselves connected with the Press, were not opposed to the grant of protection to rulers of states. But this statement contains only a half truth. All these witnesses advocated qualified protection. They were willing to give protection only on the express understanding that the right of free criticism was not in any way stifled, and that the subjects of these rulers were equally protected while ventilating their grievances against their autocratic rule. Has any provision been made while extending this protection to the Princes to safeguard the rights and liberties of their subjects and to restrain these rulers in their high-handed administration? The despatch also misstates that some of the witnesses referred to attempts of blackmailing the Darbars. We can state on the authority of the evidence published, that not a single witness stated any case of blackmail from his personal knowledge. A solitary witness made wide generalisation about blackmail in his examination-in-chief; but when cornered to give specific instances, he had to admit that his information was hearsay.

The despatch curiously enough makes one important admission, that long before the Press Laws Committee reported, the Government of India had foreseen the necessity of continuing to the Princes some form of protection. We ask His Excellency why his Government did not enlighten the Press Laws Committee with the reasons which appealed to them so overwhelmingly in favour of this protection. If the Government had made up its mind before the views of the Press Laws Committee were communicated to them, we fail to see why the Committee was appointed at all. Was the attention of the Princes invited to consider the suggestions of so weighty an authority as the Secretary of State for India? We beg permission to ask if the Princes were ever requested definitely to state the mode by which this protection was to be granted and the form which it was to assume? Was this question ever debated in the Chamber of Princes? And if it was not so considered and we are assured that it was not so done, who is responsible for this omission? Was it not the duty of His Excellency Lord Reading to place the views of the Secretary of State before the Princes and request them to categorically state their opinion? This despatch mentions that out of eight Provincial Governments only three were in favour of this protection. Three were against giving any protection. One did not give any opinion and the most important Provincial Government possessing more than fifty per cent. of these 700 States—we mean the Government of Bombay—was unable to suggest any satisfactory method of giving this protection. Why has the Government of India set at naught the views of the majority of Provincial Governments in this respect? Were they not more interested in this question than the irresponsible Political Department of the Government of India? Was it not the duty of Lord Reading's Government to communicate the views of the public as represented in the British Indian Press to the Secretary of State for India? Why has His Excellency's Government deliberately omitted to enlighten the Home Authorities on this subject?

His Excellency seems to take credit for having abstained from giving protection against spoken words. We humbly ask the late Lord Chief Justice of England if it is possible to institute any criminal prosecution in British India for words spoken on the British Indian soil exciting disaffection amongst the hearers against a Prince to whom none of them is bound by any ties of allegiance. If His Excellency had invented any measure against spoken words under these circumstances, he would have undoubtedly added to the legal stock of knowledge till now possessed by humanity. The despatch sadly lacks any explanation of the precipitate haste with which this measure was rushed through the Council of State. We are not yet convinced that any national calamity would have occurred or the heavens would have fallen, if the consideration of this question had been postponed to some time early in 1923. His Excellency remarks that the Assembly had not fully realised all that their action implied. We fail to see what His Excellency means by this expression. We refuse to believe that they did not know the responsibilities of their action. To insinuate otherwise is to grossly libel a respectable democratic institution. That Lord Peel has communicated his approval of this unusual conduct of the Viceroy only shows what is in store for India and what it can expect from a reactionary Conservative Government.

BACK TO STATUS.

(The Behar Herald.)

A very noticeable feature of modern life in all advanced countries is the great importance that is attached to the part which the State plays in the welding of national life. Human actions are now subject to diverse laws, and Legislation—the expression of the will of the state organization—is now recognized as the most effective panacea for national ills. The State consequently reaches the lives of its peoples in almost every phase of their daily avocations.

This undue importance to organized state effort has resulted in the overthrow of all other considerations be they ethical, social or religious and also in the disintegration of brotherly ties and feelings of comradeship and love. If one cares to think but even slightly on the justification of any course of conduct of an individual or a body of individuals and distinguish between the sanction behind this conduct now and in earlier days when life was more simple and less ordered, one will notice a marked difference. In earlier days most action had either social or religious or ethical sanction and in very few instances pleaded the authority of the state for their justification. A course of conduct was right because either religion said so or the unseen laws of morality prompted one to think it was right or lastly because one would not offend the feelings of neighbours and friends by it. Very seldom was it said in support of any action that it had been willed by the organization in which all political power was vested, for even the organization lived in dread of the unwritten laws of religion, ethics and society. With what has been called the "progress" of the world, human life has gained a more ordered precision and human conduct is now more and more gradually being directed by the political than by ethical, religious or social considerations. It has become the fashion among men to look to the state as the supreme arbiter of destinies and the effect has been a noticeable lessening of religious, moral or social influence. Greater importance is now paid to expediency and opportunism which are presumed to be the essence of politics and the political organizations that rule men ride roughshod over considerations which in earlier days influenced the actions of rulers and subjects alike.

This being so, man worships the state and leaves religious moral or social considerations to take care of themselves. An action may be immoral or irreligious detrimental to brotherly or social good-will. But if it has behind it the sanction of the state, that is the authority of the caucus that has secured the reins of power in the political organization, such a thing is right.

The governing cliques all over the world take full advantage of this decay in human ideals and therefore intervene with their laws in every department of human life. From the day that a child is born till the day that he quits this earth, the state follows him assiduously in every stage. Maternity welfare is the state's look out. Education of the child is the state's duty. The state must regulate the food, —in India even the clothing—of men and women. The state must fix marriages—and regulate marital relations, that is the latest craze in America and England. If the people want their agricultural or their industries to improve and yield better results, well, there is the state with its laws and its regulations to do so. The state must manage Railways and mines. Scientific research must be done under state control. The state must protect industries, be they nascent or well-established.

In short, wherever and whenever any effort is necessary to improve the existing condition of affairs, the appeal must be made to the state organization. Compulsory education, compulsory medical examination of all students, compulsory physical training, state aid to industries, nationalization of mines and railways and their management by the state, control of food and other civil supplies—all lead towards one end, the regimentation of the people. For the state even when it accomplishes reform that are good in themselves, usually can do this only by means of constraint—for what are laws but a restriction of liberty?

This regimentation is the curse of the modern age—the greater because by conferring certain superficial benefits it has endeared itself in the hearts of many nations. In the West the national machinery turns out neatly compressed bales of humanity having their use and high market value. Personal man is eliminated to a phantom. For this process of regimentation, this over-government is like a hydraulic press whose pressure is impersonal and on that account completely effective. Its basis is not social co-operation. Its basis is never religious or ethical. It is like a perfect organization of power but not of spiritual idealism. It is not creative, not being a living thing. No man now feels as he did in earlier days that he had his destiny in his own hands. A certain amount of callousness is also produced in men's minds. Even petty organizations of business and profession produce callousness of feeling in men who are not naturally bad and we can well imagine what moral havoc it is causing in a world where whole peoples are furiously organizing themselves for wealth and power.

This regimentation has the additional defect, as has been pointed out, of narrowing freedom. By the crushing weight of the organization, by its enormous cost, and its deadening effect, upon living humanity, state organization seriously impedes freedom in the larger life of a higher civilization.

The movement towards state supremacy is in essence therefore a movement towards bondage. If it is true that the movement of progressive societies has been uniform in this, that it has been distinguished by the gradual dissolution of what has been called "status" and the growth of individual obligation in its place, then it is equally true that the present movement of all advanced countries towards the regulation of all individual effort by state control is a movement decidedly retrogressive. It has been claimed with much force that the world has progressed in as much that the status of the slave of the female under tutelage or of the son under the pater familias has ceased to exist and the ties between man and man, man and woman, master and servant are all regulated by contractual relations. But while this change may be a fact, have we not drifted to a worse form of slavery? Has the interference of the state in the daily, almost hourly, life of individuals resulted in any greater liberty than was extant under the regime of a pater familias?

The above is mostly a consideration of western conditions and not of Indian conditions previous to the eighteenth century. Through all the ages, all the fights and intrigues and deceptions of her earlier history the real India had remained aloof. Her homes and her fields, her temples and her schools, her village self-government, all these which truly belonged to her were managed without the slightest interference from above. Thrones and political lords were not her concern. They passed over her head like clouds "now tinged with purple gorgeousness, now black with the threat of thunder" and we do not welcome the change which is noticeable now-a-days in Indian life even if it be sent by the Lord of the Immortals. Our politicians have gradually grown to have as strong a faith in state organization and state control as people of the west. There have been passed legislative measures in every province to regulate our village life. They are hankering after compulsory education and measures to bring it to effect are on the anvil. In more than one province compulsory physical training and compulsory medical examination of boys are facts in the educational system. The demand for state aid to industries is becoming more and more insistent. Protection and state management of Railways are now recognized as unchallengeable propositions. More and more the tentacles of the state octopus are tightening their grip on the unhappy citizen.

THE ALL-INDIA THEISTIC CONFERENCE, 1922.

THE EDITOR, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

We have great pleasure to inform you that arrangements are being made to hold the Theistic Conference this year at Gaya during the Christmas holidays. Gaya is a sacred place of the Hindus. Budh Gaya where Gautama Buddha attained his enlightenment is not very far from this place, and the pilgrims may also pay a visit to Rajgir, the ancient capital of Magadh, and where the first Buddhist Council was held. The place has therefore an attraction on account of its past traditions, and we are sure Theists all over India will take this opportunity of meeting together on such hallowed grounds. If a large number of the Brahmans and members of Prarthana Samajs assemble for mutual exchange of ideas and arrange to deliver the message of the Brahmo Samaj to the large number of people who will come to Gaya at that time, they will not only derive great benefit for themselves but they will also render a piece of very useful service to the country. We therefore invite the Brahmans and other Theists in sympathy with the Brahmo movement to come and attend the Conference. We also ask the blessings and good wishes of those who will not be able to attend.

We also appeal to you to send us some money for the expenses of the conference. We count a great deal upon the co-operation and sympathy of the theistic bodies throughout India.

Yours truly,

PROBLEM OF CHILD MARRIAGES.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In studying the problem of child-marriages the question arises whose mentality has to be studied, the girl-wife's or the boy-husband's, the one and the other of whom are innocent victims of circumstances, or of the guardians who generally at great sacrifices to themselves risk the happiness of their children. It cannot be denied that in Hindu Society children, when they are most open to suggestions, get repeated suggestions of the idea of marriage with the result that they begin to marry their dolls and in the end they are married like dolls. We talk of 'Brahmacharya' but in everyday life Hindu boys and girls contract ideas contrary to it.

As regards guardians, it is generally women-folk who are more responsible than male-members. They look to their own past, judge things by their own standards and press their views on male-members. When questioned by me why he was getting his boy married, a middle-class Hindu replied: "Grand-mother is getting old and wishes to see the marriage performed in her life-time." Grand-mothers must get old and die, but can they not die without doing damage to the Society?

Excepting few intellectual communities, most Hindus look upon their children's marriage as their principal duty in life. They will grudge money for their education, but will spend hundreds and thousands to get them married, whether weak or unhealthy matters not, they must be married. Otherwise they will miss Heaven after their death! We don't know whether they go to heaven or not, but they make a hell in Society. Some young men married against their will to girls whom they don't like, look down upon the institution of marriage, openly break their oaths and go to prostitutes. Girls married to men, who don't love them, fall easy victims to wizards, magicians, astrologers and so-called saints who cheat them and fleece them.

The priest-class and Vaishyas are much attached to child-marriages. They spread this custom amongst other Hindu communities. Ghastly fatal failures and tragedies of child-marriages are covered up by the theory of fatalism and "sins of past lives." It is these two communities who never had the responsibility of self-defence. These advocates of child-marriage had always to look to others for their protection. They hide their weakness under the high-sounding name of religion and humanity, which they forget when they freely fleece the masses.

Yours, etc.,

Deolali, 7th November 1922.

THE HERITAGE OF THE TAMILS.

The Association Press, Calcutta, in association with a group of Christian scholars in South India, has made arrangements to publish a series of volumes in Tamil under the title of 'The Heritage of the Tamils Series'. The purpose of this series is to bring within reach of educated Tamil people in a convenient form and at a reasonable price their cultural and religious heritage. This series is under the joint editorship of Dr. J. Lazarus, the well-known Tamil scholar of Madras, and Mr. G. S. Duraiswamy, Tamil Literary Secretary of the Y. M. C. A. Mr. G. S. Duraiswamy, was formerly Tamil pandit of the C. M. S. High School, Palamcottah and spent many years in the study of Tamil literature. He joined the Y. M. C. A. in the year 1914 and gave himself for some years to the work of the economic uplift of the depressed classes in the villages of South India. He has now been set apart entirely for literary work and has devoted himself to the preparation of the books in the series. The first book of the Series which is to be published very shortly, deals with the history of Tamil literature to the end of the Sangam age and will be called 'Tamil Literature of the Sangam Period'. This book treats of the subject in a scholarly and comprehensive fashion from its beginnings to the end of the third century A. D. It also brings together in a readable and concise form the information upon this subject which may be found scattered in many works, magazines, reports and monographs. It discusses carefully the question of the date of the different works and gives some account of their contents, as well as of the religious and social conditions of the times. It is expected that this book will be a real contribution to the knowledge about this glorious age of Tamil literature.

THE WOMAN'S PLACE.

Professor Maurice A. Canney spoke with some frankness in an address which he gave to members of the Manchester Literary and Philosophical Society in mail week on "The social position of women in the past and present."

"This nation," he said, "is suffering from a sexual conflict. It is not true of all nations or individuals that they are suffering in the same way, but as regards ourselves, much of the nervous tension from which we as a nation are suffering is due, I believe, to the unhealthy relations between the sexes. One evidence of this is to be found in the unnatural hostility which many women feel towards men and which many men feel towards women. One hears of otherwise sensible women who dislike men and of otherwise sensible men who dislike women. By sexual conflict I mean simply the conflict between the sexes. I am not allying myself with those who say that all women and all men ought to be married. This is one of the superstitions. Many women, however fond they may be of children, do not need to have children of their own. Their sexual desire seems to be eliminated or sublimated. They have attained to that state of happiness where there is neither marriage nor giving in marriage; they are, if I may say so, like the angels."

The sexual conflict of modern times, he went on, with all the evils that accompanied it, was due to the repression of legitimate desires in women that cried for satisfaction. The conditions, physical and psychical, imposed upon women by modern civilisation were not natural or normal. Women had no outlet for many of their varied instincts and energies. It was pointed out that the brain of woman was smaller than that of man, but he had yet to learn that what counted in the brain was quantity rather than quality. (Laughter). The idiot had a brain which was too small; the lunatic, he believed, often had a brain which was too large so that if the female approximated to the idiot the male approximated to the lunatic. (Renewed laughter).

Women's "frivolity"—their love of shopping, and so on—had been spoken of, but if under present conditions women—and he would add other people—refused to take life seriously who was to blame? "Life as we know it," said Professor Canney, "cannot be taken seriously. There is something better, and behind the tinsel shops woman visualises the true world of colour, music, rhythm, song, and laughter." The way to end the sexual conflict was to have perfect faith in women and give them complete freedom. By complete freedom he did not mean licence, but freedom to work out their own salvation. If women were given complete freedom no doubt they would try at first to do things for which they were not fitted, but that would do no harm. Before long they would discover their true vocations, and then many present evils would disappear automatically.

Nominally at least, he continued, women possessed greater power and influence than before the war; practically they were still precluded from making full use of their gifts and talents. If this were a personal loss it would not matter so much, but it was more than that—it was a disastrous loss to the nation. If women were given rights fully equal to those of men the blood would flow more freely in the veins of humanity and many sores would heal.

"There is something very wrong with the world," said Professor Canney, in conclusion. "If the ship of humanity pursues its present course it will founder on the rock of extinction. In the Greek of the New Testament 'repent' means 'alter your outlook': in the Hebrew of the Old Testament it means 'go back'. In both senses we need to repent of our folly. We need in large measure to renew our minds, reverse our thoughts, re-educate ourselves, and revive our faith. Of all our needs the greatest is faith. Have faith in women and make them free."

POET'S VISIT TO MALABAR.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The great international teacher of the world, and the Rishi-putra of poetic fame passed through our Coast just a few days ago like a heavenly bird of passage singing a most melodious hymn that will for ever link the children of this soil to the great Kingdom of God. Verily, he taught us like one in authority. He stood amidst us like another Jesus, Budha, and Krishna incarnate in one. His lips spoke words of love and peace. His whole physical frame and his marvellous face bore witness to his great message. The echoes of his great mystic hymn are fast spreading wonderfully in every hearth and home, dispelling the ignorance and superstitions of ages. Hindus and Muslims, Christians and Parsees, touchables and untouchables, men and women, all equally and dearly received the great one with love and affection, their dearest and most cherished homage to him. "Visva Bharati—Shanti Nikethan" has become a household word in Malabar and the young men and women of this Coast look forward to it as the one place of pilgrimage, the symbol of their future hope and the meeting place of the East and West—the holy Prayag of international welfare.

The people of Malabar and Travancore have become really inspired and happier for having had the Poet amidst them. Our esteemed and beloved friend Sjt. C. F. Andrews has been of immense value to us. His incessant services in behalf of India and her poor and oppressed children, his love for the youth of this country; his indignant reproaches against the bane of untouchability and unapproachability and above all his burning love and whole-hearted devotion to his Gurudeva—Poet Rabindra Nath Tagore, makes us feel that he is verily our own. May God bless the Poet and his dear disciple is our heart's spontaneous prayer now and for ever.

West Coast Brahma Mission,
Alleppey, 2nd December.

NOTES.

Mr. Sastry on His Mission: The Right Hon. Mr. Srinivasa Sastry delivered an excellent-tempered address at the Bombay Presidency Association on Wednesday, on his mission to the Dominions. If he was inclined to exaggerate its magnitude before starting, he showed no such inclination in his speech. He pointed out that the three Dominions which he visited, together contained less than 5000 Indians and that, on the whole, they were doing very well where they were. In Australia and New Zealand, where there are about 3000 Indians, Mr. Sastry had, in fact, little to do, and that he did with his accustomed grace and dignity. In Canada, the Indian population has come down in a few years from 6000 to 1200. The bulk of them are in British Columbia, and from what we could gather, Mr. Sastry has not been able to do much for them. We were rather curious to know whether these Indians in Canada are yet allowed to take their wives and children. Mr. Sastry was reticent on the point. The Chairman, Sir Dinshah Petit, adopted such an unnecessarily aggressive attitude towards an innocent interruption, that one did not feel inclined to call down his wrath by asking for enlightenment on a point, however important, which Mr. Sastry chose to leave untouched. Mr. Sastry implied that he utilised the opportunity to sound the Dominion statesmen as to their attitude towards granting self-government to India, and that they were all favourably disposed to the idea. On the whole, Mr. Sastry's tone was such as to disarm criticism and make the audience feel that he had done his best in the circumstances of his deputation.

The Home and the Hostel: The July number of the Mysore University Magazine devotes nearly three pages to an editorial criticism of the rather sweeping condemnation of college hostels in India which appeared in the Reformer of August 27th in a leading article on Madras University Reform. We have since acknowledged that college hostels have done much good in several cases, notably hostels attached to Women's Colleges. The Maharaja's College Hostel in Mysore is, no doubt, one of them. We are nevertheless of opinion that the best students' hostel is but an indifferent substitute for a fairly good home from the point of view of character-formation, just as the best teacher is but a poor substitute for one's own father and mother as an inspirer of youth. We are, therefore, very much in favour of bringing higher education to the doors of the people, instead of concentrating them in a few big centres. We consequently attach the greatest importance to mofussil colleges as outposts of intellectual light and culture, and strongly deprecate any change that is calculated to weaken them. In our opinion, it is utterly premature, before there is a much larger diffusion of elementary and secondary education in the country, to think of concentrating higher education in a few small centres. The makeshifts to which some of the new Universities have been driven to provide professors, is but one illustration of the futility of trying to build a high edifice on a narrow foundation.

The Subodh Patrika and Facts:—The last issue of the Subodh Patrika, the organ of the local Prarthana Samaj, has a leading article headed "Vedant and Morality." We do not wish to discuss here our contemporary's dictum that the doctrine of the ultimate absorption of the individual in the Universal Soul, leaves no room for morality. If the writer thinks that, without a guarantee of personal immortality, he would be without an incentive to morality, he is perfectly entitled to do so. But he has no right to misrepresent facts. Now the fact is that, in quoting Professor Deussen's remark about the Vedanta furnishing the explanation of a Christian precept, we expressly stated that similarly the study of Christ's teaching is helpful for a better understanding of Hinduism. Yet, the Subodh Patrika says that we did so with a view "to pander to the prejudices of the people and make them believe that they have got everything in their own scriptures and have, therefore, nothing to learn from others on that account." "The celebrated Shankar" might have been a dreamer of dreams, but he compressed in his short ministry of thirty years an amount of literary and propagandistic work, which even the Prarthana Samaj, whose fifty-fifth annual report has just been issued, might envy. The Subodh Patrika might stigmatise his doctrine as it likes but the man himself was obviously a mighty worker which, at least, may be counted to him for righteousness. While pandering to popular prejudices, is undoubtedly wicked, a pharisaic outlook on life is an insidious poison which should be equally eschewed.

Protection for the Services:—Princes have been "protected" from the Indian Press by the certificated Bill now before Parliament. It will, of course, receive the Royal Assent, after lying for the requisite number of days on the Parliamentary table. The demand now is for protection of the English officials. In the House of Commons on Tuesday Colonel Sir Charles Yate declared that the want of protection from vilification in the Press was one of the reasons which were drawing many officers in the Civil Service and Police in India to apply for proportionate pensions. He suggested that Viscount Peel should consider the question of enforcing a more effective method of stopping the abuse of Government servants. Earl Winterton replied that actions for defamation against newspapers appeared to be having some effect, but he was sure that the Government of India would willingly consider any more effective method Sir Charles Yate could suggest. According to the latest information he had received, there had been some appreciable improvement in the conditions and he felt more hopeful than he did some eighteen months ago.—We may confidently expect another certificated Bill, drafted by Sir Charles Yate, to lie before Parliament in a short while. Who will save India from the Yates?

Indian Christians and Communal Electorates: New India, Madras, pays a well-deserved compliment to the Punjab Indian Christian Conference for passing the resolution, referred to in our last issue, condemning the principle of communal electorates. "The Conference", says our contemporary, "must be congratulated on having adopted such a sensible attitude in the matter. For a Communal Conference in its position, the temptation to demand communal representation in the public services must have been great, and its action is marked by courage and statesmanship. The warning which it has sounded, it is to be hoped, will not be lost on the country." The Leader, Allahabad, also writes in the same strain: "With the Indian Social Reformer", says our contemporary, "we also venture to hope that the example set by the Punjab Indian Christian community will be followed by other communities."

An Interview That Did Not Take Place: It was a pleasant surprise to read in the papers last week a message to the effect that the Government of Bombay had relaxed their rule of not allowing any departure from their Jail Code in the case of Mahatma Gandhi, so far as to permit an interview with him in Yeravda Prison to his political colleagues Messrs. Dass, Motilal Nehru, and Hakim Ajmal Khan. It is understood that permission to see Mr. Gandhi had been previously refused to Mr. Srinivasa Sastry, Mr. Lallubhai Samaldas, and Mr. Polak. Speculation was rife as to what had brought about the sudden change. Some said pressure must have come from the Secretary of State, others that Lord Reading, after a period of quiescence, was beginning to assert his authority. No one doubted that the permission had been granted as stated in the message. This continued for some days. On the 13th, however, another message was published to the effect that the permission had been cancelled by a telegram from the Superintendent of Yeravda Jail and Pandit Motilal was returning to Allahabad. This was wrong as the Pandit did not leave Allahabad, having been apprised in time that he could not see the Mahatma. Was the permission granted or not? If it was, why was it subsequently withdrawn? If it was not, how did the Pandit come to believe it was, and make arrangements to go to Yeravda to see the Mahatma? The Government of India or the Government of Bombay, should unravel the mystery.

The U. P. Way: In the United Provinces, it seems that the Financial Secretary to Government was paid a special fee of Rs. 3,000 for preparing the annual Budget but that he refunded the money at his own request. This gentleman's name deserves to be handed down to posterity. For a man of such unusually keen conscience, Blunt is a most inappropriate name. He should be created Lord Keen of Prayag in the next Honours' List in order to remove the anomaly. Seriously, we are truly grateful to Mr. Blunt for his action which has restored, for the moment, our waning faith in the high purpose of his once-sterly righteous service. If this policy of largesses be extended, bonuses may be paid to Members of Council for answering questions, to Ministers for attacking Non-Co-operators, to Law officers for drafting Bills, to Members of the Legislative Council for moving amendments and to Governors for exercising their veto!

Departmental Development: His Excellency the Governor of Bombay opened some of the chawls, consisting of one-room tenements built by the Development Department as a remedy for the housing problem in Bombay city, a few days ago. Sir George Lloyd, as usual, gave some harmless and much unnecessary advice to critics of his administration in general and the Development department in particular, and relied upon the verdict of the working-man on the D. d. chawls to vindicate his policy to posterity. We have heard from some observers, to whose opinion we cannot but attach great weight, and who have seen these chawls, very unfavourable opinions regarding their suitability for the purpose for which they are intended. One of them recalled with reference to them the epigrammatic observation of a great sociologist about the difference between housing and warehousing workers. We hope these criticisms will lead to a change of design in future chawls. As regards the larger scheme of Development to which Sir George Lloyd has committed the Presidency, misgivings, so far from subsiding, seem to be hardening, though the City having acquiesced, is in no mood to engage in a controversy about what is now regarded as inevitable.

Liquor at Public Fairs: The Madras Municipal Corporation, backed up by a strong local opinion, has unanimously refused to allow the holding of People's Fair if any liquor was to be sold at any part of it. A High Court Judge who was also President of the public body which is organising the Fair, wrote a letter to the President pointing out that the prohibition would militate against the success of the Fair, and the President, Sir P. Theagaraya Chetti, placed the letter before the Corporation, with the result that that body confirmed with even more emphasis its previous resolution. We congratulate the Madras Corporation on its insistence upon a great principle. What about Bombay? We have a big Red Cross Fete in progress, and we hope that no liquor is dispensed at any of its shows. If, on the contrary, it is allowed, it is high time that a strong protest is entered against such a violation of public propriety.

The National Social Conference: The National Social Conference will apparently be in session at two places this year, instead of only at the place where the National Congress is held, as last year and in the previous years. No announcement has been published regarding the holding of the Conference at Gaya, but we hear that arrangements are likely to be made as usual. Meanwhile, it has been notified that it has been decided to hold the National Social Conference at Nagpur on December 30. A Reception Committee has been formed with Dr. Gour as Chairman and Messrs. David, Jayavant and Mangal Murti as Secretaries. The Hon. C. Y. Chintamani has been offered the presidentship of the Conference. Sir Narayan Chandavarkar, Mr. G. K. Devadhar and others are going for the conference. We are glad that the social reformers among the Liberals have decided to hold a Social Conference with their annual Federation meetings.

The All-India Theistic Conference: Mr. K. Natarajan has been invited and has consented to preside at the forthcoming All-India Theistic Conference at Gaya, regarding which we published a letter from the Secretaries, Professor U. N. Ball and Mr. D. N. Sarkar last week.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, DECEMBER 16, 1922.

GREAT BRITAIN AND THE TURKISH QUESTION.

There has been such a confusing conflict of information regarding the real, actual conditions of the latest phase of the Turkish question, that it is a great relief to have a thoroughly reliable estimate of it from a person quite competent to form one, by his knowledge and impartiality. Major-General Sir Charles Townshend, the heroic defender of Kut-ül-Amara, contributes an article to the current number of Asia, the organ of the American Asiatic Association of New York, on "Great Britain and the Turks," which throws a flood of light on several aspects of the problem. At the outset, the General warns us not to take the atrocity stories at their face value.

"I am not," he writes, "going to defend what has been done in the name of Turkish rule, either in Europe or Asia. But those of us who cast stones at the Turk should beware lest we damage our own frail houses of glass. The Turk has had to deal with turbulent and treacherous peoples, and his way of dealing with them had the merit of strength at least. If the atrocities were totalled on either side of an account, we should find that many of the so-called Christian nations were deeper in bloodshed and guilt than the champion of Islam."

That reminds one of the account given by Sir Percival Phillips, in a recent letter to the Daily Mail, of the dropping of bombs from air-craft as a means of collecting taxes in Mesopotamia. "Tax-collecting by bomb," he writes, "has become almost a matter of routine for the Royal Air Force in Mesopotamia. It would surprise the British tax-payer to know the extent to which bombing has prevailed in the country districts of the new State of Iraq during the past year in order to bolster up King Feisal's authority." He adds: "Until now, government by bomb, as I have described it, has been the only really effective form of authority in many parts of Iraq." If this had been done under Turkish regime, what an outcry would there have been against this atrocity? Atrocities are hateful by whosoever committed, but, as Sir Charles Townshend candidly says, not many Christian nations have the right to point an accusing finger at Turkey.

Sir Charles Townshend was taken in battle after the fall of Kut and became a prisoner. He was released unconditionally in October 1918 and returned to England with authority from the Turkish leaders to open negotiations. "How were they rewarded for this," he asks, "the first active offer to end the misery and destruction of Armageddon? They were given the Treaty of Sevres." Of that treaty itself, he writes:

If we had deliberately set ourselves to devise the most unjust, ungenerous and merciless policy of revenge, if we had picked for the task our clumsiest and most ruthless and discredited politicians and partisans, we could not have evolved a worse result than that which was achieved by our complacent and self-congratulatory 'experts' at the Foreign Office and in Downing Street.

The General explains why he went to Angora without the permission of the Foreign Office some months ago. "I took the liberty of thinking," he writes, "that our Government, though not the British people, had broken faith with an honorable enemy. And more: I knew what the Prime Minister did not seem to know, that the greatest safeguard we could possibly have for the preservation of India and our empire in the East was Turkey's friendship." He observes:

When we remember that in India and Africa, Great Britain alone has a population of close upon a hundred million Mahomedan subjects, that there are large numbers in the Malay Peninsula, and that the Hindu population of India has made the cause of the religious freedom of all the races of India its own, one can see what the peril might be if we antagonize and insult the Turk, the acknowledged head and leader of Islam, in his own holy capital.

He thought, he says, that he might do something to persuade the Turkish Government at Angora that things were not so hopeless as they seemed and that this heaping of insult upon indignity was not the policy of more than a bigoted few in Britain. The treaty of Sevres, remarks the General, contains insult to Turkey in every paragraph. The French Chamber of Deputies never accepted it. The Italians ignored it.

Before its recent victorious career the Angora Army was depicted as a ragged, undisciplined mob of brigands. What Sir Charles Townshend found at Angora was very different. He writes:

I found an entire nation in arms, under the leadership of single-minded patriots. I found an army whose match the world would be hard put to provide to-day, full of spirit, brilliantly led, from the generals down to the platoon officers, supplied with artillery, equipment and munitions which their own hands had made and adapted, ready to fight to the last man for the defence of their sacred soil.

General Townshend pays a high tribute to the self-restraint of Mustafa Kemal Pasha in not proclaiming a holy war. According to him, the Turks are, and have always been, sincerely anxious to cultivate Britain's friendship. The Turk, he says, likes and admires the spirit of Great Britain and France and sees therein a reflection of his own best qualities which, under the great Sultans of two and three centuries ago, were the admiration of the world. He is, therefore, willing to leave the British and the French in peaceful control of their vast Mahomedan populations. But he may be forced too far. Says the General:

At this very moment there is on foot a great Mahomedan movement in India and Mesopotamia directed against British rule. That movement still lacks leadership, and we can deal with it by firmness and justice. But I served for twenty-one years in India and the Sudan, under that great administrator, Lord Kitchener, and I have never known a time when the peril of religious war was more grave and fraught with more dire consequences. With Turkey leading the Mahomedan world in an organized rebellion against British rule there would be, as I see it, no hope for the maintenance of the security of the empire.

This picture, so far as Indian Mahomedans are concerned, is overdrawn but there can be no doubt that the situation is serious. The greatest obstacle to the resumption of political activities on constitutional lines in this country, is this outstanding question of the Turkish treaty. The Hindus are bound to stand by every community on a question involving religious freedom, or they will not be true to their own great, ancient tradition. The fall of the Lloyd George Government, has removed the main stumbling-block in the way of a just peace with Turkey. We earnestly trust that the negotiations proceeding at Lausanne will eventuate in a completely satisfactory settlement with Turkey. We should add that it argues real courage and statesmanship on the part of the Angora Government to have brought about the separation of the Caliphate from the temporal power, when, if they were less scrupulous, they might have used the Caliphate to feed the fanaticism of ignorant Mahomedans.

THE BI-CAMERAL LEGISLATURE IN INDIA, I.

(By P. L.)

Few persons now feel enthusiastic about what we still persist in calling the "Reforms." But of all the abortive creations of the new era, the one that has caused the deepest disillusionment is the Council of State. Yet it did not need any remarkable degree of political thinking or experience to perceive that neither the decisions nor the temper of the Council could have been different from what they have been.

The Report on Indian Constitutional Reforms made it clear that its authors wanted not a revising chamber in the Central Government but a superseding body called the Council of State constituted and empowered as a government machine. While in most other countries, the upper house is a revising body, in India it was meant as an antidote to the elected majority in the Legislative Assembly and in practice as the seat of power of the Government. It thus acted not as a check but as an Opposition in power in relation to the lower house. This is made plain in the Report which points out the need of some positive power of legislation for the executive and invents this device for it. Whatever the political consequences of such an upper chamber, it can never take the constitutional place of a check, and when disagreement comes, the fight between the two chambers will take place not over any matter in dispute so much as over the powers of an irremovable and popularly irresponsible executive and the duly elected representatives of the Indian people. It will be a contest between the executive and the legislature to determine which is sovereign. The rest follows. As Bagehot observes "In common government it is fatally difficult to make an unpopular entity powerful in popular government." But the authors of the Report argue that they did not mean this plan of theirs as a complete bi-cameral system. Yet the experiment of second chamber has been far from successful in other countries. Bagehot quotes a critic as remarking that "the cure for admiring the House of Lords was to go and look at it." And the growing impotence of non-elected second chambers is a well-recognised fact while their future extinction with a nearer approximation to social and economic equality than now exists, is almost certain.

In fact, the Joint Committee of Houses of Parliament presided over by Lord Salisbury wisely reduced the Council to a "true second chamber" and deprived it of its former resemblance to the old German Bundesrath in which Prussia could throw out any measures it disapproved and thereby ruled the Reichstag. The Joint Committee said that there was no necessity to retain the Council of State as an organ for government legislation and that the legislative responsibility of the Governor-General-in-Council for the safety and tranquility of British India should not be concealed through the action of a Council of State specially devised in its composition to secure the necessary powers. But it is more than questionable whether its perpetuation even in this modified form is beneficial. When a body is carefully created for the purpose of revision and as a seat of greater strength for the officials, it seems illogical to entrust the power for which it was created to some one else. And that power—namely the power of carrying the government measures considered essential by the Governor-General—was not vested in the elected Legislative Assembly but was to be wielded by the Governor-General himself. The old power of ordinance having the scope of law for six months, has been replaced by a reactionary instrument making that power permanent and indefinite. But why, then, retain a revising chamber when the executive still retains such limitless powers? The obvious reply that may be suggested is that such powers of the executive are transitory; to which it may be replied that the Council of State itself is a transitional body and to make it a permanent institution in the political life of the country, is harmful.

Why is this so? How is it that the theory of constitutional checks has completely failed in practice in England, her colonies and America? Have the apparent advantages of a second chamber usually mentioned in treatises on political science, any actual existence in fact? These are questions that at once come up to one's mind when considering the subject. It is now a commonplace that the bi-cameral system is a peculiarly British institution and though—like most British institutions—it came into existence accidentally, it did not prove very uncongenial to the British soil till recently. From being a chamber of distinction, the House of Lords had become a brake upon the wheels of legislative change till the Parliament Act of 1911 virtually ended its legislative control upon the Commons while its financial powers have been nil for a long time. These two features of the British constitution have been embodied in the governmental systems of almost all democratic countries but while a two-chamber system was thought to contain some hidden virtues within it, the prerogative of the lower house over fiscal measures was due to a true belief that as Lord Morley has said, "the people must mediately or immediately possess the powers of granting their own money or no shadow of liberty can subsist." It is not the latter but the former feature which has been borrowed without sufficient consideration in other countries; and it is essential that this system so dear to British political thinking and so inconvenient in British political working should not be thrust upon India. For even if that system had been working well in England to-day, that is no reason why India should copy it per se because we must get rid of the notion that self-Government means only the British kind of representative Government. Transplanted political institutions are likely to be barren unless the roots are carried with them, says Lowell. There are said to be monkeys in Africa so imitative that they copy faithfully the huts of men and then live on the outside of them instead of the inside. Political imitation is not free from this danger of copying the obvious and leaving out the essential in the working of a foreign government.

Three arguments are usually advanced for a bicameral system in India. The first of these is that the representation of minority interests would be more effective in an upper house as the minority representatives would not feel free to defend their interests where there are other elements. The great fuss that is made about the right of minority representation and the amount of discussion on the subject are due to a fundamental error in understanding the true nature of representative Government. As Mr. Ramsay MacDonald observes: "Representation in the legislative organ of society is the result of the success of the propaganda of an opinion, not a right that can be claimed for it simply because it exists." In India, ever since the mistake of separate representation for the Mussalmans, every sect, creed and caste—be it small or great—has begun to demand special and separate representation as if a legislative assembly is a debating society in which men belonging to every queer sect which is able to muster up a thousand or two thousand electors are to find accommodation; as if the main task of a legislature is not contact between mind and mind for the formulation of a coherent policy but a tug-of-war in which different interests pull the rope in their own direction so that the sect that is not in the chamber is lost; as if Parliament is but a mirror of various interests and opinions, a mosaic exhibiting the picturesque diversity of castes, creeds and sects instead of being what it really is, the making of an active will for the State. The presence of an odd handful of men representing this caste or that creed in the legislative chamber sent by groups of voters scattered about the whole of India, is of no importance to the accuracy of the representative system or to the proper working of popular government. The minority is always represented—so soon as the minorities reach a representable proportion of the electorate. What deserves representation is not any and every interest but "a body of political opinion of sufficient general importance to be organised for political purposes." If certain permanent minorities have some valuable contribution to make to social intelligence, they must rouse general interest by their opinions and gain a non-sectarian following before they earn the right of representation. If they do so, they are certain to find representation through ordinary channels of the electoral machine; if they fail to do so, one may safely assume that they are of no relevant consequence. No special scheme of minority representation would give minorities in India more legitimate influence than they have in the countries with representative government to-day. Though minorities have every right to be heard and represented, they can only win by earning the goodwill and the support of the major portion of the mass of citizens. Nothing therefore is good for the protection of minorities except goodwill—and this cannot be secured by any mechanical device. Persuasion is the only legitimate political means and not special privileges in a secluded chamber. As Amos puts it, representation, co-operation, concession and adjustment can be better secured in one broadly representative chamber than by discussion in one chamber representing one set of interests and then by another representing another set.

THE NATION'S DILEMMA.

II

The objective is the attainment of full Swarajya and the redress of the Khilafat and the Punjab wrongs. It is a common ground between all parties, not excluding the Liberals. There is yet another ground of common agreement, which does not seem to find acceptance only with the Liberals, namely the belief that the objects can be achieved only independently of British co-operation and in spite of British opposition. Whatever has to be gained has to be wrested from unwilling hands; for that purpose we must weaken the enemy—the British bureaucracy and the vested interests—and increase and consolidate our strength. Mr. M. R. Jayakar made an able use of this argument at the Calcutta meeting of the All India Congress Committee in urging his plea for entry into the Councils for working the Reforms. He said there is a fundamental difference between the Liberals entering the Councils and the Congressmen doing the same. Non-co-operation, he said, represents an attitude of mind which does not believe in the bureaucracy and it is shared only by Congressmen. This is a stock argument which eminent leaders of the standing of Sjt. C. R. Das and Pandit Motilal Nehru use in different forms. They say: "We are staunch Non-co-operators because we hate and distrust the Government, not a whit less than any of you. What more do you want?" This is a crude and blunt way of expression but that is the central fact. But this argument is not restricted only to advocates of Council entry. It is the main plank of some ardent supporters of Council boycott.

Mr. Gandhi was harnessing the National energy to the militant chariot of aggressive Non-co-operation, when at the last moment, in the hour of battle, he called a truce and enjoined the Bardoli programme upon the country. The reason Mr. Gandhi gave for the drastic change of plan was that the country had not acquired the discipline of the Non-violent. In arriving at the Bardoli decision Mr. Gandhi weighed in the balance, the victory of the movement in its political aspect on the one hand and the failure on its moral basis on the other, owing to the growing spirit of violence with its concomitants of anger and hatred. Mr. Gandhi thought and acted with Christ:—What does it profit a man if he gains the whole world and loses his soul? Mr. Gandhi did not mince the issues. He told the people that the Bardoli programme was a penance the Nation had to do for the crime of Chauri Chaura. Those who followed Mr. Gandhi only as a political leader and had accepted Non-violence as a policy in its narrowest sense felt Mr. Gandhi had done a great disservice to the cause. Mr. V. J. Patel put this view-point emphatically in a speech he delivered to the Bengal Provincial Khilafat Conference soon after the last meeting of the All India Congress Committee. He said he stood for Civil Disobedience and had little desire to go to the Councils in the event of the possibility of launching it. But he did not understand those who were opposed to Council entry in any form and who at the same time opposed an immediate campaign of Civil Disobedience or even picketing. They asked the country to ply the Charkha and to wait for Swaraj. Nor could he understand, said Mr. Patel, the emphasis upon Non-violence in word, thought and deed. He said Non-violence as a policy can only mean Non-violence in action. Anger and hatred there would always be, in word and thought and he will not fight shy of it. Sjt. Das expresses the same central idea when he says:—"I am a Vaishnava of Vaishnavas. But I am prepared to destroy everything which stands in the way of Freedom, because Freedom is the highest good." This is exactly the reverse of what the Bardoli decision stands for, namely, Righteousness alone is the highest Dharma—not even Freedom matters.

If Mr. Gandhi had been free, even the peaceful Bardoli programme would have been a potent weapon of offensive and defensive warfare and nation-building. But in his absence, the Bardoli programme lacks the appeal to the superficial mind, that a war-cry offers. After Mr. Gandhi's imprisonment, the All India Congress Committee that met at Lucknow in June, was in a tumultuous mood. The country resented the imprisonment of the great Leader and thirsted for the word of command to resume militant Non-co-operation. The Committee owed it to the country to have itself threshed out the question of Civil Disobedience or Constructive programme at Lucknow itself, and given a clear lead. Instead, the Civil Disobedience Committee was appointed to tour the country and to report. The Committee unanimously found that Civil Disobedience of an intensive character under the stringent conditions of Non-violence and discipline laid by Mr. Gandhi, cannot be undertaken. Then there were three courses open:—(1) to persevere in the Constructive programme, (2) to embark upon Civil Disobedience without the restrictions imposed by Mr. Gandhi to keep it on a non-violent and highly moral basis and (3) to enter the councils for wrecking or responsive co-operation. Apart from the conflict of principles let us examine the different proposals.

The policy of Council entry has the active support of tried leaders as Sjt. C. R. Das and Pandit Motilal Nehru, and the Maharashtrians. Sjt. Das wants to contest the elections and to present the Government with a demand for the conceding of certain essential of Swaraj and, failing acceptance, to offer total obstruction. Pandit Motilalji wants the attainment of the triple objects of the Congress, until which time he will totally obstruct the working of the Councils. He is so emphatic that he has declared he would obstruct the Government even in a motion for the release of Mr. Gandhi. The Maharashtrians want to work the Councils and feel that Congressmen should capture the ministerships. Sjt. Das and Pandit Nehru feel confident of having a majority in the Council to offer effective obstruction. Their present declaration is that if the Non-co-operators are returned at the polls in a minority, they should totally abstain from participating in the Councils. The Maharashtrians are not so rigid in their principles. They want to work the Councils in any position. But they are prepared to abide by any Congress mandate that may be given after the elections are over, if the Congress will permit the contesting of elections. There is one other complication, peculiar to the Mussalman which I have omitted. The Mussalman Divines have issued a Fatwa declaring any form of Co-operation with the Government, particularly through the schools, courts and Councils as a religious sin. The Fatwa, I think, is based on the Punjab wrong, Khilafat betrayal and denial of Swaraj. To-day the position is, that the Fatwa has been modified to the extent of permitting contesting of elections. The impression is that if as a result of the Lausanne Conference, following upon the victories of the Ghazi Mustapha Kemal Pasha, the Khilafat question is satisfactorily solved, Council entry will not remain any longer a sin.

To sum up: the question of Council entry has no standing on its own merits. It is admitted to be a second best, an alternative and not the main remedy. The slogan is, Civil Disobedience is the chief remedy. But since it is hedged in by so many impossible conditions on moral grounds, we shall take to the Councils. The Council entry will yield greater results in national advancement than the constructive programme. There is a section of Congressmen corresponding to the Maharashtrians in favour of Councils who are for Council boycott under any circumstance because they are convinced of its futility. That section is for Civil Disobedience or for some other forward programme. That is the position that faced the All-India Congress Committee at Calcutta. The policy of wrecking the Councils represents a school of the militant Non-Co-operationists while responsive Co-operation is only a reversion to the methods of winning freedom as a gift for good behaviour. Council-entry in any form is as contrary to the true spirit of Non-Co-operation as militant Civil Disobedience. What is on trial is Mr. Gandhi's doctrine of Non-violence as a sine qua non of all progress, as embodied in the constructive programme. In the face of such an issue, the common hatred and anger against the foreigner that gave the solidarity in carrying out the militant Non-cooperation programme hinders and does not help. The issue is of a fundamental character and is enclosed in a camouflage of stock phrases and ideas. It remains to be seen what choice the Gaya Congress will make.

INDIAN CHRISTIANITY AND THE NATIONAL AWAKENING.

(BY A ROMAN CATHOLIC).

II

THE EUROPEANISATION OF THE INDIAN CHRISTIAN.

To answer the query why it is that the Indian Christian has not in common with his Hindu and Moslem fellow-citizen realised a common consciousness and a common will, as far as such can reasonably be expected, it is necessary to look at facts squarely in the face. It is no use blinking the realities of the situation.

First of all, it is undeniable that a difference of religion does of itself introduce some distance, howsoever small, whether it is between two individuals or two communities. Our creeds are, or rather are excepted to be, so integral a part of our life and conduct that except in very rare instances some sort of restraint or diffidence, call it what one will, is bound to enter into the relations of two people who do not pray at the same shrine. To put it briefly, two such parties can never, making allowances for exceptional cases, be in utter communion. The inappreciable distance that a difference of religion implies broadens into a real gap when the adherents of the new religion associate themselves with social changes which are inconsistent with or hostile to the traditions of the parent society. A Hindu convert to Christianity would be of no more concern to an orthodox Hindu than would be a Hindu who had forsaken his ancestral faith for Buddhism, so long as the former did not adopt many of the social habits and practices which, though warranted by his admission into the new faith, the believing Hindu or Mohammedan would eye with positive disfavour if not disgust. Hinduism is not and never has been a militant religion; its powers of absorbing all that it considers good or unobjectionable around it into its own system, is truly startling; the moment, however, the Hindu thought that his fellow-citizen who had joined the Christian faith, had under the sanction of his new creed committed what to the former would be hideous and gross 'sins', such as cow slaughter and the partaking of animal diet, the orthodox Hindu could scarcely be blamed for treating the Christian with a certain feeling of reserve and even of estrangement. The conflict is due not to a difference of religion but of social usages.

But this difference between the Hindu and the Christian that has arisen from one side adopting social habits and practices that conflicted with those of the older cult and civilisation, is not appreciably greater than the social gulf that avowedly exists between the Hindus and the Mohammedans; but whereas the gulf between the two major communities of India has been gradually diminishing and to-day even spanned over by an entente cordiale, that between the Christian and the other Indian communities is as wide as ever. The reason for this is not far to seek. The Hindus and Mohammedans though divided by religion are knit together by a common motherland, and what is more by their allegiance in the main to the tastes, fashions, forms, art, customs, habits, social life, in a word, the culture of the East; they are proud to feel that in all that they think, feel and do, they represent the East. The Indian Christian, on the other hand, is taught to feel happy in believing that Christianity is a brand of Europeanism (pace an ugly word) and this notion, sad to say, is as much detrimental to his faith as to himself. He develops a frame of mind which leads him to the view that the truth and fervour of the Christian life may be measured not so much by the approximation of his life and conduct to the ideal set out in the Sermon on the Mount but on the correct-cut of European-wise tailored clothes, the imitation and like most imitations, shoddy, of the European's habits and social usages; the proverbial sahib's topee, the coat and the pantaloons become the veritable hall-marks of the new religion. The size and shape of the frame must be in keeping with the subject of the picture, but to the Indian Christian it matters not at all whether he fits in the new frame; he is satisfied so long as it is the sort of framework that his co-religionists in Europe affect, the same kind that has been held up to his admiration in the life, habits and manners of his religious mentors.

Together with his old religion the Hindu convert to Christianity sloughed off his social habits and to the extent he clung to the new and alien modes of life and thought, he became oblivious, if not scornful, of the Swadeshi history, traditions, culture and of the aspirations of his non-Christian fellowmen. The attitude of the Indian Christian towards the non-Christians is in effect a sort of conceited or infatuated assertion of the much quoted 'East is East and West is West and never the twain shall meet.'

LONDON LETTER.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, November 28th, 1922.

THE PARLIAMENT.

The elections are over, with apparently a great victory for the Unionist Party. The country has made a complete end of the Coalition and given the Unionist Party a working majority over all other parties. And now commences the Government of Mr. Bonar Law. It is stated that Mr. Lloyd George approved of the programme that the New Prime Minister has laid down, so that there is to be no captions fighting or obstructive opposition from him. His only regret and surprise are that the country chose Mr. Bonar Law instead of himself to proclaim the determination of the country to pursue a policy of tranquility and stability. Details of how to obtain these much-to-be-desired ends remain to be filled in. The gains of the Labour Party are bigger than was expected for them, and this party will, by reason of the number of its elected members, now form the official opposition. Labour has returned some very good men to represent it. These possess an intellectual force valuable to any party. Such men as Mr. Ramsey Macdonald, Mr. Sidney Webb, Mr. Philip Snowden, Mr. H. B. Lees Smith, Mr. C. P. Trevelyan, Mr. Patrick Hastings, K. C., and Mr. Arthur Ponsonby, many of them converts from the Radical side, will keep any party virile and forceful, and the Opposition will not be easily swamped, however large the majority on the Unionist side. Of course, the Liberal Party feels very sore at being defeated, and in its recognised organ, the "Westminster Gazette", calls the present election results a caricature of Democracy. It is true that though Mr. Bonar Law's victorious supporters come into power, they yet numerically do not represent the electorate, and have actually secured only about a million and a quarter more votes than the defeated Liberals. But to alter the present electoral system would be the work of the Government and one wonders if, after this, the Liberal Party will put a new item upon its agenda, that of electoral reform. "The Westminster" urges them to do so, and to work so as to get rid of a method which produces such ridiculous results.

THE UNEMPLOYED.

Already Mr. Bonar Law's optimistic statement of his party's producing tranquility looks like being falsified at the outset through domestic difficulties. A tremendous unemployed rally took place last week and a deputation from the National Unemployed Workers' Committee decided to call upon the Prime Minister. Advised of this intention, Mr. Bonar Law referred the Committee to the Ministers of Labour and Health, as heads of the departments primarily responsible for the treatment and alleviation of unemployment. The Committee refused to accept such an answer and again requested Mr. Bonar Law to make arrangements to receive them on the day they had appointed. A second refusal was given. Then the unemployed committee declared their intention to invade Whitehall by a body of a thousand picked men drawn from all over the country. Mr. Bonar Law remained firm, but was faced with a prospect of very serious disorder on a formidable scale. Strong measures under the police regulations were taken, and all processions were forbidden in the neighbourhood of Parliament and Government offices. A general feeling was abroad that a riot was probable and that the whole unemployed Organisation was in the hands of extreme Communists who were seeking to produce some real and serious disorder. Fortunately, yesterday passed without these black forebodings being justified. Meetings were held in various parts of the West End, but no attempt to rush Whitehall was made, saner counsels prevailing. The majority of the Unemployed demonstrators wisely recognised that nothing but suffering could come to them by an attempted raid on the Premier, and also they may have remembered that now they have a powerful voice in the House itself. It is certain that the whole matter will be brought up and discussed in Parliament as soon as ever that body gets to work. Mr. Bonar Law pledged himself a few weeks ago to produce and put into operation the plans which were already worked out by the last Government for the relief of unemployment during this winter, and has set up a new Cabinet Committee on unemployment, which, as the winter approaches, is increasing.

MR. RAMSAY MACDONALD.

The election of Mr. Ramsay Macdonald as the Leader of the Parliamentary Labour Party, in preference to Mr. Clynes, is an event of political importance, for he holds very different views on many outstanding subjects from Mr. Clynes, and what his position will be in regard to any foreign policy it is difficult to say. He was a very angry pacifist during the war, and as far as it is generally known, has not altered any of his former views. Yet he is a ruthless fighter and, if an enemy, is to be feared.

WOMEN IN PARLIAMENT.

A good deal of surprise has been shown at the very small return of women to Parliament in this General Election. Out of about thirty women candidates, only the two already there, Lady Astor, a Conservative, and Mrs. Wintringham, a Liberal, secured seats. Yet the women's votes should have turned the scale in favour of a woman representative in at least a dozen constituencies. Curiously enough, the opposition to placing women in Parliament comes from women themselves and not from men. Women in the main have not yet learned to adjust themselves to the new order, and still look to men as being the rulers of the world outside the home. This, however, does not apply to the younger women of to-day. Were the sexes on an equal electoral footing (women under thirty years old cannot vote), the result of the polls would probably have been very different. But much gratification can be felt at the very earnest way in which the recently enfranchised women took their duties. Incidentally, it may be mentioned that the French Senate has by a big majority just shelved the question of women's franchise.

MR. CHURCHILL'S DEFEAT.

That Mr. Churchill should have lost his seat must be very disappointing for him, but his recent illness and operation removed him from the fight, and his Imperialism is not popular. Probably some seat will be found for him as soon as he is recovered sufficiently to desire to get into office again. It has already been suggested that a new-elected Member should resign to give his seat to him as by a fairly large number of people it is thought desirable that Mr. Churchill should be in the House when the discussion on the Irish Treaty and later on those on those on Mesopotamia and Palestine take place, for he was part-author of the policies in these three areas. Another significant defeat is that of Mr. Montagu, whilst Mr. Charles Roberts returns to the House.

THE LONDON FOG.

During the last fortnight London has been visited by some of the most disagreeable and depressing fogs it has known. For days, in the City, we have not seen the sun and the polluted smoke-laden air has given rise to a perfect epidemic of bad throats, colds and bronchial affections. So exasperated have people now become that the London County Council is sitting to consider how far fog in London is due to preventable causes, and to ascertain what possible means can be taken to counteract pollution of the atmosphere. To do away with the consumption of coal both for commercial and private purposes seems to be the only remedy, but to do this and substitute electricity in its place would mean a complete revolution in the present manner of life. That London cannot be considered a civilised city until this is done may be true, but many years will have to pass ere such a change takes place, and in the meantime the fogs will continue, and the lungs and nerves of the people suffer. To industrialise successfully a city may be a fine work of man, but if it blots out the sunshine so necessary to life, the price paid for such industry is beyond its value.

DISTRESS IN LANCASHIRE.

A serious condition has arisen among the cotton operatives in Lancashire. For some considerable time they have been on short time, with the result that all private savings are exhausted as well as the funds that the operatives could call upon. One of the Union leaders stated recently that unless some special action is taken by the new Government, the distress during the winter will be appalling. It seems that the disquiet in the Near East is the cause of the great depression, and were the trouble there ended, the Lancashire cotton operatives might again flourish.

LADY LAWYERS.

This week two more lady barristers were called, both of them having had a considerable connection with India and Indian affairs, one having spent some years of her life there, and still keeping in touch with many things affecting Indian girls and women. Another rather notable event has been the Petition for Special leave to appeal from an Order of the High Court at Patna which rejected the application of Miss Sudhanasa Bala Handra for enrolment as a pleader. The petitioner had been granted the degree of bachelor of Laws at the Calcutta University after examination, and claimed the right to practise in Patna. The petitioner contended that there was no prohibition in the Hindu or Mahomedan Law against women as lawyers nor did the British Legislative authorities ever impose such a prohibition. Special leave to Appeal was granted.

THE LAUSANNE CONFERENCE.

Lausanne is now the centre of European and the Near East foreign politics. The Conference is actually in being. It has not yet been wrecked either by the French or the Italians or the Turks, but there seems to be a steady alignment of all the powers greater and lesser against conceding too much to Turkish pretensions. There is a very real fear lest arrogant extremism at Angora and an inflamed Turkish Imperialism may wreck the proceedings. The Turkish delegates are said to be friendly and conciliatory, but fearful lest they should be denounced as traitors by the Angora National Assembly. On the other hand, Russia, which has been supporting Turkey, is looking with some alarm at the developments of Turkish militarism, especially in the region of the Caucasus, and Bulgaria, Turkey's former ally, has recently entered into closer relations with both Greece and Rumania, with a view to obtaining a free outlet into the Mediterranean, without her railway connection via Karagach being interfered with by the Turks at Adrianople. The Conference may last for days or months. The factors making either for a breakdown or success are altogether incalculable, and a most extraordinary secrecy prevails at Lausanne.

HAS DEMOCRACY BEEN A FAILURE ?

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I was deeply stirred on reading the quotation from the new head of Colgate University in your issue of December 2nd. It is unfortunate if your Press Service supplied you with nothing constructive from the speech. And perhaps even more unfortunate if, with his criticism, the speaker supplied the Press Service as well as his hearers with nothing constructive. Since the report is partial it would be wrong to criticise the speaker. But it will not be wrong to criticise what will seem to be the implication of the part quoted, to the minds of most of your readers.

It is true that there still lies a great chasm between our attainments in the way of democracy and our ideals and our objectives. It has been imperfectly applied and we can point to all too many blots in our experience and all too few triumphs. But still it remains a fact that the best argument for democracy is the still more unsatisfactory nature of the alternatives. To what should we turn? Those who recommend autocracy or any other non-democracy fall into the error of comparing an ideal autocracy with the democracy of fact, forgetting for the time that the ideal autocracy of which they are speaking would be as hard to attain, given the same humans to work with, as the ideal democracy.

The article indicates that democracy is found wanting as it fails to solve its problems. It instances the way in which we have tried to deal with the tariff, i. e., submitting it "to the people as a whole, 25 per cent of whom are mentally subnormal, with an average mentality of slightly over thirteen years." What is his alternative? The tariff would have to be submitted to one or more of "the real tariff experts" who "could probably be counted on the fingers of one hand." What would be the use of this, since in the next breath he says "these do not agree"? Which one would prevail? The alternative, if we had none of the conditions that produce and grow out of democracy, would be that the "expert" who could get the most armed men at his back would settle the tariff question. And is there anything to prove that men with 13-year-old mentalities do the world any more good as soldiers than as voters?

And after all, is it so terrible that the democrats sometimes follow a leader? What is it for a nation to follow a leader?

In doing so the people simply say "This man stands for and gives expression to what is in our hearts." As long as he does that, he "rules" as acceptably in a democracy as in an autocracy. But when he ceases to do so in a democracy he is quickly set aside. On the other hand when he ceases to do so in an autocracy, though he may not agree with the other 45-year-mentality experts, he can continue to impose his will on the whole or be set aside only by revolution. Or suppose we have an aristocracy, i. e., rule by the high mentality experts. In as much as they are certain to disagree, the most influential of the group will surely set his course in one of two directions. He is, by assumption, a strong man of real convictions. Then he will try to make his convictions prevail. He will move either in the direction of autocracy, that is, in the end, an appeal to force, or in the direction of democracy, that is, an appeal to the judgment of the people. If he does the latter he may discover, as our educational experts are discovering, that he will have to raise the nation's mentality a bit. That becomes not only a duty, but indeed a privilege. Raise a 13-year mentality to a 17-year mentality and he is almost sure to have at least one 45-year mentality as a son.

In spite of America's "greatest failure" there are millions of average mentalities who believe that the divinely ordained, though imperfectly delivered, message of America and other democracies to the world and especially to India is: A nation striving toward democracy is better than that nation content with anything else.

Sincerely yours
H. A. HANSON.

BRAMWELL BOOTH.

A PERSONAL SKETCH.

Within the next few weeks the name of Bramwell Booth, the second and present General of the Salvation Army, will become increasingly familiar to the people of India, by reason of the visit which he is paying to this land. At this time of day, when the worth of the Army's work is so generously recognised, there is no need to ask Who is this man? Excepting that he must not be confused with Commissioner Booth-Tucker who is so widely known and greatly loved as the Founder of the Army's work in this land, General Bramwell Booth is the son of William Booth the founder of the Salvation Army.

When, ten years ago, William Booth, to quote the phraseology of his obituary announcement, "laid down his sword", those who saw and knew him at close quarters say that Bramwell Booth was weighed with a sense of the responsibility that the legacy of the Army's Generalship brought to him. Well was it for him—and for his Army—that ever since his boyhood days he had made so close a study of the constitution, the personnel and the field of the Organisation, at the head of which he now found himself. Since then those who are able to speak from an inside knowledge, including his most intimate and immediate Lieutenants, testify to the ability with which he holds the reins of government, at the same time devolving responsibility for departmental and local detail upon his various Commissioners.

Although this is his first visit to India, he has in his ten years' Generalship—in spite of the difficulties of travel which for so long obtained—inspected his forces, conferred with his leading Officers, and conducted campaigns in Australia, New Zealand, Ceylon, Canada, the U. S. A. and most of the countries of Europe, thus maintaining a close touch with the Army's International affairs and becoming known at close hand to his rank and file. There are probably few Englishmen who possess a wider general and all-round acquaintance with the history and condition of life of the Indian people, or who are better versed in the complexity of the problems of the East.

In his wife Bramwell Booth has an able and strong supporter, who is at present time responsible for the Army's work in Great Britain and Ireland, besides taking an active part in many other enterprises of the Organisation. Their six living children all hold positions as Officers in one department or another of the work, and all share much of their parent's zeal and devotion to the cause which, in each instance they espoused in their youth.

On the public platform, he presents a striking contrast to the Army's Founder. Those who met and heard his gifted mother are at once struck with the strong facial likeness which he bears to her, and the recollection of her is further helped by his argumentative method of presenting the matter which he is expounding. Much of the strength of William Booth's utterances, it is often said, lay in the way in which he played upon the emotions of his hearers; Bramwell Booth's calm yet serious reasoning possibly appeals to an audience in a different way, but with equally striking and lasting results.

To his Officers and Soldiers, Bramwell Booth stands for the highest ideals of Salvationism, and in him they see a Chief whom to a man they honour, trust and love.

A HINDU STUDENTS' CAREER SOCIETY.

As our readers must have noticed from our advertisement columns, a Hindu Students' Career Society has been established at Lahore with a view "to help the bright students, whether male or female, who for want of pecuniary aid can not pursue a career fitted to their brain." Money in the form of monthly stipends will be given to poor and deserving Hindu students either on the loan system or in rare cases without an undertaking to return the amount advanced. To begin with, it is proposed to grant six stipends, four to male students and two to females. For the present the scheme is limited to those students who desire to prosecute their studies in India. Suggestions relating to the professions, amount of stipends, etc., have been invited. We wish the Society and its founder, Sir Ganga Ram, every success in this laudable undertaking.—The Tribune, Lahore.

NOTES.

Wanted an Explanation: The Independent of Allahabad prints the telegrams which passed between Pandit Motilal Nehru and the Superintendent of the Yeravada Jail relating to the interview which, it had been announced, the Pandit and Hakim Ajmal Khan were to have had with Mahatma Gandhi. The Superintendent at first intimated that the permission had been given and, later, revoked it on the ground that he had no authority to grant it. We do not know who the Superintendent is, but a raw, inexperienced man, without a knowledge of his powers and duties, is not likely to be placed in charge of the most important Jail in the Presidency. We can only surmise that the permission granted by the Superintendent, in the exercise of powers vested in him, was ordered by superior authority to be withdrawn when it came to know of it, apparently from the press message stating that the interview was to take place. This, if correct, would mean that Mr. Gandhi in Jail is treated on a special principle from which other prisoners are immune. Yet, we have been told repeatedly that Government could not distinguish between political and other prisoners. As a fact, we were surprised when the interview was announced in the press, first, because the regulation period of three months had not elapsed since the Mahatma was last allowed to be interviewed by his people, and secondly and chiefly because it seemed to imply a liberalisation of policy which there had been nothing to prepare us to expect. The authorities, no doubt, were acting within their rights, but we would remind them that they are dealing with human beings and should deal with them as human beings. It should not be difficult for them to imagine what would have been the feelings of Mrs. Gandhi, who was to have been of the party, to be suddenly told that the great event to which she was eagerly looking forward had been cancelled. An Indian Prince, however autocratic, would have instinctively shrunk from giving occasion for a pang in the heart of any good woman, much less that of a living sati like Mrs. Gandhi. If the Superintendent had exceeded his powers, he might have been reprimanded and told not to do so again, but no authority has a right to trample upon the tenderest sentiments of an innocent human heart. If the Government of Bombay has an explanation different from the only one we could imagine, it ought to have been published as soon as the revocation of the interview was announced. It is not too late even yet. In the absence of any explanation, it is impossible to acquit them of callously inhuman conduct in this matter.

Constitutional Reforms in Cochin: It was four years ago on the occasion of His Highness's Shash-tipoorthy day (60th birthday) that His Highness announced his intention of associating his subjects directly and formally with the conduct of Government business. Two years after that announcement a Proclamation proposing the establishment of a Legislative Council was issued. There has been practically no talk of it during the last two years except a passing reference to it in the Administration Reports. The delay has been naturally taxing the patience of the people of Cochin. It is, therefore, gratifying to read in the Cochin Government Gazette the Dewan's press communique announcing the publication of the draft rules of the Cochin Legislative Council Regulation, the Cochin Legislative Council Rules, the Standing Orders thereon, the Electoral Rules and the Election Offences and Enquiry Regulation. The draft rules and regulations run to 40 pages of the Gazette. Several modifications seem to have been made in the draft rules published two years ago by the then Dewan, Mr. Vijayaraghava Charya. The creation of two special constituencies for the Ezhavas, the most progressive of the "unapproachable" communities of the State, and the extension of franchise to Thavazhi Karanavans of the joint Marumakkathayam families as a result of the Cochin Nair Regulation which confers the right of partition on Thavazhies, are some of the noticeable features of the new constitution. The most remarkable feature, however, is the very liberal franchise. Women have not only the power to vote but are also eligible to be elected to the Legislative Council. Considering the position of women under the Marumakkathayam system of inheritance, a system peculiar to Malabar, it goes without saying that the franchise based on property qualification cannot make any distinction of sex, as women have as much right to the Tarwad (family) property as men. With all the faults of the much-abused matriarchal system, it must be said that, in this particular respect, the women of Malabar occupy an enviable position as compared to that of their sisters in other parts of India. The people of Cochin have been looking forward to the day when the announcement made by His Highness four years ago would take practical shape. We trust that further delay will be avoided in bringing into working order the long-talked-of Cochin Legislative Council.

The Development Department Chawls: We invite attention to the letter, reprinted to-day, which Mr. C. F. Andrews who is on a temporary visit, wrote in the Times of India on the Development Department's tenements opened by His Excellency the Governor. Sir George Lloyd spoke of the need of sun and air in the lives of the people, but Mr. Andrews shows that these, especially the former, are largely and carefully excluded from these tenements. He likens them to Jails, and another authority is said to have observed that these rooms are calculated to promote neurasthenia in their inmates. No body doubts that Sir George Lloyd in taking up the question of housing, has been actuated by motives of social reform and humanity. But if these chawls are to be taken as a specimen of the work of the Development Department, it is obvious that those who have to carry out His Excellency's ideas have not been selected with special regard to their sympathetic understanding of the conditions of the problem. An even greater responsibility attaches to the member in charge of this Department who, as an Indian, is expected to supply this very quality for which, naturally, an English Governor is entitled to rely mainly upon his Indian colleagues. The Indianisation of the Services will do little good to the people if the Indian official does not realise that his first and last duty is to enforce his Indian ideas and aspirations upon his British colleagues in all matters of administration.

Social Reform to the Front: Any one who examines with a discerning eye the depressing factors in the present situation, cannot but see that they all arise out of inadequate spade-work in the social and religious field. If men's deepest ideas and their immediate social environment continue to be undemocratic, it is idle to raise a democratic political structure on such a foundation. We, therefore, welcome the increase of agencies for propagating social reform which aims, in brief, at making available to the nation the vast resources that lie repressed in Indian womanhood and in the Indian masses. To raise "women and sudras" is the whole of social reform. We welcome, accordingly, the holding of a Social Conference with the Non-Brahmin Conference; we welcome the holding a Social Conference with the Liberal Federation at Nagpur. It is announced that the Hon. Mr. Paranjpye will preside over the latter, and not the Hon. Mr. Chintamani as first stated. The usual National Social Conference will be held during Congress week at Gaya under the Presidentship of Mr. M. R. Jayakar. A Reception Committee has been formed and arrangements are proceeding on the customary lines.

Education and Gambling: We entirely agree with the Dnyanodaya in its stinging criticism of the recent measure passed by the Bombay Legislative Council providing a part of the money required for primary education by an excise on the takings of the Turf Club. The children are to be educated from the proceeds of the gambling and drinking of their parents. It is impossible to imagine anything more unprincipled as a measure of educational finance. If the Hindu and Mahomedan Members and Ministers do not understand what a vicious expedient they have resorted to, they are entirely incompetent to conduct the affairs of the nation. In the hope of doing good, they are, as our contemporary points out, creating vested interests in a vice which is ruining hundreds and demoralising thousands of persons in Bombay. These be your Gods, O Israel!

A New Indian Christian Journal: We have received a copy of the first issue of a newly-started Indian Christian fortnightly, published in Lucknow, named the Christian Observer. Our contemporary in defining its policy, observes:

Up till very lately Indian Christians could not look beyond the haze and mist of Mission and Mission Service. But, thank God, a great section of it is now trying to see beyond that and political awakening has reached the community. It is an undeniable fact that by force of circumstances Indian Christians are to a great extent regarded as aliens in their own country by their countrymen. They are called "Saheb log," etc. There is truth in this indictment. They have been ostracised by their countrymen, and indignity, insult and contempt have been heaped upon them and therefore they have had to separate themselves and have become out of with the general political life of the country. But the times are now changed. We are anxious to share responsibility with our countrymen and they are anxious to secure our co-operation.

There is much truth in the above, more especially in the description of the altered position at present. The awakening of the Indian Christian community to its national duties is one of the most encouraging signs of the times.

All-India Social Workers' Conference: The Secretaries write: "The Madras Council of Social Service have resolved to hold an All-India Social Workers' conference (third session) at Madras under the Presidency of Dr. D. N. Maitra of the Calcutta Social Service League on the 29th and 30th December. The Conference will enable all persons interested in the cause of Social Service in India, to meet and exchange thoughts on the many problems now engaging the attention of Social Service Workers throughout the world. An exhibition will also be held in conjunction with the Conference."

The late Maharaja of Cooch Behar. The death was announced on Thursday of the Maharaja of Cooch Behar in London at the early age of 36. The Maharaja on his mother's side was a grandson of the great religious reformer, Keshub Chander Sen, and he married the accomplished daughter of His Highness the Gaekwar of Baroda. Since his marriage, the late Maharaja came into prominence both as a prince and a ruler of character and capacity and improved considerably the administration of his State. The deep sympathy of all India will go to the bereaved Maharani, and to Their Highness the Maharaja Gaekwar and the Maharani of Baroda.

Under the Patronage of the Viceroy: We invite the attention of the readers to a letter headed "Under the patronage of the Viceroy" from a Christian Missionary gentleman who signs himself as "Temperance Reformer". Our correspondent rightly protests against the use (or rather abuse) of the high and dignified position of His Excellency to encourage the sale of intoxicants by advertising various whiskeys as being sold "under the patronage of His Excellency the Viceroy." We associate ourselves with our correspondent in his protest and trust that His Excellency the Viceroy and the Government of India will recognise the advisability of forbidding the use of the Viceroy's name and title in such advertisements.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, DECEMBER 23, 1922.

THE SATARA NON-BRAHMIN CONFERENCES.

It is hardly necessary for us to repeat what we have said more than once since the inauguration of the Non-Brahmin movement in the Madras Presidency and Bombay Dakhan, that the movement embodies the assertion of some broad principles which have been so long overlooked in the Hindu socio-religious polity. The Hindu community must continue to be a source of weakness instead of, what it should be, the mainstay of the national cause, unless and until its structure is radically revised in the light of these broad principles which were well summarised by His Highness the Maharaja of Kolhapur who presided over the Social Conference held at Satara along with the Non-Brahmin Political Conference.

"The goal of our movement," said His Highness, "is to restore to each of our castes and creeds and to each individual therein that opportunity to rise higher and higher which the so-called highest among us, starts with. For this purpose we have to purify our minds by weeding out ideas of superiority and inferiority based on mere birth."

This is a remarkable pronouncement coming, as it does, from the ruler of Kolhapur and represents a refreshing departure from the attempt of some other chiefs to get Brahmin sacerdotalists to recognize them as Kshatriyas entitling them to have the Vedic sacraments administered to them and members of their families. And it is the more remarkable because it is hardly likely that His Highness, in enunciating this broad principle, did not realise that, pushed to its logical limits, this principle would militate against His Highness's own position as the hereditary ruler of a historic State. The hereditary monarch, indeed, has become an anachronism in the modern world. Great Britain and Japan are the only two ancient independent monarchies of importance in our time. Even China and Turkey have relinquished the hereditary principle and adopted that of elective heads of State. The hereditary principle as the basis of national and social life is doomed. The caste system based upon birth is, it is well-known, a perversion, the original basis of it having been character, conduct and occupation. The priest by birth will have to go and the ruler by birth will inevitably follow in his wake. "No Bishop, no King"—"No Brahmin, no Maharaja." The priesthood in every country has been the mainstay of hereditary monarchy, and a religious reformation abolishing priests has been usually followed by a political revolution abolishing hereditary monarchs. Both are fundamentally opposed to the democratic principle which the Non-Brahmin movement professes, though without realising in full its implications which extend far beyond its immediate objective of "Down with the Brahmins."

We welcome the addition of a social side to the Non-Brahmin movement which, like other political movements, needs its moments of introspection in order to give substance and solidity to its work. Its political programme at present does not rest on any very broad basis. Mr. Thanikalla Chettiar who presided at the Satara Political Conference made a long speech a large part of which was a denunciation of the Non-Co-operation movement. The Non-Brahmin movement and the Non-Co-operation movement, however, are essentially one in spirit and method. The former wants to Non-Co-operate with Brahmins while the latter wants to Non-Co-operate with the British in India. Mr. Thanikachallam therefore, in many parts of his attack on Non-Co-operation, was unconsciously attacking the Non-Brahmin movement of which he is a leading spokesman. In the able address which his distinguished elder brother, Mr. Kandasami Chettiar, delivered at the Adi-Dravida Conference a few months ago, it was shown by a relentless analysis that the present Non-Brahmin party is but the counterpart of the orthodox Brahmin at heart, with Chettiar, Mudaliar, Pillayar, instead of Aiyar, or Aiyangar for suffixes to his name. The Depressed classes in Madras complain that, while the Brahmins chastised them with whips, the Non-Brahmin party in power is chastising them with scorpions. In the Cochin State, the measures for the relief of the untouchable which the Brahmin Dewan, Mr. Vijayaraghava Chariar introduced, are being reversed by his non-Brahmin successor. Mr. Ramaswami Madaliar's exhortation to the Satara Non-Brahmins bears out the charge that the Non-Brahmin party which he represents regards only birth in utter disregard of every other consideration. "He warned them," reads the report in the Times of India, "that whether a Brahmin was a liberal or a Conservative, a Congressman or an anti-Congressman, a Moderate or an Extremist, a Co-operator or Non-Co-operator, he was a Brahmin. He would say to them: 'Don't put your trust in Brahmins.'" Mr. Thanikachallam denounced Mahatma Gandhi as a bigot because he had said that the caste system was inherent in human nature. A man's life is the best interpreter of a man's words. It is well-known that Mahatma Gandhi in his Ashram at Sabarmati and elsewhere has insisted on untouchables being treated exactly like members of the Hindu castes. The untouchable girl, whom he has adopted, goes about freely in every part of the Ashram including the kitchen. We wonder how many vehement non-Brahmins of Mr. Thanikachallam's party can show such an example in their homes? When a man like the Mahatma speaks of Varnashrama, it is obvious that he is not speaking of the Varnashrama as it is but of the Varnashrama as it should be—the Chaturvarnyam of the Gita, based on character, conduct and culture. And when Mr. Thanikachallam attacks Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya because he would not eat food touched by an "untouchable," may we ask whether Sir P. Theagorya Chetti, the accredited leader of Mr. Thanikachallam's party, would do so?

We have been opposed from the beginning to Non-Co-operation. And the Non-Brahmin movement, as we have said, is only the same in essence, only it has substituted Brahmins for the British Government. Both are negative in their outlook. But, while the Non-Co-operation movement, learning from experience, has adopted the constructive Bardoli programme, the Non-Brahmin movement has yet to evolve a constructive national programme. The best hope of its being able to do so, lies in men like Mr. Kandasami Chettiar who clearly see that the root evil is exclusiveness, and that both Brahmin and Non-Brahmin are equally tainted by it. Mr. Kandasami, we may mention, is one of the few men in the non-Brahmin movement, the others being Dewan Bahadur R. Venkatratnam Naidu and Mr. Patro, who have been actively associated with social and religious reform movements for the last quarter of a century. There are some younger men, some of whom we have met, who are yearning for the non-Brahmin movement to develop into a truly democratic national movement in which only character and ideas, and not the accident of birth, will count. These are the hopes of the Party which has immense potentialities before it. Mr. Thanikachallam and others have done valuable service in awakening non-Brahmins to a sense of their importance. Their right to a predominant share in the administration is indisputable but so are their responsibilities. So long, however, as their principal game is hounding a small minority, which is as much native to the country as themselves, out of the public services, so long their ability to discharge their national responsibilities must remain unproved. We have said before and we repeat that the 'Justice' party is on the eve of disintegration. A new party will rise upon its ashes, which will not be exclusively Brahmin or non-Brahmin, but will be composed of all the sound and sane elements in the public life of Madras and Maharashtra. The non-Brahmin party, in as much as it has paved the way for it, will then become an episode in the history of India's political evolution.

WEALTH AND WELFARE.*

(By Prof. PATRICK GEDDES.)

This review has been communicated also to the Sociological Review, London.

Though the title of this book adds "of the Punjab"—and must thus limit its circulation, especially in Britain, whose invincible ignorance of India persists, despite all urgency of need to mitigate it, as our writer peculiarly tends and helps to do—it is especially reviewed here as a real and solid contribution to economics, and of the kind most urgently needed by its students in this country, as well as India.

A FRESH VIEW OF ECONOMICS.

Economics, for Mr. Calvert, is not merely, or even mainly, the study of "the Market," ruled by its gods of "supply and demand." Nor does it turn upon "Manufactures and Commerce," as for Adam Smith; nor yet on "Capital," as since Ricardo; and yet as little on Marx's turning of those arguments outside in, towards the apotheosis of "Labour," meaning essentially the urban and mechanical proletariat, with their resultant exasperation accordingly; from Socialism since his publication, to Bolshevism to-day.

What Mr. Calvert has done has been to recover for himself the essential truths of economics as seen by Vauban and the Physiocrats, from whom Adam Smith arose, and most unhappily departed, instead of developing as he should have done. In a word, his economics is fundamentally Rural economics: and from his first prefatory page he stoutly carries his war with the conventional urban economics into England as well as India—citing for the former also Mr. Collett—"The ignorance of the urban majority in this country on agricultural matters is so colossal and so genuine as almost to deserve respect."

He points out, too, for India—though also implicitly for Europe—that as "it is the townsman who will supply the province with its future councillors," it is time that he not only knew something of what rural economy means in life, and begins to mean anew in thought also, but that he changed his perspective accordingly; his politics thereby as well. Not of course by returning to the too slowly obsolescent routine ignorance of the town-depressed and town-miseducated peasant, or the passive and senile conservatism still too prevalent among landed proprietors, and in India, of course, especially. The service of liberal and radical politics, and its traditional (more or less middle) "classical economics," has been to work out something of urban and commercial ways; and so far well. But as this has been accompanied by the persistent survival of the Italian Renaissance view of the country, as existing simply to feed and serve the city, its whole standpoint has thereby been vitiated; and its would-be scientific construction has thus to be rebuilt anew, and this upon the permanent physiocratic truth of the basal character of agriculture and food-supply—always and everywhere that on which town industries depend, as even the town population for its vital recruitment, and so often its leadership.

THE STUDY OF ECONOMICS.

The School of Economics in any and every University, is of course accustomed to imagine that it does justice to this; and at the very outset! Do we not say, "Land, Labour and Capital"? Of course; but only in such ways as to show no real grip or comprehension of the first: hence after this initial "coup de chapeau" to rural economics, our would-be general economists have gone on without contributing observations or ideas to the rural world, much less understanding this. For them the City—and as "the Market"—is the hub of the Universe: not the field; and when "Industries" are referred to, it is with the most naive omission of the fundamental industrial life of the children of men, and with as real a mental limitation to the exploits of the urban machine as that of the orphan child in the cotton factory. As its prison-house was one of the main centres of their would-be science, it is perhaps not to be wondered at that its professors have so well retained that child's ignorance, and his psychology too—the classical in their docile submission—the socialistic in their mood of revolt.

It is not possible within these limits to do any justice to Mr. Calvert's vigorous presentment of the rural perspective in economics : enough here to refer to the original. But that he is at home in the historical and the comparative fields, by way of which our economics has long been on the way towards reform, though too slowly, is evidenced by his appreciation of the best thought and work of Denmark, America and Ireland : as notably also by his useful presentment of the real economics of Japan, too little seen by those who merely see her as "Great Power," or as "economic competitor."

A GREAT WORK.

Our writer has thus accomplished a great, and so far as the present reviewer knows, an essentially new work for one of the great provinces of India : one which may, it is to be hoped, serve as type for others, for other Provinces, and thus for the first time, at least in our day, may present India as she mainly is : one of the most predominantly agricultural of lands, in past, present, and even future, despite such development of other resources and industries as may be. When this view is given in the large—and along with "Village Surveys" such as those of Dr. Harold Mann, alike as Bombay Director of Agriculture, and, we may add, as an active member of the Sociological Society—we shall then not only begin to know more of the real India, such as its people, their British rulers, and their new would-be replacers, all urbanist in immense majority, alike urgently need : and we shall even have fresh and useful impulse to the study of the whole empire—and even one helpful towards renewing the too urban economics and politics of its central isle.

GANDHI AND GOVERNMENT.

Towards realising our present state of backwardness alike in economic and social thought, and in the outlooks of administration and government accordingly, one or two illustrations may be taken—quite outside Mr. Calvert's survey, which is of more modern character—but since conveniently well-known to all newspaper-readers. First, Mr. Gandhi—who is this great and terrible agitator—lately so loyal to the British Raj as to have manfully recruited for the war, yet in post-war years branding the Indian government as "satanic," and organising "non-co-operation," to its grave embarrassment accordingly? A true ascetic and true idealist—a character thus impressive and attractive to the Indian mind beyond anything we in the modern West can imagine, though our legends of the saints show we were "once like Indians too." Next a barrister, who can hold his own with the best ; a journalist, the like as well. But his ideas? simply, frankly, and naively three, all Western ones—Mazzini's vivid Nationalism, Tolstoi's Non-Resistance, Ruskin's Criticism of the Machine—industry, and its urban outcomes. Excellent ideas, each and all : but of 1860—not 1920 ; by which time there have arisen some more, unknown to Mr. Gandhi, or at any rate unutilised. The anxiety with which the Indian Government and the British Government too has looked at him, is thus essentially explicable in one way only, viz ; that their stock of working ideas is of still earlier date ; and that they are thus still more immune to later social economic and political thought, than can be Mr. Gandhi ! Mr. Calvert's service is thus to present some of these later ideas : and the persistence of the present "steel framework" of India—to use Mr. Lloyd George's not entirely happy phrase, though all too true—depends, more than either government at present realises, on introducing a more modern and organic—vital—rural brain-framework as well. An easy matter—since the mental outfit and outlook of the Indian educated classes, now of such increasing insistence, is for the most part, and in principle, about as antiquated as our own, since what our Colleges and their wretchedly inadequate libraries have given them.

BOLSHEVIK ECONOMICS.

One more illustration—still outside Mr. Calvert's, but helpful to understanding his view, message and method—what of the yet more terrible Bolsheviks, in these years the bogey of Europe, and not without reason? Again the exponents of a vivid contribution to urban economics, also two generations back, and about contemporary with that other most worldshaking book THE ORIGIN OF SPECIES—Karl Marx's CAPITAL. Why then this inability of thought and action alike to deal with this relatively small, but intensive group of ideopraxists? who have not only so effectively demolished their older urban system, but so substantially upset the rural economy of Russia as well, and are thus so largely (though not exclusively) responsible for the present debacle and one of the great famines of history. Does not the essential explanation of all failures to combat them lie in the invincible ignorance of such better and later thought and work as has been growing up since 1860 ; as so notably that of American, Danish, and Irish and French rural economists, though not of these alone? Enough, then, to justify the satisfaction with which we hail this contribution to Indian rural economics, and plead for its wide and careful reading.

ECONOMICS AND SOCIOLOGY.

But it may be said, are we therefore to neglect urban economics, as the Physiocrats undeniably too much did, to their supersession accordingly by the successive urban schools, Smithian, Ricardian or Marxian? By no means. During the past eight years, the present reviewer's work in India has been well-nigh exclusively limited to the study of towns and cities, now some fifty and more, over the length and breadth of this immense land : but in such survey, in interpretation, and in planning, whether for housing, for urban industries, or towards cultural developments, he has found exactly no help whatever in the usual English urban and academic economic literature, with the single and honourable exception of Prof. Marshall's INDUSTRY AND TRADE—a book which he also cannot over-recommend, as our best example of the economist moulting from the old type towards the sociologist of the new, even though yet too little awakened to the neo-Physiocratic revolution in progress. And no doubt there are others.

Here, then, we may leave Mr. Calvert to fight his own battle. To those of us who have learned their rural economics in other and largely older or later schools, from Xenophon to Le Play, Demolins, &c., there are grounds for difference from Mr. Calvert. His world-commercialisation of agriculture has still the taint of the urban market theories upon it; and in his isolation he does not seem to have come upon the ever-increasing world movement towards regionalism, with its more vital co-ordination of country and town. Again, though himself a sower and leavener, a steady organiser of co-operation throughout his province—in fact, its Horace Plunkett as far as may be—he yet remains somewhat conventional, not to say commonplace, in his otherwise excellent pleading for agricultural education—overlooking, for instance, that most simple and inexpensive of its resources, the school garden—though that offers the readiest of escapes from the too essentially cram and thus sham instruction, with the current and world-wide verbalistic empapement so characteristic of our period, and nowhere more than in what is magniloquently called “Indian Education.”

Yet such are but minor differences, compared with that general change from the urban to the rural perspective in economics which Mr. Calvert in the main so well expresses: and if he can convert his often too steely colleagues in India, and help to do something of the like at home, such further developments of rural economics, from education, up (or down), to politics, will not be long of coming.

THE BI-CAMERAL LEGISLATURE IN INDIA.

(By P. L.)

II.

Nor is the oft-repeated plea of the need of a check to hasty legislation an argument of greater force. A second chamber as a corrective to the lower one is an anachronism. Mr. Ramsay Macdonald advances an ingenious dilemma about this plea. If the upper house be reactionary, he says, it will not check the excesses and follies of reaction; if it is democratic it will not check the excesses and follies of democracy. The experience of the countries with second chambers, shows that the upper house acts only when in opposition to the lower, and such cases involve neither national welfare nor statesmanlike foresight but are only problems of sectional strife. But there is another objection to this theory of check which is advanced by Mr. Macdonald and is worth noticing. It is that a second chamber acting as a check, is, indeed, in a position to strangle public opinion of a normally calm character. This is exactly antithetic to the purposes of representative Government which seeks to prevent the accumulation of pressure reaching revolutionary intensity by opening out channels for the easy and constant flow of public opinion. It is conceivable and has actually been possible for an upper house to flout popular opinion and delay its fulfilment and thus to compel it to become revolutionary in order to be effective. But as the case of Ireland has proved, time is an all-important consideration in politics and if the fruit is not plucked when it is ripe, it rots. Hence it would be a tragedy if the existence of a second chamber meant the putting of obstacles in the formation of decisions. Finally, there is a more fundamental objection to this system of checks which in normal times are superfluous and in abnormal times prove mischievous. What a system of checks ultimately hinders, is a development of unfettered and full responsibility. There is nothing more desirable from the political and moral point of view than that the location of responsibility must be clear, precise, and definite. But where a Conservative opposition relies on a notoriously reactionary upper chamber or a Liberal Government throws the blame for its failures on the other house, it is obvious that neither honesty in policy nor freedom in opposition is possible. Nature does not work by one organ checking another, says Mr. Macdonald. In nature, opposing forces blend into motion. So the conflicting social forces should be blended in one legislative organ.

It may be added that to advance the argument of haste in the case of India, is to falsify the issue, since the fundamental conservatism of the Indian people is in itself a sufficient check. Indeed, the fear in India is not that social progress will be too fast but that it will be too slow. It is the inertia of the mass of citizens that acts like a mill-stone round the necks of those enthusiastic reformers who would bring millenium within a few months. Only when that inertia is in part overcome and when an antagonistic reaction is checked, does any reform come before the legislature in the form of a bill. To pretend that there is a danger of precipitance in politics is to ignore the strain which the mass can bear. Stagnation, in fact, is a more constant and more subtle danger than revolution. Even were a check necessary, it ought to be effected without the creation of a rival and extraneous body constantly at war with another and in the end possibly killing itself out. For though a check necessarily must have concurrent and equal authority with the part that is being checked, a cabinet cannot remain responsible to both the chambers and must ultimately submit to the more popular one. As India might develop a cabinet system, all experience shows that the sole responsibility must be placed on the popularly-elected body.

The third argument usually advanced, namely, that there may be men unwilling to seek election or accept nomination in an assembly the majority of whose members are of a different status, needs only the simple answer that such men have no right to be in the governing body of the country. The ballot-box is the means of democracy but its end ought to be human brotherhood. A democracy that preserves notions of status and class-prejudice defeats its own object. If such unwilling intelligentsia exists, it ought to keep its virtues for governing, and not keep them in a reserve to waste them, by watching over the errors of the lower house. Such extraordinary statesmanship ought to be used for the formulation of a policy, and not for the limitation and frustration of a policy formed.

A more pertinent question that suggests itself to one in this connection is, how are these intelligentsia to be chosen? Hereditary composition is obsolete and anti-democratic and the only reason why British statesmen cling to it is because they cannot discover an effective substitute. On the one hand, it is extremely doubtful if class-distinctions are co-equal with innate ability; and on the other hand, it remains to be proved whether intellect can be so easily transmitted as wealth. There are no hereditary statesmen, said Thomas Paine, any more than there are hereditary mathematicians or hereditary poets. Very few persons would now agree with Bagehot's contention that nobility is the symbol of mind or that money alone cannot buy "London Society". In all industrial countries, today, aristocracy has become plutocracy and purchased peerages command no social prestige. A house composed of a set of eldest sons picked out by chance, that is, of "accidents of accidents" cannot but be mediocre; for the qualities essential for success in a deliberative assembly do not necessarily go with estates and trusts." Besides, aristocracy is a matter of growth and not of creation. What Prof. W. Graham Wallas said about Lord Morley applies with even greater force to Mr. Montagu, that his inventive range does not extend beyond the adaptation of the British House of Lords to Indian conditions.

Nomination is a method that is attractive to theorists who conjure up visions of a great assembly composed of wise statesmen, experienced lawyers, distinguished litterateurs and the rest. But nomination, though excellent in principle, depends in practice on the question of who nominates. It implies a moral perfection in the executive which should nominate only the "best men" who are unfamiliar with the arts of flattering the crowd. But the government likes to be flattered as much as the people, as the case of numerous nominated members in Indian Councils prove. And if we are to make a choice, let us like Machiavelli choose rather the people who are less liable to sudden changes of mood than the officials who exercise and love power.

All these confused notions proceed from an initial false start. People try to invent some institution to act as an old guardian to the inexperienced and rash child of democracy who can say "No" to its puerile demands. They therefore search for some elements out of which such an institution could be created. But any new principle that is suggested in addition to that of democratic representation must be based on a desire to broaden its basis and not on a distrust in its very structure. So one should reject the idea of a second chamber that could have a superior wisdom and a broader outlook than those of a declared majority elected by the people. If there are such qualities, men possessing them can appeal to the ordinary constituencies and if the normal electoral machine gives no scope for that, it stands self-condemned.

The disadvantages attending a second chamber in India are obvious. The moneyed and landed interests predominating in such a chamber—as they do, in fact—will obstruct every kind of social reform calculated to benefit the classes that are economically less favoured. Thus, as Prof. Wallas observes, the possible result might be that the hereditary rent-collectors of Bengal will influence and decide the agricultural policy and the factory-owners in Bombay will regulate factory legislation. Another unfortunate but inevitable consequence of such a chamber will be to foster the disinclination of many of the younger Zamindars and businessmen to seek the votes of the electorate, thus retarding the sound democratic evolution of the country. Lastly, as the Council of State is a cross between several principles which, if not absolutely contradictory are clearly distinct, it will never possess either the glamour of an aristocratic or hereditary chamber or the strength of an elected assembly or the utility of a Senate representing the national as opposed to the provincial idea.

INDIAN CHRISTIANITY AND THE NATIONAL AWAKENING.

THE EUROPEANISING AGENCIES.

The Indian Christian has committed the error of identifying his faith with Europeanism or to speak more correctly looked upon Europeanisation as the complement to his Christianity. The Hindu and the Moslem have on the other hand fallen into the opposite error of identifying every European with Christianity. Both are in error. Jesus the Christ was an Easterner, and preached in the East; His Apostles that carried His message to Europe were Orientals. Thomas, one of them, who, as tradition says, brought the new religion to India was a Jew; the blood of the martyrs which is spoken of as the seed of the Christians was in the beginning the blood of Orientals and it helped to irrigate the nascent seed of Christianity. It was purely an accident like the many which one meets with in history that Christianity became identified with the West: and even when the West took upon itself to maintain the supremacy of the new religion it was not without a protest from the East where to this day there are large numbers of Christians who claim to belong to the Eastern Church and carry on their ceremonials in the Oriental rite.

Again, owing to a combination of fortuitous circumstances the peoples who came under the influence of the Western Church progressed, grew in strength and vigour, expanded out and spread themselves and their political influence and religious faith over large and distant parts of the earth; this fact helped to create an illusion that all men that hail from the West, from Europe, are on that very account Christians: this has made the peoples of the East oblivious of the fact so well attested to, that to millions of Europeans the teachings of the Master are so many mummified specimens which are honoured more in the breach or utter disregard than in observance or reverence. True it is, that every European bears the hall-mark of Christian teaching and culture: you see it in his name (where has not already given up the practice of taking a name from the Calendar of the Christian saints) and in his attitude towards many questions of life; it could not be otherwise for during the centuries when the genuine Christian civilisation was the dominant force of European life, it stamped the people of the country with certain qualities and characteristics which their present laissez faire moral and religious tendencies, their hedonistic outlook, and soulless materialism cannot wholly blot out. Millions in Europe are entirely innocent of the most elementary tenets of Christian belief or doctrines, and specimens of such are not unfrequently met with in India.

How came the Indian convert to Christianity to entertain the notion that a European make-up must be the natural corollary to his adoption of the Christian faith? The answer to this is not without its interest. Christianity within historical times was preached and propagated by men in India who till within very recent times, were blissfully ignorant of the culture, the history, the philosophy, and the sciences of the East and particularly those of ancient India, and who were in consequence of their ignorance led into the belief that in manifesting a disdain for the social practices and the religious ideals of the East they were really doing a service to their neophytes in as much as they were holding up to their vision the grotesqueness of their own practices and comparing them with the beauty and harmony of what was followed in Europe. To the early Hindu missionary and to very many of the present day too, the Hindu and his religion were both pagan, and this term had very deservedly a very undesirable connotation especially with reference to the religious and social practices of the Greeks and the Romans especially in the days of their decline, and the missionaries' acquaintance with the history of the past was confined to that of these two peoples. When in India, they devoted their energies to acquiring a working knowledge of the vernacular of the people among whom they carried on their work of preaching and they had no time, concern with or inclination for the study of the sacred languages of the East, a knowledge of which would have opened to them the inexhaustible treasures of its philosophy, its moral precepts etc. and pointed out to them that Hinduism represents something more than bespattering a stone with red ochre or very grotesque and hideous dances and rites.

Even Francis Xavier than whom a greater missionary has not come down to the East and to India, was ignorant of the existence of a high ethical code in the sacred writings of India and of the moral obligations and sanctions prescribed by them; he knew no Sanskrit and his contact with the submerged classes and sometimes with such Brahmins whose knowledge of their Scriptures and whose morals were not free from doubt or suspicion, only helped to confirm his a priori assumptions that all religious teaching in the East to make it beneficial required to be rigorously exorcised.

We have been careful to say that this was the attitude of the newcomers that came to preach religion after the discovery of the sea route to India, for what Christianity existed prior to this,—and as we have said, there were Christian settlements in Malabar before this time,—had no European prepossessions. The Christians of the Syriac Church who worshipped in an Eastern ritual, had never felt any inconvenience nor feel any today, in worshipping the God of the Christians and upholding Christian principles while at the same time clinging tenaciously to their country's social habits, usages and manner of dress. The Portuguese were the first and greatest sinners in attempting to Europeanise their converts but, in justice to them, it must be admitted that in this attitude of theirs they were actuated by a great and generous principle. They unfeignedly believed that by giving to the Indian, all that they felt proud to own, viz. their religion and their usages, they were making a genuine attempt to raise the Indian to a social status equal to their own and were thereby helping to carry out the fundamental principle of their faith—the Brotherhood and Equality of Man.

THE GURU-KA-BAGH MUDDLE.

Mr. Dayram Parasram Mirchandani, in the course of a representation to the Viceroy, observes: In a recent press communique of the S. G. P. Committee published in the Tribune of Lahore dated the 21st instant it is stated that Rai Bahadur Sir Gangaram of Lahore went to Amritsar on the 16th instant and interviewed Sardar Bahadur Sardar Mehtabsingh (one of the accused Sikh leaders and Ex-Deputy President of the Punjab Legislative Council and Ex-Government Advocate) on that day in the Court of Nawab Aslam Hayat Khan, Additional District Magistrate of Amritsar, in the presence of several other respectable gentlemen. When there was a talk of the Guru-ka-Bagh lands being entered in the name of the Gurdwaras in Revenue Records, the discovery of ancient Jagir file in favour of the Gurdwaras and the completed compromise between the Mahant and the S. G. P. Committee as early as 31st January 1921, Sir Gangaram said to Sardar Mehtabsingh "that all this had come to the knowledge of the Government too late, and it was regretted that the Government had been kept in ignorance and misinformed by the local authorities. He (Sir Gangaram) said that this was all admitted by the Government, who were anxious to undo the mischief and to satisfy the religious aspirations of the Sikh community. He also stated that the Government were misinformed of the history of Guru-ka-Bagh, the strength of the Akali Movement and the backing that the whole Sikh community was prepared to give to the S. G. P. Committee, to carry out the reform of Gurdwaras."

Sir Gangaram not only does not refute the above statement made by the S. G. P. C., but in his letter, published in the Tribune of 22nd November 1922, he says that it is substantially correct but adds: "It was not fair on the part of the Prabandhak Committee to publish all that happened at a private conference." He is reported to have asked Sardar Mehtabsingh to accompany him to His Excellency the Governor in his motor car, which was then standing outside the Court-compound, "to talk over the whole affair as His Excellency was very anxious to bring about peace and that measures should be adopted somehow or other to extricate the Government from its present untenable position with regard to the Guru-ka-Bagh affair. Sardar Mehtabsingh is reported by the S. G. P. Committee to have declined this honour and declared that "he being a prisoner, his proper place was in jail." The Punjab Government has not issued any statement throwing light on the above and the S. G. P. Committee's press communique remains uncontradicted upto this day.

WORKMEN'S DWELLINGS.

Mr. C. F. Andrews writes in the Times of India of the 10th instant:—As one who has been very deeply interested in the housing of the poor, I was taken to see the new model dwellings for workmen, which H. E. the Governor of Bombay has just opened. I understood that the work has been standardised, and that a very large number of new dwellings, of the same design, are to be completed. It, therefore, appears to me necessary to urge upon the authorities the need of remedying certain defects before the construction proceeds further.

One of the most serious defects is the shutting out, from every single room, of the sight of the sky by means of an immovable concrete shutter, with horizontal bars (on the Venetian blind pattern) while over each window is a sloping structure which effectively further screens off the sky. I have rarely seen, in any human habitation, windows more gloomy and prison-like.

This is not a small consideration. Many people are likely to live in these rooms for the greater part of the day; some all day long. Those who have studied prison records know how demoralising to the human mind is the gloom of a daily existence which is passed for very long periods without any sight of the sky. Furthermore, besides shutting out the sky these concrete windows shut out too much light. What is needed is to place a small balcony outside each room where clothes may be hung to dry and where both light and air may enter. The cost would not be excessive. Such balconies are always a precious boon to the poor in a great city.

At present, these huge buildings, both outside and inside, have a dismal prison-like appearance, which must, in the long run, tell on the mind and make life joyless. I have worked for many years of my life in the slums of London among the poor, in the midst of similar so-called 'model' dwellings, and I know full well the deadening effect, which comes upon the minds of young and old alike from constantly living in prison-like blocks with all the beauty of the sky excluded. It must not be forgotten that a joyless childhood is one of the most potent causes of many unnatural evils in after-life. Nature takes her terrible revenges.

Another factor, which has been most strangely overlooked is the lack of utilisation of the roofs of these new buildings. Here, London is already repentant for the evils of the past. The monstrous, sunless blocks in the East End and in Walworth and Bermondsey are now redeemed, to a very slight extent, by a railed roof, where children may play in safety and old people may sit out in the evening and get a draught of fresh air. Cannot the roofs of these workmen's dwellings in Bombay be utilised for a similar purpose? The cost would be quite insignificant; the gain would be enormous.

While I was down there, I asked some poor people what they thought of the dwellings. They one and all disliked them. There were bitter remarks and one said to me,—“They are like a prison.” Before further money is spent, could not the judgment of those workers of the ‘Seva Sadan’ and other societies, whose daily duties are done among the poor, be taken on simple points such as those I have mentioned. It would be a thousand times worth while to get the advice of some one, who had gone through the disheartening experience of the ‘model dwelling’ period in London or Glasgow, and had come out of it with an intimate knowledge of what should not be done, before going on with this immensely large scheme on a standardised basis.

I have seen the older dwellings, where the workmen now live, and I recognise fully the appalling insanitation and overcrowding which have to be overcome. I am not for one moment suggesting a return to the past unhealthy congestion. But the fact, that the present slums are so bad, should not blind us to defects in the new system. I am certain that those who have endeavoured so earnestly and perseveringly to promote the new system will be the first to welcome suggestions which may make their scheme more in accordance with the natural instincts and wishes of the working men themselves. It is for this purpose that I have ventured, though only a visitor to Bombay, to write.

AN INTERVIEW THAT DID NOT TAKE PLACE.

(The Independent, Allahabad, December 16.)

[In a recent issue we published the news that the permission granted by the Superintendent of the Yeravada jail to Pandit Motilal Nehru, Sjt. C. R. Das and Hakim Ajmal Khan to interview Mahatma Gandhi was cancelled. We give below a more detailed account about it along with the true copies of the telegraphic messages between Pandit Motilal Nehru and the Superintendent, Yeravada Jail.]

When the Civil Disobedience Enquiry Committee were at Poona an interview with Mahatmaji was sought on behalf of Pandit Motilal Nehru, Hakim Ajmal Khan and Doctor Ansari. They were informed that no interview was then due. It followed from this that the only condition of having an interview was that they should seek it at a time when it was due. Early in November, Pandit Motilal Nehru learnt that an interview would become due in December, and that in case of non-relatives jail authorities would allow interview by two. Later it was arranged through Mr. Chaganlal Gandhi that Panditji and Hakim Ajmal Khan were to have an interview with Mahatmaji on the 14th December.

On the 8th December Pandit Motilal Nehru, with a view to be thoroughly assured about it sent the following message to the Superintendent of the Yeravada jail.

“Agreeably your letter to Chaganlal Gandhi, Hakim Ajmal Khan and self arriving Poona, 18th night to interview Mahatma Gandhi, 14th morning. Kindly wire if interview will be granted”-

To the above wire Pandit Motilal Nehru got the following reply from the Superintendent of the Yeravada jail.

CENTRAL JAIL.

After receipt of this Panditji went to Etah for the District Conference. The arrangement was that he should leave Etah after the Conference and proceed to Poona via Agra where Hakim Ajmal Khan was to join him. On the 11th evening the following wire from the Superintendent of Yeravada jail to Pandit Motilal Nehru was received at Allahabad.

“I had no authority to grant interview. Inform Ajmal Khan and do not come pending advice from me”.

As stated above when the above wire was received at Allahabad Pandit Motilal Nehru was away at Etah. He then left Etah and went to Agra. At Agra Railway Station where he expected to see Hakim Ajmal Khan he did not see him but in his stead Hakim Ajmal Khan's secretary, had come there. He told Panditji that Hakim Sahib had been informed that the permission for an interview had been withdrawn. Pandit Motilal Nehru then proceeded to Delhi and after spending some time with Hakimji returned to Allahabad.

BOMBAY MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS.

Mr. G. B. Trivedi M. L. C., who is standing as a candidate from Bhuleshwar Ward for next Municipal Election for the Bombay Municipal Corporation, has issued the following manifesto:—

Dear Sir,

I am a candidate for the next Municipal Election from Bhuleshwar Ward. I have tried my best to protect the interests of the poor and middle classes, in the Legislative Council at the time of the Rent Act Amendment Bill and the Municipal Act Amendment Bill, by getting the duration of the former extended and by getting franchise for tenants of Rs. 10 and above.

My other work in the Council is before my voters. My method of work is to serve the public without distinction of caste or creed and if elected to the Municipality I assure to work there on the same lines and hope therefore my voters, be they Co-operators or Non-Co-operators, be they Hindus, Mahomads, Parsees or Christians, will support me.

I had a good chance of joining the municipal Nationalist party but I prefer to work as a non-party man. I believe that in Municipal affairs you require best civil virtues and not politics.

I seek this new field of work with the idea of social service only and if you have faith in my work I hope you will vote for me and get me the votes of your friends and neighbours.

THE RACE COURSE TAX.

Many of us have, no doubt, hailed with satisfaction the decision of the Legislative Council to impose a 50 per cent. tax on the gate money collected by the Western India Turf Club. That Club has become, to the shame of all thoughtful people, the chief dispenser of charity in this Presidency. The only way, apparently, in which to maintain charitable or Red Cross organisations to-day is to appeal to the passion for excitement or to the gambling instinct. A natural desire is aroused in one to lay hold for State purposes of a share of these ill-gotten gains. But, as an Indian Christian friend has pointed out to us, this is a very short-sighted view to take. Our Legislators would have been far wiser if they had refused to have part or lot in this business. The decision of the Council goes near to creating a vested interest on the part of the State in gambling. We know how hard a thing it is to get rid of the liquor traffic now that its four crores have become the chief source of revenue to the Presidency. Just so the 4 lakhs that it is hoped to recover from the Race Course will become a chain binding us all to this demoralising institution. The long view that would refuse any share in this money on these grounds was not, as far as we have observed, brought forward at all at the Council, but it is undoubtedly the wise view.—Dnyanodaya, Poona, December 14.

"UNDER THE PATRONAGE OF THE VICEROY."

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I have just read in a daily newspaper an advertisement of various whiskies sold "Under the patronage of His Excellency The Viceroy." With due respect to His Excellency, I desire to enter a vigorous protest against the use of his high and dignified position to encourage the sale of intoxicating liquors in India. Considering the strength of Temperance sentiment among the people of India, it is very surprising that the liquor dealers have considered it advisable to publicly link the Viceroy's name with the sale of whiskey.

I do not protest against the use of intoxicants by His Excellency the Viceroy. It would be to me, as to the vast majority of the people of India, a cause of great joy if His Excellency should voluntarily announce his adoption of total abstinence throughout his term of office. It would be a signal evidence of His Excellency's respect for Indian convictions. The point of my protest is not that His Excellency purchases the particular brand of whiskies mentioned in the advertisement, but that permission is given to advertise that these liquor dealers are operating under his patronage. The purpose of the advertisement is to induce readers to purchase, and patriotic Indians and those who desire to protect the prestige of the Government and to advance the cause of British and Indian understanding will object to the use of the Viceroy's position to further the sale of liquors.

I trust that His Excellency the Viceroy and the Government of India will recognize the advisability of forbidding the use of His Excellency's name and title in the advertisement of intoxicating liquors.

What teachers and parents say of it:

"I have long been looking for just this kind of a magazine for the boys and girls of India."

"Should you be able to maintain the high standard you have adopted from the very outset, the success and popularity of your magazine are assured.....Paper, printing illustrations, and cover, all will appeal to the young folk. But above all, the freshness, local colour and graceful style of your articles, poems and stories."

"It is a charming magazine. How our kiddies love it!"

NOTES.

The Gaya Congress: The 37th session of the Indian National Congress met on Tuesday at Gaya. There was a large audience of over fifteen thousand persons including visitors. Nearly four thousand delegates have registered themselves. Gaya is a provincial town with few facilities for organising such a huge gathering. Several conveyances, motor cars and lorries, have been brought from outside and these are fully taxed. The cold after night-fall is severe. The Reception Committee has made heroic efforts to meet the requirements of this great gathering. Entire control of crowd that throng to Congress is in the hands of the Congress volunteers. There are no policemen visible for about two or three miles near the Congress pandal and the way in which they manage is quite creditable. Their orders are implicitly obeyed by crowds and carriage drivers with great humours.—(By wire)

Non-Co-operation and the Bardoli Programme: Mr. C. Rajagopalachari, writing in Young India of December 21st, presses for our acceptance his view that the Bardoli programme is not independent of the old Non-Co-operation movement but is inextricably connected with it. Certainly both are based upon non-violence, but it is hard to establish any other connection between the two. Bardoli programme was clearly intended to supersede Non-Co-operation programme some of the items of which were expressly modified at Bardoli. Mr. Rajagopalachari further says that to kill Non-Co-operation because we get some toddy shops closed and some spinning wheels introduced in schools would be like killing the goose for the golden eggs. This is not all that can be done through the Legislative Councils to advance the Bardoli programme. The lot of the untouchables can be indefinitely improved, communal unity ensured, total prohibition accelerated and a swadeshi fiscal policy adopted in the Councils and in the Councils only.

Lifting the Ban: Referring to Dr. Annie Besant's proposed Convention, we expressed the hope that the Convention should have for one of its principal ends the procuring of the release of political prisoners and the removal of the disqualification for standing for the Councils of such Congress leaders. The question was raised in the House of Commons and Lord Winterton in reply declined to do anything to facilitate the Non-Co-operators' entry into the Councils. Commenting on this we are glad to read the following observations of the Servant of India, the Poona Liberal weekly. In a recent issue it observes:—"As a matter of fact, there is not a Moderate but desires whole-heartedly the cessation of the Non-Co-operation and therefore the removal of the ban on Council elections, whether the Government or the Non-Co-operators. No one will welcome the leaders of the Non-Co-operation movement more warmly back into the folds than the Liberals; not only because it would be a complete vindication of the policy which they have been consistently following, but because they are fully conscious of the weakness from which the legislatures suffer on a point of the fact that all the different views prevailing in the country are not represented therein. Let this therefore be clearly understood and let the Conservative Government in England not shelter itself behind the Indian Moderate party in maintaining the present boycott. The Moderates who are never tired of appealing to the Non-Co-operators to come in and take their place in the Legislatures will not support the Government in the latter's non-co-operation with the Non-Co-operators."

Mr. Sastry on Diarchy: In the course of his presidential address at the fifth National Liberal Federation which commenced its session at Nagpur on the 27th instant, the Right Hon'ble V. S. Srinivasa Sastry referred to some of the serious defects of the Diarchy and said that the demand for its removal comes from many sides. He said:

Since I spoke on this subject in Bombay my opinion about diarchy has not been shaken. I think it has reached its limit of usefulness. Not having inside knowledge of any administration, I am unable to enforce my opinion by a striking array of specific instances. Perhaps Ministers at present in office and Executive Councillors, when freed from official restraints and called upon to state their experience before a duly authorised commission, will make out an overwhelming case for the termination of duality in provincial administration. The best results have been obtained where Governors have treated Councillors and Ministers as belonging to one Cabinet. The rule requiring that the Finance Member should be an Executive Councillor has placed Ministers at a decided disadvantage in obtaining money for their departments. Official discipline too is difficult to maintain as Ministers have discovered, when an officer cannot be censured or transferred except with the consent of the Governor. In some provinces Ministers are not recognised as forming one official group.

After narrating some instances of the pathetic woes of the Ministers under the dual system, Mr. Sastry observed:

A half and half system is naturally productive of friction and wears out the nerves of those who have to work it. Members of the services are not the least loud in demanding that the system should be developed to the full. It seems now to serve no useful purpose. No one, official or non-official, has questioned the efficiency of Ministers or their ability to manage the reserved services if these should be entrusted to their care. The public will long remember the indiscriminate arrests of a few months ago and the high-handed use in certain places of section 144 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and they no longer wish to have such powers exercised by officers without fear of being called to account in the house of legislature.

We reserve our comments on Mr. Sastry's presidential address and the proceedings of the Liberal Federation for the next issue.

Malabar Forcible Conversions: In the Reformer of the 9th instant, we referred to the extraordinary statements regarding Malabar forcible conversions made by Mr. Gopala Menon in the course of his speech at the Islamia College Hall, Lahore. We reprint to-day the comments of the Swarajya, the Non-Co-operation daily of Madras and of the West Coast Reformer, a Calicut tri-weekly which, as will be seen from its comments, is strongly opposed to the Non-Co-operation movement. The Swarajya says that Mr. Gopala Menon, who was described by the Associated Press as "Secretary of the Calicut Congress Committee", is the Secretary of the Town Congress Committee which is a "bogus institution" and warns the Congress organisations in Northern India to guard against the vagaries of this individual. Since then we have received information from an unimpeachable source regarding Mr. Gopala Menon and his doings. Our informant who, we may mention, has an intimate knowledge of the working of the Kerala Provincial Congress Committee, writes:

But for your drawing attention in the columns the Reformer to Mr. Gopala Menon's mischievous propaganda in the Punjab, his doings would not have been known in these parts. For, the Associated Press telegram never appeared in the Madras papers. I need hardly tell you that Mr. Gopala Menon's allegations are cruel and baseless in the extreme. Messrs. Kesava Menon and Madhavan Nair, to some extent, lost their popularity with a section of Moplahs (it is only a section mainly confined to the Calicut town) by their venturing to speak out the truth about the rebel atrocities. Messrs. Gopala Menon and Moideen Koya took advantage of this and have been fanning the flame of Moplah dislike of Messrs. Kesava Menon and Madhavan Nair to discredit them and to increase their own popularity with the unthinking people. To this end they have been deliberately and systematically trying to suppress the tale of the rebel atrocities and to exaggerate or rather invent stories of Hindu misdeeds. If things are as Gopala Menon has stated in his Lahore speech, one would have heard of them at the time when the rebellion was going on. But there was no suggestion anywhere of such things. It is only now that one has begun to hear of them from Messrs. Gopala Menon and Moideen Koya. By the way, they had never had occasion to go to the interior and it is evident, therefore, that the whole thing is a clumsy afterthought. As for Mr. Gopala Menon, he was holding office of the Taluk Secretary for the Calicut Taluk and was also carrying on the affairs of the Town Congress Committee. In these capacities, he was acting in defiance of all discipline and against the directions of his superiors in office, Messrs. Kesava Menon and Madhavan Nair. Mr. Madhavan Nair, the District Secretary, had, therefore, to refuse all financial aid to Mr. Gopala Menon and the latter, leaving matters thus, walked away with his friend Mr. Koya to the Punjab. Of course, he is not in the habit of reporting his movements or doings to the Provincial Congress Committee who came to know of his departure to the Punjab only indirectly. That is how matters stand.

Further comments will be superfluous. We trust that the above statement from one who is more intimately acquainted with the Malabar Congress affairs than Mr. Gopala Menon, will clear the probable misapprehensions of those who have been misled by the latter's Lahore speech.

Railway Advisory Councils: In paragraphs 139-142 of their Report, the Railway Committee recommended the establishment of a Central and a number of local Advisory Councils to give the Indian public an adequate voice in the management of their own railways which almost all the main lines in India are. Contrary to the recommendations of that Committee, the Government of India have appointed the Central Advisory Council from amongst the members of the Legislative Assembly and the Council of State. The Committee recommended about twenty non-official representatives of the Commercial and Industrial Associations and the public definitely identified with rural interests and of the Indian travelling public, not necessarily from amongst the Legislative Councils. Each of the Provincial Councils was, however, to be asked to appoint a representative for its own Province. We are not aware whether the Provincial Councils were asked to appoint such representatives on the Central Council. The Government of India are not justified in setting aside the definite recommendation of the Railway Committee according to which the local Advisory Councils are to be established either at each of the railway centres or at the head-quarters of each railway. In November last, we read in the newspapers that the Legislative Councils of some of the Provinces have elected their representatives for the local Advisory Councils, but we have not yet seen any of these Councils properly constituted. Will the Government make an announcement and state whether these Councils are to be constituted according to the recommendations of the Acworth Committee? A definite announcement as to the constitution and working of these Councils is urgently required.

The Congress and Council Entry: The Bombay Chronicle on Friday publishes a telegram from its special correspondent at Gaya that the Congress Sub-Committee, after prolonged discussion, decided to adopt Mr. Rajagopalachari's resolution against Council-entry. The President of the Khilafat Conference, Dr. Ansari, has also expressed his opinion against Council-entry. That as well as the Ulemas' decision against Council-entry will influence Moslem delegates to vote against it. There is every sign of the Council-entry party meeting with a defeat.

Removal of a Social Disability: An Associated Press telegram from Rangoon dated 23rd December says that British Government as successors of Kings of Arakan has cancelled the sentence of social degradation passed nearly two centuries ago on persons punished for political crimes and since borne by their descendants. They were originally considered as pagoda slaves but their present day descendants have earned livelihood for some generation as agriculturalists and petty traders and are by no means distinguishable from other Arakanese. Government annuls all disabilities, holding that any offence their fore-fathers may have committed must long since have been expiated.

THE NATIONAL WEEK

IMPRESSIONS OF OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

[The Superintendent of Telegraphs, Bombay, notified yesterday that, owing to line disturbances, telegrams between Bombay and Calcutta were liable to serious delay. A press message sent from our Special Correspondent from Gaya at 11 A.M. on Thursday was received here on Friday after 10 A.M. i.e., after more than 23 hours. We, therefore, waited to print this issue till 6-30 P. M. yesterday to enable us to publish the impressions of our Special Correspondent. As no messages were received till late last evening, the paper was printed off to enable us to post the paper to our overseas subscribers in time to catch the out-going mail to-day.

This morning at 8-30 a. m. we have received the following two express messages sent by our Special Correspondent from Gaya yesterday at 9-10 a. m. and 1-55 p.m. respectively. We therefore, issue this Supplement to this number.]

CONGRESS IMPRESSIONS

(From Our Special Correspondent).

Gaya, 29th Dec. 9-10 a.m.

SHARP DIVISION AMONG CONGRESSMEN.

The Congress atmosphere this year was one of anxiety rather than enthusiasm. The Pro-Council and Anti-Council parties are more sharply divided than it seemed before coming to Gaya. The President Mr. C. R. Das, Pandit Motilal Nehru and other Pro-Council leaders obeyed with scarcely veiled indifference. The address of the Chairman of the Reception Committee is a strong plea against entry into Councils. The Presidential address received with little enthusiasm. No Congress session on Thursday, the day being wholly devoted, in addition to large part of previous day, to discussing draft resolutions and amendments on Council entry in the Subjects Committee. Voting taken Thursday evening showed overwhelming majority against Council entry. Except United Provinces, Bengal, Punjab and Bombay, other provinces were almost wholly against entry into the Councils. There is little doubt that this will be endorsed by Congress to-day and its leadership definitely passes into the hands of the extreme wing of Non-Co-operationists. I have reason to think that more thoughtful among the latter are themselves nervous as to the effect, especially as Pro-Council leaders have adopted an unexpectedly firm tone as regards their determination to exercise their right of personal freedom under the constitution of the Congress.

THE NATIONAL SOCIAL CONFERENCE.

Gaya, 29th Dec. 1-55 p.m.

The National Social Conference held on Friday morning, though at short notice, was a great success. The Jamiat-ul-Ulema pandal was filled with audience of three thousand. Babu Gorakh Prasad, President of the Reception Committee, delivered a Hindi address after which Rai Bahadur Dwarkanath proposed Mr. M. R. Jayakar to the Chair. Miss Tyebji seconded. The President, in the course of his address, emphasised the enlarged character of social reform movement quoting Sir Narayan Chandavarkar's message to the Amritsar Social Conference. Mr. Deepnarayan Singh moved in Hindi the first resolution on the removal of untouchability, Abbas Tyebji seconded in Hindustani and Babu Rajendra Prasad supported. The other resolutions relating to women's uplift, marriage reforms, total prohibition, and the organisation of Conference work were passed. Among the principal speakers were Mrs. Sarojini Naidu, Mr. Vijayaraghava Chariar, Lala Dhanichand, Mr. Stokes, Professor Ruchi Ram Sahni, Mrs. Deepnarain Singh, Miss Natarajan, Mrs. Santosh Kumari, Mrs. Singh, Mrs. Keshav Dev Shastri and Behari Lal of Dehra Dun.

THE WIDOW REMARRIAGE ACT. 1856.

We have a few copies of a little book, now out of print, published in 1885 containing a collection of the proceedings which led to the passing of Act XV of 1856 compiled by Pandit Narayan Keshav Vaidya. They are old but in fairly good condition. They may be had on application from the Manager, The Indian Social Reformer, Empire Building, Hornby Road, Fort, Bombay for Rs. 2/- a copy.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

THE MOPLAH WAGGON TRAGEDY CASE.

On the 19th November 1921, one hundred convicted prisoners (97 Moplahs and 3 Hindus) were despatched from Tirur (Malabar) to Bellary in a luggage van. When the van was opened at Podanur after nearly five hours, it was found that 45 of the prisoners (including the three Hindus) had already died of asphyxia, combined with heat and exhaustion. Out of the remaining, 14 died subsequently of the same causes. Ultimately 70 prisoners out of the one hundred died. The expert medical officers gave out their opinion that the terrible tragedy was due to asphyxia. The news sent a thrill of horror throughout the country. The then Secretary of State, Mr. Montagu, expressed his horror at the incident in a cablegram which he sent to the Viceroy on the 22nd November. He wired:

I am shocked at the terrible consequences of what seems, in absence of explanation, to be culpable negligence. I trust that investigation will be urgently dealt with by the local Government, and that if the facts are as stated, no time will be lost by the Government of India in expressing its views publicly. This incident is peculiarly untoward, in view of the fact that the suppression of the disturbances in Malabar has been in general so well conducted.

The Viceroy replied three days after that the Government of India could not express their views publicly until further information as to the facts was received from the Madras Government.

The Madras Government appointed a Committee which was presided over by Mr. Knapp, the Special Commissioner in Malabar. Regarding the constitution of this Committee, we have already expressed our opinion in the Reformer of the 27th November 1921, that Mr. Knapp, as Special Commissioner of Malabar, was himself ultimately responsible for the administration of the affected tract and he was, therefore, not the proper person to investigate this terrible scandal. The findings of the Committee's report were first published in England and an English paper characterised the report as a "pice of sickening, shuffling hypocrisy." The Committee could not see their way to blame anybody in particular and their conclusion was that the whole tragedy was due to "a deplorable accident." In their resolution on the Committee's report dated 30th August 1922, the Government of India disagreeing with the findings of the Committee held that Sergeant Andrews and five Indian policemen including one head constable who formed the escort of the prisoners of the "death waggon" were guilty of culpable negligence and directed the Madras Government to institute proceedings against them. Accordingly, the Madras Government sanctioned the prosecution of Sergeant Andrews and the five policemen.

The trial commenced before Mr. H. L. Braidwood, L. U. S., the District Magistrate of Coimbatore on the 14th instant. The Public Prosecutor alleged that "the accused by their not investigating the condition of the prisoners and their failure to relieve their suffering in time have caused the deaths of the above mentioned seventy prisoners and are guilty of the offence under Section 304, I. P. C. and are further guilty of offence under Sections 128 and 129 of the Indian Railways Act, in that by wilful omission or neglect, they endangered the safety of 100 prisoners travelling under their charge." Several witnesses including two prisoners, who were among the thirty survivors of the train tragedy, were examined and the Magistrate himself inspected the "death waggon." On the 23rd instant, His Honour in passing the order discharging the accused concluded by saying that

On the evidence, I can only hold that Sergeant Andrews had not sufficient ground to take any steps to rescue the prisoners from the desperate situation, in which they had been unfortunately placed, by a mistake, for which he was not responsible. The other accused also cannot be held to blame for not having formed the opinion that there was anything wrong. Even if they heard something in the prisoners' cries, indicating distress which in my opinion is not proved, they would, I think, have been justified in the circumstances regarding it as mere bluff and in omitting to act on it.

However that may be, on the evidence available there is no case against the accused to justify their being called on to enter upon their defence.

I discharge them under section 253 (1) C. P. C.

The italics are ours. It will be seen that the District Magistrate holds that there had been "a mistake for which he (Sergeant Andrews) was not responsible." It is not difficult to understand from the above passage that the "mistake" referred to is that of selecting such waggons for escorting prisoners. In opening the trial of the accused, the Public Prosecutor stated that it was the practice to despatch prisoners in luggage vans closed and bolted. Attention was called to this inhuman practice by Mr. Lakshmanan writing from Coimbatore few weeks before the tragedy characterising this practice as "brutality pure and simple." There must be some person or persons who are responsible for the terrible tragedy. Who are they? We are not sorry for the acquittal of Sergeant Andrews and his colleagues, but we are sorry that those who are really responsible for the terrible tragedy are not brought to book. We reserve further comments for a later issue.

THE BOMBAY LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

The Bombay Legislative Council had a sitting of two weeks from the 4th to 16th instant. It was not a new session but a continuation of the 3rd session and hence resolutions and new questions were not admitted. In fact it was wholly reserved for official work which consisted of 5 Bills, one resolution from Government for participation in the Empire Exhibition of 1924, and some supplementary grants.

Of the Bills one was non-contentious and passed through all the three readings. One relating to the re-constitution of the Bombay Port Trust Board was read for the first time and given to the Select Committee. The Indian Merchants Chamber, on whose demand it was introduced, asked for clear Indian majority on the Board and Chamber's members in the Council put this demand forward but the Council failed to hammer this view and the Indian member in charge of the Bill characterised this demand as raising a racial question. He was so much mindful of suppressing Indian merchants' views in the Select Committee that he put only 2 Indian merchants on a Committee of 11. It is a pity that a reformed Council should have thus failed to demand effective Indian majority on the Port Trust Board where Indian rights are so much ignored as to have only 6 Indians on posts of Rs. 500 and over as against 107 Anglo-Indians and Europeans.

Next three Bills were for second readings (1) The Local Board Bill (2) The taxation bill on entertainments and (3) The Compulsory Primary Education Bill. The three Bills were so allied to each other that they three formed one whole, one central purpose, running through them which was the provision of Compulsory Primary Education. There is going to be a devolution of powers, additions of functions and democratising of constitution of the Local Boards so that they will elect their School Boards to Central Primary Education in their own areas. Big Municipalities will also have their own School Boards Government control and inspection being very limited to seeing that their grants are not misused and that pernicious education is not given and statistics are kept properly. Thus Local Board Bill was to provide the machinery for the Compulsory Education and the Taxation on Entertainment was the first measure to provide money. Thus these three bills hung together.

The chief battle of the non-officials was for inadequate finance provided for Municipalities and Local Boards. The Select Committee recommended $\frac{2}{3}$ and $\frac{3}{4}$ grants as against $\frac{1}{2}$ and $\frac{2}{3}$ in the original Bill. The Minister agreed to this increase in the Select Committee. But it appears that as soon as he went to his colleagues of the Reserved departments with this increase, he was thrown overboard by them and he was asked to face his Council with an amendment to reduce the grants again to $\frac{1}{2}$ and $\frac{2}{3}$. This raised a storm of protest which would have wrecked the Bill for the Compulsory Education had not Government promised to give more voluntarily to such Local Boards or Municipalities as were financially unable to bear the burden. But Government made yet another attempt to reduce their liabilities by excluding building grants from non-recurring grants. This too was against the Select Committee's report and was negated by the Council by two divisions in spite of the threat of Government members that Bill will be withdrawn if Government were defeated. But Government took the defeat gallantly.

The Council showed its disappointment at the inadequacy of finances of the Local Boards who were not allowed to levy cesses on Abkari, Forest, Income Tax and Salt. But as this was considered to affect Government Revenues no amendments were allowed.

The Entertainment Tax Bill raised strong opposition on three points. The Select Committee had taken evidence and was convinced that Cinema trade was in a depressed state; yet Government would not exclude it wholly or partly from taxation. The other point was of complimentary tickets which Government would not exempt, but they ultimately agreed to do so. The third and important point was Government's anxiety to protect the fat goose of the Turf Club. The Select Committee unanimously recommended 50 per cent tax on admission to Race Course. But the Finance Member moved an amendment to reduce it to 25 per cent. This evoked strong opposition and Government were defeated twice. Later on Government wanted power to remit tax and made no secret of their intention to give benefit thereof to the Turf Club. This too was resented and negated. Incidentally a reference was made to the conduct of the Turf Club who opened the third enclosure to entrap poor people. This led to a statement by the Home Member which was found unsatisfactory and would lead to a debate in the next session. Thus these three bills were passed after the Council has convinced the Government that the stumbling block in the way of success of Dr. Paranjapye's Education Bill will be financial stringency both of Government and Local Bodies.

The last battle raged round the resolution of Dr. Paranjapye about participation of the Presidency in the Empire Exhibition to be held in London in 1924 and granting rupees one lac net for the purpose. This was opposed by representatives of Commerce and Industry in the Council both on the grounds of ill-treatment of Indians in the Colonies as well as on our poverty of Industrial Exhibits except mill products and timber. For the former mill-owners think that in comparison to Lancashire and Manchester goods, their products had no chance of capturing new markets and to exhibit our goods there would be like carrying coals to New Castle. There may something in favour of timber but if Government were anxious to develop this trade, why do they allow their own departments like the Development Department and the Port Trust and Indian Railways import Canadian Oregon Pine wood while Burmese and Canara timbers much superior in quality was available. But the Council treated this as a political resolution on a par with the visit of the Prince of Wales and voted for it on grounds other than Industrial and the resolution was passed by a majority of 39 against 6 only. Thus ended an epoch-making session. It was remarkable for passing important Bills affecting the life of the people. There are some important omissions which only strong Councils could have remedied. But defective though they are, let us work them with a hope to amend them in more popular Council of the future.

MARRIAGE III.

In my previous articles, I have tried to show that the idea that marriage is a sacrament is not helpful in keeping the marriage institution free from abuses and that marriage will follow general social reform. I shall now briefly review the present position with regard to different branches of marriage reform.

The most monstrous of all the evils is enforced widowhood. The disabilities and humiliations heaped on widows form only part of it. Enough has been written about the injustice of denying the women who have the misfortune to become widows mere human, mere animal rights. But in no branch of social reform has the opposition of orthodoxy been so strong and so successful as in the matter of bettering the condition of widows. I have used a wide phrase so as to embrace remarriage of widows and allowing them to grow hair and to be regarded as normal human beings and not as "bad omens." Orthodoxy has resisted and resists any change in the treatment of widows. The large mass of Hindus who are neither orthodox nor heterodox sheepishly follow the tyrant custom because of the fear of boycott by the orthodox. The strength of this fear I shall deal with later on. So far as the disfiguring of widows is concerned there is however a perceptible change though the extent of this change is not at all satisfactory. Even orthodox people are after all human beings, fathers or mothers and brothers or sisters. Public opinion is now somewhat more lenient than it was some years ago about allowing girl-widows to allow hair to remain unshaved. But is this reform, if it may be called so, in any way flattering to our nineteenth century and twentieth century rationalism? As early as in the 14th century the same reform was successfully carried through by the sect of Vaishnavas founded by Pillai Lokachariar and Peria Vachan Pillai, and given shape by Manaval Maha Muni the Tegalai Vaishnavas of the Madras Presidency. Even now they observe that practice. What is rather curious is that Tegalais and Vadagalais intermarry notwithstanding this heterodox practice of the Tegalais. Taking widow remarriages, far from there being any progress, there seems to be a setback. In a recent issue of the Indian Social Reformer there was published an article about Social Reform in the Andhra Desa in which the writer points out that very few widow remarriages have taken place in that province that had the benefit of the labours of the late Veeresalingam Pantulu. The chief reason why we have not progressed is that people are so greatly in dread of the consequences that may follow on offending the orthodox. Another reason is that social reform propaganda has not been conducted in the Indian languages and has not reached our ladies. My impression is that if propaganda is started in Indian languages and made to appeal to our women, the results will be much more encouraging. No doubt, our women are orthodox, but they are more women with feelings than auto-mata moved by regulations fixed for a different age. Also, even orthodoxy will have to bend to a human appeal. Here I may state that the position taken up by orthodoxy does not reflect the true genius of Sanatan Dharma. It is impossible to cite a lower Sanatani in the highest sense of that term than the great saint of Dakshineswar, Swami Sri Ramakrishna Paramahansa. His opinion about Pandit Ishwar Chandar Vidyasagar, the father of the widow remarriage movement, will be received with a shock by those who pride themselves on their orthodoxy. The sentences I give below are from the "Gospel of Sri Ramakrishna" Vol. II. "I should like to see Ishwar Chandar Vidyasagar a few times more. Everything is fully ripe in Vidyasagar, only it is hidden. So he is doing a lot of good work, but knows not that God is lying concealed in his inmost heart, knowing which, one gives up all work and longs to cry unto the Lord."

Again, "Ever work unattached. The works that are done by Vidyasagar are good, for he tries to be selfless." Orthodoxy would declare Pandit Vidyasagar a sinner. But here we find a real seer giving Vidyasagar a very high place among evolved souls as one on the threshold of Sarva Sanga Parityage. I make bold to say that the Hindu world has greater regard for the judgment of Sri Ramakrishna than for the judgment of any number of pedantic pandits. But very few have been told of the high esteem in which Sri Ramakrishna held Pandit Vidyasagar and his work. It should be part of social reform propaganda to give the widest publicity in all Indian languages to the life and work of Pandit Vidyasagar and also to the estimate of his work by men like Sri Ramakrishna Paramahansa and Keshub Chandar Sen. But I admit that propaganda alone will not be enough. The more important work will be organisation with a view to mitigate the discomforts consequent on a boycott by the orthodox sections of the community. But this wider question I shall deal with after noticing the other important evils of the marriage institution.

INDIAN CHRISTIANITY AND THE NATIONAL AWAKENING, IV.

(By A ROMAN CATHOLIC)

THE SPIRITUAL DOMINATION COMPARED WITH THE POLITICAL.

It is one of the strangest features of the present day history of India that whereas this great continent is ruled politically by one people and this the English, yet in matters spiritual which pertain to Christian belief, it almost acknowledges the sway of almost as many people and nations as those into which the continent of Europe is broken up. We are not thinking of the numerous sects of Christianity, each one of which has its panacea for all the ills of mankind and is ready to provide 'salvation' for the asking: not at all, but we are thinking of the French, and the Italian and the Spanish and the Portuguese, the Swiss etc. and in pre-war days the Germans and the Austrians who have carved out little spiritual principalities for themselves, and not least of all the citizen of the land of the Almighty Dollar with his strongholds dotting the whole country.

The inner workings of international diplomacy often-times discloses such pathological conditions as to shock the naïveté of the ordinary citizen who has faith and grace to be trustful of the pompous, correct and copy-plate maxims of the diplomatists, and we have much reason to believe that the international relations of these miniature religious nationalities in India are not wholly free from the jealousies, petty bickerings, beggar-my-neighbour policy which are so much noticeable in the political punch and Judy show. We are not concerned with these, for they are the consequences which one must after all expect when divergent nations with varying shades of belief have to interpret one common ideal, in their case, to bring the Christian Gospel to India.

We only wish to ask the plain and simple question whether that part of the Indian population that acknowledges the sway of these European nationals in the spiritual field can claim to have advanced in that particular sphere as much as those who acknowledge the political yoke have advanced in the direction of self-government. If in the field of administration and justice it has been found possible to enlarge the scope of the Indian, have the ecclesiastical authorities in Europe or America thought fit to extend the scope of Indians in the ecclesiastical government of their own countrymen? It shames us, or should we rather say, the mouthpieces of Christianity in this country and not Christianity itself, to have to answer that political development has far outstripped any ecclesiastical advance: in fact it is doubtful if there has been any advance at all in this domain worth speaking about.

In the ecclesiastical as much as in the political world the highest ideal is to see every people ministered to or governed by its own members. We have no difficulty in accepting the worn-out solemn plausibility which makes a benignant Providence entrust political education or spiritual enlightenment of a country to an alien people; but even the most blantant assertors of this hoary doctrine will admit that the trustees shall have failed to discharge their obligations if they have not within a reasonable time been able to bring about the emancipation of their ward. One would have reason to believe that the Christian doctrine of the equality of man and the Fatherhood of God would lead to a quickening of the pace of spiritual home-rule for Indians: but unfortunately the wheels of the ecclesiastical machinery appear to be more clogged with racial prejudice and with the time-worn platitudes of Indians not yet being fit for ecclesiastical preferment, even more than those of the political machinery. The native Christian element in India by virtue of its numerical insignificance and its backwardness and its tragic dissipation has never been able to bring home to its foreign ecclesiastical masters that Swaraj in the field of religion is as much necessary for the corporate health of the life of the community as is civic and political liberty.

Roman Catholic Christianity has been in existence in this country for at least four centuries and one should have expected that a religion that calls itself democratic and universal, one which prides itself on the fact of having the highest office in its hierarchy open to one of the lowliest birth, should have advanced at least a few of the children of the soil to the most important positions in the Indian Church. But one might as well expect the leopard to change its spots. Pronouncements from Rome like the Proclamation from the English Throne and Parliament blazoning the equality of the Indian with the dominant people and piously avowing intentions of providing scope for indigenous talent are numerous; they are meant to act as anodynes on unquiet minds and nothing besides unless it be to add one more to the list of beatitudes: 'Blessed are they that hope for they shall not be disappointed.' That has been the tragedy of the Indian to be made to pursue illusions with a devoted confidence.

It is common knowledge that in England which has governed this country for a century and a half during which time countless of its men and women have lived in, moved about India and been associated with Indians, 9 out of 10 cannot tell what is the difference between a 'bamboo' and a 'babu': what wonder therefore, if in the high places of ecclesiastical government accessible only to the select few, the only picture of Indian Christianity that reach there are of the skeletons of famine-stricken humanity, standing by thatched grass-huts imploring alms or praying for rain. There is a bureaucracy ecclesiastical as well as civil; and it knows its own interest; it is human to feel indignant that there should be Indians who maintain that they have outgrown the status pupilaris.

It will ever redound to the credit of England that its most exclusive body opened its doors to an Indian; the House of Lords was proud to be associated with an Indian. Governorships of Provinces are not today beyond the Indian's aspirations and what need therefore to speak of other eminent positions like High Court Judgeships, Memberships of the Executive Councils that have long been thrown open to them. But during a spiritual domination that runs into centuries what are the careers that are thrown open to the sons of the country? Of course not a Bishopric, so we are told as far as the Christian Section of the Roman Communion goes which we should have expected to be more generous and liberal-minded, and we are told that positions of much inferior status and carrying no dignity whatsoever are hardly within the aspirations of the Indian cleric.

Where in Europe, the homeland of modern Christianity, as we are told, do we see, a Bishop of one nationality, ruling over a people of a different one, Italian will not tolerate a Frenchman, and the Scotch not an Irishman: only in India to seek the normal is a heresy—an anathema, O! the pity of it—we were almost tempted to shout the hypocrisy of it.

Oh unfortunate Motherland! What great sins must you have committed in the past that even the regeneration of some of your children's souls—let alone the care of their body—should not be trusted to you!

LONDON LETTER.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, December 7th, 1922.

THE IRISH BILL.

The Irish Free State Constitution Bill passed through its final stages in the House of Lords on Monday December 4th, exactly one year after the Treaty was signed in London. The third and last reading was allowed by the House of Lords without even the formal challenge of a division, and thinking of this to-day, one cannot help glancing over the pages of past history and remember that when Gladstone's first Home Rule Bill was introduced in 1893, it was rejected by 419 votes to 41. Thus another great experiment in Self-Government within the Empire comes into being, 29 years after the first demand for it was made in the House of Parliament here. But those 29 years have not been spent only in convincing England that Home Rule was good for Ireland; they have been much more important than that, for they have convinced Ireland herself that she wanted and needed it, and in addition have so enlarged and broadened the original Bill that the present one bears only a structural resemblance to its parent of so long ago. An infinitely greater measure of liberty is given to Ireland to-day than was even contemplated as a possibility in the Gladstonian period. But probably even more than on the recovery of domestic freedom is Ireland to be congratulated upon the fact that she has, during the years of waiting and suffering, clearly defined her own schemes for Government and has developed statesmen big enough and capable enough to put her schemes into instant operation.

THE FIRST GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF IRELAND.

Mr. G. M. Healy, K.C., that great lover of his own country, is to be the first Governor-General of Ireland, and in a message to the Press that he gave a couple of days ago, he expressed the utmost confidence in Ireland's future, and also the firm belief that she will settle down and become a very happy and prosperous country. This state of happy being will not fall ready-made like a cloak upon Ireland; it has yet to be worked for and made. Even now, scarcely a day passes without its list of outrages and murders in the name of patriotism. But once the confidence of the Irish people can be gained in their own Parliament, the work of reconstruction, started months ago, will rapidly move towards its appointed end of political and social order. During the past fortnight, several of the leaders of the Irregular army, have fallen into the hands of the National forces, and numbers of Irregulars seem to be drifting back to their homes. The execution of the great Republican, Childers, has struck a sombre note into the hearts of many outside Ireland, for he was one of the poetic and heroic figures, and even those most opposed to him in political thought feel regret that his genius was cut short by so unhappy an end. Probably his last letter addressed to his wife, in which he expressed an ever-living love for England, even though that love was misunderstood by her, has done much to establish him as a pathetic figure in the minds of many here. But the Free State is determined to show that she can rule her own household, and that those who set themselves in violent opposition to her must be broken, if they will not submit.

THE UNEMPLOYMENT QUESTION.

As was foreshadowed before Parliament opened its new session, one of the first things it did, was to discuss the unemployment question. It became the main theme in the first debate the House had. The position with regard to unemployment is easier to-day than it was a year ago, the figures have dropped from over two millions unemployed to 900,000, but such a number is tragic, and these men, in addition, are becoming desperate, or "wasters". The State continues to pay doles, but such an expenditure, is an appalling waste of the State's resources.

During the Debate in the House, various schemes were discussed including one by some members of the Labour Party, who had suggested that the State should open factories and produce goods. But, as Dr. Macnamara pointed out, it is useless to make goods unless we can find a market for them. Such goods would have to be thrown on to the scapheap, or sold at such a figure that a big loss would be incurred and the tax-payer would have to make good the loss. However, enterprises, like railway, canal and road construction are being hurried forward, and it is expected that thousands will find employment in these three main organisations for many months to come. But such schemes, at best, are palliatives and not the real cure for this spectre of unemployment that haunts us and threatens to destroy our vitality. The only real remedy lies in improved trade and this mainly depends upon world conditions over some of which we have no direct control though doubtless a more satisfactory foreign policy on our part would effect a considerable improvement. The 2,000 unemployed men who marched from various parts of England to Whitehall, beguiled by the belief that they could force themselves upon the Prime Minister, are slowly dribbling back to their homes, disappointed and sore, disappointed not only in the refusal of Mr. Bonar Law to see them on quite good constitutional grounds, but in the organisers of their march as well; they feel that they were deceived by false promises of success. The further proposal that Mr. Hannington, the organiser of the unemployed movement made, that 50,000 men should march on to London from the Provinces, and "shake Mr. Bonar Law out of his tranquillity" has been severely condemned by Mr. J. H. Thomas, M. P. Even 50,000 people "pledged to lay down their lives if necessary, and to help to destroy the capitalistic system" would probably only bring endless misery upon themselves, and no hope or good to any one else. It is not expected that such a march will take place, for it is believed that though unhappy and often desperate men will do foolish things, yet there will be sufficient commonsense left to cause better counsels to prevail. Meanwhile, Mr. Lansbury is promoting a movement to enable an unemployed deputation to be heard at the Bar of the House of Commons.

THE NEW INDIAN M. P. AGAINST HIS OWN PARTY.

The new Parsee member of the House, Mr. Saklatwala, has come up against the party that helped to give him his seat and apparently it has been decided by the Labour Party to review the position of their member. He and an avowed communist moved the rejection of the Irish Bill in a debate, during which the leaders of the party strongly supported it. No party likes to keep within its ranks members who oppose it on most vital issues and we shall probably hear more of Mr. Saklatwala before very long.

THE LATE MRS. ALICE MAYNELL.

The death of Mrs. Alice Maynell takes from us our greatest living woman poet and essayist. It was known that her health was failing for some time, and that the end was near, for she had passed the allotted span of life. But right up to a few weeks before her death, she retained her place as an active worker in the fields of truth and beauty. Some of the finest tributes ever paid to a poet have been paid to her, both during her life-time and at her passing. Yet not only have these tributes been paid to her as a great poetess and great essayist, but a great and saintly woman. After the death of Tennyson, she was suggested as Poet Laureate. But such a suggestion did not bear any fruit, women in those days had not come to occupy the important place that to-day is theirs. Yet how fitting it would have been, that a woman, who will probably go down to history as one of the world's great and good queens, should have bestowed upon another good and great woman the coveted title of Poet Laureate. She occupied a unique position in a unique circle in which Francis Thompson and George Meredith played a great part. There seems no one at the present time to take her place. Though many minor poets come to the surface, they have no staying power but come as bubbles, and, like bubbles, soon disappear from view.

THE DECREASE IN BIRTH-RATE.

The lowering of the birth-rate for England and Wales, again occupies both optimists and pessimists alike. The optimist rejoices in it, because side by side with the lowered figures of birth, he sees the lowering of the mortality rate too. The pessimist groans seeing nothing but calamity for a country that does not lend to over-populate its boundaries. The birth-rate for the second-quarter of the year was lower than for any corresponding quarter except in the abnormal period of the war, and as the decline has been steady for some considerable time now, it looks as though some of the pressing problems of our day will not press upon future generations here.

LORD HAIG'S WARNING TO EMIGRANTS.

Lord Haig has warned people not to emigrate indiscriminately. In a speech he made at Manchester last week, he said that ex-service men should not emigrate to the Dominions "until the Dominion Governments have set their house in order." Men who went to the rich lands overseas did not find their expectations realised, and continued Lord Haig, "What I want to get are letters from the Colonies to men here saying 'Come out here, there is a good job and plenty to do.' Instead, I have letters from various parts of the Dominions saying that men who have gone out are starving. I have just had a telegram from a Colonial Governor asking for £1,000 to help some men who had emigrated." These statements coming from Lord Haig are rather in conflict with those of the Empire Overseas Settlement Associations. Nevertheless both are probably true; good men are wanted to work the rich lands yet undeveloped in various parts of the Empire, but the men wanted to do this work must be picked from the old country and possessing at least £2,000 in capital.

THE POET ON THE PLATFORM.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

You have done well in your able leader of the 2nd instant to nail down some of the "debilitating" and "enervating" suggestions thrown out by Poet Tagore in his recent lectures in Bombay. I have nothing to do with them here, but I crave your indulgence to point out two mistakes of fact, one of which many people have committed in common with the Poet and for the other of which the Poet alone, to my knowledge, seems to have been responsible.

(1) To speak of India as a tropical country at all is a mistake all but universal. A very great part, perhaps the greater part, of India lies actually outside the tropics. A look at any map will show that almost the whole of Northern India or the whole of continental India, leaving the peninsular portion of it, lies outside the tropics in the temperate zone. In fact, Persia (with which the Poet contrasted India for the difference in climate as affecting the character and achievements of the two branches of the Aryan race settled in the two countries) lies in about the same latitudes as this temperate portion of India. On the other hand, a considerable part of Egypt and a small portion of China lie in the tropics; but nobody to my knowledge spoke of Egypt or China as tropical countries.

(2) In Bombay and on another occasion at Madras, the Poet declared or rather "generalized" that all the Avatars of the Deity in Hinduism were Kshatriyas with the solitary exception of Parasurama. This too is a mistake. For leaving the Fish, the Tortoise, the Boar, and the Man-lion which, of course, could have no caste, of the others, two, Yamana and Parasurama, were Brahman avatars, Krishna was neither a Brahman nor a Kshatriya, he was of a mixed tribe, the Yadavas. So only two, Rama and Buddha, could be claimed to be Kshatriya. Kalki is yet to come. So Brahman and Kshatriya avatars are only equal in number.

Yours etc.,
M. D. N.

"THE ETERNAL QUEST."

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Mr. Rathnam has compressed in his article so much matter that it would need as many days as there are lines in it, to comprehensively examine and analyse his statement in order to arrive at correct judgments on the various points touched upon by him.

Mr. Rathnam admits that "Man's belief in God is as old as humanity." Very well, I then argue that if we believe in the Fatherhood of God, He could not, and cannot, leave man in ignorance about his duties towards Himself and about the "ultimate goal of humanity." The historical fact is that He has not read the dealings of God with His chosen people in the Old Dispensation and of the Christian Revelation in the new Testament of the Christian Bible. The latter is moreover, intended for all peoples and for all times. An attentive and intelligent perusal and study of the two Testaments will show that a Revelation has been made to man and that a relationship between God and man is just as old as humanity itself. In other words: Religion began with the creation of man—for Religion is nothing else than the certain though not complete, knowledge of God, and the duties arising therefrom, loyalty, love and service of man. It has not been left to "natural evolution" as Mr. Rathnam believes, in which case mankind would have been still groping in the dark in search of "truth about God," because human intellect and reason by themselves are incapable of forming a correct and true concept of God. Study Christian (by which I mean Catholic) theology and philosophy and the Indian mind, admittedly a religious and a philosophic mind, will find abundant and perennial source of intellectual food to satisfy the highest aspirations of her wisest philosopher, as it meets the needs of the smallest child.

"What definite conception of life beyond death have we?" asks Mr. Rathnam. Surely the writer could not have exhausted all sources of information on the subject. Has he tried Catholic philosophy and Theology, which can, and do, give "verified" scriptural quotations and a certitude about the life beyond the grave? Of course, religions which are mere "superstructures built on the strata of superstitions" cannot be expected to give a definite conception of the subject.

Mr. Rathnam observes: "If man consciously refuses to indulge in the physical cravings of nature and represses the animal in him, the body suffers while the soul gains." It would be interesting to know in what way the body suffers and the soul gains by the subjugation of animal cravings as understood by the writer. "But if he represses the dictates of his conscience and indulges in the animal cravings the soul suffers while the body gains." Does it? What does Science say? It is too well known to the Medical Science that inordinate indulgence in drink, smoke, and sensual pleasures, leaves indelible marks on man's physical frame, disastrous in their consequences, both to the individual and to his progeny, yet unborn. All Temperance Reformers are working upon this truth.

Mr. Rathnam begins the last para of his article with the remark "A careful study of the Gospels would convince us that Christ has revealed nothing except the way to the realization of the eternal truth," whatever that may mean. To a Catholic who knows his Christianity and has lived a Christian life, the composition in this para will surely make the other sense. I own to being mystified by its mystical theology, and I feel confident that many like me would be glad to learn the purport and purpose of this paragraph.

NON-BRAHMIN IMITATION OF BRAHMIN CUSTOMS.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Your correspondent Mr. G. A. Sundaram has put his finger on the right point when he calls the Non-Brahmin leaders to turn their attention to large measures of Social Reform. I know in the Deccan some Mahrattas who, in order to distinguish themselves from the Mahratta masses, claim that they have no custom of widow re-marriage. Some two years back I remember to have read a letter in a vernacular paper wherein a Jain proudly asserted that Jains have no widow re-marriages. Mahrattas, Jains and many other non-Brahmin communities claim their equality with us on the ground that they have no widow re-marriages as we have not got them. In my opinion this is the weakest point of Brahmins as well as of non-Brahmins. It means we do not love freedom but tyranny. We claim superiority not at our own merits but at the cost of our women. We rival with each other in tyrannizing them. We want to achieve ideal purity by force. Outside the Maharashtra, both Brahmins and non-Brahmins of Maharashtra are called Mahrattas. We are proud of the name, because we gallantly fought for freedom and won it. We are freedom-loving people.

Mahrattas have a right to claim equality with us not on this point of absence of widow re-marriage but on the solid ground of their sterling virtues, valour and gallantry. Jains have distinguished themselves in the field of commerce. The country requires as much their services as ours. Then why is there this silly imitation of Brahmanism and causing of untold miseries to helpless women?

A few months back on this side, a hot controversy was raging between two non-Brahmin communities. Superiority was claimed by one community over the other on the ground that it had no custom of divorce, which the other had. Having seen a number of women married to men who have no right to marry in both Brahmin and non-Brahmin communities, I firmly believe that the institute of divorce is a necessity for justice, humanity and growth of virtue. There is no greater check to fraudulent marriages than the institute of divorce. Introduce this institute to give justice and old men will stop out of terror to buy girls in the marriage-markets. Brahmins by force and tyranny have not achieved any greater purity but have created ghastly intolerable scenes under the name of religion. Let non-Brahmins, if their eyes are open, stop this slavish imitation of our customs. Virtue is not a product of force but of healthy surroundings and of healthy teachings. The ugliest custom amongst us of disfiguring widows, will you believe, has even some followers amongst the non-Brahmins. Women, who do re-marry, in old age undergo this disfiguring that they may claim equality with us.

Non-Brahmins are as fondly attached as the Brahmins to caste and untouchability. In the Deccan the Brahmins excepting the priest-classes and their puppets are ready to give up untouchability, but the non-Brahmins are not. Many non-Brahmins hate us, but they are more caste-ridden than we. They hate us, because they believe that we do not consider them as our equals but in no way they are better disposed to those communities which are below them. I believe it will not be out of place, if I give my own experience of a non-Brahmin Sardar in the Deccan. Some few years back I was employed by a Sardar as a tutor to his son. Though myself a Brahmin I was freely dining with him taking only vegetarian diet prepared by his own Mahratta cook.

His usual topic of conversation was Brahmanism. He was a great hater of Brahmins. One day an educated Bhil, a pupil of mine, came there. The Sardar would not allow the Bhil to dine in the same row. Mahrattas, Dhangars, Prabhus want perfect equality with us. I am on their side. But they must give the same equality to other communities which are below them. Non-Brahmins are as much entangled as we ourselves in the superstitions of astrology, fatalism etc. Unless the Non-Brahmins work on better principles, the country cannot be benefitted. Some individuals may. Excepting few Brahmins who have learnt from Europeans more of their vices than their virtues, we Brahmins do not drink liquor. Herein lies our strength and superiority. A Brahmin boy will face any difficulties, his parents will starve themselves, and take a world of pains to educate him. No doubt Brahmins are selfish and caste-ridden. But are the Non-Brahmins less selfish and caste-ridden?

As long as Non-Brahmins do not organize Hindus in their fold on basis of equality, fraternity and liberty, Brahmins have a right to say: "Many communities took full advantage of caste and that rotten Varnashram for their material prosperity, when the circumstances were favourable, but to-day the masses are awakened, these very people therefore to save their skins, want to make us scape-goats and pose themselves as saviours."

Yours etc.,

K. G. KARKARE.

LETTERS WRITTEN BY MAHATMA GANDHI.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

SIR,

May I request through the Press that any one who has any letter written by Mahatma Gandhi, which might be of special value in writing a Biography of Mahatma Gandhi should communicate with Pandit Benarsi Das Chaturvedi, Gujerat Mahavidyalaya, Ahmedabad?

I am certain that any letters that are sent (or copies of them) will be carefully and reverently used.

C. F. ANDREWS.

MALABAR CONVERSIONS.

The apostles of the Congress creed have ventured into Northern India with their own tales of the Mopla Rebellion. Whatever may be the differences existing between the Non-Co-operators and the rest of society regarding the causes that have led up to the Mopla rebellion in Malabar, there could be no room for disputing the irrefutable fact of forcible conversions of Hindus wrought by the fanatical rebels. It was understood that this was beyond controversy. One Mr. M. Gopala Menon apparently in the name of the local Congress Committee, is reported to have gone all the way to the Punjab and furnished a garbled account of this desecrable form of atrocity committed by the Moplas. This young truant who joined Non-Co-operation movement probably enamoured of the golden vista of possibilities it opened up before the youthful imagination, has with a show of scientific perception classified the cases under the three heads: "(1) By the raff of the Hindus, who thought that the time of loot had arrived and looted the people in the garb of Moslems; (2) Hindus who cared more for their money and property than religion. There were thousands of this class who embraced Islam willingly (3) a few cases of real forcible conversions" (the italics are our own). We can conceive of no greater calumny on the abiding faith of the Hindus in their ancient religion. The poor helpless Hindu overtaken by a frightful gang of desperadoes armed with swords still reeking with the blood of the unyielding few cannot be described as willingly embracing the Islamic faith if to save his own life, which is after all dearer than anything else in this world, submits to the inexorable fanatics' mandate. And yet the young Congress missionary would fain catalogue such cases as instances of willing conversion! We are unable to understand the motive underlying such a perversion of facts unless it be the result of a perverted imagination diseased by the constant injection of the Non-Co-operation poison. We can sympathise with this young man flying into a rage over the lack of courage in the Hindus and their apparent indifference to matters of religion and religious worship but we can hardly endorse the condemning tone in which he refers to the "most unkindest cut" of the fanatical rebel.

The record maintained by the Arya Samaj branch of Malabar shows a doleful figure of 1766 cases of forcible conversion that have come to its notice. It requires uncommon hardihood to assert that these are "a few cases" as the itinerating non-co-operator would have the people outside Malabar believe. We are unable to think that such a campaign of misrepresentation is carried on without any aim. . . . We are averse to embark upon any course that is calculated to reopen the hostilities created by the wanton acts of cruelty perpetrated by the rebels but we should certainly insist upon the rapprochement being made on the basis of truth and justice. The security of a fresh union between the erstwhile antagonistic elements lies in their mutual appreciation of the realities of the situation and an adjustment with a clear consciousness of the same. Any other scheme of compromise is bound to be shortlived. We are sure that the creation of the atmosphere required for a clear mutual understanding between the Hindus and the Mahomedans and their reversion to the pre-rebellious terms of neighbourly relations are impossible of permanent attainment until and unless the parties take stock of the situation in its true perspective. Any attempt to paint the facts in false colour can only lead to further embitter the feelings. We must, therefore, unhesitatingly condemn such false steps as have been taken by the young congress missionary in the Punjab.—The West Coast Reformer, Calicut, December, 24.

The Indian Social Reformer of the 9th contains a quotation from a statement which Mr. M. Gopala Menon made at Lahore with regard to forced conversions in Malabar. Speaking before a large audience at the Islamia College Hall Mr. Gopala Menon made the astonishing statement that the Hindus themselves in the garb of Muslims converted others, that thousands embraced Islam voluntarily and only a very small section had been converted forcibly. This Gopala Menon who, if the report be right, thus calumniated the Hindus of Malabar is described as the Secretary of the Calicut Congress Committee. As far as we know there is no such institution at Calicut. The Town Congress Committee of which he claims to be a Secretary is a bogus institution which has not been recognised by the Provincial Congress Committee. It is possible that as this Gopala Menon comes from Malabar and describes himself as the Secretary of a Congress organisation, his statements may carry some weight with ignorant persons in distant provinces where the actual conditions of Malabar are not fully realised. But as facts speak for themselves and as the truth about Malabar atrocities are now well-known we may leave the silly statements of irresponsible individuals like Gopala Menon to take care of themselves. But we would warn Congress organisations in Northern India against the vagaries of this individual.—The Swarajya, Madras, 16th December.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, JANUARY 6, 1923.

THE NATIONAL WEEK.

A detailed survey of the numerous gatherings which, as usual, took place during the last week of last year, will, even if space permitted, be far from illuminating and, indeed, serve to confuse the reader regarding the broad currents of Indian thought and feeling at the present day. It would be an instance of failing to see the wood for the trees. In the following paragraphs, it is proposed to present a synthetic view, so far as one is possible, of the ideas which dominated the principal national and communal conferences. These are the National Congress, the All-India Liberal Federation, the Khilafat Conference, the All-India Indian Christian Conference, the National Social Conference, the All-India Theistic Conference, the Hindu Mahasabha, and the All-India Social Workers' Conference. All except three of these met at Gaya where the Congress met. The All-India Liberal Federation met at Nagpur and the All-India Christian Conference at Lucknow. Along with the Liberal Federation, for the first time, a Social Conference was also held at Nagpur. The All-India Social Workers' Conference met at Madras. The Non-Brahmin Federation at Madras is not an All-India movement concerning, as it does, only Madras and Maharashtra.

THE CHOICE OF GAYA.

That the eyes of all India and of the outside world interested in India, were turned to Gaya more than to Nagpur or Lucknow or Madras, goes without saying. The choice of Gaya for holding the Congress and the important Conferences which always hold their sessions at the same place as the Congress, was disadvantageous from all points of view but one. No doubt, a hundred thousand Hindus, perhaps more, from all parts of India, go to Gaya every year to perform the Shraddh or commemorative ceremony for their departed ones, the Shraddh at Gaya being considered as the greatest and best of Shraddhs. Every part of India has its representative priestly families established at Gaya as at Benares and Prayag, who keep a record of all the visitors for whom they had officiated for many generations, with the name of their villages, families and so on. Any Hindu going to these places of pilgrimage is soon spotted by the priest in whose lists he can trace the name of a grandparent or great grandparent and the date when he made his pilgrimage. Gaya, therefore, does not strike any Hindoo as a strange place and the Gayawallas are familiar with Indians of all parts of the country. But the resources of the City are utterly inadequate to accommodate gatherings which bring many thousands together in the course of a single week. The one point of view, however, which transcended all others and which, from the absence of any reference to it in the principal speeches, was not evidently present to the conscious mind of the organisers, was that at Gaya, for the first time in the history of the human race, Lord Buddha took compassion on the multitude and launched His great mission to spread among them spiritual truths so long regarded as the exclusive patrimony of the twice-born castes. There, under the Bodhi-tree whose lineal descendant still stands, was first proclaimed the equal right of all men, who tread the path of self-knowledge, self-reverence and self-control, to the spiritual Swaraj of which political Swaraj is but the temporal reflection. To one mind, at least, this thought dominated every other during the crowded days at Gaya, and there can be no doubt that, sub-consciously, it dominated many others. While writing these lines, the lofty Gopura of the temple, the sweet serenity of the great Buddha face within, and the Bodhi tree shading the stone seat, precisely as in the carving at Sanchi, on which the Lord Buddha meditated, rise before the mind's eye.

THE NATIONAL CONGRESS.

The opening meeting of the National Congress was attended by at least 15,000 persons. The delegates numbered four thousand. All the accommodation provided them was thatched huts on the bank of the Phalgu, with bare stretchers, bought apparently from the Surplus Stores left from the last war, to lie upon. The cold was piercing. No one certainly went to Gaya for physical comfort. At the Congress' itself, chairs and tables were tabooed. Every one was supplied with a bag made of Khaddar in which to secure his shoes, and with this in hand, he stepped barefooted into the pandal and squatted down there for perhaps six or eight hours at a stretch. No exception was made. The President down to the obscure delegate were all on the same footing. All were, of course, in khaddar, the solitary exception being Professor P. M. Buck of Nebraska University who, as an invited guest, occupied a prominent place just ahead of the President on the platform. Most of the speeches were in English, the injunction regarding Hindi being tacitly overlooked in consideration of the importance of the issues and the need for most facility of expression in debating them. Delegates from all parts of the country mustered in force, the women constituting a strong minority. In this pardah city, women volunteers moved about freely among the thronging crowds which respectfully made way for them. Hindus, Mahomedans and Sikhs were prominently represented, the last by a strong Akali contingent whose black turbans, Kripans, and chivalrous deportment made a strong impression. There was a sprinkling of Indian Christians, and a solitary Parsi in the person of Burjorji Framji Bharucha. The nation, it is clear, looks to the Congress as to no other body for guidance.

CONGRESS RESOLUTIONS.

The Resolutions passed by the Congress at Gaya, which have attracted most attention and excited most interest, are those rejecting the proposals to boycott British goods and to enter the Legislative Councils, that enjoining the raising of 50,000 Volunteers and 25 lakhs of rupees to prepare for mass civil disobedience, and that repudiating national liability for any public debt incurred hereafter. Nobody except a few hot-heads believes in the possibility of mass civil disobedience consistently with non-violent non-co-operation. The third resolution is therefore merely a call for men and money, both badly needed, the tag about mass civil disobedience being a current Congress shibboleth. The fourth resolution represents a protest against the mounting expenditure on the Army and the Services, and expresses the necessity put upon the country of protecting itself from the consequences of such exploitation. But, as it is worded, it is crude and ill-conceived. The proposer himself desired that the question should be postponed for further consideration, but the Congress was bent on adopting it. This illustrates the danger of placing immature proposals before mass meetings. This resolution will not help the Congress to get the 25 lakhs it wants. It will not stop further loans though it may conceivably raise the rate of interest on them. After the no-councillites got their way about Councils, prudence would have counselled moderation. There can be no doubt that they have not enhanced their reputation for statesmanship by passing this so-called repudiation resolution. As regards the first two resolutions, they represent, broadly speaking, the Congress's desire not to depart from the programme as laid down by Mahatma Gandhi. The rejection of the proposal to boycott British goods was the more crucial test. The resolution was actually adopted in the Subjects Committee by a small majority. The majority of Congressmen, had they not been swayed by loyalty to the Mahatma, would have gladly voted for the boycott. The defeat in the Congress was somewhat of a surprise, but it showed the hold of Gandhi's personality on the mass of Congressmen.

The rejection of the proposal to enter the Legislative Councils was also to a large extent motivated by loyalty to Gandhi. But it, unlike the boycott of British goods, was also in consonance with what seems to be the settled conviction of the great majority of Congressmen. The general belief seems to be that in the Councils' game the dice are all loaded against Indians and that both because of this and because of Englishmen being more expert in the game, the people's voice has no chance of obtaining more than a polite hearing in these bodies. There is also a genuine fear that, judging from experience, few Indians are proof against the blandishments of the bureaucracy. A certain length of rope is permitted to the favourites with a view to deluding the people into a belief in their independence, and this length is capable of extension or curtailment according to the exigencies of the occasion. But the limits are strictly defined and instances are given how certain public men were pushed up or let down on certain occasions. These ideas are inveterately rooted in many minds and no arguments can dislodge them from them. The pro-Councillites had also prejudiced their case by declaring that they wanted to go to the elections for every purpose except that of working in them. Some would get elected and refuse to sit in the Councils, others would get elected and then wait for a Congress mandate as to what they should do. These two groups forgot that the electors may have some self-respect, and may resent being asked to waste their votes on men who did not want them for any serious purpose of work. A third group would go to the Councils intent on wrecking them, while a fourth would start wrecking only if its scheme of Swaraj is rejected. These divided counsels in the pro-Council camp did not help it to carry conviction to its opponents, and indeed, it was astonishing how few would advocate the straight course of going to the Councils to continue in them the Bardoli programme. The Councils men have no faith in the Bardoli programme; the No-Councils men have no faith in the Councils. Those who believe in that programme and who think that it may be advantageously worked in the Councils as well as outside, are a small minority whose voice is at present drowned in the clamour of the others. The manifesto issued by Mr. Das and others, unless it is modified, as it may be in the light of farther discussion, is incompatible with the aims of this group which, otherwise must continue as an independent one in the Congress.

The misgivings of the majority can be set at rest only by some sound Congressmen seeking election into and doing good work in the Councils. No party is needed to do this, as the Congress majority does not question the right of every Congressman to act according to his own convictions. The announcement of the formation of a party within the Congress is at any rate premature.

THE LIBERAL FEDERATION.

The Liberal Federation which met at Nagpur was attended by about 500 persons. Most of them came from Madras and Maharashtra. Few non-Brahmins even from these parts would seem to have taken part in the proceedings. There are no Mahomedan names of note. The Right Honourable Srinivasa Sastry delivered a long address which may be said to be a conspectus of complaints against the Secretary of State. The address leads but to one conclusion: that the reforms have failed and unless they are extended, there is no hope of success. Even Dr. Besant in New India expresses the opinion that the Federation's remedy falls far short of the requirements. She says that the Federation has missed its opportunity, adding that "the Federation contains many Progressive Liberals (!) but they are not allowed to progress"—she does not say, by whom. This admission, coming from Dr. Besant, will be regarded as providing confirmation of the misgivings of Congressmen as to the liberty enjoyed by Liberals, whether progressive or non-progressive. In one passage in his address Mr. Sastri extended a conditional welcome to the Councils to Congressmen. Having regard to the position of the two parties in the Country, the entry of Congressmen into the Councils would be the signal for the exit of Mr. Sastry and his friends from them. His offer of welcome, therefore, is an act of disinterested generosity which must be understood to be appreciated. The weakness of the position of the Liberal Party has been clearly exposed by Mr. M. A. Jinnah in a letter to the Times of India. In substance, he says the Liberal Party enjoys official positions but has no official authority. It can give no undertakings to the electorate which distrusts it. "Working the Councils," unless it brings some tangible good to the people, may be an entertaining pastime, but it contains no serious appeal to the country.

THE KHILAFAT CONFERENCE.

An esteemed Mahomedan friend, opposed to Non-Co-operation, wrote to us in a private letter a few weeks ago that he was obliged to confess that Hakim Ajmal Khan, Dr. Ansari and Moulana Mazharul Haque were the three most statesmanly leaders among Mahomedans in India at the present day. Dr. Ansari's suggestion about a National Pact in the course of his presidential address to the Khilafat Conference at Gaya, is a valuable one which ought to attract widespread attention. Apart from the Presidential address, the proceedings of the Khilafat Conference contained no contribution to Indian national problems. The Khilafat question has undergone a radical change owing to Mustapha Kemal Pasha's successes, and the Lausanne Conference is engaged in determining the final terms of peace with Turkey. That they should be fair and just and such as to give Turkey full scope for her national development, is the desire of all India, and the Khilafat Conference was perfectly right in insisting that the British Government should do everything in its power to ensure such terms. But it is not reasonable for the Conference to ignore all Indian questions because of the inconclusive deliberations at Lausanne. The only assistance that the National Congress received from a Moslem organisation at Gaya was of an embarrassing character. A Council of Ulemas, or theologians of Islam, met and decided that entry into the Legislative Councils was inconsistent with or forbidden by Islam. The Subjects Committee was detained for several hours while Mahomedan speakers debated whether this resolution was a fatwa or a mere expression of opinion, how many first class Ulemas voted for and how many who voted against the resolution were second or third class Ulemas. How can it be expected that the Congress should take note of Ulemas' decisions which are not accepted even by large sections of the Mahomedan community? Despite the Ulema's opinion or fatwa, no Mahomedan seats in the Councils have been vacated, and nobody expects that at the next elections Mahomedan candidates will not be forthcoming to fill those seats. To demand that the Congress should bend to the dictation of Ulemas, as was done by some speakers, was extremely unreasonable. For our own part, we do not recognise the authority of any priest in religion or politics, and we must resent the irruption of theologians into politics of the rudiments of which they are utterly ignorant. Some of those who are most anxious to conciliate Mahomedan sentiment wondered if this was the price that had to be paid for it. (To be Continued.)

Landlordism and Reaction: We reproduce the following from a recent issue of the Bengalee of Calcutta, the organ of the Bengal Liberals: "In a speech recently delivered by the Maharaja of Darbhanga, at a meeting of the Bengal Landholders' Association at Calcutta, the Maharaja of Darbhanga tried to controvert the general impression that, as a class, the landlords of India were a reactionary lot of men. Politically, the Maharaja is right; for certainly the landlords of India have given very loyal and enthusiastic support to the new scheme of reforms. Nor can there be any doubt of their attachment for British connection with India, and their desire to march forward towards our goal as an equal partner of the British Commonwealth. But, at the same time, it must not be overlooked that, as a class, the landlords of India have stood against free and primary education, against the removal of untouchability in Hindu social hierarchy, and, above all, against the fusion of the different elements of Indian life, by matrimonial alliances, into a homogeneous nationhood. Nor have this class of men, it must be confessed, excepting a few zemindars like the Maharaja of Kasimbazar, given much thought and attention to promote the general welfare of the country, and the particular conditions of their tenantry. If even ten per cent of the landed aristocracy in India had spent half as much as what the Maharaja of Kasimbazar has spent during the last twenty years to promote the cause of education, sanitation and industries, to encourage literature, science, and fine arts, including music, painting, and sculpture in this province, probably they would have still remained, as they had remained for so many past generations, the 'natural leaders of society'. Unfortunately, it is the intensive culture of their own self-interest, the neglect of the interests of their own country and their tenantry, and the life of detachment they generally live that have set Indian society against them. Cannot the Maharaja of Darbhanga see his way to put his house in order?"

OUR NATIONAL TONGUE, I.

A PLEA FOR HINDUSTANI.
(BY MR. HAFIZUR RAHAMAN.)

None can deny that national solidarity is the great remedy for all our evils. To-day India needs the organisation of her different communities in a socio-political brotherhood which is the best guarantee for our internal and external peace and prosperity. Religious unity among ourselves, though highly desirable, is neither possible nor is an essential of modern nationalism. Besides, its importance will diminish to a considerable extent with the growth of catholicity of mind and the consequent decline of insane religious orthodoxy which is a bane on humanity. The question arises then : what are the means to secure the much needed national solidarity? There are a thousand means to gain this object, but none is more proper and effective than the introduction of a common language into India which can serve as a lingua franca for the whole country. This is not an abrupt-statement but a conclusion based upon historical facts and the far-reaching effects of language on civilisation.

A common language affords a basis of mutual intercourse and free communication of ideas between two persons. Similarly, when two tribes, races, or nations meet together for the first time in peace, a common language is the only stepping-stone to their future relations. The history of every country in the world gives ample proof of how a common language has blended varied sections of the world population into a united whole, and has given their life a national aspect. The same has happened in India; and the revolutionary effects of Persian and English on Indian life are too well-known. It would be sheer ingratitude, if we do not put here on record our indebtedness to these two languages for enabling India to become more and more national in the modern sense of the word. The revival of Persian as the common language of India is out of the question. Much our Europeanised Indians may delightfully chat in English and put forward their fashionable proposal of making it a common language for India. The proposal, however, loses all its weight when we consider the difficulty and the time required to popularise a foreign language. Look at the Census of India (1911) in which only 0.5 per cent of the total population of India returned as literate in English, while the Census of 1921—though the Indian year Book 1922 mentions no exact figure as to the increase in this percentage—brought the number of Indians literate in English hardly to 1 p. c. of the total population of the country. English therefore, has little hope of being the common language of India. Now, it is said that there are one hundred and forty-seven distinct languages spoken in India. Of these there is only one language, viz, Hindustani, which can possibly become some day the recognised lingua franca of India. But, what is Hindustani?

Modern Indo-Aryan languages are divided into three groups: the Middle, the Intermediate, and the Outer group. The language of the Middle group is known as western Hindi and the tract to which it belongs consists of the Gangetic Doab and the country extending, roughly speaking, from the Eastern Punjab to Cawnpur. To the west and east of this tract are three spheres of Punjabi and Eastern Hindi respectively—both Intermediate languages. The languages of the Outer group are Sindhi, Rajasthani, Bihari, and Marathi. Western Hindi could not reach Sind on account of the intervening Desert of Thar but due south-west it expanded to Gujarat where under the form of Gujarati it broke the continuity of the language of the Outer group. Western Hindi has got four main dialects: Bundeli of Bundelkhand, Braj Bhasha of Muttra, Hindustani and Bangaru of the country to the west of the Upper Gangetic Doab. Thus, Western Hindi forms the nucleus of the modern Indo-Aryan languages of India. It is from Western Hindi that our Hindustani is derived. Hindustani, therefore, is an Indo-Aryan dialect whose home is the tract comprising the Gangetic Doab and what is now called the Delhi Province. Again, Hindustani has many recognised varieties of which by far the most important are Hindi and Urdu of today. Urdu and Hindi are, therefore, one in origin. They are the two forms of Hindustani as the sequel will tell us. The Europeans call Urdu by the name of Hindustani, but this is a wrong English nomenclature. According to the latest discoveries, Hindustani is an actual living dialect of Western Hindi and not a mongrel-pigeon form of speech. It is the direct descendant of Saurasine Prakrit and has existed for centuries in its present home. Hindustani was the natural language of the people in the district of Delhi most of whom resorted to bazar from which it went to the Mogul Camp and was subsequently spread all over India as far as the influence of the Mogul Empire reached. This 'Camp language' or Urdu stamped later on by Persian and Arabic words has ultimately become the modern Urdu. Born with the advent of Mogul rule in India, the growth of Urdu was given an impetus in the days of Akbar and Shah Jahan when the Mogul Empire was at its zenith and the tolerant policy of these rulers attracted towards Delhi men of different castes, creeds, and languages who needed a common dialect which could form the vehicle of mutual intercourse. Up to the end of the 18th century Urdu remained the most influential form of Hindustani and was used only in poetry. Urdu prose took its origin in the English occupation of India and the need for text books for the college of Fort William which was founded at the commencement of the 19th century. 'The Hindi form of Hindustani was invented simultaneously with Urdu prose by the teachers at Fort William. It was intended to be a Hindustani for the use of Hindus and was derived from Urdu by ejecting all words of Persian or Arabic birth, and substituting for them words borrowed from Sanskrit or derived from the old primary Prakrit' (Encyclopedia Britannica). The foregoing statements decidedly prove that Urdu poetry, Urdu prose, and Hindi as a whole are three children of the same mother, Hindustani; although Urdu prose and Hindi are twin-born. From the dawn of the 19th century up to the present day Hindi and Urdu are progressing on their own lines. This is the whole history of Hindustani in a nutshell.

The language which is recommended here as the lingua franca of India is neither Urdu nor Hindi which are only the two important species of the genus, Hindustani, the would-be common language of India. Simple Urdu without much of Persian and Arabic words in Hindustani proper and simple Hindi without Sanskrit bombast is also proper Hindustani. This proper Hindustani is the very language which should be adopted as the common language of India.

THE POET'S TOUR IN SOUTH INDIA, I.

(By Mr. N. LAKSHMANAN.)

The transcendental thought of the Aryan, by its marriage with the emotional and creative art of the Dravidian, gave birth to an offspring, which was neither fully Aryan, nor Dravidian but Hindu.... And by reason of this dual strain in its blood, whenever Hinduism has failed to take its stand on the reconciliation of opposites—which is its essence—it has fallen a prey to incongruous folly and blind superstition.—

RABINDRANATH TAGORE.

The Poet has completed his South Indian tour in two journeys, the one undertaken during the April vacation of 1919 and the other during the September vacation of 1922. As a member of the small travelling party, on both these occasions, I have much pleasure in writing to the Reformer a short account of the tour. Wherever necessary, I have freely quoted from other sources and, in particular, the Modern Review which is aptly called a mirror of the Poet's activities especially as prose-writer and travelling lecturer.

When, three years ago, his Secretary, Professor Andrews, wrote to me that I was counted as one of those who would help to make the Poet's visit to South India a success, it was indeed a generous invitation which I could have never foreseen when, for the first time, at Calcutta—in that historic year of 1911—I had my darsan of the Acharya of the Adi Brahma Samaj who, seen among other stars of the first magnitude, shone as the foremost living representative of the Indian Renaissance:—

“Bliss was it in that dawn to be alive,
But, to be young, was very Heaven.”

Nay, more: His popular song—“East and West stand side by side wearing the garland of love” helps me to go a step further and say, with one of his well-informed admirers in the South, that like his namesake in the sky, Ravi Babu, has from his very childhood, cultivated the spirit of internationalism and tried to realise the dream of the future.

And it goes without saying that when I followed the sweet singer of Sivam, Shantam, Advaitam, from place to place in the South, I did so with the humility of those tiny little squirrels that tried to help in the construction of the bridge for Sri Ramachandra's passage into Lanka. It filled my heart with joy when, three years later, I found that my attitude of humility was cast into the shade by the spontaneous welcome offered to the beloved son of Maharshi Devendranath Tagore by my Brahma brethren of the village near Coimbatore. The Agricultural College, in the vicinity, had been already inspected by the Poet's son-in-law, Babu Nagendranath Gangulee; and in the first tour the Poet had confessed to me his own disappointment at the enforced omission to meet the villagers of the South in their own sylvan homes. And, as it happened, this unique village of Vattamalai was the first of its kind in all South India to offer its homage to the Poet of Humanity and its humble mite to the Visvabharati fund.

In all ages, village life has its own fascination for the Indian mind. And suffice it to make a passing reference to the Poet's fondness for the peasant folk—a fondness which powerfully reminds one of his worthy contemporary, Tolstoy—and his never-failing interest in the welfare of the “big, helpless, infantile children of Providence” as he knows them to be. He has also been compared to Shelley. “Both aristocrats by birth, both have never accepted their heritage of social superiority,” says Mr E. T. Thompson. But, unfortunately, in Bengal—as Mr. Thompson has recorded—and in the South—as I now see, some of the Poet's “own country—men have been content to grumble” and their pet prejudices die hard. However, the others, it would seem, have fully understood the meaning of his profound advice. “If nobody follows thee, go thou forward, alone.”

It was an agreeable surprise to many in the South to be told that his International University founded on the December 22nd, 1921, has also got a School of Agriculture and Village Economics at Surul, which is within walking distance of the Asram. This single fact is enough to disarm the vain criticism made at the Madras Beach meeting. “For whom is the culture and for whom are the international universities? Where will you build those universities? On the grave-yard of your brothers, on the skeletons, will you lay the foundations of your international universities?” This rhetoric apart, what do we find? In bare outline, the aim of the unpretentious School is to gain the confidence of the village cultivators by showing a kindly interest in everything connected with their existence and a kindly effort to help them in solving their most pressing problems. Along with this, a study of village conditions is undertaken. The students of the Agricultural School are trained to do everything with their own hands and to gain a practical experience of the best methods of cultivation. Carpentry and smithing, weaving and tanning, are taught. Instruction is also given in hygiene, drainage, sanitation and co-operative methods.

Rabindranath has thus always been keenly alive to the fact that, to quote his words:

Civilisation will fall to pieces if it never again realises the spirit of mutual help and the common sharing of benefits in the elemental necessities of life..... Our centre of culture should not only be the centre of the intellectual life of India, but the centre of her economic life also.... Its very existence should depend upon the success of its industrial activities carried out on the co-operative principle which will unite the teachers and students and villagers of the neighbourhood in a living and active bond of necessity.... In such an atmosphere students would learn to understand that humanity is a divine harp of many strings, waiting for its one grand music. Those who realise this unity, are made ready for the pilgrimage through the night of suffering, and along the path of sacrifice, to the great meeting of man in the future, for which the call comes to us across the darkness.

Rabindranath is no doubt an ideal traveller, but this roving life burdened with a "begging mission" tires him beyond words. And no wonder he often longs for "his lost universe of an easy chair, watched over by its guardian angel, Sadhucharan." It has been said that Poet is a Poet and it is hard to fix time and space to such a mind as his. He himself knows this and asks: "To-day, life is nowhere normal in this world. The atmosphere is swarming with problems. Singers are not allowed to sing; they have to shout messages. But, my friend, is my life to be one perpetual polar summer, an endless monotony of a day of lidless light, of ceaseless duties, with never a night of stars to open before my vision the gateway of the Infinite?" Prompted by a compelling sense of duty, and in spite of old age and failing health he has emerged, not once but twice, out of the amlaki groves of his Tapovana to complete the pilgrimage to the South. Thus, on the one hand there is the "grand music" and on the other, "the night of suffering." And to-day or to whom, then, shall we bow the head? To which god shall we offer oblation." This is the central problem put in a nutshell.

The Poet's visit to Father Muller's Homeopathic Dispensary at Mangalore revealed to the South Indian public his partiality for the German system of medicine. After this rather unexpected publicity, his admirers were not content with his spiritual ministry alone, but on rare occasions expected him to cure their own malady. And the medicine was freely given, whenever asked for. At least one such case came under my notice. It is remarkable that in the matter of taking care of his health, without the aid of a medical adviser, the Mahakavi is just like the Mahatma who has published his indigenous "Guide to health", a welcome contrast to Vivekanand and Gokhale whom, by their attitude of indifference to the laws of health, the country had to lose in their very prime.

In another place, at a public meeting, the Poet was emphasising the need to cultivate the spirit of acceptance, and not that of rejection. This time the truth was illustrated from his own personal experience of post-war Germany.

When I was resting alone in my room, in the hotel at Hamburg, timidly there entered two shy and sweet German girls, with a bunch of roses for their offering for me. One of them, who spoke broken English, said to me, "I love India." I asked her "why do you love India." She answered "because you love God." Germany appears now to have set out on a voyage of spiritual adventure. And in spite of her dire poverty, she is not thinking merely of the spinning wheel or of some new move in the political game of gambling but rather of the achievement of that inner freedom, which gives us power to soar above the vicissitudes of circumstances ... Europe is a child, who has been hurt in the midst of her game. She is shunning the crowd and looking out for her mother. And has not the East been the mother of spiritual humanity, giving it life from its own life?

On another occasion when the Poet was about to finish his illuminating exposition of the Ramayana and when his dutiful Secretary, Mr. Andrews, slowly and silently ascended the platform by emerging out of the spell-bound audience, stood for a while at a respectable distance and then approached his Guru seated alone, an admiring student seeing this large-hearted Englishman in person for the first time exclaimed: "ah! Look! How he stands like Hanuman himself before Sri Ram". Be it remembered Hanuman is worshipped as Anjineyar by many Hindus, even today. For my own part, however, it dawned on me slowly that all along Mr. Andrews remains as the basic type of an Englishman and as the latest and best exemplar of Swami Vivekananda's observation that the greatest achievement of the English was 'that they had known how to combine obedience with self-respect'. And yet his Guru-Bhakti is only equalled by that of such Westerners as Hammargreen of Sweden for Raja Ram Mohan Roy or Sister Nivedita of Rama-Krishna Vivekananda. It is no wonder that he has puzzled Mrs. Sarojini Naidu by his bold statement that he derived his inspiration both from the Mahatma and the Mahakavi, "The Diastole and Systole of the Indian Heart"—to quote the classic words of the Reformer.

Again and again, Mr. Andrews has said that he is not a politician, who deals with methods, but a thinker, who deals with ideas. So it is my firm conviction that he, as an ardent educationist, has once for all changed the angle of vision of the keen-witted young men of the South, for he has taught them, by precept and practice, his hardly-brought wisdom that "the political motive and the social motive when separated from the highest motive of all—the search for the Infinite Truth,—are vanity and vexation of spirit."*

Just after replying in fitting and eloquent terms, to the very touching address of welcome presented to him by the enlightened young men and young women of Trivandrum, Mr. Andrews told me that he always returned from such student gatherings happier than when he left for them.

THE PRESENTATION OF CHRISTIANITY TO INDIA.

(BY THE REV. H. C. READ.)

The world to-day—and of all countries India not least—is in upheaval. The habits of thought, the social customs, the political ideals of the past are undergoing radical transformation. In the sphere of morals and religion, the working of the same revolutionary spirit is apparent. The accepted dogmas of the past are criticised, their truth is questioned and the religious sanctions of a past generation are in many cases thrown to the winds. And that is not all. Even the moral standard is assailed. Every day sees an increase in the number of those who deliberately call black white, and in place of truth with some falsehood.

To all would-be religious or social reformers such a state of affairs has caused deep distress. Social reformers have re-doubled their efforts to combat the rising tide of reckless immorality. Religious leaders have re-examined the truths by which they live, and endeavoured, without any sacrifice of essentials so to re-present them to this new world, as that they will find acceptance, and bring to restless, seeking soul spiritual power and peace.

This is as true of Christianity as it is of Hinduism. In England and other Christian countries sustained efforts are being made to re-interpret Christian truths in a manner that will at once satisfy the intellect and appeal to the aspirations of the rising generation. The same attempt is being made by Christian missionaries in India, and the other countries in which they are at work. It should be of interest, therefore, to religious men and women in India to know the aim and content at the present day of the best Christian propaganda work in this country. For many who are sincerely interested in Christianity, such information is difficult to obtain, and as a result there is to be found, in otherwise well-informed circles, serious misapprehension as to the essential meaning and implications of the Christian Religion.

Something may be done, even in a few short articles, to supply this need, or at least to enable the readers of this journal to gauge how far the essential spirit of Christianity is alien from, and how far it is congruous with, the religious genius of India.

The first difficulty with which the Christian missionary has to contend is the deeply-rooted idea—and under the circumstances it must be admitted, a not unnatural idea—that Christianity is a foreign religion. The keenest Indian patriots of to-day, the leaders of Indian life and thought, in very many cases just for this reason refuse even to consider the claims of Christianity.

But is Christianity a foreign religion? Let Indians face this question fairly and squarely. Christianity had its birth in an Eastern country. It is true that since that day it has largely found its home in the West, and that the Western nations have naturally in the course of time given to the body of Christian truth a Western dress and appearance, though even that dress and appearance differ in different countries. But in its essential genius the Christian religion is not Western. Neither is it Eastern. Its setting is Eastern. Its truth is universal, super-natural. It will be objected that Christianity is offered to the people of India in a foreign dress and by foreigners. That is no doubt true, and helps to explain the instinctive aversion which many of the finest Indian minds feel from it. At the same time, it is all the more a challenge to the religious genius of India, to disentangle the truth from its unattractive wrappings, and deck it out in an Indian dress for the reverent homage of India's sons.

There is a yet further challenge. It will perhaps be admitted by thoughtful men that the ideals of Christianity are the highest the world ever seen and therefore that it is harder to be a good Christian than to be a good Hindu or a good Mahomedan. To be a good Christian is hard. India to-day points the finger of scorn (so we are told) at so-called Christian Europe for its disastrous failure to live up to its professed Christianity. Let the failure be granted. What then? Lies there not herein a challenge to religious India? Of all the peoples and the world (the present writer as an Irishman must be allowed to except the Irish) Indians are accounted the most religious. And here is the religion that the nations of Europe have tried, and tried, most of them, to their own condemnation. The conclusion is obvious. Let India try it. Let India, the home of mysteries, of religious devotees and ascetics, take it and mould it, as to its outward form, according to her own peculiar genius, and it may well be that India will make such a contribution to the world's highest good, as is in the power of no other nation, Eastern or Western.

One further thought, for this too is included in the presentation of Christianity which the Christian missionary seeks to make to Indian minds. Indians as a whole are not satisfied with Hinduism. All that there is in it of beauty and moral worth, all that there is in it of imperishable value—they know better than any foreigner can ever appreciate. But it is not complete. Something is lacking. That something is assuredly not the devotion of its adherents (complaint of other countries). The defect is inherent in the Hindu system. May it not be that, without destroying anything that is true or beautiful in the old, Christianity may yet come into crown the edifice, and satisfy fully and finally India's religious aspirations?

Such are the considerations that the Christian missionary would always wish to place before the educated thought of India, before he proceeds to unfold as best he can, from his own Western standpoint, with his own Western limitations the deep mysteries of the Christian Faith.

A HINDU WIDOW RE-MARRIAGE.

A Secunderabad (Dn.) correspondent writes: In the evening of Friday, the 8th December 1922, there was celebrated at the residence of Mr. Baji Krishna Rao, B. A., B. L., Pleader, and a member of the Arya Samaj, a Hindu widow re-marriage the parties to which belong to a caste which does not permit such marriages, and hence the event is worth publishing as an act of practical social reform.

The parties to it were: Mr. A. Appa Rao Naidu, aged about 20, employed as a clerk in The Loco. Office, N. G. S. Railway, Secunderabad, and Sreemati Dhana Laxmi Amma alias Ethirajamma, aged about 18, widowed daughter of Mr. T. K. Ramanujam Naidu, retired School Master, Teachers' College, Saidapet, now settled down in Hyderabad. The marriage was attended by about 50 persons, both ladies and gentlemen, including several near relations of the parties and some members of their community. It is a significant sign of the times that the said relations and members of the community were not only present on the occasion to bless the couple but partook of the wedding dinner in the company of persons belonging to other castes.

THE NATIONAL SOCIAL CONFERENCE.

MR. JAYAKAR'S PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS.

The following is the full text of the presidential address delivered by Mr. M. R. Jayakar at the National Social Conference held at Gaya on the 29th December 1922:—

CONGRESS CONSTRUCTION PROGRAMME : A NEW ERA IN SOCIAL AND POLITICAL REFORMS.

I am deeply grateful to you for the high honour and privilege you have conferred on me by inviting me to address you to-day. By virtue of an unwritten tradition, the National Social Conference has always followed in the wake of the Indian National Congress. This affinity, the parent of which, according to all reliable authorities, was the esteemed pioneer of our corporate activities, the late Mr. Justice Ranade, was indicative of the wish of the thoughtful leaders of those times to avoid putting Social and Political Reform into two water-tight compartments or setting up barriers between them. They recognised that the National Problem has two aspects, one facing the Government and the other facing the people: that these two aspects had many common attributes and also the common purpose of humanising and liberalising the psychology of the people, in one case, through the medium of the Social organism of the community and in the other case, through the agency of the political institutions set up in the country. This affinity between these two aspects has passed through various vicissitudes and painful controversies. It was often denied, and not infrequently ridiculed, but in the era through which we are passing now, its foundation has been firmly laid in the people's mind by the hand of one of the most dearly-loved leaders, in what has been described by one set of political workers in the country as the "Constructive Programme" of the Congress. This programme proceeds upon the fundamental principle, on which far-sighted Social Reformers in previous times have often insisted, that goodwill among the various classes and communities inhabiting this vast Peninsula is the first asset of Social Reform. Owing to many historical and ethnological causes, race diversity has been for centuries the main problem awaiting solution in India from time to time. Other people in the world have solved it in their own way. Speaking generally, their solution has most often taken the form of destruction, in the sense either of religious conversion or physical extinction, notably so, in cases where the races juxtaposed were ethnologically different and could be graded as strong and weak. India, on the other hand, from the times of its earliest available records, has endeavoured to arrive at a more humane solution, based on principles of toleration and eventual assimilation. The Puranas and Epics of India reveal, to the critical reader, a fascinating record of such attempts, sometimes made in most uncongenial surroundings. No student of Reform, therefore, who is aware of this characteristic of our race and wishes to proceed on the lines of its continuity, can lose the opportunity of asserting this important aspect of our growth. Whatever the political Reforms of 1919 may have failed in achieving, they have at least accepted the principle, more clearly than any preceding State document, that there will be in future no politically dominant alien caste in India, constituted by reason of the accident of its birth or the colour of its skin. This may seem an obvious principle but what blood had to be shed for its acceptance by foreign rulers is known to the students of British Indian History. The solitary merit of the Montagu-Chelmsford Report, and in a much smaller measure, of the Government of India Act that followed it, lies in the circumstance that they recognize, however feebly, the principle that Government cannot be carried on through the agency of a dominating alien caste and that all such Government must be short-lived. The period of its duration, I make bold to say, will really depend on the sternness and persistence of our effort to do away with this superior caste, whatever contrary terms the preamble of the Government of India Act may employ.

GOOD-WILL BETWEEN ALL CLASSES : THE PRIME NECESSITY OF THE HOUR.

Good-will between all classes is, therefore, the prime necessity of the hour. Those who yielded at Lucknow to the claim of the Mahomedans for representation beyond their numerical strength were acting under the domination of this self-same principle. "Put the Moderates and Englishmen at ease"—this sententious advice of Mahatma Gandhi likewise proceeded on the same principle. The Resolution of the 11th and 12th, February 1922, shortly described as the Bardoli Resolution by Congressmen, accepts the same principle, in so far as it prevents the exercise of coercion by social boycott and lays down that in order to promote and emphasise unity among all classes and races and mutual good-will, the establishment of which is the aim of that political movement, a Social Service department should be organized, that would render help to all, irrespective of differences, in times of illness and accident. A note was added at the end of the resolution, enjoining on the followers of that movement the duty of regarding it as a privilege to render personal service, in case of illness or accident, to every person whether English or Indian.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF MAHATMA'S INJUNCTIONS.

I am aware that many have scoffed at and doubted the efficacy of this injunction in the domain of politics. I am also aware that in many cases the above movement, especially as worked by those who attempted to follow the great leader thereof, has shown inadequate capacity to respond to this wish of its promoter. But this injunction, to my mind, lays down the fundamental principle of Reform—Social as well as Political—as conceived by a true and gifted Indian, in whom the culture of his race had found its highest fruition. A true leader is often as a quick recording camera—noticing, recording, and perpetuating many phenomena, not at all apparent or very inadequately apparent to the common eye. When Mahatma Gandhi laid down this injunction he was freely responding to the genius of his race, and his claim to eminence can be rested with sufficient strength on the single circumstance that he has had the clearness of vision and boldness of outlook to accept this essential principle of Reform in a domain of human effort, which has often been associated with blood-shed and revolution.

MEANING OF SOCIAL REFORM.

The Bardoli Resolution, in my opinion, therefore, typifies the great change that has come over the definition of Social Reform in this country. It has now come to mean Social Service and Social Reconstruction, pervading all the categories of our national life. For a long time Social Reform was more or less a domestic problem of high-caste Hindus. Widow remarriage, female education, caste tyranny and such other problems, which had their significance mostly in high-caste Hindu life mainly engrossed its attention. Sir Narayan Chadavarkar, the General Secretary of the Social Reform Movement, in his message to the Amritsar National Social Conference in 1919 remarked:—

"After nearly a century of political and social work begun by our first political and Social Reformer, Raja Ram Mohan Roy, after varied experiences, diverse struggles, painful controversies and some sufferings, we have arrived at that stage in the lines of our progress when we are able to perceive, more clearly than ever, that Social Reform is the whole, of which the Political, the Industrial, the Educational etc. are but parts, and that these parts are inter-active and interdependant. In Europe and America when they speak of Social Reconstruction now, they mean all the categories of national life. The time has come for us, Social Reformers and workers, to enlarge the meaning and scope of Social Reform and extend our activity and outlook to such questions as education of the masses, the sanitation of the country, the housing of the poor, the care of the sick and feeble, the employment of labour on national lines, the provision of healthy recreation and amusement for the masses, village sanitation and rural education, instead of confining Social Reform, as we have hitherto confined it to Female education, Widow remarriage, removal of Caste restrictions and such other items.

WIDENED SCOPE OF SOCIAL REFORM.

In conformity with this view, the first resolution passed by the Amritsar National Social Conference declared that:—

‘Recognizing the fresh life opened out to the country by the new era upon which it is entering and the urgent call that that fresh life makes for the Social Reconstruction of India’s National life, the Conference is of opinion that the term Social Reform should be widened so as to comprehend, besides the items of Reform hitherto advocated by the Conference, those additional measures which are necessary for the development of the Industrial, Economical, Sanitary and Educational interests of the Indian people, in rural and urban areas.’

In its extended sense, therefore, Social Reform now includes the entire area of our national growth, as it affects the physical, moral, intellectual and economic well-being of the people. Its main field of activity is Social Service, irrespective of caste and creed. The attempt is at a reconstruction of the entire Society, so as to give full scope to the forces generated in our midst. In this entire scheme of Social Reconstruction, politics takes its proper place, as being only one department concerned with the collective activities of the State. The great feature of the present Nationalist movement is that its leader persistently attempted, while he was in the enjoyment of his liberty, to put politics on the basis of Social Service. The old and time-worn barriers between Social and political Reform he has endeavoured to demolish, as far as it lay in his power. The tendency in India has been marked of regarding Government as an establishment formed chiefly for the purpose of developing and exploiting the industries of the country, its coal and iron, forest and fisheries, hides and raw material. The peace and order of Society and the maintenance and protection of its resources and revenues have been regarded as its chief function. The altered definition of Reform as a species of Social Service and Reconstruction will have the advantage of our requiring, as the sole test of the success and efficiency of State institutions, the promotion of the Social welfare of the citizen and not merely the stability of the system under which his peace and security are protected. The object of Social Reform will, in the new era, be to insist that the promotion of the health and happiness of human beings shall be given the first place in the administration of the affairs of the country and that the raising of the average intelligence, efficiency, happiness and well-being in the country shall be the main purpose of constitutional Reform.

THE GOAL OF SOCIAL REFORM.

Thus Social Reform has come to occupy its true basis. Its goal now is to ensure a perfect heredity and perfect environment for the average man in the country. Its alliance with Political Reform is now firmer than before. That Society is an organism in which every part has a living relation to every other part is now the principal tenet in the working faith of the Social Reformer. He is no more a solitary worker, isolated or in hostility with his fellow worker in the political field. They are now allies. They can mutually help and co-operate. Their efforts supplement each other. They can often interchange their fields of action and relieve each other’s toil and burden.

SOCIO-POLITICAL ALLIANCE—THE FOUNDATION OF DEMOCRACY.

It is a great gain to the present age that this alliance has been effected and we ought to feel grateful to all those workers in the field of Social as well as Political Reform who have by their efforts continued to bring about this approximation. Reform will now be a reality and not merely a holiday excursion of the rich and educated classes. The poor and afflicted will now have an interest created in the concerns of our Congresses and Conferences. Already signs are apparent of this change. The stir in the country which usually takes place in the last week of December is no more a pleasure trip of the fatigued lawyer and rich businessman, seeking to renew year-old friendships in tents and hotels. It is now, and will grow more and more, a yearly pilgrimage of the poor and lowly as if to a Shrine where they will behold and listen to the voice of their own leaders, dressed in their costume, living in their camps, fed on their food, vocal with their language and brimful of their interest and welfare. Thus the foundation of a true democracy will be laid and the germs of a truly National Government take root.

THE AMERICAN ELECTIONS AND PROHIBITION.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

With his usual zeal for serving the liquor trade, Reuter telegraphed alleged news about the triumph of the ‘wets’ in the recent elections in America. The newspapers that have reached India during Christmas week show how far from the truth those reports were. Instead of a triumph the liquor interests suffered a crushing defeat relieved only by meaningless successes in a very few places.

It is true that Governor Edwards of New Jersey, who is an uncompromising wet, was elected to the Senate, defeating one who had supported prohibition. There were other issues involved in the election, however, beside the attitude of the two men to Prohibition. While the election of one wet Senator was hailed as a great victory for the liquor interests, nothing was said by Reuter of the fact that a good many Senators, who had opposed Prohibition, were defeated and that the dry forces are stronger in the Senate since the election than they were before. There has been a gain of at least three in the number of dry Senators.

It is true as Reuter telegraphed that in Illinois a greater number voted in favour of a proposition for the sale of wine and beer than voted against it, but it is also true, as Reuter did not telegraph, that the vote was meaningless as it cannot be effective because it is contrary to the National Constitution and did not have the status of law and also because the leaders of temperance sentiment, the Anti-Saloon League, the Churches and many of the newspapers advised the people not to vote on the proposal at all. Surely with the dries not voting, the wets can not fairly claim that they have won a victory, especially since they polled far less than half of the votes of those who took part in the election on other issues.

The real significance of the recent election in Illinois is to be found in the choice of members of the State Legislatures and the National Congress. It must be remembered that before the enactment of National Prohibition, Illinois was one of the chief liquor-consuming States of the Union. Before the ratification of the amendment to the National Constitution, there was never any indication that Illinois was in sympathy with Prohibition. The popular vote had never definitely approved it. Now, after a trial, the people of the State have elected a large majority pledged to support the law in both houses of the Legislature and have increased the number of dry representatives in the National Congress.

The voting in Chicago is most significant. This second city of America has always been a stronghold of the liquor forces but in the recent election, has voted dry by a large majority. Forty eight candidates were endorsed by the Anti-Saloon League after promising to favour Prohibition and to oppose all attempts to defeat the law. Of these, thirty four were elected. The Cook County (Chicago) Board of Commissioners is the organization most directly concerned with the enforcement of the prohibition law. For the first time in its history a majority of its members are in favour of Prohibition. Not more than five of the fifteen members of that Board are friendly to the sale of liquor.

The liquor interests claimed a great wet victory in the State of California. In fact the election there shows for the first time the conversion of that State to the prohibition policy. The State has been dry under the National Constitution but never before has the popular vote been given in favour of a direct prohibition proposition. In former years, in fact, the voters have always given a majority in favour of liquor. A year ago a State-wide referendum on the proposed State-enforcement of prohibition was defeated by a majority of 65,000. In the recent election the vote favoured State-enforcement by 40,000 majority. Another test of California sentiment was provided in the election of the Governor. The Association against the Prohibition Amendment put forward a candidate favouring the sale of wine and beer. The other candidate declared in favour of the strict enforcement of the law against all intoxicating liquors. The pro-liquor candidate was defeated by a majority of almost four hundred thousand.

Ohio was another battle-ground. This is one of the great States of the Middle West. It is frequently said as that Ohio goes the nation will go. The Association against the Prohibition Amendment made a great effort in Ohio and made the most confident predictions of a great victory there. They spent vast sums on propaganda. But the State voted overwhelmingly dry. The proposed wine and beer amendment was defeated by 187,000 majority. In a similar contest on a previous occasion the dry majority was only 29,000.

The effort to represent the victory of the Democrats as a victory for the wets has been severely resented by many Democrats. The fact is that in some states Democrats in favour of liquor were elected but that cannot be interpreted as indicating that the people are tired of Prohibition. The truth is that sentiment in the nation turned rather strongly from the Republicans to the Democrats but this was due to other causes than Prohibition. Take Ohio as a proof of this. The Democratic and Republican parties each nominated dry men for Governor. The Democrat was elected. For Lieutenant-Governor the Republicans nominated a wet man, the Democrats a dry man. The Democrat was elected. For Attorney-General the Republicans nominated a dry man, the Democrats a wet man. The Republican was elected. About the only Democrat not elected was the one who favoured a return to the sale of liquor. If there is any comfort in his for the pro-liquor people, they are welcome to it.

In the South there were several wet Democrats, members of the American Senate, elected six years ago. They were all defeated for re-election this year. It is believed that no Democrat, member of the National Congress or Senate, who was in favour of Prohibition, has been defeated by a wet candidate. The only possible explanation of the election of some wet Democrats against dry Republicans is that the country on other issues preferred the Democratic attitude to that of the Republicans.

J. WASKOM PICKETT.

THE MADRAS CO-OPERATIVE HOSTEL AT DADAR.

A correspondent writes :—On Monday, the 1st. instant, was celebrated the opening ceremony of the spacious new premises of the Madras Co-operative Hostel society Ltd., an institution which is the first of its kind in India and which was started a year ago with a view to provide decent boarding and lodging to the increasing Madras population of Bombay. Mr. J. A. Madan I. C. S., who was the Registrar of Co-operative Societies at the time the society was registered and who naturally wanted to see how it will succeed, presided on the occasion. Professor Kaji, a keen co-operator, delivered a very interesting lecture on "Distributive Co-operation" in the course of which he emphasised that three important factors were necessary for the successful working of any co-operative institution, namely, the need for its existence, loyalty on the part of the members concerned and earnest workers, all of which, he was of opinion, the Madras society possessed in ample degree as was evident from the splendid results so far achieved. Both the president and the lecturer complimented the Hon. Executive Committee of the society and expressed a hope that other communities also would take advantage of the example set by the Madras society and that the wide and new field for co-operative activities which this society has opened up will be thoroughly canvassed by those concerned. Many of the prominent Bombay co-operators were present at the function as also Madras in large numbers. The guests of the evening were treated to light refreshments, one noticeable feature in this connection being that the serving was done by the members of the society themselves, a feature which agreeably impressed the guests.

RECONVERSION TO HINDUISM.

The reconversion of Mr. F. G. Natesa Iyer and Venkatarama Iyer from Roman Catholicism to some form of Hinduism could not have taken our readers by surprise. It was a step long contemplated and thought of by the two gentlemen vitally concerned. Though as Christians, whether Roman or otherwise, we cannot but feel sad at these reconversions, we would point to one important advantage accruing to the cause of Christianity in India. It is this: the rigidity of the social system drives our believers in Jesus Christ if they receive baptism, out of the fold. Such reconversions to Hinduism, accompanied by some sort of ceremony will in the near future break down this orthodoxy and make it possible even for baptised converts to stay within their own community. We regard them as liberalising processes, and as paving the way for the socialisation of Hinduism. In this connection we would draw attention to a suggestion in the Indian Social Reformer that all Indians should call themselves Hindus, irrespective of their religion. That is how they are called in America, for example. We may then be Hindu Christians or Christian Hindus, Mussalman Hindus, Buddhist Hindus, Sanatanic Hindus, Saivite Hindus. This would cut at the roots of the process of division which the Census operations would perpetrate in India. By the bye, these wonderful Census operations are more responsible for those divisions than is generally imagined. The Census officer calls some class like Sourashtras non-Brahmins, and then a hullabaloo is pointed to as a sign of our endless divisions. Why not call everybody a Hindu and give him the title he wants?—The Christian Patriot, Madras, 16th December.

NOTES.

The Need for a Conference: The division in the Congress camp has, it is no exaggeration to say, caused great distress in the country. The difference of opinion on the question of entering the Legislative Councils, has been extended even to matters on which the Civil Disobedience Enquiry Committee were unanimous in their recommendations. Mr. A. Ramaswami Aiyangar, Editor of the Swadesamitran of Madras, in an important interview published in New India of the 4th instant, observed:

The Gaya Congress has ignored the Working Committee's resolutions passed during Mahatma's time and rejected the unanimous recommendations of the C. D. Committee to suspend all propaganda as to these two boycotts, and has again declared that the boycott of Schools and Courts must be maintained. In the next place, the Congress has adopted a resolution on Civil Disobedience which, if it is meant seriously, is a step which it was most unwise to take in the face of the unanimous recommendation of the C. D. Committee, a recommendation made upon a most careful consideration of valuable evidence as to the state of the country, and which it ought not to have adopted against the advice of such great leaders as Mr. C. R. Das, Pandit Motilal Nehru, Hakim Ajmal Khan and others, who alone by their knowledge, sacrifice, suffering and patriotism, would be fitted to carry forward a movement of even limited Civil Disobedience to any degree of effectiveness or success. But the fact that, in both these instances, as well as in the rejection of the C. D. Committee's recommendations advising No-Co-operators to seek election to Municipalities and Local Boards, it was Mr. C. Rajagopalachari who was a fully consenting party to the recommendations of that Committee, is of great significance.

Since the Congress dispersed, there has been further controversy which threatens to develop into a definite split. Such a development cannot but be a public calamity. Dr. P. Varadarajulu Naidu, who recently refused to pay income-tax so long as Mahatma Gandhi was imprisoned and had his property distrained in consequence, writing of the division in the Congress in the Tamil Nadu, warns both sides that "unless they call for a special session of the Indian National Congress as soon as possible and come to some common plan of action, no party will be able to fulfil its programme." If such a common plan is not feasible, an effort should be made to limit strictly the differences so as not to affect the solidarity of the national movement. The pronouncements made on behalf of the new party, again, show that the caution enjoined by Mr. Stokes in an article in the Tribune of the 9th instant, is by no means supererogatory. He writes:

Though we may accept the formation of a minority party in the Congress as a matter which should cause us no uneasiness, it remains to be seen if the particular party at Gaya will be beneficial to our national life or the reverse. As will be seen from the manifesto published yesterday the programme has still to be drawn up. Upon the character of that programme and the principles on which it is based, must depend the value of the new party. If those who are framing it determine to lay its foundations upon the bed-rock of stark justice and right, and to put before the country a programme of fearless constructive advance along clear and specific lines, a programme which will give a clear lead to the country and work for everyone, they will indeed render a service to India. But if they decide to follow a hand-to-mouth policy, to build it upon the basis of pleasing everybody without reference to sound and permanent political principles, they will make it a thing of no value. The country does not stand in need of vote-catching policies and quack panaceas but of an honest and truthful lead by men who are capable of facing realities, and daring enough to sacrifice popularity rather than principle. A programme framed in such a spirit by able and patriotic men may meet at first with less support than one less honest and more flamboyant, but ultimately it will rally the country around it as no other could.

It is a hopeful sign that, according to a message published last week, Babu Bhagwandas is collaborating with Mr. Das at Benares in drafting the new Party's programme. He moved an amendment, which was lost in the Subjects Committee, recommending Council entry with a view to carry out the constructive programme.

The Gaya Congress and Civil Disobedience: The Bombay Chronicle of the 9th instant remarked that we were under a misconception in stating last week that the resolution of the Gaya Congress enjoining the raising of 50,000 volunteers and 25 lakhs of rupees had reference to mass civil disobedience. The resolution runs as follows:

This Congress re-affirms its opinion that civil disobedience is the only civilised and effective substitute for an armed rebellion when every other remedy for preventing the arbitrary, tyrannical and emasculating use of authority has been tried, in view of the wide-spread awakening of the people to a sense of the urgent need for Swarajya and the general demand the necessity for civil disobedience in order that the national goal may be speedily attained and in view of the fact that the necessary atmosphere of non-violence has been preserved in spite of provocation, this Congress calls upon the Congress workers to complete the preparations for offering civil disobedience by strengthening and expanding the national organisation and to take immediate steps for the collection of at least 25 lakhs for the Tilak Swarajya fund and the enrolment of at least 50,000 volunteers satisfying the conditions of the Ahmedabad pledge by a date to be fixed by the All-India Congress Committee at Gaya and empowers the Committee to issue the necessary instruction to carry this resolution into practical effect.

We take the wording from the Mahratta of the 7th instant. The resolution as it is worded does not discriminate between individual and mass civil disobedience. On the contrary, the preamble which affirms that civil disobedience is the only civilised and effective substitute for an armed rebellion, would be more relevant if mass civil disobedience were intended than if individual civil disobedience were intended. The fact that a speaker so little addicted to unnecessary explanations as Mrs. Sarojini Naidu, should have felt the need to explain that individual disobedience and not the mass variety was meant, shows that the resolution is not so transparently unambiguous as the Chronicle thinks. Even as regards individual civil disobedience, while it is one thing for a person to disobey a law or order which violates his immutable rights of conscience, it is quite a different thing to enroll 50,000 persons with the set purpose of preparing for civil disobedience. We print the Chronicle's comment and a letter sent to our contemporary. We may add that the withdrawal, by the new Governor of the United Provinces, of the notification declaring the Congress Volunteer organisation illegal, on the morrow of the Gaya Congress resolution calling for Volunteers in imagined defiance of the notification, has taken the wind out of the sails of the notification.

The Gurdwara Reform Movement: One of the most impressive memories of Gaya during the national week is the attendance at an Akali Diwan. The orderliness and solemnity of the gathering were remarkable. A complete account of the Gurdwara Reform movement and of the Akalis is contained in a well-written book (English) of about 500 pages, published by the Desh Sewak Book Agency, Jullundur City, and priced Rs. three. The Akali movement as at present organised has done excellent work in social reform. It has totally put down drink among Akalis. The Akalis have given up holding nautch parties and have adopted a simple plan of life. They are doing their utmost to get rid of the curse of untouchability. They have taken to Khaddar, and it is very rarely that an Akali is seen dressed in any other cloth. We are told that in these and other social reforms, Akalis work through Panchayats in which they freely co-operate with Non-Akalis. Thus the full Bardoli programme has been adopted and is being carried out in right earnest by the Akalis. Women are taking an equal part with men in this remarkable movement. An old-fashioned Sikh happened to remark, before an assembly of Sikhs at the Akal Takht, that women should not be allowed to come upon the sacred Takht, as they did not show the same force of character as men. "As soon as these words were uttered," we read, "a host of women, old and young, wearing kirpans, came forward and demanded of the Sikh to tell them what the men could do which they, the women, who had received Guru Govind Singh's Amrit, could not do. They carried children in their arms and were not ashamed of being mothers." Some of them, we are told, in their zeal to work along with men, have taken to tying turbans. The Akali Jathas of Amritsar, Lahore, Ludhiana, Ambala and Nabha, it is added, are in favour of this practice.

Too much Home Work. A danger against which school-masters must guard themselves, writes the Educational Review, Madras, especially in the lower stages of instruction is the tendency to give too much home work to the pupils. It is a temptation which a teacher is sometimes not able to resist. It is an easy way of insuring that pupils do some work at home and the teacher probably has a feeling that it saves him much of his own trouble. In the case of girls in adolescence the danger is particularly serious. Sir George Newman, Chief Medical Officer of the Board of Education in England, has recently drawn special attention to the evil. He points out that girls in Secondary Schools are growing rapidly and at their age are very liable to defects of growth. Their conditions are much affected by over-pressure and mental strain. "There is no doubt," says Sir George, "that home-work and preparation for examinations tell very hardly upon many girls who are found in a neurotic condition and in a depressed state of health." Sir George Newman reports that 35 per cent. of the children coming to school at the age of five years bring with them physical defects and seeds of disease which give them a very bad start in their school-life. In India, we imagine the percentage should be even higher and the matter deserves even more serious attention. Another evil of even greater magnitude, is the practice of private tuition out of school hours. This is an evil to which children of well-to-do parents are especially exposed. No school is worth the name, the instruction given in which for five hours a day has to be supplemented by transgressing on the time which a growing child must have to itself. If closely examined, it will be found that one reason why wealthy people's children are so often stupid, is this curse of private tuition.

State Aid to National Shipping: Mr. S. N. Haji has published a very timely brochure setting forth the need for establishing an Indian Merchant Marine. He gives an account of the State aid given in Great Britain, France, Japan and the United States of America to their respective Mercantile shipping industry. Mr. Haji points out that the British India Steam Navigation Company has practically the monopoly of carrying mails along the Indian Coast for which it received during 1921-1922, Rs. 10,12,000, out of a total of about 13½ lakhs of rupees paid yearly by the Indian public treasury for the carriage of His Majesty's mail by water. In addition, the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, an allied organisation, receives annually from the Indian exchequer amounts varying between Rs. 6,00,000 and Rs. 7,50,000 as India's contribution towards payments for the carriage of mails from Marseilles to Bombay, Shanghai and Adelaide. He adds: "If these amounts could only be diverted to national shipping concerns, how quickly would an efficient Indian merchant marine evolve!" He has also drafted a Bill to give effect to his suggestions. The book can be had from the author, Hirji Mansion, Sandhurst Road, Bombay.

Science and Politics: In his suggestive address at the Science Congress held at Lucknow, the President, Sir M. Visveswaraya, lamented the apathy exhibited by the public in India towards Science. The fact is incontrovertible. But there is some excuse for it. Does Sir Visveswaraya know that wireless apparatus which are widely available as scientific toys by the general public in several countries, is prohibited in India and that when some persons imported them, the apparatus was confiscated? He should, therefore, recognise that those who concentrate on obtaining political freedom, are also helping the cause he has at heart.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, JANUARY 13, 1923.

THE NATIONAL WEEK.

THE INDIAN CHRISTIAN CONFERENCE.

The All India Indian Christian Conference held at Lucknow under the Presidentship of Dr. S. K. Datta, marks an epoch in the history of Christianity in India. Dr. Datta in his address wrenched himself free from the conventional idea of who is a Christian. He claimed, and rightly, that Mahatma Gandhi was the greatest Indian Christian. A Christian is not made such by birth or baptism. He is a Christian who lives in the spirit of Christ. The implications of this courageous claim are far-reaching. The Conference demanded the early release of the Mahatma on the ground that, apart from political views, his freedom was essential to the nation to guide it on the most secure path of progress. The autocrat Tsar saw the wisdom of letting Tolstoi go free, though his teachings gravely compromised autocracy. Cannot the British Government of India see that it is seriously handicapping the chances of conciliation by keeping the Mahatma in jail? The Indian Christian Conference passed another resolution for which it deserves the gratitude of the country. Following the Punjab Provincial Conference, it condemned communal electorates as anti-national and appealed to Government, the National Congress, the Moslem League and other public bodies to put an end to them as early as possible. These resolutions expressing, as they do, the determination of the Indian Christian Community to bear its share of the burden of national leadership, are very welcome.

THE NATIONAL SOCIAL CONFERENCE.

The National Social Conference was established two years after the Indian National Congress and since then has always held its sittings at the same place as the latter body. In 1921, the Conference was held at Ahmedabad and both Non-Co-operators and Liberals took part in it. No resolution authorised a departure from this long-standing practice. The National Social Conference was, therefore, held at Gaya, and it had in Mr. M. R. Jayakar a President in every way competent to guide its deliberations. We published his address in full last week, and it was worthy of the best traditions of the Conference. The attendance at the Gaya Conference was large, and included men and women from all parts of the country. The resolutions passed covered all the principal subjects and several of them were supported by orthodox leaders, which, of course, gave great weight to them with the audience. The large number of ladies who attended the Conference was a noteworthy feature. The social reform movement is now firmly integrated with the national movement, and it is impossible to think of reaction. Another Social Conference was held at Nagpur by the Liberals who attended the National Liberal Federation. It was presided over by the Hon. Mr. Paranjpye, and was a success. The Liberal Party had laid itself open to the charge of indifference to social questions, and it is gratifying to note that it recognises the force of the criticism and is anxious to give no room for it in future.

THE THEISTIC CONFERENCE.

Much credit is due to the small band of enthusiastic Brahmos who held the All-India Theistic Conference at Gaya. It is impossible to think of any time when the call on the Samaj was more insistent. Many of our national problems are really religious questions and can be solved only by men of deep faith. The opportunity offered by the great national gathering to proclaim the message of the Samaj founded by Raja Ram Mohun Roy, should not be missed. The Brahmo Samaj has been a success in that, though the number of its adherents are but a drop in the ocean of India's millions, its ideas have leavened the whole of our national life. In the uplift of the depressed classes, in the abolition of caste, and in the emancipation of womanhood, the Brahmo Samaj has been the pioneer. The earnestness and devotion of those who attended the Conference at Gaya, were most impressive.

THE HINDU MAHA SABHA.

The Hindu Maha Sabha was started a few years ago in imitation of the Moslem League. Unlike the Moslem League it had never much influence as a political body. Recent events, however, have revealed a far more important use for it, and Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya who presided over the Session at Gaya, gave a vigorous lead in the new direction. The removal of untouchability, the divisions among Brahmins and Non-Brahmins in some parts of the country, and the re-admission of persons converted, sometimes by force, to other religions, are some of the questions which the Hindu community has been called upon to face. The solution of these and other problems, it is evident, is only feasible if the community has a Central All-India organisation in touch with every part of the country. So long as it continues in its present divided and distracted condition, so long the Hindu community cannot make its contribution to Indian Nationalism commensurate with its position as the oldest and largest Indian community. It has a special duty in this country of ensuring perfect religious freedom not only for itself but for all other communities inhabiting India. We trust that the Mahasabha will not rest content with annual speeches, but will seriously set itself to work on the lines broadly outlined in the Presidential address and the resolutions passed at its Gaya session.

THE ALL INDIA SOCIAL WORKER'S CONFERENCE.

This Conference was held at Madras with Dr. D. N. Maitra as President. It represents the fast extending movement of Social Service. Dr. Maitra is one of our most distinguished workers. The Conference was well attended.

THE POET'S TOUR IN SOUTH INDIA, II.

(By Mr. N. LAKSHMANAN.)

The Poet's own experience in the South was quite similar to that of his Secretary, with perhaps this difference, that the students, on their part, did not always seem to appraise in full measure his authentic and delightful admission that the fountain of youth is hidden in his heart. He has personally invited many a student to go to his Ashram, learn to read his works in original instead of relying upon mere translations, to cultivate a genuine love for the mother-tongue, and, above all, to uphold the principle of the unity of races from a spiritual and not a political standpoint.

His appeal to the "grown-ups" in the South was naturally pitched in a different key. Three years ago, the Brahmin-Non-Brahmin cry was rending the air, and was passing through the fair land like a thunder-storm. And in the second tour the burning topic of the day was Non-Co-operation. Though, as a Poet, Tagore did his best to avoid entangling himself in the labyrinth of party politics, enough has been said to lift up the veil; and so once more, "his own countrymen have been content to grumble." Let us hope and pray that when the weary pilgrim should come to the South for the third time, he would be able to say with a sigh of relief: "This was the nightmare that once rode our land."

Meanwhile, it is worth remembering that Rabindranath has been a "fighter" all his life; and, it is sad to think that his "battles" are not yet over. He is not a "Mystic, with his head for ever in the clouds"; Mr. Rothenstein's pencil-sketch only revealed the "delicate and elusive" nature of the Poet's genius, but the un-failing chisel of Mr. Narayan Dewal has brought into bolder relief the "militant and massive" traits of the composite personality of the Seer and Reformer. Though three years have passed by, I vividly remember that day at Palghat, the gate of Malabar, where unfortunately he came across a glaring and cruel instance of untouchability. Burning indignation at this age-long social tyranny stirred his heart to its very depths on being further reminded by an ardent admirer of Vivekananda that the Swamiji, as a Parivrajaka or wandering monk tramping along the West Coast years ago, anathematised Malabar as a huge lunatic asylum. Rabindranath's righteous anger has found its vent in his Letters from an On-looker published in the Modern Review for July, 1919, i. e., immediately after his first tour. And as the fates would have it, it was only the other day that another great son of Bengal, Dr. Brajendranath Seal as president of the Mysore Panchama Conference, lamented by saying: "If only Buddhism had a stronger and longer hold in the South! Then, one may have the temerity to think, even the political history of the South, during the last five years, like its social and religious history for a thousand years past, might have assumed a different hue." Similarly, "you can never hope to build the miracle of political freedom on the quicksand of social slavery" is the compendious and timely warning by Rabindranath to the people of South India.

At the same time, the Poet has repeatedly asked; "Give me your culture, your scholars, and make Visvabharati truly your own"; and thus his appeal for men and money, for more men and money, has gone forth. To what extent and in what manner South India is going to respond to the generous invitation is a matter for speculation, and it is also too soon to judge. But, for his own part, the Poet has realised, more than ever before, how precious, and how beautiful is the simplicity of his Asram which, as he says "can reveal itself all the more luminously because of its dark background of material want. I know that I am harping on this one subject lately,—because my suffering is continuous and profound. My soul is being choked in this atmosphere. But it is my tapasya.....It is untruth which tries to decoy us with extravagance of materials. I earnestly wish we had power to create a tapovana, rather than to build up a University. But unfortunately, money though scarce may be available; but where is tapasya?"

It is, however, encouraging to think that the South to-day is not altogether wanting in men of tapasya. For, already, Tinnevely is suitably represented at the Visvabharati by its leading Sanskrit scholar, Pundit R. A. Sastri, late of the Baroda service. At Mangalore, the Poet was struck with surprise at the facial resemblance of the people to Bengalis, and was at the same time delighted to meet some earnest students willing to gather materials—from ethnology, folk-lore, rites and ceremonies and art-crafts including the relics of Jain places of pilgrimage—for a fuller and more detailed history of Jainism in the South. Explaining the conception of "Brahma-Vihara" to a local scholar, he regretted that, in spite of the labours of the pioneers like Prof. Jacobi and others, the sacred Literature of the Jains is yet a sealed book to the non-Jains, and is not allowed by its custodians to see the light of day. Similarly he is most anxious to recover the full historical perspective of Buddhism and it was for this purpose that he visited Ceylon hoping to obtain support from leading Buddhists and others in that island so as to form a centre of Buddhist culture side by side with other cultures at Santiniketan.

As while in Japan, so also at Ceylon, the Poet unfortunately found himself confronted with the imperious necessity to bring about an early restoration of the "Spiritual Commerce" with India, even as the railway engineer had to link Ceylon again with India, immediately after the recent storms and abnormal rains had subsided. The urgency of the task and the seriousness of the situation are obvious from the fact that even the younger generation among the so-called educated in Ceylon were still exposed to the contagion of the "English fever"—not to speak of the more dangerous "Delirium Tremens." And to quote again the Poet's own words:

Let me clearly say that I have no distrust of any culture because of its foreign character. What I object to is the artificial arrangement by which foreign education tends to occupy all the space of our national mind, and thus kills or hampers the great opportunity for the creation of a new thought-power by a new combination of truths. It is this which makes me urge that all the elements in our own culture have to be strengthened, not to resist the Western culture, but truly to accept and assimilate it. Have we not watched some modern Japanese artists imitating European Art? The imitation may sometimes produce clever results; but such cleverness has only the perfection of artificial flowers which never bear fruit.

Though days filled to overflowing with his onerous work as the Poet's Secretary, I found Mr. Andrews also busy writing and often saying, as Dr. Ananda Coomara Swami himself wrote and said years ago, that exotics have always an appearance of brilliant fertility at the first. But they have little permanent fruit. And yet, it must be said to the credit of Ceylon that, even today, there are honourable exceptions. The Buddhist Priests in the out-lying villages, some leaders of society as well as such students of Tamil Literature as Sir P. Ramanathan, Sir P. Arunachalam and Mr. E. S. W. Senathi Raju and others in Ceylon bid fair to enrich and extend the Renaissance in India.

Rabindranath has well reminded us that "the great ages of renaissance in history were those when man suddenly discovered the seeds of thought in the granary of the past." He is not perhaps a historian in the orthodox sense of the term, but he, like Dr. Seal, is a historian of the "artist" and not "artisan" type. Both have been able to warn us betimes by saying that to bring order and peace at the cost of life is terribly wasteful, whether in politics or sociology. Both have discovered that the later compilation of legends and historical records in India afford evident traces of suppression and distortion of facts, slurring over important events and putting wrong emphasis on others. And therefore both have taught us to "meditate from the heights of Universal History on the outstanding facts, engraved in India not on clay cylinder or triumphal arch, but on the ever-renewed tablets of human flesh and blood."

In this connection it is interesting to observe that the receptive, renovative and assimilative power of Hinduism is such that even in these evil days it has produced, from the "Indian thorough-breds of the soil" a Swami like Sri Narayana Guru. It was at Travancore, the Home of Sri Sankara—that the sage of Santiniketan, by the dispensation of Providence as it happened at Janarthan or modern Varkalai, met face to face the great spiritual preceptor of the Eshavas or Tiyyas of Malabar; and at once felt inspired by the thought that here was another Parivrajaka who, like the "Hindu, Jain, Buddhist" Parivrajakas of old and "those Shaivite, Vaishnavite, Tantrik Gurus belonging to a hundred Sampradayas unknown to the pages of history, granted diksha, initiation, to whole tribes and communities."

OUR NATIONAL TONGUE, II.

A PLEA FOR HINDUSTANI.

(By MR. HAFIZUR RAHAMAN.)

It is a well-known fact that almost all Europeans or foreigners who live in India for some time can speak and understand proper Hindustani, while to an average Indian it is intelligible. Proper Hindustani is spoken and understood all over India except the extreme south or the southern parts of the Madras and the Bombay Presidencies where the Dravidian languages predominate. No language but proper Hindustani possesses, therefore, the largest number of speakers in India. This is the strongest and the most unrefutable argument in favour of proper Hindustani to be the common language of India. Proper Hindustani being an Indo-Aryan dialect can be learnt easily by those who speak the allied Indo-Aryan languages. The speakers of the Indo-Aryan languages form the bulk of Indian population; because the Dravidian languages are confined to the Southern extremity of India, whereas the Indo-Aryan languages are spread all over the country. Hence, the majority of Indians, by reason of their speaking Indo-Aryan languages, can master the rudiments of proper Hindustani within a short period and without any serious difficulty. It is a common experience that the Bengalis, the Deccanees, the Biharees, the Gujratees, and the Sindhees learn proper Hindustani easily and very soon. Practically speaking, no other language in India enjoys the same advantages as regards popularity and the small amount of time and effort required in learning it; and these are the two most important essentials of a common language to be spoken by a country like India.

There are, however, a few obstacles in the way of proper Hindustani being adopted as the lingua franca of India. The first and the greatest obstacle is the tug-of-war which has been going on for the last so many years between the Urduists and the Hindustanis. The former want Urdu as the common language of India, while the latter wish Hindi to be the lingua franca of the country. The claim of both the parties falls to the ground if we understand the fact that Urdu with its rich Persian vocabulary and Hindi with its profuse Sanskrit words, do not possess those advantages which, as narrated above, go to make us advocate proper Hindustani as the common language. Besides, the Urdu-Hindi struggle is intensified only by a sectarian spirit which is bound to ebb as soon as the flow of a nobler and higher nationalistic sentiment sets in with full force and in due course of time. The second obstacle is the perplexing question: what are the characters in which proper Hindustani should be written? To invent new characters and make them current is an up-hill task which even the best philologist would not dare to take up. The only solution of the difficult question can be found in adopting both Urdu and Hindi characters. Proper Hindustani may be spoken as one language but it may be written in two different characters, if nothing bad and much good can come out of such an action. The suggestion is to write two parallel lines, one of Urdu characters and another of Hindi characters of the same language, proper Hindustani, in all Government papers; while in private correspondence any of the two or both may be adopted according to the needs of the writer. Again, there is much good in keeping the two characters. If we drop one of them, the Urdu-Hindi struggle may begin afresh with a renewed zeal. Considering the strength of both the parties and the legitimate desire of each to keep in touch with their sectarian love, by using at least the characters of their sectarian languages, it is futile to hope that any party would give way. Hence, to write proper Hindustani in both Urdu and Hindi characters will avoid a breach, however seemingly small, between those two great communities of India whose sectarian hooligans and rowdies (be it spoken to their shame!) are always eager to make much of a little issue. To use both the characters is to help indirectly the highly desirable and essential study of Sanskrit, Arabic, and Persian which store in them Hindu and Muslim civilisations. Proper Hindustani may not have at present any literary value; but once adopted by us as a common and national language, it will come to have far more literary merits than those possessed now by any Indian vernacular. Proper Hindustani, besides neutralising and nationalising the Hindu and the Muslim thought, will afford to the divided Hindu community through Hindi characters an opportunity to rear a common Hindu literature which will serve as a bond of union to the Hindus whose communal strength has been shattered to pieces by the curse of untouchability and the caste system to the great disadvantage of the national advancement.

These are the benefits which proper Hindustani as a common language is to confer on India. Since the inauguration of the Non-Co-operation movement the influence of proper Hindustani is fast growing. The meetings of the Nationalists have already begun to echo their eloquence and oratory in simple Urdu or simple Hindi. It is probable that our Congress may in the near future declare proper Hindustani as our common language and thus add to its strength. Let us then, hope that, as Nationalism triumphs over communalism and every department of Indian life is nationalised in course of time, proper Hindustani will be spoken in every Indian home as the common language of India and our national tongue.

LONDON LETTER.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, December 21, 1922.

THE NEW PARLIAMENT.

The first session of the new Parliament held its final sitting on Friday last. The House has not had much time to prove itself yet, but it has shown some real capacity for sound work, and the new Members have not found their jobs to be easy ones. The great and important work of this short session has been the signing and sealing of the Irish Constitution Act. It is interesting to remember that a measure born of a Liberal Member many years ago and thrown out of the House by successive hostile Governments takes its final and much more advanced shape from a Conservative Government. This fact shows, no doubt, that just as all life moves forward to fuller development and broader knowledge, Governments and parties are no exception to the rule; they either have to keep in touch with their day or go under.

LABOUR MEMBERS' MISBEHAVIOR.

Labour has been specially active in kicking and many disagreeable scenes have been witnessed; violent words and loss of temper have resulted in cries of "order, order". Possibly a great deal of this, which is not exclusive to any one party, will disappear as time passes. The new Members will learn that there are accepted ways of trying to accomplish things and that, until they actually hold the reins of Government in their own hands, they must comply with the code and behave accordingly. But these first three weeks give a taste of what the future is likely to be. However, the noisy part of the Labour Party is not taken too seriously, for the leaders know that if the present big section in the House does not justify itself during the ensuing years, it will have no chance at the next Polls.

TRADE-DEPRESSION AND UNEMPLOYMENT.

A very distressing sign of our present trade-depression is the large number of young people going to waste. During the recent short session, special questions have been put in the House in the hope of finding a remedy for this evil. The Minister of Labour stated that, in England and Wales, during the 13 weeks ended November 6th, there were 124,517 boys and girls below the age of 18 registered as unemployed. These figures by no means represent the total number, because unemployed juveniles between the ages of 14 and 16 do not come on the unemployed register at all, and tremendous numbers of these are unemployed or employed only fitfully. The school-leaving age being 14, and the compulsory hours of attendance at any educational centre after this age being very few, it means that a vast unruly army is being thrown upon its own resources, and drifting into idleness and anarchy. Youth is never quiescent, it is always active, and either creative or destructive, and, unfortunately for itself and the future, it has to depend entirely upon outside help for its development. If good help is not forthcoming, then its positive and active forces are spent in real harm. The boys often, for sheer excitement's sake, drift into revolutionary circles, and the girls, for the same reason, after being subjected to such a lowering of their moral standards, drift into a condition of mind where a life of evil becomes attractive. Government has been asked to urge Parliament to provide a sum of not less than £50,000 to provide grants-in-aid to the various voluntary bodies, either now in existence or which would, with this aid, come into being. It is hoped that, with such assistance, continuation classes could be held, both for further education and technical instruction, so that, until openings of employment can be found for them, the young people can continue to receive mental, moral and physical discipline.

LADY M. P.'S OPPOSE A REACTIONARY PROPOSAL.

A matter brought to the notice of the House in Question and Answer by Mrs. Wintringham and Lady Astor, is the proposal, owing to the condition of the local budget, to close down the Indian Hospital at Suva, and withdraw the subsidy in respect of the woman doctor, who has been doing such splendid work among the Indian women and children. This was one of the constructive proposals, when in Fiji some time ago, of Mr. C. F. Andrews, and, as the two lady Members of Parliament pointed out, the hospital and the services of the lady doctor were an asset to the Colony and not a liability. I understand that friendly representations have been made privately to Mr. Ormsby-Gore, the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, and it is hoped that, in view of the moral obligation lying on the Fiji Government, it may be possible to keep the hospital going and retain the services of the woman doctor. I understand that the Hon. Secretary of the Indians Overseas Association here has been co-operating in the matter.

AMERICA'S UNCERTAIN ATTITUDE.

Though repeated rumours keep coming from New York and Washington of some immediate grand American move in the direction of helping to settle the economic middle of Europe, not too much optimism or belief is shown about the matter. That something is being done on both sides of the water to try and find a path in which useful intervention from America would lighten the European gloom is recognised as true, but the whole position is so complicated that it seems as though Europe must herself find the remedy for her sickness, even if afterwards America helps to supply the ingredients for the medicine. According to the latest reports, America does not look at all like having a united desire to change its policy by taking a hand in European politics. We quite recognise here that President Harding's reported plan of a big credit loan to Germany is going to meet with a large amount of opposition in his own country; and that the greatest support will probably come from the radical elements in the Congress, not because of high ideals, but in the hope of helping to revive world-trade and so find a market for their products which at present are more or less a drag in the country. But just at the moment, we in Britain are so full of interest in the approaching festive season that high finance will probably be left to the few experts and enthusiasts, the rest of us will be busy over purely domestic trifles, and we shall neither be optimistic nor pessimistic over America, her possibilities and probabilities, until the Christmas season is over.

THE NURSES REGISTRATION ACT.

Owing to the desire on the part of duly qualified nurses themselves and the authorities dealing with nursing and medical work, an Act was passed in 1919, called the Nurses Registration Act. The register now being completed, the Act becomes law, and notice has now been given that anyone calling himself or herself a registered nurse after a certain date is liable, on a summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding ten pounds for a first offence and for a second, fifty pounds. Nurses hail this Act with joy, as it keeps their work on a professional level. Unfortunately, too often the garb of a nursing sister has been used as a cloak for evil-living. During the war, and in the early days afterwards, a nurse's uniform gave a woman an entry into many famous restaurants where a woman of an ignoble calling would not have been allowed to enter, and it opened to these same women a market for their only purchasable wares. So big a scandal did this become, that many qualified nursing sisters, at soon as possible, took to mufti for outdoor use. Now, however, all that will be altered. I understand that, under the Act, a person dressed in the registered nurse's uniform creating any suspicion of her bona-fides, can be asked to produce her registration certificate, and should she not be able to do this, enquiries can be made and for false representation a fine imposed.

LONDON FREED FROM SMALLPOX SCARE.

In London the smallpox scare has died down, not any new cases having been reported for nearly a month now. Probably owing to the thorough manner in which the case was handled as soon as the disease was discovered, a serious epidemic was avoided. A great deal of credit is due to the authorities for the prompt measures that were taken to prevent the spread of infection. A few hours after the first case was discovered in the Poplar Institution, a systematic examination of the Institution and its inmates was made and nine other incipient cases were discovered. Thereupon a plan of campaign was drawn up and put into immediate execution. All the patients then suffering from the disease were removed to an isolation hospital and everything was thoroughly disinfected. All the inmates were vaccinated, 1,090 persons being vaccinated in two days, all contacts were visited, and wherever possible vaccinated. In addition to these extraordinary measures, vaccination was pushed and hurried on everywhere. Schools and all likely harbouring places were kept under strict supervision, and thus, what might have been a serious danger, was averted. It is stated that the present outbreak could possibly be traced to Russia as there is a most virulent type of smallpox sweeping over that unhappy country.

THE THOMPSON MURDER TRIAL.

The result of the Thompson murder trial, when the wife and her lover were found guilty, without extenuating circumstances, of the murder of the deceased husband, was more or less what most reasonable had expected. But it may have somewhat unexpected consequences. According to the criminal law of England, both murderers have been sentenced to death, and it is generally understood that, irrespective of the result of any appeal that the condemned woman, aged 27, may bring, it is not intended that she will be called upon to pay the full penalty of the law. On the other hand, her guilty partner, aged 20, it is expected, will be hanged. The sentence has naturally raised several questions of the first importance. The first is whether public sentiment in England is not to-day opposed to the death sentence being inflicted upon women-murderers. The second is whether the woman should escape death, though she was by far the more guilty of the two, and her young accomplice whose hand struck the fatal blows should have to suffer the full penalty of the law. The third is whether, if the woman escapes, the man should not do so, too, seeing that it is against public policy to differentiate on grounds of sex alone. Women are naturally saying that either both should be hanged or both be reprieved. Probably both will be reprieved; but the real question, after all, is whether the death-penalty should not be abolished in all cases of murder, since their infliction cannot restore to life the dead and it is by no means proved that they act as a deterrent. This week, for instance, a single judge has sentenced to death three women and one man within twenty-four hours, and in to-day's papers no less than seven murderers are referred to. It may be that these matters must be dealt with by degrees, and if the practice can be established of reprieving women-murderers, the time may not be far distant when the death-penalty for murder may be altogether abolished.

LEAGUE TO ABOLISH CASTE SYSTEM.

JAT PAT TODAK MANDAL.

THE EDITOR, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

For over a quarter of a century every patriotic Indian has been feeling that caste system, in its present form is a great impediment to the progress of the country. Some earnest attempts have also been made to break its rigidity by the great social reform movements of Arya Samaj and Brahma Samaj. The work so far accomplished by these and other similar bodies consisted in ameliorating the condition of the suppressed classes and doing other kinds of propaganda work which mainly confined itself to speeches and writings. But very little has been done by the Arya Samaj and other bodies to break the citadel of caste system by the arrangement of inter-caste-dinners, inter-caste-marriages and other allied reforms which would go to the very root of the evil. These movements, instead of coming forward boldly and frankly to champion the cause of social reforms, have become part and parcel of the orthodox retrogressive Hinduism. The result has been that they have always fought shy of action and are gradually becoming caste-ridden.

This being the state of affairs, the conviction was growing among all well-wishers of Hinduism that unless some very extreme measures were taken to strike at the root of the caste system and thereby avoid its blighting effects, Hinduism was doomed to perish.

It is with this object of infusing a new spirit that (जट पत तदक मण्डल) Jat Pat Todak Mandal has been started recently at Lahore. The Mandal not only intends carrying on an intensive propaganda in the cause of social reforms but also do some practical work. It has already enlisted the sympathies of prominent social workers of the Punjab, headed by Bhai Parma Nand. Upto this time the following prominent gentlemen have responded to the call of the League :-Pandit Bhumanaud Preacher of the Arya Samaj, Pandit Parma Nand B. A., Shri Tirath Ram of Lyallpur, Shri Kanahya Lal of Ferozapore, Pandit Brahmhatt Vidyalkar of Delhi, Shri Sudarshan, Editor of the 'Panth' Pandit Chet Ram, Professor National College Lahore; Pandit Dharmendra B. A., editor of the Arya Mitra Pandit Vishnu Datt Vakil of Ferozpur, Shri Parma Nand, Coal merchant, Lahore; Shri Ram, Charan Lal, Vice-President, Arya Samaj, Lahore; Dr. Khan Chand M. D. and Dr. B. R. Dewan of Lahore. The League was able to collect fifteen hundred rupees on the very day when it was founded. Names of sympathisers and members of the League are daily pouring from all parts of the Province.

Such being the noble objects of the League, it becomes incumbent upon all lovers of social reform to give their active support. Efforts should be made everywhere to enlist members for the League. The League intends in the near future to call a meeting of the members to consider its future course of action. The work has already been taken in hand by some of our energetic members. We cordially invite public sympathy and support. Communications should be sent to the following address:—

AMERICAN APPRECIATION OF MAHATMA GANDHI.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Some months ago I read an Editorial "Ecce Homo" in which you spoke of Gandhi's influence, in "turning the face of India towards Christ." I immediately sent this paragraph to Bishop Fred B. Fisher of Calcutta who has been spending the summer in America, leading the Centenary movement here, for India and throughout the world.

Bishop Fisher has made extensive use of your Editorial, and I desire to commend you for writing it.

As Pastor of the Bowen Memorial Church, in Apollo Bunder, Bombay, we spent a few delightful years in India and are deeply interested in all that concerns her people.

We have a great admiration for Gandhi's passionate idealism and deeply religious concept of life. We believe that India will not be saved by logic, but by loyalty to idealism as found in Christ, and the fact that Gandhi has made India self-conscious, and has convinced her that she has her own interpretative message to contribute to the world, and has given a moral basis, and a spiritual understanding to India's life, is a mighty achievement for which the whole world can thank God.

Christ is, we believe, the fulfilment of every religious aspiration, that light that will complete and glorify every Hindu longing and desire. It is true of Hinduism and Mahomedanism as of Judaism, Christ "came, not to destroy, but to fulfil."

Again expressing my appreciation,

THE MOPLA TRAIN TRAGEDY.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In the Reformer of the 30th ultimo, reference was made to the acquittal of Sergeant Andrews and five Indian Policemen by the District Magistrate of Coimbatore. They were merely escorting the prisoners, who were put in a Luggage van. As the van was supplied by the Railway Administration, they could not imagine that the administration would give a van that was totally unfit for the accommodation of human beings. When they heard the cries of the prisoners from the closed van, they could not, it appears, realize the danger in which the unfortunate men were placed. The responsibility for using the van for the prisoners must rest with the Railway Administration, who had no business to use the van for prisoners without an authority of the Government Inspector of the Railway, who under Section 4 (2) b of the Indian Railways Act (Act No. IX of 1890) is required to inspect and certify all vehicles intended for the carriage of passengers. Was the Van No. 1711 so certified? If not, the Railway Administration must be held responsible for the use of the van, which has been declared unfit for the conveyance of human beings by competent Medical authority. The van is described as a Luggage van; it was probably designed for the carriage of Luggage. One hundred prisoners concerned in the Malabar rebellion were put in the van, which measured 24 feet by 8 feet wide by 7½ feet high, giving a floor area of 1.92 square feet or 1.92 sq. feet per passenger. The cubical space in the van was 1440 cubic feet or 14.40 feet per man. Under the rules laid down by the Government of India in the Standard Dimensions issued with their circular No. 1831, R. C. dated 13th July 1913, the minimum room required per passenger is:—

Minimum width of seat 19½ inches.

Minimum floor area 8½ sq. feet.

Minimum cubic capacity 25 cub. feet.

The accommodation given to the unfortunate prisoners was not only unfit for human beings but it was short of the minimum laid down, by 1.58 sq. feet per man in floor area and by 10.60 cub. feet per man in cubic capacity. Did the Knapp Committee or the Government of India notice these points? Or will they take due notice of them now, to prevent a recurrence of a similar mishap?

CHANDRIKA PRASADA.

Ajmer, 3rd January 1928.

A NOTE OF DESPAIR.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The momentous sessions of the Gaya Congress are over. It has failed to rise to the height of the moment. Great doubts were entertained about a split among the Congressmen on the much-controverted question of Council-entry, and it cannot be said that they have passed off. The no-change party has succeeded in its advocacy. Great men who raised great issues have been defeated. Men of minor ability have supplanted men of major ability. Sentimentalism has triumphed over reason; argumentations have failed; facts are flung off and far-sightedness has become a thing of the past. The country has been asked to tread the trodden track. It has been tried and found wanting.

Reaction is natural when the rigours of a step are unreasonable. Over-pulling has always terminated in a split. This is the natural law which can only be ignored at the cost of our country's interests.

The Congress was confronted with the same sort of confused conditions as it had to witness at the inception of the movement. At that time a far-sighted and practical leader was lying on his death-bed; and the nation felt itself forlorn.

This time the nation experienced the disadvantages of the Council-boycott and its mind was wavering between two alternatives viz., prestige and Council-capture. Albeit the soul of the movement has been shifted from the scene this time also. The nation has preferred the former to the latter of the two alternatives. Unexpected things always take place where confusion reigns supreme. Unwillingness to acknowledge the facts and sticking fast to once formulated views, however out of date they may have become, are responsible for baffling the wiser counsels of the Congress. Pious protestations of truth now sound like suppression of the same, but one day it is sure to assert itself. The nation is sapping the sources from which it inhaled its life-breath. One cannot kick out other Gods with impunity on account of one's overwhelming adoration of one's own duty. The nation has been compelled to do so and it will have to face the consequences if it does not rectify its errors.

Yours faithfully,
SARABHAI DALAL.

THE CONGRESS CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE RESOLUTION.

The Bombay Chronicle wrote in its issue of the 9th instant as follows:—A Misapprehension: "The Indian Social Reformer" is labouring under a misconception when it declares that the resolution adopted at the Gaya session of the Congress enjoins the raising of 50,000 volunteers and 25 lakhs of rupees to prepare for "mass civil disobedience." If our contemporary would look to the actual wording of the resolution it would find that not only does the qualifying word "mass" not occur in it, but also that what is contemplated by the Congress is not "mass civil disobedience, but as Mrs. Naidu puts it correctly, "individual civil disobedience of a very disciplined people." In the resolution under reference the appeal is made for 50,000 volunteers "satisfying the conditions of the Ahmedabad pledge," such as those of being pledged to non-violence, the wearing of Khaddar and so on. It is this very restriction imposed by the Congress that has created some dissatisfaction in Das-Nehru circles which would like the conditions of the Ahmedabad pledge to be relaxed very considerably."

The Editor of this Journal sent the Chronicle the following letter for publication:

To The Editor of the Bombay Chronicle.

Sir,

I am obliged to you for pointing out that the Civil Disobedience intended by the Congress resolution to raise 50,000 volunteers and 25 lakhs of rupees, is individual and not mass civil disobedience. I have, of course, read the resolution. While there is no mention in it of whether the civil disobedience is to be mass or individual, the preamble that "Civil disobedience is the only civilized and effective substitute for an armed rebellion," would seem to imply the former rather than the latter type. Mrs. Sarojini Naidu, I am sure, would not have entered into a superfluous explanation, had the point been as clear as you think from the terms of the resolution. Personally, I may add, I can not see much difference between mass civil disobedience and that of 50,000 persons individually offered.

I do not, however, wish to start a fresh controversy. I would much rather avail myself of the opportunity of your courteous correction, to appeal to all Congressmen to do or say nothing calculated to extend a legitimate difference of opinion into a definite cleavage. If I judge the position correctly, the idea of a separate party in the Congress is viewed with much concern and sorrow by the large mass of Indian opinion. No effort should be spared to compose the differences that have appeared, or if this is not possible, to limit them clearly so as not to affect the solidarity of the national movement.

I believe absolutely in the Bardoli programme, with all that it implies, as a sufficient and complete scheme leading to national emancipation, socially, economically and, as the necessary consequence, politically. I can accept no programme which does not emphasise it, much less one which minimises or ignores or is likely to obscure its importance. It is only as an additional means of giving effect to it that I favour entry into the Councils. Mr. Rejagopalschriar, Mr. Vallabhbhai Patel, Mr. Rajendra Prasad, Mr. Vijayaraghavachariar, and several others, are, as I understand them, willing to consider this if it can be shown that it can be done without detriment to the central principle of non-cooperation. I feel that this avenue to an understanding has not been completely explored. In any case, I think that the resolutions of the Gaya Congress require careful revision in the light of fuller discussion. I would, therefore, earnestly appeal to all Congressmen to consider if some sort of conference, formal or informal, should not be held with a view to discover a middle way and thus to avert a schism.

THE 2ND CLERKS' CONFERENCE.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The Second sessions of the Clerks' Conference will be held under the auspices of the Clerks' Union on Saturday and Sunday, the 20th and 21st January, Mr. Joseph Baptista presiding. The time and place of the Conference will be notified later on. As President of the Clerks' Union and as Chairman of the Reception Committee, I exhort every clerk serving in mercantile offices to attend either as Delegates or visitors and make it a success. A strong Reception Committee, representative of most of the important offices has been formed and a Working Sub-Committee has been hard at work and every attempt will be made to make the Conference as well attended as possible. Clerks wishing to work as Volunteers during the Conference will kindly write to the Secretaries the Clerk's Union, 128 Esplanade Road, Bombay. All correspondence should be addressed thereto. Tickets could be had therefrom on application, and will also be available at the door.

Yours faithfully,
B. M. ANANDA RAO.
President, the Clerks' Union.

THE PUNJAB VIDHVA VIVAH SAHAIK SABHA.

Reports of 67 widow marriages have been received from the different branches and co-workers of the Vidhva Vivah Sahaik Sabha, Lahore (Punjab) throughout India, during the month of December 22. The total number of marriages held in the year 1922 has reached to 458, as detailed below:-
Brahman 96, Khatri 112, Arora 110, Agarwal 41, Kaisth 20, Rajput 16, Sikhs 19. Miscellaneous 89. Total 458.

MEERUT.

The proceedings of the Conference commenced in the afternoon of the 28th Decr. 1922. Opening Speech was made in an eloquent and impressive language by Lala Hargovind Prasad Nigam M. A. of Delhi owing to the absence of President-elect. Next day B. Ratan Lall Sahab B. A. L.L. B. Munsiff, the Chairman of the Reception Committee welcomed the delegates and President-elect and delivered a very touching and interesting speech; afterwards Rai Sahib Lala Kedar Nath, Retired Judge and Founder of the Ramjas College, Delhi, the President of the Conference delivered his address. He described the condition of the Hindu Widows in touching tone and laid a great stress on the necessity of Widow remarriage.

The following resolutions were passed in the Conference.

1. Resolved that considering the present plight of Hindu widows of the country it appears to be essential that a Vidhva Sahayak Conference be held every year and that the Vidhva Biwah Sahayak Sabha Lahore, be requested to arrange for holding such conference every year.

2. Resolved that an All India Vidhva Sahayak Sabha be established and its aims and objects be as follows:—

(1) To establish Provincial, District and Branch Committees.

(2) To establish Widows' Homes, Pathshalas and Foundling Homes in places, where they are needed.

(3) To arrange for marriages of widows of marriageable age.

(4) To give pecuniary help to deserving widows.

(5) To publish such literature as to popularise the custom of widow remarriage.

3. Resolved that the Conference appreciates the services of those who have taken an active interest in the cause of widow remarriage and appeals to the guardians of widows of marriageable age not to hesitate in performing their marriages.

4. Resolved that the Conference shows its satisfaction at the work of the Hindu Widows' Home, Meerut, which has lately been removed to Delhi and appeals to the Hindu public in general, and particularly the Hindu public of Delhi to lend their help in making the said Home a permanent institution.

5. Resolved that Widows' Homes be opened at Muttra, Brindaban and Hardwar for the protection of homeless widows arriving there and that leaders of Muttra and Saharanpur Districts be requested to respond to this call of the country.

6. Resolved that people of all the various castes of the Hindu Community be requested to show humane and sympathetic treatment towards the widows and that the practice of marrying girls below 16, and men above 40 years of age be discontinued to secure a decrease in the number of widows.

7. Resolved that all communal and caste societies and other social Reform Associations do establish Vidhva Sahayak sub-committees under their control for the proper help of widows and arrange for the remarriage of widows of marriageable age.

NOTES.

A Political Parable. A correspondent writes: "Several years ago a small boy offered to tell me a simple method of how to catch lions. He said: 'You must begin by running away from your house, and sit in a cave lamenting your lot. After some time a lion will come to the cave limping. You should praise the lion's mane, enquire about his family, and then examine his feet to find out the cause of his limping. You will find that a thorn had pierced one of his forefeet. You should gently take out the thorn and this will relieve the lion of his pain. The lion will thus become your great friend and, instead of devouring you, will allow you to catch him and keep him as a pet in your house for your children and grand-children to play with.' One is reminded of this incident by reading the speeches of Dr. Besant and the Rt. Hon. Sastry—a curious combination—as to how to get Swaraj. The young boy took the story of Androcles and the Lion to be a treatise on the art of lion-catching. Mr. Sastry and Dr. Besant are convinced that the story of the English political evolution, as they understand it, is the road ordained by nature for obtaining self-government. English constitutional history, on the contrary, is of all constitutional histories, the least amenable to generalisation. It is neither scientific nor logical and are we to work on the assumption that we need be neither logical nor scientific in our political activities, because England was not? That way madness lies."

An Opportunity for Retrenchment: One of the members of the Bombay Executive Council is due to retire next month. A correspondent suggests that as a measure of economy his place should not be filled. As, however, there are two English members, who have yet some part of their terms to enjoy, and as it will not do to have one Indian member to face the two, he suggests that, if an appointment be made in Sir Ibrahim's place, it should only be till one of the two Englishmen drops out. This seems to be rather a grotesque reason for continuing a superfluous, high-paid job. Experience has shown that the reason for which two Indian members were supposed to be necessary so long as there were two Englishmen in the Council, has not had much significance at any rate in Bombay. On the other hand, an Indian member has sometimes gone farther than any previous English member had ventured to do, in defying well-established conventions relating to the freedom of public life and the non-political character of the Civil Service. We are unable to think that the character of the Government of Sir George Lloyd will be affected by the presence or absence of any Member or Minister in it, Indian or Englishman. We think, therefore, that there is no need to wait till the retirement of Mr. Hayward or the other English member to abolish the place which Sir Ibrahim will vacate. The Presidency will have an immediate, certain saving of a lakh of rupees, the estimated cost of each member.

Legislative Councillors' Allowances: With reference to our comment on Lord Inchcape's statement at the St. Andrews' Dinner, that he received no allowances when he was a member of the Indian Legislative Council, a friend sends us the following article from the old Civil Service Regulations: "A non-official Additional member of the Council of the Governor-General for making Laws and Regulations who has to leave his ordinary residence and reside at Calcutta...shall receive Rs. 1000 a month or part of a month during which he may attend the Session plus a sum of Rs. 1000 for travelling &c. provided that the total amount paid for any one Session shall not exceed Rs. 5000." The later rule under which they draw Rs. 20 a day during a Session came into force in 1911. When there was a Simla Session, the old Legislative Council member got another Rs. 2000 at least, so that he could get in all Rs. 7000 a year, and not Rs. 10,000 as we stated. Lord Inchcape would not have received any allowance for the Calcutta Session as he was a resident of that City. But the point is that, as compared with the old scale, the present scale of allowances is by no means high. Under the old rate, a member got Rs. 1,000 a month, while now he gets only Rs. 600. As for the travelling allowance, a lump sum of Rs. 1,000 was paid in the old days whether a member lived a thousand miles from Calcutta or only ten miles, whereas at present only the few who go from the farthest south will get that amount. We are mentioning these details, because we think it will be a serious mistake to cut down the allowances of the non-official members. Many of them are poor men, and their absence from their work for several months in the year cannot but seriously interfere with their ordinary income. When proposals were being formulated for the present Reforms, we urged that non-official members should be paid a salary. But those who then regarded themselves as controllers of Indian opinion, thought that the mere mention of it would put a new weapon in the hands of opponents of reform. When the work of Legislative Councils becomes serious, this question will have to be settled. If wealthy countries like America and England find it necessary to pay their members, it is absurd to expect India to possess a sufficiency of men who have the brains, the leisure and the money to be efficient members of the Legislature without any assistance from the State. The action of the Ministers in the United Provinces in voluntarily renouncing a fifth part of their salaries, has our appreciation.

The Indian Passengers' Traffic Relief Association: The hard lot of third class passengers in Indian railways and the indifference of the railway administrations to it have been receiving increasing attention from the public bodies. We are glad to note from the Report of the last five years of the Indian Passengers' Traffic Relief Association, that the Association has been working hard to get measures introduced to relieve the hardships of the travelling public. Although the response from the railway administrations and the Government to the several representations from the Association, was far from satisfactory, the Association has been very active in rousing public attention to this question. The Association was founded in 1915 and it has among its patrons several prominent public men of all political parties. The Association has also extended its activities to passengers by Ferry and Coasting steamers and Tramways in the city. The report says that the Association interviewed Railway officials, attended to the complaints of Indian passengers, carried on extensive correspondence with the Government, Railway authorities and sister societies, started branches in several important centres in the mofussil, arranged protest meetings and sent deputations to wait on the authorities to represent the grievances of third class passengers. It also moved the Indian National Congress held at Calcutta and several provincial conferences to pass resolutions pointing out the grievances of Indian passengers. The Association's Secretary, Mr. Jivraj Nensey, gave evidence before the Indian Railway Committee and the Deck Passengers Committee appointed by the Government and expressed the Association's opinion in favour of state management of Railways. The Association is of opinion that the Railway Board should be abolished and the Railway Department should be presided over by a Member of the Viceroy's Executive Council who should be an Indian. The colour prejudice is the worst evil of Company management and the Association has done well in illustrating this with facts and figures and also by comparing the high positions held by Indians under Railways managed by the Companies and those under State management. The Hon. Secretary hopes that those interested in the objects of the Association will contribute their mite for the maintenance and development of the Association. Enquiries and remittances may be addressed to Mr. Jivraj Goculdas Nensey, Secretary, the Indian Passengers' and Traffic Relief Association, 11, Bank Street, Fort, Bombay.

Congressmen and Municipal Elections: The Mahratta has a gift of sardonic humour one of the most recent exhibitions of which is the publication in the last issue of certain resolutions rejected by the Gaya Congress. One of these runs as follows:

This Committee declares that it is desirable for Non-co-operators to seek election to Municipalities and District or Local Boards with a view to facilitate the working of the constructive programme but considers that no hard and fast rules should at present be laid down to regulate or restrict the activities of Non-co-operating members beyond advising them to act in harmony with Local or Provincial Congress Organisations.

To understand the "inwardness" of this rejected resolution, it should be explained that it was unanimously recommended by the Congress Civil Disobedience Committee. The Committee gave cogent reasons for recommending it. But the Congress rejected it, the opposition to it being, so far as we can gather, on the same grounds as to Council entry. It is, therefore, puzzling to see that some of those who are strongly opposed to Council entry, are candidates for election to the Bombay Corporation on the 29th instant. We wish some of them and especially the ladies, success, but obviously Congress exegesis is becoming too abstruse a science for ordinary people.

The Dev Samaj, Lahore: The need for reconstructing and organising Hindu Society has been receiving a great deal of attention of late and there are several public bodies engaged in that work. The Dev Samaj of Lahore is one such body. Members of the Dev Samaj are admitted only on giving a pledge that they would refrain from "the ten prescribed gross sins, such as dishonest dealings of various kinds, suppression of debts and deposits, social impurity, gambling, use of all kinds of intoxicants, flesh-eating, bribe-taking, theft, adultery etc." It is gratifying to note from the report of the annual Mahotsav which was held at Lahore in the first week of December, that the Samaj is progressing satisfactorily. The Samaj conducts 24 schools, including 2 High Schools for boys, one High School for girls, and four schools for the depressed classes. That the Government have made over to the Dev Samaj the work of reformation of two settlements for criminal tribes, is a significant testimony to the good work it is doing. It is stated that at the Mahotsav Bhojan (dinner) nearly 800 persons of different castes and sub-castes sat together and the Samaj rightly claims that it is a notable feature showing the progress it has made in the direction of social unification and uplift of the caste-ridden Hindu society. We wish the Samaj every success in the noble work it is doing.

A Composite Musical Instrument: Mr. S. G. Tumne has kindly demonstrated to us how the composite instrument he has devised at much cost and trouble can be used in the place of almost any Indian stringed musical instrument with little or no trouble. His instrument can be used in musical Schools where instruction in several instruments is imparted and in families where different individuals learn or practise on different instruments. It costs about Rs. sixty (Rs. ninety with its wooden box) but all the several instruments it represents will cost three or four times that price. Its great merit is economy and simplicity as it can be easily put together by the village carpenter with a little direction. The shapely but fragile gourd is replaced in it by a wooden box which is far less liable to accident. Mr. Tumne's invention is a step in the direction of democratising music, and in tune with the spirit of the age. We wish him every success.

Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru: There was a note of personal affection in the speech in which Lord Reading proposed the health of the late Law Member at the dinner His Excellency gave in his honour last week. Sir Tej counts good taste among his many accomplishments and he did not seek to spoil his host's dinner party by uttering unsavoury truths in his reply. His views on the political situation were given to an Associated Press correspondent in an interview on the same day. There seems to be something in it to confirm what one has been hearing recently about Sir Tej's dissatisfaction with the conventional progress favoured by leading Liberals. It is best, however, to wait till he sees fit to make an explicit pronouncement.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, JANUARY 20, 1923.

SCIENCE AND POLITICS.

Referring to the complaint of Sir M. Visvesvaraya, in his presidential address to the Science Congress at Lucknow, that the importance of applied science is not sufficiently appreciated by the Indian public, we mentioned last week that the small apparatus for receiving wireless messages, which is freely sold in other countries, is not permitted to be imported into India. Of what immense service this simple device can be in a country like ours, is described in an interesting article headed "Telescoping Time with Radio" by Mr. Waldemar Kaempffert in the January number of Asia. Mr. Kaempffert writes:

Radio in its broad-casting aspect is a powerful instrument of mass-appeal, and therein lies its immense advantages over the telephone, the telegraph, the steamship and the railway and its immense possibilities in moulding oriental opinion . . . Such an instrument of mass-appeal must inevitably quicken the pulse of both Europe and Asia.

The receiving apparatus costs about the same as a gramophone of which there are so many in this country. Even if there were one such in every village, the presidential address at Gaya and Nagpur, and the Viceroy's Calcutta speech, could, with a broad-casting apparatus, have been heard instantly all over the country. In a country where there is so much illiteracy, where there are millions who can receive knowledge only by the spoken word, the possibilities of radio in its broad-casting aspect are tremendous.

Mr. Kaempffert advocates the co-operation of England and America in extending the use of this great invention, as a potent means of making English a world-language. The radio, he says, is destined to be the ear-newspaper, the ear-stage of the Orient. "What may not come to pass when broad-casting becomes more pliable, when but little power will be required to project the voice of Einstein or Sir Oliver Lodge or the President of the United States to the uttermost parts of the earth"? It may happen, he adds, that by the year 2000 the radio will bring about the introduction of English or French as a world language, provided the control and development of broad-casting instruments remain in British, American and French hands. The writer also points out of what great advantage the radio system can be to the British Empire. "When her plans are completed," he writes, "England will possess an imperial radio system which will enmesh every ship that flies a British flag, every army post on the frontier of Afghanistan, every handful of British colonists under the sun. The ear of Bombay will be as accessible as that of Liverpool, and so will the ear of the native of Tongking, who owes a theoretical allegiance to France." Incidentally, Mr. Kaempffert emphasises the fact, often lost sight of, that "the steam-engine, the railway, the telegraph, the telephone, the postal service, as much as the Magna Charta and the French Revolution, have made Europe what it is to-day. Communication has had as profound an effect in emancipating the European peasant as the overthrow of Kings and feudal lords." When Mr. C. R. Das says the unit of Indian Swaraj should be a small area consisting of about 10,000 people, he forgets that while such areas represented the natural limit in the past, they would be unnatural in the days of the wireless. Why should a civic community restrict itself to 10,000, while modern science enables it to establish and maintain exactly the same measure of contact and intercourse with a hundred or a thousand times that number? The ancient village was not the choice but a necessity of those days. The greatest obstacle to the revival of that system is the bicycle and the newspaper.

All schemes of political or social reconstruction, which ignore the revolution effected in the conditions of the problem by the achievements of Science in abridging space and time, are bound to be merely so much idle talk. Political and social systems which depend for their security on withholding from men the knowledge and the free use of these implements by which Science multiplies their limited natural faculties, will be condemned at no distant date by the conscience of mankind as being no better than the ancient despotisms which ruled by maiming and mutilating their subjects. Sir M. Visvesvaraya knows more than most other Indians what the real obstacles are at the present day to the extended application of Science to problems of national progress. His address is, therefore, an appeal to the Government in the guise of a rebuke to his own people. The difference between the two schools of politics in India is the measure of their belief in the inclination and power of Government to listen to such an appeal. So far as the people are concerned, we realise to-day more than ever the late Mr. A. O. Hume's reason for putting politics before social reform in his work for India. He said that it was hopeless to expect the people of India to exert themselves for their own improvement until some measure of self-confidence and self-respect had been instilled into them by means of political power. Writing without reference to political parties, the true leader for any people at any time, and more especially for the Indian people at the present time, is the man who bids them strive and thrive. The advice to the people to increase their producing and purchasing power is more likely to bear fruit, if the people are assured that they will have the full use and enjoyment for national purposes of the results of their efforts. It is difficult to say how much of the apathy of the people of India is the result of the long-continued political exploitation of their resources, and how much is due to ignorance and inertia. No Indian has the right to say that it is his business to work in remedying only one side of the evil and that others who are so minded can deal with other aspects of it. The corollary to his able presidential address at the Lucknow Science Congress is an equally well-thought-out pronouncement on the political problem.

THE POET'S TOUR IN SOUTH INDIA, III.

(By Mr. N. LAKSHMANAN.)

Again, like Dr. Seal, India's representative at the First Universal Races Congress, Dr. Tagore has also pointedly and repeatedly drawn attention to the fact that the prologue of India's history opened with the most difficult of all human problems—the race problem. Let us hope that his words of deep insight and rare wisdom have not fallen on deaf ears and that the number of those who ignore or merely despise the Universal Race War is not legion; and if we are really wrong in our surmise let us then take leave to console ourselves by thinking with the Poet Sentinel that Ravana had not the power to defile Sita, though for a time, she was under his dominance, for ideal truth is inviolable even though it may remain for a time in obscurity.

Like one of those fruitful generalisations of Dr. Seal, Dr. Tagore has given to the South an immense and subtle generalisation about the meeting of the Aryan and non-Aryan races "like the Jumna and the Ganges at their confluence." And this sublime and synthetic vision of India's past has now got to be worked out more fully and in greater details by a syndicate of indigenous scholars having the candour and courage to unmask the hypocrisy and superstition of the text-torturing and gerund-grinding fraternity and thus carry out, in right earnest, the long-delayed work of preparing a truly constructive and comprehensive history of the South. The stupendousness of the task is evident from one of the published letters of Vivekananda about the antiquity of the Tamils, their religion and literature. He says that the Madras Presidency is the habitation of that Tamil race whose civilisation was the most ancient and a branch of them called the Sumarians spread a vast civilisation on the banks of the Euphrates in very ancient times whose astrology, religious lore, morals and rites furnished the foundation of the Assyrian and Babylonian civilisations and whose mythology was the source of the Christian Bible. Another Branch of these Tamilians spread from the Malabar Coast and gave rise to the wonderful Egyptian civilisation, and the Aryans also are indebted to this race in many respects.

In "The Master as I saw Him" Nivedita has recorded that, in the course of his wanderings, Vivekananda was able to observe at first hand such obscure questions as the Caste-customs of Malabar. The book containing his inspired talks reveal to us his pioneer efforts to open the vista of Malabar Sociology. In this connection, I remember the graphic description by Professor Sundara Rama Iyer and his son Mr. Ramaswami Sastri, of the Swami's visit to Travancore; and it was only in the fitness of things that Trivandrum should be the first to discover "Noren" and enable him to spread the message of Vedanta across lands and seas. And it is a matter for rejoicing that enlightened Travancore offered the same spontaneous welcome to Rabindranath. Well did the citizens of Trivandrum say in their address to the Poet:

The present age has need of you, and in welcoming you to this land of ancient traditions, the home of Sankara, we fervently pray that the Giver of all good may grant you long life, health and strength to enable you to carry to completion the noble work to which you have dedicated your life.

In reply, the Poet said, in one of his best extempore speeches in the South, that in the gift Sri Rama received from Janaka, the gift of Love, he saw the symbol of the unity of the Aryan and Non-Aryan races which was the mission of Ramachandra; and the Poet significantly pointed out that, whereas Parasurama and other warriors have not the place of honour in the people's memory, Sita-Rama is worshipped today as the incarnation of the great ideal of unity for this country.

"There is no doubt that we in India had our own publicity department which had its function of selecting and arranging facts according to its particular purpose, thus muddling the memory of the people and inscribing on it impressions that are incorrect." In the study and interpretation of the Ramayana itself, the scholars have ranged themselves in opposite camps—as the pages of the Tamilian Antiquary go to show—and the echoes of the "Rama-Ravana" controversy in the South have not yet died out. On the contrary, it seems that the battle of the Pandits is likely to be resumed, with the wider publication of the works on Saiva Siddhantam and with the English translation of such of the oldest books in Tamil now extant, as Agattiyam, Tholkappiam and the newly-discovered "Sengontarai Chelavu" which is said to have been composed even before Agattiyam. And it is also said that the talented author of the famous Manon maneeyam was the first to prepare the background for, and also write out the prologue to, the recently commenced "Brahmin-Non-Brahmin" drama in the South. Whatever may be the sequel, the onlooker at any rate should be allowed to come out of the heated atmosphere and gain some consolation from hearing "the one grand music" and of listening "in the night of suffering" to the student at Trivandrum who, seeing the walls adjoining the spacious Shamianna fall down in the rains, felt inspired to say: "See how at the very touch of the Poet the 'narrow domestic walls' have been 'broken up into fragments'!"

It has been observed the Poet needs to receive in his wanderings "some play of Imagination, some intellectual sparkle, some little cupful of clear mental water that would stimulate his own well." As might be expected, the Poet had all this in abundance during his sojourn in the enlightened and progressive Native States of Mysore, Travancore and Cochin. His presence at the first Festival of Fine Arts organised at Bangalore by Mr. J. H. Cousins and Mr. N. K. Dewal, his appreciation of the histrionic talents of Mysore and Travancore, his admiration for the musical attainments of Tanjore and Travancore, and his intense desire to obtain specimens of the artistic cottage industries of the castes and tribes of Travancore and Cochin revealed that, by his own personal example and by establishing the schools of Art and Music at the Visvabharati, he has taught others an object lesson that "Music and Art must have their prominent seats of honour and not be given merely a tolerant nod of recognition." The Poet's son and daughter-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Rathindranath Tagore, when they formed part of the travelling party, devoted special attention to the study and observation of the architecture and sculpture of the far-famed temple cities in the South.

In Bengal, the system of temple service by "women dedicated to God" is conspicuous by its absence; and when the Poet came across some Devadasis attached to the Srirangam temple, these votaries of dancing and music, often called nowadays by their very patrons as fallen women, looked like "angels fallen"; and if they are ever destined to come out of the "Temples of Maya" and be restored to their dower of spiritual freedom, the transforming process would be the same as that described in Rabindranath's touching and immortal poem, Patita, the fallen woman. It can be safely asserted that he has touched upon and studied every phase of life in South India. Whether he heard the sweet hymnology of the Tamil Saints, or of the maxims of Tiruvalluvar,—the immortal saint who lived in Mylapore—or read about the musical composer Tiagayya, or even about the four brothers Vadivelu, Sivanandam, Chinmayya and Ponnayya of the Nattava community, experts in four different branches of the art, and who came from Tanjore and received the royal favour and patronage at Travancore, Rabindranath said again and again: "Free me from the burden of my begging mission; send your best scholars and musicians to my Asram, and thereby make Visvabharati your own."

Mr. T. Lakshmana Pillai, whom the friendly author of the State Manual has already recognised as a musical composer of taste and ability, says that the Dravidian system of music in the indigenous form called sopana exists side by side with Aryan music. After some weary waiting, during the journeys, at long last at Trivandram, in the State Guest House, the Poet was transported with joy to receive from Mr. Lakshmana Pillai and Mr. Kuttan Pillai the cupful of clear mental water that stimulated his own well. With my feeble words I can never hope to describe "the flow of soul" due to the "concord of sweet sounds" on that memorable evening; and the entrancing effect of the instrumental music, first the Veena, and then the Goats Vadyam played separately, is only comparable to the boat journey, on a moon-lit night, in the famous backwaters of Travancore. And even before the Poet's pilgrimages to the South were over, the one finished player on the Goats Vadyam was found missing from Travancore, and,—and then, can the reader guess who "kidnapped" my friend Mr. Kuttan Pillai and placed him in the amlaki groves of Santiniketan?

And before the answer is given, the memory fondly lingers on the two-fold mission of Buddha—"one of world-moving, and another, of nation-making", and the heart's homage goes forth in adoration to Ram Mohan and Vivekananda, and above all, to my Ishta Devata—the Rishiputra—the modern Bhikshu who, with the "life abundant" of the vedic bards and the poetic gifts of Kamban and Kalidasa, possesses for the redemption of mankind "the heart of Buddha and the intellect of Sankaracharya."

(Concluded).

(BY MR. P. DAMODARAN.)

Custom is an autocrat who always wants to have his own way in everything. Be it Napoleon or Hannibal, Jesus or Mahomed, everyone has to pay obeisance to him. His presence is felt in all departments of human activity, be it religion, politics or social affairs. Manu says "immemorial custom is transcendent law" and that "holy sages, well knowing that law is grounded on immemorial custom, embraced, as the rule of all piety, good usages long established." That even a conqueror has no power over this autocrat is acknowledged by Yajñawalkya who says that "of a newly subjugated territory, the Monarch shall preserve the social and religious usages, also the judicial system and the state of classes as already established." Yajñawalkya's view has been followed by the English in their administration of India. Warren Hastings, in his scheme of 1772 "reserved their own laws to the natives" and wanted that Moulvis and Brahmins should attend Court to expound the laws. Due consideration is always given to custom by our Courts and legislature. Both under the Hindu and Mahomedan systems of law "clear proof of usage will outweigh the written text of the law." This is so, even if Custom were to be quite contrary to religious precepts. The Law of Inheritance prevalent amongst the Moplas of Malabar (before the Act of 1918, but the same even now with regard to ancestral properties) and of the Borahs and Cutch Memons of the Bombay Presidency illustrates this point. Though these systems are perfectly antagonistic to Koranic injunctions, yet, the courts have to recognise them on account of immemorial usage.

Custom is the germ out of which have sprung most of the legal systems of the world. Sir John Salmond says that "custom is the embodiment of the principles which have commended themselves to the national conscience as the principles of truth, justice and public utility and the fact that any rule has already the sanction of custom raises a presumption that it deserves the sanction of law also." According to him "custom is to society what law is to the State, each being the expression and realisation of the principles of right and justice to the best of men's insight and ability." There are various theories as to the origin of custom. When a reasonable act is performed by a man of prudence, if that act is found beneficial to his fellow beings, others follow him and by frequent repetition of the same by several people, time after time, without interruption, such an act becomes custom and thereby obtains the force of law. Most of the customs which make up the "Law Merchant" have, no doubt, been recognised as being found to be useful for the required purpose. As observed in a case, "Custom of trade one practises which have been uniformly observed by those engaged in business and have become so well known and understood that they are taken as incorporated and as governing all transactions of that nature unless otherwise expressed." Numerous other customs originate unconsciously or by accident as, for example, the caste system of India. There is nothing in the Vedas that suggests a division of the people into castes. In either case, whether the origin be traceable to individual initiation or to accident, it assumes three stages of development. Firstly it becomes exceptional, secondly it becomes usual and thirdly and lastly it becomes universal in the locality where it prevails.

A cursory reading of any book dealing with the constitution of Great Britain and Ireland will show clearly the part played by custom in matters connected with the constitution. The reader always hears about the power of the King to summon and to dissolve Parliament and that the laws of the realm are "enacted by the King's Excellent Majesty by and with the advice of Lords Spiritual and Temporal in the present Parliament assembled and by the authority of the same." Could anyone believe that it is any longer so, when custom has slowly but surely snatched away a great portion of that authority and vested it in bodies other than the King? The House of Commons has gained the exclusive right of initiative and control over that branch of the legislation by which taxes are imposed. The power of the King has been considerably reduced since the days of Henry IV, to a mere right to express assent or dissent to measures sent up by the Houses of Parliament. This power of veto has not been exercised for the last 200 years or more; which King will dare to exercise it hereafter? Again, the retirement of the King from the Cabinet was due to the fact that George. I. was an imperfect master of English. It has now become an accepted rule that the King should leave it to his ministers to determine the general policy of the country.

It may perhaps be said that such customs arose from the fact that Great Britain has a flexible constitution. But such an argument loses all its force, when we see the force of custom even in such a rigid constitution as that of the United States of America. The whole machinery of Presidential election has come to work in a manner never contemplated by the authors of the constitution.

Nowhere is the force of custom more strongly felt than in social affairs; and no country has suffered more by it than India. The innumerable castes and sub-castes that exist in India are due to custom and custom alone. As has already been pointed out, the Vedas do not recognise these castes at all. But custom proved more powerful than the Vedas and brought into existence the Brahmin and the non-Brahmin and all the rest of them. Though this division has no basis in religion yet, curiously enough, the people cling to it with the greatest amount of religious fervour. The pernicious effects of the caste system cannot be put better than in the language of Ramsay MacDonald who says that "in the Hindu camp alone divisions of castes mean so much that they not only separate the people, but condemn one-fourth of the total population to a life little removed from that of the beasts that perish. The Sudra is not to receive religious instruction or to take part in religious observance, the penance for killing him, according to the Laws of Manu is the same as required for killing a cat, a frog or a cow. The Indian caste system expresses not merely a social distinction but a religious repulsion, the clean against the unclean and involves the existence of an outcaste class of millions, whose very shadows taint the sacred ones."

When the British Government decided to introduce Western Education in this country, they had for their objects not only the infusion of Western culture amongst its inhabitants but also the removal of the fetters of stupid customs and superstitions which bound them from time immemorial, which they thought would eventually leave the stamp of nationality on them. What the Englishmen have got for their good intentions is a sad tale to relate. It may not be shocking to any foreigner who is acquainted with the orthodox section of the people in this country to hear that there were instances where Indian members of the I.C.S. have performed the punnyaham ceremony because the previous occupant of the bungalow they had to occupy happened to be an Englishman!

It is the women of India that have suffered most by the observance of all sorts of customs. No one can exaggerate the baleful influence of such customs as infant marriages, the Zenana system, prohibition of widow marriages etc. on womankind. What could be more cruel than to allow young girls to become widows before they have become wives and to condemn them to perpetual seclusion? The story of a Maharani who, having a bad ear, would allow an English lady doctor to examine the ear alone, which was shown through a screen, would clearly indicate the extent to which the orthodox section of the people in this country are prepared to go where their superstitious beliefs are concerned. What can be more ludicrous than the application that was submitted to the Privy Council signed by nearly 18,000 people on the abolition of Sati in 1829 protesting against the abolition of this barbarous custom? Most of such customs have absolutely no meaning at all, yet they are most scrupulously followed. A caste Hindu could go to the house of one who is supposed to belong to a caste lower than his and partake of ordinary refreshments to his heart's content, yet, if he is to eat rice cooked there, he would lose his caste immediately! Instances like this could be multiplied by the million, but to what purpose? Until Indians assimilate Western culture and set themselves free from the fetters of meaningless customs and ridiculous superstitions, there seems to be absolutely no hope of India ever working out her salvation.

SOME CRUEL CUSTOMS.

THE EDITOR, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The enclosed cutting on "Japan's Pariah Problem" (A. B. Patrika, December 10—Bi-weekly Ed.) sheds a distinctly new light on the problem of untouchability in India. In Japan there is no caste as we have it in India. There may be class distinction there as in other countries, but caste is peculiar to India. Now it is sometimes postulated that untouchability and unapproachability (touch-pollution and 'distance-pollution') are but extreme manifestations of caste; that they are in fact its logical developments, not mere aberrations from it. I hope you will give your opinion on the point in the light of this cutting.

2. Another cutting from the Hindu (Dec. 7—tri-weekly Ed.) headed 'a Cruel Custom' ought to throw some light on how conversions of Hindus into Islam ordinarily take place in Malabar.

3. The third cutting (from the A. B. Patrika—December 8—Bi-weekly Ed.) is a distinct certificate to the Congress and Khilafat movement for its social progressiveness and practical social service.

4. The A. P. message dated Rangoon in the Bombay Chronicle, Dec. 25, p. 5, headed 'Thinshes' shows how untouchability crept into Burma, a Buddhist country.

I hope all the four will receive your Editorial notice.

Yours etc,

K. R. HALDIPREKAR,

Kerwar, 30th Dec. 1922.

JAPAN'S PARIASH PROBLEM.

It is not India alone that is confronted with the problem of the outcaste. Japan has the same problem also. The Pariahs of Japan are called "Eta" which means outcaste in Japanese. They number approximately 80,00,000 and are settled in the Kyoto and Osaka districts. Some of them are wealthy and have considerable influence in economic circles. They have an association called "Nippon Suihei Kai" which rendered into English means "Japan Horizontal Society". The object of the society is to protect the interests of the "Eta" class. Recently there was a meeting under the auspices of this association and many leading Eta representatives came from all parts of the country. Numerous speeches were delivered condemning bitterly the social discrimination practised against the Eta. Some of the speakers indignantly demanded to know why they were barred from social intercourse when they shared equally in national conscription and taxation. Instances in which their children were unable to attend elementary schools, because they were bullied by other children, were cited by many. One speaker told of a child being struck deaf by a policeman because of a minor offence. When the higher authorities were appealed to, the case was dismissed. Whenever a dispute occurs between the Eta and the rest of the villagers, the case is invariably settled partially, said another speaker. The meeting terminated with an appeal for equal social treatment for the Eta.

Be it said to the credit of the Japanese Government that it is leaving no stone unturned to ameliorate the condition of the Eta and to remove the prejudice of the people against them. Many public-spirited Japanese also have taken up the cause of the Eta and it appears to be a question of time only when they will be able to secure equal social status with the other Japanese.—*A. B. NAMBUDIRI WOMAN OUT-CASTED.

Cochin, December 5.—The Nambudiris who form the most orthodox and conservative among the people of Malabar are even to this day very rigid in their observance of caste rules, and the following account which comes from Trishur of a woman being outcasted on a very trivial ground illustrates how they are adhering to the letter of the law with regard to their established social customs. A Nambudiri woman of Korattikkara, a village near Pudukad Railway Station, was outcasted, it would appear, for the sin of helping the Nair servant of the Illom to unload the basket from his head. The servant had returned from the market with the purchases for the Illom, and finding the weight too heavy for him to unload, requested some one to help him. There was no elderly male member in the house and the Nambudiri woman helped the servant. The woman's husband, on his return, heard about the incident and declared her an out-caste as she was polluted. There was the usual enquiry and merry round of feasting amidst a fanfare of trumpets, and the woman was driven away. It would appear that she has since found a home under the care of a Mahommedan, and besides embraced that religion.—The Hindu Dec. 7, Tri-Weekly.

A SHAMEFUL EXAMPLE OF UNTOUCHABILITY.

(Dacca Prakash.)

In the village of Nalus in the subdivision of Narayanganj, a widow, who had been excommunicated by society, died. A few days before her death some local gentleman had performed a "Prayaschitta" ceremony in her behalf, and yet her corpse was left untouched in her room for full 24 hours. At this, several Congress and Khilafat workers came forward and cremated the body of the unfortunate widow. It is now rumoured that there is a movement afoot to outcaste these noble souls. It is hoped the local gentry will stop the perpetration of such a shameful act.—A. B. P. Dec. 8. (Bi-weekly).

OUR TRAVANCORE LETTER.

THE STATE AND TEMPERANCE.

The temperance movement is spreading slowly and steadily. Several meetings are being held throughout the whole State to bring home the advantages of the movement to the very doors of the peasant. It is the Ezhavas who by heredity have been chiefly responsible for the manufacture and consumption of liquor. They alone have been the tappers, and for several years past, they controlled the market in the matter of consumption. For, they had the sole monopoly of the contract for the sale of liquor. But the angle of vision of this community slowly changed as a result of the spread of education among them. The policy of the Travancore Government has been for the past 18 years—since the Dewanship of Mr. V. P. Madhava Rao C. I. E.—to remove the veil of ignorance, illiteracy and arrogant exclusiveness and take the depressed classes like the Ezhavas, Pulayas, Parayas, &c. to a higher level and open their eyes to the benefits of education. This beneficent policy was persisted in by his successor Diwan Bahadur (now Sir) P. Rajagopalachari whose seven years of Dewanship will ever be associated with a vigorous programme of uplift and the substantial measure of success achieved by him in throwing open the Schools, in making them members of popular institutions and generally in giving them wider access to public institutions will ever remain as a land mark in their elevation. All this has resulted now in the community knowing and realising its own defects and in taking immediate steps to remove them and avail themselves of the good offices of the Brahmin Dewan who wanted to befriend and uplift them. As however a larger number of young men and women are now permeated by the light of general education, the first point of social evil to which they addressed themselves was to remove the deep-rooted stain on the community as a whole and prove themselves worthy of that measure of beneficent attention which the Government bestowed on the amelioration of their material condition. The desire to purge themselves of the vice of drink has taken hold on them and it is a remarkable fact that the movement has wonderfully spread out of all proportion to the percentage of literacy now obtaining among them. The more striking is it to notice the enthusiasm of educated girls and even of people whom the modern influence of literacy has not reached. Mr. T. K. Madhavan, the real strength of the movement, has been unsparring in his commendable labours of social reform and, it is indeed a matter of great satisfaction that he is listened to in several areas and in certain villages public meetings are arranged by the local residents themselves. The movement has taken such a firm hold that, in connection with the public meetings held, tea parties and dinner parties are organised and the question of abstaining from auction sales of contracts of liquor shops is seriously discussed and a general understanding for keeping back from such auction sales is arrived at and carried into action. In connection with the general discussion on the State budget, the Financial Secretary had to bemoan a big drop in the Excise revenue, as a direct result of the work of temperance advocates. The subsequent course of this reform movement has been more prejudicial to the receipts which, it is feared, have not showed a more favourable turn. Some other source will have to be tapped to meet the fall of this tainted money. It is noteworthy that the Government whose reins are in the hands of Dewan Bahadur T. Raghaviah, a quiet and unostentatious worker in social reform, are in practical sympathy with the central idea of the temperance movement and even accepted the principle of prohibition as the ultimate goal. Such is the present stage of the movement and, in these days of financial stress and strain, it is no doubt a matter of great anxiety for the head of the Administration that it has to face a steady decline in its excise revenue, despite its eagerness to advance the cause of temperance by its policy of minimum consumption and maximum revenue. The pity of it is that the general financial condition of the State is not helpful to temperance. The Dewan should all the more be complimented for his heroic efforts to reduce this objectionable money.

THE ENGLISH SOLICITATION LAW.

(From the Shield.)

ARRESTS OF MEN FOR ANNOYING WOMEN.

The arrest and conviction of Sir Almeric Fitzroy, Clerk to the Privy Council, on a charge of wilfully interfering with and annoying women in Hyde Park by accosting and entering into conversation with them has, let us hope, made inevitable the drastic amendment of those laws under which 6 000 women a year and some few men are fined or imprisoned on police evidence only for alleged annoyances of persons of the opposite sex. As Sir Almeric Fitzroy has appealed against the decision of the Marlborough Street magistrates, we will at present make no comments on his case, but will only quote here one indignant paragraph from the Daily Sketch of October 17th:—

"Any man to-day is liable, on the evidence of the police alone, and without any complaint from the person alleged to have been annoyed, to be arrested and convicted."

The following is a report of another case from the Daily News of October 19th:—

BENCH'S RULING IN ANNOYANCE CASES.

"In a prosecution for insulting behaviour at Marylebone Police Court yesterday it was alleged that a woman complained to the police that the accused had followed her and tried to get into conversation with her; but when she was asked to attend the police station she declined. Defendant denied that he interfered with her in any way.

"Mr. Ratcliffe Cousins said that so far as the unknown woman was concerned, unless there was a very strong case he never listened to third party evidence of a woman being annoyed if she had not the courage to come forward and say she had been annoyed.

"Here there was no evidence upon which he could rely that a woman was annoyed, and as the woman was unwilling to come forward he should disregard that evidence entirely.

"In all cases where people called in the aid of the police, they must come forward and corroborate them."

We think it is law and custom which are to blame rather than the police, but otherwise we are entirely in agreement with the indignation expressed by the Daily Sketch, the Daily Express, the Daily Graphic, and many other papers. Nevertheless, when we remember that probably the total charges brought against men for annoying women merely by accosting them is probably not more than 100 or 150 in the course of two or three years, whereas 6,000 unfortunate women are arrested every year for alleged annoyance of men, we feel that this display of public indignation is somewhat belated and is open to a charge of hypocrisy. We do not think it is hypocrisy, but ignorance. People do not know the hopelessly slipshod and totally unjust way in which these women are treated in the Courts. Because British law and administration is, on the whole, good, we do not realise that the women who sell themselves on the streets are outside the law, receiving neither its protection nor its privileges, but only its penalties.

ARRESTS OF WOMEN FOR ANNOYING MEN.

The legal position and treatment of all those women who are officially described as "common prostitutes" is responsible for a very great amount of cruelty and injustice. It is not generally realised that some 3,000 women are imprisoned, and another 3,000 fined, every year, on charges of "soliciting for immoral purposes," without any outside evidence whatever being required that they are "prostitutes," that they were in fact soliciting, or that any person was annoyed by them. On the evidence of police only, these women are branded with the terrible stigma of being "common prostitutes," made social outcasts and legal outlaws, fined and imprisoned. Moreover, having once been convicted as a "common prostitute," a woman is thereafter liable to be arrested at any time on sight, without hope of redress or acquittal. Under the solicitation laws specially directed against "prostitutes" the police are, in theory, supposed to prove: (A) that the woman is a common prostitute; (B) that she was loitering for an immoral purpose, and (C) that she was annoying male passengers. No proof except the policeman's statement is ever brought forward of any one of these things, although in most cases one may be reasonably certain that the accused is of this class. But it is not a legal offence to be of this class. The legal offence is that, being of this class, the woman solicited to the annoyance of male passengers. It is, therefore, important that the annoyance should be proved, and it is never proved.

We are not blaming the police. They cannot arrest the same women night after night, although they see and recognise them on the same "beat" almost every night, so they presumably carry out the law to the best of their ability by arresting some of them from time to time. But these women assert over and over again, and with apparent truth, that when arrested they were not accosting anyone, and certainly not annoying anyone. Those who study this aspect will rarely see a woman speak first to a man. She will loiter, and either by glances or general demeanour, will make her calling quite clear, but except occasionally in the darker side streets she does not take the initiative. In any case, whether the woman speaks first or not, the fact remains that the "professional" woman usually conducts herself in a quiet and non-aggressive manner, and she not unnaturally regards her fines and imprisonment as extremely unjust.

But, it may be argued, the streets must be kept reasonably clear of such women, and if they are, confessedly, habitually immoral, what does it matter if the strict letter of the law is not always observed in their case? This is best answered by looking at the facts. How does such a woman pay her fines?

How does she pay her back rent and her other running expenses if she is sent to prison? Obviously by making greater efforts to attract and obtain customers when she comes out. If that is so, how can those legal methods improve the streets, lessen temptation for men, or promote morality? It may be argued that these women should be sentenced for longer periods. But what legal crime have they committed? Our morality may be offended by their very existence, but even so we might try to cultivate a sense of justice. No one who has any first-hand knowledge of these women's lives can doubt that they are frequently arrested when they have committed no legal offence. The police are endeavouring to carry out laws which are complicated, unjust and unequal as between men and women and between one woman and another. They doubtless do their best; it is the law which is wrong.

The "prostitute" is the scapegoat for everyone's sins, and few people really care whether she is justly treated or not. Good people have spent thousands of pounds in efforts to reform her, poets have written about her, essayists and orators have made her the subject of some of their most striking rhetoric; perhaps no class of people has been so much abused, persecuted, hated, or, alternatively, sentimentalised over as prostitutes have been, but one thing they have never had yet, and that is simple legal justice. Ought we not to secure legal justice for the "common prostitute" before we set out to reform her? These women are slaves and outcasts, despised and rejected by all respectable people. They are used, not as though they were women, but as though they were "things." Yet they are sentient and often suffering human beings, and many of them are very unhappy. Like the rest of us they are made in the image of God, and it was to a woman of that particular class that Christ spoke, when He asked, "Woman, where are those thine accusers?" and when He found they had all gone away, said: "Neither do I condemn thee."

THE DEV SAMAJ, LAHORE.

The Annual Mahotsab of the Dev Samaj, which was held in commemoration of the 72nd Birthday anniversary of its most worshipful President Founder the Dev Atma, Shri Dev Guru Bhagwan, was celebrated with great enthusiasm and remarkable success at Lahore in the magnificent and most tastefully decorated Hall of Shri Dev Guru Bhagwan Memorial Mandir, from 8rd to 7th December 1922. Nearly 800 persons joined from about 90 stations in the Punjab, N. W. F. Province, Imperial Province of Delhi, Sind, Baluchistan, United Provinces of Agra and Oudh etc. Besides this, hundreds from amongst the outside public also attended. There were in all 16 engagements, including three public lectures and a ladies' gathering.

The proceedings of the anniversary began with an illuminating and remarkably elevating devotional meeting, in which four of the higher grade disciples of the Dev Atma delivered sermons and speeches on his unique life-work and sacrifices for its fulfilment and the essential need and the highest privilege of sacrificing one's wealth and bodily and mental powers for the unique cause of the Dev Atma. The most blessed and particularly uplifting occasion in the Mahotsab was the meeting held on the 5th December, the special day of the Mahotsab, being the birthday of our most worshipful Master.

The initiation of 20 new members and enrolment of 5 new associates as well as promotion to higher grades of 17 old members presented a very impressive spectacle.

Another important item of the Mahotsab proceedings was the election of new members of the Representative Assembly of the Dev Samaj. This consisted of 32 members who in their turn elected members for the executive council of the Dev Samaj for the ensuing year.

Three public lectures formed another important feature of the occasion. The first two lectures were delivered by Shriman Pandit Harnarain Agnihotri, Editor, "The Science Grounded Religion", and the third by Shrimans Amarsingh and Nirmalsingh. The subjects dealt were the following:—

- (1) An Epoch-making revolution in the religious world.
- (2) Why is the Dev-Atma the only true worshipful being for mankind?
- (3) Marvellous work of higher changes which the Dev-Atma's unique psychic powers bring in every department of mankind.

These lectures were as powerfully and lucidly delivered as they were comprehensively dealt with, and were heard with rapt attention, and impressed very considerably the vast audiences present.

The annual report of the Dev Samaj for the year ending 30th November 1922 showed that 187 members (as against 159 during the preceding year) were initiated during the year. Besides this, 620 persons were reclaimed from one or more gross sins noted above. The number of domestic ceremonies, performed according to the reformed rites of the Dev Samaj, was 45 including several marriage ceremonies. The number of life workers and lay workers who devoted themselves to the cause of the Samaj during the year was 101. The number of schools worked by the society was 24, which comprised two High Schools for boys, one High School for girls, four schools for depressed classes and a number of primary and middle schools. The work of reformation of two settlements of the criminal tribes, made over by the Government to the Dev Samaj has elicited great appreciation at the hands of Government and the public. The total receipts and expenditure for the maintenance of various institutions during the year were Rs. 1,00,468 and Rs. 88,526 respectively.

The Mahotsab Bhojan (dinner) at which nearly 800 persons of different castes and sub-castes sat together was a notable occasion, showing the progress which the Dev Samaj had achieved in the direction of social unification and uplift of the caste-ridden Hindu Society.

The proceedings of the Mahotsab were brought to a close by a meeting in which numerous ladies and gentlemen most enthusiastically enumerated the blessings and benefits they had derived by their attending the Mahotsab and gave expression to their feelings of serving the unique cause of the Dev Samaj with renewed zeal, and devotion during the ensuing year.

CATHOLIC CLERGY PROHIBITION LEAGUE.

CHURCH BENEFITED BY THE DRY LAW.

Because of the misconception of many people that Catholics oppose Prohibition, the Catholic Clergy Prohibition League, through its president, the Rev. George Zurcher, pastor of St. Vincent's Church, North Evans, N. Y., has given out for publication the following statement:

The greatest objection among Catholics to Prohibition used to be, that it would interfere with sacramental wine. Many of the objectors were absolutely sincere. Since the advent of Prohibition, there is not a single case on record where a priest found it difficult to obtain the necessary sacramental wine.

Under Prohibition, Catholics spend more money for education. Some Catholic colleges find it difficult to accommodate all applicants. The Catholic University of Notre Dame, Indiana, is discontinuing its preparatory school, in existence ever since the University was founded, because of the great increase in the enrollment in the collegiate courses.

Catholic institutions formerly trying to reform drunkards, are now devoting more of their energies to the training of neglected children.

Where Prohibition is not very strictly enforced, as in some cities in the State of New York, Catholic clergymen entertain some doubt as to the permanency of Prohibition, and are, therefore, rather reticent about its manifold benefits. Elsewhere we find most favourable expressions for the strict enforcement of the law. The Catholic Bishop of Great Falls, Montana, Right Reverend Mathias C. Lenihan, under date of April 25, 1922, wrote to us of the general attitude of the people of his state: 'We have an army of intelligent and patriotic citizens who are in favour of enforcing the Eighteenth Amendment.'

The liquor traffic has ruined so many Catholics physically and spiritually, that the Catholic Church, in spite of the many Catholic immigrants, in spite of the marvelous generosity with which Catholic edifices were built, and in spite of the hard labour of so many priests, and of thousands of self-sacrificing nuns, was losing ground. Nothing ever happened in America that will make for the spiritual progress of the Catholic Church, as Prohibition. Fifty years hence the greatest wonderment will be, why all Catholics did not work with tooth and nail for Prohibition.

Among the most active members of the Catholic Clergy Prohibition League are: Rev. C. P. Baron, Columbus, Ind;

Rev. M. Mahony, Mendota, Minn.; Rev. A. Jacquemet, O. P. Priory, Fall River, Mass.; Rev. Geo. Zurcher, North Evans, N. Y.; Rev. M. F. Sperlein, Nadean, Mich.; Rev. P. J. Murphy, Dalhart, Tex.; Rev. E. A. Hannan, Washington; Rev. P. Saurasaitia, Bayonne, N. J.; Rev. M. J. Wyte, Sunnyvale, Cal.; Rev. J. McNamee, Chicago, Right Rev. Bishop Lenihan, Great Falls, Mont.; Rev. J. Kubacki, Cleveland; Rev. P. J. O'Callaghan, Catholic University, Washington.

A NEW THEORY ABOUT THE ARYANS.

Of the two events that characterise the history of the ancient India, one is the advent of the Aryans to India after conquering the North-Western Frontiers; while the other is that they composed the "richas" of the Rigveda after their settlement in the Punjab. But Mr. Pargiter, the famous scholar of the Puranas (ancient historical records of India) has recently expressed certain opinions with regard to them, which deserve the attention of the scholars of the early history of India. In his detailed description of the ancient history of India, he has opposed both these well-established theories. He holds that the Aryans, who were really the "Ails" descended to India from the central regions of the Himalayas, and settled in a small estate of Prayag (Allahabad). About the year 2050 B.C. they went out of Prayag, conquered the tracts lying to the north-west and south of it and settled there and thus, by the time of the Maharaja Yayati, they came in possession of all the tracts of land which afterwards came to be known as the Central India (Madhyadesha) or Aryavarta, i. e., the land of the Aryans.

Mr. Pargiter is also of opinion that in no book dealing with the ancient history of India is the land lying at the north-western boundary of India described as showing India's antiquity or as holy land. It is the central hilly tracts of the Himalayas near the Kailash and the Kedar that have always been regarded as holy from the olden times and this is the only holy land situated outside the country. This was the sacred birth place of the "Ails". This was the place visited by Rishis and Kings on pilgrimage. They never went to the land at the north-western boundary for this purpose. He has adduced certain evidences in support of this statement. He says that nowhere in the Vedic records is any mention made of the advent of the Aryans from the north-west of India.

Mr. Pargiter has shown in his records that the oldest "richas" of the Rigveda were not composed by the Aryans or the Brahmanas. They were composed by non-Aryan Rishis and Kings. Not even one of the "richas" is described as having been composed by a man inhabiting the north-western parts. When we come down to the time of Shivi, we, of course, then find some extracts in the Vedas composed by the inhabitants of the north-western tracts. As a matter of fact the oldest "richas" were composed by the "Manawas" and their Rishis and not by the "Ails." These "richas" again have their connection with the Madhya-Desha (the Central India). They have nothing to do with the Punjab. At the end of the above writing he has quoted the chapters and "richas" of the Veda in support of his statements and has shown that the Veda, the Vedic Institution and the original Brahmanic religion were all the outcome of non-Aryan influences. They have nothing to do with the "Ails" or their original civilisation.—The Servant, Calcutta.

NOTES.

Is it a Clash of Ideals? Lord Ronaldshay was not right when, in his paper read before the Society of Arts in London, he attributed the present unsatisfactory situation in India to a clash between the ideals of the East and the West. Surely, the Punjab Martial Law excesses and the breach of faith with Indians regarding the peace with Turkey, do not represent the ideals of the East or the West. Neither are the financial muddle, the sale of reverse Councils, the imprisonment of thousands of persons for a technical offence created by an executive order, the outcome of any ideal. The object of generalisations like the late Bengal Governor's, is to divert attention from the blunders and wrongs of the administration. Viscount Peel, who presided, made an even greater effort in this direction by attributing Indian discontent not to Indian grievances but to world causes. The Secretary of State thought that Indian discontent was not connected with the ferment produced by the War. "There was a world-wide feeling of revolt against the machinery of civilisation which was not peculiar to this age or time". If by "the machinery of civilisation," he meant the Indian bureaucracy—and it is impossible to make any sense out of the remark if he meant anything else—that machinery surely is not ages old. We agree with him that Western civilisation has behind it a spiritual idealism which is concrete and practical in its application. Our experience is that this idealism has been very little in evidence in the Indian administration for the last half century. If it is brought into the foreground, the Indian problem will be promptly solved, for in reality there is no clash between Eastern and Western ideals. The only clash is between the material interests and political aspirations of the East and the West.

General Bramwell Booth in Bombay: The story of the beginnings of the Salvation Army is told in graphic language in the life of its Founder by Mr. Harold Begbie.* It is a story of faith and resolution overcoming great resistance. The movement was attacked from the intellectual side by Huxley who in his famous letters to the Times, since collected in his volume on "Evolution and Ethics" with the heading "Social Diseases and Worse Remedies", denounced it in fierce language. From the religious side, Anglican Bishops openly accused it of promoting immorality instead of holiness. There were riots, legal actions. When the authorities of the Army first landed in India in 1883, they had to encounter considerable official opposition. Even in 1892 when the Salvation Army had lived down much of the calumny and opposition in England, the late General, during his visit to India, was ignored by the English community and by Government. The only welcome he got was from educated Indians. To-day, however, his successor is the bearer of a message from His Majesty and he addresses an audience presided over by His Excellency the Governor of Bombay and attended by all the high officials in the Presidency. When a change of such magnitude has occurred, one naturally asks oneself whether it is due to a greater appreciation of the work of the Army by officials or a greater approximation of the attitude of the Army to that of officials. The answer is, both. The Army has shed several of the features of the "corybantic Christianity" of its earlier days and Government have found in it a useful agent for certain kinds of social work. We have been consistently sympathetic to the Salvation Army's work in India, and have done what little we could, to remove prejudices against it. From our intercourse with its officers, we believe that some of them, at any rate, have no thought beyond the good that they might do to the people. But we have felt in reading one or two of the pronouncements within the last few days of General Bramwell Booth, who is visiting India, that they are not likely to be helpful to the work that the Army is doing in this country. It is not for him, for one thing, to speak ill of "agitators", seeing how large a part agitation has played in the work of the Salvation Army. In some directions, the Army officers are entrusted with certain kinds of social work by Government and by private organisations such as the Bombay Beggar's Relief Committee. The General does not seem to be quite correctly informed of the exact position of the Army in respect of these activities. His ex-cathedra pronouncements on education and the depressed classes are by no means well-considered and are calculated to create political prejudice against the Army's future activities. One of the best things in the report of the Dev Samaj, which we printed last week, is that it has been officially entrusted with the reclamation of two criminal tribes. Other indigenous reform agencies should relieve the Salvation Army of similar work elsewhere.

Students and Politics: There was more than a suggestion of what Sir Narayan Chandavarkar, who presided, characterised—recalling an ancient but not very happy phrase of Plato's—as "puppy politics" in the address which the Hon. Mr. Paranjpye delivered to the Muslim students the other day. From first to last it was a thinly veiled attack on those who differ from Mr. Paranjpye's politics. Now, Mr. Paranjpye is a prominent politician and it is perfectly legitimate for him to attack his political opponents, as it is for them to attack him. But he should choose his occasion with due regard to propriety. The subject of his address was "Students and Politics." Our own opinion on the question has often been expressed in these columns. Students should study politics but they should take no active part in it till they formally cease to receive instruction in a school or college. So far as we can gather, this is also Mr. Paranjpye's view. What has to be taken exception to in his address, is the irrelevant and carping references to some largely imaginary individuals who, in his belief, seduce students into politically immoral paths. The reference obviously is to Congressmen, and as we have had actual, personal experience of the work allotted to students in the last Congress, for instance, we have as a matter of simple justice to rebut the imputation made by Mr. Paranjpye. A hundred and fifty students of the Benares Hindu University, in charge of their professors, went to Gaya in response to the call for volunteers. We were told this at the Benares University prior to the Congress, as a conclusive answer to a question as to the attitude of the United Provinces Government to the University. "Absolute non-interference" we were told, and as a proof, this incident was mentioned with the confident remark that they did not expect any objection to be taken to it by the Government of the United Provinces. And how did these student volunteers conduct themselves? The atmosphere was heated, there was a sharp division of opinion, and rival politicians harangued groups of delegates at all hours of the day and night on the rightness of their own particular views. But it was the unanimous tribute of those who were at Gaya, including several who did not belong to the Congress, that these boys and girls acquitted themselves with admirable discipline and good humour. They were kind, courteous and helpful to every one, without distinction of party, creed or caste. Such self-effacing service as theirs to their fellow-countrymen, gathered in thousands from all parts of the country, is a far greater liberal education than lectures which heap opprobrium on fellow-countrymen whose personal sacrifices, if nothing else, should command the respect and admiration of the youth of the land.

A Bombay Minister's Difficulty: Speaking at Dhulia last week, the Hon. Mr. C. V. Mehta, Minister for Excise and other departments in Bombay, frankly acknowledged that the reduction of the number of shops, the limitation of hours and the reduction of the strength of the liquor—the main features of the policy adopted by him last year—would not do and that more drastic remedies were required to stop the drink evil. It may be recalled that we anticipated this when his policy was announced and we are glad that Mr. Mehta has had the candour to make the acknowledgment. This is a hopeful sign. The Minister went on to say that the Sathe Committee, which was expected to investigate the question and make recommendations as to the best course to be adopted to put down the evil, has had to postpone its work since the death of its chairman, the late Rao Bahadur Sathe, and he (the Minister) regretted that, though several gentlemen were approached for the chairmanship, he was not able to induce one of them to accept the post and carry on the work. This, by the way, throws light on the composition of the Excise Committee. There is not evidently a single member of it who can step into the place of the deceased chairman. It will not be right to conclude from the Minister's lament that there are no competent persons sufficiently interested in getting rid of the drink evil, to take up the Chairmanship of the Committee. The reasons why no one is forthcoming to do so, are first, that there has been an impression abroad—which the Minister's admission should go some way to remove—that the Committee was not seriously intended to deal with the question, and that it would be sheer waste of time for a man to throw himself into the work, only to find that nothing came of it; and, secondly, the experience of some committees recently appointed by the Bombay Government, has been not very happy. The chairman of the Technical Education Committee, if report is to be trusted, was reduced to quite pathetic straits to secure the clerical assistance needed to carry on his work. The Prostitution Committee fared no better. It had not even a fixed place of meeting. On one occasion, in the middle of its examination of a witness, it was bundled out of the Council Hall into a passage adjoining it, as His Excellency just then wanted the Hall for a Council meeting. The Elementary Education Committee would seem to have had more facilities, perhaps because the Chairman, who is also President of the Legislative Council, was not a non-official to be trifled with. The refusal of responsible men to accept the Chairmanship of the Excise Committee, is largely due to their feeling that the Minister's power—not willingness—to accept any recommendations that the Committee may make or even to provide it with the facilities to carry on from day to-day, is strictly limited. This is another tribute to diarchy!

Indian Arms Rules Committee's Report: The Committee appointed to examine the rules under the Arms Act and to suggest improvements, recommends that Ministers and members of the Imperial Legislature and Privy Councillors should be added to the list of those exempted from the requirement to obtain a license for arms. The majority, however, are against a similar concession to members of Provincial Legislative Councils. Except that the members of the Committee were all members of the Indian Legislature and that no member of a Provincial Council was on it, we see no reason why the M. L. C. should not enjoy the same privilege as the M. L. A. The Committee reject the proposal that Magistrates should be included in the list of exemptions on the ground that "a firearm cannot be regarded as a necessary part of the equipment of a Magistrate." Is it a necessary part of the equipment of a member of the Legislative Assembly or the Council of State? The system of exemptions is wrong in principle. Messrs. Bajpai, Reddi and Fayaz Khan are right in their contention that licenses should not be withheld except in the case of undesirable persons. The Committee threw out their proposal that a list of undesirable persons should be kept as being "entirely outside the scope of practical politics." This, no doubt, is impracticable. Such a list, however, is not necessary. The right of possessing arms is the right of every free citizen, and the deprivation of it should be a penalty for the commission of offences involving moral turpitude. It will be said that the adoption of this principle would flood the country with arms, which would make life insecure. In practice, many people in India, as in other countries where there is no restriction on the possession of arms, would not care to possess them, because they have no use for them. As for those who keep arms, the best and surest safeguard against their abuse by ill-disposed persons, is the knowledge that well-disposed persons also possess and can use arms. No Arms Act can prevent people determined to get arms from getting them, neither will any man go to the expense and the risk of accident involved in keeping arms merely because there is no Arms Act. The main grievance of the Arms Act in India is that it is one of the worst pieces of racial legislation and that even, when the law is changed, the administration of it has not materially improved. Licensing is, of course, necessary as an administrative measure to provide reliable data as regards the quantity and distribution of arms in the country. An abnormal increase in any particular locality will have to be promptly investigated.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

FREDERIC HARRISON.

In Frederic Harrison has passed away one of the most illuminating spirits of the nineteenth century. He was known as the leading apostle of Positivism in England. He himself defended Comte in a beautiful open letter to Ruskin, who had attacked him, which is reprinted in his volume entitled the "Choice of Books and other essays" with the heading "Past and Present". That is a letter which ought to be widely read and pondered in India at the present day when Mahatma Gandhi's sweeping diatribes against modern science, largely in Ruskin's vein, has overpowered so many minds, young and old. Another and scarcely less important reason, is that the letter is an exquisite example of how to state uncompromising objections to the views of an opponent, while at the same time maintaining towards him the respect and even reverence due to his personality. "You reprove me," Harrison begins, "for believing with Auguste Comte that the human race is worthy of our regard, is growing wiser, stronger, nobler. You say, on the contrary, that mankind is now very crazy and utterly vile; that beauty, nobility, and truth are all gone out of the world, though they did flourish once in a date undetermined. And in public and in private you call on me to break a lance with you as a true man; though mine, as you see, is little better than a reed, and your own is like a weaver's beam." One of Ruskin's assertions was that the human race had deteriorated physically—that there was no European as handsome as the figure portrayed in the Elgin Theseus. Harrison answers him completely. He points out that the physical test is not the only test; that even according to it, modern men are not inferior to the ancients. He sums up:

A civilised man can roll over a savage; is bigger, stronger and lives longer; can bear twice as much and do twice as much. Men now-a-days cannot get into the puny armour of ancient days; and, if a pampered aristocracy in an age of slavery, by giving their whole lives to the care of their skins, did reach a special type of beauty, the race as a whole has a higher physical standard. So that, if you are not so handsome as Theseus, and Hamlet is not to be compared to Hercules, you and Hamlet have something to set against the want of muscle, and you may console yourself by thinking that there are more fine men and women in Europe to-day than there were two thousand years ago.

It is not as if Harrison did not recognise the grave defects of modern civilisation. He was, what George Eliot said of herself, and which he quotes with evident satisfaction, a maliolist, "facing the world with clear vision in all its evil, but confident in its progress towards the better". The age of machinery did not appeal to him but he saw in it a necessary stage in the march towards moral perfection.

Of Harrison's passionate reach after moral perfection, there can be no better proof than his fine judgment on the incident in the life of George Eliot which has exercised so many thoughtful minds—her living with

George Lewes as his wife without the sanction of marriage. Like every one who knew her and came in contact with her, Harrison had the highest opinion of her innate purity and her nobility of soul. He was her friend and the friend of George Lewes. "He was a witness of the unbroken happiness of their joint life; of their affectionate performance of every domestic duty; of their scrupulous observance of all that they recognised as belonging to a pure and refined home; of his devoted love for her till death; of her honour of his memory whilst life remained." In reviewing her "Life," written by Mr. Cross whom she afterwards married, Harrison feels obliged to refer to this delicate question, as to keep silence on it might be misunderstood. "It is the duty of those who have cause to speak at all to make clear their canons of right and wrong; but it can never be a duty to pass public judgment on the lives of our departed friends." So, while refraining from passing judgment on this episode in the life of his friends, he clearly states his own opinion of what he holds to be the essentials of the marriage relation. He speaks of himself as one of those "who have pledged their lives to labour in every way to fortify the marriage bond, to teach the future to make it indissoluble by law, and indissoluble even by death." He trusts that the future will recognise, as India did ages ago, "that responsibility in marriage and happiness in marriage, alike depend on its irrevocable nature." He goes on to say:

It is the essence of marriage to be above the field of individual exceptions, to stand supreme, high beyond all personal opinions, miseries or joys. The happiness of individuals would be dearly bought if it dimmed, by one passing shadow of suspicion, the inviolable institution whereon the happiness of all depends. It is meet, sometimes that some suffer for the people. The moral law is infinitely more precious than the personal happiness of any; and the sufferings of exceptional cases must be borne with resignation, lest harm befall the sanctity of every home, and the moral currency be debased.

These are noble words and we should not add anything to our expression of whole-hearted and admiring approval of them, if we did not feel that Hindu orthodoxy may twist them to endorse its own narrow bigotry. There is no moral currency that can be debased in a system of child-marriages and child widowhood. The moral currency of marriage has first to be restored to its original standard before the rule of irrevocability can be safely applied to it. The efforts of social reformers in India for nearly a century have been directed to fortify the sanctity of the marriage relation by getting rid of the cruel and oppressive wrongs that have come to be associated with it. Divorce and remarriage are but temporary expedients to be discarded when marriage is placed on the high plane of a free union of hearts.

What was Harrison's position in politics? He called himself "a republican and a puritan," but he "loved good order, historic permanence and personal dignity." He had a whole-hearted admiration for Oliver Cromwell and his Life of the Great Protector in the English Statesmen series, is a brilliant monograph. If we remember, Frederic Harrison himself traced his descent from one of the close associates and colleagues of Oliver. But great as his admiration was, Harrison's judgment on the dark episodes in Cromwell's career, is unflinching and crystal-clear. Lord Morley, who has also written an excellent "Life" of Oliver Cromwell, is deeply antipathetic to both puritanism and religion as political forces, and, moreover, he holds that it is a common error to ascribe far too much to the designs and the influence of eminent men, of rulers and of Governments. "The momentum of past events," Morley writes "the spontaneous impulses of the mass of a nation or a race, the pressure of general hopes and fears, the new things learned in the onward and diversified motions of 'the great spirit of human knowledge', all have more to do with the progress of the world's affairs, than the deliberate views of even the most determined and far-sighted of its individual leaders". True, but the individual leaders are leaders precisely because they are the embodiments in a larger measure than their contemporaries of the influences which Lord Morley regards as moulding history at a given time among a given people. And does the individual leader count for nothing? According to Lord Morley's point of view, English history would have proceeded pretty nearly as it has done if there was never a person called Oliver Cromwell. Frederick Harrison is equally imbued with the historic spirit, but his estimate of the value of the individual in history is widely different. "The one condition of the maintenance of his (Oliver Cromwell's) rule," writes Harrison, "was the duration of his life. Had his life been prolonged to the age of seventy-five—now almost the normal limit for modern statesman—the Protectorate might have lasted for twenty years instead of five. It is perhaps not an idle dream that, in some way, it might have handed on a peaceful and reformed State to a Constitutional Monarchy, without the debasing interlude of the Restoration." Harrison agrees with Morley that the dominant spirit of the Commonwealth, Puritanism, was fatally impracticable for constructive work as a political and social scheme. But he points out that Oliver as he grew larger in statesmanship, became less and less the rigid Puritan, the literal Bible zealot. He was, thus, the only man at the time who could have controlled the dominant Puritan spirit and shaped it to practical political use. The whole of this discussion has an intimate bearing on questions agitating many minds in India today. Lord Morley draws from Cromwell's career the lesson that revolutions do not change the course of history, although the spirit of the revolutionary is essential to keep history on the path of progress. This is a mystifying and paradoxical doctrine like much of Lord Morley's work at the India Office. Harrison, on the other hand, holds that English history took a new start from Cromwell, as did the history of Europe from the French Revolution.

Mahatma Gandhi's Health: Some days ago we heard from a reliable source that the latest news about Mahatma Gandhi was that he was losing interest in what was going on in the outer world, was getting absorbed in himself and that he spoke little to Mr. Banker who is lodged in the same cell with him. We thought this was but natural as Mahatma Gandhi is one of the rare souls who, having done their best, do not worry themselves as to the fate of their work when they are no longer able to further it. This can come only of a strict soul-discipline which prevents the worker from forming an egotistic attachment to his work. The next we heard of the matter was in the shape of the Government communique contradicting the rumour that the Mahatma was suffering from melancholia. The official communication said that the Mahatma was cheerful and in good spirits. It was from the Hindu of the 17th instant that we got the full version of the rumour, given in bold type as from its own Bombay correspondent: "It is rumoured in certain circles that Mahatmaji is not only suffering from melancholia, but there is some sort of insanity mixed with it. Long solitary confinement has had a serious effect on his brain." The correspondent added that the rumour was as yet unconfirmed. Those who know the massive strength of Gandhi's mind, have little fear that it will give way under the strain of the rigid seclusion which is enforced upon him, but one cannot but be apprehensive of the effect of the sudden change from an extra-ordinarily active life to the complete seclusion of Yerravda Jail. The civilised world expects those responsible for the Mahatma's treatment in jail to temper it so as not to impair the free functioning of his mental faculties, and it will not accept any excuse of rules should anything happen in that direction. Many men who have come out of jails in the several provinces have published their experiences. In no province, does there appear to be the complete seclusion from what passes in the outer world, as in Bombay and in respect of Mahatma Gandhi.

A New Reason for Indianising the Services: When the horror of the Dyer exploit at Jallianwala was fresh in men's minds, a Bill was introduced, and it passed the three readings, in the Council of State, to regulate the firing upon crowds by military or police authorities. No more was heard of it till a member raised the point in the Legislative Assembly the other day by proposing to introduce a clause to a similar effect in the Criminal Procedure Code which is being amended. Another member then asked what had become of the Bill which had been passed by the Council of State and why it was not brought before the Assembly in due course. The new Home Member, Sir William Hailey, replied that it had been found impracticable to embody the proposal in an Act and that, therefore, the Bill had been allowed to lapse. The member was not satisfied. He asked how it was that Government did not make the discovery of its impracticability when the Bill was introduced, debated and passed in the Council of State. Sir William Hailey tersely replied: "Sir William Vincent (his predecessor) would be able to answer that question better than I." If the Legislative Assembly were not what it is, there should have been one intrepid member at least to move the adjournment of the House to consider the dangerous and novel principle implied in Sir William Hailey's reply. Is there no such thing as corporate responsibility in the Government of India? If Sir William Hailey is right, it means that no pledge or promise or statement made by an English member of Government is valid beyond the term of that member's tenure? If that be the case, it is obvious that there will be no Government with which the public can deal with any assurance till all its members are men who will remain in the country and be responsible to the public for their acts.

PRESENT CONDITIONS IN CHINA.

(BY THE REV. E. STANLEY JONES.)

It is not easy to write on the present conditions in China for the statements may not be true by the time the article gets into print. This is especially true of the political situation which is exceedingly kaleidoscopic. But I will give the impressions I received at the time. My trip took me through nearly all of the twenty two provinces. As the editor has requested that I should write upon the social and the political conditions, I will confine myself to them, only incidentally touching upon the religions, which after all must be taken into account as we face a situation.

I must confess that I came away not with a unified impression, but a contradictory one. I felt alternately delighted and despairing, sometimes amazed at some fresh manifestation of the people's essential greatness and then sick at heart over the failure of things. The Chinese people have a very deep moral sense, so much so that you could see an audience of sober, sane men literally pound themselves unconsciously as they sat and listened to a revelation of China's conditions. Yet nowhere in the world is things breaking down so for want of moral character in the officials. In many ways the Chinese are exceedingly clean, and yet one citizen of Amoy announced to me that his city was spoken of in the encyclopedia as the dirtiest city in the world. He said it with a smile and seemingly with a touch of pride. I agreed with the encyclopedia. China has the largest homogeneous people in the world and yet no country is more divided in many ways than China. At the hour of China's greatest opportunity, when the heavy hands of encroaching foreign nations have been lifted by the Washington Conference, she was never so helpless. The Chinese people have been a peace-loving people and are still so, but China has a larger number of men under arms today than any other nation in the world. She has a million and a half men under arms and at war with no one but herself. In spite of all of these soldiers, great sections of China are overrun with bandits roving about in bands of ten thousand and more, burning, looting and killing. The Chinese are the keenest business men in the world. They can beat the Jew on his own ground. Yet there is an utter lack of business sense shown in the government of the country save in rare cases. There is only one thing that is holding together the country at the present time—the ability of the people to take knocks and still carry on, they are the toughest people in the world, made so by centuries of knocks from disease and famine and oppression. But they still carry on. And that is the thing that makes me feel that even at this time this great people will carry on till they get their feet and their stride. Then let the world take notice, for never did a people prostrate, struggle to their knees and fall and rise, but with face toward the light as the Chinese people are doing at the present time.

The political situation is just now in another of the frequent transition stages. President Li is isolated, his cabinet has resigned (the best one they have had for a long time, I am told) and a new one with Gen. Chang as Premier has been formed. But this is only temporary, it seems, for the man who is pushing out the present Government and who is to replace President Li is Tsao Kun, the Chief of the military. He is said to have nineteen of the twenty two provinces behind him. He will be the next President with Gen. Wu Pei Fu, the general who defeated Gen. Chang Tao Lin, the Manchurian War Lord last spring, as Vice-President. Not that any election will be held or is even in contemplation, for offices are not obtained by election now in China. The man who gets a place sits tight until some one ousts him either by force or by intrigue. There are said to be thousands of office-seekers in Peking at the present time gathered from all parts hungrily waiting for a turn of the wheel of the machinery that may put in a friend or a relative when their chance will come. A gentleman will hand you his card on which is printed not only his occupation and offices but those he hopes to have, such as "Prospective Magistrate," or "Registered for a Post in the custom" etc.

Gen. Chang Tso Lin, though defeated last spring, only withdrew into his province of Manchuria and there he still holds full sway. The Government does not try to punish or degrade him for fighting it. It can do nothing. So Chang Tso Lin still stays on as lord just as much as he was before. Sun Yat Sen has been put out of Canton and a Northern sympathiser Gen. Chen put in his place. But Sun's troops withdrew from Canton only to pounce on another province, Fuloien, and take it and this he still holds. I was at Foochow, the capital of the province, and saw his troops in charge and we were fired at when our launch went up the river. Just an ordinary nightly incident.

The star of Wu Pei Fu, the hero of six months ago, is waning. The country thought that he would save the situation. But he has not done anything worth while. While the star of Wu Pei Fu wanes, the star of another military man waxes—General Feng Yu Shang, the Christian general. He is the one man who is gripping the heart of China more and more. Both Christian and non-Christian look on him as the one strong man who has no ulterior motives and seeks nothing for himself. He really defeated Chang Tso Kin last spring though Wu Pei Fu got the credit. He governs every province he holds righteously and for the sake of the people. His army is the best disciplined in China and is out to serve China not to make a place for its general. Many who know him say that he might be the man that can save the situation. He may be the next president.

All this time I have been writing, I have not mentioned constitutional government, for though I have been describing a Republic, there is no constitutional Government. The situation has largely resolved itself into semi-independent provinces held by military governors paying some contribution to the Central Government at Peking (although eleven out of the twenty two provinces pay nothing to Peking and are really independent). This is discouraging, but it may be the way out. Federalism seems at present the only plan of unification that may ultimately work. Certainly it seems impossible for Peking to impose its will on any of the Province to any extent. The only thing that seems possible is that the situation be accepted, that these various Governors and their rights be recognized, that after recognition they voluntarily tie up to Peking and become more and more responsible to it and thus gradually sum up things there as constitutionalism grows. This was accomplished in America and it may yet be accomplished in China.

The remarkable thing is that, with all this breakdown in Government, the country goes on. It shows the essential solidity of the life of China that, when the bottom drops out of the Government, the country does not hasten to ruin. The people have not had much connection with the Government in the past ages. Life has been founded on the family, not on the State; so with the collapse of the State there is no collapse in life as in Russia.

The thing that seems to be lacking is the community spirit. I mentioned the dirt of Amoy. The shops along the street are individually very clean, but the refuse and filth is dumped out of the individual home into the community street and there it lies. No one clears it up. In their games they have never played together. Their play has been individual play until recently when modern games of playing together have come in. The family life has been developed, the guild life has also functioned, but there is little community, and there is much less national feeling. Shantung has been given back to China. While the matter was red-hot there was a good deal of agitation about it and a great deal of bitterness as shown in the boycott of all Japanese things. But when it was decided the province should be restored to China and that Japan should evacuate, little interest was taken in the matter except to make it exceedingly difficult for the man who was taking it over, because not enough jobs were given to hungry office-seekers of the local province. Outside of that, little patriotic interest was taken and it was given back practically without comment. As far as I could see, there was no rejoicing of any kind.

(BY KRISTODAS.)

A slogan of the alumni of the Yale University at the time of their processions is said to be "Marry them early, Treat them rough." A writer in a leading American monthly attempts an analysis of this and asks whether it betokens a growing feeling to go back to the stage of the caveman on the part of modern men and women. He finds support for this supposition from modern literature as represented by novels like the Sheikh and a goodly portion of short stories appearing in periodicals. Many heroes are treated in this kind of literature as beating their wives and yet this literature is not only liked but also sells tremendously, betokening an avidity of the public for it. The democratising of literature which began with the printing Press and the modern cheap editions has naturally resulted in bringing down the standard of literature and making it suitable for popular tastes. At the same time, however, it has made literature as it is a fairly good index to the inclinations and general temperament of the people in a way which could not be said of earlier literature. The question is, therefore, if the signs and portents as given out by some of the modern books and periodicals really go to show that the public in general in the West has come to regard beating of wives as a normal method of bringing about domestic peace and concord. It may be that there is some reaction against the over-worshipping of women for which the so-called Age of Chivalry was responsible. Woman was placed on a pedestal from which she could not descend to take part in the activities of public life. It was a clever stratagem of Man to monopolise everything to himself by thus driving our Woman from all public life under the guise of paying her compliments. The Nineteenth Century industrialism followed later on by the war brought Woman in the limelight and she herself chose to tear off the curtains that had encircled her for long. Her long seclusion from public life made her yearn all the more for sunshine and light and life and all the privileges which Man was enjoying. She could not, however, both eat her cake and have it. In getting her place on an equality with Man she lost the special privileges which were accorded to her when she was enjoying the solitude of the lonely heights. "Women and Children first" is one of the noble heritages of the past which threatens to be changed just as there has been a change effected already in the oath to be taken by the wife through the omission of the word "Obey" in the marriage service. In Continental countries like Germany and France, few think of offering their seats to women in buses and trams unless they are old or feeble. In fact you make of yourself a cyonure of all eyes if you offer your seat to a young lady. Not only this, but I have seen young ladies themselves refusing to take seats if offered to them. These old time courtesies persist to some extent in conservative England but they are threatened with a speedy extinction there too. Woman has got her vote, why should she have a preference in the matter of seats?

We have not yet come to all this state of things in this country, but we are sure to. Arguments based, however, on the Western conditions are already being used against extending the domain of Woman and against enfranchising her like her sisters of the West. I heard only the other day a friend of mine with a pretty long English experience saying that the Hindu Woman was always considered a superior being and that it was almost a desecration to bring her down from this pedestal by giving her all the political rights and privileges to which man was entitled. Shades of hundreds of thousands of child wives and widows rise up to refute this statement which is used as a mere platitude to thwart the progress of Woman towards light and liberty. It is dishonest to deny to our sisters the sunshine of life on the plea of despiritualising them when the whole treatment meted out to them up to this time is the very antithesis of spiritual. Nor will the question be disposed of by merely saying that Woman herself does not want any reforms in her present status. Slaves do not like to be freed from their chains which they have come to hug fondly through a long association with them.

It was a poor woman in rags who sang the melancholy song but sung with a woman's voice that it went to the hearts of all those who heard it. It was simple in texture with no ornamentation such as sophisticated poetry loves to put as a gloss upon the expression of human emotions. It was a natural ebullition of human feelings and emotions, giving the sad tragedy of a Hindu woman. She was in a distant land dying, evidently of a long, persistent, silent cruelty which a Hindu mother-in-law knows so well to practise. She sends a message with birds to her sister, sister-in-law and mother-in-law. There is no bitterness in the words but the very simplicity is heart-breaking. "Tell my mother-in-law that the clothes which she sent proved too many for me." "Tell my sister-in-law that I am dead." There is restraint upto the last which a Hindu wife is expected to keep on her feelings. She dares not lift her head even when away in distant lands but with drooping head, looking mildly at the blue of the heavens above and the fleeting forms of birds, sends her last message with just a hint of sarcasm and a flood of poignancy. This simple song typifies the life of a Hindu wife as it is lived more or less. It is the Western winter which is gray with mists and snow and biting winds from the North. When one is there in the winter, he remembers with a yearning home-sickness the blue skies and the shining sun of the East. This is what Nature has provided for us and yet Humanity has ordained that even in this country with its proverbial blue sky and shining sun there should be a perpetual gray winter for its daughters.

The scene changes again and this time it is a dark winter night in London with a slight drizzle of snow. Streets are flaring with electric lamps and the restless pedestrians are seen in their hundreds making their way hither and thither in search of food or pleasure or in pursuit of employment. A woman is seen singing at the time on a street near a pavement—for alms. It is a rare sight in London though it is common enough on the Continent. The effect of that voice in that snow and cold with darkness illuminated by electric flares was something weird. Crowds were passing by heedlessly and only a stray man or woman would, attracted by the singing and the face, stop for a while, drop a coin in the extended basket and merge in the darkness beyond. Still that voice went on with its pathetic and sad music with a note of protest in it against—the world? Next morning I learnt that the wife of an ex-officer of the British Army tried to maintain her husband and two children for some time by singing on the streets. That voice and that music reminded me of a simple song I heard thousands of miles away in India. The melancholy pathos in both was the same and the East and the West truly met in their sorrow. While, however, that Indian voice was a protest against social injustice, the Western voice was a protest against industrial injustice. It is upon such protests that revolutionary movements are really based. For a time protests are made in this sweet and gentle manner appealing to the hearts of people. When they go unheeded they rise in the form of a column of fire burning everything within their reach as the Russian revolution devastated the whole of the old society. When the protests assume the form of a prairie fire, nothing will quench them. They must consume everything which the people hold sacred and dear hoping that a new world of justice and fairness will rise from the ashes. The business of statesmen, whether in politics or in industrial and social fields, is to heed to protests before it is too late.

THE BENARES HINDU UNIVERSITY CONVOCATION.

(By Mr. RAMAGYAN DWIEDI B. A. HONS.)

The sixth Convocation of the University this year had to witness a considerable number of varied activities. The whole week was crowded with an overflowing number of visitors and students who came in connection with the ceremony. Among them were Dr. Rabindra Nath Tagore, Sir Devaprasad Sirbhadhikari, M. Ishwar Sharan, Dr. Radha Kumud Mukerjee and famous scholars like Dr. C. V. Raman. Quite a number of brilliant addresses came off, two of them being from Dr. Raman on "Whispering Galleries" and "The Physics of the Himalayas" illustrated by lantern slides. Special interest attached to the lectures as they were based mostly on the research made by the Professor himself during recent months. M. Ishwar Sharan, the well-known publicist of Allahabad, gave a general address to the students on their University life and pleaded for a better recognition of the claims of women in education and social status and for a higher spirit of national life among the students in general. Mr. P. P. Shashtri M. A. (Oxon) of Madras also gave a very vivid picture of a day in Oxford, dealing with the life and atmosphere of Oxford College education. Another distinguished visitor was the Indian Commissioner at the British Empire Exhibition at London, Dewan Bahadur T. Vijayaraghavacharyar, M.A., who broke his journey at Benares on his way to Lucknow, to visit the University. He expressed himself particularly delighted at the progress of the University and hoped to have the privilege of coming again for a more leisurely study of the institution in the course of his coming official tour throughout India.

Another noteworthy lecture was that of Dr. Brown Ph. D. of America delivered under the auspices of the Post Graduate Association. He spoke of life in American Universities, dwelling mainly on the athletic and social activities of the students and pointed out that, as far as the purely intellectual aspect of education was concerned, there was little difference between India and America. Dr. Brown talked of the tremendous athletic activities, the various organisations managed by students for social and disciplinarian affairs and co-education on an extensive scale which is a striking feature of American University life. Professor Sheshadri in his Presidential remarks said that the difference which struck observers most between the average Indian student and the American student was that the former was somewhat tame and docile while the latter evinced a good deal of spirit and self-reliance. He mentioned a batch of American students who had come from Harvard and Princeton last year to the University, to watch whom was an inspiration, as they had been sent on their world-wide tour by their parents after the completion of their education.

The same week a number of other social functions were arranged, the foremost of them being an interesting dinner party given by the students to the Old Boys of the University. Rai G. N. Chakravati Bahadur M.A.L.L.B., I.S.O., D. Sc., the Vice-Chancellor of the Lucknow University, was entertained, with a number of distinguished guests by Professor Sheshadri at a full-moon evening party, which was very enjoyable especially as the guest had recently been honoured by the University of Allahabad with the honorary degree of Doctor of Science. Another interesting dinner party was given by Professor Bhardwaj to the actors and organisers of the drama staged by the University students last month, while owing to the energy and enthusiasm of Prof. Rane and Dr. Bhanagar there was a very finely arranged chemical dinner in the convocation shamiana where 250 people were entertained. Toasts were enthusiastically drunk to the mother-land, the University, the Department of Chemistry and the guests; a number of speeches were delivered which were highly appreciated. Among the most distinguished visitors was the great poet and sage of Bolpur whom the University had the privilege of welcoming on the occasion of his visit to Benares at a large and crowded meeting in the Central Hall of the University on the 9th December. The President, in a brief speech welcomed him, eulogising his services to the country and the world as a poet, educationist and patriot. He assured him that he was among the greatest visitors received within the walls of the University and the day of his visit would count as a red-letter day in its annals. Dr. Tagore made a suitable reply, emphasising the idea of international brotherhood and thereafter visited the College of Engineering where he was shown round the machines and the workshop by Principal King of the College.

One of the most important social functions was the staging of the Hindi play, Mahabharat, by the students at the Visheshwar Theatre. There was a large audience in accommodating whom there was some difficulty, the spectators representing not only the student element but also diverse interests in the city. All through, the performance was managed with considerable ability, music and scene arrangements supplementing the high histrionic talents of the actors. Striking popular testimony to the excellence of the play was furnished by the offer of a large number of medals given by the public to the many actors. The success was largely due to the exertion and co-operation of a handful of Professors and students and we hope the Dramatic Society will become a permanent feature of the University and the public will have the benefit of such entertainments from time to time.

The athletic associations of the various institutions combined to produce a brilliant display of annual sports on the spacious grounds in front of the University Amphitheatre. Prof. S. D. Pantey and other members of the association concerned, worked hard and were able to entertain from day to day the many students and guests who came to witness the function, the most interesting of them being the long bicycle race of 15 miles, the slow bicycle race and the long and high jump in all of which a number of medals were awarded. The same week there were two very interesting mushairas in Urdu and Hindi in which medals awarded to the best writers were given by Professors Inamdar and Jai of the University. The second All-India debate held under the auspices of the University, came off in the convocation week, Sir Devaprasad Sarbadhikari, Rai G. N. Chakravati Bahadur and Principal Dhruva acting as Judges. They were representatives from various parts of the country the subject for discussion being—"The ethical principles governing the relation of man to man cannot be observed in the various relations, internal and external, of one state to another." The Saraswati Trophy awarded by the Hon'ble Raja Moti Chand, C. I. E. was given by the judges to the C. E. College of the University, so that it comes back from the Aligarh Muslim University which won it last year. The first and the second gold medals were awarded to Messrs. P. H. Patwardhan and Jagnandanlal respectively of the University and the third one to Khurshed Lal of the Lucknow Canning College. The Old Boys Association of the University awarded an extra prize to Mr. G. Saiduddin of Aligarh in appreciation of the able speech made by him, although he was not the recipient of one of the official prizes. The medal for the best lady speaker was awarded to Miss Binapan Ghose of the local Theosophical Girls' College. Principal Dhruva awarded one of the medals, while two prizes and books were given by Prof. Sheshadri to the best male and female speakers. After the debates, there was an interesting tea-party and a group photograph of the competitors and the judges.

Besides these multifarious activities the convocation itself was a charming ceremony. Not only the several hundred graduates in their academic robes were to be seen, but also a number of Sastris of the College of Oriental Learning and Theology appeared on the occasion in their Swadeshi pugrees and achkans. The Ekadasi Kathas, recited by the Vice-Chancellor, Pandit Malaviya himself, were indeed worthy of the Hindu University. The donation of a sum of about 3 lacs for the hostel arrangements of lady students of the University was announced and a special arrangement for the religious instruction of Sikh students was considered. A number of other constitutional changes were effected and their Highnesses the Maharajas of Baroda and Bikaner were elected the Chancellor and pro-Chancellor respectively.

The Colleges of Agriculture, Law, Medicine and many other valuable institutions of the University are yet to be started and we hope their Highnesses will do their best to enhance the various activities of the University and fulfil their noble aims and high aspirations, so that the University will live long and will see many more such convocations.

THE INDIAN NATIONAL SOCIAL CONFERENCE

The thirty second session of the Indian National Social Conference was held at Gaya under the Presidentship of Mr M. B. Jayakar, Bar-at-Law, on the 29th of December 1922. The authorities of the Jamiat-ul-Ulema conference very kindly lent their spacious pandal for this purpose. It was estimated that about four thousand people were present at the Conference including a considerable number of ladies, most of the leaders attending the Congress were also present.

The session commenced at 9 A. M. and terminated at about 12 noon. Babu Gorakh Prasad (of Champaran), the Chairman of the Reception Committee welcomed the delegates in a nice little speech in Hindi. The following is a brief summary of his address:

Brothers and Sisters,

It is indeed a day of supreme delight to me to have been privileged to offer you, on behalf of Bihar a cordial welcome to this holy city of Gaya. I am fully conscious of the fact that we have not been able to make arrangements for a fitting reception; but I hope that, when you look towards our love, esteem and our zeal, you will not care to mind the drawbacks.

I know there is only one desire, which is uppermost in the hearts of all of us assembled here and that desire is the desire for serving our Motherland to the best of our ability. I further realise that you all have taken the trouble of gathering here, only because you are obsessed with that one desire. I have to say only this much that both the political uplift and the social emancipation of a country should go hand in hand. Unfortunately, if it not be so, the achievement of our goal will be rendered difficult if not impossible. But the work of the Non-Co-operation movement of the last two years has lightened the social work to a large extent. I do not want to take much of your time. Suffice it to say that a little effort on our part is sure to advance the cause. Now Sri Jut Dwarkanath will propose Mr. Jayakar, who takes much interest in social work, for the presidentship and I request you to proceed with the further business after he is formally elected president.

Mr. M. R. Jayakar was then elected President and delivered his address which was published in the Reformer of the 6th January. The following resolutions were passed:

RESOLUTIONS.

1. This conference is of opinion that the inhuman custom of untouchability imposed on the depressed classes of India should be abolished forthwith and, for this purpose, calls upon all representative bodies of thought and action in every province and all such authorities as Sankaracharyas and Mahants to issue manifestoes advocating the removal of untouchability and the grant of equal social and religious rights and privileges to such neglected people.

Proposed by: Mr. Deep Narayan Singh. (Behar). Seconded by: Mr. Abbas Tayabji (Baroda). Supported by: Dr. K. D. Shastri, (Punjab) and Mr. Behary Lall of Dohra Dun.

2. This conference earnestly desires that more strenuous efforts should be made to educate our women so that they may be able more effectively to discharge their multifarious duties and attain that high position which they occupied in the past. This Conference urges that in order to arrest the increasing deterioration in the health of our girls and women, immediate steps should be taken to remove its causes including the Purdah system. It further records that it is strongly of opinion that in order to put a stop to the suicidal custom of early marriages, a sustained agitation be carried on in the press as well as on the platforms to impress upon the people the desirability of never marrying their girls until they are of 16 years old. It further condemns the evil custom of marrying young girls to old persons. This conference is of opinion that every possible reduction in the expenses should be made in performing various ceremonies particularly those in connection with marriages.

Moved by Mrs. Sarojini Naidu, seconded by Mr. C. Vijayaraghavaohariar and supported by Mr. Stokes of Kotgarh, Mrs. Deep Narain Singh, Shrimati U. Chandrama Devi, Miss Natarajan and Shrimati Santosh Gupta.

3. This conference resolves that with a view to relieve the sufferings of an overwhelming number of innocent infant and child widows of marriageable age, immediate and practical steps be taken for their remarriage if desired and for starting widows' homes for the proper training and advancement of those who prefer to lead a life of widow-hood. In this connection, this conference expresses its high appreciation of the work of the Vidhwa Vihab Sabha and the munificence of Sir Ganga Ram in maintaining it.

Moved by Lala Dunichand (Punjab) and seconded by Kartar Singh (Punjab.)

4. This conference resolves that the only true and effective excise policy for India is that of total prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drugs and drinks except for medical purposes and appeals to every province to carry on an intensive campaign to get this policy adopted in as short a time as possible.

Moved by Professor Ruchiram Sahni (Panjab) and seconded by B. Rajindra Prasad (Bihar)

5. (I.) This conference views with condemnation the immoral practice of selling girls under the pretence of marriage prevalent in certain parts of the country and appeals to all the well-wishers of the community to discourage the practice as far as it lies in their power.

II. This conference strongly condemns the cruel custom of charging dowries at the time of marriage which prevails even among the educated class of the Hindu community.

6. This conference urges upon all concerned the immediate need of organising the social-conference with a view to carry on a sustained agitation throughout the year by forming District and Provincial conference committees and raising subscription for the purpose of maintaining the offices of the Central Committee.

7. This conference appoints Mr. K. Natarajan as the General Secretary and Mr. S. Sadanand as Assistant Secretary for the next year.

(From the Chair).

SCIENCE AND POLITICS.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

SIR,

Propos the note "Science and Politics" in your current issue, will you or the Director of Information let the public know through your columns, what the law is in regard to the possession, use etc. of wireless apparatus in India? When was the law first made? Is it still in force? Are the Times of India authorities exempted from the operation of that law? If not, how is it that some few months ago (four or five, if I remember right) the Times of India organised and successfully carried out a series of wireless telephonic communications with Poona, a ship at sea and so forth, according to its own accounts published at that time? If there is no such law on the statute-book or if it has long since expired, how are the following news coming from responsible and veteran quarters to be accounted for?

"The West, particularly America, is Radio-mad. Even little boys in American schools are making their own little sets of radio apparatus. In China it is coming greatly into vogue for commercial and administrative purposes, and it is needless to add that Japan has been making continually increasing use of wireless telegraphy and wireless telephony, for that is what radio means. India lags behind, as conscience makes the Government here excessively suspicious and fearful. The Calcutta University Science College wanted to set up a radio apparatus, only for educational purposes, i. e. for teaching and experimentation, but Government refused permission"—Modern Review, November 22, p. 652).

I remember a similar statement made about two years ago in the Indian Social Reformer regarding a like prohibition at the Bombay University. Now in its latest issue we read: "Does Sir Vieweswaraya (President of the Science Congress at Lucknow) know that wireless apparatus which are widely available as scientific toys by the general public in several countries are prohibited in India and that when some persons imported them the apparatus were confiscated?"

I have asked the above questions particularly as I am interested in a local "Scouting" enterprise on the Baden-Powell system which is under Government's auspices and which according to an official propagandist is meant to train up our Boy Scouts in any or all of a number of accomplishments ranging from wireless telegraphy down to gardening and cookery. A boy, forsooth, free to learn practical wirelessing which is forbidden to a University post-graduate student! (By the same token, can the Director of Information or anybody on Government's behalf assure us with perfect confidence that at no place in India and at no time a private school has been forbidden the use and possession of chemicals like sulphur, saltpetre etc. even in small quantities for laboratory purposes, under the Explosives Act or any other Act?) It is disgraceful that our Universities should have to submit to the practice of untouchability towards a Science,—which it literally comes to when your instruction is restricted to "cramming" the theory of wirelessing, and to handle, touch or experiment with its apparatus is taboo to you; and all—because you are an Indian! Are we living in the Dark ages when in the West (and the West only) the pursuit of certain sciences called the Black Arts was rigorously banned? Yes, we are living in the Dark ages as far as the British Indian Government is concerned. Will Sir George Lloyd, our Governor and Chancellor of the Bombay University, who is a professed and even militant champion of modernism versus Medievalism, look at this and feel flattered, I wonder?

Yours etc.,
A SON OF INDIA.

Karwar, 20-1-1923.

[The case that we had particularly in mind was that of Mr. Khandubhai, son of the Hon. Mr. Lalubhai Samaldas, C. I. E. and a graduate of the Bombay University.—Ed. I. S. R.]

DEV SAMAJ AND FLESH EATING.

THE EDITOR, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I am extremely glad to read the good work which is being done by the Dev Samaj of Lahore. It is quite encouraging to read that the Samaj has undertaken the work of reformation of two settlements of criminal tribes. If our priests and religious men, instead of muttering Sanskrit hymns which they don't understand, will devote half the time in trying to uplift their backward communities, India will be a different country. If we break hearts before these idols, God does not come. We weep and our tears drop on the ground. But when we try to extend our hands to a fallen man, a brother, God comes unasked to bless us, noble feelings stir within us. We become strong, healthy, fearless, and cheerful. Our priests and Sanyasins must know that God hates cringing and begging. He stands erect within the hearts of those reformers who extend their hands out of sympathy and fellow-feeling to their fallen brothers and sisters. God hates slavishness and arrogance equally. He runs from those who seek Him slavishly and comes to seek those who try to serve His fallen children. We are grateful to the Dev Samaj for this parotical noble example of humanity and wish it a great success. It is with sympathy, therefore, that I take the liberty of pointing out a weak point of the Samaj which, in my opinion, will hamper its growth and spread. In your note, you give the list of gross sins which every Samajist is pledged not to indulge in. Flesh eating is in the list of gross sins. I ask these Samajists if, in their eyes, flesh-eating is as great a sin as adultery or drinking. Those workers who wish to uplift our masses should be more tolerant on this point than the Samajists. Some Brahmins and Banias, when they try to uplift the masses, try to thrust on their brains what has been thrust on theirs in their boyhood. A reformer's task is different; he must not come with a list of gross sins and induce the people to pledge not to indulge in them. A reformer must study the masses like a gardener, he should remove only those weeds which impede their progress. If we go to a village and ask a villager not to drink, he admits the evil effects of wine. His wife comes with her children to show the miseries of drunkenness, she thanks us with tears in her eyes and is ready in every way to help us.

But talk to the very man against flesh-eating. He will ask the reformer if he could defeat him in wrestling, in lifting weights. He will tell him plainly that it is the flesh eating that has made him stronger than an eater of vegetables, rice and pulse. Some Brahmins and Banias who put flesh-eating in their list of sins, hate actually the flesh eaters as if these weaklings can live without their protection. Those who study our castes will agree, I believe, that hatred of flesh-eaters is a chief factor which plays havoc in the minds of these weaklings. Castes cannot be broken by holding caste-dinners once a year. Bombay Hotels hold such dinners every day. I am a strict vegetarian. But I know too well my community of Brahmins does not form the Nation. I must broaden my view to suit all my countrymen. Brahmins and the Banias are not the only vegetarians but some of our weaklings make so much fuss over this 'kitchen-religion' that they do more evil than good. If you want to break down castes, knock-down this 'Kitchen-religion' and the hatred of flesh eaters. If you don't want to eat flesh, don't eat it but tolerate flesh eaters; don't assume superior airs over your vegetarian diet. A goat lives on vegetables, a stone eats nothing. Is, therefore, a goat or a stone superior to man? It is the hatred of flesh-eaters which is responsible for the structure of caste-system. Remove this hatred and caste-system melts down in no time. Among the Parsis there are vegetarian families, but they don't make so much fuss over it and hate their non-vegetarian brothers.

Vegetarian communities with a few exceptions are unfit for self-defence. Heroism is unknown to them. It is these communities which have tyrannized women under the name of religion, it is these communities which impoverish our masses by their merciless dealings with them. They may have saved the lives of some hundred pigeons, goats and hens but they have not served man with their lives. They are misanthropic, unknown to joie de vivre and humour. Non-vegetarian communities have served our country, had fought for its freedom and have been chivalrous to women. Let us be more tolerant to them, remembering that our ancestors were also once flesh-eaters. Will Dev Samajists be so tolerant as to remove flesh-eating from their list of gross sins.

Yours sincerely,
JAWHARIAN.

— 10: —

Lord Peel's Despatch: The despatch which the Secretary of State has addressed to the Government of India on the subject of further constitutional reforms, is precisely what might have been expected of him or any one else holding that office. The Indian Legislative Assembly met for the first time in January 1921. In September of that year, Rai Bahadur Muzumdar moved a resolution asking for the grant of provincial autonomy and of responsibility in the Central Government. If that resolution had been passed, it would have obliged the Secretary of State to give an answer to it on its merits. Instead of it, however, an amendment proposed by Sir William Vincent, on behalf of Government, was accepted. The amendment requested Government to convey to the Secretary of State the view of the Assembly that the progress made by India on the path of responsible government warranted re-examination and revision of the present constitution at an earlier date than 1929. This amendment, it will be seen, while appearing to favour further constitutional advance, really suggested to the Secretary of State the reasons, now given, for resisting it. The idea that, between January and September, the country made such remarkable progress as to require a revision of the reforms before the expiry of the ten-year period, is, of course, too obviously impossible to escape observation even by a more convinced believer in progress than Viscount Peel. The other two reasons given by him for declining to consider the suggestion of the Assembly, are really elaborations of this main argument. The electorate should be trained. The possibilities—also the impossibilities which are far more numerous—of the new scheme, should be more fully tested. The Assembly was led by the cleverness of the Home Member into passing a resolution which suggested arguments for its own rejection. Only a very great statesman could have resisted the temptation to turn the tables so easily on the Assembly, and Viscount Peel is only an average politician—put into the position which he occupies, because no one else would have it when it fell vacant on the dismissal of Mr. Montagu. Those who accepted the reforms as sufficient and workable, while it was as a fact utterly insufficient and unworkable, can have no effective reply to his arguments.

The Royal Commission on the Services? The Secretary of State has decided to appoint a Royal Commission to enquire into the grievances of the English Services in India. The moderate papers raised a loud protest against this step and the Anglo-Indians have joined it. In the Legislative Assembly a motion for adjournment because of this decision of Lord Peel's, was carried, the Government offering a half-hearted opposition. Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru, just emerged from the portals of the Government of India, declares that a Committee in India would have been preferable. The reasons advanced against the Royal Commission are, first, that it will create bitterness of feeling and, secondly, that it will involve a large expenditure. We do not think that there is much in either of these reasons. A public enquiry is always to be preferred to a hole and corner enquiry, even though it may cost somewhat more than the latter. A Royal Commission Report is always published, while some recent important Indian Committees' Reports have not seen the light of day. And then a Royal Commission has more authority to order the production of papers and other evidence. If the Services have grievances, it is best to have them investigated in the broad light of day. Only, we trust that ample opportunity will be given to represent the other side—the grievance it would be to the people to have the emoluments of these Services further increased while they are hard put to make the two ends meet. We fancy that the opposition of Government and the Liberal Press is due to the fact that their representatives will have to appear before the Commission and testify publicly as to the reasonableness or otherwise of the Services' demands. If they accept them as reasonable they will have to find the funds: if they do not, they must face the opposition of the Services. We are unable to join in the protest against the public enquiry ordered by Lord Peel. We think the Secretary of State, in this case, has adopted a straightforward course.

Conditions in China: The illuminating observations on the internal condition of China with which the Rev. Stanley Jones has favoured us, received an impressive illustration from a singularly interesting address delivered in the Wilson College Hall last Thursday by Mr. T. Z. Koo, one of the travelling Secretaries of the World Students' Christian Movement. Mr. Koo is a young man—the type of the Chinese Christians who are playing so prominent a part in the development and direction of the national movement in China. The amount of information which Mr. Koo compressed in his address lasting barely an hour, his shrewd observations and his frank avowal of the weak points of the Chinese national movement, were highly appreciated by the large audience which listened to him. Referring to the foreign nations chiefly interested in China, Mr. Koo described their respective methods in three terse sentences. The Americans did not want to involve themselves in the internal affairs of China: they only wanted an open door for their trade. Whenever anything went wrong, their method did not go beyond remonstrance and advice. The British method was to find some "strong man" and back him up in order to maintain the peace and order which was necessary for their trade. They supported the Mandarin reaction against the new Republicans, when it seemed to them that the Mandarins were the most likely to maintain peace and order. Now, added Mr. Koo with scarcely a twinkle in his eye, the British Foreign Office must be in difficulty to fix upon its next "strong man". The Japanese fomented civil war by impartially helping the stronger as well as the weaker party. The Chinese method, as described by Mr. Koo, of getting self-government was for the Provinces to non-co-operate with the Central Government. The Central Government automatically ceased, and then the Provincial Governors or Generals fought till one of them got the upper hand. His government was similarly ousted, and the remaining Generals played the game again. In this way, a number of them had been eliminated, and there remained only a few who would soon decide among themselves, by the same process, who should be the ultimate ruler of China. Mr. Koo's address gave the impression that the daily lives of the people were not much affected by these Provincial contests which bulk so largely in the foreign press.

Miss Jane Addams in Bombay: It is a great pity that this eminent American worker and writer on social subjects, should have spent about a week in Bombay, without any public body being apprised of her visit. On the last day of her stay, however, the Social Service League arranged for an informal conversational meeting with her for the workers of the League. The hour fixed, 5 p. m. was far too early but the Servants of India Society's Hall filled up, and her short speech full of point was listened to with absorbed attention. She very kindly desired that questions may be put to her by members of the audience at the close of her speech, and one of the questions so put related, as might be expected, to the effect of Prohibition. Her reply, in the words of the Times of India report, is reproduced here:

Questioned as to how the law of prohibition had effected social workers in America, the lecturer said when prohibition was first put into law it made a very great deal of difference. In Chicago about a third of the city prison was closed because there were no prisoners to fill it with. A large ward in the hospital, where cases of accidents arising out of drunkenness were brought, was closed. Factory workers brought home larger sums of money. But while these ideal conditions still prevailed in villages and small towns, in large cities where there was a constant influx of European people a great deal of illicit drink traffic prevailed and it was difficult to strictly enforce the law. But on the whole there was no doubt that conditions had improved owing to prohibition. Of course a certain class of people of middle age who had had their drink all their lives would have it still, but prohibition would undoubtedly benefit the younger generation.

Social workers in Bombay will cherish the memory of the hour spent on Tuesday with this gracious lady—a pioneer in the field of social service in the Far West.

Malabar Tenants: We have received a copy of the Report of the Malabar Tenants' Conference held at Pattambi (South Malabar) on the 29th December under the presidentship of Mr. C. R. Reddy, M. L. C. The writings and speeches of well-known men like Mr. Logan, the Malabar historian, Sir T. Madhava Row, Sir Sankaran Nair, Dr. T. M. Nair and Mr. C. P. Ramaswamy Iyer on the subject are published as appendices to the Report. The question has been agitating the public mind in Malabar for nearly half a century and, in spite of the general consensus of opinion on the need of legislation remove the long-standing grievances of Malabar tenants, it is a mystery that the problem has not yet been solved. In his presidential address, Mr. Reddy referred to the social system and land system of Malabar as two "manthrams and mysteries." They are, in fact, the wretched relics of the dark days when Malabar had the misfortune to pass under the regime of feudal despots. Now that the Malabar tenants have organised themselves and secured the support of the party in power in Madras, it is to be hoped that the problem is nearing solution. We have urged more than once in these columns that the long-standing grievances of Malabar tenants should be removed without delay. A perusal of the Report will convince any one that landlordism in Malabar has been mainly responsible for the social and moral degeneration of the people inhabiting that "land of surprises." The example of the neighbouring States of Travancore and Cochin in passing legislative measures to remedy the grievances of the tenants of those States who were suffering from the same grievances as their brethren in British Malabar are still suffering from, must convince the powers that be that legislation on similar lines is indispensable for the internal peace and prosperity of Malabar.

The Thirty Medicos: The appointment of thirty Englishmen to the Indian Medical Service on special terms, has caused wide-spread dissatisfaction which has been voiced at several public meetings and even found expression in the Legislative Assembly at Delhi. Mr. C. R. Reddy presided at the public meeting in Madras and spoke bitterly of this importation of unwanted Englishmen at a time of dire financial distress. The ex-Inspector General of Education in Mysore remarked: "The other day Lord Willingdon in the course of his speech at the Y. M. C. A., seemed to have said that the British were out here to help them, but that they had no wish to stay here if they were not wanted. It was an admirable sentiment which lacked one merit, that of reality. Englishmen came here without invitation and, indeed, in spite of it!" Mr. Reddy declared that one Indian doctor in the districts was more useful than ten English doctors who were strangers to the customs and language of the people.

An Indian Hermit. The four stages of life—the student, householder, hermit, and sannyasin—were prescribed in the Hindu scriptures for men. Whatever might have been the case in the distant past, for several centuries in India, the married life has been regarded as the only appropriate one for women. Even Buddha allowed women to become religious mendicants only after much hesitation and not without misgivings. It is, however, characteristic of the Hindu temperament that, whilst women in other lands, are fighting for political privileges, a cultured Indian lady like Srimati Sarala Devi Choudhrani, a niece of the poet, Tagore, should quietly assert her equal right with men to the hermit and the sannyasin's stages ordained for men. We print to-day an interesting interview with her published by a contemporary.

What is Hinduism? We heartily commend to our readers two articles by Professor S. Radhakrishnan of the Calcutta University in the quarterlies as among the best exposition we have come across of what Hinduism is and what it is not. One of them is entitled "the Heart of Hinduism" and is given the place of honour in the Hibbert Journal for October. The other is headed "the Hindu Dharma" and occupies a similar position in the International Journal of Ethics in the same month. We may notice at length these articles at a later date.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1923.

CONGRESS PARTIES.

The centre of interest in Congress party politics has shifted to Bombay. Mr. C. R. Das arrived here about ten days ago with Babu Bhagwandas from Benares and has been engaged in daily conferences ever since at Mr. Jayakar's house where he puts up. Hakim Ajmal Khan has also come. The absence of Pandit Motilal Nehru, owing to the serious illness of his daughter, in Allahabad, is one reason why the policy and programme of the new party have evidently not yet been finally settled. The Working Committee of the Congress has also been meeting in Bombay since Monday. All the members, including Mr. Rajagopalachariar, Dr. Ansari, and Babu Rajendra Prasad, are in Bombay. There is a sincere desire on both sides to come to an understanding. Of that we are sure. If the leaders of the Congress majority realise the immense change in the conditions of the Indian political situation that has been brought about by events which have happened since Mahatma Gandhi's imprisonment, they will not hug to their bosoms the delusion that the non-co-operation movement is still alive. Take the following passage from the leader in Thursday's Bombay Chronicle which is a staunch, and even obstinate, champion of unqualified Non-Co-operation. Writing of the position arising out of the threatened failure of the Lausanne Conference to produce a Treaty acceptable to Turkey, our contemporary observes :

We are certain that if, as seems to be the case, the British Government are counting upon armed support in Irak and Arabia, in the event of war with Nationalist Turkey, they are as much deceived as is Mustafa Kemal in expecting anything like a general rising of the Indian Muslims in the said event. It is to the Government of India that the Muslims must look in such an event, and it is to bring pressure on the Government of India to support their cause that their efforts must and will be directed.

We call attention to the sentence which we have put in italics. Surely, it is impossible to bring pressure to bear upon the Government of India by refusing to have any point of contact with it. The only interpretation that we can put upon the sentence is that, in the opinion of Mr. Pickthall, the time is come for Indian Mahomedans to abandon the policy of non-co-operation with the Government of India. How, then, can Indian Mahomedans demand that the Congress should persist in non-co-operation? It is evident that the question is seriously exercising the minds of responsible Khilafat leaders. The non-co-operation movement was really started as a means of non-violent expression of the feelings created by the Khilafat question among Indian Mahomedans. If such a capable and sagacious adviser of Indian Mahomedans as the respected Editor of the Bombay Chronicle now tells them that it is to the Government of India that they must look to avert war between Turkey and Great Britain, with or without the Allies, it is plain as daylight that the need for non-co-operation has ceased, and with it the possibility of it.

It is not only the majority party in the Congress but also a considerable section among the minority that has got to realise this truth, that non-co-operation is no longer practical politics. In principle, of course, it is the right of individuals and nations to wash their hands clean of any measure or system which is opposed to their vital interests or emotions. Most people who think about the matter will agree with Mr. Das that we have had no real non-co-operation in India. What we have had is merely a mild preparation for it. Another of these shibboleths which should be completely wiped out of our political slate, is "civil disobedience." The phrase itself is a highly misleading one. As Mr. Das tersely puts it, disobedience is neither a public nor a private virtue. Obedience is the crowning virtue of public and private life. But when we have a higher principle to obey, it may be incidentally necessary to disregard a lower one. Disobedience, however, is not an end in itself. Training for civil disobedience, mass or individual, is wrong. What we have to train people to, is the higher obedience. Not until we have ensured the social and general conditions indispensable to a higher and better system have we the right to disobey the existing system. Mr. Das is a thinker first and foremost. Politics is the field to which he feels called upon in the present circumstances of the country to devote his energies, but he holds that right thinking is the essential condition of sound politics. When once the path is cleared in these two respects, the Congress will have the whole country rallying round it. Mr. Das rightly feels that the one thing to be considered now is how to get self-government with the least delay. He has a holy horror of time-tables and does not pledge himself to obtain it within any period of time. What he seems to feel is that the whole mind and soul of the country should be solely and intensely fixed upon the goal of self-government. He will go to the Councils and place before them a considered scheme for this purpose. All other activities will be subordinated and made subservient to this one great aim. The Liberals, it has been objected, also want to do the same thing: how would the Congress differ from them then? The answer is simple: the Liberals are not intent upon getting self-government. They are more anxious to "work the Act of 1919" by becoming Ministers, Members of the Executive Council, roving Commissioners and so on. You will never get self-government by "working the Act" in this way. If the Liberals had "worked the Act" with a single eye to the goal, even the present Councils might have been far more productive of national results. It is not altogether their fault either. Rather it is their misfortune that their alliance with Mr. Montagu blinded them to the vital defects of the Reforms.

The constructive programme of the Congress is a fundamental necessity of self-government. We shall never come within sight of self-Government, until the Hindu community re-organises itself on the principle of brotherhood, by discarding caste prejudices of every kind, of which "untouchability" is the worst. There can be no real unity between our several communities till each is assured of perfect religious toleration and freedom at the hands of others. Communities which are disposed to carry on an aggressive propaganda in this respect, should be educated in religious toleration. Without religious toleration, it is impossible for the people of India to evolve into a common nationality. The normal attitude of the Indian, whether he be a Hindu, Mussalman or Christian, is one of respect for other religions. The exceptions are generally due to extraneous influences. The more such influences are excluded, the less friction is there likely to arise between our communities. Alcohol is the type of foreign influence which poisons our national life at its source. It is a symbol of all such influences and the inclusion of prohibition of it in the Bardoli programme, symbolises the exclusion of them all. The Khaddar tends to become a superstition. While the importance of the handloom industry is unquestioned, there should be no invidious distinction made between handloom and mill-made Indian goods, except such as is due to the intrinsic superiority of the one or the other for special uses.

The conscientious carrying out of this four-fold programme is as essential to the attainment of Swaraj as drawing up a constitution and presenting it to the Councils. The clauses of the constitution will have just so much life and meaning as we put into our work on the constructive programme. Mr. Das's main difficulty, we fancy, will be with those of his party who feel that they are doing no national, patriotic work unless they are twisting the tail of Government. The true national work at present lies as little in twisting Government's tail as in patting Government's back. With the help of associates like Mr. Jayakar and Babu Bhagwandas, it should not be difficult for Mr. Das to draw up a scheme of work on which all Congressmen can wholeheartedly unite. One last word of caution. It is absolutely essential that the programme should not be unduly enlarged by the addition of ideas which, however good in themselves, have no immediate bearing upon the Indian problem. The idea of an Asiatic Federation, for instance, is in itself not an objectionable one. On the other hand, there is much to commend it to Indians who can never forget that this country gave religion two thousand years ago practically to all Asia. But why should it be made a political question? The most enthusiastic exponent of it, Mr. Paul Richards, is a European. The cultural unity of Asia is not a political question. The danger of including such an idea in a working scheme of politics, is evident from the fact that Swami Satyadev relates it to the controversial question of handing the temple at Buddha Gaya to the Mahabodhi Society. We are ourselves strongly of the view that the temple should be placed in charge of Buddhist priests, but the management should vest in a Council on which India, Ceylon and Burma should be represented by Hindus as well as Buddhists. This should be done with the full consent of the present Mahant who should be duly compensated for his loss of income. The question is an extremely delicate one and nothing but hard and bad blood can arise out of making it a plank in a political party's programme.

COCHIN ADMINISTRATION.

(Contributed.)

Cochin is a small but progressive Indian State in South India with a population of 9,79,080 of whom 4,82,959 are males and 4,96,121 females. The State has an area of 1,479 square miles, the population per square mile being 662. Rice is the staple food of the people. More than half the population is engaged in agriculture. The administration of the State is conducted in the name and under the control of His Highness the Maharaja, the present Maharaja being His Highness Sir Sri Rama Varma, G.C.I.E. The present Dewan, the Chief executive officer of the State, is Rao Bahadur P. Narayana Menon, I.S.O who assumed charge of the Dewanship from his predecessor, Dewan Bahadur T. Vijayaraghava Charya, on the 13th April 1922. The administration report for the year ending 16th August 1922 (1097 Malabar Era), therefore, deals with the administration of the year during eight months of which Mr. Vijayaraghava Charya was in charge of the Dewanship.

PROGRESS OF EDUCATION.

It is gratifying to note from the Report that, even under severe economic strain, the State has maintained its high reputation as being very progressive in educational matters. Although the total number of Government and aided schools fell from 171 and 273 to 167 and 269 respectively, the Report records an increase of 1465 pupils in the total number receiving instruction. The percentage of boy and girl pupils to the male and female population of school-going age is 80.4 and 39.1 as against 79.7 and 36.5 in the previous year. When it is remembered that this high percentage is without the introduction of free and compulsory education by the State, it certainly redounds to the credit of the enlightened people of Cochin. It is stated that changes were made in the Educational Code so as to admit the maximum strength of 40 in every class and for the free admission of girls in Boys' primary schools. This change is perhaps intended to make up for the reduction in the number of schools. It is gratifying to see that "the system of scholarships and stipends instituted by the new Code contributed very much to the increase in the number of pupils belonging to the backward communities". This observation is specially remarkable as a practical illustration to show that the backward communities are not backward in availing themselves of facilities in educating their children and that their "backwardness" is entirely due to want of opportunities. The Cochin Durbar has every reason to congratulate itself on this result. We are glad to note that a general scheme for increasing the salaries of teachers was under consideration. The starvation wages with which most teachers, especially of the lower grades, are obliged to eke out their livelihood, has greatly diminished the prestige and respect for the teachers' profession which, after all, is one of the noblest of professions.

CONCESSIONS TO DEPRESSED CLASSES.

The Report says that "the allotment of house sites in the Pulaya colony at Narakkal and the construction of a Nayadi colony at Kunnankulam were among the features of the work done by the Durbar on behalf of the depressed classes". This, we think, was done before Mr. Acharya left the State. But the mention of this, we take as an indication of the present Dewan's interest in improving further the hard lot of the depressed classes, although his observations towards the end of the report are not quite reassuring. In his general remarks about Education, Mr. Narayana Menon, the present Dewan observes :

The very liberal systems of grants-in-aid introduced into the State resulted in increasing the demand for schools enormously, while the special concessions granted to encourage education among the backward classes and especially Pulayas, were largely availed of by the classes concerned. As some of the concessions were, however, found on experience to be liable to be abused, restrictions had to be introduced to diminish the liability. (Italics ours)

We do not understand how the concessions were abused by the depressed classes. Surely, the hitherto neglected communities largely availing themselves of the concessions to educate their children is not an abuse. We do not know what the restrictions imposed are, but we are apprehensive of the serious effects of such restrictions on the progress of the backward classes. We cannot think that the people of such an educationally-advanced State as Cochin would grudge the concessions extended to the backward classes.

WHAT IS WRONG ?

Except in educational matters, the State does not seem to have made any progress during the year under report. The condition of the various industries, regarding the improvement of which mention was made in the previous year's report, seems to be so unsatisfactory that Mr. Narayana Menon has thought it necessary to assume the role of a candid critic. He observes :

The various cottage and allied industries started by the State or with the State aid were more or less empirical. The facilities granted were found to require readjustment with reference to local conditions, heredity and individual tastes. The bell-metal business at Ernakulam and the Handloom Weaving Society at Kuttampalli started with some Rs. 1,00,000 advanced by the State, came to grief before the year was half over. One was wound up and the other had to be transferred to the control of the Co-operative department. The Stoneware factory at Chalakudi, the construction of which was entrusted to an expert on a salary of Rs. 1,400 per mensem, was to have been completed by October 1921 at a cost of Rs. two lakhs; but the expert was not able to complete the building even by the close of the year and the amount stipulated was found to be insufficient. The Cochin tanneries subsidised by Government were brought into working order and turned out excellent samples of tanned leather during the year, but to make them paying, additional advances from the State funds in the shape of loans had to be made. The formation of a paper pulp factory had not passed the stage of negotiations.

We are not told what attempts were made by the present Dewan for successfully carrying out the various industrial development schemes, empirical though they were, before striking such a desperate note. But, the blame does not and cannot rest on this Dewan or that Dewan. It is the system of importing one as the head of the administration for a period of five years or so, during which he is made the sole arbiter of the destinies of the State, that is responsible for such things. Had there been an Executive Council or Legislative Council without whose sanction the Dewan can not embark upon empirical enterprises, the necessity for the present Dewan to undertake the unpleasant task of criticising the actions of his predecessor in office, as in the paragraph quoted above, would never have occurred. There is nobody having a permanent stake in the State that can be held responsible for the loss the State had to suffer in these days of financial strain on account of embarking on industrial experiments without due regard to the financial resources of the State. The remedy lies not in blaming one Dewan or the other, but in changing the system that makes the Dewan an irresponsible Executive.

THE DRINK AND DRUG EVIL.

The financial resources of the State are very limited and the chief source of revenue is the Excise which includes revenue from Salt, Customs, Abkari, Opium, Gunja and Tobacco. It is much to be regretted that such a progressive State as Cochin has to depend on the vices of its subjects for the main source of its revenue. Out of the total income of Rs. 55,46,463 the amount realised from the Excise came to Rs. 22,95,120. It is gratifying to note that there was a slight decrease in the consumption of liquor during the year. But we cannot commend the Cochin Government's attitude towards temperance. The most disgraceful feature, as the Swarajya rightly points out, is that the State distills arrack and serves it out to its subjects. It is most disgusting to read in the Report that "additional improvements were effected in the distillery to make it better fitted to meet the requirements of the consumers". We can hardly imagine a more demoralising system than the State taking the initiative in spreading the vice of drink instead of encouraging the spirit of temperance. We cannot too strongly condemn Mr. Narayana Menon's attitude towards the temperance movement when he observes in the report that the decrease in the demand for liquor during the year is "partly due to the activities of the temperance movement which had invaded the State though only temporarily." The attitude conveyed in characterising the spread of the temperance movement as an "invasion" is clearly mischievous and it foreshadows the possibility of the Government launching a crusade against the temperance workers should they begin their activities in the State. We commend the example of Bhavnagar in Kathiawar, which adopted a policy of total prohibition in 1922, to the attention of Mr. Narayana Menon. If Bhavnagar and Palitana are too far to attract the attention of Mr. Narayana Menon, he would do well to turn his attention to the neighbouring State of Travancore and follow the example of its present Dewan Mr. T. Raghaviah. Our Travancore correspondent whose letter we printed in the Reformer of the 20th January, writing about the vigorous temperance movement among the Ezhavas, the community who by heredity have been chiefly responsible for the manufacture of liquor, said that they were determined to abstain from participating in the auction sales of contract of liquor shops. He says that, although the movement has been prejudicial to the income which showed a large deficit in the Excise revenue during the year, "it is noteworthy that the Government whose reins are in the hands of Dewan Bahadur T. Raghaviah, a quiet and unostentatious, worker in social reform, are in practical sympathy with the central idea of temperance movement and even accepted the principle of prohibition as the ultimate goal." The Cochin Royal family has an ancient and high tradition as being total abstainers from drink and we do not know how far the Dewan's views on temperance find favour with His Highness the Maharaja.

THE MOPLAH OUTBREAK.

Regarding the effects of the Moplah Rebellion on the civil administration of the State, the report says:—

Situated as it is by the sides of the frontier taluks of the British district of Malabar where the Moplah outbreak for a time brought the civil administration into confusion, the State was to a great extent indirectly affected by the outbreak. Thousands of refugees from the affected areas thronged to the State for protection and relief. Government willingly undertook the task, gave shelter to the refugees, organised a Central Relief Committee and conducted relief operations on an extensive scale for a period of some four months, from October 1921 to January 1922. There were at one time as many as 8,425 on the relief list in Trichur and its environments alone. The public subscriptions raised for the relief of the refugees could not be much and the Government contributed nearly Rs. 88,000 for the purpose.

The third conference of Co-operators was held under the presidentship of Mr. G. K. Devadhar of the Servants of India Society and it seems it has given an impetus to the Co-operative movement in the State as seen from the progress recorded in the department. There is nothing worth mentioning recorded in the report regarding the Cochin Harbour Scheme. There was much talk over it and it seems a certain section wanted to make political capital out of the State's interest in the Cochin Harbour Scheme. While it is premature to say how far the State will be benefited by the harbour scheme, the geographical position of Ernakulam, the capital of the State, does not warrant the sweeping denunciation of the Cochin Government's interest in it by saying that the harbour is intended for the British navy as if the State cannot be benefited in any way.

CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM.

The report contains only a passing reference to the most important constitutional reform, viz., the inauguration of the Legislative Council. It is stated that a revised scheme on the basis of the criticisms received in connection with the proclamation and draft rules regarding the Council as also on the basis of the Reforms introduced in British India and the sister-States of Mysore and Travancore, has been drawn up. When the resolutions of the Legislative Council are not binding on the Executive Government, it is not perhaps far from right in characterising such a Council as "a body of petitioners." The Legislative Council cannot in any way check the abuses of the powers and prerogatives of the Executive. But we do not mean to advise the Cochinites to boycott the Councils. As a medium of expressing public opinion on questions affecting the administration of the State, the Council will command a certain amount of respect not only from the officials and the people of Cochin but also outside the State. The success of the Council in influencing the Executive Government to be more responsive to public opinion, will more or less depend on the statesmanship and the capacity of its members. And it must not be forgotten that further reform in enlarging the scope of the Cochin Legislative Council can be effected without any deputation crossing the seas. While indigenous autocracy is certainly not a preferable substitute for alien bureaucracy, the difference between the present British Indian Government and the Government of an Indian State should not be overlooked. The Tenancy Legislation and the Nair Regulation which were passed in the neighbouring States of Cochin and Travancore, although British Malabar has been suffering from the same grievances for which a remedy has not yet been applied, are instances the moral of which should not be forgotten. One unpleasant feature since the publication of the draft rules is the demand of Christians for communal representation. We hear the echo of the Trichur riots in the demand of Cochin Christians for communal representation. When the Indian Christian Conference has recently passed a resolution expressing its disapproval of communal representation, it is surprising that the Syrian Christians, a community least prone to Anglo-Indian imitation, and having an ancient tradition of being purely indigenous in its ideas and aspirations, should demand special representation for their community. The communal feeling, which culminated in the Trichur riots, has not yet subsided in spite of the admonitions of Mr. C. F. Andrews than whom the Christians of Trichur can hardly find a co-religionist more competent to give them good advice. We sincerely hope that the educated people of the Christian, Hindu and Mohammedan communities will lose no time in devising means to remove the communal distrust and antipathy which are so clearly manifest in the cry for communal representation. That way lies the peace and prosperity of the State.

PRESENT CONDITIONS IN CHINA, II.

(BY THE REV. E. STANLEY JONES.)

I noted in my previous article some of the things that are paralyzing China's life. The Revolution came, but it was not thorough enough. It did away with the Manchus, but it did not clean out the officials and their methods. Many of these have been taken over into the new Republic to its undoing. The hope of China is in raising up new men, who will employ new methods with a new spirit. The clicking of political machinery did not bring the millennium as some fondly thought, for everything rests back upon character for its final solution. The new day awaits new men. But there are signs that there is a new spirit abroad that is creating new men.

THE CHINESE RENAISSANCE.

One hopeful thing I note is the Renaissance Movement. This Movement, which has its centre at Peking in a few moving spirits there, has had a very great influence indeed. We had lunch with the leaders and they told us that they stood for four things: first, the scientific method; that things be approached in the spirit of the question: what are the facts? second, ruthless application of those findings to all the institutions of China, moral, social, political and industrial; third, a fearless launching out in application of the principles found; and fourth, propagation of the findings. This outlook is certainly to be commended. There are a number of periodicals devoted to the propagation of these ideas. The practical working out of this has been that many things have been challenged in their time-honoured positions. The classical language was the medium for all literature and was different from the spoken language. These modern scholars are writing their literature and expressing their poetry through the common spoken language. This is a great change, for it brings the gems of China's thought-treasure where they are available to the ordinary man. The common language is becoming respectable and, of course, with it the common man. China has an amazing literature and it is noted for its fine moral sentiment. There is not an unclean line in its vast religious literature, I am told. The family is being challenged as the unit of life. There is no doubt that China, through her intense veneration of ancestors, has chained herself to the dead past. It has turned her face to the yesterdays, instead of the to-days and the to-morrows. China is one vast grave-yard—graves are everywhere and so much land is taken up by them that the dead are crowding out the living. That is serious enough but it is not the most serious thing, for the dead are not only claiming the land but the mental processes and the rest of life as well. The Renaissance would smash this hold. But it should do it gently and with care, for this hold of the family has been the power that has preserved China amid the crash and wreck of things in the past ages. Empires and dynasties have come and gone, but China, the real China, founded upon the family and not upon the State, has persisted amid the changes. The Christian Church is trying to preserve this element of worth in ancestor worship and is replacing it with a Day of Respect and Remembrance of Ancestors held annually with suitable ceremonies. Bertrand Russell has been lecturing in China and his influence has been pernicious in openly flouting the sacred ties of family and in giving to China a shameless example of "freelove".

The Renaissance Movement is also challenging Capitalism and its attendant evils, as Imperialism and War. There has been a good deal of flirting in thought with Bolshevism and in the case of Dr. Sun Yat Sen, the first Provisional President of China, it has gone further and he has been negotiating with Russia to have Lenin's doctrines and influence in China. The Governor of Canton is decidedly Bolshevistic in his outlook. But now that the news comes that the Reds are about to invade China along the border of Manchuria, it may give many of them pause.

The Renaissance Movement has some exceedingly fine things in it and if it were not for the materialistic philosophy that underlies it, it would be potent for good. "Science and Democracy" are to be the panaceas for all ills. That too will bring its disillusionment. The most materialistic and anti-religious are usually returned students from France. France is becoming a menace in more ways than one.

REVIVAL OF OPIUM.

Five years ago opium was practically banished from China. It was a great achievement and a great moral victory for a people who were desperately trying to save themselves from its clutches. To-day it is coming swiftly back. In Amoy there is an Anti-Opium Society with its banners out stating that opium is illegal and that it is a crime and a blasting influence, etc., and yet that very Society has secret orders from Government to foster the growth of opium and the Society itself obtains for the farmers the necessary permission for the growing of opium. They cleared up four hundred thousand dollars for themselves in one small area through opium. The Government has saved its face with the outside world by changing its tactics and not directly fostering the growth of opium, but really doing so by the method of putting on taxes on the land so high that no other crop but opium will pay to cultivate. When I was there, a great part of the cargoes of the vessels in port was "bean cakes" used in fertilizing opium.

FOOT-BINDING.

Foot-binding is on the decrease, but is still practised to some extent. It cuts one to the very core to see these women hobble through life. Worse still, I am informed by medical authority, that foot-binding stops the circulation of blood to such an extent that the mentality of the women is dwarfed. Caste is mental foot-binding, whether it be the caste system of India or the "White caste" system of the west. In either case it prevents the circulation of ideas of brotherhood and the feeling of our common humanity and makes us stunted and dwarfed in soul and mind.

A CHINESE RAILWAY.

One feels the absence of a Government in China. We were fired on by a Chinese gun boat one night as we were proceeding up the river in a steam launch to the city of Foochow. We were told to anchor near by and not to move if we did not want to be shot. It was of no use to protest; so we lay on the wind-swept launch all night in the cold. There was no Government to which we might protest, for, those in power at that particular time at Foochow, did not belong to the Peking Government nor did they belong to the South. They were simply a band of soldiers who had captured the place. In the centre of the country I went on a railway journey from Hankow to Changsha. The Railway has only been built seven years but it is going to pieces to-day for lack of repairs. The ties are rotten and the train ahead of us was wrecked on an open track by the spreading of the rails. There were four accidents on that one journey which took us forty two hours instead of twelve. I asked an official what the trouble was and he re-

the Reformer of the 20th January, writing about the vigorous temperance movement among the Ezhavas, the community who by heredity have been chiefly responsible for the manufacture of liquor, said that they were determined to abstain from participating in the auction sales of contract of liquor shops. The ties are rotten and the train ahead of us was wrecked on an open track by the spreading of the rails. There were four accidents on that one journey which took us forty two hours instead of twelve. I asked an official what the trouble was and he replied in despair: "We have notified the Government that the railway will not run three months more unless they give us money for repairs. There is a Military Governor at one end and another at the other end and they are bleeding the railway at both ends for selfish purposes". The only Chinese built, owned and operated railway in China is now mortgaged to Japan. An official high up told us that one hundred million dollars had disappeared from the railways in the last eleven years through public "squeeze." This was according to the books. It was amazing to us to see that merchants or their servants were seated on the top of goods vans in which their goods were being shipped. They did not dare to turn it over to the authorities. They stayed with it. Nearly every village has a block house standing up above the rest of the houses with slits in the sides for rifles to protect villages from bandits. In Honan the bandits had captured eleven walled cities and had burned and looted and plundered. About a dozen foreigners had been captured by them and held for ransom. But the Chinese suffered most.

A BEAM IN DARKNESS.

Amid all the despair that comes to my heart as I write these things, there comes a hope. It burns clear and bright: The Chinese will pull through. I came away with a deep admiration for them. They are one of the coming races of the world. Their capacity to work harder than any people in the world in any climate at any thing, their common sense and good-humour and general loveliness will pull them through. In spite of the break-down in Government, there is not that sense of poverty in China that one feels in India. There is an abundance of things and food. The Chinese are the greatest eaters in the world. Their feasts are a surfeit. Moreover, they are producing in spite of the handicaps.

CHRISTIANITY AND NATIONALISM.

It may be of interest to readers of your paper to know that there is a distinct difference in China compared to India in the way that patriotism and Christianity have been linked up. The most patriotic and nationalistic are the Chinese Christians and in the hour of China's need, China is turning to them. Eighty per cent of delegates to the Washington Disarmament Conference were Chinese Christians. A Chinese Christian has been entrusted with the task of taking over Shantung from the Japanese and I am glad to note that it has been completed and the Japanese have fulfilled their agreements in loyal style. Another Chinese Christian has been entrusted with the task of raising the sixty million dollars to buy back the Shantung Railway from Japan. In the recent popular voting of one of the secular newspapers on the question "Who are the Twelve Greatest Living Chinese," four out of the first five voted for were Chinese Christians. Christianity has become naturalized in China and it is producing men who will stand up under temptation. While the Government schools are becoming poorer and poorer in influence and material equipment, the private and Mission schools are crowded and are doing great work. A private institution like Nankai University with its 1,800 students headed by Dr. Chang Polin, a Chinese Christian, is one that China may well be proud of. I visited and addressed the students of the Ching Hua College, the institution which has been built and sustained by the Boxer Indemnity money returned to China by the American Government. The Rockefeller Foundation has built and equipped the most complete hospital and Medical College in Asia situated at Peking. The buildings alone cost four million dollars. It is setting a very high standard for China.

ADVANCE CHINA.

One Western historian says that "it is only in the 16th and 17th centuries with the birth of modern science and the discovery of America and the perfection of the art of printing that the Western world began to pull ahead of China." Until that time China was well in the forefront of the nations. She will be so again. This conviction has burned itself in upon me as I have addressed large audiences of eager students from North Manchuria clear down to Canton in the South and have felt their open-mindedness, their eager sympathy, their practical-mindedness and their dogged persistence and fine human qualities. This people will rise. It was a privilege to serve them, and to learn from them.

LONDON LETTER.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, January 4th 1923.

THE REPARATIONS QUESTION.

Once again the Prime Ministers of Great Britain, France and Belgium and a representative from Italy have met to discuss the Reparations. How much depends upon this latest meeting cannot be exaggerated. It will probably be the final one, and will determine the fate of Germany, as well as of the countries met to discuss her. If France could be brought to accept the British view that Germany is honestly willing to pay, but cannot, and that the stabilisation of Germany is of such importance to that country that she is not likely to deal in trickery to evade payment, a step forward might be taken. The proposed occupation by a military force of the Ruhr region has temporarily receded into the background; but the new French proposal for the economic occupation of parts of Germany is likely to find no greater favour than the military one did. Mr. Bonar Law's scheme caused a fair amount of surprise, as it was totally unexpected. The suggestions he makes are so sweeping in character that a great deal of controversy is sure to occur. Indeed, we are already informed that they have been unanimously rejected by the French Cabinet, which holds that they contain no guarantees that Germany will pay and that, if given effect to, at the end of fifteen years, Germany will, having already virtually wiped out her internal debt by reason of the fall of the mark, be actually better off than any other European State. The Paris Conference is tottering to a fall and any moment we may get the news that it has collapsed and that France has determined to act alone.

CINEMAS AND CHILDREN.

The prolonged controversy that has been going on with regard to the admission of children to cinematograph shows at last reached a real settlement. About a year ago, strong representations having been made in the proper quarters, the London County Council decided that no young person under the age of 16 should be allowed to visit public places in which films suitable only for adults were shown. But as soon as this decision was known, a storm of protest was raised by the cinematograph exhibitors, and in consequence the new regulations were never put into force, but were held in abeyance for a year. This year having now elapsed and the position during the last month becoming acute again, the London County Council threshed the matter out, with the result that the resolution of last year is to be adopted with an amendment, and regulations are to be enforced as from January 1st, prohibiting any young person under the age of 16, or apparently under the age, from being present at an exhibition of an "adult" film, the amendment being "unless accompanied by a parent or bona fide guardian". A strict censorship over all films is to be made, but in the whole question of censorship lies the difficulty. It is easy enough to ban a picture dealing distinctly with sex-crime or violent sensationalism, but it is much more difficult to do so in the case of many famous novels that have been, and others that can be, adapted for film purposes. The things seen by the eyes of a child convey quite a different meaning to the things read. Almost any perfectly innocent child could be turned loose in a varied library, and though it might read much that would horrify its elders, that would convey little or nothing of the reality to the child mind, for the child cannot form pictures to itself of things it has never seen or had presented as a living fact to it. In the case of moving pictorial representations it is quite different; crime, passion, lust and fear become awful realities, the most innocent child is rudely awakened and plunged into a world of emotions of which it really knows so little, that the danger of a tender mind becoming unbalanced is very real. Many classics given to boys and girls to read as studies in literature for school work, could scarcely have their most striking episodes literally reproduced on a film without shocking even adult minds. And if the Censor is to do his duty properly, many scenes famous in literature and in the written drama must be out ere the film dealing with such scenes can be shown before a mixed audience of adults and children. It is this proper censorship that is likely to cause a good deal of friction and trouble in the near future, unless we do in England as has been done in some places in America, make a drastic rule that children shall not be allowed to visit any public film exhibition unless the films shown be of a purely educational character.

PASTEUR CENTENARY

Every now and again a man is born into the world, who renders such service to humanity that his birth is ever after commemorated. Probably such a one was Louis Pasteur, whose centenary was celebrated last week. A simple, pious Frenchman, it is difficult to imagine how men lived before he gave them the benefit of his genius. The "Times" sums up the situation excellently in the following terms:—It is almost impossible to conceive the magnitude of the changes which have directly issued from his work and teaching. So much that the modern world accepts, as a matter of course, lay, in 1822, outside even the realm of the imagination, that a reconstruction of life as was then lived can scarcely be accomplished. Preventive medicine, with its ancillary services of sanitation, water supply, food inspection, and hygiene, remained as yet but a dream. Surgery was attended by dangers so great as to inspire in the general mind a horror unrelieved by any gleam of hope. Plague and pestilences of many kinds swept at short intervals over Europe and the world, destroying vast numbers of human lives and taking, besides, a heavy toll of flocks and herds. Whole industries were not infrequently placed in jeopardy by unseen forces which defied the most scrupulous attempts to stay their havoc. It was an age of great intellectual activity, yet its negative outlook found many expressions, and none perhaps more significant than the doctrine of the spontaneous generation of life. Pasteur, in consequence of his studies of fermentation, attacked this doctrine with all the passion of his soul; he disproved it in a series of experiments. In its stead he gave to the world his discovery of the kingdom of the 'infinitely small,' those minute atoms of life renewed from generation to generation which, by their ceaseless activity, make and unmake our world." The science of surgery was made secure and efficient, and a new tropical medicine has been developed that will, as it becomes more widely studied, render still greater services, to mankind, for "the kingdom of the infinitely small is wide as the world."

YULE TIDE IN LONDON.

The feeding of the poor has always been a special feature of Christmas celebrations, but especially is Christmas the time for children and most of the big functions are devoted to children alone. The Lord Mayor of London held his annual Christmas festivities at which 1,200 poor children were entertained and fed, about 4,000 hampers were despatched to little cripples throughout the Metropolis, and many more thousands to little sufferers and poor children throughout the country. Sir William Treloar, a name always associated with the welfare of crippled children, welcomed the little guests at the Guildhall and played with them. At Poplar about 6,000 children were entertained, the funds for all these entertainments being collected from voluntary subscribers. But apart from these big centres, every district, every sect, and every section has had its Christmas treat for its poor children. The students at the Indian Hostel having previously caught the spirit of the time, had their Christmas party also, for poor children gathered by the Mansfield House and Toynbee Hall settlements. This is not the first Christmas party for children the Hostel at Shakespeare Hut has had, but it will be the last, as the site of the hostel has been acquired by the Rockefeller Foundation for the Hygienic Research Institute. The Indian National Y.M.C.A. are hoping to secure new premises near the present Hostel, but much anxiety is felt by the officers and Committee because of the lack of funds for the satisfactory carrying on of the work. However they have faith in the rightness of that which they are doing, and they use every scrap of opportunity in endeavouring to overcome the difficulties facing them, and have hope of being able to fulfil a real need in making a happy health-centre for Indian youth here.

CHINESE EDUCATION.

It has been decided to devote the remainder of the Boxer indemnity to Chinese education, but in exactly what way this shall be applied is not known. There are at present many British educational institutions in China largely conducted by missionaries, and these are sure to put in an application for funds, for it is quite true they have to work on the narrowest possible financial margin. There are also various colleges in China run with the help of China itself, but all needing money for further expansion. There are medical colleges badly in need of financial assistance and the need for a new University has also been voiced. At present China possesses one British University situated in Hong Kong. For the upkeep of this, both the Chinese and British commercial communities contribute largely, and a proposal has been put forward for establishing a proper school to feed this University. Attention is also being drawn to the urgent necessity of establishing women's colleges in various parts of the country. All these suggestions show that there is no lack of existing avenues for disposing of the money: the difficulty will be to find out how best to allocate it. Happily no suggestions have been put forward for using the money for educating the youth of China outside its own country.

THE BRITISH UNEMPLOYED.

A new demonstration of unemployed is harassing the London authorities. This demonstration consists of a march of unemployed men from Scotland to London. A great deal of attention is being called to it, and a great deal of exasperation on both sides is being shown. The marchers themselves have found great difficulty in getting food and accommodation once they have arrived in the Metropolis, and the people of London ask themselves and each other why they should support people from other parts of Britain, considering they cannot feed their own unemployed. The Metropolitan Asylums Board, which had to shelter the men in its casual wards, has come in for a lot of abuse because of its alleged treatment of the marchers. The food is complained about, as being too poor in substance and variety, and the sleeping accommodation such as to make it impossible for men to sleep. Some of the marchers have become disappointed and dispirited and returned to their homes, advising others to do the same. But the organisers of the movement refuse to be "browbeaten" into submission and have called for further contingents from Scotland to come forward. A special appeal is being made for a unanimous protest from all over the country next Sunday and to demand that the Government take immediate steps to provide work or maintenance for unemployed men and women.

SREEMATI SARALA DEVI.

The Editor, The Hindi "Navajivan," publishes the following report of an interview he had with Srimati Sarala Devi Chaudhrani recently:—

At the close of the sessions of the U. P. Provincial Conference, Mr. Ramdas Gandhi and myself started for Mussorie to see Mrs. Saraladevi Chaudhrani. It will be remembered that Shrimati was overtaken by a serious illness during the Ahmedabad Congress, from which she has not yet completely recovered. But since coming up to Mussorie her health has taken a turn for the good and I am glad to report that there is a gradual but steady progress. We had the pleasure of spending three days with Srimatiji, the loving memory of which shall ever remain fresh in my mind. Her motherly care, affection and hospitality notwithstanding her ill health and the attendant inconveniences of a Himalayan retreat will be difficult for us to forget. Her wonderful and up-to-date management of her simple household was also a matter which made a deep impression on my mind. I had heard in Dehra Dun that since the 9th September 1922, Shrimati had entered Vanaprastham and had also taken the vow of leading a life of mendicancy for at least a year. In Mussorie I found Srimati observing "Mounavrat" every morning upto nine, and very often wrapped in meditation. She was always in a severe contemplative mood. But at the same time one could find in her the lovely and singular combination of poetry and music which added to the dignified grace of that mood of serenity and inwardness. It was really an entrancing sight to see her seated in deep meditation in the peace and calm of the King of the Mountains and hear her singing in her sweet and clear voice the spiritual songs of her own composition to the accompaniment of her violin. My heart was filled with rapturous joy. But I could discern in it a shadow of uneasiness &c. A question was stirring in my mind—a question, that came in and out so many times,—as to what led the patriot lady to leave the country in the thick of the fight and retire for contemplation when there was the greatest need for her selfless services. At last I could not help giving expression to my uneasiness and humbly but respectfully enquiring of her the reason for her taking to this new stage of life.

To this she replied that the reasons were three. When nearly twenty years ago she came to Punjab, her adopted home by marriage, in the midst of Arya Samajists, she heard a great deal about the third stage of life enjoined by the scriptures, viz., the Vanaprastha Ashrama. Her imagination was struck and the seed of a resolve was implanted in her mind to enter it in due course, i.e., on or about her 50th year.

The second reason was, she said, as we know whilst in the thick of the fight for the motherland she was suddenly struck down with a severe and prolonged illness from the effects of which she had not yet recovered. During this pause she had ample time for reflection and self-introspection. As a result she discovered she was not what she was taken to be. Courage she lacked in confessing what 'is' and not 'seems.' She felt therefore that she was a coward and not true to herself and the God within her, that she was sailing under false colours and that she must forfeit the privilege of serving her dearly beloved motherland to whom she had dedicated herself even from her very girlhood.

The third reason was the illness itself. She read in it a sign from God to retire and withdraw within herself. The illness made her physically unfit. Her self-introspection found her spiritually unfit and her resolve nearly 20 years back made her morally unfit to remain in the world any longer. Happily, she said, all events combined and hastened the denouncement of her God-union—the joy beyond measure reserved to human souls.

Our next question was "What is your idea of a Vanaprastha? Are you to be simply engrossed in God, in your own spiritual well-being? Are you to render service to your fellow-beings no more?"

Answer:—"My idea of a Vanaprastha is that it is a preparatory stage for rendering better and purer services in the fourth and the last stage of life viz., Sannyasa. As I wrote to a friend, this third Ashrama to my thinking is a voluntary return to the first one of Brahmacharya with greater knowledge and deliberation. In the first, the parents were the agents, they gave the training according to their light and circumstances. In the third the agent is oneself and the self-training is expected to be much more thorough on account of the wider experience gathered during the householder's stage. Service to one's fellow being is sine qua non at every stage of life. During this period of preparation even, I must serve my fellow beings though in a different form and manner to what I did when I was of and in the world. When the period of probation is over, and I hear the call from above, when I feel ready for selfless service, with God as my guide, as He was to Moses "a pillar of light in darkness and a pillar of cloud by the dazzling day," I will venture forth into the world once more to serve in the way He commands."

Q.—"May I enquire, what form your service to humanity may take in your present stage?"

A.—"I have found that there are many men and women who would like to lead a retired and God-seeking life but who are denied the opportunities. For such I would like to make facilities by opening a Vanaprasthashram in the Himalayas for self-training and a Karmayogashram lower down for the application of the training. But I am not in any haste about it. If it comes it will come. If it be God's purpose to engage me in such a service, He will."

We next asked—"You were closely associated with Mahatma Gandhi in the national movement of N. C. O. Does he know of the step you have taken, which practically means depriving the cause of a leader at this critical stage?"

A.—"He knows."

Q.—"Does he approve of it?"

A.—"His message to me has been that he hopes my detachment from the world does not mean the giving up of the spinning wheel, for he regards it for this age and this country as an indispensable Yajna for all the stages of life not excluding Sannyasa."

Q.—"Do you echo his thoughts?"

A.—"It is not fair to say anything on this point. For, if I differ from him and express my difference of views, I place him at a disadvantage by not allowing him a chance to explain his position from the prison cell. He is a teacher, I am only a neophyte."

Q.—"Yet for the benefit of the public may we press upon you to give your views"?

A.—"If you must have it, in my humble opinion each stage of life has its different duties. A Vanaprasthi is not a householder nor a citizen. He has no longer the rights or the duties of a citizen. He is a denizen of the forest, of the wilderness, of the mountain solitudes even if circumstances occasionally bring him into crowded cities. All his Yajnas are by 'pratika' or symbolic, they are all mental, not 'material'. A Vanaprasthi's sole purpose is to discipline oneself for the life Eternal and not the Transitory. His is no earthly good to seek. He must burn all his ships behind him. All desires, all passions, all struggles, all strivings must cease for him even in thought. An individual Vanaprasthi may take up the spinning wheel as a recreation, but never as a Yajna. He or she would be false to one's stage of life otherwise."

Q.—"What of a Sannyasi? Would you think it proper for you to preach it in Sannyas?"

A.—"A Sannyasi is a citizen of the world. As a Sannyasi I would not consider myself belonging to any particular nation or country. Only I would probably choose India for my field of service, because through knowledge of its people, language and customs more intimately than that of any other country, I would feel my services would be more effectively rendered here than anywhere else. If I felt even then India needs must work out her salvation at the point of the spindle I would not hesitate to preach it and ply it too."

Q.—"May I ask if you had the approval of your husband in taking up the Vanaprastha?"

A.—"I have had his full approval. He is too good a believer in Swami Dayanand's teachings not to approve of such a step, and I have too great a regard for his feelings to take such a serious step without his consent. My vow of mendicancy was a hard nut for him to crack, but therein too he surrendered to the need of my soul."

Q.—"Ordinarily people would think a wife has no right to enter the Vanaprastha without the husband. What have you to say to that?"

A.—"A wife who feels the call for Vanaprastha and is ready for it has as much right to enter it in advance of the husband as the many husbands who take it up and leave their unwilling wives behind in the whirlpool of the world. Souls have neither sex, nor sex disabilities or sex superiorities. Embodied souls that are bound to each other by earthly ties can help each other most by being out of the bondage, whosoever it may be—the man or the woman—at the earliest opportunity."

Q.—"You have a son who still requires your care. Is he not likely to be deprived of it by your living in seclusion?"

A.—"Certainly not. He will receive more of my watchful care. A detached mother will be better able to guide her son to a higher ideal of life than a mother attached to worldly ambitions and pleasures."

Thus ended my talk with Shrimati. To me her leading a life of seclusion and meditation was a matter of sorrow as well as of joy. I was still sorry because in my opinion the country at a critical moment in its history was being deprived of the services of a leader. But the thoughts, that her temporary absence from the political field was but a preparation for the more comprehensive and real service hereafter, filled me with joy, and I longed to see the day she will again take up her work in hand. May the day dawn soon.

THE NATIONAL BOYS SCOUTS ASSOCIATION.

The scouts of the National Boy Scouts Association staged Muktadhara, the well-known play of poet Rabindranath Tagore, on Friday the 26th January before a very large audience including a good number of ladies, Parsi ladies being conspicuous by their absence. Among the distinguished visitors were Desabandhu Das, Babu Bhagwandas, Mrs. Naidu, Mr. M. R. Jayakar and others. During the interval, Mr. Jayakar, on behalf of the Association, welcomed Mr. Das in a brief but eloquent speech in the course of which he explained the objects of the Association. The fundamental difference between other Boy Scout movements and the National Boy Scouts Association is that the latter is entirely free from official patronage and supervision. It was started in 1921 under the protectorship of Mahatma Gandhi since whose incarceration Messrs. M. R. Jaykar and Balubhai Mashuruwalla have been the chief guides and supporters of the movement. Several Scouts of this Association were members of the Indian Boy Scouts Association started by Mrs. Besant in 1917. With the change in her political views, Mrs. Besant wanted to amalgamate her Association with the Imperial Scout Movement started by the Government in the schools. The Shivaji Troop, the name given to Bombay scouts, as a protest against this step, seceded from Mrs. Besant's protectorship and approached Mahatma Gandhi who kindly consented to be its protector. Thus the present Association came into existence in 1921. It is a non-political, non-sectarian movement started with the object of training boys and girls in good citizenship, a very wide term which includes everything else. Individual citizens form the nation and the movement is, therefore, a first step in nation-building. The duties of the Scout can be summed up in two words "social service" irrespective of caste, creed or colour. Before concluding his speech, Mr. Jaykar announced that the proceeds from the sale of tickets were expected to run into four figures—since then we learn that Rs. 1,500 was realised from the sales of tickets—which, he said, would form a nucleus round which a public fund would grow. Two donations were also announced. Mr. Das was then requested to give the prizes to the best actors. Mr. Das, after giving the prizes amidst loud cheers, thanked Mr. Jaykar and the members of the Association for the hearty welcome accorded to him. The performance was then continued and it terminated few minutes after 12 o'clock in the night with the singing of national songs by the actors. Mr. Balubhai spoke in Gujarathi explaining the movement at some length and appealing for support. Communications or contributions may be addressed to Mr. N. G. Motwane, Hon. Secretary, National Boy Scouts Association c/o Eastern Electric Trading Company, Hornby Road, Fort, Bombay.

NOTES.

Evolution of the American Spirit: Professor P.M. Buck of Nebraska University, U. S. A., has been in India for some months now as the exchange Professor, under the Carnegie endowment for the interchange of University Professors, in place of Professor Joshi of Baroda, now in America. He has been working in the College at Baroda for the greater part of the time. He delivered five lectures at the University of Bombay beginning from the 1st instant, and addressed several other students' meetings in the Bombay Colleges and elsewhere, his subject being the American spirit in the literature of that country. He maintained that American literature had a distinctive spirit which was not merely derived from the literatures of Europe. He traced the development of this distinctive spirit from the early Puritan settlers, through its several stages in the pragmatism of Benjamin Franklin and the transcendentalism of Emerson and Walt Whitman, culminating in the statesmanship of Abraham Lincoln. The audiences grew in size and calibre as the addresses proceeded, and for his last lecture on Lincoln, Professor Buck had one of the largest gatherings assembled to hear any recent University lectures in Bombay. His lectures outside were crowded with eager hearers. At his lecture delivered under the auspices of the Aryan Excelsior League on the 2nd instant at the Prarthana Samaj Hall, Sir Narayan Chandavarkar presided and in his concluding observations called attention to the important influence which Indian religious philosophy has had on Emerson, Whittier and other great American writers. Professor Buck has made many friends in Bombay and his visit has been one of the most intellectually profitable that we have had.

Mr. Das in Bombay: After a stay of an arduous fortnight in Bombay, Mr. C. R. Das left for Calcutta on Tuesday last. As Pandit Motilal Nehru was not able to come to Bombay, the task of conducting the conversations with various persons here, fell wholly upon him. We are not in a position to say what exactly has been the result of these conversations. He has, we think, achieved a great deal in reconciling differences and in finding a programme acceptable to persons who have been detached from politics for the last two or three years. It is hardly possible that this could have been achieved without some readjustment of Mr. Das's own views. Those who had occasion to meet and discuss matters with him, were impressed by his sincerity, earnestness, and single-minded desire to do whatever is best from the national point of view. One thing which Mr. Das could not have failed to notice, is that not only in the Congress but among the Liberals as well, there is dissatisfaction with merely negative methods and an anxious desire to co-operate with a really effective organisation to press forward to the goal of full responsible government. Mr. Das is too great a patriot to be a purely party man. If he finds that he can better achieve his object of focussing all the best thought in the country upon this great object, by means of a neutral organisation which, while belonging to no existing political parties will exclude none because of his affinity to any of them, he is not the man to hesitate to adopt that course. Country first and party a long way next, is his watchword. There is to be a meeting of those Congressmen who are in agreement with Mr. Das on the 20th instant at Allahabad, and some representative men who have not joined his or any party may also attend it. It will be settled there, whether and to what extent Mr. Das is able to carry the Congress pro-Council party with him.

Report of the Racial Distinctions Committee. The two principal recommendations in the Report of the Committee appointed by the Government of India to consider the existing racial distinctions in the Criminal Procedure applicable to Indians and non-Indians and to report on necessary modifications of the law, are:—That Indian accused should have the same right as Europeans to demand that one half of the Jury should be persons of their own nationality and that in certain cases the accused and the complainant should each have the right to apply to the trying Magistrates that the case be sent to a bench of two Magistrates of the First Class, one Indian and one European, for trial. The latter is an extraordinary recommendation, and it must inevitably lead in course of time to a demand for communal representation on the bench in every case according to the community to which the complainant or the accused belongs. We are sure that we shall soon have the demand that a Mahomedan Magistrate should be associated in the trial of cases in which the complainant or accused are Mahomedans; and we do not see how, in view of this recommendation, such a demand can be resisted. There can be only one recommendation on a subject of this kind at this time of the day. That is, that all racial distinctions should disappear from the Criminal Procedure Code, and there should be one law for Europeans and Indians in this country. Anything that falls short of this, is really not a step in the right direction but a new difficulty thrown in the way of progress in that direction. The Secretary of State has modified even some of the moderate recommendations made by this Committee. The Bill as it stands is an anachronism and will not satisfy the legitimate demands of the Indian people. It is utterly inconsistent with the professions made when the Reforms were introduced.

The Management of the Buddha-Gaya Temple: The Hindu Message of Srirangam endorses the statement of the Rev. U. Ottama of Burma that the relationship that binds India and Burma together is organic and adds: "This is also why, while the Mahant of the Buddha-Gaya temple with the support of the Hindu masses in North India is prepared always to offer every facility and help to Buddhists from all parts of the world to visit the scene of the Buddha's enlightenment, he is refusing to hand over the temple and its forms of worship to them." As we said last week, we strongly deprecate the idea of depriving the Mahant of his rights, whatever they are in the temple, except with his own free consent and after adequate compensation being paid to him. The temple should be placed in immediate charge of Buddhist devotees, under the management of a Committee consisting of representatives of Hindus and Buddhists in India, Burma and Ceylon. We are as anxious as our contemporary that the forms of worship in the temple should be Indian and our anxiety in this respect was quickened when we saw quite recently one who looked like a Chinese woman throw with the utmost nonchalance a pair of old shoes, belonging to her husband who was performing some worship there, into the place where the sacred Bodhi-tree stands and near the Vajrasana on which the Lord Buddha meditated. It seemed nobody's business to prevent such sacrilege. The broad namam on the forehead of the Buddha image and the ridiculous bib fastened on its chest, jars upon one's sensibility. If it is true that goats are killed near the temple, it can only be described as abominable. We do not see what exactly the Mahant does at present to justify his stewardship. A Government supervisor looks after the temple and the Mahant apparently does nothing but appropriate the gifts of the pilgrims. The Message quotes Swami Vivekananda's statement that "if China, Japan and Ceylon follow the teachings of the Great Master, India worships him as God Incarnate upon earth." Nobody who visits Buddha-Gaya will see much evidence of India's worship. It is with the view of making the worship at the temple worthy of India and worthy of the Great Master, that we strongly urge the reform in its management.

Sir T. B. Sapru and the Forthcoming Royal Commission: An English friend sends us the Pall Mall Gazette of January 24, containing an article on India in which Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru is claimed as endorsing Mr. Lloyd George's pronouncement regarding the eternal indispensability of the English services. The Journal says:

Sir T. B. Sapru, formerly one of the advanced politicians and later Law Member of the Viceroy's Council, in an interview with an English correspondent at Delhi on January 17, has practically reaffirmed the policy in regard to British Services announced by Mr. Lloyd George on August 2. He would fix the minimum strength of the British element in the various Services, and recruit accordingly, giving security of tenure and adequate overseas allowances. That, no doubt, is the view of Indians who are wise enough to foresee and bold enough to state the ruin and chaos—of which indications are already visible—that would overtake the "people of India" if the British Services disappear. Is it too much to hope that the Government here and in India have at last found a policy? If not, one is contained in the two utterances quoted above. And the sooner they set about getting their Royal Commission to work in giving effect to it the better for India, and, incidentally, for the unfortunate Services whose role for years has been that of the "toad beneath the harrow."

Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru, we think, is opposed to the Royal Commission, but whether he is one of the Indians "who are wise enough to foresee and bold enough to state the ruin and chaos that would overtake the "peoples of India" if the British Services disappear, we do not know.

An Australian View of American Prohibition: We have received by this mail a copy of a pamphlet by Mr. Gifford Gordon of Melbourne, Australia, containing the conclusions formed by him of the effects of Prohibition in the United States on the various aspects of national life and well-being. He sums up:

Now, after twelve months of thorough investigation, I am convinced that Prohibition in the United States has succeeded. Moreover, I have collected facts and statistics, and direct testimony, which support this verdict, and which I believe will be accepted as conclusive by any fair-minded, impartial judge. When I landed in New York my first impression was one of doubt and discouragement. I found many excellent Christian people who believed that Prohibition had not achieved its purpose. The cause of their discouragement soon became evident when I read the newspapers and listened to the talk of groups of average citizens, men and women, who had made no attempt to learn the facts and whose only source of knowledge was idle gossip. I went to a great editor and asked him why the newspapers had so much to say about violations of the law, and the apparent failure of Prohibition, and little or nothing about the beneficial results of its operation. This is what he told me: "Violation of law is news. Observance of the law is not news. For example a prominent citizen may lead a life of exemplary virtue, and the newspapers will not comment upon this fact. But let him fall from grace—let him break the law—and he becomes a subject for newspaper headlines." In my travels, I have been amazed to find the lack of knowledge about the operation of Prohibition which existed in every part of the country. Not only a lack of knowledge, but a distorted belief due to newspaper accounts of "bootlegging" and deaths due to drinking poisonous liquor. Whenever I have delivered my message, the people have flocked about me. "Mr. Gordon," they said, "the people of this country do not know these facts. Most of them have no idea that Prohibition has been so successful. You can do no greater service to the Prohibition cause than to publish the results of your investigation." I agree with them, and for that reason have written this report to leave behind me in America for the encouragement of those who are working for the final triumph of Prohibition here. For the whole world is watching this experiment of yours. As goes Prohibition in America, so will Prohibition go in Australia, and eventually all over the world. America, hold fast to that which thou hast! Let no man, or set of men, rob you of your prohibition crown.

Civil Disobedience: We reprint to-day a thoughtful leading article in a recent issue of the Bombay Samachar, a staunch Non-Co-operation Anglo-Gujarati daily newspaper. The Bombay Chronicle has not so far accepted the invitation of our contemporary to find an interpretation of its statement,—that Indian Mahomedans should look to the Government of India in case of a breach between Great Britain and Angora—which could be squared with the programme and principle of Non-Co-operation. For the rest, we welcome our contemporary's endorsement of our views regarding the relative values of obedience and disobedience. We find it not easy, however, to reconcile its concluding observations with its agreement with us on the question of civil disobedience.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1923.

POLITICS AND SOCIAL REFORM.

It will be generally agreed that what India wants is that she should be governed primarily with an eye to her interests. There is a surprisingly large amount of agreement even among the so-called extremists that once this is assured, India should do all that she can to help Great Britain. In connection with the proposal to boycott British goods, one heard in the most unexpected quarters at Gaya the objection that there was no sense in penalising British interests which, next to those of India, we were bound to consider, for the benefit of other foreign countries which would take advantage of the boycott to advance their own trade. Where India can produce the goods herself, it is our duty to keep out those of other countries which may imperil her incipient industries. But where this is clearly not possible within a measurable distance of time boycott of British goods can only mean a bounty to the industries of other countries. This undercurrent of feeling in regard to Britain as entitled to the second place in the consideration of Indians next to their own country, cannot come to the surface so long as India is not a self-governing country. But all the same it exists, and only the neglect of British statesmen to avail themselves of the present opportunity to enlarge the bounds of Indian freedom, can dry it up. There is a similar consensus of opinion that India should not contemplate freedom outside the British Commonwealth, until it is made manifest to the whole world that she had sought in all legitimate ways and failed to find it within that Commonwealth. We began by saying that what India wants is that she should be governed primarily in her own interests. The first thought of the Indian statesman should be to ensure the prosperity and the cultural greatness of India. Experience has clearly shown that this is extremely difficult unless Indians themselves hold the helm of the State. Religious, social and industrial reformers who started with the notion that political reform may wait and should wait till those other reforms had been accomplished, have been slowly and reluctantly forced by the logic of facts to the conclusion that a nation which has no political initiative has no power of initiating reforms in any department of life. That is why, to-day, so many religious and social reformers feel that they have to work for Swaraj as a condition precedent to any great reform in those directions.

At the same time, Indian politicians of every class have awakened to the truth that political freedom to be permanent and substantial should be the outcome of religious and social freedom. When a people begin seriously to aspire for political freedom, they are immediately confronted by the claims of those sections of the community which have not had their due measure of social and religious freedom.

The social reformers were the first to discover and insist upon this aspect of the National problem. In the early days of the Congress, however, Indian politics had not attained sufficient consistency to enable this to be realised even by the educated classes. It was possible to ask for simultaneous examinations, the separation of executive and judicial functions, and the moderation of the land tax, without awakening any slumbering social force in the country. But when politics began to assume a less formal shape, it impinged upon the social life with the result, to begin with, of the Mahomedan demand for communal representation. The National Congress was compelled to acquiesce in and endorse the demand, though to do so went against its whole past. The Lucknow compact was made. The electorates under the present Reform scheme are based upon that compact. A new and unexpected turn was given to Indian politics, the results of which have been far-reaching. The non-Brahmin party in Madras and Maharashtra, is another and later and an even more emphatic case of the same kind. In his address to the National Social Conference at Poona in 1895, the late Mr. Ranade foreshadowed the coming struggle in the South. "On the Madras side"—he might have added Maharashtra, too—"the Brahmin element is preponderant, and as a result the lower classes are borne down with a weight which they are not able to bear. But there are thoughtful men among them for whom we all feel the highest respect." If Madras had listened in time to the earnest counsel of these "thoughtful men" there would have been no non-Brahmin political party today. What is happening in the Punjab is just the same result of lack of sufficient social spade-work. The Hindu-Mahomedan problem is acute. The Sikhs are divided among themselves. Even the several political camps when examined, are seen to be co-terminous with sects and provincialisms. The Madras Moderates are all Aiyars, while all Madras Congress Brahmins, with the solitary exception of Mr. Satyamurthi, are Aiyangars (Sri Vaishnavas.) In Bombay, the Maharashtrians generally are for Council-entry, the Gujarathis, against it. In other words, Indian politics is still largely communal rivalries carried to a new plane, with the Englishman as the common rival of all. Now, nationalism begins where communal rivalry ends. Till this rivalry is ended, there can be no nationalism. This does not mean that there is no place for creeds and communities in a nation. Creeds and communities there will always be, but the relation among them should be one of co-operation and not rivalry. This was one of the first planks of the constructive Bardoli Congress programme. And it should be the first thing in the programme of the National Social Conference as well.

Mr. Ranade, when he founded the Indian National Social Conference, intended it to have a larger and wider scope than the Congress. Although in practice its Presidents and General Secretaries have been Hindus, and its resolutions have dealt chiefly with Hindu customs, its membership was never restricted to Hindus. Mr. Ranade was gradually feeling his way, and in his famous Lucknow address in 1899, he dwelt largely and significantly on the mutual influence of Hinduism and Islam and spoke of the National Social Conference as specially intended for the propagation of the great din or dharma of Hindu-Mahomedan unity for which the illustrious Emperor, Akbar, earnestly strove. He laid stress on the benefits that had accrued to Hindus from contact with Islam and to Islam from contact with Hinduism. He, in fact, in that address gave one of the first hints towards the synthetic view of Indian History, which is the first and most urgent task that awaits a national historian of the Indian people. The National Social Conference was thus intended from the first to be a common platform for all castes and creeds. Their problems are diverse, it is true, but each may learn from the experience of the other. The pardah provinces cannot fail to be influenced by the example of those where women are not restrained by that institution. The toleration of the Hindu, the solidarity of the Mahomedan, the discipline of the Sikh, the enterprise of the Parsi, and the freedom of the Indian Christian, are all lessons to be learnt by all. Mr. Ranade had also another end in view in the National Social Conference. Indian States were excluded from the National Congress owing to their different political jurisdiction. But the people of these States are as much part of the nation as those of British India. "If the heart of the nation can be traced anywhere in its ancient strongholds", Mr. Ranade said in Madras in 1894, "you will certainly see it strongly entrenched in the Native States. If any movement stirs the Native States, which are impervious to your political and industrial propaganda, that is a sign that the heart of the nation has been touched." Ranade, therefore, followed with deep interest the social reform events in Indian States, and social reform measures adopted by the rulers of Mysore, Baroda, and other States, and always prominently referred to them in his annual addresses. The Social Conference, it was clearly his purpose, should be the great common platform where representatives of Indian States can exchange and confer with those of British India on the social questions which determine to a large extent the happiness or misery of the people, and whose right adjustment was necessary to impart organic unity to the new nationalism. It was, thus, in an even larger sense than the Congress, to be the national institution of India. The time is come when a strong effort should be made to reconstitute it on the broad lines described above.

True Temperance: A few days ago we received a finely typed article headed "Drink and Non-Co-operation" from the Secretary of "the True Temperance Association," Kashmere Gate, Delhi. On reading the article, we find that the writer condemns not only the Non-Co-operationists for their picketing of liquor shops but he also holds the excise policy of Government responsible for a great deal of illicit distillation. His "true temperance" policy is not defined but it is apparently to leave the publican loose on the country. The Indian public should be on its guard against insidious propaganda of this kind under misleading headings.

LONDON LETTER.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

London, January 18th, 1923.

REVIVAL OF HAND-WEAVING IN ENGLAND.

It must come as something of a surprise to many Indian visitors to this country of machinery to find what a large amount of hand work is done by women in the making of clothing for themselves and their children. During the latter years of the war, it was seldom one saw women sitting with idle hands anywhere. They were always busy, in buses, trams, trains and meetings; hands could be seen busily plying knitting needles and making scarves, socks, hats, or gloves, for the men folk, or garments for themselves or their children. This habit has continued, and though meetings and public vehicles are no longer universally used in this manner, a tremendous amount of handwork is made and worn. Hand-weaving has always had its votaries in this country, and shops in some of the busiest centres sell only hand-woven material for dresses or house furnishings. Just lately the desire for hand-weaving has received a new impetus, and a society of hand-weavers, started some years ago in Canterbury, but having branches elsewhere in England, is making many new converts. Many gentlewomen with the need to support themselves have studied it, and after mastering the technicalities of the craft, have either set to work to help to support themselves by such labour or opened studios to teach it to others. It is hoped that this revival of the hand-loom will react upon the countryside and that once again the spinning-wheel will be heard singing in country cottages. Some of the places that specialise in hand-woven fabrics are also specialising in hand-spun wool for the same. Should this movement continue to grow, it will provide profitable work for the poor cottager and help to solve the problem of unemployment outside of the big cities.

THE RENT MUDDLE.

A peculiar position has arisen affecting landlords and tenants, chiefly of small working-class houses which is now known as the "rent muddle." A few weeks ago a "rent strike" commenced in Scotland. This being very successful, it almost immediately extended to the Midlands in England and soon reached London. The facts of the case are very simple, and it seems extraordinary that it is only now, after two years of working of the Rent Restriction Act, that the present trouble has arisen. The Rent Restriction Act of 1920 enabled landlords to raise their rents in a certain definite way, but they were first compelled by the statute, to give their tenants notice to quit the premises and thus form a new contract embracing the enhanced charge. Many landlords, however, omitted giving the necessary notice but increased the rent, the tenant acquiescing in the increase. Then someone in Scotland discovered that such an increase was not a legal contract, and that the landlord had, therefore, collected money he was not entitled to ; this discovery carried to its logical conclusion meant that the tenant could claim the increased rent back again, and a test case was brought to the House of Lords from Scotland at the end of last year. The result was a decision that where the requisite notice had not been given, the excess rents were recoverable from the landlords. It was then that rent strike commenced, the tenants refusing to pay any further rent until the excess had been worked off. The essence of the difficulty lies in the fact that the moral and legal claims clash. The landlord has never been loved by the poor tenant, so that when the latter sees a chance to score against his enemy he rejoices exceedingly. Of course, this is not true in all cases ; there are many tenants of small places who would not think of questioning the moral claim of the landlord, even though it has been technically illegal, and who are much too honest to take advantage of the position now created. On the landlords' side, it has been suggested that Government should immediately pass an Act cancelling their indebtedness. Retrospective legislation, however, does not find favour in the eyes of many, and were such legislation passed, a tremendous uproar is certain. The law had definitely said certain things and laid down certain rules for regulating the relationship between the landlord and the tenant. The landlords sought to take full advantage of the new power given to them ; if they failed to comply with the rules governing their power, they were surely at fault and, however unfortunate the individual case may be, must abide by the consequences. On the other hand, the tenants cannot be allowed to administer the law in the way that best suits them. The only way out of the muddle seems to be that the landlords should admit the money their tenants are legally entitled to recover and come to terms with them for its repayment. In the meantime the Government ought to do something to show that they cannot allow the rent strike to spread or to continue.

THE DEMAND TO ABOLISH CAPITAL PUNISHMENT.

The hanging of the man and woman last week for the murder of the woman's husband has once again made the question of capital punishment acute. Thousands signed a petition for the reprieve of both the man and woman concerned in this tragedy, and did so not because they did not believe them guilty of murder, but because they believed that our civilisation should have progressed beyond that point where we found that our only means of dealing with a person who had caused the death of another was to kill him. A big meeting was recently held by the Society of Friends (Quakers) at which a resolution was put forward demanding the abolition of capital punishment. It is very likely that some member of the House of Commons will endeavour to introduce a Bill on this subject during the forthcoming session. It is to be hoped however, if this is done, that it will be done by a prominent man who will canvass a good backing ere the Bill is introduced, for a badly introduced Bill with a poor backing will not only not serve its purpose but retard it.

CHILDREN OF UNMARRIED PARENTS.

A deputation is to wait upon the Home Secretary in regard to the "Children of Unmarried Parents Bill". The policy that has hitherto guided our actions in the problem of illegitimate birth has been to impose a legal deterrent upon unmarried parentage, and as was usual in dealing with such problems in the past, the whole onus of the illegitimate child was placed upon the mother. It is true that she could and sometimes did claim something in the nature of part maintenance for the child from the father. But the number that claimed this help was negligible, compared with the very large number that did not, and even when it was claimed and received, the sum allowed was so small that it did not pay more than a third of the child's upkeep in most instances. A few years ago a Bill was piloted successfully through the House of Commons but was delayed so long in the House of Lords over the difficulties of legal succession that it never had time to become law. However, since then public opinion has been tremendously educated and enlightened on this subject, and there is every reason to believe that a measure now brought forward, which aims at giving equal responsibility to both parents and above all, to ensure the child a chance in life, will receive ample support from all sides. Very little vital opposition would be shown to a Bill based upon the two following main clauses, one, the legitimatising of children born out of wedlock by the subsequent marriage of the parents, and the other, the raising of the amount payable by the father.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

This week the League of Nations has celebrated its third birthday. That it deserves congratulation upon the great event goes without saying, for to have achieved a third anniversary of its existence, in the face of a chaotic world, and to have actually increased in prestige during that brief period is indeed a remarkable achievement worthy of record and encouraging to all believers in the League. The Chilean President of the third assembly at Geneva last September summed up the situation in the following terse sentence :—" In its first year it was an impulsive child ; its second year schooled it ; and in its third year it has stepped as a peace-maker into the international arena." Its greatest success so far has undoubtedly been the economic salvation of Austria. The League's Court of Justice is already in operation, and already a dispute between Britain and France, as to the liability of British subjects in Tunis to French military service, has been referred to that august international tribunal for adjudication. The first question is whether or not the dispute is a French domestic affair. If the Court decides that it is not, it will be asked to adjudicate upon the main question.

LORD MILNER ON THE PRESENT ECONOMIC SITUATION.

A pronouncement of the utmost importance is being made on the present economic and industrial situation in this country by Viscount Milner, in the Observer. Reviewing the period that has elapsed since the Armistice, Lord Milner says:—"Many of us, it must be admitted, had hoped for better things. We had been encouraged by the great increase of work and production of which, under the stress of war, the nation had proved itself capable, and by results of the much abused and certainly very imperfect but rightly inspired control, which during the war it was possible to exercise over private cupidity in the public interest. And so we looked forward to a time when, by applying the same energy, in the same spirit, to the works of peace, we should make a better use than in the past of our national resources and attain a higher level of general well-being." Instead, as Lord Milner points out, we have temporarily lost our appetite for reconstruction and schemes too hastily developed have been scrapped. Lord Milner then proceeds to criticise our present social system on purely economic grounds. Says he:—"It is really remarkable how many educated people still fail to realise on what grounds, apart from what may be called humanitarian considerations, the case for Labour rests...The question whether Labour gets its fair share of what Labour produces is not the only question. Dig a little deeper, and you come to the far more fundamental problem, whether our present national production is anything like as great as it might be and ought to be. And, if it is not, where does the blame of inadequacy rest? An annual income of fifteen hundred, or even two thousand million pounds, does not spell prosperity to fifty million people...The real gravamen of the charge against our present industrial system is not that it involves an unfair distribution of the product, but that it mismanages, misdirects, and therefore unduly limits production itself. It is this contention which the out-and-out defenders of Capitalism will find it most difficult to meet...Compared with the great and rapid growth of our capacity of production, the growth of prosperity, among the mass of the people, has been lamentably slow." Lord Milner has, I believe, always claimed to be in substance a socialist. It would be remarkable if, as a veteran journalist and social reformer, he had not received some inspiration from the miseries of the people. At any rate, he says here, without gymnastics, what brainy Socialists like Bernard Shaw, Sydney Webb, and Ramsay MacDonald, have said for years. Coming from so powerful a mind as that of the tried statesman, the argument comes with tenfold striking power and conviction. In further articles, Lord Milner will develop his thesis and put forward some remedies. But is any remedy likely of success unless it is based upon a sense of human oneness, man's humanity to man? Perhaps the best way to make men realise the tragedy of injustice to another is to make them understand that they, too, suffer equally with their victims, and if they would avoid this suffering for themselves, they must cease to injure others and follow the higher selfishness.

WIRELESS TELEPHONY.

It has been tritely remarked that this is the age of miracles. We have proved it this week. The broadcasting of wireless telephony has attained such remarkable perfection already, that large numbers of people, all over the country, have been enabled to listen to the rendering of the famous opera, "The Magic Flute", during its performance at Covent Garden. It has been stated that the singing and music were heard as clearly as though the listener were actually on the stage during the rendition. It may be safely prophesied that, in the new age that is being prepared amid much suffering and tribulation, and when the dross of present mistakes has been burnt away, the human faculty of enjoyment of lofty themes and the development of the deeper and truer emotions, will have been greatly enhanced. We are only just beginning to appreciate all that the human mind and spirit are capable of.

POSSIBILITY OF TRADE REVIVAL.

The Board of Trade returns just published show a very large increase in the value of exports for this year over the last, and the imports approximately lower. Judged on broad lines there seems to be some ground for satisfaction. There are certainly signs of a trade revival shown, and a number of unemployed ships have been put into commission again. Notwithstanding the terrible problem of unemployment among workers, the figures shown by the Board of Trade have considerably decreased during the year and the year's income from foreign investments was one for congratulation rather than grief. The lower cost of living makes it possible in many instances to reduce the cost of production, and this should help British manufacturers to enter the world's markets by quoting figures that will enable them to compete with their neighbours. All this looks quite cheering and if only proper cooperation can be established between capital and labour here, there is every hope that the year 1923 may be one of improvement for all in this country if foreign complications, as Mr. Bonar Law has warned us, do not undo the work of reconstruction and re-establishment of industry already begun.

THE FRENCH OCCUPATION OF RUHR.

Much, however, depends upon the result of the present French action in the Ruhr district. Germany has defaulted in her payments under the Peace Treaty. France insists that she can pay, but will not, and that the only thing to make her pay is to bring her face to face with a situation even worse than that of the necessity of payment. Generally speaking, we in this country are sceptical of Germany's capacity to pay, even were she willing, and the view held here is that France's action is calculated to destroy every chance of reparations, and is even possible to reduce Germany to economic chaos, thereby throwing her into the arms of Russia.

THE SITUATION IN KENYA.

The situation in Kenya has again become acute. The proposals agreed upon by the Colonial and India Office and by the Government of India for a settlement, so far as possible carrying out the intention of the Imperial Conference resolution, have been received. Telegrams from Nairobi, however, appear to indicate that, since they are said to be fairly favourable to the Indian contentions, the Governor has informed the Duke of Devonshire of his disinclination to give effect to them, and Europeans are threatening violence. Mr. Polak, on behalf of the Indians Overseas Association, has addressed a sharp protest against this attitude to the Times. It is clear that an attempt will be made once more by the hostile European community to brow-beat the Colonial office into a refusal to apply the principle of equal citizenship.

THE SOCIAL EVIL.

(BY AN INDIAN LADY.)

In these times when social, moral, religious and political values are changing and we are all eager to see Right established in its true place, we can no longer afford to ignore the deep problem of man's inhumanity to woman, the inhumanity which has given birth to the so-called social outcasts and untouchables called 'prostitutes' and all that come in that category.

When women talk of all possible enfranchisements for them and want to claim equality of sexes in every sphere of the work-a-day world, and want to explore all the till-now-forbidden regions that had been marked as men's prerogatives, can they skip over this problem, and allow it to remain unsolved—the evil that has held women down for centuries, and which will hold them down yet for a long time to come, unless and until a right solution is arrived at? Man equally with woman must move within the moral bounds; he must be equally made to share the burdens and responsibilities of a new life which he may bring into this world along with women, and outside of law he ought to be an equally moral leper with the participator of his guilt, the woman. Until this be effected and the man be made to respect these primary laws of life, what hope is there for women's equality with men? A privileged few may attain real emancipation but the general social life is corroded with this deadly poison.

If we probe deeper into this form of untouchability created by man, we see nothing written there but pages and chapters of man's insatiable desire for the gratification of his lewd and mad passions, generation after generation. We, who sleep the sleep of the just! Do we give one thought to the blasted life and suffering of the joyless unfortunate sister moving about in a house of living death, who is made to live in it lest any ray of light may reach within and the mind and heart may perchance see the true life and light, and that this human prey may break its prison bars and escape! Escape from one long dreadful series of debaucheries, escape from a life that is one long dark night of infamy!

What about the children of these sisters of ours? If we go back and trace the childhood of one such fallen woman, what do we see? There is a child endowed with a child's wondering reverent soul, open to receive the first impressions of life, two bright pure eyes eager to see the world around it, ears eager to hear the song of universe. Imagine such a child to be a daily witness to promiscuous horrors, whose ears must hourly hear the foul language of mad ravaging passions, greed, crime, anger, and jealousy pervading the choking atmosphere around, the innate purity of the child dying its hourly death. This little angel who should be the harbinger of God's good teachings, is made to run on dirty errands, bearing on its innocent little shoulders the huge toppling burden of man's shameless guilt. No pure life can begin with heavier odds against it for its fulfilment. The child is a sweet normal child, a child that you or I could have had and given a fair chance, would have sheltered under a joyous happy home and devoted love of parents. With the careful upbringing of a true tender mother, life gently would have revealed to it a series of pure uplifting thoughts and sweet joys. Such a child is thrown into the hell on earth, to use a mild term for brothels. Oh child, dear child, what wouldst thou not have been! When I think of thy fate and think of what thou art made, can I help weeping? Art thou not betrayed woefully? Art thou not treacherously robbed of thy birthright to live, to joy, to love, the birth-right that is of every born creature on earth? And the childhood is slipped behind, and there is now a girl who is already half a woman aged with the ways of her world around. This will be the best time of her life, and yet she is allowed to gather no memories that may soften some moments of her hard, cold life that is in store for her. The soul tries to peep out here and there to gather joys for its growth, but is thrown back mercilessly again into darkness by hands which had never held tenderly and which are ignorant of all tenderness. Where can she turn to for a breath of life? Outside of her world what does she meet with? Cold stony stares that hurt her. A class socially higher, a class who makes her and others like her, a class that trampled upon and kicked the bodies of her mother and sisters, sees in her the marks of her race, and heartlessly thrusts her back to her own world, and she returns to it, humiliated, wounded like a hare to its cave. This insult goes deep into her heart, corroding her life, and she looks to the day when she can pay back to her tormentors an insult for an insult, and a push for a push. And, Oh, wives! she sends back to you your deceased, shameless husbands! Mothers, your enticed broken sons! Sisters, your ruined brothers! Daughters, your Godless lewd fathers! There cannot be any other justice; your near and dear ones make them suffer, and you suffer, in return. Pain acting and reacting everywhere, and no sign, no way of escape!

Having come to her womanhood, that innocent child of the past, placed as she has been amidst such poisonous surroundings, begins to know that she has a marketable value in her world where human flesh is being daily bought and sold. The more attractive a girl is in appearance, a greater chance she has of bringing more money into her world. She is made to drown all her remaining scruples, all the remains of a faint glow of life are extinguished. Fairly painted, gaudily dressed and bedecked, she is pushed into hands of the highest bidder and there she is broken like a toy! Nobody gives her another thought! She comes back to her world a woman bruised, broken, abhorring and abhorred, a half-marked receptacle of man's passions and sins, a chattel henceforth to pass from hand to hand, without relaxation until the all merciful God relieves her with death, and takes into His bosom His sweet little maltreated child.

Womanhood, the fairest flower in God's earthly paradise, womanhood the essence of all life, womanhood that dwells within the heart of hearts of every daughter on earth, womanhood, the crown, the glory, the joy of the earth, Oh! thou to be so crushed, disfigured, insulted and torn, that no trace of thy grace, thy goodness, thy greatness to be found! And thou woman, in whom this essence, this womanhood has been thus cruelly slain, thou that carriest the brand inflicted on thee, on thine brow, by the sin of man—thou the untouchable, to whom come the touchable beasts and vipers and accept the very essence of untouchability, the sin of adultery, but refuse to accept thee, thou to whom come these hypocrites, vipers, beasts to quench their foul thirst of lust and by their foulness poison thy very life-springs—God be judge between thee and they! He is all Mercy, all Love, all Purity! On the day of judgment thou wilt not stand before Him the rejected, but those that have judged thee here, shall be judged in their turn in His court, where there will not be inequity.

Then what is the task before us to-day, we who have been more favourably placed not by any special virtue, but by circumstances, by birth? Can we any longer refuse to see things as they are, seeing as we do with our own eyes, and be the silent spectators of the horrible crimes being daily perpetrated on our unfortunate sisters? And in as much as we lift not our voice, and in as much as we raise not our hands in protest against the deadly sin of "commercialised vice" and the miseries it brings in its train to the mute victims, are we not sinning against them, against our own conscience, against God?

CHILD LABOUR IN THE UNITED STATES.*

In spite of wide-spread disapproval of child labour in the United States, the United States census bureau reports that there are 1,000,000 children between the ages of ten and sixteen engaged in gainful work in industry in the United States. Approximately 660,000 of these are employed in the sugar-beet fields, cotton fields, and onion fields of the land where whole families are engaged by the contractors. The children work with the adults, often from sunrise to sunset, huddling over the ground, crawling between the rows, and rarely getting any relief from their cramped positions.

In the textile factories of America more than 50,000 children are employed as spinning girls and doffer boys. In the cotton mills children work sixty hours a week, and those over fourteen and a half years of age work at night. Thousands work at home stringing beads, pulling threads from lacework, and doing the monotonous tasks bringing in so little that the children of the family are forced to contribute their work to those scant earnings of the adults.

Even while the national child labour laws were in force, children laboured under the supervision of their parents, this condition being apparently beyond the reach of the protective laws which had been secured.

How persistent are the attempts of certain employers to have child labour is indicated by the fact that they actually cause the suspension of the immigration laws on the Mexican border to permit the importation of Mexican families for the purpose of working in the cotton and sugar beet fields.

Forty-two states out of the forty-eight have adopted so-called child-labour laws, some of which are highly developed and rigidly enforced. Others are rather rudimentary and indifferently enforced. The manufacturers in the state where children under the age of sixteen years are not permitted to work at all and where those above sixteen and below eighteen are permitted only to work under certain restricted conditions and regulations complain that they are subject to unfair competition by competitors who manufacture in states where there are no child labour laws or where they are not comprehensive and not enforced.

Under the American system permitting the Supreme Court to pass upon the constitutionality of enacted laws, two recent decisions of that court have destroyed former attempts to do away with legislation forbidding child labour. One was the decision of the Supreme Court, given last May, which broadly stated that the tax designed to put a stop to child labour was unconstitutional. A previous decision had declared unconstitutional the act which closed the channels of interstate and foreign commerce to the products of child labour.

The court made it plain that a federal restriction would have to be abandoned and reliance placed upon the states to deal with it, or that there would have to be an amendment giving Congress the right to pass a child-labour law. Both the first and second federal child-labour laws sought only a minimum national standard. State laws were still operative, and were enforced by state machinery under the attempted federal laws.

Among the organizations advocating an amendment giving Congress the right to establish a federal minimum are the trade unions, the National Child Labour Committee, and the National Consumers' League.

President Harding in his recent message to Congress, said: "Closely related to the problem of education is the abolition of child labour. Twice Congress has attempted the correction of the evils incident to child employment. The decision of the Supreme Court has put this problem outside the proper domain of federal regulation until the Constitution is so amended as to give Congress the authority to act in this matter. I recommend the submission of such an amendment."

A bill authorizing an amendment to the Constitution regulating child labor, is now pending, and it is believed that the favourable consideration and passing of the measure will surmount the legal restrictions imposed upon the former laws by the Supreme Court.

DEV SAMAJ AND FLESH EATING.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

SIR,

Your correspondent "A Jawharian," objecting to Dev Samaj principles says that he is a vegetarian himself but takes up the cudgels on behalf of flesh-eaters generally. That were a worthy attitude to take if it were a question of cosmopolitanism, e. g., it must be really high-minded of him to have said; "I am a Hindu, but I object to such and such an institution being reserved only to Hindus, —I would like my Muslim brethren to enter, too," and so on. But in his defence of flesh-eaters and flesh-eating, your vegetarian correspondent has committed some fallacies which I would show up as briefly as possible. I do not wish to enter into all the pros and cons of this subject, favourite of our debating clubs, humanitarian journals, physical culture faddists, et hoc genus omne.

I will say at the outset that I am not myself a strict vegetarian: my diet includes fish, crabs and other crustacea; and I would not scruple to take eggs if medically advised to do so. Yet I have an inner conviction that fish-eating is wrong; but I cannot easily get over the habit because I was brought up on it from a child. There is an irrepressible craving for it although I know that I could get as good as or even better nutriment from a purely vegetarian diet if sufficiently varied. Though I indulge my palate, I am persuaded that flesh-eating in any shape is wrong at least on moral (or conscientious) grounds, if not on dietarian (or physiological) grounds also. For though I do not do the killing myself, I pay and encourage somebody to do it for me. And to take animal life either selfishly or wantonly, for pleasure or in sport is what no true Hindu, Jain, or Buddhist (esp. the two latter) will do or encourage consistently with his religion. To go no higher—that primer for beginners of Sanskrit named the Hitopadesha pleads to us so sententiously; "When enough of nourishment can easily be obtained from that which grows spontaneously on the earth, who will commit such a great sin as to kill animals for filling his stomach and deriving a little pleasure of taste?" Again, "Compare the eater with the animal that is eaten. The one has pleasure which lasts for a few seconds, and the other is deprived of all the pleasures of life." (द्वितीये विषयः कलः). Seneca expresses a similar idea when he says: "Vegetables are sufficient food for the stomach into which we now stuff valuable lives." (though I shall find it difficult, I mean to get over my flesh-eating habit, and if Mr. Horniman, late of the Bombay Chronicle, and the late Mr. F. T. Brookes (itinerant Theosophist) to name only two, originally greater flesh-eaters than myself could overcome their palates and become pure vegetarians, there is surely hope for me.

Morality is involved in the question because of the reaction which the act of killing or getting killed animals for our selfish sake has on our mental and moral fibres. The doing to death of thousands of innocent creatures, often attended with horrible cruelty cannot but blunt the feelings and gradually lower in the subject's eyes even the sanctity of life of the highest animal, viz., man. It is well-known how slaughterhouses turn out the greater number of hired assassins, kidnappers and desperadoes in the West, especially in and about Chicago. And vegetarianism rests upon a recognition of this principle as well as on the sanctity of animal life and "animal's rights." The vegetarian who is such from humanitarian motives (and the generality of vegetarians is so disposed) will abstain not only from the eating of animals but will abrink from doing anything which encourages and patronises the infliction of cruelty on God's or Nature's sentient creatures, e. g., he will not wear those kinds of silk which he knows come from worms which are boiled alive in water;—he will not wear shoes that are made of the skins of slaughtered animals;—he will not taste honey the gathering of which involves treacherous cruelty to the bees in the hive;—if a female she will eschew furs, feathers etc. in the obtaining of which, she knows, are involved processes of torture to beasts and birds. In fact vegetarianism is only an aspect of humanitarianism. It may be considered as a synecdochical term for "humanitarianism"—as "Cow-protection" stands for the "sacredness of all animal life" implied in Ahimsa. (Plant-life and microbes might generally be excluded as their destruction, witting or unwitting, does not react upon man's or the average man's moral sensibility.)

This is the moral aspect. But your correspondent credits flesh-eating races with certain virtues like the power of self-defence, heroism, chivalry, and what not. The reasoning by which he arrives at these "truths" seems to be vitiated by a type of fallacy worse than the Post hoc, ergo propter hoc type. In this way one might say that cannibalism conduces to artistic skill, for, did not the Caribbean Indians, the aborigines of Mexico and Peru, who were addicted to a taste for human flesh offered in sacrifice or other, develop a type of civilisation characterised by wonderful artistic skill? To disprove "Jawharian's" generalisation one might cite these instances; the Deccani Brahmins (or Maharatha Brahmins) who led the armies that overran the length and breadth of the Indian continent and reduced the Moghul Empire to a name and a shadow were all pure vegetarians. The Sikhs too are probably all vegetarians. The Japanese who checked Russia's advance in the East in the early years of this century and are now one of the "Big Powers" are mainly and predominantly a vegetarian people who were not so long ago looked down upon as "rice-eating monkeys". On the contrary are not the Negroes flesh-eaters, and yet do they not slave for their European masters as in Belgian Congo of the "Red Rubber" fame? Athletes living on vegetarian diet have proved superior in strength and endurance, as shown in racing, weight-lifting and other competitions, to their flesh-eating antagonists. In the animal world the herbivorous elephant and the horse as compared with the ferocious tiger, lion, etc., are animals capable of much greater muscular endurance and staying-power. These instances are sufficient.

"Jawharian" makes one mistake. He writes as if all Brahmins were even at the present day vegetarians. It is not a fact. I know a story of how a certain Deccani Brahmin tourist arriving at a place near the foot of the Himalayas and resting at a Brahmin-owned inn was surprised to find venison served for dinner and asked the landlord why he had served flesh for his meal and whether he did not know he (the guest) was a Brahmin; upon which the host appeared to be surprised in turn and told his guest that he (the landlord) was a Brahmin himself ("Ham bhi Bhaman hai!").

As for chivalry and the rest, is there also not fanaticism to be observed amongst flesh-eaters, as shown e. g. in their witch-burning, heretic-roasting, hag-drowning, negro-lynching, Jew-baiting—counterparts to their chivalry and heroism! As also cannibalism amongst the savages? (Sati-going in India, it must be noted, was an act of voluntary self-immolation in theory and very largely in practice, but it was never a punishment which the "stake" was for the heretic and the witch in Inquisition times).

Finally I would personally wish that the Dev Samaj had insisted on respect for all forms of life—of which non-flesh-eating is a corollary,—rather than interdicted flesh-eating as a "gross sin." On moral grounds I would not object to eggs. But milk, known to be taken by depriving the calf of its due share, would be haram for me.

"Jawharian" says that the wife and children of a drunkard come out and protest against his drunkenness and testify against the evil. True; and so also would the victims of cannibal tribes protest against cannibalism, and if the lower animals could speak they would testify, too, against man's selfish and wanton brutality vehemently! As for the contempt which vegetarians are accused of feeling towards non-vegetarians,—why, every virtue, even temperance, is open to the same charge; and meat-eaters cannot be absolved of an imputation of similar conduct as against vegetarians. Aye, their contempt and disdain for vegetarians—I do not speak of conditions in India only—is fiercer, like the tiger's for the sheep. The carnivorous are carnal, as a rule.

Yours, etc.,

"A KARWARIAN."

KEMAL PASHA ON TURKISH WOMEN'S EMANCIPATION.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The great leader of the Turks, Ghazi Mustapha Kemal Pasha, in declaring the harems out of date, made a striking pronouncement at Brussels in favour of the emancipation of Turkish women. Contending that women should leave the harems to take up equal position with men, he said: "Traditions have been pushed too far. Women ought not to hide themselves, otherwise the whole society suffers. They should become savants, novelists, lecturers and teachers and help forward the national life equally with men." (The Times of India, 30th January). I believe that these words will serve as an eye-opener to those Hindu and Mahomedan nationalists who oppose compulsory education of girls. These Indian Nationalists want our national life to flow freely and vigorously with the full co-operation of women. But they want it without their education. They must know that uneducated women are an impediment and a burden to our national life. I have seen a lot of uneducated Hindu women who sincerely advise their brothers and sons not to take part in "swadeshi." They will slavishly request their husbands to spend money even beyond their means to support all the priest-crafts. They cannot appreciate the self-sacrifice of those sons and daughters of India who suffer willingly for the sake of their country. If opposition to female education in our sister-community becomes less stiff, it will not fail to have its healthy effect on our society.

Yours sincerely,

JAWHARIAN.

Devlali, 31st Jan. 23.

THE LIQUOR MENACE.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The Indian Messenger, a Brahmo Samaj paper published in Calcutta, in an able editorial on "The Moral Atmosphere of the Brahmo Samaj" laments the growth of intemperance among the younger generation of that community and pleads for "greater efforts to preserve the pristine glory of the Samaj as regards temperance."

The condition that troubles this editor is by no means confined to the Brahmo Samajists. Educated young men of most communities in India are being more sorely tempted to drink than their fathers were. The loosening of the restrictions of caste, the weakening of social and domestic discipline and the assumption by the rising generation of individual liberty in regard to many customs formerly decided by caste or community action have resulted in an increase of drinking.

If the real benefits of democracy, now so loudly acclaimed and so earnestly sought, are to be generally enjoyed in India, greater efforts must be made to save the sorely-menaced young people of every community from slavery to drink. An evil habit is a hard master. Any alleged liberty which brings one under the domain of drink is a delusion.

A strong reason for united effort against the drink evil is suggested by the Message as follows:—"We Brahmos cannot retain the purity of community if the moral atmosphere of the whole country is vitiated. Our boys mix with other communities and often misled by their bad example." Mahomedan, Arya, Christian or orthodox Hindu Editors might write the same way with as much reason. In the new India every community reacts on every other community. No groups can boast of immunity from public influence. The only way to save any class of India's people is to save all classes. We can't supply drink for the European and count upon all Indians refusing it. We can't license liquor shops for the depressed classes only. As long as the liquor trade is allowed, the life and liberty of the boys of every community are in peril.

A BRAHMIN WIDOW REMARRIAGE

Under the auspices of the Bombay Presidency Social Reform Association, a widow re-marriage was celebrated at Mr. Bhagwandas Madhavdas' Bangalow on Thursday the 18th December at 6 P. M. in the presence of influential ladies and gentlemen. The bridegroom, Mr. Nanal N. Kavishwar, is a Sathodra Nagar Brahmin of Rajkot aged 35 years and the bride, Bai Mani, is a Modh Chaturvedi Brahmin lady aged 25 years. The ceremony was performed according to the Arya Samaj rites by Pandit Dwivendra Nath Sarma. Bai Mani, who unfortunately had lost her previous husband 6 years ago, took the protection of the Ashram 4 months ago. This is Mr. Nanal's first marriage and he is a very well known writer in Kathiawar. He has published many books depicting the horrors of widowhood and he is a strong Arya Samajist. He gave Rs. 500 as stridhan (sic) and transferred his life policy to the bride's name. Arya Samaj Bhajan Mandli recited prayers and songs of blessings to the married couple.

A BOMBAY MINISTER'S DIFFICULTY

The Indian Social Reformer comments on the statement of the Hon. Mr. C. V. Mehta, Minister for Excise, and other departments in Bombay Presidency. Mr. Mehta acknowledges that the limitation of hours and the reduction of the strength of the liquor are not sufficient to stop the drink evil. The recent death of the Chairman, Rao Bahadur Sathe, has stopped the work of the Sathe Committee, which was appointed to investigate and recommend the best course to adopt to put down the drink evil. There has been difficulty in securing another Chairman to carry on the work. The Editor of The Indian Social Reformer thinks that one reason for this is the lack of confidence that measures suggested will be put in force by the Government. We are sorry to believe this; but the experience of some other provinces, notably the Punjab, leads one to question how much the Government is ready to carry out the will of the people, concerning its dealing with the drink problem.—The Indian Witness.

DISOBEDIENCE.

(The Bombay Samachar.)

The Indian Social Reformer in its issue of February 3rd put a very curious interpretation on one of the passages which it quoted from the Bombay Chronicle and proceeded to judge that "in the opinion of Mr. Pickthall, the time is come for Indian Mahommedans to abandon the policy of non-co-operation with the Government of India." We shall leave the learned Editor of the Bombay Chronicle to make his own reply and rest contented with stating that the interpretation seems to us to be very curious and unjustifiable. The Bombay Chronicle has always believed so far as we have been able to interpret it that the only method open to Indians to bring pressure on the Government of India is thorough-going non-co-operation and we are still under the impression that the passage quoted by the Reformer advised Indian Mahommedans to intensify their non-co-operation with the Government of India and thereby to force it into advising the British Government to adopt a more reconciliatory attitude towards Turkey.

While disagreeing with the Indian Social Reformer in this respect and refusing to admit that non-co-operation has failed, we are entirely in agreement with him when he says: "Obedience is the crowning virtue of public and private life. But when we have a higher principle to obey, it may be incidentally necessary to disregard a lower one. Disobedience, however, is not an end in itself. Training for civil disobedience, mass or individual, is wrong. What we have to train people to, is the higher obedience. Not until we have ensured the social and general conditions indispensable to a higher and better system have we the right to disobey the existing system." This is what Mahatmaji himself would have said. Non-co-operation is an exception, co-operation is the law of life. Similarly obedience is the rule, disobedience a rare exception. Whoever non-co-operates, whoever disobeys undertakes a tremendous responsibility. He is bound to see that the necessity for non-co-operation and disobedience is supreme and such that cannot be obviated on any account. He is responsible for taking care that as soon as the points of non-co-operation or disobedience are settled and circumscribed within very accurately defined limits, the other points of contact and obedience are correspondingly strengthened. For a non-co-operator co-operation and obedience become greater duties than for an ordinary indifferent citizen. Otherwise anarchy results, loyalty disappears and the world becomes a hell. The aim of Non-co-operation and disobedience becomes impossible of achievement. We recognise that this view has not been laid before the country in all its emphasis. But Mahatmaji was never under a delusion, and he was always for discipline and obedience within the non-co-operation camp. He tried to strengthen the points of co-operation between different communities, between the Englishmen and Indians and between the Moderates and Extremists. It was also for this reason that he took upon himself the responsibility of preserving law and social order and was harsher to non-co-operators at the time of the Bombay riots than to the hooligans. It was because he felt that the law of higher co-operation and obedience was not fully understood by the country that he refused to embark on his campaign of disobedience and even when pressed to raise the ban, he only consented to do so on condition that it was restricted to individuals who fulfilled in all respects the conditions of the Ahmedabad pledge. That pledge is the minimum that appeared to guarantee to him discipline and obedience in the extremist ranks. The Civil Disobedience

Enquiry Committee found to the good fortune of the country that the pledge should be maintained. At the same time all the members unanimously found that the country being weak, indisciplined, and unorganized was not fit for embarking on a campaign of disobedience. The Gaya Congress while seeming to adopt this finding, resolved to enlist fifty-thousand volunteers. The purpose of enlistment as explained by various leaders was individual civil disobedience. The meaning of the resolution therefore is that the Gaya Congress undertook to train the country to habits of discipline, organization, co-operation and obedience within four months to such an extent as to justify embarking on a campaign of disobedience to law and disorganization of Government machinery.

If this interpretation of the resolutions of the Gaya Congress be accepted, we have to admit that nothing has been done by us in the month and a half that has lapsed except the delivery of a few speeches. We have been enmeshed in controversy and our morale is degenerating every day. We once more urge upon the leaders of the majority to realize the grave responsibility they have undertaken. Money may be collected, volunteers may be enlisted, but the necessary conditions of disobedience require greater accentuation. We suggest to our leaders therefore that when the time comes for recruiting volunteers for civil disobedience, sufficient emphasis should be laid upon the conditions of the pledge, so that disobedience may be effective and may conduce us to our goal without our having to fall back as at Bardoli.

AKHILA DRAVIDA RASHTRIYA SANGHA.

The Editor, The "Indian Social Reformer."

Sir,

A meeting of the South Indian residents of Bombay was held at Dadar on Sunday the 4th February 23, under the presidentship of Sjt. C. Rajagopalachariar, when it was resolved by those present to form themselves into a Political Association with the name "Akhila Dravida Rashtriya Sangha". The objects of the above association are: (1) to foster a spirit of brotherhood and service among the South Indian residents of Bombay and suburbs irrespective of caste or creed, (2) to carry on the activities of the Indian National Congress among the South Indian community, (3) to co-operate with the Congress Committees in South India in all possible ways, (4) to organise a Volunteer Corps for general national service, especially in Bombay and suburbs. Membership is open to all those who come from the Madras Presidency and South Indian States. South Indian residents of Bombay and suburbs are expected to rise high to the level of the present situation and join the institution forthwith. The following have been elected Provisional Secretaries of the Sangha:—M. R. Anantha Krishna Iyer, 80 Abu Mansion, Parel, and C. V. P. Shivam, Congress Office, Lady Jamshetji Road, Dadar.

The Sangha will be pleased to look to the comforts of South Indian leaders coming to, or passing through Bombay, for which purpose the leaders and the various Congress Committees in South India are requested to communicate with the Secretaries. C. V. P. SHIVAM.

THE PUNJAB VIDVA VIVAH SAHAIK SABHA.

MAGH UTSAV AT MIANWAL.

(A Correspondent.)

Magh Utsav was celebrated in Ram Mohan Roy High School at Mianwali on the 25th January 1923. The proceedings commenced with bhajans, and speeches were delivered on the life and teachings of Raja Ram Mohan Roy. L. Narain Das, B. A. B. T., the head master of the school, impressed on the audience how the best study for man was man. He was followed by Mr. M. Mela Ram B. A., who said that the Hindu nation is indebted to Raja Ram Mohan for his work in connection with the sacred Vedas and Shastras. "The Raja was a great soul and puissant worker who laid his hand in Bengal and shook her out of her indolent sleep." L. Alamchand and L. Tekchand followed with their instructive speeches. Malik Uttamchand, the manager of the school, then gave a bird's eye view of the teachings and professions of the Brahma Samaj. After upvasa and arti the meeting came to a close.

In connection with this a ladies' gathering was arranged. Mrs. Mela Ram B. A., read a short paper on the duties of Indian women. Sweets were distributed, Bhajans were sung and after exchange of greetings and conversations, the meeting dispersed.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1923.

MEMBERS AND MINISTERS.

When Sir Chimanlal Setalvad was re-appointed Vice-Chancellor of the Bombay University after he became a Member of the Executive Council, we pointed out that the dual position, which had for forty years been considered incompatible with the interests of the University, had become still more so owing to the transfer of education to a Minister. An evidently well-informed correspondent, writing in the Madras Ministerial organ, Justice, more than suggests that the defeat of the Irrigation Bill by the Ministerial majority in the Legislative Council, and the resignation of his office by Sir Srinivasa Iyengar, the Member of Government who was in charge of the Bill, was partly due to differences that had arisen between the latter in his capacity of Vice-Chancellor of the Madras University and the Minister of Education on matters pertaining to the University. "Constitutionalist" writes :

The duel between the Law Member and the Ministry began when the former continued in his Vice-Chancellorship even after he became Executive Councillor and, worse still, had his term extended after experience had shown that the relations between University and Government had become meanwhile strained. He was colleague as well as subordinate 'vis a vis' the Education Minister, and a person who combines self-contradictory functions is bound to suffer self-stultification. His Excellency, too, must bear his share of responsibility for this, especially as the Secretariat knew how difficult the transaction of University business had become when Sir Sivaswami Iyer acted in that dual capacity. Sir K. S. Iyengar, not content with the inherent difficulties of a situation which would have taxed the finesse of the finest temperament in the world, aggravated it by his omissions and commissions—omission to give the Legislative Council the benefit of his advice as Vice-Chancellor in any of the debates concerning the University and, above all, when its transformation was being effected; and commission of a speech at Chidambaram, where he was beyond the range of our guns, in which he practically attacked the Bill and told a bewildered world that what was wanted was more money and not constitutional reform, an attack which went to the root of the Bill and its very soil.

Sir Srinivasa's fault in the eyes of the Ministerialists was that, as Vice-Chancellor of the University, he held and expressed views not in accord with those of the Minister. And for it, among others, he was defeated on a Bill pertaining to the Irrigation Department of which he had charge as a Member of the Government, and has had to resign office, though he held office from the Crown. Ministers, supposed to be responsible to the Council, have continued to hold office notwithstanding that their proposals have been thrown out in the Councils, and, in one case, a Legislative measure brought forward by a Minister, was thrown out by the Provincial Council without anything happening to the Minister. We agree with "Constitutionalist" that both Sir Srinivasa and Government are to blame for a combination of offices in which the Vice-Chancellor of the University can be secure of his position as Member of Government only by subordinating what he holds to be in the interests of the University to the views, which he considers injurious to it, of the Minister in charge of Education. If a similar situation has not arisen elsewhere where such a combination of offices prevails, it may be because of the minds of the Minister and the Member—Vice-Chancellor being tuned extraordinarily to one pitch.

"Constitutionalist" claims that the resignation of Sir S. Iyengar is the crowning triumph of the Madras Council and its Ministers. It has been suggested that the Governor should have dissolved the Council. The correspondent rightly points out that there was not the remotest possibility of the electorate returning a different kind of chamber. It has also been suggested that the Governor should have tried a new set of Ministers.

"If this Presidency had been Bombay, Bengal or U. P." "Constitutionalist" observes, "such a course would have met with success. But unfortunately for the adherents of autocracy, veiled or naked, there is discipline in the party in power. Whatever differences there may be amongst themselves—and which party is free from them or could be if it is to be progressive—they are not the sort who would betray the party to the foes outside the walls. A Ministry drawn from the rest of the House could not continue in power for two days without resort to unconstitutional expedients. Confronted with votes of no confidence and continuous defeats, it would be obliged to dissolve the Council and disappear in the electoral gulf."

Lord Willingdon adopted the easiest course open to him and that was to obtain Sir S. Aiyangar's resignation. This was possible because the latter was a non-official before he was appointed Member of Government. His Excellency could not have acted in the same way if the Member in charge of the Irrigation Bill was, as he would ordinarily have been, a Member of the Indian Civil Service. In that case, the Governor would have either had to drop the Bill or, if it was too important to be dropped, to "certify" it as the Viceroy certified the Princes' Protection Bill. With a strongly organised Ministerial majority, this can only mean the collapse of the Council system, as the Government may be reduced to having to carry on by "certification," like a sick man in the last stage of decrepitude on champagne. The Non-Brahmin Ministerialists in Madras have achieved just what Non-Co-operationists who are in favour of entering the Councils, wish to achieve. They have forced the Governor to dismiss a Member of Government who could not get on with them. They could, if they chose, have forced His Excellency to appoint for his successor a member of their own party. Mr. C. P. Ramaswami Iyer who has been appointed is not one of them but New India, which is likely to know, plainly says he has received assurances of support from the Ministerialists. Obviously he can hold his post only so long as the Ministerialists choose to let him. He cannot become a Ministerialist himself, as in Madras Ministerialists are born, not made.

"Constitutionalist" claims that the Ministerial party in Madras is entitled to credit for this great step in constitutional progress. But as he himself urges that the official and English Members of Government were in the same boat with the Indian Member and should, in fairness, have gone out with him, the incident has only a limited constitutional significance. It has shown—and if Mr. C. P. Ramaswami had declined to take office under sufferance, it would have definitely established—that the non-official Indian member of the Executive Council is an anachronism and a misnomer. Indians can hold office only as Ministers responsible to the Legislature. This is not a small matter. The change from diarchy to full responsibility is undoubtedly retarded by Indian public men accepting office in the reserved half of the Provincial Governments. The Indian Members are supposed to temper the bureaucratic spirit of their English colleagues, but they as often as not are themselves infected by it. Not that bureaucracy is an evil in itself. It is at any rate a necessary evil. We cannot do without it when we have Swaraj, and we are not able to do without it even in the Congress or the Liberal Federation. What is evil is that a bureaucracy should be the master, not the servant of the Administration. It should have no hand in shaping policies. Its functions should be solely to carry out policies shaped by responsible Ministers. Some Indian public men have pretended that by becoming Members of the reserved half of Government, they have not forfeited their character as public men. But nobody has been deceived by this pretence which, indeed, could be maintained only by effacing the dividing line between fact and fiction. The Madras incident indicates that the departments now entrusted to Indian members should be immediately transferred and the number of Ministers correspondingly increased in the provinces. No Indian should hold office in the Government except in a relation of direct responsibility to his countrymen.

THE PRESENT SITUATION IN THE PHILIPPINES.

(BY THE REV. STANLEY JONES.)

The Phillipine Islands present an interesting study to those who love to see humanity on the upward march. There is scarcely a more striking example in the world.

Magellan "discovered" the Phillipines to the Western World on March. 16, 1521. At the time of the Spanish conquest the Filipinos numbered less than half a million. Now there are 10,500,000. The islands number 7,084, of which 462 have an area of a square mile or more. The total area is 114,406 sq. miles. They are about the size of England, Scotland and Wales put together. They are exceedingly fertile and sustain a population of 60,000,000.

The people are a mixture of Indian and Mongoloid, generally called Malays. There have been found Hindu idols, showing early connection with India. There are many words in the Tagalog language which show early Indian connection, for example, the word for teacher is "guru." Of the population, 9,495,272 are Christians while there are 855,368 Non-Christians including a quarter of a million Moros who are Mohammedans. The remaining Non-Christian tribes, 27 in number, are in a low state of civilization; until quite recently many of them were addicted to head-hunting. These were the aborigines in the Islands.

The Phillipinos are the first Malay race that has ever attained to anything like being a nation. The rest have always remained in a more or less unorganized state and where organized it was the tribal stage. Moreover, while it is questionable whether the rest of the Malays will hold their own and survive in competition with the more hard-working Chinese and Indian (many think they will not do so), there is certainly no question about the Phillipinos surviving. They are not only surviving, they are rising and rising rapidly. With the possible exception of Japan no people are rising more rapidly.

America came into possession of the Phillipines without planning to do so. When she captured Manila from the Spaniards she intended to hold that city and no more. Cuba, taken at the same time was given her independence, but the Phillipines were surrounded by powerful neighbours who were land hungry; so they could not be turned adrift so quickly. Besides there is much to be done to weld the people into a real nation.

Since the American occupation in 1898 the Phillipines have had four forms of Government. The first was the Military Government which lasted from August 1898 until February 1900. Next came the Government of the Phillipine Commission which ruled the Archipelego for upward of seven years. Then followed a dual Government composed of a Phillipines Commission and a Filipino Assembly elected by popular vote. This was followed in 1916 under the Jones Bill by a form of Government to all intents and purposes autonomous. The whole of the legislature is Filipino and there are only three officers whose appointment is not subject to it. The Governor-General, the Vice Governor, who is also the Commissioner of Education, and the Auditor, are the only officials who are appointed by the President of the United States. The Governor has the power of veto over the Legislature, which I understand has never been exercised.

The Woods-Forbes Commission was sent to the Phillipines in 1921 to report to the President of the United States on the question of whether the Phillipines were ready for immediate independence. After a most thorough enquiry they came to the following conclusions and gave the following recommendations:

We find the people happy, peaceful, and in the main prosperous and keenly appreciative of the benefits of American rule.

We find everywhere among the Christian Phillipinos the desire for Independence, generally under the protection of the United States. The Non-Christians and the Americans are for continuance of American control.

We find a general failure to appreciate the fact that independence under the protection of another nation is not true independence.

We find that Government is not reasonably free from those causes which result in the destruction of Government.

We find that a reasonable proportion of officials and employees are men of good character and ability, and reasonably faithful to the trust imposed upon them; but that the efficiency of the public services has fallen off, and that they are now relatively inefficient, due to lack of inspection and to the too rapid transfer of control to officials who have not had the necessary time for proper training.

We find that the Filipinos have shown a marked capacity for Government service and that the young generation is full of promise; that the civil service laws have in the main been honestly administered, but there is a marked deterioration due to the injection of politics.

We find that there is a disquieting lack of confidence in the administration of justice, to an extent which constitutes a menace to the stability of the Government.

We find that the people are not organized economically or from the standpoint of national defence to maintain an independent Government.

We find that the Legislative chambers are conducted with dignity and decorum and are composed of representative men.

We feel that the lack of success in certain departments should not be considered as proof of essential incapacity on the part of Filipinos, but rather as indicating a lack of experience and opportunity and especially lack of inspection.

We feel that with all their many excellent qualities, the experience of the past eight years, during which they have had practical autonomy, has not been such as to justify the people of the United States relinquishing supervision of the Government of the Philippine Islands, withdrawing their Army and Navy, and leaving the Islands a prey to any powerful nation coveting rich soil and potential commercial advantages. In conclusion, we are convinced that it would be a betrayal of the Philippine people, a misfortune to the American people, a distinct step backward in the path of progress, and a discreditable neglect of national duty, were we to withdraw from the Islands and terminate our relationship there without giving the Filipino the best chance possible to have an orderly and permanently stable Government.

We recommend that the present general status of the Philippine Islands continue until the people have had time to absorb and thoroughly master the powers already in their hands.

We recommend that under no circumstances should the American Government permit to be established in the Philippine Islands a situation which would leave the United States in a position of responsibility without authority.

In making enquiries from the Filipinos we found that there was a general sentiment of the student and political classes for immediate independence. Others who are more conservatively inclined called our attention to the following facts:

That the Filipinos are not truly united. That there is still a good deal of jealousy between the different language areas. The Moros are against the proposition of immediate grant of independence. That 86% of the business of the Philippines is in the hands of the Chinese, 8 per cent in the hands of Europeans and Americans and only 6 per cent in the hands of the Filipinos themselves. This is in spite of the fact that restrictions of various kinds have been placed in the way of the Chinese. That the men who are in the places of leadership are nearly all men of mixed blood, particularly with Chinese blood; Aguinaldo, the leader of the Revolution against Spain and America, Mabini, the brains of the Revolution, Rizal, the great national hero, who was unjustly shot by the Spaniards, Quizon, the present leader of the Nationalists and other men of prominence are all men of mixed blood. It may be remarked in passing that the remarkable thing in contrast to many other countries is that the people of mixed blood identify themselves with the Filipinos and to all intents and purposes are Filipinos in dress, thought and outlook. This is certainly in contrast with India.

They also reminded us of deterioration in many departments. The most damaging thing mentioned was the fact that the Government had gone into business and had involved itself until it was on the very verge of bankruptcy. The Legislature had founded a Philippine National Bank and had loaned huge sums to friends and relatives on most insufficient securities and according to the Auditors had "violated every principle which prudence, intelligence and even honesty dictate." There was a total loss of twenty two million five hundred dollars. I saw Gen. Concepcion who had been at the head of the Bank while he was serving out his sentence in jail.

On the other hand many things can be cited in their favour. Much as has been written to the contrary, the Filipinos are hard working and industrious, although the lower classes are improvident and easily exploited. A close student of Filipino life estimates their temperament as "nervous, but quiet and reserved and at first distrustful." Among the Filipino's moral qualities, he places courage very high. He is a natural soldier and he stands up under calamities in a most remarkable way and begins again with unbroken courage. He is very ambitious, in fact he will do anything to get an education. They have made very remarkable strides in education. In 1898 there were 4,504 in the public schools, by 1914 there were 489,070 and by 1920 there were 925,678; in other words ten per cent of the population are in schools. In 1920, 6,869,654 dollars were spent for education. The education is practical as well as theoretical and stresses the dignity of labour with the industrial and agricultural sides emphasized. Each school has its own school garden where vegetables and other things are grown in a scientific way. The Filipinos are "restless for progress."

In one thing particularly they stand out in the East. Woman is the full social equal of man in the Phillipine Islands. "In Filipino society the woman occupies a place respected and assured: she is more prudent and balanced than the man, more skillful in business and negotiation, more judicious and self-controlled. There is no country less in need of a Woman's Movement or alteration of the relationship of the sexes." While the Filipino is amorous "his attitude towards women is never brutal, and it is usually characterized by respect and something approaching to chivalry."

The Filipino is intelligent and quick, inclined to be a little superficial, but makes a delightful companion and is warm in his friendships. In regard to personal cleanliness I do not think there is a cleaner race of people in the world. They are immaculate in their clothing and their persons.

I did not feel the strained relations between the Americans and the Filipinos which I had expected. But the Americans are developing a type of mind different from what I found six years ago. Then everything in the way of race relationships seemed on a simple, natural basis of practical, social equality, now I find a tendency to exclusiveness in social matters and those who marry Filipino women are not socially acceptable in many quarters.

Taken altogether the Phillipines are a fine example of a people rising in every way.

A MEMORY OF VIVEKANANDA

(BY MR. REEVES CALKINS)

My first impression of the Swami was not a happy one. He had come to the World's Fair as India's representative at the Chicago Parliament of Religions, and I, a young preacher fresh from the University, did not greatly admire the magnificent ease with which he waved aside Christian history and announced a new Star in the East. I think it was his lordly manner that disturbed, somewhat, my American sense of democracy. He did not argue that he was a superior person, he admitted it. Afterwards, when I learned that several cities, notably Boston, had formed Vivekananda Clubs, I was prepared to credit the report that, not his ideals, but his eyes, were leading captive silly American women, which was manifestly unfair. Then, for several years, I heard nothing further of him.

I reached India in December, 1900, embarking at Naples on the "Rubattino" of the old Italian Line. It chanced that my seat in the saloon was at the end of one of the center tables—which has considerable to do with my story. Mr. Drake Brockman, I. O. S., of the Central Provinces, occupied the first seat on the right, and another English Civilian whose name has escaped my memory sat opposite him. At Suez there was a shift at table, some of the passengers having left the vessel, and our first meal in the Red Sea saw a strange gentleman, in Indian habit, seated next to Mr. Drake Brockman. He was silent that first meal, taking only a ship's biscuit and soda water, and leaving before the meal was finished. There was some question up and down the board as to the identity of the distinguished stranger, for, as was quite evident, he was no mean personage; whereupon a rough and ready traveller, disdaining delicacy, called to the chief steward to bring him the wine orders. Ostensibly looking for his own wine card, he drew forth a modest soda water slip which was handed round the table. "Vivekananda," in pencil, was what passed across my plate. In a moment I remembered the furor he had created at the Parliament of Religions, and looked forward with some interest to the coming days at sea.

My earlier impression of the Swami was still strong upon me, so I did not immediately seek his acquaintance; a bow at table answered every requirement. But I chanced to overhear one of the passengers speak his name, and add, "We'll draw him!" I suppose my instinct for fair play pulled me toward Vivekananda as his unconscious ally in the intellectual rencounters of the next ten days. Perhaps he discerned my unspoken friendliness, for, almost immediately, he sought me out.

"You are an American?"

"Yes."

"A missionary?"

"Yes."

"Why do you teach religion in my country?" he demanded.

"Why do you teach religion in my country?" I countered.

The least quiver of an eyelash was enough to throw down our guards. We both burst out laughing, and were friends.

For a day or two, at table, one or other of the passengers proceeded to "draw" the Swami—only he refused to be drawn! His answers were ready and usually sufficient; but, more than that, they were brilliant. They sparkled with epigram and apt quotation. Presently the lesser wits learned the valor of putting up their swords, all excepting Mr. Drake Brockman; his keen and analytic mind constantly cut across Vivekananda's epigrams and held him close to the logic of admitted facts. It worried the Swami a lot! The rest of the company soon lost interest and permitted our little group at the end of the table to hold uninterrupted forum, breakfast, tiffin, and dinner.

One night I participated in a discovery. Vivekananda had been particularly brilliant. His conversation was like Ganga at high flood. There was really no interrupting him. A question might deflect him for a moment, but presently he was moving again on the main current of his speech. At the close of an unusually eloquent period he bowed slightly to each of us, then arose and quietly left the saloon. The Civilian sitting opposite Mr. Drake Brockman leaned across the table.

"Have you noticed that when the Indian gentleman is interrupted he begins again where he left off?"

"Yes, we both had noticed it."

"He is repeating one of his lectures for our private benefit."

And so it was. But, even so, it was an amazingly interesting performance, many leagues beyond the ordinary chit-chat on board ship.

Vivekananda was a patriot much more than a philosopher. I think his passion for the Vedantic propaganda was because this seemed to him the best way of fostering Indian nationhood. I believe at this he was mistaken; nevertheless, my recognition of his patriotism washed away completely my first unhappy impression of him, and enabled me to know him as I think he would be glad to be remembered by his countrymen—not as a religionist propagating an ancient creed, but as a lover of his own land seeking to promote her good in the society of modern nations.

It was this passion for his country, short-circuited by a misapprehension of the purpose of Christian missions, that brought on an explosion. One evening, over the nuts and coffee, the conversation had turned on India's preparedness for self-government. (By the way, that conversation took place more than twenty-two years ago, when as yet the Chelmsford-Montagu Reform Bill was nebulous and far away; similar conversations may logically continue for one hundred and twenty-two years to come, for no nation ever yet was "prepared" for self-government).

Suddenly Vivekananda blazed.

"Let England teach us the fine art of government," he burst forth, "for in that art Britain is the leader of the nations;" then, turning to me, "let America teach us agriculture and science and your wonderful knack of doing things, for here we sit at your feet—but"—and Vivekananda's pleasant voice grew harsh with bitterness—"let no nation presume to teach India religion, for here India shall teach the world!"

That night we walked over the deck together and talked of the deeper things where there are no Britons, no Americans, no Indians, but only our hungry humanity and of one Son of Man whose sacrificial Blood, somewhere in the shifting sands of Asia, still abides. I think I helped the Swami to understand that no missionary in his senses is seeking to teach "religion" in India, but only to help India know and love that Man.

During the last day or two of the voyage our understanding of each other increased greatly, and, as I believe, our mutual respect. The mysticism of Vivekananda was a fascination and wonder. For I was not affected. When our conversation touched, as it was bound to, on the hidden things of the spirit, his heavy eyelids would droop slowly and he wandered, even in my presence, into some mystic realm where I was not invited. When, on one such occasion, I remarked that a Christian's conscious fellowship with the Supreme Person must be alert and awake, (as all personal fellowships must be), and therefore is essentially and necessarily different from a Hindu's immersion in the all-pervading Brahma, he looked at me with a quick glance of scrutiny but made no reply.

The last night, before the "Rubattino" reached Bombay, we were standing on the forward deck. Vivekananda was smoking a short sweet-briar pipe—the one "English vice," he said, which he was fond of. The wash of the sea and the unknown life which would begin on the morrow invited quietness. For a long time no word was spoken. Then, as though he had made up his mind I would do India no harm, he laid his hand on my shoulder.

"Sir," he said, "they may talk about their Buddhas, their Krishnas, and their Christs, but we understand, you and I; we are segments of the All-One."

His hand remained upon my shoulder. It was such a friendly hand, I could not rudely remove it. Then he withdrew it himself and I offered him my own.

"Swami," I said, "you will have to speak for yourself and not for me. The All-One of which you speak is impersonal, and therefore must remain unknowable, even though we be immersed in it as this ship is immersed in the Indian Ocean; He Whom I know, Whom I love, is personal and very very real—and, Swami, in Him all fulness dwells."

The sweet-briar went swiftly to his lips, and the drooping eyelids as he leaned against the rail gave token that Vivekananda had gone forth on a far quest.

Was it the All-One, or the One in all, the Swami sought that night?

THE OPERATION.

Here wait I in silence
For ninety slow minutes,
Whilst under the surgeon's knife
Fate is worked out—Fate, whether that which I love a thousand times better than life
Shall die, or shall live.

Fate, said I?
Nay, here as I wait
(My soul gathered and crouched at God's feet
In a long dumb anguish of prayer),
Of a sudden the barriers fall,
The curtain of sense rolls back—back—back,
And is gone :
Still my eyes look out on the sunlight,
The song of the birds still comes to my ear,
And the slow deliberate march of the clock :
Yet my spirit is lifted clear of it all,
Clear from this fragile and changing world,
Beyond and away.

Around my soul
Lift and strain the tides of eternal life,
Lift and strain, and bear me away :
Around my soul
Thunders in slow majestic rhythm
The surge and beat of Thine endless love,
O Father—
Not Fate, O Father, not Fate, but Thy love.

O Thou, in whom all love
Is born, and for ever lives :
O Thou, who gavest this love,
Who rejoicest for ever in all true love :
Father, whose love for that single soul
Is love for a world of souls focussed and fixed upon one :

Father, upon whose bosom
Lieth that white soul now (Mind dulled by the drugs, Body shorn by the knife) :
Father, in life and death
To be utterly trusted :
Father, Thy will be done.

THE PRESENT STANDSTILL.

AN APPEAL TO SOCIAL REFORM WORKERS.

The problem of social reform has been agitating the minds of the leaders of thought in Maharashtra for a very long time, and determined and continuous efforts have been made since the days of the late Justice Ranade and Mr. Agarkar who were the foremost in leading the attack on the old order of things. The cause of Social Reform which they made their own and espoused with their life fervour made a powerful impression, but at the same time roused the reactionary from his age-long slumber. And Mr. Tilak who looked only for political emancipation, led the reactionary forces in opposing the Reform Party, tooth and nail. But that controversy happily is now almost a thing of the past. The Social Reformer has at last won the day, though greatly in a moral sense, and the Indian National Congress and other allied political bodies have also begun to pass resolutions pressing for the removal of untouchability and better treatment of their women-folk.

As I have said above, the Social Reformer has at last come out triumphant after his arduous struggle, but the work which he undertook is far from being complete or even half done. The grim reality is still before us. The success achieved up to now is no doubt encouraging. But the movement, if we look below the surface, is not making the progress it should. It has ceased to make any great headway, and has come to a standstill. We could not follow up the victory and gain further victories. Now the moral forces are decidedly on the side of the Social Reformer, and still he is handicapped, and has to glory over his past achievements and present meagre gains. So in my humble opinion, if the movement is to make any advance and achieve what it is intended for—Social Regeneration—we must change the methods followed so far. The old methods of achieving social progress have outlived their usefulness and we must improve upon them and even change them where necessary.

To make myself clear, I suggest that a conference should be periodically held to which the chosen representatives of each leading caste should be invited, and this assemblage with common responsibility and collected wisdom should try to define our immediate objective and find out workable means. The vague and, in a certain sense, irresponsible talk about the need of Social Reform must now cease, and some definite shape must be given to the movement of our social uplift. We sometimes vaguely talk of inter-caste dinners, forgetting the insurmountable difficulties peculiar to India. For instance, there is a perfect cleavage in two groups of castes. One group consisting of vegetarian castes such as the Bramhins, Gujarathis, Jains, Lingayats, etc.; and the other group, numerically much larger, consisting of the Marathas and its allied sub-castes, and depressed classes who take animal food. This wide gulf is separating the two groups and no attempt is ever made or even thought of, of converting either group to one of them. Even if such an attempt were made, it is bound to fail as certainly as the sun shines in the sky. Their union in the kitchen and in the dining room will be limited. To transgress those limits in favour of greater unity will be just like sounding a war-horn. What those limits should be must be clearly thought out and decided by a responsible representative and influential body, such as the one suggested. When matters affecting one's religion and caste are concerned, the man in the street is so very suspicious and sensitive that he must first get assurances that he will not be led astray or eventually placed in a hopeless position. If he has nothing definite before him, he will be scared away by even just and small measures of reform and stick to his original position through weakness and fear.

Some will say that this is perpetuating caste-differences. In a certain sense it is true. But close observation of things both from inside and outside has led me to believe that total abolition of castes is well-nigh impossible. It may be and should be a distinct goal. I do not quarrel over it. But I fear that like some of the N. C. O.'s the extremists of the Social Reform party too are indulging in airy ideals. Can any one mention even five gentlemen from the Brahmin community who have given up their caste, wholesale both in private and public affairs? A man born in the Maratha community, however educated and progressive he may be as Mr. V. R. Shinde of the Depressed Classes Mission undoubtedly is, will never renounce his caste. He will remain a Maratha though a liberal Maratha. Therefore what I suggest is that leading men from all the big castes should be brought together in a round-table Conference. The people from all communities will look up to this common body as their own, and look to its deliberations with genuine interest and devotion. The power in social matters usurped by one community or one individual such as the Shankaracharya ought to be restored to a representative body. This body should try to bring about harmony by removing unjust things and rigorously abolishing the privileges of the classes. The depressed classes will no longer feel themselves depressed when they sit shoulder to shoulder on a common platform with equal dignity and status. They will thus have full chance of laying their case clearly before their Hindu brothers in order to get their answers. If we take human nature and the inner working of the mind in consideration, I am sure it will be very difficult for the representatives of higher castes to give unreasonable replies and still more difficult to repeat them. And supposing that even then they do not change their attitude towards their less fortunate brethren, the instinct and sympathy of the hearing masses unconsciously will go to the side of the aggrieved party. And thus the Social Reformer will stand to gain more and lose less. The bitterness which is bound to appear at the outset will give place to mutual goodwill. A change of heart complete and thorough cannot be expected all at once. But it is sure to follow in course of time. As Mrs. Besant once said: "If each owner of the house sweeps the street before his own house, the whole city will become clean within half an hour." Likewise if leaders of every caste take counsel together and to work in their own limited sphere, instead of wasting their energy in tall talk and expressing mere wishes, they will do much solid work.

A round-table conference of the above description, besides throwing into more insignificance the tottering Jagadguruphas, will also serve another great purpose. The mischief of part of the agitation carried on by some of the so-called Brahmin leaders, simply with the view to create bad blood and corner only one community, shall have its very source knocked out of it. And at the same time the Round Table conference will provide us with a good machinery which will work with least friction and give us greatest possible results. It will be a slow yet sure means for gradual social evolution and will make all the communities feel the warmth, reasonableness and urgency of reform and will liberate us from the present stagnant state.

Problems like widow re-marriage, Hunda, infant-marriages which are not common to all but are peculiar to certain castes, should be attended to by these respective caste leaders. But problems of inter-caste importance such as untouchability, social dinners, use of public schools, wells etc., and re-Hinduising or Hinduising of men outside Hinduism ought to be considered and solved by common consent by the common body. This must be our new Shankaracharya giving us guidance in social matters. Those of the social reformers who do not pay any attention to such knotty problems as Vegetarians-versus-Meat-eaters, the inborn and inseparable love of bearing the name of our ancestral caste, and still hope to achieve the objects of social reform are foredoomed to failure. I doubt whether such men are serious enough and mean business. I appeal in all humility and sincerity to such people to re-examine their ground in order to face the sacred task with better preparedness and precision.

409 Sadashiv Peth,

Poona City.

G. R. HINGNEKAR.

HINDUS IN A ROUND TABLE CONFERENCE.

(From A Correspondent)

A novel attempt at approaching some of the controversial social problems was made in Poona last week when on the invitation of Mr. Hingnekar, the organiser, a small round table conference was held in Kibe Wada. The chosen representatives of the Mahar and Mang communities were present. The Chairman of the Brahmin Sabha, Poona, and its Secretary though in their individual capacity, were present at the meeting and took part in the deliberations along with men like Mr. V. R. Shinde of the Maratha community and Mr. Manurkar a leading Lingayat gentleman. Mr. V. R. Shinde was voted to the chair.

The subject matter of the day was the use of public places such as Dharmashalas, schools, meeting places, markets, wells etc. The spokesmen of the depressed classes demanded that all these public places must be thrown open to the depressed classes people, a right which is at present denied to them. This demand was admitted in principle by all gentlemen of the higher castes and then each item was discussed looking into some details. After some discussion it was agreed that boards should be placed at public Dharmashalas indicating that they are open to all including the depressed classes. This event should be proclaimed through the neighbouring village by tom tom and village officers should be directed to see that nobody obstructs the depressed classes in the right of their enjoyment.

As regards public schools it was suggested that Government should stop the grant of those aided schools that do not throw their doors open to all classes. The leaders of the depressed classes contended that according to the new law of compulsory primary education they would put their children in schools. But this could be effected if only the public schools and aided schools were open for their children? We won't tolerate, they said, any invidious distinctions in school rooms. The Brahmin gentlemen admitted the force of their demand but some gentlemen held that aided schools must be treated differently.

As for the public meetings, reading rooms, markets, law courts, and railway stations even now the people of the depressed classes are not quite barred and hence this question is not very serious. However, it was suggested that people of depressed classes should not hold themselves back through over-courtesy or timidity and the higher class people should not slight or discourage their brothers in religion. The depressed classes, however, in turn were asked with great emphasis to discontinue the observance of untouchability amongst themselves and were asked to be more clean in their habits.

The question of public wells, pipes, tanks etc. was a very difficult one indeed. The leaders of the Mahars and Mangs appealed that these places too ought to be opened to them. But most of the Brahmins present were in no mood to listen to this proposal while some of them showed strong disapproval, while Mr. V. R. Shinde and Mr. Manurkar admitted this demand too, as worthy to be conceded.

The meeting terminated after some such discussions. Although it was purely a deliberative meeting it will help a great deal in clarifying the thought. There was no question of pollution by touch at the meeting as all the people assembled took seats on a common Jajam.

INDIANS IN EAST AFRICA.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

SIR,

Only recently a despatch has arrived here from the Secretary of State for the Colonies which the Governor has instructions not to disclose—but the European members have got the information from some source or other—that the Colonial Office intends to grant common franchise to Indians. They consider that this would be equal to granting equal status to Indians which they are bent upon opposing at all costs.

There is a large number of level-headed and fair-minded Europeans in the country who consider that it is only equitable that the Indians should be granted some rights as a proof of sincerity of the resolution passed by the Imperial Conference in 1921, but the small clique known as the "Reform Party" are agitating and exciting the minds of the general European population by making them believe that if a common franchise is granted to Indians it means that the Europeans will be ousted from the country in course of time.

As a result of mischievous propaganda carried on by Europeans, the innocent and just Europeans also are being dragged into becoming party to use violence against Indians in case the common franchise is granted. Papers also suggest that the Government cannot enforce this policy without bloodshed, and rumours are, in fact it is being stated openly, that the intention of the Europeans is to shoot down every Indian in the colony. It sounds too ridiculous and wild to believe but the class of settlers that reign here have been encouraged to indulge in this sort of lawlessness which has been resorted to frequently by them in the past, and on every occasion they have succeeded in intimidating the Local and Imperial Government and have had their own way.

On one occasion, a party headed by a noble Lord went to the Government House, threw stones at the Governor and behaved themselves in a disgraceful fashion and asked the Governor to resign. On another occasion, an assembly of Europeans including a number of European leaders gathered in front of the Court House and flogged certain natives because they thought it was useless to take the case to the Courts as the Magistrates did not and would not punish them sufficiently. Then again a responsible and very much respected settler took the law into his own hands and went and set fire to the huts of several natives whom he suspected of having stolen his cattle or sheep. Another settler, a very high personage, shot a native dead because he suspected him of having stolen his sheep. He was tried for murder, pleaded guilty, and yet the Jury returned a verdict of "not guilty" and he was consequently discharged. All this, you will say, sounds like yarns but the fact remains, nevertheless, that these are solid facts. It is no wonder that these sorts of happenings have given the country the reputation, according to Lord Cranworth, as being the place "where they shoot the natives and stone their Governors".

Only recently a few Europeans went to the houses of certain Indian shop-keepers at a station called Gilgil, at night tried to effect an entrance into the married quarters by breaking doors and tearing the roofs, and threatened to shoot and set fire to the whole location. They were, however, prevented from doing this by some others. They were tried but some of them eventually apologised to the Indians and the case was compounded. This has never appeared in the local papers although it is common knowledge that this took place only a few months ago.

The pity of the whole matter is that the Government instead of suppressing these sentiments of lawlessness manifests its weakness by saying that they believe that such an action by the settlers is improbable to be taken and in fact this bullying attitude of the settlers is used as an argument against granting the equality of status to Indians. In any other country such a propaganda would be crushed ruthlessly by the Government but here the Local Government actually confess that they cannot put into practice a policy which has such a strong support of the Government of India, is said to have been approved by the Imperial Government and is sanctioned by the Imperial Council.

As far as our information goes, the despatch that is kept secret up to now does not give the Indians anything in the shape of equal rights. It reserves all the highlands for Europeans, allows about 10 per cent. of the Indian population being brought on the common electoral roll and on the other hand the immigration is to be restricted.

We expect that the threats of the European community may be carried into practice at any time or at least an attempt made to do it, and I expect you to take up this cause and to give the matter the publicity it deserves and show the utter absurdity of the European population of this country.

Yours faithfully,
SHAMS-UD-DEEN,
General Secretary,
Eastern Africa Indian
National Congress.

"SCIENCE AND POLITICS."

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

SIR,
Anent your remarks and the correspondence appearing in your paper on this subject the following taken from A. B. Patrika (art. "Science and Swaraj," issue of Jan. 18, Bi-weekly Ed.) also makes pertinent reading;—the journal after referring to the early difficulties of Bose and Ray proceeds:—

"An Indian Mahomedan gentleman of the U. P., who was employed in the Government Telegraph Department, recently invented an instrument for the transmission of wireless messages through water. He wanted leave to carry on his researches which was first denied. When this leave was granted, he was brought to Calcutta and allowed to carry on his experiments inside the premises of the Central Telegraph Office here, and a European Assistant was placed to watch his work constantly. All this shows the mentality of the ruling caste towards the prosecution of scientific researches and investigation by Indians."

¶ Sir, is it not up to the Director of Information in Bombay or Delhi to shed light on all such allegations?

CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE.

The Indian Social Reformer writing about the 'Congress parties' rightly interprets the view-point of Mr. Das towards Civil Disobedience. No intellectual with a clear vision and foresight can ever think of Civil Disobedience as a permanent phase of public life of a country and Deshbandhu Das does not hold it as such, whatever may be the views of its protagonists in the high circles of orthodox Non-co-operation. It can come in, only when in obedience to a higher principle, obedience to a lower one has to be disregarded. In this sense it is used as a political weapon to be used only in the war of emancipation of one's country. The Reformer, continuing in the same strain, exposes to the view the distinction between the method of Deshbandhu Das and the Liberals. —The Mahratta, 11th February.

II.

The Indian Social Reformer in its issue of the 3rd instant advances a rather curious sort of logic. Since obedience is the crowning virtue of public and private life, and since disobedience is not an end in itself, therefore, concludes the journal, all training for Civil Disobedience whether individual or mass is wrong, and asks non-co operators to abandon their preparations for it. We heartily agree with the journal in its remark that disobedience is not an end in itself, but we fail to see how all training for Civil Disobedience can be wrong on that account. All education in what the journal calls the 'higher laws' is at the same time a training and preparation for the disobedience of immoral or unjust laws. The journal emphasises the duty of training people to a 'higher obedience.' We submit that non-submission to unjust or immoral laws is as much a duty as obedience to 'higher laws'. In fact the one follows from the other as a natural corollary.

It is not, however, to train people to disobedience that the Congress has set itself about just now, but to train them to civility. The spirit of disobedience there already is in the country—and to a very dangerous extent too. And it is bound to remain there so long as bad laws exist. The Congress is not concerned in augmenting this spirit but in preparing the people for giving expression to it in a civil manner, by training them to those very 'higher laws' which the Social Reformer commends. —Young India, 8th February.

PROHIBITION AFTER THREE YEARS.

The Manufacturers' Record has performed a valuable public service in writing to the signers of America's most influential petition to Congress in behalf of prohibition, five years ago attacking them whether they still favour prohibition as vigorously as they did at that time, and in publishing their replies. Several hundred other leading manufacturers also were requested to state their views, which were, at the time, entirely unknown to the editor. Of about one thousand five hundred who replied, 98.50 per cent. are in favour of prohibition in some form, and 85.50 per cent. favour the strictest form. Only 7 per cent. are for beer and wine. Among the number, there are, in addition to manufacturers and business men enough representatives of other callings—trade unionists, university men, engineers, public officials, lawyers, farmers—to give a general survey of what America thinks about prohibition to-day. Warren S. Stone, grand chief of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, is as positive about the good social effects as is Judge Gary, or President Wilbur of Stamford University. There is as yet no statistical evidence sufficiently accurate or on a large enough scale to prove the material benefits; but in the absence of statistics, the opinions held by men with a vast area of observation before their eyes are good evidence. The editor of the symposium says:—

"The whole world is watching this country. Every drinker on earth who wants to continue to be a drunkard, every wine-grower in France, every beer maker in Germany, every whiskey producer in England and Scotland, and every other liquor interest in all the world is struggling with all possible energy to break down prohibition in this country."

We have had distinguished visitors, such as Gilbert K. Chesterton and Mrs. Asquith, who have gone back to Europe saying that prohibition is a failure. "One can get a drink almost anywhere in the United States," they say. But the margin of non-enforcement, as viewed by the contributors to this symposium, however evident, is almost insignificant in comparison with the good results that have already come from enforcement. Here is a typical reply to the questionnaire, coming from the general manager of a great steel company:—

"There is more interest taken in home life, which is reflected in a greater number of men paying for their homes, improving their furnishings, providing better shoes and clothing for their little ones, and increased savings deposits.

"School attendance in both day and Sunday schools had improved. Merchants as well as families have been benefited in that sales have increased and the collections are better. The morals of the community have made wonderful progress.

"Notwithstanding the fact that all our principal industries were shut down by a strike in 1919 for six months, and operated only for about six months in 1920, three months in 1921, and none so far this year, there has been comparatively little suffering. Comparing the last twenty-seven months in which there has been only fifteen months of employment, with any shut-down of three months' duration under the saloon regime, conditions in our city have been easily one hundred per cent. better. In fact, 'What would be our lot if we had saloons with the great unemployment of such long standing?' has been the common saying in our city."

He also testifies to the fact that not the workingmen, but the well-to-do in the community, are the law-breakers. The importance of this testimony, and that of others, lies in the fact that it proves the value of prohibition at a time of depression. In 1919 and 1920, when industry was booming, it was almost impossible to disentangle the good effects of prohibition from those of the prevailing general prosperity. To-day, the permanent results are becoming more and more strikingly manifest. Judson C. Welliver, in the current issue of the American Review of Reviews, concludes an article based upon another investigation, by saying:—

"Complete enforcement will never be attained. The completest possible enforcement has not yet been attained. But no fair consideration of conditions as they stand can justify any other conclusion than that prohibition has already accomplished much of what its advocates expected, and that it is on its way to accomplish much more."—The Survey.

NOTES

Compromise between Congress Parties: There was a schism amongst the followers of the Sakyamuni some of whom wanted to observe habits of extreme asceticism, while others were inclined to be more sparing in their self-denial. The great Teacher tried to bring about a reconciliation on sensible principles, but when he found he did not succeed, he left both, and went to another place. After his departure the schismatics quarrelled with one another so much that the lay votaries got disgusted and ceased supplying the wants of the monks in respect of food and clothing. This brought the latter to their senses, and some of them from both parties went on a deputation to Buddha to request him to return and restore peace among them. When they came in the presence of the great Teacher, the leader of the deputation laid before him the object of their visit, namely, to effect a compromise. We commend the Sakyamuni's pronouncement to those who are striving to bring about a compromise between the Congress parties. He said:—

There are two ways of re-establishing concord; one is in the letter, and the other one is in the spirit and in the letter. If the Sangha declares the re-establishment of concord without having inquired into the matter, the peace is concluded in the letter only. But if the Sangha after having inquired into the matter and gone to the bottom of it, decides to declare the re-establishment of concord, the peace is concluded in the spirit and also in the letter.

The controversies arising out of the Congress split, have already disgusted the public and if they are continued longer, there can be no doubt that both parties will have public support withdrawn from them. Concord is, therefore, an urgent duty. But it should be a concord established on a recognition of the realities of the moment. One of the terms of the proposed compromise, that we have seen, fails on this test. To speak of Civil Disobedience as a possibility of the next three months, seems to us to be a palpable self-deception which leaders on both sides should know to be such.

Removal of Untouchability: Prominent among Mahatma Gandhi's services to the country, is the emphasis he laid upon the removal of "untouchability" as a test of the country's fitness for Swaraj. So long as some millions of our fellow-men are regarded as being so degraded as to pollute by mere physical contact, so long the state of mind and heart upon which alone an enduring Swaraj can be raised, is absent among us. Mahatma Gandhi proclaimed this great truth by word and by deed. Since his incarceration, this important reform has not received the attention which it demands. It is no doubt there on agenda papers but not much good comes of that. Sometimes academic discussions are held as to how the object may be best achieved. The disabilities of the untouchables are catalogued, and the question is debated as to which of them should be first dealt with. All this, we think, is useless beating about the bush. The one sure way to get rid of the whole detestable scheme of untouchability, is for the other castes to mix with the "untouchables" in ordinary social intercourse. We are pleased to announce that arrangements are being made to hold in Bombay in the course of the next few days a dinner, followed by a Conference, to which members of the untouchable classes will be specially invited, as also members of all other castes and communities.

Special Class Bombay Prisoners: The Government of Bombay, after protesting that they would never consent to make any special concessions in the case of political prisoners, have introduced some improvements described in a resolution reprinted in this issue. Those concessions, so far as they go, are satisfactory. They provide for prisoners wearing their own clothes, having their own bedding, getting their usual food from outside, and obtaining stationery, magazines and books at their own expense. The interval for interviews and letters is reduced to one month. No provision seems to be made for the provision of light for reading and recreation in the time between sun-set and bed-time. The Jail Commission specially recommended that it should be made. These concessions are available to all prisoners sentenced to simple imprisonment, on the order of the Judge or other authority. It may be that it is in contemplation to prescribe only simple imprisonment for political offences. If this is done, these rules will be nearly all that is desired. But till this is done, the limitation of the concessions to prisoners sentenced to simple imprisonment, will leave political prisoners sentenced to rigorous imprisonment without the benefit of them. It is largely a matter of chance and the Judge's temperament now, whether a political offender is sentenced to simple or rigorous imprisonment. It would be highly improper for the Executive Government to instruct Judges or Magistrates to give only simple imprisonment to political offenders. The change can be made only by the legislature. Meanwhile, the rules may be so altered as to include also prisoners sentenced to rigorous imprisonment, in suitable cases. The action of Government, in making these humane changes, is much appreciated.

Sir George Lloyd on his administration. The Governor of Bombay opened the Budget Session of the Legislative Council. His Excellency reminded the Council that this Budget would be the last of his regime as well as the last with which the present Council would deal. His Government is entitled to credit for having cut down expenditure without the adventitious aid of Lord Inchcape's or any other extraneous axe. The scissors have been applied too closely to some vital spots, while they have passed lightly over some ornamental ones; but the net result is one which could not have been achieved without earnest and honest application to the ungrateful task. One of the improvements in financial method, for which His Excellency claimed credit was "that revenue was properly applied and was not, as in the past, misused for works and undertakings that could more economically and profitably be financed out of borrowings." It is an equitable principle that, where the benefits of an undertaking are likely to extend to future generations, the burden of its cost should not be laid upon a single generation and may be distributed among future generations. The test here is clear and definite. When, however, we leave this concrete line and begin to apply general considerations, we are in the realm of opinion and not in that of facts, and opinion is to some extent affected by temperament. The results of the borrowing policy of Sir George Lloyd's Government cannot be known, until many years after His Excellency bids farewell to Bombay. Sir George Lloyd might have spared himself the trouble of answering those who criticise the Legislative Council as worthless. But as His Excellency has thought fit to answer them, we may point out that the Ministerial achievements for which he claimed credit, are really not so very credit-worthy. According to the recent admission of the Excise Minister himself, something more stringent than his policy of rationing is needed to cope with the drink evil. The Bombay Municipal Act was really carried through in spite of the Minister, and his contribution to the Local Boards Act is the introduction of the communal principle. The Primary Education Bill is but an enlarged edition of Patel's Act extended to Local Boards. Even His Excellency's eagle-eyed optimism could not discover any very notable achievement of the reserved departments. Sir George was significantly silent about the Development Department. His Excellency cannot but know that the weight and volume of condemnation of the chawls built by the Department are increasing. It is desirable that, before more chawls are built, a competent Committee should be appointed to consider what improvements should be effected upon the present model. One high authority described these chawls to us as probable future Bolshevik seminaries, calculated to breed the spirit of revolution among their inmates.

Indian-Officered Regiments: The Commander-in-Chief announced in the Legislative Assembly last week that eight Indian regiments, infantry and cavalry, would be immediately officered entirely by Indians. We do not doubt the excellence of the intention underlying this decision. But we venture to think that it is not a fair way of meeting the Indian demand for admission to the higher ranks of the Army. The project was described as an experiment. The value of an experiment in the physical sciences is commensurate with the extent to which the conditions of it approximate to normal conditions. When you are experimenting with human beings, you should not only reproduce normal conditions, but you must do this in such a way as to make those experimented upon believe them to be normal conditions. The eight regiments selected for the experiment and the Indians selected to be their officers, cannot but feel that they are in an invidious position where their faults must appear magnified and their merits correspondingly reduced in scale, in the eyes of those who are to judge the results of the experiment. It is a matter of everyday experience that in official comparisons between Indians and Englishmen, the presumption is always in favour of the latter and equally always against the former. One of the most onerous incidents of British rule is this heavy handicap on Indian effort. We should be surprised if an experiment under such conditions succeeds, not if it fails. We do not wish to prejudice the chances of success of the experiment, but we do wish at once to state that the failure of such an experiment will be no proof of the incapacity of Indians to make as good Army officers as Englishmen. Nor can the Indianisation of the Army be deferred until this experiment is admitted to have been tried long enough to yield reliable results.

Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru and the Forthcoming Royal Commission: In the Reformer of the 10th February, we called attention to a statement made in the Pall Mall Gazette about Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru's view of the future of the English Services in India. The English friend who sent it to us, urged that a prompt reply should be published in England to the Pall Mall's statement. We hope our friend will get as much publicity as possible in Britain for the following categorical contradiction by the Leader of Allahabad with which Sir Tej Bahadur was closely connected prior to his translation to Delhi, and which, perhaps, knows his views better than any other journal since his return to Allahabad. Our contemporary writes:
