NOTES.

Gour's Marriage Act:—A correspondent writes to inquire the conditions that govern a marriage under the Civil Marriage Act. The present state of the law is certainly anomalous. The disabilities prescribed in Gour's Act of 1923 which does away with the repudiation of religious belief insisted on by the Act of 1872, do not seem to attach to marriages under the latter Act. That is to say, a man who declares he does not profess Hinduism, retains his rights in the family, while one who scruples to do so, forfeits them. As for the rights which are affected by a marriage under Gour's Act, we think that rights in ancestral property are protected by Section 23 quoted by our correspondent. Only rights of a religious or semi-religious character, which are expressly indicated in the Act, are affected. For instance, it is not clear whether a man marrying under Gour's Act will be competent to perform the funeral obsequies of his parents. The confusion arising out of this Act, is the strongest argument for passing a simple Civil Marriage law which will leave no room for doubt. Meanwhile, if the parties belong to the same caste, the only reason for registration is that it gives a monogamous character to the marriage. It is not necessary, however, to register for this purpose. The majority of Hindus are monogamous without any registration. For the rest, pioneers in social reform as in other matters cannot expect to have the path made smooth for them before they take a step; and frankly, we cannot understand why the marriage in the case referred to should be made contingent on an acceptable interpretation of Gour's Act.

Sastri in South Africa:—We publish elsewhere a letter from a correspondent in Penukonda asking what Mr. Sastri has achieved in South Africa. The Cape Town Agreement, no doubt, recognises Indians as an integral part of the population, with rights and duties the same as all other sections of it. So does the Indian law which makes no distinction between high caste or low caste. Nevertheless as we have the depressed classes with their numerous disabilities, so in South Africa, though Indians have been formally admitted to be an integral part of the population, there is much yet to be done to make them actually so. Mr. Sastri's work during eighteen months has largely been to create the social atmosphere favourable to this process. As for the college for Indians, it is necessary before Indian youths can claim admission into the universities that they should come up to the entrance standard from which they are very far at present. Their education, too, has to be specially adapted to their needs which have not yet but will in course of time become closer to those of their White fellow-citizens.

Indians' Educational Efforts:—It is gratifying to know that Indians in South Africa are keenly alive to the advantages of education and have been doing much by way of self-help to promote it among themselves. Mr. P. Kodanda Rao, who went as Mr. Sastri's Secretary, bears testimony to their efforts in the current number of the Young Men of India. He writes:—"It has been shown before the Natal Indian Education Enquiry Commission that there is absolutely no foundation for the myth that the Indian Community did not care for education, showed no public spirit and self-help and made no sacrifices for the education of its children. In one form or other the Indian community have helped to build and equip the Indian aided schools in Natal, and would have done more if the Government had extended a helping hand. Besides this, they have built and conducted over 30 private schools without receiving any aid from the Government. On top of it all they have recently raised, under the inspiration of Mr. Sastri, the sum of nearly £ 20,000 for a Training College and High School at Durban. The social service rendered by a band of Indian volunteers during the last small-pox epidemic has been handsomely acknowledged by the Durban Municipality. Two organizations have since come into existence, the Social Service Committee and the Indian Child Welfare Society. Indians have organized sports for their young and the more well-to-do have a fine country Club, the Orient Club at Ispingo, near Durban."

The Andhra University:—Within the last twenty years quite a number of universities has been started in India for reasons of a provincial or communal character, with little reference to educational conditions. One of these was the Andhra University which was rushed into existence by the first Panagal Ministry in Madras. The University has proved a costly failure, and the Madras Government have been obliged to consider what to do with it. They have now decided to shift it from Bezwada to Vizagapatam, with a restricted area for its jurisdiction. The Educational Review (Madras) observes :—"The Government has had to re-open the question, and at a meeting of the Legislative Council held this month, it was resolved upon fixing Vizagapatam as the head-quarters of the Andhra University. In view of the proximity of Waltair, the extensive harbour which is being built, intended to link up trade between Central India and the sea-coast, and the salubrious climate of the place, the decision is probably not unwelcome, though there is as yet no first-grade Arts and Science College at the centre. It is an advantage indeed that there is a Medical College already there and if the Engineering School and the Girls' High School are also developed into colleges and a scientific and technological college also comes into existence, nobody need regret the step which Government has taken. The necessary corollary of the shifting of the head-quarters of the University to Vizagapatam has been the exclusion of the Ceded Districts from the area of the Andhra University. Their geographical position unfortunately does not enable them to take much advantage of the Andhra University, whether the head-quarters are situated either at Vizagapatam or even at Bezwada".

Votes for Behar Women:—The Behar Herald commenting on the enfranchisement of women in that province writes :—"The Bihar and Orissa Legislative Council has decided to give votes to women. Many people, however, do not seem to realise what class of women will be enfranchised. Since educated women and their men friends have been most vocal in their demands, it is believed by some people that the votes will go to that class of women who have received English education—in other words the "ladies." That is far from the truth. The qualification for the franchise is mainly a property qualification, and most ladies are lacking in that qualification, being financially dependent upon their husbands. Among Muhammadans there will probably be a higher percentage of voters than among Hindus, because a Muhammadan woman inherits property from her father and her husband even in the presence of male relations. A woman governed by the Dayabhaga School of Hindu Law may qualify herself for the vote by cremating her husband. But the chances of a woman governed by the Mitakshara School of Hindu Law becoming a voter are very remote. Her prospects will improve if the Hindu Inheritance Bill now on the anvil becomes law. But for the present the franchise is likely to be extended mainly to Muslim women, and in view of the strict purdah which they observe it is impossible to make any but the vaguest conjectures regarding their idea of the vote. Very interesting possibilities will arise in connection with women franchise in this province. For instance Muslim votes may rise considerably in proportion to Hindu votes. Purdah polling will have to be allowed if the franchise is to become a reality. Candidates at elections will have to employ women propagandists to secure the vote, and in view of the proverbial uncertainty about women's minds an election forecast will be an impossible affair." Luckily for the Hindu women of Behar, the Hindu Inheritance Bill has passed into law. This will remove the legal disability of the Hindu women who are governed by the Mitakshara School of Hindu Law and enable them to exercise the newly acquired right to vote. It is an irony that the women of the community, the representatives of which opposed the enfranchisement Bill and voted against it in the Council will most benefit by it. This is one of many proofs that the lot of the two major communities in India is cast together and any effort to stem the tide of progress by one or the other is bound to fail. There are signs not wanting that advancement among the women of Behar is rapid. Their eagerness to exercise their political right should see the last of the purdah.

Preparing Emigrants:—The High Commissioner's report on Indian students in England deplored the fact that many Indians who left for England had a very meagre knowledge of the conditions prevailing there. The Oriental Watchman of Poona gives in a recent issue a short note on how the problem is dealt with in Japan. It writes :—"The social work bureau of the Japanese home affairs ministry has decided upon an ambitious plan to encourage Japanese emigration to Brazil next year, and so has asked an appropriation of £1,000,000. An average of 500 emigrants a month has been leaving for Brazil during the last year. At present Japan's emigrants to South America are given a course of instruction lasting ten days in special quarters at Kobe before they leave. Japanese returned from Brazil lecture to them on social, economic, and other conditions they may expect to find in South America. They are taught to eat with knives and forks instead of chopsticks; they are instructed in the use of farming tools such as they will need, and are even taught to sleep in Western-style beds. As the authorities feel that ten days' training is inadequate, they propose to provide a corps of instructors who will accompany the emigrants on the forty-day voyage to South America to continue instruction. Another project is the establishment of a large colonial museum exhibiting a wide variety of objects of particular interest to prospective emigrants, giving full information about the customs, living conditions, and geography of South America, Korea, Manchuria, and Saghalien. A special library and colonial research institute will be operated in connection with the museum." The importance of such a bureau will be readily admitted and the establishment of a similar one in India will be of some help to our students going abroad. Of course the fact that the Japanese emigrants to South America are adult workers renders it necessary to instruct them in everyday matters and this would not be necessary in the case of students who are generally young and more easily adapt themselves to changed conditions. But a colonial museum, the library and the lectures on the conditions prevailing in foreign countries by men and women who have been there would help the student to find his bearings when he gets there.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, MARCH 2, 1929.

BOMBAY AND PROHIBITION.

We earnestly trust that the Bombay Legislative Council will pass a vote of censure on the Minister of Excise for going back on the policy deliberately adopted by it and accepted by the Government of working towards Prohibition as the goal to be reached in twenty years. There was a strong opposition to this period as being too long, but it was acquiesced in as a compromise by the advocates of Prohibition. Certain measures were adopted as first steps in pursuance of this policy such as rationing, reduction of liquor shops, and the strength of the liquor sold to the public. The effect of these measures was seen in the considerable reduction in the consumption of liquor, particularly country liquor, during the last few years. Almost from the first the Commissioner of Excise and his department have been raising the cry of encouraging illicit consumption. They have now won the day and the present Minister has openly turned his back on Prohibition. The Rev. J. F. Edwards in his memorandum submitted to the Simon Commission has pointed out that no less than five different Ministers have held the Excise Portfolio during the twenty-one months between January 1927 and September 1928, and has pertinently asked what could be expected of solid and abiding reform from a Department which is being made the shuttle-cock of India's changing politics in this way. Rationing was stopped last year in every district of the Presidency except Sind, and last week the present Minister, Mr. B. V. Jadhav, issued a statement announcing that Government have revoked the orders prohibiting the sale of 'charas'—a hemp drug—in Bombay which had been promulgated. The reason given is curious: the prohibition has not stopped the use of this drug, the desire on the part of many people for it remains strong, and it is being illicitly sold in the bazaar. Nobody expected that in the course of a few years charas addicts would forget their craving, and a certain amount of illicit sale was inevitable. There is absolutely no basis for the assumption that more 'charas' is being consumed clandestinely than was done before its sale was prohibited. The Minister, however, has persuaded himself or has allowed himself to be persuaded by his Departmental heads that the consumption of 'charas' would be reduced if its sale were allowed. The revenue expected is about a lakh of rupees, which is very welcome to an exchequer impoverished by heavy losses on its fantastic Development schemes.

Another way in which the Minister has elected to raise more revenue is the opening of 17 liquor shops which had been closed in West Khandesh where the Bhils, a primitive tribe, form a large part of the population. These people require to be protected more than others. The Minister, however, thinks otherwise. The Bhils, he says, "are by habit and customs, that almost have a religious sanction, users of alcohol, and when they cannot obtain it licitly they obtain it illicitly. The result of the policy of "rationing" and of closing many shops in the district have been to raise the price of liquor to a prohibitive figure, and to afford a strong incentive to the manufacture of illicit liquor, which is rendered all the more easy by the large quantities of mhowra flowers that grow in this district. The people are unable to believe that the consumption of liquor, even of illicit origin, is a criminal offence, and in consequence a spirit of lawlessness has spread throughout the district. Government hold that in such an area it is a truer form of temperance to offer reasonable facilities for the purchase of licit liquor of moderate strength, than to stand helplessly by and watch the health of the community being undermined by illicit material sometimes of very high strength." The idea of the opening of liquor shops being a truer form of temperance and the health of the Bhils being undermined by illicit material, is, of course, pure and undiluted nonsense. The non-Brahmin party claims to be more representative of and more concerned for the well-being of the masses than others, and it is astonishing that these retrograde proposals should be issued under the authority of the non-Brahmin leader who is now the Excise Minister! The bait that 3 or 4 lakhs of revenue which these measures are expected to bring will be used solely for the nation-building departments, is flagrantly a bribe offered to the Council as an inducement to swallow its scruples about throwing its previous declarations overboard. This is the thin end of the wedge, and if it is allowed to go unrepudiated, we may soon see the same policy being extended to all liquors and drugs and to the whole of the Presidency. We understand that it is proposed to challenge the action of the Minister by a motion in the Council for a nominal cut in the Excise grant, which, if passed, amounts to a vote of censure. But the Bombay Legislative Council as at present constituted is so dominated by communal interests and factions that it will not be surprising if the Minister is able to get a majority in his favour. Unless there is a thorough overhauling of the present system, the country must be prepared to go through a period of reaction in many directions before the electorates are educated to their responsibilities. The new Chinese constitution postulates a period of tutelage, during which Government will be responsible only to the national party, before power is finally and completely handed over to the people. A similar period should be provided for in every transitional system, and is actually provided though not in the same open way as in China.

SOME POINTS OF FACT AND LAW.

V. A GREAT ARYAN MISSIONARY.

(BY MR. KOPARGAM RAMAMURTI).

For authentic cases of Conversion of which any Missionary of God might justly feel proud, we must turn to the Ancient Series of Aryan Law Reports, popularly known as Puranas, published under the authority of Sage Vyasa the renowned Editor of the Vedas.

Those ancient chronicles present us admirable pen-pictures of many spiritual men who walked and talked with God and laboured incessantly to help mankind in its struggles to reach Him. But of all that adorable band of human saviours, there was none who rivalled the genius of the celestial sage, Narada, who was the Master Missionary of the Aryan Empire in its Golden Age. The saintly author of the Andhra-Bhagavata is ever in raptures over this heavenly saint and exclaims with ecstatic admiration: "Oh! Is there anywhere another Matamari (मतमरि) like him?" A matamari is an adept at expounding religious doctrine and disseminating the true faith.

Starting his career on earth in his earliest incarnation as the orphaned child of a humble servant-maid, it was Narada's good fortune to be entrusted with the duty of close personal attendance on the holy men who frequented his master's hospitable home. This intimate contact with holy people so filled him with unquenchable thirst for God and made him oblivious to everything else beside God, that after ages of single-hearted aspiration and struggle for attainment through many lives, he emerged at last an irresistible spiritual giant blessed with a direct vision of God, hailed and adored as a Celestial saint, a Deva-Rishi, transcending Time and Space, knowing all that there was to know in Heaven, on Earth and in the Nether world, of the Past and the Present and the Future, and yet as simple and mirthful as a child.

Swinging and twanging a Vina with his hands, and chanting with his lips day and night the blessed name and praise of Hari and Hari alone, this lightly clad harbinger of Light, Life and Purity, gaily roamed the three worlds with dancing steps, entralling the hearts of all with sweet melodious strains and rapturous song and chasing away sins at his holy approach as mist before the advancing Sun. Wherever he went, men and women, old and young, hailed with joy as an event of great good fortune the coming of this Trikala-vedi and Triloka-sanchari. They flocked round him to pour out their hearts at his feet, to receive his blessings and to hear the latest news of the interesting goings-on at Indra's Heavenly Court where there was neither hunger nor disease nor age nor death, enjoyed his breezy talks and gossip of all the worlds, and made him gladly welcome to their homes. Gentle, suave, sweet-tongued and witty, this delightful Brahmachari of transcendent virtue and transparent purity had the unrestricted freedom of the innermost Zenanas from the humblest cottage to the royal palace, Aryan or Asurio, in every part of the Universe. He easily commended the confidence of one and all by his charming manners and irresistible genius for sympathy. With a kind word here and a compliment there he quickly drew them out and spotted with unerring eye each individual foible, each individual discontent and every delicate situation.

It was here that Narada's characteristic genius for curing people of their earthly vanity and winning souls for God shone forth with especial brilliance, earning for him a unique name for artistic subtlety in Missionary work which resounds to this day in every Hindu home. Modern artists in the same line may have discarded and cast away his inimitable method as dangerous in unskilled hands or as too crude for these 'civilised' times. But Narada was a master scientist in spirituality. He had no fears in his mind about his own skill about the verdict of civilisation. That expert and daring fisher of souls was not afraid, nor indeed did he die-dain, to fish in troubled waters. On the other hand he adroitly turned his intimate knowledge and exceptional opportunities to splendid account and pushed matters scientifically to a crisis, to clean up the state as it were, by blowing up all individual foibles, all individual discontents and all delicate situations at one stroke, with no other motive but the spiritual good of the people concerned.

He spoke only nice things and spoke them with exceeding nicety, to each according to his taste and need, with great earnestness and sympathy, with charming candour and disinterestedness. But somehow, by the time that pleasant-spoken, pure-souled and benignant preacher of God had finished his pious round of visitations in any part of the globe misunderstandings and mishaps of worldly nature sprouted up spontaneously everywhere. Vain people became vainer, proud people became prouder, suspicious people became more suspicious, feelings and situations became more complicated and strained, crises developed rapidly and catastrophes were precipitated. Then brother smote brother, friend smashed friend, families burst up like bubbles, kingdoms fell out and fell, empires quaked and crumbled.

And when the sore-stricken souls of the disillusioned converts lay sprawling in the dust amid the wreckage of their former pride—amidst the shattered vanities of wealth, power, prestige, good looks, high position, home happiness, physical powers, regal pomp or other clogging attachments which had hitherto proved a hindrance to a true vision of God and prevented an unquestioning surrender to His will and guidance,—then the Angels in Heaven rejoiced and showered bouquets of flowers on the divine wizard who brought the miracle. And the wizard himself would also be seen high up on the firmament surrounded by a host of the Shining Ones, the immortal Devas, amidst clattering din and splendour, twanging his Vina and laughing and dancing and singing away with ecstasy the praises of 'Hari and Hari alone'.

And when crowds of grief-distracted men, women and children, connected in a worldly way with the dear Disillusioned, trooped up into the streets and gathered around the Ashram grounds and bewailed up into the skies, saying: "Thou, lover of mischief! Thou, feeder on strife and breeder of catastrophe! Kalahasana! Kalahapriya! Thou Celestial Meddler! What can we say to thee when the Angels themselves adore thee and rejoice with thee? What can we say to thee when Sri Krishna himself is helpless to prevent thy poking into His family affairs?"—then that intrepid master-servant of the Lord would burst into more tumultuous and hilarious dance, and twanging his Vina all the louder above the deafening din, he would lustily sing back with organ voice, that every word might strike home into the hearts of his ignorant accusers, the Sanskrit version of Psalm 2:

Why do the Heathen rage

And the people imagine a vain thing?

Why not they too sing with me

Glory to Hari and Hari alone?

A strange ineffable calm would then settle down upon the hearts of the sorrowing multitude and dry up their tears. They would stare at him in simple wonderment and silent adoration for a while, heave a sigh and slowly walk home with bended heads muttering praises of the angelic sage and the irresistible Lord of his devotion, and then—begin to long again for the day when that wonderful preacher would come on his next round of visitation to bless their homes with his radiant presence and rouse them with his inspiring talks.

But Narada was not merely an expert pioneer in itinerant evangelistic work. There was no branch of the art of spreading the gospel which he did not inaugurate and raise into an exact science by his resourceful genius. With very few and unimportant exceptions, such as knitting wool and pronouncing English, which were not in vogue and therefore had no educative value in his days, he anticipated all the methods, now considered modern of driving home the truths of holy Religion to the untutored human mind, especially the un-Aryan Avaric mind. Rescuing of unprotected women from violence, the care of expectant mothers, Maternity and Baby Welfare work, the care and control of child Education, were all his original inventions, calculated to promote a change of heart at the most impressionable and sensitive periods of life, unchecked by noxious home influences.

The masterly skill, cool courage and unflinching affability with which Narada employed all these brilliant and unquestionably philanthropic methods for the triumph of Truth and Aryan spirituality in Ancient Avaric India, are fully illustrated in that celebrated case reported in 7 Bhagavata which made so much stir in the religious and political circles of the day throughout the Universe and the same of which is still reverberating in the corridors of time. It is the well-known case of the conversion of Prince Prahlada to the cult of Hari, the Confounder of the Rakshasa race, who incarnated specially for him as Nara-Hari, the Man-Lion; a conversion which inevitably led in due course to parental wrath and filial disobedience and then quickly to the other disruption of the home, the life and the far-flung Empire of the convert's sovereign King and father, the proud and mighty Hiranakasyapa, between whom and the Shining Ones there had existed a never-ending family feud.

That splendid feat of matchless genius has remained in the annals of man ever since as an undying memorial to the ultimate victory of the Spirit over the flesh and made Narada the great Aryan Missionary an Immortal among Immortals for all climes and ages.

THE MARRIAGE LAWS.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I have to state that a marriage has been arranged between a Mahratta lady and a Mahratta gentleman (both of whom are Graduates) to be solemnised according to Arya Samaj rites and registered under Act III of 1872 as amended by Act XXX of 1923.

After the date for the registration has been fixed by the Marriage Registrar, the bridegroom says that he is not for registration on account of the following provisions in the Act:—

Section 22:—The marriage under this Act of any member of an undivided family shall be deemed to effect his severance from such family.

Section 23:—(Proviso) such person shall have no right to any religious office or service or to the management of any religious or charitable trust.

Section 24:—Succession to the property of such person is to be regulated by the Indian Succession Act.

Section 25:—Such person shall have no right of adoption.

Section 26:—The father of such person shall have the right to adopt another person as his son.

It is contended that by these provisions a person marrying under the Act is treated as a non-Hindu and disinherited from his ancestral property. This is the interpretation of the local lawyers who are rather ignorant in this matter, they having had no opportunity to deal with cases connected with such marriages in this part of the country. Though it is pointed out to them that there can be no disinheritance of any kind as is definitely stated in the main clause of Section 23 which runs—"A person who marries under this Act shall have the same rights and be subject to the same difficulties in regard to any right of succession to any property as a person to whom the Caste Disabilities Removal Act—1850 applies,"—they are not convinced. The expression "Undivided family" in Section 22 and the fact that the Indian Succession Act has so long been applied only to Christians, seem to lend colour to their interpretation or apprehension. In the result, the proposed marriage is about to be given up, unless the bridegroom's party can be convinced of the right interpretation by an authority. I therefore request that you may kindly publish a reply to this letter in the Indian Social Reformer, giving your opinion in the matter.

In this connection, I may also state that under a similar misunderstanding, another marriage which took place sometime ago in a high class family had to be solemnised, without the registration, according to orthodox rites.

MR. SASTRI'S WORK IN S. AFRICA.

The Editor, the Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I have just read the first editorial note in the Indian Social Reformer of 16th February welcoming the return of Right Hon'ble Mr. Srinivasa Sastri. I am one of the thousands of Indians who rejoice over his achievements in South Africa but with little understanding. You say "his important work as Agent has been to make provision for the education of Indian children up to a higher standard than has been available to them hitherto." One of the terms of the agreement under the settlement is that "the Union Government recognised Indians as an integral part of the population, with rights and duties the same as all other sections of it." These rights must perforce include the rights of Indian parents to send their children to the same school as those of all other sections to the highest standard available in the land. If this is so, what is the kind of provision for the education of Indian children which Mr. Sastri had to make, and which you call to be his most important work as Agent? I am prepared to concede that the personality and culture of Mr. Sastri must have raised the Indians as a whole in the estimation of the South African Colonies serving as a corrective of their prejudices against them. I should like to know if Mr. Sastri, beyond this, persuaded the South Africans to any degree to relent at the Indians seeking to live in their own traditional way. I am willing to believe this to be the paramount achievement of Mr. Sastri, only I want to know something more concrete of such if any.

I should not be understood to write this in any carping spirit. I am only acting on the principle that it is better to understand than to flatter.

PRESIDENTIAL SPEECH OF MRS. MIR MUZHURADDIN.

Mrs. Mir Muzhuraddin presiding over the prize distribution of Willingdon School last week, remarked:—The physical welfare of a community entirely rests on the healthy constitution and physique of the mother and physical culture is therefore necessary for mothers not only to preserve their bodily functions and ensure health but also to shake off the above mentioned evils and draw-backs and become alert cheerful, pleasant and active. If our girls are given proper physical culture which they need and which can be easily acquired without much expenditure and pains, they will develop vitality, self-discipline and self control and become physically fit, mentally strong and efficient. The possession of physical beauty can be obtained only by scientific and rational physical culture. It may not be possible for every mother to bequeath wealth to her daughters but she can bequeath her beauty by taking care of her own physique and health—for beauty is hereditary.

Some women are of opinion that we should keep to our own athletic sports and games such as "Kolatum," "pukri" and "Ankmuchans" etc. I don't know the terms for the two latter in Tamil but these are not sufficient or effective enough to improve health and beauty. In early days when girls were not sent to schools they were engaged in carrying water for the household use from wells and tanks, scrubbing and cleaning the floor, pounding the rice, grinding the chacki for flour, washing clothes, cooking and attending to other domestic work which were done by all classes poor or wealthy and which now have unfortunately been dropped. Although the present system of physical culture is not ours where still health, beauty and our progress is concerned we should not waste time to consider whether this is ours or not because in my opinion we have all come into the world to learn from one another something that is good and progressive and it is my firm belief that nothing belongs to anyone in particular. We are born to learn from each other and this has been going on ever since the world was created. By constant practice and habit any new thing will become our own as it had become others, because habit is second nature.

Ancient Orissa Temples:—Five centuries of a continuous artistic development are responsible for the unique series of temples in Bhuvaneshvar, Puri and Kanarak, declared Dr. Stella Kramrisch, Fine Arts Lecturer, Calcutta University, in the course of an illustrated lecture on Temples of Orissa at the Indian Museum. The temples, she said, were erected between the eighth and thirteenth centuries. At this period the zenith of Indian temple architecture was reached in more than one province, but none, not even Southern India could show an art-form as consistent, vital and logical in its evolution. From the architects' point of view the attainment was slight. No problem of construction worth mentioning were attempted, for the buildings were nothing but thick set masses of trabecated stone piled up into considerable height, almost entirely massive, allowing for the sanctuary as well as for the other rooms as little space as possible. On the earliest preserved temples, there was altogether about 560 shrines still in existence. They were relatively low erections moderately ornate and "primitives" in the sense of being early endeavours teeming with suggestions, harshly combined. The culmination of the development was reached in the gigantic ruin of the Sun temple at Kanarak.

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

IX. EMPLOYERS.

In the History of the Hebrew People an important leader tells us the story of the re-building of the walls of Jerusalem. The project was one of considerable difficulty, but was at length accomplished, "For," says the writer, "the people had a mind to work." Now it is just this "mind to work" that is so often lacking in modern industry, and one of the principal causes of it is the unreasonableness of certain members of the employer group. A number of employers have sensed that industry is a co-operative affair, that employer and employee alike are engaged in a great common task of production. But in contrast to this group there is the large body of employers who regard any talk of industrial democracy as vain words. The profits are the thing, and work and still more work is laid upon the men that the profits may increase. Individually these employers are good men. They are kind fathers and genial friends. But when it comes to industrial relationships each excuses himself with the statement, "I am doing as much as the others." He then goes on to explain that if he should introduce labour-saving devices, improved sanitation, shorter hours, better pay, workers insurance, and the like, that he would be going against the precedents of his trade, and would not only incur the enmity of his associates, but also lose money. The point he fails to see is that in industry as in every other field of human relationships we need pioneers—men who are willing to dare, who are not content simply to be with the majority, but who are resolved to do more than others. We need employers who will be just, who will approach each new problem in a spirit of fairness and without bias. We need employers who will be sympathetic, ever ready to lend a listening ear to the pleas of their fellows. We need employers who will be humble or teachable, ready at all times to learn new and better ways for meeting the human problem. We need employers who can instil in their men the feeling that industry is co-operative—that the employee is working with his employer, instead of simply for him.

Many employers would like to be more human, but they do not know how to be. They have thought so long in terms of commodities that they find it exceedingly difficult to think in terms of individual men. With this group we have the utmost sympathy. It is a difficult matter for one man to put himself in the place of the other. The golden rule is workable, but it calls for a high type of imagination. A man must be able to see the things he cannot immediately experience. Such an imagination cannot be developed at once, but it will come through careful practice.

And speaking of imagination, the public must also try to see the problem of the employer. The industrial leader is under a continuous mental strain.

There is no business that does not involve a risk. Crops may fail, markets may be bad, periods of financial depression may arise, but still the business must carry on. Is it not our duty then to be as solicitous for the employer as for the man in his employ? Both are men, and all that is human is a part of us. "As in water face answereth to face, so must the heart of man to man."

HINDU WOMEN'S RIGHTS OF INHERITANCE *

(By Mr. M. R. Jayakar, M.L.A.)

I am aware that I am speaking on a narrow amendment. This is an old Bill and its principles have been accepted by this House, including our predecessors. It was even passed by the Council of State, which is generally not likely to take extravagant views of social affairs. It has come back to us with its approval. Now the amendment before the House is very restrictive. I want Members clearly to realise the effect of this amendment. It is the same amendment as the one which has been tabled by Mr. Shanmukham Chetty. Before I go into the details of that amendment, I may say generally that that amendment will have the effect, if carried, of hanging up the operation of this whole+ some measure. Therefore the position of those Members, on whichever side of the House they may be seated, who think—that this a wholesome measure is clear. I can quite understand the attitude of Members in the position of Mr. Aney who do not think that it is a wholesome measure. But the position of those Members who think it is a wholesome measure is quite simple and clear. Those who believe that this House should not interfere with the Hindu law of succession on grounds which are more or less spiritual viz., that obligations to the dead come in, to which Mr. Aney referred with such detail, those I say who believe that this mundane House, somewhat material and non-spiritual in character, has no right to interfere with the law of succession because every law of succession concerns the dead, to them I have nothing to say. Their proper function is to oppose the Bill. But may I say, without offence to Mr. Aney, that those like him who are taking shelter under the present amendment but are really opposed to the principle of the Bill itself will not be honest in voting for the amendment. Their opposition is to the principle of the Bill. They are absolutely opposed to social reform of any kind. Mr. Aney made it perfectly clear in his speech that he thinks that we have not come to this House on any social issue, that we did not submit such issues to any popular vote at the time of our election and therefore we cannot make them the subject of a controversy in this House. I do not agree with him, but I can understand his attitude. His support to this amendment, in my opinion is disingenuous. I am however speaking to those—it may be a narrow or wide section of the House—who believe in the principle of this Bill, who go further and say that the Bill embodies a very wholesome, rational and liberal principle but who wish to support the amendment, to that class in this House my remarks are primarily addressed. To them, I say, be very careful before you vote for this amendment, because this amendment, although it may seem to be grounded on equity and injustice, will have the effect of postponing the operation and effect of what they regard as a wholesome Bill.

What does this Bill do? This Bill is a very humble attempt for the purpose of equalising, and removing the inequalities and anomalies of the Hindu Law. The whole theory of inheritance in Hindu Law—I shall avoid all technicalities as far as possible, but some technical jargon is absolutely inevitable—the whole theory of Hindu law of inheritance is as follows: when a male dies, his male children come in first up to three generations, his son, his grandson and his great grandson. Failing this branch, his widow comes in. After her, his daughters come in. After the daughters, the daughters' sons come in. That exhausts the progeny of the individual. Failing any of this progeny the succession goes to his parents. I am stating in very simple English the main principles on which inheritance proceeds. Then the mother comes in first in certain provinces, the father comes in first in certain other provinces. After the parents are exhausted then the father's progeny comes in up to the brothers' son. This is the line in which succession proceeds. But it does not stop there. Then it proceeds further in a manner which may appear extraordinary to non-Hindus. It had its origin in times when males were a great fighting asset, and therefore heritable preference had to be given to them over females. I am here speaking of the days very very ancient, when males were a fighting asset, in the cause of civilization and culture. Tracing from that time, this inheritance and succession have continued, with the result that all males upto six generations upwards and six collateral generations from each of them had this right of preference over nearest females. Quoting from the latest edition of the ex-Law Member Mr. Mulla, father, father's father, his father, his father, his father, and his father. Thus after going up to the top to the seventh degree, seven generations of collaterals from each of them up to the seventh degree have to be included, i.e. the topmost ancestors six generations, his son, his son, his son, his son, his son, and his son. Sir Sankaran Nair speaking in the Upper House made a very careful computation of these individuals who in the more distant degrees are called Samānokadas and whom, a very facetious Judge of the Bombay High Court described as chimerical beings who existed on the genealogical tree but rarely in actual life. But still they exist in the computation of the lawyer and do sometimes crop up in rare cases. They have been roughly calculated by Sir Sankaran Nair as 332 in number. The anomaly of the law comes in here, that these 332 individuals, of whose existence even the testator is not often aware, come in before his nearest relations like son's daughter.

One of the arguments advanced was: "Oh, the last male owner should have left a will, and as he has not done so, his presumed intentions must be taken to benefit the man who is several degrees removed, as against his own nearer relations like his son's daughter". This would be a most extraordinary presumption indeed! The argument proceeded from Mr. Aney, who said, "Oh, by reason of his dying intestate we can presume his intentions as if he made a will in favour of those to whom the estate goes by operation of law." But, what is this "presumed intention"? First of all, God alone knows what the intention of a dead man was. The devil may possibly know it, but certainly we mortals do not know it. It is perhaps a privilege shared between God and the devil to know what exactly was the intention of a deceased person. But supposing we could know the "presumed intention" of a dead individual, why should we presume that, if he had known the real law of succession, which he is supposed to know, he would have left a will in favour of any of these chimerical individuals, any of these 332 distant men, as against his own son's daughter, daughter's daughter, sister and sister's son whom this Bill provides for? Surely is it not too much of a stretch of imagination to believe that, if the deceased had left a will with knowledge of the law, he would have preferred these chimerical individuals six or seven degrees removed and would have ignored his own son's daughter, daughter's daughter, sister and sister's son. Therefore, the argument based on the question as to what could have been the wishes of this man, if he had been able to give expression to them by means of a testamentary document, is certainly too far-fetched. Leaving this question, let us see what this Bill provides. This Bill does not interfere with the deceased man's progeny, goes up to his father, and mother, then takes his father's progeny up to two generations, brother and brother's son, then it goes to the father's father and stops there. Stopping there, there is a provision in this Bill which introduces four female heirs at this stage, who would be but for this Bill and who are, under the present law, postponed until these 332 individuals are exhausted. In other words, this Bill seeks to make a kind of compromise between the old theory of sapindaship and the newly awakened public desire that female heirs should be given their proper place in the scheme of inheritance. And there it stops; it stops with the inclusion of only four heirs, and not more. This ought to prove that its provisions are not a very violent departure at all. I am again going to quote from Mr. Mulla's new edition of Hindu Law which I received only last night here. The heirs who will not be touched by this Bill at all and who will stand as under the old law are the son, son's son, etc. i.e. three generations—they will not be touched; the widow will not be touched, the daughter will not be touched nor the daughter's son, nor the mother, father, brother, brother's son in Bombay, the grand-mother, full sister, half sisters and others, who have secured a place in Bombay, then, the great grandson, great great grandson, great great great grandson, son's widow, grandson's widow, great grandson's widow in certain provinces—brother's son, brother's son's son and so it goes on untill we come to the 34th heir, the father's father. There it will stop. So, all these old stages of the law are not touched by this Bill. Is that a very violent departure, may I ask.

A great deal has been said that we are revolutionising the law. Is it revolutionising the law to say that daughter's and son's daughter should have the benefit of heirship, after all these nearer heirs, mostly male, have been exhausted. I want my Honourable friend to remember that the son's son is a very near heir, he gets the property in the very first remove. The son's daughter however is postponed for 332 generations. Similarly, the daughter is provided for, the daughter's son is provided for. The daughter's daughter is again postponed for 332 generations. What equity is there, except that by a freak of nature, the secret of which science has not yet been able to unfold the one child is born a male and the other a female. What else is it but a mere freak of circumstances. Is it equitable to penalise the female child to the extent of putting back her rights for 332 generations. We want just to modify the evil effects of this freak of nature. That is the purpose of this Bill. There is no violent revolutionary purpose in this Bill at all. Do we honestly believe, as the ancient Hindus believed, that all males are capable of taking inheritance, but that women are not so capable? I may here point out to Mr. Aney, because I know a little of Hindu Law—that he should examine very closely the foundations of this doctrine that Hindu women are not competent to inherit. May I point out that the main authority on which that doctrine is based is from a book on Vedic Ritual, and not on any law of inheritance? Speaking of Vedic Ritual, I may state that there was a time when in very ancient times a liquor, similar to the drinks now in use, used to be distributed in ceremonial sessions. It was called Soma juice. It had the reputation of giving a touch of Dutch courage, if I may use that modern expression, a feeling of elation for the moment, just like that which drinkers feel when they take a drink in these days. The belief arose, which became a rule in course of time, that as women were not required to fight, they should not be given a portion of this drink. Now in Sanskrit the word for a portion is Dāya. The Dāya (portion of drink) was excluded from the woman, because it would be wasting that drink upon her as she would never be called upon to fight. It was a "portion of the drink" that was excluded from women. Later on some wags, of whom there were a great number in those days, took those words from the ancient context and turned them into a text of the Hindu Law. He took advantage of the fact that Dāya also means a portion of the inheritance. Mr. Aney, I am sure if he knew this origin of the rule would not say that the Hindu law does not allow women to take inheritance, as summarily as he did. Mr. Aney solemnly propounded the sacrosanct character of the Hindu law and felt a superior reverence for it. Therefore, I am examining the theory and it is this theory we have to examine now. I certainly wish, as my friend said before me, that we could have a committee of this House sitting to examine the whole theory of the Hindu law of inheritance, and go into its rudimentary conceptions and evolve an equitable system. But the Government would not allow us to do that. But for all that, it is fortunate that that extremely maligned species of human beings, in Mr. Aney's opinion, the social reformer, does exist in this House and in this country too, and cannot be got rid of merely by a mere obiter dictum of Mr. Aney's. In spite of great difficulties the social reformer has got to struggle to get these little things improved bit by bit. It is not his fault, but the fault of circumstances, that he can only introduce little bits of reform because we have not in our hand the wide power of introducing reform enjoyed by those sitting on the opposite benches. We can only struggle on slowly as humble social reformers have always struggled in the past and will struggle in the future, gaining slow victories bit by bit.

I do not wish to go further into this matter. That is the present theory and that is the present Bill which says that certain degrees of remoter male heirs should be postponed to the nearer degrees of female heirs. Now who are these relations thus preferred? How near are they to the deceased? Sons' daughters, born of our own son's loins. Daughters' daughters, sisters and sisters' sons. Some critics have said "Oh, why not also other female heirs?" I say sufficient for to-day is the evil thereof, I would certainly try to introduce many more female relations, but let us first get this Bill through and then the time will arise to extend the right to others. These are the near relations touched by the present Bill. Now I want my Honourable friends to contrast them with the remoter degrees of male relationship and such an examination will show Honourable Members that this is a very sensible Bill, and by no means an extravagant one.

INTERNATIONAL UNITARIANS' VISIT TO BANGALORE.

The unitarians Delegates Dr. W. H. Drummond, M.A., D.D., LL.D. and Mrs. Drummond, from England, Dr. F. C. Southworth, A.M., D.D., and Mrs. Southworth, and Dr. J. H. Lathrop, A.M., D.D. and Mrs. Lathrop from America visited Bangalore in connection with the centenary celebrations of the Brahma Samaj on the 10th and 11th instants. The Public reception to the Delegates arranged by the Cantonment Brahma Samaj at the Brahma Mandir was largely attended by the public of Bangalore and the Delegates were welcomed by a large number of the Intelligentsia of Bangalore belonging to various religious bodies. The audience that assembled in the spacious and beautifully decorated Pandal erected in front of the Brahma Mandir for the occasion, was a sure sign of the fast growing love for international Fellowship in our land. Mr. M. Mahadeva Mudaliar M.A. the Secretary of the Cantonment Brahma Samaj welcomed the delegates in suitable terms. The delegates in their turn conveyed to the members of the Brahma Samaj, the hearty congratulations from their unitarian brothers in England and America, and to the Indian public the message of brotherhood, good faith and peace from the public of their country. They assured the audience that they were carrying with them the good wishes of the Indians to their countrymen besides their happy impressions of the Indian hospitality and sweet memories of the friendliness and cordiality which they have enjoyed during their sojourn in India. To the Brahmos in particular they said that the long line of Brotherhood between the Unitarians and the Brahmos was started by the founder of the Brahma Samaj movement in India, Rajah Ram Mohan Roy more than a hundred years ago and that their visit to India now was only a happy occasion for reassuring their brotherhood. They congratulated the Brahmos on their work during these hundred years and exhorted them to stand by their banner of Brotherhood, Truth and Righteousness; and push on to their goal, namely, the establishment of the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of man all over their land. Mr. K. H. Ramayya B.A., Bar-at-law, Registrar of Co-operative societies in Mysore, welcomed the Delegates on behalf of the public of Bangalore. The Delegates were then garlanded amidst cheers.

A RELIGIOUS CONFERENCE.

In the afternoon the delegates took part in Religions Conference in the same premises. Dr. F. C. Southworth, B.A., L.T. presided over the deliberations. Mr. D. Venkata Ramiah, B.A., L.T. Mr. C. M. Vija Raghavachariar, B.A., L.T. Dr. W. H. Drummund, Rev. C. J. Cox and Mr. P. G. Thomas spoke on the problem "How to combat the apathy towards the Religion in Modern Society." The speakers representing different religious bodies joined together in the deliberations, brought to bear their learned opinion on the subject upon the discussion. They unanimously condemned the growing indifference towards Religion, and traced it to Modern conditions of life and education. They regretted the fact that religious instruction was getting obsolete in educational Institutions, and in family houses, and that Teachers and parents were neglecting an important duty towards the religious training of the youth of the present day. Mr. C. M. Viji araghavachariar was of opinion that Sanskrit education should be made more popular so that people might study their scriptures in their originals and that translations of the scriptures for making religious instruction more wide-spread would lack the hidden charms of the original. Rev. C. J. Cox was of opinion that the apathy towards religion was rather on the surface, that man in the depths of his heart was extremely religious, that representatives of the great religions should make it very clear that religion is for all kinds of men, that a universal human note must be struck in religions, and that none should feel that they are outside the pale. Further that religion is not the exclusive property of any particular sect or class, and that if it should dispel apathy it must be universal. That teachers of religion must fulfill this need by way of love and persuasion and must seek to bring their messages to all sorts of people, that the highest truths contained in the scriptures must be made intelligible by translations. Dr. Drummund supported this view and condemned the idea of scriptures being written down in dead languages and in the same way as the Christian scriptures have been translated into English from their Hebrew and Greek originals. The scriptures of other religions also must reach the masses in some common language. He regretted the neutrality towards religion in schools and colleges and suggested that religion be accepted as a cultural subject in education and that the solution of the apathy towards religion lay in discovering more common grounds for all people for the human soul belongs to God and men hunger and thirst after Him. Dr. Southworth in concluding the proceedings laid stress upon the importance of bringing out translations of scriptures of the land and on fraternity towards all men for the apathy towards religion was mostly due to the apathy between man and man.

OTHER EVENTS.

Dr. W. H. Drummund conducted divine service in the evening and preached a sermon on Prayer and its significance in our relationship with God. Dr. Lathrop conducted divine service at the Brahma Mandir on Monday, the 11th morning and preached a sermon on "the Divine in Man" Mrs. Southworth delivered an address on the same morning to the school children of the Brahma Girl's school, and sweets were distributed among school children. On the afternoon of the 11th instant, Mr. and Mrs. Mahadeva Mudaliar gave a garden party to the Delegates at which a large number of ladies and gentlemen were present. In the evening the Delegates addressed a large body of the Bangalore public at a public meeting held in the Government Intermediate College premises under the presidency of Mr. C. S. Doraiswamy Ayyar, Chief Judge of Mysore, a report of which will follow. On the night of the 10th instant, Rao Bahadur Dr. C. B. Rama Rao, B.A., M.D., invited the delegates and friends to dinner.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Viceroy meets Mahatma Gandhi:—Mr. Vithal-bhai J. Patel, the President of the Indian Legislative Assembly, gave a tea party at his residence at Delhi on the 18th instant when Mahatma Gandhi was staying with him on a short visit. The guests sat at four tables. The Viceroy, Mr. Gandhi, Maharaja of Kashmir and Mr. Jinnah sat at one; the Commander-in-Chief, Mr. Patel and Mr. Shah Nawas at the second table; Pandit Malaviya, the Nawab of Bhopal, Mr. Orerar and Mr. Cunningham at the third, while Pandit Motilal, the Maharaja of Bikaner, Dr. Ansari and Sir Darcy Lindsay sat at the fourth table. Pandit Motilal later joined the table where the Viceroy, Mr. Gandhi, the Maharaja of Kashmir and Mr. Jinnah were having informal talks which now and then referred probably to political issues raised by the Calcutta Congress and communal riots in Bombay and communal differences generally and the political, religious, social and economic causes which were keeping up communal differences. But these conversations were of course very informal and without any definite object and were of a character which generally take place over such social functions. The party sat over an hour when the Viceroy had to leave as he was to receive a deputation about horse breeding.

The late Mrs. M. A. Jinnah:—The death occurred on Wednesday the 20th instant of Mrs. Ratibai Jinnah, wife of Mr. Muhammad Ali Jinnah, M.L.A. Mrs. Jinnah who had been seriously ill for sometime was the only daughter of Sir Dinshaw and Lady Petit. Mrs. Jinnah, says a message published in the Bengales of Calcutta, was buried at the Khoja cemetery at Arambagh, Mazagaon, soon after Mr. Jinnah's arrival from Delhi. The cortege left the Ridge Road, Malabar Hill, at one o'clock and was followed by many relations of the deceased and friends of Mr. Jinnah. At the grave side members of the Bombay Bar belonging to all communities and many notable Mahomedans were present. Perhaps for the first time a number of ladies of all communities gathered at the graveside at the cemetery. Lady Dinshaw Petit has donated a sum of Rs. fifty thousand to the Bai Awabai Framjee Petit Parsae Girls' Orphanage for a separate block to be built in memory of her late daughter Mrs. Ruttonbai Jinnah.

Hindu Arya Samaj Unity:—The Punjab Hindu Sabha has proposed the name of Lala Hansraj for the presidentship of the Hindu Mahasabha session to be held at Surat. Lala Hansraj is the president of the college section of the Arya Samaj and one of the founders, an honorary life-member and ex-principal of the Dayanand Anglo-Vedic College, Lahore.

An Un-recognised University:—A Punjab Government press communique says:—The attention of the Government has been drawn that a society which has taken the name of the Western University, the chief director of which resides in Kapurthala, is granting or offering to grant graduation letters in arts, commerce and engineering as well as in homeopathic medicine. This university is not a university in the proper sense of the term as used in the British Empire. It has no authority to grant academical degrees or any other honours nor is it competent to certify any professional qualifications. The communique proceeds: 'Certificates issued by it are not valid for any of the privileges attaching to the diploma of a recognized university properly established.'

"Pussyfoot" Johnson in Bombay:—Mr. W. E. (Pussyfoot) Johnson, the well-known Prohibitionist, who is now on a world tour, arrives in Bombay on Sunday, 3rd March 1929. He will be in Bombay till the 5th idem, during which period he will deliver three public lectures under the auspices of the Bombay Temperance Council.

Co-Education in Medical Colleges:—The Committee appointed by the Senate of the University of London to inquire into the medical education of women undergraduates has reported unanimously in favour of co-education in medicine.

All-Bengal Anti-Dowry Association:—Jyotirbid Pandit K. Samajpati, B. A., Kalyanode has recently started the All-Bengal Anti-Dowry Association with its office at 37, Harrison Road, which is doing immense public good. The Association has been formed with a view to help distressed and poor parents having daughters of marriageable age, by finding out suitable bride-grooms for them. It will also induce Hindu young men to marry without taking any dowry. Thus the Association hopes to do a great deal in removing a long standing social evil of the Hindu society. Pandit Samajpati is a respectable gentleman and the public may safely rely on the sincerity of his purpose. The Marriage Alliance will not take any remuneration for its labour.

NOTES.

Mahatma Gandhi's Arrest:—In pursuance of the resolution of the National Congress for the boycott of foreign cloth, Mahatma Gandhi, on his way to Burma halted a day at Calcutta to inaugurate the campaign. As a means of making the occasion impressive, a large quantity of foreign cloth was collected from the citizens in Shradhanand Park, and Mahatmaji before a vast concourse solemnly set fire to the heap. The Police authorities, under a section of the Calcutta Police Act forbidding the burning of rubbish near highways, had served a notice on the Secretary of the Calcutta Congress Committee forbidding the making of a bonfire of foreign clothes as announced in the papers. Mahatma Gandhi in his speech at the ceremony argued that the order was illegal and that the law did not contemplate an incident of the kind in which he was engaged. The result was that he was served with an order of arrest and though he demurred at first, he agreed later to sign a bail bond for a small sum, to appear before a Magistrate on the 26th instant. He left next day, according to programme, for Burma where great preparations are being made for his reception. Mahatma Gandhi has made it clear that he is not at present offering civil disobedience. His objection to the order is on the ground of its legality which will have to be decided by the Courts. He lays stress on the point that the boycott is not of British goods only but of all foreign cloth. As a large proportion of Indian imports are of British origin, this will necessarily affect Britain more than any other country. Mahatma Gandhi told an interviewer that he was anxious and ready to arrive at a pacific settlement of the Indian question with Britain, if the opportunity was honestly offered. Many people do not approve of the bonfire part of the programme, but they sadly realise that arguments make as little impression on British statesmen as water on a duck's back, and they are obliged to acquiesce in it as it seems to be as impressive in the eyes of the British as of the Indian people.

An Unnecessary Ban:—The Government of India has prohibited the importation of a book entitled "Shiva, or the Future of India" by Mr. R. J. Minney, published by Messrs. Kegan Paul, London, in their excellent series "Today and Tomorrow". We have not seen the book, but evidently it has been in circulation in this country for some time. The steed had, therefore, been stolen before the stable door was closed. The present ban, therefore, serves only as an advertisement to Mr. Minney's book. The Pioneer which says it received a copy of it some weeks ago, asks why, if this book is prohibited, Miss Katherine Mayo's "Mother India", was allowed entrance. That question is for the Government to answer. For our own part, we do not believe in prohibiting books of the "Mother India" or of Mr. Minney's type. If "Mother India" had not been allowed to come into the country, it would not have evoked the replies which it did and which has done much to check the mischief it undoubtedly caused. Further, it is well always to see ourselves as others—even jaundiced observers like Miss Mayo—see us. It must be admitted, too, that, while her poisonous generalizations about Indians, and especially, Hindus as a class aroused resentment, her book has stimulated action which otherwise would not have come so soon. Indian opinion is almost morbidly sensitive to Western criticism, and Miss Mayo's bittingsgate has gone home more effectively than the long and patient propaganda of social reformers in many circles hitherto but slightly responsive to their reasoned arguments. As regards Mr. Minney's book, we see from a lengthy notice in the People of Lahore, that in one important respect at least he is less objectionable than Miss Mayo. The latter declared, that the Hindus were a world menace and should be closely guarded by British bayonets. Mr. Minney seems to think that there is hope for them if Government would help them to carry out social reforms. The Government of India must have had its own reasons for prohibiting the book. Concern for the feelings of Indians, particularly of the mild Hindus is not a determining factor in its policies. The Hindus also have ceased to expect Government to care for their sentiments. The free circulation of Mr. Minney's book, therefore, would have done no harm, and it would have enabled Indians to point out any gross inaccuracies in it. The book will now continue to circulate in countries where no one can criticise it with knowledge, while it is not available in the land where it can be most effectively answered, if it is worth answering.

Inquiry into Bombay Disturbances :—The adjournment motion in the Bombay Legislative Council for the appointment of a committee of inquiry to investigate the causes of the recent disturbances in Bombay was opposed by the Home Member on the ground that the unpleasant task of the committee would only serve to embitter the feelings of the Hindus and Mahomedans. The Council was not satisfied with the promise of an official inquiry and the motion was passed by a large majority. In pursuance of the desire of the public, the Home Member has issued a statement in the course of which he says: "A Committee will be appointed as soon as its composition can be settled and the consent of those invited to join it obtained. I regret to have to inform the House that the Hon. the Chief Justice, who has already been asked to preside over the Committee, has refused, for reasons the force of which Government fully appreciate. Government will secure the services of another chairman whose impartiality and ability will similarly command general confidence. As regards two other members of the Committee, since Government are fully in accord with the opinion expressed in the floor of this House that there is the proper number, I understand that the names of Sir Ibrahim Rahimtoola and Sir Chunilal Mehta would be acceptable to all. These gentlemen are being invited to serve and I hope they will find themselves able to spare the time for this important public duty. The terms of reference will be as follows: To inquire into the recent disturbances in Bombay, their causes and origins, the course which they took, and the measures adopted by Government to suppress them, and to make recommendations. The Committee will have to decide whether to hold its meetings in public or in camera, or partly the one and partly the other. Meanwhile we shall proceed with the compilation of the report which I mentioned last week; it will undoubtedly assist the Committee in its investigations."

Bombay Co-operative Conference :—The presidential address of Sir P. C. Ray at the Bombay Provincial Co-operative Conference held last week contained many valuable suggestions for the expansion of the movement. Undoubtedly, Co-operative Societies furnish one of the most effective means for the improvement of the economic condition of the masses of India. Even in the limited extent to which the movement has been worked here, it has succeeded in relieving much of the indebtedness of the Indian peasantry. Sir P. C. Ray thought that there was much truth in the criticism levelled at the Co-operative movement in this country that it has only developed its credit side to the exclusion of its other activities. He exhorted the promoters of the Co-operative movement to devise methods which would enable the people to add to their resources by creating new wealth. He strongly emphasised the necessity of intimate connection between co-operation and the improvement of agriculture and cottage industries. There was every possibility of the revival of cottage industries if co-operative methods were adopted. This would mean spare-time occupation for our rural population who were obliged to remain idle for 6 or 9 months in the year. Further Sir P. C. Ray declared that it should also be the endeavour of Co-operative Societies to arouse the sanitary conscience of the people and adopt measures for the improvement of their health. He also laid stress on the importance of having trained workers for the expansion of co-operative work. This can be achieved immediately by educating and training grown up men and women. "What, therefore, is needed," concluded Sir P. C. Ray, "is that a well considered scheme of adult education should be devised and efforts should be made to bring it into effect at once and that steps be taken to introduce such education all over the country on an extensive scale. As the Report on the Royal Commission on Indian Agriculture states, such a development would antedate by at least a generation that great advance in literacy which in our view is essential to progress in all directions."

An Unofficial Inquiry :—A few of the members of the Bombay Legislative Council constituted themselves into a committee with Mr. K. M. Munshi as chairman to look into the Bardoli question. In July last year, the coalition Nationalist Party of the local Legislature ratified the appointment of the committee. The only man on the committee who is a member of the Bombay Council is Mr. B. G. Kher, who acted as its Secretary. The Report which makes interesting reading is based mainly on the evidence of Mr. Vallabhbai and his associates as the Government of Bombay did not give any response to the Committee's overtures. The Report, therefore, where it deals with the hardships inflicted on the people of Bardoli, is a restrained and moderate statement of the popular case. The Committee suggests in its recommendations a complete change in the Land Revenue policy and emphasises the need for defining more precisely the relations between Government and the people and for limiting the powers of the Executive. The Report makes a valuable contribution to the subject.

"Blue Lie" :—Mr. S. M. Kaikini, B.A., L.L.B., Sub-Judge, Haveri, writes :—As regards the "Blue lie" mentioned in the Reformer of the 23rd February, I may inform you that in Kanara the same kind of 'lie' is known as 'Gudgar Patti' and it is generally supposed to be spread when painters on wood or idols who are generally called 'Gudgar' cannot have their paint properly set on the material used by them. In our younger days such 'pattis' were spread and generally they took this very form of kidnapping of children by Kabulis or some such up-country men. Last year even here at Haveri a similar scare about kidnapping was raised. Such scares are always raised and people always attribute them to paint or dyes not being otherwise properly applied either to cloth or other material used by artisans or weavers. I think there are technical expressions for this 'blue lie' in almost all vernaculars. I learn that in this part this scare is attributed to indigo paint not being properly set as is stated about the 'Blue Lie' referred to by you and is called 'Niligeh suddi or warte'.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, MARCH 9, 1929.

PROHIBITION IN BOMBAY.

The week has been one of distinct encouragement to advocates of Prohibition. Contrary to our apprehension, the Bombay Legislative Council carried without division a motion introduced by Mr. V. N. Jog of Dharwar to reduce the grant demanded by the Excise Minister by a nominal sum of Rs. one hundred as a mark of disapproval of the recent proposals to permit the sale of charas (a hemp drug) in Bombay city and the re-opening of certain liquor shops which had been closed in West Khandesh which has a large Bhil population. Another change which has been introduced is the fixed fee system in place of the auction system of selling licenses for liquor shops. The fixed fee system had been in vogue for many years in Bombay Presidency, but was given up in favour of the auction system, owing to its tendency to create vested interests, and its many openings for patronage and consequent corruption. The liquor shop-keepers, however, have never liked the public auction system, and they have been able to convert Government to their view. In all these directions there has been a disposition to favour the liquor trade, and the Council had an opportunity to express its disapproval. The anti-Prohibition side, of course did not allow its case to go by default. The debate was enlivened by an extraordinary speech by the Commissioner of Excise, Mr. J. P. Brander, in the course of which he extolled the use of liquor as conducive to health and longevity. A Hindu member, Sir Vasant Rao Dabholkar, distinguished himself by maintaining that the Hindu religion did not prohibit the use of liquor as it was offered to goddesses. This is no doubt the practice among the Animists whose Hinduism is of the crudest type, but if Sir Vasant Rao tried to offer liquor at the Mahalakshmi temple or at Madhav Bag, he will have a rude disillusionment. The Mahomedan member from Karachi, Mr. Noor Mahomed, on the other hand, emphatically declared that no Mahomedan member could vote in support of the liquor traffic. The Minister, Mr. B. V. Jadhav, made an important speech in which he unequivocally avowed himself a Prohibitionist, assured the Council that the orders which have been issued would not be given effect to against the decision of the Council, and promised to produce his own scheme of advancing Prohibition in the course of the year. On Sunday Mr. "Pussyfoot" Johnson arrived in Bombay from Madras and was enthusiastically welcomed by Temperance reformers. He addressed several public meetings during the four days he was in the city. His presence and utterances have been a source of much encouragement to Prohibitionists. He tore to pieces the misleading statements circulated by interested agents regarding the results of Prohibition in the United States. Tuesday's public meeting held at the Cowasji Jehangir Hall adopted a message of congratulation for transmission to President Hoover on his election to the great office and his installation in it on the previous day.

Mr. B. G. Pahalajani, an eminent member of the Legislative Council from Sindh, writing in the Indian Daily Mail complains that Temperance organisations have become inactive and recommends the introduction of counter-attractions to wean the people from drink. It is no doubt, not true, that Temperance Societies are not carrying on propaganda on the old lines. But it is not correct to say that the feeling against the liquor trade is less evident in the country than before. For one thing, the idea which obsessed the earlier generations of English-educated men that drink was a sign of civilisation, is utterly gone. Except for elderly men who acquired the habit in their youth and have not been able to give it up, educated Indians as a class are total abstainers. Then, again, the crusade against the liquor traffic is now a regular part of the nationalist programme. It has been given the first place in the constructive scheme of congress activities. Movements to wean people from the liquor habit are being carried on in several parts of the country. The toddy-drawing castes themselves have in many places pledged themselves to give up the trade. In Gujarat at the present time Mr. Vallabh J. Patel is engaged in an intensive campaign to put down the drink traffic. The Temperance movements of the old type were movements which aimed, to use the words of Mr. Johnson, to get rid of the evils of drink without getting rid of the drink itself. They were all found to be inadequate and the Americans came to the same conclusion as the ancient Hindu and Islamic teachers that the only sure cure for the evils of drink is to abolish drink. So long as the liquor trade flourishes, mere propaganda cannot be very effective. As for providing counter-attractions, it is not easy to provide counter-attractions for every vice which people have to be weaned from. The whole principle of this method is that human beings cannot be persuaded to give up an evil way unless another way equally pleasant but without the evil is found for them. As the ancient Upanishad says, however, the good and the pleasant are two different things, and men have often to choose between them. An Englishman speaking at the Associated British Chambers of Commerce in Calcutta last December claimed among other things, that the British have been instrumental in familiarising Indians with more exhilarating drinks than water. We have now to re-teach our people that water is the most natural and refreshing drink for man. The only permanent and the counter-attraction to the public house is to make real homes for the people instead of the masonic holes in which they have at present to live in cities like Bombay. This, again, can be done through the impetus of a great national spirit which is in a position to use the resources of the State for the enduring benefit of the people of India.

SOME POINTS OF FACT AND LAW.

VI. SOME MISSIONARY PROBLEMS.

(By MR. KOPARGAM RAMAMURTI).

Let us by all means pay our humble tribute of admiration to ancient genius. But at the same time let us not be blind to the points where it had not been put to an adequate test. The problems that beset the practice of conversion are numerous, varied and intricate, and may easily be heart-breaking sometimes. Great as was the achievement of Narada in the difficult situations which he had to negotiate practically single-handed, we cannot close our eyes to the fact that in some vital matters at least he was exceptionally lucky.

In the first place, the removal of the pregnant Queen, Lilavati Devi, from the pernicious surroundings of her royal home to the spiritual environment and sylvan joys of his holy Ashrama had not to be done on his own responsibility. He had ~~on the~~ ~~other~~ ~~hand~~ ~~the~~ ~~inestimable~~ ~~advantage~~ ~~in~~ ~~the~~ ~~form~~ ~~of~~ ~~being~~ ~~able~~ ~~to~~ ~~inquire~~ ~~into~~ ~~the~~ ~~identity~~ ~~of~~ ~~her~~ ~~rescuer~~ ~~and~~ ~~protector~~ ~~from~~ ~~the~~ ~~violent~~ ~~hands~~ ~~of~~ ~~the~~ ~~Angels~~ ~~who~~ ~~were~~ ~~the~~ ~~sworn~~ ~~enemies~~ ~~of~~ ~~her~~ ~~husband~~, and so could earn the warm gratitude and gushful thanks of her husband and relations instead of incurring their suspicion and wrath.

Secondly, there were weighty considerations which he could reasonably urge to the lady herself and to others to explain his unwillingness to restore her to the protection of her own people immediately after he rescued her. He had to consider and provide for her future safety. She was in a delicate condition. Her husband was not at home to protect her. He had gone to the jungle and lost himself in the severe austerities of a Tapas from which there was no knowing when he would recover and return. What guarantee was there that the rowdy Angels from whose hands he had rescued the lady would not make another attempt to carry her away? Could the Palace Guards and soldiers of her husband, who had proved so powerless against the previous raid, be trusted to defend her more ably now? At his own Ashrama on the other hand the lady was perfectly safe. The Angel gang would not dream of molesting her while under his protection. He was an Angel himself and a Holy one too whom they adored and obeyed as their Guru, and his abode was held by them in inviolable sanctity. And the Lady Lilavati also understood this position and acquiesced in his decision to keep her under his own special care far away from her unsafe home until her husband's return.

Last but not least, Narada had the exceptional good luck of being left with the undisturbed guardianship of the lady and her child for nearly six years by the continued absence of her husband. This gave him ample time for bringing them under the 'steady influence' of his own religious creed at a very delicate period in their lives. Day and night therefore he kept humming into the ears of his helplessly dependant and willingly docile patient, whether awake or asleep, the name and praise of Hari and Hari alone, until the sound and the cult filled her soul and became part of her very being and stirred up the infant in the womb to throb and leap responsively to the tune of the great charmer.

The education of the child thus begun from the mother's womb was continued without interruption for five years after his birth under constant and vigilant care. So that when the mother and child had at last to leave the Ashrama and were taken into the bosom of their family amidst general rejoicings and fulsome tributes of gratitude to the benevolence of the noble sage, Narada himself had the quiet satisfaction of knowing in his mind that he had securely packed sufficient spiritual dynamite into the boy to blow up the citadel of all ancestral superstitions and false gods and shatter the Asuric home and empire of his infatuated father. He could thereafter wait for the expected results as confidently as ~~the~~ ~~king~~ ~~of~~ ~~Greece~~ ~~awaited~~ ~~the~~ ~~flaming~~ ~~of~~ ~~Troy~~ ~~after~~ ~~the~~ ~~Trojans~~ ~~had~~ ~~jubilantly~~ ~~carried~~ ~~off~~ ~~the~~ ~~Wooden~~ ~~Horse~~ ~~prepared~~ ~~for~~ ~~them~~ ~~with~~ ~~Greek~~ ~~soldiers~~ ~~in~~ ~~its~~ ~~belly~~ ~~and~~ ~~lodged~~ ~~it~~ ~~happily~~ ~~within~~ ~~the~~ ~~city~~ ~~walls~~.

But let us suppose for a moment that all things did not turn out quite so nicely as they actually did. Suppose that Hiranya Kasyapa, instead of prolonging his Tapas for six years, had finished with it quickly on hearing of his wife's abduction and came thundering at the Ashram gates immediately after her rescue by Narada or soon after the baby was born, and demanded to see them and asked that they should be returned to him at once. What should Narada do? Should he give them up and forego all the generous plans he had already set on foot for the supreme welfare of their soul and body? Is that angry man of elemental passions and crude savage nations about woman's honour and duty to be allowed to meet his wife? What if that man of blood killed her on the spot to vent his spite or maimed her horribly to relieve his excited feelings, or dragged her away mercilessly by the hair and thrown her into a dungeon or driven her by ill-treatment to suicide?

"Cases are not unknown", says Judge Paul Appasami in his book, "where if a convert fell into the hands of his people he is kept in confinement for months, sometimes for years, in the hope that he may revert to his original faith. Sometimes such a person disappears altogether."

"When their clamour had reached its height, the police arrived," narrates an eminent Missionary lady in her account of a girl's conversion," and the people retreated with cries of vengeance, shouting that if they had the convert in their power they would cut her in pieces," and among them "she recognised two athletes who by their wonderful strength threw people up into the air and then carried them away, and if they had done this to her she would have been entirely lost to us."

Luckily the Queen Lilavati Devi was confident of her husband's chivalrous love and regard for her and was not at all nervous to go back to his rightful guardianship with her son. And, as Prahlada explained later to some of his classmates in his father's city school, the teaching of Narada entered her feminine ears so late in life that it could secure no firm footing in her heart and therefore she had no conscientious scruples to return to her husband's home and protection and the boy himself did not know what kind of home it was and what trials awaited him. But suppose the lady had become unnerved or felt a revulsion at her husband's call, and had flung herself with her boy at Narada's feet and implored him by all that he held sacred not to abandon them to the tender mercies of that passion-ridden and God-forsaken man and drive them back to those hateful home surroundings where they would not be free to worship the God whom they had been taught in the Ashrama to love and adore. And suppose also that she wound up her passionate appeal for protection by assuring him most earnestly that death either by violence or by poison would be their lot on account of their changed faith if they were forced to return to their ancestral home. What should a compassionate and conscientious servant of God do under such trying circumstances? How can he refuse to protect his converts and save their souls? Yet how is he to make others believe that the alleged unwillingness of the mother and child to go home was voluntary and not of his own making induced by drink or drugs or an evil spell or by coercion and under influence or other illegitimate means? How is he to protect himself from false charges of Abduction, kidnapping and wrongful confinement? How is he to appease the laws of Habeas Corpus, Conjugal Rights, Minority and Guardianship? And, above all, how is he to save himself from the direct personal violence and scandalising tongues of the lawless husband and his devilish clan? Beyond declaring sententiously that "according to the strict theory of the law there is nothing to prevent a minor or major from changing his faith by renouncing the creed of his forefathers and adopting a new form of religion," even Judge Paul Appasami is practically helpless to give any immediate relief in the matter. In such circumstances, the simple honest preacher of God might very well exclaim in his grievous perplexity: "Happy indeed is the man (or woman) who is not a Matamari!"

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

X. THE SICK.

(BY DR. CLIFFORD MANSCHARDT, PH.D.).

There are three ways in which men may meet illness. One man will surrender to it. Another man will endure it. A third man will conquer it. The first man is afraid of sickness. At the first symptoms of pain he is in a funk. He worries, frets, complains, and makes life generally disagreeable for himself and for his family. Perhaps under normal circumstances a collected man of affairs, he now presents the inglorious spectacle of a man in collapse. He is attacked, defeated, and completely routed from the field. The experience of pain has become his master. The second sufferer endures his illness. He shuts his eyes, grits his teeth, clenches his hands, and carries on by the sheer force of his own determined will. Uncomplaining, he wins the respect of all who watch his struggle. He bears his pain, but he does not rise above it. The third person, though suffering pain equally as grievous, changes the whole atmosphere by the contagion of his personality. Through his quiet confidence and serenity of spirit he wins men's admiration, but better still he wins their love. By his endurance he has "possessed his soul", and in possessing his own soul he has captivated the hearts of others.

The power of mind over matter is a fact that cannot be over-emphasized as we deal with the problem of sickness. There is a definite connection between a healthy mind and a healthy body. More diseases than the most of us have any awareness are the product of our own desires. As every psychiatrist knows, "disease symptoms are in many cases simply substitutes for strong suppressed emotions". Whether the patient recognises it or no his disease is often "his own curiously indirect way of gratifying a strong emotion which cannot be gratified directly". The problem is one that cannot be dealt with in a paragraph, but quite certain it is that good thoughts are a powerful influence in the direction of good health. The advice of an ancient writer to his friends to think only on those things that are true, honest, just, pure, lovely, and of good report is excellent preventative medicine for to-day.

The modern man no longer looks upon pain as a chastisement of the gods, but as a challenge to remove its causes. Diseases regarded by our fathers as incurable have to-day almost been wiped out, and each year new triumphs are being added to the noble record of the men of science. But despite all our advance the experience of sickness still remains a trying one, and there are still periods when the patient is mentally in a deep pit, needing the help of a sympathetic friend. To see a face from the outside, to experience a hearty greeting, to have one's thoughts turned away from one's self, to feel that some one really cares, cannot but fill the patient with new life and inspire him with new cheer. It is such courtesies as these that we are inclined to neglect, but it is just such courtesies that made life worth the living. Members one of another we share each other's weaknesses, and enrich our common life through suffering.

MAHATMA GANDHI'S SPEECH.

[Mahatma Gandhi was arrested by the Calcutta Police on Monday the 4th. After a monster meeting at the Shradhanand Park Mahatma Gandhi and other leaders intended to make a bonfire of foreign cloth. The police informed the leaders that a fire in a public place within reasonable distance of residential houses could not be allowed, and Mahatma Gandhi informed the police that he took all responsibility for disobeying the order. Fire was applied to a huge heap of foreign cloth whereupon the police tried to stamp out the fire and came in conflict with the people assembled there. Mahatma and others left the Park, and the crowd dispersed late at night. Mahatma Gandhi was arrested and was afterwards released on bail. Before applying the torch to the pile of cloth Mahatmaji made a speech the full text of which is given below.]

Mr. Gandhi first addressed the meeting in Hindi; after which he spoke in English. He emphasised that the boycott of foreign cloth in terms of Khadi was the only effective weapon if they were to wake up on January 1, next as Independence-wallas, if need be: "I want you to be true to yourself. Do not deceive yourself and the country. You will count no cost too great against what you will have to pay for vindicating the honour and liberty of your country.

"I have seen the notice served upon the Secretary of the Bengal Congress Committee, which proceeded after this style; that at this meeting no burning of foreign cloth should take place, because it is an offence under the Police Act or regulation, whatever the thing might be called. The section seems to run somewhat after this fashion; 'that no burning of straw or such other thing should take place in or near a public street or thoroughfare.' I have been taxing my mind as to whether to call this place a thoroughfare or a Park. Two lawyers have put their heads together—I do not count myself a lawyer, I am disbarred—but two lawyers not disbarred have advised me that by no stretch of language could this park be called a thoroughfare. They drew my attention to another section in the Act where public streets, public thoroughfares or places of public resort are mentioned. In this section the place of public resort is specifically omitted. I can well understand this park being a place of public resort. In these circumstances what are we to do?

NOT A CIVIL RESISTER.

"I accept this notice as served upon my humble self. I do not want to avoid the consequence of this law. But to-day I do not appear before you as a civil breaker of the law I do not appear before you as a civil resister, I do not want at this moment to commit a breach of any regulation. I am quite capable of any breaking all the regulations that may not hurt moral sense, but that time is not yet for me. The time may come to-morrow but it is not to night.

"But I have got to discharge a public duty in front of me and interpreting this law as I do, or as I am advised to interpret, I venture, to submit that this notice has no effect on me, assuming and agreeing that the service of this notice upon the Secretary is equally a service upon me. If I was taken to a court of law I make this definite promise that I shall not raise this issue that the notice was not served on me. But having got this notice on me, I feel that I must not accept this notice as if it is really the true law even in the terms of the Police Act. I claim this is not a public thoroughfare. I claim also that I am not doing anything which is dangerous. The Working Committee of the Congress had got a burden to discharge. I am a member of that Committee and the Chairman of the Boycott Committee; and I feel I shall be running away from my duty if I shirk this issue and avoid a prosecution against me. If I am allowed to go away I shall be going away to Burma to-morrow, but I shall report myself on the 25th or the 26th of this month to undergo or stand a prosecution against myself for having undertaken to burn these clothes in this park, which, I claim is not a public thoroughfare."

TIME NOT YET FOR CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE.

Continuing Gandhiji said: The act of burning will be by me, and it will be on my own sole responsibility and you will be only witnessing it. But you are not being harmed by being a witness, I wish that you were harmed; but as to day the campaign is not one of civil resistance but is one of conducting a fierce boycott of foreign cloth, remaining so long as it is possible within the four corners of the law. I do not want to day to be guilty consciously or unconsciously, of any breach of the law of this land, however irksome that law may be. You will, if you only care to obey the directions of the Working Committee, get an opportunity when the proper time comes to break certain laws or non-moral laws of the country. But as I have said that time is not yet and I do not want to anticipate that time. If the Government will play the game, if the public will play the game I promise that we shall be able to settle our business with the Government without the public having to resort to Civil Disobedience or having even to resort to a no-tax campaign, which is also a part of Civil Disobedience.

"Believe me I shall strain my every nerve to avoid precipitating such an issue. Speaking with a full sense of the responsibility on my shoulders, I know the tremendous consequences of Civil Disobedience and no-tax campaign in a vast country like this, which has undisciplined masses. But a man who is mad after freedom, a man who is hungering for freedom—and the real hunger for freedom is infinitely more painful than the hunger for mere bread and believe me I am hungering for freedom—has got to take tremendous risks and take everything that he has in order to gain that precious freedom.

NO HEROIC MEASURE NEEDED.

"It is because I am hungering for freedom, that though I am on the threshold of death, I want to see Swaraj coming to us while I have still breath in me. Therefore I want to take every precaution. I therefore shall plead guilty. I shall plead with the Government; I shall ask them to come to their senses and do the right thing. And if you will only help me, please God, I shall be able to avoid the issue and still find the dawn of freedom breaking upon us before the 31st December is finished. If you will be truthful, if you will carry out honestly, faithfully and completely the programme that will be set before you from time to time I promise that no heroic measure will be necessary to be taken on your part.

"Is this boycott of foreign cloth a heroic measure? Is the habitual wearing of khaddar on the part of the rich and the poor an heroic act? If you think it is so I can tell you that you do not know what an heroic act is. Heroic acts are made of sterner stuff. Do not run away with the idea that the programme before you is a heroic one. These are the easy things placed before you for the simple reason that you are millions against a hundred thousand men.

"If you and I were not under a spell of hypnotism, if you and I were not under the spell of that mighty force of inertia, we would have shaken ourselves from this terror, this want of self-confidence and inability to breathe the air of freedom which is ours to breathe. If we were not under this hypnotic spell we would not have to go through these preliminary things that are before us.

"Try and do these things during this year and then come to me and ask me where is Swaraj. You will not need to come to me. You will find it within your grasp. The millions of the masses will smile upon you. They will bless you for making common cause with them by understanding their real grievances. Therefore, I ask you to do this."

MR. GANDHI TAKES UP THE RESPONSIBILITY.

Concluding Gandhiji said: "I have faith in you. This notice from the Commissioner of Police has enabled me to make my appeal to the authorities. I am here to take the risk. I propose to burn the clothes that have been handed to me, and want you before I perform the sacred ceremony to throw all your clothes at me and on the platform.

"Do not make any noise. No violence or force is permissible in this campaign so long as you will have me. I swear by non-violence. It is my final creed. I can see no other way open to my country to regain its freedom. So long as you choose to have me in this campaign in spite of my creed, so long do I plead with you to observe the laws of non-violence and you will find that you will have done well.

"The responsibility for this act of burning is entirely upon my shoulders. May God give you strength and wisdom to carry on to the final issue this boycott of foreign cloth, not merely of British cloth. Let that confusion be dispelled from your minds. As regards the mills the mills will take care of themselves if you take care of Khadi. Otherwise the mills will be a halter round your neck."

LIGHTING THE BONFIRE.

Then Mr. Gandhi lighted the first stick, and after the bonfire had proceeded for a time, some of the constables with regulation lathis pushed their way and extinguished the fire. Then followed a confusion in the course of which brick-bats and lathis were used as the result of which three police constables, three sergeants and five among the audience were more or less wounded. Some press representatives also had their share. After the major portion of the crowd had dispersed the mounted police were stationed at the place.

PROHIBITION IN AMERICA.

Five public meetings were addressed by Mr. Johnson before he left Bombay for Limbdi on Wednesday night. A crushing reply to the official protagonists of the liquor trade, who instanced America to prove the failure of prohibition, was given by Mr. "Pussyfoot" Johnson, the world's greatest prohibitionist, in his first lecture at the Blavatsky Hall on Sunday evening.

Mr. K. Natarajan, who was in the chair, made a strong plea for prohibition in India and, incidentally, criticised those members of the local Council who had defended drink on very specious grounds.

Mr. Natarajan said that "Pussyfoot" had come to Bombay, at a psychological moment when the prohibition fight was going on in the Legislative Council. They were thankful to him for his visit, for it was in no small degree due to that event that they were able to inflict a complete and decisive defeat on the Government on the prohibition issue. It could be said with justification that his visit had the effect of rallying the divided forces in the Council on the temperance side and giving a decisive verdict in favour of prohibition. At the same time he wished to express his admiration for Mr. Noor Mahomed (the Sind Member) for the bold and courageous speech he made in the advocacy of prohibition. Mr. Noor Mahomed's utterance on that occasion, the President declared, would be recorded in golden letters in the history of India. "But as a Hindu," he said warming up, "I am ashamed to say that there was a Hindu gentleman and the only Indian member, who actually defended the liquor trade on the ground that the Hindu religion did not prohibit it. I am sure throughout the country there will be a general repudiation of this exhibition of abject subservience to the officials."

The Chairman next reminded the audience how, in the course of the debate in the Legislative Council, America came in for a good deal of abuse. Those who supported prohibition cited America as an example and those who opposed it made use of the strong argument that an American expert had pronounced that an ounce of alcohol was equal to an ounce of butter.

Another gentleman said that American tourists came to India in such large numbers in order to get drinks, because they could not get it in their own country and a third advocate of the Government liquor trade described every American as a walking distillery. Mr. Johnson at any rate was not a walking distillery. They had a man direct from America who would tell them exactly what was the situation in America and how far prohibition was a success or failure in that country.

MR. JOHNSON'S LECTURE.

Mr. "Pussyfoot" Johnson said that he was happy to visit India for two reasons, firstly, because he had been here before and liked the people and, secondly, because the great body of the Indian people on account of their religion were against drink. They in America had to struggle for 550 years to get the people to the oriental standard in regard to drink and now they felt, because they had adopted the Indian principle, they could look them in the face without an apology or excuse.

In the whole history of the world they had numerous records of the struggle of civilisation to get rid of superstitious ideas. In the very ancient times they read of people being skinned alive and Christian religion being spread by burning people who disagreed from it. Later they read of the high-ways of the sea being infested by pirates. Eventually people got tired of piracy and they stopped it by enacting and enforcing prohibitory laws. Then there was another great social wrong—human slavery. For thousands of years slave dealers bought and sold human beings just as they bought and sold cattle and sheep. They defended the practice in the name of human liberty, holding that a man had the rights to own a slave provided he could get one. Finally the conscience of the world was roused against that abomination and they stopped it again by enacting and enforcing laws prohibiting slavery.

They were now up against another great social wrong—the drink traffic. For thousands of years men had made it a business of debauching their fellowmen by poisoning them with alcoholic liquors and for thousands of years the world had suffered under that wrong. So far as America was concerned they had put a stop to that wrong by prohibitive laws exactly in the same way as piracy on the high seas and slavery were put an end to.

WORKING OF PROHIBITION LAW.

The lecturer then referred to the early attempts made to get rid of the evils of drinking without getting rid of the drink itself, and pointed out how they had all failed. He said that for over 4,000 years good men, wise men, philosophers, scientists, school-teachers and statesmen were trying to devise a scheme, whereby they could eliminate the evils of drink without doing away with the drink. Failure of these attempts was long enough for America to come to the conclusion that it was time to think of some other way of dealing with the evil. And they hit upon the idea that it would be a good scheme to get rid of the evils of drink by getting rid of the drink. That idea had now spread in every nook and corner of the world and it was still spreading and gaining ground. It was spreading because the havoc wrought by drink was so terrible everywhere. Wherever there was drink there they saw suffering and misery growing out of it. It did not matter who sold the liquor, whether it was regulated by the State or not, it was the stuff that brought trouble. That fact had been recognised all over the world and good people were organising themselves to get rid of that hideous thing because of the suffering it brought.

"Who is it that suffers on account of drink?" he asked. "It is not the man who drinks, but his wife and children, his family. Women who do not drink suffer on account of it. Children who do not drink have to go hungry, are not able to go to schools because of the drink. And in order that some people might make money and the Government might get some revenue this suffering of innocent women and children is allowed to go on. In America we came to the conclusion that this is wrong and inhuman and decided that in future the expenses of the Government should be met by clean honest money and not out of the suffering and misery of women and children."

Continuing, Mr. Johnson said that they did not jump to the idea of prohibition all of a sudden. They experimented and tried for a considerable time the licensing system and it failed. Then the cry for prohibition started and it spread from village to village, from town to town. For seventy years that movement had gone on and they had achieved very good results. Prohibition had become the fundamental law of the land; it had come to stay and it was going to stay for ever. In a few years of its introduction they had reduced the consumption of liquor by 90 per cent. There still remained a 10 per cent. which he hoped would be wiped out very soon.

The liquor dealers were finding fault with America and crying about that prohibition had failed there because 90 per cent. of their traffic was gone. They were angry with America because so much of their graft had been taken away. At the same time the benefit of prohibition was apparent all through America. They had now three times as many students in colleges, several times as much money in the banks as ever before. They were building houses all over the country on a scale unprecedented for over 30 years. The liquor dealers did not like all that, because the money that was being spent on them now used to go into their pockets. So the exasperated and chagrined liquor dealers were running about and saying that America was tired of prohibition and that she was trying to get rid of it,

CONGRESS ELECTION THE BEST TEST.

The best reply to those people was that America was not keeping up prohibition by a majority of one. Their Congress was elected every two years and a Congress election was the best instrument to decide whether they were for a wet or dry policy. Since the enactment of the prohibition laws they had five Congress elections in America. During all these five elections there were some people who went about crying against prohibition and the electors responded to them by voting each time a drier Congress than before. In the Congress they had five pestiferous members who were always in the habit of protesting against the prohibition laws. At the last election on November 6 they had to face their constituents at the general election and they were each one of them elected to stay at home and five dry men were elected in their place. (Laughter.) He did not think there were a dozen members in the Congress who were what might be called "wet." Even if there were, they were keeping quiet for they knew that any man who played double on that question would be thrown into the gutter at the next election and for the rest of his life would have to remain a private citizen. Then again, if an officer said he could not enforce the prohibition laws he would be immediately dismissed and another man who could enforce the laws put in his place.

The speaker next referred to the last presidential election in America and he described its result as the final and decisive verdict of the country in favour of prohibition. President Hoover's victory over his rival Governor Smith (who was a wet) with a majority of over 6 million votes was the answer to all the loose talk about America being tired of prohibition etc. "I tell you" he added, "that so far as America is concerned this business is over. We are dry and we are going to be dry."

In conclusion, Mr. Johnson said that the result they had attained were by no means perfect. They had still many difficulties in enforcing prohibition, but they were not so numerous as they had to face in enforcing regulation. In fact there were fewer violations of the prohibition law compared with the violations of the regulation laws.

PRESIDENT'S CONCLUDING REMARKS.

The president in his concluding remarks thanked Mr. 'Pussyfoot' Johnson for his interesting speech. He said after hearing the world's greatest prohibitionist they would go home with greater determination to fight prohibition in India. For India prohibition was a matter of life and death. They were not a rich people nor a great political people nor a military nation. All the forces of Imperialism and exploitation were arraigned against them. Their only asset were the righteousness of their cause and the unalcoholised brains of the people. Once the drink got hold of the people and poisoned them, they would go the same way as the Red Indians in America and the Negroes in Africa did. India would be wiped out as a civilised nation from the face of the world.

The sub-conscious motive of those who defended the drink on the ground that it had a good value was to strengthen the foreigners' hold on the country politically and commercially. He was glad to say that the Christian community in India and the missionaries had realised the importance of prohibition to India and a strong memorandum had been submitted to the Simon Commission urging the adoption of prohibition by his friend the Rev. J. F. Edwards. He was also glad that the Indian National Congress also had realised the vital nature of the problem and had given the first place to it in its programme. In conclusion, he declared that India would stand side by side with America in the fight for prohibition.

After a vote of thanks to the chair the meeting terminated.

HINDU WOMEN'S RIGHTS OF INHERITANCE.

(BY MR. M. R. JAYAKAR, M. L. A.)

The amendment introduces a very controversial matter. The amendment says that this Bill will not apply to cases where the male owner has died prior to the passing of this Bill. That is the amendment paraphrased in plain English. It means this. Let us suppose that a man dies a year before this Act comes into force leaving a widow who is about 20 years of age—I am taking a hypothetical case—and that widow is now in possession of the property. In spite of the short age limit in India, let us say the widow lives for another 25 years and 25 years after this Act passes, the widow dies. The succession in that case opens 25 years after this Bill passes. The amendment says that in such a case, although the Act is passed to-day, and the succession opens 25 years later, the old inequitable law should prevail, by reason of the simple fact that her husband, the male heir, died before the passing of this Act. I want Members to bear in mind the meaning of the expression "succession opens" which has a distinct meaning in law; it means the date on which the heirs to the male owner, consequent on the death of the widow, are to be determined. That is in law the material date, and although that date comes 25 years after the passing of this Act—the amendment says the case will not be governed by this Act but by the old order of things, i.e., according to the law which ceased to exist 25 years ago. I submit, that apart from any other argument against it, the amendment will certainly have the effect of hanging up the liberal provisions of this Bill. If we believe that the provisions of this Bill are wholesome, what is the reason for not making them applicable to a case where the succession opens after the Act has come into force? I can understand the anxiety of the conservative elements in this House—among whom I may even include myself—that we should not make this reforming Bill applicable to vested rights, i.e., those which are vested either in interest or possession, or those even which are pending in suits in a Court of Law. I agree that this Bill, to use lawyers' language again, should not have the effect of divesting titles already vested. I can understand that as a lawyer. I recognise the desirability of doing nothing of a revolutionary character which will have the effect of divesting titles. Supposing e.g., a reversionary heir has already got hold of property excluded by this Act. He should not be called upon to divest himself of it. I can understand that and if this Bill had the effect of doing that I should certainly have opposed such an operation. But the Bill does nothing of the kind. It should be observed, further, that this Bill has proceeded from a very conservative House where these considerations of caution and prudence were present to the mind of Members. The Bill has provided ample safeguards. It only applies where a man has not left a will—that is a very wise limitation in the Bill. Again it does not touch family property, which comes under a provision of its own. The Bill only applies to the separate property of which a man dies intestate; it does not touch any other property at all. It also excludes customary rights. In such cases of limited application I cannot see any reason why the operation of this Bill should be postponed, on the simple ground that the propositus died some year ago.

The argument was advanced, that we should have regard for the feelings of the dead. That was a very strong plea urged by my friend Mr. Aney. Well, it is a very risky doctrine to proceed upon where the precious rights of the living are involved. First of all, we can never know the true intentions of the deceased. But assuming that we did know, then, as I said a few minutes ago, it is impossible to say what he would have done if he had known the true law. There is a constant caveat which Courts of Law have to bear in mind and a fortiori a House of a non-legal character like this, that it is unsafe to embark on enquiries into the intentions of a deceased individual. One has no means to find them out. Therefore, I say that all we can do is to provide for a limited operation of the principle of the Bill, in so far as it should affect vested interests, vested either in possession or in interest.

Mr. Aney says "I am not speaking of reversioners at all; I am speaking of heirs who are not reversioners." May I remind him once more of his law, that excepting the son, the grandson and the great grandson in the male line, no other male heir intervenes except as reversioner, because the moment these three relations are exhausted, biz., the son, grandson or great grandson, the widow will come in, and after her the reversioners. I do not know what particular case of relationship Mr. Aney had in view when he advanced his argument. I asked for a specific case, but he did not give one.

The possible male heirs before the widow, are sons' grandsons and the great grandsons. This Bill does not apply to them at all because the assumption of the Bill is that there is no male progeny. The Bill is intended to touch only those male heirs who come after the widow. Therefore my friend, possibly in his zeal against social reform, forgot his law. There is no male heir whom you can include in this Bill except reversioners.

Now what is the reversioner's interest? Even a tyro in law will tell us that it is a purely expectant or contingent interest. It is not in law a vested interest, which can ask for our protection. As an authority for this view, I will quote from the ex-Law Member Mr. Mulla's new book, page 164, and I am sure the new Law Member will agree with him. "The interest of a reversioner is an interest expectant on the death of a limited heir. It is not a vested interest."

I need not go into other arguments. We are asked, on the grounds of the supposed intentions of the dead and the expectant interests of the Reversioners to postpone the near relations, the kith and kin, who would possibly be surrounding the deceased on his death bed,—the son's daughter, the daughter's daughter, sister and sister's son. These are some of the relations with whom the man would be in his dying moments. They would possibly soothe and nourish him on his death bed. These relations are to be postponed and that too for the supposed intentions of the deceased man, which we cannot ascertain, or for some supposed justice to contingent interests in favour of a man who may not be alive when the widow dies, and of whose existence possibly the owner was not aware, who possibly did not exist at the time when he died and came into existence during the widow's life-time—I ask Members whether it is sound to postpone the operation of this principle for the sake of a man whose right, in the words of Mr. Sinha, the mover of the amendment, is only that of one "who lives in the hope and expectation of succeeding if he outlives the widow". I am quoting his words. That is an interest which the law does not recognise. If its owner went out into the market to deal with it, section 6 of the Transfer of Property Act—as the Law Member will agree with me—says that it is a pure spes successionis—a mere chance of succeeding, which he cannot barter away or sell, cannot pledge, or in any way deal with. It is purely an expectant interest which has no existence in law. For such vague interests we are asked to ignore the interest of those in whose hands possibly the man dies.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Congratulating Hoover:—A meeting of the citizens of Bombay passed the following resolution:—"That this public meeting of the Citizens of Bombay held under the auspices of the Bombay Temperance Council this day, the 5th of March 1929, to hear an address from Mr. 'Passyfoot' Johnson, heartily congratulates you on your election and accession to the Presidentship of the United States of America and wishes you a successful career in the cause of Prohibition, thus giving an impetus to the movement for the abolition of the liquor traffic throughout the world."

Prof. D. K. Karve:—Prof. D. K. Karve, the founder of the Indian Women's University is shortly leaving for England and the Continent, to attend the International Educational Conference, and to study the systems of women's education prevailing in some countries in Europe.

Awakening of Sindhi Woman:—For four successive days crowded and enthusiastic ladies' meetings were held recently in Shikarpur (Sind.). These meetings attended by ladies in their thousands were organised by Devi Damyanti, the pioneer of the women's education in Shikarpur. The first two days' meetings were presided over by Mrs. Hood (the Collector's wife) and Mrs. Hudson (the wife of the Commissioner in Sind.) The last two days' meeting were presided over by Sadhu T. L. Vaswani. Mrs. Hood, Mrs. Hudson and Sadhu Vaswani spoke highly of Damyanti Devi and her school which is being sustained at great sacrifice. Five speeches were delivered by women and their dramas of "Sati" and "Mirabai" evoked enthusiastic admiration.

Mr. Brander's Resignation:—Mr. J. B. Brander, I. O. S. who replying to the criticisms levelled against the excise policy of the Government spoke against prohibition, has resigned his office of member of the Bombay Legislative Council.

Tagore's Mission:—Dr. Rabindranath Tagore arrived at Bombay last week and left for Canada via Japan by the Naldora. He declined to be interviewed. The Rev. Mr. Tucker, an American professor at Shantiniketan, who is accompanying the poet, said that Dr. Tagore was proceeding on the invitation of the National Council of Education in Canada. He will address delegates attending the National Council from all parts of the world on 'The Philosophy of Leisure'. Dr. Tagore proceeds to Los Angeles afterwards, where he will lecture for six weeks to university students on Indian philosophy, literature and arts. Health permitting, he will proceed to Europe to deliver the Hibbert lectures at Oxford University and then visit France and Hungary. The professor added that Dr. Tagore was going to Canada as the unofficial ambassador of India to represent eastern culture and civilization and promote international goodwill.

NOTES.

The Hindu Mahasabha:—So long as mankind is divided into religious communities, communal movements will have a place and an important place among human activities. Protestant Christians of various denominations, Roman Catholics, Jews and others have their own communal educational and social activities in all parts of the world. We think, therefore, organisations like the Hindu Mahasabha, the Moslem League, the Parsee Rajkiya Sabha, the Indian Christian Conference and the Anglo-Indian Association, may all play a useful and beneficial part in the national life. But on one condition. They must all recognise that they are parts of one great whole and that every one of their activities should be so designed as to help and not to hinder the well-being of the whole. Perhaps, a measure of conflict at the early stages of these movements is inevitable, as the communities concerned seek to adjust their relations to one another. But the leaders must always bear in mind that this stage should not be unduly prolonged, lest the integrity of the whole be irretrievably injured. That each of these movements is instrumental in creating within itself a larger solidarity than there has been up till now, is evident from the fact that inter-sectional and inter-communal distinctions within themselves are becoming gradually eliminated. The Hindu Mahasabha, for example, has defined a Hindu as including all followers of any religion of Indian origin, thus bringing into the fold not only Hindus but also Jains, Sikhs, Arya Samajists, Brahmo Samajists and Buddhists. Even Parsees have been invited to participate in the proceedings of the Sabha, in recognition, no doubt, of the affinities between the Vedic and the Avestaic religions. At the All-India Mahasabha to be held in Surat in a few days, Mr. Ramananda Chatterji, the distinguished Editor of the Modern Review, a staunch Brahmo Samaj leader, has been invited to preside. Mr. Ramanand Chatterji's views on Hindu social and religious reform are of the most advanced character, though fundamentally in keeping with the spirit of the Upanishada and the Gita, and the fact that the members of the Hindu Sabha have by a majority chosen him to guide their deliberations at the next session, is a proof, if proof were needed, of the broadening influence of the movement on Hindu mentality.

Mahatma Gandhi in Burma:—Indians in Burma were in ancient times welcomed and honoured as religious preceptors, and so long as the country was independent they were not regarded as undesirable aliens. The British conquest of Burma was largely compassed with Indian troops and since the annexation large numbers of Indians, moneylenders, coolies and officials, have entered the country. They have naturally not been popular. Of late, another factor has entered into the Burmese attitude towards them. The British officials, from the governor downwards, have openly favoured the separation of Burma from India as being a distinct ethnic and economic entity. This while it has not tended to increase the Indians' popularity with the Burmese, has for the time being made the British seem to be their protectors from Indian exploiters. Mahatma Gandhi's visit to Burma at this juncture has had a remarkable effect. At first, Mahatmaji seems to have been viewed with the general distrust of Indians common among the Burmese, but as his aims and objects became clear, the Burmese, men and women, have cast off their suspicion, and have gathered to welcome him everywhere during his tour. His passionate faith in non-violence, his constant and earnest concern for the poor, his purity and simplicity of life, have won their hearts, and his avowal that he drew his inspiration from Gautama Buddha has made the Burmese feel as if he was one of their own great teachers. Mahatmaji advised Indians in Burma to identify themselves with and work for the Burmese. This is the only justification for a people of one land claiming the hospitality of another. Mahatma Gandhi declared himself repeatedly as having fallen in love with the Burmese people, their simple and graceful ways, and particularly the freedom enjoyed by their women, which, he said, was greater than anywhere else in the world. Whether Burma should remain politically a part of India is entirely a matter for the Burmese to decide, but culturally the ancient ties between the two countries can never be broken, and it will ever be the privilege of India to help in all ways and at all times the progress and security of Burma and her people.

Removal of Untouchability:—A new method of attacking the problem of untouchability with a view to eradicate this evil has been inaugurated in Poona, the stronghold of orthodoxy and conservatism. The Poona correspondent of the Times of India writes:—"In the teeth of opposition from Government officials and some of the wealthiest classes in Poona, the City Municipality is introducing a scheme, declared to be unique in the Presidency whereby untouchables will be housed alongside Brahmins and other high caste Hindus. A special colony is now in course of construction in one of the most picturesque localities near the river front, and in less than two months there will be approximately 80 families living there, in close proximity to the Government servants' Colony. It is the aim of the city to improve the conditions of 5000 members of the depressed classes so that in future all citizens, irrespective of caste, will have equal opportunities of enjoying the normal amenities of life." The campaign against untouchability will be effective if carried on by self-governing bodies like the municipalities and local boards and it is futile to expect any help from the Government who have, in all vital matters affecting the people, ranged themselves on the side of the opposition. Further interesting details of the scheme and how the opposition was overcome are given below:—"It is realized that the scheme is somewhat in the nature of an experiment, but the Councillors believe that the results will justify themselves. The opposition to the establishment of the colony in the locality selected has come largely from members of the wealthier classes, who have bitterly resented the proposal that untouchables should be compelled to live in such close contact with themselves. Originally there were some Councillors who were somewhat dubious as to the wisdom of the scheme but their opposition was stilled when it was pointed out that the responsibility for the sanitary conditions of the colony would be shouldered by the Co-operative Housing Society, which has been registered under the Co-operative Societies Act. In the colony the families will be provided with modern septic tanks and lavatories though these will be for the joint use of all, as none will be installed in the individual huts. The colony is, being built on three acres of land which have been acquired." The results of the experiment will be watched with much interest.

Opposition to Unequal Marriages:—An Associated Press message from Ahmedabad gives an interesting piece of news; "A Jain named Purshottamdas Ratanchand, a share broker, aged about fifty was to marry a young girl aged fifteen years of his caste yesterday. A public meeting of Jains was held last evening when a resolution was passed condemning the marriage and taking steps for preventing the marriage. An application was made at the District Court to grant an 'ad interim' injunction for preventing the marriage. The court granted the injunction and ordered the girl to be produced on the 14th March in court. The girl was not produced before the Court on that day and her parents asked for an adjournment of the case till Monday on the ground that they were not able to prepare a reply as thousands of men had collected near their house last evening and harassed them. They were not also able to produce the girl in Court owing to the mischievous behaviour of the opponents. They were, however, willing to produce the girl either in the Chamber or at the bungalow of the District Judge if he ordered proper arrangements to be made for her protection." The application to the court was made by a Jain social reform organisation called the Young Jain Bania Osva Club. Further reports in the local newspapers show that the young reformers, fearing lest the marriage ceremony be performed in spite of the Courts order, surrounded the houses of both parties all through the night. The bride's party contended that the parents' consent having been obtained the application could not be entertained whilst the petitioners argue that the bride has been coerced and that her consent has been obtained through undue influence. The case is still proceeding and the Court's decision will be awaited with interest by all reformers. The incident is, however, significant in as much as it shows the force of public opinion against unequal marriages even in such an orthodox community as the Jains and the fact that it should happen in Ahmedabad which is the stronghold of the Jains adds to its importance.

An Urgent Need:—Mr. S. K. Sen, Provisional Joint Secretary, Indian Section Ram Mohan Roy Memorial Committee, has done a distinct service to the Indian public by drawing its attention to the dilapidated condition of the revered Raja's mausoleum and the immediate need of funds for its repair and preservation. The mausoleum was built over the Raja's grave at Arnos Vale Bristol, by the late Prince Dwarkanath Tagore. Steps have already been taken to prevent the structure from crumbling to pieces by the London Committee of the Memorial Fund and to complete the repairs a sum of 300 to 400 pounds is urgently needed. We trust the appeal will meet with a ready and spontaneous response as the Raja's memory is held in sacred veneration all over India. Modern India owes what it is at the present day to the inspiration, guidance and pioneer efforts of the great Raja in the political, social and religious fields. Our patriotism no less than our gratitude should compel us to see that the monument does not suffer from neglect.

The Legal Aid Society:—We publish elsewhere an appeal on behalf of the Legal Aid Society of Bombay. The Report of the Society for the year 1928 has just been published. During the year 91 applications from all the communities were received 83 of which were on the civil side and legal aid was given in 72 of these cases. Out of these 22 were applications for recovering wages or obtaining compensation from employers. The rest were to enable the applicants to defend suits filed against them, to file appeals, to recover debts, to obtain maintenance from husbands and so on. The list of cases appended to the Report gives an idea of the service rendered by the Society. We understand from the Report that one of the achievements of the Society has been the inauguration of a similar Society in Calcutta. The importance of the work done by the Society in the sphere of social service was recognised in April 1928 when it was invited to send delegates to the Bombay Social Service Conference and a resolution was passed unanimously approving of the aims and objects of the Society and appealing to the public to give their support to it in all possible ways. We congratulate the Society on the work it has already achieved in so short a time and we trust that public response will be sufficient to enable it to extend its activities along the lines indicated in the "Appeal".

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, MARCH 16, 1929.

THE PROTEST AGAINST CASTE.

In that encyclopædia of Hindu culture and civilization, the Mahabharata, there is an interesting disquisition which shows, among other things, that the protest against the system of hereditary castes had been raised even at the remote period of the fateful war between the Kauravas and Pandavas. In the Vedic period men followed whatever avocations they chose and the only distinction of classes was between Aryas and non-Aryas, those who followed the cult of fire-worship, and those who followed other rites. By the time of the Mahabharata, the hereditary caste system had evidently been long in vogue, and had already begun to be felt as an evil. Yudhishtira says that a Sudra is not a Sudra by birth alone, nor a Brahman a Brahman by birth alone. His argument in support of this opinion is curious. "In human society," he says, "it is difficult to ascertain one's caste, because of promiscuous intercourse among the four orders. Men belonging to all the orders begot offspring upon women of all the orders. And to this the Rishis have borne testimony, by using at the beginning of a sacrifice such expressions as,—of what caste so ever we may be, we celebrate the sacrifice. Therefore, those that are wise have asserted that character is the chief requisite, and needful. Whosoever now conforms to the rules of pure and virtuous conduct, him I have, erenow, designated as a Brahman." (Pratap Chander Roy's Translation Vol. II p. 531 and 532). The Bhagavat Gita without going into the reasons avers that man was created by God in four castes according to character and conduct. The hereditary caste nevertheless persisted in spite of these authoritative opinions and Arjun the friend and devotee of Sri Krishna, unless the introductory canto is an interpolation, expresses his horror at the mixing of castes that must follow a war in which thousands are killed on both sides. That the hereditary caste continued to flourish practically unaffected by these protests is shown by the fact that Gautama Buddha and numerous subsequent teachers of the Bhakti school, Nanak, Kabir, Chaitanya, Kapila and others in all parts of the country have from time to time pointed out its absurdity. But caste has still persisted not only among orthodox Hindus, but even among the protesting sects, and has even left its impress on the social life of Indian Mussalmans and Indian Christians who, according to their creeds, recognise no differences among themselves.

No student of social science will admit that an institution which has endured so long in spite of successive influential protests and which has influenced even non-Hindu communities, could have been invented by a single group of interested persons. The system must have met certain essential needs of social existence in this country to have struck such deep root in it. That it did so, is acknowledged by foreign observers who did not fail to note its serious disadvantages in modern India. Whatever the benefits of caste might have been, they are now much less in evidence than its disadvantages. Caste, indeed, has now become a great obstacle in the path of national unity. For this reason, we have from the first regarded the non-Brahman movement as a necessity of the times. Owing to the need of evoking popular support, the leaders had at the outset to present some tangible object as the immediate aim of the movement. This they readily found in the practical monopoly of the subordinate offices in the Government services by Brahmans in the Madras Presidency and in Maharashtra. They were not unregardful of the monopoly of the white Brahmans—the British—in the superior offices. But tactics required that the brown Brahman should be first dislodged from his monopolistic position, and that this could best be achieved by securing the assistance of the white Brahmans at the top. When the native Brahman had been swept out of his vantage ground, it will be time to deal with the white Brahman. For this purpose, even Mahomedans and Indian Christians were enrolled in the non-Brahmin party, and by the combined efforts of non-Brahmin Hindus, British officials and non-officials, Mussalmans, Indian Christians and even Parsis in the Karnatak districts, the Brahmanical monopoly has been effectively broken throughout Peninsular India. If the non-Brahman party had no further mission, it will have no reason for its continued existence, and there are signs to show that this stage is being reached. Wise and far-seeing non-Brahmin leaders, therefore, are trying to place the movement on a broader basis. The late Raja of Panagal in the course of a long conversation told this writer that he would take early steps to have this done. Unfortunately, his untimely death has deprived the party of his sagacious guidance. We are glad to see that younger men are taking up the task. The first Provincial Self-Respect Conference held at Chingleput was presided over by the Hon'ble Dr. Subbaroyan, Chief Minister of Madras. In his address he dwelt on the importance of cultivating self-respect in the social as much as in the political sphere, and in conclusion he suggested that the object of the Self-Respect League should be made comprehensive so as to include all persons whose religion is the service of humanity, irrespective of their caste or communal origin.

GONDAL ADMINISTRATION.

The financial statement of Gondal for the year 1925-26 presents a unique feature. The Kathiawad State is practically tax-free. There are no customs, export or import duties, no salt tax or entertainment tax. Not only is there no excise duty or a tax on gambling but actually Gondal incurs expenditure in preventing gambling and in enforcing a policy of prohibition of alcoholic drinks. The only source of revenue to which objection could be taken is opium which is received from the British Government and sold on their account. The Report informs us that here the State has adopted "the policy of maximum price and minimum consumption". The difficulties that beset a policy of "Prohibition" in this matter can be well appreciated when we read that opium is used in important social functions by the richer classes in the State. The liberal policy followed by the enlightened Thakore Saheb who is at the head of the State in educational matters has given an impetus to social reform. The educational policy of Gondal has been guided by the ideal of bringing education to the door of the villager. Women's education alone is compulsory and this is so, perhaps, on account of the prevalent belief that if the women of a community are educated the men will for very shame strain every nerve to attain at least the same standard. Strange as it is the scheme has not been unsuccessful. Every girl who matriculates gets a prize of Rs. 500 and every girl who graduates gets a prize of a thousand rupees. The education of the backward classes is progressing steadily but the State deplors that the backward classes have not realised the value of education. By an arrangement with the Ferguson College, Poona, Gondal students go through their college studies there. Provisions have also been made in Gondal for vocational education. Private schools have also been established by the public spirited.

All this, as has been pointed out above, has led to an advance in social reform and has given rise to the formation of societies for communal uplift. Cooperative ideals have also arisen among the cultivators. The purdah system is rapidly disappearing and the marriage age has risen to eleven or twelve. "Ill-matched marriages or bargain in marriage tolerated formerly have now become the butt of social criticism." The opposition to women's education has been converted to zeal for its furtherance. Better ideas of sanitation prevail and the public of Gondal are a happy and prosperous people. The Thakore Sahib of Gondal who has been to Europe for his education has assimilated much that is good in Western Civilization and he has justly earned for himself a place in the hearts of his subjects. But much though he has achieved, we are sure he would be the first to agree with us when we say that a good deal remains to be done. In the social field, it is proper that laws should take the place of public censure, and we trust that in social questions like the marriage age the State of Gondal will consolidate its position and secure the advantages it has thus far gained by social legislation.

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XI. DOCTORS AND NURSES.

(BY DR. CLIFFORD MANSHARDT, PH.D.).

To dedicate one's life to the relief of suffering is one of the highest services that any individual can render. There are doctors, as there are members of other professions, who have chosen their life-work with the end in view of making money. There are doctors, as there are members of other professions, who have chosen their life work because of their desire for social standing. There are other doctors, as there are members of other professions, who feel themselves called to a great calling and who regard their work as a holy ministry.

Entering into the home at life's most sacred hours the doctor has an opportunity that is given to few. What other professional man is brought so squarely to face with life in its darker moments? What other professional man is so often called upon to confer with anxious friends, and to speak the words that comfort? How important it is then that the doctor be a man who not only understands the use of medicines, but who also has the inner reserves of character that can strengthen the lives of others. How important it is that he be at peace with himself that he may also reflect his peace to others. The most skilled physicians and nurses are not simply those who are skilled in the mechanics of their profession, but those who are also familiar with the laws of the mind. The power of faith as a healing force is a power that is recognised by all physicians. A stricken man with the will to recover has already gathered his legions about him and inflicted a first blow upon his enemy. When all the powers are poised and one is in a state of quiet confidence, nature is ready and willing to do her healing work. And the doctor is the one man above all others who can inspire this confidence. It is scarcely an accident that men of religion occupy so prominent a place in the ranks of the medical profession.

Few men or women who have been compelled to undergo long confinement with serious illness will minimize the faithful services of the professional nurse. Our modern hospitals have become pretty well depersonalised, but in the nurse one finds a refreshing contact with humanity. Burdened with a schedule that allows but scant leisure, she still finds time to attend to the exacting demands of her individual patients. Working in an atmosphere that would tend to depress the ordinary man or woman, she is always hearty and cheerful. Patience, long-suffering, kindness,—such virtues as show the regard of man for man—are a part of her ready equipment. All honour to the doctor, but all honour also to those brave subordinates who do the less spectacular work and whose skill and faithfulness play so large a part in routing the onslaughts of man's grim foe, disease,

Men the world over are looking forward to a better social order, a state of society in which men shall dwell in brotherhood and peace, in which sickness, poverty, oppression, vice, and sin shall be ameliorated. For the important part that the doctor is playing in ushering in this era, we give our hearty thanks.

SOCIAL RECONSTRUCTION IN INDIA.

(By MR. N. K. VENKATESWARAN).

The essence of social reconstruction is individual work. Society is an invisible force but the individual is a visible element. Society will elude but the individual will stay and yield. It is only through the individual that we can influence society. It is only the individual that can resist the invisible force called society when it strays from the right channels. Social reconstruction is bound to be inert as long as individuals are not absolutely earnest.

Do we not know that the caste-system as it exists to-day is a source of utter pollution to society? Caste might have originated in a desire for cleanliness, but by common consent it is the uncleanest thing to-day. This has been said time and again and even persons who do not believe in it often say it to be abreast of the times. Even persons who believe in it and say it are often found to pay private homage to the caste-system even as it exists to-day. Educated persons boasting culture and wisdom and placed high in life are often found to drape themselves in the enemy-ideas opposed to truth. Wherever intellect is not upright, effort is bound to halt and limp and the harvest is bound to be poor.

Although there are signs of a better day soon to dawn, social reconstruction in India is still gravely menaced by this intellectual flexibility of educated folks. One earnest man with the pure flame in his soul may transform society. All the members cannot even so far as touch it should their loyalties be divided, should they be drawn, ever so slightly, by the comforts of sitting on the fence. Has not Mahatma Gandhi done what a hundred others, and some of them far superior in intellect to him, failed to do in a hundred years?

There is a question that faces India to-day like a Sphinx's riddle. It is if India is going to rise or fall or even to live or die. Once the most truly religious country, India to-day presents the picture of creeds taking the name of God in vain. Once the most intensely cultural country in the world, India to-day presents the picture of cultures battling one another. Such war with God and beauty cannot go on for any length of time without leaving marks of lasting degradation behind. India stands to-day outside the comity of nations. Our decorous untouchabilities, our holy unapproachabilities, our thousand sacred pieties through which each one in this country tries to seek a special heaven for himself, are not, through some strange irony of fate, bringing world-ideas to come and bow to India. This is probably the reason that we are so much prone to harp on our undoubted ancient glories.

We may have begun to fight against caste, but before the fight is hardly begun we seem to have sold ourselves to a greater evil than caste itself. To-day communalism, which is in reality so much worse than caste, is holding us in its dear and deadly grips. The prevailing thought of the land has been turned into communal conduits. Communal societies, communal claims, communal schools and communal confraternities fill the air like thunders stolen from the blue. We cannot fight the caste-system with its own weapons. We cannot fight caste and erect caste at the same time. If an unpleasant truth may be uttered we have only been nourishing caste all the time.

As long as men will not see men as men there is little hope. As long as men will not worship God in the love of man, be he high or low, there is little chance for religion to become true. In the measure in which we have been becoming more and more this casteman or that casteman in that measure we have been becoming less and less men.

Social reconstruction is essentially individual work, first, last and all the time. If we would try to become truly men and to increase our humanity day by day a great stride will have been taken in this all important field of social reconstruction.

GOUR'S MARRIAGE ACT.

The Editor, Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Mr. Balasundaram's letter in the last issue of the Reformer raises some interesting points. However, it may at once be stated that the fears of the Mahratta couple referred to therein are only imaginary. By Act XXX of 1923 it is the special privilege of Hindus to get their marriages solemnised by registration. By Act III of 22 it was obligatory on the couple to renounce their faith as Hindus and solemnly declare that they were not Hindus. Under Gour's Act they have to declare that they do not profess all other religions except Hinduism. So it is sheer nervousness to say that by marrying under that Act one becomes a non-Hindu. I do not believe that any lawyer would give such an opinion in the matter.

Your explanation of Sec. 23 is correct. The person who marries under this Act does not at all lose his right to inherit his family property. Only on account of Sec. 22 his position becomes that of a divided member. This means that his share in the family property is settled on that day; and the law of survivorship does not apply to him. That means even without a regular partition his share in the family property is fixed and so if he were to die after the marriage his widow would succeed to that share and it would not go and could not be claimed by his coparceners by right of survivorship.

Section 22 was enacted to safeguard the interest of the wife by such marriage. I do not think it is necessary for me to state here that in an undivided family (and this term can be applied only to a Hindu family) on the death of a male his share in the property cannot be inherited by his widow but it goes to the male relatives.

I do not know why Sec. 24 should create any apprehension. It is not harder than Sec. 17 of the Act which makes the Indian Divorce Act IV of 1869, which was applicable only to persons professing Christian faith, applicable to such couples. All these provisions are meant to make the legal status of the parties and their children quite clear.

I may note here one anomaly. The Succession Act of 1865 is repealed by Act XXXIX of 1925. This Act contains a comprehensive provision for law of successions. It is divided into several parts. Part V refers to intestate succession and Sec. 29 states in Sub sec. (1) that it shall not apply to any Hindu. When that is so it is difficult to understand how Sec. 24 of Gour's Act could be interpreted, so also Sec. 57 of the Act makes Part VI concerning Testamentary succession not applicable to Hindus in general. When this is so and when the succession Act of 1865 is repealed by what provisions are the Hindu couples marrying under Gour's Act to be governed?

This question need not worry the couple referred to in Mr. Balasundaram's letter.

I can assure that couple that their fears are all groundless. As stated by you if both of them belong to the same caste they need not even register their marriage.

As regards Sec. 25, I do not think the bridegroom would care very much for the right of adoption. If his marriage should prove unfruitful he can will away his property in favour of the person who would have become his adopted son. As regards obsequies and shradha courts cannot prevent a person from performing these, nor can they compel him to perform them.

As regards Sec. 26, as the marriage brings about a partition in the family by the adoption of another son by the bride-groom's father the rights of this bride-groom under joint-family are not in the least affected. This adopted son will inherit only to the share of the father.

REGULATING MARRIAGE EXPENSES IN CHINA.

The Department of Civil Affairs of the Kwangsi Provincial Government has promulgated a set of regulations to govern wedding ceremonies and observances, economy being the guiding theme. It declares that the people have cultivated the bad habit of great extravagance when celebrating marriages, and this pernicious habit is practiced not by any one particular class, but by all sections of the people, rich and poor alike. Extravagance goes to such extremes that frequently people have to borrow in order to find the wherewithal to stage the frills attendant on the ceremonies. This practice of spending on a lavish scale has now become a custom, and consequently many of the poor experience great difficulty in negotiating marriages, as they are unable to raise the necessary funds to provide for the accepted usages. Such an expensive habit, although now revered as custom, has nothing to its credit, and is to be strongly condemned and corrected with the least possible delay. The Department of Civil Affairs has drawn up three regulations for this purpose, and the Bureau of the Public Safety has been intrusted to see that these regulations are enforced. The regulations are as follows:—

1. The pecuniary presents given when the betrothal is consummated are not to exceed the sum of one hundred dollars. In case the parties to the betrothal are in poor circumstances, the presents may be reduced to such a level as is convenient to the giver, and in such cases the prospective bride's family are strictly prohibited from considering such presents inadequate, or cancelling the engagement. Due punishment will be meted out should the bride's people infringe this rule and upset the betrothal.

2. Presents in the nature of edible articles must not exceed the sum of fifty dollars in value.

3. For the entertainment of guests and friends tea parties may be given. When circumstances make it necessary to entertain the match-makers, or prospective new relatives, banquets may be given, but the expense is not to exceed ten dollars for each banquet.—Pacific Affairs, Honolulu.

CHILDREN WHO WORK.

(BY GERTRUDE FOLKS ZIMAND.)

Child labor does not seem to conform to economic theories. Whether we are prosperity idealists or unemployment realists, we cannot escape the fact that child labor still flourishes in 1928. Though the glaring abuses of tiny tots in mills and mines are now, fortunately, largely a thing of the past, thousands of older children are still sacrificed to the machine. During the impressionable years of fourteen and fifteen, when both mentally and physically, children are still undeveloped, they are sent out into the industrial world. And not only are these children immature but they come from impoverished homes; they are children whose whole life has been such as to make them unfitted for the strain of industrial life at an early age.

During the recent controversy over the proposed federal child labor amendment, Will Rogers made an excellent suggestion: "If Congress or the states would just pass one law, as follows, they wouldn't need any 20th Amendment: 'Every child, regardless of age shall receive the same wages as a grown person.' That will stop your child labor. They only hire them because they pay them less for the same work than they would have to pay a man. If children don't do more for less money, why is it that they want to use them? No factory or farmer or anybody else hires a child because he is so big-hearted he wants to do something for the child. He hires him because he wants to save a man's salary."

Children not only work for little wages, thus handicapping adult labor, but they also work at little jobs thus seriously handicapping themselves. Jobs little, not in the number of hours worked, not in the demands the job makes on their strength—but little in the opportunities offered for development. Little blind alley jobs leading nowhere.

When the jobs are not "little" they are frequently dangerous, as the statistics on the number of industrial accidents to minors bear witness. Each year thousands of children are maimed or killed in industry, because they are doing work suitable only for adults. The awkwardness of children of adolescent age, the natural irresponsibility, carelessness, and curiosity of youth, the unaccustomed strain accompanying the transition from an easy five-hour school day to the confining work for eight hours a day or longer in a factory—all increase the accident hazard for these young workers.

Children are not needed to carry on our industry; they are harmed by participation in it. Yet we find that in thirteen states children of fourteen may leave school for work regardless of their grade; in fourteen states children of fourteen may go to work without presenting evidence of physical fitness; in ten states children of fourteen may work in factories from nine to eleven hours a day; in thirty states children of fourteen are permitted to work on scaffolding, in twenty-four states around explosives, in twenty states they may run elevators, and in fourteen states they may oil and clean machinery in motion.—Labour Age, New York.

THE BOMBAY LEGAL AID SOCIETY.

AN APPEAL.

Friends who appreciate the work of the Society, have made a suggestion that the Society should take up the work of rendering help to the families of those who are sentenced to undergo imprisonment. The Indian Social Reformer in its issue of February 3, 1929, after referring to a similar movement in America, has stated that a Society, which undertakes the work, is sure to obtain considerable public support and will be rendering useful work to the community. The problem, indeed, requires consideration because it very often happens that in the imprisonment of criminals the heavier punishment falls on the members of the convict's family, left behind. It is imperative that something should be done for them. The Legal Aid Society, however, is handicapped owing to want of funds. In order that it may fully function, it requires a separate office with office convenience, a paid investigator and full time lawyer, so as to make for expedition, orderly handling of the clients; privacy in interviews, &c. A better financial support of Legal Aid work is urgently called for. A nucleus of a permanent fund has been formed by the donation of a sum of Rs. 500/- by "a friend" during the present year. The Society appeals to the Bar to generously contribute to the support of this agency for aid to the poor. There has always been a considerable number of persons outside the legal profession who have been interested in seeing that the poor get justice. It is hoped that such persons will make substantial contributions to the Society. Organised charities can also come to the aid of the Society. There is no reason why the Society should not benefit by bequests, endowments or grants like any other social service or worthy cause. A recent and striking example is to be found in the 1925-6 Report of the Committee on Legal Aid of the American Bar Association, where there is described a fund of $ 150,000 of which the income is to be devoted to legal aid. Another endowment of Dollars 25,000 was announced at the 50th Anniversary Dinner of the Legal Aid Society. There is a little doubt but that legal aid performs a public service and may lawfully be encouraged by public moneys. The Charter of the City of New York authorises a discretionary appropriation "to the Legal Aid Society—a sum not exceeding twentyfive thousand dollars for the uses and purposes of the said Society." It is earnestly hoped that during the current year, the public and especially the persons and institutions above referred to, will, generously, come to the aid of the Society and help to build up its Endowment Fund. "SOVIET RUSSIA"*

Even in an advanced country like America, an ignorance of soviet conditions is a reproach and a travesty on her institutions. A mass of information or scraps of information or misinformation have trickled through, in a way that has simply added to our confusion and bewilderment. He will be a bold man indeed who will dogmatize about the success or failure of Bolshevism.

It is unfair to presume that Pandit Nehru's account of soviet Russia is either exhaustive, or critical or scholarly. At best it is a snapshot view of the conditions in soviet Russia, featuring what is obvious, and omitting what is deeper below. As the author himself admits it, the account is disjointed and sketchy. The value of the book however lies in its extra-ordinary power to stimulate curiosity and create a zest in the mind of the reader for fuller knowledge.

The chapters that can be highly commended for reading, are those on Criminal law, Prison, education, peasant and the land, women and marriage.

* Soviet Russia by Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, Allahabad Law Journal Press. Price Rs. 2.

They form interesting reading and are written in a simple but elegant and vigorous style.

The three characteristics of soviet Government are, economics of occupational constituencies, scientific organisation of economic life and the obligation to render some service to the community on the part of every able-bodied adult. These are no doubt touched upon but are not duly emphasised. The foundation-stone of Bolshevism is the abolition of private property and Pandit Nehru is silent in this point. As a preliminary survey, as a birds' eye-view of soviet Russia, the book has a rare value and merit, and on that account, I commend the book to the readers. The get-up is nice and attractive and all credit goes to the Allahabad Law Journal Press.

A. S. V.

WHY NOT A MASS LITERARY ASSOCIATION.

A lady correspondent writes from Poona :—

Any one interested in Indian problems can not but admit that poverty and ignorance are the two most prominent among other leeches which are ever sucking India's life-blood and rendering her paler and paler.

An attempt at releasing the country from the first one is being made by Mahatmaji with an enthusiasm bordering upon religious zeal. Those who are convinced of his cult are entrusting themselves under the banner of All India Spinners' Association.

But there being a diversity in tastes, habits and culture of individuals different problems are likely to strike different public spirited persons.

Mass literacy, which has taken deep root in villages and which is seen to be the father of a brood of evils like drink, superstition, indebtedness, and unions expenses on marriage and funeral ceremonies is the twin sister of poverty and is obstinately closing the door of culture and progress against the mass. Why not private agencies like the Servants of India Society or Ramakrishna mission which is usually found to confine its activities to medical help or Prof. Karve's Widows' Home Association which are known for their self-sacrificing work and which are therefore better fitted to take up the work of the removal of illiteracy and thus prepare the way for Swarajya in whatever form it may come start mass literacy associations?

THE MASSES MUST BE FINANCED.

(By Mr. J. E. ROSAIR).

Sir Daniel Hamilton referring to the poverty of the masses in India, remarked: "I have no hesitation in saying that 75 per cent of the present unrest has its roots in the villages of India. Financial stringency and lack of funds, is no excuse for lack of action on the part of the Government.

The people's labour is the people's capital, and India has a larger supply of that capital than any other part of the Empire. Self-Government, to be of any service, must begin at the foundations and not at the roof. It is of no use talking of Independence or Dominion Status while the status of the masses is the status of serfs. Give India a banking system based not on gold or silver but on living men and on the solid assets which their labour will create, and she will lead the world in the paths of peace and prosperity, when the queen bee understands its job and begins to lay."

What then is the way out of the darkness into the light of a better day? The road lies by way of the Indian National Congress. The Masses must be financed. If the plan for peaceful circulation of capital for prevention of unemployment by raising funds through the sporting spirit of the public cannot be sanctioned, it is the duty as well as the business of the Indian National Congress to hold the monopoly of the manufacture of paper money, to print and issue as much as may be required for productive and constructive purposes; otherwise, so far as the great masses of the people are concerned, their life will remain the empty one it is today. The Government of India must hand over the manufacture and issue of paper currency to the Indian National Congress to be used for the benefit of the people and the development of the country; for without a credit system which can be expanded to the needs of the people, India's only future will be one of stagnation and deep poverty. India's banking system must be framed to suit the people; the soul of a nation must not be dwarfed to suit the Imperial Government.

Hard cash in the form of gold and silver starves a nation, because there is not enough to go round. Soft cash in the form of paper currency feeds a nation, because it can be manufactured so cheaply and issued in quantity sufficient to employ every man in productive and constructive work, and requires neither capital nor gold and silver deposits in the Bank. The capital is the living man who requires only paper money to turn his labour into profitable work which will enrich himself and his country.

There are millions of acres of uncultivated land in India, and millions of unemployed people, but no money to set their industry in motion. The masses are starving for more and better food, to which every man willing to work is entitled, but which he cannot get while gold and silver dominates.

The people need starve no longer if the Working Committee of the Indian National Congress would arrange to expedite the manufacture and issue of Congress Currency Notes, and send down boxes of one rupee notes to the villages for rural reconstruction.

The Congress Currency Notes when issued to the ryots and the handloom weavers of India, by the opening of co-operative bank branches throughout the length and breadth of the land, will be received as readily as the Government of India notes. The villagers can make their purchases and pay wages with them, and thereby immense areas of uncultivated land will be changed into fertile fields. In other words, by aiding rural reconstruction, there will be employment also found for the educated classes of India, as well as for skilled and unskilled labour. In truth it was written of old: "the king himself is served by the field."

The queen bee mentioned by Sir Daniel is doubtless intended to refer to the Indian National Congress which he must know carries moral weight in India infinitely greater than the Government of India.

75th BIRTHDAY OF EMIL VON BEHRING.

A great benefactor of humanity, a scientist whose researches saved the life of millions of children throughout the world and whose life-work still to-day is vivid amongst us, could celebrate the 15th March 1929 his 75th birthday, had he not been called away, too early in his 63rd year.

One is quite justified to call medicine, the most noble of sciences, because its aim is the relief of the humanity from pain, sorrow and distress.

When it succeeds to attain that aim, it is entitled to universal thankfulness.

This thankful homage falls due to-day on his 75th birthday to a man, who, as few others before him, succeeded to turn away unspeakable sorrow from hundreds and thousands of families throughout the world, by the discovery of the Diphtheria Curative Serum, with which, the name "Emil von Behring" is united for all times to come.

Scarcely, has the present generation who enjoys the results of this genial man's lifework, an idea of the cruel devastations, which formerly Diphtheria caused among the children everywhere.

That humanity disposes to-day of a reliable weapon against Diphtheria and that this disease lost its former terror, we owe to the German scientist "Emil von Behring".

As all great intuitive men, who, after swaying first, soon are carried away by their vocation and have to follow it, also Emil von Behring, clearing away all obstacles, stuck to his idea without regard to his personal comfort.

Son of a large family the father was teacher in Hannsdorf near Deutsch-Eylau, Western Prussia, he learned early the hardship of earning his living. With 12 children the father saw no way to afford a high-school education for this boy, who yet early showed a liking for medicine.

His intelligence, however won him the favour of his teachers and they procured him a scholarship at the highschools.

Twenty years old, he entered the Military Medical Academy at Berlin, which he left when 25 years after having been admitted a doctor.

He now joined the German Army as a military surgeon. A strong inclination for scientific research and a surprising ability for observation, was obvious in him already then.

In 1882 he appears with a completely new and fundamental perception on the action of bactericidal mediums and devotes the work of the following years to this particular study.

Here lie the roots of his future pioneering discovery of the blood-serum-therapy. The struggle and work for the recognition and dissemination of this, his creation filled his life till the end.

Hence his genius acts but in the direction of his great discoveries. He gives up the military career, becomes scientist, carries through his experiments under trying economic conditions and lastly publishes in the winter 1890 his epochal discovery of the blood-serum-therapy. This discovery culminates in the statement that bloodserum of animals recovered from their disease, has the power to cure another animal affected by the same sickness.

In Diphtheria this thesis transferred to man proved to be a sensational success, which led to final triumph, when he succeeded to save in the following year in the Clinic of von Bergmann Berlin, for the first time, children attacked by Diphtheria. The problem was solved. Now he, the man of both thought and deed, began vigorously to clear away the obstacles and misconceptions everywhere, in order to prepare the way to an universal application of this therapy, to the benefit of mankind.

Too convincing were the proofs of the correctness of his ideas, that antagonism and envy could hold up the triumphant march of his discoveries. Throughout the world the favourable results obtained from Diphtheria-Curative-Serum confirmed the truth of Behring's theories.

The rate of Diphtheria casualties fell wherever physicians applied Diphtheria Curative Serum, humanity was freed from a most cruel scourge, that hitherto had decimated its children.

The next problem was now, to produce Curative Serum on a large scale to provide for the requirements of the whole world.

Within a short time most doctors throughout the world successfully used Behring's Curative Serum against Diphtheria.

Here it should be mentioned also, that already in 1890 Behring in collaboration with Kitasato had prepared the Antitetanus-Curative-Serum, the value of which equals that of the Antidiphtheria Serum.

Besides these problems the great scientist devoted his life time to the study of tuberculosis.

The many inspirations that occupied his mind demanded special laboratories, where this ever active searcher could realise his ideas and tasks.

In Marburg-Lahn he founded in 1904 his proper exemplary research institutes and laboratories, for the production of Serum, which later on he quitted under the title, “BEHRINGWERKE”.

Until his death he managed, equally gifted as scientist and as practical man, this worldwide known enterprise, the preparations of which are used everywhere.

Emil von Behring, belongs to the rather seldom representative men of genius, who yet in their lifetime earned the recognition of their work.

Numerous honours were bestowed upon him. The “Institut de France” and the “France Academic de Medicine” already in 1890 presented him with a honorarium 50,000 and 25,000 frs., the French Government followed with the appointment as officer of the Legion of Honour. England distinguished him by the honorary membership of the “Royal Institute of Public Health”, the latter bestowing upon him the “Harben medal”. The king of Italy decorated him with the commander of the order of the Italian Crown. Besides other important Italian scientific corporations, the “Reale Societa Italiana” made him honorary member. In the U. S. of America he became honorary member of the “American Academy of Arts and Science” and the “New York Academy of Medicine”. Austria, Hungary, Russia, Turkey, Roumania, Sweden, Belgium, and other nations made him honorary member of their most distinguished scientific Societies. The Universities of Athen and Mexico conferred upon him the degree of “doctor honoris causa”. The Sultan of Turkey presented him with the order of Modjidiji I. class and Roumania with that of Meritul Sanitar I. class.

When in 1901 for the first time the “Nobel prize” was distributed, the choice fell on E. von Behring as the most prominent searcher on medicine.

It goes without saying that in Germany Science and Public not hesitated to do him the due homage.

Already in 1893 he was promoted Professor, 1895 he became “Geheimor Medivinalarat”. In the same year the “Senkenbergische Naturforschende Gesellschaft” in Frankfurt Main, presented him the “Thiedemann Medal” with an honorarium, and the Faculty of Medicine in Wurzburg followed with the “Binekker Medal”.

The Prussian Academy of sciences and many important corporations made him correspondent or honorary member.

The city of Marburg Lahn, in which he had lived so long granted him the honorary freedom. Sovereigns and princes of the German Empire bestowed on him orders and distinctions. The German emperor raised him in acknowledgement of his scientific merits to the hereditary peerage. In 1903 von Behring was nominated “Wirklicher Geheimer Rat” with the predicat “Excellency”.

Too early for the humanity he died the 31st March 1917. His remains were buried in a mausoleum near Marburg Lahn surrounded by a peaceful landscape and close to his creation, the Behringwerke.

There he rests, but his work lives and grows. “Not to heal, to prevent” deemed him always the most noble duty of a physician. For his part he solved that problem. By his “Diphtheria prophylactic” he left us an even stronger weapon, than the Curative of Diphtheria.

This last and most genial idea of Emil von Behring to prevent the outbreak of diphtheria by vaccination stands just at present in the limelight of medical and public interest.

Thus, the 75th birthday of a great man, taken away from us too early, links the memory of the past with the events of to-day.

HINDU WOMEN'S INHERITANCE RIGHTS.

The following Act of the Indian Legislature received the assent of the Governor General on the 21st February 1929 :—

ACT No. II OF 1929.

An Act to alter the order in which certain heirs of a Hindu male dying intestate are entitled to succeed to his estate.

WHEREAS it is expedient to alter the order in which certain heirs of a Hindu male dying intestate are entitled to succeed to his estate; It is hereby enacted as follows.—

1. (1) This Act may be called the Hindu Law of Inheritance (Amendment) Act, 1929.

(2) It extends to the whole of British India, including British Baluchistan and the Sonthal Parganas, but it applies only to persons who, but for the passing of this Act, would have been subject to the law of Mitakshara in respect of the provisions herein enacted, and it applies to such persons in respect only of the property of males not held in coparcenary and not disposed of by will.

2. A son's daughter, daughter's daughter, sister, and sister's son shall, in the order so specified, be entitled to rank in the order of succession next after a father's father and before a father's brother :

Provided that a sister's son shall not include a son adopted after the sister's death.

3. Nothing in this Act shall—

- (a) affect any special family or local custom having the force of law, or
- (b) vest in a son's daughter, daughter's daughter or sister an estate larger than, or different in kind from, that possessed by a female in property inherited by her from a male according to the school of Mitakshara law by which the male was governed, or
- (c) enable more than one person to succeed by inheritance to the estate of a deceased Hindu male which by a customary or other rule of succession descends to a single heir.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The Whitley Commission :—The Associated Press Lobby correspondent informs that although the personnel of the Royal Commission on Labour has not yet been settled it can be definitely stated that the Right Hon'ble V. S. Srinivasa Sastri will be one of the seven or nine members and Mr. A. G. Clow, Deputy Secretary to the Industries Department, now on leave, will be appointed as Secretary.

Women in Mines.—The Governor-General-in-Council has made regulations prohibiting the employment of women underground in mines. The regulations do not extend to coal quarries or open workings. The Railway Board have, however, decided that the employment of women in certain forms of work in open workings in Railway collieries should also be put a stop to and are issuing orders to this effect. These orders will result in the gradual elimination of the employment of women as coal getters or as earth workers at depths of more than 60 feet.

An Archaeological Find:—An important archaeological discovery has been made by Prof. R. D. Bannerji, the discoverer of the Mohenjodaro civilisation. The professor has discovered in the jungles of Orissa and Baudh, a feudatory state, two temples of the period of the oldest Bhuneshwar type of the eighth century. General Cunningham, who surveyed the old pilgrim route to Puri, had missed these temples, and owing to their inaccessibility they had been hidden for centuries. The architecture of the temples is unique and the professor believes that they will be considered as prototypes of the Parsorameshwar shrine at Bhuneshwar, which has hitherto been regarded as the oldest temple in Orissa. They are situated at eight miles west of the town of Baudh and about 116 miles from Cuttack on the bank of the Mahanadi. One is a Shiva temple and the other is a Vishnu temple. The Chief of Baudh State is taking steps to preserve the monuments. The professor has also discovered in the town of Baudh a figure of Buddha 11 feet high, carved in black stone, buried underground. The sculpture belongs to the eighth century A. D.

Training for Social Work:—The First Session of the Social Service Training Class in connection with the Nagpada Neighbourhood House, Byculla, Bombay, has just been completed. The class opened on Monday, January 7th, with an enrollment of 14 students, 5 of whom were women. All of the students were English speaking, and the majority were already engaged in responsible work. The students represented the Christian, Hindu, and Mahomedan communities. Three hours of class work were held each day, and visits were made to representative social institutions. The course of study included lectures upon the Meaning of Social Work, Social Work in the Villages, Practical Sociology, the Social Teachings of Jesus and the Prophets, Public Health and Sanitation, the Conduct of Boys Clubs, recreation, Biographies of Social Workers, the New Industrialism, and the Villager in the City. An effort was made to make each lecture as practical as possible, and the class discussions were a real sharing of experience. While the term was originally scheduled for six weeks, the Bombay riots necessitated closing the session at the end of five weeks. The riots afforded the class the opportunity of observing at first hand the great need for ameliorative social work and of helping people to live together in a friendly, co-operative manner. With the experience gained from this year's work it is planned to extend the 1930 term to a two months' period, starting early in January. This session will pay increased attention to the problems of the city. The training class is in a purely experimental stage, and it is hoped that it may lead eventually to a well-established School of Social Service Training. The Director will welcome any inquiries or suggestions.

Pacific Data:—Pacific Data as a clip sheet medium between countries in and interested in the Pacific area, is being discontinued. No. 30, December 20, 1928, is the closing number. In future items of interest to this area will be incorporated in Pacific Affairs, the monthly journal of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

NOTES.

Awakening of the Lingayats:—The Lingayat sect, as founded by Basava, has initiated a strong social and religious reform movement against caste, enforced widowhood and other cramping customs and in favour of a monotheistic worship of Shiva. Unfortunately, like other protestant movements it forgot the principles of its origin, and settled down as a new sect following largely the same old customs, and observing only certain outward forms. This community is a prosperous one in the Karnatak, and we are glad that within the last few years, it has awakened to the need of keeping abreast of the times. It has a flourishing Education Society in Belgaum which conducts several High Schools, and it has now come forward to establish an Arts College in Belgaum. With a catholicity worthy of imitation by other communities, the new College will be open to all classes and creeds. The Senate of the Bombay University a few days ago passed a resolution approving of the affiliation of the College and we trust the Government of Bombay will not delay in giving its sanction to the arrangement.

Monogamy and Registration:—In the Reformer of the 2nd instant, was published a letter from Mr. Balasundram of Bangalore in which he said that a marriage had been arranged between a Mahratta lady and Mahratta gentleman (both of them University graduates) but that it was about to be given up as they are advised that if registered under Act XXX of 1923 (Gour's Act) the parties would lose certain rights as members of a Hindu joint family. Commenting on this we said that the present state of the law was anomalous but that as both the parties were Mahrattas, the only advantage of registration would be definitely to fix the marriage as a monogamous one, but that this advantage can be equally secured without registration by the parties, both of whom are well-educated, voluntarily agreeing to treat the marriage as monogamous—this with reference to their having to give up their engagement. The Hindu law does not require any marriage to be polygamous, and permits the taking of a second wife only under conditions which, it is true, are practically fixed. Perhaps we did not make our meaning quite clear. The Messenger says that the experience in Bengal does not encourage it to approve of our comment. Our contemporary observe:—"The widow marriages celebrated under the leadership of Pandit Iswarchandra Vidyasagar were all caste marriages. Deception and desertion practised on the poor widows made quite a lot of them dependent on Vidyasagar. Caste public opinion far from proving a check on desertion, encouraged a fresh alliance with a virgin. The experiment of widow remarriage within caste limits failed and in later days Vidyasagar would often send widows to his friend Babu Durgamohan Das to get the parties married under the provisions of Act III of 1872. No use repeating the experiment in connection with marriages, not in conformity with Desachara." In the early days of the movement, widow remarriages were brought about without much regard for other considerations, and some of the men who married widows, not only in Bengal, when the novelty of the affair wore away, deserted their wives who had to be supported by the reformers. That these men were able in Bengal to marry virgins of their caste subsequently, is an interesting piece of information. But the vast majority of ordinary Hindu marriages which we had in view in making the comment are monogamous in fact, and according to the census figures the proportion of polygamous marriages is less than ten in a thousand.

An Apologist for Government:—Government have found an apologist for their delaying tactics—the word is Earl Winterton's—in respect of Mr. Sarda's Bill to prevent child marriages. The Baptist Missionary Review, published from Bezwada observes:—

Supporters of Mr. Sarda's Bill seem to think that the Government by their action have shown themselves against the reform, but it may turn out that they are in favour of even more drastic measures in-as-much-as it seems quite likely that the report of the Committee will show a preponderating desire for even a higher age for girls. We cannot help but feel that the violent outburst because of postponement of consideration may be due to the fear that when the whole matter is considered in the light of the Committee's thorough-going investigation, an even higher age may be found desirable. If public opinion is as strong as the supporters of Mr. Sarda's Bill believe, a few months delay in the consideration of the bill certainly will not affect its ultimate success. When the Government throw their weight on the side of a bill for reform they are roundly berated for pushing ahead of popular opinion. When they urge delay for further consideration they are again berated for obstruction of popular desire. They get the blame either way.

In this connection it is interesting to note that the Government are getting their full measure of blame for allowing the terrible disturbances in Bombay, yet it was only a few weeks ago when police constables were being hailed before the court to answer charges of unlawful restraint of public citizens while making a demonstration at a railway station. If the police fear a crowd will get out of hand and use forceful measures they are rebuked. If they allow the people to have their fun they are asked what they were doing at the time. Consistency thou art a jewel".

Evidently in the opinion of this Christian Missionary formal consistency consists in allowing the police to a small citizens peacefully conducting a legitimate political demonstration on the suspicion that it might become disorderly if the police are to be expected to maintain the peace during riots much as we had recently in Bombay. We suppose in the country from which the Mission hails, police are allowed to do what they like as the price or penalty for maintaining order in times of trouble. The idea that those who have criticised Government for getting the Sarda Bill postponed are afraid that Government may bring a more drastic measure later, is amusing.

Maternity Benefit Bill:—The Bill to regulate the employment of women in factories some time before and after confinement and to provide for maternity benefits passed the third reading at the current session of the Local Legislative Council last week. There was strong opposition to it particularly from mill-owners who wanted the scope of the Bill to extend to all classes of women labour and not to factory labour alone. While the mill-owners were ever ready to employ cheap labour, they expressed their unwillingness to shoulder the burden that the passing of such a measure would involve. Mr. S. C. Joshi, the Labour member demolished all the arguments of the opponents effectively and showed that this piece of humane legislation far from being premature was long overdue and could no longer be delayed. Allowance can be made for honest opposition due to the inability to see the workers' point of view but we cannot, however, appreciate the tactics adopted by Mr. K. M. Munshi, the University representative, to shelve the Bill. The proceedings in the Council with regard to the measure serves to show how difficult it is to secure even the elementary rights for women and still the Government do not deem it necessary to nominate women to that body.

The other point of view:—The following is from an unnamed contributor in Unity:—"You write of things you've seen—the moonlight on the Taj, the romance of the Orient, the joy of discovery. All those things I know and we are comrades in knowing them together. But there is something else that hammers through a stiff indifference to disturb a spirit little given to pondering on serious things. The knowledge that has beaten through my callous selfishness is this—that other peoples with their Gods are just as moral, just as right as I with mine. For instance, there was the handsome Arab who talked with me in Egypt. I wondered at the way their women lived in deep seclusion and I told him that to us the plan of life was wrong. He smiled a tired smile at me, as though his ears were weary hearing always that remark. As some learned sage would answer a simple student's query he replied to me. "To us it seems your morality is negligible. See how your wives and sweethearts cling to other men in the music of an obscene dance. We Arabs could not stand for that. We love our women far too much." It startled me from a smug acceptance of Christian superiority and all the trip my complacency has been upset remembering the first lesson from that Mohammedan and watching other peoples at their prayers.

Religious Tolerance:—"Through the mystery we call India continues the correspondent, I heard companions sneer at how the Hindus lived. They ridiculed their childish beliefs and rites so little understood by other nations. But I could not join in. A lazy people? Well, perhaps their happiness lies in doing what they wish. Under the scorching sun a people must be lazy to exist and may be all their practices are governed by the sun. An inner contentment they seem to search for not shouting their righteousness from the corner of the street, but listening always to some inner voice that cannot penetrate to you and me. The earnestness of deep religious convictions that have built the scores of temples I have wearied of seeing is something that to you and me should ever be a lesson. Tolerance should come from out this education. Who now can say that he is right and all the world is wrong? Who now can see in white superiority anything save a greater knowledge of science and commerce? We have tried for generations to steal from these peoples the religious beliefs that have lasted longer by far than Christianity, and yet they follow the faiths of their father. Beauty I have seen as moons have fallen to the sea and suns have disappeared in glories that I never knew before. But beauty, too, I have seen in simple people who have built in reverence to their Gods such structures as the occidental mind has never made. And if ever again I boast about my colour or my faith, this trip has been in vain.

Caste in Britain:—In reviewing a book on India by Mr. Paton of the Y. M. C. A., a writer in a Glasgow paper deploras the existence of a modified form of caste in Britain. According to a Free Press message he says, "We know of priests of all churches who have reserved to themselves rights and functions that were once the privilege of working men, disciples of Christ. In Britain the system keeps millions without the place and it follows them from birth to death. The plumber's man is an outcaste so far as the daughter of the Manor is concerned, and the dock labourer with two quid a week and a physique like Hercules is an outcaste, from the cradle to the grave, from the smug society of the ordinary bank clerk. Even in Christ's Church moleskins cannot sit in the same pew with silks. We have even known the British caste system to ostracise the sons and daughters of an aristocratic family from high social circles because they adopted Socialism as their political faith. The present writer is quite aware of the necessary distinctions that must be kept in mind, both religious and political, but in essence the thing is the same, and we think the Church that sends Foreign Missionaries abroad to fight this evil should fight the same evil at home. The Missionary who returns on furlough to make blood run cold about the Caste System in India should develop a sense of proportion, if not of humour, during his holiday in these beautiful Islands.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, MARCH 22, 1929.

RELIGION AND PROSTITUTION.

Replying to a question in the House of Commons why Mr. Minney's book "Shiva or the Future of India" was prohibited from being imported into India, while Miss Katherine Mayo's "Mother India" was freely distributed in this country, the Under-Secretary of State, Earl Winterton, said that while Miss Mayo's book was "a serious study" of Indian life, Mr. Minney's was not, and, therefore, it was banned as being calculated to wound the feelings of Hindus. Earl Winterton is notoriously inaccurate and inconsequential about his facts on Indian questions—the Home Member of the Government of India had to admit in the Legislative Assembly on Wednesday that the figures the Earl gave to the House of Commons of the number of persons detained without trial in custody were wrong—and it is quite possible that he thinks that Miss Mayo's book did not hurt the feelings of Hindus. Indian opinion was unanimous that Miss Mayo's book was a cold-blooded piece of political propagandism against Indian aspirations for self-government by means of sweeping generalisations derogatory to whole classes. We do not wish to recall the lurid passages now, but there can be no doubt that no book which has been published for years produced such deep and wide-spread resentment as "Mother India." But, as we said a fortnight back, we would not have approved of the banning of the book and we do not approve of the banning of Mr. Minney's book either. Hindus view writings reflecting on their religion differently from Mussalmans. The rigidity of the Hindu social system is altogether absent from the intellectual sphere and, indeed, intellectual greatness has been recognised and honoured even when it manifested itself in a denial of orthodox beliefs, two outstanding instances being the sage Kapila, the promulgator of the philosophy of Materialism, to whom the Bhagavad-Gita assigns the supreme place among seers, and Gautama Buddha who is included among the ten avatars of Vishnu. The Government of India, therefore, have been rather officious in banning Mr. Minney's book. There is a general feeling that they are indifferent to Hindu sentiment and perhaps they thought it was a cheap way of showing that this is not true. We wish to say once for all that intellectual India does not favour the banning of books or persons on the ground that they inculcate views which are repugnant to any section or interest.

Miss Katherine Mayo, it seems, has written another book called the "Slaves of the Gods". According to a message published by the Times of India from its London correspondent, it contains more than a dozen stories portraying what it means to be in India and gives a lurid picture of the child-wife, the widow, the temple prostitute, the Suttee, the untouchable and the sacred cow. We have read a novel recently published by F. S. Penny, advertised as possessed of intimate knowledge of India, in which several of these institutions are introduced in the most improbable situations to point the moral that the British family is the ideal system and the Hindu system is unpeepably rotten to the core. We can, therefore, imagine the sort of stories which Miss Mayo has written in her "Slaves of the Gods" and, indeed, some of them, we are told, have already appeared in certain magazines. This new book, we are told, contains a letter from Bishop Whitehead, who was in Madras for some years, in which that worthy prelate rebukes Miss Mayo for not having made a far greater effort to awaken Hindus to the cruelty and inhumanity of their social evils! The Bishop asks "what London will be like if in St. Paul's, Westminster and other leading Churches, large establishments of prostitutes had been kept for centuries for the use of the clergy and the worshippers." This, he avers, is the parallel to the conditions in South India where "immorality is consecrated by sanctions of religion." Miss Mayo endorses this view: "Examples of degenerate crime, cruelties and abuses suggestive of Hindu India's worst may be found amongst our own people," she thoughtfully concedes "but they cannot be found to have been commanded or sanctioned by any form of Christianity or upheld, defended, excused or denied by the public conscience or leaders."

The last statement shows that either Miss Mayo's knowledge of Christianity is limited or that she prefers to write as if it were. We do not, however, wish to answer the Bishop and Miss Mayo in their own way. We want to go to the root of their argument that because there are no dancing girls in St. Paul's or Westminster Cathedral or in the Churches of America, therefore Christianity is not concerned with the Brothelism which may flourish outside the four walls of the Church while Hinduism because there are dancing girls attached to certain temples, is to be condemned as a religion which is indifferent to morality. Let us tell the Bishop and Miss Mayo that their attitude bears more resemblance to the attitude of the Pharisee with broad phylacteries who turned away his face and drew his garments about him as he passed the wounded wayfarer rather than to that of the good Samaritan who bound his wounds and made provision for his treatment at a wayside inn. And what of Jesus Christ Himself? He did not like Bishop Whitehead and Miss Mayo pride Himself on keeping aloof from fallen women and sinners of various kinds; he accepted their ministrations and found pleasure in their company. He did not think that religion had no responsibility for the brothel because the brothel was not formally attached to the temple. Christianity is not to be judged by what is found within the four walls of a Church—it is there the Bishop is making an inexcusable mistake—it is not to be found in the creeds of the churches, as Miss Mayo fondly thinks; Christianity as a popular religion must be judged by the sum-total of the life of Christian countries and we say that so judged it does not come out any better than Hinduism; rather worse. The Indian Social Reformer may claim to have initiated the anti-nautch movement of which the abolition of girls in temples was the main issue forty years ago, but, with the knowledge we have since gained of Western Brothelism, we deliberately say that if there is no other alternative we prefer the Indian system to the European system, because the former is less—far less—brutalising on the women than the latter. Let Miss Mayo's classic, the Abbe Dubois, step into the witness-box :

"To the discredit of Europeans it must be confessed that the quiet seductions which Hindu prostitutes know how to exercise with so much skill resemble in no way the disgraceful methods of the wretched beings who give themselves up to a similar profession in Europe, and where indecent behaviour, cynical impudence, obscene and filthy words of invitation are enough to make any sensible man who is not utterly depraved shrink from them with horror."

If a modern authority is needed, we refer the good Bishop and Miss Mayo to a book which we noticed in these columns entitled "A Terrible Life: The Confessions of a Procuress". Nearer home, the conditions prevalent in Bombay brothels conducted on the modern commercial system, and the revelations about their methods of recruitment and management, by comparison make the indigenous system appear as a humane one.

The Bishop has not the same excuse as Miss Mayo who is a professional propagandist with just enough knowledge to serve her purpose, for asserting that the devadasi system, which, as it exists, is a corruption and a survival, has the sanction of the Hindu religion for the prostitution which has come to attach to it. The Courts have refused to accept the view that dedication as a devadasi is necessarily dedication to prostitution. Temple worship in Hinduism was borrowed from Buddhism, and the devadasis were the counterparts of the Buddhist nuns. The institution of monasticism in Buddhism as in Christianity became infested with corruption of various sorts, and the great, post-Buddhistic revival movements swept away many of them. The nautch-girl in some temples is almost the sole relic left, and in South India, Dr. Muthulaxmi Reddi's Act has put the finishing touch on the anti-devadasi movement started forty years ago. The Bishop knows, or should know all this, as he spent many years in South India. And it is impossible to reconcile with the perfect intellectual and spiritual honesty expected of a high functionary of the Anglican Church, his analogy between St. Paul's converted into a brothel with the Hindu temples which still have devadasis attached to them in Southern India.

SOCIAL REFORM IN SOUTH INDIA.

THE PRESENT CONDITION.

(By MR. T. S. GANGADHAR AIYAR, B.A., B.L.).

At one time politics was playing second fiddle to social reform. All parties, despite their political commitments, worked heart and soul for social reform. But now, the condition has completely changed. Politics has become the all-absorbing question and social reform has been woefully sidetracked. But, what is worse, social reform is looked upon with distrust by some, who think that, because social problems stand in the way of political unity, they should not be touched by political organisations. It is in this unhealthy spirit that some of the political organisations begin to assert that they should have nothing to do with social matters.

It is true that social problems stand in the way of political unity and therefore, it is, that proper attention should be devoted to the proper solution of the social problems. The Indian National Congress as part of its very legitimate duties, has taken up the social questions of child-marriages and untouchability. But some branches of that national institution, more especially in South India, have begun to protest stating that the Indian National Congress should not interfere in religious matters—as if, the problems of child marriage and untouchability are purely religious questions. Such an attitude is highly objectionable from the progressive point of view and if the political bodies in India want to work for national progress, they cannot but take up, and work for, social reform, despite the fact that a small section of the public attempts to shelve some social questions on the ground of their having a religious tinge.

It is really impossible to conceive of any political progress in our country, until and unless her social evils are cured to a great extent. Some public workers, however, contend that the social evils will cease to exist when India gets freedom and that therefore all the national work should be concentrated in political work. But nothing proves the absurdity and the untenability of such a contention, than the fact that even "free countries" like England and the United States of America are not really free from their respective social evils. In fact social reform paves the way for political reform. Rid of some of her social evils, India's political progress will be greatly accelerated. When Mahatma Gandhi and the late Lala Lajpat Rai appealed incessantly that the curse of untouchability should be removed at any cost, they had in mind the tremendous advance that political progress would make thereby.

So then, social reform should have equal importance if not, greater importance, than political reform. Politics and social reform should go hand in hand. While political reform works mainly for the progress of institutions, social reform is primarily concerned with the uplift of the individual. If political reform is attempted to be carried at the expense of social reform, then there will not be any real national progress and the so-called political reform will only end in chaos and confusion. It is our bitter experience that any political programme, without a proper solution of the Brahmin non-Brahmin, the Hindu-Muslim, and the Depressed Classes problems, only serves as an appeal of discord.

The neglect of social reform, therefore, is mainly responsible for the slow progress of the movement in the past. Having been started at the time of the abolition of Sati to put down that cruel and time-honored custom, the movement has not made as much progress as it should have done. Till a few years ago, the field of social reform was the arena of real unity. People of various political views heartily co-operated and worked unitedly. Further, due to the cold neglect of social reform by the public men, social problems have unhealthily developed into political and religious problems. The Brahmin non-Brahmin question has become a political problem. The question of child marriage has developed into a religious problem.

The immediate necessity therefore, is the remobilisation of the movement of social reform, which should at least keep pace with, if not go of ahead, political reform. Some of the important social problems should be solved in order to make political reform effective. If social reform is not important, why then should problems like women franchise, social legislation, the depressed classes, the caste system and the condition of the labouring classes engage the attention of the tribunals of political reforms in the country? The answer is simple. Social problems do stand in the way of political reform and true statesmanship demands a tackling of the problems and discards an avoidance of the same.

Real national progress therefore requires that the public workers should take up social problems in right earnest. The caste system in South India is working havoc. By means of gradual reform the acute differences should be put down. Success herein depends upon a wider outlook on the part of the various communities. Untouchability is a national curse and the sooner South India is rid of it, the better. Regarding the problems affecting the Indian women, child marriage, widow remarriage, female education and the amelioration of the dancing girls, require special attention. The drink evil should be eradicated. Better ideas of health and sanitation should be made to prevail among the people. Social service should be done on a large scale. The condition of the labouring classes should be improved.

The nation consists of individuals and the improvement of the individual means the progress of the nation. But nothing facilitates to a greater degree such individual improvement, than social reform. And if social reform is carried on properly, the real political progress of India will, ere long become an accomplished fact.

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR

XII. YOUNG MEN AND WOMEN

(By DR. CLIFFORD MANSBARDT, PH. D.)

The younger generation is ever a perplexity to its elders. Even the most sympathetic adult often finds it difficult to understand the ins and outs, the comings and goings of youth. The non-sympathetic adult does not attempt the task. He is ready at once to declare youth wild and irresponsible. It is true that some of the ways of youth are unconventional. Youth often is against established customs and opposed to adult ways of doing things. But the spirit thus displayed is a sign of health. It demonstrates that youth has vitality, initiative, and thoughts that are his own. Though at times, youth rejoicing in his new-felt strength is led into excesses, he is at heart idealistic. He wants to place his life where it will really count. He feels the appeal of great causes and wants to have his share in realizing them. A few of the young men and women thus attracted will find their way into teaching, social service, or one of the so-called altruistic professions, but the great majority will be absorbed in the regular channels of commerce and industry. Here will come the real test of strength. Will youth be satisfied with near-goods, or will he demand the best? Will he have the courage to follow the leading of his convictions, or will he become simply a member of the crowd? Will he lose his lofty purposes and high enthusiasms, or will he vitalize the forgotten ideals and renew the faded dreams of those who are older? Time alone will tell, and where we cannot know, we trust.

In his desire for immediate accomplishment, youth often chafes under the yoke of sustained preparation, and yet for the most of us such discipline is essential. To a few is given the spark of genius, but to the rest is given the capacity for work. It is the youthful hours spent in the classroom, the library, the studio, the workshop, the office, or the field that really prepare us for the later demands of life. It is through living life to the full each hour of the day, and every day, that we acquire the habit of accepting responsibility and using it wisely.

"It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth."

The period of youth is a time of questioning. As the mental horizon expands, new problems present themselves. The world instead of being static, becomes alive and in the making. The sciences, astronomy, and psychology open up pathways hitherto undreamed. As a result youth is confused. He is unable to piece the discordant parts into a harmonious whole, and often in the midst of his confusion he feels that there is nothing certain that remains. But men have gone before, and have left behind them landmarks that still endure. Sincerity, honesty, thoroughness, purity, generosity, helpfulness, reverence and love—such virtues are eternal and will remain. The privilege of youth is to take the proven ideals of the past and so to interpret them that they may live anew in a complex and changing civilisation.

MAHATMA GANDHI ON TEMPERANCE.

Mahatma Gandhi addressed a meeting of the Burma Women's Christian Temperance Union recently at the Jubilee Hall when there was a large gathering present.

In introducing the speaker Miss May Mack said :—

The members of the Women's Christian Temperance Union feel greatly honoured this evening in having Mahatma Gandhi, India's greatest temperance advocate, this morning. Our organisation recognising the fact that temperance education must precede temperance legislation in order that the latter may be effective has been unremitting in its efforts to encourage the teaching of temperance in schools, but the tragedy is that so often the bad example of the senior members of the family in the home nullifies to a large extent the effect of the instruction given in the school. What is needed in Burma is an intensive educational campaign amongst adults of all races, stressing the necessity for total abstinence on the part of individuals as the most effective way of closing a vast number of existing liquor shops, for no shop can remain long open when it has ceased to be patronised. In our distinguished guest we have a great example of one who not only preaches total abstinence and so it is with very sincere respect that we will listen to his message.

MAHATMAJI'S SPEECH.

Madam and friends.—I feel not a little embarrassed in having to address this meeting especially as I don't possess any knowledge of your activities. When I prepared to face this audience, I thought that I would have to meet all sorts of people who would come, some out of curiosity and others in order to know my views about temperance. But I feel that I am in front of an audience—if I may so name it—of specialists, for I hope that you are all specialists in this work. Madam you have suggested that if an educative campaign is carried on among the people and if as a consequence of that propaganda, people who are in the habit of drinking cease to visit liquor shops, there would be no liquor shops in existence.

I want to put before you my own experience without combating the view that has been suggested by you. My work in connection with temperance began as early as 1893 when I went to South Africa. When I saw the people, I mean my own countrymen, drinking and even women drinking who never could think of drinking in India, certainly not one of the many hundreds, if not thousands of women who were given to that deadly habit, I saw that the task was an up-hill task. These men and women were not prepared to listen to any lectures on temperance, much less to any personal advice. I saw too that some of them were perfectly ill-dressed because they were helpless. I adopted many measures, but such measures being worked within the competence of one man without any authority, I am not able to claim any degree of visible success for those measures.

Then there was a sort of Liquor Commission appointed by the Union Government after South Africa became a Union. I gave evidence or rather I wrote a note for that Commission but I am again sorry to have to inform you that nothing came out of it. The position in South Africa was and still remains somewhat curious. There are three degrees of drinking if one may so describe the state of drinking. There were those regulated by legislation the white race and the so-called race. They are prohibited from carrying bottles with them or from being served in canteens and yet they drink—this does not apply to all parts of the Union and I am not going to take you through the variety of legislation applied to the different provinces of the Union. Indians may not be served with bottles, they may not take liquor away, but they may drink as much as they like in the canteen with the result, especially to women, that I have described. The white men are, of course, free. There is no legislation in connection with them. But you may guess that I would like to say that the source of this evil comes from this freedom of the white man in South Africa. He has also amassed a fortune out of the drink habit of the natives and so you have the anomaly of different legislation.

When I came to India I found the position very different from the position in South Africa in one respect, but the problem is essentially the same. There was, as you are aware, a hurricane campaign in 1920 and 1921 and you will not mind my saying to you that if we had then received the whole-hearted support from all those temperance organisations throughout the length and breadth of India, we would have achieved complete success. Of India I can speak from firsthand evidence and I can give you my own evidence as to whether this habit of drink is one that is ingrained in the people or whether it is a habit of the middle class people or of the aristocracy. It is not a habit with the aristocracy and certainly not with the middle class men. It is a habit imbibed and confined to the labourers and that essentially the factory hands. This is an interesting piece of evidence that I am giving you. Why do factory hands drink when there was no drink before they came to the factory. Then again as regards those men and women who went to work in South Africa, they were not drinking before, but the conditions there were made such and the temptations that were placed in their way were such that they became addicted to the habit of drink. When you talk to them they have no sense of shame for it. They say they are labourers, they will deceive you and talk lies; of all these things they are not ashamed. In Europe it will be ungentlemanly on my part if I don't stand you a drink when you come there. When I was a student there I would not care to enter a public house, nor did I like to see a drink bottle on my table, and so I summoned sufficient courage and thought if I can't get enough friends, I must go away without friends. that required some initiative and a great deal of courage. But that is not the case in India and herefore I suggest that it would be a wrong thing for you to say that education is to precede legislation. While that education will never cope with the evil, the evil will continue to grow and then you will find Indian ministers themselves as they are today getting up from their seats and saying, we can't forego this revenue, but you must go on educating. But we want to deprive ourselves of this revenue. About this revenue also there is a ragedy. The Ministers—it applies to Burma equally with India—should never have been placed in that embarrassing position. Excise belongs to the transferred departments. It should never have remained part of the central revenue (as is the case with foreign liquor) and then Government might at any moment have been called upon to do its duty and forego that revenue and declare complete prohibition.

When the great nation of America where drink was so common has tried prohibition, how much more easy in a place like India or Burma where liquor is not the fashion and where the vast majority of people don't want liquor, where if you take a referendum, you will get millions of signatures to it saying we want prohibition introduced. It is simply the obstinacy of the Government that will not forego the revenue. The revenue I know is 15 crores. But I suggest to you that instead of 15 crores even if it was 250 crores, it is a revenue which Government should take no pride in collecting. That revenue is being utilised for educating our children and the result is that a tremendous barrier is being erected day after day between this essential temperance legislation and ourselves because people begin to think that they will not be able to educate their children if they don't get this revenue. A whole nation like the Burmese or a nation of 300 millions might perish, because if the factories multiply and if people leave their hearths and homes, they are bound to become a prey to this habit. It was possible to educate public opinion in America, but it is not possible today to mobilise public opinion here where there is illiteracy and its handmaid superstition. If for a time the two things combined are allowed to go on, it will be utterly impossible to bring about any prohibition legislation and so you, especially, the women who are concerned with this temperance work, will take your courage into your hands and will also employ yourselves diligently to this question because I don't ask you to take as gospel truth what I told you but to take it as prima facie evidence of one who is endeavouring to tell a true story of what he knows and if you find it is more than confirmed then I suggest that you will make it your sacred business to carry on a whirlwind campaign for total prohibition. It is not a difficult task in itself, but it has become difficult because the rights that have been created upon this drink evil have become tremendously strong and the rights belong to the ruling race. That is why it has become a tremendous problem. If you discuss this problem with the administrators they will tell you all sorts of stories and put all sorts of difficulties in the way of carrying this legislation through. Don't believe those difficulties exist at all. There is no difficulty at all beyond the difficulty of making up deficit of revenue. I refuse to listen to the difficulty of deficit revenue. What is it to you and to me who are reformers of this accepted evil. If you and I make up our mind that this evil could be eradicated only by introducing prohibition legislation, then it is for the Government to make up this deficit and it is not open to you to suggest the method of making up that deficit. These suggestions have been made and there are answers to them also. Therefore I suggest to you to refuse to answer that question and it is better for you to take up this unassailable ground and say 'it is for you to find a substitute for this source of revenue and it is not for us to find.' Let it be enough for you to know that it is the duty of every temperance worker to prosecute a whirlwind campaign for prohibition and when the psychological moment comes, and I am praying for that moment and I can dot every liquor shop and opium den with pickets, I will then ask you to lend a helping hand. I tell you there is even now intensive picketting going on. We have selected the Bardoli District and been doing the work there because the people of that district have responded in a manner that was never expected of them. The people being responsive, we are undoubtedly carrying on that picketting but it is confined to that small bit of an area where we have acquired, as it were, a right or special qualification of service to people. It was a small compact body of reliable unimpeachable workers. When the opportunity comes, you will find the whole of India dotted with pickets and in Burma also Burmese men and ladies could, if they chose to, carry on picketting. It is a noble thing and as far as I can see it stares them in the face here as much as in India.

DR. MOONJI AND RIFLE SHOOTING.

The Editor, Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

In your issue of Feb. 2nd I read of Dr. Moonji's, scheme of making "rifle shooting a national game for the Indian youth, with the object of a revival and development of a healthy desire for big or small game shooting.....popularizing shikar", the idea being, that such qualities as are included in the term "manly" will be fostered by a taste for blood sports. This idea has probably gained ground from the deduction that manly races are keen "shikaris" but it is evidently not realized by the promoters of the idea, that amongst the most highly civilized of those races the opinion is steadily growing that blood sports are relics of barbarism, and that all such "sport" involving torture and death of harmless and defenceless creatures, is unworthy of the name, and in a generation or so will be prohibited, as some have been already.

Those who notice "signs of the times" in the daily papers here, observe that though blood sports are still indulged in to a great extent, that sportsmen do so in face of much criticism, and in many cases with the frank acknowledgement that they have no defence but the enjoyment of out-door exercise or companionship at the bottom of which is the indulging of the primitive instinct in man for shedding of blood and hunting for prey. A bill for prohibition of stag hunting is brought up again and again, and is not passed yet, but it will pass in time, and then will come the turn of fox hunting &c., already there are here and there in the country, owners of estates who forbid that any animal or bird be hunted or shot at in their domains. The prospect of coming youths of the Indian villages finding their enjoyment in prowling round and dealing death and mutilation amongst the harmless creatures of the jungle, is rather appalling.

(These remarks do not apply to animals that are harmful and dangerous). To seek to destroy that belief in the sacredness of life which is one of the glories of Hinduism is surely not a good deed.

Rifle shooting in itself no doubt gives scope for learning of useful qualities, but the required attributes could be better brought out in games and sports such as foot-ball. Heaven forbid the introduction into India of the idea, outworn in the West, that there is anything "manly" in blood-sports.

QUALIFIED DIVORCE—A NECESSITY.

(By Mr. D. CHITALE).

By the term "Qualified Divorce", I mean a divorce granted only under pressing circumstances in which it is found, after due consideration by legal men that the husband and wife are no longer in a position to pull on together and their safety and happiness depend upon separation. I do not want divorce to be cheap and easily obtainable but I want it to be granted only under dire circumstances. We know that in certain countries in the West divorce is as cheap as the buying of market commodities for we often see that married parties in some countries on the slightest pretext and difference of opinion go to the Court and get themselves divorced and are next day married; as if marriage is an experiment to be made daily so as to make it suit the everchanging habits of men and women. This kind of divorce is far from satisfactory and parental duties are utterly neglected. The experiment of not granting divorce has been tried by Hindu Society so long to the complete detriment of many a married couple who though very anxious to separate from each other permanently could not do so in the absence of divorce laws. It is no use blinding ourselves to the realities of the situation and live happy under the assumption that everything is going on smoothly. We often see members of the rich and even middle classes keeping prostitutes to the disgust of many a wife. We see that some ladies are brutally treated for entreating their husbands not to leave the house at night. Besides this polygamy is not unknown to Hindu Society, and the hardship inflicted on women by this system is too well-known to need recapitulation. Polygamy furnishes one of the strongest arguments for divorce.

The immediate inclusion of qualified divorce in the Hindu Law will alone solve this problem. The position of many Hindu women to-day is that they can neither divorce the husbands because at present there is no such provision in the Hindu Law nor can they live with them because the husbands do not want them. This is certainly a preposterous position and is the greatest injustice done to women as a class. It is only right that they should be granted divorce in such cases.

THE PEOPLING OF AUSTRALIA.*

Under the above title there has just appeared a volume consisting of eleven chapters by as many Australian scholars. These chapters are advance data papers for the third conference of the Institute of Pacific Relations. Probably the volume represents the outstanding interest of Australia in Pacific affairs. As the occupants of an underpopulated continent and as people uncommonly well aware of the social implications of immigration they have made immigration restriction and control a central feature of public policy. In the interest of international understanding and goodwill they wish the world to understand their situation and their attitude.

A consideration of chapter titles and of the points of view of the authors is evidence as to the advanced state of public interest in Australia and of the disposition to approach the subject from many angles. The introductory chapter, entitled "The Australian Population Problem," is contributed by the editors, P. D. Phillips, Lecturer on Modern Political Institutions, and G. L. Wood, Senior Lecturer in Economics, both of the University of Melbourne. The remaining chapters are as follows:—

II. "Australian Population: Its Nature and Growth," by C. H. Wickens, Commonwealth Statistician.

III. "Australian Immigration Policy," by A. H. Charteris, Challis Professor of International Law, University of Sydney.

IV. "Immigration in Relation to Primary and Secondary Industries," by G. L. Wood.

V. "Some Eugenic Aspects of Australian Population Problems," by W. E. Agar, F. R. S., Professor of Zoology, University of Melbourne.

*Issued for the Institute of Pacific Relations. Edited by P. D. Phillips and G. L. Wood, Melbourne University Press, Melbourne, in association with Macmillan & Co., Ltd. 1928.

VI. "Racial Composition of the Australian People," by Jens Lyng, Commonwealth Bureau of Census and Statistics.

VII. "The Urbanization of Australian Population," by E. J. McPhee, Commonwealth Bureau of Census and Statistics.

VIII. "Climate Factors Affecting the Distribution and Limits of the Population of Australia," by Henry Barkley, Assistant Director (Research), Commonwealth Meteorological Bureau.

IX. "The White Settlement of Tropical Australia," by R. W. Cilento, M. D., Director, Division of Tropical Hygiene, Commonwealth Department of Health, Queensland.

X. "The Optimum Size of Population," by F. O. Benham, Ph. D., Senior Lecturer in Economics, University of Sydney.

XI. "The Economic Control of Immigration," by J. B. Bridgen, Professor of Economics, University of Tasmania.

Each writer is responsible for the views expressed. There is just about the degree of agreement and disagreement that one would expect under the circumstances. To an outsider it will appear that there is much agreement as to fundamentals, while the disagreements relate to minor matters.

A view of the more significant conclusions are as follows:—

1. Since 1860, 76 per cent of the increase of population has been by excess of births over deaths and only 24 per cent by immigration. Despite the fact that the birthrate is only moderate, Australia ranks high in the rate of natural increase by virtue of its low death rates—particularly its low infant mortality. Over a long period the average annual rate of gain by excess of births over deaths was $1\frac{3}{4}$ per cent.

2. In 1921 over 84 per cent of the population was Australian born and over 12 per cent were born in the British Isles.

3. The carrying capacity of Australia is much smaller than is suggested by its size. This is mainly on account of the amount and distribution of rainfall. Great areas are uninhabitable or able to support only a scanty population. Dr. Benham estimates ten to fifteen millions as the optimum population of Australia. Professor Griffith Taylor is quoted to the effect that if Australia were saturated as is Europe today, it could support sixty million people.

4. Despite the efforts to place immigrants on farms, the cities continue to grow more rapidly than the country. While the population of Australia increased by 22 per cent in the ten years, 1911-21, the number of persons engaged in the primary industries was reduced by a fraction of 1 per cent. On the other hand, there was a notable increase in the number engaged in commercial activities, in manufacture, in transportation and in the professions.

5. One of the chief problems of immigration arises from the fact that Australia wants immigrants to occupy her untilled lands, while most of those who want to come are unsuited to this program. As industrial workers they lack not only the capital but the aptitude and skill essential to success as pioneer farmers.

6. Queensland has demonstrated that white people of British stock can establish themselves successfully in the tropics. In the tropical parts of Queensland white men, largely of Queensland birth, perform all sorts of agricultural labor. The death rate for both men and women is low. Birth rates are normal and infant mortality low. This happy situation has been made possible by wise provisions for sanitation and medical treatment.

7. The people of Australia in general are not wholly united in their attitude toward immigration. The main line of cleavage is between employers who feel the need for more laborers or, possibly, for more docile labourers, and the working people whose purpose is to protect their standard of living and their status.

8. As Australian history goes the policy of immigration restriction and control is old. Before 1850 Australia had only a scanty population and it was almost exclusively British in origin. During the period of the great gold rush, 1851-1862, immigrants from other cultural and racial stocks began to come. Quite promptly the various states adopted measures which effectively restricted the movement. By the beginning of the present century the policy had been stabilized and the administrative procedure was about as it is now. At no time have large numbers of non-British people been permitted to make Australia their home. Moreover, it is a part of Australian policy to encourage immigration of men who will fit into the Australian economic system,—men who have the appropriate education and skill or, perhaps, capital.

This stands out in marked contrast to the practice of the United States, which had over fifty million people when it began, in a small way, to regulate immigration, and a hundred millions when it began seriously to restrict immigration and to select its immigrants.

While the statements of fact seem to explain Australian policy and attitudes pretty adequately, the editors emphasize the need for further scientific investigation relating especially to the optimum size of population, to Australia's carrying capacity, to urbanization, and to white settlement in the tropics.

Wholly aside from the practical issues involved, the social scientist and race biologist should welcome the Australian policy as an experiment in population control. The United States and the Spanish-American countries represent another sort of experiment. The future student may be able to draw some interesting conclusions by the comparative method.

The Australian, more than any other group, is helping to define the problems relating to immigration. This is but a part of the larger question of population control. With the rapid growth of population characteristic of our time, with the increasing ease and cheapness of movement, there is sure to be a growing interest in the whole matter. The world will be indebted to all the peoples who contribute to a clear understanding of the issues involved. The early publication of the volume makes it possible for all members of the Institute to read it in advance of the Kyoto Conference and it is well worth the time required for its reading.

MADRAS SEVA SADAN.

The Madras Seva Sadan which has grown out of the pre-existing Women's Home of Service, was recently thoroughly organised and is now located in a spacious building in Mylapore occupied till the other day, by the P. S. High School. Its principal aim is to succour helpless women and girls such as deserted wives or widows and give them such training as will render them self-reliant and self-supporting. With this object, the Home of the Seva Sadan is maintained for giving lodging and boarding. In the case of utterly poor persons, no fees are charged whatsoever, but where any girl has some relation or friend who can either wholly or partially support her, fees are charged according to the capacity of the candidate. The present strength of the Home is 32 exclusive of day-scholars and it is under the management of an efficient staff. Official and non-official visitors have spoken very highly of it and are entirely pleased with its working. Even women belonging to well-to-do and rich families attend (paying a small fee) classes conducted in the Home, where training is given in Rattan Work, Weaving, Lace-work, Jigno, Sewing, Cutting, Needlework and Music. Facilities are also provided for a limited number of paying women boarders, who may be studying in Colleges or engaged in teaching or other work.

One of the main objects of the Seva Sadan is to train women to become nurses and Midwives. To enable them to undertake the necessary training, general education is imparted (as a preliminary), literary subjects being taught up to the IV Form standard. Similarly, necessary preliminary instruction is imparted to enable women to be later trained as teachers. The Institution depends for its conduct entirely on the support of the public. The Hon'ble Mr. Justice Venkatasubha Rao has given a splendid donation of Rs. 10,000 to form the nucleus of a permanent endowment and the Rajah of Kollengode has promised a sum of Rs. 2,000. Besides, the Seva Sadan has been receiving substantial help from the public in the shape of subscriptions and donations. At present, annual donations amount to about Rs. 6,000. It is receiving in addition, grants to the extent of about Rs. 3,000 from the Industrial Department and other public bodies. But the work has been undertaken on a large scale, and to expand it in the manner, liberal help is still required. It is estimated that for the upkeep of the Home and the payment of the staff Rs. 20,000 per year is the minimum amount necessary.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

An Indian's Distinction at Cambridge:—His Excellency the Governor has offered his congratulations to Dr. Birbal Sahni D. Sc. (London), University Professor of Botany at Lucknow on the high distinction won by him recently. He has been awarded the D. Sc. degree of the University of Cambridge, which is the highest academic distinction in science in the power of that university. Prof. Sahni, says a correspondent, is the first Indian to achieve this rare honour. His labours in the field of palaeobotany and especially his researches on Indian fossils of plants have made him an authority on the subject in India and Europe alike. We too offer our congratulations to Dr. Sahni as well as to his distinguished father, Mr. Ruchi Ram Sahni.

An Orphanage In Calcutta:—The Forward of Calcutta writes:—Rapid strides mark the growth of the Maternity League from the original idea of a professional guild with social and cultural aspects into a social and cultural institution minus the idea of a professional guild. The League was started in August 1927 as an Association of the lady doctors, midwives and nurses of Calcutta for promoting the interests of its members and with social, cultural and humanitarian interests. Apathy soon set in and the membership gradually dwindled till it comprised only the secretary and just three or four others. The idea of a professional guild thus dropped out. The Secretary, however, stuck on to her charge with a religious tenacity and was able to build up, with her limited resources unlimited energy, a living adjunct to a moribund Association, in the shape of a free school for girls and little boys. This was started at 3J, Raja Nobokissen Street in October, 1927 and has since been progressing very well. Exactly a year later the Secretary started the experiment of an orphanage with a new-born foundling. Public support forthcoming the school and the orphanage are sure to grow into two very useful and indispensable institutions in Calcutta.

In Support of Prohibition:—At a recent meeting of the Total Abstainers' Fraternity, Madras, the following resolution in support of Rev. J. F. Edwards' memorandum to the Simon Commission was passed unanimously: "Resolved that the Total Abstainers' Fraternity, Madras, have read and desire to give hearty support to the "Appeal to the British Parliament and People through the Indian Statutory Commission" set forth in the Memorial to the Commission entitled India's Excise Demand, dated November 5, 1928, forwarded to the Commission by the Rev. J. F. Edwards of Bombay. They earnestly request the Indian Statutory Commission to recommend that India's future Constitution shall include provisions for ensuring that India's desire as expressed in that Appeal shall be granted."

Boys Leaders' Institute:—Workers among boys from the youth movements of many lands are being invited by the Y. M. C. A. to meet in Geneva on April 1st for a month's conference and study. The languages used by the 'Institute', as it is called, will be French, German and English, and those taking part will be enabled to profit by the knowledge and experience accumulated by national youth movements in different parts of the world. The courses will be handled by experienced boys' work leaders of various nationalities, and will include such subjects as the religious psychology of youth, programmes and methods of work with school-boys of various ages, with boys in industry and rural boys, camping, physical training, &c. Further information may be had from the Secretary, Mr. Tracy Strong, World's Committee of Y. M. C. A. S, 3 Rue General Dufour, Geneva, Switzerland.

Another Bust of Mr. Sastri:—A movement has been started in Johannesburg to establish a fund for the purchase of a bust of Mr. Sastri for the Johannesburg Art Gallery, writes the correspondent to "The Natal Witness" under date Johannesburg Jan. 17: The bust has been sculptured by a brilliant young Russian artist, Miss Miriam Syman, who has been working in Johannesburg for the past year. In the opinion of many well-known critics Miss Syman has secured one of the most striking representations of Mr. Sastri that is ever likely to be secured, more strikingly true to life than that made by Mr. Kottler of Capetown. Mr. Sastri gave Miss Syman a special sitting, but the young sculptress was not satisfied, and followed him at every meeting he held in Johannesburg until she was certain she had obtained a representation of him true in every detail. Miss Syman studied in Russia and Germany and received instruction from a pupil of the famous sculpter Rodin.

The N. M. Wadia Charities:—The Statement of income and charity expenditure for the year 1927-1928, (from 1-8-1927 to 31-7-1928) is as follows:—Income from rents of Properties Rs. 3,37,342-3-2. From dividends of Shares Rs. 1,27,997-18-6. Interest on Government Promissory Notes Rs. 81,100. Interest on Port Trust Bonds Rs. 41,682. Refund of Income Tax Rs. 8,484-11-0. Proceeds of Parel Mangoes, Rs. 370. Grand Total of income Rs. 5,96,926-11-8. Expenditure Account:—(1) Marriage of Poor Maids Rs. 6,245. (2) Navjote of Parsi Boys and Girls Rs. 1,700. (3) Maintenance and education of Orphans Rs. 12,303-13-3. (4) Hospitals Rs. 5,472. (5) Relief of Poor and Distressed Rs. 77,028-12-5. (6) Natural Calamities Rs. 49,620. (7) Care and Protection of Animals Rs. 15,000. (8) Education Rs. 123,045-5-3. (9) Amboli Development Rs. 4,555-0-6. (10) Miscellaneous and unspecified Charities Rs. 66,492-15-6. Grand total of Expenditure Rs. 4,12,462-14-11.

NOTES.

Inter-Communal Amity Conference:—
A new approach to the communal question in this country is suggested by the "Inter-communal Amity Conference" which met yesterday in connection with the 62nd anniversary of the Bombay Prarthana Samaj. It was at first intended to name it the Conference of Religious Thinkers, with a sub-title pointing to inter-communal amity as one to which attention should be specially directed, but it has been finally decided to call it simply "the Inter-Communal Amity Conference". The declaration to be signed by every member, however, lays down that the object of the Conference is to promote inter-communal amity and the Conference will strive to attain this object by confining its activities to eradicating all points of conflict arising out of supposed religious differences and upholding by right conduct the ideal of human brotherhood." The Conference, in other words, is to promote inter-communal amity by operating on the religious consciousness of the several communities. This is a very necessary attempt at the present time when many minds disgusted with the squabbles between Hindus and Mussalmans, and erroneously attributing them to religious differences, are tending to adopt the view that religion as such is anti-social and opposed to progress and, therefore, there is no place for it in the national movement. This is more or less the official policy of Soviet Russia as it was of the French Revolution. The Chinese Nationalists seem to be inclined to it, while the Turkish reformers seem latterly to aim at a reform of religion rather than its elimination from national life. The Fascist regime in Italy has just concluded a Treaty with the Vatican, recognising the sovereign character of His Holiness the Pope and undertaking to enforce the canon law throughout Italy. It is generally admitted that Signior Mussolini has done much to stabilise the Fascist regime thereby. We are ourselves of the opinion that the State cannot ignore Religion without impairing its usefulness to the people. The proceedings of the first session of the Inter-Communal Amity Conference will be watched with great interest, as it may prove to be the starting point of a new stage in Indian nationalism.

The Political Situation:—A somewhat startling development has taken place in the political situation during the last fortnight. On the 21st instant, Bombay learnt that many places had been searched by Police and several arrests had been made in the City of persons prominently associated with the Left wing of the Labour movement, and this was followed by messages from other parts of the country reporting similar occurrences. It transpired that all these searches and arrests were made on warrants issued by the District Magistrate of Meerut in the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh with whom a complaint had been lodged on the orders of the Government of India of a conspiracy to deprive the King of his sovereignty of India under section 121 A of the Indian Penal Code. A few days previously, Mahatma Gandhi had been arrested in Calcutta on a charge under the local Police Act of disobeying the order of the Police Commissioner forbidding the burning of foreign cloth in a public place. He was allowed to leave for Burma on his own recognizance, and returned to Calcutta to stand his trial last Tuesday when the Chief Presidency Magistrate fined him one rupee. Mahatma's statement in the Court is printed elsewhere. Another prosecution has been launched in Bombay against Mr. K. P. Khadilkar, Editor of the Nava Kal, a Marathi daily newspaper, for sedition in writing an article which was understood to suggest that Government had a hand in stirring up the recent riots in the City. The case was tried by Mr. Justice Blackwell and a special Jury at the Bombay High Court. Mr. Khadilkar pleaded that he had no intention of bringing Government into hatred or contempt and was merely refuting the Times of India's contention that the riots were caused by Bolshevik influence. The Jury found him guilty by a majority of 6 to 3 and the Judge accepting the verdict sentenced him to one year's simple imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 2,000. As Mr. Khadilkar is a writer of repute in Maharashtra, the Nava Kal has acquired a considerable position as an organ of opinion in that area, and his conviction has naturally created much sympathy. There is a general feeling that these prosecutions have been undertaken as part of a policy of using the ordinary law to put down extreme opinions.

Divorce in Hinduism:—Once more social legislation is being contemplated in Baroda. This time it is an attempt to introduce divorce in Hindu marriage. However reluctant even social reformers may be to advocate its introduction it must be admitted that some provision must be made for extreme cases. The Baroda Gazette contains a Bill for circulation and the draft, according to the Times of India correspondent, has attached to it a statement giving for each of its provisions the Sastric authority and the marriage laws of Great Britain, United States of America, Germany, Japan, France, Italy, Russia, Canada and other countries. The Bill will apply only to Hindus, but the term includes Jains, Buddhists and Sikhs—in short all the communities who till now had not accepted divorce as a general principle. The courts shall have jurisdiction under the proposed Act only if a party praying for any relief under it is domiciled in the State at the time of the suit and in case of a suit for dissolution of marriage only if the marriage has been solemnised in the State or the cause of action has arisen in the State. A wife or husband instead of asking for a dissolution of marriage might present a suit for judicial separation on several other grounds in addition to any of the grounds specified for divorce. When a wife obtains a decree of judicial separation, property acquired by her or vesting in her from the date of the decree shall be considered as her own and the husband shall have no right over such property during her lifetime, while on the other hand, the husband shall not be liable for any acts committed by the wife. The bill also lays down detailed regulations with regard to alimony, marriage settlements and the custody of children. The Bill is not the first of its kind as Sir Hari Sing Gour has introduced a similar one in the Assembly but it will come as a surprise to many. Even the advocates of divorce have not been quite clear about the particular system they favoured and apart from the vague statement that "divorce must not be cheap" they have not worried over much to state their ideal. We wonder whether the remark said to occur in the note appended to the Bill that "it is necessary to provide persons with the legal means of divorce as sometimes husbands and wives are unable to maintain harmonious marriage relations" does not indicate a divorce bill of a very advanced type—even in Great Britain this alone would not constitute a sufficient ground for divorce—and we believe that in the present state of society, such a system would inflict greater hardship on Hindu women than help them to live happier lives. We, however, trust that with suitable modifications the Bill will be passed in Baroda and that British India will soon follow suit.

Children's Aid Society:—The second annual report of the Children's Aid Society was adopted at the General meeting held on Thursday last with the new president of the Society, the Governor of Bombay, in the chair. The period under survey marks the progress the Society has made during the second year of its existence. The number of children admitted at the Umar-khadi Home during last year was 588, and with the previous year's figures brought up the total to 967. The chief offences for which the juveniles are detained are petty thefts and begging. The girls admitted into the Home formed only 15 per cent of the total number and they were the victims of bad individuals and environment. As the result of the operation of the Bombay Children's Act which is restricted in its scope, the following suggestions have been made: (1) the Amendment of the Bombay Children's Act so as to widen the scope of protection afforded and to extend the period of commitment to school; (2) increased accommodation in certified schools; and the establishment of a Junior Reformatory School near the Umar-khadi Home. The facts mentioned above cannot but convince the public of the excellent work the Institution for the care of the juvenile offenders has been doing. A juvenile offender is a potential criminal; by nipping his evil tendencies in the bud and by proper care and education the opportunities for honest and useful citizenship are placed within his reach. Saving of child life must be the first consideration of the public of Bombay and this they cannot do better than to help to build up the Children's Aid Society with their help and service.

Tuberculosis in India:—Dr. Munsiff, Director of Public Health, delivered an illuminating lecture on "Tuberculosis in India" in Poona recently in which he dealt with the evils which flourished in particular communities. Speaking of the incidence of tuberculosis in India, he said that this disease had been propagated here by social customs more than by anything else, and it was more prevalent among women than men, being largely the result of early marriages, the purdah system and the custom of eating out of one plate. India was physically, but not intellectually, bankrupt, and the physique of the Indian was not strong enough to stand the strain of present conditions where we breed, rear and feed a man on the tenth century principles so that he cannot stand the strain of the twentieth century civilisation. He pointed out that the Indian climate was not at all unfavourable to Europeans and that many of the ills for which the climate is blamed were really due to the Europeans' own ignorance. He further condemned the European habit of eating heavy meals and drinking port wine as both were injurious to health. He deplored the custom of cousin marriages, stated that among the Parsis this custom had a decidedly evil effect and pointed out that it brought about mental and physical deterioration. In conclusion he asserted that Public Health was a far more important department than the Medical Department and its interests ought not to be subordinated to those of the Medical Department as prevention was more important than the cure of diseases; and he pointed out that the health problems with which some of the Western countries were confronted were far greater than any that India had to face.

Commercialised Vice in Bombay:—A deputation of Bombay Presidency Women's Council waited on the Governor of Bombay and presented a manifesto published elsewhere, urging the necessity of adopting immediate measures for the abolition of vice areas in the City. They have stated in the manifesto that their demand is no new one but only the "redemption of the promise of 1923". The Prostitution Act penalised brothel-keeping by men but not by women. It is to remedy this glaring defect in the law that the public in the Bombay City have been agitating in vain. The deputations further demand that all brothels must be closed down within three years, an interval allowed for the deportation of foreign women and up-country girls. It is high time that the Bombay Government awoke to a sense of duty in ridding the City of the moral pest.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, MARCH 30, 1929.

CASTE CONFERENCES.

The Kayasthas like the Brahmins and the Banias are one of the literary Hindu castes. Theirs is an instance of a caste originally rather low in the social scale having by dint of industry and ability raised itself to an equality with if not superiority to the other two castes in the parts of the country where it is most largely distributed. The All-India Kayastha Conference held its 35th annual session yesterday at Delhi with Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha, late Finance Member of the Government of Bihar and Orissa as President. The address which Mr. Sinha delivered on the occasion is a characteristically comprehensive review of the progress hitherto achieved by the caste, with a sketch of what is urgently needed for its progress at present and in the future. It is besides full of suggestion to social reformers generally, in keeping with Mr. Sinha's view that caste conferences are beneficial only if they steadily keep in view that castes are a part of a larger whole, and mould their policy so as to assist and not to hinder the progress of the whole. Mr. Sinha, as one who has long ceased to observe the limitations of caste, felt necessary to make clear his own position at the outset with reference to the principle and policy of caste conferences. After considering both sides of the question, Mr. Sinha declared himself to be in agreement with Munshi Iswar Saran's opinion that "there is nothing inherently objectionable in a nationalist identifying himself with a caste movement, provided, of course, his real motive is to serve the whole through the part. As long as castes exist, these caste movements, if wisely guided and controlled, can be made to render effective and useful service." To leave caste movements wholly to conservative and orthodox leadership, will only result in hardening and narrowing caste exclusiveness.

The late Sir Ramakrishna Bhandarkar, while conceding that caste conferences might be useful in introducing social reforms within the caste, pointed out that "the assertion of the exclusiveness of the community involved in the holding itself of a conference or the running of a club serves to harden the caste distinction instead of softening them. Hence these conferences and clubs are retrogressive in my opinion, for in our meetings and our conferences we should accustom ourselves to be guided only by the feelings of a united nation." Those who believe that caste is wrong in principle and harmful in its effect, as Dr. Bhandarkar did as a leader of the Hindu Theistic movement, cannot consistently with their principles participate in a caste movement. The problem so stated seems insoluble, but the broadening influence of time on the castes themselves have changed the conditions of the problem and has to a large extent eliminated the problem itself. Mr. Sinha's own case is an excellent illustration. He said he had attended only two previous sessions of the Conference and that was a long time back. He continued:—

The first was in 1892 when the Conference was held at Benares, shortly on my return after my call to the Bar, and the second in 1901, when I attended the session held at Lucknow. On both these occasions a great deal of the time of the Conference was devoted to a discussion, mostly in the lobbies, as to how to devise effective means of getting rid of me, without hurting my feelings, on the ground of my having been to Europe. I need not tell you that both the Benares and the Lucknow Conferences found in me rather a tough creature to deal with and, in spite of considerable opposition to my taking part in their deliberations, I held my ground successfully and exercised on both occasions my right as a member. That this Conference has, in the interval of the last thirty years, so far changed its mentality as to have offered me the presidential chair on the present occasion, shows the great advance in the mental outlook of the community, which should be a matter of satisfaction and gratification to all lovers of Indian progress, irrespective of the particular community to which one may belong.

When Dr. Bhandarkar made his observation many years ago about the danger of caste movements, the influence of liberal ideas on the castes themselves had but faintly revealed itself. He did not foresee that the time must come when, so far from the reformer compromising with his caste, his caste will open its arms to the reformer, as the Kayastha Conference has done to Mr. Sinha, and other castes to their members in similar circumstances. Those who maintain that Hindu castes are immovably conservative are not observant of the signs of the times. Several reforms which evoked angry protests at the end of the last century have now been tacitly accepted and become part of Hindu conservatism. Who ever thinks of excommunication in connection with sea-voyage and foreign travel nowadays? The remarriage of widows which aroused the most bitter opposition is now acquiesced in as a personal matter and causes scarcely a ripple on the surface of society. Even the Marwari community is confronted with the risk of a serious split if it persists in its opposition to the remarriage reform. The fact is that the religious, social, political and industrial movements which for many years flowed in separate channels have become merged in a broad national movement and it is no longer possible for a reactionary in any one of these spheres to be a leader in any other of them.

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XIII. THE POOR.

(BY DR. CLIFFORD MANSHARDT, PH.D.).

There are several common methods of dealing with the problem of poverty. One way is to ignore it. A second way is to recognise it but to do nothing about it. A third way is to endeavour to overcome it. The majority of our so-called good citizens are still ignoring the problem. Though the fine residential section may be but a step removed from the slums, few of its inhabitants ever make the crossing. The greater portion shut their eyes and live as though the question of poverty did not exist. A second group is fully aware that poverty exists, but it regards it as a necessary evil. It talks much about the "blessings of poverty", and the "strength of character developed by those who are poor". Now we shall agree that many poor people are people of estimable character, but many of us also know the difficulties against which they have struggled to attain to this eminence. Character has been achieved in spite of poverty and not because of it. Fortunately, however, there is a growing third group which not only recognises the problem of poverty but also attempts to do something about it. The difficulty is that the enthusiasm of this group often exceeds its wisdom. Unscientific measures of relief too frequently result in pauperisation and in reducing the recipient to the state of a permanent dependent. "Give to him that asketh thee", may be good advice, but our modern life has become so complex that it is both impossible and impractical to attempt to deal with the problem of poverty by handing out doles. It is for this reason that our many agencies of public welfare have come into being. By contributing to those agencies, with their trained staffs and scientific methods of relief, we are coupling sympathy with wisdom. The highest type of relief is that which enables the individual to help himself and to maintain his own self respect. It represents the co-operation of the helper and the helped. The victory over poverty cannot be won for the poor, it must be won with the poor. The strong must bear the burdens of the weak, but the weak must also bear their own burdens to the full extent of their ability.

Relief measures, however, are but one step in the process. The social worker who moves in and out among the homes of the poor finds a feeling of bitterness towards the existing social order. "A society that allows such gross inequalities cannot be either just or sympathetic. The only hope for the future lies in its reorganisation or in its complete overthrow". To change this spirit into a spirit of co-operation demands much more than an offering of palliatives—it means the probing of our social organization to its inmost depths.

The prevention of poverty is not simply an idle dream, it is an economically sound proposition. It calls for new insights into education, politics, human nature, religion, and morals. It calls for a changing of personal habits and for a reorganisation of institutions. It is a task of the greatest magnitude, but because it is so difficult, it is a most appealing one. The recognition of poverty as a remediable evil is so new that the idea has not yet penetrated the public consciousness. But the leaves are stirring, and soon the movement will go forward with the rush of a mighty wind.

THE SCOPE OF THE NON-BRAHMIN MOVEMENT.

The Editor, the Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Regarding the scope of the Non-Brahmin movement here, the Reformer of the 16th instant observes: "When the native Brahmin had been swept out of his vantage ground, it will be time to deal with the white Brahmin". It also refers to the fact that due to "the combined efforts of non-Brahmin Hindus, British officials and non-officials... the Brahminical monopoly (of subordinate offices in the Government services) has been effectively broken throughout Peninsular India". It is time, therefore, "to deal with the white Brahmin (the Britisher)".

May I respectfully draw your attention to certain facts which go, to a large extent, to clear up the situation? They are as under:—

(a) The Non-Brahmin leaders have ousted Brahmins from their position of vantage, as you yourself admit, with the help of British officials. It is true Mussalmans and Indian Christians also joined the Non-Brahmins in carrying out their object. But it is an open secret that, without the active support of the Government, the Non-Brahmin leaders whatever might have been their standing in the country, could not have done anything in the matter. This is no dogmatic assertion but a fair conclusion deducible from the first achievement of the leaders themselves, namely, the ousting of Brahmins from subordinate offices in Government Services which it is fair to admit, they have done only with the help of British officials. This is a point, I beg to state, which has been lost sight of in ascertaining the future possibilities of the movement.

(b) You seem to think that the broad-basing of the movement, as evinced at the Self Respect Conference, Chingleput, very recently, would make it so powerful and strong as "to deal with the white Brahmin" most successfully in days to come. But some of the resolutions passed at the Conference, like those relating to the abolition of temples and the giving-up of the time-honoured custom of worshipping God and the wearing of caste-mark and, last but not least, the attacks made on Avatars, Siva, Samayacharyas, the Ramayana the Mahabharatham et hoc genus omne, by Mr. E. V. Ramaswamy Naicker and his co-workers have undermined greatly the moral and political assets of the movement as seen from the activities of the newly-started Sangam, namely, the Madras Asthika Sangam. If things do not take a better turn in the near future, one is afraid that, the incorporated Nihilism in the movement alone is sure to estrange the sympathies of a large body of Non-Brahmins in the country and, consequently, the dislodgment of the 'white Brahman' from his monopolistic position will be a thing more to be talked about than acted upon in future.

And (c) the Britisher is not a docile weak man to be easily trampled upon as is imagined. He is a dogged fighter and will not lower his flag till the last chances of victory are declared against him. The Chamber of Princes has already placed its trump card on the table, viz., that the adjustment of all political relations between British India and the Native States in future should be made on the basis of British connection. The factions and differences in British India alone are factors showing Britain's strong-hold over the country. It is idle to dream that what a politically unified and racially compact country like Egypt has not been able to achieve so far in the political sphere, will be accomplished by a conglomeration of races and creeds called India and much less by a sectional movement like the present one.

I beg to state that I do not write these lines in a carping spirit. The difficulties are pointed out just to show the stupendous nature of the problem the solution of which, as you write in your leader, rightly forms the Holy Grail of the valiant knights of the Non-Brahmin Round Table.

MAHATMA GANDHI'S TRIAL IN CALCUTTA.

The trial of Mr. Gandhi and others in connection with the Shradhdhanand Park bonfire took place on the 26th morning before the Chief Presidency Magistrate, Calcutta. Mr. Gandhi was charged with the abetment of an offence against the Calcutta Police Act. He was convicted and was ordered to pay a fine of rupee one. Mr. Gandhi made the following statement:—

"Occupying the position that I do in the public life of the country, it is necessary for me to give an explanation to the Court and the public of my conduct which is the subject matter of this prosecution. I am the Chairman of the Foreign Cloth Boycott Committee appointed by the Working Committee of the Indian National Congress and the scheme of the boycott is, whenever it is possible, to collect and burn foreign cloth. Therefore, I naturally advised the collection and burning of foreign cloth at a meeting that was held at Shradhdhanand Park. The notice of the Commissioner of Police came upon me and my colleagues as a disturbing factor and we saw at once that it was not meant for the protection of property from fire, but it was meant to prevent a demonstration and it was open to us to conduct the burning demonstration at a private place. But, two lawyers came to the conclusion that the interpretation sought to be put upon section 66 of the Police Act by the Police was open to question, if not altogether wrong.

NO IDEA TO DEFY POLICE.

"We, therefore, decided to conduct a full demonstration at the Park as advertised and ran the risk of prosecution and of the police interpretations being tested in a court of law. This boycott was not a part of civil disobedience and there was no intention to defy the police notice for sake of defiance or to court imprisonment. I made this absolutely clear in English within the hearing of the police at the meeting before I started setting fire to foreign cloth. I believe the Deputy Commissioner of Police was present when I was speaking. I was, therefore, surprised and deeply pained to see the police, after the burning was well over, swoop down upon the crowd surrounding the fire, charge it with big lathis, disperse it and put out dying embers. The rest of the painful scene I will not describe, though I shall gladly answer questions if the Court so desires.

"I venture to submit that by taking the law into their own hands, especially in spite of my very clear statement above referred to, the police put themselves in a wrong position and changed places with us; and they should be the accused and my colleagues and I be the complainants. I have, before now, in other parts of the world, been obliged to differ from the police interpretation of law and act contrary to their notice; but they have recognised the practice of testing points involved in law courts without, in the first instance, prejudicing the issue and thus running the risk of themselves breaking the law and—what is more—of inviting a disturbance of the public peace. I affirm that the crowd was absolutely peaceful and extremely well behaved. There was no danger to neighbouring property from the little fire that was lighted. The site chosen for the bonfire was completely isolated. It was, therefore, the duty of the police to refrain from interfering with a peaceful and orderly demonstration. Their interference, in my opinion, was exceedingly premature, extremely highhanded and uncalled for. In putting out the fire, they usurped the function of the Court and anticipated its judgment.

"I ask Your Worship, upon stating the facts I have mentioned, to discharge me and my colleagues and take such notice of the conduct of the police as may be open to you; and this discharge I ask irrespective of the interpretation the Court may put upon the section with which I am charged. On the question of interpretation, Mr. Sen Gupta was one of the lawyers referred to in my speech at the Shradhdhanand Park.

NOT A THOROUGHFARE.

"After having had another argument with him, I am clear in my mind that Shradhdhanand Park is neither a street nor a thoroughfare. This is the meaning of the Section, since it is not the intention so far as possible of foreign cloth boycott further to offer civil disobedience in connection with the campaign. I must leave argument to Mr. Sen Gupta. As to three of my colleagues who are charged with the primary offence, I should like to state that burning was actually started by me. If, therefore, any offence has been committed by any of us the prime offence has been committed by me and the others are secondary offenders".

KANARA SARASWATS' MEETING.

The following account of a meeting of the Saraswat community held on Sunday is extracted from the Bombay Chronicle :—

It was only two years ago thanks to the active efforts of the Kanara Saraswat Association a 'Social Conference' was held and radical resolutions were passed. But these resolutions fell flat on the orthodox section on whose behalf it was contended that the spiritual head of the community His Holiness Shri Anandashram Swami of Chitrapur Muth, had not accorded his approval and sanction to these reforms. Recently it was felt that if pressure of public opinion was brought to bear upon His Holiness he might give sanction to the reforms urged by the community and the progress would thus be accelerated.

The first step in this direction was taken on Sunday last at a meeting convened to urge His Holiness to remove the ban ex-communicating England-returned 'Saraswats' and their relations who are also declared as unfit for social communion. Although this was an extremely modest demand, the orthodoxy attended the meeting in full force, and opposed the resolution tooth and nail but in the end they sustained a defeat. This will be followed by demands such as the sanction for widow remarriages, raising of marriageable age for girls to 15, etc.

Mr. R. S. Padhadri in moving the first resolution respectfully urging His Holiness Shrimat Anandashram Swamiji to convene at an early date a Mahasabha to reconsider the resolutions of the last two Mahasabhas of 1896 and 1907 about Foreign Travel, etc., and to consider such other questions affecting the welfare of the Muth and the community including the reconstruction of the Muth and Mahasabha, put forward a vigorous plea of abolishing old and antiquated customs such as ex-communication of foreign-returned individuals as well as those who abet in such travels which might have been appropriate in the eighteenth century and it was disgraceful and degrading to allow such a ban to stand on the statute book of the Muth at the present moment. He remarked. "In our veneration for this defunct form of social structure, we have forgotten the true ideal of Hinduism. In our zeal and blind faith in the rigid enforcement of rules of social conduct fixed for all time to come, we have challenged Nature's principle of growth and were lagging behind centuries". He therefore urged on the community to unitedly place their demands before His Holiness and invoke his co-operation in completely abolishing these customs which stood in the way of progress. The resolution was supported by a number of speakers.

LADIES SUPPORT THE DEMAND.

A number of ladies who were present heartily supported the idea. The orthodoxy battalion was up in arms again. It found recruits from amongst the so-called social reformers like Rao Bahadur Talimiki and Mr. G. Annajirao.

The position on behalf of the Saraswat Youths was made absolutely clear by Messrs. H. Kulkarni and S. R. Sharma. Mr. Sharma in his speech declared that they stood for a radical social revolution and not an evolution at a snail's pace. Above all he condemned the timid halting policy of the elders. The resolution was passed by an overwhelming majority.

DISCUSSION ON RACIAL RELATIONSHIPS.

The Rev. G. B. Thompson, Pastor, Methodist Episcopal Church, Karachi, has sent us the following :—The following is a summary of a discussion which took place at the Karachi Y. M. C. A. on Monday March 1st. 1929. At the outset it was stated that the problem of adjusting the proper relations between the various races is easily one of the most difficult and sensitive of our age. The solution offered is that which was recommended by the enlarged meeting of the International Missionary Council held at Jerusalem in the spring of 1928 and may be stated as follows.

1. The belief in and practice of the sacredness of personality as taught by Jesus Christ.
2. The principle of the sacredness of personality is applicable to the whole of men's life and relationship.

By way of Review, as is often pointed out, it is indeed remarkable that Christian Leaders from 57 countries should gather on such a sacred spot as the Mount of Olives to discuss and resolve to act upon fearlessly the real implications of the Gospel of Christ in relation to our modern life. Indeed the fearless application of the mind of the Christian church as to the true meaning of the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man will most certainly solve our most acute economic, social and moral difficulties.

THE CHINESE.

The CHINESE, because of their large numbers and the remarkable capacity which they have shown through many centuries of adjustments are an outstanding example of need. China has been going through the following four great revolutions within recent years. (1) Political. She has changed from an Absolute Monarchy to a Republic and back to a Monarchy again, followed by the more recent attempts at a Government more responsible to the people. (2) Educational. The educational system has changed from the old memory test as to the laws of Confucius to that of the modern university with its legal requirements. (3) Industrial. China has also been in the throes of the industrial change that inevitably came when in contact with the outside world. The ambition of western powers to profit by her marvellous resources of materials and cheap labour have brought on her the determined effort that China shall be for the Chinese.

CHINA FOR THE CHINESE.

China for the Chinese has meant the demand for a change in the existing custom-laws of China. Other nations concerned have been wise enough to yield largely to these demands. Their wisdom and patience in dealing with the Chinese at the time of their great uncertainty is but a wise recognition of the great destiny of China as a nation among the other nations of the world.

THE NEGROES.

Even a brief treatment of the Negro would be incomplete without considering his home in the vast continent of Africa. Lying as it does on the south-side of the great middle sea which separates it from the continent of Europe. Since time immemorial Africa has been over-run by her northern neighbour. To-day in fact there are only 2 small countries namely Liberia and Abyssinia which are not under the control of protection of some foreign power. Again Africa has vast material resources. It is undoubtedly for the acquisition of these that the white-man has persistently penetrated her forest and eventually built railways and other means of communications. So to-day Magistrates have taken the place of Chiefs and the whites with their different ideals of land ownership control 88 per cent of the land area of this vast continent and the Blacks, the remaining 12 per cent. With the increased recognition however of the claims of the people born and bred on the land itself, even Lord Curzon recognized that the time had arrived for sharing the vast accumulations of natural wealth with the people who for centuries have lived on the soil. Mr. Wilson called it "the self-determination of nation". The enthusiastic democrat of an earlier day cried out for "equal rights for all and special privileges for none".

It was Mr. Gandhi who said to Dr. Stanley Jones "practice your religion, do not tone it down, then it will be irresistible". In fact the only hope of our adjusting peaceably the relationships between races anywhere to-day is the application of the Golden Rule "Do unto others as ye would that they should do unto you". Instead of the white-man being controlled by fear lest he lose the major control over vast resources of man and material whether in Africa or in other countries, let him be gracious enough to share what he has accumulated by his powers of organizations and superior knowledge of science and labour together for the up-building of the peoples as a faithful steward from God the maker of all.

THE NEGRO IN THE UNITED STATES.

The Negro was taken from Africa to the southern part of the United States that he might labour on the cotton and sugar-cane plantations. He was brought as a slave and remained as such until freed by the Civil War of 1861 to 1865. The Emancipation Proclamation made by Abraham Lincoln in 1863 proved the magna charta of his civil liberties. The results of slavery however left him at a disadvantage for he was not able to shake off at once his slave mentality. He had the advantage however of being in contact with the teachings of Jesus Christ which at heart stood for his civil and religious liberties along with liberty of all man-kind. The Negro being by nature deeply religious often resorted to song and prayer to express his religious feeling and to find comfort from his servitude. The Negro's Spirituals so popular in our day are the outcome of the fine re-action of the Negro to the hard lot in which he lived. The following figures show how thorough he re-acted to religion.

In 1800 there were only 50,000 Negro church members in U. S. A.

In 1860, there were 468,000 Negro church members in U. S. A.

In 1916 there were 4,680,000 Negro church members in U. S. A., or 45 per cent of all the Negro population at that time.

The improvement in his relations lies in 2 ways. (1) The Negro has been exceptionally keen in taking advantage of every opportunity for self improvement. While school privileges have been inadequate, Negro children walk for miles to attend Day-Schools. Their hearts always thrill with the story of Abraham Lincoln and others who have laboured for their freedom. The life story of Booker T. Washington is an outstanding example of what one poor boy did in the face of tremendous handicaps both socially and economically. He fought his way to the top and lifted many others by his sheer determination and faith in God. It is literally true "A good man cannot be kept down". (2) The White man in the Southern States has gradually come to realize his responsibility toward the Negro. Not only must he help the Negro, for the sake of the Negro, but he must help the Negro for his own sake. As Washington said all too truly "One cannot hold a man in a ditch without being there with him". Furthermore the Southern Whites are realizing that God does not have one set of Ethics for the White-man with his White neighbour and another set of Ethics for the White-man with his Negro neighbour but rather that "the principle of the sacredness of personality is applicable to the whole of men's life and relationship, and that "do unto others as ye would that they should do unto you" applies equally to all.

REVIEW.

"INDIA IN BONDAGE". Her Right to Freedom. By J. T. Sunderland, M.A., D.D., published by Ramchand Chatterjee, 91 Upper Circular Road, Calcutta Price (1926). Rs. 5.

Few of us will question Dr. Sunderland's right to write this book before us, in view of the fact, that for forty years, he has been a constant student of India's great religions, extensive literature, philosophy, remarkable art, long history, her pressing vital, present-day, social and political problems, that he made extensive tours, once in 1895-96, and again in 1913 and 1914, covering a distance of 13,000 miles under great personal hardships, visiting missionaries, officials, businessmen and prominent Indians, and conferring with leaders of religious and political parties, that he has made good his opportunities for enquiries in several small towns and cities and for direct contact with all classes, India's problems, and actual conditions, that he for a period of 6 years in 1914 to 1919, enjoyed the unique privilege and honour of intimate association with that distinguished Indian leader, Lala Lajpat Rai, that he undertook lecturing tours in Canada and U. S. A., on India's vital problems, and that in the preparation of this magnum opus, he has taken the trouble to consult 70 books and 200 writers, including literary authors and journalists.

It is a good sign of the times that more and more of Western curiosity is in evidence in Eastern matters, and unless it is satisfied in a reasonable manner by fair and authoritative information, there is every likelihood—and danger too—of mutual ill-will and strife. Now and then surprises are sprung upon us by sensational books of the ilk of "Mother India", indulging in fallacies like "suppressio Veri" and suggestio falsi", and in deliberate calumnies besides. In a way Dr. Sunderland's book may be taken as a reply, though the author might not have meant it so. The author's task has been rendered holier, more comprehensive, more sympathetic, and therefore nobler and more valuable. It is a thorough and searching analysis of the psychological difficulties, behind the Westerner's inability to understand Indian ideals and aspirations, and to expose the true nature of the misconceptions caused thereby.

Said John Bright as early as the 18th Century, "If a country be found possessing a most fertile soil and capable of bearing every variety of production yet notwithstanding, the people are in a state of extreme destitution and suffering, the chances are, there is some fundamental error in the government of that country". To this task of detecting the error, Dr. Sunderland sets himself and suggests a masterly remedy i. e. freedom for Indians to live a life in India in the manner it is lived by the English in their country. Considered on all counts, the alien rule is a crime, and examined from all points of view, self-rule is a virtue and a duty. It may appear an axiom but Dr. Sunderland's exposition is popular and scholarly, simple but telling, and convincing alike to the ruler and the ruled. His treatment of the subject is more "Objective" than subjective, and lets others, mostly un-impeachable authorities speak, keeping his own self in the back-ground. On this account,

I trust, it is verily a gospel of self-determination for India and should be owned by every Indian.

The book consists really of three parts. The first part is taken up with an examination of India's right to freedom and an assertion of the same on general grounds. Next, in the second part the stock-in-trade arguments against self-government, are systematically demolished viz. her caste system, social evils, languages, Hindu-Muhammadan riots. By the way, the kind of justice and peace as the so-called blessings of British rule, also come in for a good deal of scathing condemnation, to quote only a few words of which, would mean only a ripping away from their context, many maxims of political philosophy, best admired, when least divorced from their setting. The most important part of the book comes last. It is a great delusion for Britain to claim that she is educating India for self-rule, just as it is a farce for her to claim India as her sacred trust. These pleas are beaten out thread-bare by un-assailable weapons of argument and logic. The coping stone to the beautiful arch is afforded by the memorable expressions (true for all time) that while subordination saps India's vitality, domination demoralises Britain, and that the British domination of India, is a menace to the world's peace. Will the League of Nations pay heed to this? The question demands an urgent answer and Dr. Sunderland's book supplies it.

Mine will be an unpardonable sin, if I do not congratulate that foremost publishing house, of which the talented and revered R. Chatterjee is the proprietor, on the publication of a very valuable treatise in Dr. Sunderland's book, whose price is after all, a modest sum of Rs. 5 only.

MISS MAYO'S "SLAVES OF GODS".

Miss Mayo in an interview to the "Daily Mail" vouches for the truth of every dreadful story she is narrating in the "Slaves of Gods". The American authoress maintains that her "Mother India" is a true presentation of the India of to-day. The present book a sequel thereto, according to her, re-emphasises the specific instances of the various diseases that are festering sores in Hinduism.

The "Daily Mail" in reviewing the book points out that stories given in the book are certified to by the author thereof as episodes taken from real life with only the names of persons figuring therein altered. Fat being in the fire for the Imperialist critics of India the reviewer expatiates on the qualifications of Miss Mayo for this work. For one thing, we are told on the reviewer's testimony, that she is an impartial American witness and with no prejudices against Hindus or predilections in favour of the British. Miss Mayo returns to her earlier charge of over-sexuality of Hindus, which had made them decadent and expresses her opinion, that were the British authority withdrawn from India, the fighting races will make short work of the decadent Hindus. After elaborately referring to the grievances of untouchables in India, the reviewer says, it should be seen when the Simon Commission submits its report whether these poor creatures will be abandoned to the tender mercy of their age-long oppressors and exploiters.

Miss Mayo prefixes to her chapter on "the sacred cow" a moving quotation from Mr. Gandhi on the worship of the cow as a unique Indian contribution to the evolution of humanitarianism. On this, the reviewer proceeds to comment by calling it an amazing fact that cows should be kept alive while infanticide is by all accounts a roaring profession and orthodox Hindus devote considerable trouble to preserve the life of the cow. This apparent disparity in the sense of values nearly chokes the reviewer as it makes plain to Miss Mayo, the perverted mentality induced by too much sexuality.

The reviewer concludes with voting to Great Britain, great thanks for not having removed this festering sore. If, says the reviewer, Great Britain did not so long clear this festering sore which calls itself Hindu civilisation it was because of the basic principle of the British rule in India to respect the alien religion even with its repulsive gods and goddesses.

INJUNCTION ON WIDOWER.

To prevent the marriage of Purushottam Ratanchand, sharebroker aged 53, to Rambai, aged 15, for alleged monetary considerations, the young men of the Jain Oval Bania's Club filed a petition to the District Judge Ahmedabad who issued injunctions to the would-be bridegroom and the parents of the girl restraining the marriage, pending the decision of the application. Later on Purushottam gave an undertaking in writing that he would honour the feelings of the young men and would not marry the girl. This undertaking was referred to in court by Mr. Kalidas J. Zaveri, pleader for the petitioners, whereupon Mr. Moshangji repudiated the undertaking on behalf of his client, Parushottam, saying it was taken by hooligans under coercion. The Court then inquired whether the girl's parents would press for an alliance and sue for damages. Mr. Keshavlal said he had no instructions regarding damages but would say that his clients would not press for an alliance. Further hearing was adjourned till March 21. But pending that decision wiser counsels have prevailed and Mr. Keshavlal has filed a statement in the court signed by his clients, the girl's parents, to the effect that in case Purushottam withdraws from his undertaking they would not press for an alliance and further assured the Court that they would not take any steps under caste rules or in courts legally for damages. Thus if Purushottam shows his willingness fully to abide by his undertaking the case will come to an end.

Zaveri Desinghbhai Maganlal and his wife, parents of the girl who was to be married to an old man, filed a written statement today in the district court that as the bridegroom Purushottamdas Ratanchand was ready to revoke the marriage contract, they would not marry their daughter to him and would not claim damages, pecuniary or otherwise, from him for breach of marriage contract.

The bridegroom Purushottam Ratanchand, however, submitted a written statement that he was 49 years of age and not 53 as alleged by the applicants, that he had not been ill and that he walked about 4 or 5 miles every day, morning and evening. He added that owing to the instigation of some evilly designed persons, some youngsters had come forward to harm his reputation and he thought his life was in danger. For the safety of his life he gave up the idea of marrying and passed a writing in that behalf which could not be held to be legally binding on him. He prayed for the dissolution of the injunction passed by the court preventing him from marrying.

The brothers of the girl deposed in the court that their parents were not willing to marry their daughter to Purushottamdas Ratanchand, nor was their sister willing to marry him. They were willing to be appointed guardians of their sister.

The District Judge examined on the 23rd at his bungalow the father and mother of the Jain girl who was to be married to an old sharebroker Purushottamdas Ratanchand. The father of the girl, Javeri Desinghbhai Maganlal said that he would force his daughter to marry the old man. He had consulted her before her betrothal. She was opposed to the marriage now owing to popular opposition and the injunction of the Court.

The mother said that she was not willing to marry her daughter to the old man.

The Judge remarked that when the father, an old man, spoke he caused a sense of disgust in him.

Asked by the father of the girl what the Court would do the Judge said that the Court would look to the happiness of the girl. He should know the condition of a widow in the Hindu society. What happened 50 years ago in India and England would not happen again.

The Judge appointed the mother as the guardian of the girl in the place of the father and ordered the girl to be kept in the custody of her brother if she so desired.

BOMBAY PRESIDENCY WOMEN'S COUNCIL DEPUTATION.

A deputation of ladies of the B. P. W. Council led by Lady Tata, the President, waited on the Governor of Bombay to urge on his Excellency the necessity for the speedy abolition of the vice areas. "We come before you today to present to you this Manifesto urging upon the Government the necessity of taking immediate steps towards the abolition of vice areas in the city of Bombay. We come before you as members of a deputation sent by the Bombay Presidency Women's Council, which includes 27 Affiliated Societies and is the leading women's organisation in this city; we come as citizens prompted by the sense of our civic responsibilities but chiefly we come as women impelled by duty on behalf of our sisters in distress, who lie bound and fettered by a vicious system in the veriest depths of moral slavery.

This Manifesto makes no new demand on Government; it calls for the redemption of a promise. In 1923 at the time of the passage of the Prostitution Act, an undertaking was given by the Hon'ble the Home Member that its salient defect—the retention of vice areas—would be speedily remedied by the passage of amending legislation for the penalisation of brothel keeping. Five years have now elapsed and the signatories of this Manifesto demand the fulfilment of that official undertaking.

Secondly we would bring before Your Excellency's notice the iniquitous conditions sanctioned in this city. According to the Census Report of 1921 no less than 885 houses of ill-fame existed, and according to the figures of the Hon. the Home Member in 1928 at least 680 exist to-day. Segregated areas work for the moral degradation of the city as a whole. Prostitution is thereby accepted as a necessary evil and male incontinence directly encouraged. The so-called segregated areas of Bombay plant this evil in her very midst. Schools and libraries, places of worship and public recreation grounds stand interspersed with brothels whilst tram-cars ply their route between houses of ill-fame. The moral tone of the city is being thereby contaminated and the retention of vice areas, like festering sores, is undermining its moral health.

Thirdly it has to be remembered that vice areas stimulate traffic in women and girls for the profit of third parties. They constitute an open market. The goods required are human bodies. The traffickers are brothel keepers, pimps and procurers. This trade is stimulated by the open market and immoral traffic is encouraged by the vice areas. The importation of up-country victims is widely carried on. Census of 1921 revealed the fact that 82 per cent of women in Bombay brothels are up country denizens. The vice areas exist; the trafficker and his agents carry on their clandestine work. Some victims come willingly but in ignorance of the horrors of the future. Others who are unwilling victims arrive, sometimes duped by false promises of work, occasionally drugged and often directly kidnapped and generally beaten and starved into submission. As a business enterprise profits accrue but the profiteer is the trafficker and not the victim. Importation of up-country women will only cease when the markets of ill-fame are shut down by Government.

Fourthly we would refer Your Excellency to the practical proposals, outlined in the Manifesto, for the closing down of brothels within a three year time limit. Such an interval allows for the deportation of foreign women and the repatriation of up-country girls whereby, according to the Census figures, only 15 per cent of Bombay victims remain to be rehabilitated. We have not come as mere visionary idealists. We realise the magnitude of the problem and we herewith present not only practical proposals of reform but offers of direct co-operation in the rescue work to be entailed. Further delay will serve but to intensify the problem; therefore an immediate declaration by Government is required whereby brothel keeping by man or woman will be prohibited and a time limit prescribed on the above lines.

Fifthly, we would point out that Bombay learnt in the past the costly failure of a system of regulation, that she is learning to-day the shameful degradation of a system of tolerated segregation and that it is full time for her to profit from her own experience and from that of countries in the West and to adopt in the place of regulation or toleration that of abolition. The report of the Body of Experts appointed by the League of Nations stated in 1926 that in those countries pursuing the policies of regulation or toleration, street order was at its worst and the incidence of disease at its height. This is true of Bombay to-day. The appalling conditions which cause amongst other evils the spread of venereal diseases in this city are a great menace to the whole population and require immediate legislation for their removal. Both from the physical and moral standpoint prompt action on the part of Government is imperative.

Lastly we appeal to you, as women and as citizens, to give this grave matter your most earnest consideration. The beauty of this city is marred by the retention of vice areas, the moral and physical health is undermined and its reputation in the eyes of the world lowered. Public opinion has materialised. It demands reform. Hitherto Government has turned but a deaf ear to resolutions passed at public meetings. The manifesto, however, before Your Excellency is the accredited opinion of thoughtful citizens who demand that the pledge of 1923 be immediately redeemed by Government and that Bombay be rendered in every way a cleaner and a healthier city.

We thank Your Excellency for granting us this interview and venture to hope that we may have the satisfaction of hearing soon that Government have taken the necessary action in this matter."

RUSKIN ON DRINK.

John Ruskin's "Queen of the Air" contains a strong passage on drink which we reproduce below:—

"Your idle people, as they are now, are not merely waste coal-beds. They are explosive coal-beds, which you pay a high annual rent for. You are keeping all these idle persons, remember, at far greater cost than if they were busy. Do you think a vicious person eats less than an honest one? or that it is cheaper to keep a bad man drunk, than a good man sober? There is, I suppose, a dim idea in the mind of the public, that they don't pay for the maintenance of people they don't employ. Those staggering rascals at the street corner, grouped around its splendid angle of public-house, we fancy they are no servants of ours! that we pay them no wages! that no cash out of our pocket is spent over that beer-stained counter!

"Whose cash is it then they are spending? It is not got honestly by work. You know that much. Where do they get it from? Who has paid for their dinner and their pot? those fellows can live only in one of two ways—by pillage or beggary. Their annual income by thieving comes out of the public pocket, you will admit. They are not cheaply fed, so far as they are fed by theft. But the rest of their living—all that they don't steal—they must beg. Not with success from you, you think. Wise as benevolent, you never gave a penny in "indiscriminate charity". Well, I congratulate you on the freedom of your conscience from that sin, mine being bitterly burdened with the memory of many a sixpence given to beggars of whom I know nothing, but they had pale faces and thin waists. But it is not that kind of street beggary that the vagabonds of your people chiefly practise. It is the home beggary that is the worst beggars' trade. Home alms which it is their worst degradation to receive. Those scamps know well enough that you and your wisdom are worth nothing to them. They won't beg of you. They will beg of their sisters, and mothers, and wives, and children, and of any one else who is enough ashamed of being of the same blood with them to pay to keep them out of sight. Every one of those blackguards is the bane of a family. That is the deadly "indiscriminate charity"—the charity which each household pays to maintain its own private curse.

"And you think that is no affair of yours? and that every family ought to watch over and subdue its own living plague? Put it to yourselves this way, then: suppose you knew every one of those families kept an idol in an inner room—a big-bellied bronze figure, to which daily sacrifice and oblation was made; at whose feet so much beer and brandy were poured out every morning on the ground; and before which every night, good meat, enough for two men's keep, was set, and left, till it was putrid, and then carried out and thrown on the dunghill;—you would put an end to that form of idolatry with your best diligence, I suppose. But suppose farther, that this idol were not of silent and quiet bronze only;—but an ingenious mechanism, wound up every morning, to run itself down in automatic blasphemies; that it struck and tore with its hands the people who set food before it; that it was anointed with poisonous unguents, and infected the air for miles round. You would interfere with the idolatry then, straightway? Will you not interfere with it now, when the infection that the venomous idol spreads is not merely death—but sin?"

NOTES.

Mr. S. Sinha on Social Legislation:—In his presidential address to the All-India Kayastha Conference, Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha referred to social legislation in these terms:

"I have noticed with great regret the increasing tendency in the country to invoke more and more the assistance of the State in bringing about social reform. I am not to be understood to be laying down any such general proposition that in no circumstances should it be permissible to utilise the State as an agency for advancing progress. In fact, in so far as social reform can be brought about by means of the expansion of primary education, the imparting of technical education and the development of industries, the people must utilise the resources of the State for that purpose. But I do deprecate the present tendency in the country to rush to the legislatures with all kinds of bills for being enacted with a view to eradicate social evils. Frankly speaking, I am no believer in such a method, as I am not in trying to make gentlemen of those who are not so, by means of legislation. Such enforced reform from outside will never lead to successful results, for the obvious reason that anything so mechanically superimposed cannot, in the nature of things, be the natural—and therefore permanent—growth and development on the part of either an individual or a community. After all, the chief value of social reform and progress is not merely to induce men to go abroad for education or travel, or to spread universal primary education, or to remove the bar against widow marriage, or to accelerate the tendency towards inter-marriage amongst various groups and communities, and many other similar things—good and desirable as they all are in themselves. All these are, to my mind, but different important factors leading to the development, in men and women, in a community or country, of that sense of personal responsibility and spirit of liberty in comparison with which everything else in this world is more or less valueless. To train people to develop ideals of personal liberty and individual responsibility should, in my opinion, be regarded as the fundamental object of social progress."

Its Nature and Necessity:—We entirely agree with Mr. Sinha that the chief value of social reform, is to develop in men and women the sense of personal responsibility and a spirit of liberty. But in order to do this our social institutions should be liberalised just as political institutions have to be liberalised to permit of political freedom. The purpose of social legislation is just this, and not trying to make social reformers by legislation. If Mr. Sinha analyses the measures of social legislation which have been introduced during the last few years—since the inauguration of the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms which, in fact, had the speeding up of social legislation for one of its chief objects—he will at once see that all of them aim at removing some restriction on individual freedom and derogation of personal responsibility, which is sanctioned and enforced by the law as at present administered. The Bill to prevent child marriages may seem an exception, but it is really not so. Child marriages which are a gross restriction on personal freedom and a negation of individual responsibility, are sanctioned by law and Mr. Sinha as a lawyer knows the implications of the juridical maxim that "whatever the Sovereign permits, he commands." Child marriages, therefore, have established themselves as an integral part of the legal system under which Hindus live, and can be dislodged from that position only by legislation. As for the multiplicity of social Bills in recent years, the country has been starved all these years in the matter of liberal legislation and has to make up for past arrears.

Church and Brothels:—The Dnyanodaya writes:—

"The Indian Social Reformer has taken Bishop Whitehead to task because he made an analogy between prostitutes in St. Paul's church and the temple women in South-India. We do not think that the Reformer has effectively answered the Bishop's argument. It is well known that fifty per cent or more of the population in Western countries is distinctly outside the church and should not be classified as genuinely Christian. It is thus true that up to the present Christians have failed to thoroughly Christianize the social order, but fair-minded students of history will recognize that progress is being made. Because brothels exist in Western countries, it does not at all follow that the Christian churches sanction or encourage them, any more than the Christian churches in Bombay acquiesce in the situation there. In those Western communities where the Christian influence is dominant such as residential areas, the brothel evil does not exist. There is no more connection between Christianity and the Western type of brothel which is the product of vicious criminal classes than there is between Christianity and the invention of the automobile. The Christian faith as lived by Christians is open to many criticisms but it is hardly fair to accuse it of being responsible for the many evils of Western materialism. Having originally come from the Orient, the oriental phases of Christianity are quite as pronounced as the occidental."

The sum and substance of the above is that Christianity is responsible only for what is good and pure in Christian countries, and that for the rest materialism is responsible. The last sentence seems to suggest that the oriental origin of Christianity may be responsible for its failure, which is acknowledged, to thoroughly Christianize the social order in the West. Incidentally, our contemporary states it as a well-known fact that fifty per cent or more of the population in Western countries is outside the Church, like the brothels. We venture respectfully to suggest that if Christianity is to be judged by ideals, Hinduism too should be judged likewise. Hinduism like Christianity, like Buddhism, like Islam, has failed to make its influence felt thoroughly in the social order. Hinduism means the higher Hinduism, just as Christianity means the religion of Jesus and not that of Bishop Whitehead and Miss Catherine Mayo. Will the Dnyanodaya say that there is proportionately more immorality in India than in, say, the United States or Great Britain? And may we ask in no unkind spirit, if 50 per cent. of the people of Christian countries are not Christian, why should not the Missions first convert their own heathens before undertaking to convert those in distant Asia and Africa?

The Conscience Clause:—In an interesting article on this subject in the National Christian Council Review, the Rev. John Mckenzie, Principal of Wilson College, argues in favour of the missionary educational institutions initiating a policy of voluntary attendance at religious instruction classes instead of waiting for Government to adopt some form of conscience clause which they are bound to do sooner or later. We have it on his own authority born of long experience that compulsory religious teaching has not swelled the ranks of his co-religionists to the extent that it was expected. "For a good many years," writes Rev. Mckenzie, "I have been teaching classes that have been required to study Scripture. I cannot complain of the appearance of attention that has been given to the lessons. It is only very rarely that I have to check a student for speaking or for marked inattention in any form. Yet I have positive evidence that many of them carry almost nothing away with them. It would be a far healthier thing, from every point of view, if these students were employed during the Scripture hour in some other useful study. Yet I have been told by supporters of foreign missions in Scotland that they would not continue to give their support to mission colleges unless they were assured that every student was receiving instruction in the Christian religion. Their zeal is commendable; their knowledge of student psychology is very defective. We must not deceive ourselves into imagining that any, except a very small minority, are drawn to our institutions by our religious teaching. They come for other reasons. Many of them are quite indifferent to the religious teaching; some of them resent it."

The Prohibition Movement:—Mr. C. Rajagopalachari, the veteran worker in the cause of Prohibition, has been elected the General Secretary of the All-India Prohibition League in place of the Rev. Herbert Anderson. This should give fillip to the movement here as Mr. Rajagopalachari has been working through the Congress for some years for the cause and had recently submitted a scheme which has been accepted by the Working Committee. A committee has been formed consisting of Dr. Ansari, Mr. Vallabhbhai Patel, Mr. Rajendraprasad and Mr. Rajagopalachari to carry out the work. The scheme has been published in this week's Young India and the main points of it are that the provincial congress committees should appoint sub-committees for the anti-Drink and Drug campaign and allot sufficient funds for the work; that honorary workers should be enlisted for the campaign in the taluqa and the formation of Anti-Drink Sabhas in the towns and villages with volunteer corps attached to them—the membership to these sabhas not being restricted to those who wear khadi or to Congressmen; the organisation of monthly processions and meetings, of as many gatherings as possible in each village and town and of village to village and home to home visits for combating the drink evil; and the taking of pledges. The most important recommendation is that "the introduction and active promotion of total prohibition shall be made a part of the election pledge of Congress candidates." This should go far to introduce in the Legislatures a strong prohibition party. We publish elsewhere the other recommendations in the scheme. We are glad to learn at the same time that Mr. Ramaswami Naicker and his co-workers in the Non-Brahmin Party have undertaken a campaign for Prohibition propaganda in the South.

Prisoners' Aid Society, Punjab:—Following the example of provinces like Bombay and Madras, the Punjab started a Released Prisoners' Aid Society in 1928 and a report of its first year of work has been published. The year 1928-1929 was one of preparation and preliminary organisation for the Society which was duly registered the same year and ever since helped to rehabilitate many released prisoners. The organisers of the Society have succeeded in establishing 27 District Committees and enlisted more than 2,000 members. The nature of the work of the Society is varied. The members visit the local jails, interview the prisoners to be released, explain to them the objects of the Society and extend a helping hand to them. Efforts are made to secure suitable employments for the prisoners; in cases of released prisoners who have no friends or means of support, subsistence money for a limited time is given and clothes and tools are also provided. Released prisoners who have no home to go to are temporarily accommodated at the expense of the Society until some work is found for them. During the short period of its existence, the Society has helped as many as 25 prisoners to their feet. More than this, the moral influence of the Society has been greater. It has succeeded in banishing the distrust and suspicion that centre round a released prisoner and has been carrying on propaganda to secure sympathy and assistance for him. The cause that the Society has espoused is a noble one. Such an Institution deserves the sympathy and support of the public.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, APRIL 6, 1929.

AN UNMERITED CRITICISM.

We welcome the growing practice of having women to preside over meetings of National and Provincial Social Conferences. This would have been impossible twenty years ago, and with due deference to Mrs. Uma Nehru who presided with distinction over the United Provinces Provincial Social Conference held at Lucknow last Sunday, this may be claimed as one of the, by no means trifling, achievements of the efforts of the National Social Conference during the forty years of its existence. Another like achievement was that noted last week in our leading article on Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha's presidential address to the All-India Kayastha Conference held at Delhi last Saturday, namely, the Conference choosing as its President Mr. Sinha whom it had tried hard to exclude from its early sessions. Mrs. Nehru and other women leaders will, perhaps, object that the Social Conference and its organizers cannot claim credit for these and other achievements which are the outcome of the spirit of the present time. But the spirit of the present time will surely not be what it is but for those who in the past have persistently and perseveringly laboured to instil the principle of social justice in the minds of men and women to the best of their ability. This is, of course, a commonplace of social studies, but Mrs. Nehru, like not a few Indian men, would perhaps more readily be convinced if it is put in the words of a European authority. "The world only grows better, even in the moderate degree in which it does grow better, because people will that it should, and take the right steps to make it better. Evolution is not a force, but a process; not a cause, but a law." And, again, "the progressive tendency can only be a tendency, it can only work its way through the inevitable obstructions around it, by means of persons who are possessed by the special progressive idea. Such ideas do not spring uncaused and unconditioned in vacant space. They have had a definite origin and ordered antecedents. They are in direct relation with the past". The great Indians who founded and nurtured the social reform movement into adolescence, are gone, and it matters little to them whether or not they get the credit for their noble service to their people. But it is of very serious import to those who are taking up the leadership that they should have a right perspective of the past as well as of the future. Mrs. Uma Nehru is one of the most influential of Indian women who are in the forefront of the social movement, and she, we are sure, will appreciate the spirit in which this criticism is offered. The time is fast going by, if it is not already past, when Indian women should expect for their public utterances the application of less searching tests than those applied to men's.

Mrs. Uma Nehru compares the achievements of the National Social Conference with those of the National Congress. "During the same period," she says "the Indian National Congress has grown from strength to strength till its healthy influence has spread over the whole country, while we, who were its corollary on its social side, have continued to dwindle in influence and numbers till we are reduced to our present proportions". She does not stop there: "The Indian National Social Conference," she adds, "never faced the real problem and by following an unfortunate line of development helped instead of averting the crisis. The Social Conference was not suited for the task of social re-organisation. Its leaders were perhaps too much cut off from the real social life of the people to have been able to touch those social springs—moral and religious—through which alone social reform can be achieved in the East and were too conservative to have undertaken to model their social system frankly on the economic and political lines of the West with the result that they remained supremely unconscious of the work before them." Because thousands of people did not crowd into her Conference, Mrs. Nehru concludes social reform has made no progress. This is hardly a scientific test. Proof to the contrary is abundantly available in all the directions in which the Social Conference has sought to direct progress. We wonder whether Mrs. Uma Nehru quite realises that she is bringing this terrible charge against Raghoonath Rao, Ranade, and numerous others who knew—none better—that their work was to help the country to assimilate what was essential to national progress from the West, while conserving every particle of what was good and sound in the social and spiritual heritage of the country. In a memorable letter published in this journal, Ranade prophetically foresaw the kind of criticism which would be levelled against his school of thought by later reformers like Mrs. Uma Nehru. "You are not strictly correct," he wrote, "when you think that men like Telang paused and halted from want of earnestness or from fear of offending people. Those who live in the past secure popularity. Those who bury their past obtain ease. Men like Telang and others obtain neither ease nor popularity by the very fact that they can neither hold by the past, nor forget it altogether."

Mrs. Nehru's comparison between the achievements of the Congress in the political field and that of the Conference in the social field involves many fallacies. Telang justified the Congress devoting itself exclusively to politics, on the principle of advance along the line of least resistance. British rule in India is foreign, tentative, and inherits a tradition of Constitutional Government derived from its own history going back several centuries. By comparison with our social system it is of mushroom growth. Moreover we had to generate the force to deal with social evils from the momentum of a dynamic which in the circumstances can only be found in political work. The greatest opposition to social reform up to within the last fifteen or twenty years came from women themselves. The first task of the reformers, therefore, was to push on with women's education, and get out in as short a time as possible a band of educated women who would be an example and inspiration to their conservative sisters. In fact, the social reformers could do nothing until a sufficient strength of women's opinion was behind them. This, Mrs. Uma Nehru's own example shows they have succeeded in creating. It is work of no small importance, and though it is rather hard to be told by her that they were all fools, still they could say with old Simeon "Lord, let us now depart in peace, for our eyes have seen Thy salvation".

THE PROHIBITION CAMPAIGN.

[We have noticed in our notes column a few of the recommendations of Mr. Rajagopalachari's scheme. We give below the rest of it].

Anti-Drink Sabhas and Congress Committees shall organise wherever possible healthy counter-attractions at such places and hours as may be suitable in order to divert people from the drink habit.

At each anti-drink meeting, pledges shall be taken in solemn form from all persons promising to abstain from alcoholic drinks and drugs.

Sabhas may after obtaining the sanction of the provincial sub-committee organise peaceful picketing of liquor and drug shops wherever the same may be usefully done by their volunteers.

Sabhas shall exercise their influence to prevent landholders and lessees from letting out their trees for tapping for manufacture of intoxicating drinks.

Sabhas shall dissuade people from bidding at auction sales of the right to vend drinks and drugs.

On or before the third Sunday of every month each Taluq Secretary shall gather information and send to the provincial sub-committee a brief report of the meeting held on the Sunday preceding and other work done during the previous week in his Taluq. The provincial sub-committee shall consolidate these reports and send them to the Working Committee and to the press for publication.

Written pledges shall be taken from voters and citizens supporting total prohibition in the following form with names and full addresses legibly written.

"I hereby pledge myself to support the enactment of laws for the total prohibition of intoxicating drinks and drugs as indispensable for the moral, economic, and social welfare and progress of our country. I further declare that in any election to local bodies and provincial and all-India legislative bodies I shall not vote for or support any candidate who has not signed the pledge in support of total prohibition."

Suitable books for taking these pledges shall be distributed by provincial committees.

The provincial sub-committee may appoint a district prohibition Secretary when the amount of work within the district calls for such appointment.

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XIV. THE RICH.

(By Dr. Clifford Manshardt, Ph.D.)

The writer of the old Hebrew book of Ecclesiastes was a supreme egoist. Everything that he did, he did for himself. "I made me great works; I builded me houses; I planted me vineyards; I made me gardens and orchards...I made me pools of water,...I gathered me also silver and gold,...I was great, and increased more than all that were before me in Jerusalem." Wealthy he was, but when he came to survey the results of his life's work this same man was led to declare: "Then I looked on all the works that my hands had wrought, and on the labour that I had laboured to do: and, behold, all was vanity and vexation of spirit, and there was no profit under the sun." Of course there was "no profit." Not a single act in this man's catalogue was for another. He had been successful in accumulating wealth, but he had learned very little about how to live.

Although there are many present-day counterparts of this old Hebrew, the conception of wealth as a stewardship is a conception that is coming more and more to the fore. An increasing number of men are coming to see that the production of wealth is a co-operative affair, and that no one man's success is independent of the efforts of others. For this reason they are giving of their means for benevolent causes, for the promotion of higher education, for the establishment of hospitals and libraries, and for the furtherance of the general culture. Men who by dint of industry and ability have risen from the lower ranks of labour are remembering that they too were servants, and are giving their best thought to raising the economic level of others. Though it is quite true that the number of socially-minded capitalists is still small, it is also true that the number is growing and that their example is spreading rapidly. Through deeds of helpfulness the rich are finding "profit".

There is no group of people more subject to criticism than the men and women of wealth. Because of the power that is in their hands they are continually watched, and their every deed is submitted to public scrutiny. Men thus in the limelight cannot afford to be other than honourable. Gifts of lacs of rupees to charity do not blind the public to the tactics by which the benefactor may have acquired his riches. To oppress one man's son for the development of another's is an unsound policy, and one that must be abandoned. A man's good must not "be evil spoken of".

To the children of the rich are given the rarest of opportunities. To be raised in a healthful environment and endowed with a strong body, to be sent to a school with the ablest of instructors, to be surrounded with books and worthwhile periodicals, to be acquainted with the best of music and of art, to know the world of nature, and to be at home in the world of men is a priceless heritage. In our emphasis upon the obligations of wealth let us give honour where honour is due, and record our appreciation of the capable way in which the young people of the more privileged group are giving of their talents in the cause of human betterment. May the fire of their enthusiasm ever refine, purging our common life of the dross of selfishness.

INTER-COMMUNAL AMITY CONFERENCE.

In connection with the 62nd anniversary of the Prarthana Samaj, a Conference for promoting inter-communal amity was held on Friday evening at the Prarthana Mandir, Girgaum. It was attended by members of the several communities. The Chairman of the Reception Committee, Mr. S. A. Brelvi, opened the proceedings with the following address:—

MR. BRELVI'S ADDRESS.

Allow me to accord to you, on behalf of the Reception Committee, a very hearty welcome to the Conference. The object of this Conference, to which you have been invited, is to promote inter-communal amity. Various efforts have been made in the past and are still being made by various organisations to promote this object. The question may, naturally, be asked: Why add one more organisation? The answer is that this Conference does not seek to find a complete solution of the problem of inter-communal disharmony. Its organisers recognise only too well that the strained relations between Hindus and Muslims and the violent conflicts that now and then take place can be traced to causes which have as much to do with the political and economic condition of the country as with the wrong practice of their respective religion by Hindus and Muslims. The Conference will confine its activities only to eradicating these causes of conflict between the two communities which are based on supposed religious differences.

CAUSE OF MISUNDERSTANDING.

“Speaking for myself I am one of those who firmly believe that there is the beneficent hand of Providence in the centuries' old arrangement which has brought together into this great country the followers of all the religions and particularly of the two great religions of Asia, Hinduism and Islam. I feel proud that I belong to a country which is distinguished, above all other countries in the world, in being blessed with this unique destiny of creating unity of purpose and aspirations in diversity of religious beliefs and practices the destiny of establishing a genuine Brotherhood of Man on earth despite differences regarding the method of adjusting human relations with God. What is wrong with us is that we do not realise the greatness of our country's destiny the fulfilment of which will make it once more an exemplar to the world. The West is supposed to have outlived the era of religious feuds. That is, however, not wholly true. In Ireland the struggle between Roman Catholics and Protestants still continues. No Western country is confronted with the problem of having its population composed of people belonging to so many different religions as we have in India. In every Western country, the overwhelming majority of the people profess one faith—Christianity—and if the treatment accorded to Indians in the British Dominions and the restrictions placed in the way of Indians acquiring citizen rights in the U. S. A. are any guide, it is open to doubt whether, if the ratio of population belonging to different religions were reproduced in any of the Western countries, the intercommunal problem would not also be as intense there as it is in our country to-day. That among all other countries, ours has been selected for fulfilling the great purpose of establishing Human Brotherhood in a society consisting of individuals professing different religious beliefs should inspire us to be worthy of our unique responsibility. It was Akbar, who more than any other single Indian, realised the tremendous possibilities of this great opportunity and heroically strove to turn the possibilities into realities. We cannot do better than follow his footsteps. The fulfilment of our country's great destiny does not involve the establishment of universal religion or even the pursuit of the ideal of universal religion. The pursuit of a universal religion, in my humble opinion, is an ideal dream though every sane man must deplore the present divergence between the profession and practice of true religion. For the aim of life is surely not dull uniformity. If nature is beautiful it is because of its harmony in diversity. If human beings are to progress towards perfection they cannot do so by ignoring this vital fact. What is necessary is not that all men should profess the same Faith but that all men should realise and act up to the realisation that a man does not cease to be less your brother because he professes another Faith. The fundamental teachings of all religions are the same. They all enjoin the practice of the same cardinal virtues and, above everything else, toleration. It is the followers of each religion who pervert its teachings by creating barriers between man and man which should not exist. The inter-communal disharmony is largely due to the fact that toleration, which is enjoined by every religion, has not yet been given a fair trial by either of the communities. And the explanation of this failure to give a trial to toleration is that, however, religious-minded Hindus and Muslims may be, many of them understand very little of the spirit of their own religion or the other community. Ignorance is thus the main cause of the misunderstandings and distrusts which mar the relations of the various communities, particularly the major two communities. Religious considerations play the most dominant part in the lives of a vast majority of our countrymen.

PLEA FOR MUTUAL UNDERSTANDING.

“It is not, however, always the truly religious considerations which sway the minds of most of us. I need hardly give you instances. The stupid controversies and conflicts over the questions of music before mosques and cow-slaughter provide glaring instances of this fact. The playing of music before a mosque may disturb Muslims at prayers but no Muslim can contend that his religion requires him to fight with Hindus in order to compel them to stop playing music before a mosque. The sacrifice of a cow by a group of Muslims may be economical, but no Muslim can, as Muslim, claim that the request for stopping the slaughter of cows even for a sacrificial purpose is an offence to his religion. On the other hand, it would be a magnificent evidence of the toleration which Islam preaches if Muslims voluntarily agree to stop the slaughter of cows out of respect for the sentiments of their Hindu fellow-countrymen. Similarly, it may be the right of Hindus as citizens to play music before mosques. But can any sane Hindu insist that it is of the essence of his religion that a religious procession cannot be led before a mosque without the playing of music or hold that it is wise or patriotic to assert one's civil rights at the cost of disturbing others at prayers or offending what they regard as their religious susceptibilities? And the tragedy of the matter is that it is a large section of the educated classes of both communities which gives the wrong lead to the people in this respect. Whenever controversies arise or riots take place on these issues, the majority of educated Hindus and Muslims instinctively range themselves on the side, not of Right and Justice, but on that of their co-religionists, irrespective of the merits of the case. "My community, right or wrong," seems to be the guiding consideration which determines their attitude. This attitude is the result of the false notion of religion and of a lack of understanding of the requirements of true religion. Though religious considerations, whether right or wrong, guide the conduct of most of us, our educational system is so devised that if the majority of our educated men and women are most ignorant of anything it is the religions of their own country and the glorious tradition and culture of which the different communities are the inheritors. One of the resolutions that will be placed before you will recommend to the University to incorporate the study of comparative religion in its curriculum. The object of such study is to make the practice of toleration a second nature with every Indian; for, it is only true mutual understanding of the principles and ideals that inspire the different communities which will foster the spirit of toleration among them.

AKBAR'S EXAMPLE.

"But toleration is not enough. Its effects are at best negative. If true inter-communal amity is to be achieved it is necessary that the members of the two communities should be brought more and more in contact with one another in the more intimate functions and relations of life. It is possible for Hindus and Muslims to meet together in schools and colleges, in clubs and social gatherings and in various spheres of public service and yet to maintain a barrier between themselves. The advantages of inter-communal dinners cannot be minimised. But they are at best formal affairs. True community of feeling and perfect mutual understanding can arise only when Hindus and Muslims are brought together in the best of all schools of experience—the home. I know I am treading on delicate ground. But I feel convinced that the best solvent of the Hindu-Muslim problem is inter-communal marriage. Akbar showed us the way with remarkable results but, unfortunately, we have not yet followed it, though there are welcome signs to show that the generation that is now growing up will see to it that inter-communal marriages do not remain the exceptions that they are now. Besides inter-communal marriages there are other ways in which intimate relations can be established among the two communities such, for instance, as the well-to-do classes initiating the experiment of bringing up and educating in their own homes boys and girls of their friends of other communities.

WHAT STUDENTS SHOULD DO.

"Students crowd into many of our cities and the demand for hostel accommodation is increasing day by day. This demand is, unfortunately, satisfied by establishing not hostels where students of all communities can live together but hostels reserved for members of certain communities and even certain sections of those communities. If our young men and women can live in private families when they go to various European countries for study there is no reason why students studying in this country should not live as paying guests in families of Indians belonging to a community other than their own. It is time our educated classes gave proof of their enlightenment by offering such facilities to students of different communities. There are, it is true, difficulties in the way. But they are not insuperable. Except for the difference in religious beliefs the conditions of domestic life of Hindus and Muslims do not differ so fundamentally as to make their living together very difficult. What is required is the will to make a fresh and healthy innovation in our social life. This innovation will easily be made if the best minds in both the communities strive their utmost to impress upon their co-religionists to take a rationalistic view of their religion—a view which would enable them to march with the times without being irreligious. Whatever may be the practices of Muslims, Islam recognises no priesthood except the priesthood of Reason and the cardinal principles of Islam are such as can be adapted to the changing requirements of human progress. With the lapse of time, customs and practices among Muslims have obtained a sanction which is regarded by many as religious but which is strictly speaking not religious. In so far as these customs and practices conflict with the requirements of modern times, they must be discarded. For there is nothing in the teachings of Islam which sanctions any course of action which retards the progress of man. The only test of the worth of men and women, according to Islam, is conduct, and the only guide for conduct which it recognises is Reason. Therefore, what should matter to a Muslim is not the belief that another professes but whether his conduct is such as is considered proper according to the dictates of Reason. If the practices of Muslims accord with the teaching of their religion far from there being any cause for conflict with other communities, the Muslims will be making a most constructive contribution towards the establishment of relations of genuine brotherhood among members of all communities. I have no doubt a similar rational interpretation of Hindism and its application to the problems of life will lead to similar happy results.

"It was Emerson who said truly that the religion which is to guide and fulfil the present and coming ages, whatever it be, must be intellectual. If this Conference is to attain any measure of success, it can only do so by making Hindus and Muslims take an increasingly intellectual view of their religion, so that it could not be said of them that, to use the language of Swift, they have just enough religion to make them hate but not enough to make them love one another. In guiding its deliberations to this end, we could not have secured a worthier President than Mr. K. Natarajan, who has devoted a life-time to the great mission of rationalising religion as it is practised in our country."

On the conclusion of Mr. Brelvi's address the Rev. John Mackenzie proposed Mr. K. Natarajan to the chair. Mr. Natarajan then addressed the Conference.

MR. NATARAJAN'S PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS.

I very highly appreciate the kind thought which has prompted the promoters of this Conference to choose me to preside at its first session. Inter-communal amity has been very close to my heart for almost as long as I can recall, and I can think of nothing more congenial to my feelings than to assist at a movement to foster it.

"We are, as I need not remind this gathering, met to-day under the auspices of the Bombay Prarthana Samaj and as an event in its 62nd anniversary celebrations which are being held since yesterday. The founder of the Brahmo combined in himself the three great streams of the world's religious culture—the Hindu, the Moslem, and the Christian—which together form the source from which modern Indian culture takes its rise and must make its contribution to humanity. The Raja Ram Mohan Roy was the product of Hindu, Moslem and Christian influences. A recent Indian writer has called him the father of the comparative study of religions. He was, however, not merely a student of religions in the sense in which there are students of languages and social systems. He sought to understand different religions with the definite purpose of incorporating whatever was good and true in them into our national life. The Brahmo Samaj which he founded has been called an eclectic system somewhat with a deprecatory intention. It is true that it draws its inspiration from all religions, but it is not a mere mechanical mixture of ideas picked up here and there, but a system with a central core of its own capable of absorbing and assimilating whatever of truth it sees in other systems. The Prarthana Samaj, therefore, is a very proper medium for promoting the movement of inter-communal amity. And I am glad that it has taken up this very important national problem, for it can approach it as few other movements or agencies can with the detachment from and sympathy with secular and other religious movements, which is essential to success in such an undertaking.

"It is also an auspicious circumstance that the first session of the Conference is held on Good Friday when Jesus Christ who proclaimed the gospel of peace and good-will among men, cast off his Jewish body, and became the World Teacher which, he has since been to all mankind without distinction of race, religion or country.

THE AIM OF THE CONFERENCE.

This Conference was at first intended to be one of religious thinkers and it was as such that I was invited and undertook to preside at it. It was, then, thought by its organisers, I have no doubt for good reasons, to indicate inter-communal amity as a subject to which it might specially direct its attention. It has again undergone a change, and it meets now as the Inter-Communal Amity Conference whose object is "to promote inter-communal amity" and "it will strive to attain this object by confining its activities to eradicating all points of conflict arising out of supposed religious differences and upholding by right conduct the ideal of human brotherhood." It is evident that several minds have devoted much attention to define the aims of the Conference, and that the form in which it has finally emerged is designed to reconcile many points of view and to give no room as far as possible for any to feel that it has no place in the Conference. The part assigned to religion seems rather to be of a negative kind—the eradication of supposed differences—but the ideal to be kept in view is that of human brotherhood.

DIFFERENCE NOT DUE TO RELIGIOUS CAUSES.

THE REMEDY

"The principal reason which induced me to accept almost with alacrity the invitation to preside at this Conference as originally planned as a religious Conference, was this. Owing to a very natural feeling of disgust felt by our young men and women at the communal quarrels so frequent among us of late, there is a strong tendency among some of the brightest and best of them to turn their backs on religion as a played-out force, which has no place in the structure of India's future. I feel this is due to a profoundly wrong diagnosis, and was anxious to place at the service of those who think thus my reasons for requesting them to approach this vital question with an open and unbiassed mind. Some of these I may briefly indicate here. The present dissensions are not really religious in their character. They are purely political or, more correctly, economic, though they are made to take on a religious colour by propagandists interested in keeping them alive and to the front. The truly religious men of all communities have no quarrel with one another, and harbour no ill-will towards one another. The promotion of true religion is the only means permanently of preventing quarrels, both religious and secular. Even if religion be totally eliminated from the national life, the quarrels must continue because they are essentially secular and have nothing to do with religion.

“ You will thus see that I disagree with the suggestion in the declaration drafted for membership of this Conference that religious differences, are responsible for points of conflict between the communities. Inter-communal amity has been from time immemorial the tradition of India, and is even to-day the normal condition except where it is affected by political and economic interests. It follows that by confining our efforts to eradicate religious differences alone, we cannot in my opinion, promote inter-communal amity wherever it showed signs of being strained.

“ Can nothing then be done, it may be asked, by a Conference like this which is not a political or economic body to promote inter-communal amity or rather to strengthen it and make it proof against secular strains? I think much can be done: I would like to say that organised activities in such matters are of secondary importance—the primary being individual action. I place in the forefront of measures for cementing inter-communal relations, the assiduous cultivation of individual and personal friendships between members of all our communities. Twenty men, Hindu and Mahomedan, who cherish towards each other sincere feelings of friendship, do more to knit the two communities together than half-a-dozen unity Conferences. Amity is not a thing which can be ensured by pact or enforced as a contract. It must be felt in the heart. My impression is, it may or may not be right, that among our young men of different communities, the conditions of spontaneous friendship are present in much larger measure than among the older men. This to my mind is the most hopeful sign of the times. I told a very esteemed Moslem friend who is greatly worried about Hindu-Moslem relations the other day, to set his mind at rest as these present differences are not going to outlast our generation. This is what I sincerely believe. I am not therefore, perturbed about Hindu-Moslem conflicts. Rather, I see in them an earnest desire on both sides to be in contact with each other, forcible if it cannot be friendly. I should despair of amity between the two communities, if each went its own way indifferent to and unconcerned about the other. If I had any influence with our political leaders, I would tell them to leave alone communal electorates and other questions for the present. These have not done as much evil as they are supposed to have;

in fact, they have done some good by stimulating the spirit of emulation among communities which were hitherto pathetically content to remain where they were. In ten years' time, I prophesy, no one would want communal electorates or reservation of seats or allocation of appointments in the public services. The only thing which can retard this process, is premature attempts to get them out of the way.

EARLY TRAINING OF STUDENTS.

“ One constructive suggestion I should like to make before I sit down. It is that the courses of study in our educational system from the bottom upwards should be designed so as to foster a national culture common to all those who have or made their homes in India. The educated classes of Europe have found a common basis of culture in Greek and Latin which has been taught in their schools for centuries. Why should not an Indian boy who is destined to pass beyond the primary stage, be likewise grounded in Sanskrit and Persian or Arabic as well as in English—the fountain-heads of three great components of Indian nationalism? At present, the educational system, secondary and University, takes absolutely no thought of the crying needs of the hour. This is not right. Our schools, colleges and Universities should be our principal means of raising up the younger generations in an atmosphere of mutual respect and good will. They can do much to promote inter-communal unity, and, in fact, they can give us in the place of our several religious communities, a cultural community standing for all that is beautiful, and good and true in our several religious cultures, and over and beyond, fired with a high enthusiasm for the mission which we, as Indians, I firmly believe, have to humanity at large.”

RESOLUTIONS.

The Conference again met on Saturday afternoon and discussed and adopted a number of resolutions. The following basic statement was placed before the Conference by Dr. McNicol.

The aim of the Conference is the elimination as far as possible of occasions which give rise to breaches of inter-communal amity and the promotion of movements which shall serve to bring together in friendly co-operation members of all communities; and it shall seek to achieve this aim through the sympathetic study by members of cultures and religions other than their own and through the cultivation of goodwill and the spirit of service towards members of all communities.

The Rev. McKenzie then moved the following resolution:—

This Conference recommends to the University of Bombay to take early steps to make Comparative Religion a subject of study in its curriculum and appoints a committee consisting of the Rev. McKenzie, Prof. Wadia, Barrister Fyze, Prof. Zimmermann, Prof. A. B. Gajendragadkar, and Dr. G. Y. Chitnis (Secretary) to frame concrete proposals to be forwarded to the University.

The following resolution was moved by Swami Vishwanand.

This Conference resolves that steps be taken to carry on a vigorous propaganda among all communities with a view to bringing into prominence all that is noblest in all the existing religious systems and arrange meetings for the presentation of the ideals of various religions preferably by the representatives of these religions.

Prof. P. A. Wadia then moved the following resolution.

This Conference resolves that lectures, congregational discourses and sermons and study circles be organised to bring about inter-communal harmony.

Dr. Abdulla moved the following resolution.

This Conference directs the Executive Committee to organise inter-communal dinners and social gatherings as often as possible.

The fifth and the most important resolution was moved by Mr. R. S. Padbidri. It ran as follows :

This Conference declares that the institution of untouchability is repugnant to the sense of humanity and calls upon the Executive Committee to work for its immediate abolition in co-operation with other institutions having the same object.

By a resolution put from the Chair, the Conference appointed the Executive Committee consisting of prominent ladies and gentlemen to carry on the work of the Conference. Among others, the Executive Committee consists of Messrs. K. Natarajan, S. A. Brelvi, A. A. Fyze, Swami Vishvanand, Moulavi Mohamad Ali, Prof. P. A. Wadia, Dr. Abdulla bin Abdulla, V. L. Mehta, R. S. Padbidri, Mrs. Kashibai Nowrange and Mrs. McKenzie.

The President after a brief concluding speech declared the Conference dissolved.

CASTE CONFERENCES AND NATIONAL PROGRESS.

In his presidential address to the 35th session of the All-India Kayastha Conference which began its sittings at Delhi on Friday the 29th March, Mr. Sachchidanada Sinha, late Finance Member of the Government of Bihar and Orissa, and founder and editor for many years of the Hindustan Review, touched on the question of the utility or harmfulness of Caste Conferences. We reproduce the passage below :—

Having now treated briefly the origin and the striking developments of this movement, I shall next address myself to discussing whether a movement confined to a particular community can be held—at any rate, now—to be at all beneficial in its activities, in so far as the general progress of the country is concerned. This question is, to my mind an important one for a communal conference to consider, as its decision may be of a far-reaching character. You are no doubt aware that, particularly during the last few years, a revulsion of feeling has come over certain sections of the educated community in regard to the value and utility of communal conferences. It has been chiefly due to the fact of the following in the wake of this Conference—which was the first in the field—of a large number of similar conferences confined not only to large communities but to sections, or sub-sections of them, that earnest reformers and well-wishers of the country have been repeatedly asking the question whether the multiplication of such conferences is likely to lead to the good of the country as a whole or whether they do not, by accentuating local and parochial considerations, retard the growth and development of the country, specially in the matter of the evolution of an Indian nationality. I must tell you frankly that in my opinion this is a question which cannot be shirked but must be faced. It merits serious consideration—whatever the view which one may ultimately take of it as the result of careful and earnest deliberation and discussion. Amongst those who have taken the view that communal conferences are injurious to India's progress, I shall refer to but one eminent authority on our social history, a great scholar, a distinguished savant and, above all, an earnest social reformer, namely the late Dr. Sir Ram Krishna Bhandarkar who expressed himself as follows—“A wave of reaction has been sweeping over us for a good many years. I have heard of the formation of caste clubs and recently we have had periodical conferences of many castes. It is often urged in favour of such conferences that they are the means of the introduction of social reform in those communities. To that extent a conference may do good, but the assertion of the exclusiveness of the community involved in the holding itself of a conference or the running of a club serves to harden the caste distinction instead of softening them. Hence these conferences and clubs are retrogressive in my opinion, for in our meetings and our conferences we should accustom ourselves to be guided only by the feelings of a united nation.” Now, whatever may be said to the contrary, these observations of a great Indian reformer contain a warning which cannot be neglected or ignored, and in all that we say or do, either in this Conference or outside it, we should always be anxious that the result of our speech or action is not one which may be calculated, even remotely, to retard the progress of this country in the matter of developing national unity.

But that apart, this problem is after all not so simple as it may seem at the first blush. If merely by ignoring caste distinctions in our speech or writing and by talking of a united nation, we could evolve in its true sense an Indian nationality, then there has been already so much talk about it, that we should have long since been successful in our effort. But unfortunately facts are stubborn things and it does not stand to reason that by merely ignoring our present limitations, we shall be able to rid ourselves of the effect of those sociological conditions under which we have lived for thousands of years. Now, the groundwork of our social system has been based for several millenniums on caste and all that that system implies. Many eminent sociologists, therefore,—who have studied the origin, the developments and the effects of the caste system on the people of this country—have come to the conclusion that whenever India is able to develop nationality, in the political sense in which that term is understood in western countries, it will only be by moulding and modifying the system of caste on correct lines, by adapting it to our modern requirements, and not by merely ignoring it or refusing to utilise it for what good result it may be likely to yield, if approached in the right spirit. This view, it is held, is based on the experience of western countries themselves, where nationality has developed in a marked degree during the last few hundred years. Thus one qualified European authority—who is conversant with Indian conditions—writes on the subject of the evolution of national unity in India as follows:—"There is no doubt that the general tendency of evolution is in the direction of unity. It is at the same time in the direction of gradually increasing specialisation and differentiation. The two processes run side by side and may be observed not only in the wider evolution of communities and nations, but also in the small sphere of individual development. The question arises therefore: how are we to synthesize and reconcile two such apparent opposites? In what sense can unification and specialisation form part of one homogeneous process."

Now if the view propounded in the above observations be correct, it will have to be admitted that the process of specialisation and differentiation of the individual and communities has still to be gone through by the vast bulk of our people, and it will have to be so passed through before we can hope to have a genuinely unified nation. By this expression I mean not that kind of make-believe unity which was witnessed during the last few years, and which collapsed at the feeblest touch of some disruptive element, but that true unity which springs as an urge from within as the result of all the people in a country and is independent of any artificial aid such as opposition to a common adversary, for the time being. This true unity, which alone can be the basis of nationality, is not likely to accrue merely from any such fortuitous circumstance as a sense of wrong against a common opponent, but should derive its sustenance from the indigenous elements in the body politic, as the result of sheer intellectual and moral necessity. That which is the outcome of such adventitious aid as an opposition to a common antagonist cannot in the nature of things retain any elements of permanence, for no sooner than the antagonistic factor disappears, the artificial unity is bound to cease to exist. According to this view, therefore, before there can be a true spirit of nationality in our country, each component part of the people must realize that its individualisation has reached a point in self-expression when it is desirable in the interest of further advance or progress to merge itself with other groups or communities. In other words, before there can be a true effort at nation-building, the integral factors of the body politic must come to realize that their specialisation has reached a point at which they may feel it to be to their advantage to merge themselves with others. Unless therefore all the communities making up the people of this country become self-subsistent and self-expressive, no true Indian nationality is likely to come into existence, for the unity to be perfect can only be the direct result, not the negation, of fully developed individualism of each organic part of the whole organism. If you look at the problem from this point of view, you will have no difficulty, in appreciating the causes that have brought into existence the non-Brahmin movement in Southern India, the Bhumihar Babhan upheaval in Behar, and the Musalman opposition in general even to nationalist demands culminating in a war on the Nehru Report, led amongst others by the Moulana ex-President of the National Congress. The spectacle so presented to view is, no doubt, depressing and annoying, but it should be appraised at its true value as an inevitable concomitant of the present stage of our social evolution.

The popular theory, therefore, which largely obtains at present in this country that political unity can be brought about by ignoring or suppressing the sociological limitations of the component parts and is independent of them, seems not at all warranted either by experience or the teaching of history. That it is unsound is evident to all who have followed the course of events in this country during the last few years, the outstanding feature of which is the gradual disappearance of the artificial unity we saw some years back, under the pressure of the frailest of disruptive forces—to which it is unnecessary to refer in detail.

But apart from our experience and the lessons to be derived from the teachings of the history, considerable support is lent to this view by the observations of one of the greatest European sociologists and thinkers, who writes on this subject in the following terms:—"Before there arise in human nature and human institutions changes having that permanence which makes them an acquired inheritance of the human race, there must be innumerable recurrences of the thoughts and feeling and actions conducive to such changes." He adds that "the process cannot be abridged and must be gone through with due patience," and "the man of the higher type must be content with greatly moderated expectations, while he perseveres with undiminished efforts;" as "he has to see how comparatively little can be done and yet to find it worth while to do that little". Such being the divergence of views, I have noticed with gratification the opinion expressed by my esteemed friend, Munshi Ishwar Saran, in a recent contribution by him on the subject of this Conference, made to the columns of the Hindustan Times of this city. This is how he has reconciled the two seemingly conflicting views:—"In nationalism alone lies the salvation of India. Nationalism has peculiar difficulties to contend with in this country and the feeling of separateness generated by caste and intensified by innumerable sub-castes is its worst enemy. How then, well may the question be put, can an Indian nationalist take part in a caste organization? To my mind—I do not forget that there is a serious conflict of opinion on this point—there is nothing inherently objectionable in a nationalist identifying himself with a caste movement provided, of course, his real motive is to serve the whole through the part. As long as castes exist, these caste movements, if wisely guided and controlled, can be made to render effective and useful service." I am disposed to agree with my esteemed friend whom I have just quoted and it is in this spirit that I stand before you to-day to guide the deliberations of this Conference. I hope that nothing that we may say or do on the present occasion shall have the least trace of any such communalism as may be held likely to jeopardise the larger interests of the country.

NOTES.

The Dagger and the Pen:—The Bombay High Court a few days ago convicted and sentenced to a term of imprisonment a young Mussulman for stabbing a Hindu journalist for publishing articles derogatory to His Highness the Aga Khan, to whose sect he belonged. On Saturday last, Rajpal, the author of the notorious Rangila Rasul which created a great commotion two years ago, was stabbed to death by a Mussulman who, on being arrested, exclaimed that he has avenged the insult to the Prophet. The state of mind which finds satisfaction in vilifying great religious Teachers, who have changed the course of history and led mankind onward on the path of civilization, is essentially a low one, and we cannot too strongly condemn the conduct of those who misuse their literary gifts for such a purpose. But in a civilised society such men ought to be dealt with by the law and public opinion, and persons who resort to murder in the belief that they are serving God, not only commit a heinous crime against society but bring religion into disrepute. The Moslem League of Lahore has promptly issued a statement expressing its condemnation of the dastardly murder of Rajpal and other Moslem leaders have emphatically done the same. We trust that this will be the last of such crimes.

Social Reform and the Marwari Community:—The eleventh session of the All-India Marwari Agarwal Mahasabha commenced its sitting on April 10 under the Presidentship of Raja Govindlal Shivlal of Bombay. The Conference was well attended and the pandal was crowded with visitors. A large number of ladies were present and 800 delegates from all over India met at the Conference. The President, Raja Govindlal Pitti, rose amidst loud cheers and read his presidential address in Hindi. There was an uproar when the President referred to the question of widow remarriage, but calm was soon restored. He condemned in strong terms child marriages, marriages in old age, and other evil customs prevailing in the community. He laid stress on the need for extending female education and supported Mr. Sarda's Child Marriage Bill. He proposed that the marriageable age should be fixed at 25 for boys and 16 for girls. He strongly supported widow remarriage. The President also put in a strong plea for the removal of untouchability, and the acceptance of the Nehru Report, and appealed to the Conference to take up the Congress programme, particularly in regard to the promotion of swadeshi industries. He concluded by saying that he welcomed opposition which in his opinion was bound to result in the ultimate assimilation by the public of wholesome ideas. We congratulate Raja Govindlal on the courageous lead he has given to his community. We understand that in the Subjects Committee a heated discussion arose on the question of widow remarriage. This was to be expected as the orthodox section of the community holds very strong views on the subject. We are glad to see that the citizens of Ajmer have taken every advantage of the presence in the city of distinguished leaders of the community. That the public of Ajmer are not unresponsive is borne out by the following message which we reproduce from a local paper:—"Mass meetings of Ajmer citizens attended by thousands were held under the auspices of Navajiwani Mandal at Nagar Arya Samaj on 9th, and 10th inst. when Kunwar Chandkaran Sarda presided. Lectures advocating widow re-marriages and uplift of the depressed classes were delivered by Messrs. Padamraj, Jain Basantlal Murarka, Shardaprassan, Radhamohan Gokulji of Calcutta, Nanakchandji Ganpatiji of Delhi, Dwarkadasji Bhartiya of Muttra and Bhagwandasji of Indore." The advanced section of the Marwari Community has been making much headway against orthodoxy and we are sure that the Conference will accept the lead of its able President.

Drinking Cup Controversy:—We congratulate the Bombay Municipal Corporation on the firm stand it took in refusing to rescind the resolution adopted by it last October, directing the Schools Committee to provide common drinking cups in the Municipal Schools. With the passing of this resolution one would have thought that the last was heard of the cup controversy in the Bombay Corporation. But that was not to be. There was an attempt on the part of the orthodox and reactionary section of the Corporation to reopen the whole question on the plea that certain Associations had addressed letters to the President protesting against the resolution. We have it on the authority of a corporator who moved that the letters be recorded that, since the Corporation had given its verdict against discrimination in the use of drinking cups, the children attending the Municipal Schools had been "gladly using common drinking cups". On the face of this fact, it was mischievous to attempt to take up the question anew. The Corporation remained imperious to all the stock arguments summoned to their aid by the orthodox members. Even the threat of the depletion in the number of students attending the schools failed to have its effect. We entirely agree with Mrs. Avantikabai Gokhale's remarks that since the Municipality made no discrimination in recovering taxes, it should treat all the castes and communities on an equal footing. It was finally agreed by an overwhelming majority to drop the matter. It is amusing that a local Anglo-Indian contemporary with an unholy zeal for the orthodox cause misinterpreted the proceedings of the Corporation and splashed the headline "Orthodox Hindus score over Reformers" across its page. Since it has not thought fit to correct itself subsequently, we believe it is really under the delusion that the orthodox members of the Corporation "have".

Hartog Committee Report:—What purports to be the Hartog Committee's recommendations on Indian education to the Simon Commission has been foreshadowed in a summary published in the press. The Committee while reviewing the growth of education in India recognise that there is a genuine desire among the masses for education, that there has been a social and political awakening of the women of India and an expressed demand on their behalf for education and that there has been rapid progress in the number of Mahomedans receiving instruction. The Committee had condemned communal institutions as lowering the standard of education and thus retarding the progress of the backward communities. The Committee are opposed to any special concessions of a communal character but as a temporary expedient suggest the reservation of places in public institutions for backward communities, if they could not get admission to them otherwise. We are against invidious distinctions in regard to franchise and membership to the legislatures and other public bodies, but we think that education is the chief remedy for communal differences and we are therefore inclined to support the Hartog Committee's suggestion.

"Hand-book of Indian Universities":—The Inter-University Board has brought out the record number of the "Hand-book of Indian Universities" which, we learn, had been made an annual publication. This new number of the Handbook is much more comprehensive than the first in that it contains information about all the Universities in India together with an appendix in which is recorded the work done by institutions which, though they do not come under the nomenclature of universities, aim at a university standard. The value of the Hand-book to those interested in education in India and abroad cannot be overestimated. The Inter-University Board's decision to publish the Hand-book every year would be welcomed as it will enable the public to have upto date knowledge of the working of the Indian Universities. The Inter-University Board which was formed in 1925 with the main purpose of co-ordinating the courses of study in India and securing uniformity in their recognition abroad, is not so widely known as its usefulness warrants.

The Air Mail:—The first air mail from London to Karachi arrived in Karachi on Saturday the 6th instant at about 7 in the evening. The aeroplane, the City of Jerusalem, left Croyden on March 31 and its arrival in Karachi was delayed by three hours owing to sandstorms encountered on the way. The actual flying time was only 53 hours and a half. The aeroplane, City of Bagdad, carrying the first air mails from India to England, left Karachi on Sunday the 7th instant at about 8 A. M. The opening of the Suez Canal reduced the journey from twenty one days to a fortnight and we have before us again reports of another week's reduction in the journey. The fact that there was a time when it took nine months and more to cover the distance between England and India seems hardly credible. The air mail service is undoubtedly important in so far as it brings the two countries in closer contact with each other. There is however one point which we hope the authorities will take note of and that is that while it takes only seven days for Karachi to get the mails from England, it takes three days more after the mails have reached Karachi for the letters to arrive in Bombay. We do not see why the mails should not be taken to the other parts of the country from Karachi by air.

Prohibition in Bombay:—Writing editorially in the Dnyanodaya, Dr. Wilbur S. Deming, who has undertaken the work of conducting the journal in the absence of the Rev. J. F. Edwards, urges on the Bombay Government the necessity of a better enforcement of the liquor laws. He writes:—"If prohibition has brought beneficial results to America, a judgment that was verified at the last election, it is fair to assume that it will be a blessing to India, especially since it meets the approval of all the larger religious communities. Some of the difficulties in Western India are concerned with the present system of collecting and expending revenue. Education, for example, should not be supported by the income from excise as this creates a vicious circle and offers an unhappy alternative. Similarly, the extreme poverty of the people makes it difficult for Government to devise new methods of taxation to supplant the loss in excise revenue when prohibition becomes operative. Ultimately the improvement in economic conditions due to prohibition will probably allow a higher rate of general taxation. If the prohibition goal is to be reached, Government must give rationing a sincere and honest trial." and he quoted authorities to show that the President had the power to decide finally on the point. At the conclusion of his statement, he read a message from the Viceroy intimating that his Excellency would address a joint session of the Legislative Assembly and the Council of State on Friday. The Viceroy in his speech disagreed with the President's opinion as to his powers to hold up the Bill but thought that the question was not of immediate importance. The Government would acquiesce under protest for the present, and postpone further discussion of the Public Safety Bill, the Governor-General meanwhile issuing under his emergency powers an Ordinance embodying the provisions of the Bill.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, APRIL 13, 1929.

A DANGEROUS PROPAGANDA.

We have referred in another article to the outrage perpetrated in the Legislative Assembly on Monday. The Indian press and public have condemned it in the strongest language. The President of the Legislative Assembly, Mr. Vithalbhai J. Patel, before giving his ruling disallowing the Public Safety Bill on Thursday, proposed from the Chair a resolution placing on record the Assembly's sense of horror and indignation at the dastardly outrage and assuring the authorities of its full support in such reasonable steps as might be necessary to prevent the recurrence of such a crime. This accurately reflects Indian opinion all over the country. In the face of such expressions of opinion, it is disingenuous of some Anglo-Indian papers to pretend that Indian leaders are either unwilling or afraid to denounce the crime. Any one who knows India knows that outrages of this kind are not native to the soil. Most of the offences against life in this country are offences of passion or consequent on sudden and grave provocation. The sanctity of life is so deeply rooted in Indian mentality that even the men concerned in the present crime, felt it necessary to apologise for and justify the means to which they had resorted on the ground, utterly absurd, of national necessity. It is the general feeling among Indians that this and cognate incidents are engineered by persons who are determined to thwart India in her endeavours to raise herself in the scale of nations. It is evident that powerful agencies are at work to discredit India in the eyes of the world. The literary bomb and dagger have been and are being freely employed for the purpose. Poisonous propaganda to foment quarrels between communities, castes, employers and workers and even between men and women, is in the air. This latest and most direct attempt to proclaim India to be a nation given to the methods of the anarchist and the assassin, is of a piece with the rest of this nefarious campaign. In the circumstances, it is impossible to resist the Government's demand to be vested with special power to deal summarily with alien propagandists of strife and revolution, and this is obviously the meaning of the resolution passed by the Assembly.

A CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION.

The Indian Legislative Assembly at Delhi met on Monday in a high state of excitement. The President had in the previous week advised Government in view of the pending prosecutions of Communists in Meerut to postpone further consideration of the Public Safety Bill. It was admitted by Government that some of the material on which the Bill was based was also the foundation of the Meerut prosecutions. The Bill empowers Government to deport foreign Communists, and the Meerut case is that the accused, 31 in number, were engaged in a conspiracy to overthrow Government in collusion with foreign agencies. The President and members of the Assembly like Pandit Motilal Nehru, Mr. M. R. Jayakar and Mr. Srinivasa Iyengar, took the view that the discussion of the Bill at this stage would prejudice the trial at Meerut and that, therefore, it should be postponed. Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru, the Liberal leader who is not in the Assembly, has stated to a Press agency that he was of the same view. Government's position is that though the material or some portion of it is common to the Bill and the prosecution, it is quite possible to discuss the one without prejudicing the other. They maintain that they are entitled to bring any new project of legislation before the Assembly at any time, even when judicial proceedings are pending relating to the subject-matter of it; and that the President can only regulate the discussion and not prevent the consideration of the project. The correctness of this view technically cannot be gainsaid. But if, as Mr. Jayakar said, a Bill cannot be discussed without the President having to pull up members speaking every two minutes, it is difficult to have a satisfactory debate on it, and on the broad principle that persons accused of a serious offence such as that against the accused should have full freedom to establish their innocence until they are proved to be guilty, it is but right that the further consideration of the Bill should not be proceeded with when the prosecution is pending. The President was to have given his ruling on the point on Monday, and the whole country was waiting for the news from Delhi with eager interest. The Assembly met. After some time spent in getting through the final stages of the Trade Disputes Bill, which had been opposed by Labour leaders as imposing unfair restrictions on Labour, the President stood up to give his ruling. Suddenly from the galleries two bombs were thrown on to the floor, hurting five members the Finance Member, Sir George Schuster, and four Indians. This was followed by a scattering of copies of a printed tract justifying the crime. The Police had no difficulty in arresting two men who surrendered themselves. The Assembly broke up and when a short while after the members returned, the President adjourned the session till Thursday. The President gave his ruling on Thursday when the Assembly re-assembled. He held that the Public Safety Bill could not be proceeded with until the Meerut case was decided,

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XV. CHILDREN WHO TOIL.

(BY DR. CLIFFORD MANSHARDT, PH.D.)

If a child is entitled to anything in life, he is entitled to a happy childhood. The long, carefree hours of play; the joyous, careless hours of day-dreaming and laziness are the rightful heritage of every child. The period of childhood is all too short. All too soon society begins to make its demands, and the days of childhood are lost under the accumulating weight of responsibility. What a tragedy is in that so many parents feel it necessary to shorten an already too short childhood. To compel a young boy or girl to accept the responsibilities of later adolescence or adulthood is little short of criminal. We have child labour laws upon our statute books, but they are of small value when parents and unscrupulous employers make common cause against their enforcement. And even were the child labour laws most rigidly enforced we should still be confronted with the problem of thousands of village children serving in the capacity of goat-herds and fencibles when they should be enjoying the privileges of the village school. Of course the common excuse is "poverty." But a people that will not give its children a chance has scant hope of ever overcoming poverty. Here indeed is an opportunity for the good citizen. The strength of a well-ordered society lies in its mutuality, in every member feeling a responsibility for the welfare of every other member. The shame of child labour is not the shame of any individual or class, it is a corporate shame. The good citizen must do all in his power, not simply to arouse public sentiment against the exploitation of childhood, not still more to enlist public support in the effort to root out its causes. The abolition of child labour is both an economic and a moral issue. Looked at from the narrow, selfish point of view, child labour may appear to be an advantage to the manufacturer or to the farmer. But in the long run it is a loss. Society is a unit, and men "gain or lose, stand or fall, grow richer or poorer together." The exploitation of childhood means a generation of physical weaklings, of illiterates, and of inefficient workers. It is the entire people who pay, and it is the entire people who will gain as child labour is abolished.

Many citizens, when brought face to face with the facts of child labour, are ready at once to profess their love for children, but love for children in the abstract means nothing until it is translated into every-day life and conduct. No man can love children in general without loving children in particular. And no man can love children in particular without being vitally interested in the welfare of these children. The problem confronting us is to expand our love until it passes beyond the boundaries of our own family circle to include the weak and underprivileged,

It is an old Persian proverb which declares, "When one child cries in the dark, the throne of God rocks from side to side." And to-day the little children are crying,—a cry which is shaking the very foundations of our social order as it calls for justice. And justice is at hand. The cries of the little children are not falling upon ears of stone. The public conscience is being awakened, and the arm of justice is being lengthened. The children will be saved!

INDIAN WOMEN'S EDUCATION.

MR. V. S. S. SASTRI'S ADDRESS.

The Rt. Hon'ble V. S. Srinivasa Sastri was given a very cordial reception in the evening of the 4th instant by the Women's Indian Association at the Headquarters of the Association, Pantheon gardens, Egmore. There was a large gathering of ladies and gentlemen present on the occasion. The Rt. Hon'ble V. S. Srinivasa Sastri spoke on "The place of woman in India" and also referred to the condition of women in South Africa. Dr. (Mrs.) Muthulakshmi Reddi presided. The Rt. Hon'ble V. S. Srinivasa Sastri addressed the gathering as follows:—

Ladies and Gentlemen,

I am happy indeed to be in this meeting the recipient of a most cordial welcome on the part of an influential association of Madras women. It is significant in more ways than one when we found that the women's problem in South Africa was of much greater magnitude than we have to face here. In that small community, living in somewhat strange and unfavourable circumstances it is no wonder that every woman, as regards her legal status or her social recognition, is much behind a woman in this comparatively well-ordered society. Women in South Africa need help of every kind. Where everyone has to care and earn in somewhat adverse circumstances, women have to play a part more or less like that which the women play in this country among the lower classes of our population. When we speak of Indian women, their culture, their destinies and their future prospects, we are apt, I think far too much, to be thinking of the more favourably circumstanced women, women living in what we may call refined society, removed from the grosser forms of struggle for existence, emancipated as it were from those features of a struggle for bare living which is known only lower down. People bring in sastras and invoke the authority of scriptures and often speak of sanctions and customs. It is true that all these are powerful factors in the determination of any social problem; but we forget that there is a much greater factor than these and this is the economic factor introduced by the struggle for existence. These things that I have mentioned, scriptures, custom, prescription, long established practice and so on, do not come in very much where both men and women have to work in the field for their subsistence. That there are millions of people living in those conditions we are apt to forget.

Let me go on to consider the condition of women in South Africa in the light of this fact. I do not say that woman in South Africa has freed herself entirely from the shackles imposed by Indian tradition or heredity. That can hardly be the case. But I would say this that in her progress to-day in the struggles that she and her brother make for better conditions altogether of life it is not the prescription of our sastras that guide them merely so much as the hard and stern necessities of the struggle through which they have to pass. This has two sides. It is often seen that where woman takes her place side by side with man in hard labour, where she has to contribute her own earnings to the maintenance of the family, in point of fact whatever the theory be, she gets a good deal more freedom than women elsewhere get. Elsewhere woman falls more under the scope of theory of social thought, of tradition and of prescription. There then she enjoys sometimes the privileges of emancipation from the struggle for existence.

SOCIAL DISABILITIES.

Looked at from certain other points also she suffers from the shackles imposed by the conventions of society rather more than is convenient for their progress. Take for instance the question of marriage. There is far greater freedom in South Africa in the institution and practice of a marriage than there is in this country. That is caused, you will say, by the necessity of life. Yes, that is my principal point. It is the necessities of the case, the hard economic facts that determine these matters far more than the theoretical consideration with which the papers are full and manifestoes get filled when we talk of the propriety of the conditions of women's life. It is very easy for instance to give a learned lecture upon what the rules of marriage should be, but the requirements of that line of thought would be found to have very little scope when an actual marriage has to be conducted among the classes which are at the bottom of the society of whom I am thinking for the moment. All these theoretical conditions, every one of them, will have to be seriously qualified and some will have to be summarily set aside during the conduct of marriage negotiations. In the upper ranks, however, of our society, these thoughts and restrictions have a certain amount of scope and it is the question how far society will progress in these matters merely from a theoretical discussion of these topics. I am thinking rather of such a very commonly experienced feature of woman's life as education. What applies to education will apply I think with perhaps not equal force but with some qualifications more or less to other spheres of life. Now take education. There has been ever since I was a little boy no end of thought both original and unoriginal, upon the ideal syllabus for girls' school and upon the further consideration whether it is right for the girl to be brought up upon the educational regiment as her brother. And upon that further question, which in India is not acute, but is on the way to become so, whether girls and boys should be educated together from the beginning or separated as far as possible. Upon all these questions each one of us has his own theories, not all of them, I am afraid, subjected to the test of criticism. Committees, conferences, and congresses have discussed this problem of the ideal curriculum for girls' school with far greater minuteness and with far greater scruples than the syllabuses for men's education. They are considered by our senates and by our educational bodies and howsoever the determination goes, we more or less submit to them. In convocation addresses and in educational conferences men give expression to some original ideas and some grave doubts whether we are moving in the right direction with regard to men's education. But all that is mere beating of the air. Where girls' education is concerned, however, people's deepest feelings are engaged over the radical question: What is the woman's destiny in life and then the orthodox and the new line of thought are engaged in a battle royal. Every detail is then subjected to scrutiny from this point of view. Are we not unfitting woman in India for her real role? We fall back then on trying to find out what is woman's place in life and as you know on that question there is room for a great deal of difference of opinion.

PROF. KARVE'S EXPERIMENT.

As I was coming here I was thinking of Poona and of the great effort which Prof. Karve has made there for the education of women, an effort which must command our admiration and support from many points of view. He has gone on the supposition that woman's education must run on lines somewhat different from the education of man, that she must be fitted for life much more quickly than her brother and that it is safer to experiment on woman's education along fresh lines than it would be in the case of man's education. In order to carry out these ideas of his—I grant they are great moving ideas—he has found it necessary to establish a separate women's university.

In connection with the university there are high schools established in various places. Altogether you may say that he has tried as in Japan a course of education for woman alongside man's but marked off in very many ways from the regular university life. Much in his plan is wise. A great deal comes from his almost unrivalled experience and when the whole of his effort is informed by magnanimity, by rare self-sacrifice and devotion to the welfare of the community, it is difficult to conceive more auspicious conditions for the success of any new experiment. In these most favourable conditions, I think, the institution is now 7 or 8 years old. It is possible for us to study the result with a certain amount of confidence. Now what do we find? This is a woman's university and teachers is it to a considerable extent are women, women of light and leading who have obtained distinction in the regular educational sphere. Besides the experiment has the undoubted advantage of appealing to the feelings, the patriotic feelings, of the people, by putting English in the second place and by giving to vernacular, which there happens to be Marathi, a place of honour as a subject of study and as medium of instruction. Can you conceive better conditions from a theoretical point of view which, an a priori leader of thought could have brought into existence for a university for woman exclusively? Here then is a case, I say, where we can look around and see whether the point of view which strikes one, who brings theoretical considerations into the forefront is exactly that which in actual experience is found also to be the wisest and to command the most widespread support. I am not speaking of this matter as a critic, much less as an unfriendly critic. I am only trying to isolate a social phenomenon. What do we find? During these years, this University has expanded its influence. It has produced a certain number of graduates. There are also a great many people, who think that Prof. Karve's experiment is bound in the long run to conquer the field of woman's education. Nevertheless, the facts are like these: I speak from what I knew of it a few years ago—before I left the country. Everything therefore is subject to correction. While people give their theoretical allegiance to the excellence of the ideals of this university the number of girls who actually take advantage of this new and theoretically conducted education, is curiously enough very small. Upon the other hand, just consider how many girls go to the neighbouring institution, the Fergusson College for boys. At one time, there were far more women studying for the regular university degree in Bombay in this single institution—there were girls studying in other colleges of Bombay—than in the whole of Prof. Karve's women's university. That phenomenon continued for a great number of years, and I think still is so. Why should it be so?

THE FUNDAMENTAL DEFECT IN PROF. KARVE'S SCHEME.

I have tried often to answer this question to myself, but I have not succeeded yet in finding out precisely why in the face of the theoretically well-grounded plan of education, the older plan still seems to recommend itself to the greater number of our girls and therefore to the greater number of parents, who wish their girls to acquire modern education. That is a problem, which I will just propound for you. It is worth considering. The best minds were employed on this subject. Prof. Karve himself with his vast experience has evolved this new plan specially for woman's behoof. It seems to accord with all the fashionable ideas on the subject. Nevertheless, the fact seems to me, that it has not hit as it were. It appears to me judging without full knowledge of all facts and I have put this to Prof. Karve himself and I have no hesitation in making it public, it seems to me studying the question as sympathetically as possible, that there was something vital, which this theoretically conceived system of education has missed from the beginning. And what is it? I will venture at the risk of being considered somewhat heterodox and heretic to put it forward for your consideration. I don't affirm it with confidence. I think the fundamental defect in the whole of this conception is that it tried to isolate woman from man. For such a vital purpose of education, preparation for the tasks of life which are common to both sexes and which must be faced by both in the same spirit and with a cordial spirit of mutual understanding and co-operation—to start a system of education for woman, as though she had different tasks totally different mentality and totally different destinies there I think is the mistake lying at the very bottom of the whole idea. And in our own community so far as my experience goes, what do the higher castes and their spokesmen and spokeswomen say often in public? They say for instance if you go to a village or a small town you will be assailed every moment, while you are on this subject, by the query "Why do you want to spoil our girls. You have spoiled our boys enough."

I was present at a debate in the Presidency College where the proper curriculum for women was the subject of discussion, and where young men thought seriously upon what sort of wives they should have. Boy after boy came on the platform and said: "Are not we spoiled quite enough? Why spoil our sisters too? Educate them differently if you must educate them at all. Now that is the idea, which, from a theoretical point of view, occurs to the ordinary Hindu of the higher caste. He cannot shake himself off from the idea that to have a woman educated exactly like himself is to be subjected to an embarrassment in life. "Is she going to enter the same profession as I? Is she going to compete with me, and question my degree?" These are the questions asked by him. I am not saying this in order to show you that the Western system is perfect. I am by no means of that opinion. I am trying to impress this fact upon your consciousness, that while upon this subject, it is possible for us, inheriting an ancient culture, ancient civilisation and ancient modes of thought, to think along certain lines feeling ourselves quite safe and sound all the time. It is quite possible for us to think so, but at the same time miss out something absolutely vital and the experience, which a moment ago I detailed as coming from the Poona experiment, is being, I think, in a small measure repeated for us here.

LESSON OF THE MARRIAGE MARKET.

While the orthodox people, the exponents of the ancient view of life either have a very anaemic view of the education proper to woman or think her best when she is not educated at all in the literary sense of the word, what is it that actually happens? You study the market—what they call the marriage market. The exaction of bridegrooms and their relations are, I think somewhat moderated if the girl has some of the small accomplishments to her credit, if she is comparatively educated, if she had been to school for a few years and could read some books, if she has a little music to her credit, and if she is as it were a little refined and has come into ways of modern life. Then we find as a matter of fact even among orthodox people she finds it more easy to get married than otherwise. Then you go and open a girls' school in a small village and you try to carry out there the theoretical considerations of the schoolmaster. You go and say for instance, 'Why should we learn this wretched foreign language, English? Our girls have not got to earn their bread and we shall bring them up without a knowledge of English.' A heroic schoolmaster may go on for a while confining himself to teaching girls only the vernaculars and the other subjects through the vernacular, priding himself upon it. But the moment another man opens a school where he teaches English alphabet, the original cheap will find his school empty. We may say, this is a vulgar craze; this is the verdict of the man of theory who plans what he considers wise and good for others. Upon this simple matter I am quite prepared to take the judgment of the average mother in preference to the theoretical schoolmaster who draws his principles out of books. Believe me so many men and women are not likely to attach this dreadful importance to a very slight knowledge of English unless it has some value. Whether it is spiritual value or not is another matter. It seems to be a vital value of life. Why do we miss that out in all our calculations? It appears to me, therefore, that in speaking of women's education we, men of theory are apt to miss out something which appeals to every man and woman, who are concerned with the realities of life.

AIM OF WOMAN'S EDUCATION.

That brings me back to the question: What is the object of woman's education? I would say to you not as a man of theory at all, but as a practical student of life, that it is just the same as the object of the education of man. I may here make myself liable to a great deal of misunderstanding and misrepresentation unless I introduce a great number of qualifications, I have hardly time for all of them. But I think I ought to approach the conclusion of my remarks this evening by just making clear one final consideration on this subject I disregard for the moment all our Sastras all our Vedas and all our traditions. They all have their value but I am thinking of this question purely from the point of view of the man who wants India to prosper, to get along among the countries of the world and Indians to be able to hold up their heads in future among the other nations of the earth. It would be idle for me to answer the question "Should women be educated at all?" I take that as having been answered sufficiently already by the fact of Indian life. Whether it is necessary further to educate her on the same lines or on similar lines with man is a question which requires an answer and it is that point on which I propose to dwell for a few minutes. What is the biggest fact to-day regarding India? It seems to me that whether she likes it or not, she has been dragged into the centre of the world's life, and she must be a participant for weal or for woe in this general life all around her. She cannot revive the past entirely; she cannot go back even if she would, say, to the time when our sages lived on the banks of the streams and evolved their early philosophies. That is no longer possible. We are going in the same direction—and no mistake about that—as other nations are going. That applies to woman just as much as to man. If that be clear that woman must develop in India as she has developed elsewhere, the question is whether it is to be an identity or an approximation, with necessary variations. No one would say that it should be an identity, but that it should be something more or less similar, seems to me to be abundantly clear and they are unwise who try to erect barriers along this line. To a certain type of temperament the task of fighting in the last ditch appeals as the acme of heroism. Such people, I am prepared to admire but not to follow.

DESTINY OF MAN AND WOMAN COMMON.

If that be the case, the final consideration is that we must fall back upon the common destiny of man and woman. It is impossible to escape that conclusion. There is no doubt, in spite of the Pandits, we are going in that direction. If we are wise in our day we may control the pace, that it be not precipitated, and we may regulate the line that it be not risky. But to attempt to put a stop to all these seems to me an impossible task and an unwise task which is bound to recoil not only on those that say it but also on those on whose behalf they say it. To-day we are reading of a severe competitive struggle between man and woman in the West. They seem to have come to blows over this question of education. You may well ask me: "Do you wish us to repeat that experience?" I am not here to prophesy over things that are likely to happen the next century or in the century after that. But I can only see a little into the future and that dimly. As yet I do not see signs of such struggle in this country and I think it will be time enough to erect suitable barriers in consonance with our ancient civilization when we are faced with anything like that difficulty. I know this and confidently say this about those who try to threaten us with these spectres and bogies. They tell you "Look at that dreadful thing we wish to avoid. You are going to precipitate right upon that." I ask them in turn "Yes. That may be your intention but tell me practically what you are doing. Here is the tendency of the time; women can no longer be kept down. She has begun to assert herself. She has got the suffrage, a day sooner perhaps than she should have got it. But she has got it. What are you going to do with her? The answer clearly comes from them. 'No, we are trying to put her back where she was long, long years ago.' Those who oppose certain changes and reforms are those people who on examination will be found to be opposed to any change and to any reform. Now that is the conclusion to which I come.

Where there is bad education, my answer always is the remedy is good education, not no education. Where there is insufficient education, the proper remedy is sufficient education, not the withdrawal of facilities for all education. Similarly in the matter of reform, ill-judged reforms are bad for any community. I do not want to precipitate reforms, but I do want some reforms. I find however the greatest opposition to our reforms from those who want no reform whatever. Those who hesitate and refuse to go along the lines clearly indicated by the modern marks of the world's civilisation, those who hesitate merely because there are loud cries of halt are playing into the hands of the conservatives of the land, the obscurantists who cannot read the signs of the time and who want to revive things that are long dead and can no longer be revived. People functioning for themselves in this century of ours have their minds and hearts harping back always to the third and second centuries, the history of which however they have constructed for themselves largely through the efforts of their imaginations and not through a study of the facts as we know them to be.

We cannot resist the large force of progress. Whether we see them or not, they are striking hard and shrewd on our life in all its points. The part of wisdom is to regulate progress, to conduct it along certain lines, but not to resist it altogether. That effort is bound to fail and before it fails, during all the time that it lasts, it is bound it seems to me, to create much confusion, where we wish clear thinking, and discord, where we wish harmony and true co-operation. U. P. SOCIAL CONFERENCE.

The fifth session of the U. P. Social Conference was held on Sunday 31st March at Lucknow, under the Presidency of Mrs. Uma Nehru, and was attended by a large number of prominent ladies. Mrs. Uma Nehru in the course of her presidential speech said:—

The aim which the Social Conference has set for itself appears to have been to adopt the ideals of the West in our social life just as the Indian National Congress has adopted in our political life. In the beginning the Social Conference seems to have met some opposition as the social atmosphere in the country was more conservative than political and as the English educated classes found politics and political agitation more pungent and interesting. The political development of the country must largely depend upon the social condition of the community, which supplies, the physical, intellectual and moral resources of the people. It was the condition of the present Society that led to the dangerous deduction that the ruling class is justified in withholding the grant of political rights to the people till such time as it thinks them socially fit to receive them. But looking at our achievement I am grieved to say that no other movement in the forty years of its life could have achieved so little as we have done.

EXCLUSIVENESS OF OUTLOOK.

Frequent and intimate contacts, close association and a common cultural and social programme with such of our brethren as were socially free from evils from which we suffered would have facilitated and expedited our growth. On the contrary the exclusiveness of outlook from which we approached the question of social reform dangerously reacted on our own social system. Our Social Conference gave an impetus to sectional social conferences and to the revival of the same tendencies, which it meant to crush. Thus the lead and inspiration of the Indian Social Conference, instead of welding together the Hindu community into a nation, tended only to awaken, organise and deepen caste consciousness in its various sections. And this evil has continued to grow until now its vicious influence is felt in every committee, association or office, where members of different communities have to work together. Thus instead of creating a Hindu nation we have succeeded in creating a series of nations one within another. Other communities of India also continued to grow on the same independent lines as no effective steps were taken to remove the estrangement, real and engineered, which followed in the wake of our awakening. The political consciousness of the various communities continued to drift more and more apart. As a consequence while our political consciousness widened and deepened our social separatist tendencies, with added energy from the political side, widened and deepened also. Until to-day we are just emerging from a social crisis, of trouble and turmoil, which, perhaps, is the blackest page of our social history.

"CHOOSE YOUR IDEAL."

It is time now that we should make up our minds as to the method we are going to adopt for social reform. We should not permit the present confusion of thought to continue. To begin with we must fix our social ideal and decide whether it is communal or national. If we choose to adopt a national ideal we must adopt a programme of work designed to give practical shape to that ideal. If we mean to work for some particular community we should give up our designation of Indian or National; for nothing can be more disastrous for our country and society than the idea of a Hindu and a Muslim nation or a Sikh and a Christian nation. In the relation of sexes we must emphasize social and moral motives and check and discountenance romantic and individualistic tendencies, which are steadily growing in our society. We must try to avert the coming revolt of women and the consequent breaking up of the marriage institution and home life. Finally our activities in all these directions should be backed by ceaseless propaganda about the religious, social and economic units of our national life. But there is no half way house for us. A little tinkering here on Eastern lines and a little tinkering there on Western lines will be of no avail. Social anarchy, which is prevailing to-day, in the thinking section of our society and which is gradually finding its way into the masses will continue to grow and will perhaps in the near future produce more disastrous results than it has done so far. It is the evident duty of the Indian Social Conference and its provincial branches, if they mean business, to take stock of the situation and give a sane and courageous lead.

DISSOLUTION OF HINDU MARRIAGE.

Pandit Krishna Prasad Kaul next moved: This conference is of opinion that steps be taken at an early date to enact legislation to sanction dissolution of Hindu marriage at least in cases of (1) desertion and (2) cruelty by husband.

He said that it was natural that a new movement should meet with misgivings, fears and unintelligent opposition. His appeal was not addressed to those who were opposed to all reform but to the supporters of the social conference to the advocates of social reform. This resolution was complementary to the resolution on widow remarriage. If the conference allowed a widow to remarry in the event of the physical death of the husband, why should the conference not allow remarriage in the event of desertion and cruelty by husbands when her condition was no better than that of widowhood. It was no use quoting statistics from France, America and other foreign countries as the grounds of divorce were limited only to desertion and cruelty and Indian conditions were different. It might be urged that this innovation was not necessary for Hindu society in view of the rarity of cases covered by his resolution. But he was not convinced that such cases were as few as not to call for a legal remedy. Statistics were not available but his investigations had shown that in the small community of Kashmiri Brahmans there were 14 cases of desertion of wives by husbands, out of which in about half the cases the husbands had taken to new wives. He gave further instances of widows' homes, a fair percentage of the inmates of which were not widows but deserted wives either actually driven out by husbands or forced to leave their husbands because of the impossibility of living with them. He then took up the commonly urged plea that the Hindu marriage was a spiritual sacrament, not a civil contract. If it was a religious sacrament, an indissoluble spiritual tie, it must be so for both parties, not only for the weaker party. In practice it was the reverse of an indissoluble spiritual tie for the husband.

He further instanced cases of contractual marriage from the Vedas and said that though such marriages might have been few, they were not unknown. He then quoted from Manu who contemplates five causes under which a wife can remarry in the life-time of the husband. Katyayana and Vashista also recognise about half a dozen causes similarly. Though the word divorce might not occur in the authorities legalised separation and remarriages were recognised. Even if it be granted that the cases calling for the legal remedy of divorce were very few among them there was no valid reason why justice should be denied to even a few dumb and oppressed victims. He wound up with a passionate appeal to the audience to carry his resolution unlike the previous conferences which had thrown it out.

MR. CHINTAMANI.

Mr. Chintamani, seconding the resolution, first referred to the militant statement hung right above the head of the president that women must be emancipated from the bondage of men and said that he had been discussing with some friends whether the time had not come for a husband's protection league to be formed (laughter), so that the tables might not be turned against them. Proceeding, he said that the resolution before them was a serious proposition which deserved the complete and active support of every enlightened man. If the basis of the social reform movement was to secure justice to every individual unit of society, if its motive and purpose was to see that no section of the community suffered from disabilities on account of birth or of sex, he thought that no one could offer any valid opposition to the resolution. Mr. Chintamani added that the delegates who had assembled in the Conference would forfeit all title to be called social reformers or advocates of justice and liberty if they did not vote for this resolution.

AN AMENDMENT.

Mr. Surendra Nath Verma moved an amendment which urged a dissolution 'particularly in cases of misconduct, bigamy, desertion and cruelty by either party to the marriage.' Pandit Iqbal Narain Gurtu seconded the amendment moved by Mr. Verma. Pandit Krishna Prasad Kaul, the mover, announced that if the conference was in favour of widening the scope of his resolution he was wholeheartedly in favour of it. He restricted its scope only to make it more acceptable to the conference. He accepted the amendment.

PANDIT SHYAMLAL NEHRU.

Pandit Shyamlal Nehru in opposing the resolution remarked that Mr. Kaul had not urged any effective and cogent reason in support of his resolution. If there were 14 cases of desertion and cruelty by husbands in the Kashmiri community of over 10,000 souls, there were half a dozen cases of desertion of husbands by wives. If the number of cases was so small without the aid and sanction of law, there would be 9000 out of 10,000 homes which would be ruined as a result of the highly dangerous remedy proposed by Mr. Kaul. The slightest disharmony would very much grow in proportions as a result of the so called legal aid proposed and result in intense social chaos and disruption of family life of which he gave instances. He said that a better course to meet almost all the cases pointed out by Mr. Kaul would be to penalise bigamy among Hindu males and make it a penal offence.

The president before putting the resolution to the vote of the house remarked that her own individual opinion was that even if the remedy for divorce were at present provided by law, Hindu ladies were not sufficiently advanced, educated or economically independent to take advantage of it. This did not, however, mean that she was asking the conference to reject the resolution.

The resolution as amended when put to the vote was declared carried by a majority of 5 votes. Pandit Shyamlal Nehru demanded a division but the president disallowed it.

THE CHURCH AND SOCIAL EVILS.

We are told that Miss Mayo's new book, The Slaves of the Gods, contains a preface by Bishop Whitehead, a former Bishop of Madras, in which he makes a distinction between the practice of Christianity and that of Hinduism as regards prostitution, to the effect that Christianity has never upheld such social abuses as prostitution by making provision for their upkeep in its temples. The Bishop's memory seems to have played him false. Did not Christianity uphold the practice of slavery and base it upon the very Bible itself? Did not the official heads of Christianity uphold the burning of witches and the persecution of heretics for centuries? Does not Christianity to-day in some countries officially uphold the colour bar and refuse equality of religious privileges to men of colour? Do not some sections of the Church to-day place women in an inferior position in regard to religious ordinances? Did not the Christian churches all over the world uphold war and urge on their members to fight and kill? Even as regards sexual immorality and prostitution the Church has not been free from blame in the past. It is a well-known fact that in the middle ages the Church countenanced sexual immorality and took no steps to see that its own priests lived clean lives. It is clear that these social evils were not part of Christian teaching but they were part of Christian practice for many years and some of them still are. The Bishop might retort that organised prostitution is a far worse thing than organised war. That is entirely a matter of opinion. Both are evil and both are anti-Christian and we may add anti-Hindu and it is absurd to identify the immoral practices of the adherents of any religion with that religion in itself. We may admit that the practice of every religion falls very far short of its ideals and should attack such evils wherever they found. Prostitution can never be said to be a fundamental part of Hinduism and this form of religious attack is unworthy of our religion and of our intellect. It is as blasphemous to attach prostitutes to God's temples as it is to refuse admittance to coloured persons or to outcastes but we have no right to judge the religion itself by these practices. The Indian Social Reformer carries the answer to the Bishop a little further still and asks if it is not hypocrisy to claim to judge Christianity simply by what is found connected with its temples. Commercialised vice is largely a western business, carried on by men, some of whom attend our churches. It is possible for the Christian to stand aside and to cast off all responsibility for this terrible blot on western civilisation? 'Christianity' says the Reformer, 'must be judged by the life of Christian countries.' If it is so judged it does not come out very well. Whether Hinduism or Christianity is the better religion is not to be determined by this sort of attack, which immediately invited a tu queque and leads nowhere. As long as such gross perversions of practice continue in connection with any religion, religion itself invites these attacks and it is up to both Christianity and Hinduism to purge their holy precincts of them as rapidly as they can. The result of the continuance of such unholy practices is not the condemnation of one religion as against another but the relegation of all religion to the lumber heap of superstition by those who despise such hypocrisy.

THE ASSEMBLY INCIDENT.

When Mr. Patel got up on Monday the 8th inst. to give a ruling on the Public Safety Bill, two bombs fell from the Gallery near where Sir George Schuster was seated. The whole house dispersed at once in panic for a while. Sir Bomanji Dalal and Sir George Schuster were injured while some other members also received minor injuries. Two men were arrested with six-chambered revolvers in their possession. It is alleged that the two accused, immediately after dropping the two bombs, fired two pistols. It is further alleged that they then threw their pistols on a seat and one of them stated "I have done it and here is my pistol" and that he gave himself up without resistance to the Police Sergeant.

The following is the text of the pamphlet, several of which were thrown from the Assembly gallery simultaneously with the bombs. It is a "notice" by the "Hindustan Socialist Republican Army" and is signed by Balraj, the "Commander-in-Chief".

"It takes a loud noise to make the deaf hear. With these immortal words uttered on a similar occasion by Villant, the French Anarchist martyr, do we strongly justify this act of ours. Without repeating the humiliating history of the past ten years of the working of the reforms and without mentioning the insults hurled down upon the head of the Indian nation through this House, the so-called Indian Parliament, we want to point out that, while the people are expecting some more crumbs of reforms from the Simon Commission and are even quarrelling over the distribution of the bones Government is thrusting upon us new repressive measures such as the Public Safety Bill and the Trade Disputes Bill while reserving the Press Sedition Bill for the next session.

"The indiscriminate arrests of labour leaders working in the open field clearly indicate which way the wind is blowing. In these extremely provocative circumstances, "The Hindustan Socialist Republican Association" in all seriousness and realising its full responsibility has decided and ordered its army to do this particular action so that a stop may be put to this humiliating farce and to let the alien bureaucratic exploiters do what they wish but make them come before the public eye in their naked form. Let the representatives of the people return to their constituencies and prepare the masses for the coming revolution.

"Let Government know, that while protesting against the Public Safety Bill and the Trade Disputes Bill and the callous murder of Lala Lajpat Rai, on behalf of the helpless Indian masses we want to emphasise the lesson, often repeated by history, that it is easy to kill individuals, but you cannot kill ideas. Great Empires have crumbled while ideas have survived. The Bourbons and the Czars fell while revolutions arched triumphantly overhead. We are sorry to admit that we, who attach such great sanctity to human life, we who dream of a very glorious future when man will be enjoying perfect peace and full liberty, have been forced to shed human blood. But the sacrifice of individual at the altar of revolution which will bring freedom to all rendering the exploitation of man by man impossible is inevitable. Long Live Revolution."

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Students International Service:—According to a Reuter's message Dr. S. K. Dutta of the Y. M. O. A. in India and Mr. Yusuf Ali, Ex-Member of the I O. S. attended the sessions of the International Students Service held at Dresden on April 7. Mr. Yusuf Ali spoke at the Conference on the future of Indian Universities. The conference discussed the question of helping Indians in foreign universities.

NOTES.

The Late Mr. Balak Ram:—The sudden death of Mr. Balak Ram on Wednesday at Mahableshwar where he had just arrived is one of the most tragic events in our experience. After a brilliant University career in Lahore and at Cambridge University, Balak Ram entered the Indian Civil Service and was posted to Bombay Presidency. He rose steadily in the Service, but had to pass through a fiery domestic ordeal out of which only his brave and buoyant nature enabled him to emerge unscathed. His subsequent career has been one of steady happiness in the loving companionship of Mrs. Balak Ram. They both returned only a few months ago from their second visit to Europe. His elevation to the Bench of the Bombay High Court, which was practically assured of permanence, gave much pleasure to his friends. His death at the threshold of a what had all the promise of a great judicial career, is a stunning blow to those who were privileged to know him intimately. A most loyal and affectionate nature, endowed with social gifts of a high order, Balak Ram's intellectual interests were never for a moment allowed to be overshadowed by his official duties. He was one of the founders and ex-Presidents of the Indian Mathematical Society, and a member of the Board of studies for Mathematics of the Bombay University. To Mrs. Balak Ram, and to the other members of the family, we offer our heart-felt sympathy in their irreparable loss.

Mr. Sastri at Chidambaram:—We congratulate the Annamalai University at Chidambaram in having as its first Vice-Chancellor the Right Honourable Srinivasa Sastri. Mr. Sastri who has just returned from South Africa where owing mainly to his efforts a college has been established for Indians, is pre-eminently fitted for the task of seeing the University through the first years of its existence. Mr. Sastri as is well-known began his life as and was for many years a schoolmaster and the Annamalai University is fortunate in having succeeded in persuading him to return to the educational line after his long digression into politics. Chidambaram is an ancient cathedral town of the Hindus and is famous as the seat of Aryan-Dravidian culture particularly of the remarkable Shaivite movement of S. India and the fact that to his knowledge of educational institutions the world over Mr. Sastri adds a deep understanding of Indian culture no doubt influenced the Annamalai University in its choice. There is one other reason why we welcome Mr. Sastri's appointment and that is his attitude on the question of women's education. We published in last week's issue of the Reformer a speech delivered by Mr. Sastri at the Women's Indian Association of Madras in which he expressed himself very strongly on the subject of different curricula for women in educational institutions. "I think," said Mr. Sastri on that occasion, "the fundamental defect in the whole of this conception is that it tries to isolate woman from man. For such a vital process of education preparation for the tasks of life which are common to both sexes and which must be faced by both in the same spirit and with a cordial spirit of mutual understanding and cooperation—to start a system of education for women, as though she had different tasks, totally different mentality and totally different destinies—there I think is the mistake lying at the very bottom of the whole idea." Mr. Sastri must not have been in complete ignorance of the Annamalai University's intention of securing his services as Vice-Chancellor and we may well take it as an indication that that University will not adopt the policy of different curricula for women as we are sorry to see seems to be attempted to be done at the Andhra University.

Dr. Besant on Indian Women's Progress:—In her annual address to the Women's Indian Association, Dr. Annie Besant dwelt on the rapid progress that the women's movement has made in this country since she first came to India in 1893. She further observed:—"Women were essentially the heads of the households in India. Indian Women in the past enjoyed as much privilege as men and there existed in the country, women mathematicians, metaphysicians and philosophers. This was one great advantage for Indian women. They had not been checked by any law as the women of England and all over Europe were faced. Indian women had only to fight against custom and not against laws. The whole system of law hindered the emancipation of women in the West and thus made the women's struggle a continual fight in the West. Another great advantage the Indian women had was the great sympathy shown by men, which gave a great incentive to the growth of the women's movement in India. The movement had spread all over the country in an extraordinarily short space of time and everywhere men had helped it in every way they could without any antagonistic feeling whatsoever. Men had come to recognise the part which women should play in the life of the nation and had helped women to develop to their full stature." The contrast between the men in the West and Indian men towards the women's movement is striking. In India the movement has not only derived sympathy and support from men but the very credit for initiating it belongs to them. This, in their zeal for righting the wrongs of society, such of the Indian women as have recently taken the lead, are apt to forget.

Hartog Committee on Women's Education :—The Hartog Committee on Education have done well in pointing out the neglect of women's education in the country and laying strong emphasis on its importance. They rightly observe : "Despite the growing increase in girls' education the measures taken to promote it have been inadequate. The education of the girl is the education of the mother. The school-education of each additional girl counts more towards the future than the school-education of an additional boy. We are of opinion that, in the interests of the advance of Indian education as a whole, priority should now be given to the claims of girls' education in every scheme of education." Then again earlier in the summary the Committee are of opinion that in the primary stage of education the wastage in the case of girls is even more serious than in the case of boys. Greater facilities in the shape of more girls' schools, Training institutions, scholarships for women teachers for study and training abroad and liberal grants for girls' schools will serve to combat the prevailing illiteracy to a great extent. The Hartog Committee's findings are a sad commentary on the educational system of the Government which during the hundred years of its rule has such poor results to show. It is to be noted that the Hartog Committee make absolutely no mention of private enterprise which has played no mean part in Indian education.

Justice in Africa :—A few days back Reuter cabled a message to India that a white farmer of Transvaal was sentenced to ten lashes and six years' hard labour on a charge of having caused the death of a negro by tying him head downwards to a tree and flogging him mercilessly. It was further announced in the same message that the lashes were not to be administered as the Minister of Justice was intending to look into the question. We are now told in a later message that the Cabinet are unable to advise the Governor-General to exercise mercy in this case and that the full sentence will be carried out. We are glad that the whites in Africa have not put themselves hopelessly in the wrong through false notions of prestige. The penalty is by no means a heavy one considering the crime. If anything it errs on the side of leniency. We do not see how on the face of it the Cabinet could for a moment have entertained the idea of recommending the exercise of mercy in farmer Nafte's case. We understand that Nafte has appealed against the verdict.

Indians Abroad :—During his tour in Burma Mahatma Gandhi emphasised the need of Indians in that province adapting themselves to the conditions prevailing there. Dr. Tagore who is present in Canada as India's representative at the National Educational Conference also laid stress on that necessity when he advised Indians domiciled in Canada to bring up their children in accordance with the customs of Canada and train them to be good Canadian citizens. The Po further noted that Indians were now able to bring their women to Canada and he urged the importance of Indians adopting local customs and conforming to the requirements of Canadian citizenship. The advice is sound and will not be without value to Indians not only in Canada but in other lands.

Temple Entry :—Presiding at the first Anniversary of the Nair Literary Association M. Ramaswami Mudaliar, Editor "Justice" and President of the Madras Corporation, made an interesting speech on "Social Movements." In the course of his address, he gave his views on temple entry and the problems that arise with regard to temples which will be of interest to our readers. Regarding the question of temple entry, M. Mudaliar declared it was going to become the very biggest problem for the Hindu Society in the very near future. The movement for the admission of all classes in the great temples of the land was bound to succeed sooner than later. Prohibition of entry into certain temples to classes of people was an illogical state of society which could not be tolerated. Then again, a great deal had been said about Atheism and those who were tending to be atheistic in society. But it had to be realized that Atheism was a well-recognized thing in Hinduism. How dare people say that one man was a true Hindu and the other was an Atheist, while Hinduism itself was the most tolerant of all religions and held in its bosom the Atheists, the Agnostics, the dwaitins and the Adwaitins. For his own part, the speaker was firm in his belief that every Hindu did at heart believe in a supreme God. When the Self-respecting propagandists condemned the existing temples their main idea was to put an end to the corruption existing in those temples. Mahatma Gandhi himself had once said : "The temples, in this country are the den of prostitutes". The fact was that those who made such criticisms of the temples were so despondent of any sort of purification and reform being possible with reference to those temples, that they had come out with such extreme statements. But for his part the speaker was optimistic enough to hope that the temples would be cleansed of all their evil through reform work, such as the Madras Religious Endowments Bill.

A Lajpat Rai Number :—The People of Lahore has just issued a number in honour of Lal Lajpat Rai. Lalaji was one of the few Indians who attained international fame and he had a large circle of friends in Europe and America. The special number which contains, besides a few of the unpublished letters and writings of Lalaji, tributes to his memory from his numerous friends and acquaintances both in India and abroad. The number which is priced at annas eight is well got up, considering that it had to be rushed through the Press and the various contributions make interesting reading.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, APRIL 20, 1929.

BRITISH INDIA AND INDIAN STATES I.

Several causes have been assigned for the establishment of British rule in India. It was not done by conquest in the sense that the British connection was imposed on South Africa. Seeley described it as not a foreign conquest but an internal revolution. Four-fifths of the army of the East India Company were Indian. Not a rupee was added to Britain's national debt on account of the "conquest" of India. The mere fact that Englishmen are not Indians should not obscure the truth. The Parsee merchants of Bombay, as Seeley observes, might have done the same, and if they had, it would have been recognised as an internal revolution. This internal revolution which was due to the need felt by the people for a stable Government, however, did not extend to the whole country. Either the same need was not felt there to the same extent or it suited British policy to leave it alone. In a letter to Mr. John (afterwards Lord) Morley, when he was editing the monthly, Fortnightly Review, on an editorial on the right of adoption which Lord Canning had promised to all Indian rulers, John Stuart Mill, who was for long in charge of the States affairs in the India Office, wrote: "All arguments grounded on vague phrases of the most plausible and successful of political humbugs, Lord Wellesley, count with me for nothing. He would have taken the whole country outright had he dared, but Parliament had then very recently made a solemn declaration against territorial acquisitions in India, and his object was to throw dust in the eyes of Parliament and take the country as far as it could be done while pretending not to do it." Mill himself was of opinion that the only "really Native States, with a nationality and historical traditions and feelings" were the Rajput States and Rampore. All the rest he considered to be creations of British rule, and in these he would have made the continuance of the dynasty by adoption "not a right or general rule, but a reward to be earned by good government" and as such he would grant it freely. He disapproved, therefore, of Canning's promise, but he feared "our faith is committed beyond recall".

We recall this bit of ancient history because it throws light on the section—the most important one—of the Report of the Committee presided over by Sir Harcourt Butler to define the relations between the British Government and the States, as to which there have been some disputes in recent years. In the beginning of this century, Lord Curzon stressed the doctrine of suzerainty to its last limits. He laid down in a memorable passage his conception of the duties of Indian Princes. Lord Curzon claimed them as his colleagues and partners. He insisted, however, on a high ideal of conduct on their part. "He (the Prince) must learn that his revenues are not secured to him for his own selfish gratification, but for the good of his subjects; that his internal administration is only exempt from correction in proportion as it is honest; and that his gadi is not intended to be a divan of indulgence, but the stem seat of duty. His figure should not merely be known on the polo ground, or on the race course or in the European hotel. These may be his relaxations; but his real work, his princely duty, lies among his own people. By this standard shall I, at any rate, judge him. By this test will he, in the long run, as a political institution, perish or survive." In pursuance of his views, Lord Curzon laid down that Indian rulers should not be permitted to be absent for long periods in Europe, except under special circumstances approved by Government. This order was introduced by the declaration that "the Government of India desire to lay down the initial proposition that repeated absences from India of Native Chiefs should be regarded as a dereliction, and not as a discharge, of public duty." Lord Curzon was succeeded by Lord Minto who reversed his predecessor's policy in this as in other matters. Since then owing to various causes the control of the Government of India steadily weakened until it became almost nominal. It is the opinion of several experienced Indian administrators in the States and outside that the policy of laissez faire has led to much deterioration in the standard of administration in several States. It is certain that the practice which Lord Curzon condemned of Indian Princes making long and frequent visits to Europe has reached the dimensions almost of a scandal. Discontent in the States has become chronic and it is no longer rare to find subjects of several States publicly declaring that if a plebiscite were taken they would vote for amalgamation with British India. The Butler Committee says that in the last ten years no less than eighteen States had to be dealt with, by way of admonition and otherwise, by the Government of India. A difficult situation had arisen owing to the interpretation put forward by some of the ruling Princes on their relations with the Government of India as representing the Paramount Power. Lord Reading's letter to H. E. H. the Nizam of Hyderabad came as a sharp reminder that the Princes should not presume too much upon the position which the Paramount Power as a matter of courtesy or policy had conceded to them. This led to much discontent and the Butler Committee was appointed to investigate the question.

SOME POINTS OF FACT AND LAW*

MARRIAGE.

(BY MR. KOPARGAM RAMAMURTI.)

We read in 10 Bhagawata (Part II) that when Sri Krishna invaded Assam and slew the much-dreaded Asura King, Naraka, and delivered from captivity the 16000 royal maidens whom that monster had forcibly taken in war from all the princely houses of the world and immured in his castle at Pragjyotishapura near Goahati, those grateful ladies one and all insisted that their divine liberator shall wed them without demur in right mortal fashion. The Hindu Law raised no bar to such multifariousness in kingly affairs. And the Lord of Compassion had of course no option but to honour the earnest prayers of his devotees. But being also the Lord of Loka-Sangraha or the ordered welfare of the world, Sri Krishna disdained to take advantage of the unthinking laxity of the human law. On the other hand, he resolved to make this an occasion to demonstrate to the world the virtue and expediency of one man wedding only one woman and being faithful and attentive to her for the sake of her happiness and his own. He therefore lodged each princess in a separate mansion specially built for her in Dwaraka and on one auspicious day he astounded the world with the spectacle of 16000 Sri Krishnas going through 16000 monogamous wedding ceremonies at the same identical moment in 16000 mansions. When the news of this miracle reached the ears of Sage Narada, that indefatigable Missionary and Curator of public and private Morals could not restrain himself from hurrying immediately to Dwaraka to look into the matter on the spot with his own eyes. But, to his utter amazement and holy joy, he too saw a distinct and real Sri Krishna faithfully engaged with his wife in various domestic pursuits in each and every royal home that he entered and found himself heartily welcomed, entertained and bowed out by 16000 Sri Krishnas and their respective spouses in rapid succession.

It is not given however to ordinary mortals to monogamize polygamy in this extraordinary fashion. Nor is compassion, pure and divine, invariably the motive for matrimony in this work-a-day world of men. The ancient Hindu law-givers recognised only one legitimate motive for marriage and that was the desire for progeny. To beget a son who would offer funeral oblations to his dead ancestors and continue their line on earth was the main purpose of Grihastha life according to the Hindu conception of human Dharma. Not to fulfil this purpose entailed sin and inevitably consigned the defaulter to Hell. Therefore, if the married life of any particular couple proved unfruitful and gave no hope of male issue, the law allowed the man to fulfil his Dharma through another wife with the consent of the first. The son thus begotten was welcomed and loved as the son of all his father's wives and was believed to save them all equally from perdition along with their ancestors. When Colonel Meadows Taylor, author of the charming Indian novel Tara, made the good Brahman lady, Ananda Bai, to worry her affectionate and pious husband to marry again in spite of his sincere reluctance, and made her also to seek out with voluntary zeal a suitable bride for him herself and to rejoice with genuine thanksgiving as if her own life-purpose was fulfilled when her husband's second union resulted in the birth of the much-coveted son, he was not drawing unduly on his own imagination or taking liberties with the credulity of his readers but honestly portrayed an aspect of Hindu life and sentiment which has not become extinct even in the India of to-day.

Of late however the system of adopting a son has become more popular and practically superceded the earlier system of achieving fatherhood by multiple marriages. The spiritual interests of the adoptive parents are equally well served by the adopted son without detriment to the worldly interests and happiness of the sonless woman whose status in the family would have been otherwise undermined by the introduction of a younger and more lucky co-wife. The average Hindu householder therefore never thinks of a second marriage now-a-days as necessary or desirable in the life-time of the first and is as confirmed a monogamist as any westerner. No father it is true, would be found so foolish as to give away his son in adoption to a poor man, although "poor people too have souls to be saved", as observed by John D. Mayne in his classical work on Hindu Law and Usage. But then poverty would be as much a disqualification for the luxury of polygamy as for adoption.

Sonship by adoption is unknown to Muhammadan Law. But Moslems too, like Hindus, seem to be governed and goaded by a sentimental craving for a son as the "giver of water" and "perpetuator of lineage" and as the crown of life's fulfilment in general. We have it on the authority of Munshi Mir Amman of Delhi, the venerable author of the Hindusthani version of Amir Khusru's immortal Persian tale of Char-Darwesh, that Padshah Azad Bakht, Emperor of Constantinople, who possessed all the power and worldly happiness that human heart could desire, was nevertheless incessantly miserable because he was not blessed with a son who alone is Zindagani-ka-phal or the Fruit of Life. At every one of the five daily prayers, it seems, that mighty man would humble himself in the dust before his Creator and cry his heart out in agony, saying, "Ay Allah! Mera nam leva aur pani deva Koi nahiñ! Oh God, there is none to take my name and give me water! Thou hast in thy grace bestowed everything on this wretch, but omitted to give even a single lamp to lighten this dark home of mine. This want festers in my soul, this craving lingers. In thy marvellous treasure-house there is everything always ready in store. Grant me but one lively male child to perpetuate my name and give permanence to this Empire ! ”

The spiritual or fatherly motive of marriage however is not always kept clearly in view by many people in modern times. They simply follow the sex instinct common to all races and the special usage of the community to which they belong. Yet it is a fact that Hindus as a class are habitually monogamous in practice to-day. So also, it is said, are most Muhammadans in India, owing chiefly to economic causes and, considerations of domestic peace.

But from woman's point of view there is not much to be proud of or thankful for in the laws of marriage governing the two communities. Not even an extreme feminist would make a grievance of the fact that the selfish laws of man all the world over have conspired to make the marrying of more than one husband at a time punishable as a crime for woman. But even the gentlest of women, quite innocent of feminist ideas, cannot fail to note the invidiousness and feel the cruelty and humiliation of the existing state of the laws which allow man to marry a number of wives without regard to the wishes or feelings or interests of the previously married ones and yet make it impossible for even an ill-used and deserted wife to seek relief under any circumstances by divorce and remarriage. For as at present administered even the Hindu law has lost sight of the spiritual basis of marriage and lost its power for dealing equitably with women's rights. What was once but a legal concession allowed under special circumstances to enable man to fulfil his spiritual Dharma has been transmuted in course of time into an indefeasible worldly birth right of the Hindu to possess a "plurality of wives" at his will and pleasure, as disclosed by that eminent jurist, Sir V. Bhashyam Aiyengar, in Chetti V. Chetti (1909 Probate 8), and marriage, which was meant equally for the spiritual good and worldly happiness of woman, has been made to operate as a kind of compulsory crucifixion, at least in some cases, through Child-Widowhood or premature motherhood legalised desertion and impossibility of divorce.

To appreciate the badness of the present law it is not necessary to premise that Hindu husbands are habitually cruel and unfaithful or that Hindu wives are being daily abandoned or superseded by their fickle husbands in the exercise of their exclusive legal privilege of marrying again and again. Hindu civilisation and human nature have on the whole proved nobler than the degenerate Hindu law of the present day. The principle Eka-patni-eratam, or devotion to one wedded woman for life, has been sincerely venerated in India since Sri Rama's time. Calamity, dire and irresistible, may sometimes force husband and wife cruelly apart for a while as in the historic cases of Nala and Harischandra. Ordinarily however no Hindu ever deserts his wife or takes delight in planning to supersede her by bringing into the family an additional wife.

Such thought never enters his mind in the usual course of things. There may in fact be more sincerely devoted husbands of the monogamous type among Hindus than in all Christendom. Yet the hard and unignorable fact is there that if any particular Hindu male happens by any chance to be made of less noble stuff or to lose temporarily his usual good sense and regard for the proprieties of civilisation, not to speak of humanity, there is nothing in Hindu law at any rate to bring him to his senses or to prevent him from disgracing his wife and making her life a burden to her by desertion and supercession.

Such cruelty and unhappiness are of course rare. The Hindu husband may by law be endowed with despotic powers but it must be said to his credit that he is amazingly mild and benevolent in the use of his despotism, a fact for which every thoughtful Hindu wife no doubt renders thanks to God every day. But to the Law itself no Hindu woman has cause to be grateful. The discrepancy in matrimonial status and privilege created by the law between the sexes (in addition to the discrepancy in property rights which shall be dealt with later on) assigns to woman an inferior and precarious status as a human being of which she is subconsciously cognisant even in her happiest moments. It is that which has habituated her to take her joys sadly in this world and implanted in her a rooted feeling, which often finds unconscious expression in common talk and folk-song, that a woman's lot in life is after all a futile and unenviable lot.

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XVI. TRAVELLERS.

(BY DR. CLIFFORD MANSHARDT, PH.D.)

From the earliest time man has been desirous of new experience, of pushing out his boundaries, and widening his horizon. He has sailed the seas, travelled through uncharted wilderness, scaled lofty mountains, and followed treacherous rivers. In the course of his quest he has met strange peoples, peculiar customs, and different standards of living. From a few caravans and sailing ships bearing their precious burdens, the field of transportation has developed until today every civilized country is served by its railroads, and regular paths of travel are charted upon the seas. The lure of the unexpected, the desire to see that which lies on the other side of the hill is a mighty drawing force. No other experience offers quite the same opportunity for growth as the experience of travel.

In travel, however, as in other phases of life, there are those who learn and those who refuse to learn. To some travel is a continuous delight, a never-failing fund of new experience. Why others travel is at times a mystery. They rush hither and yon paying flying visits to everything and seeing nothing. The best of any land is not that which lies upon the surface, the sights of the boulevard, and the pavements. The best is the spirit of the nation, which can only be absorbed through conversation, reading, and effort. "Deep calleth unto deep," and the frivolous unto frivolous. It is only the fool who is "wise in his own conceit."

As an aesthetic experience travel has no equal. To stand on the deck of an ocean liner pointing its way into the sunset; to climb a lofty mountain and to find a kingdom at one's feet; to peer into a giant crevasse and find there reflected the splendour of the rainbow; to pass smokestacks and busy factories, and to gaze with marvel upon the noblest work of man; to enter temples and shrines near sacred rivers; to see the stars shining above the lonely desert—these are the experiences that really enrich life, and make it worth the living.

And as we think upon travel in general we would also remember the vast army of workers who are engaged in transportation and who make safe travel possible. On land and on sea, by day and by night in fair weather and in foul, they do their work faithfully and well. From the captain on the bridge down to the humblest cooly each has his own responsibility, the proper performance of which makes for the success of the whole. The extremely efficient coordination of modern transportation is one of the real marvels of the age.

But though a man may wander far and near visiting places of beauty, his deepest satisfaction is in the return to his own home. No matter how dreary the day the sky seems bright and the air seems pure. And at the journey's end there is peace—the peace that is Divine—mediated through the love of faithful friends.

REPORT OF THE BUTLER COMMITTEE.

The report of the Indian States Committee which was signed on February 14th last will be presented to Parliament this evening and simultaneously published both in England and in India. It is a short unanimous report of 52 pages signed by Sir Harcourt Butler, the Hon. Sydney Peel and Mr. W. S. Holdsworth. The report is divided in five sections of which the following is the Committee's own summary:—

UNIFORM TREATMENT OF INDIAN STATES DIFFICULT.

There are two Indias under different political systems, British India and the Indian States. The latter differ so greatly among themselves that uniform treatment of them is difficult if not impossible. Treaties, engagements and sanads where they exist are of continuing valid force but have necessarily been supplemented and illumined by political practice to meet changing conditions in a moving world.

GROWTH OF PARAMOUNTCY.

We have traced and analysed the growth of paramountcy. Though it has already lost and should continue to lose any arbitrary character in a full and open discussion between the Princes and the Political Department it must continue to be paramount and therefore it must be left free to meet unforeseen circumstances as they arise. We find that the relationship between the Princes and the Paramount Power has on the whole been harmonious and satisfactory. No practical proposals for new machinery have been placed before us but we have indicated changes in the procedure based on experience which should lead to the removal of grievances and the settlement of outstanding questions.

THE RECOMMENDATIONS.

In particular we recommend that the Viceroy, not the Governor-General-in-Council, should in future be the Agent of the Crown in its relations with the Princes and that important matters of dispute between States themselves, between the States and the Paramount Power and between the States and British India, should be referred to independent committees for advice.

We have suggested methods for recruiting and training officers of the Political Department to which we attach great importance. We have indicated ways of adjusting the political and economic relations between British India and the States.

We hold that treaties, engagements and sanads have been made with the Crown and that the relationship between the Paramount Power and the Princes should not be transferred without the agreement of the latter to a new Government in British India responsible to an Indian Legislature. But we have left the door open for Constitutional developments in the future.

While impressed with the need for great caution in dealing with a body so heterogeneous as the Indian Princes, so conservative, so sensitive, so tenacious of internal sovereignty, we confess that our imagination is powerfully affected by the stirring of new life and new hopes in the States by the progress already achieved and by the possibilities of the future. To that future we can merely open a vista. Our terms of reference do not invite us to survey the distant hills and valleys that lead to them but we are confident that the Princes who in war and peace have already rendered such signal service will play a worthy and illustrious part in the development of India and the Empire.

RELATION BETWEEN STATES AND PARAMOUNT POWER TRACED.

The Committee trace the relationship between the Paramount Power and the States and point out the diversity in the political condition of the States. During the last ten years, they state, the Paramount Power has interfered actively in the administration of individual States in only eighteen cases. In nine of these interference was due to maladministration, in four, to gross extravagance, and in the remaining five, to miscellaneous cases. In only three cases has the ruler been deprived of his powers. The Committee remark: "No bad record this, considering the number of States and the length of time concerned. We have heard comments from some of the Princes themselves that in certain of these cases, intervention should have taken place sooner than was actually the case. The decision when to intervene must be left, and experience shows that it can be safely left, to the discretion of the Viceroy of the day." The Committee further observe that the Paramount Power has defined its authority and the right to intervene with no uncertain voice on several occasions, as for example in the Baroda case (1873-75) the Manipur Case (1891-92) and so lately as March, 1920, in Lord Reading's letter to the Nizam of Hyderabad. That the Paramount Power has, on the whole, acted with consideration and forbearance towards the States, and that many of the States owe their continued existence to its solicitude is undoubted and admitted. Few Governments at any time in history can look back on more than a century of action without some historical regret that certain things had been done and certain things had not been done.

ACTIVITIES OF THE PARAMOUNT POWER.

The Committee observe that the activities of the Paramount Power fall under three main heads namely, (1) external affairs, (2) defence and protection and (3) intervention. The Committee accept the plea of the States that they should be consulted on all external affairs. Regarding defence the final voice must be with the Paramount Power as it is responsible for the defence of both British India and Indian States. Intervention may take place for the benefit of the State and of India as a whole. Paramountcy must remain Paramount. It must fulfil its obligations, defining and adapting itself according to the shifting necessities of time. Nor need the States take alarm at this conclusion, for under paramountcy alone have grown up and flourished those strong and benign relations between the Crown and the Princes on which at all times the States rely.

"We feel bound, however, to draw attention to the really grave apprehension of the Princes and to record our strong opinion, that in view of the historical nature of the relationship between the Paramount Power and the Princes the latter cannot be transferred without their own agreement to a relationship with a new Government in British India responsible to the Indian Legislature."

FINANCIAL AND ECONOMIC RELATIONS.

Touching the question of the financial and economic relations between British India and the States, the Committee recommend that an expert body should be appointed to enquire into (1) reasonable claims of States or Groups of States to a share in the Customs revenue and (2) the adequacy of their contributions to Imperial burdens. The question of a Zollverein which they consider to be the ideal solution, would at once come up before such a body.

The Committee recommend that the concession by which all goods imported for the personal use of the Princes are exempt from customs duty, should be extended to all Princes who are members of the Chamber of Princes. Great stress is laid on the recruitment and training of political officers who at present are recruited from the I. C. S., and the Indian Army. The Committee hold that the sources of supply of such officers are now limited as both the services above referred to are shorthanded. The time has come to recruit separately from the Universities in England for service in the States alone.

The Committee admit that there will be matters of common concern to British India and the States in which the interests of the two may clash. The natural procedure in such cases will be for the Viceroy to appoint Committees to advise him, and in cases where such Committees fail to agree the Viceroy may appoint more formal Committees with impartial Chairmen of not lower standard than that of High Court Judges. In the event of their advice not being taken the matter should be referred to the Secretary of State.

Practically no change is recommended in existing arrangement on such question as mints and coinage salt and posts and financial claims in reward to posts and telegraphs, opium and exercise.

THE LATE MR. BALAK RAM.

Mr. Balak Ram, I. C. S., who was recently appointed to act as Puisne judge of the Bombay High Court, died shortly after arrival here to-day. He was apparently in normal health when he arrived at the Hotel de Russe, merely complaining of a slight pain in the leg. Death is believed to be due to a sudden heart attack.

Mr. Balak Ram appeared hale and hearty and was quite cheerful on arrival here. He conversed for some time with Doctor Munsiff, Director of Public Health. Subsequently he went into a bathroom. The doctor heard a scream, and going in, found the deceased lying on the floor. Doctor Munsiff picked him up, but he died on the Doctor's arms.

Doctor Munsiff stated that death was due to heart failure.

THE FUNERAL.

A large number of European and Indian mourners attended the funeral of the deceased. His Excellency the Governor was represented by Captain Nicholson, Aide-de-Camp. Others present included the Hon'ble Mr. Rieu, the Hon'ble Sir Ghulam Hussain Hidayatullah, Superintendent Willis, the Hon'ble Mr. Jadhav and representatives of all Government Departments. The body was driven to the burning ghat in a motor car by Doctor Da Gama. All along the route to the Golf course Indian mourners assembled, and by the time the ghat was reached a big crowd was present. The cremation took place in heavy mountain mist and the mourners returned in pitch dark.

Mr. Balak Ram was educated at the Dayanand School, Lahore, and subsequently prosecuted his studies at the Government College there. After graduating from the Calcutta University, he proceeded to England with a view to qualifying himself for the I. C. S. and studied at St. John's College, Cambridge. He passed the I. C. S. examination in 1899 and arrived in India in the beginning of the year 1901. He was posted to the Bombay Presidency. He commenced his official career as Assistant Collector and Magistrate. Subsequently he acted as Assistant Accountant-General. In March 1907, he was appointed Deputy Accountant-General, United Provinces, which post he occupied till December 1908. He returned to Bombay in the following year, when his services were transferred to the judicial department as Assistant Judge and Sessions judge, in November 1921, he was appointed District and Sessions Judge. In May 1926, he officiated as Secretary to Government, Legal Department, and Remembrancer of Legal Affairs. He was confirmed in the appointment in November of the same year. He was a member of the Bombay Legislative Council during the years 1926 and 1927, and was only recently appointed a Puisne Judge of the Bombay High Court.

EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN IN JAPANESE INDUSTRY.

In the February 1929 issue of the International Labour Review there is an interesting article on the above subject by Iwao F. Ayusawa containing a statistical survey of the position of women in Japanese Industry. It is pointed out that a striking fact in the economic organisation of Japan is that the aggregate number of women engaged in all kinds of labour exceeds that of men and that certain basic industries are largely dependent on female labour.

WOMEN IN FACTORIES.

At the end of 1927 the total number of women employed in factories was 1,009,550. Of these women 128,796 were unprotected by the factory Act because they were employed in workshops or small factories which employed regularly fewer than 10 persons and in which the work performed was not considered of a dangerous nature or injurious to health.

As a result of the revision of the Factories Act which came into operation since 1st July 1926, 22,573 new work places have come under the provisions of the law, the increase of the total number of workers employed being 173,293 and of women alone 44,834.

EMPLOYMENT OF CHILDREN.

The legal minimum age for industrial employment of children is now 14 instead of 12. By raising the standard minimum age to 14, Japan has come up to the general standard of the Washington Convention of 1919 fixing the minimum age for admission of children to industrial employment. The only exception, besides certain transitional provisions, is that if a child has completed the course at an elementary school before reaching the age of 14 it may, by obtaining special permission, be employed while under the age of 14, but under no circumstances before reaching the age of 12. Employers who contravene this provision are liable to a fine which may be as much as 1000 yen.

The effectiveness of the application of the Act is apparent from the reports of the inspectors. In the first six months after the Act came into force there were 789 cases reported of the employment of children below the minimum age. Warnings were given by the inspectors and 11 employers were fined for not discharging the children immediately upon receipt of the warning.

The writer points out that a total of only 11 penalties among 789 offenders cannot be said to be many and suggests that this somewhat lenient attitude was deliberately adopted in the first half year in view of the fact that the law was being applied for the first time in industrial and mining undertakings other than factories, and allowance was also made for the lack of legal knowledge of the employers.

The enforcement of the law in new fields is made difficult by the extreme poverty prevailing in some rural districts. It has recently been found that in a large number of cases the earnings of the children are an indispensable part of the income of the family for their subsistence. Early in 1928 there was an official statement in the Labour Gazette that the apparent hardship resulting from the strict application of the law indicates the urgent need of enacting another law for the relief of the poorer workers.

EMPLOYMENT OF YOUNG PERSONS.

The problem of the employment of young persons and in particular of young women workers in their adolescent or pre-matrimonial period is far more acute than that of employment of children, which may be considered as almost wholly disposed of. The difficulty lies in the peculiar situation of the basic industry of Japan, namely, that the textile mills are operated almost exclusively by young women before their marriage. It is seen from the available statistics regarding age distribution of workers in Japanese factories during 1923 to 1925 that the number of boys under 16 years of age employed in factories has diminished considerably and that of men above 16 has increased. In the case of female workers the number of girls under 14 has decreased and of those above 14 have increased. If the proportions of these workers in the different age groups are worked out it is seen that in 1925 as many as 95.41 per cent. of the male workers were above the age of 16 while women workers above 16 years of age were 73.88 per cent. of the total leaving 26.12 per cent. for girls below the age of 16. In other words, among women factory workers in Japan every fourth person is a young girl below 16 years of age.

There is a striking preponderance of young women in the Textile Industry. Beside that of the young person under 16 years of age, girls are more than 15 times as numerous as boys, while, among the adults there are between 3 and 4 times as many women as men.

WOMEN WORKERS IN MINES.

The Mining Industry in Japan has made considerable progress in recent years. In 1927 the number of women employed in mines was 64,237. The proportion of women to men is about one-third. It is pointed out that the presence of many women workers in mining work, which involves hardship and physical danger, is in itself a problem, whose seriousness is intensified by the fact that there are many women, some of them quite young, employed in underground work. In 1925 out of 208,295 miners working underground about 47,071 were women, 8672 of whom were, under 20 years of age. It must however be remembered that the employment of women in underground work is an old custom in the country, especially in the southern coal mines where hewers are accompanied by their wives, sons and daughters.

SOUTH AFRICAN INDIAN CONGRESS.

The Editor, Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

We desire to bring to your notice that at the ninth session of the South African Indian Congress held at Durban, Natal, in January of this year, the subject of repatriation of Indians from South Africa to India under the Assisted Emigration Scheme provided in the Capetown Agreement was fully discussed, and we quote below an extract from a resolution passed by this Congress, namely:—

“In view of the reports emanating from repatriates that their welfare in India is being neglected, this Conference feels that a thorough investigation into this matter be instituted and for this purpose instructs the Executive to do the needful”.

Following upon this resolution the subject was further discussed at an Executive meeting of this Congress held at Johannesburg on the 17th February 1929.

When this subject engaged the attention of the Delegates present at the Conference, it was stated that the Government of India have taken no steps to assist the repatriates, that they are stranded and unable to find work, that the present day conditions in India are not congenial to them, that reports have been read, conveyed by letters from repatriates, that owing to absence of work and assistance from the Authorities they are either starving or undergoing much suffering and consequently many of them, have, by force of adverse circumstances, migrated to Fiji or Malaya.

In the Capetown Agreement, one of the conditions accepted by the Government of India in regard to the Scheme, is that on their arrival in India the Emigrants will be helped as far as possible to settle in the occupations for which they are best suited, by their resources.

Judging from the report from the repatriates, it is doubtful whether the Government of India are doing anything at all to help the repatriates.

This Congress will be extremely grateful to you, if you will afford information on the subject so that it may be guided in making full representations to the Authorities.

HINDU LAW REFORM.

The Secretary of the All-India Hindu Law Research and Reform Association, Poona writes:—

On behalf of the All-India Hindu Law Research and Reform Association formed under the Auspices of the Mimanta Vidyalaya, it is proposed to convene in or about the last week of May 1929 an All-India conference of the Hindu Law Research and Reform Association for considering the following and similar other questions viz:—

(1) To review the work done by the Provincial Committees.

(2) The creation of provincial committees in provinces in which they have not been established.

(3) The desirability of appointing paid workers in each committee to ensure a thorough and satisfactory working.

(4) The reorganization of the central committee in the light of the experience obtained so far and the determination of the ways and means of co-ordinating the activities of the provincial committees with those of the central committee.

(5) The forming of a general constitution of a provincial committee as a rough guide for the provincial committees already existing as well as for the committees to be newly established.

(6) The election of the office-bearers of the central committee viz. (1) President (2) Vice-presidents (3) Secretaries (4) Treasurer (5) Members of the executive committee.

COUNTRY-WIDE PROPAGANDA.

(7) The determination of the lines of propaganda to be carried out by the central and provincial committees in respect of (1) the raising of funds for the association's work (2) the enrolment of new members (3) the enlisting of sympathy of the general public for the cause of the association and the doing of such other activities that may further the aims and objects of the Association.

(8) The establishment of an up-to-date library at the Head Office of the Central Association containing books bearing on the subject. With a view to facilitate the consideration of the above matters you are requested to furnish as early as possible the following material to the central committee; viz. (1) A report stating in detail (a) the work done by your committee (b) list of members (c) the amount of subscription collected by the Committee (e) rules and byelaws (f) and such other information as may bear on the points.

The Central Committee will be much obliged if different provinces will send representatives, making suggestions as to subjects to be discussed by the conference, asking research scholars to be personally present, etc.

Provinces are also requested to send papers that may throw light on the subjects on Hindu Law so that they can be read with advantage before the conference.

Provinces which have not yet established an Association are requested to form such a body, and send us the names of the office-bearers, nature of the work you propose to undertake and such other information as you may deem relevant. You are also requested to send a representative to the conference.

Any further information or the number of delegates likely to attend the conference should be communicated to the Secretary before 28th of April 1929, so that the central body may help the delegate for their budging, etc.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Dadar Girl's School:—The Annual Social Gathering of the students of the above High School was celebrated on the 21st March, when 500 ladies were present. Mrs. Kshamabai Row presided. Miss Hirabai Dixit, B.A., Lady Superintendent of the High School read a report in which she surveyed the gradual growth of the High School by the persistent efforts of the Society. She pointed out that the present status of the High School was mainly due to the worthy patrons such as Shet Mathradas Vissimji, Seth Velji Lakhamji, Dr. Nair, Dr. Rao and others as well as the selfless workers of the Society. Attention is also paid to the religious as well as moral instruction. In conclusion she directed the attention of the audience to encourage the efforts by sending donations to the school and enrolling larger number of girls every year. Mrs. Indirabai Sahasrabudhe appreciated the work of the Society in giving education to the girls at cheaper cost in the North of Bombay. She admired the simplicity and liveliness of the girls and appealed to the public to help the institution. Mrs. Kshamabai Row then distributed the prizes. It was announced that Mrs. Tulshibai Padwal of Dadar gave a donation of Rs. 501 to the High School.

The Eighth Bombay Temperance Conference:—The Eighth Bombay Temperance Conference which was to have been held in Bombay in February, but had to be put off owing to the disturbed state of the city, will be held early in May. Fresh invitations have accordingly been sent out to the various Temperance and other Associations throughout the Presidency to elect delegates to the Conference. If any Society has not been officially approached through inadvertence, the Secretary thereof is requested kindly to communicate with Mr. D. D. Gilder, Princess Street, Bombay, 2. The subjects to be discussed are Rationing and Statutory Reduction, Auctioning of liquor licences, Advisory Committees, Propaganda etc.

The New Vice Chancellor:—Mr. Mirza Ali Mahomed Khan, one of the oldest Fellows of the Bombay University, has been appointed Vice-Chancellor. He assumes office at an important stage in the life of the University, when it is being reconstituted under the new University Act. Sir Chimanlal Setalvad, the retiring Vice Chancellor, has held the post for a period of 12 years, having been appointed to it six times successively. Mr. Mirza was first nominated a Fellow of the University in 1907. In the following year he was elected to the Syndicate where he served for many years. He was Dean of the Faculty of Arts from the year 1922-25. During his long academic career, Mr. Mirza has taken a keen interest in the educational problems of the Presidency and his great love for Persian and Arabic literature led him to bring before the Senate about three years ago a resolution for the formation of a Faculty of Oriental learning. The resolution was carried and a committee was appointed to draw up a scheme. When the scheme was submitted for the approval of the Senate later on, that body rescinded its previous resolution regarding the formation of the proposed faculty. Mr. Mirza has also taken an important part in the civic life of Bombay. He was nominated to the Bombay Municipal Corporation in 1908 and his connection with that body has ceased with the termination of the life of the present Corporation. In 1922 he was elected President of the Corporation.

Kharag Bahadur Singh Released:—Kharag Bahadur Singh, a Nepalee youth sentenced on the 22nd March 1927 to 8 years' rigorous imprisonment for causing murder of one Hiralal Agarwalla for alleged cruel treatment to Rajkumari, a Nepalee girl, was released from Rajshahi jail yesterday. Kharag Bahadur Singh came down to Calcutta this morning. It might be remembered that Rajkumari, a girl of the Rana family of Nepal was taken to Calcutta by one Padamprasad where she met Hiralal who told her that she had been sold to him. Hiralal and his friends, it is alleged, criminally assaulted, made her drink against her will and this treatment continued for five months. As a relative of Rajkumari, Kharag Bahadur Singh took a bold step for protection and honour of women folk. After conviction several deputations waited on Lord Lytton and the Viceroy for immediate release of Kharag Bahadur Singh.

Social Reform Marriage:—A correspondent writes in the Hindu:—A social reform marriage was solemnised on the 31st May at the Brahma Samaj Mandir, Anna Pillai Street, Georgetown, the contracting parties being Mr. A. Arunagiri Chettiar of the Nagarathar community in the Ramnad district and Miss Sundari Ammal belonging to Naidu community. A large number of ladies and gentlemen, friends and relations of the married couple were present to witness the ceremony, including Sir R. Venkataratnam Naidu who officiated. In the evening, a tea-party was given by Mr. O. T. Jambulinga Chettiar of Kanadukathan to celebrate the wedding. The host, speaking in the end, characterised the morning function as an epochmaking one in the Nattukottai Chetti community; and expressed the hope that his Nattukottai Chetti brethren would follow the example set by Mr. Arunagiri Chettiar in social reform.

First Rajasthani Lady Doctor:—Miss P. Gahlot is the first Marwari lady, who out of 48 lacs of women in Rajputana, where there is no institution for English education for girls, has come out successful as a Sub-Assistant Surgeon from the Punjab Women's Medical College this year. She is the daughter of Mr. Rampratap Gahlot of Jodhpur, who has evinced equal zeal and interest in the education of females. Miss Gahlot was enthusiastically received at Raikabagh Palace Railway Station (Jodhpur), and is at present posted as a lady doctor in the Women's Hospital of Jodhpur State.

Passport Refused:—Mrs. Kamaladevi Chattopadhyaya who is in Delhi has been refused a passport to go abroad by the Madras Government and is now approaching the Government of India.

NOTES.

Lala Lajpat Rai's Autobiography:—The People of Lahore which the late Lala Lajpat Rai founded, and which is being ably edited by Mr. Firoz Chand whom he specially trained up for the work, is publishing his autobiography, which promises to be a valuable contribution to the social and religious as well as political history of India. We reprint the chapters relating to Lalaji's early life. The picture which it gives of Hindu society in the Punjab in Lala Lajpat Rai's boyhood, is specially important as furnishing the background to the subsequent sweeping success of the Arya Samaj in that Province. Bengal and the Punjab are the two predominantly Moslem provinces in India, and it is significant that the two great religious reform movements—as distinguished from revival movements—in Hinduism originated in these two provinces. In Bengal, however, although the Brahmo movement began half-a-century earlier, and although Raja Ram Mohan Roy, its father and founder, was deeply-versed in Persian and Islamic culture, the reform movement was a reaction to Christianity and not to Islam. It was at once deeply influenced by Christian teaching which the Raja held to contain the essence of religion, and a protest against the proselytising propaganda of missionaries. In the Punjab, the Arya Samaj was a reaction against Islam rather than to Christianity. Lala Lajpat Rai says that it was only after he, the son, had become an Arya, that his father took to the study of Hinduism and became not an Arya, but a Vedantin, that is a Hindu not of the Vedic but of the post-Vedic or philosophical Hinduism. Lalaji says what prevented his father from turning Mahomedan was the fear that his mother would separate from him and go with her children to live with her parents. The domestic struggle which resulted from the husband's strong pro-Islamic leanings and the wife's intense faith in the orthodox religion, is graphically told. The wife held her husband from proselytising till the son grew up and brought him back to belief in the ancestral faith. The story is one which has had analogies all over the country. It is the strongest proof if proof were wanted of the essential identity of Indian home-life from the Himalayas to Cape Comorin.

Marriage Law Anomalies:—In his illuminating article which we publish this week, Mr. Kopargam Ramamurti remarks that owing to their opposition to be included in the Gour Marriage Act of 1923, Mahomedans, Jews, Christians and Parsis are still subject to the condition of formal apostasy along with their brides even when both parties belong to the same race and religion if they seek the help of Act III of 1872. This is not correct so far as Parsis are concerned. The Parsi Marriage Act which is applicable only to marriages where both parties are Parsi Zoroastrians, prohibits polygamy. As for Jews, a recent case in Bombay showed that polygamy still prevails or at any rate is not illegal among Indian Jews. When Mahomedans marry non-Mahomedan girls, the latter as a rule become converts to Islam. In the Punjab, the Anand Marriage Act is a means of contracting inter-communal marriages which are not legally monogamous. Mr. Ramamurti points out certain defects in the Christian Marriage Act which needs looking into. Registration under the Act of 1872, notwithstanding the formal religious repudiation demanded, does not in fact lead to any further social or legal consequences. There was a case of a Hindu-Mahomedan marriage under the Act a year ago, but we have not heard that either of the parties had been put out of their respective communities for that reason. The Privy Council, we believe, has held that rights of succession are in no way affected by such marriages. We strongly commend Mr. Ramamurti's suggestion that all Hindu marriages should be registered under the revised Act of 1923.

An Unsuccessful Experiment:—A few days ago a message was published in the newspapers to the effect that the term of office of Mr. Watts, Dewan of Travancore, had been extended by one year. We were surprised, because all that we have heard of affairs in that State was not by any means indicative of a successful administration. Rather the reverse. Travancore had for long enjoyed the reputation of being one of the best-governed Indian States but recent reports were to the effect that it was fast losing this reputation. It is impossible to say more than that affairs seem to have come to such a pass that in the interests of the State a change of Dewanship had become imperative. We were one of the few Indian journals which warmly welcomed the departure from custom inaugurated by Her Highness the Maharani-Regent by appointing Mr. Watts as Dewan of a State with deep-rooted Hindu traditions. As the Butler Committee remarks the Kshatriya Raja and the Bramhin Minister are implicit in the Hindu idea of a State. Travancore scrupulously maintained this tradition, and the Maharani-Regent's act was, therefore, one which betokened both liberality and high courage. But we are constrained to admit that the experiment has been a failure, and Her Highness has been obliged to admit it too, and, contrary to the earlier message which was perhaps a feeler, has according to the correspondent of the Times of India reverted to the traditional practice of a Hindu Prime Minister, her choice having fallen on Mr. Subramanya Iyer, a Judge of the Travancore High Court and a native of Travancore. The failure of Her Highness' bold experiment, however, should not discourage her. Even in Great Britain no Roman Catholic has been Prime Minister since the Reformation, and the law expressly prohibits one being appointed to the Lord Chancellorship. In the United States of America, a very popular and capable Catholic candidate stood last year for the Presidency for the first time since the Republic was established and he was defeated by an over-whelming majority because of the strong Protestant tradition. Travancore, by comparison with these countries, is centuries behind. The failure of Mr. Watts, moreover, is also due to other causes, such as his want of administrative experience and a personality which could have overcome the hostility which every innovation from long-standing practice provokes in conservative minds who form the bulk of every stable society. Viceroys and Governors in British India are greatly assisted by their wives in bridging the social gulf and Mr. Watts' career in Travancore was perhaps somewhat handicapped by the absence of that inestimable advantage.

Joshi Committee's Surprise:—The forecast that has appeared in the press, of the recommendations of the Age of Consent Committee which is engaged in giving final shape to the report, is not at all encouraging. Keen disappointment will be felt if, as is believed, the Committee were to recommend 14 years as sufficient for the present as the age of consent. It is also stated that the report will not be unanimous, as the progressive members who form a majority are strongly in favour of raising the age to 16. In spite of the over-whelming evidence in favour of a higher age than 14, the Committee's suggestion will no doubt come as a surprise. The only charitable interpretation that can be put to the unsatisfactory recommendation of the Committee after its long labour is that the members were seized by the strangle hold of conservatism. This is one more proof that in the matter of social reform as in others not to put one's faith in Committees.

Canon Davis' Munificence:—"We are delighted to learn," writes the Leader, "that the Rev. Canon Davis has promised a gift of Rs. 50,000 towards the building fund of Agra University. As we have previously remarked, Canon Davis had a large share in bringing the University into being, he was its first Vice-Chancellor and right well did he deserve the hon. degree of Doctor of Letters which the University conferred upon him. The promised gift is enormously to the credit of Canon Davis, and is very much like him. It was only the other day that we referred to his generous gifts to St. John's College. Canon Davis has been a great educationist as well as great philanthropist, and his name and fame will long be remembered in the United Provinces with respect and gratitude."

The Education of Indian Princes:—The king on the 18th at Pudukottah at a public meeting presided over by the principal of the N. Raja's College, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi protested against the principle of appointing European tutors to minor princes. She observed it is a pity that the Durbar should have thought of importing a European lady as governess for a minor Raja. A European lady, however highly academical qualifications may be, a woman was unacquainted with the manners and customs and also the vernacular of the State was a suitable tutor especially for an Indian Prince. She wondered why the Government should have thought of importing a European lady, when many of our highly educated Indian women had training in the West were available. It was not available one of our woman graduates whom there are many at present could have been trained for the post. In this connection she also pointed out that much depended upon the early training of children. The Raja's early association with a European lady while developing his young mind a love for western dress, manners and customs, might, she feared, also induce in him a feeling of aversion towards his people and to the commendable features of Eastern civilisation. She also observed in passing she visited the Women's Hospital at Pudukottah and expressed the view that there should be Maternity and Child Welfare centres to educate the people on the necessity of preventive treatment and skilled help during confinements. Facilities should also be provided for the treatment of venereal diseases. Many Indians not only in British India but even belonging to the States have for long felt strongly on this question and it is a pity that the policy of placing fresh barriers between rulers and ruled should appeal to the Indian States.

A Reform Marriage:—The marriage was solemnised on Sunday the 21st at Bombay by Mr. S. Sadanand, Managing Editor of the Press of India, with Miss E. S. Sagaram Iyer, L. T., Head Mistress, Government Training School for Women, Bellary, under Act III of 1913, in the presence of a number of friends and well-wishers of the couple. Mr. Sadanand is the son of Mr. C. V. Swaminath Aiyar who founded and conducted for several years Viveka-Chintamani, a premier Tamil journal which did much to popularise liberal ideas in South India and Mrs. Sadanand is a daughter of the late Mr. E. S. Srinivasa Aiyar a deputy-Collector of the Madras Presidency and a practical social reformer, who firmly believed in higher education for women. Although both are from the Brahmin community they belong to different sub-castes.

Sanatorium at Tambaram:—We have had occasion to note in these columns sometimes about Dr. Muthu's scheme of establishing a sanatorium at Madras for open air treatment of those afflicted with the fell disease, tuberculosis. The foundation stone of the first set of buildings was laid last year and we now understand that the building work has been completed and the opening ceremony of the Hospital was performed on the 1st April by the Right Hon'ble V. Nivasa Sastri in the presence of a distinguished

BRITISH INDIA AND INDIAN STATES II.

It has been claimed in the Chamber of Princes that the Butler Committee was appointed at the request of its members. When the Committee's terms of reference and personnel were announced the Princes did not disapprove of them though one or two of their prominent spokesmen let fall expressions to the effect that the terms might have been wider and that a representative of the Princes might have found a place on the Committee. The Princes, however, expressed their full confidence in the Chairman, Sir Harcourt Butler, and were quite confident that the Committee could not fail to see the justice of their case. That there was an element of diplomacy in all this, goes without saying. The Princes engaged an eminent English Barrister, Sir Leslie Scott, who was believed to be a great friend of Lord Birkenhead, then Secretary of State for India, at a fee which, perhaps, was a record one, to prepare and put forward their case before the Committee. The whole thing was treated as confidential, but as a matter of fact every little move was fairly well known to the leaders in British India. When, therefore, Sir Leslie Scott wrote an article in a British Law Journal summarising his views on the position and claims of the Princes, no one was surprised, and the Nehru Committee in a chapter, believed to be largely the handiwork of Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru, pulled to pieces the elaborate edifice of his argument. The Princes put forward an informal disclaimer that Sir Leslie Scott's article in the Law Journal did not represent their views, but it is believed that the case he presented to the Committee did not materially differ from the contents of that article. The method adopted by the Princes in their relations with the Committee was the very reverse of that of politically-minded people in British India in relation to the Simon Commission. The former was largely diplomatic, as transactions between States had necessarily to be, the latter purely political as the action of subjects is to secure constitutional rights from their own Sovereign. The Butler Committee was feted wherever it went and if the claims of hospitality could have decided the issue a decision in favour of the Princes would have been a foregone conclusion.

When the Committee and several princes had assembled in London for the final stage of this drama, three men, Dewan Bahadur Ramachandra Rao, Mr. Abhyankar and Mr. Chudgar, were nominated at a Conference of Indian States' subjects to proceed as a delegation to London to see that the British public and the Butler Committee were properly apprised of the fact that Indian States consisted of the Princes as well as their people, and that the latter's point of view were entitled to consideration in deciding the future destiny of the States. The Dewan Bahadur and his colleagues were not speaking to a brief, but from a patriotic sense of what was best for the Princes as well as for the people of the States. While thoroughly loyal to the Princes, the States People's deputation stressed the right of the people to be consulted in administration as well as in the relation of the States to British India. The Princes, while condemning the independence movement in British India, wanted independence themselves under a shadowy suzerainty personal to the King-Emperor, quite oblivious of the fact that the British sovereign was a constitutional monarch who governed through Ministers responsible to the people. The deputation of States' subjects, on the other hand, maintained that the Princes ought to become increasingly responsible to their subjects as a condition of their securing more freedom from the control of the Government of India. If the Princes had been politicians or had been advised by politicians and not by lawyers, they would have realised at a very early stage that in the present state of world-opinion it is as difficult to establish a case for autocracy as for slavery. There is a good deal of autocracy and slavery in the modern world, in fact, but the strong tendency is towards democracy and freedom of contract. A naked advocacy or defence of either condition, has not the least chance of gaining a hearing in any civilised country. The arrival of the States People's deputation in London, wrought a transformation. The Butler Committee pleaded that it could not give a hearing to the delegates, but agreed to receive their statement and to give it its best consideration. Copies of the Butler Committee's Report though published in India and in England ten days ago are not available at the time of writing. The official summary published evidently omits important passages. Mr. Chudgar, one of the members of the deputation who has remained behind in London, has sent cabled messages to the effect that the peoples' interests has been fully safeguarded in the Report, though the summary contains only a feeble trace of this important part of it.

gathering. The fact that the work has been completed within so short a period speaks much for the untiring zeal and efforts of Dr. Muthu. Mr. Sastri in opening the hospital paid an eloquent tribute to Dr. Muthu's extraordinary knowledge and experience and wished the doctor every success in his noble undertaking and hoped that the Madras Government and the wealthy men of the locality would recognise the greatness of the cause and talents which Mr. Muthu so unreservedly and meritoriously placed at their disposal,

SOME POINTS OF FACT AND LAW*.
MARRIAGE.

POSITION OF HINDU REFORMERS.

(BY MR. KOPARGAM RAMAMURTI.)

Indian social reformers have from the time of Keshav Chandra Sen been struggling to make monogamy for the male too an essential part of the marriage systems of this land. But Orthodox Hindus and Muhammadans can never be persuaded to acquiesce in such a change in their respective family laws. Woman as the presiding deity of man's household wields so many natural advantages and holds already so many strategic points in her unreasoning grip, that the wise man of both communities will feel equally nervous for the destiny of their superior sex if she is to be given any more powers. They cannot be happy unless they are allowed by law to hold, as they do now, some emergency powers in their own hands, some kind of domestic "Regulation III of 1808," which will help them to keep woman ordinarily afraid to overstep her constitutional bounds or to dislodge her from her throne, if need be, by one desperate effort at any moment without explanations or the framing of a charge. Married life, it seems to them, may become a pandemonium and a nightmare if the law itself encourages woman to think that she is the equal of man in all respects and makes it absolutely safe for her to fetter, gag and tyrannise over him, "as in the west."

The only way then open to social reformers to establish by law the principle of frequent monogamy in India is to persuade their countrymen to voluntarily surrender their polygamous rights by getting all future marriages registered under the Special Marriage Act (III of 1872) as amended in 1923 just before their usual religious ceremonial, out of a chivalrous regard for the human status and dignity of their womankind. Self-respecting and prudent Hindu girls, especially widows who wish to remarry, and their wise guardians also, should develop the grit to demand that the bridegrooms of their choice shall be willing to have their principles and bona fides placed above board by registration of the Marriage under Act III of 1872. In doing so they do nothing that can be regarded as obnoxious to Hindu religion, because since 1923 when the Act was amended at the instance of Dr. Hari Singh Gour, it is open to Hindus to marry under this Act while positively affirming their faith in Hinduism. There is nothing in this procedure that can offend caste rules either, because the registration does not bear the immediate performance of the sacred rites customary to each caste. The only class of Hindus who will be unable to avail themselves of the Act are those few whose caste compels marriage of a girl before she is fourteen years old. This disability also will disappear when the Legislature makes 14 years the uniform minimum age of marriage for girls throughout the country as proposed by Mr. Har Bilas Sarda.

* For the earlier articles of this series vide I. S. R. Jan. 5, Feb. 2 to March 9, and the last issue.

MUHAMMADAN MARRIAGE.

But unfortunately there is no such relief yet to reformers of the Muhammadan marriage system in India. Moslem gentlemen willing to bind themselves legally to a life of monogamy have no facility to solemnise their marriages under Act III of 1872. Under its provisions both the bridegroom and bride are still required as before to declare that they do not profess the Mahammadan religion.

For this reason, the late Sir Ronald Wilson in his valuable work on the Muhammadan Law of India under British Rule, which he termed "Anglo-Muhammadan Law," strongly pleaded for the provision of a tolerable alternative for those who do not wish either to abjure Islam or to be governed in all their family relations by usage dating from the Middle Ages." He also pointed out that "considering the intellectual ferment now going on among Indian Muhammadans and looking especially to the wide publicity given to the views of Mr. Justice Amir Ali, it is difficult to suppose that there are more who would jump at the opportunity of contracting a legal marriage on a footing more distinctly monogamous than can be secured by even the most carefully drawn contract under the Anglo-Muhammadan Law, if the thing could be managed without the formal apostacy required by Act III of 1872."

But the Indian Legislature, yielding readily to the clamour of orthodoxy, has resisted all attempts made up to date, including the last one of 1923, to amend the Act on these lines and so Muhammadans, Jews, Christians and Parsis are still subject to the condition of formal apostacy along with their brides even when both parties belong to the same race and religion, if they seek the help of Act III of 1872.

CHRISTIAN MARRIAGE.

The learned author of the "Law applicable to Christians in India" is naturally proud that the marriage law of Christians is more considerate to the human rights and dignity of woman than either the Hindu or Muhammadan law and enforces monogamy even on the male instead of leaving it entirely to his good sense and good nature. He is therefore very particular that a Christian woman should never marry except under the provisions of the Indian Christian Marriage Act (XV of 1872). Even if she chooses to marry a non-Christian she may do so before a Marriage Registrar appointed to solemnise such marriages under that Act. But she should on no account be so foolish as to marry with non-Christian ceremonial conducted by a Hindu or Muhammadan priest, as that would place her at the mercy of their polygamous law. To deter her from taking such suicidal step and to make an example of her if she did is obviously the duty of every good and wise elder of the National Christian Church of India. Judge Paul Appasami therefore is anxious to have the misguided woman and her ill-favoured husband and heathen priest, along with their friends of whatever community, subjected to criminal prosecution under Section 68 of the Indian Christian Marriage Act for which the maximum punishment is ten years rigorous imprisonment or transportation. And, that he may be impartial to both sexes without invidious discrimination, he is prepared to mete out the same treatment also to any Christian male who might similarly offend against Christian sentiment by having his marriage solemnised under heathen rites with the help of a heathen priest, although no such evil consequences can be said to accrue to him by his marriage as could be pointed out in the case of a Christian woman. His only regret is the Judgment of Mr. Justice Walsh in Maha Ram's case (I. L. R. 40 Allahabad), in which that learned Judge declared that this penal section is not applicable to marriage not purporting to be Christian marriages recognised by Act XV of 1872, pointed out the "apparent error" slipped into by the learned Chief Justice of Madras in the "decision of the so-called Full Bench in 40 Madras," and remarked that such prosecutions should be discouraged. "Since the above pronouncement," says the learned author of the Christian Law "it has become risky, at least in the United Provinces, to undertake prosecutions against Hindu priests and Qazis for celebrating marriages where one of the parties is a Christian." (Vide also I. L. R. 17, and 20, Madras.)

DEFECTS OF CHRISTIAN MARRIAGE ACT.

Even non-Christians can readily understand and sympathise with the desire of good and benevolent elders of the Christian community to see that Christian men and women do not thoughtlessly throw away the benefits secured to them by the Christian law. But unfortunately there are at least two flies in the ointment which must be removed before drastic steps are thought of the strength of section 68. The Indian Christian Marriage Act is defective in at least two particulars. It is insecure for valid intercommunal marriage as well as for conserving the principle of monogamy among Christians.

I. VALIDITY.

The careless and dangerously loose wording of section 88 of Act XV of 1872 and the incongruity of the marginal note appended there makes it exceedingly difficult of right interpretation beyond doubt, and seems to throw a cloud on the validity of a Christian-Hindu marriage even if duly solemnised and registered under the provisions of that Act. Such marriages however are supported by the long continued practice of the entire Christian community of India and are unquestioningly accepted by them as valid. There is no decision of any Indian High Court one way or the other. The only case in which the point was argued was Chetti V. Chetti. (1909 Probate 67), but that was before the High Court of England and the remark of Lord Gorell which seems to agree with the contention that section 88 is a bar to the validity of a mixed marriage of that kind in India is mere obiter, because the decision in the case turned upon the fact that the marriage in question had been contracted in England under the English law of civil marriage which was held good against all personal laws of India to the contrary. In the recent case of Lendrum v. Chakravarti, however a Scotch Court of Sessions pronounced a decree of nullity under similar circumstances. (vide the "Hindu" of 21st January 1929). Lord Mackay held that marriage between Hindus and non-Hindus was not recognised by Hindu law and that, though the marriage in question was good in Scotland and probably in all the rest of the world, it was still a marriage which was not good within the bounds of British India. But there is no indication in the judgment that the provisions of the Indian Christian Marriage Act had also been considered in this connection. Still it is desirable that the Indian Legislature should be moved at an early date to amend the wording of section 88 and bring it in to conformity with the sense of its marginal note and with the established practice of the community. (Vide I. S. R., 27th October and 17th November 1928).

II. POSSIBILITY OF BIGAMY.

The second defect is the absence in Act XV of 1872 some provision corresponding to section 16 of the Special Marriage Act (III of 1872). This section specifically lays down that if a man who has once married under the Act marries again during the life-time of his wife he shall be punishable for bigamy under sections 494 and 495 of the Indian Penal Code, "whatever may be the religion which he professed at the time of such second marriage." In the absence of such a provision with the specific words quoted above, a Christian wife married under Act XV of 1872 is as unprotected as any heathen woman married with heathen rites against the bigamous proclivities of her husband. If she had married, say, a Muhammadan husband under the Act, what is there to prevent him from marrying a second wife under the Muhammadan law? His first marriage under Act XV of 1872 does not at all deprive him of the polygamous rights which he possesses under his personal law. The fact that the Christian wife is still alive is no bar to the validity of her husband's second marriage with Moslem ritual under the Moslem law and hence sections 494 and 495 I. P. C., would not operate against him. But let us consider what may seem to be the stronger case of a Christian woman who has taken scrupulous care to marry only a Christian man and according to Christian rites as provided for by the Christian Marriage Act. If that Christian husband of hers takes it into his head to prove faithless to her, what is there to preclude him from circumventing the Christian law against bigamy by adopting the Muhammadan or Hindu religion and taking another wife from his new fold as was done with impunity by Michael (3 Madras High Court Reports, Appeal 7) and Antony (I. L. R. 33 Madras 371)? To rely on an Obiter in Emperor v. Lazar (30 Madras 550) and another from Panjab opposed to the earlier as well as later decisions and to say that opinion on this point is divided and that "the better opinion seems to be that he cannot" so marry, is not to solve but to shelve the trouble. If an outsider, with but a limited understanding of the human problems involved in the matter, may yet venture to make a friendly suggestion, what the elders of the Christian Community should do is to take no rest till the Indian Legislature incorporates a provision corresponding to section 16 of Act III of 1872 into Act XV also.

THE SPECIAL MARRIAGE ACT.

Till that is done, the belief that marriage under the Indian Christian Marriage Act protects the monogamous rights of a Christian woman cannot be said to be based on sure foundations. It is true only to the extent that her husband, whether Christian or non-Christian, cannot marry again under the same Act while she is alive. But he is entirely free to marry another woman under some other law which permits polygamy. Any zeal therefore that Christians may show in the meanwhile to prosecute Christians and other people who prefer a non-Christian ritual and do not take the services of a Christian Marriage Registrar under Act XV of 1872, must be justified only on the ground of excessive religious sentiment. It cannot be justified, as is sought to be done in the book under review, on the plea that the Christian wife was thereby made to forfeit a right which was indefeasibly hers under the Act.

There is a further justification urged in this same connection, that by marrying a non-Christian with his religious ritual instead of under Act XV of 1872, the Christian wife deprives herself and her children of their better rights of inheritance under the Indian Succession Act. This falls properly under the subject of "Inheritance", the third department of Family Law which must be considered later on. We may however conveniently dispose of the question just here by mentioning only two relevant points for remembrance in this context. The first point is that Act XV of 1872 has no provision corresponding to the new section 24 of Act III of 1872 making the Indian Succession Act applicable to the property of persons who marry under that Marriage law and of their issue. The second point is that the rules of succession applicable to the property of a deceased person are ordinarily governed by the religion which he professed and not by the religion professed by his widow or his children. A Christian wife can inherit to her Moslem husband, for instance, only according to the Muhammadan Law of succession whether she had married him in the presence of a Christian Marriage Registrar under Act XV of 1872 or before a Qazi according to the ritual prescribed by the Moslem law. Where then is the excuse for persecuting a Christian woman who prefers one marriage ritual rather than another or a Qazi who faithfully exercises his ancient legal privilege under the Shariat?

EARLY LIFE.*

(BY THE LATE LALA LAJPAT RAI.)

I will be very brief about my early life. My father was an Aggarwal (banya) by caste. Several generations of my ancestors lived in Jagraon, a small town lying between Ferozepore and Ludhiana at a distance of 24 miles from the latter place. Before that they belonged to Malerkotla. My grandfather was a shop-keeper. My father was born in 1845 on the day when the British defeated the Sikhs in the battle of Mudki (in Ferozepore district). During my father's boyhood, my grandfather who could read and write only the Mahajani characters, was for several years a Patwari in a neighbouring village under the British. I well remember my grandfather, and I can say he was a very painstaking and courageous man. He was short-statured, very intelligent and wise and sociable. He made friends with people very quickly and was ever ready to start on journeys. He embodied all the virtues and failings of shopkeepers. In keeping with the code of that class, he was fond of making money in all possible ways. He was very firm in his religion and belonged to that sect of Jains whose Sadhus keep a piece of cloth tied round the mouth. He used to perform the religious duties twice a day regularly. He was fond of the company of Sadhus of his sect and was very hospitable to them. His last illness lasted for but a day, and so he died practically in harness.

My grandmother was a different type altogether. To this day I have not seen another woman as righteous, pure-hearted, hospitable, generous and simple as she was. She could not count beyond twenty. All her life she never used a lock and never kept a key in her custody. She was incapable of keeping money, and so her husband never gave her much. She was not fond either of jewellery or of dressing well. She was so generous-minded that practically all she got from her husband she distributed among her neighbours. She made herself useful to all. She would join children in their doll games. She needed no "dinner-things" or plates, for she merely put her vegetable on her loaf and ate it.

Occasionally she had fits of a peculiar kind. Whenever she was in this abnormal condition, it was supposed that the spirit of my grandfather's deceased sister had entered her body. Whatever she said then, she said as if she were my grandfather's sister. The whole family would gather round her and each would consult her as an oracle for his or her own peculiar need or difficulty. She would answer all such questions. I saw her several times in this state of trance. I cannot offer an adequate explanation of the phenomenon. But of this I am sure that tricks or fraud or humbugging my grandmother was not acquainted with. Her temperament and her character ruled out all such suspicion. She kept excellent health and seldom fell ill. Considering all these facts, I find it hard to discover the cause of the phenomenon I have described. I must add that when in her trance my grandmother used to foretell the future or make revelations about matters not known to anybody. If I may depend on my memory, events often corroborated her prophesying. In any case the family had great faith in her.

* (Being the two first chapters of Lalaji's autobiography which is being published week by week in the People, Lahore under the caption, "The Story of My Life". The first chapter appeared in the Lajpat Rai Number which was noticed last week).

As I have related above, my father was born in January, 1845. In 1849 the British annexed the Punjab, but the Jagraon side of the Sutlej was in their possession even before that. My father was educated in a Persian school established by the British. The Head teacher was a Mussalman Maulvi, very firm in his religion, and honest and righteous and given to religious observances. Because of his lofty character his contact influenced all his pupils and Islamised their outlook. Several of them embraced Islam afterwards. Even those who did not formally accept Islam, remained Muslims by conviction much the greater part of their lives. My father belonged to the latter category. My father received instruction in his native town from this Maulvi for some time, and afterwards joined the Normal School at Delhi. He always stood first in his class, and in the final examination at the Normal School he stood first in the whole of the Punjab. In some of the papers he was awarded the maximum marks, amongst these being Mathematics and Physical Science. Throughout his life he has loved learning passionately. Now that I write this story he is fast approaching seventy. His 71st birthday falls in January next. But even now he reads day and night and devours all books, pamphlets and journals in Urdu, Hindi or Gurmukhi that he can lay his hand on. If he cannot get any new book he goes back to the old favourites. His reading covers a varied range, but he is particularly fond of religion and history. His study in religion is deep and extensive. He is extremely well informed about Islam, Hinduism, Christianity, Jainism and Buddhism. The Quran and the Upanishads he must have read scores of times. The Bible and the Jain and Buddhist literature also he is very familiar with. He is a keen student of religious literature in general.

For the first 25 or 30 years of his life he was a believer in Islam (according to the Suni School). He used to recite namaz and to observe the ramzan fast, and he cultivated acquaintance among the Ulemas and Moulvis. When Sir Syed Ahmed started his socio-religious mission, he read Sir Syed's works and became a follower of his. Upto the 40th year he was a Muslim of the Syed Ahmed school which was popularly known as the "natural religion" school. During this period he was antagonistic to Hinduism and the Arya Samaj, and used to criticise the teachings of both in the Brahmo press. But when I joined the Arya Samaj and he studied the best of Hindu literature, his outlook under-went a radical change, so much so that in old age he has become a Vedantin, and is now a believer in the Vedanta.

CHAPTER II. MOTHER'S MIRACLE.

Why didn't then my father finally accept Islam? The answer is furnished by my mother's shrewdness and toleration. She did not take much time to discover that her husband's ideas were Islamic, and she strove ever after that he should have full liberty of religious belief without discarding the external Hindu garment. She served him as well as she could, and put up with his Islamic ways. My father's Mussalman friends used to come to dine at our house, she would afterwards cleanse in fire the utensils they had eaten out of. She would not object even when my father went to the length of bringing with him food cooked in a Mussalman's house, and sometimes he would even cook flesh in our own house. But she strove always to make him happy. My mother was very shrewd but had a wrathful disposition. The veriest trifle would upset her. But her love for her children and her husband made her put up with things she despised. She had been born in a family where Sikhism reigned supreme. Her father and mother and brothers were Sikhs. They used to recite Japji and observed Hindu ritual and festivals, they wore long hair and in religious matters they worshipped the Gurn Granth Sahib (Sikh scripture). One of the brothers of my maternal grandfather's was a Granthi. My grandmother used to recite Japji and Rehras from 3 hours before daybreak till morning. All these people hated Mussalmans and Islam. But by an irony of fate my mother was wedded to a man who was a lover of Islam and a friend of Mussalmans, and who renewed every day his threat to turn Muslim.

When I consider how devoted a Muslim is to his religion, how he regards the propagation of Islam as a bounden duty and how he believes that the highest reward attaches to converting a man to Islam, I can well imagine what great pressure must my father's Muslim friends have brought to bear upon him upto his 40th year, and how often they must have tried to induce him to become a Mussalman openly. That my father did not become a convert to Islam in spite of all these things is nothing short of a miracle—and the credit for having wrought this miracle must go to my mother. I remember full well that whilst I was yet a child she used to shed tears over my father's religious "improprieties" for hours. Sometimes she would not taste food for days together, and would keep heaving sighs of sorrow all the time with her children in her lap. But she would never think of deserting her husband. In fact she always lived with him and was never away from him for any appreciable period of time. She always tried to conceal his religious enormities or improprieties, and put up with everything.

My father always condemned the Hindu religion and Hindu customs and ritual, and sometimes he used extremely harsh language about the Hindu gods and goddesses. On occasions of Hindu festivals he would not only himself not join the poojah, but would not permit it in the house. But my mother managed to discharge all the duties observed in the orthodox Hindu families. The observances, the poojahs, the shraddhas—she neglected none of these. Generally she did all this without my father's knowledge. Sometimes she would shut all doors in his absence and be through her orthodox observances before his return. But occasionally she might be taken unawares, or our father might gather from our talk that in his absence she had been occupying herself with idol-worship; on such occasions he would lose temper and administer her a scolding. Poor creature she put up with everything; she would weep and suffer in silence. Our father knew that if he turned Mussalman, our mother would take her children with her and live either at his father's or at her own father's. This my father did not want,—and mother understood him aright in this matter. She, therefore, put up with his religious "improprieties, and never interfered with his liberty of thoughts.

I cannot sufficiently praise my mother's shrewdness and forbearance, particularly when I recall that my father's income was always a meagre one, and because of his independent character his job never seemed to be secure. When I was born he was a Persian teacher getting Rs. 25 a month. For 12 or 13 years he got no increment, for he was never given to flattering Inspectors and Headmasters. Within this small sum of twenty-five rupees my mother managed to run the house, to perform the religious samskars of her children, to feed them well according to the standards of the people of her status, and even to extend her hospitality to her neighbours and to the needy. My father's salary never rose beyond Rs. 35 a month. In the last 7 or 8 years of his service he was given 2 increments of Rs. 5 a month each time. His pecuniary difficulties ended only when I became a bred-winner at the age of 19.

My mother was altogether unlettered. My father tried several times to teach her, and I also made several efforts—but to no purpose, for besides her bad health, household duties and attention to children left her little leisure. She bore ten children, of whom at the time of her death six were alive—2 sons and 4 daughters.

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR

XVII. STUDENTS.

(By DR. CLIFFORD MANSCHARDT, PH.D.)

In the history of the kings of Israel the story is recorded of a certain king who went forth to battle. The odds were decidedly against him and the king was very much discouraged. But at the time of crisis a prophet appeared assuring him that the enemy would be delivered into his hand. "By whom?" the king asked. "By the young men," replied the prophet. And so it happened. The young men were mustered, went forth to battle, and won a glorious victory. If the great social evils that confront our modern society are ever to be mastered, it is the young men who must rally. It is the youth who must carry through to completion the programs of the fathers, and it is the youth who must lay down practical programs for their own generation. It is to the students now training in our schools and colleges that we must look for leadership.

It is very easy for students simply to drift along, accepting things as they are, but in days such as our own there is no time for drifting. The pressing problems confronting us call for men of purpose, men who have glimpsed a better social order, and who are bending their every effort to its attainment. If there is one lesson that students find to be of real difficulty it is the lesson of concentration. To take a hard problem and to wrestle with it until it is completely subdued is contrary to the spirit of the average student. But there is no other way out. Unless the schools turn out young men and women of moral fibre, young men and women who find joy in intellectual conflict, we can hold out small hope for the future. About the only thing worse than a scholar without enthusiasm, is an enthusiast without a sound scholarly training. If the young men of our generation are to gain the confidence of those whom they would lead they must be able to speak with the voice of intellectual authority. Shallow thinking on the part of the leader spells sure disaster for the movement he would carry forward. Let our students heed the voice of the ancient proverb: "Take fast hold of instruction; let her not go: keep her; for she is thy life."

In our emphasis upon education as preparation for living, we sometimes lose the truth that education is life itself. The Students in our schools and colleges are not simply preparing for life that begins at some indefinite future—they are living here and now. Every habit formed, every skill acquired, every attitude developed, every appreciation cultivated, is a vital part of the life of the student and has its direct relation to the lives of his fellows. How essential it is then that students should cast aside dawdling and settle down to the real business of living.

The fact that one is a student or a graduate does not in itself raise that one to the level of a superior person. There are multitudes of educated fools, and multitudes of wise men who have never crossed the threshold of a college. The educated man is that rare person who feels himself to be at home in his world; who looks on life with keen delight; and whose soul within him is unafraid. He is a man of broad sympathies, a lover of truth, and a champion of the right. Among our students, as well as in the other walks of life, "many are called, but few are chosen."

THE LATE Mr. K. S. RAMASWAMY IYER.

Glowing tributes were paid to the memory of the late Mr. K. S. Ramaswami Iyer, Managing Agent of the Arungabad Mills, Ltd., at a public meeting held on Sunday morning at the Napoo Hall, Matunga, under the joint auspices of the South Indian Association, South Indian Union, The Mysore Association, Nayar Samaj, the Asthika Samaj, South Indian Co-operative Consumers' and Credit Societies and the South Indian Sangeetha Sabha. Mr. K. S. Aiyer presided. Mr. K. Natarajan, Mr. K. S. Ramachandra Iyer, Rao Saheb K. Ramaswamy, and several other prominent South Indian residents of Bombay were present on the occasion.

A BELIEVER IN DOING ONE THING WELL.

The President, in his opening speech expressed himself to be overwhelmed with grief at the sad and premature death of one of the most respected South Indian citizens of Bombay. Mr. K. S. Ramaswami Iyer was one of the earliest of the South Indian settlers in Bombay and he had won a reputation for himself and commanded great respect and admiration in the commercial circle. It was a matter for congratulation that it was he who had established the reputation of the community in Bombay. He had earned a name for himself as one of the biggest financiers and mill-owners and his services were greatly in demand. Several requests were made to him to join the Board of Directors of various other companies, but he stoutly refused to do so because he believed in doing one thing well. He took charge of the affairs of the Arungabad Mill at a time when the financial condition of the mill was at a very low ebb and but for him the mill would not have risen to the position to which it has now been raised. It was really a great shock to see that such a personality was taken away from their midst when his right judgment and mature experience would have proved much more beneficial to the members of his community in particular and Indians in general.

A UNIQUE PERSONALITY.

Mr. K. Natarajan then moved the first resolution placing on record the deep sense of loss felt by the South Indians at the sad and premature death of Mr. Ramaswami Iyer and offering their heart-felt condolences and sympathy to the members of his family. The speaker thought that the death of Mr. Ramaswami Iyer at the present moment was a very great loss both from his personal point of view as well as from a public point of view. The very large number of institutions under whose auspices this meeting was being held, itself showed how wide and varied, at the same time quiet and unassuming, were his activities. The speaker could say from his personal knowledge that Mr. Ramaswami Iyer was in some way or other personally connected and interested in all these associations. It was well-known to everybody that he took a very special interest in the South Indian community of Bombay and, had time been more favourable and his health sustained him, the speaker was sure that he would have provided some means of consolidating and strengthening the position of South Indians in this city. He was a unique personality, I am using that word very definitely and quite deliberately, continued Mr. Natarajan, in the industrial and financial circles of Bombay. But no one who came in contact with him would think of him as a financier or a commercial man. He was a man of very high culture and perfect gentleman, the finest flower of Indian culture, particularly of South Indian culture, a type which I am afraid is passing away.

A MAN OF THE WORLD.

Mr. Ramaswami Iyer was born in a family which is one of the most illustrious in modern India. Sir K. Seshadri Iyer, the father of Mr. Ramaswami Iyer was a towering personality in South India and the latter has inherited to a large extent the qualities which are bred in an atmosphere of public interest. There is such a thing as heredity and breeding and there is also an atmosphere of families in which public affairs, public questions and public interest are often talked about, discussed and considered. Mr. Ramaswami Iyer had the advantage of being brought up from his very childhood in an atmosphere of public duty and public service. Although his opportunities were many, he deliberately refused to extend his activities beyond the limits within which he could apply himself with the greatest concentration. I can think of very few people in Bombay, who to the same extent represented the type of Mr. Ramaswami Iyer who was in the best sense of the term 'a man of the world'. He was not a mere man of books or theories but a man who held his own with men of business in Bombay or any other part of the country. The great conscientiousness with which he performed the many duties the onus of which fell upon him was quite in keeping with the greatness and virtue of his family. He had a ready hand to help and it was willingly extended to all cases of need and I can say he was one of those men who were not very censorious in judging the need of men. He regarded men as more ignorant and weak than wicked and attributed any defects in their qualities more to ignorance than to original sin. He had a very broad and charitable outlook upon the world and his help was extended to all kinds and classes of people without anybody knowing anything about it and it is one of his remarkable features that I have never heard him complain about the way in which his goodness was being taken advantage of. His death is a very great loss to us the South Indians particularly in this part of the country. There is no doubt whatever that Mr. Ramaswami Iyer raised the prestige of the South Indian community to a very high level in Bombay. It would be very long indeed before we can find a substitute for him possessing all his qualities to follow in his foot-steps, and in the meanwhile we can only try to cherish his memory and follow his example.

Mr. K. S. Ramachandra Iyer, seconding the resolution, said that in Mr. Ramswami Iyer the South Indian community had certainly lost a great leader and a good friend and the poorer people had lost a benefactor.

Rao Saheb K. Ramaswamy, in associating himself with the terms of the resolution, characterised the deceased as most unassuming gentleman and a jewel among the South Indians in Bombay.

The resolution was unanimously passed, all standing. Mr. R. Krishna Iyer then moved the second resolution authorising the President to forward a copy of the resolution to the family of the deceased which was also passed by the meeting.

UNTOUCHABILITY.

(BY MR. N. K. VENKATESWARAN).

The psychological origin of the caste-system must have been the universal human desire for cleanliness and purity. It has taken many centuries for man to understand that impurity could only be overcome by washing it away and not by keeping it off, and many have not understood it in any real sense still. Untouchability is an offshoot of the caste-system and it has been perhaps helpful in so far as it has served to prove the futility of the caste-idea. It has been quite harmful in so far as it has outlived this use. Do we not feel a sense of national degradation in front of this curious thing?

It is true that no public man or woman of note is to-day for preserving untouchability and all the absurd things it means. Who cannot see that it is a subtle trick, this untouchability, that insidiously embitters our social relations and keeps our just political aspirations, as it were, under a cloud? Evil is cunning and stoops to conquer.

Who does not know the nature of evil? But mere knowledge is not enough. Good intentions sleep overlong. If we really make up our minds that untouchability must go it will have to. But we must really make up our minds. That is the thing.

What a mad thing is this untouchability that parts up from one another! Is there one in the wide world that is not our brother then we are less than men. If he is unclean we can only wash him and not say that he is none of us. Who can be true to his humanity and disclaim a brother?

What a land is this South India where pious pundits preach the superiority of some over others! Look at this Kerala where hundreds of people are doomed to distance from society. These sub-human beings who are denied the most elementary rights of living things make you stand aghast and wonder sadly. It is easy to find a justification in the ancient writings and salve one's conscience. It is easy to say that these things must be and avert the eyes. But they are there blowing the fires of blame. Temples, who will speak against temples, where men might seek, each in his own way, the Great Authority of the Universe? But some persons, they say, cannot enter them. What temples are these that would have God cabined for the delectation of a select few! Do we know God who has floated this universe with its countless hosts of suns and satellites that evolve their own laws of birth, life and death? And some strive to keep God a captive in these temples!

Even the late Sri Narayana Guru who so long and so strenuously tried to lift many lakhs of people in Kerala to human dignity was considered an untouchable! A greater Brahmin than Sri Narayana Guru never lived in Kerala and yet he had no entrance to the temples of his land. Things are slowly improving. The Guru did not live in vain. Perhaps tomorrow untouchability will go. These are surely mercies. But why should untouchability live to-day, this 'museum-piece' of man's small mind?

In the days of the Vaikam Satyagraha, which was a localised fight for winning the right of passage for the untouchables along a public road round the Vaikam temple many orthodox people in Kerala were appalled at the demands made by the Satyagraha soldiers. They could not withdraw themselves from their blinding habits and ask themselves if there was anything really inordinate in these demands. They were simply appalled at the prospect of an old age ending so suddenly. They could not stop to consider how long that age had lived and how absurdly. And they queered the pitch for the reformers and little was gained for the cause of freedom. They even puzzled the Mahatma with their thousand citations from the sacred writings and when they failed to puzzle him some of them called him an enemy of Hinduism and asked him to quit the land. Such orthodoxy still lives. And many bad things continue to have a chance.

India has arrived at a stage in her national evolution when it would be folly for her to shut her eyes to the things of which she cannot be proud. Self-praise will be no aid in the attainment of self-rule.

Education has done much to relax the bonds of caste but education has also given to many a sort of intellectual flexibility. Do we not now and then see people who preach against caste in public and practise it ardently in private? Even the knowledge of what is right is sometimes very difficult.

If untouchability is right and if people are not prepared to throw it off unitedly and swiftly India will have to wait long not perhaps for self-rule but self-respect. Self-rule is easy to attain and often follows from superficial causes. True self-respect is a thing of conscience, of true living and is often greater than self-rule and may exist without it while self-rule will not be worth having without self-respect, without national self-respect. It is for the educated men and women of India to think and throw away this great curse of untouchability and if they do that the masses will be uplifted and the path of brother-hood will be opened again in this ancient country.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

King's Message:—His Majesty the King has addressed the following message to the nation:—"Looking back on my long illness and recovery, my heart is full of thankfulness of a far deeper origin than a mere sense of relief that I have been brought back from danger and weariness in the past months by the wonderful skill and devotion of my doctors, surgeons and nurses. Help had come from another source of strength as month after month I learned of the widespread and loving solicitude with which the Queen and I were surrounded. "I am able to picture to myself crowds of friends waiting and watching at my gates and think of the still greater number of those who, all over the Empire, were remembering me with prayers and good wishes. The realisation of this has been among the most vivid experiences of my life. It is encouragement beyond description to feel my constant and earnest desire has been granted, the desire to gain the confidence and affection of my people. My thoughts carried me even further. I cannot dwell on the generous sympathy shown to me by unknown friends in many other countries without new and moving hope. "I long to believe it possible that experiences such as mine may soon appear no longer exceptional: when the national anxieties of all peoples of the world shall be felt as a common source of human sympathy and a common claim on human friendship. I am not yet able to bear the strain of public ceremony but I look forward to some appointed day for joining my people at home and overseas and thanking God not merely for my own recovery, but for new evidences of growing kindness, significant of the true nature of men and nations. In the meantime I hope that this message may reach all those even in the remotest corners of the world wherefrom I have received words of sympathy and goodwill.

Late Mr. Balak Ram :—A Resolution of the Government of Bombay states :—"The Governor in Council has learnt with deep regret the news of the death of Mr. Balak Ram, I. O. S., Remembrancer of Legal Affairs to the Government of Bombay, and recently an Acting Puisne Judge of the High Court of Bombay. He desires to record his sympathy with the members of Mr. Balak Ram's family in their bereavement and his sense of the loss which the public service has sustained. Mr. Balak Ram was an able and efficient officer and a scholar of distinction, who had given many years' valuable work to the Judicial Service of this Presidency and to the cause of Education."

NOTES.

Bombay Mill Strike Again:—The long general strike of the workers in Bombay mills was suspended when Government appointed a Committee to investigate the differences between them and their employers. The Committee made its report a few weeks ago, and it is one of the most informing and sagacious reports that we have seen. Had the recommendations of the Committee been accepted and put into force at once, the suspended strike may never have restarted. But there was some delay and discussion, and in the interval the strike has begun again on some points of difference which have arisen. Into the merits of these points, it is needless for our purpose to enter here. But one thing should be noted. It was loudly maintained last year that the strike was engineered by foreign Communists. All Communists, real or suspected, foreign and Indian, have been arrested and are awaiting their trial at Meerut. The Viceroy has promulgated as an ordinance the Public Safety Bill which the Legislative Assembly refused to pass, and which it was asserted would bring about an end of the strikes. Nevertheless, the strike has commenced again, and at the time of writing, there does not seem to be an early prospect of its ending. It is clear that the employers and workers have no common ground of ideas on which they can meet and agree upon a stable settlement. To find or create such a common ground is the only sure means of averting the dislocation of the industry. A suggestion has been made to import workers from other countries to replace the Indian workers, China being mentioned as the most likely source. We hope this suggestion will find no support. Chinamen can combine more readily than Indians, and the labour problem will be further complicated by an alien problem, if this fatuous suggestion is accepted.

Mr. Sastri for East Africa:—The Right Honourable Srinivasa Sastry sailed on Wednesday, May 1st for East Africa to assist the Wilson Commission particularly with regard to questions concerning the Indian community in East Africa. The following telegram was sent by his Excellency the Viceroy to the Rt. Hon. V. S. Srinivasa Sastri dated Simla, April 30th 1929. "Before you sail for East Africa, I wish on behalf of the Government of India as also of myself to send you a message of godspeed in the task you have at our request undertaken. You returned to India after a period of distinguished and eminently successful but arduous duty in South Africa as the first Agent of the Government of India only in February last. Your ready response to the invitation of the Government to proceed to East Africa at a very short notice when you might legitimately have pleaded for a well earned and well-deserved rest, reflects the highest credit on your sense of public duty which the Government of India gratefully recognise. The Government are confident that this recognition of your patriotism will be fully shared by your countrymen. They earnestly hope that the same measure of success may attend your new mission as made your work in South Africa a source of abiding satisfaction to India and the Empire." A meeting of the Imperial Indian Citizenship Association was held on Tuesday. The Rt. Hon'ble V. S. Srinivasa Sastri was present. The meeting passed the following resolution: "That the Council of the Imperial Indian Citizenship Association places on record its high appreciation of the action of the Government of India in nominating the Rt. Hon'ble V. S. Srinivasa Sastri to help Indians in East Africa to present their case to Sir Samuel Wilson on questions arising out of the Hilton-Young Commission Report and its complete confidence in him that he will be able to render the most valuable help to the Indian community in East Africa.

Tributes in the Commons:—A Reuter telegram from London dated April 30 says:—In the House of Commons, during the debate on the Colonial estimates, Commander Hilton-Young (Lib.) welcomed Mr. Sastri's aid to the Wilson Commission and hoped that he would repeat the notable success he had already achieved in reconciling opinions which were seemingly divergent. There were misunderstandings and acrimony in East Africa as regards the Asiatics and the moderation and single-minded concentration upon high ideals such as Mr. Sastri had already shown would do a great deal to reconcile the different opinions. Returning to Kenya Lt. Col. Amery in the course of his speech said that the problem of the Government there was very difficult and that Mr. Sastri was not a member of Sir Samuel Wilson's Commission but he would accompany Sir Samuel during the whole of the tour to discuss very important questions concerning the Indian community. Lt. Col. Amery was sure that the Indian case could not be argued with greater eloquence and moderation than by Mr. Sastri. The problem was more administrative and developmental than constitutional. Sir Samuel had to consider the whole problem with which the Hilton-Young Commission had dealt and seek solution generally and administratively acceptable and then report to the House of Commons.

A Scheme of Primary Education:—The Anjuman-i-Taraqqi-i-Hyderabad (Deccan) after much labour and research have produced a scheme of compulsory Primary education, which the State Government will do well to adopt. The percentage of literacy in the State is very low, for statistics show that only 12 per cent of the school-going population are receiving instruction. The scheme of departmentalization of finance recently adopted by the State has not found favour with the Anjuman. Regarded from the viewpoint of education the Anjuman are of opinion that it has its own drawbacks. "The weakness of the Scheme," say the Anjuman "lies in the fact that it limits the sum of money to the same amount every year for a particular period, and does not permit or take cognizance of any increase that is bound to arise if the system of education is not to remain static." The scheme drawn up by the Anjuman has for its goal universal compulsory education for both boys and girls. They do not believe in experiments but straight away lay down the period in which the goal is to be attained as ten years. The scheme also discusses the ways and means by which it can be achieved and the suggestions are eminently practical. To the pertinent question which the Anjuman ask "Are the people ready for the adoption of compulsion in education", their answer is sufficient proof. The Anjuman observe "A great majority of the people we have come in contact with, officials and non-officials alike, desire a speedy attainment of a measure which they agree would be a blessing." The Anjuman have definitely stated that they are opposed to religious institutions in schools and strongly urge that in the interests of harmony and goodwill education should be made as secular as possible. The Scheme of the Anjuman is to be commended for their robust views and suggestions. In the matter of girls' education, we much regret that the Anjuman do not evince the same enthusiasm for education as they have in the case of the boys. The laissez-faire attitude adopted by them in girls' education is disappointing in the extreme.

Rescue Work in Bombay:—The sixth annual report of the Bombay Vigilance Association was adopted at the annual general meeting held on Wednesday last. The Association has an excellent record of work to its credit for the year 1928-29. Its propaganda work carried on by means of lectures and leaflets has resulted in awakening the conscience of the public to the dangers of social evil in the city and to the immediate necessity of eradicating it. The Vigilance Shelter conducted by the Association has rescued 83 girls from falling a prey to the vice and restored them to respectability. After repeated representations, the Association has at last succeeded in eliciting from the Government that they are drafting a Bill embodying several amendments to the Bombay Prostitution Prevention Bill and that on its completion a committee consisting of the Chief Presidency Magistrate of Bombay, the Commissioner of the Bombay Police, with two representatives of the Vigilance Association and the Under-Secretary to the Home Department of the Government of Bombay as secretary to the Committee, will be set up to consider the proposed amendments. The Association has also succeeded in enlisting the sympathy of the Bombay Municipal Corporation. With such powerful support it will not be too much to expect a speedy disappearance of the vice areas in the city.

Montessori Society, Bhavnagar:—We have received a copy of the report of the work done by the Bhavnagar Montessori Society during the last three years. The institution has succeeded in having an organ of its own with wide interests. Another feature of its progress is that lecturers were sent out to the neighbouring places to propagate the principles of the Montessori system. The membership of the Society is open to all irrespective of caste or creed and the yearly subscription is only a rupee. The objects of the association are laudable and we hope the list of members will increase sufficiently to enable the society to extend its activities.

Tuberculosis in Calcutta:—We publish in our news columns a short interview on tuberculosis in Calcutta given by Dr. Goheen, Superintendent of the Madaipalle Sanatorium, who will be in that city for six months to a Free Press representative. The last issue of the Calcutta Municipal Gazette contains a detailed report of a speech delivered before the Calcutta Municipal Corporation on the same subject. He pointed out in the course of his address that in the last ten years there has been an increase of seventy-seven per cent in deaths from tuberculosis. The position therefore in Calcutta is similar to what it was in the West twenty to thirty years ago and in spite of the economic distress prevailing in the West owing to the war it is surprising that the percentage of deaths from tuberculosis has been reduced by nearly seventy-five per cent. The Doctor suggested the adoption of four measures to meet the evil. "One of the most important" he said, "is the special dispensary which will recognise the cases and advise them how to take care of themselves." He proceeded to point out that educative propaganda could be carried out from there. Secondly he recommended the employment of Health Visitors or Health Nurses who would study the home conditions of the patients and advise them how to protect themselves and how to prevent the disease spreading to the other members of the family. And lastly the establishment of tuberculosis hospitals and sanatoria—the hospitals to segregate the worst cases from the general population and the Sanatoria—a special type of hospital which provides shelter from the sun and rains but lets in maximum of air for the milder cases. The Calcutta Corporation has already commenced work on a small scale and we have no doubt that the presence of Dr. Goheen in their midst will help them in fighting the disease.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, MAY 4, 1929.

THE DEAD-SET AGAINST HINDUISM.

It is impossible not to observe that at the present time a massed attack on Hinduism is being carried out. For about a century Christian Missionaries have sought to undermine it with all the resources of the political prestige of belonging to the ruling race and the material resources and organization of the West. At the first onset they achieved some noteworthy results among the higher castes. But this provoked a strong reaction led, of all men, by Raja Ram Mohun Roy, the founder of the Brahmo Samaj, and a sincere and devoted admirer of the personality and teachings of Jesus Christ. The establishment of the Brahmo Samaj effectively checked the tide of conversion and since then various influences have tended to stop practically all conversions from the educated classes, though a large proportion of these receive their education in schools and colleges conducted by Christian Missions. The attitude of the Government of the East India Company was at first resolutely opposed to the proselytising missions. Mr. Arthur Mayhew in his book entitled "Christianity and the Government of India" * gives a curiously partial and perverted account of this feature of the Company's Government in the beginning of the last century. The Christian missionaries up to very recent years made no distinction between what is good and what is corrupt in Hinduism. They attacked it from top to bottom as an invention of Satan with the result that beef and beer became almost as essential a part of their propaganda as the Bible. A few exceptionally large-minded missionaries saw that this was not the right way of introducing Christ to India, but they were not heeded and were looked upon rather as backsliders.

Since the beginning of the present century, a new school of missionaries has given up the method of frontal attack on Hinduism as defeating its own purpose. Instead, it professed to see a great deal of spiritual aspiration in Hinduism which, however, could be realised only through Christianity. This school had a certain vogue for a time owing to its appearance of impartiality, but it has now spent itself. We seem now to have come back to the first phase of the attack on Hinduism. Miss Katherine Mayo resuscitated Abbe Dubois who had long passed into oblivion. She has been followed by other writers who have denounced Hinduism as the parent of all evil. Miss Mayo herself has tried her hand again with the "Slaves of the Gods" but, owing to the changed feeling between the British and Americans rather than to any reason connected with the merits of the book, the very same papers which hailed her "Mother India" with delirious praise, have condemned her second attempt as hysterical, over-wrought and fanatically prejudiced against the Hindus. Poor Miss Mayo! There is no doubt, however, that a dead-set is being made against Hinduism. Part of it is political, the British in India and through them the British in Britain having persuaded themselves that Hindus as a class are the most clamant advocates of self-government. Non-Brahmin Caste Hindus and the Depressed Classes in South India are exempted from this indictment. Elsewhere, the whole Hindu community is regarded as being disaffected and this is ascribed to the opposition of Hindu orthodoxy to the emancipating consequences of British rule. Behind this feeling, however, there is a deeper feeling that Hinduism now remains the only effective opponent of the basic principle of present-day Western Civilisation. Buddhist countries like Japan and China, and Moslem countries like Turkey and Persia, have accepted Western Civilisation at least as a matter of expediency. India alone refuses to do so, and the impelling force here is that of Hinduism. The triumph of the West will be complete when Hinduism lowers its flag and capitulates to the gospel of the so-called "standard of life."

The kind and volume of literature which is produced against Hinduism, is proof that the writers represent a fear in the heart of Westernism—a more appropriate word than Western Civilisation or Christianity—that its existence is a challenge to the supremacy of the latter. Orthodox Hindus who blindly cling to old worn-out customs offer a ready target to these assaults. But Hinduism is no more caste, child-marriage and untouchability than Christianity is the shambles of Chicago or of Northern France during the late War. Hinduism existed before these evils and will outlast them, because it has its roots in truths which live for ever. A thoughtful American writer, Savel Zimand, the author of "Living India", has perceived this. America is not after all a land of Katherine Mayos. "Great teachers of other religions," he says, "have gazed upon the august vision and reported the divinity of the spirit. But only the Hindu seers heard whispered the secret that salvation is to be reached in life, not death." This itself is but a link in a chain of thought which takes the human mind right into the heart of the universe: It is this which has to be saved against the terrific onslaught upon Hinduism which is now being made on all sides.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XVIII. TEACHERS.

(BY DR. CLIFFORD MANSCHARDT, PH.D.).

Education produces light. To the teacher is given the privilege of kindling the flame that illumines the whole of life. Too often, however, the teacher quenches the fire within. Having acquired a bit of "knowledge", conceives it as his task to purvey this same knowledge to others. Any originality on the part of the pupil is discouraged. The student is not supposed to learn the art of thinking; he is supposed to learn the wisdom of the past. Although education should be the interpreter of change, it is far too often suspicious of change. It is conceived as a body of static material to be transmitted, instead of a process of development. We minimize the teaching values of the past, but at the same time we would give an attentive ear to the message of the present. We would recognize the teaching values of life to be equally as important as the teaching values of books. We would regard education as continuous, as a constant reconstruction of experience.

Under this conception of education the teacher is not only a dispenser of facts. He is also a fellow-seeker after more light. The dead weight of the teaching profession, as of any other profession, is the man who no longer learns. The teacher who acquires a few volumes or sets of notes and then settles down simply to hand on this same information to others is in a bad way. The world is moving, and no individual needs more to be aware of the fact than does the teacher. New experiments, new discoveries, new hypotheses must all be checked against the old and evaluated. A school with teachers who have ceased to grow is no longer worthy of its name. He who would teach another must first of all teach himself. It is one thing for a teacher to say, "This you must learn; but it is a far different thing for a teacher to open up wide ranges of human experience in such a fascinating way that the pupils really want to learn. There is no other motive power in education that can compare with the power of interest. The true teacher is a trusty guide, leading his pupils "into a large place."

The teacher who takes his function seriously is a "troubler of the people." A man needs little education to acquiesce in things as they are, but the educated man is always comparing things as they are with things as they might be. Economic conditions, social conditions, political conditions, are all brought under careful scrutiny, and if they are found to be lacking, the trouble begins. The educated man replaces the question, "What is customary?" with the question, "What is right?" And then, if he is truly educated, he seeks to do the right. It is the teachers of a land who are its real social engineers—the builders of a new humanity.

ASOKA'S POLITICAL SYSTEM.

Sir Daniel Hamilton writes in New India Madras :—

In these days, when the sky is dark with words; when in the language of Job's comforter, men's bellies are being filled with the east wind, and small and great are exerting themselves in the making of Constitutions, let India listen to the voice of her great Emperor as it resounds across 2,000 years of time, and give head to the Constitution which he recorded on tables of stone, so that we and the generations to come might read and understand what Asoka regarded as the things most vital to India's welfare.

His first and favorite Rock Edict was "Let small and great exert themselves."

The exertion which Asoka stresses so strongly in these Edicts is that of Dharma or piety, or soul-force as Mr. Gandhi might call it.

Asoka practised what he preached. Having seen with his own eyes, on battle-fields of Kalinga, the horrors of war, he thenceforth preached and practised the gospel of peace and good-will among men. He did not renounce "war as an instrument of National policy" only; he renounced it altogether. He did not sign a peace pact with his right hand, and a war pact with his left. Instead of the bheri gghosa or war drum, was heard the dharma gghosa or prayer drum. He beat his swords into ploughshares, and his spears into pruning hooks. From Kalinga onwards his warfare was a war against poverty and ill-will, and scarcity and ill-health; and the strenuous Dharma within him found its outward expression in a strenuous life devoted to the constructive work of peace.

Asoka's political system was a theocracy based on hard work of soul and body—the utmost exertion of small and great. It was a blending of heaven and earth, a co-operative system linking up the people with the King. "The Kingdom of Heaven is within you", he seemed to cry to small and great, "exert yourselves, for the the violent take it by force". Two hundred years later came Jesus of Nazareth preaching the same doctrine of hard work for body and soul. "Work, for the night cometh". "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and His Righteousness, and all things needful will follow". It is the only sound and scientific system of political economy, for when a man's heart is good, his work is good, and the State prospers accordingly.

For some time back I have been scanning the Indian political heavens for another star to arise and shine with the light of Asia, but the stars which have arisen have, for the most part, proved to be planets only, reflecting the dim western lights of Democracy, Self-Determination, Dominion Status, Independence, and the farthing candles of party politics. But the fruits of democracy are neither freedom from self, nor abundance of good deeds. Its gospel of grab, its fruits the apples of Sodom, and taxation which sinks in the State,

Two thousand years have rolled by since Asoka cut on the rocks his gospel of peace and his programme of public works, but the millennium—the thousand years of peace—seem to be still a thousand years ahead. The bheri ghosa is still here, and the gospel of good-will which Asoka preached seems as the rocks on which he wrote. The great Asoka, like the great Akbar, wished his people to be One, but their name is still Legion. Why? Because when the great Emperors passed, the moulding power passed with them. Power centred in the one, but was not organised in the many, fell to pieces, and throughout the cities and towns and the 700,000 villages of India, the pieces lie scattered and broken unto this day.

Is India's new political system to be a system embodying the spirit of Dharma, based on peace and good-will, hard work, and the utmost united exertion of small and great, or is it to be a system of racial or religious or party politics based on garb, whose guiding principle is neither honest hard work, or united effort, or mutual service, nor the utmost exertion of small and great, but the robbing of Peter to pay Paul? Is she to have the race war added to the class war, and the class war added to the caste war, Hindu against Muslim, Muslim against Hindu. East against West; and every man's hand against his neighbour? Is she to be a house divided against itself which will fall to pieces at the first great storm, or a great Ashram reaching up towards heaven, built upon the rocks of Asoka?

I do not know what form India's new Constitution is likely to take, and I do not suppose that the Statutory Commission themselves yet know; but if it is to be a living power, and not merely a threadbare suit of old clothes made in Europe, with no soul or body inside; if it is to be a sceptre endued with soul force, and merely some sheets of dry parchment, it must embody that spirit of Dharma which is in the blood of India, and its terms be so arranged that the spirit which burns within may be given free play to exert itself to the utmost in healthy directions without.

One day, about twenty years ago, as I sat in my office, No. 16, Strand Road, Calcutta, Mr. Chowdry, the originator of the Dharmagola grain banks, came in to see me. He had heard of my interest in the co-operative movement, and came in to express his approval of the movement which, more than any other, embodies the spirit of Dharma, and which at last showed an understanding of the people and their problems. "For", said he, "you Europeans have been 200 years in our country, and you do not understand us".

It may help the Statutory Commission to a clearer understanding of the difference between Eastern and Western political system if I here quote from Prof. Mookerji's Asoka :—

The Government of India under Asoka was an absolute monarchy in the legal and political sense of the term. Nevertheless, autocracy in India was much more limited in many directions than the autocracies of the west. The Indian King is no Sultan with the sole obligation of satisfying his personal caprice . . . It is as guardian of the social (including domestic and religious) order, and defence against anarchical oppression that the King is entitled to his revenue; failing to perform this duty he takes upon himself a corresponding share of the National sin. (Cambridge History of India.) But apart from this living sense of his moral responsibility to his people, there was an important limitation upon his autocracy from the fact that he was not the source of Law but rather its support. Sacred law, according to Manu and other legal authorities, is derived from four sources, viz. the Vedas, the Smritis, the practices of the pious, and the opinions of the pious on doubtful points, while the sources of secular law were the manifold groups and communities which legislated for themselves . . . It is the quasi-instinctive postulates and conventions of group life which come to be formulated as law, and not the mandate, command or decree of a single central authority in the State. Law, under these conditions is not an arte fact, but a natural growth of consensus and communal life . . . Indeed, the Head of the State and his people are but integral parts of one corporate and constitutional unity . . . Ancient Hindu monarchy did not aim at centralization over Government, but gave full scope to the varieties of group life to which the people have been used from time immemorial, even prior to the emergence of a central government among them.

Group life, which is co-operative life, is, therefore, the indigenous form of political system; and, as Professor Mookerji shows so clearly, it is the duty of the Monarch or Government to guard and encourage and give full scope to the varieties of group life to which the people have been used from time immemorial. It is a system of Government from the base rather than from the roof, the main duty of Government being to guard the people and help them to work out their own salvation co-operatively. And the Government's share of the National sin is in proportion to its failure to do so.

But effort must be organized and co-ordinated; for organization and co-ordination are wanted on the battle-fields of peace as well as on the fields of war. It is because the old group life has been broken up, and because the great majority of the people are now unorganized and disunited that they have so little joy in effort, and their forces lie scattered and broken throughout the length and breadth of the land. The old group life must be revived, and the groups organized co-operatively into larger groups, and these into groups still larger, each grade being given power to deal, respectively, with Village or District or Provincial matters, and so on upwards into one great whole or Co-operative Commonwealth, the head being the Monarch or Government whose sin will be absolved by monetizing the labour of small and great. And that labour, organized and monetized co-operatively, will build a new India from the ancient rocks of Asoka.

The Co-operative State or Commonwealth is the ideal to which the best thought of the time is reaching—not a Socialistic or Communistic Commonwealth, but a Commonwealth of organized individualism in which every man will receive, not a flat rate of wages nor a flat life, but the due reward of his labor, whether of hand or brain, the whole being financed by the organized credit of the people which will cost the Monarch or Government practically nothing to manufacture. India will then lead the world in statesmanship and sound finance.

Example is better than precept. Let the Government of India follow Asoka's example, but with this difference that, in place of the Rock Edicts, Government shall establish in every Province a model village, or remodel an old one, in which the teaching of Asoka will be translated into practice and inscribed on the solid rocks of honest labor, the work to be entrusted to the Co-operative Departments, and the money required to finance this small experimental project to be supplied by the paper currency department and returned at the rate of six per cent per annum, five of which will be treated as a refund of capital. The Provincial Governments would, I am sure, be glad to guarantee each other, and each would give to the Government of India its bond for the amount borrowed.

The name Asoka means "Without Sorrow," but India's sorrow will remain until the labor of India's small and great is organized and monetized co-operatively by Government.

CONVERSION.

We take the following article from the Guardian, Calcutta:—

The last number of the Prabuddha Bharata has an interesting article on the relation-ship between Conversion and Hinduism, written in response to a letter from a correspondent expressing disapproval of any attempt at conversion. The correspondent seems to have attributed to the members of the Ramakrishna Mission a 'desire to convert', as a result of reading some extracts from conversations with Swami Vivekananda printed in the journal. At the outset the Editor repudiates emphatically any desire to 'convert' and states that the Ramakrishna Mission has never made any converts and does not mean to do so in the future. It is clear from the whole article, which is entitled 'Expansion of Hinduism: A Defence' that he is using the word 'convert' here in a strictly technical sense of leading a man to change his religious affiliation. Then the article goes on to explain the kind of 'conversion' that the Ramakrishna Mission believes in. He says—

'Yes, we must live the life and pray sincerely. But we must also tell people of the truth and work unceasingly for the betterment of the condition of men.'

What Sri Ramakrishna condemned was fanaticism dogmatism, worldliness, and so on, and while he sought to lead men to give up worldliness and to seek for God, he never interfered with any man's religion.

'What we mean by "conversion" is nothing but asking people of other religions to give up these narrow ideas.'

Here the Editor refers to the ideas of fanaticism and dogmatism, mentioned in the previous paragraphs. He says that Swami Vivekananda believed in the right and duty of every man to preach his positive religious ideas, and also insisted that man must be careful never to hurt the positive part of any other religion. This statement is explained in a subsequent sentence.

'We feel in our heart of hearts that all religions are true.'

and then he goes on to say,

'I wish you could live with us for some time and see for yourself in what spirit we practise the harmony of religions, which was one of the central doctrines of Sri Ramakrishna.'

And again,

'Believe me when I say that it will take a few centuries yet before we can be so degraded as to forget this teaching of Sri Ramakrishna and seek to convert others as Muhammadans and Christians try to do.'

The trouble is that the practice of proselytism and the attaching of religious labels has prostituted the real meaning of conversion. Conversion does not mean the leaving of one religious group and the attaching oneself to another. It means a change of life from sin to godliness, a change of direction from walking in the paths of selfishness to walking in the paths of love and service. But unfortunately through the activities of proselytising religions this meaning has often become covered up by religious labels. It is true that both Christians and Muhammadans have often seemed to attach undue weight to the mere change of religious affiliation but that is not real Christian practice in any sense. What is sometimes forgotten is that the inherent tendencies of humanity lead men to attach themselves to social groups with which they are in deepest sympathy and this operates in the sphere of religion as well as in other spheres. Then after a time the group-mind expresses itself in the activity of perpetuating the group itself and extending it, and so the group becomes an organized body seeking to infuse its ideas into other men. The Editor himself admits that he does want to convert Muhammadans and Christians in the sense that all men must be brought to realise the 'universal religion in Hinduism and the universal society in Hindu society.' He explains it more fully in another paragraph.

'By "conversion" we do not want to change any man's faith, nor do we want to deprive him of his inherited culture. We simply want him to recognise that he belongs to a religion and a society which people call Hindu but which is really of a universal character, and feel its spiritualising influence. This recognition is wanted not only for the safety of Hinduism, which is the only religion existent on earth that stands for universality and is therefore most precious and indispensable to the future growth and welfare of man, but also for the realisation of a universal community in which all races, cultures and communities will live in harmony.'

We may assure the Editor that if the words 'Christian' and 'Christianity' are substituted for 'Hindu' and 'Hinduism' these sentences would express part of the Christian ideal also. We also wish o see a real synthesis of religions, in which the truths that have been garnered by holy and scholarly men in all religions and in all ages are brought together into a unity. The editor goes on to admit that all religions are not equally developed nor are all thinkers equal and that if one religion proves more perfect than another nothing can prevent people from being attracted to it more and more. Even if we do not seek to 'convert' people will be drawn to it more and more. The tendency to attach undue importance to the affixing of labels must be deprecated, but it must be admitted that men will seek those social and religious groups with groups with which they find themselves most in sympathy, and unfortunately labels will come to be attached whether we will or no. We believe that the Ramakrishna Mission in its definite stand for spirituality and service is doing a great work in India to-day and we welcome all possibilities of co-operation with such an organisation. It is our hope that some day in India, out of this mingling and contact of religious faiths, there will come into being a synthesis in which the truths for which Hinduism, Buddhism, Muhammadanism and Christianity stand will be brought together into the harmony, and the world will realise that no man can reach his highest without God who is an ever-present reality.

INDIAN INSTITUTE OF POLITICAL AND SOCIAL SCIENCE.

ANNUAL REPORT.

The Managing Committee of the Indian Institute of Political and Social Science have great pleasure in presenting the following report of the activities of the Institute during the year 1928 :—

Owing to the prolonged illness of Mr. C. S. Deole and his subsequent death in December 1927, the activities of the Institute had practically come to a stand-still during the latter part of 1927 and the opening months of 1928. Mr. S. C. Warty took up the idea of re-starting these activities and with the permission of Mr. Ambedkar, the other Secretary of the Institute called a meeting of the Managing Committee in April 1928. At this meeting, Mr. Warty was himself elected Secretary in place of the late Mr. Deole and the work of the Institute was thereafter resumed in right earnest.

The annual general meeting of the Institute was held on the 13th April 1928 when the report for the years 1926 and 1927 with the audited statement of accounts was adopted. Thereafter three meetings of the Managing Committee were held upto the end of the year, one in June, another in July and the third in October. Including the meeting held in April, four meetings were held in all. The business done at these meetings was generally of a formal character, such as the enrolment of new members, and the preparation of programme.

Fourteen new members were enrolled during the year of whom three were in the first class, 10 in the second class and one an associate. The total number of members at the end of the year was 91, against 77 at the end of 1927. The treasurer of the Institute reports to us the considerable difficulty that is felt in recovering subscription. The work of the Institute is much handicapped owing to this difficulty. But it is hoped that this year would show better results.

As stated above, the activities of the Institute were resumed in right earnest from July 1928 when Sir Chimanlal Setalwad delivered his inaugural address on "Constitutional Reforms" under the chairmanship of Mr. K. Natarajan the President of the Institute. The meeting was very well attended and there were full reports in the press. The next lecture was delivered on the 28th of July by Sir Lallubhai Samaldas on the "Agricultural Commission's Report" when also there was a very crowded audience.

The other lectures delivered during the year were as follows :—

Date.	Subject.	Lecturer.	President.
15th August ...	Hindu Moslem Relations.	Mr. M. C. Chagle.	Mr. B. J. Desai.
24th November ...	Indian Military Administration.	Dr. K. K. Dadaocharji, I.M.S.	Mr. Jamnadas Mehta.
5th December ...	Do. ...	Do. ...	Do.
21st December ...	Land Revenue Assessment.	Mr. F. G. H. Anderson, I.C.S.	Sir Lallubhai Samaldas.

In addition to organising these lectures, the Institute also held regular classes for some time on Sundays with a view to interest the younger generation into the scientific study of political and economic subjects. The class was commenced from the 15th July and the subject for discourse was "Studies in Political Theories." Mr. B. H. Vakil, M.A., LL.B., F.S.S. conducted these classes and he delivered in all 13 discourses. The thanks of the Committee are due to him for this good work rendered to the Institute.

Commencing from November 18th i.e. when the Colleges re-opened after the vacation, Mr. Warty delivered six discourses on "India's Future Constitutions" with special reference to the Nehru Committee's report one on each Sunday. The subject of these discourses were as follows :—(1) "First Principles" (2) "Central Government" (3) "India's Next Parliament" (4) "Provincial Autonomy" (5) "The question of Minorities" (6) "The Native States". Summaries of these discourses were published in the press from time to time. The Indian Daily Mail and the Pioneer published these summaries in full and other papers, such as the Times of India, the National Herald, the Hindu and the Forward published them in parts.

The aims and objects of the Institute were brought to the notice of the public through the press from time to time and there were general enquiries from all parts of India. Many philanthropic persons were also approached during the period for donations.

The only donations received so far are Rs. 100 from Sir Victor Sassoon and Rs. 25 from Mr. S. N. Pochkhanawalla. It is hoped that with greater publicity for the Institute during the current year, we shall be able to collect a much greater amount in the form of donations to the Institute.

The Committee has appointed a sub-Committee to draft a memorial to Government suggesting the creation of a Board of Economic Enquiries on the lines followed in the Punjab. The Institute can indeed be made useful to the public in various ways. Its activities can be increased in manifold directions if only the funds are available.

CO-EDUCATION AT SANTINIKETAN.

Santiniketan is one of the very few institutions in India where men and women are educated together and it is one of the extremely rare places in India where men and women live in and share the life of a residential institution. I am writing the following account from my experiences after a year's residence at Santiniketan in the hope that it will give those interested in educational experiments in India an idea how it is worked in the great Poet's institution, writes Mr. Amulya C. Sen in "Forward".

The feminine element in the Asram consists of female members of families of Professors, teachers and other workers, and of the inmates of the Naribhavan (Women's Institute), i. e. lady members of the staff and students of all ages. The Naribhavan and the Gurupalli are both removed some distance away from the dormitories and hostels for boys and men students. The Naribhavan stands on one end of the Asram and contains all the residential female students and some female members of the teaching staff.

The first time in the day boys and girls and men and women students come together is at the time of the morning Vaitalik (Prayer-Song). This "coming together" I use only in a figurative sense as the girls and women students stand on one side about twenty or thirty yards away from the main body of boys and men.

During class hours students of both sexes attend the same classes. They sit in two quite distinct groups, one to the right and the other to the left of the teacher. There is nothing to prevent them from mixing freely with each other during these hours but as a matter of fact each group in the main keeps within itself. Exchange of ideas and even of jokes of course takes place! There is restraint but not stiffness.

The time after morning classes are over and before the afternoon classes begin is spent by girl students at their boarding house, the Naribhavan, which has its own kitchen and dining hall, garden, play grounds, an extensive compound, sick room, etc., and is under the supervision of an experienced Lady Superintendent. Any one wanting to see a girl on any business may go up to the gate of the Naribhavan and send for the girl he wants to meet. It is not always necessary even to obtain the permission of the Lady Superintendent for this purpose. The number of interview-seekers however from amongst non-relations is few and their business does not take more than a few minutes to finish. In games hours after classes are over, boys and men play their games in the play-grounds and girls play theirs on their own grounds in the Naribhavan. When the men play matches, the girls are interested spectators and occupy a special corner of the play-ground all by themselves. When they do not play games, girls go out for walk in the afternoon in batches along the roads and into the fields around the Asram as the men also do who do not play games. Men and girls are not allowed to go out for walk together. If men and women encounter each other on the roads inside or outside the Asram whether during these walks or at any other time the custom which has come to acquire all the force of unwritten law is for each sex to pass along one side of the road leaving the other half to the other sex.

In meetings, entertainments and social or ceremonial gatherings the sexes take part equally but occupy sections of the hall quite distinct and apart from each other.

Students of both sexes sometimes go out on picnics or excursions. On all such occasions Professors or teachers of both sexes are in charge of the parties, and though they go out together each group on the whole keeps except when joint action is required.

This is not the place to dilate on the merits and demerits of co-education. But on the whole it may be said that co-education in the school-stage, i. e., up to the period of adolescence is of great benefit to the growing boy and girl. Familiarity with each other exerts a steadying influence on the growth of sex-consciousness. It prevents prurient curiosity taking hold of the young and immature mind. It normalises the reactions of sex. It prevents vicious and unclean ideas of sex getting hold of the young mind. It gives to each sex a purer outlook towards the other. Amongst the school boys at Santiniketan morbidity or excessive curiosity with regard to girls or sex matters is found to be wholly wanting. The Santiniketan boy is much less sex-conscious and much less sex-susceptible than his brother school fellows elsewhere in Bengal.

I am in full support of boys and girls being under the same teacher, who in the earlier stages must be a woman studying together in the same class, till the period of adolescence. This puts the school on a par with the home where brothers and sisters are equal in every respect and the mother is the teacher till they are all sufficiently grown up to develop along lines peculiar to the sex and individuality of each. It develops an attitude of chivalry and respectfulness besides doing the other benefits I have already mentioned. It enables each sex to have some knowledge of the other which is certainly of great help in after life and is an important part of a boy or girl's education. In my own college classes at Santiniketan where I have taught, in the other college and school classes which I have observed and watched and in the meetings or gatherings I have attended it was unmistakable how the presence of members of both sexes helped to introduce greater restraint, dignity and courtesy in the atmosphere of the place.

Whether co-education is advisable after the period of adolescence is a moot question in educational circles. If "co-education" is understood in its popular sense with its background of social conditions in the West it can not achieve good results as it provides only an extra field for the free play of sex attractions and thereby interfere with the proper functioning of other aspects of life.

Co-education has another shade of meaning in the West, viz., that both sexes receive the identical parallel, collateral and co-extensive education under it. Whatever the man learns, the woman also learns and what the man does not learn the woman also does not learn. No special provision is made to meet the special requirements of each sex. If this interpretation of the term is accepted co-education is bound to fail for obvious reasons.

I believe Santiniketan tries to steer clear of both these dangers of co-education. The unrestricted liberty of the West is repugnant to the Indian mind. The management at Santiniketan, as I found out from my conversations with responsible men on this point, aims at loosening the rigidity of the older social order but at the same time they are well aware of the dangers of loosening it too much. The ideal of the institution is to strike a golden mean between the excessive familiarity and liberty of the West and the total exclusiveness of the East. I have it on very high authority that those entrusted with the responsibility of looking after the life of the students at Santiniketan have special instructions to have an ever watchful and strict eye that this via media is never deviated from. Secondly, the education of the boy and girl, young man and woman is not the same at Santiniketan. Courses on cooking, house-keeping and house-management, sewing, music, floor-painting, etc., are specially available and compulsory for girls while all kinds of hard manual work and manly sports are compulsory for the boys. The work of each is complementary when it is possible, e. g., the boys learn 'lathi' play and the girls learn the use of dagger and knife for defensive purpose and purposes of protective offensive: in the case of a fire the boys go near the fire and get up on thatches and the girls render wonderful help in carrying by relays water-buckets from the wells to the scene of action. The system in Santiniketan attempts an approximation to the ideal of harmony in the relationship of the sexes, identical and co-extensive in some matters, complementary in some other matters, and entirely different and separated from each other again in sound other matters and yet all on the basis of full and complete equality.

PUNJAB SOCIAL REFORM.

The Secretary of the Punjab Social Reform Association Writes :—

I have the honour to inform you that under the auspices of the Punjab Social Reform Association a representative meeting of persons keenly interested in Social Reform was held on the 18th April 1929 in the Brahmo Samaj Mandir, Anarkali to consider the steps to be taken to organise the next Annual Session of the Indian National Social Conference during the Christmas week at Lahore. The following resolutions were adopted by the meeting unanimously :—

"Resolved that arrangements be taken in hand for holding the annual session of the Indian National Social Conference at Lahore during Christmas week and with that object in view Mr. Haradatta Sharma be requested to place himself in communication with the office-bearers of the Indian National Social Conference."

"Resolved that meanwhile an organising committee, consisting of Prof. Ruchi Ram Sahni, Rai Sahib Lala Raghunath Sahai, Khan Bahadur Sheikh Amir Ali, Mr. B. L. Rallia Ram, Dr. Parashu Ram, Lala Faqir Chand, Mr. Hari Mohan Chatterjee, Prof. U. N. Ball, Prof. Diwan Chand Sharma, Sardar Pratap Singh, Lala Lajpat Rai Sahni and Mr. Surendra Sashi Gupta, with power to add, be formed for taking the necessary steps for holding the Conference at Lahore."

It was further resolved that Mr. Haradatta Sharma and Prof. U. E. Ball should act as joint Secretaries and that Sardar Partap Singh be the Treasurer.

The delegates' fee for the Conference was fixed at Rs. 1 and that of the membership of Reception Committee at Rs. 5.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

All-Hindu Temple:—Bhagnji Balaji—a rich Hindu contractor of Bombay—has announced his intention of building a temple at Ratnagiri, which will be open to all Hindus including the untouchables. The temple writes the Mahratta will be fitly called Patit-Pavan Mandir. An orphanage and a gymnasium are also to be attached to the temple. It is very difficult to induce managers of old Hindu temples to allow the untouchables to have darshan of the deity. Old prejudices die hard. But it is comparatively easy to build a new Hindu temple open to all castes. This policy of building new temples is criticised by a number of people as ineffective; for by this policy the old strongholds of touch-me-notism would remain unchanged. It will admittedly be the best thing if all the old Hindu temples are opened to the untouchables. But the better can in this case be no enemy of the good. If new temples open to all Hindus are built in all places, the old temples will gradually lose their importance. It will be a practical every-day demonstration of the social equality of all Hindus. And if this new temple is not polluted by untouchables, how can the old temple be polluted by them? This question will haunt the mind of every Hindu who visits this new temple. The new temple will thus effect a change in the mentality of the common people which will eventually lead to the opening of all temples, including the oldest, to the untouchables.

Mr. Sastri's New Mission:—At the invitation of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Government of India have deputed Mr. Srinivasa Sastri to help the local Indian communities in East Africa to state their views to Sir Samuel Wilson of the Colonial Office, who is now in East Africa, inquiring into matters arising out of the Hilton-Young Commission's report on closer union, and to be at Sir Samuel's disposal, if he wishes to make use of him in dealing with Indian deputations. Mr. Sastri's visit will supersede the suggested appointment of a representative of the Indian Civil Service on the Executive Council of the Governor of Kenya. Mr. Sastri left for East Africa by S. S. Ellora which left Bombay on Wednesday May 1.

Mrs. Naidu leaves for England:—A Reuter's message says: Mrs. Sarojini Naidu has abandoned her tour of China and Japan owing to the present conditions in India and has left for England. Interviewed by Reuter, she paid a tribute to the invariable courtesy and kindness of the Americans who were very sympathetic and anxious to learn the conditions in India though they were abysmally ignorant of them. Mrs. Naidu has spoken before 200 audiences in the United States and Canada.

Tuberculosis in Calcutta:—"In Calcutta to-day, deaths from tuberculosis alone come to about 4,000 per million. And for every death it is recognised that there are 10 other persons who are suffering from the active disease of tuberculosis. We, therefore, have in Calcutta something over 40,000 individuals who are in need of special treatment for this disease. "What is Calcutta doing to meet the situation that faces it in the light of the facts mentioned above? Facilities at present existing for combating this terrible scourge are extremely inadequate" said Dr. R. M. B. Gohsen, the Tuberculosis expert of Madanpalle Sanatorium, (South India) in the course of an interview with a representative of the Free Press of India in Calcutta. Continuing, the learned Doctor said: "In Calcutta a careful study of the incidence of tuberculosis has brought out the indisputable fact that Tuberculosis is increasing at a rapid speed approximating another over 1 per cent, a year. The doctor suggested increase in the number of hospitals and sanatoriums which must be adequately financed. He also suggested that there should also be in connection with the sanatorium a palm colony for a certain small but definite proportion of discharged patients. Concluding the Doctor said, in addition to these there must be developed an educative propaganda that will persuade even the most ignorant of the advantage of hospital and sanatorium treatment.

New Governor Of Madras:—The King has been pleased to approve the appointment of Lieutenant-Colonel the Right Hon'ble George Frederick Stanley, C. M. G., to be Governor of the Presidency of Madras in succession to the Rt. Hon'ble Viscount Goschen of Hawkurst, G. O. I. E., C. B. E., whose tenure of office will expire in the autumn. His Majesty has also been pleased to approve the appointment of the Hon'ble

Sir Norman Edward Marjoribanks, K. O. I. E., C. S. I., I. O. S. (Member of Governor's Executive Council) as Acting Governor of Madras in place of Lord Goschen for the period beginning from June next, during which the latter has been appointed to act as the Governor-General while Lord Irwin is absent on leave and until such time as Colonel Stanley takes up his duties as Governor.

Forward Libel Case:—Judgment was delivered on Wednesday, April 24, by Mr. Justice Buckland at the Calcutta High Court in the two libel suits brought by the Secretary of State for India and some officers of the East Indian Railway against the Forward Publishing Co. Ltd. and the editor and Printer of the Forward awarding damages totalling Rs. 1,50,000. At the High Court on Tuesday the Advocate-General applied before Mr. Justice Buckland for the compulsory winding up of the "Forward" Publishing Co. Ltd. as the last balance sheet has shown that they are hopelessly insolvent. His lordship has fixed June 4 for the hearing of the petition. A provisional liquidator has been appointed to take possession of the properties of the Company and to collect its assets.

The "New Forward":—With the permission of the Chief Presidency Magistrate Mr. Hamant Kumar Das declared himself to be the keeper of the press of the "Indian Daily News which is the property of Mr. O. Gowsami, and Mr. Kunjbehari Sarkar to be the printer and publisher of the New Forward which is to be published from the Indian Daily News press. The Free Press understands as the result of enquiries made, that leading members of the Congress Party in Bengal have decided that the attempt on the part of the interested associations and bodies to crush the "Forward" must be thwarted if the decrees against the Forward Publishing Co., Ltd. are executed. The Free Press is assured that three new papers will appear immediately to take place of Forward, Bangalar Katha and Atmachakti and that the new papers will maintain the same nationalist policy and the same high level of journalism.

Students Debating Tour:—A Free Press Message says:—The syndicate of the Calcutta University has accepted the proposal of the National Student Federation of U. S. A. of sending three students of Colorado university for debate with the students of the Calcutta university. The American Students Federation is interested in sponsoring a tour round the world of a students debating team.

An Inter-caste Marriage:—With a view to introduce social reform recently an inter-provincial and inter-sub-caste marriage in the Vaishya community was settled in the Sabarmati Ashram. Mahatma Gandhi and Seth Jamanlal Bajaj settled the betrothal of Mahatmajl's niece, the late Mr. Maganlal Gandhi's younger daughter, Kumari Rakmani Devi, aged about 18 with Srijut Banai Lal Bajaj, son of Srijut Rameshwarlal Bajaj of Raniganj, a Marwari Agarwal, aged about 24.

A Marriage under Gour's Act:—Under Dr. Gour's Special Marriage Act the Inter-caste marriage of Sir Harisingh Gour's daughter Miss Partap with Lt. Harkishen Singh, Berar was registered yesterday morning. After the reception Dr. Gour proposed a toast of the newly married couple and pointed out that persons married half-a-century ago were pressing him that the Act should be made retrospective so as to give their children the benefit of English law of succession. He said the marriage united martial races, Rajputs and Sikhs, and would have the far-reaching political effect in creating national solidarity amongst various castes and communities without which there was no possibility of a stable national government.

NOTES.

Bardoli:—The village of Bardoli in Surat district, Bombay Presidency, has become famous in current Indian political history. It was at Bardoli that Mahatma Gandhi wished to launch his satyagraha campaign in 1921 as a protest against the imprisonment of a large number of congress volunteers for demonstrating against the Prince of Wales' visit to India. A day-to-day record of those eventful months is furnished in an interesting book just published entitled "Seven months with Mahatma Gandhi" by Krishnadas. Mahatma Gandhi at the very last moment gave up the no-tax campaign which he had planned, as some outbreaks convinced him that there was not then the non-violent atmosphere in which it could be carried out with complete success. But the work of preparation has been going on in the taluka since then and last year, Bardoli again emerged into fame on account of its protest against the enhancement of land revenue sanctioned by the Bombay Government on the recommendation of the Settlement Officers. It should be explained that the land revenue in Bombay Presidency is settled for thirty years, after which a revision takes place. The Settlement Officers recommended an increase of nearly 30 per cent on the current figures, but Government sanctioned an increase only of 20 per cent as being a more moderate addition. The Bardoli peasants led by Mr. Vallabhbhai Patel, the brother of the President of the Legislative Assembly, objected on the ground that the Settlement Officer had not carried out his investigation according to the rules under the Land Revenue Code and that if a proper investigation was made it would be found that no increase was justified, and asked for a fresh, independent enquiry into the matter.

The Peasants Vindicated:—Government did not at first realise the strength of the protest, and attempts were made to forcibly collect the revenue. No one was found to buy the distrained cattle or land, and the very officers sent to carry out the coercive measures had to depend on the good-will of the protesting peasantry for their supplies. Mr. Vallabhbhai had such perfect control of the situation that there was not a single case of resistance on the part of the peasants, numbering some 8000. When Pathans were enrolled to help the Revenue officers and indulged in excesses, the people patiently suffered and Government for very shame had to withdraw their auxiliaries. The Anglo-Indian papers cried aloud for repression, the King's writ they indignantly cried out, did not run in Bardoli, and the Under-Secretary of State in the House of Commons declared he would crush the movement. But the Governor of Bombay, Sir Leslie Wilson, was a just-minded man, and he realised that his Government had made a mistake and complied with the peasants' request for a Committee of Enquiry. Two English officers of the Indian Civil Service, Messrs. Broomfield and Maxwell—Mr. Broomfield was the Judge who presided at Mahatma Gandhi's trial eight years ago—were entrusted with the duty of making a fresh enquiry. Their report was published last week. It fully bears out the complaints of the peasants and recommends that an enhancement of about 6 per cent. is the most that can be made having regard to the economic history of the taluka. Government have promptly accepted the recommendation and issued orders to give effect to it. The larger question must now be faced of bringing land revenue assessment under the control of the Legislature in the same way as other forms of taxation. This was recommended by the Joint Parliamentary Committee ten years ago, and it is high time that it was adopted.

The Bombay Situation:—The conflicts which suddenly broke out last week have as suddenly subsided on the appearance of armed police and the military on the scene. What began as a General Strike of mill-workers, is gradually settling itself, after the Governor and Members of Council who had come down to mediate, had failed to effect a compromise. Responsible and safe Labour leaders like Mr. Joshi and Mr. Bakhale of the Servants of India Society, who had been forced into the background by the young enthusiasts of the Girni Kamgar Union, have asserted themselves, and to them belongs the main credit of bringing about the return of the workers to many of the Mills. We trust that the mill-owners who, in the past, have shown scant regard for the counsels of responsible Labour leaders, will now realise the importance of working in co-operation with them. The workers, too, who have allowed themselves to be misled by young men without an adequate sense of responsibility, must see that they have lost much and gained little by their lightning strikes. We hope that the industrial peace to which Bombay seems to be in a fair way, will last and that it will be a long time before the city is plunged into trouble again. This can only be assured if all mill-owners understand, as some of them do not yet seem to, and as most employers in Europe or America now-a-days do, that the wage-earner has his rights of which the right to organized action to protect his interests is the most important.

Widow Marriage and Early Marriage :—

We have been following with considerable interest the work done by the various institutions founded by the late Sir Ganga Ram. Sir Ganga Ram was particularly interested in widow marriage and had helped that cause more than any other single man has done and, after his death, his trustees have seen to it that the reform has not suffered. The Widows' Cause which is the monthly organ of the institution founded for helping widows has shown steady progress in its work. We, however, regret to see that in their zeal for the cause of widow marriage the persons responsible for the institution have acted with utter disregard for another reform which is even more vital and affects the rights of women even more fundamentally. The abolition of too early marriages is the reform most urgently needed in Hindu society and we are pained to see advertisements appearing in the latest number of the Widows' Cause for "suitable matches" for widows aged 14, 13 and even 8½ years. It is not desirable that there should be social workers who in their anxiety to introduce a particular reform contravene another. We can understand the difficulty which the workers in the cause of widow remarriage must be experiencing in persuading parents to postpone the marriage of their widowed daughter for a few years but surely it is easier here than in the case of parents with unmarried daughters. We trust that the Society will take our criticism in the spirit in which it is given and that they will postpone the remarriage of widows in their institutions till at least they have attained the age of 16.

Women's Votes:—The Women's Associations in Madras have issued a timely questionnaire to the candidates seeking election to the local Legislative Council bearing on social reform mainly among women and Prohibition and only those who pledge themselves to support these reforms can hope to secure the votes of the women of the Presidency. We scanned the printed list of questions but nowhere do we find any mention of the removal of untouchability. That the go-ahead women of Madras should be unmindful of so important a social reform passes our comprehension. They at least should have taken the cue from Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya's stirring appeal in their own province for better treatment of the depressed classes.

Havoc by Fire :—Mr. Sahasrabudhe of the Parel Social Service League has issued an appeal for relief work in the village of Venjad. Venjad which is four miles from Ambernath was recently the victim of a fire which consumed most of the huts in the village. It is one of the big villages in that area and is composed of 80 huts belonging to the agriculturists and 20 huts occupied by the Mahars of the village. The twenty huts of the Mahars have escaped unscathed from the fire owing to their isolation but of the rest only six have survived the fire. The grain stored by the villagers have all been burnt out and the relief to be given them must be in the shape of clothes, food and materials for building their homes. A sum of rupees ten thousand would be necessary to carry the work through and it will have to be forthcoming very soon as the work of reconstruction must begin before the rains set in. Some work has already been started and Mr. Devadhar who is guiding the operations proposes to start a co-operative society in the village. The need as we have pointed out above is an urgent one and we trust the public will respond to the appeal.

Tuberculosis and the Middle Class :—

In answer to a question Dr. Goheen said tuberculosis was more prevalent among the middle classes than amongst others and he said that much could be done to alleviate their condition by improving the general hygienic condition of the middle-class people, improving the drainage, eliminating flies and other carriers of the disease, improving the milk and food supply of the city, preventing the sale of contaminated meat and other food-stuffs, demolishing houses which were unfit for human habitation, widening the streets, providing more parks and squares and, above all, by educating the people and the children specially in principles of hygiene. The people should be taught to give up the present practice of consuming polished rice at a high cost while unpolished rice was better and cheaper. Then, again, they could do a great deal of work by propaganda through the press and posters, for it was a human instinct to believe anything in print. In one of his digressions Dr. Goheen said :—"The children are specially susceptible to tuberculosis infection, and this disease is usually contracted in childhood. But fortunately childhood has also a special immunity from its effects, and because of this immunity most of us are here present to-day. Unfortunately this immunity breaks down between the age of 15 and 40 in the case of males and between the age of 10 and 30 in the case of females. That is why such a large number of students, nation-builders, workers, teachers, cultivators, landlords, lawyers and others are cut down by this disease at the age when they are most necessary to the State—when their productive power is at its highest." Another argument for the Sarda Bill!

A Correction :—Mr. K. Ramamurthi asks us to publish the following corrections. We regret that the mistakes should have crept in his article published on April 27. "The principle of frequent monogamy" in the second line of the second para should have been "the principle of monogamy." Lower down in the same para "the registration does not bear immediate performance of sacred rights" should be read "registration does not bar." And lastly in the sentence "it is difficult to suppose that there are more who would jump at the opportunity of contracting a legal marriage" in the fourth para the word "more" should have been none. The mistakes are all on page 548.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, MAY 11, 1929.

SOCIAL REFORM BARS THE WAY.

When the Indian National Congress was started in 1885, a small group of Indians urged that social reform should be made an equal part of the object of the institution. This was opposed by men like W. C. Bannerjee, Dadabhai Naoroji, A. O. Hume, and K. T. Telang, for a variety of reasons the chief of which were that the national character of the movement would be impaired if social questions pertaining to different communities were to be discussed in the Congress, that Indians must gain some confidence in themselves by operation successfully on the political plane which offered the line of least resistance, and that the unanimity that then existed would be broken by divergent opinions on social matters. These reasons convinced political leaders of the expediency, and even necessity, of keeping social reform apart from politics and the National Social Conference was started two years later as a parallel and allied movement to deal with social questions. The Social Conference like the National Congress was open to all communities, though practically Hindu social problems engaged the largest measure of its attention. Occasionally on resolutions on women's education and the purdah, a Moslem or Christian speaker might be found to take part in the discussion. Otherwise, the subjects discussed related to Hindu social life such as child marriage, removal of the ban on the remarriage of widows and on foreign travel, amalgamation of sub-castes, re-admission of repentant converts and so on.

After ten years of existence on these lines, the Conference was threatened with expulsion from its formal association with the National Congress by the late Mr. Tilak on the ground that the Conference relied on the support of the British Government to carry out social legislation, and that he and others as Nationalists were opposed to the interference of an alien Government in the social and domestic affairs of the Indian people. Thirteen years later, Mr. Tilak brought about the split in the Congress at Surat on the same principle which he had meanwhile extended to the political field. The conciliatory temper of Ranade averted a public divorce between the Social Conference and the National Congress, but from that time, the growing influence of Mr. Tilak in politics tended to an antagonism between political and social reformers. The tradition of this antagonism has not altogether disappeared as shown by the criticism, considered by those who pass it as all sufficient, that the addition of a social programme to the Congress resolution on Swaraj last year, has reduced the Congress to a social reform movement! As a matter of fact, it is this social programme which invests the political objective of the Congress with a power which it did not possess so long as politics was conceived as merely a matter of agitation in the Press and public meetings. Mahatma Gandhi's distinctive contribution to nationalism is the increasing stress which he has brought about on social action as the surest lever for lifting political disabilities.

The concentration of the National Congress received its culminating reward in the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms. But further progress is confronted by the difficulties of unsolved social problems such as caste and communal differences, disabilities of women, and the intolerable social and economic position of the depressed classes. The work before Indian nationalities immediately, is largely that of social reform. Constitutional reform is needed largely as the means of accelerating social progress. The Liberal Party, notwithstanding that it consists of many able and experienced Indians, has failed to attract popular support, because it is yet without a social programme.

In these circumstances, it is well worth considering if a party whose main object is social reform to which all other questions will be subsidiary, should not be formed with the purpose of taking an effective part in public life and giving a distinct social bent to administration and legislation. The two principal parties at present are the Congress and the Liberal Federation. The former while it pays attention to social reform does so only in a subsidiary way and further, it mixes up social reform with non-co-operation which is the worst way of advancing social reform. The Liberals, on the other hand, cling to the old partition between social and political affairs. It seems, therefore, to be necessary and desirable to have a party pledged to social reform as its primary end. The numerous attempts at social legislation, the evidence given before the Age of Consent Committee, the non-Brahmin and the Depressed classes movements, and even the Hindu-Mahomedan and Indian States problems, all show that social reform is the one platform on which a solution can be found that would bring about a synthesis in the place of the present disruptive tendencies. In the great addresses which Ranade used to deliver at the Social Conferences, all these questions are touched with the power and illumination of his master-mind. The Social Reform Party need not be a large one. But every one who is of it and in it, must be earnest and sincere in pursuit of the great objective.

ABHYARTHI.

(By Mrs. I. J. Pitt).

A man has died last month in a small town of South India by name P. Nanjundappa known as Abhyarthi. A poor schoolmaster, but of a personality of such force, so ardent and life-long a worker for social reform in its widest sense, that it would not seem fitting that his death should remain unnoticed in this organ.

With no advantage of station, or means, or high education, yet by natural ability, an extraordinary gift of speech, and above all a passionate and burning zeal for righteousness, which never seemed to flag, he spread an influence wherever he went. He was born a Lingayet, a caste which in that part of the country can claim the limit of exclusiveness and bigotry. When a young man he became a Christian, and suffered as much for his faith as may be imagined by anyone who knows what being outcasted means in the South. The writer being on the spot through some of his most fearful trials, can testify to what he had to endure, not because he "loved the Lord Jesus" as he boldly proclaimed, but because he spurned caste. All the more strength of mind and courage did he require in that he chose to stand completely alone, attached to no Church—afterwards he joined the Arya Samaj. Whether or no there was incongruity in this position he found none; while remaining a staunch disciple of his "Lord Jesus" he worked as a devoted servant of the Samaj.

The whole of his spare time was given to preaching in the streets or anywhere he could get a hearing, on the evils of untouchability and caste, bad and cruel customs, such as he saw around him, dishonesty and corrupt practices, "in season and out of season" did his never ceasing eloquent tongue denounce unrighteousness. Also he wrote a good deal in the way of verses, treats &c.

The apostle of "Ahimsa" he was too, in his limited sphere, as may be imagined, not without stirring up the enmity of the unworthy, but gaining the partizanship of the worthy and in many cases imparting to them some of his fiery zeal, and with practical results too. Always the most downtrodden oppressed and helpless appealed to him, and when he was asked to work for that section of the Deccan Humanitarian League which deals with the prevention of animal sacrifices (which, by the way are prevalent in that part of the country to a much more horrifying extent than would be believed by any one who had not the facts brought to their notice, as the annals of that noble Society can testify) he responded with great fervour. In this work he and his companions had to tour round from "jatre" to "jatre" travelling long distances, under more or less hard conditions, their only weapon to fight the evil being their voices, in "bhajans" and their powers of persuasion and reasoning. Never sparing body or soul, being a man of highly strong temperament and keen sensibility, he became utterly worn out by hardships to the body, and agonizing in spirit with the sufferings of the helpless beasts. Even to save one poor goat he would expend the utmost of his strength. Sometimes meeting with success sometimes with failure, but never relaxing effort. A record of his work, graphically written from week to week was being sent to the writer.

He at last, completely broke down in health and had to give up returning to his schoolmastering, but the seeds of disease had been sown, which has now cut short this life of so much value, and of whom it might be said truly. "Of such is the Kingdom of God."

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XIX. RELIGIOUS LEADERS.

(By Dr. Clifford Manshardt, Ph.D.)

In an old classic the writer tells the story of two tribes going forth to battle. The contest was a hard one, for both of the tribes were about equal in strength. One side, however, had the advantage of an inspiring personality, an aged man in whom the people placed the utmost confidence. When this trusted leader stood in the sight of his people with uplifted arms, the soldiers took new courage and advanced, but when his arms grew weary and dropped, the enemy advanced. Thus the battle fluctuated, until two other men came to the help of the old leader, seating him upon a rock, and themselves holding up his hands. From that time forward the battle was won.

This simple story is an excellent parable of life. Although it is quite impossible for religious leaders to participate actively in every good cause, they can and should hold up the hands of good causes. From the religious leaders should come the message that will inspire men with hope, that will strengthen them to meet opposition, that will give them the courage to stand for right principles in business, in politics, and in their dealings with their brother men. The religious leader is far more than a master of rites and of ceremonies; he is, "for the people to God-ward", bringing the light of the eternal to bear upon the perplexing problems of every-day living. He may not be pre-eminent in agriculture, economics, or in politics, but in the realm of the spirit he should stand supreme. He should himself know to live, and show to men the way of life.

To be worthy of his calling the religious leader must be a man of an understanding heart. To condemn wrong-doing is easy, but to understand the man who does the wrong is much more difficult. To frown upon the foolish actions of the young is one thing; to realise the aspirations that are behind these actions is another. To regard certain adults as stupid and stubborn does not require a great amount of imagination; to understand the background out of which these same persons have come and to appraise them in the light of this background requires much imagination. The religious leader must be a seer in the best sense of the word—a man who really sees.

And as a further contribution to the life of his generation the religious leader must exemplify the spirit of tolerance. Religion should be a unifying factor, but far too often it is a cause of division. Why Hindus, Mahomedans, and Christians should fight within their own communities and against each other instead of making common cause against social injustice and moral wrong is very hard to see. Religion, as I understand it, is the attempt of the individual to become a full-fledged citizen of the Universe. It involves certain attitudes towards men. Functionally it is an attempt to realise a better way of living for the individual, and to help men to dwell together in a friendly co-operative manner. The religious leader who descends to controversy is denying the very heart of his gospel. Being of many religions we are still one-members of a seeking humanity.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF MISS MAYO.

It is rather singular that no criticism of Miss Mayo that I know of—serious, flimsy or vituperative—has yet attempted to account for her success. That she has succeeded, even if it be in achieving an unenviable notoriety, no one now needs to be told. But the surprising thing is that she has not succeeded because she had anything novel or original to tell the West about us: an abundance of writers has preceded her in what have been called her "revelations" and false condemnation of us. Nor has she succeeded on account of any intrinsic merit in her publications as a contribution to knowledge or as an attempt to interpret the soul of one race to another. The question then naturally arises: What is the underlying cause of her success? Hints have now and again been thrown out of dark hands at work, thrusting her books into the lime-light as much as possible for political ends. There may be some justification in fact for this suspicion, for political motives may have prompted a certain class of persons to assist her to a publicity she did not deserve. But this hypothesis does not fully explain the reasons for the credulous acceptance of Miss Mayo by the Western public—an acceptance which has been so encouraging that she has been led to publish another book in the same strain as the former. Well, then the cause of her success must lie elsewhere. But we shall be taking a false step at the very outset, if we seek it in the books of Miss Mayo as such. It must rather be sought in a certain psychological condition of the Western public itself amongst whom she finds the majority of her readers. May not her former book at least have achieved its peculiar success, because, after all, it was nothing more than a reflection of the state of the Western mind with regard to India? Let us follow this clue and see whither it leads us.

Before, however, we set about to ascertain how Miss Mayo held the mirror up to Western notions about India, we should bear in mind two facts which will help to elucidate much of what will be said later on. The first is that the Westerner has scarcely ever viewed India in the cold light of truth or reason; he has generally visualised her with the aid of a smoke-glass of myths which have varied at different periods. The second is that the Anglo-Saxon mind in particular is markedly tenacious of its myths.

AN EXPLODED MYTH.

Now, we usually fail to notice the fact that even to-day there is a myth extant in the West about us. Of course, Europe no longer casts covetous eyes on India as a land of boundless gold: though, for the matter of that, certain people have not yet done with "shaking the pagoda-tree." The myth of India being a country of untold treasures has been exploded; but it has been replaced by another. We must not gather from the impressions of globe-trotters that to every Tom, Dick and Harry in the West, India is a land of strange mysteries, strange contrasts, strange peoples, and a strange civilisation. The average bourgeois mind cannot live on a poetical mystery; it must have working notions, whether false or true, crude or well-grounded. And there have not been wanting persons to supply a basis to build those notions on.

The reader will easily be able to imagine what that myth is without our dilating on it at length, when we point its origin and sources. Its sources have been principally two—the missionary and the British official from India. But we must bear in mind that little, if any, of the contribution to this myth can be imputed to the missionary of to-day. Be it said to his credit, that he has learnt to speak of India with respect and justice; and the fault is not so much his as of his training and traditions if he has not acquired the desirable extent of detachment in his thought and speech regarding certain matters. And amongst the British officials there have always been some, from the earliest days of the Company's rule in India, who have been conscientious and chivalrous enough to speak the truth not only fearlessly but forcibly.

THE MISSIONARIES' WEAPON.

For the origin of the myth we will have to go back a little to a period in the early nineteenth century. It was a period when England and America were stirred not a little to missionary enterprise. The focus of the bustle of the newly stirred missionary spirit was mainly India. Our country was represented by the missionaries to be a splendid market for the diffusion of Christianity. But, in order to prove that it was a splendid market, how was it represented? In the worst light possible. The fanaticism, (I can call their attitude by no other name) of the missionaries of those days saw in our religion only a mass of superstitions, in our customs the barbarity of a by-gone age, in our philosophy only the devil's subtlety, in our social institutions a hindrance to "salvation," and in ourselves nothing more than a decivilised, if not uncivilised, people wallowing in unspeakable degradation. Even the sacred precincts of our domestic life were sometimes not spared. The method of the missionaries was a simple one. They fastened upon a few evils which indubitably existed and magnified them beyond recognition. These evils were almost represented to be the full measure of what India was. Moreover, their arguments in support of the propagation of Christianity in India frequently assumed the form of a downright vilification of Hinduism. We shall choose just one example of this type of argument:—

"As Hinduism is incapable of carrying forward a nation in the career of improvement, so neither is it adapted for a high state of civilisation; they cannot co-exist; but while there is no species of improvement to which Hinduism is not hostile, there is none which Christianity does not foster. From a careful examination, therefore, of the tendency of Hinduism and Christianity; and a comparison of their effects, incontestably developed in India and England, it is not presumptuous to assert, that India stands peculiarly in need of Christianity. We need Christianity to extinguish the fires of the funeral pile, into which superstition is annually casting its victims, and to send back the mother to the relief of her wretched family. We need Christianity to annul the prohibition for widows to marry, to remove the thousands of widows annually created, out of the reach of danger and disgrace, and to restore them to the bosom of society;—to teach women to read, to cultivate their intellectual faculties, to raise them in the scale of being and to open to society the benefit of their influence. Hinduism has practically taught its followers, that the great bulk of mankind exist only for the Brahmins that the whole duty of man consists in implicit faith in the Vedas, and obedience to the priesthood. It has forbidden the exercise of reason on the most important interests of society; it has locked up all knowledge in a language unintelligible to the great body of the people, and then forbidden them to study it under pain of eternal damnation. We need Christianity to break up this system, to dissolve the unnatural distinctions of the caste, to teach the natives that all men are equal in the eyes of their Maker and to introduce a tone of manly freedom in thought and action—to cultivate the language of the people, and to encourage a spirit of enquiry after truth. We need Christianity to abolish the long and dreary pilgrimages so inimical to happiness, so destructive to human life,—to subvert the system of religious mendacity—to suppress the numberless feasts, and to restore the time which they destroy to national industry. We require the pure faith and unblemished morality of the Gospel in lieu of the adoration of trees, rivers, and beasts, and the licentious example of the gods. We need Christianity to restore to God, his just rights, and to man his legitimate privileges. We need it, finally, and in the opinion of some this may appear the most urgent want, to develop the vast resources of this rich country, to remove every obstacle to its occupying that elevated rank in the scale of nations, which it is so well able by nature to sustain." (Quoted from the "Friend of India". May 1825, in Peggs' "India's Cries to British Humanity." pp. 406—7).

Deduct the pious sentiment, and, in the ring of the sentences of this specimen of missionary eloquence you can detect the very tones of Miss Mayo which were once more to fill the ears of Europe and America with slander over a hundred years later.

Not to strain the patience of the reader too far with quotations, we confine ourselves to a single instance to show how the missionary view of India was popularised. Here is a poem on the same theme:

"Wide o'er the regions of the Orient world
Her murderous sway dark Superstition holds;
And the far Occident still sees unfurl'd Slavery's black banner float in ample folds.
"The burning altar smokes—and wrappe'd in flame.

The widow lies—a living victim bound;
While Juggernaut's grim car rolls on the same.
Wheeling O'er human heads its impious round.
"Reeking with blood the East lights up her pyres."

Where idol gods through frantic crowds are borne;
And in the West are kindling other fires.'

'Mid chains and groans, mingling hate and scorn.
"To cheer the gloom of those benighted skies,
The Press, its radiance o'er the darkness flings;
The Herald of that Sun which soon will rise,
With freedom, peace, and healing on its wings.

(Ori. Herald, Jan. 1824, quoted in Peggs pp. 442—43).

James Bryce, himself a missionary, admitted, as far back as 1839, that "the tale of their (the Hindus') depravity and debauchery was readily taken up by the Christian philanthropist, who sought to bring them within the precepts of Gospel morality ...The first Missionaries, who undertook the task of converting the Hindus, were, as might be expected, more attracted by the patent vices of the few, with whom they came in contact, than with the quiet and unobtruding habits of the many, of whom they remained ignorant; and perhaps we may say, without any breach of charity, that these good and excellent men delighted more, to depict the immoralities of the Hindu character, than to dwell upon such amiable features as it possessed."

Having this dark picture placed before it, the West was asked to stretch forth its saving hand for the uplift of India. It will be seen from what Bryce says that the missionaries early realised their error and ignorance; but the vilification of our people was too potent a weapon for them to resist the temptation of using it for a long time subsequently. Of course, all uncharitable exaggerations passed off as display of "zeal". But the consequence has been that, though the missionaries have learnt better, the picture of Indian their zeal once painted has never completely vanished from the Western mind.

THE BRITISH OFFICIAL.

Close on the heels of the missionary followed the British official from India. The latter was not perhaps as obtrusive as the former; but he had as ever his ever-lasting platitudes about the weakness and incapacity of the "natives," their political imbecility, and when political imbecility becomes hard to prove, their religious dissensions and animosities, their propensity to fly into anarchy as soon as the controlling hand of his was removed from the helm of affairs, and so on and so forth—the tendency of all his platitudes being of course to rattle in peoples' ears the supreme necessity of his presence here. These platitudes have become, as it were, the very pith of an Englishman's mental attitude towards India. The British official, moreover, had by then installed himself as the "trustee" of India; the and very indae of trusteeship has gone a great way towards fostering in him a delusive sense of superiority and indispensability, accompanied as it is with the notion that we happen to be weaklings perennially in need of his attention and vigilance. Hence his contribution to the idea that we are a set of weak and sometimes naughty children whose safety and existence depend upon their being confined in the political nursery established here in the shape of the British control over us. Nor must we forget his unfortunate propensity to trumpet forth his own achievement in this land of his "excile" whenever he takes the trouble to open his mouth regarding any matter pertaining to it; and when this propensity seeks expression, it is easy to surmise the class of facts that would be chosen for exposition for the edification of the English people. And the English people would of course pass on the views and opinions derived from this source to the rest of Europe and America.

The globe-trotter with literary propensities may be a third possible source of this myth. But his contribution to it is so indefinite and difficult to determine that we may leave him out of account for the present.

ARABIC INFLUENCE ON MUSIC.

(By KHAN BAHADUR MIR MUZHERUDDIN, B. A.)

Intellectual awakening of Europe largely depends on the influence which the Arabian sciences exercised on the Westerners. The Arabs reached heights of eminence in Arithmetic, Geometry, Music and Astronomy which had never been attained by any nation in Europe. It is commonly believed that Music has no place in the Arabian Sciences, at any rate, it is not generally known what potent influence Arabic Musical science played on the west. The Arabs came in political contact with the west in the eighth century. The wandering Arab took with him wherever he went the musical instrument known as "Ghannayi." These wandering minstrels knew very little of the science of music as they were more performers learning by rote. The Arabs were the inventors of the lute, Guitar, Rebec and Naker. The Arabian Cymbals, Tambourines, Drums and Trumpets were adopted by the musicians in Europe. It will be interesting to note that the Arabs were actual constructors in the ninth-twelfth century of both the pneumatic and the hydraulic organ which was never before known in Europe.

Arabs established many schools of music in Andalus. The great musician Fulan, who was a Moor of Granada discovered the art of playing on the Lambutan, Cythara and viola. Several treatises on music were published by Al-Kindi, Al-Sarakhsi, and Banu Musa the great Arabian writers of the time. Intellectual superiority of the Arabs was admitted in Europe. A large number of European Scholars went to the universities at Andalusia to study sciences and the writings of the Arabian Theorists. The great scholars such as Gerbert, Hermann Contract, Constantine the African and Plato of Tivali took back with them to Europe the results of their musical studies. One of the most famous in the world was the musical school at the University of Cardova where the greatest musicians of Europe such as the Jew Elias and the Christian Pedro Canciotor were the students. Al-Kkahwarizmi the great Arabian Arithmetician, Ibnal-haitham, the great Geometrician, Al-battani the great Astronomer, Al-farabi and Ibn-Sina, the great Music Theorists were the teachers of those sciences to the western scientists.

Harmony in music was unknown in Europe before the tenth century although a form of musical art known as organizing existed and the latter was taught in the Andalusian Musical schools. Organum which means measured music was taught at the University of Cardova. The Arabs were the first to introduce Solfeggio and instrumental tablature. The Arabs translated many Greek musical treatises which were not known to western Europe such as Harmonics and Rhythmics of Aristoxenes, Problems of Aristotle, Harmonics and Canon of Euclid. A comparison of the musical writings of Europe at the time with those of Arabian Scientists will prove the mediocrity of the former. The Spanish Jews some of whom were exiled by the Muwahhid persecution in 1130 visited Europe and played a prominent part in blending the cultural contact of Arabs and Westerners. The well known Abraham Ibn-Esra the greatest writer on Music settled down in England for some time between 1158-9 and carried on his literary work there, thereby giving an opportunity to English Jews to make copies of his works. Mensural music was introduced in Europe by one of the early Arabic Student from Europe, Hermann Contract in 1013-54 and hence it is of Arabian origin. Roger Bacon an illustrious English author was deeply indebted to Arabian science and his respects for the Arabs may be gauged from his remark "That Christians were inferior to the pagans in morals and were in consequence behind them in invention." The Arabian influence in the European music ceased after the fifteenth century as the political power of Andalus was broken leading to an intellectual decline amongst the Arabs.

WOMEN'S TRIUMPH.

Sangamner is a Taluka place in the Ahmednagar District. This little town has suddenly come into prominence, thanks to the courageous stand taken by the brave women of the place in the Hanuman Jayanti Day. This situation was created by the prohibitory orders passed by the District Deputy Collector of the Ahmednagar District, prohibiting the Hanuman procession. In spite of this order and in spite of the protest of the terror-stricken male populace, the second chariot was carried in procession by the women of Sangamner, in the face of official opposition and the force of armed police brought from all parts of the District for the special purpose of prohibiting this procession, writes a correspondent of the Mahratha, Poona.

The Hanuman procession is an annual feature of the Hanuman Jayanti celebrations in Sangamner. These processions have never so far caused any breach of peace. In 1927 the Mahomedans took it into their heads to obstruct this procession. This year as the Hanuman Jayanti approached the local authorities were active. This time they invented an entirely novel plea for prohibiting the procession. For it is reported that they went to the length of collecting evidence to prove that the idea of processions was set afoot by the higher classes only and that the majority of the people were apathetic towards it. It is also said that they threatened uneducated masses, insinuating that if the Hindus were to insist on the procession being carried by the old route, they would come to grief. But the attempts were of no avail. The procession was due on 23rd April 1929, at Sunrise. An order was suddenly issued by the Sub-divisional Magistrate late in the evening on the 22nd April, 1929, prohibiting the procession. This order prohibited not only the annual Ratha procession but also prohibited any kind of procession which had any connection with Hanuman, whether with or without a music, either instrumental or vocal, whether on the 23rd or during the next two months. The order also prohibited the holding of meetings whether in private or public and making such gestures as would hurt the feelings of others, within a radius of three miles of Sangamner. This order contains several mischievous and false allegations and insinuations which would tend to create ill-feeling and hatred, if not enmity, between the classes and the masses, and between the sub-castes of His Majesty's subjects. For instance, the order states "the major portion of the Hindus in Sangamner such as the Marathas, Malis, Koshtis, Salis and other weavers, artisans, Mahars and other castes do not seem to desire to take out such procession with an avowed religious purpose. This procession was introduced and persisted in mainly by the attempts of certain Hindus of the higher castes with the intention of making a communal demonstration."

Simultaneously with this order notices were issued to 14 Hindu and 7 Mahomedan local leaders to show cause as to why they should not be bound over with sureties for a period of two months for keeping peace! These orders were so peremptory that even the summonses could not be served on all the persons against whom the notices had been issued. These notices were issued after 6 p. m. and the recipients were ordered to present themselves in the court at 7 p. m. Proceedings commenced after 8 p. m. and continued till nearly 2 a. m. The accused were not given any time to engage legal help, and an application for postponement on that ground was refused. In spite of this haste, the cases are still pending.

Excitement reached its highest on the publication of the prohibition order. The local authorities had imported about a 100 armed police from all parts of the District. In addition to this came the notices that were served on the leaders. These orders caused considerable sensation. On the Hanuman Jayanti DAY, the Maruti temple was surrounded by a police party. The Jayanti celebrations passed off quietly, though everybody was in a dejected mood. Some two hours after the Jayanti the women of the town began to flock in the temple for Darshan, as usual. The Hindu leaders were persuading the crowds to disperse, telling them that they would do everything in their power, and that they would carry on agitation in every constitutional manner. At about nine in the morning, two Hindu boys tried to bring the procession Idol from the temple and to place it into the Chariot. But the police intervened and forced them to carry it back to an adjoining temple. News of this incident was sent to the higher authorities who at once appeared on the scene. The police then tried to disperse the crowds but the people were quietly sitting in the roads near the temple.

At about 10, about 200 Hindu women appeared on the scene. They had come with the procession Idol and wanted to place it in the Ratha. The police of course obstructed. They then opened negotiations with the higher police authorities, to the effect that they would carry the Chariot along the old route, and if they were allowed to do so, there would be no danger to peace. The authorities took charge of the Idol and thus the entreaties of the ladies were of no avail. It is reported that some of the women were threatened with criminal prosecutions and attempts were made to persuade them to leave the place. The Sub-divisional Magistrate then appeared on the scene and tried to impress upon the women-folk that if they were to continue their attempts, they would surely come into trouble. He also insinuated that the wives, daughters and sisters of the higher classes were absent at the critical moment. But to his discomfiture, he received a straight reply that the God Hanuman was as sacred to the masses as to the classes; and that he need not try any further to create communal ill-feeling. As this conversation proceeded news went round and about a thousand ladies of all castes and creeds assembled on the scene. The male populace apprehended that their wives and daughters would be molested by the police, and hence they gathered in large numbers near the temple.

In the meanwhile a weaver boy was arrested by the police. While the attention of the authorities was diverted to this incident and as the chain of the police around the Ratha was broken, some of the women pushed the Chariot along. One foresighted lady had brought over a picture of Hanuman which was placed in the Chariot. When this was seen by the crowd of women, the procession started right merrily. The police were under the impression that as the Idol was in their possession, the procession would never start, and by the time they got wind of the picture the Chariot was already at a furlong's length. The streets being narrow, and crowded, the police could not stop the procession till it reached the Market-square, which is only about a hundred yards from the Bhadangbua's masjid, the bone of contention.

The Market-square was the only place where the police could organise stout opposition to the procession. They brought over a cart from the neighbourhood and placed it in the street. Behind this barricade they stood in strong formation. The news of the procession had reached the District officers who at once proceeded to the square in their motors. They took shelter behind the police lines, and awaited developments. The Ratha came along at higher speed, and the brave women displaced the cart and then began a hand-to-hand scuffle with the police. Their only weapons of offence and defence were Gulal and Battasas. The police used to sterner weapons had almost taken possession of the Ratha, when such huge quantities of Gulal were thrown at them that they had to retire from the fight. Then came the turn of the motor cars. The women-folk had never heard of battering rams, but they used the Ratha as such and in a few minutes one of the motors was damaged, and the authorities remembering the wise old adage, that discretion was the better part of valour, left the scene in haste. In hot pursuit, the Ratha came along and in a few minutes had passed the famous masjid. The procession was not accompanied by music, but the ladies were in such glee that never did they shout out in the sacred name of their favourite at a higher pitch as they did while the Chariot passed the Bhadangbua's mosque. In no way did the Mahomedans object to this procession.

Hereafter the procession was not disturbed in any way by the authorities. The police quietly followed the crowd of women, carrying the heavy Chariot, through the streets of Sangamner. The news of this victory went round in the town and the procession received an unprecedented reception in each and every corner from each and every community, from the rich and the poor. The procession came back to the Maruti temple at about 2 in the afternoon, where Miss Liladevi Pingale addressed the victorious assemblage. After the distribution of coconuts and Haldi-Kunku the brave women dispersed.

INTERNATIONAL WOMEN'S CONGRESS.

"J. P." WRITES IN THE Forward :—

Many things have been accomplished by woman since she lost her inferiority complex and began to exterminate the notion, harboured by mere man, that the weaker sex must also be the inferior sex. Gone are the times when, in England and elsewhere, a lone band of heroic women fought valiantly for suffrage. England, Germany and other countries have long ago accorded woman the franchise and other privileges and though there remains much to be done, much has been achieved. Perhaps, the war helped, but, chiefly the success is due to the untiring labors of the leaders and the rank and file of the international women's movement.

A review of the past and a programme for the future of woman's endeavours will be the feature of the eleventh congress of the International Alliance of Women for Suffrage and Equal citizenship. A call for this congress has been sent out by the President, Mrs. Corbett Ashby, who in her New Year's message, urges that each country should send its most representative woman "to bring the tale of toil and its reward, with pride in its achievements won, and with humility for all that is left undone."

AFTER TWENTY FIVE YEARS.

This gathering will meet in Berlin from 17th to 21st June this year, twenty-five years after the first congress which was held in that city in 1904. Over six hundred delegates representing forty two countries are expected to attend. In addition over thousand men and women prominent in the international emancipation movement, have already intimated their intention to come to Berlin for the congress and give their moral support to its decisions.

It will, no doubt, be a memorable meeting. I will not only be a great anniversary after a quarter of a century of international work, but it will also be a testimony to the depth and sincerity of the new international unity which exists among the forty two affiliated countries which will be represented.

Thus the congress will in itself be an event of great interest, but no less great and interesting will be the opportunity for the hundreds of international women's leaders of a visit to a new Germany. How the pioneers of twenty-five years ago would have smiled if they had been told that in 1929 they would be observing the results of their efforts in a free republic, almost devoid of armaments. They might reasonably have come to the conclusion that the happy changes had been brought about by some extraordinary success in the competitive struggle of the nations for supremacy, instead of as was the case, by a defeat in that struggle in which the odds were too heavy for Germany.

PREPARING FOR RECEPTION.

The German women, indeed, lost much in that struggle, but they gained also, and they are now, with characteristic thoroughness, preparing for the reception of delegates and visitors to the Congress. The wife of the Chancellor, the wives of Cabinet ministers, women Parliamentarians, and leaders of the great women's organisations are all taking their share in placing the Congress on a broad and firm basis. Professional women who attend the Congress will have the opportunity of meeting women of their own profession.

A special youth committee has been formed to offer the younger visitors opportunities for mingling with their comrades from other countries, and the Midsummernight Fire celebrations will be the occasion at which young people's aims and hopes will be voiced. A special performance of the State Opera House has been promised and the week before the Congress is to be especially rich in musical and dramatic performances.

The General Women's Citizens' League is in charge of arrangements, and in its recent national convention here some of the most prominent leaders of the women's movement in Germany have already aired the principal subjects on the agenda of the International Congress. Of special interest among them is the question of a married woman's nationality. In most countries women lose their status as nationals when they marry a foreigner a provision which has often resulted in many legal and economic difficulties and to which consequently the international women's movement is opposed.

So far, however, only the United States, France and Sweden have granted lifelong national status by women, no matter what their matrimonial arrangements, and it is proposed that this privilege be extended to the women of all nations. Most countries, including Germany are extremely reluctant to break a centuries' old tradition, and at the Berlin meeting, the German Government, at any rate, was bitterly criticised for its "backward" attitude on this point.

LABOUR AND WOMEN POLICE.

Another important issue before the congress is the question of varying labour conditions for men and women. At the Berlin meeting it was pointed out that the employers generally advanced as reason for their different treatment of men and women the fact that in the case of the latter they had to assume greater financial burdens (protection for expectant and nursing mothers, prohibition of nightwork for women etc.) wherefore women in England and the Scandinavian countries were opposed to women welfare regulations as conflicting with their individual liberty.

This attitude however was rejected by the German speaker who asserted that the care for the future generation was more important than certain restrictions for expectant mothers. The International Congress in Paris, in 1926, the speaker added, has laid down certain principles in that respect which the forthcoming congress will probably elaborate.

A third item on the agenda of the congress is the question of women police in all countries regarding whose task and composition there exists a variance of opinions. The congress will probably attempt to unify these opinions for the benefit and the guidance of the police administrations in those countries where women squads have already been established.

HINDU CONFERENCE.

Hindus, representing all the communities in Malabar, attended in large numbers the first Kerala Hindu Conference which commenced sitting on 31st May at Therunawayi in threatening weather. Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya presided and Dr. Moonje, the Raja of Nilambur and Mr. Venkatramana Iyengar of Coimbatore were among the prominent visitors. After the speech of Mr. P. Narayana Menon, Chairman of the Reception Committee, Pandit Malaviya rose to speak. He had scarcely spoken for forty minutes when a violent storm accompanied by rain caused further proceeding to be curtailed. Pandit Malaviya continued his address this morning. He dwelt at length on Hindu Dharma, the excellence of Aryan culture and the sublime principles that lay embedded in the Vedas and Sastras. He exhorted every Hindu to peruse and understand his rich literary heritage. Explaining the object of the Hindu Mahasabha the speaker laid stress on the imparting of religious instructions to promote amity and good-will among the various communities and to take part in politics to protect Hindu interests.

OUT OF DATE CUSTOMS.

The Pandit drew pointed attention to the prevailing antiquated practices among the Namboodiri Brahmins which impeded the progress of the community. He observed: "The rules you are following have long been obsolete. The realities have been thrown into the background and formalities have been made predominant." In the interest of the race the Pandit advised the Namboodries to adjust themselves to the changing conditions and to modify their marriage laws allowing every member of the family to marry within his own community and to remove the purdah system.

UNAPPROACHABILITY AND TEMPLE ENTRY.

He strongly pleaded to them to discard the idea of pollution by distance that is of unapproachability. He quoted chapter and verse from the Sastras disproving the erroneous theories entertained by the upper classes.

Referring to the question of temple entry by the depressed classes, the speaker requested the people to view the matter generously and to solve the problem by paying due consideration. The people of the depressed classes belonged to Hinduism, and had the legitimate right to enjoy "darshan" of God and God's bliss.

RECONVERSION.

Speaking on the shuddhi movement Pandit Malaviya said that full opportunity would be given to those sincerely wishing to return to Hinduism, having been once misled to adopt another faith. But no force, fraud or unfair temptations, he said, ought to be practised in reconversion and the matter must be left entirely to the free will and conviction of the party.

Concluding he stressed the need for a "home" for destitute women and orphanages at the principal cities and the introduction of physical culture in educational institutions for both boys and girls.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Annamalai University:—In connection with the Annamalai University, two committees have been appointed, one to draft rules and regulations and the other to be in charge of the appointment of professors and the teaching staff. Mr. S. E. Ranganandhan, Principal, Kumbakonam College, has been appointed Vice-Chancellor in the place of Mr. Sastri.

English Age of Marriage Bill:—The Commons passed the third reading of the Age of Marriage Bill rendering void marriages in which either party is under sixteen years.

Indian to fly from London to India:—Mr. P. N. Kaball, who was sent to Europe by the Eastern Airways of Bombay for flying training, has completed his course. He intends to start on May 20 on a solo flight to India in his own, plane, the "Arya". The Indian community in London is arranging to give him a send-off.

NOTES.

Objectionable Advertisements:—The Pioneer has devoted a leading article to pointing out to Indian Journals—"the English owned and English-edited ones" are excepted—their duty to refrain from publishing what it calls advertisements of "filth dealing with rejuvenation of old men, birth-control, specifics for unmentionable diseases, and alleged charms, which will do everything from 'securing success in the law courts' to procuring 'love marriages'." The object of our contemporary is no doubt excellent, and we think, therefore, that it may like to see the other side of the story. The Reformer may claim that it has from the first paid as much attention to advertisements as to reading matter. At first, we were inclined to accept without question the standards of our Anglo-Saxon-Indian censors. But reflection has brought light, and shown that the censors themselves stand in need of enlightenment. In some cases, we have recalled Ophelia's exhortation to her brother: "Do not like some ungracious pastors do, point to me the steep and thorny road to heaven, while thyself the primrose path of dalliance tread." But these may be ignored. The important thing is that Englishmen, having set some arbitrary standards of decency, presume to condemn those who do not accept them as wanting in mental cleanliness. Let us take the Pioneer's list. First, is the rejuvenation of old men. If this is filth, it must be filth whether undertaken by Unani Hakims or Vienna Professors, whether in the advertisement or literary page? Does the Pioneer mean seriously to maintain that English newspapers do not publish advertisements and articles about rejuvenation discoveries by European scientists, nothing about monkey-glands? Then birth-control. Here, our contemporary is distinctly behind the times. Deans and Bishops have advocated birth-control, perhaps not yet from their pulpits. As for "unmentionable diseases," there is now a regular official propaganda about them in many countries, including Great Britain. As regards medical advertisements generally, whatever may be the case in England where every village has its panel doctors, in India where outside the towns no medical help is available, advertisements in newspapers are often the only means of enabling a sufferer to get a remedy. On this ground alone, we have been admitting medical advertisements. As for "charms", those who believe in them may be fools, but there is nothing indecent in them. We have from the first excluded liquor and tobacco advertisements from the Reformer. We regard liquor as worse than any Unani's "aphrodisiac". The liquor trade is the indispensable adjunct of the brothel system. Read any book on Prostitution, and you will find this emphasised. We do not ask the Pioneer to give them up, if it thinks otherwise, but we do suggest that it need not moralise to its Indian contemporaries who may have their own views as to what is decent or indecent.

Madras Temperance Conference:—The Excise policy of the Government of Madras has come in for severe criticism at the hands of both the public and the Press. By ostensibly earmarking four lakhs of rupees for Temperance propaganda the Government have evaded the real issue and ignored the demands of the people. The Temperance Conference held recently at Ootacamund under the Government auspices was according to the Hindu little more than make-believe. Our contemporary pertinently asks "What is the need of the hour, is it propaganda or action?" and then goes on to observe: "Surely, it is action that is needed and not talk. One can understand the need for propaganda in a country where drink was universally practised and among whose people it was not considered a vice. But that certainly is not the case with us in India. If we legislate in the direction of Prohibition here, it will not by any means be a case of legislation in advance of public opinion; for public opinion here is solidly behind Prohibition. If the Government have any doubt on the point, that can be easily set at rest by ordering a plebiscite. But they have always fought shy of such a course.

Public Opinion for Prohibition:—The policy of the Madras Government would suggest that hitherto nothing has been done to awaken the people to the evils of drink. On the contrary private enterprise has done much in this direction. To quote our contemporary once again "Temperance workers in the country have for years demanded the adoption of a policy of local option by the Government, but to this day they have not acceded to that request. If it is enforced on fair conditions, we have no doubts as to what the results will be: as in Changanacherry in Travancore, the overwhelming majority will be against drink. Moreover, we fail to realise what better results can be secured by the proposed subsidised propaganda than those achieved by the propaganda carried on by philanthropy and public spirit in the last forty years in the country. The Anglo-Indian Temperance Association has rendered forty years of devoted service in this field carrying on propaganda on systematic lines in the districts through active workers; so have the missionary bodies. To conduct further propaganda is, as a matter of fact, to seek to persuade the convinced—it will be an act of carrying coal to Newcastle. If the Government are really serious in their intentions and wish to bring about total prohibition, as the Legislative Council has desired them to do, the first thing they should do is to spare the rural population the boredom of officialised lectures on the evils of drink."

"Slaves of the Gods":—Dr. N. Macnicol has written for the June number of the National Christian Council Review an article on Miss Mayo's second book an advance copy of which has been supplied us by one of the Secretaries of the Council. Dr. Macnicol avoids discussion of the main contention of Miss Mayo that Indians are not fit for self-government till they rid themselves of their social evils and denies Miss Mayo's right to criticise the work done to meet the evils here when she herself has not taken any part in the work of reformation. We are not quite clear as to Dr. Macnicol's statement that Bishop Whitehead gives her "some carefully guarded support." So far as we can recollect the Bishop's letter showed a deplorable lack of self-restraint! The Doctor points out that Miss Mayo has singled out Hindu India for her criticism. In the course of his article he writes:—"That India has powerful enemies who desire to keep her in subjection, and to that end to give her a bad name, no one can doubt. When, therefore, Miss Mayo's former book appeared describing India as a land of decadents and degenerates, describing them as though their faults and crimes were relieved by no traits of nobility, is it any wonder that it was believed that the book was a deliberate attempt to besmirch them in the eyes of the world and so to help those who would defraud them of their right of freedom? This lady who claimed to be a friend certainly seemed, both from the manner of her book and the occasion of its appearance, to be on the side of their enemies. And this suspicion was confirmed when the book was made use of with exultation by those who were unquestioned enemies. Miss Mayo may have been unfortunate in the circumstances that created this deep-rooted suspicion of the sinister purpose of the book, but it can hardly be denied that the manner in which the evils of India were presented seemed to confirm the view that its author was no friend but a foe, that she was willing and eager to wound." And again, "In her appeal to the women of India Miss Mayo points out to them that in the case of American women it is of those who "flagrantly abuse" their liberty that they chiefly hear. Just so, in the case of a casual student of Indian life such as Miss Mayo is, it is of its flagrant abuses that she chiefly hears."

Christian Workers in India:—Dr. Stanley Jones who is at present in Great Britain gave an interview recently to a newspaper in which he discussed Indian problems. On the question of the prospects of Christianity in India he said that there was a "danger" of Christ's teachings being assimilated by Hinduism and of his being given a place in the Hindu pantheon. Commenting on this the Indian Messenger, a Brahmo paper of Calcutta, writes:—"But not even the best of the Christian workers in India are free from the credal bias in favour of Christianity. Dr. Jones is waiting for the "next step," "the step of proving that Christ was 'not only a way, but the way.'" This reminds one of the Anglo-Saxon instinct in the matter of colonisation which leads to the extirpation of the original inhabitants of a colony. If room is to be made for Christ that must be done at the cost of others. In life man Jesus with all his anathemas was a good neighbour to others, but in death he is transformed beyond recognition. Dr. Jones' Autocrat of the Indian Road will not bear near him passers-by with umbrellas on. Not content with Indian admiration for one who himself said, "Why callest thou me good? None is good save one, that is, God," Dr. Jones bargains for Indian adoration of Christ. And till that is secured he will not lay down his arms. Would that all this enthusiasm were better employed and Christianity were more worthily interpreted."

at many points. And they have had their reward. Many of the reforms they originally espoused against fierce opposition are today social commonplaces. Whereas the convert community has not only ceased to have any influence on Indian life, but has itself become stunted in growth owing to its being uprooted from the soil in which it had been reared. Thoughtful Indian Christians realise this, and are earnestly endeavouring to re-knit the broken links with national culture, and we wish them all success. The British connection with India likewise stands to gain immensely by similarly becoming continuous with the life and history of India. The removal of the capital to Delhi was intended as a striking proof of its desire to do so, but in the subsequent developments that idea has been very little kept in view. Indian social reformers who have found it necessary to take part in politics, dislike any break in the continuity of political life. Their influence, whatever it may count for, is, therefore, steadily cast on the side of peaceful reform and against violent revolution. The greatest objection to revolution is that it inevitably leads to a reaction in the direction away from the one in which movement is desired. Reform, on the other hand, is calculated to make both action and reaction, like the forward and the backward strokes of the piston, contribute to and accelerate the speed of the engine of national progress.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, MAY 18, 1929.

SOCIAL OR POLITICAL REFORM?

Mr. Vallabhbhai Patel, speaking at Bardoli last week, said that he felt more happy when working for social reform than when leading a no-tax campaign, although, he added, politics and social reform were so interwoven that neither could be neglected without retarding the other. This exactly represents the position of many who have devoted their lives to social reform. The reason why one feels more ease of mind in working for social reform is that there one is more clear regarding the result of his activities than in any other field. All or nearly all the factors of the problem are within his personal experience or complete cognisance. He knows when he can effectively quicken or slacken the pressure that he is able to bring to bear upon those whose cooperation is necessary for him in his task. To the extent that this condition is reproduced in any field of activity, the same ease of mind which is felt in social reform work will be felt there also. There is another point to be borne in mind. In social work, the worker does not feel that he is fighting against a hostile power, while, in politics particularly under conditions similar to those prevailing in India, this is the sentiment predominantly in his mind. The foreign character of British rule was not the feature of it which Indian reformers and politicians laid most stress on up to about thirty years ago. British rule was accepted as a Providential dispensation intended for the benefit of the country, and the methods of reform favoured were those appropriate to social reform. It is only when the foreign-ness of it became more and more prominently impressed on the Indian mind that these methods came to be increasingly regarded as unsuitable to politics in the present political conditions. If a tiny particle of coal gets into one's eyes when travelling in a railway train, one's whole effort is concentrated on removing it, and for the time being, it is useless to exhort one to remember that the steam-engine is a vast improvement on the bullock cart, that the introduction of railways has greatly benefitted the country economically and socially, and that the bit of coal if left to itself will cease to irritate in course of time. That is precisely the position in politics to-day.

The growth of the national sentiment, the idea that one Indian has more in common with another, however great may be the distance between them geographically, and in religion, language and customs, than with a non-Indian, is, as Seeley perceived many years ago, of itself, without any overt expression, a force antagonistic to foreign domination. The Hindu-Moslem quarrels, the Brahmin-non-Brahmin rivalries, and the depressed classes upheaval, are things which do not affect this central fact. They are capable of adjustment and will be adjusted, but it is impossible to eliminate, in spite of the wireless and aircraft, the five or six thousand miles between Great Britain and India. The political movement is a movement to shift India's political centre of gravity from London to Delhi or some other place in India itself. When it is so visualised, it is easy to see that its success is inevitable. Severance of the British connection is not needed. In Canada, Australia and South Africa, it has not been found necessary, and it is not necessary in India. If the seat of authority in Indian affairs is transferred to India, the Indian political problem will become essentially a social problem, amenable to the methods of social reform. Social reform itself will receive the greatest impetus from the transfer. Indeed, no government of India which is Indian in its outlook and which has to derive not only its revenues but its driving power from the country, can for a day lose sight of its duty to emancipate and elevate the people socially, intellectually and economically. The non-interference which is an inexorable necessity of a foreign rule, will be an intolerable anomaly in a national government. This is not a mere theory. It has proof in experience. The Montagu-Chelmsford reforms, though they did not go far enough, have certainly speeded up social reform. More legislative measures have been introduced during the last eight years than during the previous thirty years. Social reform questions are being more seriously discussed. Men and women are giving thought to questions like the reform of marriage laws, removal of untouchability and invidious caste and communal distinctions. Miss Katherine Mayo, no doubt, claims that this is all due to her "Mother India"! We need not quarrel with her over her claim. The cock thinks that the sun-rise is the direct result of its crowing.

Political emancipation all the world over has ever been the signal for social progress. It has been so in India and will be so. Social reformers, therefore, are intensely concerned to see the country progress rapidly towards self-government. But the methods they prefer are those which they have found successful in the social field. The underlying principle of these methods may be described in the single word "Co-operation". Social reformers from the first opposed the proselytising methods of Christian missionaries, although conversion was often pressed on them as the shortest road to social reform. They have preferred to remain and work within the old systems with which they were in acute antagonism

REGISTRATION OF CASTE MARRIAGES.

(By MR. V. BALASUNDARAM, BANGALORE).

There is a Civil Marriage Act popularly known as Gour's Act. It is Act XXX of 1923 which has been incorporated into Act III of 1872, being an amendment thereof. This Act not only legalises inter-caste marriages between persons who profess the Hindu, Buddhist, Sikh or Jaina religion; but also secures certain privileges to persons who register their marriage under the Act, though such marriage might be between persons of the same caste and is celebrated according to the ordinary Hindu caste rites. It must, however, be noted that one chief condition to be fulfilled for marriage under this Act is that the man must have completed his age of 18 years and the woman her age of 14 years and that neither party must, at the time of marriage, have a husband or wife living.

2. In connection with a recent registered marriage in Bangalore, some doubts were raised as to whether it was really advisable to register Hindu marriages under the said Act, in view of certain provision therein which severed the person marrying under the Act from his joint family, made the Hindu Law of Inheritance inapplicable to his property, took away his right to any religious office as also his right of adoption and empowered his father to adopt another son. It was feared that all these indicated that he is treated as a Non-Hindu and disinherited from his ancestral property. The provisions in the Act, referred to, are the following.—

Section 22. The marriage under this Act of any member of an undivided family shall be deemed to effect his severance from such family.

Section 23. A person who marries under this Act, shall have the same rights and be subject to the same disabilities in regard to any right of succession to any property as a person to whom the Caste Disabilities Removal Act of 1850 applies.

Provided that nothing in this section shall confer on any person any right to any religious office or service, or to the management of any religious or charitable trust.

Section 42. Succession to the property of any person who marries under this Act shall be regulated by the provisions of the Indian Succession Act of 1865.

Section 25. No person who marries under this Act shall have any right of adoption.

Section 26. When a person marries under this Act his father shall, if he has no other son living, have the right to adopt another person as a son under the law to which he is subject.

3. In order to clear the doubts raised, Sir Hari Singh Gour who was responsible for introducing the Act and the Indian Social Reformer of Bombay were addressed, on the subject. Extract from their replies as also from a letter which Mr. S. M. Kaikini, Sub Judge, Haveri, addressed to the Indian Social Reformer, dealing with the points raised, are reproduced here.

(A) GOUR'S REPLY DATED 19TH FEBRUARY 1929.

My Act XXX of 1923 safeguards all the rights that a person has in his property, and moreover preserves to him the right of inheritance, only enlarging his right to the extent provided by section 22; the meaning of which is that "upon the marriage he ipsa facto becomes a separate member of the society and is therefore entitled to his share in the joint family." This clause is inserted to enable him and his wife and his children to enjoy the property as full owner, and section 24 safeguards the rights of his children, because the devolution of his estate is governed by the Indian Succession Act, which does not disqualify a woman because she is a woman from inheritance.

Such a person cannot adopt, because he can make a will in favour of anybody. The sections 25 and 26 are therefore not disabling sections; but sections which place him and his wife and his daughters as regards the enjoyment of his property in the same position as an absolute owner, say an Englishman.

I think I have answered your two queries, and repeat that my Act was intended to keep a Hindu as a Hindu, even after the marriage.

(B) INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER'S REPLY DATED 2ND MAY 1929.

As for the rights which are affected by a marriage under Gour's Act, we think that rights in ancestral property are protected by Section 23. Only rights of religious or semi-religious character, which are expressly indicated in the Act are affected. For instance, it is not clear whether a man marrying under Gour's Act will be competent to perform the funeral obsequies of his parents.

(C) KAIKINI'S LETTER DATED 5TH MARCH 1929.

By (Gour's) Act XXX of 1923 it is the special privilege of Hindus to get their marriages solemnised by registration. * * * Under the Act both the parties to the marriage have to declare affirmatively the religion they profess. So it is sheer nervousness to say that by marrying under that Act a Hindu becomes a Non-Hindu.

Your explanation of Section 23 is correct. The person who marries under this Act does not at all lose his right to inherit his family property. Only on account of Section 22 his position becomes that of a divided member. This means that his share in the family property is settled on that day, and the law of survivorship does not apply to him. That means even without a regular partition his share in the family is fixed and so if he were to die after the marriage his widow would succeed to that share and it would not go and could not be claimed by his coparceners by right of survivorship. Section 22 was enacted to safeguard the interest of the wife by such marriage. I do not think it is necessary to state here that in an undivided family (and this term can be applied only to a Hindu family) on the death of a male his share in the property cannot be inherited by his widow but it goes to the male relatives.

I do not know why Section 24 should create any apprehension.

All these provisions are meant to make the legal status of the parties and their children quite clear.

As regards Section 25 I do not think the bridegroom would care very much for the right of adoption. If his marriage should prove unfruitful, he can will away his property in favour of the person who would have become his adopted son. As regards obsequies and shradda, courts cannot prevent a person from performing these, nor can they compel him to perform them.

As regards Section 26, as the marriage brings about a partition in the family by the adoption of another son by the bridegroom's father, the rights of this bridegroom under joint family are not in the least affected. The adopted son will inherit only to the share of the father.

(D) :GOUR'S SECOND LETTER DATED 8TH MARCH 1929.

(In reply to the query as to how section 25 is not a disabling section when adoption is necessary at least for the purpose of shradda which no Hindu can dispense with).

The right of adoption is an antiquated law which has been abolished in all European countries. It was the law of Rome 2,000 years ago, but, with the establishment of modern ideas, adoption was abolished. If I gave the parties the right of adoption, the old trouble of coercing the wife to adopt would reappear. Parties can either make a will, or make a secular adoption by deed; and they can make a spiritual adoption for the performance of shradda, but such an adoptee would not get a right to inherit the property of his adoptive father as such, independently of a gift or will. The clause against adoption is not a disability at all. It gives the party the right of election and selection wholly beyond the range of Hindu Law.

4. Some of the advantages to be had by registering marriages under Gour's Act have been made clear in the foregoing extracts. One other important advantage is that no bigamy is permitted under the Act (section 16). The only disability is that referred to in the Proviso to Section 23. It is clear from the wording of this clause that it does not absolutely take away the right of a person to any religious office: all that it indicates is that the right of succession to the property given by the section does not ipso facto give a right to any religious office also. The latter right has therefore to be determined by other circumstances. The mere registration of a marriage cannot be considered to be such an untoward act as to forfeit a person's right to any religious office. The only other thing that can be thought of to affect his right to any religious office is his taking a wife who is of a different caste or religion. It may therefore be safely assumed that the disability cannot apply to marriage between persons of the same caste. As regards intercaste marriages, the disability need not be considered as all in case of a person who as a matter of fact has no right to any religious office or to the management of any religious or charitable trust.

5. It is possible that the advantages mentioned may not appeal to a person so far as his individual interest is concerned, but it cannot be denied that it is advisable to get the marriages registered under the Act in the interest of his wife, his daughters or his sisters, whom it would benefit in more than one way. It may be stated here once again that such marriages might be solemnised according to any rite the parties may desire, registration being added thereto.

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XX. WELFARE AGENCIES.

(BY DR. CLIFFORD MANSHARDT, PH.D.).

The organised agencies for social welfare are the conscious attempt of the strong to assist in bearing the burdens of the weak. The men and women who are fortunate enough to live in comfort and security are through these agencies extending their reach, so that their hand of friendship may be grasped by those who are not living in comfort and by those who do not feel secure. The problem of providing bread for hungry, relief for the suffering, care for the handicapped, and work for the unemployed is fast becoming a joint responsibility—a task for the community for the wider social group. More and more the residents of our cities are becoming convinced that the private handing-out of doles is not enough, that relief must be conducted upon a scientific basis, and that a concerted attack must be made upon the causes of poverty.

The Directory of Social Work in Bombay, published in 1926, report about 700 different agencies at work in the City and Island of Bombay. Various kinds of work are being supported, such as orphanages, hospitals, dispensaries, child welfare societies, care of the defectives, relief for widows, sanitary associations, and the like. The list is quite impressive, though it shows considerable overlapping of effort, and not enough of co-operation between the various agencies. Some of the work that is being done is constructive, but a great deal of it is resulting in increasing dependency. The problem confronting welfare agencies is to strike a proper balance between sentimentality and intelligence, so that the organisation is both human and conducted along sound, constructive lines. The idea seems to be prevalent that good intentions and a kindly heart are the only equipment needed by the welfare worker. But to kindness there must also be added knowledge, a high grade of intelligence, and an infinite capacity for hard work.

We are all familiar with the changes wrought by the combination of chemical elements. Social welfare work is a sort of human chemistry. The welfare agency goes to individuals with wrong attitudes towards life and make these attitudes wholesome. It enters homes of disappointment and leaves behind it cheer. It finds out peoples in trouble and gives them new strength. It seeks out the unfortunate and enables them to get a new grip upon life. And at the same time it seeks to change institutions. It knows the tremendous influence of environment, and that colour wash is a poor remedy for a wall that is in need of solid repair. It knows that before social wrongs can be righted, laws and customs must be changed and a new public conscience developed.

Social welfare work has set before itself a well nigh impossible task—appealing because of its complexity. To accomplish its ends it needs the support of every good citizen. The day is past when a few charitably minded citizens can continue to shoulder the burdens that really belong to all of the people. Every man and woman must give something, each in accordance with his [or her] ability. The line separating the average citizen from the dependent may be as narrow as a prolonged illness or the loss of one's position. Whatsoever we would that men would do to us, so let us do to them.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF MISS MAYO.

A Correspondent in the Indian Daily Mail writes:—

The reader will need little imagination to perceive for himself without our specifically stating it the character of the myth that has grown round India in the mind of the West. To put it shortly, the West visualises our country as a festering swamp of multitudinous evils inherited from mediaeval times. Of course, it is also sedulously taught that the pure waters of Western civilisation are clearing a good deal of the swamps; but that is another matter. To the Englishman especially India is little more than a huge, misshapen, triangular pendant to the Empire which his heaven commissioned countrymen like born political lapidaries are busy shaping into a modern Western State. The simple English creed with regard to our country is: "India was a breeding-ground of political, social, moral anarchy. But she was spared further catastrophe by the advent of John Bull in the nick of time. She will suffer again if he departs. It is satisfactory to know that the Englishman is there and all's right with her. God bless him. Amen." That is how the Englishman mentally sums up our history and our present condition and that is what he has taught the other Western countries more or less to believe. Only a few have the acumen to see how the self-advantageous side of the doctrine of trusteeship is turned to account.

SWAMI VIVEKANANDA'S WORK.

But for some time past those sources had begun to be discredited in the Western world, or at least the information emanating from them viewed with circumspection. In other words, their bias has begun to be perceived. Amongst other circumstances, a great historical event first clearly brought it to light. The year 1893 should be remembered by us as the year in which the first blow to the intellectual conceit (I reluctantly use the word for want of a better) of the West was openly delivered. It seems that in that year the Parliament of Religions at Chicago was staged with the ulterior motive of showing up what was confidently believed to be the intrinsic superiority of Christianity to all other religions. But what happened was totally unexpected: for it was Hinduism through its representative Vivekananda that carried the day. One direct consequence of this unlooked-for turn of events was that a breach was effected in the massive wall of myth that had, thanks to the sources pointed out above, so long shut out from the minds of Europe and America correct views about us. The educated classes were startled into the truth about India. One American journal went so far as to declare frankly: "We must stop sending missionaries to this learned nation." (I quote this from memory.) The generality of the people wondered. A wholesale revision of notions about India seemed to be called for. Since Vivekananda's time that breach had gone on widening more or less. Ram Tirath, Tagore, Bose, Gandhi followed—a constellation that would do credit to any country in any age. In them our country found a voice that not only began to spread the truth about her, but delivered a dynamic interpretation of her culture to the West. Whatever may be our shortcomings, we cannot at any rate be charged with having grudged the world what was the best in our thought, culture, and civilisation.

A SAD OMISSION.

But we have failed at one important point. We have not kept up such a continuous literary intercourse with the West as would have led to a complete demolition of the myth. The words of our modern sage and literary men have not yet permeated the lower level of Western society. It needed a body of popular writers to do that. Popular writers have also their use—one of them being the service they render by interpreting the thoughts of intellectual giants in terms suited to homely understanding and so popularising them. It is moreover they who bring the common daily life of the people of one nationality to the door of another. But our popular writers have not yet attempted to obtain the ear of the Western peoples. So, as it is, the westerner has caught a glimmer of the truth about us as reflected from our intellectual peaks; but his ideas about what prevails in the valley below have not substantially changed. That myth still frowns on us in scepticism and distrust.

MISS MAYO STEPS IN.

Well, what has been the result of that omission of ours? Here we come to the central point of our story—the relation of Miss Mayo to the myth. The result has been that Miss Mayo has seized an opportune moment to step into the breach which we have seen first effected by Vivekananda. The movement she chose was one when India had just passed through an acute political phase and, consequently, had drawn towards itself a great deal of the world's attention. It must be acknowledged that she went to work rather cleverly. She began by simulating the careful student and investigator of Indian conditions. She laid claim to personal observation, first-hand knowledge, and an unimpeachable impartiality. She made a skilful parade of documentary authority. She made constant references to the words and dicta of our leaders so as to damn us out of our own mouths. She did everything necessary to gull the West into a belief that through her at last it would have a faithful picture by an unbiased painter and true information from an unimpeachable source. She next proceeded to fish out some fact from our cess-pools and enlarged them to monstrous dimensions. She combined the exaggerations of the old missionaries with platitudes of the British officials and presented such a composite picture of India as the West was accustomed to long before we began the process of replacing it. Whithal she adopted more subtly the method of the now almost extinct type of the missionary, namely that of depriving things of their proper perspective and of overshadowing the truth by exaggerations deftly strung together so as to resemble an array of facts. She dwelt at length precisely on those evils which have been usually associated with India in the Western mind. To all this she superadded the journalist's banality and wove what she called her facts into a picture vivid in its very ugliness. A close analysis of her book cannot fail to reveal the tactics adopted by this American literary swashbuckler.

RE-ESTABLISHING THE OLD MYTH.

In short, she succeeded in recalling to the Western mind the myth which has ever had so strong a hold on it. Especially the memories of that myth have strongly been revived in the Anglo-Saxon; and hence the Anglo-Saxon world seems to have reverted for the time being at least to its former notions about India on the semblance of a confirmation of them by an apparently impartial witness. That explains to me why Mayoism (a term which may be taken to mean the literary rifling of a people's character) had so good a time of it in England and America. We need not wonder that the West in general was taken by surprise by Miss Mayo's picture. "Why," it must have said to itself, "in spite of all talk about Indian religion and spirituality and culture, here is the very picture of India we had so long carried about in our minds. And it has been painted for us at this time of day by a disinterested person. Moreover, it has been based on well authenticated facts which let them deny who can. There is every appearance of truth about it. Lo, after all, we are justified in what we believed India to be." Outcome of this soliloquy: thundering applause for Miss Mayo.

A PRACTICAL SUGGESTION.

Now, if the reader permits, I would like to end with a practical suggestion. It is this: that, as I have hinted before, we must establish literary contact with the West to a sufficient extent at least to render it impossible for Mayoism again to plant its fangs into our character and reputation. Our literary men and publishers need to be a little more enterprising than they have hitherto been. Our growing vernacular literatures can boast of many workers of real literary worth; and I do not see why it should not be feasible to turn out really good translations of them, at least for the most part into English (but, mind you, not into Indian English), and thus render the West familiar with our ordinary habits of life and thought and especially with the truths about our homelife, and not merely with what our sages thought and said centuries ago. It is mainly through the medium of literature that we must try to capture the imagination of the West and proceed to dispel the repugnant myth about ourselves. It is to be remembered that that myth can be a potent political weapon against us. Our young men from colleges and universities need not confine themselves to politics and the legal profession; in the literary field too they have work of international importance at hand to do. Of course, there will be difficulties and difficulties. But we must realise that we are already engaged in a keen struggle for a higher footing among the nations of the world and that on no side are we going to have an easy time of it.

ENGLAND AND INDIA.

One word more before I conclude. Under the peculiar circumstances of England's connection with ourselves, it is not desirable from a political point of view that the people of that country should remain in ignorance of the truth about us. It is a strange thing that, after India being ruled for well-nigh seventy-five years in the name of the British people, the average Englishman's mind as regards a knowledge of it should still be a nearly blank sheet with a few commonplace, mischievous, and out-of-date notions imprinted on it by interested hands. This ignorance on the part of England regarding our country is too obvious a fact to require elaborate proof or demonstration. It is patent even on the face of the numerous articles which English men and women have been provoked to pen in English journals, whether in vindication or in censure of Miss Mayo. Our point however is that such ignorance is a matter for reflection on our part. But as it is its magnitude and its effects seem to be hardly realised amongst us. When India was governed by the Company, there were always the Company's aggrieved enemies to draw the attention of the English nation to its administration in India. It is quite possible that whatever element of real good existed in the "benevolent policy" which the Company professed to adopt towards our country was owing to the spirit of criticism roused against it by the exertions of its foes. There was a sort of moral pressure brought to bear on it by the English people themselves. But with the assumption of the Government of India by the Crown the agency which incited the people of England to exert that moral pressure disappeared. Consequently, England has lapsed into a queer listlessness, ignorance, and complacency about our country which it would be difficult to explain on any other hypothesis. And when we sometimes wistfully contrast this state of things with the spirit of the times which impeached Clive and roused Burke's fury against Hastings we forget that it is precisely the instrumentality of the persons who stimulated that spirit that is lacking today.

Not only that, but England is encouraged in its ignorance and complacency by glib reports and ingenious manipulations of facts and figures—all tending to conclusions that would not be strictly warranted by the facts as they happen to be. Naturally when one version of events occurring here forestalls every other in possessing their ear, people in England are at a loss to understand the real reason for the "agitation" in progress in this country. The result is a needless misunderstanding and bitterness and sullenness on both sides—noticeable in sections of the Indian and the British press alike—which can be removed by correct information and by editors being a little sparing in the flourishes of their pens. After all, there is plenty of good-will in many English men and women; and once they begin to know and understand us, not only will their mental attitude towards us undergo a transformation, but even political relations between us and England begin to assume a new character. The fact, however, is that the instrumentality of the Company's doughty antagonists in stimulating people in England to a sense of duty has never been replaced. In a measure we can replace it: and it is our duty and interest to do it. Here also it must be acknowledged that tremendous difficulties would lie in the way of our efforts to gain the ear of the English people. But are great undertakings to be left unattempted because of initial difficulties?

SOME ASPECTS OF DIVORCE BILL.

A mass meeting of the Baroda ladies was held at the central hall of the Female Training College under the presidentship of Mrs. Samajuba Desai to protest against the new Divorce Bill, now under circulation for public opinion.

Shrimati Shardaben Mehta discussing at length the points arising from the new Bill said that she was no doubt of the opinion that women in Hindu Society did need protection and should have certain privileges that are to-day denied to them. But then it was equally essential that a Bill permitting remedies more dangerous than the disease should either be prevented from being enacted into law or should be so mended as to serve the purpose of such an enactment. She presented a vivid picture of the present condition of women devoid of economic independence. She, therefore, thought that such safe-guard should be vouch-safed in the provisions of the Bill as would prevent the divorced women from falling into a worse condition than one they are in to-day. Messrs. Purohit and Chimanlal Doctor further discussed the Bill and explained the clauses one by one and pointed out their defects.

VARIOUS ASPECTS OF THE BILL.

Mrs. Shardaben Mehta then took up the thread and discussed the Bill in its various aspects. She at first complimented the Government on the latter's acceptance of the principle underlying the Bill, but at the same time asserted that the Bill as it was drafted was very defective and might prove more harmful than beneficial. The present draft left much room for amendments. She persisted that if the Government desired a really beneficial enactment, a fair proportion on the personnel of the Committee to consider the Bill should be granted to women. The Bill, it was maintained, was more or less a progressive, reformatory measure and she therefore maintained that being childless should not be considered sufficient ground for a divorce, she also wanted the clause permitting dissolution of marriage bonds on the plea of Sagotras should be deleted. Men through long ages have by their physical force enacted the ideals of Satiwa and one husband ideal, so that women always bore the burden of subjection. If the wedding bond was a sacred tie, why should it be so only for women? She therefore pressed for a full consideration of the Bill before it was allowed to be placed on the Statute.

DISABILITIES IMPOSED ON WOMEN.

Mrs. Ramabai Kinni further discussed the Bill in doing which she said that provision should be made to annul a marriage if a husband took to another wife in the life-time of the one. If divorces should be made so easy, no husband would prefer to give maintenance to the wife, but would run to get a divorce. Besides a divorce would be doubly cruel if given to a woman whose mental order may be defective. If therefore in the circumstances, necessary safeguards were not provided for, there was every danger of people rushing for divorce decrees on trifling pretexts such as irritation by smokes or annoyance at frequent kissing, as has been wont with the Westerners. She should not be surprised, she said, if a husband in this country petitioned for dissolution of marriage with his wife for her not having observed the baneful purdah. Another point deserving close attention was the question of difficulties for divorced girls to secure matches in a society where there are not men ready to marry even the child widows. She was of opinion that some provision ought to be made to disallow re-marriages in the life-time of one or the other.

Mrs. Jayavati Desai thanked the speakers and also moved a resolution of congratulations to Mrs. Sharda Mehta on her election to the Senate.

OUR MISSION TO THE FAR EAST.

(By Mr. G. Y. CHITNIS.)

We left Rangoon on Tuesday evening and sailed southward to Penang. We did not stop at Penang for a long time and therefore, we had no chance of getting down and having a look at it. On our way back, however, we did get down to see the beautiful town.

The ship stopped at Singapur only for a day but it was enough for looking around and we found that there is a very small Indian community engaged in business; there did not seem to be much intellectual life there and the few associations there are intended more or less for social purposes. In spite of this it is possible that the Brahma Samaj may do a lot in these parts both among the Indians and Malayans, provided we have a proper man and money. There are a few Indians in Singapur who do sympathise with the ideals of the Brahma Samaj and these men will be of immense value if the Brahma Samaj starts mission operations there.

We stopped at Honkong only for a few hours and then we sailed north-east to Kobe. On board our ship there were a number of Japanese who showed a keen interest in the Brahma Samaj and they assured us that we would be given very warm welcome in Japan. These words heartened us a good deal, because after the experience of the Burmans and the people at Singapur, we were continually being haunted by the fear of meeting with like indifference in Japan. In addition to the fact that we were venturing into a country of which we knew very little we were without any resources whatsoever. We had no introductions to any leading men of Japan and we had no idea as to how and where we should proceed. I had, however, a few addresses with me of well-known persons in Japan and I decided to write to them as soon as I reached Kobe. These few days, I passed in very great anxiety and I was afraid that after all our mission would be an utter failure. We had from the beginning counted upon this possibility but when failure began actually to start us in the face we were quite unnerved. It was at this time that I began to feel the unwisdom of organising this mission and many a time I wished we had not undertaken so great and responsible a task as carrying the message of the Brahma Samaj to an unknown people. One can, therefore, imagine the relief we felt when those good Japanese told us that we would be well received in their country. Happily for us, Mr. R. Naito, the Japanese Consul of Rangoon who was returning home from Burmah was also travelling with us. He and his wife were very kind to us and enquired a good deal about the Brahma Samaj. Finally he asked us to call at the Foreign Office in Tokio in case we needed his help in furthering our cause in Japan. We presented him with a number of small books on the Brahma Samaj which he gladly accepted. We also gave a couple of pamphlets to the purser who was particularly kind to us.

We reached Kobe on the 25th September at about 9 in the morning. There were a few Indian friends who had come to receive us at the pier. Mr. Sanzo Misawa, the Secretary of the Bahai Assembly in Kobe to whom I had written from Hongkong had also come to receive us. We put up with Messrs. Pohoomull Brothers to whom Dr. Khandwala had an introduction from Bombay. Many Indian friends came to see us at the Pohoomulls'. Mr. Sanzo Misawa then went to the Y. M. C. A. to arrange for the meeting. On the evening of our arrival we went to the Indian social club started by the Sindhi merchants and there we had an opportunity of talking to a number of friends. Next day, that is on Wednesday, I spoke to the English Speaking Society about the purpose of our visit to Japan. On Thursday we addressed a large meeting at the Y. M. C. A. Hall. Mr. R. Okumura, the General Secretary of the Y. M. C. A. acted as our interpreter. Dr. Khandwala spoke on the History and I spoke on the Message of the Brahma Samaj and afterwards there was a very interesting discussion. A couple of Buddhist priests who were present asked me why it should be necessary to believe in God and whether God was purely transcendental or immanent. After the meeting was over, one elderly gentleman who had been quietly listening to the addresses and the subsequent discussion came to me and introduced himself as one of the priests of the Omoto sect which is one of the important sects in Shinto. His name was Mr. A. Kyoya and was living near the Y. M. C. A. He invited me to his house next evening. As I had no public engagements for the next two days I decided to utilise them in visiting some of the leading persons in Kobe. On Friday evening I went along with Mr. Misawa to the house of Mr. Kyoya. As soon as we entered the house Mrs. Kyoya who is also a priestess of the Omoto sect came forward and knelt down on the carpet almost touching the floor with her head. As I was not accustomed to this form of salutation I did not know whether I was also supposed to kneel down likewise; so I glanced at my Japanese friend; but he simply bowed and went in. We had to take off our shoes as the whole house mostly built of wood was covered with soft and fine mats and every one has to take off the shoes before entering. They gave us soft slippers to wear. The Japanese house is so exquisitely beautiful, neat and clean and the manners of the people so polite that one feels like being in a sanctuary. Their peculiar manner of sitting down also indicates reverence and hospitality. Mrs. Kyoya gave us Japanese tea and some fruit while Mr. Kyoya was telling us something about the Omoto Sect. He could not speak English although he could understand it very well. Mr. Misawa was all the time doing the work of an interpreter. The substance of his talk was that the Omoto sect was the most liberal sect in Shinto and there was a good deal that was common between that sect and the Brahma Samaj. He then invited us to visit their headquarters which were several miles away from Kobe and offered to go there himself to prepare them for our visit. Unfortunately we could not avail ourselves of this kind invitation as the place was a bit out of the way. On Saturday morning we went to see Mr. J. Kawakami, one of the rising lawyers in Kobe and a member of Parliament. He showed a good deal of interest in the Brahma Samaj although he was a Christian. He struck me as being a particularly religious minded man and as he was one of the leaders of the young men in Kobe I was interested to know what his view of Christianity was. He said that he did not believe in traditional Christianity and it was necessary to restate the teaching of Jesus in terms of modern thought. He believed that the teaching of Jesus was intended for the working classes and was never addressed to the rich and propertied classes. He looked upon Jesus as the father of modern socialism although he doubted if Jesus was in a position to grasp all the economic implications of it. Mrs. Kawakami whom I found to be interested in educational and social work is one of the enlightened women of Japan and she edited for some time a magazine for women. On Sunday evening I addressed a large meeting of Indians at the India Club on "Guru Nanak, the precursor of Rammohan Roy". Mr. Das, one of the leading merchants and president of the Club presided over the meeting. Dr. Khandwala also gave a brief address on the purpose of our visit. After the meeting there was a good deal of talk about doing some educational work for Indian boys and girls in Kobe and I said that if the Brahma Samaj decided to start mission operations there the man in charge would of course look to the needs of the Indian community in Japan. Some of the Indian friends were desirous of showing their appreciation of the Brahma Samaj in a more substantial manner and they decided to raise a small sum in aid of the Far Eastern Mission. Mr. S. T. Vyas who took active interest in the matter went about from place to place and collected about 500 yen. The mission is deeply grateful to Mr. Vyas and others who willingly contributed because of the active sympathy they showed towards the Brahma Samaj. The Brahma Samaj has a large mission to fulfil among the Japanese but even if it were to confine its activities to the Indians in Japan, it would be doing a splendid service to India. Our Indian community in Kobe and Yokohama have great claims upon the Brahma Samaj and if the mission is properly organised for Japan its first duty would be to minister to the educational, moral and spiritual needs of the Indian community residing in Japan.

Next morning we left for Yokohama. Before leaving for Yokohama I had paid two or three visits to Osaka to meet some people there; but I was not very successful in the way of organising meetings there as the people were very busy with preparations of the Prince's wedding and the coronation. The Subodha Patrika.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Mrs. Naidu in London:—Mrs. Sarojini Naidu who left America on 27th April arrived in London on 3rd May. Interviewed by Reuter, she reiterated her appreciation of her reception in the United States. She was convinced that frequent friendly interchange of cultural embassies between India and America would result in far-reaching and beneficent international solidarity. Mrs. Naidu, referring to Dr. Tagore, regretted the undue publicity given to his sudden departure from Los Angeles, which she understood was occasioned by the loss of his passport. She expressed the opinion that the emigration officials would not consciously offend one whose name was a house-hold word in America. Anyway she understood his health would not have permitted long stay. Mrs. Naidu will remain in London for a fortnight.

Prevention of Early Marriages:—With a view to discourage the custom of early marriages, the Sukkur Municipality has decided to charge Rs. 2 as extra fees in case of married students under 16 in its secondary schools.

Annamalai College of Music:—The inauguration of Raja Sir Annamalai Chettiar's Music College under the auspices of the Annamalai University took place on Saturday afternoon before a distinguished gathering of Pandits and musicians. Raja Sir Annamalai explained that the object of the institution was to conserve the musical talent in South India. There will be two courses starting with a proficiency course and a diploma course. A specialist's course is to be added later on. The recurring annual expenditure is estimated at Rs. 17,000 and will be shared between himself and the Government. Mr. A. Rangaswami Iyengar M. L. A. on behalf of the board and visitors paid a tribute to the Raja's munificence and advised the Pundits to take to research in music and treat the institution as their alma mater.

Mr. Kabali's Flight:—Mr. P. M. Kabali, the Indian airman who is flying to India on May 25th, says a Reuter's message, was given a reception to-day at the National Liberal Club. There was a distinguished gathering including the Maharanee of Cooh Behar, the Maharaja of Burdwan, Sir Sankaran Nair, Lord Sinha, Sir Dorabjee Tata, Sir Binod Mitter, Sir Umar Hayat Khan, Dr. Paranjpye, and Mr. Rushbrook Williams. Sir Dorabjee Tata and Sir Umar Hayat Khan congratulating Kabali hoped that many other Indians would follow his example. Sir Dorabjee Tata requested Colonel Patterson of the India Office to arrange that Mr. Kabali as his Majesty's first Indian Subject to fly to India should convey messages from His Majesty to the Viceroy. Mrs. Sarojini Naidu will find the name and the Maharanee of Cooh Behar will christen Kabali's machine on May 22 at Croydon. Lord Peel and Winterton, Sir John Simon and Sir A. C. Chatterji sent messages regretting their absence.

Another Indian Aviator:—Mr. J. P. Ganguly, member, Bengal Flying Club, is the first Bengalee to pass all tests for an air certificate. He is leaving for England shortly for training for commercial pilots' license.

NOTES.

The Week-End in Bombay:—The end of the week finds Bombay city the venue of two important gatherings. The All-India Congress Committee began its sittings on Friday with an agenda containing some sensational items. Mahatma Gandhi returned from his Khaddar collection campaign in Andhra on Thursday, and several other congress leaders, including Pandit Motilal Nehru, arrived on the same day. The question which the All-India Congress Committee will debate most warmly is the decision of the Tamil Nadu Congress Committee to permit its members who are members of the Legislative Council to accept office if they find that they could more effectually carry out their programme of work by so doing. This programme, which was adopted at the meeting of the Tamil Nadu Committee at Madura on the 5th instant, consists mostly of subjects of great constructive importance among them being Prohibition and removal of untouchability. Any one who has followed the fortunes of Prohibition in the Provinces will see that the cause, which has a very large amount of support from public opinion behind it, has nevertheless failed to make headway because the Ministers in charge of it have no strong convictions and, being dependent on official support, are afraid of imperilling their position by adopting a vigorous policy to give effect to it. So in the case of removal of untouchability also, a strong Minister with a solid following in the Province, can do much to bring it about in a few years. This also is a reform which is ripe for action, and the policy favoured by the Tamil Nadu Congressmen will make action possible immediately. It may be recalled that the Responsivist Party three years ago, led by Messrs. M. R. Jayakar and N. C. Kelkar, broke away from the Swaraj Party on this very issue. Mr. Srinivasa Iyengar, leader of the Tamil Nadu Congress party, is a man of resolution, and we are assured that he will not be deterred by opposition from other provinces from doing what he thinks is the best in the circumstances of his Province. The All-India Congress Committee is not likely to waste much time over the proposition suggested from the United Provinces laying down that a wholesale revolution of social and political institutions is the only way of saving the country.

The Indian States Peoples' Conference:—

The other important movement which has selected Bombay for its meeting, is the Indian States Peoples' Conference. This is the second Conference, the first having held its sitting last year. Mr. C. Y. Chintamani, the Editor of the Leader of Allahabad and ex-Minister of the United Provinces, presides this time. On the last occasion, the President was Dewan Bahadur Ramachandra Rao. The immediate cause of the creation of the Conference was the appointment at the request of the Chamber of Princes by the Government of India of a Committee, with Sir Harcourt Butler as chairman, to enquire into the complaints of the Princes about the observance of their Treaty rights by the Government of India, and the financial relations between the States and British India. The people of the States felt that they were left out, and the Conference was called in order to emphasise the claim of the subjects to be heard before any settlement is reached about the future of the States in relation to British India. Dewan Bahadur Ramachandra Rao and two other leaders of the movement, Messrs. Chudgar and Abhyankar, were sent to England as a deputation to lay the peoples' case before the Butler Committee. They were not allowed to appear in person before the Committee, but a written memorandum was received of their views. The Butler Committee's Report bears evidence that the point of view of the deputation was prominently present to the Committee in drafting several parts of it. It is unfortunate that the Princes and their people should seem to be pulling different ways on the important issue of the relation of the States to British India. The Princes—the important States of Hyderabad, Mysore, Baroda, Travancore, Cochin and some others have kept aloof from the Chamber group—claim that their relation is personal to the King-Emperor, and should be so defined when the Government of India is made responsible to the Indian Legislature. The people, on the other hand, urge that the social, cultural and economic relations between themselves and the people of British India are so intimate that the future of their States cannot be planned separately from the British India. Though the meetings of the All-India Congress Committee and of the Indian States Peoples' Conference simultaneously in Bombay, has no formal connection, there is likely to be much informal exchange of views between the leaders of the two bodies, and it is not improbable that some common line of action may be adumbrated as the result.

Indian Labour:—In publishing the names of the members of the Commission on Indian Labour the Government communiqué states: "H. E. the Viceroy announced on January 28 at the opening of the Legislative Assembly that His Majesty the King-Emperor had approved of the establishment of a Royal Commission under the Chairmanship of the Rt. Hon. J. H. Whitley to inquire into the conditions of labour in India. His Majesty has now been pleased to constitute the following persons as members of this Commission. Mr. J. H. Whitley (Chairman), The Rt. Hon. V. S. Srinivasa Sastri, Sir Alexander Murray, Sir Ibrahim Rahimtullah, Sir Victor Sassoon, Mr. N. M. Joshi, Mr. A. G. Clow, Mr. G. D. Birla, Mr. John Cliff, Diwan Chamanlal, Miss. Beryl Power and Mr. Kabiruddin Ahmed. The terms of reference are: To inquire into and report on the existing conditions of labour in industrial undertakings and plantations in British India on the health, efficiency and standard of living of workers and on the relations between the employers and employees and make recommendations." The Commission is a strong one and should produce a Report which will be valuable not only for solving the present troubles but also for future guidance. It is however a serious omission that no Indian woman has been appointed on the Commission. The presence of at least one is absolutely necessary in order to enable the Commission to understand the wants and feelings of the large class of women workers in India. The Hartog Committee on Education and the Joshi Committee on the Age of Consent will bear testimony to the valuable help which they have received from Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and Mrs. Brijlal Nehru. There is a rumour that Bai Anusyaben of Ahmedabad who of course would have been the best choice had declined to serve on the Commission. If this is the fact there are others available and we hope Government will still favourably consider our suggestion.

Hindu Law Research Society:—The All-India Hindu Law Research and Reform Association, under whose auspices, a conference was held in Poona, on the 22nd and 23rd instants, was inaugurated, about three years ago by the Mimamsa Vidyalaya of the Shikshana Prasarak Mandali in Poona. The Association has been seeking the co-operation of the Pandits and the Lawyers, the Shastris and the Advocates, and the Nagpur and the Bombay Law Committees, which have been started about six years ago, and have been seeking the opinions and assistance of people well versed in the old Dharma Shastra. And the formation of these Provincial Committees as also the Central Association is largely due to the indefatigable energy and immense self-sacrifice of Mimamsa Shiromani Baman Shastri Kinjavadekar. The Central Association had enlisted the sympathy of the Legal world in this Presidency and other parts of India. At a Conference of Maharashtra Lawyers held at Poona on May 4, 1928 the delegates adopted a resolution approving of the aims and objects of the Association and requesting "all the pleaders in Maharashtra to render all possible help to the association for the furtherance of its objects." One of the important personages, taking interest in the work of the Association is Jagadguru Shri Shankaracharya (Dr. Kurtakoti). In the course of a message Dr. Kurtakoti says: "It would be a truism to observe that our fore-fathers directed their actions in such a way as to render them fully capable of adaptation to the changing conditions and stand the modern tests of progress. To circumscribe their actions or expose them to misrepresentation, as has been done in the past, would be suicidal to the progress of our culture. The Association examined six Bills presented by Mr. D. W. Kathalay of Nagpur and as amended some of them were sponsored by Mr. N. C. Kelkar in the Legislative Assembly. A Bill for validating certain adoptions has also been circulated and the principle embodied therein has received the unanimous support of the Bar Association Poona, and nobody so far has expressed his dissentient voice with regard to it. The trend of all the Bills is to bring the rules of Hindu Law into accord with the requirements of the Modern Hindu Society, in a manner which will preserve their spirit and sanctity, but at the same time to adapt the same to the changing conditions of life. They are not intended to make any violent innovations or to shake the foundations of Hindu Culture and sentiment but only to liberalise the same so as to accord to the Hindu Men and Women their proper place in the Modern Hindu society. This is the beginning which the Central Association has made towards the realisation of its object.

Buddha Jayanti:—The anniversary of the thrice sacred day of the birth, enlightenment and death of the Lord Buddha was celebrated by the Buddha Society on Thursday last under the presidentship of Prof. Vaswani of Karachi. The Buddha Society, during the seven years of its existence has done much to stimulate interest in Buddhism and the life of its Great Founder. Among the manifold activities of the Society may be mentioned the fortnightly classes on Buddhism, study classes for the promotion of Pali literature, public lectures and distribution of free leaflets bearing on the Life and teachings of the Lord Buddha. Besides maintaining a well-equipped library of Buddhist literature, the Society conducts a journal and has opened a book-stall. Thanks to the munificence of Dr. Nair, the president of the Society, the Sakyamuni Vihara of Bombay will be soon completed. The Society has issued an appeal for a sum of Rs. 10,000, which is needed for the maintenance of the Vihar. In view of the solid work done by the Society for the revival of Buddhism in this part of India, the public should come forward and accord a liberal support to so worthy a cause.

Immediate Remedy Needed:—As the result of a gruesome incident, the Poona city is keenly alive to-day to the horrors of cremation before life is extinct and steps have been suggested to prevent any such occurrence in the future. Thursday papers contained an account of how a little girl who was taken for dead, regained consciousness when on the funeral pyre and narrowly escaped cremation while still alive. The City Municipality requires the registration of deaths before cremation but there is no law enjoining compulsory medical examination of those reported dead. This aspect of the matter, we learn, will be taken up by the Municipality at an early date. Everything human should be done to prevent persons from being burnt alive through ignorance. But precautionary measures, such as those mentioned above, may not be of any avail in those rare cases of trance which closely resemble death and which baffle even the medical expert.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, MAY 25, 1929.

RESEARCH AND REFORM.

Since the inauguration of the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms enlarging and increasing the powers of the Indian and Provincial Legislatures, several Bills have been introduced dealing with social questions. The raising of "the age of consent", the discouragement of child marriages by fixing a minimum marriage age for boys and girls, the removal of restrictions on inter-caste and inter-communal marriages, the reform of the law of succession, the abolition of the institution of devadasis, and the suppression of brothels, have been sought to be advanced by legislation. This, incidentally, is proof if proof were needed of how political progress directly stimulates social progress. Some of the Bills have been introduced in the Provincial Councils but, the majority have been introduced in the Indian Legislature. In the case of some of the Bills, it has been evident that sufficient thought had not been bestowed on the aims sought to be achieved and the methods by which they are sought to be achieved. Mr. Sarada's Marriage Bill is a good instance. The Bill as at first drafted proposed to make null and void all marriages performed before the minimum age which was fixed lower than the average age at which marriages actually take place in many parts of the country. It was completely recast in Select Committee, making child marriages not void but punishable, and had to be re-circulated for opinion. Dr. Gour's Bill about Divorce is an instance of another type. There is no widespread demand for such a total innovation in the Hindu Law, and the sentiment even among advanced social reformers is not very clearly defined in favour of divorce as the best or only way of remedying unhappy marriages.

The necessity in all such cases of revision by a central body of representative men and women before a Bill is introduced in the Legislature is evident. The Hindu Law Research and Reform Association of Poona which held its first Conference this week under the presidentship of the Hon. Mr. Justice J. D. Madgavkar of the Bombay High Court, is intended to supply the want. It has succeeded in establishing branch Associations in several Provinces and has been sympathetically received all over the country. The necessity of coupling research with reform among its objects, is due to the fact that Hindu society is a living organism unlike the societies for which the laws of Solon and the Twelve Tables were promulgated. If research shows that certain reforms are merely revivals of an order of things which was sanctioned by Hindu law-givers but which has been misunderstood or misinterpreted by the British Indian Courts, the opposition to them will be conciliated to a very considerable degree. Many earnest and thoughtful Hindus believe with Dr. Kurtkoti, who sent an inspiring message to the Conference, that the spirit of the Hindu Law is entirely consonant with the adoption from time to time of necessary reforms according to the needs and conditions of society. The highest Hindu ideal does not stop short at the brotherhood of man: it proclaims the solidarity of the human race through the interpenetrating godhead. The practical application of this ideal to the problems of life, is a complete and final solution for them all. The Indian economist, social reformer, legislator and politician, does not need any other key. It could not but have been the intention of Indian thinkers to work out the application of this ideal in every phase of national life, as time and opportunity favoured. The work was a long one needing much time and perfect freedom from distraction and interruption, which unfortunately India has not had for a thousand years. The time is now propitious for taking up the thread where it was broken.

Mr. Justice Madgavkar's address without going into details laid down the broad lines on which social legislation and social reform, should be undertaken. He feels keenly that Hindu society suffers from self-inflicted evils to a larger extent than any other community in the world, and is passionately anxious that it should break its bonds and develop to the full height of its capacity. One of the causes which keep back progress is the unsatisfactory condition of the Hindu Law as administered by the Courts. As a Judge, Mr. Justice Madgavkar could not criticise judicial decisions out of Court individually or collectively. He declared, however, that there was wide-spread dissatisfaction with the administration of Hindu Law, and that its result was hardly open to doubt. The need for improvement was almost universally felt, but there is no practical unanimity as to the directions which it should take. The President laid down two broad propositions which should be observed by all reformers, legal, social or political. We quote them in his own admirable words: "It is only when we find that the social structure has so altered that the existing law results in considerable hardship not contemplated by ancient principles and legislators, and that the proposed reform will result in improvement—it is only on these conditions that we can set our hands to a change. Before we approve of any change or reform we must be satisfied not only that the proposed change will effect the particular object aimed at but that it will not indirectly affect some other point which we do not wish to touch." These two sentences accurately define the method of progress by evolution without the disconcerting reactions of attempts at revolution.

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XXI. SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

(By Dr. Clifford Manshardt, Ph. D.)

In the enlisted personnel of the army and navy there is found a representative cross section of the youth of the nation. The idea that the service man is by the nature of his occupation unprincipled and dissolute is a pernicious one that should be hit hard. The service man is little better or worse than the young man outside of the service, and certain it is that he is confronted by more severe temptations. Every trickster, gangster, dissolute man, or dissolute woman regards the man in uniform as his or her fair prey. A mature man can meet this opposition; but a youth, often separated from the influence of home and friends, has a hard fight on his hands. The wonder is not the number of boys who succumb, but the number who manage to overcome temptation.

It is quite true that very few soldiers and sailors are conventionally religious, but the enlisted man has a code of his own that brings out the finest qualities. The virtues of honesty, generosity, loyalty, selflessness, sincerity, and justice are prized and nurtured. In very few other social groups is there found the comradeship that is found in the service. The love that causes a man "to lay down his life for his friends," is much more than a theory—it is being demonstrated again and again in actual practice. As men live together day after day under the most intimate circumstances the artificial drops away, and the man stands revealed as he is. It is upon such a foundation of truth that the structure of friendship is builded, and with truth as its basis the building endures.

The problem of the service man in a foreign land is a most difficult one. Despite the honest efforts of both civil and military authorities to prevent friction, there is always an undercurrent of dissatisfaction. The soldier is living among people of different customs, different standard of living, and different social attitudes. He finds it difficult to make the adjustment, and the citizen finds it difficult to become adjusted to him. But the attempt must be made, and if honest effort is exerted upon both sides the result is sure to be worthwhile.

In our emphasis upon the army and navy as agencies of war, we often tend to minimize their importance as agencies of peace. In times of national calamity, such as the destruction occasioned by earthquakes, winds, floods, fire, or the violence of man towards man, the service man is immediately at hand, acting as a minister of mercy, with no thought of personal safety or of comfort. No matter how arduous the task, or how it may be fraught with danger, he never questions. True to tradition he does his duty, and true to his name: he serves.

AN UNMERITED CRITICISM.

The Editor, the Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In your issue of April 6th is an article on the Presidential address of Mrs. Uma Nehru at the U. P. Provincial Social Conference. At first sight her pronouncements appear very powerful, but on consideration and as you ably point out, it is seen how unsound are the speaker's sweeping assertions, and how they "involve many fallacies". Want of historical knowledge, and deficiency of sound judgement has led to these mistakes.

But while satisfactorily refuting the speaker's charges against the workers for Social Reform in India, you leave Western civilization undefended against her equally unfounded implications.

Mrs. Nehru warns the women of India that if they decide on adopting Western culture they must "suppress religion and all that it stands for", and that "the ideal of economic success is the golden law of life".

Apparently she does not know that Western civilization as distinct from the Roman and Greek, is founded upon Religion. With the spread of Christianity over Europe, the Church of Christ imposed an entirely new ideal upon the community. "To seek and save that which is lost", care of the sick, weak and helpless, brotherhood of man, equality of man and woman and other divine principles though not peculiar to Christianity have not, it may be asserted without fear of contradiction, been carried out in the form of practical service to the same extent in other creeds.

Striving for economic success and higher standards of life certainly loom very large in the West, but may appear more materialistic than they really are. When pure materialism obtains it should be regarded as an aberration from the true principles of modern civilization. The implications of Mrs. Nehru could be only quite fairly applied to Communism.

This unwarrantable aspersion on the "character" of Western civilization has roused up much indignity among the readers of Mrs. Nehru's address over here.

April 30. }Yours faithfully,
I. J. PITT.

HINDU LAW REFORM.

The following is the full text of the Presidential Address delivered by the Hon'ble Mr. Justice Madgavkar, at the Conference of the All-India Hindu Law Research and Reform Association at Poona on 22nd May 1929:—

"Gentlemen,—It is with unaffected diffidence that I have accepted the honour of presiding at this Conference. The health of Sir Mahadev Chaudhary compelled him a month ago to resign the chairmanship. The invitations for the Conference were already launched and the preliminary arrangements made. Sympathising as I did with the objects of the Association, I felt it impossible to refuse the invitation to step into the breach even at short notice and notwithstanding the fact that I cannot consider myself worthy to rank among the workers, whether of Research or of Reform. One other name I might be permitted to mention: the late Sir Lallubhai Shah. Owing to the pressure of his judicial duties in the High Court he did not think himself justified in accepting the Chairmanship. But he hoped and promised to take an active interest in the Association on his retirement. Unhappily, as in the case of some of his predecessors, he was cut off in the fullness of his faculties. Not merely this Association but the whole Hindu community has sustained an irreparable loss by the premature death of a very noble soul, whose modest simplicity to those who knew him but enhanced the the sterling worth within.

It is not open to a Judge to criticise judicial decisions individually or generally. But that there is wide-spread dissatisfaction with the administration of Hindu law and its results is hardly open to doubt. Bills have been introduced both in the Supreme Legislature and in the Local Councils. Questions of codification and of a Supreme Court in India have been mooted. But along with this and other signs of dissatisfaction, the absence of practical unanimity as to alterations is equally noticeable. The Hindu community would appear to stand in need of a lead and of education in the necessary reforms. And it is this lead and this education, which, if I may say so in all humility, can best be given by an Association such as this combining research with reform, containing both Shastris the products of our old scholarship and Hindu lawyers the products of the new education, combining a theoretical knowledge of Hindu Law with practical experience of its working.

WORK ACTUALLY DONE BY THE ASSOCIATION.

Successfully to discharge this duty it behoves us to take stock of the work actually done and of the work which lies before us and consider the ways and means best suited to achieve our end. Like the Mimansa Vidyalaya, this Association is greatly indebted to Waman Shastri Kinjavdekar. He has visited Calcutta, Nagpur, and Bombay, and Provincial Associations have been formed there. He has also brought out since the Association started "Shaberbhashya" in continuation of his other publications. Our energetic Secretary, Mr. Bhonde and Mr. Kathalay have brought out a bill on Hindu Women's right and Mr. Kathalay of Nagpur has drafted six other Bills. All these drafts however were made by these gentlemen in their personal capacity and are under circulation by the Association. They are the expressions of their individual opinion. Speaking for myself, I think, standing in this place, that I serve the Association best, by giving vent not to my own individual views as to the character and extent of the reform in Hindu Law for which, in my opinion, the time is ripe, but rather by confining myself to elucidating, our general position and offering a few suggestions on the most practical lines of work. None of us, I feel sure, desires that the Association should belong to the category of bodies with high-sounding titles, so noisome for the most part, awakening perhaps once a year to give vent to ideals and pious aspirations, only to resume their slumbers for another year.

AMPLE ROOM FOR RESEARCH.

As regards research, besides Wamanrao Shastri Kinjavdekar, the only two workers at the Bar on this side of India known to me are Mr. Gharpure and Mr. Kane. There is a large field for research still unexplored. There is ample room for workers, whether scholars or lawyers, who have the necessary enthusiasm and leisure. And we have in view a Quarterly Magazine to encourage such workers. The question of reform is more thorny—so thorny that one Provincial Association prefers to drop the word altogether. The difficulty of the question is, however, a reason not to shirk it but to face the reality manfully, seeking for solution in a spirit of humility and service in all patience and earnestness.

SELF INFLICTED EVILS OF HINDU SOCIETY.

There are several questions which the Sphinx the day poses to every thinking Hindu. Does the strength of a community depend on its total numbers alone and on the numbers of its castes or do quality, discipline, scientific and accurate thought and organization count for more? Does the strength of a religion lie in the multitude of its gods and the extent of its mythological lore or rather in its simplicity and its appeal to love faith and charity to all mankind and its practical working in life and Society? Is the excellence of a Code to be judged by the number, complexity and minuteness of its laws and their admixture with ritual and theology and the subtlety and number of its text books and commentaries or rather by simplicity, elasticity within the measure of well defined principles, adaptation to existing social facts and their influence in raising the social standard? We all deplore the lack of progress—it might even be called degeneration—from which we have been suffering from centuries. An orthodox Hindu Statesman, Sir T. Madhavrao, opined half a century ago that there was no society which suffered so much from self-inflicted evils as Hindu Society. The causes are patent: extreme conservatism, lack of perspective, reluctance to face realities, attempts to work round difficulties by metaphysical casuistry and legal subtleties, inability to adapt ourselves to altered environment, stubborn pride in the past with insufficient thought of present and future—all these, most of us are agreed, are the root causes. It is this which causes a large number of us to shirk the work of reform. And it is not merely from the Shastris and Pandits but too often those least versed in our ancient laws that the outcry proceeds of sacrilege and of religion in danger whenever any proposal of reform is mooted.

What is to be our reply to this attitude? The answer is in my opinion plain. If the wisest legislators in any country were to be asked to-day to frame laws which would be suited to the conditions of their country centuries hence, an attempt at compliance would be thought only one degree more rash than the request itself. The unbending conservative attitude of worship of our ancient legislators reflects not credit upon them so much as discredit upon ourselves. Reverence is one thing, blind worship is quite another. To the lawyer at least it should be plain that the laws of Manu are neither more nor less sacrosanct than the laws of Solon or the twelve Tables. Justinian, Gaius, Blackstone, and Coke are names which command reverence and not only in their own times and countries. But that is not to say that their words are for all time the last word in legislation, however society might alter. The Fascists have restored the Pandects.

NEED OF CHANGES IN THE EXISTING LAWS.

In true reverence to our ancient legislators we yield to none. We appreciate the heavy antiquity of our society, its laws and institutions; and while we are not opposed to reform for change as such neither are we revolutionaries anxious for a change for its own sake, or unless it is a change for the better. It is therefore that we couple reform with research. We welcome all the light possible on the principles of our ancient legislation and its varying applications in different provinces and to different castes. And we can also point out the changes which, even in ancient times, are to be found in legislation. It is only when we find that the social structure has so altered that the existing law results in consistent hardship not contemplated by ancient principles and legislators and that the proposed reform will result in improvement—it is only on these conditions that we can set our hands to a change. In short, we recognise that the Hindus are no longer the isolated community they were in those ancient times and that now even Hindu Society is not static but dynamic. Like other societies it must in course of time come forward or lag behind. We desire that it should progress. If we find our laws crystallising and favouring those institutions which have decayed and which prevent progress, we conceive it our duty to strive to alter them in the right direction. As to the rate of progress, opinions may reasonably differ. As to the direction there need be no serious difference of opinion.

THE JOINT FAMILY SYSTEM.

The Joint family system for instance patriarchal family to be found in ancient Rome, Greece and other countries. It assumes several basic factors; a simple state of society, in the main agricultural, with enough spare land available for the increase in the family and for it to throw off-shoots by emigration, a strong tie of family affection in all and particularly reverence and obedience towards the head, women with the exception perhaps of the woman at the head accepting throughout her life a subordinate position, content to live and develop entirely within the sphere of family. Most if not all these factors are tending to disappear, particularly in the large towns. As far as my observations go, both in this and in other Provinces, the circumstances, economic and psychological, which made for the stability of the joint family tend to disappear. The institution is in the melting pot and tends to dissolve. And yet the laws still applied are those enunciated centuries ago. In a poor country such as India, where the standard of life is simple, there may still be cases of near relatives such as brothers and their families whom it suits best to live together even when their father has passed away. Living together voluntarily, though one need not, is one thing. Living together because one must though one would rather not and because of the legal difficulty of separation, is quite another. The process of dissolution of the caste system is similarly a noticeable phenomenon. Its negative aspects are seen in controversies such as Brahmin non-Brahmin questions and the claims of the so-called depressed classes and untouchables. Its possible aspects are seen in the desire and the necessity to enlarge the circles of marriage and the cry for nationality. I do not propose further to enlarge on a topic somewhat controversial and political. But it serves to show that ancient legislation should only stand so long as the sentiment which is the force and the structure which is the body of particular institution in Hindu society which is implicitly assumed are alive no longer.

NEED FOR FUNDS AND MEN.

Even therefore in the field of research and still more in the field of reform, our work is still to do. That work cannot be done without the necessary money and the necessary men. It will not be done merely by annual conferences or by the exercise of individual ingenuity in drafting Bills. The difficulties are enormous. The vast majority of Hindus are illiterate and conservative. The masses and the women and to a large extent even the commercial classes dread reforms. The Government is not directly concerned in encouraging them, its declared policy is one of neutrality. Nevertheless, the flowing tide is with us. We are realising that unless we reform ourselves, our institutions, and to some extent our laws, we shall degenerate still further and shall perish, even though all the while we lay to ourselves the flattering unctious that we are the most spiritual people on earth, while in reality we prove ourselves amongst the weakest and least fitted to survive in the struggle of nations. We seek reform not because we will but because we must. I have said enough I hope to show that while we realise the necessity for reform we do not under-rate the difficulties of the task before us. Without further loss of time we must equip ourselves to carry on the work before us. The Association must set its own house in order.

So far the work of the Association has been carried on by the 'Shikshan Prasarak Mandali' and the 'Mimansa Vidyalaya' at their own expense. It is now time for the Association to stand on its own legs. Our Society can be registered, proper unimpeachable Trustees appointed, funds collected, and accounts audited. They and then only can we appeal to the public for assistance.

NO CAUSE FOR PESSIMISM.

In regard to membership, I would submit again that quality is more important than quantity. It is a point for our consideration whether election should not be left to a Committee. But with all this it is vain to expect startling or quick results. Within a Presidency, language and even laws, vary. The process of change takes time and we must be prepared for opposition, misrepresentations and abuse. We must be careful to keep our heads, never to retort and above all, to avoid offending Hindu susceptibilities. Before we approve of any change or reform we must be satisfied not only that the proposed change will effect the particular object aimed at but also that it will not indirectly affect some other point which we do not wish to touch. Provided we do all this and provided we work not for the sake of mere publicity but in a spirit of disinterested disciplined service and reasonable compromise, content occasionally to accept half a loaf, I see no cause for pessimism. With us research and reform go together. Shastris, lawyers, and laymen—we welcome them all. There are Hindu States with a large Hindu population where reform is easier than with us. In Portuguese India, as far I know, the old Hindu law in its entirety is not applicable to Hindus. The working of such reforms and such laws is a valuable guide to action outside. We have, to encourage us, examples of communities such as our friends the Parsis to show how a community can with advantage adapt itself and its laws to altered circumstances. And last but not least, as I have already said; the flowing tide is with us.

I hope, I have not committed you or the Association to any particular line of action on any particular point. The question which we should take up first must be a matter for deliberation, and I refrain therefore from indicating any particular points, whether the rights of a widow or a widowed daughter-in-law, the pious obligation of the sons to pay the father's debts, the power of a coparcener to alienate his share, or other points which will readily suggest themselves to you. I trust that nothing which has fallen from me has hurt the susceptibilities of any Hindu, present or absent; if it has, I will ask him to accept my excuses and my assurance that nothing was further from my thought. It is possible, I hope to be proud in the right sense of being a Hindu and to revere our ancestors and ancient laws and institutions without concealing from ourselves our present position or desiring to remain stationary. I have sufficient confidence in the good sense of the community to think, that conducted in the right spirit and on the right lines, the Association will win it over to its side and its work and obtain, if not now, then in the long run, recognition from Hindus that our only aim is disinterested service to Hindus and to India.

LIBERATE THE WOMAN.

In reply to a letter from Dr. :Muthulakshmi Reddi, Mahatma Gandhi writes in Young India :—

Dr. S. Muthulakshmi Reddi, the well-known social worker of Madras, has written a long letter based on one of my Andhra speeches from which I take the following interesting extract :

"Your observations on the urgent need for reforms and for a healthy change in the daily habits of our people, during your journey from Bezwada to Guntur, have appealed to me very much indeed.

"I may humbly submit that I as a medical woman fully concur with you. But will you kindly permit me to say that if education is really going to bring in its train social reform, better sanitation, and improved public health, it is going to achieve this result only through the education of our women?

"Under the present social system, don't you think that very few women are given sufficient opportunities for education, full development of body and mind, and self-expression?

"Don't you think that their very individuality is being recklessly crushed under the burden of customs and conventions?

"Does not early marriage strike at the root of all development—physical, intellectual, and even spiritual?

"Do not the pangs of child-wives and child-mothers, and the unmitigated sorrows of our widows and deserted wives demand an immediate remedy?

"Is the Hindu society justified in tolerating or conniving at a custom that in the name of religion condemns innocent young girls to a life of degradation and vice?

"Don't you think that as the result of social tyranny, Indian women, with a few exceptions, have lost the spirit of strength and courage, the power of independent thinking and initiative, which actuated the women of ancient India, such as Maitreyi, Gargi, and Savitri, and even to-day actuate a large number of our own women belonging to the liberal creeds like the Brahma Samaj, Arya Samaj, Theosophy, which is only Hinduism freed of all its meaningless customs, rites and rituals?

"Should not the members of the Nationalist Party, we mean the Congress, burn with a desire and enthusiasm to find an immediate remedy for all these social evils, the source of our national weakness and the cause of our present degradation, or at least educate the masses to liberate their women from the servile bondage to which they are subject that they may develop to their full physical, mental moral and spiritual height, so that they may set an example of courage and wisdom, and above all that they may as wives and mothers rightly and truly fulfil the sacred task of training, guiding, and forming the daily habits and character of the future administrators of India?

If the members of the Congress believe that freedom is the birth-right of every nation and individual, and if they are determined to achieve that at any cost, should they not first liberate their women from the evil customs and conventions that restrict their all-round healthy growth, which remedy lies in their own hands?

"Our poets, saints, and sages have sung in the same tune. Swami Vivekananda has said, 'That country and that nation which do not respect women, have never become great, nor will ever be in future. The principal reason why your race is so much degraded is that you had no respect for these living images of Shakti. If you do not raise the women who are the living embodiments of the Divine Mother, don't think that you have any other way to rise.'

"The late Subramanya Bharati, the gifted Tamil poet, has echoed the same idea.

"So would you kindly in your tour advise our men to follow the right and the surest way to attain freedom?"

Dr. Muthulakshmi has a perfect right to expect Congressmen to shoulder this responsibility. Many Congressmen are doing great work in this direction individually as also corporately. The root of the evil however lies far deeper than would appear on superficial observation. It is not the education merely of women that is at fault. It is the whole of our educational system that is rotten. Again it is not this custom or that which needs condemnation, it is the inertia which refuses to move even in the face of an admitted evil that needs to be removed. And lastly the condemnation is true only of the middle class, the town dwellers, i.e., barely 15 per cent. of the vast millions of India. The masses living in the villages have no child marriage, no prohibition against widow remarriage. It is true that they have other evils which impede their growth. Inertia is common to both. What is however necessary is to overhaul the educational system and to devise one in terms of the masses. No system will be even passable that does not lay stress on adult education equally with that of children. Moreover no system will touch even the fringe of the question that does not give the vernaculars their natural place of supremacy. This work can only be done through the existing educated class such as it is. Before therefore reform on a large scale takes place, the mentality of the educated class has to undergo transformation. And may I suggest to Dr. Muthulakshmi that the few educated women we have in India will have to descend from their western heights and come down to India's plains. Men are undoubtedly to blame for their neglect, may their ill use of women, and they have to do adequate penance, but those women who have shed superstition and have become conscious of the wrong have to do the constructive work of reform. This question of liberation of women, liberation of India, removal of untouchability, amelioration of the economic condition of the masses and the like resolve themselves into penetration into the villages, reconstruction or rather reformation of the village life.

PROHIBITION PROPAGANDA FOR MADRAS.

Under the Caption "Preaching to Drunkards" the Champion writes:—

Four lakhs of rupees drawn out of the public revenues of this presidency are proposed to be spent this year under the direction and supervision of the Government for conducting a propaganda against the liquor habit of the people. This unique enterprise of the Government or the Excise Minister has been condemned by the real prohibitionists and temperance workers as a sheer waste of public funds. Several non-official members of the legislative council denounced this proposal during the budget. They pointed out that the propaganda would be quite useless in the absence of definite action towards reducing or exterminating the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. The Government have no proposal or intention of abolishing the demoralising trade. They have budgetted for the usual crores of income from this evil source and they have no fear of a fall in this revenue. After making this assurance, they have set apart four lakhs for preaching against drink. This expenditure is a trifle as against the estimated revenue from drink. Will this propaganda convince any body that the Government are desirous of abolishing the liquor traffic? Will this half-hearted campaign add to the prestige of the Government? It is of course, in strict accordance with the time honoured policy of attempting to reduce the drink habit without reducing the drink revenue. It is an improper and insincere measure because it is not a straightforward campaign against the universally condemned evil of alcohol. The proposed propaganda is only a practical illustration of the policy of providing facilities for those who want liquor, on the one side, and offering advice to drunkards on the other side to desist from drinking. Drunkards will surely be attracted by the drink offered by Government contractors rather than by the lectures and leaflets offered by Government propagandists. There is a good deal of criticism about the methods and persons proposed to be employed for propaganda. This is going to be a new opening for patronage and favouritism. The Government have held a conference and discussed and formulated a scheme to utilise the four lakhs of rupees. They have devised a sort of organisation impressing the aid of local boards and municipalities. A central advisory board is to be created, lectures and pamphlets are to be prepared on a "type design" and distributed by propagandists. The local bodies have been consulted as to the amounts they are capable of spending and the means they are likely to adopt for anti-liquor propaganda. These bodies have given a variety of incomprehensible answers and suggestions. Now comes the report that the Ministry would give a high-sounding name to the proposed board such as "Advisory Board Against Alcoholism". The public are too enlightened to be fooled by this or another name attached to a sham. Everybody knows that no amount of preaching and pamphleteering can cure drunkenness. The only efficacious cure is Prohibition, the total suppression of the trade in harmful liquor. If the Government is not prepared to adopt this remedy, it is well to say so and stop the waste of four lakhs. We all know that prohibition will entail the total loss of the six crores of rupees a year derived from alcohol trade in this presidency by the Government, and that Government cannot carry on unless an equally large revenue can be derived from another source or unless the public expenditure is cut down by six crores. Both these ways are considered impossible but at the same time it is deemed expedient to make a show that the Ministry dislikes alcohol and is going to discourage drink. The elections are coming and the electorates are known to hate alcoholism and to agree with the congress in demanding prohibition. The Ministers have been often criticised for their failure in bringing prohibition within a conceivable future. They have worked out the council's agreed resolution for extinguishing the liquor trade in twenty years. They have tried all sorts of spectacular and futile tactics. The four lakhs propaganda will not improve their position of prospects, but will make them unpopular for the big waste.

DR. PARANJAPPE'S TRIBUTES TO LATE MR. BALAK RAM.

Dr. R. P. Paranjapye, of the India Council, writes in the "Times".

Balak Ram was born in Jullundhur, Punjab, on April 21, 1876, and was educated at the Punjab and Cambridge Universities. He was a Government of India scholar and went up to St. John's College in 1897, and graduated as fourth wrangler in 1900. He had passed the open competition for the Indian Civil Service the year before, and was posted to Bombay. After serving for some years as an assistant collector at various places, he spent three years in the Finance Department of the Government of India as an assistant and Deputy Accountant General. On going back to the province he was taken into the Judicial Department, and served as a Judge in many Districts where his sound legal knowledge and fairness and courtesy to the public and the Bar made him highly respected by all. Three years ago he was selected for the important post of the Remembrancer for Legal Affairs and Secretary in the Legal Department and was in consequence also a member of the Bombay Legislative Council where he was referred to on all legal and constitutional questions. Two weeks ago I received a letter from him in which he said he had just made his last speech—his "swan song" as he called it—on his being appointed to act in the High Court. It is very likely he would have been permanently appointed to it very soon. His death is a great loss both to the Service and to the people.

But besides his work in the Civil Service, Balak Ram was keenly interested in all intellectual pursuits. His especial interest was in mathematics and he was a founder and an ex-president of the Indian Mathematical Society, and also a member of the London Mathematical Society and he had contributed several papers to the "Journal" of the former. While he was on leave in Europe last year he was always thinking of a problem mentioned in the recently published collected works of Ramanujan by Professor Hardy—namely numbers which can be represented in two different ways as the sum of two cubes and 1,729 being the smallest of these numbers. Balak Ram devised a method for finding more of these numbers, and had actually calculated all possible numbers of this kind below 20,000,000. To me who was his dearest friend and more than a brother, his loss is overpowering, as we shared our inmost thoughts for 32 years.

DIAMOND AND CHARCOAL.

"Who would have thought that lamp-black and char-coal have exactly the same magnetic behaviour as diamond and quite different from graphite? And yet that is the definite conclusion at which I have arrived at as a result of further studies of the magnetic behaviour of organic crystals," said Dr. C. V. Raman, F. R. S., to a representative of "Free Press."

In a brief article which has just appeared in the well-known weekly "Nature," Prof. Raman has announced some striking discoveries concerning the magnetism of carbon and its compounds made recently in his laboratory. A century of labour of the organic chemists had provided the science with hundreds of thousands of beautifully crystallizable solids which are compounds of carbon with various other elements such as hydrogen, oxygen, nitrogen and so forth. It had long been known that every compound of carbon is a diamagnetic, in other words, that when it is taken near the pole of a strong magnet, it is acted upon by a feeble repulsive force. The study of these forces and of the relationships between them and the chemical nature of the compound forms part of the important science of magneto-chemistry. Remarkably enough, however, the rich field of research which offers itself in the magnetic behaviour of crystals of organic compounds remained strongly neglected, till with the help of delicate instruments specially designed for the work, the subject was taken up in Prof. Raman's laboratory. The remarkable fact emerged that the repulsive force exerted on the organic crystal depends to a notable extent, not only on the position of the crystal with respect to the pole of the magnet, but also on what particular face of the crystal is turned towards the pole. With naphthalene crystals for example. Some faces are found to be repelled three or four times more strongly than others. This is a very general type of behaviour observed with what are known as the aromatic class of carbon compounds. That it is an experimental discovery which must profoundly influence the development of our idea regarding the structure of molecules generally and of carbon compounds in particular. The evidence already to hand suggests also that the study of the magnetic behaviour will prove a powerful aid to the understanding of the architecture of crystals.

DIAMOND AND CHARCOAL.

Another highly interesting problem which the study of magnetic behaviour appears to solve definitely is that of the nature of the different forms of the element carbon. Diamond and graphite are the two crystalline forms of carbon and differ profoundly in their magnetic behaviour. Ordinary lamp-black or char-coal is usually considered as being in its structure closely analogous to graphite. It is very remarkable, therefore, to find that lamp-black and char-coal have identically the same magnetic behaviour as diamond and are quite different from graphite in this respect. This very surprising fact definitely disproves the supposed identity in ultimate structure of char-coal and suggests rather that char-coal is a special form of carbon wholly lacking in crystalline structure. It is the raw material from which either diamond or graphite might emerge as the result of crystallisation under suitable conditions.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Opening of the Kasheli Bridge:—The Director of Information has sent us the following for publication:—Motorists will be glad to learn that the Kasheli Bridges across the two arms of the Bassein Creek are now open to vehicular traffic, the roadway and approaches having been completed and thrown open early this month. These bridges were constructed by the Bombay Municipal Corporation primarily to carry the Tansa water mains over the creek. As a bridge at this point to carry the Bombay Agra Road was an urgent necessity it was decided that a roadway should be provided over the bridge at the cost of Government and that Government should construct the necessary approaches. The total cost of the work amounted to over Rs. 64 lakhs, of which Government contributed Rs. 16.89 lakhs, i. e., Rs. 13 lakhs as the share for the roadway over the bridges and the island which separates them, plus Rs. 3.89 lakhs, the cost of the approaches. The completion of this connecting link on the Bombay Agra Road avoids the long detour via Shil and Kalyan which was formerly necessary and shortens the distance between Bombay and Nasik by about 13 miles.

Servants of Hindu Society:—Dr. Moonje, addressing the Marawari community last night, explained his scheme of an All India organisation called the Servants of Hindu Society whose members will be paid life workers in the cause of the Hindu Mahasabha. He said they would be paid up to a maximum of Rs. 150 per month and that their lives would be insured for Rs. 5000. A committee has been formed to collect subscriptions for Lala Lajpatrai Memorial Fund. A committee has been formed to collect subscriptions for Lala Lajpatrai Memorial Fund. A sum of about Rs. 500 was subscribed on the spot.

An Unequal Marriage:—An Air Mail message from London to the Times says:—Mr. Darrell, a seventy-year-old land-owner, of Hillfield House, Dartmouth, and Miss Dorothy Yabsley, aged fifteen and a half, a kitchenmaid, of Gara Bridge, have been married at Kings-bridge, South Devon. The bridegroom has been married twice previously and has six children.

International Scout Jamboree:—A contingent of 86 Boy Scouts from Bombay and other cities and districts in the Presidency sailed from Ballard Pier for England by the S. S. City of Lahore, on Wednesday afternoon under the leadership of Mr. Venkateswaran, the Provincial Scout Secretary, to take part in the International Jamboree at Arrow Park, Birkenhead on July 31. Over 30,000 scouts from all parts of the world will gather at the place and the Jamboree will continue till August 13. The wharf presented an animated scene prior to the departure of the ship. The parents and guardians of the scouts and a large concourse of spectators thronged the pier, garlanded the scouts and gave them a hearty and enthusiastic send-off. The contingent in their uniform waved their hats in glee as the ship left the harbour.

The Late Lord Rosebery:—The death occurred on May 21st, of Lord Rosebery, the veteran statesman and former Prime Minister. Lord Rosebery celebrated his his eighty-second birthday earlier this month. For a quarter of a century during Queen Victoria's reign, Lord Rosebery was a dazzling figure in British politics and in 1894 succeeded Gladstone as Liberal Prime Minister, after holding many Government offices, including the Foreign Secretaryship during Gladstone's administration. During the last twenty years he emerged only occasionally from private life, but on such occasions his pronouncements carried great weight. He was a distinguished man of letters and probably the most brilliant orator of his day. He always took intense interest in sport and was the only Prime Minister who won the Derby during his term of office. Lord Rosebery is succeeded by his son, Lord Dalmeny, a soldier and sportsman.

Kanya Mahavidyalaya Jullundur:—Shrimati Shanno Devi, the Head Mistress of the Jullundur Kanya Mahavidyalaya, who has taken a vow not to enter the premises of the institution, until she has collected Rs. 1 lakh for it, is now touring the Punjab at the head of a deputation which consists of Shrimati Indra Devi, and Pandit Sri Ram a member of the Managing Committee. Among the chief places to be visited are Jhelum, Mirpur, Pind Dadan Khan, Pindi Baha-ud-Din and Rawalpindi. The response to the appeal of the lady, who has been striving energetically to fulfil her vow as quickly as possible, has been quite encouraging. The collections made so far amount to Rs. 40,600 approximately. After finishing her Punjab tour, Shrimati Shanno Devi proposes to proceed to Burma. It is to be hoped that her vow will well nigh be fulfilled in this Province upon which the claim of the Vidyalaya is undoubtedly the greatest.

NOTES.

► The Afghan ex-King in Bombay:—The sudden appearance of ex-King Amanullah Khan with Queen Souriya and other relatives and friends at Chaman in British territory at the end of last week, put an end to further speculation about the results of his attempt to regain the throne. From Chaman the party left by special train for Bombay where they arrived on Monday afternoon. At several stations on the way there were demonstrations of sympathy from both Hindus and Mussalmans. In Bombay, the Police kept the platform and the approaches to the Railway station clear, but large crowds gathered along the route to the Taj Mahal Hotel where the party is staying, and gave it a hearty welcome which was evidently appreciated. Queen Souriya is expecting to be confined very shortly, and it is understood that, as soon after as convenient, Amanullah Khan and his family will go to Italy where they intend at present to settle down. There is no other instance in history of a King having deliberately sacrificed a hard-won sovereignty to his zeal for social reform. The reforms which aroused the Mullas' opposition most and enabled them to inflame the mob against King Amanullah were especially the ones which aimed at the emancipation and elevation of women. This is evident from the fact that almost the first thing Bacha-I-Sakao, the leader of the revolt, did on assuming power, was to close down the girls' schools which Amanullah had opened, recall the girls who had been sent to Europe for professional education, and to enforce the purdah by strict penalties. For the time being, the reactionary forces have gained the upper hand, but this is only a passing phase, and the day is not far-off when the liberal ideas which Amanullah has sown in Afghan soil, will take root and overshadow the narrow sectarianism of the priests and the masses who are led by them. Among the great names in the history of men and women who have braved suffering for great ideas Amanullah and his Queen have gained a secure place. Long after Bacha-I-Sakao is forgotten, they will be remembered foremost among the makers of modern Afghanistan.

Education and Purdah:—Mr. Mirza Ali Mahommed Khan who was nominated Vice-Chancellor of the Bombay University recently, dwelt at length, in his presidential address to the Poona District Muslim Educational Conference, referring to the ignorance and illiteracy of Muslim women, cited the part played by the women of the West during the last war and concluded that the country in which the women were backward could not hope to have any future. So far so good. But he dismissed lightly the "two serious difficulties", the "purdah" and "want of qualified teachers" as if they were not "serious". Mr. Khan is of opinion that the difficulty presented by the purdah in education has been successfully overcome by the Zenana schools. The baneful effects of the purdah on the health and educational progress of women cannot be over-emphasised. Instead of adopting a virile attitude towards this blight on womanhood and advocating its total abolition, Mr. Khan would fain have education to adapt itself to the needs of the purdah. Those of us who know something of the education imparted in Zenana schools will not hesitate to say that the term "Zenana" is alone adequate to describe the work done in them without the redundant "schools". They are just Zenanas and not schools. With such slender equipment how can any progress in women's education be expected? If all the talk about the education and training of women for service is not mere cant, if men are earnest about their progress, let them forthwith initiate a campaign against the purdah. They need entertain no misgiving that their women will oppose it. The spirit of Queen Souriya, we have reason to state, animates every woman who is only too anxious to give the purdah a decent burial.

The States People's Conference:—The All-India States People's Conference met on Saturday and Sunday last under the presidentship of Mr. C. Y. Chintamani in the Royal Opera House. Strictly speaking, it was not an All-India body as the three South Indian States, Mysore, Travancore and Cochin, were not represented in it. The Chairman of the Reception Committee, Mr. Abhyankar, in his address excluded these three states specifically from the charge of autocratic rule which he applied to the States generally. These States owing to the constitutional form impressed upon them by able Dewans, have a separate civil list and a well-defined judicial system, and are in other respects modelled on the plan of British India, with the Services completely Indianised from top to bottom. These States, moreover, did not join the group which was represented by Sir Leslie Scott before the Butler Committee. Baroda belongs to this category. The majority of the delegates were from the Kathiawar States, owing no doubt to their proximity to Bombay. The Southern Maratha States were also represented, Mr. Abhyankar himself hailing from Sangli. So far as can be judged by outside observation, the greatest discontent prevails among the subjects of the Kathiawar States and the States bordering on them. Mr. Chintamani's address was a frank, sincere and straight-forward pronouncement and was actuated by a genuine solicitude for the well-being and prosperity of the Princes and the peoples of the States. He cherishes a deep regard for the States as the sole remaining monuments of indigenous government, and for the Princes, as a class, he has a similar sentiment. For some of them whom he has personally known he has the highest respect and admiration. His criticisms and suggestions, therefore, were inspired by a real concern for the States, and will, we trust, be received and acted upon as the counsels of a sincere friend. Mr. Chintamani's criticisms of the Butler Committee's report was searching and at places even forced. The Committee's report, to our mind, is neither so revolutionary nor so reactionary as the President seemed to think.

The Congress Situation:—The National Congress is the oldest and best known political organisation in the country, and it has a hold on the masses which no other party has. By adopting non-co-operation as its guiding principle nine years ago, it cut itself off from its past tradition. It was soon found that it was impossible to maintain the non-co-operation policy in its full strength, and the Swaraj Party favouring entry into the Legislative Councils got the upper hand, and took control of the Congress. The policy of consistent and continuous obstruction, which was to have been followed by Swarajist members in the Legislative Councils, was tacitly given up as unworkable after a short trial. The passing of the 'Independence' resolution at the Madras Congress in 1927 introduced a fresh complication and at Calcutta last year the leaders were forced to declare that they would range themselves on the side of 'Independence' if they were not assured of Dominion status within this year. This is not all. The Congress is further troubled by the growth of a party in favour of revolutionary action in all fields in preference to the reform method, and this party was able to carry practically without opposition a resolution at the All-India Congress Committee meeting declaring that it is necessary to make revolutionary changes in the present economic and social structure of society and to remove inequalities. The means suggested were provision of a living wage for every worker, taxing heavily all unearned incomes, the supply of adequate land to the peasants and their protection from the interference of all middlemen. Mr. Sri Prakesh who moved this resolution said that he could not understand why the Congress should not declare that under Swaraj everyone born in India would be happy. For his part, he said, if no such guarantee was given to the large mass of India's teeming millions there was no use of talking about mass organisation. The Hon. Ramdas Pantulu moved the omission of the last clause which, he said, was in the nature of a tall order. After two divisions which resulted in a tie, the President, Pandit Motilal Nehru having declined to give his casting vote, a third division showed a majority of two in favour of the amendment. The resolution recommending revolution without any specific provisions was carried with acclamation. No one who watched the proceedings of the Committee could have failed to note the conflict of ideas and emotions which precludes for the time being any estimate of the ultimate course of the Congress.

The All-India Congress Committee:—The All-India Congress Committee meeting to which we referred last week ended rather tamely after the expectations raised by the decision of the Tamil Nadu Congress Committee in favour of accepting office by Congress members of the Madras Legislative Council if they should find themselves in a majority at the next election. This question was not brought up before the Committee. The spokesman of the Tamil Nadu delegates made a statement to the effect that the decision of his Committee had ceased to be of immediate importance owing to the extension of the term of the Legislative Assembly by the Viceroy, which meant similar action by the Governors of Provinces including Madras. The Tamil Nadu resolution was passed in the expectation that a dissolution would take place in September, but as this was not likely now, there was no need for the All-India Committee to consider the question. Mr. Satyamurti made no secret of the fact that the strong opposition which had manifested itself to the Tamil Nadu "revolt", since the resolution to accept office was published, was an important consideration which induced him and his friends to drop the question. There was not the least chance of the All-India Congress Committee endorsing the Tamil Nadu resolution, and Mr. Satyamurti no doubt felt it unwise to create a split in the Congress over this point. It is clear, however, that there is a strong feeling which is found to grow, in favour of discarding the barren tactics of non-co-operation, and that sooner or later the Congress will have to face the question raised by the Tamil Nadu Committee's decision. The introduction of an element of responsibility in the Central Government as a part of the constitutional reforms which have to be decided in the course of next year, will force this question to the front and it will be practically beyond the power of the Congress to stick to its self-denying ordinance.

Married Students and Universities:—The Punjab University has invited the opinion of the high schools in that province as to the desirability of excluding married students under the age of eighteen from the Matriculation and School Leaving Certificate examinations. The Bombay Chronicle disapproves of this decision but suggests that scholarships may be withheld from early-married students. We are unable to follow the line of reasoning by which the Chronicle arrives at the conclusion that public scholarships could be withheld from students who have married early. Here too the argument that the boys are the dupes of their parents applies and we fail to see how scholarships could be awarded on any ground other than merit. The fact is this is not a question for the University which can only strive to impart more liberal ideas to its students. The wisest course for Universities is to adopt the suggestion of forming leagues against too early marriages and leave the task of penalising the victims of such marriages to the Government which is the proper authority to deal with the problem.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, JUNE 1, 1929.

SOCIAL REFORM AND LABOUR.

In a message to the National Social Conference held at Amritsar in 1919, Sir Narayan Chandavarkar, who was unable to attend the Conference, sent an important message in the course of which he said: "We have arrived at that stage in the line of our progress when we are able to perceive most clearly than ever that social reform is the whole of which the political, the industrial, the educational etc., are but parts and that these parts are interactive and interdependent. In Europe and America when they speak of social reconstruction now, they mean all the categories of national life. The time has come for us, social reformers and workers to enlarge the meaning and scope of social reform and extend our activity and outlook to such questions as the education of the masses, the sanitation of the country, the housing of the poor, the care of the weak and the feeble, the employment of labour on rational lines, the provision of healthy recreation and amusements for the masses, village sanitation and rural education, instead of confining social reform as we have hitherto confined it to female education, widow remarriage, removal of caste restrictions and such other items."

The full text of the message is reprinted elsewhere. It is ten years since this message was endorsed by a resolution of the Conference, but little has been done to give effect to it. The Social Conference resolutions and addresses continue to be very much on the old lines dealing with questions relating to marriage, caste and other institutions mostly belonging to Hindu Society. It is high time that a step forward was taken on the lines recommended by Sir Narayan Chandavarkar and approved by the Social Conference. A beginning should be made at the forthcoming Social Conference to be held at Lahore next December. Let Lahore inaugurate what was decided upon at Amritsar ten years ago.

There were several causes which led to the concentration of social reform on women's grievances. To begin with these were most pressing, as the hardships involved were both the harshest and most vividly present to the consciousness of the reformers. Sati and enforced widowhood, child marriages with the disastrous consequences of premature parentage, illiteracy and ignorance of women, were matters which came most readily home to the reformers. In fact, they paralysed action and obstructed the free flow of ideas. The struggle was correspondingly hard and bitter, but we may now say that it has ended in victory for reform. The opposition has broken down, and it is now only a question of facilities for the reforms to form part of the normal social life. Meanwhile, we have coming forward an increasing number of educated and public-spirited women to plead their own cause. The opposition of women which used to be a real obstacle to social progress no longer exists. This phase of social reform has thus passed and the stage is set for further progress.

Another reason why labour questions did not find place in the programme of Indian social reform so long, is that there can be no labour question in a social and economic system based on status. Even in Great Britain where labour problems first appeared, they did not exist so long as agriculture was the main industry. We have been reading an extremely interesting book recently published entitled "The British Workman, Past and Present", by the Rev. M. C. F. Morris, by the Oxford University Press, which gives an insight into the nature and conditions of the daily life and work of the agricultural labourer about the middle of the last century in East Yorkshire. Mr. Morris thus describes the ideas of Mr. William Blades, a nonagenarian who has been an agricultural labourer the larger part of his long life, and from whose reminiscences the author has largely drawn. "I once asked Blades", he writes "what his opinion was of Trade Unions. His reply was given without hesitation. 'I think' he said 'they are a perfect nuisance to the world'. It is impossible to conceive of a man like William Blades ever becoming a member of a Trade Union. He could never have brought himself to submit to their rules and restrictions. He would wish to be free to work any number of hours a day he liked, and to make what bargains he thought fit with those who wished to employ him." (p.p. 107 and 108). Trade Unions and the labour movement generally, are the product of the factory system. In India, the system was introduced half a century after Great Britain, and until the beginning of the present century, it was confined to the textile industry in Bombay and Calcutta. Within the last thirty years, factories have increased and the Labour problem has been partly forced to the forefront.

Trade Unions in Great Britain and some other countries of Europe, have become powerful organisations able to control politics and legislation. In India, they are still very much in the adolescent, not to say infant, stage. Caste and communal sentiments largely preponderate in the workers' minds, and qualify the economic motive which has become the principal and dominant motive for work in the West. Furthermore, many of the leaders of Indian Labour are not labourers themselves and they are more influenced by abstract ideas imported from Europe than by the actual felt needs and possibilities of conditions in this country. The recent textile strike in Bombay which has collapsed ignominiously, is a proof of the irresponsible way in which the workers are led in Bombay. Instead of being as it should be the last resource not to be used until all others had been tried and failed, the strike is being used as the sole weapon in all disputes great and small, with the result that except the loss to the workers and the industry, there is nothing appreciable to show as gain on account of them.

In the circumstances, it is necessary that the problems of Labour should be studied as problems of social reform and that a body of well-digested ideas should be created and popularised as to the best way of solving them.

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XXII. PEACEMAKERS.

(By. DR. CLIFFORD MANSHARDT, PH. D.)

The dreamer, the man who lives in an ideal future, must always bear the reproach of his more practical neighbours. "A warless world? It is absurd. Men have fought, and they always will fight. You can't change human nature." But the dreamer persists. "Because a thing has been, it need not always continue to be. Mankind in the course of its evolution has outgrown many things previously regarded as fixed. Slavery, dueling, blood revenge, and other evils have been banished and war will likewise go." The dreamer too is a student of human nature. He recognizes that man has an innate tendency towards combativeness, but he also knows that instinctive tendencies can be directed. There is no reason at all why the "fighting tendency" cannot be used for peace as well as for war. The killing of disease germs is certainly no less heroic than the killing of one's fellow men. The attack upon the strongholds of vice calls for just as much heroism as the attack upon the strongholds of an enemy. The campaign to make a city a more sanitary place to live in is certainly more appealing than the effort to destroy a city. The assault upon ignorance calls for a higher type of intelligence than the conduct of any battle. Perhaps men will always fight, but the peacemaker asks that they will turn their fighting into constructive channels.

A question that continually arises in a discussion of the problem of war is the question as to whether the same standards of judgment can be applied to a nation as to an individual. Can a nation follow the principle of the golden rule in its dealings with another nation? Can a nation forgive national insult and injury as the individual forgives? The idealist believes that she can. He regards the principle of brotherhood as equally applicable to the individual or to the group. He believes that the recognition of this principle is the only basis for an enduring peace. Men fight because they fear. Brothers do not fear each other. Men fight because they misunderstand. Brothers understand each other. Men fight to gain advantages over one another. Brothers help each other. Men fight because they do not know each other. Brothers know each other intimately. There is no type of international difficulty that cannot be resolved by the application of mutual trust and friendliness. When a nation sets her face in the direction of brotherhood, she causes even her enemies to be at peace with her.

The ordinary citizen is often led to wonder regarding his part in the world peace enterprise. He feels that the movement is something abstract and apart from him. And yet, if men are to live peaceably with one another, where better can they begin than in the local community. Certain it is that there can never be world peace before there is peace in the smaller social groups. Is not the time at hand for a searching of hearts, for each individual to be fully aware of just what he or she is doing to hasten the day. In the words of an old teacher: "If it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men."

SCOPE AND EXTENT OF INDIAN SOCIAL CONFERENCE.

The following is the message of Sir Narayan Chandavarkar to the Indian National Social Conference held at Amritsar on 28th December 1919:—

It is a matter to me of the deepest regret and disappointment that owing to illness in my family I am unable to attend the session of the Indian National Social Conference at Amritsar, which, in kind response to so many, you and other ardent social reformers of the Punjab, have at such short notice and in the midst of Punjab's sufferings, organized. For that prompt and patriotic action you all deserve the warmest acknowledgement of all earnest lovers and servants of the Motherland. You deserve them all the more because the Social Conference at Amritsar this year will be held at an epoch-making period in the history of this ancient and living land of ours. A new era, throbbing with the aspirations of a higher life of union and achievement, is dawning upon us or has already dawned. Of the many signs of that new life none is more marked than the spirit of patriotism and nationality, and of service to the Motherland and sacrifice in her cause which have more or less diffused themselves among all classes and communities. If it is easy to exaggerate the extent and character of that diffusion, it is just as easy to ignore and underestimate them. Whatever, the extent or character, there is an awakened conscience and there is an awakened consciousness of higher life in the country. It is true that conscience and that consciousness have during the last few years, when they have made their voice heard before the world more forcibly than ever before, been almost wholly political in their outlook and activity so much so as to give one the impression that we have in India thrust back social reform and deified instead the political. But the social reform movements and agitations during the last 100 years in India will show that with the growth of years and under the stress of a variety of circumstances both kinds of reform, have been thinning the partition wall which divided them, and seeking to coalesce and absorb each other. Not to go further back than the last five years, witness how Indian politics of these years have caught the social reformers' views and pleaded for women's emancipation and the untouchable's elevation. The fact is after nearly a century of political and social work, begun by our first political and social reformer, Raja Ram Mohan Roy, after varied experiences, diverse struggles, painful controversies and some sufferings, we have arrived at that stage in the line of our progress when we are able to perceive most clearly than ever that social reform is the whole of which the political, the industrial, the educational etc., are but parts and that these parts are interactive and interdependent. In Europe and America when they speak of social reconstruction now, they mean all the categories of national life. The time has come for us, social reformers and workers to enlarge the meaning and scope of social reform and extend our activity and outlook to such questions as the education of the masses, the sanitation of the country, the housing of the poor, the care of the sick and the feeble, the employment of labour on rational lines, the provision of healthy recreation and amusements for the masses, village sanitation and rural education, instead of confining social reform as we have hitherto confined it to female education, widow remarriage, removal of caste restrictions and such other items.

By so enlarging this Conference and the scope of social reform, we shall not be trenching upon the sphere of political bodies or purely industrial and economic organisation or sanitary institutions, provided we adhere faithfully to and keep prominently before our minds' eye the distinguishing aim of this Conference, which is to touch, purify, elevate, and invigorate the political, industrial and municipal life of the country by developing its domestic and social forces, which are the feeders and makers of that life. It is said we live in times of democracy, when the age calls for equality of opportunity for all, high and low, rich and poor. Democracy is more a social, than a political force and must find, to be healthy, its life, first in our home life and social life to make our political and industrial life wholesome. That is the call of the times to us from the spirit of the Age and may the Social Conference meeting under your blessed auspices help the spirit by a hearty response for the inauguration of the New Era.

HINDU-MUSLIM MARRIAGES.

Mr. Rafiuddin Ahmed, writes in the Hindu:—

The law governing a marriage between a Mahomedan male and a Hindu female is beyond discussion. It is valid neither under Hindu nor Mahomedan Law. In Mahomedan Law, especially amongst the Sunni Mussalmans, it is described as an invalid marriage. The expression 'invalid' is there used as a term of art to describe the resulting consequences as different from those which follow marriages which are either valid or void. Amongst other things the main result flowing from an invalid marriage is that children born during the existence of the marriage are legitimate and inherit to their parents, though as between the spouses there are no mutual rights of inheritance. They will inherit to each other if the non-Mahomedan wife happens to be a Kitabia which a Hindu woman is not. To escape this disability two violent methods may be adopted. Either the wife should embrace Islam before the marriage, or, the husband should abjure his religion and take advantage of the provisions of the Civil Marriage Act. Then, in one case, the personal law of the Mussalmans and in the other the Statute law confers validity upon the union.

THE PLACE OF MARRIAGE—AS A DECIDING FACTOR.

Supposing the parties are reluctant to disown the creeds of their forefathers but still desire to obtain validity for their marriage. It will be of topical interest to examine the validity of a marriage which in pursuance of such desire is gone through by the parties in a place outside British India, say, for example, in Pondicherry. For simplifying the problem it may be assumed that the marriage by observance of certain formalities obtaining at Pondicherry is valid under the French Colonial Law. It may be also assumed that the parties are the permanent residents of British India and contemplate British India as the place of their matrimonial domicile. It may be further assumed that the question of the validity of such a marriage arises not in a French Colonial Court, where different considerations may arise, but in a British Indian Court which administers Hindu and Mahomedan Laws as matters of justice, equity, and good conscience.

The bare question which thus survives the assumptions is whether a marriage between British Indian subjects, which is invalid there, assumes any higher status by reason of its having been effected in a foreign country whose law sanctions the alliance. The first principle of private international law confronting one who examines the position is that a foreign marriage which is valid according to the law of the country where it is celebrated is good everywhere. That is a very old principle arrived at and observed by the comity of civilized nations with a view to remove an important institution like matrimonial status outside the conflict of municipal laws.

On the principle thus baldly stated it may appear that the marriage under consideration will be held to be valid even by the British Indian Courts by virtue of some ceremony which the parties have undergone under the French Colonial Law. At first sight this result may also appear to be confirmed by reason of the decisions of the English Courts in Chetti vs. Chetti (1909 P. 67), R. vs. Superintendent, Registrar of Marriages, Hammer-smith, Ex parte Mir Anwaruddin (1917. I. K. B. 634) and R. vs. Nagulb (1917, I. K. B. 359). But it should be noted that in the second of these cases no question of the validity of the previous English marriage ever arose, in all of them one of the parties, viz., the wife, was a person of English domicile. Lord Reading, whilst reviewing the first case and dealing with the second, brought out the feature common to both of them by stating, "He chose voluntarily to enter into it in England according to English Law with a woman domiciled here." It is on that ground that the invulnerability of the English marriage was upheld. In the case under discussion, Pondicherry is nobody's domicile, the parties return back to British India which is their permanent residence and they have no more to do with French than with Portuguese India.

LIMITATIONS TO THE ABOVE PRINCIPLE.

What then are the limitations of the principle above stated? A distinction is made in law between what are called the essentials of a contract of marriage and the formalities required by law to be observed at the time of a marriage. The law governing the one is not always the same governing the other. While the forms of entering into the contract of marriage are regulated by the lex loci contractus, i.e., the law of the country in which it is celebrated, the essentials of the contract depend upon the lex domicilii, i.e., the law of the country in which the parties are domiciled at the time of the marriage and in which the matrimonial residence is contemplated. The leading case which drew this distinction and laid down the law (a unanimous decision of Lord Campbell, Lord Chancellor, Cranworth, St. Leonards and Wensleydale) is Brook vs. Brook (1861, 9. H. L. C. 193). In that case an English widower and the sister of his deceased English wife, both domiciled English subjects who contemplated England as their place of matrimonial residence went over to the Duchy of Holstein in the Kingdom of Denmark and got themselves married there to avoid the brand of incestuousness attending upon such a union under the law prevailing in England. Such a marriage was valid under the law in force in Denmark. The question of its validity subsequently arose in English Courts. The learned Lord Chancellor laid down the law by stating: "If the contract of marriage is such, in essentials, as to be contrary to the law of the country of domicile, and it is declared void by that law, it is to be regarded as void in the country of domicile, though not contrary to the law of the country in which it was celebrated."

He further went on to observe that "it is quite obvious that no civilised State can allow its domiciled subject or citizens, by making a temporary visit to a foreign country, to enter into a contract to be performed in the place of domicile if the contract is forbidden by the law of the place of domicile as contrary to religion or morality or to any of its fundamental institutions." In view of these dicta of such high authority the law may be taken to be that the incubus of invalidity imposed upon such a marriage by Mahomedan law is not got over by the parties taking a trip to some station outside British India.

It may be contended that the supremacy given to Lex loci domicilii when the question arises between two Europeans will not be upheld when the parties involved are Asiatics. A qualified support was also given to this proposition by Lord Watson in the case of Skinner vs. Skinner (25 I. A., 34), where he stated that, "in the case of spouses resident in India, their personal status, and what is frequently termed the status of the marriage, is not solely dependent upon domicile, but involves the element of religious creed." But even on that basis the marriage under examination will not fare better, for the other considerations joined to the element of domicile is only the element of religious creed which unhesitatingly brands the union as invalid.

BUDDHA JAYANTI.

A public meeting of the citizens of Bombay was held at the Blavatsky Lodge on Thursday evening to celebrate Lord Buddha's Jayanti. Mr. T. L. Vaswani presided. Mr. K. Natarajan, in requesting Mr. Vaswani to preside over the occasion, observed that Mr. Vaswani was eminently fitted to preside over the celebration, who, by his teachings and writings, had earned the esteem and admiration of Indians, especially the youths. Although over 2,500 years had elapsed since the death of Lord Buddha his teachings had still a new meaning and significance to the modern world, and he had no doubt that his teachings would be the key to the solution of the many problems of the day. Sir Lalubhai Samaldas said that the Buddha Society could not have made a better selection in the choice of the president of the meeting than Sadhu Vaswani. The Secretary of the Society then gave a brief account of the Society.

PRESIDENT'S SPEECH.

Mr. Vaswani, in a lucid and eloquent speech, made a clear exposition of the teachings and philosophy of Lord Buddha. He had not come there as a "Sadhu" but as a pilgrim, and wanderer going about from place to place from town to town seeking knowledge and truth. He wished to continue his observations, more to the youthful section of the audience in whose hands lay the shaping of the future eternity of the country. The speaker was irresistibly reminded of his visit to Buddha Gaya some years back, and gave a vivid account of the place. It was beneath the holy tree at Gaya that the Great Lord had his "vision, wisdom and light". Lord Buddha was, he said, a great discoverer whose laws were greater than Newton's law of gravity, whose theories were superior to Einstein's theory of relativity. His discoveries had made him a seer. Buddha, according to him, was eminently a poet of life. Shakespeare, Byron and Shelly, the three great English poets, were in his opinion, poets of passion, while Buddha was essentially a poet of compassion. He was one of the supreme poets of humanity, with a world figure and that Buddhism was a world movement which initiated a great renaissance, a movement of culture and reconstruction. Buddhism was, he said, a world civilising force, and that civilisation was not like the modern civilisation, which the speaker characterised as "brutalisation" and "baptised barbarism". A true civilisation, he remarked, stood firstly for a sense of values and secondly a preference of the higher to the lower value. Mr. Vaswani then gave a brief history of the rise and development of Buddhism, how it spread to Ceylon, Burma, China and Japan.

The criticism that Buddhism was a religion of pessimism, was, he said, groundless. The influence of Buddhism could be traced even in Greece and America. Its influence was discernible even in men like Lessing, Edwin and Tolstoy. Buddhism had profoundly affected the religious thought of the whole world. Buddha's teachings had influenced Hinduism as well and Vaishnavism was its result. It had its effects on art and literature too. Concluding the President asked the youths to work for freedom, and freedom, he said, was the spirit of fellowship with humanity for the service of the fettered and the fallen.

The following resolution was then passed:— That this meeting of the citizens of Bombay urges upon the Government of India and the local Governments to take steps to declare the Buddha Day as a public holiday and further resolves that the President of the Society be authorised to open correspondence in the matter.

IS THERE A DEAD-SET AGAINST HINDUISM?

The Indian Social Reformer in its recent number had an article entitled "The Dead-set against Hinduism" which begins in the following way:—

"It is impossible not to observe that at the present time a massed attack on Hinduism is being carried out. For about a century Christian Missionaries have sought to undermine it with all the resources of the political prestige of belonging to the ruling race and the material resources and organization of the West. At the first onset they achieved some noteworthy results among the higher castes. But this provoked a strong reaction led, of all men, by Raja Ram Mohun Roy, the founder of the Brahma Samaj, and a sincere and devoted admirer of the personality and teachings of Jesus Christ....."

The article goes on to say :

"Since the beginning of the present century, a new school of missionaries have given up the method of frontal attack on Hinduism as defeating its own purpose. Instead it professed to see a great deal of spiritual aspiration in Hinduism which, however, could be realised only through Christianity. This school had a certain vogue for a time owing to its appearance of impartiality, but it has now spent itself. We seem now to have come back to the first phase of the attack on Hinduism.. .."

The kind and volume of literature which is produced against Hinduism, is proof that the writers represent a fear in the heart of Western Civilisation or Christianity—that its existence is a challenge to the supremacy of the latter. Orthodox Hindus who blindly cling to old worn-out customs offer a ready target to these assaults. But Hinduism is no more caste, child marriage and untouchability than Christianity is the shambles of Chicago or of Northern France during the late War. Hinduism existed before these evils and will outlast them, because it has its roots in truths which live for ever. A thoughtful American writer, Savel Zimand, the author of Living India, has perceived this. America is not after all a land of Katherine Mayos. "Great teachers of other religions," he says, "have gazed upon the august vision and reported the divinity of the spirit. But only the Hindu seers heard whispered the secret that salvation is to be reached in life, not death."

The Editor of the Indian Social Reformer seems to have been upset by the recent book of Mr. Arthur Mayhew entitled Christianity and the Government of India, coming as it does after the attacks of Miss Mayo and others on Hindu customs. We do not believe there is any foundation for the feeling of the Indian Social Reformer that the West is making a dead-set against Hinduism. In fact, it may be said that some of these books, have been written on account of the fact that the higher Hinduism is attracting the attention of the West in an increasing measure and there is a growing feeling in the West that Hindu ideals and civilisation have a great deal more to be said for them than was originally imagined. The present prevailing attitude of Missions to Hinduism and other similar religions has been clearly expressed in the Resolutions of the Jerusalem Conference. This not only recognises the great truths for which Hinduism stands but also definitely accepts the idea that Missions are not necessarily concerned with fighting rival religions, so much as with fighting the evils of materialism, secularism, and selfishness wherever found. There is a growing feeling among missionaries in India to-day that Hinduism contains many spiritual values, which must be conserved, and which even the West needs to realise. It may be said without hesitation that missionaries are anxious to-day to see many of these Hindu ideals expressed more completely in the Christian Church in India and have no desire to make a dead-set against Hinduism in all its forms. There are some forms of Hinduism, which many of our Hindu friends will admit, are survivals of an age of ignorance and superstition. As Prof. Radhakrishnan himself has said "Hinduism has been content to retain inadequate conceptions of God." In common with Hindu reformers missionaries believe that it is their duty to displace these inadequate conceptions of God, and it may be said also of the moral life, with higher conceptions which have now become realisable. Missionaries also believe, and here Hindu reformers will hardly be able to follow them completely, that the doctrines of karma and transmigrations have no real logical basis and are responsible for a good deal of the defects of Hinduism. They also believe in the words of a Hindu friend that "only Christ can save the higher values of Hinduism." Only as Hinduism is transfused with the Spirit of Christ will it be able to realise its full mission. This is certainly not to make a dead-set against Hinduism. Missionaries do not believe this simply in order that Hinduism may be attacked and driven from the field, but rather that all that Hinduism has stood for and stands for that is true and noble may be saved not only for India but for the world. If we may be allowed to express our own feelings in regard to the present duty of Hindu leaders we may say that it is our belief that the best thing that could happen to Hinduism to-day would be for the reforming leaders of Hinduism to organise their forces in such a way that the evils and superstitions which have been associated and still are in many places associated with Hinduism may be swept away. As was said nearly 2,000 years ago in another country if this Christian movement is of God it will go forward to victory. We believe that behind all these reform movements the Spirit of God is working and that He will bring a new world of truth and beauty out of the present chaos. Again and again Christianity has had to set her own house in order and surely Hinduism cannot expect to be free from this duty. The Guardian, Calcutta.

CAMPAIGN AGAINST UNTOUCHABILITY.

PANDIT MALAVIYA AND SETH BAJAJ'S APPEAL

The following appeal under the signatures of Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya and Seth Jamanlal Bajaj has been issued:—

"The Working Committee of the Indian National Congress has, at its meeting held at Delhi, entrusted the work for the removal of untouchability among Hindus to a sub-committee consisting of Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya and Mr. Jamanlal Bajaj.

"In spite of the fact that a good deal of substantial work has been done during recent years, much remains to be done for the removal of the disabilities of the so-called untouchables. We accordingly, invite all Hindus—men and women—and all patriotic Indians to co-operate with this Committee in fighting down this evil during this year of grace.

"The most effective steps, in our opinion to be striven for are:—

- (1) Throwing open Hindu temples to the so-called untouchables by approaching their managing trustees, etc., by propaganda among the visitors to such temples and such other peaceful means as necessary;
- (2) Throwing open of public drinking water wells for the use of the so-called untouchables;
- (3) Throwing open public schools to the children of untouchables without distinction;
- (4) A better living and sanitary habitation for the untouchables;
- (5) Instruction in sanitation and hygiene;
- (6) Weaning the untouchables from the evil effects of using carrion and drink.

"We earnestly hope that every good Hindu will extend a helping hand to the Committee in its labours. The Committee will be glad to receive any communication, suggestion or help in this connection from the public or from the workers already in the field. All communication should be addressed to Mr. Jamanlal Bajaj, Secretary, Anti-Untouchability Sub-committee (Indian National Congress), 395, Kalbadevi Road, Bombay.

CONGRESS WORKING COMMITTEE'S APPEAL.

Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya and Seth Jamanlal Bajaj, on behalf of the Anti-Untouchability Sub-Committee, of the Indian National Congress, send the following to the press:—

The Working Committee of the Indian National Congress has, at its meeting held at Delhi entrusted the work for the removal of untouchability among Hindus to a Sub-Committee consisting of Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya and Sjt. Jamanlal Bajaj.

In spite of the fact that a good deal of substantial work has been done during recent years, much remains yet to be done for the removal of the disabilities of the so-called untouchables.

We accordingly invite all Hindus,—men and women,—and all patriotic Indians to co-operate with this Committee in fighting down this evil, during this year of grace. The most effective steps in our opinion, to be striven for are:—

- (1) Throwing open Hindu temples to the so-called untouchables by approaching their managing trustees etc., by propaganda among the visitors to such temples and such other peaceful means as necessary;

- (3) Throwing open public schools to the children of untouchables without distinction.
- (4) Better living and sanitary habitations for the untouchables;
- (5) Instruction in sanitation and hygiene;
- (6) Weaning the untouchables from the evil habits of using carrion and drink.

We earnestly hope every good Hindu will extend a helping hand to the committee in this task of social uplift. The Committee will be glad to receive any communication, suggestion or help in this connection from the public or from the workers already in the field. All communications should be addressed to Sjt. Jamanlal Bajaj, Secretary Anti-Untouchability Sub-Committee (Indian National Congress) 395, Kalbadevi Road, Bombay.—Associated Press.

WORK AT NAVSARI.

Under the direction of the Gujarat Antyaja Seva Mandal an Antyaja Ashram is being conducted at Navsari for the last six years. The outside world even in Gujarat hardly knows that a small band of young Gujaratis, most of them Graduates of the "Gandhi University" (Gujarat Vidyapith) and hailing from higher castes have been unostentatiously carrying on the welfare work mutely. Besides the Ashram, they have extended the sphere of their activity by opening a Bhangi school for the last three years wherein the Municipal servants and their children—the scavengers—all receive education. But the ambition of the conductors of the said Ashram knows no bounds, they are over-ambitious and they have now added a special sewing class for the Bhangi women and girls for the last eight months and special feature that attracts the attention is that they have been able to secure the active co-operation of two Graduate sisters for this work, one a Parsee and another a high class Deccani. These ladies of refinement and culture to their credit it must be said, without feeling the least hesitation to mix with this class readily shouldered the responsibility of conducting the class and teach the Bhangi girls and women the art of cutting and sewing. They will thus be able to contribute a little to the family budget or at least free it from the burden of the sewing charges. Miss Tehemma Nariman, B. A., and Miss Anandibai Pathak, B. A., will have the blessing of these poor women's hearts for what they have been doing for them out of a sense of service. These two ladies by their persistent labour and efforts have also nurtured in these women a habit of cleanliness; and those who had the fortune to be eye-witnesses of these operations being carried on, rubbed their eyes for a moment to think if the women they saw before them were really the scavenger class of women. The workers have been also able to interest some of the very prominent citizens of the town.

POLICE HIGH-HANDINESS IN U. S. A.

Under the caption "The Birth Control Raid," Margaret Sanger writes to the New Republic.

"This is my party!" shouted Policewoman Mary Sullivan, in the midst of her personally conducted raid on the Birth Control Clinical Research Bureau in New York City, last week. Subsequent developments have demonstrated that this boast was as premature as it was untruthful. For Policewoman Sullivan's little raiding party, carried out with a vigor that swept aside as unnecessary such things as common courtesy and ordinary good manners, has proved to be of vital interest to every thinking member of this community. And the end is not yet in sight. As I write these indignant words, the announcement comes that Chief Magistrate William McAdoo now admits that the police, in seizing the case histories of our patients, had exceeded the scope of the search warrant he had issued authorizing this raid—an act on their part which constitutes a misdemeanor.

After you have spent some fifteen years, slowly and with infinite pains and patience working for the right to test the value of contraceptive practice a scientific and hygienic—and lawful—manner, without interfering with the habits or the morals of those who disagree with you, it is indeed difficult to submit with equanimity to such brutal indignities as were gratuitously thrust upon us at the clinic a week ago. Compensations there have been, of course—mainly in the enlightened attitude of such dailies as the New York Herald, Tribune and others, and the generous offers of aid from distinguished physicians. But even these can scarcely counter-balance the evidence of the sinister and secret power of our enemies.

As in the breaking up of the birth-control meeting in the Town Hall, in 1921, the raid on the Birth Control Research Bureau gives us a glimpse of the animus which may direct the action of the police. In their futile efforts to annihilate a social agency which had already been given a clean bill of health by the health department of the municipality, by the state board of charities and by the Academy of Medicine, our hypocritical antagonists have not the courage to fight us squarely, in the open, but adopt the cowardly subterfuge of utilising minor and grossly ignorant members of the police force. Our research bureau has been functioning since 1923, operating within the law, and co-operating with recognized charitable institutions.

From whatever point of view it is analyzed, Policewoman Sullivan's "party" was a deplorable failure. A failure, first of all, because it has exposed a complete lack of intelligence in those who conducted it, and a woeful lack of co-ordination in the police department itself. It is not enough for Grover Whalen or District Attorney Banton to disclaim all foreknowledge of the raid. Modest as may be the head-quarters of the research bureau, it is highly significant and important. Therefore, to permit minor members of the police force, or hostile assistants in the office of the District Attorney, to pass judgment upon its fate, denotes either a lack of co-ordination of powers or a bland carelessness in directing them. Certainly no official of the city Government, cognizant of awakened public opinion concerning the social value of contraception, and aware, moreover, of the searching criticism to which the police department of New York City is now subjected, would ever have chosen the present moment as one psychologically suited to inaugurate a brutal raid upon a modest unadvertised clinic which was functioning quietly and successfully in an obscure side street, minding its own business and hoping that its powerful ecclesiastical neighbours would mind theirs. At a time when the criminal elements of the city—racketeers, gangsters, gunmen and hijackers—are so active and successful, it would seem to a bystander that all the intelligence, skill, and brawn of the force should be mobilized and focused upon "crime control."

Even the thrill of satisfaction we have had in the offers of distinguished doctors to testify in our behalf, in the letters to the press, and the courageous outspoken editorials, cannot obliterate the memory of Policewoman Sullivan standing in the clinic and shouting vigorously and victoriously "This is my party!" I would rather forget that here was a woman fighting against other women who were devoting their lives to succor and to save their fellow women. By trickery and hypocrisy she had obtained her "evidence," and now she triumphantly commanded the doctors and nurses into the waiting patrol wagons,

Whatever the outcome of this raiding party, I hereby call upon the citizens of New York to find out for themselves how and where it originated, and why it was carried out. I ask them to recall the breaking up by the police of the birth-control meeting in Town Hall, with the subsequent revelation that this illegal action was instigated by Roman Catholic ecclesiastical authorities. We are paying, and paying heavily, for the support of a great police force. It is our right and duty to insist that it shall function in an efficient, legal, and socially effective manner. Policewoman Sullivan's "party" exposes it as operating in a manner which suggests the gratification of private prejudices and unreasoning emotion, rather than the even-handed administration of justice and the law.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

A Lady's Munificence:—Srimati Kirpadevi, wife of the late Ragunath Pershad, Meerut has created an endowment trust of Rs. 30,000 for running a girls' school named after her husband, a widow's home and other charitable institutions. Rai Bahadur Lala Sita Ram, President of the U. P. Council, would be president of the trust.

Drinking among Women:—Disquieting reports of drinking among women in cafes and factories were given at the Prohibition Conference held last month in Melbourne, and the necessity for scouring the votes of women at the coming elections was stressed. Cocktails, and medicated tonic wines, and sly-grog selling were mentioned as among the serious menace to society. Drinking among men is serious enough, but when the coming mothers of the race take to wine and cocktails, and even brandy, it is a bad lookout for the future of Australia. One speaker quoted from a liquor official in England:—"The votes of the flappers who drink cocktails are much more numerous than the votes of those who attend Sunday School."

"Feather of the Dawn":—"Feather of the Dawn" is the name given to the light aeroplane in which the young Indian, Kabali, who has been learning to fly in England intends to leave for India. The interesting ceremony at Oroydon today was performed by the Maharani of Cooh-Bihar in the orthodox Hindu style, coconuts, lemons, saffron, rosewater and turmeric powder mixed with rice, were used as symbols of prosperity. Sir Dorab Tata and Prof. Rushbrook Williams thanked Her Highness on the conclusion of the ceremony. Mr. Kabali thereafter took off and performed a series of stunts. He then gave the Maharani and Lady Tata joy rides. Mr. Kabali was then presented with a golden eagle's feathers as symbols of successful flight. The distinguished attendance included Sir B. C. Mitra, Sir Umar Hayat Khan, Mrs. Sarojini Naidu, Kunwar Maharaj Singh and representatives of the High Commissioner, Air Ministry and the Imperial Airways. Mr. Kabali is now awaiting favourable weather reports from the Air Ministry for starting on this great adventure.

Jat-Pat Torak Directory:—Jat-Pat Torak Mandal, Lahore, has decided to include in their Directory, which is to be published shortly, a list of inter-caste marriages so far contracted in India. All those who can supply the Mandal with lists of such marriages (no matter how small they may be) should communicate them to the Secretary of the Mandal at an early date.

The Open Door Council:—The Open Door Council was formed 3 years ago to combat restrictions on the freedom of the women wage-earner. There is a widespread tendency—under the name of "protection"—to increase such restriction: the International Labour Organisation of the League of Nations has of late been active in the matter. The International Labour Organisation, while it has done good work in proposing conventions which apply to men and women alike, becomes an international danger when it proposes special restrictions on the work of women. It may be likened to a factory where proposals for limiting the freedom of women, as a worker, are turned out by mass protection methods. The Open Door Council wishes to make it clear that it is not opposed to the regulation of the conditions of work, the safe-guarding of health, the forbidding of certain processes to the worker, provided such regulations are applied to all adults, male as well as female. It holds that the work of children and young persons should be subject to special restrictions. Great Britain is not the only country in which feminists are working on these lines, and it is believed that the time is now ripe for the formation of an international body pledged to oppose restrictive legislation. The Open Door Council, therefore, proposes to hold a Conference a supporters on the 15th and 16th of June at the Russischerhof Hotel, Berlin; to be followed on the 19th by a Public Meeting. The choice of Berlin is due to the fact that the meeting there in June of the International Alliance for Women's Suffrage will bring together delegates from Societies all over the world.

Sir J. C. Bose Invited to South Africa:—On behalf of South Africa, states a Free Press message, Sir J. C. Bose has been cabled to from Johannesburg, most cordially inviting him to give a special address at the fourth coming meeting of the British Association at Cape Town, on his important discoveries which have greatly advanced Science. Sir J. C. Bose will be their guest.

New Professorship at Oxford:—A new Professorship has been offered to Oxford through the Association of the American Rhodes Scholars by Mr. George Eastman, Head of the Kodak firm. The scholarship is offered on the condition that it shall be held by a citizen of the United States eminent in teaching or research in any branch of university study and he shall lecture and give instructions in such a subject. He is to be selected by the Board representing Oxford University and the Association of the American Rhodes Scholars. The Professor will be appointed for a period from one to five years and successive appointments shall, if possible, represent different subjects of study.

Sequel to wife's Suicide:—Following the tragic disclosures in the Coroner's court and the jury's verdict that Sm. Jamuna Bala, wife of T. O. Dutt, was goaded to commit suicide by ill-treatment, her husband, mother-in-law were arrested and prosecuted before the Chief Presidency Magistrate on a charge of abetment of circumstances which led the girl to put an end to her life. The mother-in-law was bailed on Rs. 1,000 and the husband was remanded to custody.

Exchange of Messages:—The Associated Press states that telegrams have been exchanged between His Excellency the Viceroy and ex-King Amanullah. The telegram from the Viceroy is as follows:—"The arduous journey undertaken by Queen Souriya and yourself has filled me with deep concern. I have enjoined on my officers to do all in their power to mitigate the irksomeness and discomforts of your passage through India and make this trying journey less difficult. I am most anxious that you should feel that they are at your service.—Irwin" Telegram from Amanullah:—"I am deeply touched by your Excellency's kind message. As on the former occasion I have received in the course of this journey every assistance, attention and consideration from your respected officers. My wife and I thank your Excellency for your kind and friendly attention in instructing them to facilitate our journey.—Amanullah."

NOTES.

Law and Custom:—We publish to-day reports of two cases, the one in Madras and the other in Bangalore, in which wives applied to the Courts for injunctions to restrain their husbands from contracting second marriages. The ground was the same in both cases namely, that, though the Hindu law permitted polygamy, custom in their respective castes forbade the taking of a second wife during the life-time of the first except for specific reasons the chief of which was barrenness. Hindu jurisprudence upholds the authority of custom over the texts of the Shastras. The husbands who opposed the applications denied the existence of the custom alleged. Mr. Justice Beasley of the Madras High Court in granting the injunction till the point about custom was decided, observed: "The result of allowing the marriage to go on and having this question of custom decided afterwards, would lead to very serious damage to the proposed bride. Counsel for the opponent has ably argued that his client is prepared to take the risk. I do not think that the Court ought to associate itself with so great a risk as that." Without commenting on the merits of the cases, an important fact may be noted. It is, that several castes, like the Berichetti and Kunchitigara, have by custom sought to introduce reforms in Hindu law. This method which the caste system facilitated has become impossible at the present time. It is an instance of how fluid custom has been hardened and reform made difficult now-a-days. The point is also brought out in the interesting letter which we publish to-day from the Hon. Mr. Jadhav on Divorce in Hindu law.

Doubts and Difficulties:—We publish today under the heading "Confessions of a Missionary" a communication which, originally intended to be personal, should, in our opinion, be perused and pondered by a larger circle of thinking men. We, therefore, obtained the permission of the writer to publish it. Before expressing our own views on the questions propounded in the letter, we should much like such of our readers as are interested in the subject to give us the benefit of their observations. In particular, we should wish to have the opinions of other missionaries, whether by way of confirmation, qualification or contradiction of the writer's propositions. We need hardly say that we look forward to the comments of educated Indians who have thought about these matters and can contribute materially to the discussion which, we are sure, will be conducted in the same sincere and earnest spirit in which the letter is written.

The Gour Marriage Act:—There has been much discussion as to the exact status of persons who marry under the Marriage Act of 1923, which was introduced by Sir Hari Singh Gour. All doubts have been set at rest by the author himself. Mr. Maneklal Vakil of the Hindu Civil Marriage Association sums up the results in an article in the current number of the Social Service Quarterly. The Act, to begin with, applies only to Hindus, including Jains, Sikhs, Buddhists and followers of other religions which had their origin in India. The Act enables an ordinary Hindu marriage to be converted into a monogamous marriage with all its incidents of divorce and succession by a simple act of registration. The point most in doubt was that regarding succession. It is made clear that all existing rights are preserved while at the same time the rights of wives and widows are greatly improved. Mr. Maneklal observes: "Thus the parties may remain Hindus by religion, may retain their caste by marrying within it and may also retain their rights of succession to other relations in accordance with the law governing the succession to such relations. The above remarks make it clear to every educated Hindu that all the points that the social reformers were striving at for a reform in the marriage-relation, in the past fifty years in India, have now been provided for by legislation, and it is now upto the educated Hindu to secure a greater freedom and a higher economic status to women by encouraging marriage by registration as far as possible. To meet the religious susceptibilities of the majority of people they may have the marriage first registered and then the seriousness of marriage may be impressed on the couple by its being sanctified in accordance with their religious beliefs and religious rites though the simple promises before the Registrar are no less solemn in reality and the legal recognition is equal in both the cases. The registration ceremony involves no expense and even religious rites need not be accompanied by wasteful extravagance on feasting, fireworks and processions."

Child Labour in Ceylon:—During her recent visit to Ceylon, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi, in the course of a lecture on the "Place of Woman in the National Life of India," condemned the employment of women and children of tender years in the estates. However good the conditions of estate labourers in that country may be, there can be no excuse for child labour as an economic necessity. Dr. Muthulakshmi was perfectly right when she made the shrewd remark that if a labourer and his wife could not earn enough to make both ends meet without making their child work, it could not be a very satisfactory system. In British India Factory legislation has brought about a decrease in the employment of children in industries. The low wages which child labour commands are a source of great temptation for employers. To compel children to work in their tender years is a sin against humanity. Now that the evil has been brought to the notice of the Ceylon Government by a no mere carping critic but a social worker who has the good of humanity at heart, we hope they will take steps to remedy it.

Sex Equality League :—A Reuter's message last week reports the proceedings of a conference in London of the British Commonwealth League, which aims at securing sex equality. Mrs. Jinarajadasa spoke on the evils of the system of devadasis and prostitution in India and said that the majority of the people in India were anxious for social reform, but whenever any regulation or bill was introduced in the legislatures, Government always opposed it. She appealed to the various women's organisations of the Empire to pass resolutions urging the Secretary of State and the Viceroy to yield to the people's wishes. A resolution was passed congratulating Dr. Muthulakshmi of the Madras Legislative Council on the introduction of her bill dealing with devadasis and abolition of the system of dedicating infants to Hindu temples.

Indian Delegation :—The Government of India have given effect to the resolution passed at the last session of the Legislative Assembly that an Indian should be at the head of the Indian representatives to the League of Nations, by selecting Sir Mahomad Habibullah to lead the delegation. It is a welcome announcement and the choice has given entire satisfaction to the Indian public. That Sir Mahomad is eminently fitted for the task before him may be said with confidence from the success, which is still fresh in our minds, that attended his embassy to South Africa. The other members of the delegation are the Maharaja of Kapurthala and Sir William Ewart Greaves. The substitute delegates chosen are Sir Chunilal Mehta, Sir Geoffrey Corbett and Mr. Syed Raza Ali.

The Non-Brahmin Movement :—Drastic changes in the policy of the non-Brahmin Party, Bombay, are understood to have been proposed by Mr. Javalkar, Secretary of the Party, in the course of a representation to the President of the Party, Mr. B. V. Jadhav, Minister, Bombay Government. Mr. Javalkar suggests that the Party should shed its communalist appellation and should be called "The Peasants' Party" with "Dominion Status for the present" as its goal. It is also proposed that the cardinal principle, for which the Party should work should be the protection of agriculturist India from social, religious and economic exploitation by mullahs, moulvies, priests or usurers and anyone accepting this principle even if he be a Brahmin, should be admitted to its membership.

Drink Amongst the Young :—It is deplorable that the young people should take to drink. The Indian Temperance News writes:—"There is, however, reason to be alarmed by the spread of the Cocktail habit among girls in England. Dr. Barling describes the habit as one of the most pernicious things that had been introduced into the social life of the country. Dr. Morton, Governor of Holloway Jail, has referred to the number of young girls who came under his care as the result of drinking. They wanted a gay time, went to dances and found that to get men to dance with them they had to drink with them. Beginning with port they went on to whiskey and thence was recruited a class of women alcoholics. The number of women committed to Holloway for drunkenness last year was 1396. Sir William Arbuthnot Lane and the True Temperance Association have felt compelled to denounce the Cocktail habit. When apologists for strong drink see the evils of one particular brand of folly there is hope that more light will yet dawn on them."

Medical Research in India :—A summary of the recommendations of the Committee appointed by the Government of India to go into the question of the organisation of medical research in this country has been just published after considerable delay. One of the chief recommendations of the Fletcher Committee is to establish a Central Medical Research Institute at Dehra Dun. Public opinion has expressed itself strongly against the place proposed and is in favour of a more centrally situated locality. The observations of the Indian Daily Mail on this controversial subject clearly set out the reasons against Dehra Dun as a suitable place for the proposed Medical Research Institute. Our contemporary writes:—"The advantages of Dehra Dun for Medical Research are not many. There is no Medical College, few large hospitals, and no independent medical practitioners in the place. It is a military and official station where private enterprise and initiative in any direction does not exist. Intellectual keenness is not fostered by such surroundings. The very purpose of research is frustrated unless the work is carried on in close contact with the population which it is intended to benefit. It is the absence of this contact which is responsible for the little direct benefit which the people of India have hitherto derived from re-searches carried on in their midst. Sir Ronald Ross's discoveries in malaria have been very usefully applied in other countries, but so far as India is concerned, malaria still flourishes practically without any attempt being made to control it. The Dehra Dun Institute may enable several future Sir Ronald's to make a name for themselves at the cost of the Indian tax-payer, but the tax-payer himself will remain as much exposed to disease as ever. If the Institute is located near great centres of population, the result will be advantageous not only to medical science but also to the people who suffer from the diseases for which medical science has to find remedies. Dr. Deshmukh requests Government to appoint a small Committee of medical men, officials and non-officials, to report as to which place would be the most suitable for the proposed Institute." The Government of India should lose no time in acting upon the suggestion of Dr. Deshmukh and appointing the Committee.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

THE BRITISH GENERAL ELECTION.

The result of the General Election in Great Britain, which took place on the 30th May, has been to return Labour members in a majority to the House of Commons. In the last House, there were 396 Conservatives, 160 Labour and 46 Liberal members. In the new one, there are 288 Labour, 255 Conservative and 58 Liberal members. Mr. Baldwin, the Prime Minister, has resigned without waiting to meet Parliament which meets on the 25th and Mr. Ramsay Macdonald, the Labour leader, has been commissioned by the King to form a Ministry. From the Indian point of view, the change must be considered to be for the better. So far as constitutional reform goes, we may not expect much beyond what a Conservative Government might approve. The selection of Lord Chelmsford to the office of Secretary of State for India, which is forecasted by Reuter, is no doubt intended to reassure the other parties that the Labour Cabinet does not contemplate revolutionary changes in the Indian constitution. The Labour Party, even if it had the will, is not in a position to pass any measure which will not meet with the acquiescence, if not active support, of the other two Parties. Besides, India is viewed by the British parties as a national and non-Party interest like the Navy or the Army, and for much the same reasons. What we may expect of the new Government, however, is a liberal spirit in the administration which at present is conspicuous by its almost total absence.

Arrests on all sides on the merest suspicion, indefinite detention of persons pending investigation, many of whom have to be let off later for want of evidence, and espionage, are the order of the day. The latest instance is the arrest on a charge of sedition of the much-respected veteran religious and social reformer, the editor of the Modern Review, Mr. Ramananda Chatterjee, apparently for publishing Dr. Sunderland's book on India. A Government which finds itself called upon to arrest people of Mr. Chatterjee's character and eminence, has a good cause to turn its mind inward and see what there is in its own conduct to deserve the disapprobation of men of such high patriotism and intellectual honesty. The Viceroy, whose high principles and good intentions are generally admitted, seems to have lost control of affairs which are apparently now left very much to the whims of the executive officials. A strong Secretary of State for India, well grounded in the history of coercion and its almost inevitable ineffectiveness as a means of allaying discontent, may put strength in the Viceroy to assert himself, and therein lies the hope of an improvement in Indian conditions.

Apart from that, the advent of the Labour Party to power may have an influence in exercising a moderating influence on the separatist movements in this country. The ruling Chiefs will not fail to see in it a challenge to the hereditary principle, and will realise more keenly than ever the need for meeting their people's aspirations. The Labour Party is opposed to the communal principle—another form of the hereditary principle—and it will, no doubt, discountenance any extension of it in future constitutional arrangements. The Labour Government will also give an impetus to social reform, as its own conception of politics is nine-tenths social. In all these ways, India stands to gain by the coming of the Labour Party into power. The Conservative party was largely a party of vested interests. Not that true Conservatism is incompatible with reform. On the contrary, judicious reform is the very essence of real conservatism. But the British Conservatives are hampered nearly as much as our Indian conservatives, by caste and custom, and though Mr. Baldwin himself is a very liberal and just-minded man, his colleagues have been too much for him. The British Labour Party, though progressive in its aims, is not a revolutionary party. It is inspired by high ideals, and has at its back some of the finest spirits in Great Britain. Apart, therefore, from what India may gain or lose by its success, Indians should be glad that ideals have once more gained the upper hand in the governance of Great Britain.

The Pope and Mussolini :—Some weeks ago the signing of an agreement between the Pope and Sgr. Mussolini restoring the papal State was hailed as an act of great historical importance. It is, therefore, sad to see that the spirit of concord has not been maintained. A Reuter's telegram says :—In a long letter to Cardinal Gasparri, the Secretary of State, replying to the recent speeches of Signor Mussolini during the discussion of the Lateran Treaty in the Chamber and Senate in which Signor Mussolini 'inter alia' claimed that the Church of Italy was subject to the authority of the State, the Pope emphatically dissents from many of Signor Mussolini's views. In the course of the letter, the Pope after recalling that the 'Concordat' formed an integral part of the Treaty for the solution of the Roman question, ends with the ominous words, "It follows that together they stand or fall, even if the Vatican City should fall as a consequence," thus clearly indicating that the Vatican would consider the failure of the Italian Government to observe the clauses of the Concordat as sufficient reason not to ratify the Lateran Treaties.

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XXIII. THE ISOLATED.

(BY DR. CLIFFORD MANSHARDT, PH.D.)

The number of isolated people about us is more numerous than we are inclined to think. There are the strangers, the sick, the misunderstood, and many others. Isolation is not simply a matter of geography, in its worst form it is generally mental. The isolation of loneliness: only he who has experienced it can actually know it. The sensitive child, understood neither by his parents nor by his teachers. The awkward child, who feels himself out of place in every circle. The boy who goes into the city to find work, but finds there no trace of friendliness. The aged, living life in retrospect, and yearning for the days that are past. Parents separated from children, and children separated from parents. The alien, striving to make his adjustment to a strange civilization. These are but a few of the lonely people with whom all of us must be acquainted. May we strive to make clear to them the meaning of friendship; to develop the grace of helpful understanding; to order our speech, that we may speak the fitting word at the proper time; and to cultivate a sympathetic presence for the moments in which speech seems futile.

Anti-social behaviour carries with it its own isolation. When a man sins against society he isolates himself. A base nature can find no pleasure in the company of those who are true. One with depraved appetites finds no congeniality in the presence of the pure. The most isolated man in the world is the man who hedges himself about with his own selfishness. Far too many of our people are prisoners in houses of their own building. Release lies in but one direction—the expansion of the social self.

The man who is at home with books has before him an open door. Biographers, adventurers, historians, scientists, philosophers, poets, and religious leaders all enter into his dwelling and acquaint him with the best thought of the ages. Regardless of the material circumstances of such a man, for a few brief hours each day he lives in the company of the great. The illiterate man, homely philosopher though he may be, is clearly isolated from this privilege. His life is restricted, hemmed in slowly, however, the line of illiteracy is retreating before the advance of education. May it be completely routed,—and that in our own time.

And as a final group we would mention the masses who are so busy with worthless things that the great things of life are passing them by. The isolation of frivolity, of busying one's self with nothings, is perhaps the most dangerous isolation of our generation. People almost without number are shutting themselves off from the best for the passing pleasure of the secondary. All things are ours, but to attain to our heritage we must discriminate.

(BY PERPLEXED.)

You of course do not know me, and I know you only as the distinguished Editor of the Social Reformer. But I have an urge to put certain feelings in black and white, and I think that if I may point my pen toward you that it will help it to flow with more ease. What I write is not for publication.* Don't even read it yourself, if you do not feel like it—it will make no difference. With apologies for making you the target, I proceed.

What I have to write might be called "The Confessions of a Missionary." May I first subject you to a bit of autobiography. I came out to India in 1911. I did not have to come to obtain a livelihood. My family was well to do, and my parents opposed my coming. The Christian Ministry in America offers many tempting opportunities to a young Padri. But I heard a call of God to go. Jesus Christ had done a tremendous lot of good to my own soul, and life, and I honestly wished to share the good-news that is in Him, in service where it was most needed. The experience of my wife was much the same (we met and were married in India). At a very great personal sacrifice she acquired the best medical education that the schools of America afford, for she thought that that was the way in which she could serve best. And so here we are a Padri and a Doctor, eagerly anxious to do what we can to serve God and India.

India and her people appealed to me from the beginning. After nearly nine years of service, I went back to America, enthusiastic about India. In speaking before widely scattered audiences, in America, I gained some popularity as a speaker on India, because of the bright, enticing, optimistic picture that I was honestly able to draw of her. My experience thus differs from the theory expounded by a writer in the Indian Mail, and recently published by you, for whatever success I had, was due to my tale of a great people, with infinite possibility.

After reading Miss Mayo I was filled with indignation, because of her unfairness, and the inexcusable title of such a book. I did some writing in refutation, and much clipping and sending of the various replies. I write of this only to show that my attitude has been that of a booster and a friend, rather than otherwise.

Now the point of all of this is, that gradually I feel my heart changing. Why is it that India with her great tradition and culture, her suave and engaging manners, her keen and logically working brains, should remain for the most part so unchanged, so helpless and so sick. There seems to me to be no adequate excuse for her not doing better. You are a reformer and an Indian, perhaps you can tell why India prefers to remain sick and weak. I am truly puzzled. I do not have to quote from Miss Mayo, for the life of a large District, in the heart of India is constantly pressing in about me, and the cumulating effect is gradually making me resentful toward India. Perhaps you will think me discouraged, because I am unsuccessful in making converts. No. Although I know that in your eyes it will be a damning admission, I have been instrumental in baptising many hundreds into the name of Christ, and one of my chiefest embarrassments is the large number of clamouring enquirers, the care of whom is beyond my, and my Mission's resources. While it is true that they are from amongst the Outcastes, it is also true that amongst them there are many fine upstanding men with good endowments, and ambition. But why is there not a more rapid change in betterment, in their intelligence? Perhaps it is not in intelligence for many of them have very keen wits. The baffling thing to me is the appalling gap between what they know, or should know, and what they do. Just to give one example, that has occurred this month. About eighteen miles out from here there is a group of about thirty Sweeper Christians. Our associations with them have been more or less close. Throughout the years we have done a lot for them. They are unusually intelligent. Even if they do not have faith in Christ, they should have faith in us, for we have been for years their true helpers and friends. A few weeks ago they had a great fight amongst themselves, all starting over a very trivial matter. Heads were smashed, and both bones in a poor woman's arm were broken. Immediately word was sent to us. We responded at once. I went along to see if I could not make peace, while the mem-sahib patched up the broken bodies. The arm was set, and over and over, and still over again we explained the necessary process of a joining bone, and what they must do, and must not do. We came away feeling that a good job had been done. After ten days I was there again. The second or third day a hakim had been called, and the arm taken out of the splints. There it was dangling, with a little rag tied around it, the woman suffering of course most excruciatingly the while. The arm is ruined forever. Now what is the matter with a mentality like that?

As I see life in India, it all centers around one great end—to establish desirable family relationships, to have children and to do the best possible for them. These motives are not unworthy, in fact India holds them rather much in common with all the rest of the world, however in an exaggerated form. So the wedding is the big thing—but a means to an end. No trouble or expence is shunned to make it the best possible. A man will cheerfully make himself a slave debtor for life, to have the marriage of his daughter creditably performed. But when the crisis comes—the birth of a son—toward which end all endeavour and desire, has been so earnestly turned, every paise is carefully guarded, and the dirtiest, most ignorant, and cruel methods are employed. Many of our Christian women, whom I know intimately, are dais, and I know what they are like—dirty sweeper women, social pariahs of the dung heap—until the supreme moment of life—a birth of a child—and then this foul off scouring of humanity, is called in to become the master of ceremonies, to perform the most delicate and important work of all physical life and well being. Now why is that? To me it seems inexcusable, and so utterly lacking in intelligence, that it is difficult for those who allow it, to retain my respect.

I know a prominent lawyer in a large city. He is a most suave, accomplished gentleman, and a man of high moral purpose. Moreover he is a very successful lawyer, which says much for his natural intelligence. His wife is illiterate and so is his mother. In childbirth, by the employment I suppose of such methods as above described, his wife died. When remonstrated with, brokenheartedly he replied, "I know, I know it is terrible. But what can I do, my mother rules my home with an iron hand." Indian men are most jealous of the prestige of their sex, in the petty moment of life, but what sort of a system is this that at the supreme moment of life and death, requires the high intelligence of the natural head of the house, to bow to the ignorance of an old woman? I can not understand it.

I know a practising physician whose "Medical Hall" does a flourishing business. This man is the good friend of a really great lady Missionary Surgeon. His wife was taken ill. The Missionary Doctor was called. The sick one did not improve immediately. The Missionary Doctor was dismissed. A hakim, and the puja walas were called, and the woman died. Now that man knew a lot better than to do that. Why did he do it?

Although from personal experience I know a good deal about it. I will not linger over the lack of interest and ambition in the masses for learning. No chance? Of course. But on the other hand I have tried by my own effort throughout the years to give this needed chance to hundreds, and have had it spurned. This to me is a puzzling fact, since learning holds the honored position that it does in India. Japan, by her own effort, almost over night became a literate nation, in this regard surpassing European countries. While I can't understand it, it seems significant of much.

There is the question of Indian standards of decency. Perhaps it is too much to ask a foreigner to understand. Still the world over there must be some common standards. My heart quite warmed the other day at your remarks apropos of the Pioneer's rebuke about advertisements. I think that you most decidedly scored. Undoubtedly however medical advertisements should be very carefully chosen.

But there are other standards that greatly perplex me. The other day the Mem sahib came in from the Dispensary, with her face flushed from shame and anger, because of a dirty insult given by a foul mouthed Mohamedan woman, while my wife was performing for her a service from which even a sweeperess would shrink. To be sure this sort of thing is more liable to happen with Mohammedan women than with Hindu women. There is small comfort in this however, for Mohammedans are Indians as well as Hindus. As I see so many of these women passing to the Dispensary, so utterly foul, and dirty, and diseased in mind and body, I sometimes don't know what to do—whether to be angry, to puke, or to weep with compassion. In fact we do all three things.

Standards of decency. These hot days our work takes us out not infrequently in the twilight of both morning and evening. To say the least it is most embarrassing, especially if accompanied by one's wife and little girls, to see both men and women squatting in the fields, and by roadside puddles, with no attempt at concealment of the most private parts of the body. A man physician may not treat an Indian woman, and yet she will go out in the fields and openly expose herself to the world. Now where is the sense and the decency in this?

One of the most discouraging things about our work, is the fact that our motives are so utterly misunderstood. Even my closest Hindu friends I think do not in the slightest understand why we are trying to do what we are. The other day in the Dispensary I was watching my beautiful and delicate wife cleaning an especially repulsive syphilitic ulcer, and I turned away in disgust, with the remark that this doctoring is a very loathsome business. A Christian man standing by said "Sahib dont say that. There is a great merit in effecting a cure. The Memsahib is laying up much merit in Heaven by such work". There you are. I suppose that almost all Indians think that this is our motive, even the Christians. Nothing could possibly be further than this from our motive. The doctrine of merit is fundamentally opposed to what we most deeply believe. Why do we do it then? For instance why does my wife carry on the Medical business? Surely it is not to make money. Above what we get for it from the Mission, and in fees, it costs us out of private funds about Rs. 75 per member. Nor is it again because it is a part of the job for which we are paid a salary. My wife is not strong. We have a large family. There are many other duties, and the Mission neither requires or encourages medical work on her part. Why does she do it then? There is Christ's example and His command. But I think that the real reason for doing it is simply that we can not help doing it. Even if my wife were sick in bed and a patient required her services she would in some way contrive to do it. Given a situation that requires help, and an ability and resource within us to meet that need, creates a call of God that is compelling within our hearts. If we refused we would be refusing the Christ within us which is fatal. So in the end I think that we do what we do because being whose we are, we must.

Returning for a moment to the question of standards, there is another one that I would like to mention. It is the almost universally accepted attitude of indifference towards bribery. The Police of course are notorious in this respect, for bribes, turning truth into falsehood, and vice versa. In my work I have much to do with both bribe givers and bribe takers, and it is nothing short of appalling. I have known of Thanadars retiring from this District, who have immediately bought large Zamin-daris—indeed one has just recently purchased one for a lak of rupees before retirement. I have spoken to many S. Ps. about it and they claim to be helpless. Some years ago an English Collector came to this District determined to put down bribery. Because of this very thing within six months, he had become so unpopular with his own people and with the public, that he was transferred. Indeed the attitude towards bribery is not one of indifference, but it is rather an institution—a privilege prized and guarded by both bribe givers, and bribe takers. Frankly I find such an attitude in such a land as India very perplexing. Why is it?

The Arya Samajist's programme and mine coincide in a good many places. Yet they follow me around wherever I go, doing every thing in their power, by fair means and by foul, to counteract the service that I am trying to render. They must not understand what we are after. But you number many Missionaries amongst your friends. One would expect you to understand. I pick up the "Reformer" for a little comfort, and read in "The Deadset against Hinduism" that Missionaries are even willing, rather have been willing, in the past to stoop to beer and beef as weapons against Hinduism. Now that is downright discouraging coming from you. I, and I think that I can say my fellow Missionaries, are not against Hinduism as such. It is true, however that we are dead against certain manifestations and practices of Hinduism, as indeed you must be yourself. He would be a very wise man who could tell us what Hinduism is. I have read, in fact read twice, Prof. Radhakrishnan's "From the Hindu Point of View". He writes most persuasively. And yet the Hinduism of which he writes is no more Modern Hinduism, as practiced, than Miss Mayo's "Mother India" is India. I am familiar with the idea that in its hey-day, Hinduism produced great learning, and prosperity and that air-ships circled in the Heavens. Perhaps so. I can't deny it. But what good does that do us now? We are crowded about by the hard facts of things as they are. May I take just one instance—idolatry. I am certainly deadset against that, much more dead set, than I was ten years ago, for I have seen more clearly its devastating effects. Symbols? Yes, but they do not lead towards a knowledge of the true God. Time and again amongst my own people I have seen the result of a relapse into idiatry—it is a superstitious spiritual debauch, that is ruinous to the Truth. I understand better than I used to, why the first two Commandments of the decalogue, are concerned with idols, and why the "deadset" of the whole Bible is against such practice. It is impossible for me to understand how a man of Mr. Gandhi's spiritual discernment can be tolerant in this regard. But this "deadset" is not against Hinduism as such. Idolatry for instance is just as wrong in Christianity (and there are forms of idolatry within certain sections of Christianity) as it is in Hinduism.

I wish that we might all rid ourselves of racial, and religious super-sensitiveness. It is not at all a matter of whether your race, or my race, whether your religion or my religion is the best or worst. There is a great deal in my own America, past and present, for which we can only blush with shame. God knows both West and East, we are all desperately bad, and in need of saving. The tuo quo que answer is no answer.

It is not a matter of saving or defending a religion—that is as one over against the other. What we all need is religion, not a religion. Why then, you may ask do I engage in proselytism? Well one very practical answer is that in the relation of Guru and Chela, I can do a great deal more to help and teach a man, than if I haven't that relationship. Dr. Stanley Jones has truly said, that we have no use for a mathematics, or a science, but that we want mathematics, and science, in other words the truth. God is one, mankind is one, and what concerning God is true for me is likewise true for you. So why do we have to work at cross purposes, each misunderstanding the other? Why can we not search for this truth together? The fact that I believe that I have found true religion in Christ Jesus, gives a right and a duty to tell you about it. I may be able to convince, or I may not be able, but neither you nor I should become angry about it. We should be able to go on searching and sharing together as brothers.

But I fear that I have wandered from my main thesis, namely, my growing perplexity; resentment at Indian life as I find it. Perhaps you will think that I need a vacation. Perhaps I do. Well our furlough time will be coming after a year, and we will be going back to America. The big question in our hearts, is whether or not to come back. If we do we will have to leave our two boys, seventeen and fourteen respectively in American Boarding Schools. We will both have to leave aging parents whom we could hardly expect to greet us again after another eight years' term. Is it worth the sacrifice to them and to us. Formerly I thought it was—gloriously worth it. But now I have my doubts. What do you think? Have I been a fool to throw away these twenty best years of my life, on a country that wants me not nor needs me? Would I be a greater fool still, to dedicate my remaining twenty years to this land? Don't tell me to come and to be just a "good neighbor". I have an idea that Christ was not as comfortable a neighbor as you seem to think he was. I can't come back and put the soft pedal on religion. I am, and will remain, whether in India or in America, an ambassador of Him, Who I believe to be in Himself true religion—the Way to union with God.

DIVORCE IN HINDU LAW.

The Editor, the Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In your issue of the 25th May 1929, your leading article "Research and Reform" refers to Dr. Gour's Bill about divorce. You say that "there is no wide-spread demand for such a total innovation in the Hindu Law, and the sentiment even among advanced social reformers is not very clearly defined in favour of divorce as the best or only way of remedying unhappy marriages." It is generally supposed by the educated people that the Hindu law does not recognise divorce. But Smriti writers such as Narad, Vashishtha and even Manu countenance it and the present practice will be known if one will scan the pages of vernacular mofussil newspapers in the Bombay Presidency. One will be surprised to see the immense number of notices given by deserted wives to their husbands, calling upon them to redeem the debts they had incurred and to give security for considerate treatment in future. The notice warns the husband that his default will be taken as divorce granted by him and his wife would marry again. This shows the state of things in which the divorce is said to be obtained without any judicial proceedings. In such cases one cannot be certain whether the fault lies with the wife or with the husband or with both, and one is not sure whether the allegations made by the wife are true. There are also numerous cases in which caste Panchayats have decided the question of divorce and granted or refused it. But there again friction arises and the decision of the caste Panchayats is not so impartial as one would desire. As education advances a community is generally unwilling to admit that divorce is prevalent in it and the unfortunate wife is refused divorce. The best remedy for all these evils will be permission to institute judicial proceedings before a Subordinate Judge. The communities in which widow marriage is not ordinarily allowed will not make, any use of the provision for divorce, and therefore the advanced communities will not be affected. But the communities in which re-marriage is allowed will be very greatly benefitted by a provision to decide by a judicial proceeding the equity of granting a divorce. The advanced classes do not feel the need of it at present and do not care to know how the backward classes are suffering. The masses of the people are practising divorce under conditions not recognised by law. The measure of Dr. Gour will be useful mainly for them.

CHRISTIAN WORKERS IN INDIA.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

It was with a feeling of sorrow and surprise that I read your comment given in May 18th number, on Dr. Jones' efforts with the help of the Holy Spirit of God (Italics are mine) to show to the world that Christ is not only a way but the way—a feeling of sorrow because you presume to be a more worthy interpreter of Christianity than the true and real Christians who know Christ by their own experience, and a feeling of surprise, because I never knew that you being the Editor of the Indian Social Reformer could go out of your way and pass remarks on a matter purely religious. If your paper is open to religious controversy like this, which I suppose not, you will find what Christians as well have to say about it.

Your remarks 'Not content with Indian admiration for one who himself said, "Why callest thou me good? None is good save one, that is, God" Dr. Jones bargains for Indian adoration of Christ', only reveal your smattering knowledge, I regret to say this, of the Holy Scriptures and attempt to mislead people. If you read this account with reference to the context prayerfully seeking the guidance of God's Holy Spirit and go deep into its inner meaning, keeping in view all that Jesus Christ did in this world and all that He said about Himself, vide Chapters I, XI, XIV and XV of St. John's Gospel, go through them very carefully, you will find that He in those words showed to the man that He was in reality God Himself in the shape of a man.

Again your remarks "In life man Jesus with all his anathemas was a good neighbour to others but in death he is transformed beyond recognition" do not take into consideration the fact why this good neighbour was so mercilessly tortured and nailed to the cross by others, to suffer that disgraceful death.

Parker High School,

R. S. CHARAN.

[The remarks quoted in the letter were, as we acknowledged, from the Indian Messenger, the organ of the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj of Calcutta, and represents the Indian point of view which is most appreciative of the life and teachings of Jesus Christ. We agree with the Messenger, and have often expressed the same view in these columns.—Ed. I.S.R.]

INJUNCTION AGAINST SECOND MARRIAGE.

I.

Great sensation has been caused in a Bangalore City, over a marriage of a rich and influential man belonging to the Kunchitigara community. In this connection one Rangamma daughter of Mr. Munisamappa, Sugar Merchant, moved the Munsiff Magistrate on Saturday afternoon praying for perpetual injunction restraining defendants from participating in marriage arranged to take place on Sunday at 12 noon. The Munsiff immediately issued orders returnable within two hours on the party some of whom received the same whilst others were not served with the orders. It is understood that the marriage was solemnised on Sunday morning at 3 o'clock which had previously been fixed to take place at 12 noon.

The facts of the case briefly are :—

of Mr. C. Papamma a rich Thangadi merchant of Cantonment. She was married to him 14 years ago and has borne a son for him which is at present about 9 years old. The plaintiff was living with the 1st defendant till about a year ago when consequent on some misunderstanding between her parents and the 1st defendant she was sent away from her husband's house. Ever since then she is compelled to seek protection under the roof of her parents, and her attempts to join her husband have so far proved abortive.

That the parties consisting of P. Hanumanthiah, B. S. Nagappa, Putta Narasamma wife of 2nd defendant Mr. N. Puttarangaswamy in Mysore, and three others belonging to the Kunchitigara community in which by a long immemorial custom and usage no man can marry a second wife during the lifetime of the first unless the first wife was barren or unchaste without the expressed consent of the first wife.

IRREPARABLE HARDSHIP.

The plaintiff stated that if the marriage is allowed to take place or for the matter any marriage of the 1st defendant should take place during the lifetime of the plaintiff not only will the same be illegal and void according to the custom of the community as aforesaid but will also cause considerable injury and irreparable hardship to her.

On the above grounds the plaintiff prays for a decree restraining the 1st defendant by a perpetual injunction from marrying a second wife and the other defendants from bringing about or participating in any manner in the intended marriage of Puttalingama with the 1st defendant during the plaintiff's lifetime.

It may be mentioned that the age of the proposed second wife is only 13 years. It is learnt that the marriage was solemnised in the early hours of the morning at 3, in spite of the matter being taken to Court.—The Indian Daily Mail, Bmbay.

II.

His Lordship disposed of an application filed on behalf of one Kamalang Ammal for a temporary injunction restraining one Gopala Chetti, her husband, a member of the Beri Chetti community residing at Muthialpet, Georgetown, from marrying as second wife, the daughter of one Chengalvaraya Chetti.

The plaintiff was married to the said Gopala Chetti in August 1925, when she was 8 years of age. The first defendant, Gopala Chetti was about to marry another wife aged 17 on Sunday last and the plaintiff and her mother who alleged that they for the first time came to know of this marriage only on Thursday last, filed a suit against the first defendant, his mother, his maternal uncle and the father of the proposed bride for the issue of a perpetual injunction restraining the first defendant from marrying a second wife during the life-time of the plaintiff and an application was made in Chambers for the issue of an interim injunction prohibiting the marriage on the next day. His Lordship ordered the same and it came on to-day after notice to all parties.

On behalf of the plaintiff it was submitted that though under the Hindu law a Hindu could marry more than one wife, among the Beri Chetti community to which community the parties belonged, there existed an ancient and time honoured custom that a husband could not marry a second wife during the life-time of his first wife, unless she was barren or unchaste and in the former case the consent of the first wife was necessary to marry a second wife. It was further submitted that the plaintiff was only 12 years old and had attained age only some months back and the plaintiff could not under those circumstances marry a second wife and a second marriage would be null and void. In support of the abovesaid custom two affidavits were filed. It was also submitted that the Privy Council in 15 L. W. 521, had held that a custom in a community would outweigh a written text of law. In those circumstances it was prayed that an injunction be issued prohibiting the marriage.

On behalf of the first defendant, the husband of the plaintiff, it was submitted that no 'prima facie' case had been made out for the granting of an injunction. The Hindu Law was quite clear and did not prevent a Hindu from marrying more than one wife. As regards the alleged custom, it was submitted that there was no such custom and specific instances were cited, supported by affidavits to show that there were cases where husbands in the Beri Chetti community had taken second wives during the life-time of the first with the latter's consent.

In the course of his order, His Lordship set out briefly the facts of the case and said that allegations were made on both sides. On the side of the plaintiff, it was alleged that this marriage had been brought about by the second, third and fourth defendants out of spite for the plaintiffs' family. Similar allegations were made by the defendants with regard to the presentation of this suit and the application for injunction. No doubt there was a good deal of ill-feeling on both sides. As regards the custom alleged, his Lordship said that no doubt evidence of persons belonging to the Beri Chetti community having contracted marriage showed that there was no such custom. On the other hand, two responsible persons of the same caste had come forward to say that there was that custom. Therefore his Lordship was of opinion that this was a matter which should be tried out as soon as possible in a preliminary issue.

Continuing his Lordship said: "The result of allowing the marriage to go on and having this question of custom decided afterwards would lead to very serious damage to the proposed bride. Mr. Narasimhachariar has very ably argued that his client is prepared to take risk. He is so confident in the strength of his own case that he is prepared to run the risk of allowing the marriage to go on and having this matter disposed of afterwards. I do not think the court ought to associate itself with so great a risk as that. No harm will be done to the young woman by postponing the marriage. Under these circumstances I shall grant the interim injunction and the issue as to whether or not there is such a custom as is contended for by the plaintiff might be tried at the earliest possible moment. I, therefore, direct that it will come on for trial on the re-opening date before me." The Hindu.

RAMMOHAN ROY AND AN ENGLISH OFFICIAL.

Mr. Brajendra Nath Banerji gives the following interesting incident in the Raja's life in the Modern Review :—

The following letter to Lord Minto, dated 12th April 1809, which I have discovered in the Bengal Record Office, is of very great personal, I may even say, historical interest. It is the first English composition of Rammohan yet known and it shows that already at that early age he had acquired a wonderful ease, flexibility and purity in the use of a foreign language. His insistence on the just rights of the Indians when their personal dignity was attacked, is a most significant trait of his character and must have been an extremely rare thing in that age. R. Montgomery Martin (quotation in Miss Collet's biography, page 16) informs us: "A written agreement was signed by Mr. Digby to the effect that Rammohan should never be kept standing (a custom enforced by European Civil Servants towards natives of the higher rank) in the presence of the Collector, and that no order should be issued to him as a mere Hindu functionary."

RAMMOHAN ROY'S PETITION TO LORD MINTO.

In the course of a letter the Raja wrote :—

"Confiding therefore in the impartial justice of the British Government and in the acknowledged wisdom which governs and directs all its measures in the just spirit of an enlarged and liberal policy, your petitioner proceeds with diffidence and humility to lay before your Lordship, the following circumstances of severe degradation and injury, which he has unmeritedly experienced at the hands of Sir Frederick Hamilton.

On the 1st of January last, your petitioner arrived at the Ghant of the river of Bhaugulpur, and hired a house in that town. Proceeding to that house at about 4 o'clock in the afternoon, your petitioner passed in his palanquin through a road on the left side of which Sir Frederick Hamilton was standing among some bricks. The door of the palanquin being shut to exclude the dust of the road, your petitioner did not see that gentleman, nor did the peon who preceded the palanquin, apprise your petitioner of the circumstance, he not knowing the gentleman, much less supposing that, that gentleman (who was standing alone among the bricks), was the Collector of the district. As your petitioner was passing, Sir Frederick Hamilton repeatedly called out to him to get out of his palanquin, and that with an epithet of abuse too gross to admit of being stated here without a departure from the respect due to your Lordship. One of the servants of your petitioner who followed in the retinue, explained to Sir Frederick Hamilton, that your petitioner had not observed him in passing by; nevertheless that gentleman still continued to use the same offensive language, and when the palanquin had proceeded to the distance of about 300 yards, from the spot where Sir Frederick Hamilton had stood, that gentleman overtook it on horseback. Your petitioner then for the first time understood that the gentleman who was riding alongside of his palanquin, was the Collector of the district, and that he required a form of external respect, which, to whatever extent it might have been enforced under the Mogul Government, your petitioner had conceived from daily observation, to have fallen under the milder, more enlightened and more liberal policy of the British Government, into entire disuse and disesteem. Your petitioner then, far from wishing to withhold any manifestation of the respect due to the public officers of a Government which he held in the highest veneration, and notwithstanding the novelty of the form in which that respect was required to be testified, alighted from his palanquin and saluted Sir Frederick Hamilton, apologizing to him for the omission of that act of public respect on grounds that, in point of fact, your petitioner did not see him before, on account of the doors of his palanquin being nearly closed. Your petitioner stated however at the same time that even the doors had been open, your petitioner would not have known him, nor would have supposed him to be the Collector of the district. Upon this Sir Frederick asked your petitioner how the servant of the latter came to explain to him already, with your petitioner's salam, the reason of your petitioner's not having alighted from his palanquin. Your petitioner's servant stated in reply to the observations of Sir Frederick Hamilton that, he had not been desired by your petitioner to give that explanation, but that seeing that your petitioner had gone on and knowing that the doors of the palanquin were almost shut, he had explained that circumstance to Sir Frederick Hamilton, in the hope of inducing that gentleman to discontinue his abusive language, but that he the servant had not expressed your petitioner's salam as he had no communication with your petitioner on the subject; Sir Frederick Hamilton then desired your petitioner to discharge the servant from his service and went away. In the course of that conversation, calculated by concession and apology to pacify the temper of Sir Frederick Hamilton, that gentleman still did not abstain from harsh indecorous language..... Your petitioner is aware that the spirit of the British laws would not tolerate an act of arbitrary aggression, even against the lowest class of individuals, but much less would it continue an unjust degradation of persons of respectability, whether that respectability be derived from the society in which they move or from birth, fortune, or education; that your petitioner has some pretensions to urge on this point, the following circumstances will shew:—

Your petitioner's grandfather was at various times, chief of different districts during the administration of His Highness the Nawab Mohabut Jung, and your petitioner's father for several years, rented a farm from Government the revenue of which was lakhs of rupees. The education which your petitioner has received, as well as the particulars of his birth and parentage, will be made known to your Lordship by a reference to the principal officers of the Sudder Dewani Adawlat and the College of Fort William, and the gentlemen in the service of the Hon'ble Company, as well as other gentlemen of respectability and character. Your petitioner throwing himself, his character and the honour of his family on the impartial justice, liberality and feeling of your Lordship, entertains the most confident expectation that, your Lordship will be pleased to afford to your petitioner every just degree of satisfaction for the injury which his character has sustained, from the hasty and indecorous conduct of Sir Frederick Hamilton, by taking such notice of that conduct as it may appear to your Lordship to merit."

Note: A copy of the above petition was sent to the Magistrate of Bhaugulpur who called upon Sir Frederick Hamilton to explain.

Sir Frederick Hamilton's Defence:—"In the afternoon of the 1st January last, I rode to a brick kiln near my house, where I alighted from my horse. While standing on the top of the kiln, I observed coming towards it, a palanquin highly decorated, attended by four chuprasseys. I turned to a servant of mine and enquired who it was coming along; he replied, Mr. Digby's Dewan, Baboo Rammohun Roy. He passed within about 6 ft. of where I was standing, elegantly dressed in blue silk, and silver fringe, his palanquin doors wide open; I said not a syllable to him. I took no notice of him nor he of me. When he had passed about 600 yds., he sent one of these outrunners with his salam, that he did not know it was the Collector, or he would have stopped. I immediately rode after him, desiring to know what he meant by sending his salam to me, as I have said nothing to him, that if he thought he ought to have made the salam, instead of sending, he should have returned, as the distance was so trifling. I reproached him for his want of civility, and warned him how he did so again to other gentlemen, lest he might find one who would not keep his temper with him so well as I had done. He said, he had not ordered his servant to give his salam; I then told him that he ought to punish his servant, for delivering messages without his orders. Upon which, in a great rage, he asked, 'How shall I punish him? Shall I cut off his ears'. 'No no, friend' said I, 'that is your look out', and rode away.

The above is a true and faithful account of a transaction between two private individuals. It may be necessary to observe that, previous to submitting this petition to Government, he sought redress in the Supreme Court in Calcutta, without success."

SIR FRED. HAMILTON WARNED BY GOVERNMENT.

Ordered that the Secretary to the Government in the judicial Department write the following letter to the Magistrate of Bhaugulpur.

"I am directed by the Rt. Hon'ble Governor General in Council, to acknowledge the receipt of a letter from you dated the 20th ultimo, with its enclosure, and to acquaint you that, from the inquiries which have been made, it does not appear that Rammohan Roy ever instituted any suit against Sir Frederick Hamilton in the Supreme Court of Judicature, or at all events, that such a suit was brought to trial. His Lordship in Council deems it however sufficient to desire that you will caution Sir Frederick Hamilton against having any similar altercation with any of the Natives in future."

NOTES.

The Bombay Textile Strike:—A further attempt was made by the Government of Bombay last week to bring about a settlement of the dispute between the mill-owners and workers which is causing great hardship to those who have invested money in mill-shares and are more or less wholly dependant on the dividends for their livelihood. A considerable section of the Bombay middle class population is thus involved in the struggle which has been going on now for nearly two years, reducing the industry to a dire plight. Besides Government, several public bodies have taken up the question and are anxious to put an end to the present intolerable situation. The owners, on the one side, and the workers, or that large section of them represented by the Girni Kamgar Union, on the other, are obdurate and refuse to yield a jot of their respective claims. They do not even want a neutral board, which is provided for in the Trades Disputes Act, passed recently, to investigate their dispute with a view to finding a way of adjusting their differences. It is, therefore, no good going into the merits of the dispute here. Some general considerations, however, may be stated, which have a bearing on the question, and the statement of which may help to narrow it down to manageable dimensions. To begin with, the trouble of the Bombay industry is not peculiar to it. The textile industry all the world over is passing through a crisis, in Great Britain and the United States as much as in Bombay. The reasons are that textile manufactures have been established in other countries, substitutes like artificial silk are gaining ground, and, above all, the purchasing power of the middle and poorer classes has suffered much as the result of the economic destruction due to the War. Nearly fifteen years ago, Sir Dorab Tata in his address to the Industrial Conference, warned Bombay that the conditions which favoured its growth and prosperity had passed, and that new mills should be started not in the city but up-country and their object should be mainly to supply the home market to the fullest extent.

The warning has gone unheeded. The Tariff Board also found that Bombay mills are suffering from competition from the up-country mills and that between Lancashire and Japan on one side, and Cawnpore and other mills in the interior, they stood in danger of extinction, unless they applied the strictest measures of economy and efficiency to their management. One of these measures was the "standardisation of wages". The mill-owners' attempt to introduce this reform, is the immediate cause of the dispute. An independent Committee appointed by the Bombay Government, on the whole, approved of the measure, but counselled circumspection in the manner of its application. It seems also likely that if this particular measure did not stand alone, but was put forward along with the ameliorative measures recommended by the Tariff Board, it might have caused less discontent. There is, therefore, clearly room for arbitration by an independent agency, and it is likely that the pressure of public opinion will compel both sides to agree to it within the next few days.

The Sadhu Menace:—The sadhus originally were religious-minded men who, quitting the world engaged themselves in meditation and spiritual ministrations to the community. This valuable and necessary institution has now degenerated like several other Hindu institutions. A case was reported last week in the papers of a particularly gruesome character. A poor, illiterate mill worker's child died of small-pox, and the distracted father brought the dead body to the sadhu requesting him to call it back to life. The wise Buddha in a similar case counselled a bereaved mother to go and get him five grains of mustard seeds from a household in which no one had ever died. The mother patiently made the round of her village, but while she found sympathy in every home, all of them sadly declared that death had visited them too. The mother comes back to the Buddha with her experience, and He then tells her that death is the universal lot, and bids her go and bury the child and devote herself to a life of sacrifice and service for her people. The sadhu of Bhuleshvar, however, took the dead body of the child and threw it on the fire which was burning before him. This caused an uproar, and the man was arrested and placed on his trial before a Magistrate on the charge of burning a dead body in an unauthorised place and was fined fifty rupees or one month's imprisonment. The sadhu admitted his guilt but said he had no money, whereupon the Magistrate observed "You are a sadhu and the jail is as good to you as a palace". The punishment looks disproportionately light, but the Magistrate no doubt took the proper view of the offence in the light of opinion among the ignorant, illiterate masses who have faith in these self-styled sadhus. Bhuleshvar is a wealthy Hindu centre of Bombay, and it is high time that the temple there was cleared of such pests as the "Sadhu" in this case. The Hindu Mahasabha, too, should take up the question of the reform of sadhuism in right earnest, as it has become a grave menace to Hindu social and religious life.

The New British Ministry :—The names of the members of the Cabinet which Mr. Ramsay Macdonald has formed were announced at the end of last week. These are given among our news items. The Secretary of State for India is not Lord Chelmsford, as was forecasted last week, but Captain Wedgwood Benn, who was a Liberal before he joined the Labour party owing to his disapproval of Mr. Lloyd George's leadership. As a matter of fact, he was very little of a party man and has stood out for principles. It is suggested by an English journal, the Observer, that he will be at the India Office only until Mr. Vernon Hartshorne who is a member of the statutory Commission on Indian Reforms is free to take it up. It seems too unlikely that one member of the Commission will be selected to an office in which he will sit in judgment over his own Report, whether it be a unanimous one or as has been rumoured, a minority one. Moreover, Mr. Hartshorne has publicly made sweeping statements about Indian employers which involved him in a law suit, and his appointment to the India Office will be viewed with misgivings by important sections of the Indian people. Besides Captain Wedgwood Benn, there are other members of the new Cabinet who have kept themselves in close touch with Indian public life. The Prime Minister himself visited India while he was yet a struggling M. P., and has written a book which is still a helpful guide to India's principal problems. Mr. Sidney Webb, Mr. Tom Shaw, Mr. George Lansbury, and Mr. Lees-Smith, are other members who have evinced a deep interest in this country. Sir Charles Trevelyan and Sir Oswald Mosley are also well-known names. No previous British Cabinet had anything like the same number of Ministers with a sympathetic knowledge of and interest in this country. The present cabinet, therefore, may be expected to bring to bear upon Indian problems, a liberal and friendly judgment. What it can achieve, depends a good deal upon what Indian leaders can help it to achieve. A strong, responsible and judicious Indian attitude will greatly strengthen the Cabinet against the opposition which it may encounter from the opposition. Above all, a vigorous promotion of social reform in India, will be the best argument for self-government.

The New Era :—In welcoming nine months ago the New Era which was started for the special purpose of providing a recognised organ of modern Indian culture, we hinted that it may be difficult to keep up the standard of the first number. The editors have been obliged to give the first place in the current number to a paper on "the Indian Banking Problem" by Sir J. C. Coyajee. The importance and the topical interest of the subject, cannot be denied, but there is no special appropriateness in giving it a place, and that the leading place, in the New Era. We do not find fault with the Editors. The number of men who think and can write on cultural subjects is not large in any country, and least of all in India at the present day. All the same, it was a bit startling on opening the New Era to be invited to study the Banking Problem. There is need for a review of the best current thought of the world outside commercial and industrial subjects, and if good original articles cannot be had, well-chosen reproductions of papers from contemporary periodicals will be welcome.

Police Report on the Riots :—As was expected the Police Report on the Bombay Riots which marred the peace of the City in February last, just published, fails to throw light on the real causes which were at the bottom of the trouble. The Report traces the events from kidnapping rumours which were afloat in the city as early as January 24th and which, gathering momentum, led to the outbreak against the Pathans. The repeated assurances of the Police and the Government that the kidnapping rumours were absolutely without foundation did not have any effect on the public and the riots assumed a communal complexion. It is to be observed that the Police were not aware of the prevalence of the scare in the city until a week later. The Report points out that the explanation for the communal disorders should be sought in the strained relations between the Pathans and the Oil Installation strikers at Sewri since December 1928, when the former were employed to break the strike. The suggestion that the strike leaders were responsible for starting kidnapping rumours and exploiting the scare to wreak vengeance on the Pathans has no evidence to support it. During the riots the situation in the city was grave, involving 149 deaths and 739 wounded, treated in hospitals. The Police had an arduous time in restoring peace in which task the citizens of Bombay co-operated and gave unstinted support. The narration of facts contained in the Police Report will prove very useful to the Riots Enquiry Committee in their investigation. Copies of the Report can be had from the Government Book Depot, Charni Road Gardens, at the nominal price of annas 4.

Women's Educational Conference :—The full proceedings of the Third All-India Women's Conference on Educational Reform held at Patna in the first week of January this year, are available in the form of a report recently published. Appended to it are the details of the educational conferences held in various places, the resolutions passed by them, the names of the delegates who represent their constituencies and the policy, articles and object of the Conference. It is gratifying to see that the organisers of the Conference have succeeded in establishing a net-work of women's educational Associations throughout the country. The enthusiasm for women's education created by the Conference is producing tangible results. The Director of Public Instruction in Madras has drawn up a comprehensive scheme for speeding up female education, which has been accepted by the Government.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, JUNE 15, 1929.

THE PROBLEM OF CHRISTIAN MISSIONS

The Western attack or penetration, whichever we choose to call it, in the East and more particularly in India, has been made from three sides, commercial, political and religious. Miss Katherine Mayo recently extended it to the social and sanitary sides also. The earliest was the commercial phase, which accordingly we have placed first in order. Then came the political, and this was followed by the religious. Leaving the commercial aside for the moment, the political and religious penetration has co-existed for about one hundred years. At first, political interests were regarded as being jeopardised by religious propaganda, as Mr. Mayhew's review in his book on the subject of the relations between British rule and missionary enterprise in this country shows. Later, the missions were recognised, though not avowed, as auxiliary to the political power, and were countenanced and supported as such. This is not to say that Christian missionaries as a class had consciously and deliberately lent themselves to purposes of political propaganda. It is, however, the fact that the value of missions as means of extending national influence has been increasingly present to the minds and in the policies of European statesmen and diplomatists. The best proof of it is that France which is a secular State has recently permitted the religious orders to recruit for foreign missions, while the ban against them within the country itself is still in force. In an article in a leading English monthly, a writer lamenting the supersession of British influence in Japan by American, recommended the strengthening of British Christian Missions to that country.

It is interesting to note that Christian missions are feeling the need of a new orientation—to use the now fashionable term—of their policy and methods just as the political government of the country is doing. The Church of England in India following the inauguration of the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms, has established a system of what is intended to be an introduction to representative government, and has anticipated the next stage of constitutional reform by making itself independent of the Archbishop of Canterbury who is the official head of the Anglican Church. Other denominational Churches also seem to be moving in the same direction. One of the oldest of these is the American Baptist Mission in the Telugu districts of the Madras Presidency. The American supporters of the Mission have lately been exercised in mind about the results of its work. The Rev. W. E. Boggs, in an important article in the current number of the Baptist Missionary Review, states as follows the thoughts in the minds of the "home constituency" of the mission: "The churches within the territory of the Northern Baptist Convention, have been supporting this Telugu Mission, these ninety years. They are naturally eager to know when they may hope to be relieved of this burden. When may they look to the Telugu Churches to stand on their own feet? Has not the history of our other missions and our Home Mission work in America proved that the time ought to be fast approaching, if not already arrived, when Christianity should be indigenous in the field of this mission? Other peoples have reached the desired goal after a much shorter period of foreign assistance. Witness Uganda and Korea and even our own work among the Karens. South China has been widely heralded as having taken a great advance step. Watchman, what of the night in Telugu Land?" Dr. Boggs' paper is an attempt to answer these questions—or rather this question because they all fall in one category—frankly and without bias.

He begins by admitting the great difficulties presented by this problem, so great that "as we approach it, it is with the sense of groping about in the darkness striving to find a way out". He next points out that there can be no comparison between mission work in India and in other countries, the conditions are so different. We may fairly sum up the implication of the general propositions in which he expounds the difference. In Uganda, Korea and among the Karens and in China, the missionary has a comparatively clean slate. In India, he is hampered by historical and temperamental peculiarities. "The Karen and "untouchable" of South India have had different histories and are possessed of vastly different temperaments". In other words the Karen more readily yields to the process of christianizing than the Pariah. Some of the most experienced Missionaries, who have devoted their lives to its service, "are not so sanguine to-day as they were ten years ago as to the fitness of the Telugu community to take on the larger burdens." They dread, therefore, the probable consequences of leaving any district without a "resident missionary" for a period of years. A place named Atmakur is cited as an example and a warning in this respect. The effects of the "Indianization" of the mission staff at Atmakur, have evidently not been encouraging. After this preliminary clearing of the ground, Dr. Boggs proceeds to state the difficulties in the way of an early fruition of the ideal of a self-supporting Baptist community in the Telugu districts where it has been planted these ninety years.

These arise, he suggests, mostly from the defects of the Telugu leaders. The following are stated in practically Dr. Boggs' own words. Indian Baptists will not take responsibility unless they have the support of an American missionary behind them. They suffer from lack of imagination. They have not made any suggestions for the speedy solution of the problem, that is, the conversion of the Telugu population to the Baptist Church. The ethical standards of some acknowledged Telugu Baptist leaders leave much to be desired. It seems a former prominent leader whose conduct had proved unworthy, has not been given up by his friends. "On the other hand, opportunities are persistently sought to bring him forward on every possible occasion, even to securing for him a place on the program of an annual gathering to conduct an inspirational and devotional service." This is, indeed, carrying the principle of "love the sinner, take the sin" a little too far! "There is a looseness in financial matters among our people." Dr. Boggs adds that he calls attention to this defect in "many of our leaders" not on his own responsibility but because it had come among a number of other representations from an honoured Indian brother. "Jealousy and rivalry among our most trusted leaders is all too apparent." Though there are a few among the community who are genuinely interested in the deeper things of Christianity, the Christianity of the general run is too largely one of form and ritual, "head religion rather than heart life." While not altogether disclaiming responsibility for this state of affairs, Dr. Boggs thinks that this is a reflection of "the general attitude of India," as the spiritual, according to him, does not figure largely in any of the Indian religions from which the converts are drawn.

Dr. Boggs then gives what he calls the grievances of the Indians of his Mission, and then proceeds to make his own suggestions. We have no space, neither is it necessary, to give these in detail. It is sufficient to say that the "grievances," as given by Dr. Boggs, amounts to little more than that Indians do not get enough jobs and have no voice practically in the conduct of the mission. Their position is one of hewers of wood and drawers of water, so to speak, of the American missionary. Dr. Boggs admits that the Baptist mission has in these respects done less for its clientele than other Protestant missions. "In all the Protestant missions of India, there are more than one thousand nationals of missionary grade. In our mission there are none." His own suggestions, besides emphasising the importance of the spiritual side of the mission's work which, he thinks, rather tends to get into the background, are chiefly in the direction of a greater association of the Indian element in the administration of the Mission and of making its educational and religious work indigenous to the soil. Dr. Boggs notes the contrast between the generous way in which an Indian, when he is a Hindu or Mahomedan, contributes to his religious institutions, and the parsimony with which the same Indian when he is a Christian gives to his. He mentions the case of a well-to-do Indian of the mission who, when asked to contribute one pie a week to the Lord's work, agreed but requested that his wife's name be expunged from the Church roll! This leads Dr. Boggs to put some searching questions to himself. "It is difficult to say," he writes, "just what is to blame for this new attitude towards religion, so different from that formerly observed by these same people. But we surely have here a great barrier to the speedy spread of Christianity." He asks:—

"Is it due to our materialistic western ideas and ways of expressing ourselves? Or is it the outcome of our western educational processes? We should dearly like to have the phenomenon explained that we might the more readily address ourselves to its correction. A sense of personal obligation and responsibility for the development and life of the churches is absent to a great degree from the thoughts of the rank and file of our Christians. Have we been slack in presenting this phase of our message? Or have we been too eager for an advance in quantity and too easily satisfied as to quality? Have we been so overwhelmed with the numbers thronging to us for baptism, so fearful lest we lose them if we keep them on probation, that we have lost sight of the absolute necessity of instruction? Have we emphasized one item in our commission, to baptize, at the expense of the making disciples, and teaching them all things which our Lord commended? Wherever the fault lies the result is apparent in the backwardness of our people to accept the responsibilities for evangelism which the early church felt so keenly and accepted so heartily."

SOME POINTS OF FACT AND LAW.*

INHERITANCE.

(BY MR. KOPARGAM RAMAMURTI).

1. THE POSITION OF WOMEN IN HINDU LAW.

"In every age and country, the wiser, or at least the stronger, of the two sexes has usurped the powers of the state and confined the other to the cares and pleasures of domestic life," says Gibbon in his history of Rome's Decline and Fall.

Those usurped powers have enabled man to legislate for woman in a way most satisfactory to his own superior wisdom and convenience. That the right of physical might is the basis of most principles of Morals and Legislation affecting the sexes is frankly acknowledged by Bentham. Solon, the great Athenian sage of antiquity, may be the first wise man to discover by his genius the expediency of entrusting state powers to the male because he is the stronger of the two. But, as neatly put by Bentham, "in the disposal of domestic power, every legislator, without any effort of genius, has been a Solon."

* The earlier articles of this series appeared in the I.S.R. of Jan. 5, Feb. 2 to March 9, and April 20, 27.

It is inconceivable, however, that the ancient Rishis of India, who were the fathers of Hindu jurisprudence, could have been guided by specious principles or unworthy motives. They were perfected souls who rose above all the pettinesses of the flesh, and looked with equal eye upon male and female and the strong and the weak, and strove to make them all equally happy in this world and the next. But Hindu law as we have it to-day is by no means the undefiled product of their spiritual genius, although their names are often dragged in to give a colour of sanctified authority, infallibility and immutability to the corruptions of centuries of human degeneracy. Even the term Hindu is not of their coining. If we but make up our minds to look at facts squarely in the face, we can easily see for ourselves that there is nothing sacrosanct or primordial in the unhappy concoctions of fraudulent local pandits and ignorant foreign judges of recent times, which masquerade as the ancient wisdom of Aryan law-givers, unquestionable and unchangeable for all time. Those who have any doubt on this point will do well to read again and ponder over the masterly exposition of Women's Rights in Hindu Law by Mr. M. R. Jayakar in his Presidential Address at the last National Social Conference held in Calcutta. (I.S.R. 29th December 1928.)

The inferior matrimonial status assigned to woman through the licentious privilege accorded to man by the letter and spirit of the Hindu Law of Marriage in the present day has been already noticed in these columns. Learned men however are not wanting who rhapsodise over the beauties of such a system and acclaim it as proof positive of the honour and esteem in which woman is held in Hindu social polity. "Woman is capable of great heights of self-control and self-denial (tapah-pradhanya)", says Professor S. Radhakrishnan. To his thinking, therefore, "the stricter code of morality applied to women is really a compliment to them, for it accepts the natural superiority of women". The alleged compliment, however, when enforced not only by the constraints of the social code but also by the terrors of the law of the state, becomes painfully overpowering. Unlearned people might have thought that to give a blank cheque of license to the naturally self-indulgent and unscrupulous, and to practise legalised coercion for extorting impossible virtue from the naturally good and self-denying, is not just the way to signify one's admiration of the latter's natural superiority. But we live in strange times. The spokesmen of the British Government in the Indian Legislature have begun to descant on the ideal of Ahimsa and point to their imposition of the Arms Act and refusal to give national military training to Indian youth as incontestable proof of their high esteem for that ideal and for the acknowledged natural superiority of Indians to Europeans along that line of godliness!

There is yet another and equally fundamental self-denial forced by law on Hindu women, by way of completing the compliment. It is in respect of rights to property.

"As the bearing and rearing of children take a good deal of time and attention, women were relieved of their economic responsibilities for the family:" says Professor Radhakrishnan. It was certainly very good of the Hindu law-givers not to have insisted that the unpaid whole-time maids-of-all-work of the family shall also contribute cash for its upkeep. But when the "relieving of economic responsibilities" is made by law and practice a gentle euphemism for depriving woman of valuable economic rights and turning her into an economic slave in human society for the glory and comfort of her male relations, it is time that right-minded people everywhere woke up to the gravity of the injustice.

The right to acquire property, by gifts and bequests from relations or by one's own industry, and to spend it according to her own will and pleasure, was never denied to woman, whether married or single, by the theory of the Hindu law; and there can be no grievance on that point even in practice except what is inevitable from her subordinate position in the family. But in respect of her rights of inheritance to the property of her deceased male relations, such as father, brother, husband, son etc., a Hindu woman compares very unfavourably with her Parsi or Muslim sister, and is decidedly much worse off in comparison with her Christian prototype.

2. THE JOINT FAMILY.

The very first fact which stares us in the face in making this comparative study is that no question of inheritance can arise at all in a "Joint" Hindu family. The Joint Family is a hoary institution peculiar to the Hindu people. It causes a genuine pang to note anything unpleasant about it. It must have had many beautiful points in its favour to ennoble and endear it in the past. But the times have unhappily changed, and it is no longer a thing of beauty or a joy for ever as one would wish, although it has still some amount of economic utility in some cases. The spirit which made every Hindu home a refuge and a beehive where many generations, descended from a common stock, lived together in peace, amity and natural goodwill, all standing up for each and each for all against a common foe, each contributing heartily his skill and industry for the common good according to his capacity and each enjoying the freedom to take from the joint resources whatever he required, to the measure of his need, irrespective of his contribution,—that spirit of unselfish love, ungrudging accommodation, guileless co-operative service and mutual protection, advancement and trust, is practically fled from our midst, never more to return very likely, in this individualistic age of small men.

But even in its halcyon days of wholesome communistic life, the Hindu Joint Family could not have been anything but a system of economic slavery and personal dependence so far as woman was concerned, relieved only by domestic idealism of a special type and glorified by spiritual exaltation. With the disappearance of that exaltation and that old-world idealism, however, her position in that system has become painfully precarious and intolerable. And the Hindu law of the British courts, through its "presumptions," makes it only more so by practically favouring her despoilers. For the wife of the successful bread-winner of the family may today be the queen of the household and the giver of food to all the able-bodied drones, with their numerous progeny, who feed fat upon her husband's substance, on the strength of their "undivided" kinship and remote ancestral "nucleus," while making a bed of thorns for her in many diligent and spiteful ways; but tomorrow, if he happens to die sonless, the whole property passes to those very ill-conditioned kinsmen by right of "survivorship," and she and her daughters become abject servants of their erstwhile dependents or must eke out a half-starved existence on the grudging "maintenance" doled out by the new masters. The Law, in its wisdom, looks on with approval. It "presumes" that the deceased male and his dependent kinsmen were all one "Joint Family," and that all the property left by him was "Joint Family Property," unless and until the contrary is proved to its satisfaction by irrefragible evidence which is too often found wanting. It therefore rejects as untenable the woman's claim to any bequest or share in the property. The deceased, as member of a Hindu joint family, possessed in the eye of the law no share that could be called his after his death and therefore no property which he could pass, by a will or by the ordinary Hindu law of Intestate Succession and Inheritance, to his nearest and dearest female relations, however much he may have wished it in his last moments.

It is therefore highly desirable and expedient that when a young man takes upon himself the responsibilities of family life by contracting marriage, he should take every necessary step to define and acquire legal control over whatever share he may be entitled to at the time by immediate partition. It may be that he will get a smaller quantum of property now than what might become his if he stuck on to the joint family and contrived to outlive not only his father but all his other male kindred as well and thus blocked the chances of their female heirs and possible legatees. But he should entertain no such unseemly ambition, because it might as likely end in the pauperization of his own wife and daughters by his own earlier death. To him it should be sufficient that he acquires a definite and lawful share from the family chest, or "hatch-pot," which he can pass on to those for whose welfare he makes himself voluntarily responsible.

3. PARTITION.

In practice, however, he will find it no easy matter to persuade his kinsmen to let go their hold on him and allow a partition amicably and honourably, even if he found courage enough to make the proposal. The breaking-up of a long-standing natural partnership is keenly felt by them as a shame and an injury. Those especially who wish to rule him and his wife and control his property and his future to their own satisfaction, are sure to assail him with a fierce fusillade of affectionate sentiments and vile attacks, expatiating upon his heartlessness, ingratitude and meanness in deserting life-long protectors and benefactors to make a goddess of a newly acquired stranger girl, and will set no limits to the lengths they may go to embarrass him and frustrate his purpose. Much vexation, indignity and laceration of feelings, and perhaps also expensive litigation, will have to be gone through before he succeeds in extricating himself from the tentacles of a "joint status" which held him in its grip from his very birth. The prospect of such unpleasantness and trouble may easily prove a deterrent to any young man of ordinary natural affections and prudence. On the eve of marriage especially, and even for a long time after it, he would rather court the blessings and happy co-operation of his kindred than invite their curses and provoke active uncivil warfare by fussily setting up a separate cooking for himself with amateur hands, wrangling over undisclosed valuables, spurious debts and false accounts, demanding a muster-roll of pots, pans and spoons, cutting up shares from the parental homestead and ancestral lands, dislocating violently the normal life of the family and humiliating the elders by blatant repudiation of their time-honoured guardianship.

4. SEPARATE STATUS BY DECLARATION.

Sixteen years ago, however, the Privy Council introduced a happy improvement in the technique of family division by suggesting and sanctioning a third course. They declared that "a definite and unambiguous indication by one member of an intention to separate himself and enjoy his share in severalty may amount to separation." (I. L. R. 35 Allahabad 80). It was hailed as a god-send by those who knew the practical impossibility of the "common consent" method and the futile hardships of the "litigation" method. Either method might take years to fructify and in the meantime it would be in the power of the obstructive members to saddle the seceding members with liabilities which did not benefit him in the least, or the seceding member may die leaving his heirs adrift before the struggle reached fruition. For even if he had filed a suit for partition it benefitted him and his heirs in no way, under the old view of the law, unless he had the good fortune to be alive at the time when the court actually pronounced the decree. The decision, therefore, of a Full Bench of the High Court of Madras in 1915 accepting the principle enunciated by the Privy Council in the above case and holding that the mere filing of a suit for partition by one member was such a clear expression of definite and unambiguous intention on his part as would separate him at once in status from the other members, came as a great relief in this thorny situation of family law. (I. L. R. 39 Madras 139.)

But the filing of a suit is after all an unpleasant and expensive way of declaring one's legitimate wishes. A less costly but equally effective method of expressing one's intention "clearly and unequivocally", so as to create in the eye of the law a divided status for oneself without actual division of property and without waiting upon any other's consent had yet to be found. To make such declaration by a registered document and arrange with the Registrar to send copies of it to the other members by registered post, as proposed by Dewan Bahadur M. Ramachandrarao in his "Hindu Coparceners' Partition Bill" of 1915, would have been one such method. But it was thought unnecessary and dropped. The same unilateral declaration might with equal validity be made through a letter addressed to each of the other coparceners and sent directly by registered post to guard against a possible denial, and this would be the cheapest method of all.

The recent cause celebre however, in which the widowed daughter-in-law of a famous Diwan of Mysore had to pass through the most vexatious and ruinous litigation through all possible courts to establish her just rights to her husband's share against his brothers' claims, discloses some loopholes still left uncovered by this simple formulary method. The effect of the declaration, even where the fact is not denied, may be ingeniously countered, and perhaps nullified too, in some cases, by the plea that the maker of the declaration had subsequently changed his mind and amicably lived with his kinsman in uninterrupted joint status or at least re-union. Formidable evidence may be forthcoming in support of such plea, as it did in the above instance. The property being, by the very nature of the case, undivided by metes and bounds and entirely under the control and management of the contesting kinsmen, every item of affectionate conduct and helpful service rendered to them by the deceased member subsequent to his declaration goes only to strengthen their plea and defeat the interests of his heirs.

But, even apart from these possible difficulties, there is one quality which still vitiates this method of Declaration or Notice and Demand, though not to the same degree as the other two methods, and makes it none the less, unsuitable as a preliminary step to a joyful family function like marriage. It carries with it an air of selfish aggressiveness which can be plausibly resented as offensive, and which anyhow provokes an unfriendly feeling and open estrangement between the parties by rudely focusing their attention on their threatened self-interest.

5. THE SPECIAL MARRIAGE ACT.

Under these circumstances it would be an incalculable advantage if, by the very ceremony of marriage, an affectionate and peace-loving member of a Hindu coparcenary is enabled to raise for himself, silently and automatically, a legal status of division for which no further documentary evidence would be necessary and against which no fraudulent denial or ingenious plea on the part of his kindred can avail after his death to the detriment of his female heirs. Such a ceremony is provided by the Special Marriage Act (III of 1872) as amended by Dr. Gour in 1923. It is open to every Hindu of proper age to take advantage of it while remaining faithful to his religion and caste ritual. The event which calls it into operation, and for which the blessing of all friends and relations is humbly and politely invoked, is marriage, not partition. The joy of the auspicious occasion need not be marred by other thoughts. Nothing need be said among family members about future status or money matters, to poison the atmosphere. The common kitchen arrangements need not be disturbed to the distress of the old loving hearts. The common management of family property by the honoured head of the domestic corporation, be he father, elder brother or uncle, need not be interrupted to the end of their natural lives. No division of property need be actually made with weighing, scales, measuring poles or boundary marks. No parikhat-nāma or deed of partition need be formally executed and registered, and not even a letter of demands or declaration need be issued to anybody. And, above all, he may continue to live with the rest of his family, so long as they permit, on the most affectionate terms as usual and render them every service in his power to the best of his ability. Yet his share and savings will not lapse to his kindred, and his wife will not be turned into a waif, the moment he passes away from this world. For the solemnization of his marriage under the Act gives by itself, according to section 22, a separate legal status for him in the family, defines his share and marks off his acquisitions from that date and makes his female heirs equally competent to inherit his property, knocking out all "presumptions" and pleas to the contrary, whether of union or re-union.

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XXIV. THOSE WHO FEAR.

(By Dr. Clifford Manshardt, Ph. D.).

The tendency towards fear is instinctive in the human organism. In the early days when man dwelt in the jungle fear was a healthy thing, for it saved him from being devoured by wild beasts, and helped him to become adjusted to his physical environment. To-day, though hardly necessary for survival, the tendency persists, manifesting itself in varied forms. Some fear the dark. Others fear for their jobs and for the security of their families. The ignorant man is afraid of evil spirits and of the unfamiliar. Most of us are afraid of public opinion. Many fear sickness and death, and so it goes.

Almost every man and woman is carrying about a burden of fear, with a consequent depletion of energy. The allaying of fear is one of the most helpful services of social engineering.

Take the simple fear of the dark. Night: lurking shadows, unseen terrors, blackness. Night: the stars, peace, God. Sleep comes, restoring the spent energies and renewing the inner man. Quiet reigns, and in the silent watches there comes the opportunity for uninterrupted thought. The voices of men are hushed, and softly through the stillness there speaks the voice of God. Night, a time for fears, or a source of refreshment? It depends upon the man. It depends upon the early influence of the home, and the growth of character throughout the years. It marks the difference between the alien and the fullfledged resident of the world.

In building up our industrial civilization we have been so anxious to get results that we have relied on force instead of on love. Force gets things done. When a man is driven to it he will make an effort to come up to the expectation of the driver. But fear kills the inner man. The will to do, the spirit within the man, does not expand under driving. On the contrary it contracts, and before long it is crushed. The man still produces, but the life within is dead. Love, on the other hand, is an expansive power. Brotherhood and co-operation lead out. The way of love is so simple that most men do not understand it, but it is love alone that casts out fear.

And that which is true of individual relationships is equally true of the nations. In a world organized upon the basis of force it is natural that one people should fear another. But when the nations conceive their task as a co-operative one, then fear shall pass away. The Paris Pact for the Renunciation of War leads us to hope that the day is near at hand.

An immediate, every-day fear is the fear of men and women to accept responsibility. "I cannot undertake this task, I am not equal to it". The idea seems to be that ability is a divine gift instead of the result of hard work. Perhaps a man is not equal to the task. He certainly will not improve himself through inactivity. We "learn by doing," and it is only as responsibility is accepted and carried that we prepare ourselves for larger and larger responsibilities. We may feel ourselves to be children, but there lies within us the power to attain to the stature of men.

UNITY OF THE HUMAN RACE.

To the Editor, the Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In a practical, rather than a strictly ethnological way of speaking, the population of the world is made up of three great divisions of people: the Caucasian or white races of the Western Hemisphere (North and South America), the Mongolian or yellow races of Japan and China, and the great Hindu (Aryan) and Mohamedan population of India. The four other races of men: the Negro, the Malay, the Jewish, and the Red Indian, are smaller than the first three that I have mentioned, and on account of their smaller numbers and lack of power they do not enter into a consideration of the main currents of the world's political thought and activities, though of course these smaller peoples should share as beneficiaries in any successful scheme for world improvement and betterment.

To-day we are witnessing the attempts of China, India, and other countries to be self-governing, and to throw off foreign domination. Whether such attempts be laudable or not, they are easy to understand, for the yoke of foreign domination, whether it be easy to bear, or hard to bear, is always more or less galling to proud and independent peoples; though the virtues of prudence, patience, and fortitude should enable them to endure such a yoke until they show themselves fully able to govern themselves. In my opinion, the time has not yet arrived for the Indian peoples to govern themselves. They have much to learn in the art of government, in political, social, and economic theory, and in reconciling and consolidating various racial, political, social, and religious groups and interests.

While I believe in the integrity of races, and think it a mistake for any well-defined and distinct race of people to admit large numbers of an alien race into its territories, I also recognize the truth that in our day the world has a different aspect from that which it had only a few years ago. Fast steamships, railroads, airplanes, the telegraph, the telephone, the radio, have contracted the world to such a degree that what was once a world is now hardly more than one large country.

Since this is true, and since above all the differences of race God "Hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth", it does not behove any race of people or any nation to desire a complete riddance of all foreigners from their territories. Even supposing, or granting, if you will, that at some time in the future the Indian peoples will become a self-governing nation, they should welcome foreign settlements in their nation. The Indian people are fairly homogeneous as compared with a nation like the United States of America. Their languages, also, are different from the languages spoken in other parts of the world. Therefore the only way India can be linked with the rest of the world is through these foreign settlements in India. The foreign settlements of any country serve to link that country with the rest of the world. Through these foreign settlements a country is interpreted to the rest of the world, and the world is interpreted to that country. Such foreign settlements serve as symbols of the unity of the whole human race, and of the bonds that unite all peoples in one great fellowship and brotherhood. If such settlements did not exist in a country, that country would become detached, isolated, self-centred, and cut off from free communication and fellowship with the rest of the world. Despite what Kipling said to the country, East and West, yes, the whole world, can and do meet through wise and beneficent mediators.

TEMPERANCE WORK IN INDIA.

ASSOCIATION'S REVIEW.

An exhaustive review of the temperance work done in India in the year 1928-29 was placed before the annual meeting of the Anglo-Indian Temperance Association, held in London on May 13. It began with a complaint that during the last fifty years the vice of in-temperance had infected an increasing number of inhabitants of India and drew attention to the fact that the excise system, under which the sale of drink was regulated had now become one of the most lucrative revenue-collecting agencies of the Government. That rendered the solution of the problem one of extraordinary difficulty, a fact which the Excise Ministers in every province had now realised. It was admitted that there had not in recent years been an actual increase in the amount of alcohol consumed, but it was regarded as an ominous fact that about one-quarter of the total provincial revenues was dependent upon this destructive traffic, the proportion rising to as much as 33.3 per cent. in Madras and 34.4 per cent. in Bihar and Orissa. "In view of these figures," it was observed, "it is not surprising that several of the Provincial Governments who have announced that prohibition is the goal of their policy find themselves confronted with serious financial difficulties in trying to give effect to that declaration, even at the end of a long term of years. These Governments are now reaping what was sown by their predecessors in the days before excise was transferred to the control of the legislatures."

BOMBAY POLICY CRITICISED.

The excise policies in the different provinces were then discussed. Referring to Bombay the review stated: "The attitude of the Bombay Government on the question of temperance reform has been the occasion of much criticism throughout the Presidency on account of its failure to give effect to the prohibitionist policy announced a few years ago. The system of rationing liquor supplies then introduced was designed to achieve the goal by gradual stages, but after a five years' experiment, it has now been practically abandoned. This led to an animated debate in the Council on March 2. The Minister in charge of Excise, the Hon. Mr. B. V. Jadhav, in defending the administration, reiterated his implicit faith in the principle of prohibition, but admitted that the policy hitherto pursued had not achieved the results they had looked for. He could only hold out the hope that prohibition would be brought about gradually district by district. The Minister's apologia, however, did not satisfy the critics of the Government, and the motion of censure (as the President described it) was ultimately carried without a division. There can be no doubt that Bombay is faced with a position of considerable gravity in regard to temperance reform. The rationing of liquor was stopped in all districts of the Presidency proper as from April 1, 1928. Only in Sind has this method of restriction been continued, the ration for the current year being fixed at 5 per cent. less than that of 1927-8. It is not without significance that Bombay has had no fewer than five Excise Ministers during the last two years, which will account, perhaps, for the lack of continuity in the measures adopted by the Bombay Government for reaching its avowed goal of prohibition.

GOVERNMENT SUBSIDY.

The review then referred to the decision of the Madras Government to set aside a sum of money for expenditure each year in propaganda work to discourage the drink habit and to subsidise work on the lines hitherto carried on by voluntary age agencies, such as temperance societies. It added: "When the advice of the Association was sought on this question it was pointed out that there could be no objection in principle to the acceptance of Government grants for temperance work provided that the societies so subsidised were left perfectly free to advocate total abstinence and prohibition. The temperance societies may be relied upon to make good use of any funds which may be placed at their disposal and we trust that the work to be undertaken by local authorities and health officers will also promote the principles of abstinence and prepare the way for prohibition. The official statement of excise policy merely says on this point: "The Government have permitted the officers of the Public Health Department to draw attention in their lectures to the effects of intoxicants on the human body and to the evil results on health of an excessive use of them."

BENGAL'S ATTITUDE.

Discussing the attitude of the Bengal Government, it was observed: "In Bengal the attitude of the authorities to the pressing problem of intemperance leaves very much to be desired. The Government of Madras, Bombay, and the Central Provinces, whatever their shortcomings may be, have discarded the old policy of "a maximum revenue from a minimum consumption"—which has always been objectionable to Indian reformers—and have approved eventual prohibition as a practical ideal. But the Bengal Government is still content with regulation and regards prohibition as impossible. The effect upon the provincial finances would be disastrous, it is said, if the contributions from Excise were suddenly stopped. It is stated in the report of the Calcutta Temperance Federation that the attitude of the Government towards temperance workers has become unsympathetic, and even hostile. Regret is expressed that after a quarter of a Century of Temperance effort in Calcutta, "the Council finds itself no longer in sympathetic co-operation with the Bengal Government, its Excise Minister, or its excise policy."

In conclusion a tribute was paid to the Rev. Herbert Anderson, Hon. Secretary of the Prohibition League of India, for the leading part he had taken in the foundation of the League and for the service he had rendered to it since its inauguration in 1925.

NEW OFFICE-BEARERS.

Resolutions were then passed putting on record the Association's sense of grief at the death of Mr. John Turner Rae, its Hon. Secretary; affirming that the coming revision of the Indian constitution would include powers which would enable the people of India to give effect to their convictions in regard to the prohibition of the liquor traffic: and appointing the office-bearers and members of the Consultative Council of the Association. The Right Hon. Lord Clwyd, to be President; the Rev. Herbert Anderson, Honorary Secretary; and Mr. F. Grubb, General Secretary. The following to be members of the Consultative Council of the Association:—Rev. J. H. Bateson, C. B. E., Rev. C. Philips Cape. Mr. H. G. Chancellor, Sir W. Howell Davies, Sir Mathew Dodsworth. Bart., Mr. Henry Edmonds, J. P., the Right Hon. T. R. Ferens, Mr. D. D. Gilder, Mr. Alexander Guthrie, J. P., Dr. Hooper, F. C. S., Sir G. B. Hunter, K. B. E., the Right Hon. Leif Jones, the Right Hon. Sir J. Herbert Leavis, G. B. E., Mr. J. M. Parikh, Miss P. H. Peckover, Mr. Charles Roberts, and Mr. Sidney Robinson, J. P. with the following, who shall form the Executive Committee:—Mr. A. Yusuf Ali, C. B. E., Mr. A. E. Blackburn, Mr. Arthur Davies, M. A., Mr. E. C. Emerson Mr. A. E. Goodwin, Dr. Harold Mann, Lieut.-Col. P. W. O'Gorman, C. M. G., J. M. S. (ret'd) Mr. H. S. L. Polak, Lieut. Col. D. Warlikar, I. M. S. (ret'd). Mr. Cecil Wilson, M. P., and Mr. G. B. Wilson.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The New British Cabinet:—Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, Prime Minister. Mr. Philip Snowden, Chancellor of Exchequer. Mr. Arthur Henderson, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. Mr. J. H. Thomas, Lord Privy Seal. Mr. Sidney Webb, Secretary of State for Dominions and Colonies. Lord Parmoor, President of the Council. Sir John Sankey, Lord Chancellor. Mr. J. R. Olynas, Secretary of State for Home Affairs. Captain Wedgwood Benn, Secretary of State for India. Lord Thompson, Secretary State for Air. Mr. Tom Shaw, Secretary of State for War. Mr. Arthur Greenwood, Minister of Health. Miss Margaret Bondfield, Minister of Labour. Mr. Noel Buxton, Minister of Agriculture. Sir Charles Trevelyan, President of the Board of Education. Mr. William Graham, President of Board of Trade. Mr. A. V. Alexander, First Lord of Admiralty. Mr. W. Adamson, Secretary for Scotland. Mr. George Lansbury, Commissioner of Works. Sir Oswald Mosley, Chancellor of Duchy of Lancaster. Mr. W. Jowitt, Attorney General. Mr. J. B. Melville, Solicitor-General. Mr. F. O. Roberts, Minister of Pensions. Mr. Herbert Morrison, Minister of Transport. Mr. Tom Johnston, Parliamentary Under-Secretary for Scotland. Mr. H. B. Lees-Smith, Postmaster-General, and Lord Arnold, Paymaster-General. All on the list

as far as and including the First Commissioner of Works are members of the Cabinet. Mr. A. V. Alexander was Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Trade in 1924. The positions of Lord Advocate and Solicitor-General for Scotland have not yet been filled. Sir Henry Slessor does not appear on the list because other services have been assigned to him which will be announced later. Lord Arnold, the new Paymaster-General, will not be paid any salary. He has accepted the position with nominal duties in order to be free for work in the House of Lords and otherwise. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and First Commissioner of Works will also have duties imposed on them in connection with the scheme of National reconstruction which is being prepared. Mr. Sidney Webb who retired from the last election will probably be given peerage.

Scholarships for Indian Students in Munich University:—Professor Dr. Kalidas Nag, Hon. Secretary, The Greater India Society, has received from Prof. Friedrich von Muller, President of the German Academy, writes the Modern Review, a circular offering three scholarships to Indian students to enable them to study at the University of Munich. Prof. F. von Muller writes to him: "Our humble effort is nothing but a simple attempt—a modest beginning—towards the promotion of cultural relations between Germany and India." As a bulletin of the Indian Information Bureau of Berlin reminds Indian students wishing to study in Germany, all teaching there is given through the medium of German. So those who do not know that language should either acquire a working knowledge of it here or in Germany. It requires four months to do so in Germany. So it is best to reach that country four months before the opening of a session. The circular is printed below:—Under the joint auspices of die Deutsche Akademie and die Deutsche Akademische Auslandsstelle of Munich, Germany, it has been arranged as an expression of our gratitude for the hospitality extended to Munich, visitors to Indian Universities, that during the academic year of 1929-30, three scholarships—one for Medicine, one for Engineering and one for either Applied Chemistry or Physics—will be awarded to three Indian students to continue post-graduate studies in the University of Munich and the Higher Technical School (the Engineering College) of Munich. The scholarships will be given in the form of free rooms in the Student's House and board. The chosen candidates will have to pay their own travelling expenses from India or any other country to Munich. They will have to pay the regular tuition fees which will be for the Medical Faculty about 570 Marks or £28.—pounds sterling, for the Engineering Faculty about 340 Marks or £16-13.—pounds sterling, and for Applied Chemistry or Physics about 440 Marks of £21-10.—pounds sterling for a year. Furthermore they will have to bear all other necessary personal expenses. An applicant for the scholarship must be a graduate of an Indian, British or American university in Medicine, Engineering, Chemistry or Physics. He should have some knowledge of the German language and must furnish at least one testimonial from a professor as to his scholarship and standing. All Applications must be addressed to "Hauptstelle der Deutschen Akademie, Muenchen, Residenz, Germany" in time to reach us by the 15th of July, 1929. The selection of successful candidates will be made by the 1st of August, so that they will have ample time to arrange for their passage etc. to arrive in Munich by the 15th of October, to begin their regular work from the very beginning of the Winter Semester. Die Deutsche Akademie Hauptstelle Residenz, Munich (Bavaria), Germany.

NOTES.

The late General Bramwell Booth:—After long years of meritorious service to the Salvation Army which he helped to make the largest and most effective organisation for social service, which it is to day, General Bramwell Booth passed to his rest last week. In his famous essay on "The Moral Equivalent of War", William James outlined a scheme of army recruited for war not against nations but against Nature in her aspects inimical to human well-being. The Salvation Army to a considerable extent has become such an army of social service, engaged in daily battle with sin and suffering. General William Booth, the founder of the Salvation Army made it more or less an organisation of religious propaganda, of which the "Conversion of souls was a greater object than the amelioration of life conditions. His son perhaps laid less emphasis upon the soul or rather he thought the soul is best reached through the body. Whichever it may be, the Salvation Army under his leadership has developed a high technique of social service, and its skill and organisation are placed at the service of all causes, without reference to creed, which require them. The Salvation Army to-day is not a proselytising body. At any rate, proselytising is not its main object. Its chief aim is to do whatever good it can to individuals and groups of them in the pure spirit of service. By adopting the dress and learning the language of the people, and conforming as far as possible to their mode of life, the Army has opportunities of influence not open to other missionary bodies.

Christ's Message to India:—Mr. John S. Hoyland who has frequently written in these columns is given the first place in the current Nineteenth Century and After, one of the leading English monthlies, for his paper entitled "The presentation of the Christian message to India". Mr. Hoyland says that the position of the Christian missionary in India has entirely changed during the past fifteen years. The War, in his opinion, has discredited Western civilization in the eyes of India and Christianity as associated with that civilization, has shared in the discredit. The Christian missionary has, therefore, to show that Christianity and Western civilization are not the same, that they are different, and that the failure of the latter is not the failure of Christianity. More. The missionary should seek the help of the East in finding the true meaning of Christ. This is admirably put, and if Christian Missionaries as a class are willing to accept this mission of co-operation in the understanding and application of Christ to present-day world problems as their principal function in India, a very important step would be taken in the harmonization of Indian and European religious life. This cannot but gradually extend to other spheres, and we shall have a movement which may mean the redemption of humanity from its communal and national rivalries. Mr. Hoyland points out that humility and teachableness must be present in the Missionary in order to understand his duties in this sense, and more than these, there must be love for the people. Referring to those who say that they cannot love Indians, he gives examples from his own personal experience of how loveable they can be, and furthermore, he holds that "it is possible to train oneself in love, not only in the avoidance of everything that would give offence or hurt sensitive feelings, but in the genuine affection of one's heart for those whom one would serve. Above all, this gift of love is to be sought and gained through prayer". After mentioning several ways in which the Christian message might be given to India, Mr. Hoyland concludes that "the best of all ways of presenting the Christian message to India is that of the Good Samaritan". Finally, he emphasises his conclusion "that all consideration of the task of presenting the Christian message to India is essentially secondary to, and dependent upon, the work of the Spirit of God in the heart of His people". If the inspiration is absent in the heart, the work of the Missionary will be mechanical and without point. The article is a valuable contribution to the discussion initiated in these columns by the letter of "Perplexed". We have received several letters by way of comment on that letter. We publish some to-day and shall publish more next week.

The Bombay Strike Situation:—Sir Frederick Sykes has come down to Bombay to see what he can do to compose the differences between the millowners and workers which have led to the present prolonged strike. His Excellency and Sir Ghulam Hussain Hidayatulla, the Member of Government in charge of General affairs, have been holding conferences with representatives of all interests and social workers. Dr. Clifford Manshardt of the Nagpada Neighbourhood Home, whose admirable little weekly talks in these columns are a source of inspiration to many readers, was one of the first to be called in consultation by the Governor on arriving in Bombay from Poona on Tuesday. Social work, it is evident, has a strong appeal for Sir Frederick Sykes. His Excellency personally went the round of the workers' chawls on Thursday, making sympathetic enquiries of them. This is not his first visit to them as one of the first things he did when he took charge of his office, was to make a thorough inspection of the poorest quarters of the city. The Governor's visit and his kindly talks have broken the impression in the workers' minds that they were without any one to think of them except the leaders of the Girni Kamgar Union. A visiting Committee of sympathetic men and women of position following the lead of his Excellency, will go a greater way towards solving the deadlock than any mere method of prosecutions. Both the Governor and the General Member have the interests of the workers close to their hearts, and we are confident that their efforts to settle the present strike which, by the way, has been needlessly embittered by the use of harsh words on both sides, will be rewarded with success.)

Newspapers and Advertisements:—The Christian Missionary weekly, Indian Witness in the course of a lengthy article on the reform of advertisements has the following observations to make:—"We congratulate the Pioneer for its perception of this evil and its courage in denouncing it. But the Pioneer has not pursued the subject of newspaper responsibility for the content of its advertising columns far enough. Had it done so it would have recognized a need for reform in its own practices. Its advertising columns contain many recommendations of alcoholic liquor. The use of alcohol is the cause of incalculable harm to the human race. The most virulent opponents of Prohibition do not attempt to make anyone believe that the traffic in alcoholic liquors is an asset to the race. By selling its space for use in stimulating the demand for alcohol the Pioneer is departing from the ethical practices that ought to characterize every honourable newspaper. Having so nobly taken its stand for the cleansing of the advertising columns of its Indian-owned contemporaries we hope the Pioneer will soon decide to cleanse its own columns from the advertisements that make it a menace to many of its readers". Our contemporary would have done well to have addressed its salutary advice to all the Anglo-Indian journals, for the Pioneer is not the only offender in this respect. In exhorting them to give up publishing alcohol advertisements, we would cite the example of Punch in England, which about two years ago decided to eschew such advertisements from its columns. And why confine our attention to the advertisement columns alone? Why not pay equal heed to what appears in the literary columns under the direct eye of the editor? We can supply our contemporary excerpts and pictures from reputable Anglo-Indian papers which no Indian paper would care to publish. Indian and Anglo-Indian papers can help each other to maintain a high level more by sympathetic suggestion than by censorious criticism.

South African Election:—The Nationalist Party of which General Hertzog is the leader has emerged triumphant from the recent elections in South Africa with a clear majority. This bodes good for the Indians in that country, as the Cape Town Agreement formed one of the main issues on which the elections were fought. The verdict of the voters has gone against General Smuts and his rabid anti-Indian policy and has declared itself emphatically in favour of the enlightened and far-sighted policy of the Nationalist leader. There is much dissatisfaction among the Indians that the operation of the Agreement has not been on the same liberal lines on which it was conceived. While the Indians have carried out their part of the programme, the Whites have always kept in view their own interests to the detriment of the former. General Hertzog who has shown time and again that he is anxious to see justice done to the Indians will, we hope, initiate a vigorous policy recognizing the Indian settlers as the children of the soil and not as aliens.

Age of Consent Committee's Recommendations:—At last the labours of the Age of Consent Committee have been concluded, for it is stated that the report was signed on Thursday last at Mussoorie and is being submitted to the Government of India. From the scanty information available, it is gathered that the report is unanimous on the main points and recommends fourteen years as the minimum marriageable age for girls. The report recommends fifteen years for the age of consent within marital cases, and eighteen in extra marital cases. It is further mentioned in the Associated Press message that Moulvi Mahomed Yakub in a Note of dissent points out that a sufficient number of Muslim witnesses were not examined in the Committee and adds that he proposes that any legislation based on the report should be applicable to any particular province only, if the Legislative Council of that province ratifies the measure. It was the duty of the Moulvi Sahab and his Muslim colleagues in the Committee to have seen that Muslim opinion was adequately expressed before them. As regards the second point in the Note of dissent it is a matter of common knowledge that the criminal laws of the land have universal application and no part of the country can be excluded from its operation. We reserve our comments until the publication of the report.

Widow Marriage:—The disgraceful scenes that were reported to be the sequel to a meeting in Karachi of Santanists and Reformers who came to blows on the question of widow marriage do credit to neither party. The widow marriage question may be considered as good as settled with the passing of the Widow Marriage Act of 1856 since when, such marriages have been common and given prominence in the press. Those who oppose widow marriages are labouring under a misapprehension that each and every widow is required to marry. Statistics show that almost all the cases of widow marriages are those of young girls who were the victims of child marriage. There are many widows who have undergone professional training as teachers; nurses and doctors and who have made themselves useful to society in their different capacities. Recognising the hardship to which widows are subjected, the Poona Seva Sadan Society and the several Widows' Homes have espoused their cause, inculcating in them the ideal of social service. The bigoted Sanatanists, while they have the license to marry as many times as they choose, want to deny the right of remarriage to widows. Their zeal is worthy of a better cause than hectoring the helpless widows.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, JUNE 22, 1929.

PROHIBITION IN INDIA.

On Saturday and Sunday last, the Eighth Bombay Temperance Conference held its session in Bombay under the presidentship of Sir Purshotamdas Thakoredas. The President began his address by remarking that he was not a Temperance man and has never joined a Temperance association because he was a Prohibitionist. As a fact, the title "Temperance" is a survival from the old days, and the Conference, though still called by that name, is a staunch advocate of Prohibition as every one of the resolutions and the speeches thereon unmistakably showed. Sir Purshotamdas in his address emphasised the importance of the question being dealt with by the Central Government as an All-India one. The efforts, such as they have been, of the Provincial Governments to make a beginning in the direction of Prohibition, have been nullified by the unresponsive attitude of the Government of India. It must be explained that while the excise on country liquor is a provincial, transferred subject, that is, a subject delegated to the Provincial Governments and administered by an Indian Minister chosen from among the elected members of the Legislative Council, the duty on imported foreign liquor is levied by the Central Government. The Bombay Government have been following a policy of restricting the consumption of country liquor, but as the Central Government would not follow a corresponding policy in regard to foreign liquor, the decrease in the consumption of the former has been counteracted to a considerable extent by the substitution of cheap foreign liquor. Sir Chunilal Mehta, the first Excise Minister under the Reforms, who introduced the rationing system, told the Conference how the Government of India opposed a small increase in the transit duty on foreign liquor which he had levied, and which Provincial Governments were entitled to levy, with a view to check to some small extent the increase in the consumption of foreign liquor. The attitude of the Government of India at present is thus not only one of indifference but of active hostility to the adoption of Prohibition.

The Mussalman and Hindus who constitute nine-tenths of the Indian people are by religious precept and social opinion forbidden to drink. And a considerable proportion of them still adhere to this wholesome prohibition. The national policy as regards liquor, therefore, may be said to be total prohibition. But the Government policy is, to use the official formula "the maximum of revenue with the minimum of consumption". Experience has shown that the former half of the formula has been more sedulously pursued than the latter half. The effort to raise the revenue has inevitably raised consumption also. The fallacy of the formula is shown by the fact that the moment the excise revenue (and consumption) showed a real tendency to decrease the excise officials discovered an alarming increase in "illicit manufacture and consumption", and have been pressing Government to renounce the policy of rationing as leading to these offences. As Sir Chunilal Mehta said that the object of his policy was to reduce consumption: a reduction of revenue was bound to follow; illicit offences also were bound to rise but if the preventive staff did its duty, they could be put down. The abandonment of his policy, therefore, can only mean that the Government were not in earnest when they accepted Prohibition as the goal of their Excise policy. Sir Frederick Sykes, the present Governor of Bombay, has shown himself, during the few months he has been here, to be an earnest student of social questions. We trust that his Excellency will help his Minister who is himself a convinced Prohibitionist, to enforce his policy against the obstructive attitude of the officials hardened in the old tradition. The stoppage of the drink traffic, we may assure him, will have a direct effect in reducing much of the industrial unrest, and what is more, it will put Britain right with India on a question which, more than almost any other, concerns the happiness and well being of women and children in the Presidency. Let Bombay under his leadership set an example to the rest of India of how to make India and Great Britain co-workers for the lasting good of the people of both countries.

The Conference placed on record its considered opinion that the so-called Advisory Committees which are appointed to assist the Excise officials in ascertaining local feeling in regard to the number and location of liquor shops, were a farce. More than one speaker bore testimony from his experience as a member of such a committee that its composition and mode of transacting business, were absolutely faulty and there was no good trying to mend them. The Conference advocated a complete system of Local Option as the only sure way of allowing local opinion to determine local needs, and as a method of gradual approach to Prohibition. Miss Ruppell, an American Christian Mission lady, who moved the resolution, pointed out that Local Option in the United States did much to pave the way to Prohibition. Dr. Abdullah bin Abdullah wished to exclude so-called "vice areas" from the scope of the resolution on the ground that they are sure to vote for liquor shops. The Conference, however, declined to make any exception for the reason that the "vice areas" cannot be regarded as permanently given over to vice and that with proper propaganda, these areas too can and should be reclaimed. What are called "vice areas" are the areas where the women participators in vice live; the men participators live in the "respectable" areas which are not supposed thereby to be incapable of exercising the power of Local Option!

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XXV. PEOPLE OF OTHER LANDS.

(By DR. CLIFFORD MANSCHARDT, PH.D.).

The world traveller is continually amazed at the likenesses he finds in every country. The people wear somewhat different clothing, and observe somewhat different customs, but down beneath it all there is a real sameness. The primitive groups are interested in marriage, reproduction, and the stern demands of every-day living. The intellectual groups are concerned with politics, economics, social problems, art, philosophy and religion. Cultural and environmental differences cause these problems to be approached from different angles, but each group is making its contribution.

The main reason we do not respect the abilities of the people of other lands is because we do not know these people. We look upon ourselves as divinely chosen, but our knowledge of other nationals is strangely limited. We refer to a nation as "Germans", "Turks", "Bolsheviks", or "Fascists", and then proceed to designate the entire group as bad. We forget that a nation is a complex thing, unable to be understood without study. If we ever hope to have world peace it must be upon the basis of mutual understanding. Our children should be acquainted not only with their own national tradition and heritage, but also with the achievements of other nations. Our schools present courses in many less important subjects, why should they not introduce courses in international appreciation? Why should our young not be acquainted with that which is of worth in all lands? The humanizing of knowledge will go far in solving the problem of inter-racial contracts.

At a time when there is so much loose talk concerning racial superiority and inferiority, it is well to call to mind that keen students of the racial problem have come to look upon the matter of racial superiority as a cultural rather than a biological difference. A dark race is not inferior to a lighter race because of its colour. If there is any superiority or inferiority, it is due to a difference in culture. Biology advances no good reason why the members of one race should have a superior mental capacity to the members of another. The difference between races is more often due to difference in opportunity than to difference in ability. Geography and climate also enter into the situation. Modern scientific research is serving to confirm the thesis that the nations of the world are "of one blood", having "diversities of gifts, but the same spirit".

The idea of the interdependence of nations is slowly penetrating the national consciousness. If the war did nothing else, it taught us that no nation can live to itself alone. Social change in Russia; unsettlement in Germany; discontent in Balkans; a rising nationalism in India and China; the growing financial power of the United States—all have their effect upon the life of the world. There is no avail in shutting our eyes and shouting "Peace", when there is no peace. There is avail in facing the facts and striving mightily to make peace a reality.

"CONFESSIONS OF A MISSIONARY."

I.

REFLECTIONS OF AN AMERICAN BISHOP.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

With deep sympathy and interest I have read the communication in your issue of June 8th entitled, "Confessions of a Missionary". As I came to the end of that statement, I found myself saying,— "Surely there ought to be a place in India for such a man, and for his wife".

Let me say that it is thirty years ago this month since I was appointed a missionary to India by the Methodist Episcopal Church of America. My father, after nineteen years of happy and enthusiastic missionary service for India, died on this field in 1891. I am glad and thankful to say that my missionary life in India has been full of the deepest satisfaction, and has held for me rewards so rich that I have never for an hour coveted anything that America might have offered.

SITUATION NOT DISCOURAGING.

There are many difficulties and problems in the task to which a missionary in India gives himself, and, as your correspondent reveals in his confessions, there are things that discourage. Had I the opportunity, I should like to say to him that he should not think of giving up his work in India. The very fact that progress is slow and that ignorance, combined with force of customs and superstitions of long standing, render the task arduous and discouraging, would indicate the need in India of those who can help in raising the level of thought and life. His narrative is itself a clear indication of the need of his own and his wife's help.

I believe I am right in holding that, despite all the difficulties and discouragements, India offers to the Christian missionary the most responsive and fruitful field of the world. Not only in the matter of the numbers of those who have responded to the Gospel of Christ, but also in the depth of understanding of and devotion to Christ on the part of thousands of India's choicest sons and daughters, we have the surest indication that those who have brought the evangel of Christ to this land, and are trying to live according to his divine principles and laws, are making the best possible investment of their lives. The instances that are cited by "Perplexed" are surely cause enough to bring about dissatisfaction, but do not furnish a reason for leaving people who are in such desperate need. After all, we have not only social and religious customs to deal with, but personal habits. I find it difficult to understand why an Englishman, with all his knowledge of physiology and hygiene will persist in drinking alcoholic beverages to the detriment of himself, his family and his income. Being an orthodox American, I am puzzled also as to why governments that have the highest welfare of their subjects at heart, should refuse to pass laws that would eliminate the loss and suffering that come to their subjects through the sanctioned sale of liquors that cause drunkenness and drugs that demoralize. My only answer is that the governments do it as an apparently easy way to get revenue, and that people keep up these practices because they have become habituated to them. Such people and such governments need help and enlightenment, and a true follower of the Lord Jesus Christ will spend his or her life in an earnest effort to establish a kingdom of righteousness, which is the Kingdom of God, on earth. To leave the situation because it is difficult, or the results discouraging, would be to prove recreant to the heroic Christ who Himself was "obedient unto death."

It is inspiring to me to note the high motives that have kept "Perplexed" and his wife at their difficult and, in so many ways, unpleasant task in India. If it were not for such souls in every part of the world, life would be far less endurable. India certainly can ill afford to lose such selfless workers. Who would not be proud of anyone working with such a self-sacrificing spirit as the wife of "Perplexed"? It is a heartening picture he has drawn of her beautiful and helpful ministry for the poor and suffering. Of those who are around her some may not appreciate such devotion, and some may attribute it to wrong motives, but surely there are those among the Indians who feel grateful and will prove themselves worthy of such kindness, so freely bestowed. India can love, and does love, such people. My testimony is that there are warm hearts in this land, that friendliness gains an instant response, and courtesy is met more than half-way. There is opposition, of course, but much of it is due to misunderstanding, and a great deal of it can be overcome by love that does not stop at sacrifice. It was such a price our divine Redeemer paid, and no less a price will win people to Him and help to establish His kingdom on earth.

A "DEADSET" AGAINST WHAT?

Referring to opposition to the missionary on the part of non-Christians in India, I am surprised that there is not more of it. While it is wrong to say that Christian missionaries are making a "deadset" against Hinduism, or any other religion, it is true that they are and, in keeping with Christ's teachings and commands, must be opposed to much that Hinduism includes within its beliefs and practices. Among these things I would name the following:—Idolatry, in all its forms and degrees; the doctrine of Karma; the belief in transmigration of souls; Caste, in all its ramifications; Untouchability; Cow worship, and in any religious sense, the "protection" of the cow; the system of the priesthood as it operates at Benares, Brindaban, Muttra and elsewhere; the practice of having Devadasis; Suttee, with whatever motives it may be accompanied; Child marriage; Enforced widowhood; the entire Pardah system; Mendicancy, with its religious basis, resulting in the creation of millions of sadhus and faquires; and the system of pilgrimages as now in vogue. I am not concerned, for the moment, as to whether Christianity's opposition to these things is right or wrong. The point is that the extent to which Hinduism holds these beliefs and engages in these practices is the extent to which Christian missionaries must be opposed to Hinduism. It is possible that the list as I have made it would be modified by a consensus of Christian opinion, though I do not think, very greatly. Now, in regard to such things, personally I would admit that there is a "deadset" against them on the part of Christian missionaries. Any other attitude would be impossible, but in opposing them there is no thought of opposing the Hindu people. As we consider it, the interests of the Hindus demand that these beliefs be discarded and these practices abandoned. Love is the dominating motive of Christianity, and the true follower of Christ will make this apparent even where he opposes what he believes to be untrue or unwise. Nevertheless, this opposition on the part of Christian missionaries to so many things that are within the pale of Hinduism as we know it, would naturally lead to counter opposition.

LET US REASON TOGETHER.

Why should we not, as "Perplexed" pleads, "search for the truth together"? The tests, scientific and practical, to which Christianity has been subjected and which it is still facing, are not tests that Hinduism or any other religion can evade. All that cannot stand the test of true reason and the practical needs of humanity, should be given up. The past one hundred years have seen many changes in Hinduism, and I think the next fifty years will see many more. As true well-wishers of India, Christian missionaries intend to stay here and continue the work of teaching, even though there were ten times the opposition there now is. No intelligent man need be in doubt as to why we have come or why we remain. A reading of the entire Gospel of Christ, including His exclusive claims for Himself and his Last Great Command, not a mere skimming of such portions as may happen to fit in with or please the notions of any particular group of India's people, will make clear the objectives, programme, methods and spirit of Christ. As nearly as it is possible for us, we seek to do His will in the situation that faces us. While it is the constraining love of Christ that keeps us steadily at our difficult tasks, we rejoice in the love and friendship of hosts of India's people who have welcomed us and accept us as true friends of this great land.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

Appreciating the spirit in which you have published the "Confessions of a Missionary", I gladly respond to your invitation to express my opinion, not so much because I think my opinion will help greatly in clarifying the issue, but because I welcome the friendliness of your invitation. You will pardon me for saying that I have felt the Social Reformer, recently has been inclined to carry a religious chip on its shoulder. Perhaps I have been mistaken. At any rate nothing could be in better spirit than the way you have presented the rather long wail of my missionary brother, whoever he may be.

What I say is said with the kindest intent, but since a frank discussion has been invited and since many will have been inclined to look upon the "Confessions" as typical, I feel the case has been lifted out of its personal relationships and must be treated absolutely on its merits as I see them. It matters not who the writer is. He may be well-known to me. He may have a hundred explanations and excuses for his attitudes. That is beside the mark. The whole case stands or falls by what he has said and it is to this I am attempting to address myself impartially and sincerely.

My advice to the brother is not to return to India if his life here is not yielding him greater spiritual returns than his letter indicates. There seems to be far too much of self protruding in what he says, to make it possible for him to humbly serve, not counting the cost but only seeking the opportunity.

He has charged Miss Mayo with unfairly presenting conditions in India. But what has he himself done? He has certainly presented extreme examples. Has his doctor wife never set a broken arm, applying splints, for a patient who has gratefully accepted the service and tried faithfully to follow the instructions given? One man dismissed his doctor wife and called in a hakim and the man's wife died. Yes, but has his doctor wife never treated the wife of an Indian neighbor who implicitly trusted her and proudly exhibited the son or daughter who had been ushered into this world under the doctor Memsahiba's skillful supervision?

Much of the good brother's plaint seems to have originated in the realm of the medical department. He doesn't seem to take naturally to surgery and my advice is for him not to hang around the dispensary so much. I fear he may be a bit of a wet blanket there unless he is very, very careful. I would like to hear his wife's report. I will guarantee she would give us a very different picture using exactly the same colours.

And regarding the other matters of social and religious standards and practices to which he takes exception, I wonder if he thought these things would be changed just to keep them from getting on his nerves? Who is suffering from the conditions he depicts and which are so well known to us all? You might think, from his putting of it, that his own inconvenience or offended sensibilities are the most serious considerations to be faced.

I do not wish to be unfair to one who doubtless is sincere in his perplexity and who, probably before this, wishes he had held to his original instructions, not to publish. What he has said does not represent him at his best. He needs a furlough. But he will want to come back. He will see things in a different light when he has been away from India for two months. He will realize again the great opportunities for loving service.

I agree with him that we should all be more friendly in our religious differences. But men do not seem to be so constructed. I do not expect an orthodox Hindu or Moslem to see eye to eye with me. Nor do I expect them to join me in my religious hopes for India. But I would be happy if they could bring themselves to give religious liberty to their brethren who may wish to seriously investigate the teachings of Jesus. I do believe India would be in a better way to reach her religious goal if her young men could feel perfectly free to study the teachings of Jesus, without any compulsion from the Missionary and without any fear of being out-casted by their brethren, and could thus calmly ponder together as to whether Jesus really spoke truly when he said, "I am come that they might have life and that they might have it more abundantly". Yes, I have longed for the day when men of education and position might feel free to come to me and talk about their spiritual problems. Will that day ever come? Quite probably not. But in the meantime I shall stay in the offing doing what I can to help and encourage those who do come to me and those I happen to find who want my help. Some day the tyranny of caste and sect may be done away with and then I want to be where I can easily be reached by any who may want to find me.

I do not worry or bother about whether others may think I am wasting my time. I despise the word "sacrifice" as used in connection with the high privilege of going any where, at any time to be a witness for my Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. The joy and peace that fills my soul in the midst of conditions that may, at times, be somewhat unlovely, are but the fulfillment of the promise that Jesus made when he said, "Blessed are ye when men shall reproach you, and persecute you, and say all manner of evil against you falsely for my sake. Rejoice and be exceeding glad". What excuse can a Christian missionary have for ever failing to radiate joy and good cheer? Even if things were pretty bad for him, which they are not, he could still fall back upon the boundless source of all strength and, "rejoice and be exceeding glad."

But India has gone out of her way to make me feel at home. Her sons and daughters are my brothers and sisters. Why should I wish to leave? And in these days when we are emphasizing the need for internationalism, why should India not be the place where all the world may behold men and women of all the nations working bravely and patiently together for the highest good of all? St. Paul has given the Christians their chart and compass by which, if we sail, we cannot fail to find opportunities to do good nor can we fail to find joy in companionship with those who seek to know God. In Colossians 3: 12 he says, "Put on therefore, as God's elect, holy and beloved, a heart of compassion, kindness, lowliness, meekness, longsuffering; forbearing one another and forgiving each other if any man have a complaint against any; even as the Lord forgave you, so also do ye: and above all these things put on love which is the bond of perfectness". This is the "love" of which Paul speaks in I, Corinthians, 13:4, "Love suffereth long and is kind.....beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things. Love never faileth".

As Christian missionaries if we become discouraged or if we fail to find joy in whatever service we are called upon to render, it must be because we have ceased to be actuated wholly by this love of God which "hath been shed abroad in our hearts through the Holy Spirit".

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I read the "Confessions" and I think "Perplexed" has answered his own arguments. In the first place he will not allow us to use the "Tu quo que" or the fault of Government arguments and is quite free himself to compare our apathy with Japanese energy. I think he should not return, not because his twenty years have been wasted here—far from it—but because we are the people who must do the job for we can understand our people and sympathise with them and are not doing things with the impression that after all we may be wasting our time and energy on the work. His arguments about the Arya Samaj Missionary are equally applicable to the attitude of the Christian Missionary to the Indian reformer and worker. His charge against idol worship is all nonsense, because every religion has deteriorated to this and it can only be called idol worship when a man knowing the truth bows down to "false gods" and this form of idol worship is more common among Christians than among us. His reference to Christ at the end verges on the ludicrous and I think that if all these things had been cut out his "perplexity" would have solved itself. So also his reference both at the beginning and end to his relations. His main charge is quite true, but that can only be cured by us and the educated in this country dare not go to the villages to work, because they will be swamped if they do so. Another twenty-five years and a more intelligent educational system will see an educated class ready to go out and work. Meanwhile we should not expect high morality, character and gentlemanliness on Rs. 7 a month or even less.

BOMBAY PROHIBITION CONFERENCE.

The eighth Bombay Temperance Conference was held at Blavatsky Hall, French Bridge, on Saturday and Sunday. Sir Purshottamdas Thakurdas, M.L.A. presided. Mr. K. Natarajan, Chairman of the Reception Committee, welcoming the audience said that though it was called a temperance conference they were really there to promote and demand prohibition for the whole of India. Temperance had become an old word and it had done good work; the watch word now was 'prohibition'. He could say with confidence that the national policy of India in regard to liquor was prohibition, but the Government policy was different. It was the object of the Conference to bring the Government policy into line with the national policy.

The prohibition movement in India, continued Mr. Natarajan, suffered from certain disabilities. The most serious of these was the water-tight division of the society in which the higher and educated sections of people were total abstainers and for whom the necessity of prohibition did not exist. They were not concerned with prohibition because they were free from the evil of drink. The imitation of Western customs, when English education was first introduced into the country, included drinking and when it was found that some of the best intellects of the country were blasted by that evil the reaction against Western manners began.

When movements of reform were started against such evils as drink and social abuses the leaders of such movements were suspected of advocating social license in the name of social reform. They had to remove that misunderstanding and to show that reform did not mean following the West but driving out everything that was socially bad. At the present time he could say from experience things were much better. Nearly all the public men of India were total abstainers and even those who were not disinclined to an occasional drink had now totally given it up. So far as the intellectual classes of India were concerned it could be safely said that the drink problem did not exist.

GREAT HARM TO INDUSTRIAL WORKERS.

The problem existed chiefly for the masses, particularly the industrial workers of big cities and industrial centres. It had been proved that the industrial workers of Bombay had spent whatever increases they got in wages during the boom period in the drink shops. It was a maxim of psychology that when people lacked higher and healthy pleasures they chose lower and often injurious pleasures. The life of the industrial worker was such that lacking healthy and beneficial recreations he was forced to resort to stimulants of an intoxicating nature. The drink had done great harm to the industrial workers. They should be saved from this temptation by removing liquor shops and making it inaccessible to them. If that is done, they would be able to spend their earnings on the education of their children and on the improvement of their social conditions. Not only as a matter of social reform, but also from the interest of industry the introduction of prohibition was most important.

PROHIBITION FOR INDIA.

The Conference would pass a resolution advocating prohibition for India. He thought prohibition would not be a difficult problem for a country like India, the major portions of whose population were against drinking liquor. He regarded the advent of the Labour Government in England as a favourable circumstance to the promotion of prohibition in India, for the Labour Party included many who were prohibitionists and total abstainers. They would sympathise with India in her demand for prohibition if she believed that it was to her interest.

Another source of strength to the movement in India was the Christian Mission. He was glad to say that the Rev. Edwards in a memorandum to the Simon Commission had strongly pressed for the introduction of prohibition in India at the next grant of reforms. They had now to press the Government of India to adopt the beneficial measure and also to appeal to the Princes of India to be true to their traditions by adopting prohibition in their territories. They should also see that all their national leaders and public men were abstainers and in favour of prohibition.

Mr. Gilder, then read messages from those who could not attend the Conference. The Hon. Mr. Jadhav, the Excise Minister, regretted his inability to attend, but expressed full sympathy with the object of the Conference and wished it success.

PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS.

Sir Purshottamdas Thakurdas who was elected President of the Conference then delivered his presidential address extempore. He said that what India wanted was not temperance, but prohibition. The two great communities of the country, Hindus and Mussalmans were not addicted to drink—liquor being banned both by custom and religion. To talk of temperance, which meant moderation in drink, when the predominant feeling in the country was against all kinds of drink, was in his opinion a retrograde step. What India really wanted was complete prohibition.

The President, continuing, said that he first came to be interested in the problem after his entry into the Legislative Assembly. When the first resolution demanding prohibition was moved in the Assembly by a Mussalman gentleman, Sir Basil Blackett, the then Finance Member said that Government were not prepared to consider the question of prohibition, because the country could not afford it from a financial point of view. It was that statement of the Finance Member which made him study the subject deeply. Since then he had taken pains to study the facts and figures in regard to the experiment being made in America. And inspite of all the stories spread by the Government of India about the failure of prohibition in America, he believed that America had attained very good results and would in a generation or two be in the same condition as India was in olden days in regard to the drink problem.

GOVERNMENT'S LIQUOR POLICY.

Without going into the details of his enquiries into the liquor policy of the Government of India he would say that since 1903-4 the liquor revenue of the Government had gone up from 7½ crores to 21½ crores in 1923-24. The bulk of the increase was due to imported staff. Foreign liquor was allowed to be imported free of duty and it was replacing country liquor. It was not fair, he argued, to increase the import of foreign liquor at the expense of the native staff which was placed under some restrictions. He regarded both foreign and indigenous liquor as harmful and he wanted that both should be restricted.

He was aware of the financial difficulties in the way of introducing prohibition, but at the same time the degradation and deterioration of the people of the country should not be allowed to go on by the consumption of liquor. The Government had tried the policy of rationing for some time. They have now gone back upon it on the ground that it failed inasmuch as it was followed by increased illicit distillation. The remedy for illicit distillation was not to open more shops and increase the supply of licit liquor, but to find out why the policy of rationing adopted by Government and endorsed by the Council proved a failure.

He concluded by expressing his admiration for the work of Mr. Gandhi and Vallabhai Patel in regard to temperance and suggested that members of Councils and the Assembly must be made to declare themselves in favour of prohibition.

The following resolutions were adopted,—Resolution I. Having regard to the various difficulties in introducing effective prohibition in India through the Provincial Governments, this Conference is of the considered opinion that the only real and effective solution lies in the adoption and steady pursuance of a policy of prohibition by the Government of India in co-operation with provincial governments and Indian States, Resolution II. This Conference places on record its considered opinion that the Excise Advisory Committees as at present constituted are a farce, and do not serve the purpose for which they were intended, viz., the determination of the number and location of liquor shops in accordance with the wishes of the residents of the locality. It is of the opinion that nothing short of a complete system of Local Option will meet the present needs of the situation and pave the way for Prohibition. Resolution III. This Conference deplors that the Government of Bombay have, notwithstanding their repeated declarations gone back on the measures of rationing and reduction of the strength of liquor which were calculated to further prohibition which the Government accepted as the goal, and even restored in the city of Bombay the discredited fixed fee system, in place of the auction system, with its notorious possibilities of corruption and the creation of vested interests calculated to hamper the introduction of Prohibition. Resolution IV. This Conference requests the President to forward these Resolutions to the Government of India and the Government of Bombay.

THE INDIAN DIVORCE ACT.

NEED FOR AMENDMENT.

A lacuna of serious import in the law of divorce as administered in British India was disclosed in a matrimonial matter which came up recently before the Hon. Mr. Justice Kemp.* In this case the petitioner—husband petitioned for dissolution of his marriage with the respondent, his wife, on the ground of adultery with the co-respondent. The respondent denied the adultery and counterclaimed that the petitioner had during the time the parties cohabited together, been guilty of adultery. The respondent further charged the petitioner with cruelty and desertion for one year and seven months and prayed for a judicial separation. The co-respondent denied the adultery alleged.

The parties to the suit professed the Roman Catholic religion and were domiciled in India. There were two children (boys) of the marriage. One of the children lived with the petitioner and the other with the respondent.

Prior to the suit, the respondent had filed a complaint in the Police Court for maintenance. The Magistrate directed Rs 30 per month to be paid to the respondent for the maintenance of the child in her custody. After the petitioner filed the suit in the High court, the Police Court complaint so far as it remained undisposed of (i.e., as to the maintenance, if any, to be allowed to the respondent) was dismissed for non-appearance.

The adultery charged against the respondent was in respect of her stay at three different places with the co-respondent. His Lordship found adultery not proved at the first two places and held it proved at the last place of residence of the respondent and the co-respondent.

His Lordship further found that the petitioner also was living in adultery and that the respondent was justified in declining to live with the petitioner because of the woman with whom the petitioner had committed adultery staying in the same house with the petitioner.

His Lordship was satisfied on the evidence that the petitioner did not properly maintain the respondent and her child. His Lordship held that the respondent's misconduct with the co-respondent was the direct result of the straitened circumstances to which her husband had reduced her. His Lordship concluded the judgment, which was a considered one, as follows:—

“I find on the evidence that (1) petitioner has been guilty of adultery with Soni; (2) petitioner has been guilty of desertion towards the respondent since February 1927 but not for two years. The petitioner was the cause of the cohabitation ceasing by keeping Soni and thereby compelling his wife to leave the house at Sholapur some time in March 1927. The suit was filed in August 1928. The money he allowed her was not sufficient for the maintenance of herself and her child; (3) petitioner has been guilty of legal cruelty towards respondent. He so treated her as to cause reasonable apprehension of suffering or injury to her both physically and mentally. We have Dr. Batliwala's evidence on this point of her wretched state of health and the petitioner's letter of 28-10-26 which was a most cruel and filthy letter to write (see Russel v. Russel, 1895, p. 315 Walmsley v. Walmsley, 1893; 69 L. T. 152). When he wrote the letter of 28-10-26, there was no adultery or misconduct between respondent and corespondent.

I find further that respondent has been guilty of adultery with co-respondent at Haroon Building but that the petitioner's conduct conduced to it and that she was at the date of the suit living under co-respondent's protection. It remains to consider the law applicable to these findings. The petitioner's petition for dissolution of the marriage is dismissed. As to the respondent her prayer is for judicial separation. Here the Court has to decide according to the principles and rules in force in England (Act IV of 1869, 2 V. 7). In the Ecclesiastical Courts, no relief was afforded to a guilty wife. I think the case of Everett v. Everett, 1919, p. 298 is applicable here. In cases of dissolution of marriage the Court like the Divorce Court in England has a free hand and is not hampered by the principles and rules of the Ecclesiastical Courts but the decree for judicial separation has taken the place of the Ecclesiastical decree—“a mensa at thoro” and this case must be decided on principles and rules as nearly as may be conformable to those on which the old Ecclesiastical Courts would have acted and those Courts would not have given relief to a wife under these circumstances. See also Othony v. Othony, 13 P. D. 141; Welton v. Welton, 1926-27. 43 T. L. R. 174 has no application. It was a case of grant of alimony pendente lite on a wife's petition for dissolution. I see no alternative but to dismiss the wife's counterpetition for a judicial separation. The co-respondent to pay his own costs throughout".

His Lordship accordingly dismissed the husband's petition with costs to respondent. His Lordship did not think the petitioner had sustained any real injury in the circumstances of the case by co-respondent's adultery with petitioner's wife, nor did the petitioner appear to have regarded his wife as of any value. His Lordship accordingly assessed the damages at one rupee against the co-respondent.

The practical result of the decision was that notwithstanding the unhappy circumstances attending their conjugal life, the petitioner and respondent continued in law as husband and wife. Notwithstanding the immoral character of each spouse held proved in the case, each retained the custody of one child. Although the Court found that the adultery of the wife had been conducted by the cruelty and immoral character of the husband, which compelled the wife to throw herself upon the protection of another person, the Court found itself without jurisdiction to make an order in the suit against the petitioner for the maintenance of the wife. Although the wife was compelled to seek shelter with her child with the co-respondent, to keep body and soul together, which led to the adultery with the co-respondent, no provision could be made by the Court for her future maintenance and she was left to shift for herself as best as he could.

Counsel for the respondent applied to the Court that under the circumstances of the case, the husband might be ordered to pay alimony to the wife. The learned Judge, however, was of the opinion that he had no jurisdiction to make the order in the suit. His Lordship said that he had to administer the law as he found it, and if any amendment was required, the matter was one for the Legislature.

The foregoing case is important inasmuch as it shows in what respects the Indian Law of Divorce stands in need of urgent amendment. In the first place the law ought to be amended so as to enable the Court to grant a decree for judicial separation to the wife in a case like the present, where the adultery of the wife is the direct result of or in other words, is conducted by the cruelty and misconduct of the husband, otherwise the consequences would be deplorable. It is admitted that in cases of dissolution of marriage the Court has a free hand and is competent to grant a decree for divorce to a wife who had been guilty under circumstances of the nature disclosed in the foregoing case. Modern opinion will undoubtedly support the plea for conferring the alternative or additional right upon the Court to grant judicial separation under the same circumstances. It is obvious that the wife would have played into the hands of the husband, if she had counterclaimed for divorce, when the guilty husband was himself praying for a divorce. Furthermore, it is inequitable that the wife should be driven to institute separate criminal proceedings against the husband for her maintenance. It should be competent to the Court, under like circumstances to make an order in the same suit, against the husband for the maintenance of the wife.

Apart from the legal questions involved, the case is one of profound interest to the sociologist. It shows up in a lurid light what a sordid life the lower middle classes are compelled to live in this city. The respondent, a young girl, came to Bombay from Goa in search of employment. She secured a job as an Ayah. Then she was taken up by the petitioner, who was a neighbour. The parties shifted from place to place finding it hard to make both ends meet. The petitioner tried his hand at several occupations, speculated, lost and had to take relief in insolvency. For a long time, the petitioner, the respondent, her sister and mother and an Ayah lived and slept together in a room 10 feet by 12. A cook and odd-job man slept outside in the verandah. The Petitioner misbehaved with the respondent's sister, who became enciente, was taken to a free Municipal hospital for being confined and there she died. From this unhappy household, the petitioner got a chance to escape by securing a job upcountry. There he took a mistress and set up an independent establishment. He at the same time ceased to support the petitioner and turned a deaf ear to all her entreaties for aid.

The respondent was alone with her child in Bombay. Her mother had left her and she did not know her whereabouts. She had no money to return to Goa. Creditors were pressing her. The landlord was threatening ejection. She sold her few sticks of furniture, but that did not yield enough to pay the debts and there was no food in the house. The child was seriously ill. She was in terrible grief and despair and at the end of all her resources. Death seemed to face her and her innocent child.

There is however an All Merciful Providence that looks after the waifs and strays of the world. In the midst of her distress and destitution, a Parsee gentleman, a medical practitioner took compassion on her and gave free treatment to her child and advised and consoled her. The child survived.

The respondent was without a home. One night, when it was raining hard, she took her child and her few belongings with her and went to the room occupied by the person who had once been employed by her husband as an odd-job man and cook. This person was eking out a bare subsistence for himself as commercial salesman, but on being made acquainted with her condition, he gave up his own room to her. He himself slept outside and took his food away from home whenever and wherever he could. Not only this, but he shared his scanty earnings with the respondent, by placing a few coins when he had them in the hands of the child, instead of giving them directly to the mother, so as not to hurt her feelings. Here was true Christian charity by the poor to the poor.

Some time after the respondent again found herself stranded with her child. This time the Hindu Ayah who had once nursed the respondent's child, and who had now nothing to expect from the respondent, took pity on her and gave her shelter and attended her. The Ayah's husband who was old and infirm beat her because she was neglecting him in favour of the respondent and her child, but the Ayah cheerfully put up with the punishment. The employers of the Ayah threatened to dismiss her from their service if she gave any of her time to the respondent and her child, but the Ayah managed to pacify them. Undeterred by fear of consequences, the gallant little Hindu soul loyally and selflessly stood by the Christian lady unto the last.

The Legal Aid Society took up the respondent's case and an order for the child's maintenance was obtained in the Police Court. The High Court litigation has also come and gone but the question remains; has the human tragedy been fully played out yet? The marriage tie between the petitioner and respondent subsists with all its implications. An innocent child is being reared up in the custody of each guilty spouse. The young wife is in Bombay entirely without means of subsistence, without a home of any sort and without any person to look after her and her child. The husband and wife are loose on society. What will be the denouement? Time alone can show.

Here is however a field for study for the sociologist, an object lesson for the worldly and a chance for the philanthropist.—Bombay Law Journal.

NOTES.

The Late Rev R. A. Hume:—The news of the death of the Rev. R. A. Hume who, as his father and grandfather before him and as his son and daughter at present, devoted the best part of a lifetime to the service of India, is a reminder that differences of race, colour and creed pale into insignificance in the presence of a dominant spiritual ideal. Mr. Hume was an active sympathiser and worker in every good cause, not only for his own particular christian community in Ahmednagar but for all classes of Indians. He was a familiar figure for many years at social and even political gatherings and his advice was always received with much respect. He regarded himself an Indian by birth and nationality and felt for our sufferings as one of ourselves. Though rather old-fashioned in his views about the proper attitude of the missionary towards non-Christian religions, Mr. Hume never allowed a single harsh or offensive word to escape him in whatever he said or did about them. His memory will be long cherished by his friends with affectionate regard as that of a great worker in India's service.

A good Samaritan:—The Rev. C. G. Early of Luxetypet, Nizam's Dominions, has hit upon a way of removing a wrong impression about India in the minds of the British public. He intends preparing an article for an English newspaper showing that there is another side to the picture of "Communal dissensions", "Racial difficulties", "Clash of colour" and so on, which is so much in evidence in the Press". He wants to tell the British public how much mutual liking and respect there really is between members of different communities and nationalities living in India. "Really", he writes, "there is much more affection and agreement between members of different communities than is generally recognised and I want to bring this fact into prominence." The method which Mr. Early has devised has the merit of being original. He is inviting a number of Indians connected with social and political movements to let him tell in as few words as possible "What I like about Englishmen" and "What I like about Mahomedans." At the same time, he is requesting a number of prominent Englishmen to tell him "What I like in Indians". Mr. Early feels convinced that if a number of people assist him in this matter, a useful article could be produced which will help to dissipate the ignorance which exists in England concerning Indian affairs. We think that an article of the kind intended may have that effect, and in any case it is worth while to write it. The British people is, like the people of other countries, mostly engrossed with its own problems. "Unemployment" in England is of greater importance to it than good government in India. Those who have an interest in this country are the persons who sell goods or seek employment and their relatives and friends. This class is interested in keeping up the impression that India is a land of irreconcilable race and religious antagonisms, which, but for its goods and men, will at once be plunged into primeval chaos. It is not that they do not know the truth, but that it is a matter of bread and butter to them to cherish a half-truth. English newspapers reflect largely the opinions of this class. We do not expect Mr. Early's article to have much effect in the direction of changing the attitude of this class and of the newspapers which serve its interests.

"What I like about Englishmen?":—Nevertheless, we have no hesitation in answering Mr. Early's questions. He has addressed them personally to the Editor, but we are sure he will not mind our preferring to answer them in these columns. In the first place, it saves time, in as much as our reply to Mr. Early also furnishes copy to the printers of the Reformer. In the next place, the attention of our readers is called to the questions, and there may be among them, persons who can give helpful answers but whom Mr. Early may not have included in his list: Mr. Early's question is "what I think about Englishmen", as a class and not as Englishmen as individuals. Among Englishmen as individuals, there may be innumerable varieties of taste and temperament, but the question is, What distinguishing characteristic of Englishmen as a people most appeals to us in their favour. The character of a group, as distinguished from individuals, is best judged not only from their reactions to current problems but by their history. So judged, the quality which we most appreciate in Englishmen is their wonderful genius for carrying through momentous revolutions with the least disturbance, in other words, their constitutional temper. The British constitution is far more unworkable as a piece of political mechanism than Indian diarchy. It is the constitutional mindedness of the people which has made it not only workable, but even to appear to be a model to the whole world. That this quality has not deserted the race, is shown by the astonishing ease with which the far-reaching social and political revolution implied by the accession of a Labour Ministry to power, has been effected. The latest news relating to the constitution of the Labour Government conveys a good impression both of the radical nature of the revolution and the smoothness with which it has been introduced. Three men from the ranks of workers, an ex-cab driver, Mr. Ben Smith, an ex-policeman Mr. John Henry Hayes, and a Glasgow labourer, long unemployed, Mr. Thomas Henderson have been appointed Treasurer of the Royal Household, Vice-Chamberlain, and Controller of the Royal Household respectively. These positions will bring their holders, as Reuter says, in close contact with the Court at St. James. Although it is a recognised right of the Prime Minister, since Sir Robert Peel's historic protest, to appoint the officials of the Royal Household, these appointments are always made with the approval and consent of the Sovereign. The fact that His Majesty the King has made no difficulty about having an ex-policeman, and Glasgow labourer as high Court officials about him, should convey a wholesome lesson to Indian Princes who object to their educated countrymen, as well-born, if that is anything, as themselves, being appointed to Political offices in their States. It is time that their Highnesses realised how out-of-date their ideas are of dignity and status. The only dignity which the modern world recognises is the dignity which comes of high moral character. We reserve Mr. Early's next question for answer next week.

Christian Missions' Work:—The Examiner of Bombay writes—"In an article on the 'Problem of Christian Missions', the Indian Social Reformer says that 'the value of missions as means of extending national influence has been increasingly present to the minds and in the policies of European statesmen and diplomatists'. We do not question the truth of this remark. Western politicians may look upon the missions as valuable instruments of national propaganda. But it must be borne in mind that Catholic missions are not under the control of European statesmen and diplomatists but the universal head of the Church. Their whole aim and purpose is the spread of the saving truths of Christianity and procure the eternal salvation of souls. It is no part of the business of the missionary to promote the interests of his country. We have in India missionaries of various nationalities but has ever a proof been adduced to throw even the shadow of a suspicion that they work as representatives of their respective countries? Every fair-minded Indian, who has some acquaintance with Catholic missions, must acknowledge that our missionaries forget the land of their birth and that their sole concern is the spiritual enlightenment and welfare of their adopted land." We are sure, as we made it clear in our editorial, that the missionaries, whether Protestant or Catholic, do not themselves consciously promote the national interests in the countries in which they serve. But all the same they are instruments and are made use of as such by their respective Governments and in this respect there is no difference between Catholic and Protestant as the Examiner implies there is. The action of the French Government to which we referred, makes this quite clear.

Education in Jaffna:—We have received a copy of the report of the Hindu Board for the Promotion of Education, Jaffna, Ceylon, for the five years since its foundation in December, 1923. The Board has now under its management no less than 55 schools with a total of 6915 scholars on their rolls. The income of the Board in 1928 was Rs. 96,700, of which nearly Rs. 74,500 was contributed by the Ceylon Government as grant and subsidy. We should have liked some information as to the courses of study and the grades of the schools. The Tamil language and the Saiva Siddhanta religion are taught in all the schools, but the education is of a modern type and English schools are conducted wherever there is a sufficient demand. Last year two new institutions were started at Tinnevely. These are the Saiva Training Institute and the Saiva Orphanage. S. Sabapathy Pillay of Tinnevely generously contributed to their funds. The orphanage which was opened on Vijayadasami day has already 63 children and more cannot be taken owing to lack of accommodation. The Board has done well in starting the Training Institute to provide trained teachers for its schools. The report gives an alphabetical list of subscribers, filling many pages, to its funds. The subscribers seem to be thoroughly representative, showing that the movement has the support of the entire Saiva Community. Among the helpers to the Board, is the Changanai Union of Malaya which supplied the furniture and equipment and has been defraying the salaries of teachers in one of the schools. The Pungudution Union of Malaya has rendered similar help towards the upkeep of another school. Referring to the Training Institute, the report closes with an eloquent appeal to all Saivaites to 'visualise the magnificent halls of Saiva and Tamil learning which will come into being, accommodating three to four hundred students living on the premises trained in the noblest Saiva ideals and practices amidst the elevating influence of Saiva atmosphere, and giving into the wide world with consuming passion to extend the Saiva influence and to carry the Saiva message to the ends of the world, as did our ancestors in the past'.

Assam Floods:—Owing to excessive rain, the province of Assam has been recently devastated by inundation unprecedented in its annals. The parts most affected are the districts of Cachar and Sylhet situated in Surma Valley. As the result of the floods 30,000 people were driven from their homes and only half of these have been able to reoccupy their houses. No loss of life has been reported but the plight of those rendered homeless is worse than death. In the flooded areas the water is reported to be unfit for drinking and with the subsiding of the floods, famine and an outbreak of epidemics are dreaded. Extensive damages have resulted to the rice and jute crops and cattle have been washed away. Prompt measures of relief have been under-taken by the Assam Government which has sanctioned the distribution of Rs. 45,000 for gratuitous relief in Sylhet alone. The Bengal Government has also been rendering much help. Meanwhile the public of the provinces have not been idle. A Central Relief Committee has been formed in Calcutta to render monetary assistance to the distressed people in the parts affected. The other provinces including Bombay should rise to the occasion and contribute generously and liberally to the afflicted in Assam and East Bengal.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, JUNE 29, 1929.

PRINCIPAL DHRUVA ON WOMEN'S EDUCATION.

The Convocation address to the graduates of the Indian Women's University this year was delivered by Principal A. B. Dhruva of the Benares Hindu University. No better choice could have been made for the duty. Principal Dhruva is one of the finest products of our educational system, being deeply versed in the culture both of India and the West. Unlike some superficial observers, Indian and European, officials and non-officials, he holds that English education has done incalculable good to India. He almost went out of his way to pay a fine tribute in his address to the results of Indian education during the last one hundred years. "The type of education which we have learnt to associate with the name of Macaulay," he truly observed, "but which we owe no less to the patriotism and far-sightedness of Raja Ram Mohan Roy has been in the land for a full one hundred years, and even if we confine our attention to higher education, the major Universities in India have been at work for no less than seventy years. During this long period the new education is fully justified of its children. It has awakened the country, it has knit together its varied populations, it has in one word, done much to modernize India." He went on to point out, however, that it had nevertheless done precious little in the direction of women's education. Surely, this is not the fault of the New Education, as Principal Dhruva called it. As he himself said, it is the fault of the educational departments which control elementary and secondary education. Until the foundations have been laid in the lower stages, the Universities could not do much, though we admit that they too are to blame for not actively advancing women's education. This, however, is not a good reason for a separate Women's University, as Principal Dhruva meant it to be. The apathy of the Educational Departments and the Universities was largely the reflection of the prevalent public sentiment, and with the growth of a more enlightened sentiment, as the result mainly of the spread of English education and social reform ideas among men, a more active interest on the part of these agencies is becoming common. The number of girls who are entering for University education is increasing year by year, and they are by no means confined to avowedly "reform" families. And the curious thing is that the large majority of girls seeking higher education, do not go to the Women's University even in Poona where the two Arts Colleges have many more women on their rolls than the Women's University although it is their next-door neighbour. From the point of view of expansion of higher education for women far more can be done at much less cost through the established system than by Women's universities. Principal Dhruva himself referred to the advantage of colleges which are open to men and women alike. The resulting co-education, he said, is desirable for putting an end to the barrier which is at present placed between men and women in India. "I recognize," he added, "the advantage of co-education, for I am no believer in cloistered virtue." For our part, we agree with him that, at the present stage of social opinion, separate colleges for women will attract many more girls than the colleges where men and women study together. Even in the Bombay Presidency where co-education at the collegiate stage has become normal—it is significant that there are comparatively few co-education High Schools in this Presidency—they are likely to have this result, much more so in other Provinces where co-education is not so common. But the separate women's colleges should teach the same courses as the men's colleges, and prepare pupils for the same examinations.

IMPORTANCE OF IDENTICAL STANDARDS.

It is here that the Women's University conflicts with our ideal of education. The two principal reasons which Professor Karve and those who think with him, put forward for the Women's University are, first, that education through the medium of the mother-tongue is the most natural method, and that women because of differences in their physical constitution are differentiated from men in their mental constitution also, and their education should be adapted to these differences. "Theoretically, as an abstract principle," said Principal Dhruva, "it is admitted on all hands that the mother-tongue of the pupil is the only natural medium of instruction." Quite so. Nevertheless, English education was introduced at the instance of far-seeing leaders like Raja Ram Mohan Roy, and Principal Dhruva acknowledges that it has conferred great benefits on the country. These benefits would not have been produced in the conditions which prevailed in this country by any system of vernacular education as was vigorously pointed out by Raja Ram Mohan Roy at the time. Now, the importance of the vernaculars is becoming increasingly recognised and provided for in this system. We have ventured to think, with great respect to Professor Karve, for whose untiring enthusiasm for the cause of women's uplift we have always had the greatest admiration, that this system is as suitable to women and is likely to prove as beneficial to them, as to men. Whereas a different system based on different principles is calculated to introduce a dualism in the intellectual and general outlook of society which consists nearly equally of men and women. This dualism, while it may, up to a certain point, be consistent with the harmonious development of society, must eventually lead to differences and even antagonisms such as we witness around us between communities in consequence of cultural differences. The education of the youth of a country, boys and girls, through a common system is a safeguard against a risk of this kind. The defects of the present system as well as its merits are better shared alike by both men and women, and let both strive to reduce the defects and multiply its merits. If in the present conditions, English has the most claims to be the medium of instruction for men in the college stage—even the Benares Hindu University has been obliged to recognise this although the original intention was to make Hindi the medium of instruction—it cannot have less for women except on the assumption that women need not have as efficient an education as men, which brings us to the second reason, namely, the physical differences between men and women as a reason for separate women's education. We may observe here in passing that the ancient Hindu Brahmadinis, to whom Principal Dhruva referred, did not, so far as we know, follow a different course of studies from men. They were deemed fit to master the highly abstruse philosophies which were the principal subjects of higher education in those far-off times. They sat and debated in the same assemblies and on equal terms with renowned sages and philosophers. That shows that the ancient Aryan ideal at any rate made no distinction between the intellectual capacities of men and women.

WANTED MODIFICATION OF FAMILY IDEAS.

Nor does the modern ideal make it. We have for the first time in history a Woman Minister in the British Cabinet. All walks of life are now open in civilised countries to men and women alike. There are women legislators, women lawyers, women journalists, women preachers, women scientists and even women fliers. The family system hitherto has been based on the idea that the women remained at home and looked after children and the kitchen. Martin Luther held that God had given broad hips to women because He intended them to sit at home and not go gadding about the town. That this type of speculation is not altogether dead is shown by the protests which Mr. Ramsay Macdonald received against his flying to London from his native village, on the ground that if God intended man to fly He would have provided him with wings. But the class of people who argue thus are not seriously regarded in any country. The family system, we say, will have to be changed so as to afford women opportunities of sharing with men in national life. An education based on the principle that the principal function of women is to look after the home is fast becoming modified even in India. Many intelligent and public-spirited women have found places in the Municipal and Legislative Councils, on important Committees which involve much touring, and on international Conferences requiring prolonged absence from home. Several of them are married women and mothers of children, and we are sure that their households do not go to rack and ruin because of their participation in public affairs. Several others prefer to remain unmarried, and it is too late in the day to maintain that marriage is the inexorable destiny of every girl. Principal Dhruva spoke the truth when he said that the Women's University was really a compromise with orthodoxy. Orthodox people do not want women to be educated. The Women's University undertook to supply an education which will conform with the notions of orthodoxy. We have, therefore, regarded it as a lowering of the flag of progressive ideals. And the curious thing is, that orthodoxy has not been conciliated and is as much opposed to Professor Karve's University as to the ordinary universities. As an experiment, we welcomed it, but we must say it has proved so far a costly failure. We fully expect that when Prof. Karve returns from the world tour he will bring with him a considerably widened outlook which will be soon reflected in the aims and methods of the Women's University.

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XXVI. ACTORS AND MUSICIANS.

(BY DR. CLIFFORD MANSCHARDT, PH.D.)

There are two general types of musicians: the technicians and composers and the popularizers. The musical technician is a scientist. He deals with materials no less absorbing than the materials of the laboratory technician. He devotes himself to music for the sake of music, spurning financial reward and immediate fame for the pursuit of the best. Many a young musician deliberately turns his back upon the crowd, finding in his own understanding of that which is noblest in music his "well-spring of life". The musical profession has need of such men, but it also has need of its popularizers, the men and women who interpret good music to the public. Starting at the level of the people a capable musician can by careful effort steadily raise the appreciation level until his auditors are capable of the best. The danger that the musician must continually guard against is the danger of accommodating himself to his public, instead of elevating his public to a higher plane. His problem is the problem of all leadership, namely, to stay with the crowd, and at the same time to be ahead of it.

The theater, like so many other things in life, can be for good or for evil. The drama superbly staged and finely acted appeals to the eye, to the ear, to the aesthetic sense and to the will. The actor who is an artist can cause his audience to weep, to laugh, to fume with rage, to run the entire gamut of human emotions. The distinction between an actor of ability and a novice lies in the manner in which the finished actor is able to make his audience share the life of another. When a great actor depicts a soul suffering under defeat or triumphant in victory, we too are suffering or singing our song of triumph. What a talent this is, and what a tragedy it is that such a talent should be used for anything save the best. To us, men and women of ideals, it is given to determine the type of play that shall appear upon the stage. The producer strives to meet the popular demand, but unfortunately the demand of the better class of citizens is too often inarticulate. It is because of this silence that actors are frequently forced into roles degrading both to themselves and to their audience. If the good citizens should trouble to make their voice heard the theater could well assume its rightful place as a bulwark of morality, and as a training school for the development of character.

Life should be taken seriously, but not too seriously. The man who carries the weight of the universe upon his own shoulders may be a good man, but he is not good company. Even the busiest of men must at times lay their work aside for play. An evening spent at a worthwhile comedy or in listening to bright and tuneful music will often give one a new perspective, and send one back to one's work refreshed. The entertainer who causes his brothers to laugh and to enjoy wholesome fun is a real benefactor, a healer of troubled minds. It is a very wise and a very true proverb which declares: "A merry heart doeth good like a medicine".

"CONFESSIONS OF A MISSIONARY".

IV.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

I have read the "Confessions of a Missionary" published in this weekly of June 8. The tenor of the whole document makes a most depressing reading. Committing one's confessions to writing is a very delicate matter and one who does so, runs the risk of being gravely misunderstood. "Perplexed" has verily done credit to himself and his profession by having spoken out his inmost thoughts and feelings. None who reads the "confessions" carefully and sympathetically can doubt the sincerity which urged "Perplexed" to "put his feelings in black and white". In fact, every sane-minded man will sympathise with him; for the problems which baffle him are real, demanding an early solution. I feel, that I may be able to set his troubled heart at ease to a certain extent, by some of my observations on the points raised in his "confessions".

With all due deference to him for his frank confessions and the unselfish service that he and his mem-sahib have rendered to our land, I must confess to a sense of regret at finding him so egotistical, incoherent and illogical in his diagnosis of the case. 'Confessions' are apt to be rambling and dispersed, but it hardly saves them from being severely criticised by careful readers. I am going to estimate the value of the "confessions" under review, point by point.

"Perplexed" seems to be unnecessarily obsessed with the feeling that every Indian thinks and believes that all missionaries come to India to make a living. Foolish and totally irresponsible people are alone capable of such ungenerous thoughts towards the foreign Christian missionaries. "Perplexed" appears to be a missionary in the North India. People in that part of this vast land are not at all ignorant of the worth, academic qualifications and even 'the market value' of the average missionary there. I am only just one among thousands that hold that the average missionary compares favourably with the average layman in his land as well as in ours. To speak only of North India, which educated man does not mention with gratitude the names of the late Ewing brothers, late Dr. Janvier, and the names of a host of others who are still serving India such as Canon Davis of Agra, Dr. Stanley Jones, Dr. Higginbottom of Allahabad, Dr. Woodard and others. "Perplexed" and his Doctor wife cannot include themselves among the above mentioned ministers of gospel, they have still 20 years' service ahead of them. It is a patent fact that nobody likes to be told that you are going to do him good. One can easily suspect a case of superiority complex here. Religious teachers and social reformers can hardly be expected to carry their credentials with them all the time. At any rate "Perplexed" gives me a show of having argued in his favour. His fears that people may think that he and his wife are here to make a living are absolutely unfounded.

NEED OF FORBEARANCE.

The paras 3 and 4 lend a considerable support to my criticism noticed above. Note the patronising attitude of "Perplexed" in these words "my attitude has been that of a booster and a friend". Now, we are too sensitive to ignore such expressions of self righteousness. If any one is India's friend, let him continue so, the stones on the Indian road will cry out that he is India's friend. The labourer is, no doubt, worthy of his hire; but not until the nightfall. Padre "Perplexed" will have to cultivate a great deal more forbearance to prevent him from becoming "resentful to India" entirely. Christ Jesus, whose 'mind' the Christians are exhorted to have, by St. Paul in his Epistle to the Phillipians (25) cannot allow any resentfulness. The Christian ideal of service runs the whole gamut of sacrifice, "up to the death on the cross".

We are told that India "is so helpless and sick". "Perplexed" seems to have made a discovery in the domain of ethics after having laboured these twenty years. He asks like a judge "why is there not more rapid change in their (sweeper Christians') betterment" and goes on to say "the baffling thing to me is the appalling gap between what they know or should know and what they do". With the woeful tale of a woman's arm, he argues from the particular to the general. He really does his wife great injustice building any argument on that, for he does not take into account the many thousands of obedient and grateful patients. This paragraph shows how 'Perplexed' is fond of taking stock of his achievements and not of his faith. I wish he could banish such thoughts as "we have done lot for them," and "Even if they do not have faith in Christ, they should have faith in us, for we have been their true helpers and friends". These are hardly Christian sentiments. As an educated missionary, he ought to realise, that the evolution of a perfect moral sense is a long and weary process. The slowness of the evolutionary principle ought to make all servants of humanity rather 'wait and stand' and not judge. 'Perplexed' seems to be a very sensitive soul looking for quick returns. Such a nervous haste is ruled out of court in the realm of human development. The wail of "the appalling gap between what they know and what they do" perhaps holds good for the whole world of today.

The paras 6, 7, 8, and 9 have no arguments. "Perplexed's" genius lies in stressing the truth of particular instances. The sad cases of the 'doctor' and the 'lawyer' prove hardly any thing. "Perplexed" forgets how the Mission hospitals throughout the land are crowded with maternity cases. Statistics of any hospital will show that the tragic cases, such as, have perplexed our missionary friend, will soon be a thing of the past. Besides, one ought to remember that old customs and specially where sentiments play so large a part, do not die soon. "Perplexed" may be told that the reasons for such things are to be sought in the doctrine of maya which grips this land just as tightly as the doctrine of efficiency does the average American. "Perplexed" will do well to devote some time to refuting this conception. He should strike at the root. I should beseech him to get out of the habit of being worried with the superficial aspects of the Indian problems. The utterances such as "As I see life in India—it all centres round one great end—to establish desirable family relationships" and "To me it (engaging of sweeper women as dais) is inexcusable and so utterly lacking in intelligence that it is difficult for those who allow it, to retain my respect". Sense of respect for a Christian has no measure beyond that of respecting every body, without inquiring anybody's worth. "Perplexed" has confounded custom with moral sense. The wail of his educational scheme failures is hard judgment on his own work, for surely he must have been instrumental in making hundreds of people literates. Let him see the reports that he has so far sent to his Mission Board at home. Cent per cent. success in educational work is to be found only in Utopias.

BRIBERY UNIVERSAL.

In paras 11-15, "Perplexed" discusses questions of standards. Regarding our indifference to bribery, he has 'certainly scored'. Bribery is a real scourge in North India. I wonder why "Perplexed" is not entrusted by his Mission with the task of rooting out this evil from his district. He probably has all the means necessary to attend to this business, with advantage. There is no use getting disgruntled over these things. One might say that "itching palm" is in existence in America also. But this is no argument. I mean to say that in case he does not return after the next furlough, "Perplexed" will become "resentful" towards America also for there, bribery is said to be rampant even among 'the cabinet ministers'. Here, at least, our higher officials are above reproach in this respect. In regard to the insult to his wife, there is nothing surprising, working as she does, among women "so utterly foul and dirty and diseased in mind and body". Could one expect any better treatment from those diseased in body and mind. The para 12, though it contains a fact, is not true, for the people, in question, have no idea of the decency, with which he is familiar. I suspect a good deal of laying it on thick in "with no attempt at concealment of the most private parts of the body". It is a case of lack of culture and not of morality. As far as my knowledge goes, it seldom leads to sexual immorality. That is our chief consolation. Why should not the Arya Samajist counteract his work? It is a matter of ideal. The Arya Samaj being intensely national, suspects that 'Perplexed' is denationalising Indian people. The fault is neither with 'Perplexed' nor with the Samajist, but with converts. It is a case of "conflict of religions." 'Perplexed' ought to realise that the attack of the Arya Samajists, means a greater call to service and knowledge, on his part. I find 'Perplexed' gravely misinterpreting his Christian friend's words regarding merit. The Christian man had no idea of merit, he only, paraphrased the words of his Master in the Sermon on the Mount. Padre Perplexed has tried to read his own theology in the poor man's words. The undue emphasis on 'grace' has swallowed up any 'merit' that was to be found in the doctrine of merit (I am referring to Protestant Christians). In para 15 one can easily see, how the article "Deadset against Hinduism" has shaken "perplexed."

The concluding paras speak his mind still clearly. He stands for proselytism and I ask why should he not when the Arya Samajists and Hindu Mahasaba people are claiming hundreds of converts from among the Christians. I should applaud "Perplexed's" conviction, specially because there is a growing tendency among the Christian missionaries to let proselytism take care of itself. I admire the defiant attitude which has been shown to you, Sir, in disregarding your advice to the missionaries to live in India as "good neighbours." He has the making of a real missionary in this land, for I agree with him that no 'padding' on religion will do. We want not systems but religion, which in other words mean life. I only pray that the Padre Sahib may have more grace (used in one of the original senses, i.e., manners). But he seems to be fast slipping into 'the slough of despond' if not in the cave of error. Whether he should return to this land or not, is a question, which he has to ask himself. If I can allay the suspicions of his mind, I will say that "work while it is day"; India can not neglect the help of any nation or individual who wants to help her at this juncture. I am one of those, that believe that we still need the foreign help in men and money. Let us face facts. Suppose, Sir, if all the missionaries were to get so moody and depressed and decide 'to shake off the dust', will you be able to maintain the large staff of workers who are supported by the foreign money. This consideration concerns the matter on the lowest plane. But I think all can easily follow this, for the need of 'religion' can not be understood at present, when the country is crying for economic and political betterment. Lest I grow sentimental, I should finish by saying that "Perplexed" and his wife are needed here, more than ever unless they decide to stay away for the sake of their children's education and help to their ageing parents.

But if he wants to work in this land, he shall have to know what his "attitude to the other faiths" ought to be and where his hopes and aspirations ought to be pitched to. He will better serve this land, if he himself comes not as "guru" to any one, as he claims to be now, but as a true "chela" of the Master Jesus. Let him read the last paragraph of the introduction to the "Sadhu" by Dr. Streeter.

V.

The Editor, the Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The "Confessions of a Missionary" which you published in your issue of June 8th greatly interests me, as I am sure it will others, because of the frank statement of the difficulties which "perplexed" has made. Although I happen to have been in India one year longer than the writer, and have been subjected to practically the same experiences of work and other contacts that he mentions as the background of his letter, yet I must confess I find myself taking a somewhat different view of the situation.

1. In the first place he says he regards India as "sick", and finds her hopelessly indifferent about her condition. Now, we can all cite instance after instance that can parallel the things mentioned in proof of India's "sickness" and indifference. I presume no one feels the weight of indifference more than the leaders of Social Reform in India so far as the masses are concerned. But I must confess that I do not feel as discouraged about India as "perplexed" does. There are evils in our America which make us blush with shame. We frankly admit them. But I am not discouraged about America. Why? Because no evil condition exists in America that goes unchallenged. William Lloyd Garrison was in the minority of those who wanted the slaves freed—that minority has now become a unanimous majority! Frances Willard was with the small minority who worked for Prohibition in America and now her minority has become a majority which has enacted a Prohibition law, and which will keep on growing in strength until there is a minority of lawbreakers so small that people will forget about them.

In India we must expect that the same things will happen. And there is much reason for this hope. The small group of social reformers now in India has come into being within the last century. A century is not a long time in the history of India! The number of these brave and patient workers is growing. We missionaries sometimes like to think that perhaps we may have had a small share, at least, in strengthening the hands of the indigenous reformers, and even possibly in giving them some inspiration along new lines. Maybe, we take more credit to ourselves than we should but anyway we are devoutly glad that the number of "reformers" is daily on the increase, and that they are all or almost all, doing all in their power to eradicate the evils and conditions that "Perplexed" enumerates. It seems to me that our business is to "stand by" and help all such "reformers" in every way we can and my faith will not waver in so doing even if in my time I do not see much widespread change but I shall go on with the hope that in another hundred years, or two hundred or perhaps three hundred, India will have been so far cured of her "sickness" that many of her minorities will have been changed into successful majorities and that there will remain no evil in the land that exists unchallenged.

Perhaps the trouble with some of us is that we want to see things change too quickly. In other words we are too American in our outlook, we do not Indianize easily. Faith, Patience, and Sympathy will, I believe, to see India not only well on the way to recovery, but as nearly cured as the nations of the world can ever expect to be.

2. As to the immeasurable value of religious conviction I am as much convinced as "Perplexed". The one thing that makes my Hindu Muslim brother interesting to me is his religious conviction, his belief that his doctrines are true! If he does not thus believe then he is insincere! There are some people who would solve all religious differences once and for all by the formula that "One religion is as good as another, and ALL alike are capable of leading men to the Truth." Personally I cannot accept that as an honest and intelligent formula. Truth is ONE and not many. Truth is many-sided and it is more than possible that Hinduism and Islam hold some phases of Truth that we Christians have not yet discovered. It is likewise possible that Christianity may be in possession of some phases of the Truth that Hindus and Muslims have not yet laid hold of. Therefore it seems to me that we had better each regard the other as discoverers. For this voyage of discovery we shall need open minds, and charitable hearts. We must be honest with ourselves and with each other we must hold fast to what we believe to be true, and we must seek to explain to each other and share with each other the discoveries of Truth that we make as we journey along through life together.

With this attitude towards my Hindu and Muslim brothers I expect to go on being as good a Christian as I can, and some how I cannot help believing that there are Hindus and Muslims in India who do not utterly resent the presence of missionaries as presuming busybodies, but who are just as anxious to go with me on this voyage of discovery, and enjoy this experience of "sharing" as I am to go with them. But even if I did not believe there were such in India, I would still feel that I must obey the command of Him who brought me from America to India, for I have a conviction that will not down, that I must share my experience of Jesus with India. I believe that this experience of Jesus is something which is in line with the highest and best of India's aspirations, something that has universal value the world over.

I believe in India's future; I want to see India happier and better than she is; I want to do all I can to help.

VI.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,
Sir,

I read with melancholy interest in company with a thoughtful friend of mine, the letter by 'Perplexed' as also your editorial note in the I. S. R. of 8th instant, inviting your readers to comment on the same.

Here is a Padre who has experienced a tremendous lot of good to his soul from Jesus Christ. He did not have to come to India from his distant land to obtain a livelihood. His family was well-to-do and his parents opposed his coming. He came to India—a country with her great tradition and culture, her suave and engaging manners and logically working brains—because of a call of God to go wishing to share the good news that is in Jesus, in service where it was most needed, and what more, his good wife was of the same trend of mind.

He stayed twenty years in India to advantage. His sojourn enabled him to evince a sympathetic interest in her and her people to such an extent as to develop an attitude of being 'a booster and a friend' daring to refute on the platforms of his country America, even the attacks of that soul-less critic, Miss Mayo, against the Indian people.

It is a pathetic surprise that 'Perplexed' with all such rare equipment and a congenial and accomplished wife for a life companion, should feel, in despair, like wanting to return to his country not being able to withstand crass ignorance, lack of common honesty and want of ordinary decency on the part of people whom he came to befriend in the name of his God. His grievance is that India should continue to 'remain for the most part so unchanged so helpless and so sick'. There seems to him no adequate excuse for her not doing better. Why does India prefer to remain sick and weak? All this has given rise in the mind of 'Perplexed' to 'resentment' at Indian life making himself ask half in anger, whether it is worth his while to come back to India after his furlough time to which, he says, he and his wife are looking forward. Our answer to the question is that it is impossible for him to feel like hesitating to return, if his aim in life is, as he says, 'to serve God and India and to remain whether in India or America an ambassador of Him'. By running away from India he should know he cannot run away from his God. As for his own country America giving him the peace of mind which he seems to miss in this country, is it likely he would find the needed relief there? There is a great deal in his own country, America, past and present, for which he and his wife can only 'blush with shame'. Then why does he think of leaving India for good? There have been from time immemorial a galaxy of prophets, saints and seers, each of whom endeavoured in his own time to set right the erring world as often as they thought it went wrong. There is, we feel, a lack of sense of proportion, if not of humour, in one situated like "Perplexed" to deplore, that because one tiny corner of this great world would not lend itself to his altruistic endeavour, he should wash his hands of all his holy aim and his work.

"Perplexed" would do well to re-call to his mind the stream of successive servants of Christ who came to this ancient land, lived and died surrendering their best in many cases to befriend the lowly and the down trodden amidst, perhaps, ten times the ignorance and hostility which he has encountered. It would be heresy to say, that the lives of these predecessors of his have been a failure. Even supposing he and his wife returned to America what would be their consolation to find conditions still prevalent to make them 'blush'. Surely they will not be taking their God with them from India, much less can they bear to see Him amidst conditions which may not after all materially differ from what exists here or elsewhere scaring him and his wife away.

Evils, social or moral, have existed in the past, exist now and will exist in the future in every clime, and the real test of civilisation of a country is not the quantity of evil left, but the degree of living endeavour on the part of people to combat the same, rendering mutual help towards individual and collective virtuous living. The one achievement of the Christian Missionary in India, that must stand to his credit, is that he has taught Indians the importance of the element of social service in religious living, both by precept and example. That "Perplexed" and his good wife have by their twenty years sojourn, as ambassadors of Christ, also contributed in some measure to this result—perhaps they are not conscious. India at the core is grateful to many of the Christ's servants who have had to tolerate in true humility, during their altruistic career much worse things than what appears to have fallen to the lot of the writer.

Then what is this despondency on the part of "Perplexed" due to? In all work and particularly so, in that of altruistic variety, the measure is endeavour but not achievement. It betrays a lack of faith on the part of any social servant to turn to results at short intervals and feel depressed or elated. We present "Perplexed" a verse from the "Gita"—the Bible of Hindu India—as the only means of rehabilitating him in his faith from its aberration.

कर्मण्येवाधिकारस्ते मा फलेषु कदाचिन्

Translated into English it means, "Thy lot is only in duty, the result is never thine".

There is yet another song of a Vaishnava Saint, Kulasekhara Alwar, which rendered into English means, "Place me on earth, in the sky, heaven or even hell, only let me remember Thy Lotus Feet, i.e., be conscious of your presence.

INDIAN WOMANHOOD.

Mr. Guru S. Dutt I. O. S. addressed a crowded meeting on the subject of Indian Womanhood which was held in Bristol on May 17th. The meeting was organised under the joint auspices of ten different societies including the Women's International League, I. L. P. Women's Guild, Women's Labour Guilds, Women's Co-operative Guilds, Theosophical Order of Service, Young Theosophists, I. L. P. Guild of Youth, Junior Co-operative guilds, St. Aidan's Women's Parliament, and Council for the Prevention of War; in addition to the public more than 50 delegates representing the above societies were present, and the chair was taken by Mrs. Burrow Hill, a well-known local magistrate.

The lecturer said that 5000 B. C. India had developed a civilisation in which woman had the first place, but later during the dark ages of Indian history women were shut out from education, and purdah and child marriage came into practice. One of the first pioneers to advocate the cause of Indian women was Raja Ram Mohun Roy, whose tomb lies in Bristol. Women are now taking positions of equal standing with men and sitting in the Legislative Councils. The speaker further referred to the work of his wife Saroj Nalini, who founded the Mahila Samitis, which movement has spread rapidly since her death five years ago. He concluded by stressing the opportunity which lies before English women to create the bond of friendship and love with their Indian sisters. A discussion followed during which the audience condemned the fact of Indian women working in the mines. A letter was then read out which was an expression of greetings from the women of Bristol to the women of India; it was still in circulation among the various women's movements in the town but the first 275 signatures were being sent to India by Mr. Kabali, the first Indian Aviator to fly from England to India.

CO-EDUCATION.

BARON Shigoto Hozumi, the well-known legal authority and professor at the Tokyo Imperial University, advocates co-education in our schools and colleges. Our Education Department, which is always conservative and which always wants to "play safe," has not yet seen fit to let boys and girls, men and women, study in the same classrooms. "I regret to see women and girls barred from our institutions of higher learning and other schools, and denied the same educational privileges which men enjoy, simply because they belong to the feminine sex," Hozumi comments. "I am for women lawyers not so much because of the expected benefits which they will probably bring to the public, but more because I regret to see the doors to professional opportunity closed to women, on the mere ground that they are women. "For instance, I am sure that, if women were admitted to our university, the class-rooms will be much brighter, livelier, and more cheerful. As it is today, they are prosaic, colorless and even gloomy.

"When Dr. Hatoyama and I were students at the University in Bonn, Germany, I was deeply impressed with the warm atmosphere of the class room, due mainly to co-education. Our professor was giving his last lecture, and women of the class brought a bouquet of beautiful flowers and decorated his desk, as well as his platform. The old professor was deeply touched, and we all were made happy. "Of course this is only one example. But the benefits of co-education are many. The whole atmosphere would be changed; there would be more kindness, more sympathetic feelings, warmth, and courtesy among the students. I sincerely hope that the day of co-education in this country will come soon."—Japan Times, 12 Dec. 1928.

THE VILLAGER IN THE CITY.

(BY DR. CLIFFORD MANSHEARDT, PH D.).

Before the development of modern transportation in India, the Indian village was practically sufficient unto itself. The carpenter, the leather worker, the potter, the blacksmith, the weaver, and the menial servants performed their allotted functions, and there was little cause for any villager to go beyond the confines of the village to obtain the bare necessities of every-day life,

With the coming of roads and railroads a new era began, an era in which the villager found himself in touch with the larger world. Cotton planting was introduced, and when the American Civil war resulted in shutting off the American cotton supply for English mills, the development of the Indian cotton industry was begun in earnest.

The villagers began to realize that they could supplement their meagre incomes, and hence there began an influx into the cities. In 1864 the population of B Ward in the city of Bombay reached the astounding density of 773 to the acre, a density not since equalled by B Ward, or any other Ward in Bombay, and the cause was the influx of villagers to share in the prosperity resulting from the cotton trade.

The number of cotton mills in India in 1877 is said to have been 51. By 1923 the number had risen to 333, employing some 300,000 workmen. The first jute factory was started in 1855. By 1922 there were 81 mills, employing about 320,000 people. The labourers in the jute mills of Calcutta are generally recruited from distant districts. They come to the city and settle in collections of huts in the neighbourhood of the mills, generally in unsanitary and unattractive surroundings. The Bombay mill-workers come largely from the neighbouring districts about Bombay—Ratnagiri, Poona, Satara, and Ahmednagar. Because I am more familiar with Bombay conditions, I shall base my study entirely upon the villager in Bombay.

There is a tremendous contrast between the condition of the newly-arrived worker in his native village and in the city. In the village he is an integrated personality. He fits into a group, and is surrounded with the sanctions of the group and of the family. His position may not be an enviable one, but he at least has a status, and a certain feeling of security. Coming to the city the old sanctions are left behind. If the villager has friends to whom he may go, he accepts their hospitality—either temporarily or permanently—and crowds himself into an already over-crowded home. More than likely he has arrived with no surplus funds, and throws himself upon the bounty of his friends, who themselves are probably living on a very scanty margin. If he has no friends, he will probably drift into a hotel, where he manages to scrape up a few acquaintances, and soon finds himself established as a boarder in some family in a neighbouring chawl. Since the married man rarely brings his family both the unmarried and the married men often drift into temporary alliances with some woman. The man is a stranger. There is no one to question. And hence many wives and families are forgotten and deserted, while the villager, lost in the city under an assumed name, proceeds to rear up a new family.

If the villager is lucky he may secure work at once, but the chances are he will wander the streets for some time before receiving a paying job. A pernicious system of graft prevails in Bombay, whereby it is practically impossible for a man to get work without either making a cash contribution, or agreeing to hand over a portion of the monthly wage to the mukadam. One of our functions in the Nagpada Neighbourhood House is to run a free employment bureau, which is widely patronized. Cases have been brought to our attention where men whom we have willingly and gratuitously helped into positions, have extorted money from their newly-arrived villagers for the privilege of being introduced to "the sahib" for a note.

And speaking of employment there is a considerable economic wastage in the number of unemployable men who come to the city in search of work. Every reputable firm requires a physical examination, and there is no place save for those who are strong physically. The district missionary can often prevent real hardship to a family by discouraging the unfit from emigrating. The missionary can also render a service to his city missionary brethren, by encouraging every prospective worker to bring with him to the city sufficient funds for at least a period of weeks. The number of men seeking temporary loans or return fare is a heavy drain upon the funds available for this purpose.

Once the worker is established in the mill or workshop he begins to make his adjustment to city life. The chances are that he will reside either in slum tenements or Improvement Trust or Development Department chawls. The "Improvement" chawls are nothing to boast about, but they are an improvement over the ordinary slum dwelling where the occupants are packed in small, dark, foul-smelling rooms with neither privacy nor conveniences. Bombay has done heroic work in demolishing and rebuilding, but in spite of all her efforts the Bombay slums are among the worst in the world. The Industrial Housing Scheme of the Development Department at the last report comprised 207 chawls of 80 rooms each in 4 different areas. The Improvement Trust chawls number 105, with 9,424 rooms. Some 16,000 of the rooms provided by the schemes are actually occupied.

To people accustomed to living in the open air, the great cement chawls are not only uninviting, but in many cases positively unhealthy. It is no wonder that the streets of Bombay are nightly crowded with sleepers at all seasons of the year. And it is no wonder that the infant and childhood mortality of the city reaches the high figure that it does reach. The constant wonder to me is that the people crowded in the chawls maintain as good health as they do.

From the labour standpoint the villager is an open question. Since he has not a working-class consciousness, and has no tradition of taking pride in his work, he rarely exerts his best efforts, being content to "get by." He will quit his work on the slightest pretext, and being ignorant he is a ready prey to unscrupulous agitators. He knows that if he fails in the city, he can return to the village and manage in some way to pull on. The constant turnover of labour makes it exceedingly difficult to turn out a finished product that will compare favourably with that of the skilled workmen.

of Europe. On the other hand, a labour consciousness is developing. The labour Unions, though at present passing through a troublesome period, are giving evidence to the development of a working class spirit. When the movement passes from the phase of agitation to the centring of its attention upon improvement of the working groups itself, there will be a big step forward. Indian witness.

NOTES.

India And The Labour Government:—
The advent of the Labour Party to power in Great Britain was received with satisfaction in India. It has now become a sort of dogma with many Indians that there is nothing to choose, so far as the fortunes of this country are concerned, between the three British political parties, and they were precluded by it from expressing their satisfaction. Even they however, recognise that the accession of the Labour Government has changed, and changed for the better, the conditions surrounding Indian constitutional reform. This feeling was encouraged by intimations, public and private, from sources entitled to be considered well-informed, that an announcement foreshadowing Dominion Status for India, will be included in the King's Speech at the opening of Parliament on Tuesday last. The King's Speech, however, contained no reference to India, but the Prime Minister in the House of Commons thought it necessary to explain the omission. He said that when the Simon Commission was still going on with its enquiries, it was not right to forestall it, as all Parties had accepted the Commission and were represented on it. But he admitted that the Commission had met with no support and much opposition from influential Indian opinion, and he appealed to the latter to co-operate with his Government in finding a satisfactory solution for the Indian problem. Mr. Baldwin, the late Prime Minister, as Leader of the Opposition, while promising to offer no factious opposition, added that India was the acid and ultimate test, hinting thereby that the truce will not be maintained if the Labour Government attempted more in Indian reform than what his Party would agree to. It is plain that the Labour Party, whatever its intentions, cannot at present do anything substantial for India, but it is just possible that its success in the direction of the foreign relations and unemployment problems may be so striking, as to render its position strong enough in the country to face the Opposition with the assurance of success. We are, therefore, glad that leading Indian publicists like Sir Chimanlal Setalvad, and Messrs. Jayakar and Jinnah have issued statements to the Press indicating their readiness to respond to Mr. Ramsay Macdonald's invitation if it is accompanied by conditions which they can honourably accept. The Congress Party has not yet declared its intentions, but it is of good augury that the Secretary of State for India, Mr. Wedgwood Benn, is freely discussing matters with Congress and Swarajist leaders who are in London.

"What I Like About Mahomedans:—"In writing last week on the Rev. C. G. Early's first question "What I like about Englishmen," we observed that the character of a group as distinguished from individuals, is best judged not only from their reactions to current problems but by their history. This statement requires to be qualified in one important particular. The history of a people by which they are judged should be their history as written by their own historians. The lion painted by himself may emphasise the good and slur over the bad points in his physiognomy. But it is the good points we want to know in order to appreciate him truly. In the case of Englishmen, this presents little difficulty. Much of English history as Indians know it is through English sources. In the case of Mahomedans, however, the case is just the reverse. Much of Muslim history as educated Indians know it, is also derived from English sources which, however, have almost uniformly, been prejudiced against Islam. It is through eyes coloured by the English literary view of Islam that Indians look at their Moslem fellow-country men. Owing to the almost total absence of social intercourse of an intimate character between the several Indian communities, they have few opportunities of correcting their intellectual impression by personal contact at first hand. Added to this is the vague, traditional idea of Muslim oppression which has come down to non-Muslim Indians. Ranade was almost the first Indian historian who presented the history of Islam in India in its right perspective, as a civilising influence strengthening and supplementing the national culture at points where it was most needed. But political developments have tended to throw into the shade, let us hope temporarily, Ranade's fruitful contribution to Indian history. For these reasons, in answering Mr. Early's second question about Mahomedans, history is not a safe guide as in answering the question about Englishmen. When we ask ourselves "What I like about Mahomedans" we do not think so much of Moslem history (though there is much that is great and glorious in it which, as a rule, however is a sealed book to many educated men) as of the individual Mahomedans we have known best and closest. This writer has been fortunate more than many others of his kind in respect of the catholicity of his friendships. His oldest and best friends now living are two Hindus, two Parsis, one Mahomedan, two Englishmen and one Jew. Of these the Mahomedan is the one whom in some respects he has known and understood best. He has known a number of other Mussalmans in his fairly long life, and he may say that none of these has left an impression which contradicted the one formed of the friend referred to. These impressions have crystallised round the attitude of a Mohamedan member of the Bombay Legislative Council, whom this writer knows only slightly, during a recent debate on a resolution condemning certain Excise measures proposed by Government. The resolution was proposed by a gentleman with whom Mr. Noor Mahomed was not habitually cooperating. It would perhaps have been more in consonance with his political affinities if Mr. Noor Mahomed had stood by Government against the resolution. His declaration that "as a Mussalman, he must support Prohibition" practically decided Government to accept the resolution. It was a historic declaration, and Mr. Noor Mahomed will long be remembered for it. The conclusion is that "What I like about Mahomedans" is the directness with which their mind moves along the line of its beliefs.

"Village Pankhursts":—Sangamner, a taluk in Ahmednagar, gave abundant proof to the world last April that if ever India wanted a Joan of Arc she had only to turn to the little district where there was plenty of material to produce a dozen. We learnt in the early part of May how the women of Sangamner armed with only red powder and sugar cakes defied the police when even their men were counselling moderation. In the Reformer of May we published a report of the incident. The annual procession taken on Hanuman Jayanti Day was prohibited by the Magistrate this April. Simultaneously with the order notices were served on local Hindu and Moslem leaders to show cause why they should not be bound over with sureties for a period of two months to keep the peace. On the day after these orders and notices were served, the Maruti temple was surrounded by the police and the celebrations were conducted quietly. The Hindu leaders were attempting to persuade the crowd to disperse, on the assurance that they would agitate in every constitutional manner and an unsuccessful effort had just been made to get the procession idol from the temple by two Hindu boys, when the women decided it was high time they took a hand in the matter and after Darshan they brought the idol and tried to place it in the chariot. In spite of their entreaties the police took charge of the idol and had lulled themselves into a false sense of security that the procession would not start without the image, when it proceeded with a picture of the god in the chariot and the police could only offer opposition at the market place where the women got the better of them and the procession passed on to the temple augmented by the police who followed the crowd. Stimulated by this epic battle and no doubt stung to action by the taunts of their women, the leaders of the district challenged the legality of the prohibition order and the matter was taken to the High Court, where, recently the order was declared to be illegal and without jurisdiction. We find it rather difficult to believe that Sangamner is going to subside to its old calm after this out-burst and we shall not be surprised to hear more from the district which has the honour, we believe, of being the first in India to have an indigenous women's "movement."

Khadi Work:—A perusal of the All India Spinners' Association report for the year 1927-1928 and the Khadi Guide recently published is sure to impress one with the great stride that khadi work has made since the first introduction of the Charka and Spinning in the Congress programme in 1920. It has been admitted that as a supplementary employment to the agriculturist during his enforced inactivity nothing can equal that furnished by the Spinning wheel and the revival of the cottage industry. The report gives interesting figures to show that the Charka has to some extent succeeded in improving the condition of the village folk by adding to their income. In some specified villages in Tamil Nad, we are told that the Charka had given last year an addition of 11 to 28% to the income of the spinning families in the villages taken as a whole. Striking results are reported in the case of individual families whose earning from spinning amounted to an addition of 50 to 60% to the other incomes. Some idea of the expansion of Khadi activities in the country may be gathered from the figures of workers and centres engaged in the occupation. There are nearly 1000 workers engaged in khadi work in each province and there are over 260 centres of work throughout the country. Again each centre has a number of villages linked to it. The A. I. S. Association is also conducting a Technical School for the training of Khadi Service students at Sabarmati Ashram. Khadi organisations, it is gratifying to know, have not only confined their attention to their special work but have been directing their efforts to village reconstruction such as carrying on anti-drink and anti-untouchability propaganda and undertaking the education and medical relief of the village. An indirect benefit of Khadi work is that it has brought the educated worker into direct contact with village life and its problems.

author: 'My father had a sense of great admiration for the Hindus, on account of their frugal and economical ways, their abstemiousness of life, their business habits and sterling industry, their providence and quick intelligence, their philosophy, literature and music...He would not brook one word said against the Hindus by any of his sons.' Was it any wonder that the Hindus had the greatest affection for Zaka Ullah? As regards the communal problem we are inclined to take the view stated by his friend Dr. Nazir Ahmed in the Foreword which enriches this volume: 'This (the exaggeration of differences and the undue emphasis on ceremonial observances which lead to riots) is done mainly out of ignorance and prejudice. Nevertheless I do not regard this state of things as lasting. Rather as the poet says,—

If it lives,

It will live for the night

And will have no further existence.'

Mr C. F. Andrews has rendered a distinct service in writing this biography of a devout, affectionate and simple hearted man and we welcome the book as one calculated to promote a better understanding between the two great communities of this country.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, JULY 6, 1929.

Mr. C. F. Andrews has chosen as the central figure of his latest book a Musalman scholar of Delhi who was not very well-known to the outside world. Zaka Ullah was born in 1832 in a devout, learned and highly respected family and in his childhood was frequently seen at the Moghul Court. His father, like his grandfather, was respected by the Musalmans of Delhi for his saintly life and his high moral character. Both of them were highly learned in Islamic literature and were deeply religious, and their influence on Zaka Ullah was undoubtedly great. But Mr. Andrews tells us that 'the strongest influence on his character came from his mother and he was one of those many leading Indians of the nineteenth century who owed their inward purity of heart to a mother's love,' and throughout his life he held her in the highest esteem and affection. Zaka Ullah was educated at the Old Delhi College to which he was sent at the age of twelve in spite of the strong feeling then prevalent against the new English education which was held to produce atheists or converts to Christianity. He was convinced of the necessity for a modern outlook, particularly in science, but he was strongly opposed to the medium of instruction being English. 'We must not become foreigners to our own people and practically to all our womenfolk. Our mother-tongue contains for us all our hallowed memories and traditions: it is our first articulate speech which we employ while talking with our mothers when we are young.' And though he accepted the inevitable when he saw the trend of public opinion was against him, yet he was convinced that the worse course had been taken in having English as the medium of school teaching. Though himself fairly proficient in English he preferred to converse in Urdu. He was one of the first advocates of women's education in Northern India and we would like to see his ideals cherished with more warmth in his community. 'With all my heart' says he "I have faith in education as the one remedy for the great evils and misfortunes of my own religious fellowship of Islam and also for India herself.'

To modern India the most interesting chapters of the Book are those dealing with Zaka Ullah's ideas on political and communal questions. Not only was he temperamentally a conservative but he had been through the horrors of the Mutiny and it is no surprise if he drew back from anything which bore the semblance of violence. 'It was to education,' says his biographer, 'that he looked for all true political and social advancement in the near future.' Yet when Mr. Andrews suggested to him in a conversation that universal education was desirable as it would make Indians wish to govern themselves (this was more than twenty years ago), he said: 'It may end so, but that will be neither in your time or mine. After all, the main question is, not who governs the masses but whether the masses are governed well.' And again, 'I would certainly wish to have India self-governing; but India can only reach that goal by the constant practice of religious toleration.' He had the strongest objections to Musalmans regarding themselves as foreigners, a tendency which must have been greater at that time than now. His words in this connection are worth quoting as they bear testimony to the deep love he bore for our country. 'India is our own mother country, the land which gave us birth. We have made our homes here, married here, begotten children here, and here on this soil of India we have buried our sacred dead. India, therefore, must needs be dearer to us than any other country upon earth. For a thousand years our own religion of Islam has been bound up intimately with India.....I cannot bear to hear Indian Musalmans speaking without reverence and affection for India.'

When assessing Zaka Ullah's views on the communal question it must be borne in mind that he was singularly fortunate in his personal friendships. He had formed a strong friendship with the famous Mathematician, Prof. Ramchandra, a Hindu convert to Christianity, which lasted even after he had finished his education, and during the worst days of the Mutiny both had reason to thank each other for services rendered even at great personal risk. Most of his colleagues were later to become distinguished in the country. His friendship with the author of this biography is itself a remarkable one. Mr. Andrews was not only different to Zaka Ullah in religion, race and culture but belonged to another generation. It is even more remarkable that differences in politics which are very often the cause of many a dispute among friends, never strained their relations, and we do not think that there could be more acute differences in that sphere than those which existed between the two. Zaka Ullah numbered among his personal friends many Hindus. Yet he felt that the difference between Hindu and Musalman was too great for any permanent union, and he regarded the presence of a third factor, the English as necessary to link up the two. The English need not necessarily be here as rulers, said Zaka Ullah, but India is large enough and great enough for Hindu, Musalman and Christian. At the same time he held the Hindus in high esteem; his son writes to the

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XXVII. THOSE WHO ASPIRE.

(BY DR. CLIFFORD MANSHARDT, PH.D.).

From the earliest days of human history men have been persistent seekers. They have refused to be satisfied either with themselves or their surroundings, and have turned their gaze towards the heavens. For some the quest has been for God. Others have glimpsed a nobler personal life. Still others have seen a reborn humanity, a better social order, a world of brothers.

Every man who is morally alive has within him the desire for self-improvement. Although the most of us manage to keep the respect of our neighbours, we ourselves are fully aware of our shortcomings. We are hot-tempered, impatient and inconsiderate. We are given to petty nagging, exaggeration and to tale bearing. We are selfish, proud and domineering. We know that to do good is more satisfying than to do evil. To be a friend to a man is more rewarding than to be his enemy. To help another gives far more pleasure than to inflict pain. We know these things, but far too often we follow the impulse of the moment and spend hours in drinking the cup of remorse. We do the things that we should not do, and we fail to do the things that we should do. And yet, despite all our mistakes, the spirit of aspiration still lives within us.

The literature of aspiration is one of mankind's most priceless heritages. The quest of the soul for God is the most fascinating quest ever recorded. Men have endured countless tortures, hardships and disappointments. They have cut themselves off from country, friends and kindred. They have refused to recognize the limitations of time, or to be circumscribed by any existing conceptions of space. They have engaged in mystic contemplation, and have searched in the teeming world of men. Without God they have felt themselves to be as pilgrims lost in the barren desert. Glimpsing God, they have felt themselves to be as householders in the midst of a fruitful land. Regardless of the attainment of the final end, countless lives have been refined through aspiration.

Prayer is aspiration at its best. In prayer a man casts aside all sham and artificiality, and expresses the deepest longings of his heart. He probes the inmost depths of his life, throws open the shutters, and lets the light of God shine in. No word may be uttered. No word need be uttered. Alone in silence the man resolves, gains new life, finds new courage, and faces his world with a new equanimity.

"CONFESSIONS OF A MISSIONARY".

VII.

The Editor, the Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

"Confessions of a Missionary by Perplexed" indeed provide us food for serious thought. The subject is important enough to engage the considerations of Christians and non-Christians alike. There is no doubt that the writer is seriously and sincerely puzzled. He is also earnest about finding a solution. For his comfort may I be permitted to say that there are hundreds like him, both Christians and others, engaged in similar work of uplifting the low type of Indian humanity, who have similar doubts and difficulties perplexing them sometime or other. Only the vision of the awful cross of Christ, even though dim and blurred, has kept them steady at the post of duty. All reformers in India past or present whether in religion or social matters or politics have more or less come to the same essential adamant difficulty of Indian mentality, indifference, sloth, inertia, self-contradictions, conservatism, intolerance of other ways, refusal to understand the other man, absence of moral difference, etc. This dull and hard attitude of life is the cumulative result of ages of her peculiar philosophy and religion. The whole trouble can be traced ultimately to her conceptions of life, universe and God—her Pantheism, Karma, Fatalism—Her Vedant—the basic Indian philosophy of life. You cannot modify or modernise this Vedant too much. It asserts itself again and again. This view of life is not Indian in a geographical sense. It is human. The western attitude to life—which is very largely the result of Christian notions like Redeeming and Fatherly God, goodness of the universe and the worth of life is naturally opposed to Karma or Fatalism. Reform in India will never be real or lasting until mind is freed from the ancient blight of untruths and half truths. Christians who have only transferred their social allegiance are not Christians in thought or spirit and will therefore be found on the side of superstitious Hindus when the test of life comes. There are many truths in Hinduism and many features of Hindu life that are most beautiful but one sadly feels that they will be gradually lost unless the essential Hindu notions of man and God are given up or modified. Above all, Hinduism needs a purifying and inspiring personality who will both destroy and build up anew. So missionaries many of them, need to revise their methods and policies; otherwise disappointments are inevitable. Mere baptism into the Church does not make a man a Christian—a disciple and follower of Jesus Christ. India needs exactly the type of missionary that "Perplexed" represents. Liberal sympathy without the sharp edge of truth is useless, social service merely from the philanthropic or humanitarian motive—good work for work's sake is no good. Grace without truth—love without indignation—will be worthless. A missionary who cannot feel angry and indignant over injustice, wrong, sin, indifference will not achieve much. Missionaries of the olden days were of that nature. Christ was like that. But he also needs a very broad vision that covers up the future and that can see through temporary gloom and limited hindrance to that unsullied radiance of perfection—the kingdom of God—that is being slowly and imperceptibly built up and extended. Our Lord could not die had he not the glimpse of the glory and triumph of Resurrection. That again needs infinite patience which is nothing but love directed to the future. So "Perplexed" should think ten times before he decides not to come back to India from furlough. Men of grit, experience, men who have seen life and its realities are the men who can help reconstruct India. India needs western practicalness, western energy and go, western impatience with less than the best, western mind to renew and change. She has set too much through the influence of different thought and ideal however great they may have been in the past.

The sense of moral bankruptcy is strong and general in India. Men in general seem to have lost the sense of right and wrong, true and false, past and present, practical and theoretical. Reformers find it indeed a rock of offence and a stumbling block. In matters of decency, bribery, social justice, and religious right, India appears to be in a moral torpor. There are an increasing number of thoughtful men who seem to be giving up the struggle for a better world as futile and opine that the cause of reform will have the same fate as it has invariably met in India ever since the rise of Buddhism, through the years of Vaishnav reconstruction down to Brahma Samaj and Ramkrishna Movement and Theosophy. Idolatry, caste, woman's fate, belief in fate have remained more or less the same; only the passing of years has made the problems more complex. The reforming zeal has shone of it and on it but has been successfully engulfed by the eternal darkness of Hinduism time after time. Of late we have been noticing a vast renaissance of popular Hinduism all over the country.

To touch one or two specific points raised by "Perplexed", he appears to be annoyed and disappointed when Indian people reject western scientific and intelligent methods of treatment of diseases in favour of crude superstitions and often fatal methods current in villages. This shows that the masses of India's ignorant humanity have a sense (among other objectionable notions) of the supernatural and the Divine even in matters of physical healing. It seems to me that western medical science is too sure of its exactitude and effectiveness, too devoid of God and religion. The healing miracles of Jesus are too numerous and important to be rejected from his life as so many myths or cures by auto-suggestion. It is a hopeful sign of the times that the Church is slowly recognising one of her divinest of gifts. It shows too much pride and untruth to make a general remark that men who, in disease and illhealth invoke the power of the gods die, and those who depend on science live. I have personally known cases of cure by faith in God and prayer—some having been rejected by doctors; while patients having at their command the highest medical skill and resources have died.

As regards the hostility of the Arya Samajists. Much of it would not have existed but for political purposes. Moreover wholesale mass conversions of Hindus into Christianity without adequate spiritual motives have antagonised many of them. If missions could today purify perfectly all their policies they would receive more cordial treatment even from opponents. Hostility to Christianity as such is natural and universal. Christ, whom Christians believe to be the perfect embodiment of God was bitterly opposed and cruelly put to death. So missionaries need not wonder. The nearer they will come to Christ away from tradition, race and selfishness, they will be given grace and patience to continue in the work of making all men brethren and devotees of one spiritual God.

It would appear as if both "Perplexed" and I have known only the dark, fallen, sick, ignorant and bankrupt India. India, thank God, is not all that only. She has a silver lining even in the darkest gloom. God can raise her and recreate her according to his eternal purposes. This hope is dimly rising in many breasts. Her old men and young maidens are seeing visions and dreaming dreams. God is Redeemer and Saviour. If that is the central truth India has a future. Through the west and through the east she is being renewed. India of to-day knows no boundary of caste or race or colour or religions. If truth and God fail in India the failure will be universal. If only this hope—this glad and radiant hope of a better India can be implanted in her soul, and if the dead can be raised in India—she will live and bless the world. This is exactly the work of the missionary whoever he or she may be in race or religious affiliation.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Anent the "Confessions of a Missionary" in your columns of the 8th June, that, something is wrong with the Indian intelligence and the Indian world, few will be found to deny. As to what is wrong and how it may be set right there is endless variety of opinion but little agreement. A babble of voices arises expressing much of earnestness and right desire, but less apparently of clear conception. Many earnest men and women, largely emancipated from selfishness and noble of purpose, are trying to help the distracted community into a sphere of sanity where the human family may dwell together and try to be happy in the Indian world. Yet despite the unity of purpose, there is dire confusion as to what concrete achievements are essential or desirable and the methods by which they may be accomplished.

Over and above what the perplexed Padri saheb writes in his letter there are numerous other matters on which we ourselves are much more perplexed. For instance, who would not be struck with the employment of human labour in this country where animal labour can be employed with ease and dignity? In India the loads which might be placed on wheels are carried by coolies on their shoulders and they work as draught animals. In this case the reason must be comparative cheapness of human labour. But for a different reason we see a characteristic difference between the European funerals and similar processions of other communities. Hindus not only carry the bier but walk all the way long to their cemetery in the sun, in rain or cold nights and mornings with very little of dress to protect them from the climate. This fact it would seem beyond all discussion is of obvious significance to give pause.

What has been wrong with reformers sincerely bent on bettering the Indian world? To examine the causes of life we must first have recourse to death. It is a maxim of psychology that the problem of life cannot be solved without the problem of death. A Hindu Minister of state, Privy counsellor, Lord Mayor, Sheriff or Judge is a picturesque subject for an artist to paint when he is, in his untouchable uniform of a dagoo, going through streets of New Delhi or Bombay with the yoke of the bier. Of course the Ashvalayana Grahiya Sutra lay down that a dead body can be conveyed on a hearse drawn by bullocks; but how can Indians do so, when it was a riddle even for the Adi Shankaracharya, the great Hindu reformer who cremated the dead body of his mother in his compound for want of facility of carrying it.

The institution of undertakers is unknown to the Hindus, and though we have a large army of sadhus who may wish to serve us in the next world, there is no alternative method of conducting Hindu funerals, and the slavish obedience of the only method debar the way of enlightenment in the Indian intelligence. When a male child is born, the advent of the baby is generally hailed in a Hindu family, along with relations composing a subcaste, which rejoice for having one more corpse-bearer, a result of slave mentality to be maintained also by the new born who is supposed to be intelligent and a free man! In short, let me tell you that if we would help the Indian world, it is rational that we should seek first of all to understand Indian genesis and to comprehend as well as we may. The commandments in the Bible say that, Honour thy father and mother and love thy neighbour as thyself. But what when they are dead? When one of the disciples of Jesus said, Lord, suffer me to go and bury my father, Jesus said unto him, Follow me; and let the dead bury their dead, and his disciple followed him. But most of the Indians generally harass each other when alive and honour their parents when dead, by shouldering the bier in public streets and in many other ways such as Shradh, Doslan, etc.

But there is no reason for the American Padri saheb to be disappointed with Indian intelligence, if he has the patience to wait and see.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,
Sir,

The one noticeable feature in the observations of a Missionary friend, published in the "Reformer" of June 8, who came out to India in 1911 with the laudable purpose of serving God and India and who, after a ministration extending nearly over a period of twenty years, is greatly perplexed that "India with her great tradition and culture, her suave and engaging manners, her keen and logically working brains, should remain for the most part so unchanged, so helpless and so sick", is the toning down of the resolution to serve God and India as seen from his declaration at the end of his communication in view of his impending trip to America. He says,—“I cant come back and put the soft pedal on religion. I am, and will remain, whether in India or in America, an ambassador of Him, who I believe to be in Himself true religion—the way to union with God.” Truly, a steadfast devotion to Christ—the Saviour.

To come to the main points raised in the communication. Firstly, to quote his own words. "The baffling thing to me is the appalling gap between what they (converts from outcastes) know or should know, and what they do." Under this head come the Sweeper Christians, 'a prominent lawyer in a large city' and 'a practising physician'. Secondly, the question of Indian standards of decency—especially of the backward classes—is touched upon. Thirdly, bribery in Government services and lastly, idolatry.

As regards the first point mentioned above, I beg to state that among the educated classes there is certainly a wide gap between what they know or should know, and what they do, in general, but the gap in the case of others narrows down to an excusable limit. Please excuse me for being a little personal. A number of Adi-Dravidas here once sought my advice whether tips could be given to village Gods for issuing puttahs to the assignees. My reply was that there is no such rule and that they could do as they pleased in the matter. The majority of Adi-Dravidas refrained from giving them tips and, though the issuing of puttahs was delayed till recent Jamabhandi, they were ultimately given to the assignees concerned. The wide gap between knowledge and practice, noticeable in the case of the prominent lawyer and the practising physician, is common to the educated communities in India. This is my humble view, and I affirm that this state of things will continue so long as our women are kept illiterate and in social bondage. Mr. C. F. Andrews somewhere remarks that national progress is very much at a low ebb, owing to the absence of cultured home life in the country, and, it is my humble opinion, that until and unless women in India become educated and take their due state in the shaping of national destiny, lapses like these are bound to occur.

Secondly, with regard to standards of decency observed by the lower classes in the South, I beg to state that the observations of the missionary friend, in this respect, that women do not conceal their private parts of the body and that they have a repulsion to be treated by a male doctor, but without a tinge of conscience openly expose themselves to the world, are statements that do not lie within my experience, being a villager myself. Here, in the South, the Non-Brahmin labouring woman, toiling in the fields day and night, it is true, does not use a jacket, as a rule, for the upper part of the body, but, it does not mean, however, that any part of her body is exposed to the outside world. Her sari is so long and so thick to cover and conceal the whole body that no private part of it is visible to the naked eye. Here we take divergent views, but one cannot help it.

Thirdly, the point noted for discussion is bribery. The Missionary friend writes:—"Some years ago an English Collector came to this District determined to put down bribery. Because of this very thing within six months, he had become so unpopular with his own people and with the public, that he was transferred. Indeed the attitude towards bribery is not one of indifference, but it is rather an institution—a privilege prized and guarded by both bribe givers, and bribe takers." It is possible for a strong-minded and just civilian to be not in the good graces of others in the cadre, but, how he can become unpopular with the public for not taking bribes one cannot understand. Actual facts do not support such a contention. A few months back, the Revenue Inspector of our Firka came here (North Eluppai, North Arcot District, S. India) to inspect a site in connection with the preparation of B—Memo and ascertain for himself whether this was a case of unauthorised occupation of Government Poramboke land. A person interested in the matter otherwise, saw the Revenue Inspector with a few rupees, but he refused it point blank and the man, I am sure, is in no degree sorry for such a refusal. A strict officer wishing to do justice to the people, cannot become unpopular with them, on the score of not taking bribes. If at all he does so, it may be due to some other cause or causes, as the case may be. People are not willing, as a rule, I make bold to assert, to give bribes and have their affairs settled favourably. As a matter of fact, they are compelled to do so by an indirect process. Left to themselves, they would pull down this much-discredited institution at any moment in their life—and that most willingly.

In regard to idolatry, which is a long-standing practice with the Hindus, I beg to state that the mass-mind cannot be expected to think of God without images for ceremonial worship. At least, in the initial stages of bhakti, it is essential. That is what I think of the matter. I know a large number of Indian homes, where the daily meal is taken after the performance of puja to the family God or Goddess, as the case may be, and I also know that daily for a few hours, at least, before meal, they live in an atmosphere sanctified by their religious observances, however crude they may appear to outsiders. Elements of idolatry are to be found even in the Christian Church. So, it is everywhere, in one form or other. It may be possible to a few men of outstanding intellect to be always in a religious frame of mind, without having resort to this primitive form of worshipping God, but they are only in a microscopic minority, and, as such, they need not bother us much at this stage of our national life, when serious thoughts, in any department of life, and their application thereof, are greatly jeopardised by factors of present-day economic slavery.

When the missionary friend asks:—"Have I been a fool to throw away these twenty best years of my life, on a country that wants me not nor needs me?" I think he has more in mind the Arya Samajists who, according to him, do everything in their power to counteract the service that he is trying to render. In the course of his communication, he observes:—"God is one, mankind is one, and what concerning God is true for me is likewise true for you. So why do we have to work at cross purposes, each misunderstanding the other?" My difficulty is why he cannot follow his own motto in this respect, trusting all the while that his services to the country would be better appreciated and would bear fruit in an ample measure, in days to come. Moments of doubt and despair come to every honest soul, it is true, but I beg to state, that they are only passing phases in the crowded experiences of a religious man, and it is, therefore, hoped that different peoples, in general, and this missionary gentleman, in particular, would continue bringing their rich offerings and laying them at the feet of Mother India, as formerly.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

I have read with interest The Indian Social Reformer of the 8th inst, which contains the article "Confessions of a Missionary."

I do not suppose that you desire to open up a discussion of the various matters he treats of, but as you have asked for expressions of opinion I will briefly make a few comments.

My own experience is very much in agreement with what your correspondent has stated, though in every case I would not draw the same conclusions. He remarks: "The baffling thing to me is the appalling gap between what they know or should know, and what they do." But is not that human nature all over, and allowance of some kind ought to be made for that. Also I am sure that however unpleasant it is to find people whom we have helped and whom we think ought to trust us in a crisis turn to others as in the instances he gives, we ought not to resent this. Their world is so different to ours, their level of intellect different, I mean now the poor village people among whom so many missionaries work, and in a crisis like sickness they get panicky and try one remedy after another as they are advised.

I can bear out what he says about the lack of interest and ambition in the masses for learning. I, like him, have given "this needed chance to hundreds and have had it spurned." But in this again it is of no use being resentful. When the people realise that education is something to be grasped at, then and only then will the offer be eagerly accepted.

It is true that our motives in doing Christian work in this country are much misunderstood, and what some misled or indifferent people say about us is sometimes unpleasant. But I do not think that the misunderstanding is wilful except in a very few instances, as there are people who can never think good of others. It is in far the majority of instances due to a lack of knowledge, a lack of appreciation of the true Christlike attitude to life and duty.

I would like to know whether the Hindu social worker has a similar experience in his work, whether he finds the people as is stated in your correspondent's article, and as many others of us foreigners find them. I am of opinion that a good deal of the trouble is due to the marked differences between the foreign Christian worker and the almost illiterate Indian folk he lives amongst. Also, we foreigners do get liverish, the best of us I think; the climate, our life out here and our experiences do not improve our tempers, or our power to keep impressions in their right proportion.

ARE THERE SECTS IN SIKHISM?

Prof. Teja Singh M.A., Khalsa College, Amritsar, writes in the Young Men of India: As most of the religions are constituted, it is natural to expect the existence of sects in them. As long as the founder of a religion is alive, there is no possibility of dissent about principles among his followers, because the giver of those principles is present who can set all doubts at rest. But when the founder is dead, new doubts and differences arise according to the change in circumstances and the mentalities of men who succeed; and as then there is personality present that could remove these differences or, with an authority equal to the founder's, could make one opinion acceptable to all the parties at variance, therefore those unresolved dissensions perpetuate themselves and give rise to sects.

This rule governs all religions, and hence there are sects in Christianity, Islam, Buddhism, Hinduism, etc. But this very rule makes it impossible for Sikhism to have any sects. For this fact—which must look so extraordinary to people who do not understand the extraordinary constitution of Sikhism—two fundamental principles of Sikhism are responsible: (1) That all the Ten Gurus were only in spirit, and (2) that after them the whole Sikh community, organised as the Panth, became the Guru.

The Guru's personality in both these forms—individual and Panthic—was permanently one and could not allow the rise of sects. From the Sikh Scripture and history also it appears that the Gurus did not allow any separate centres of Sikhism to be formed. Nobody who differed from the Guru, or tried to strike out a new path deviating from his, could remain a Sikh. He could do so only by going out of Sikhism.

UDASIS.

Then what are Udasis? Are they not a sect? From the history of their origin and the essentials of the practice it would appear that they are not a sect of Sikhism, whatever else they may be.

OTHER SIKHS.

As we shall see, the Udasis were not the only order of preachers set up by the Gurus, who, in fact, had been appointing missionaries just according to the needs of the times. In the time of Guru Nanak the Sikh sangats or congregations were scattered all over India, even outside and the centres of preaching appointed by him were called manjis.* Guru Amardas recognized the manji system on the provincial basis, because by his time the circle of Sikhism had been narrowed down to the Punjab, as the forces it had created had raised so much opposition nearer home that the presence of the Guru was constantly needed here to prevent disintegration. The system, however, did not work long, and Guru Arjun had to institute a new order of missionaries, called masands, who, in addition to preachers, had also to collect daswandk or tithes from the Sikhs. The work began to spread far and wide, and with the increased numbers and improved organizations the Sixth Guru felt encouraged to think of reviving the old neglected sangats of Guru Nanak scattered abroad. He himself went as far as Nanak Matta, in U. P., preaching and organizing centres of missionary work. But having too much to do with war, he could not personally attend to the distant sangats, and for this purpose he appointed Baba Guruditta with a new system of Masands, who in memory of Guru Nanak's similar tours came to be called Udasis. The only difference between the Masands and Udasis was that most of the Masands, while leaving in their own homes as exemplary men, were commissioned to work as preachers and tithe gatherers, while the Udasis were to work only as preachers in far and distant places, and, as the nature of the work required, they did not marry. As it is more difficult to live exemplary lives in the midst of families and with temptations attending the collection of money, the Masands grew more and more corrupt until their existence became a scandal and Guru Gobind Singh had to abolish their order. When in 1699 Guru Govind Singh instituted the ceremony of Baptism, as the door of entrance to Sikhism, he added the name of Masands to the list of other anathematized classes such as the Minas, Dhirmalias, Ramraias, etc. whose company was forbidden to the Sikhs. After this, anybody who wanted to become a Sikh must get himself baptised. And those who were to work as missionaries were also to do the same. The nucleus of these baptized missionaries was formed by those who had got Sanskrit education at Benares and living among Pandits had acquired the name Nirmala, which is a Sanskrit synonym for Khalsa. They lived pure, ascetic lives like the Udasis, from whom they differed only in the matter of baptism and the baptismal forms. The order to get the baptism of the sword was issued to all the Sikhs, and, according to a Persian newswriter of the period, about twenty thousand were baptized in one day. It was physically impossible to baptise the whole nation at once. It required time, but time was not given. Soon after this ceremony the Guru was compelled to mobilise all his Sikhs to fight for their existence. Those very Sikhs who had to form Jathas for administering the new ceremony to the far-flung sangats of Assam, Chittagong, Surat, etc., were called away to fight; even the Guru's own little children had to do their bit. The Guru lived only for nine years more after this of which only a small part was spent in the Panjab; and all this time was given over to military campaigns during which the Guru had often no room to cover his head. He managed to keep up the morning and evening diwans, at which all who came to seek entrance into Sikhism were baptized: but this too did not bring in all the distant sangats who believed in Sikhism but could not come all the way to conform to the latest injunctions. In this way many of the professed Sikhs remained without baptism.

Close upon this came the time of persecution, when to be a baptized Sikh was to court death; for the Government of the time had banned the presence of Sikhs in cities and had fixed prices on their heads. The regular Sikhs went away to jungles. It was at that time that some people, who believed in Sikhism but had not got the courage to die for it, began to go about without the outward signs of Sikhism. This was a kind of disguise adopted by them to escape trouble. They represented themselves to the regular Sikhs, Shijdharis or gradualadopters, a kind of apologetic Sikhs. They believed in the same principles as the regular Sikhs in exile, whom they helped with money and provisions in times of need, and whom they would join as baptized brethren as soon as they found themselves ready for sacrifice.

The Panth was in exile; but the temples remained behind. They were attended by the Shijdhari congregations and were supervised by the Shijdhari mahants, that is, the Udasis. They could not, however, protect the temples against desecration. In such cases the Nihangs or soldier-priests, would be serviceable, or the Panth would send heroes like Bhai Mehtab Singh or Baba Dip Singh to come to the rescue.

When the Panth returned from the jungles and established Sardarship and Mislus, the Udasis were replaced by Singhs in the management of the Durbar Sabib, Amritsar, and other temples. But in most places they were still retained, and large grants of land were made to them by the Sardars for the upkeep of those places. The reason is that the Sardars themselves by that time had forgotten the old significance of the initiation, and the acquisition of wealth and power had made them lax in their principles. These Udasis held the same views as the general body of Sikhs, else how could they have found support and encouragement from the Khalsa? One sect does not support the preaching of another sect.

This mistake, however, of allowing the uninitiated to remain in charge of their temples brought a general back-sliding movement among the Sikhs, until they fell into the same slough of superstition and apathy from which their Gurus had tried to rescue them. In the latter half of the 19th century several attempts were made to reform the religion, to restore the worship of the Formless and Invisible God in the place of idolatry, and to inculcate the love of the Name among the worldly-minded Sikhs. This resulted in the setting up of two movements, called Nirankari (worshippers of the Formless) Namdhari (upholders of the Name). Both of them did a lot of good in their own way; but the want of education led them to ignore the implications of the oneness of the Guru and the Guruship of the Panth. Thrown upon themselves, they soon began to adopt the semblances of sectarianism. As however, they believe in baptism and do not deny the two fundamental principles on which the oneness of the Panth hinges, it is hoped that before long they will wheel into one with the rest of the community. The differences of the Nirankaris, he already obliterated almost completely, and Namdharis too, when the present controversies are over, will be drawn more closely towards the panth; or the circumstances especially the advancement of education, will press them out of the race and let their movement, like that of the Bandais, die a natural death. In no case can they live as a sect. After the failure of these two movements to cope with the needs of the time, there arose another reform movement, called Singh Sabha, which, with the help of education has devised means for restoring Sikhism to its pristine purity. It embraces the whole community, and outside it are only those who through long association choose to prefer Hinduism to Sikhism, or through dense ignorance cannot distinguish one from the other. The Singh Sabha people engaged in the temple reform are called Araliks.

Fortunately most of the missionary orders, like the Udasis, Nirmalas, etc., originated during the lives of the Gurus, and it is therefore easy to refute the sectarianism of their origin. But, one might say, whatever may have been their origin, they have in the course of centuries acquired certain sectarian practices. Even here we see that, in spite of acquiring certain peculiarities, the historical circumstances of their dependence on the Panth and the custodianship of temples belonging to all, have prevented them from becoming sects, although the same circumstances have had the effect of pulling down the Sikhs from their ancient ideals. The clearest proof of there being no sects is the incontrovertible fact that the Udasis, Nirmalas, etc., have been converting people not to Udasism or Niramalaism, but to the general kind of Sikhism. The Shias and Sunnis form different sects in Islam and so do the Roman Catholics and Protestants in Christianity. The Shias hold that the true tradition of Islam has been preserved by them alone, and so far as the Sunnis differ from them, they are wrong. Therefore they convert people to the Shia form of Islam. Can we imagine them exhorting people to become Sunnis while they themselves remain Shias? Similarly can we think of the Roman Catholics holding conversions to Protestantism? Now what do we find in the case of Udasis, Nirmalas etc.? They have in their time converted thousands of people to Sikhism, not to Udasism or Niramalaism but to the same kind of Sikhism to which the generality of Sikhs belonged. The principles preached by them are the same as those preached by others, such as the descendants of the Gurus, etc. Differences there may be, but it is very important to remember that those differences do not run on the lines of Udasism, Niramalaism, etc. but on the lines of Hinduism or non-Hinduism. They do not have any separate theology peculiar to their respective sects. It is either drawn from the Sikh Scriptures (in which the Akalis and the Singh Sabhias would also agree) or it is imported en bloc from Hinduism, with isolated passages quoted here and there from the Holy Granth to support it. The latter is no peculiarity of any particular sect. The Udasis, Bedis, Sodhis, Nirmalas, Singh Sabhias, all indulge in it more or less.

The real fact is that they have been our missionaries, like the Qazis and Mullas among the Moham-medans. They may differ from the ordinary Sikhs in dress or some minor details of living; but by so doing they do not become sects. And the few differences in views existing between them and the modern reformed Sikhs are no more than those existing among the reformed Sikhs themselves. Some among the latter believe in Vedant, others do not; some still stick to the practice of untouchability or are inventing new forms of it, others discard it wholly as a nuisance; some prefer their women to tie turbans like men, others do not; some believe only in the Ten Gurus as personal Gurus, others set up saintly persons as co-equals of the Gurus. All these differences run on the Hindu or non-Hindu lines, and are due to the want of understanding all the implications of the principles of the unity of the Guru and the Panth. They are gradually vanishing with the process of discrimination and definition which Sikhism is undergoing under the dawning sense of those principles. When the Sikhs have completely realized their significance, they will be able to resolve all differences by an opportune reference to the organized authority of the Panth, and then there will be again "only one Guru, one Word and one interpretation".

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The Bank of India Limited.—The transactions of the past six months have resulted in a profit of Rs. 11,72,082-2-8 from which sum has to be deducted Rs. 1,50,000 for Income Tax and Super Tax, leaving a net profit of Rs. 10,22,082-2-8 for the half year ended 30th June 1929. To this amount has to be added Rs. 3,63,635-8-2 brought forward from the last account, making a total of Rs. 13,85,717-10-10. This sum the Directors have disposed of as follows:—In payment of an ad-interim dividend at the rate of ten per cent per annum (Rs. 2-8 per share) free of Income Tax on the Paid-up Capital of Rupees One Crore for the half year ended 30th June 1929, which will absorb Rs. 5,00,000; carried forward to the next account Rs. 8,85,717 10-10.

Assam Flood Disaster:—Pandit Motilal Nehru has issued the following appeal:—"Assam and East Bengal are facing a terrible disaster. The floods that are ravaging these provinces are unprecedented and have caused enormous loss of life and damage. Vast numbers of people are homeless and await the generous help of their brethren in other parts of the country. The Bengal Provincial Congress Committee has organised a Central Relief Committee with Mr. Acharya Praphullachandra Roy as president and Dr. J. M. Das Gupta as secretary. No better choice of organisers could have been made. Mr. Acharya Roy has specialised in relief work, and he and Dr. Das Gupta can be trusted to do the work efficiently and well. "I appeal to all those who are more fortunate than the unhappy inhabitants of Assam and East Bengal to give generously to the funds being raised by this Central Relief Committee. Contributions may be sent to the Bengal Provincial Congress Committee, Calcutta, or to the All-India Congress Committee at Allahabad."

The Court of Inquiry:—A Gazette Extraordinary published on the 3rd contains the official notification constituting a Court of Enquiry under the Trade Disputes Act. The members of the Court are the Honble, Mr. H. G. Pearson, Bar-at-Law, Judge of the High Court, Calcutta; F. S. Taleyarkhan Esquire, Bar-at-Law, and Rupchand Bilaram, Esquire, B.A., LL.B., Assistant Judicial Commissioner in Sind. The terms of reference to the Court are (1) to inquire into and ascertain the exact nature of the dispute or disputes between the employers and workmen of certain Mills which led to the strike in those mills, in March and April 1929; (2) If there was any such dispute, to what extent the employers or workmen or both are responsible in matters connected therewith? (3) What are the causes of the prolongation of the strike? Whether the employers or workmen or both are responsible for such prolongation, and if so, to what extent? (4) What are the difficulties in the way of a settlement of the disputes between the employers and the workmen?

A Social Reform Marriage:—A social reform marriage according to Arya Samaj rites was performed recently at Soundarya Mahal, George-town, the contracting parties being Mr. Natesa Aiyar, son of Srikanta Sastri of Coimbatore and Seethadevi Ammal, an Adi-Dravida. A very large number of visitors attended the function. After the marriage ceremony Dr. P. Varadarajulu Naidu, Dr. O. Natesa Mudaliar, Dewan Bahadur B. Ramachandra Rao, and Mr. Gadde Rangiah Naidu spoke felicitating the couple. Dr. Varadarajulu Naidu said that this marriage might be said to be an epochmaking one in the social reform world. The so-called Adi-Dravidas were made untouchables by previous generations and it was the duty of the present generation to reclaim them and include them in their fold. He would like a law to be enacted making marriages like the present legal and valid and said that it would be safeguarding the interest of the couple and their progeny if such marriages were registered under Civil Marriage Act. He would also further advise people, not to contract social reform marriages without due deliberation and thought. Dr. Natesa Mudaliar said that the ancients of this land made no distinction between caste and caste. Their religion was the fatherhood of God and brotherhood of man. That state should once again be brought into existence and he hoped this marriage would be followed by many similar ones. Dewan Bahadur R. Ramachandra Rao said that South India was economically very low because no one cared for his fellow-men and the whole land was full of the vice of communalism. When once this poison of communalism was removed, they had a glorious future before their country.

"Slaves of Gods":—Lord Olivier condemning Miss Mayo's second attempt at traducing India in the book entitled "Slaves of Gods" observes that the present volume is not quite so handy as "Mother India" for political use as a weapon wherewith to smite Indian Swaraj parties of Mother India. Lord Olivier now reveals what was common knowledge at the time how generous English patriots bought numbers of copies of "Mother India" and freely distributed them, Lord Olivier, himself receiving four copies in this way.

NOTES.

An Improper Book :—We have not benefited very much from Mr. Kanhayalal Gauba's book "Uncle Sham"—(Published by the Times Press, Lahore, price Rs. 6). We admit Mr. Gauba has written it under great provocation and some of his readers will regard "Uncle Sham" as a fitting reply to the recent attacks on India in American books and papers, but we are sure that the author must himself by now be regretting having written it. Mr. Gauba does the same service to the United States which Miss Mayo has done for India in her books and there is, we fear, in Mr. Gauba the same feeling of moral complacency and a flair for the sensational which the American lady showed in her publications. That America has her own troubles, the American would be the first to admit and the best minds in that country, as in India, are trying to solve them. It is not amusing to read that their efforts in this direction have met with poor response from the average American and Mr. Gauba's whole book deals with this aspect of American civilisation. That Miss Mayo should have only seen the bad side of Indian life is no excuse for Mr. Gauba to go through America in blinkers. Nearly half the book is an attack on the women of America and that in our opinion is the worst portion of the publication. We for our part find it difficult to believe that a society which has produced some of the finest leaders of modern thought could be intrinsically rotten. Our author is anxious to show that he does not plead like Miss Mayo that because so many agreeable books have been written about a country one vitriolic attack will not matter, but we think that the pinch of incense he offers to America's greatness bears a close resemblance to Miss Mayo's apology for her book. We hope, however, that undue importance will not be given to the book and that it will neither become a best seller nor as the author wishes, be burnt at the open stake. Mr. Gauba tells us that it has been a most painful task to write the book; let us assure him that it has been no pleasure to us to read it. Our opinion of the book is that it had better been left unwritten.

Mr. Manilal Parekh.—There was an interesting gathering of friends to bid goodbye to Mr. Manilal C. Parekh on the eve of his departure on a lecturing tour in western countries. Mr. Parekh is, in a way, a unique character in contemporary Indian life. Born of an orthodox Hindu family, he was early attracted by the Brahma Samaj movement, particularly by that section of it which goes by the name of "the New Dispensation" established by Keshub Chandra Sen. Mr. Parekh threw himself heart and soul into the Brahma movement but found it, after a time, inadequate for his spiritual needs, and was baptised into the Church of England. Since joining the Christian Church, however, he has been realising with growing intensity that it does not truly interpret the life and teachings of Jesus Christ, and he has been feeling his way to a new interpretation in conformity with Hindu tradition. Mr. Parekh is by no means unique in this respect as there are hundreds if not thousands of Hindus who are not only attempting but have with more or less success achieved such an interpretation and are, moreover, earnestly endeavouring to solve the problems of personal and national life. They are still Hindus as Christ's teachings not only do not jar on any part of their own spiritual instincts but rather illuminate and bring them into bold relief. Jesus Christ to them is One who had socialised the deep implications of Hindu metaphysics, and in accepting Him as their Guru, they are in no wise departing from the root principles of the religio-philosophic system commonly known as Hinduism. Mr. Parekh's uniqueness consists rather in this, namely, that having formally been received into a Christian sect, and thus put behind him a new background, he has yet refused to surrender the social and family life in which he was born and brought up. The generality of Indian converts follow the reverse process and before they are fully christianised inwardly, become westernised outwardly. Mr. Parekh with a deep devotion to Christ adheres to the social and sartorial habiliments of his caste, not because, as has been often alleged of other educated men, he is afraid to face persecution but because he feels that in accepting Christ he is not called upon to change his name, dress, diet and such externals and incidentals of life. Just as when a man goes to a foreign land, feels the more drawn to his native land, so Mr. Parekh since becoming a Christian—or "Hindu disciple of Jesus" as he calls himself—feels more tenderly towards Hinduism. With the Bible in one hand and the Bhagwad-Gita in the other, he goes forth to interpret India to the West. Several friends who were present at the gathering, expressed the hope that Mr. Parekh's mission might be crowned with success.

Revival of Indian Music:—The revival of Indian Music and the revival of Indian Medicine are making progress. Presiding at the fourth anniversary celebration of the Bombay School of Indian Music last Sunday, the Vice Chancellor of the University, Mr. Mirza Ali Mahomed Khan, delivered a learned address in which he traced the history of Indian Music and emphasised the importance of cultivating it as a part of liberal education. Referring to the decay of music in India, Mr. Mirza thought it might be due to the fact that music and dancing had been relegated to the women of loose character. The growth of a strong public opinion against this unfortunate development, has led to the exclusion of the nautch from public entertainments, and one important result is that music is being cultivated in families and schools, and it is no longer regarded as improper for respectable women to sing in public. Opinion regarding dancing has not advanced to the same extent. Mr. Mirza called attention to the great encouragement given by Mahomedan rulers of India to musicians many of the most eminent of whom flourished in their Courts, notwithstanding that, according to the Muslim orthodox opinion, even the hearing of music, both vocal and instrumental, is unlawful according to the Shariat or the religious law. In spite of the Shariat, he went on to say, the Moslems, more particularly the Moslem Princes and the higher classes had always been patrons of the art. At the fair at the Darga at Ajmere of the celebrated Mahomedan Saint, Ktija Minuruddin Chisti, which he visited in 1927, Mr. Mirza saw musicians from all parts of India singing at all hours. Several years ago, this writer visiting the shrine of Nizamuddin Aulia at Delhi saw a long line of musicians sitting knee to knee opposite the door of the shrine, and singing in concert. He was told that this they did every Thursday and that the musicians were both Hindus and Mussalmans. Among the many influences which have been working towards a fusion of Hindu and Moslem in India, not the least was the evolution of music in which the destruction of creed was overshadowed by the love of art. Even to-day, music retains much of its harmonising power.

"Education Friends":—We publish in another column the prospectus of a new Association, called "Education Friends," which has been formed under influential auspices to advance women's education in this country. The objects, as set forth in the memorandum, are, we need hardly say, excellent, and those associated with the movement are clearly actuated by the highest motives. There are one or two points, however, on which a word of caution is necessary. The education of girls, like that of boys, is a function of every civilized State and it would be a thousand pities if the formation of this Association has the effect, directly or indirectly, of diminishing that responsibility. The "Education Friends," we see, undertakes to provide for the training of teachers, for the production of text-books, and for the housing of women teachers in rural areas. All these are part of the duty of the administration and it would be most unfortunate if the Association should give colour to an impression that the local authorities may leave these things to its care. No doubt, the funds at the disposal of these local bodies are not sufficient but the policy of supplementing them by voluntary subscriptions is not a sound one. No one would suggest, for example, that the Army or the Police should be financed in that way. Education, from every point of view, is just as essential as these agencies for national safety, and must be provided for by the State in the same way. Voluntary contributions and endowments should be used only for special purposes to help higher education. We hope that this Association will not develop into a parallel organisation with that which runs the Women's Medical Service. The position allotted to Indian women in this Service has given rise to bitter complaints, and unless care is taken to keep the new movement on the right lines, it may do more harm than good to the cause which it aims at promoting.

An Unfortunate Incident:—Even in the days when the nautch evil was at its worst in South India the educational institutions were as a rule free from it. We were therefore pained to read in a recent issue of the Bihar Herald that such a party was held not long ago in the hall of the Bihar National College and "was attended by a large and distinguished gathering including several gentlemen occupying a prominent place in the Patna University." The journal continued to point out that the regulations of the College forbid the use of the hall for religious meetings but that evidently there is no objection to nautch parties being held there and waxing sarcastic it advised the University to sanction a special grant for annual functions of this kind. Whilst regretting that the party was held in the College premises we have good reason to believe that the College authorities had nothing to do with the event and could not anticipate it. We have since learnt that the hall had been lent to an outside party under the impression that the function was not objectionable and the entertainment was arranged without the knowledge of the authorities. We are inclined to accept this version of the incident as we learn from the correspondent who sends us the cutting from the Herald that "the Principal of the College, Mr. D. N. Sen, is a venerable Brahmo and often conducts divine service in the local Samaj." We hope, however, that the College authorities who, it must be admitted, have been guilty of negligence will profit by the lesson and not let the hall in future without ascertaining that the purpose for which it is required does not bring the College into disrepute.

care for nothing but what brings grist to its own particular mills. She can appreciate breadth of vision and nobility of aim, even though they bring no immediate relief to her many troubles. The MacDonald Government's foreign policy aims at peace and justice among nations, and its home policy also is such as to advance the same interests. India wishes it well, though it is little that she expects for herself.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, JULY 13, 1929.

INDIA AND THE LABOUR GOVERNMENT.

The accession to power as the result of the recent British General Elections of Labour Government, has created a division of opinion in political India. Previous to that, certain unanimity existed in consequence of the opposition to the constitution and methods of the Simon Commission between all nationalist parties, that nothing was to be gained from the Tory Cabinet which had muddled the Indian question as it had muddled foreign affairs by its wooden and unimaginative policies. The dismissal of the Baldwin Government was received with a sort of negative satisfaction in this country. It may even be said that no other British Government would have aroused the same sympathetic feelings among Indians as Mr. Ramsay MacDonald's Government. The reasons for this are not primarily connected with expectations regarding India. Indians feel that the Labour party represents a struggle against class domination, as their national movement represents a struggle against race domination. They think, therefore, that the British Labour party should in the nature of things feel greater sympathy for their aspirations than the two other parties which stand for vested interests. This does not necessarily follow. The Jews were, till about fifty years ago, and still are in some parts of Europe, a most oppressed people but wherever they have risen to power they have been the most powerful exponents of imperialism of the exploiting type. British imperialism itself owns Disraeli as its father and founder, and Lord Reading's Viceroyalty was conceived much on the same lines. We do not forget that the late Mr. Montagu was the author of the last instalment of reforms but he was an exceptional man and would have been one at any time and among any people. The emancipated slave is often an unmitigated tyrant. The British Labour Government, moreover, can exist only so long as it keeps well within the limits of Liberal toleration. It has, in fact, to struggle for its own existence, and is unlikely to have much energy left to champion the cause of India which concerns the average Englishman only as the milch-cow of the British Empire. That the attitude of the Labour Government as such, whatever may be that of individual members of it, is not materially different, is shown by the remarks of Mr. Philip Snowden, the Labour Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the House of Commons last week. Speaking against a motion in favour of Imperial Preference, he said that Britain can gain more by investing capital in India than in the Dominions, and we all know that the "investment of capital" in Asiatic countries is the technique of financial politics which is the main instrument of modern Imperialism. Egypt is one outstanding illustration and India, another.

We entirely agree with those who hold that India must work out her own salvation. No British Government can help us except so far as we are able to help ourselves. This however, does not mean that we must go out of our way to antagonise Britain, or decline to avail ourselves of any advantages which may be secured without surrendering the essentials of national advancement. For the reasons stated above, we do not ourselves expect that the Labour Government will do much more for this country than any other British Government. The late Tory Prime Minister, Mr. Baldwin, took the very first opportunity during the debate on the address in reply to "the Speech from the Throne" to warn the Government that India will be the acid test and that except on it, his party would offer no factious opposition to Government measures in Parliament. It is hardly fair to expect, and scarcely likely, that the Macdonald Government would deliberately immolate itself on the Indian issue. The most which we can expect from it is that it will do something to remove the administrative obstacles in the way of the free growth of the national movement in India. It is evident that the present policy of the Governments in India is to encourage communal and to discourage national movements. The National Congress and the Liberal Federation are frowned upon while official smiles are lavishly bestowed on communal and sectional movements under the guise of protecting minority and backward classes. If the Labour Government is able to see through this game, and exert itself to have a change effected in this respect, it will have done much to help India to help herself. Not that we share the view that communal movements are necessarily bad. On the contrary, we think they can, properly directed, very materially further national progress. But they are not properly directed now. They are now merely instruments in the hands of not very disinterested men to advance themselves. The Labour Government can do another thing. It can encourage Governments in India to rely less upon repressive and coercive measures than on constructive statesmanship for maintaining law and order. Apart from what the Labour Government can directly do for us, we stand to gain by everything which it does to promote international peace and friendship. India is not so self-centred as to

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XXVIII. UNDERGROUND WORKERS

(By DR. CLIFFORD MANSCHARDT, PH. D.)

One of the more important and less spectacular tasks of the human family is that of supplying fuel and raw materials for industry. Those of us who work in the sunlight and partake freely of the fresh air can little imagine what it means to enter into the depths of the earth and to toil there, grappling with the earth's own vitals. According to the figures for the year 1926, there were 118,232 underground workers in the mines regulated by the Indian Mines Act. Of this total 86,343 were males and 31,889 females. In the mining industry, if in any industry, there should be a careful regulation of working conditions, but unfortunately it is impossible even to secure complete statistics as to wages paid and hours worked. At the very best the physical conditions of underground mining are not ideal. To people accustomed to working in the fields the perils of underground work offer slight attraction. The British Trades Union Congress Delegation to India reports that mine managers in order to induce the villagers to take up work in the mines, even for a short time, have to offer "substantial sums of money in advance to the head man of a group, over and above the actual earnings in the mine." But if railroads are to run; if factories are to be supplied with fuel; if we are to have steel and iron for manufacturing and building purposes; then our mines must continue to operate and even to expand their activities. The fact that we must keep sight of is that we, the consuming public, are part and parcel of the whole enterprise. The worker who enters into the mine is working for us just as truly as though we had a share in the management. The day is past when the labour problem can be looked upon simply as two sided—as between the employer and the worker. The public must also have its voice. Every death in a mine due to the carelessness of those responsible for safety is a blot upon the public conscience. Every explosion that might have been prevented is a public disgrace. Every good citizen has it within his power to use his influence to see that existing legislation is enforced, and that new protective legislation is passed whenever necessary. The human family is a brotherhood, and we are our brothers' keepers.

The fellowship of understanding is an organization that should enrol countless numbers. To all men are not given the same abilities, but to each man there is given the opportunity to appreciate the contribution of his neighbour. We are fully aware of the necessity for specialization in a cooperative society. We know that our own profession or group is dependent for its existence upon other groups. It is very seldom, however, that we actually show any sympathy towards the hopes and aspirations of these other groups. This failure is our source of weakness. It is only as we "help each man his neighbour" that our better world draws nigh.

INDIAN WOMEN'S EDUCATION.

A valued friend from Indore who knows educated Indian women intimately and is competent to speak with authority on the subject of Indian women's education, writes to us refuting the theories advanced by one Rosalie Acaon in her article on "India's New Problem" published in the Times of India of the 4th instant:—

Before concluding I want to draw your attention to the enclosed cutting taken from yesterday's Times. I felt so indignant when I read it, and thought the contemptuous and misleading statements in the article should be refuted. I think it a shame that High School and College girls should be spoken of like this—and it is only too much the fashion to do so. I don't know who the writer is, but I really think she can know very little of what Indian girls actually learn at High School and College. Her great point is that they cannot cook and sew, know little or nothing of hygiene, health matters and sick nursing or management of young children, and the type of education they receive is quite wrong and unsuitable.

I think it is all a libel. I know so many College girls who can cook well, who make their own blouses and, in the midst of their studies, owing to home circumstances, help their mothers very considerably with the younger children.

In High Schools there is a Hygiene course and if girls live in the hostel of the school, they learn all kinds of "domestic arts"—how to entertain friends, to manage a social party, to prepare plain and fancy simple dishes, arrange flowers and lots of similar things. They also learn practical sick nursing by taking care of one another when ill. At the Ahilyashram the girls have been trained to manage the hostel dispensary and the nursing. They know how to keep a chart for the doctor as a nurse does, showing temperatures and all details. And the knowledge they get of how to live according to the rules of hygiene, they certainly put into actual practice. As to the "strain," both physical and mental being too great, I once asked a graduate woman teacher if she really thought it was. She laughed and said, "Do you think that sitting behind the cooking pots, with almost nothing to relieve the monotony and drudgery, having no "outlook" and being badgered by a mother-in-law is less a strain? School-life is heaps better, for any ordinarily intelligent girl." And I felt that she was right. I am sending the cutting to you in the hope that you will refute it. One other point she makes is that all Indian Girls are certain to marry and therefore their education should fit them for that destiny—as if only cooking, sewing etc., would fit them for marriage? Moreover, they are not certain to marry. When they are grown up and educated they don't like arranged marriages, and if they don't meet suitable men, cultured like themselves and are attracted to them, they naturally don't care to marry. This writer speaks as if women's education has wrought no changes, except perhaps for the worse!

So I leave this with you. I should feel so glad to see you put people "wise"—especially the writer of the article—on these points.

"CONFESSIONS OF A MISSIONARY."

XI.

The Editor, the Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I have read with much interest the letter of "Perplexed" under the caption "Confessions of A Missionary." In reviewing the letter, I will scrupulously avoid indulging in polemical extravagances but since "Perplexed" has been so frank, it is but fair that criticism of his views should be equally frank and expressed in a friendly spirit. Originally his letter was not destined for the press, and it is obvious, that without giving him the necessary time to consider your request, you prevailed upon him to consent to its publication. It only indicates that "Perplexed" is hasty in judgment. The use of about ninety I's in his letter shows that he is also egoistically inclined. Before I proceed I wish to be clearly understood that he has my deepest sympathies in his difficulties and it is hardly necessary to assure him that they are in no way unsurpassable.

His chief trouble is that he cannot understand why India with her hoary civilisation should remain helpless and sick. The answer to this enquiry is not far to seek. It is a pity that a man of his education, ideals and experience should be oblivious to the main cause of India's helplessness. It is writ large on her face. It is the result of her political bondage. This diagnosis has been unanimously accepted by all foreign well-wishers of India. If "Perplexed" has not been able to discern it for himself during his sojourn of twenty years, he can never do it. It is not true to say that India prefers to remain sick and weak; the fact is that adverse circumstances are forcing her to remain where she is. Any effort on her part to make her lot better is ruthlessly suppressed by unsympathetic alien rulers. The fact is so obvious that it does not require an uncanny power of observation.

"Perplexed" seems to be perfectly pleased with the result of his missionary work. We are told that he has baptised hundreds from amongst the outcastes. To baptise a poor, hungry outcaste does not require much faith or courage. All that it requires is a huge amount of funds, comfortable and easy life for the missionaries, and all these things they—particularly the American missionaries—have in abundance. If he had actually converted a single Indian of any caste, he would not have been in a hopeless delusion to-day. Baptising hundreds and thousands of outcastes is a mechanical process which simply swells the number of Indian Christians. I can say from personal experience and after much study of the problem that these outcastes at the present stage of their civilisation, are not fit for Christianity and much less for Western Christianity which is presented to them. I am, therefore, not at all surprised that our friend is so much perturbed over the loss of twenty valuable years of his life in endeavouring to turn these people Christian according to his ideas of Christianity. If he revises his programme and changes his angle of vision and instead of "baptising many hundreds into the name of Christ," he serves a few of them in the name of Christ by educating them, raising their standard of living, inculcating in them a habit of thrift and cleanliness, by teaching them methods and advantages of co-operative societies, the fear of God and the love of neighbours—he will realise that that was his real aim in life—a life of service and self-sacrifice. I have never been able to understand why missionaries should care so much for the number of baptisms. Perhaps they have to fill in their monthly reports to justify their presence among heathens. Well, I may tell "Perplexed" that Christ did not mean anything of the kind. Why then blame India and "Sweeper Christians," (a peculiar phrase for a Missionary to use), when it is the missionaries themselves who are entirely responsible for their own sufferings?

It is most puerile to be disheartened by the ignorance of some of the "Sweeper Christians" or by the weakness of the lawyer whose case is mentioned. A few isolated cases of that type will not help "Perplexed" to prove his case against Indian Society. No doubt, social wrongs are there; no one denies it; but certainly they are not so unexplicable or irremediable as to make one despair of the whole affair. Moreover, Indians themselves are endeavouring to have these evils eradicated; therefore to stigmatise a whole people on that score is nothing short of a Miss Mayo-stunt. It has been my misfortune to encounter once in my life the worst type of White Padre in India. But that fact has not prevented me admiring the missionaries as a class and their humanitarian work in India. I still have some very good friends among them. I have very sad memories of the treatment that was meted out to my father by the missionaries, but in spite of that, some of them still command my respect. I hope therefore, that "Perplexed" will reconsider the whole situation in the light of the guidance that he has received from his friends—known and unknown—since the publication of his letter.

It is most unfair to compare India to Japan. There is no parallel between the two countries.

Regarding the hakim and the Missionary doctor; one of my brother's life was once imperilled by a missionary doctor who was urgently summoned from a neighbouring town. My brother was saved by the skill of a hakim. Now how did that happen? Will Mr. Perplexed kindly explain this to me? All missionary doctors are not cleverer than all hakims.

Simply because the wife of that man died does not necessarily prove that the doctor was in anyway superior to the hakim.

It is absurd to talk about Indian standard of decency in disparaging terms. It is far far above any conceivable standard of decency in America or elsewhere. I have never seen Indian women going out in the field and "openly exposing themselves to the world." I am a villager and I know what I am talking about. Our village women do go out in the field and as far as possible sit behind a cover. If they happen to see or hear any one approach they instinctively rise and remain standing until the person is out of sight. "Perplexed" seems to have observed everything else but not this most important fact—he cannot have an unbiased mind. The above statement cannot be proved without comparing the two standards—Western and Eastern—and comparison is always invidious and this is hardly the occasion for it. But why should missionaries almost invariably note our shortcomings and conveniently over-look our virtues? I am beginning to think that many missionaries are Miss & Mr. Mayo's in the making.

The main difficulty of Mr. Perplexed is that his beautiful and delicate wife has to perform loathsome business in the hospital. It is tragic indeed. I may be pardoned for stating that he loves his wife more than his God and his work to which he originally dedicated his life. Undoubtedly his wife is of angelic virtue, but if they don't look out his love for his wife will be her stumbling block. Here in the City of Bombay there is a beautiful young European lady whose husband is holding a respectable position in one of the public services. Her love for the poor and the depressed is so great that a considerable amount of the husband's salary goes towards the amelioration of their condition. Not only that, but in her spare hours she works to earn a little money in order to pay her Indian assistant co-workers. There must be many instances of that nature. I hope this example will help "Perplexed" so that he may not interfere in the good work that his noble wife is conducting.

Bribery is not peculiar to India. Perhaps it is more common here. But just imagine a Police Constable getting a salary of Rs. 15/-p.m. has got to maintain a family of six children. How on earth is he going to provide for the bare necessities of life for them? It is perplexing indeed that such an easy thing should have perplexed our friend. I never had an experience to bribe anyone in India. The two occasions on which I was obliged to bribe was once in Italy and then in England.

I am exceedingly pleased to learn that the Arya Samajists are so active that wherever "Perplexed" goes, he finds them around him. The ubiquitous Arya Samaj Missionaries are giving a battle royal to the Christian Missionaries in the spiritual field of India. Hitherto they had an easy task of baptising thousands of the depressed classes. Now when they have a rival in the field, we shall see how far they will succeed. It may be embarrassing; but it is by no means perplexing. Personally, I believe that our poor untouchables would make better men and women as Arya Samajists than as Christians. Some of the greatest Christian Missionaries in Africa have repeatedly borne testimony to the fact that a raw African native makes a better man as a convert to Mohammedanism than to Christianity. It is not implied thereby that our untouchables are on a par with the raw African natives, but the fact is that they are a component part of Hinduism, and when they are accorded equal opportunities with higher caste Hindus, they invariably make better men and women than if they had been converted to Christianity.

"Perplexed" does need a furlough rather badly. I hope and pray that he may be given the true light to enable him to get over his difficulties and to return to India. But I humbly submit that if he cannot love and worship his God and his work more than his wife and children, it will be wrong on his part to return to India. India will not lose him. He can still continue helping India and furthering her cause from his own country. There are a few Indians who, not long ago, had acquired the American citizenship and are now rendered "Stateless" by a foolish act of the American Govt. There is a field for his activities. He may join the group of American friends of India who are trying to have this grievance of India redressed. Further, he may put himself in touch with Indian students in America and help them generally. Above all, he can assist India by constantly remembering her in his prayers even as he remembers his own country and people.

XII.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,
Sir,

The "Confessions of a Missionary" published in the June 8th issue of the Reformer is a frank and free admission of the failure of what the writer conceived to be his mission in life. After such a scathing denunciation of Indian life, it is hardly to be expected that the Indian people will take kindly to him or that there will be a change of heart in the missionary himself towards them. In the circumstances it would be advisable for "Perplexed" to seek a congenial field for his work, preferably among his own people with whom he has much in common. An Indian, however lowly, has enough discrimination to distinguish disinterested service and appreciate it but when attempts are made to win him to an alien faith in his weak movements he is perfectly right to resist. It is precisely here that the Indian social worker scores. Not that the latter encounters no difficulties in his work of reform but being of the people he feels that he must sink or swim with them. And is it to be wondered at if the masses have more faith in their own people and their ministrations? I have known Indian women doctors imbued with pure love of service show unremitting attention to the so-called low class patients who were grateful to them for their services; the red mark and the sari have been passports to the inmost sanctuary of the most orthodox households. Can anything be more touching than a poor Indian woman pressing on a doctor the acceptance of a mango as a humble token of appreciation for the cure effected. Skillfully eliminating all the potent factors that keep him down, "Perplexed" argues with much show of reason that the Indian alone is responsible for all his woes. If this statement is to be accepted it should be carried to its logical conclusion and any progress that has been made should be attributed to the same agency. Self and not service looms large in the confessions of "Perplexed". Then there is the fact that during the last ten years there has been awakening among the masses who are disinclined to accept the foreign missionaries' services at their face value. If christianity is to be judged by its teachings and not by its practices, the same indulgence should be allowed in the criticism of Hinduism. Then why this unseemly outburst against and uncalled for fling at Hinduism? I cannot help feeling Sir, that in the guise of a friend and worker "Perplexed" has only dotted the i's and crossed the t's of Miss Mayo's scurrilous attack on us.

A HINDU WOMAN.

CHILD MARRIAGE AMONG CHRISTIANS.

The 1921 Census of India revealed the surprising fact that the Indian Christian community has within its ranks a serious child marriage problem. In the past the community has looked at child marriage with an attitude of detachment, denouncing it and seeking to bring it to an end but not thinking of the evil as in any sense affecting itself or its members. But in 1921, 992 Christian girls under five years of age, 4,960 between the ages of five and ten, and 27,420 between ten and fifteen were married.

It is probable that most of these little girls were married when their parents were Hindus. The Census does not correspond with Church records. It is likely that some thousands of people record themselves as Christians whose names are on no Church records, and who have never been baptized or intensively taught. An examination of the returns in one Mass Movement District, where the total number of Christians reported was less than half the number on the records of the Church, revealed the surprising fact that nearly a hundred people were entered as Christians living in villages where the Church records showed no members of the community. Some of the child marriages entered in the Census reports under the head of Christians may be accounted for in this way. But when every possible allowance is made it is still clear that the Indian Christian community has a child marriage problem. It is by no means certain that some nominal Christians are not getting their children married at very tender ages, not by Christian marriage law, for that is happily impossible, but by the rites prevailing in their old castes from which their new allegiance has not entirely freed them. It is well-known that many marriages of Christian converts in Mass Movement areas are performed according to the customs and rites prevailing in the community to which they belonged before conversion, and it would be surprising if some of the persons thus married were not very young boys and girls. The necessity of being on guard to prevent this sort of situation developing is shown by the experience of the Mohammedan community. Islam has not been cursed with child-marriage customs anywhere outside of India. Here too, the sentiment of the community as a whole has been opposed to the custom. But the 1921 Census showed 28,783 Mohammedan girls under five years of age, and no fewer than 264,723 between the ages of ten and fifteen married. It is hardly possible to think of all the 28,783 Moslem wives under five years of age being converts who were married as Hindus. On the contrary it is obvious that many of them must have been married as Moslems, though possibly not according to recognized Moslem custom.

The difficulty of uprooting such customs as this in groups of converts from Hinduism is accentuated by the paucity of their contacts with Christians outside of their own group. The only Christian, apart from their group, whom some of them know is the preacher who makes weekly or fortnightly visits to their village. Whatever they know of Christian thought and practice they have learned from him. It is not surprising if his influence, thus applied, has not overcome the influence of the old ideas, reinforced as the latter are, by prevailing opinion among their neighbours.

Does this constitute an argument against the Mass Movements? Assuredly not. As well might one argue that it is not worthwhile to continue to provide educational opportunities for the children of a community because experience has proved that a certain proportion of them after being in school two, three or even four years lapse into illiteracy, or never become literate, or because gross superstitions that prevail among the uneducated are found to exist, though in much-reduced proportions, among those who have been in school. But it does constitute a reason for strengthening the work done for Mass Movement converts. It emphasizes the need for intensive ministration by alert and well-trained pastors and for bringing to the isolated Christians in the villages as many contacts with their brethren of the Church as possible.—The Indian Witness.

BUDDHISM DEFINED.

The first thing to note about Buddhism is that there is no such thing ! The founder of what to-day is called "Buddhism," never mentioned such a word. All the great teachers of mankind are simple in what they say to men. They are concerned with things, with facts, not with words, not with labels. And things of themselves are simple ; it is only the words we use about them that tend to become, and do become complicated.

So when the Indian Raja's son at length found deliverance from unhappiness that tormented him—the unhappiness of seeing how unhappy his fellow men were—he started out to tell them how they might escape from their unhappiness. That was all. It was as simple as that. "I only teach two things," he said, "unhappiness, and getting rid of unhappiness."

His teaching was thus not a doctrine, a body of beliefs, to be accepted by the mind, but the statement of a course to be followed, a method to be pursued, for the attainment of a result, desirable, beneficial, for the whole man—the ending of his unhappiness. Here, to be sure, for us Westerners, complications arise in the stating of the nature of the unhappiness of men, and the means to be used for its removal. But to the men around him to whom the Buddha spoke every day in the course of his wanderings about his native land, what he said was not complicated at all. India was, and is, accustomed to thought about life which, to us of the West, seems very deep and profound, but there is commonplace, or at least, not difficult to grasp at all. So when the Buddha set before them his Path or Way to the ending of unhappiness completely and for every many of them saw what he meant almost immediately. The problem was already quite familiar to them ; and his solution nothing out of the way for them.

He told them what many of their teachers before him had already told them often enough, that all unhappiness arises from desire for what is impermanent, and the inevitable disappointment which follows thereupon ; and he prescribed for them a course of mental action which should rid them of this misplaced desire and its resultant ill effects. This course of action constitutes his now well-known "Noble Eightfold Path," consisting—in its triple division, of Right Deeds, Words, and Mental Aims. The definition of deeds and words that are "right" was and is the simplest imaginable, namely, deeds and words that cause no unhappiness to self or others, ultimately. Right mental aims required a somewhat more involved definition, which yet was not nearly so involved to those to whom it was first addressed, as it may seem to us of this later day, and of another continent.

Nevertheless, it has a simple aspect. It was mentality directed towards envisaging things, just as they are, in their true nature. But such direction was only possible when the mind had been brought to a state of calm or poise, which state was partially prepared by "Right Conduct." The preliminary conditions for attaining such poise, were provided by such conduct. After that, a strict course of mental athletics, so to speak, was required to bring the mind to the fit state required for the clear and perfect vision of actuality as it is.

This course consisted, primarily, in watching over the mind, and not allowing it to do what it liked, like an unruly horse. It was to be tied to a post, like a wild, prankish calf, and kept there till it learned to behave itself and keep quiet, and stay where it was placed. It was given one thing to think about, and made to think about that and about nothing else, till it had exhausted all that that thing meant, its full significance, before it passed on to think of something else.

And this practice has an every-day life value. It might be practised in a man's ordinary avocations, as concentrated attention to whatever work he had in hand, to the exclusion of everything else not connected there-with. But in its technical use in the Buddha's system of mental athletics, it was intended to assist the man in inhibiting the arising of undesired thoughts in his mind, and in assisting the arising of desired ideas; for in the suppression of the former and the encouragement and increase and growth of the latter, in the ultimate, lay all man's hope of getting rid of unhappiness, according to the Buddha.

The West has heard much in these latter days of the word Karma; and all sorts of mistaken ideas about its nature and operation have gained currency. But with the Buddha, seriously effective Karma meant, in the ultimate, mental action. "Willing, I say, O mendicants, is Karma," he once declared to the little body of disciples who accompanied him on his wanderings. To do an evil deed, or say an evil word, is an ill thing, and will entail ill consequences, he taught. But the worst thing of all, the thing that entailed the most far-reaching and profound of consequences, was evil thought, deliberately willed evil.

Here, of course, he came into conflict with the vast majority of his fellows of his time and country who were, and are, meticulously concerned about the observance of forms and ceremonies and details of formal external behaviour. All these, he declared, were of little or no avail, if the mind of the man was not set in the right direction.

Hence, on what seemed to the vast majority of his fellow-countrymen, a point of the greatest importance, that men should not partake of the corpses of animals as food, he refused to make it a rule of his way of "Right Conduct" that they should observe such a prohibition, even when pressed to do so by his cousin, on the ground that all other religious teachers of any reputation did so, and that it would bring much obloquy upon his followers to be seen eating what everybody else of good class abhorred. The Buddha was determined that externals should have no weight in his teaching, whatever weight it might have in others, and merely said that if any of his followers chose to abstain from eating flesh they might do so; but all he would do in the matter was to prohibit them from eating it if they heard or saw or suspected that the animal had been deprived of life for them. Naturally, such teaching on this point was a tremendous shock to his contemporaries. But there were plenty, nevertheless, who saw the point of his refusal to make an external observance an essential constituent part of his Path to the highest; and his maintenance of the mental attitude as the main thing in his system of training. In which respect, as Westerners may notice, he was not so very different from another religious Teacher who said that it was not what went into a man that made him impure, but what came out of him. However, in the degree to which a man's mind is possessed by the Buddha's idea of not doing anything that might even in remotest degree be likely to cause unhappiness to any living being (which includes what we call the "lower creation")—to that degree he will be careful not to do anything that might cause such unhappiness; and to that degree, therefore, he will abstain from using the bodies of dead animals as food. And as an actual matter of fact, many Buddhists do strictly abstain from using flesh as food. It all depends upon the extent to which their minds are possessed by the Buddha's comprehension of things. That is the real dictator of their conduct, in this, as in every other matter.

Succinctly defined, "Buddhism"—to use this faulty, but sometimes convenient, word—is a teaching of deliverance from unhappiness by comprehension, by understanding, not by ritual, not by external observances of any kind, not by emotion, not by feelings. "Understand!" is the first and last word of the Buddha to men. "Understand, get a right, a correct understanding of what you are, and where you are; and all the rest will follow of all you can wish in the achievement of deliverance from unhappiness. And it will follow, in degree corresponding exactly with the degree of your understanding, here in this world, without any necessary reference to what some other world may bring."

For Nirvana, that so much desecrated and vulgarised word, is not in the least a vague, celestial—or even super-celestial—lubberland beyond the gates of the body's death, but a condition that may be experienced here and now in this present lifetime, by any one who brings about the conditions in which it can manifest its presence. For it means simply the complete and entire absence of all self-referring action, whether of body, speech or mind, from the given individual. Such an individual speaks and acts and thinks in this world; but the centre from which he does so had absolutely ceased to be self. "Can such a thing be possible?" some will ask. And the reply is: It is not only possible; it has happened. The Buddha himself was such a man. And after his attainment of this happy state he lived a long life of fifty years more, stretching to eighty years all told, filled with ceaseless activity for the good of his fellow men in setting before them the Path he had found to deliverance from unhappiness. And there were others who did the same, who are technically called Arahans, that is, "Worthy Ones," in token that they had fulfilled the task that is worthiest to be done of any that man can attempt on earth, the bringing to an end of self.

The ultimate aim of "Buddhism" is the production of such "Worthy Ones", such Arahans. And the belief of "Buddhists" is that the ends of evolution will not be accomplished until every man has become such a Worthy One. Nay, some Buddhist Scriptures of the Far East even assert that "there is not a grain of dust that now is but one day shall enter into "Enlightenment," so universal, so all-embracing, so catholic, is the interpretation they place upon the aims and the expected achievements of the Teaching of the Supremely Awakened One.—The British Buddhist.

THE NEW BRITISH PARLIAMENT AND ALCOHOLISM.

THE INTERNATIONAL BUREAU AGAINST ALCOHOLISM HAS ISSUED THE FOLLOWING BULLETIN,
LAUSANNE, 11TH JUNE, 1929.

The elections in Great Britain have been favourable to the fight against alcoholism, not only because the labour party displays more sympathy for this question than the conservative party, but also because a good number of fervent temperance reformers have been elected.

Let us mention a few names:

In the labour party, Messrs Henderson, Minister of Foreign Affairs, Philip Snowden, Chancellor of the Exchequer, James H. Hudson and Dr. Salter who raised a storm by remarking on the high consumption of alcoholic beverages which took place on the premises of the House of Commons.

Among the liberals elected let us mention Sir Donald Maclean, Executive President of the Temperance Council of the Christian Churches, and one of the vice-Presidents of the World League Against Alcoholism, Mr. Lief Jones, one of the Presidents of the World League Against Alcoholism and President of the United Kingdom Alliance for the Abolition of the Liquor Traffic, Mr. W. Runciman. Scotland sends to Westminster one of her temperance leaders, Mr. Duncan Millar.

Among the conservatives two names must be noted: Sir W. Joynson Hicks who, as Home Secretary in the Baldwin Cabinet always opposed the 'facilities' demanded by the representatives of the liquor traffic, and quite especially Lady Astor, against whom a formidable opposition was organised in the ranks even of her own party, because she has always pleaded in Parliament for the fight against alcoholism.

What will the new government do now? Mr. Macdonald promised during the electoral campaign to institute immediately an Inquiry Commission on the reform of the liquor legislation and doubtless he will keep his promise. Doubtless also he will be sympathetic with regard to any proposals due to the private initiative of members which may be presented and will not oppose their discussion. It may also be hoped that the new Colonial Minister, Mr. Sidney Webb, will listen to those who have long demanded more efficacious measures against the increasing alcoholism in certain colonies. Finally the alcohol question will come up in Indian affairs; will the government and parliament oppose the wish manifested ever more emphatically by the Indians themselves to take radical measures against alcohol?

A NEW ORGANISATION.

The registration of the Education Friends as an Association, represents a very definite stage in the growth of one most interesting organisation in modern India. For many years, women in India, both Indian and English, have been considering the question of women's education. Discussions were held, resolutions passed and experiments instituted in various Provinces by University Women by special organisation and by women interested in primary education. Gradually the idea was evolved that some All-India recognition of the problems was essential and that funds to back the demands for suitable education were imperative.

This idea took a definite shape in the resolution proposed by H. H. the Begum Mother of Bhopal that an All-India Fund for the promotion of Women's education should be established which was passed by the All-India Women's Conference held at Delhi, in January 1928.

Her Excellency Lady Irwin who was present expressed her great interest in the scheme and a Committee was appointed to draw up plans to realise it.

PROBLEM BEFORE THE COMMITTEE.

The Committee found themselves confronted with a very difficult problem. They had to evolve an organisation to be worked at the minimum expense on an All-India basis, and there should be room for every one interested in the education of girls and women whatever be their political opinions. Moreover this organisation had to inspire universal confidence as to its stability and continuity since it was to ask the public for money with which to carry out its educational schemes. A draft constitution was drawn up and debated clause by clause by the Standing Committee, at the general meeting of the All-India Women's Conference at Patna in February 1929.

It was again revised at a Round Table Conference in April in Delhi at which her Excellency kindly presided. It has now been incorporated as an Association under Act XXI of 1860.

OBJECTS OF THE ORGANISATION.

It embodies the experience of members who served on public bodies of widely differing aims and organisations in England and India, and has for its object the administration of a fund to promote the education of women and girls in India, including the aid of schemes for the furtherance of the education of the girls and women of India recommended from time to time by the All-India Women's Conference. The institution of propaganda for the education of the women and girls of India. The increase of the supply of better trained teachers having particular regard to the inclusion of training in domestic subjects, the encouragement of the production of better text books and attractive and suitable literature in the vernacular, the promotion of the education of children of kindergarten age and in rural districts, the provision of suitable housing accommodation for women teachers specially in rural areas, the promotion of courses of training in home craft, fine art, domestic science, physical culture and other suitable subjects.

OFFICE-BEARERS OF THE ASSOCIATION.

The Association thus incorporated includes the following grades of members:—

President: Her Excellency the Lady Irwin.

Patron: Their Highnesses the Maharani of Baroda and the Begum Mother of Bhopal, Mrs. Sarojini Naidu and Donors of sums amounting in the aggregate to not less than Rs. 20,000.

Vice-Patrons: Donors of sums amounting in the aggregate to Rs. 10,000.

Life Fellows: Donors of sums amounting in the aggregate to Rs. 500.

Life Members: Donors of sums of not less than Rs. 100.

Fellows: Persons who pay an annual subscription of not less than Rs. 25.

Members: Persons who pay an annual subscription of not less than Rs. 5.

Those who wish to join any one of these grades, can do so by sending the appropriate subscription with their name and address to Mrs. Rustomji Faridoonji, Cecil Hotel, Simla, till August 1st and after that to Hyderabad, Deccan. If they wish to induce other people to join, she will supply all further information and copies of a letter of appeal for membership.

The first general meeting of the Association will be held in Bombay in January 1930 under the presidency of her Excellency, the Lady Irwin. There should be thousands of men and women in India who can gladly give, some Rs. 5, others Rs. 25 a year to help to make the girls and women of India enlightened and capable citizens of this great land.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Electoral Rolls:—As a result of the postponement of the Elections, Government have decided that no further action should, for the present be taken in connection with them except the preparation and publication of the Electoral Rolls. The dates for the publication of the Electoral Rolls of the Bombay Legislative Council and of the Legislative Assembly have been altered. The first publication will now take place on August 19 and the second publication on October 22.

Unique Widow Marriage:—Under the auspices of the Hindu Widow Reform League, Lucknow, Shrima'i Girja Kishori, an educated Kanya Kubja Brataman (Ohhonge Shukla) virgin widow, aged 18 years, was married to Pandit Ganga Datta Tripathi, B.A., a Kanya-Kubja bach-lor, aged 21 years, on Monday the 1st July, 1929. The moral courage of the young Graduate is admirable and the example set by him should be followed by other young Graduates.

NOTES.

Politics And Social Reform.—Dr. Drummond Shiels, the Under Secretary of State for India, raised the old question of politics versus social and economic reform at a speech which he made this week at a dinner given by the Empire Marketing Board to Indian representatives of commerce and industry in London. A Reuter's message of the 17th said that "referring to India, Dr. Shiels thought that it was an unfortunate result of the concentration of some of the best brains in India on purely political issues that a great deal of necessary and urgent work of social and economic kind had been left undone. The development of the agricultural and industrial resources of India together with a higher standard of life for workers were problems which no mere constitutional changes could solve and which could be set aside as of secondary importance only at great risk to the welfare of India." Similar reflections used to be indulged in by friendly critics about Ireland in the Home Rule days. But it has since been accepted that political freedom is to a large extent the basis of social and economic progress and that deprived of it a people lose all incentive to active effort to improve themselves. Sir Phiroze Sethna, who happens to be in London, in responding to the toast of the evening on behalf of India, took occasion to put Dr. Shiels right on this important point. We are indebted to the Free Press of India for a full Summary of his remarks. Sir Phiroze, says the message, demanded on behalf of India equality of status and responsibility within the Empire and defended the importance which the best brains in India give to politics. Indian leaders, declared the Hon. Sir Phiroze, attach great importance to political progress because the attainment of national freedom is quite necessary to enable the leaders to remove social wrongs. This point has been repeatedly emphasised by social and industrial reformers in this country, and we are taking the liberty of sending some current literature bearing on it to Dr. Drummond Shiels whose remark about having sat once at the feet of Mahatma Gandhi, shows that whatever the Labour Government may or may not be able to do in the way of Indian constitutional reform, they are at least approaching the problem free from the pre-conceptions and prejudices of the older British parties.

Education Of Indian Women:—The Mysore University Magazine devotes a long paragraph to this subject with reference to a recent address delivered by the Right Hon. Srinivasa Sastry at Madras and the article in this journal on Principal Dhruva's address at the Convocation of the Women's University last month. Our contemporary writes:—"There are unmistakable signs of a new awakening and it would be a thousand pities, if its growth were throttled on the altar of a "common destiny", emphasised alike by Mr. Srinivasa Sastry and Mr. Natrajan, the well-known editor of the Indian Social Reformer. Those few who have requisite abilities or feel the urge of the highest university training are welcome to the present system of education. But for the generality what we need is a new type of schools which will produce better housewives, better wives and better mothers. Some education is better than no education and this new type of education, utilitarian perhaps, will prove its worth by its own result: better homes. They will to a certain extent break down through their very popularity that great gulf which unfortunately sundered the educated husband from the uneducated wife in India to-day. Perhaps in course of time it may give a needed impetus to a new sense of self-respect and dignity among our women." Mr. Sastry, we are sure, and ourselves have nothing but appreciation for Mr. Karve's institution as one intended for those who but for it, would go without any education. Some education is certainly better than no education. It does not seem so far, however, that those who need this kind of education are more numerous than those who feel the urge for the ordinary university training. From the manner in which the Karve University was ushered in, it might have been expected that hundreds of women students will crowd its portals and that the regular Colleges and High Schools will be deserted by girl students. This expectation has not been fulfilled. As for producing "better housewives, better wives and better mothers," we should like to have proof that the graduates of the Karve University have, as a matter of fact, excelled graduates of the ordinary universities in these respects or even many Hindu women who have not had the advantage of education, either in Hingne Badruk or other universities. The Indian woman has not got to learn self-respect and dignity in a High School. Every foreign observer has noted these qualities in the demeanour of the women even of what are called the working classes. Much depends upon the educated husband, but we know of numerous cases where no great gulf sundered him from his less educated wife. We can name some very prominent cases but it is unnecessary, as they will occur to almost every reader. We say that the only respect in which the Indian woman falls short is an intellectual outlook which embraces modern knowledge and the requirements of national progress. These she can get best by working side by side, or at least on the same scheme with Indian young men, during their period of education. Men and women are not two distinct species or even communities.

Women's Education:—There is every reason to believe, as we wrote a few days ago, that Prof. Karve's outlook widened as the result of his world tour will be reflected on the aims and methods of the Women's University. We have proof of this in his lecture delivered before the East Indian Association in London at which Lady Simon presided. Discussing the medium of education, Prof. Karve advanced his favourite arguments for Indian vernaculars as the vehicle of instruction and for education to adapt itself to the requirements of women, which failed to convince the audience. Lady Tata, Lady Simon and others put in a strong plea for English. Lady Simon's remark that Indian women should not be handicapped by an inadequate knowledge of the world language, English, will find a ready echo in the heart of Indian reformers. In his reply Prof. Karve acknowledged the importance and unifying influence of the English language. If women are to take their place as intelligent members of society, their standard of education should by no means be lowered.

Bombay Land Revenue Assessment:—

The Government of Bombay are to be congratulated on their wise and courageous decision to suspend the introduction of all revised land revenue assessments, in view of the revelations of the Report of the Bardoli enquiry, until the principles governing assessments are reviewed and recast during the next few months. It will be remembered that the Bardoli peasants refused to pay the enhanced assessments on their lands on the ground that they were not justified by the economic conditions, and maintained that the officers who recommended the increase had not investigated the conditions in accordance with the rules laid down by Government themselves. The enquiry set on foot by Government completely proved the contentions of the ryots and Government accepted the findings of the committee and revised their decision. The revelations made by the two officers of the Indian Civil Service who made the enquiry created a wide-spread doubt about the correctness of the other revenue settlements, and it seemed likely that a strong agitation may spring up all over the Presidency against the present system. Government have taken time by the forelock and by their wise decision have enlisted the support of the public. The decision is a courageous one too, seeing that the loss of revenue will be a serious matter in the present embarrassed state of Bombay provincial finance.)

Penalising Early And Unequal Marriages:—An Associated Press message states:—“The Bhavnagar State has published a notification inviting till the 1st of September 1929, the opinion of the State subjects on the Marriage Age Limit Act which the State proposes to pass.

Marriages of boys under the age of 13 and those of girls under the age of 18 are punishable under this measure. Marriages, however, will be allowed in a caste known as the “Kanbis” where child marriages are much in vogue but the girl should not be sent to her husband's home till the above age is attained. Under this Act, no man can marry after the age of 45, unless the woman he marries is at least half as old as himself. Defaulters as well as abettors will be punished with either a fine of Rs. 500 or three months' imprisonment or both.” Bhavnagar is to be congratulated on this proposed measure of social reform which will go far to alleviate many of the social evils of the State. We hope that the State subjects will accord their whole-hearted support to the suggestion. It has been pointed out time and again by leaders in British India that the heart of the country throbs in the Indian States and therefore it is often the case that, while in the States social legislation is promulgated in response to the wishes of the people, British India has been in ignorance of popular feeling. Bhavnagar has now given us a fresh instance of this and we trust it will not be without its effect on the Government of India.

Religion and Politics:—We reproduce the following note from the Guardian, Calcutta, which will interest our readers. “The organ of the Federal Council of Churches contends that it is the right and duty of the Churches to speak freely concerning all questions of social morality. We notice that several questions were included in the agenda of the last meeting of the Council which were, to use our own Indian phraseology, “Public Questions.” We are sorry to note that the Council did not find itself competent to take in hand the cases of those ‘Hindus’ who have been disfranchised unjustly under the immigration laws. Action in this particular case was left to individuals, and we have reason to believe that a few friends of India now in the U.S.A. are doing all they can to remedy their state of affairs, and are persuading one or two leading Congressmen and Senators to introduce a bill restoring citizenship to those whose citizenship papers were cancelled. As opposed to this the younger generation is insisting that unless the Christian Church is willing to face the task of Social Reconstruction on the principles of Jesus it cannot have its wholehearted loyalty. During recent times Christians have been more and more led to realise the social implications of the gospel of Jesus Christ as applied to subjects like Industry, Race, War, and Nationalism. Attacks like these should not deflect men who call themselves His disciples from the obvious path of duty. In India we are particularly prone to criticism of this sort, and very often the bogey of ‘meddling in politics’ is dangled before the eyes of those who are desirous of making a Christian contribution to the solution of some of the most baffling problems of social morality. The Christian Church cannot identify itself with mere sordid politics, but at the same time it cannot sit quiet with folded hands when ethical standards, and vital moral principles are involved. The revolt of the present day youth against religion is very largely due to the fact that they will not divide life into water-tight compartments. Religion must pervade the whole of life and not only some of its parts.”

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, JULY 20, 1929.

THE INFLUENCE OF COMMUNAL MOVEMENTS.

A considerable part of the enquiry by the Committee which has been appointed by Government to enquire into the causes of the recent riots in Bombay, has turned upon the influence of communal movements in the country. It is, therefore, desirable in order to get the right perspective to trace the genesis of these movements. The communal movement, we may observe, is not such an unmitigated evil as it is often made out to be. In the present condition of Indian society more good can be done in certain directions by communal organizations than by State organisations which are the only alternative. The several communal movements, notwithstanding their obviously ungainly features, have done and are doing good service in stimulating a healthy emulation in the field of social, moral and material progress. The Moslem communal movement has for one thing given a greater impetus to higher education among Moslem youths and a member of the Public Services Commission told this writer not long ago that Mussalman young men have recently been topping the lists or coming very high in the tests for the Public Services. This is confirmed by the fact that in the recent Civil Service Examination held in India, the first and third places were taken by Muslim young men. Similarly there is a great awakening among Mussalmans due to the awakening of the communal conscience in respect of women's education which is the corner stone of all progress.

The communal movement among the Hindus, is comparatively of more recent origin. Till about the year 1920 there was no All-India Hindu communal movement. There was the Bharat Dharma Maha Mandal of which the late Maharaja of Darbhanga was the founder and the mainstay, but it was of no importance in Hindu social evolution. There were several caste associations and conferences, but these were not of All-India importance, although sometimes they called themselves All-India bodies. Till about 1920 the National Congress and the National Social Conference were the two principle channels in which Hindu progressive energies flowed, and these were open to all communities. When the Congress adopted non-cooperation and became closely allied with the Khilafat movement, there was a feeling among the Hindus that the Congress did not adequately safeguard Hindu interests. This was the view of Mr. V. P. Madhao Rao who had been Dewan of Travancore, Mysore, and Baroda and it was he, that was the first president of the Hindu Sabha. This movement, however, did not catch on at once and it was only after the Moplah outbreak in which several Hindus were forcibly converted that it began to gain ground. The Hindu Mahasabha movement has, during its short existence, done useful service in organising Seva Samitis, in promoting religious and physical education, in creating public opinion against such institutions as untouchability and, generally speaking, promoting solidarity among the Hindus.

The forcible conversions of Hindus during the Moplah outbreak gave a great impetus to the Shuddhi movement. But the reconversions of converted Hindus dates from a very long past. There is a special Smriti, the Devala Smriti, devoted to this subject. The necessity of a reconversion procedure would seem to have been felt almost ever since the advent of Islam into India. Such reconversions were of frequent occurrence. The following instances in the Mahratta period may be cited.

1. "Babaji Nimbalkar had become a Mahomedan and wanted to come back to Hinduism. Jijabai, the mother of Shivaji, interested herself in the subject and got the priest of Shinganpur to re-admit the Maratha Mahomedan to the fold of his religion and caste, and in order that no doubt might be left on the subject she brought about a marriage alliance between him and Shivaji, whose daughter Sakubai by his first wife Sayibai (who according to most accounts herself came from the Nimbalkar family) was, at Jijabai's instance, given in marriage to the son of Bajaji." ("The Life of Shivaji Maharaj" by N. S. Takakhav and K. A. Keluskar, p. 556.)

2. The story of Bahiram Bhat is also interesting in this connection. Being a "Shastri" he did not find rest in Brahmanism, and therefore became a Mahomedan under the impression that its monotheism would satisfy the cravings of his heart, but failing to find the satisfaction he desired, he returned back to Brahmanism. Both Brahmins and Mahomedans found fault with him for these changes of faith, but he disclaimed being either Hindu or Mahomedan. Bahiram Bhat challenged the Brahmans to make him a true Brahman as long as his circumcision mark was not removed, and he challenged the Mahomedans to fill up the holes in his ears, which showed that he was still a Hindu. The Mahomedan converts to Hinduism, represented by Shaikh Mahomed's followers, even to this day observe the 'Ramjan' fasts, and the 'Ekadashi' fasts, and the 'Ekadashi' fast, and make pilgrimages to Mecca as also to Pandharpur."—Ranade's History of Maharattas, p. 154.

3. "Many years after this (") in the days of the Peshva Savai Madhavrav, a Brahman, we learn, named Narhari Ranalekar, became 'yavanamaya' and 'bhrashta,' which I understand to mean converted to Mahomedanism and fallen off from Hinduism. He was then taken back into the fold by certain Brahmans of Paithana, although as the Peshva's order says, this was an unwarrantable proceeding. His re-admission led to a split in the Brahman community of the place; and then an officer of the Government came upon the scene, and by coercion got all the Brahmans, the ex-communicated ones and the others to sit down to dinner together."—Telang's "Gleanings from Mahratta Chronicles" appended to Ranade's History, pp. 266. Mr. Telang adds a footnote as follows:—

A similar question arose long afterwards in connection with the case of Sripat Seshadri—a brother of the late Rev. Narayan Seshadri—in which the late enlightened Prof. B. A. Gangadhar Shastri is understood to have taken a prominent part which mortally offended the orthodoxy of his day.

4. "A note of the Editor of the Peshva's Bakhar says, that Bajirao having had a son by the Musalman woman Mastani, wanted to perform the thread ceremony of that son and make a Brahman of him; but that the plan fell through in consequence of the opposition of the Brahmans."—"Telang's Gleanings from Mahratta Chronicles" appended to Ranade's History, pp. 270. Mr. Telang's footnote:—

Peshva's Bakhar, p. 40. That such an idea should have occurred to a Hindu defender of the faith is itself rather remarkable as an example of that relaxation of old traditions adverted to further on in this paper. And compare Grant Duff, Vol. I, p. 599. Well might Grant Duff say that Bajirao was free from bigotry.

It appears from these four examples that while the Maharashtra Brahmans raised no objection to the reconversion of converts, they were opposed to the conversion of persons of Moslem parentage. Mr. Ranade, however, speaks elsewhere of some converted Mahomedans as being among the saints of Maharashtra, which would show that even born Mahomedans were admitted to Hinduism. In the National Social Conference the reconversion of repentant converts was a standing resolution for several years long before anybody heard of the Shuddhi movement. Mr. Ranade in his annual addresses devoted a paragraph to the progress of this movement to liberalise Hinduism. The communal movement at the present time is at bottom largely an economic movement masquerading in the guise of religion, as is evident from the fact that communal antagonisms are least among the commercial and industrial middle classes and are greatest among the working classes and among the educated unemployed. The combination of these two is creating a serious situation particularly in Bombay and other industrial centres. The peculiar feature of Hindu religion and the one which has helped it to survive many dangers, is its enormous powers of adaptation to changed conditions. Several things which scarcely call forth a comment today were matters of fierce controversy thirty years ago. Foreign travel, widow re-marriage, education, especially higher education of women, post-puberty marriage, inter-caste or inter-communal dinners are prominent instances.

"CONFESSIONS OF A MISSIONARY."

XIII.

To,

The Editor, the Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I crave the hospitality of your valued journal to offer a few observations for the consideration of the "Perplexed" missionary gentleman, who sets forth his difficulties in the issue of your paper of the 8th June. His transparent sincerity, earnest search for truth, impelling faith in Christ and a sincere attempt to live up to it, command my admiration, and I offer my esteem unstintedly. His perplexity, however, it strikes me, is due to a confusion of thought—which has, so it appears to me, resulted by his permitting his enthusiasm to help and reform to dominate his reason and commonsense.

He finds it hard to explain away the crude perversity of the poor masses (sometimes educated persons) in acting against the canons of modern science; their transgressing the limits of modern notions of decency and falling short of present day standards of morality. All this has caused a revulsion of feelings that oppresses him. Without implying to agree that modern Science or present day knowledge possesses the monopoly of truth, I beg to suggest that any such deviations as are recorded by our friend are the natural consequence of the ignorance and its twin sister superstition in which the common people are dreadfully steeped. The Government of the day, if it is honest, should come forward to claim blame for the unhampered spread of ignorance on such a vast scale. For, however cleverly it may be argued, it cannot be disproved that this blame rightly, and deservedly, belongs to that quarter, and should not be usurped by any well meaning defenders. However, it occurs to me in this connection that "Perplexed" has no experience of the lower strata of society in America and Europe. If he cares to acquaint himself with the condition of that unfortunate section of humanity in the so called civilised and advanced nations of the world, he would, I am sure, find them no better (if not worse) than our ignorant Indian brothers and sisters. If they have abolished slums in America, he can profitably visit such institutions in Europe and England. Let me not be understood to justify the undesirable conditions in India by implication even. I have suggested this only to enable my "Perplexed" friend to discover that there is nothing fundamentally wrong with the people amongst whom he has so nobly and selflessly spent so many valuable years of his life. Such conditions as he has put on record are the offsprings of deplorable and remediable circumstances and do grow rapidly wherever ignorance and superstition hold their sway irrespective of the climate, place colour, religion and community.

About corruption and bribery, I only reluctantly suggest that he may undertake an investigation of these evils in his own land, if he does not feel justified to put any faith in the enquiries (already made) of others—though they be his own countrymen. I do venture to hazard that he would then feel inclined to give his fellow countrymen the credit of having beaten us in this game also. Here, again, let me make it clear that I not only abhor but abominate these practices; but respectfully submit that they are the concomitants of ignorance—and the governance of the land by a foreign people.

He states he has read "The Hindu view of Life" several times, but is unable to reconcile that exposition of Hinduism with what he finds being practised to-day. Does he mean to imply, and want us to understand that he is completely satisfied with the manner his fellow Christians, in America and Europe, practise the tenets of Lord Christ? Has not the learned author himself, in the book referred to, warned that the general populace cannot be expected to realise the 'ideal' at once? Here, too, I do not mean to maintain that there are no practices that need reform. Let me assure him that we are not ignorant of the very evils which have troubled him, possibly we are cognisant of even more; and, further, that as soon as we are our own masters we will tackle them more effectively and, may confidently assert, will eradicate them more quickly than it is thought possible. At present, however, we can spare very little attention and effort from our struggle for life in fighting a powerful vampire, which is sucking our life blood and undermining our vitality; and which leaves no strength to counteract other enemies; I mean our, unsympathetic, autocratic, foreign rule. One more point and I have done.

His repugnance of 'idol worship' tends to amount to abomination. It is fair of him to have admitted of the existence or prevalence, I forget which, of this practice even in Christian and civilised lands. He appears to have so much faith in the teaching of abstruse truth as such that I am tempted to ask: Does he propose to abolish all primary and secondary schools and kindergarten institutions and go about disseminating the ultimate philosophy of even present day knowledge, irrespective of the age and capability of the audience to which the truth is presented? Would he proceed to expound immediately, the 'Electro-magnetic theory of light' and the Kinetic theory of gases to the children in a primary school, say; or would he proceed to lead them up to these by showing them simple experiments on reflection and refraction of light and on the pressure of air? Will it be the fault of the children if they are left straggling in the primary schools for want of proper instruction and illuminating guidance? Will, my friend, automatically promote a student to the higher form even if he has not learnt his lesson of the lower form, or will he expel him from the school altogether? Are not most of our brothers and sisters, who stick to this practice, the spiritual Children, or sometimes grownups lacking confidence and enterprise; and are not here, as in ordinary instruction, experiment and analysis, patience and perseverance, love and care, equally essential to lift them up from their present state to one where they can appreciate more sublime truths, and explore and admire the more beautiful and fascinating realms? Let my friend ponder and satisfy himself.

AN INDIAN SEEKER.

XIV.

The following are extracts from an article in the current number of the Nineteenth Century and after entitled "The Presentation of the Christian message to India." by Mr. J. H. Hyland, of Hislop College Nagpur. As it represents a distinct point of view in relation to the discussion on the letter of "perplexed" we reproduce them here:

The position of the Christian missionary in India has entirely changed during the past fifteen years. Before that time it was still possible for him to stand before the people as the representative of a higher culture and of a successful world order, as well as of a religious system which claimed innumerable conquests in every part of the world and in every relation of life.

The war changed all that. To-day the missionary finds that he can accomplish nothing unless in his contact with educated Indians he is willing from the start to adopt an attitude of teachableness and humility, and to confess that Western civilisation has failed to establish a world order which can be regarded as Christian, as stable, or as genuinely beneficial. To quote the words of Dr. Garfield Williams, which are eminently true: 'At the end of the War the Westerner had for the educated Indian hardly a shred of reputation left.'

It is scarcely possible for people in this country to realise the vividness of the impression which was forced home upon the mind of India by the war, to the effect that Western civilisation, however outwardly prosperous and powerful it might seem, was yet in reality a system fated to end in the mutual destruction of the nations in a vast orgy of suicide. The matter was summed up as follows by one of the most moderate and enlightened of Indian publicists:

To thoughtful Indians the war seemed not an abnormal incident in contemporary history, but an apt climax of an acquisitive society that had accumulated enough wealth to be torn in conflict for its possession, a society moreover that made competition the basis of its social religion and physical force the basis of all its settlements..... Science, it seemed, had resulted in enhancing human suffering rather than in mitigating it. Newton and Watt and Darwin had ended in poisoned gas and tanks.

The East cannot separate in its mind religion from secular civilisation; and since the war it has become common for educated Indians to cite the war as proof that Christianity has failed, and failed on a colossal scale, to make good its claims to be considered as an effective religion at all.

To quote again (from the Indian Social Reformer, a Hindu-edited paper of very enlightened views): 'The Christian missionary has no chance of getting a hearing now unless he distinguishes between Christ and Christianity and between Christianity and Western civilisation.' It is, of course, an extremely difficult task to convince the educated Indian that Christianity can be separated from Western civilisation. It can only be accomplished by the missionary's frankly and freely acknowledging to him the un-Christlikeness, even the anti-Christlikeness, of much in the West, especially of the Western State system, and by his taking up the attitude that the West needs the help of the East in finding the true meaning of Christ.

The missionary can do nothing unless he is willing to confess that we in the West have failed to understand Christ and to apply His teaching to an organised society.

The whole situation is summed up in a great saying of the most distinguished of all Indian statesmen, the late Mr. Gokhale: 'I am more interested in religion than in politics, and I intensely revere Jesus; but He is handicapped with His connexion with the West.' More recently another distinguished Indian has said with striking emphasis: 'India rejects Christianity, but accepts Christ.'

Hence the missionary now goes, and must recognise that he goes, as the representative of a discredited order—a civilisation which has led directly to world warfare, a religious system which failed to prevent that appalling catastrophe, and which therefore cannot claim to exercise anything approaching a sufficient influence upon life. In brief, the first qualification of the modern missionary must be humility.

Closely connected with the necessity of humility is that of teachableness. India is prepared to accept Christ, but not Christianity; therefore it behoves the Western representatives of Christ first of all to learn from India the right setting in which he shall endeavour to paint before her a portrait of his Master which shall teach her to love Him and to follow Him better than we have loved and followed Him in the West.

We must learn the Indian point of view, appreciate the Indian outlook on religion, on social, political, and industrial institutions. We must endeavour to comprehend how our Master, who was Himself an Easterner in an Eastern environment, can be made most Eastern and least Western in His appeal to those Easterners who, once they are given a chance, are going to understand Him better than we do. Obviously this is an immensely difficult undertaking for us Westerners, deep in whose bones there lies the eager, forceful, intrusive, domineering spirit of the modern West. But the lesson of teachableness must be learnt by each one of us, or we are unfaithful to our Lord. In this connexion it will be of immense advantage to the young missionary if he spends the first part of his service as an inmate of an Indian household. As I look back to the months which I spent in the home of Principal Rudra, of St. Stephen's College, Delhi, I regard those months as in many ways the most valuable I have spent in India.

The young missionary will find that he has great opportunities of learning the Indian point of view from the Indians who teach him their language; and a real effort should be made to adopt the spirit of the Indian chela (disciple) towards the guru (spiritual preceptor) in his relationship. The chela must above all be humble, ready to serve as well as to learn from his guru. If the effort is made to adopt this spirit, it will be possible in after years to look back to the hours of labour spent with the language teacher as a time of exceedingly valuable illumination in the thoughts of the Indian mind, as well as of deep and lasting friendship.

Even from our students we have many opportunities of learning. In fact (and this especially applies to the work of Scripture teaching), the more earnestly one tries to express Christ to them, the more will one obtain new and valuable insight from them into the truths of Christ, even though they may never become members of the Christian Church.

There is much to be learnt also by the missionary from Indian literature—e. g., from Tagore's recently published Letters to a Friend and from Mr. Gandhi's Autobiography and Satyagraha in South Africa. In this connexion it will scarcely be necessary to mention the writing of Sadhu Sundar Singh.

Humility and teachableness will go far to aid the missionary in his task of presenting the Christian message, but they are nothing without love. There are some missionaries who maintain that it is impossible for them genuinely to love Indians. Fortunately such missionaries are very few; and the rest of us, I think, will agree that Indians are extremely lovable. They are very responsive to affection, and they make loyal and devoted friends, from whose character we may learn much of the spirit of Christ. If we cannot love them, we must certainly not continue to be missionaries, for without genuine love for the people to whom we are sent, our service will be dust and ashes.

I think of my best Indian friends—of those tried fellow-workers with whom through a course of many years I have been engaged in school or college work; of those with whom I have been associated in times of crisis, famine, cholera, or political trouble. I think of a group of students with whom I struggled all night long to save one of their number from a terrible disease: I think of one now himself long since dead who came to help me when I was myself alone and very ill. One's friendship with such men may very probably have meant little or nothing to them, but to oneself it has meant very much. Above all, one has learnt from them more of the meaning of the universal Christ.

It is well to remember that it is possible to train oneself in love, not only in the avoidance of everything that would give offence or hurt sensitive feelings, but in the genuine affection of one's heart for those whom one would serve. Above all, this gift of love is to be sought and gained through prayer. So only will it be unforced, pure and genuine.

If he approaches his task in the spirit of humility, teachableness and love, the missionary will find that he gets infinitely more than he gives. His task is that of helping India to find Christ—Christ the Easterner, whom the West has never rightly understood. Again and again the missionary will come across men, not all of them Christians, who love Christ and mirror Him forth in their lives with a power which completely puts us to shame. No one who has come into close contact with Sadhu Sundar Singh can fail to recognise something of the meaning of the Eastern Christ, or can doubt the immense future possibilities of the world's learning fresh truth about Him as India comes to apprehend Him rightly.

In the sphere of action, also, there are many ways in which India will teach us the true meaning of Christ. An instance may be found in the way in which the campaign against 'untouchability' was carried on in South India a year or two ago, when the method of passive resistance was applied by men, most of whom did not call themselves Christians, in an eminently Christian way for the righting of scandalous injustice at a place called Vykom.

There is no joy to be compared with that of seeking and finding in company with our Indian friends the beauty and splendour of the Eastern Christ.

There is another principle which is of fundamental importance in all efforts for the presentation of the Christian message to India. It is this: whenever possible, and in every possible way, Indians should be permitted and encouraged to do the work themselves, in their own way. It is more and more obvious every year that Westerners, however devoted and loyal, will never succeed in discovering or interpreting the Eastern Christ. This enterprise must be carried through by Easterners. It is of course true that the material with which we have to work in many branches of the Christian Church in India does not appear at first sight to be very well adapted to the performance of this great task. The great majority of Indian Christians, are from the depressed classes, and tend to become unduly Westernised in their outlook, since their own Indian culture has treated them so badly in the past. One of the main tasks of the missionary is none the less that of training these Christians, in spite of all discouragement, for the fulfilling of this great duty, the finding of the Eastern Christ. He will sometimes have to become unpopular, both with the Christians and with his fellow missionaries, because he insists so rigorously that Christianity, if it is going to speak to India, must speak in Indian terms. There is still far too marked a tendency for the Indian Christian Church to take over wholesale from the West, not only such superficial (but still important), denominational organisation, and so forth.

The Indian Christian leaders who are genuinely in touch with the great heart of their country are all too few in number. There are perhaps less than a score of them, who are known throughout India. There must be hundreds more of such men before we can hope to see a genuinely Indian Christianity emerge which shall be capable of discovering and manifesting Christ the Easterner.

We must be prepared in this connexion, more perhaps than in any other, to permit our Indian friends of freedom to make mistakes. I have heard it said by an acute and friendly observer that what Indian Christianity needs most of all is a real Indian heresy. This may perhaps seem rather an extreme statement, but the thought behind it is sound. The most healthy of all signs in Indian Christianity would be a ferment of thought and a desperate resolve to re-express Christianity at all cost for the Indian mind.

A well-known Christian thinker in South India believes that the Indian Christian Church of the future will have to consecrate in the service of Christ many features of Indian worship—e.g., the adoration of images. Here, again, freedom will have to be allowed, however serious may be our apprehension lest what we regard as dangerous errors creep into the life of the Church.

On one occasion, after I had preached a sermon on the father-hood of God, an Indian Christian professor, a man of ripe Christian experience, came to me and said: 'What you have said about the fatherhood of God is true, but some day when India has learnt what Christ means she will teach the world the significance of the motherhood of God.'

As one stands and looks back at sixteen years of missionary life there are certain impressions which remain very vividly in one's mind. One of the chief of these is that of the extraordinary attention, and even eagerness, with which a class of seventy or eighty college students (chiefly Brahmans) listened day after day in an intolerably crowded and stuffy room to the simplest exposition of the Gospel of St. Luke.

Another impression is that of a crowded gathering of students who had called the missionary to speak to them about Christ on the occasion of the great annual worship of the Hindu god Ganpati. The gaily decked idol which they had been worshipping was there close at hand; and yet the students listened with courtesy and real interest to the exposition of Christ's teaching.

But more vivid even than the impressions just recorded are those of a very different type of work. One memory is of a certain village in a northern district of the Central Provinces during the great influenza epidemic of 1918. India was at that time worse hit by the disease than any other country in the world. The Central Provinces were worse hit than any other province in India; and the district of which I am speaking had a higher death rate than any other district in the Central Provinces. The village lay in the midst of glorious jungle. When the missionary reached it he found that all the able-bodied inhabitants had fled. There were left only a few who were sick or dying. One little group is especially memorable. The father had already died.....It is not surprising that the Communist agitator, whose system promises a short way with moneylenders gains a footing among these people.

Any adequate presentation of the Christian message to India must take into account the vast and difficult range of problems thus brought into existence. The West has given to India her industrial system, which, in the view of most advanced Indian thinkers, is proving much more of a curse than a blessing because of the emergence of these dangerous problems. It is urgently necessary that we should at the same time show to India that there is a solution to these problems attainable through the grace of the Spirit of Christ. Housing schemes, baby clinics, night schools, lecture series, social institutes, and many other agencies are bitterly needed; but the Spirit of Christ will undoubtedly lead forward His Indian disciples to a deeper vision still and to more effective activity in relation to the problems presented by industrialisation.

In conclusion, I wish to emphasise my conviction that all consideration of the task of presenting the Christian message to India is essentially secondary to, and dependent upon, the work of the Spirit of God in the hearts of His people. If we pray aright and follow Christ whole-heartedly, His Spirit will lead us forward unhesitatingly upon the right path of service for this great, beautiful, and intensely lovable land.

THE SPHERE OF WOMEN'S ACTIVITIES.

(BY MR. HARI CHAREN MUKHERJI, PROFESSOR OF ENGLISH, MIDNAPORE).

During the course of our march forward it is sometimes good for us to pause and think. This seems to be particularly necessary with regard to women's education and activities. English education and ideals have been for a long time influencing our society; at first this conversion to western views was not at all rapid but of late this process has acquired a great momentum and the wheels of progress are running very fast. This may not be so evident from statistics showing the spread of women's education but this will be quite evident if we look around us and notice the changes that are always taking place in our society and in the mentality of our women. Slowly but surely our society is adapting itself to European conditions and the changes that at first seemed to be so revolutionary have been shorn of much of their novelty and are gradually coming to pass. The most important of these are the removal of the purdah, the raising of the marriageable age of girls, disappearance of hoary superstitions and caste prejudices, disinclination on their part to live in the joint family or to bear children, increased participation in public activities and, the last but by no means the least the disappearance of the old religious spirit in them. This latter up till now has been our bulwark against the encroachment of western ideas and ideals, for however atheistic one might have been from contact with western ideas the women-folk were religious to the backbone and there was no danger of these heterodox ideas attacking the sanctity of our homes. The men and women in those times seemed to live in separate water-tight compartments without one much influencing the ideals and actions of the other. This arrangement undoubtedly was not an ideal one for it led to the estrangement of the sexes. The wife could not sympathise with the aims and ambitions of the husband, neither the latter was at all in sympathy with the religious aspirations of the former. This state has now been ended in the only way it could end, viz., by the complete surrender of the women to the ideals of the men. But ultimately this conquest is nothing else but the cultural conquest of the east by the west. The western ideal of life has got us firmly in its grip and it will surely be very difficult for us to break away from it. Many of us who are in sympathy with these ideals have been thrown into ecstasies at this conquest and are now loudly proclaiming that social backwardness can no longer be urged against us as a disqualification for "swaraj." But those of us who are not so enamoured of western ideals cannot but view this with apprehension and dismay. It is all very well that some of these changes will take place in our society. There is perhaps no one now with a broad and liberal outlook who will defend the purdah system or refuse to extend the inestimable benefits of higher education to the girls, so also is the case with the raising of the marriageable age of girls. This change which has been taking place slowly has been hailed with joy. The disappearance also of the caste prejudices and superstitious beliefs and practices of women cannot but be welcome to us. They are all on the credit side. But the question is where we shall stop in our forward march and shall emphatically say that so far we shall go and no further or whether at all it will be possible for us to cry this halt. These are questions which ought to claim our serious attention.

The European conception of woman's duties and sphere of activities is founded on wrong hypothesis, viz, that the aim of our life is enjoyment of the good things of life. They don't realise that there may be a serious purpose in it viz, the evolution of a more perfect race of men and women than the world has ever seen. This is the one increasing purpose that runs through the ages. In Europe it is only the seer, the prophet or the poet who in his dreams has been able to discover this but this ideal did not catch on. So, as it is the opinion of the majority which sets the standards, the aim of life to a westerner is to make the most of life's opportunities and to enjoy life as much as possible. To him a life that has not been enjoyed to the full seems to have been wasted. In addition to this as he is of a highly democratic frame of mind he wants to extend the benefits that he enjoys to the women also. Hence we find in the west the keenest competition between men and women in every sphere of life. In order to demonstrate her perfect equality with men which is an indispensable condition of her success in this keen competition she is led to all sorts of extravagance. She takes part in all manly exercises, smokes cigarettes, shingles her hair, wears short skirts, swims the channel and wants to break the speed record in motoring or aerial navigation. It must be admitted that she is quite right in doing all this if she starts with the hypothesis that she must be the successful competitor of man in all spheres of activities. Influenced by this idea she is more and more betraying her disinclination to enter into matrimony and her eagerness to procure a divorce when once having entered into it she finds it standing in the way of her enjoyment of life. The interests of the children or the peace of the household are ruthlessly sacrificed in her efforts to procure for her better conditions of life.

If life's object is nothing else but enjoyment man or woman is under no moral obligation whatsoever of looking after the children more than what natural instincts prompt. It is undeniable that if the mother be engaged in all these manly activities the children will be neglected, one who is engaged in an electioneering campaign or in a whirl-wind tour through the country for propaganda purposes or in sitting night after night in the House of Commons legislating for the nation cannot be expected to take care of the babies left at home or to minister to the needs of the husband when he will come home weary and jaded at the end of the day. The home will be no home and the children will grow up uncared for or under the supervision of paid servants or matrons who cannot be expected to look after them as lovingly and zealously as a mother. Such will be the inevitable results of women trying to imitate men or competing with them on equal terms.

But our ideal of life is something entirely different. It is certainly not enjoyment but self-improvement through work and self-sacrifice which we are called upon to make almost at every step so long as we live in the family. According to the European conception it is helping in the evolution of a more perfect type of man which is only possible through the co-operation of men and women. As the result of long specialisation women have acquired certain qualities indispensably necessary for bringing up children. Men as a rule are lacking in these qualities though they possess others equally important for succeeding in the keen competition of life. By temperament as well as by their upbringing women are gentler and more affectionate. Their stock of patience is almost inexhaustible. At the same time they are unfit to compete with men and to receive hard knocks with equanimity. They are more sensitive to pleasure and pain and made of a finer stuff than we are. If it be the purpose of life to help in this process of evolution it will be the duty of every one of us to contribute our due share to it. The fact that women are required to manage the household or to bring up children does not imply any inferiority of status. Rather it should be looked upon as the noblest function that can devolve on us namely, the training of the childish mind, to weed out from it gently and lovingly all the roots of an inherent evil nature and to sow in the place noble principles and ideas. It is women who can perform this task most efficiently. Those who have not had the privilege of being thus brought up must be really unfortunate. It is doubtful whether they can have their finer sensibilities fully developed and it is sure that they cannot look back to a period of childhood sweet with the memory of an affectionate mother. Besides the management of the household and the upbringing of the children they must shoulder the entire charge of looking after their education during the primary stage, the need of intelligent and competent teachers is one of the crying needs of our country. Nursing also is another profession which they can enter. To be brief it is right and fitting there ought to be a sharp distinction between the spheres of activities of men and women. There will be no competition between them, no foolish race to have the lion's share of the good things of life but hearty co-operation each doing his or her utmost to usher in the millennium. This has been also our Hindu ideal and we don't want to deviate from it materially. It will be within the competence of each woman to make herself thoroughly educated, to live a celibate life if she so desires and to devote herself to the acquisition of knowledge or to social service or to any other noble pursuit. It will have our entire approval and unstinted praise. But it is to be devoutly wished that our women under no circumstances will try to imitate the European women in all the frivolous things that they are doing to demonstrate their equality with men. Neither they should, like their European sisters, be afraid of entering into matrimony for fear of its responsibilities and duties. Rather it should be the ambition of every intelligent and healthy girl to enter upon it after having fully equipped herself for it as it is in being a mother that she will find life's consummation.

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XXIX. THE TEMPTED.

(DR. CLIFFORD MANSFORD, PH.D.).

All of us are tempted, some in greater degree and some in less. The temptations with which the most of us are faced are not temptations to great crimes, but temptations to succumb to petty annoyances,

It is so easy to become irritable when things do not move just as we think they ought to move. It is so easy to become disgusted with people who have opinions different from our own. It is so easy to twist another person's words or actions, and to fancy ourselves the victims of intended insult. We become extremely agitated about nothing, and make life unbearable both for ourselves and for our friends. We need to call a halt, to learn the lesson of patience, and to school ourselves in self-control. As the writer of the Proverbs said so many years ago: "He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city."

In a day in which men live as strenuously as they live in the present day, the inevitable result is a feeling of tiredness, a tiredness of mind and of body. And in these moments of exhaustion the mind is prone to wander, to play with thoughts that would be dismissed in an instant were the physical man at his best. The most certain cure for diseased thinking lies in a return to rationalism—rational hours of work, rational diet, rational recreation, and rational hours of rest. The desire for wealth, power, and material satisfaction is a legitimate one, but it must be relegated to its proper place. "Man shall not live by bread alone," the spirit must also be cultivated. It is as first things are put first and the man is in a state of receptivity that the higher voices speak and the voice of the tempter is stilled.

The question of law and freedom was never more to the fore than it is at the present time. Where does one's personal liberty end, and the restraint of law begin? How far is one free to do as one pleases, and how far must one's actions be governed by one's contacts with others? To young and old alike there comes the temptation to do the things that are lawful but not expedient; to do the things that are proper, but the things that do not edify. Perfection is a lofty standard, but it is none too high. A good that falls short of the best is not good enough. The noblest freedom is in reality a moral bondage—an acknowledgment of one's responsibility towards others. It is a passing from the plane of "What must I not do?" to the plane of "What more can I still do?" It is a complete routing of the temptation to be inferior and commonplace, and a full acknowledgment that the moral strength of the whole is dependent upon the strength of the individual parts.

And if a brother stumble, let us not be too hasty to condemn. The majority of men do not definitely choose to turn their hands against society. They are the victims of environment, or of the circumstances of the moment. Let us attempt to understand and to guide their path aright. The most of us should bend in shame because we ourselves are a part of the offending environment. What have we ever done to make our common life better? Let him that is without sin among us "first cast a stone."

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The Crosthwaite Girls' College, Allahabad:— We desire to give publicity to an appeal made on behalf of this institution by a number of influential men and women of Allahabad, headed by the Collector of Allahabad and counting in it, Mrs. Dalal, the Secretary of the Committee, and Mrs. Uma Nehru, the Assistant Secretary. The institution teaches up to the B. A. standard and the results at the examinations for the past four or five years are seen to be excellent. It owns endowment funds of over nine lakhs of rupees besides properties of the value of two lakhs. The Government gives an annual grant of Rs. 26,424. The institution is now faced with a double crisis. The Government has cut down the grant-in-aid to 18,000 on the sole ground that the public is not doing its bit towards the institution. Secondly, the growing need of the college for want of an additional annual income of Rs. 10,000, for which a capital investment of Rs. 3,00,000 is necessary. For immediate expenditure another sum of Rs. 50,000 is also required. The present needs are two new blocks of residence for teachers and pupils, a dispensary, a library, two motor buses to substitute the bullock-carts now carrying the children to the school, and most important of all, the raising of the scale of pay for the staff. The college claims to "impart Western education without any real departure from the basic principles and sentiments of Eastern life." We know of institutions where the attempt to have an unmixed Eastern ideal instead of the wholesome combination of East and West, has proved futile. The high popularity and the excellent management in the past should commend the Crosthwaite Girls' College to all donors among the princes and people of India. While the institution to which we have referred above serves as a concrete illustration of the progress of girls' education in India, it is of special interest to follow the expression of general observations on the subject, by a veteran in the field. Miss L. Gmeiner, Principal of the Inderprastha Girls' School and College at Delhi, for the last twenty-four years and now going back to her home in Australia on long leave, has unburdened herself to a press representative of remarks on the outlook of Indian girls. There was no need to be alarmed over the rapid strides with which girls are now leaving behind their old-world seclusion. Miss Gmeiner served to give the lie to the general mistaken notion that girls and boys needed different kinds of education. She agreed with the Rt. Hon'ble Mr. V. S. S. Sastri in disapproving of the presumption underlying the Women's University at Hingue Badrak, that girls had their own exclusive scheme of education. She however conceded that boys should learn some handicraft in school, while the girls, domestic science.—Education review.

Social Workers' Training Class:—The Social Service League, Bombay, has decided to organise a class for the training of social workers for a period of about eleven weeks beginning from the 9th July 1929. The class will be held at the Head Office of the Social Service League, Girgaon. Lectures will be arranged generally on Tuesdays and Saturdays in the evenings, and visits to the social service institutions will be paid on days on which there will be no lectures. The following well-known social workers have been requested to conduct the class on the subject mentioned against their names:—
(1) Dr. G. S. Ghurye, Ph. D., (Sociology); (2) Miss M.

K. Davis, B.A., (Lond.) (The Bombay Children Act.); (3) Mr. P. L. Thakker, B.A., LL.B., Advocate, (Juvenile Courts and Probation); (4) Prof. P. A. Wadia, M. A., (Problems of Poverty); (5) Miss M. E. Hutchins, (The League of Mercy Work); (6) Dr. Miss J. E. Mistri, L. M. & S. (Infant Welfare); (7) Dr. H. T. Khote, D. P. H., M. B. O. P., (Problems of Public Health); (8) Mrs. A. W. Maclean, (The Personal Equipment of Social Worker); (9) Mr. F. W. Pereira, B.A., LL.B., (Education and Care of the Deaf-Mutes); (10) Prof. H. L. Kaji, M. A., I. E. S., (Co-operative Movement); (11) Mr. H. D. Ohhatrapati, B.A., (Education and Care of the Blind in India); (12) Rao Bahadur S. S. Talmaki, B.A., LL.B., (Life of Leading Social Workers); (13) Mr. D. D. Gilder, B.A., (The Drink Evil and the Prostitution Problem); (14) Dr. B. R. Ambedkar, M. A., Ph. D., (The Industrial Revolution and its Social Effects); (15) Mr. M. K. Vakil, B.A., LL.B., (Adult Education); (16) Principal T. A. Kulkarni, B.A., (Crime and Punishment); (17) Diwan Bahadur A. K. Pal, B.A., J.P., (The Beggar Problem in Bombay); (18) Mr. P. G. Naik, (Vigilance and Rescue Work); (19) Mr. P. G. Kanekar, (Indian Labour Problem); (20) Dr. Socrates Noronha, B. Hy., O. B. E., (Social Hygiene). An examination will be held in the last week of September and certificates will be awarded to the successful students. Those desirous of joining the class are required to register their names at the office of the Social Service League, Servants of India Society's Home, Sandhurst Road, Girgaum, Bombay, as early as possible. Students are required to pay an entrance fee of Rs. 2/- only. Names should be registered at the office of the League any time from 11 a.m. to 7 p.m. For further particulars apply to Mr. D. S. Savardekar, Assistant Secretary, Social Service League, Bombay 4.

NOTES.

The Late Mrs. G. K. Devadhar:—By a most regrettable inadvertence our notice of the sudden and tragic death of Annapurnabai Devadhar, wife of Mr. G. K. Devadhar at Calcutta on the 11th instant has been unconscionably delayed. The deceased lady was intensely orthodox in her mode of life but this did not prevent her from co-operating heart and soul with her distinguished husband in his many activities for the uplift of women and the depressed classes. The girls of the depressed classes from the Poona Seva Sadan were often her guests in Bombay taking their meals with the members of the family. Mrs. Devadhar also helped many poor women and boys by arranging for their education and protection either in the Seva Sadan or at the homes of her friends. She was a regular official visitor to the Bhatia Maternity hospital and other institutions of the Poona Seva Sadan Society. The loss of a devoted wife to a public worker like Mr. Devadhar is incalculable and we convey our deepest sympathy to him and his children in their great bereavement.

The late Dr. J. N. Farquhar:—Dr. Farquhar, who died a fortnight back in Manchester, was a pioneer in the field of Hindu-Christian understanding. For very many years the usual Christian missionary attitude to Hinduism was not very different from that of Abbe Dubois and his modern counterpart, Miss Katherine Mayo. There were exceptions especially among educational missionaries but these were few, and of the few, not more than one or two had the courage to avow his conviction that a system of belief which for several centuries had commended itself to several millions of people not absolutely devoid of intelligence, cannot be wholly evil. To Dr. Farquhar belongs the credit of having broken through a crude tradition, and pointed out that the Hindu religion had features which rank high in the scale of spiritual evolution. True, he held that the greatest height reached by Hindu thought fell far short of that attained by Christianity. But, as a Christian he could not do otherwise. His books mark a distinct advance towards a better mutual understanding between religions.

His Literary Work:—In 1911 had appeared his popular 'Primer of Hinduism', and this was followed a year later by 'The Crown of Hinduism', in which he endeavoured to show that Hinduism was a 'praeparatio evangelica' for Christianity. In 1915 he published his 'Modern Religious Movements in India', a comprehensive survey of the religious movements of the last century, for which he was awarded the degree of Doctor of Letters by the University of Oxford. And in 1920 appeared 'An Outline of the Religious Literature of India,' a monumental work of research which has been accepted as authoritative by students of the subject. Not less important than Dr. Farquhar's original work was his achievement as an inspirer of other workers in the field of letters. As head of the Literature Department of the Y.M.C.A. he gathered about him a group of writers in all parts of India and beyond its borders whom he encouraged to undertake research along various lines of enquiry. In this literary 'movement' Indian writers cooperated with missionaries and with scholars in Britain and the continent of Europe in what was in effect a Christian contribution to the understanding of India. The result of this collaboration took shape in several well-known series of books,—'The Religious Quest of India Series', 'The Religious Life of India Series', and 'The Heritage of India Series' published jointly by the Association Press (Y.M.C.A.) and the Oxford University press. In the popular 'Heritage' series some twenty volumes have been published, dealing with the various literatures of India, her art and music, and differing schools of philosophy. "Dr. Farquhar's work" writes a friend, "has left its mark on Christian thought in India and throughout the Christian world, and its influence may be traced in the findings of the recent Jerusalem Conference. He had faith to believe, when few had yet conceived the hope, that the religious genius of India would reveal its power anew in its interpretation of Christ, and he dreamed of a Christian vernacular literature which, while remaining profoundly Christian, should be truly Indian and vividly 'Swadeshi' in every possible way."

Mrs. Sarojini Naidu:—Mrs. Sarojini Naidu returned from her world tour on Monday. She bears testimony to the greatly awakened interest in many countries in Indian affairs. Interviewed regarding her tour in the West, she observed:—"Not only America but all the countries that I visited are immensely surprised that a great country, with vast traditions and culture, like India is so inert and follows a suicidal policy of sectarian conflict and narrow exclusive ideas out of touch with the main currents. From San Francisco to Budapest, I have heard in varying languages the same sentiment of incredulity regarding Indian politics, though they have great sympathy for India's aspirations." The Princes, untouchability and Hindu-Muslim feuds were the three principal war-cries raised all over the world against India's demand for Self-Government. Every one whom Mrs. Naidu met, the German Foreign Minister, the President of Czechoslovakia, in fact, leaders of every nation put her the same question as to how the Indians were going to settle the problem of Princes, Hindu-Muslim unity and untouchability. "There is a subtle insidious anti-Indian propaganda carried on throughout all the Western lands. The only answer India must give is her own action. When shall we proclaim to the world that we have settled our Hindu-Muslim question?"

Lord Lloyd:—A few days ago, the London correspondent of an Anglo-Indian paper made the sagacious forecast that Lord Lloyd, the late Governor of Bombay and High Commissioner of Egypt, would succeed Lord Irwin as Viceroy of India and that the leaders of the three British political parties had agreed to the selection. The correspondent had perhaps an inkling of Lord Lloyd's resignation of the High Commissioner-ship, but he was woefully at sea in supposing his lordship would be posted to India where at the present time he would be like the proverbial bull in the china shop. Lord Lloyd has resigned the Egyptian post, but the circumstances in which he has done so preclude the possibility of his getting any preferment at the hands of the Labour Government. It would seem, in fact, that at the eve of its resignation, the Foreign Minister of the Baldwin Government had called Lord Lloyd to order in a despatch, and that the present Foreign Minister has merely followed his predecessor's action in recalling Lord Lloyd. The comments in the British Press do not show much sympathy for Lord Lloyd. The Times says that Lord Lloyd's qualities of vitality, courage and nervous energy are less valuable in Egypt at present than sympathy, patience and power of conciliation. What is really unfortunate is that his resignation should have taken the form of public difference over an undisclosed policy. The Labour Government has no intention of letting prancing pro-consuls defy it by adopting non-co-operation tactics.

An Analysis Of The British Elections:—A recent number of the Information Service, the organ of the Federal Council of the Churches in America has an interesting analysis of the recent elections in England. We give below a short extract:—"What, it may be asked, was the secret of Labor's success? The first instinct was to ascribe it to the women's vote, and in particular to the influx of new women voters between 21 and 30. But there is nothing to justify that conclusion. No one, of course, knows how women voted. There is nothing to distinguish a woman's ballot paper from a man's. But most candidates seem to believe that the women in a family voted very much as their husbands and brothers did. The best explanation of Labor's success is probably found in the increasing solidarity of the trade union movement politically. There are no new signs of a class-war—the chief spokesmen of Labour at the recent election were studious in their restraint and moderation—but there are many new signs of an increased solidarity. The trade union organization on the industrial side of the Labor movement is in full operation in every locality day by day, week by week, month by month, year by year, and it is, in effect if not in name, a potent political instrument as well. Where the other two parties work spasmodically, with a sudden concentration of effort as the election approaches, Labor is working all the time. The powerful co-operative movement is another instrument only less effective than the trade unions and it exercises its influence more especially on the women, who shop at co-operative stores every day. The importance of this lies in the fact that the forces Labor has gradually succeeded in mobilizing are forces on which it ought always to be able to count. The votes it got at the last election it should, speaking broadly, be able to get at the next. The Labor movement has worked only gradually up to its present commanding position, but its progress has been consistent and uniform. At the last election, in 1924, the Zinovieff letter scare at the eleventh hour robbed the Labor party of scores of seats it would otherwise have won then. It has won them now instead, and there is no good reason why it should not continue to win them in the future, for if the manual, and a large proportion of the clerical, workers of the country choose to stand together politically they can always outvote the other two parties. That may in time throw Conservatives and Liberals into one another's arms, though not as the immediate result of the present election.

The League of Nations:—It is not ten years yet since the League of Nations was established but in this period it has evolved an organization so complex that the average man finds himself at a loss to follow it in all its ramifications. A handbook on the League, therefore, is welcome. Such a book is "the Unifying of Civilization" by Mr. G. Davies Watkins of the Madras Christian College, published by the Christian Literature Society of India, and priced one rupee. The book is a collected reprint, with slight modifications, of a series of lectures on the League delivered by the author at the University of Madras. The lectures were prepared at the beginning of last year but so rapid has been the growth of the League, that they have already come to need being supplemented. The signing of the Kellogg Peace Pact in August last year, is the most important international event that has happened since. The author traces the history of the League idea from the earliest times and concludes with a suggestive chapter on "India and the League." Our readers will find Professor Watkins' little book a useful addition to their stock of books on current history.

Prevention of Prostitution:—In the Bombay Legislative Council the following reply was elicited from the Hon Mr. Hotson:—"Under the law, as it stands at present, brothel keeping is not an offence. The number of persons convicted under Section 5 of the Act for living on the earnings of prostitution is 15. The police have no legal authority to order the closing of a brothel under the law, as it stands. The direct and indirect effects of the Prevention of Prostitution Act seem, however, to have led to a marked reduction in the number of brothels in the city as

BOMBAY, JULY 27, 1929.

A VOICE FROM THE PAST.

The Hindu-Mahomedan problem was recognised as one of the foremost of our social problems so long ago as 1894. In that year a questionnaire was drawn up by several reformers headed by Ranade and Satyendra Nath Tagore with the object of eliciting opinions on the outstanding questions relating to social, educational and kindred reforms. Third in the list of the questions under the head "Social" was the following:—

Religious disputes between Hindus and Mahomedans:—In what places in your province have there been religious disputes between Hindus and Mahomedans? What were these due to? If you are aware of any respective rights of the two communities as regards public processions in your province, state them. Would it not be possible for the leaders of the two communities in your town to form a committee with a view to fix the customary usage and to settle the disputes amicably when they arise, and keep up the good feeling between them both? If so, state if such leaders are willing to form a committee of conciliation.

There is no record of the answers received to these questions. Probably, not many were sent in, as the Hindu-Mahomedan problem at that time did not exist. It is nevertheless a testimony to the foresight of Ranade that he should, even at that time, have recognised the importance of removing all causes of difference between the two communities. In his address to the National Social Conference at Lucknow in 1899, he showed that there has been a movement towards fusion between the two communities, which was deliberately and as a matter of high policy fostered by the Emperor Akbar. That movement was interrupted by his reactionary successors, and the social reformers and the Social Conference, Ranade claimed, were intent on resuming it from the point where it was interrupted. "If the lessons of the past have any value," he said, "one thing is clear, viz., that in this vast country no progress is possible unless both Hindus and Mahomedans joined hands together, and are determined to follow the lead of the men who flourished in Akbar's time and were his chief advisers and counsellors, and sedulously avoid the mistakes which were committed by his great-grandson, Aurangzeb. The Conference which brings us together is especially intended for the propagation of this 'din' or 'dharma' and it is in connection with that message chiefly that I have ventured to speak to you today on this important subject."

The Suddhi movement is now regarded by many of our Mahomedan countrymen as prompted by hostility to their community, but it is interesting to note that a great thinker like Ranade who had the liveliest appreciation of the valuable contribution of Islam to Indian history regarded it as a means of promoting freedom of movement and therefore of goodwill between the two great communities. The first reference to it occurs in his address at the Eighth Social Conference held in 1894 in which he mentions as among the signs of the growing Hindu liberalism that in the Punjab the Arya Samajas and the Sikh Associations admitted as many as twelve Musalman converts. In the address next year he mentioned the story as indicating the tendency of Hinduism to throw off its exclusive character that one hundred Hindus who had been converted to Islam were taken back by the Hindu community in the Punjab during the year. Fifteen born Mahomedans were also converted to Hinduism evidently by the Arya Samaj. In 1896 Ranade noted that owing to the exertion of cultured Hindus, Sikhs and members of the Arya Samaj, the admission to the Hindu community of Mahomedan and Christian converts had made a great advance and as many as 250 or 300 persons were admitted during the course of the year. He appealed to the Hindu community to support this movement "on the ground of the devotion we owe to truth and reason and the supremacy of the claims of conscience upon our allegiance, to allow free liberty in the matter of this interchange of faiths." In the address next year he mentioned that the Suddhi Sabha admitted nearly 200 Mahomedan converts that year and that this movement which till then was chiefly confined to the Punjab had extended to Bengal, North West Provinces and even to far away Burma. Reference has already been made to his memorable address in Lucknow in 1899 wherein he insisted that no progress was possible in this country unless the Hindus and Mahomedans joined their hands together. That this movement which Ranade valued as an important means of bridging the traditional gulf between the Hindu and Mahomedan communities should now be regarded and resented as a measure of hostility only shows how important is the method of approach of social problems.

a whole. In 1927 there were 681 brothels in the city, while inquiries made in the last 3 months indicate that there are now only about 493." It is gratifying to see that there has been a reduction of brothels in Bombay and we hope that the local Government will consider penalising brothel keeping. A Madras message runs as follows. "The Select Committee on the Brothels Bill concluded its labours this afternoon. The Committee decided to extend the Bill to the whole of the Presidency, penalising brothel-keeping as an offence and deleting the clause providing for an elaborate preliminary inquiry and warning by the Police Commissioner prior to prosecution. Provision is made for the compulsory maintenance of a home or homes for rescued minor girls and women by Government." We commend this to the Government of Bombay.

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XXX. NATURE LOVERS.

(DR. CLIFFORD MANSHARDT, Ph.D.).

The resident in India who does not love nature is a poor man indeed. In few other countries is life so much in the open, or is there such a variety of natural scenery. The miles of barren plain suddenly springing into life at the awakening touch of the rushing rains. The highways lined with leafy trees. The growing fields, stretching out as far as the eye can reach in a symphony of greens. The hills, silhouetted against the morning sky. The monsoon sunsets, splashing radiance throughout the entire heavens. Dense forests, with pile on pile of living colour. Mighty rivers, sparkling mirrors in the brilliant sunshine. The mountains, rising out of the plains, intruding themselves into the secrets of the sky. The sea, colourful, varying in mood, calm and unruffled and then lashing itself into the wildest fury. The merry moon, swinging gayly through space, reflecting its happiness to the world below. Towering palms and flaming gold-mohurs; lacy corks and giant banyans; blushing orchids and trembling jasmine; colour, profusion, radiance—unparalleled beauty.

Beauty surrounds us, and yet all about us men are blind to beauty. Thousands of agricultural workers, working day after day in the open fields are senseless to beauty as the clods beneath their feet. The winds of God play upon them, but the breath of God does not enter into their souls. The sun of heaven shines upon them, but the recesses of their minds are cold and dark. The falling rain gives new life to the soil, but it fails to touch the life within. Beauty knocks and waits, but she cannot enter. Thousands of city workers, though further removed from nature, have not the seeing eye. The sight of a balanced ledger produces a greater thrill than the sight of a sunset. The clanking of rupees is a sweeter sound than the fall of the raindrops. The darkness of the cinema theatre is more welcome than the radiance of the night. Beauty hovers near them, but withdraws unseen.

But happily there are those who love and seek beauty. The field is a temple and the crowded city is a sanctuary. Their minds are open, their senses are alert, and their eyes are clear. A single flower may be to them the messenger of a new life. The trees that line the streets or highways point their fingers to the throne of heaven. The rising sun is a sign of new hope, and the setting sun is but the prelude to the music of the night. Happy are such people, and fortunate indeed is the land that can claim them. The inhabitants of a nation may be poor in possessions, but the nation is rich that is rich in lovers of beauty. May the lord of all nature grant that their number may increase!

INDIA'S TRUE WOMANHOOD.

(BY MRS. KUMUDINI GANTI, JESSORE, BENGAL).

Over half a century the education of woman has been conducted on the same line with man. The need of a somewhat different education for woman is felt at times at different quarters. In the Delhi Women's Conference this had been a subject of discussion. Also this is a dissentient question in many homes.

To give a high university education to woman on the same line with man in order to establish her on an equal footing on intellectual basis is theoretically sound. But that alone cannot serve fully the noble purpose of creation. Woman constituted different physically is equally so mentally. Diversity is not only beauty but utility too. We forget that in the economy of nature the relationship between woman and man is supplementary. Stones do not themselves make building without the soft plaster of cement. A superb edifice need both masons and gardeners to be built. Woman is born with characteristic gifts and virtues for home. As nothing can excel in merit or perfection without culture, in the educational scheme of woman there should be scope for free display of her special gifts and aptitudes.

Almost all over the world the principal function of woman is to look after her home as of man's to maintain his family. To the materialistic eye marriage may appear to be the emporium of procreation and its duty a drudgery but Providence is great in His wisdom. Emerson said somewhere that while weaving the tapes of thread perhaps you are weaving galaxy of stars. Thus the meanest of service is divine. To the seeing eye and thinking mind home is the eternal nursery and a veritable haven of humanity. It is not only the cradle of childhood but the seeds of all glory, greatness and goodness germinate and nurture here. How many souls are comforted here, the hungered fed, the sorrowing solaced by endearing kindness of woman! How many disasters eluded by her wisdom! How many lives returned to safe mooring from the tempestuous sea of this alluring world, by her patient suffering and loving expectation. Her self-abnegation, self-control, gentleness, sympathy, kindness and devotion to trifling duties form an example and a perennial source of bliss to man to inspire him to all noble impulse and deed. And even when she has left her mortal coil, her hallowed memory burns before him like the divine torch of an altar to illumine his dark days to the path of eternal greatness and glory.

True character and education is formed at home. Some years ago it appeared in the newspapers of Bombay, that the son of a lady in America who was a prominent worker in the public cause, shot dead a man because he happened to pass through his compound. I know instances where wives are social workers of fame and repute, the children have become moral wrecks and the husbands are most miserable men. In western countries, married women taken to public work, have declined motherhood. Wherever the influence of home life is slackened its responsibility neglected or shirked, grave consequences have afflicted the home; and gradually various corruptions and diseases have crept into the society.

Knowledge is power, woman endowed with high education can justly be expected to be an ideal wife while keenly alive and active to the interest of society and nation. No Character is formed without the practice of service. True spirit of service and acumen earned at the ordeal of home and extended to the cause of society and nation form a genuine and disinterested contribution of a higher and truer call. This solves social and national problem on a consolidated basis from within and finally from without, without blunder.

It is not known what course of education 'Brahmabadinis' of ancient India had, had, though indeed they scaled the great height of knowledge. These immortal ladies were members of no small family of the present-day. Deeply versed in learning, they were dutiful daughters-in-law, devoted wives, mothers of noble prodigies, kind and attentive to the various relations and inmates of the household and well-wishers of the menials. Maidenhood or equality with man was no rivalry. Woman deemed as supercreation was adored as personified deity of the household, entitled at home and abroad as Devi "The Goddess."

" BOMBAY EDUCATION FUND "

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

May I ask you to make a correction in the July 13th issue of your paper. Under the caption of " A New Organisation " you write " The registration of the Education Friends as an association "...etc. In the first place I should like to point out that it is not a new organisation. An Education Fund was started by the All India Women's Conference on Education after their sessions at Delhi in 1928. This Fund has been recently registered. For purposes of registration an association has been formed which is to be called " All India Women's Education Fund (and not friend as you write) Association. "

I hope you will make this correction, otherwise it may lead to lot of confusion and misunderstanding.

PURIFICATION OF TEMPLES.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,

Sir,

May I crave the hospitality of the columns of your valued paper to bring to the notice of your readers and yourself the following few facts about the very famous temple of Sri Jaggannathji at Puri in Orissa.

The shrine ranks among the four dhamas or important places of pilgrimage for Hindus in India. A place where millions unceasingly flock every year to pay homage to Sri Jaggannathji. The massive and gorgeous architecture of the ancient Temple at once attracts the eye of the visitor. And with enthusiasm and deep reverence he enters the temple to adore the presiding deity with all Bhakti at his heart, in expectation to obtain bliss after his death. Quite naturally he emerges from the temple a serene and religious man, his heart momentarily scared of Māyā. Thus elevated he walks round the temple to have the darshan of other deities around the main shrine, but to his utter dismay he glances over one of the many obscene statues put round the dome. Its presence bewilders him. His peace is disturbed. His astonishment is increased when he sees many more, each more obscene than the other. He is unable to account for their presence in a holy shrine like this. I venture to add that his light disappears and the mind falls an easy prey to Satan and in most cases his passions are aroused and he returns home brooding over these statues, which assuredly was not the purpose with which he went there bearing all the fatigue of the arduous journey and meeting the rough treatment at the hands of the pandas who haunt all the approaches of the shrine.

The presence of these unearthly obscene statues in a place of pilgrimage like Sri Jaggannathji is a serious blot on the otherwise untainted Hindu religion and worship. It is a matter of deep concern to all the Hindus in general and Sanatanists in particular, and each day of its existence is a burden to the Hindu heart. I appeal to all the Hindus of every sex, age and rank to unite and organise to effect the speedy removal of these undesirable statues from all the domes, temples and pandas' houses at Puri. I hope that this task will be taken up by the Hindu Mahasabha, the Sanatan Dharama Sabha, the Tirtha Sudhar Committee and other similar bodies, all over the country.

Yours etc.,

Hatia, Cawnpore, }

" CONFESSIONS OF A MISSIONARY. "

XV.

In the course of a leading article on this subject, the Liberator writes:—To come to the point of the present articles, his reference to the Arya Samaj is thuswise:—" The Arya Samajist's programme and mine coincide in a good many places. Yet they follow me wherever I go, doing everything in their power, by fair means and by foul, to counteract the service that I am trying to render. They must understand what we are after." The use of the word 'must' in the last sentence quoted, is slightly intriguing. Apparently he only means that the Samajists do not understand him. Our quarrel with the "Preplexed Missionary" is not, however, connected with his charge that we do not understand him but that in his supreme self-satisfaction he does not think that others can be as interested and partial to their beliefs, as he can be to his own. The charge that he makes against the Samaj, that it is making use of every means to thwart the work of the missionary is grossly unfair. Why should the Arya Samajists be accused of using foul means to undo the good work of the missionary? To the best of our knowledge, and we have known the Samajists and the Christian missionary for a fairly long time, the Samajists only expose the claims of the Christian missionary, when he sets up as an altogether altruistic individual. They present the missionary in his real light and show to the men of the depressed classes from whom the missionary gets most of his converts, that he is after all only human and a foreigner; that he cannot always be expected to view the ultimate interests of the Indian people in the same way as one of themselves would; that all their claims for universal brotherhood and equality are to be accepted with something more than the proverbial grain of salt. Witness, for instance, the reference which the "Perplexed Missionary" makes to certain 'sweeper Christians' in his long wail to the "Indian Social Reformer." Coming from a Padre, the expression is to say the least, scandalous. Unlike their saviour, these men of Christ put themselves on a very superior pedestal and set about retailing patronage to all and sundry. If their hearts overflowed with the milk of human kindness and if they felt for the failings of humanity, these estimable folk would find more work than they can conveniently do, in their own countries rather than elsewhere. There is as much sin and as much wretchedness in America as there is in this country; and the efforts of all the missionaries of the world have not succeeded in changing the mentality of the men that believe in the lynch law in reference to the Negro.

The truth is the missionary at the present day finds that in his proselitizing campaign he has to contend against a new rival in the Arya Samajist. He cannot reconcile himself to the new rival. Not only does the Samaj effectively prevent the Padre from getting converts to his religion: it instils into the members of the depressed classes a spirit of self-respect and self-reliance which is very offensive to the average missionary. The Arya Samaj effectively does away with the slave mentality which looks upon the white man as a heaven-born individual, which particular feeling it has been the effort of the missionary to perpetuate. No wonder that the Samaj should sit so very heavily on the missionary's brain. There may be an Arya Samaj preacher here and there, who may not exactly be an ornament to the Arya community. Such men may be guilty of acts which the Samaj would not tolerate. But that would be no justification for the perplexed missionary to generalise about the Samaj itself. We know of a number of Christian missionaries who are no better than snobs and whose allegiance to Christ has a very substantial cash basis. Will that, however, entitle us to generalise upon missionaries as a class? The "Perplexed Missionary's" heart seems to be sound; but his intellect is sadly overweighted. He is attempting to convince himself that his prejudices are based on facts. He has our very genuine sympathy. We would advise him to learn the lesson of humility from Jesus Christ whom he professes to follow. A period of mental discipline would enable him to get over his present despondency and see things in their true perspective.

STUDENTS IN INDUSTRY.

On a hot night in August a dozen college students were seated around a table in an office high up in a New York sky-scraper. The President of the Central Trades and Labour Council was speaking. From the look on the faces of some of the students, it was apparent that the occasion was their first opportunity for personal contact with a labour union official. The mythical being sometimes referred to as an agitator and trouble maker in American industry, present in the flesh in the intimate circle of the seminar, told a story of long hours, low pay, accident hazards, and lack of work among the longshoremen and in other industries, and recounted the material improvements for the workers which had been brought about by organized labour.

The searching nature of the questions which came from the students would have surprised many a professor of economics, and might perhaps have disturbed the academic atmosphere of the classroom. These students were workers themselves. They had come at the end of a hard day's work to discuss problems which now meant something more to them than those things which text books can impart.

Nor had these college students been handed their jobs on a silver platter. No pull had been brought to bear, no sob-story of the worthy student earning his way through college. Like other industrial workers, whose problems they were seeking to understand, they had found their own jobs. In their old clothes, they had applied at factory gates, registered at employment offices, hunted down help wanted advertisements in the newspapers, living meanwhile at the Mills Hotel or in the Bowery Y. M. C. A. with the unemployed. When one has lived and talked with hundreds of men whose chief ambition in life is to find a job, when one has himself applied for jobs day after day, only to find that in each case 'the place has just been filled,' when one has stood in line at a factory gate for two hours hoping for a job, only at last to hear a shouted announcement, "No more wanted today," and it is too late to try another factory that morning, "the problem of unemployment" and "the need of labour exchanges" begin to take on something more than an academic interest. Dead retired in body and mind, one's money running low, it does not take much imagination to understand the feelings of a wage earner who has a wife and small children dependent upon this job which is often so difficult to secure.

In later life a college graduate who has had this experience will no doubt be an interested citizen when state regulation of the exorbitant fees often charged by commercial employment agencies is proposed, or when the federal government and the states are urged to maintain further free employment bureaus, or to adopt unemployment insurance. As an employer or a personal director, "in charge of hiring," his very manner will be different, perhaps more Christian, as he interviews the long lines of applicants for jobs if he has been there himself.

In the most effective of these summer groups both men and women students go into industry incognito. The purpose is to place oneself as nearly as possible in the exact situation of industrial workers, with a view to gaining the clearest understanding of their problems. If one's uncle owns the works, or even if one is known as a college student, he does not receive identically the same treatment as would be the case if he "hired in at the gate." He may be favoured by special transfers from one department to another in order to learn the business. He may not be equally exposed to the unique experience of being fired. He is privileged perhaps to ask questions which might receive quite different replies if foremen and superintendents did not know who he was. Industrial workers also look upon college students as people apart from themselves and may not adopt the same attitudes toward them as they do toward other workers. If you would know what a worker is up against and understand what is on the worker's mind, you must be a worker yourself without favour or distinction.

It has proved rather a startling disillusion to some college men to discover how easily the intellectual experience is quite upsetting to the idea found in some of our colleges that a bright young man of good family will quickly be discovered among the common herd and favoured with prompt promotion by the management. Except in plants having highly developed personnel departments, the student is apt to find himself lost in the crowd, performing the eternal round of common labour, no eager management asking for his suggestions, his hope of recognition and promotion indefinitely deferred.

At the close of a summer's work a theological student in the New York group was accosted by a curious paymaster. "Say," he said, "you ain't a New Yorker, are you?" "No," said the student, "I wasn't brought up in New York." "Well, that accounts for it," replied the paymaster. "I thought you had a foreign accent."

Occasionally, it is true, the girls do not get by so easily. One girl, working in a candy factory where the pay was very low, the hours long, and the conditions far from sanitary, found herself put to it to adopt the tough language of the class of girls to be found under such poor conditions. They suspected her of being something other than themselves. They were of every race and nationality. "What are you?" they asked her. "Oh, I'm just an American," she said, "But you talk different from us," said a fellow worker and in reply to her protest added, "G'wan, kid, yer talk like a college president."

A competent leader, with a knowledge of industrial problems, is placed in charge of each of these groups of students in industry. The groups are conducted in a number of cities in the United States, under the auspices of the Student Departments of the Y. M. C. A. or the Y. W. C. A. with the co-operation of a number of other religious and social organizations, including the Federal Council of Churches. The students meet two evenings a week for a seminar.

"I wish we could study the possibilities of stabilizing production," said a student one night. He had been working for eighteen dollars a week. That afternoon a notice had been posted in the factory to the effect that the plant would operate only three days a week until further notice. Less than ten dollars a week to live on instead of eighteen? How would your family budget stand being cut almost in two on a day's notice? An industrial engineer was asked to speak to the group on this problem and described the Dennison Manufacturing Company and other factories where the problem has been met successfully by intelligent production planning and sale policies. The group also discussed the bearing of the entire industrial system on this problem in its wider aspects.

Other specialists came at the request of the group, including employers, personal managers, economists, labour leaders, officials of the State Department of Labour, experts in social legislation, social workers, ministers of labour, churches. These experts spoke and were questioned in regard to the employers' point of view, modern personnel management, the function of the state in factory inspection, statistics, mediation, employment bureaus, laws governing child labour, the minimum wage, night work for women, safety, workman's compensation, union management co-operation, employe representation, the control of wages, religion and labour, and the whole range of social theory.

The principal group for college girls is conducted by the Y. W. C. A. in Chicago. There the girls find jobs as operatives in candy factories, glove factories, bookbinderies, shoe factories, wiring radio coils, gumming and pasting boxes, feeding hog's hair to a machine in an upholstery plant, sewing lamp shades, making dresses, sometimes as domestic workers, or clerking in a five and ten cent store. They live in working girls' homes. They pool their wages so as to provide for unemployment in the group and for the less than living wages received by some girls. They discover at once that women's wages are commonly lower than men's, even for the same jobs. They find that coloured girls get less than white workers. The average wage of the entire group was only $12.62 a week. They found it possible to pay for board and meals, though at times they had to live on ten-cent lunches. They were unable to buy any clothes from their wages. "Lieten, girlie," said a woman worker to one of the girls when she complained of the low pay, "the best advice for you is to get next to a sweetie. Let him keep you. Marry him, and even though you will have to work for a while, he will support you in your old age."

As the girls gather for their seminar on industrial problems in the evening, it proves to be hard work to study at the end of a long day in a factory. Even this fact helps them to understand what wage earners are up against in their struggle for further education in our night schools. It is a Christian gesture when these college students go back to the campus and help raise funds for Bryn Mawr and the other summer schools which enable industrial workers to get a taste of college life and a chance at higher education.

There are, of course, certain psychological limitations to the experience of these college students in industry. The student knows that he is not in for life. He is continually conscious that at the end of the summer or of a somewhat longer period he will escape. He will go back to the campus. He expects to be an owner or a manager or a minister some day. He is not chained to the wheels of industry and cannot know the exact thoughts of those who are. There is a question also whether the monotony of repetitive machine operation is harder on the student's nervous system after his life of greater freedom and interest. But at any rate he approximates the experience of a wage earner. And in doing so he learns to some degree what no industrial engineer or expert in scientific management, with all his careful training and accurate observation, can know. He learns something of the emotional content of the workers' reaction to industrial relations and working conditions. He learns how it feels to be a wage earner. This is important even from the point of view of scientific management. For out of the workers' emotional reaction to various phases of our present industrial system come inefficiency on the job, industrial unrest, strikes and revolutions. A more scientific adjustment of industry will take into account in a way not yet accomplished, the emotional response of industrial workers. Modern psychology is pointing out that true education and understanding come only from participation in the situation. There is no way to understand the feeling of industrial workers under given conditions except by being a worker yourself.

College students as a rule do not emerge from their summer of combined work and study, feeling that their brief experience entitles them to suggest a complete solution of the labour problem. Rather are they impressed by the complexity and difficulty of the industrial situation, the need of further study and research, the importance of scientific approach, and the broader economic problems involved. But they do gain in sympathetic understanding of the human element in industry. For these students, the blithe indifference of the campus of industrial problems and the thoughtless selfishness of student strike-breakers disappears.

The challenge of Christian brotherhood takes on industrial meaning often for the first time. One college girl who had been brought up in a comfortable home worked all summer bending over steaming tubs and catching hot towels in a Chicago laundry. Beside her toiled a working woman whose wages constituted the chief support of her baby, her crippled father and her-elf. The college girl began to turn over in her mind a question of ethics. Is it right for people who call themselves Christians to live in comfort as she had done all her life accepting the dividends of industries where women toil for ten hours a day in the heat and noise of a factory for thirteen dollars a week?—Social Welfare, Toronto.

MRS. NAIDU IN BOMBAY.

Mrs. Sarojini Naidu returned on Monday last from her continental tour. In her interview to the press she said:—

"What we really want now, as a first step towards our freedom, is to arrive immediately at a workable understanding between Hindus and Mahomedans. Until that is done you cannot proceed any further."

MISS MAYO'S BOOK.

Asked as to what she did in America to counteract the effects of Miss Mayo's "Mother India" Mrs. Naidu said that she never interested herself in that book and her interest in it now was even still less. "When we are putting up with every other kind of evil that condemns us in the eyes of the world, why should we get so excited, because a woman with a prurient mind writes a book? This book would never have achieved the notoriety which it has achieved if Indians were not excited. We acquiesce in so many terrible evils in this country that make us really the laughing stock of the world and because some hysterical woman writes a book why should we make so much noise? It is not, on the whole, as bad as some other books on India written since and before. Whatever it is, if we had not made so much fuss about it, America would have taken no notice of the book at all."

LABOUR GOVERNMENT'S ATTITUDE.

Asked about the prospects of the Labour Government doing anything good to India, Mrs. Naidu said: "It does not matter what Government is in power and how sympathetic it is towards India. The first consideration is that India itself should be in a position of unity. We are not concerned with what Government is going to do, but what sanction have we got behind our demand and how much in earnest are we going to talk about Swaraj? Because no Government, however determined it might be, can really oppose the united will of the people who are really in earnest and prepared to make any sacrifices for the liberty of their country."

NEED OF CONCERTED ACTION.

"This question of what India is going to do, and not talk, had been asked to me by people of every type during the course of my travel for the last ten months. In every country, every section of the people, right from the working classes to the Cabinet Ministers, Senators, Philosophical writers, active and academic politicians; no matter what their ranks and political convictions were, have asked me the same question. "What is India going to do? We have heard her talking so much and now we want to know what she is actually going to do." One concerted action is a greater propaganda for us than whole volumes of resolutions passed at the different conferences. People outside are very tired of reading our resolutions on liberty and they want to come to realities now."

WOMEN'S INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE.

Asked about her impression about the Women's International Conference, Mrs. Naidu declared that it was really one of the most important things that had been done for a long time. "It was more than a gesture, it was a real step towards the re-building of co-operation and understanding between the women of nations that had been divided by very bitter hatred. The Indian delegation made a very fine show there, and their co-operation was very much valued on the committees and in the meetings. As many as 42 nations were represented in the Conference and for the first time India's National Flag was carried among the flags of the free nations, though India was not a free nation. Very fine and moving appeals were made by responsible Ministers of the German Government to the women to make peace out of chaos, and it was much more difficult for women of the different nations to meet on the same platform because they had the memory of graves. Yet they met and made very noble gestures, and the sight was very moving, because each side remembered their graves and tried from those very graves to build up a new temple of worship for common unity. French and German women met on the same platform though they did not pretend that it was easy to do so and knew full well that they were making a supreme sacrifice of their mourning and tragic memories for the sake of peace, because the Ministers of the Interior said that it is the women that should make a gesture of peace."

"There were two public peace demonstrations in which the women of many nations took part, which were extremely impressive. It was all genuine and there was no make-believe for the sake of expediency and politics in it. The women really felt that until they could bury their personal enmity nations could not do it."

TENTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE ASSEMBLY.

The next Assembly of the League of Nations has been summoned for Monday, September 2nd.

This meeting, which is the annual gathering of representatives of all States Members of the League, will be the tenth anniversary of the Assembly. It is hoped that the ceremony of laying the foundation stone of the new League buildings may take place during the session.

The Assembly is opened by the Acting President of the Council, who this time will be the Persian representative, after which it elects its own President and Vice-Presidents. The work begins with a general debate on the work of the League since the last session of the Assembly, which is described in a printed report presented to the Members of the League; this does not exclude a discussion of any matters of concern to the League. The debate is, in effect, a general review of progress in international relations during the year. In addition to this, the Assembly has before it a complete series of reports from all the technical and other organizations of the League, and on this basis it lays down the general lines of policy to be pursued during the following twelve months.

The session will be of importance from various points of view. There will undoubtedly be a general discussion of disarmament and cognate problems, upon which there may be further developments by the time the Assembly meets. It is, also, virtually certain that there will be a debate on the problem of minorities, and the Assembly will have to take definite decisions on a number of matters, including the draft Convention on financial assistance in case of war or threat of war (described in a previous issue of this Sheet), the establishment of a wireless station, the revision of the Statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice (the Assembly sitting for this purpose as signatories of the Protocol of the Statute), and on the terms of the jurists' report designed to meet the reservations of the United States of America and facilitate its accession to the Court Statute. The Assembly and the Council voting together will also have to elect successors to the late M. Weiss (French) and the late Lord Finlay (English), judges of the Permanent Court of International Justice.

Three non-permanent Members of the Council will have to be elected, the retiring Members being Chile, Poland and Roumania. A retiring Member is not re-eligible for re-election during the three years following the expiration of its term of office unless the Assembly decides by a two-thirds' majority that such a Member is re-eligible. The Assembly has already accorded this right to Poland, which will therefore stand for re-election.

A matter exclusively within the province of the Assembly is the budget for 1930, including the budgets of the International Labour Organisation and the Permanent Court of International Justice. The estimated budget for 1930 has been prepared and submitted to the Council, which has followed its regular practice in forwarding it to all the Members of the League in preparation for the discussion at the Assembly. The present total, subject of course to any changes made by the Assembly, is 27,230,000 gold francs as compared with 27,026,000 gold francs for 1929; it should be noted, however, that the 1930 budget estimate includes a credit for the Conference on the Codification of International Law, and that on the closed accounts for 1928 there was a cash surplus of 2,717,820 gold francs—roughly, £118,000. The Supervisory Commission recommends that, of this sum, one million francs be returned to the States.

The agenda of the Assembly, according to the rules of procedure, has been circulated four months before the opening of the session; any Member of the League, however, may, at least one month before the opening, request the inclusion of additional items, and the decision as to whether they should be definitely included in the agenda rests with the Assembly itself. There are provisions, also, for the possibility of the Assembly adding other subjects to the agenda.

SOME THOUGHTS ON VACATIONS.

For many of our readers this week brings the end of a vacation in the mountains where cool breezes blow and a return to the steaming plains. If the vacation has been wisely spent, and its duration has been neither too short nor too long, its benefits have been many and mighty. Chief among the values of a well-spent vacation is the gift of a zest for work. Unless one is in need of a physician's care, or has squandered his opportunities in riotous living, in worry, jealousy, over-strain and fatigue or some other unwholesome action of mind or body, he should return from his vacation eager to get at his work and with a renewed sense of its importance.

A vacation should not be spent in idleness. We venture the opinion that the least profitable vacations now terminating are those that have been spent with least to do. Nothing is more of a strain on physical and mental resources than having nothing to do. Idleness releases many of our worst enemies and sends them to a frenzied attack upon us. Weariness, gloom, sadness, vexation, disappointment, despair arise from the depths of our souls and torment us when we are unwise enough to lay aside every occupation.

And a vacation should not be spent in sleep. Some people wear themselves out seeking sleep they do not need and ought not to have. One of the mysteries of life that has not yet been studied as it ought to be is why so many people insist on trying to compel their poor bodies to make more sleep than is good for them. Haven't you seen people wearing themselves to a frazzle trying to sleep nine hours out of every twenty-four when their bodies have been unable to use more than seven hours sleep in twenty-four? We have.

Rest is a legitimate object of search in a vacation but it is not to be found in idleness nor in excessive sleep. It is found rather in a change of occupation, that will exercise parts of our being that have laid dormant, or have at least not been regularly exercised. Among the happiest ways of spending a vacation is the riding of some hobby. That hobby may be any one of hundreds,—the range of choice is very wide. It is always possible to capture and harness a new hobby and ride it with rest-producing pleasure. It is sometimes advisable to change hobbies, to give up entirely one that in other years has been a great friend and helper and select another of a radically different sort. For most people an ideal vacation in the mountains necessitates at least two hobbies, one that will take one up the hills and down the valley of God's beautiful out-of-doors; the other one that can be ridden inside the house.

But while emphasizing change of one's regular occupation during vacation it is well to utter a warning against turning away during vacation from those exercises of the soul that benefit in proportion to the regularity of their observances, meditation, prayer, Bible study, and the cultivation of graces and virtues. It is a tragic mistake to leave one's concern for spiritual things behind when going on vacation. Some one said of Emerson that he had a short creed but always took it with him. Some people are notorious for very long creeds which they leave at home when they go into politics or business or on a tour in foreign lands.

Jesus once spoke words to his disciples, when they had come together after some very hard and trying work and in circumstances of a very distressing nature, which may be regarded as the charter of all holiday-makers. They are recorded in Mark's Gospel, the sixth chapter, the thirty-first verse:

"Come ye yourselves apart into a desert place, and rest awhile."

"The secret of success," says The Speaker's Bible, "is to know what you can do and what you cannot do, and to work well within your strength." Turning away from one's regular work now and then gives opportunity to accumulate a reserve of strength at those places where the work makes the greatest demands. We should be more successful in our work because of our vacations. We should return with an increased margin of strength, a refreshed mind, a renewed devotion to God and a replenished enthusiasm for work.

For those who have spent their holidays in the hills we have this further word. One bye-product of your vacation ought to be an increase of desire to ameliorate the conditions under which the mass of people about you live. Only a very small minority of those with whom you will come in contact on the plains have had the benefits you have enjoyed. Most of them have never spent a summer out of the heat. The deadening strain of monotony has killed many fine elements in the souls of some of them. Treat them with consideration and give them as many as you can of the privileges that have brought blessing to you:—Indian Witness,

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

NOTES.

The next Congress President:—Mahatma Gandhi seems to favour the selection of Pandit Jawharlal Nehru to the Presidentship of the forthcoming session of the Indian National Congress. His opinion, of course, will have very great weight with the selecting agencies, and if he insists on it, it is sure to be adopted by them. Those who have found it necessary to remain outside the Congress, have no status in the matter, but the Congress is still the best-known organ of Indian nationalism and its affairs, therefore, cannot be regarded as being outside the pale of general discussion. We would therefore ask Mahatma Gandhi to reconsider his preference. Mr. Jawharlal Nehru is a fine type of the younger politicians among us. His selfless devotion to the public good, as he sees it, is beyond question. He is further a man of scrupulous honour, who will not, from any consideration, stoop to underhand or unfair tactics. Personally, therefore, his title to public recognition needs no justification. Nor do we think his age is an important consideration. He is well past his teens, and is a man of wide reading and culture. Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha in his interesting review of Indian public life since the Hindustan Review was started thirty years ago, notes with characteristic accuracy that Pandit Jawharlal was then ten years old. The chief consideration against his selection at this juncture is that he is deeply committed and is, in fact, one of the originators of the "independence" school. Congress is, it is true, pledged to declare for independence if by the end of the year, Dominion Status is not assured to the country. Mahatmaji himself has, however, admitted that the time-table is not immutable, should events meanwhile recommend its extension. Pandit Jawharlal is an "independence" man without any time limit, and his election now cannot but prejudice the free consideration of the constitutional problem. It will not be fair to him, either, to expect him to change his views should the conditions necessitate the acceptance of Dominion Status.

A Hygienic Scare:—Some Parsi publicists have been alarming the community by prophesying its impending extinction as the result of consanguineous, or more strictly cousin marriages, among its members. They have found an ally in Dr. J. Munsiff, the Director of Public Health in Bombay, who in a lecture before the Sanitary Institute in this city took the case of the Parsis to illustrate his thesis about racial degeneration as the result of social customs. Starting with the assumption that the Parsis have degenerated, he maintained that the degeneration was the result principally of the prevalence of consanguineous marriages. He relied for his evidence on the opinions expressed by some Superintendents of Lunatic Asylums in this Presidency and on his own personal impressions. The proportionately large number of Parsis in the Asylums, does not, however, prove anything more than that Parsis seek professional aid more freely than the Hindus and Mahomedans in the case of mental as of bodily ailments. A small, almost minute community largely concentrated in Bombay and a few other cities, they have learnt the value of early treatment. There are proportionately more men, women and children using spectacles among the Parsis, but that does not show that there is less of short sight or other defects prevalent in other communities. The same may be said of the care of teeth. Many Hindus, even among educated men, prefer to endure an occasional toothache or even the loss of one or teeth, to going to a dentist to relieve them or to fill the gap. Next to the statistics of lunatic asylums, the Parsi Jeremiads have fastened upon those of suicides. Here, again, the fact of the community being concentrated in Bombay and a few big cities, leads to events in the lives of its members being recorded and reported in the newspapers. The community has been practising cousin marriages, like other Aryan communities, from very early times. Writers on Sociology have, as a rule, not supported the popular belief about the evil consequences of cousin marriages. The attempt to start a scare on this account may be put on the same level as the kidnapping scare which led to the recent riots, only the former is promoted by hygienists, while the latter was propagated by "hooligans". We do not advocate cousin marriages as ideal ones. All that we contend is that they are not a cause of race degeneracy like alcohol or syphilis.

The Borstal Bill:—At the current session of the local Legislative Council a Bill to introduce the Borstal system in the Bombay Presidency was referred to a Select Committee for report. Borstal Institutions play an important part in the reform of young offenders in the countries in the West and we welcome the Bombay Government's efforts to establish such schools in this province. The object of the Borstal Bill is to reform youths of criminal habits, tendencies or associations, whose reformation has not been attempted by other means. The tendency in modern penology is to lay more emphasis on the reformatory treatment of offenders than on the retributive aspect of justice. The Bill applies to persons below 21, who are too old to come under the scope of the Children's Act and an order of detention is substituted for a sentence of imprisonment. Clause 3 of the Bill defines a Borstal school as a place in which young offenders whilst detained in pursuance of the Act are given such industrial training and other instructions and are subjected to such disciplinary and moral influences as will conduce to their reformation and the prevention of crime. Clause 20 of the Bill says: "If the object of the Borstal system is to be fulfilled no stigma should attach to persons who owing to having fallen under evil influences in their youth have been inmates of Borstal schools." Certain disqualifications are imposed by the law on persons who have been convicted and the clause gives power to the Governor-in-Council to remove such disqualifications so that persons whose conduct in Borstal schools has been satisfactory may enter on a new career without the handicap of any legal disability. It is regrettable that the Borstal Bill does not include girls within its provisions. The Home Member himself acknowledged this defect in the Bill when he said "although the provisions of the Children's Act and of the present Bill applied equally to girls as to boys, it would be evident that there were great difficulties in the way of devising arrangements for dealing with girls, except the smallest. While the Children's Home and some of the certified schools and places of safety did now take in girls and while Government were far from this year making a beginning with reformatory treatment of a few girls, the problem of their care and education, when they unhappily came within the class of offenders, was a problem for which a solution had not yet been found."

The Indian Delegation To The League:— We published last week a short article on the tenth anniversary of the League in which various important items in the programme for the year were mentioned. But to Indians the tenth session of the League is distinguished from the previous ones because, for the first time this year an Indian has been selected to lead the Indian representatives to the League. Sir Mohamed Habibullah who has been appointed the leader of the Deputation and who sails to-day, is an admirable choice. His work in South Africa is still fresh before us and we have no doubt he will gain fresh honours at Geneva. There are moreover, several important questions relating to India and the colonies recently arisen, which Sir Mohamed could discuss with the Colonial and India Offices in London. We wish Sir Mohamed and his colleagues "bon voyage" and every success in their work abroad.

The Young East:— We learn with regret from the current number of the Young East, the well-known Buddhist monthly of Japan, that the state of its finances which compelled the editor to suspend publication for six months, has obliged the publishers to change it to a quarterly or bi-monthly. We are glad, however, to note that in deference to the wishes of the founder they are determined not to cease publication as far as possible. While it is also a matter for congratulation that the Young East has many subscribers here. We are sure it could gain even more support in this country and we commend it to all who are interested in getting into closer touch with enlightened opinion in Japan. Journals of this type are seldom in a sound financial position and we hope the Young East will tide over the crisis.

Malaria in India:— We understand that at the invitation of the Government of India a committee of five experts from the Health organisation of the League of Nations is coming over to study the malarial problem in this country. The Committee is composed of two Germans, two Frenchmen and an American and is expected to land in India at the end of August and leave by the end of December after looking into the conditions throughout the country. The expenses of the Committee will be borne by the League of Nations. We hope the Committee will arrive at a solution of the problem which has not received sufficient attention so far. We are unable to understand why the matter has not been given publicity, as it was with difficulty that we received this information. We trust that this Committee of experts will not be precluded from inquiring to what extent the poverty of the people and the consequent insufficient nourishment available to them is responsible for the prevalence of malaria by lowering their power of resistance to disease. This, in our opinion, is the crux of the matter, but the Government of India, while prepared to finance expensive research and other schemes which do not go to the root of the matter, is persistently reluctant to face the real issue. That is why Indian public opinion is, as a rule, extremely sceptical of the results of these inquiries which it regards as spectacular displays intended to impress the outer world rather than to improve the health and vigour of the population.

A Pleasant Function:— The annual social gathering of the Muslim Student's Union was held last Sunday at the Anjuman-i-Islam Hall when Mr. M. A. Jinnah presided. The Secretary in his Report stated emphatically that the Union was opposed to communalism and rejected the suggestion recently put forward by some members of the community of having a separate public school for Muslim boys. Mr. Jinnah in his address to the gathering emphasised the need for a greater interest in outdoor games and exhorted his audience not to miss any opportunity of getting into the Army. An important feature of the gathering was the presence of several Muslim ladies who were invited for the first time to the function. We understand that the members of the Union intend to follow this up by throwing it open to the ladies. We have no doubt that the response will be even greater than they expect.

The Joshi Committee's Report:— The Age of Consent Committee has completed its report and submitted it to the Government of India. Various forecasts have been published in the Indian press, and we give in our news column a summary of the conclusions as anticipated by the Hitavada, Nagpur. We reserve our comments till we see a copy of the report. It will be received in the course of a week or two.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.
BOMBAY, AUGUST 3, 1929.

THE FAILURE OF CHRISTIAN MISSIONS.

In the Reformer of June 8, we published a communication headed "Confessions of a Missionary" which has attracted wide attention. The writer, who signed himself "Perplexed," and whose earnestness is evident in every line, came out to India twenty years ago as a Christian Missionary without any pressing necessity to earn a living thereby, and purely impelled by the desire to convey Christ's message to this country. Here he met and married a lady like-minded with him, who qualified as a doctor and is working as one. Ten years ago they both went to their country on furlough during which our correspondent exerted himself to give the American people an appreciative estimate of India and her people. Coming back to his work, he finds that things are not so satisfactory as he thought. He finds that India is sick and refuses to be cured. He gives instances which have led to this feeling in him. In conclusion, he asks, now that another furlough period is approaching, whether it is worth while his returning to his field of work in this country. This communication evoked thirteen letters from other correspondents which we published during the succeeding weeks. The writers of these letters ranged from, at the one end, some who said that "Perplexed" was not cut out for the missionary vocation and had better stay away when he goes on furlough, to, at the other, some who sympathised and agreed largely with him, but counselled him to have faith and persevere in his work. In between there were several who mingled sympathy and criticism in varying proportions. The majority, we think, favoured his return, some in the view that rest would cure him of his pessimism and some with the suggestion that he should learn to look at things in a brighter light.

In the Reformer of the 15th June, we noticed at length a paper contributed by the Rev. W. E. Boggs to the Baptist Missionary Review in which he drew what, on the whole, was an unsatisfying picture of the results of the work of the American Baptist Mission in the Telugu districts during ninety years, and ended with some searching questions as regards the methods employed by the Mission. The differences between "Perplexed" and Dr. Boggs were that, while the former spoke from his own personal point of view, the latter spoke from the broader standpoint of his Mission extending to nearly a century; and that, while the former was concerned, immediately at any rate, with the question whether he should return to India, the latter was convinced that the Mission should continue, though perplexed about the efficacy of the methods so far employed. Both "Perplexed" and Dr. Boggs were quite sure that India was sick and that they were the physicians who could and should cure her whether she wanted to be cured by them or not. The gist of Dr. Boggs's paper was that the Telugu Baptist Mission has not been able to make its converts truly "religious", though it has improved their social and perhaps, economic status. Christianity, as Christ taught it, however, was not a means primarily of social and economic upliftment. It is true that he said "Seek ye the Kingdom of Heaven and all things will be added unto you", but He did not say "Seek ye social and economic improvement and the Kingdom of Heaven will be added unto you". Dr. Boggs asked himself:—

"Is it due to our materialistic western ideas and ways of expressing ourselves? Or is it the outcome of our western educational processes? We should dearly like to have the phenomenon explained that we might the more readily address ourselves to its correction. A sense of personal obligation and responsibility for the development and life of the churches is absent to a great degree from the thoughts of the rank and file of our Christians. Have we been slack in presenting this phase of our message? Or have we been too eager for an advance in quantity and too easily satisfied as to quality? Have we been so overwhelmed with the numbers thronging to us for baptism, so fearful lest we lose them if we keep them on probation, that we have lost sight of the absolute necessity of instruction? Have we emphasized one item in our commission, to baptize, at the expense of the making disciples, and teaching them all things which our Lord commended."

What "Perplexed" complained of in individual Indian beneficiaries of his or his wife's services, are the very things which Dr. Boggs complains of in Indian Christians as a class. Underlying both complaints is the sense, not to be mistaken, that Christian Mission Work individually in the one case, and collectively in the other, has been more of a failure than a success. It has been successful in incidentals while it has failed of its central purpose. We may add that Dr. Boggs like "Perplexed" suggests that there has been a change for the worse or that a deterioration has been more manifest in the last ten years than at any time before.

A third view of the same problem is presented in Mr. J. S. Hoyland's article in the Nineteenth Century and After headed "The Presentation of the Christian Message to India," excerpts from which we re-printed in the Reformer of July 20. Mr. Hoyland too indicates fifteen years as the period during which the missionary problem has assumed a new phase. While "Perplexed" and Dr. Boggs are puzzled as to the reason of it, Mr. Hoyland explains that the change in the Indian attitude is the necessary result of its re-valuation of Western Christianity in the light of the great War. On the whole, he thinks that that attitude is not unreasonable and is justified by facts. One or two sentences from his article may be quoted. "The Missionary can do nothing unless he is willing to confess that we in the West have failed to understand Christ and to apply his teaching to an organised society. It is, of course, an extremely difficult task to convince the educated Indian that Christianity can be separated from Western Civilisation. It can only be accomplished by the Missionary's frankly and freely acknowledging to him the unchristian-like-ness, of much in the West, especially of the Western State system, and by his taking up the attitude that the West needs the help of the East in finding the true meaning of Christ." Mr. Hoyland sums up the situation thus:—"Hence the Missionary now goes, and must recognise that he goes, as the representative of a discredited order—a civilisation which has led directly to world warfare, a religious system which failed to prevent that appalling catastrophe, and which, therefore, cannot claim to exercise anything approaching a sufficient influence upon life. In brief the first qualification of the modern Missionary must be humility." Mr. Hoyland insists that, next to humility, the Missionary must be imbued with a love of the people to whom he wishes to minister. He gives examples from his own experience to show that there are lovable qualities in Indians. But the attribute of "love" in the Missionary is not conditioned by the possession of lovable qualities in the objects of his mission. In what, perhaps, is the key-note of his way of thought, Mr. Hoyland declares: "It is well to remember that it is possible to train oneself in love not only in the avoidance of everything that would give offence or hurt sensitive feelings but in the genuine affection of one's heart for those whom one would serve. Above all, this gift of love is to be sought and gained through prayer. So only will it be unforced, pure and genuine." In an unforeseen way, Mr. Hoyland's paper is at many points an answer to the questions agitating the minds of "Perplexed" and Dr. Boggs. Our own answer must be reserved for another article.

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XXXI. WOMEN.

(DR. CLIFFORD MANSCHARDT, PH.D.).

The proper status of woman is a subject about which there has long been controversy. From the time that Eve's curiosity led her to taste of the forbidden fruit, or Pandora gazed into forbidden box, men have been ready to say, "I told you so. A woman should pay attention to the duties of her home and leave other things alone. The minute she starts getting curious about things outside the home she gets herself and other people into trouble. It is not good that a woman should know too much."

Well, perhaps a woman should not "know too much," but up to the present time no one has been able to discover just where a woman's knowledge should stop. There is no indication of any sort that a woman is inferior to a man either in brain capacity or in desire to know. Certain it is that neither women nor men have as yet utilized their mental powers to the full. Contrasting what we are with what we might be, we are all in the position of children.

Woman has a contribution in the home. No one will deny it. It is impossible for anyone to exercise the same influence on the growing family as does the mother. It is impossible for anyone to give the same atmosphere to the home as does the mother. The woman's touch transforms, refines and ennobles. It sweetens, purifies, and makes our life the richer.

Ideally this is true, but when the woman is relegated to a position of inferiority and servitude the home does not break forth into flower. A woman who has never known the meaning of freedom can scarce instil the ideal of freedom into her children. A woman with the mind of a slave can do little else than reproduce the slave mentality. A woman whose daily work is that of a beast of burden is little prepared to school her children in the finer things. A woman worn out with excessive child-bearing has little strength or desire to generate ambition in the minds of her children. The women of our upper and middle classes enjoy certain privileges, but these privileges are denied to their less-favoured sisters. Here is a clear opportunity for the strong to assist in bearing the burdens of the weak. No one else can understand the problems of women as can women themselves. It is the educated women who must take the lead in bringing relief to those who are unfortunate. And that these women are rising to their opportunity is an occasion for the deepest satisfaction.

But even among the educated classes there is still a prejudice against the advance of women. Long-established custom is as strong a fetter as ignorance and economic necessity. As a matter of fact many working women enjoy more real freedom than do the daughters of the wealthy. There seems to be a real fear of the consequences should women attain to a position of equality with men. The scriptures are invoked, and the cold hand of the dead past is thrust into the living present. Temporarily perhaps the movement may be stayed. But not for long. The demand for equality for women is too right to be denied. The forces of progress are moving. They are gathering momentum and they will not be stopped. Our women shall receive their heritage.

BRITAIN'S NEW LABOUR MINISTER.

Margaret Grace Bondfield, Minister of Labour in the new British Labour Government, is a pioneer, writes Mr. T. J. C. Marvin in the American press. She was the first woman delegate ever to appear at a Trade Union Congress; she was the first woman elected to serve on a Trade Union Executive Committee; she was the first woman to be chairman of Trade Union Executive Committee; she was the first woman ever to be a member of a British Government, as Under-Secretary of Labour in the first MacDonald Ministry. Now she is the first woman to attain Cabinet rank and to be a member of the King's Most Honorable Privy Council, which carries with it the prefix "Right Honorable" and the suffix "P. C."—an honour which may last for the lifetime of the recipient, unless the present King or a succeeding King should cancel the appointment.

Miss Bondfield is a hard worker and such honours as she has received she has earned. Her position in Parliament and in British public life is a great one. As a Minister of the Crown she will sit in the House of Commons on the Government bench, where she will be required from time to time to answer such questions as are put to her concerning her Ministry. Socially she ranks midway down the table of precedence as a Privy Councillor in order of seniority of appointment. She emerges as a great public figure who may have the ear of the King on matters of state. Such a record any woman in any country might well be proud of; but in England, where women have not yet won the degree of freedom they have in America, her success is much greater. In a sense her high appointments are the tribute which Miss Bondfield pays to herself, for she has earned them—Britain still expects that every man and every woman shall do his or her duty, and on that basis Britain is prepared to reward them.

AN EXCEPTIONAL WOMAN.

Born at Chard, in Somerset, Miss Bondfield is now 56. She is small in physique, with masses of dark hair shot with gray. Her eyes are dark and bright and she carries her head alertly. Around her lips even when they are compressed, there is always a humorous curl, and her broad forehead is suggestive of the intelligence that lies behind it. Alertness, keen perception and a sharp vivacity are the traits which most mark her out as an exceptional woman.

If Miss Bondfield is a hard thinker no one can listen to her speeches without being struck by their quality of common sense. They are singularly free from hyperbole; they deal always with the actualities of a given situation. She is widely read and the knowledge she has thus amassed is not the stale stereotyped knowledge of the so-called intelligentsia, but knowledge put to work to produce thoughts that have the staying power of conviction. Miss Bondfield's speeches are not without the fire of passion, for such speeches never hit their mark. Her faith, her belief in the rights and duties of the worker, whether man or woman, are her passionate convictions, but tempered one feels, with logic.

EARLY LIFE.

Miss Bondfield may be said to have begun her career in her teens working in a store. As early as that she came to know the horrors of unemployment. Unless the workers organized, she thought, there would be no hope for them. But there was nothing in those days remotely resembling a workers' organization for women. Miss Bondfield went to London.

She was 20 when she arrived in the metropolis. After many weary weeks of searching for work she at last found employment in an East End dry goods store. Then began her life's work for the labour movement. Her faculty for organization immediately found full play in spreading propaganda for the Shop Assistants' Union, of which body she rapidly became the mainstay.

In the suffrage movement Miss Bondfield was an energetic and indefatigable worker. But she eschewed the militant wing of that famous fight of the past. Votes for women appealed to her as an inherent right of woman as a citizen but it was but a smaller part of the emancipation of women.

IN THE LABOUR PARTY.

At about this time, in order to further the emancipation of women, she joined the Independent Labour party, the parent of Parliamentary Labour party now in power. The value of her work was early recognized and she became a member of its executive Committee, in which position she remained until her trade union work became too heavy. Soon after the war she was sent as a member of the British delegation to the International Conference at Berne. In the same year she attended the French Trade Union Congress and went to Washington as labour adviser to the League of Nations Labour Convention. In 1920 she again came to America to attend the congress of the American Federation of Labour.

It was not until the following year, 1921, that she first stood for Parliament. She obtained 7,000 votes, but failed of election. In the election of 1923 she won a seat with a majority of some 4,000 votes and sat as member for Northampton and as Under-Secretary of Labour—the first woman ever to be in the Government—during Mr. MacDonald's short-lived Ministry. In 1924 she failed of election, but was elected in 1926 on a by-election in succession to Sir Patrick Hastings. Thus her new Parliamentary triumph marks the zenith of her political career.—The Pioneer, Allahabad.

HINDU WOMEN'S RESCUE HOME.

The inaugural gathering of the Hindu Women's Rescue Home (Shradhanand Anath Mahilashram) was held on the 26th evening at the Theosophical Society's Hall, French Bridge, Sir Purshottamdas Thakurdas, presiding.

Mr. M. R. Jayakar, the President of the Society, in his opening remarks, observed that though the Ashram had been in existence for nearly three years this was their first public appearance, the reason for the delay being the anxiety of the promoters not to come before the public until they had justified their existence. There was nothing controversial as regards the nature of their work which would make anybody shy, nor was there anything communal in it. They were only carrying on a little philanthropic work. It might be that very often its inmates happened to be Hindus, but necessarily the conditions in Bombay at present were so peculiar that it was generally Hindu women, who found themselves stranded owing to various causes. The Society was trying to send emissaries and agents to all parts of this city, especially to those places where these women were likely to be stranded and bring them to the Ashram. And for this noble work the Society required the goodwill and help of the public of Bombay.

NEED OF SUCH AN INSTITUTION.

Dealing with the work of the Institution, Mr. Jayakar said that it was giving shelter to a large number of helpless women and children. If this institution did not exist all these women and children would have found their way to institutions maintained by rival religions. The speaker had to admit shamefully, once during the discussion of the Children's Protection Act in the Bombay Legislative Council in 1924, that there was no "Hindu Home" where stranded Hindu children could be sent. This showed to him the extreme necessity of maintaining such an institution in this city and he also wanted the public of Bombay to realise that it was their duty to see that some provision was made to the little children and women cast away in the streets of this city.

Proceeding Mr. Jayakar said that during the past 40 years seven lakhs of Hindus had strayed away to Christianity while the number converted to Mahomedanism was not available, as most of them were secret conversions. These only showed how necessary it was that the Hindu should take a practical view of his religion and realise his obligation to his community. It was the right and duty of every Hindu to see that not a single man, woman or child was decoyed out of the Hindu fold by temptations like fraud or deception, unless they were connected with a psychological change of faith. If any member of the Hindu community is decoyed away by causes of hunger or deception, the Hindus had every right to protest against it.

In conclusion Mr. Jaykar once more appealed to the public of Bombay to realise and appreciate the little effort that the Society was making to give shelter to the fallen women of their community.

Seth Shivalal Govindlal Motilal, then proposed Sir Purshottamas Thakardas to the chair which was seconded by Mr. B. G. Kher.

The Secretary then read the report of the work done by the Society during the past year which among other things stated :—

REPORT OF THE WORK.

"The Society owes its existence to the inspiration derived from the late Lala Lajpat Rai. In the public meeting held on the 9th January, 1927, to mourn the loss of the late Swami Shradhanand, the Hindus of Bombay resolved to perpetuate the sacred memory of the late Swamiji by starting a Rescue Home in Bombay. Large organisations have been started by the followers of other religions in this City for the rescue, protection and upbringing of their co-religionists. It was only the Hindu community that had no such institution. The above resolution gave an impetus to the idea and after a few months of incessant efforts, the Hindu Women's Rescue Home Society was registered on the 22nd December 1927, with the following main objects :—

(a) To provide shelter and render assistance to Hindu women in distress without any distinction of class or caste ;

(b) To establish, conduct and carry on at Bombay or at any other place or places Rescue Homes, Night Shelters and other refuges for poor and distressed Hindu women and generally to promote the welfare of poor and destitute Hindu Women and their children and relief of their distress by Social and Spiritual Agencies ;

(c) To maintain such women and provide them as part of their maintenance with all necessary and proper clothing, board, lodging, medicine and surgical attendance, appliances and comforts ;

To impart to such women as part of their education moral and religious instruction of the Hindu Faith ;

As its first activity, the Society started a Rescue Home at Matunga and named it after Swami Shradhanand "Shradhanand Anath Mahilashram."

The Ashram began its work with 4 women and 4 children rescued by the Hindu Sabha, Matanga. It gave shelter to 64 women, 40 children and infants during the period of seventeen months since its existence. The inmates comprise many castes including the untouchables."

ASSISTANCE TO FALLEN WOMEN.

"We are sure that but for the timely assistance rendered by the Ashram, almost all these women and children would have been lost to society. It is the common experience of social workers that unprotected Hindu women become daily the victims of fraud and deception in the vast cosmopolitan City. Some of the Hindu women rescued by the Society would have been forced to live an immoral life till death, had not the Society come to their rescue in the nick of time and helped them to tread the right path. Some women are led astray owing to ignorance, but as soon as they realise the mistake they have committed, they repent and earnestly desire to be purged of their sin. Such women although repentant are outcast by their community, despised by their relatives, and humiliated now and then by their acquaintances. It is at this particular moment that the urgent necessity of an institution such as the present is felt. Several pitiable cases of women who had lapsed into degradation, but were subsequently raised to a respectable life, are contained in the records of the Society."

The Ashram mostly serves the purpose of a temporary shelter immediately the woman is rescued from her degraded circumstances, forced or otherwise. In many cases, the women have been sent back to their husbands; in others to their parents or lawful guardians. Some are married and are leading a happy life."

The financial position of the Society is anything but satisfactory. It is hoped that it will improve as the Hindu public comes to know of its existence, need and work, and shows its practical sympathy by making liberal donations to it."

MR. NATARAJAN'S SPEECH.

Mr. K. Natarajan, addressing the audience said that the Hindu Society had not so far had an organisation of its own to provide for the protection of its stranded and fallen women and children. The old caste system, he thought, was in several ways a system, not only for co-operative action but also for taking care of the poor, feeble and fallen of each community. This system had now more or less broken down and the result was that it was no longer doing the protective and benevolent work that was adequately discharged in the days gone-by and consequently there was an increasing number of children and women in the Hindu community who were in need of help at critical times. An institution of this kind was therefore a long-felt necessity.

Mr. Natarajan then referred to the Orphanage and Foundling Home started by late Lalshankar Umayashankar at Pandharpur about 40 or 50 years ago which was doing very good work in the direction of offering shelter to destitute women and children.

HINDUISM AND WOMEN.

Proceeding Mr. Natarajan said that he had visited the Mahilashram a few days back, and some of the visitors who preceded him thought it necessary to say that this Home was not founded by motives of aggressive communalism. The speaker however, at the same time thought that an institution of this kind could be conducted only under the stimulus of religious principles. As regards the policy of the Society of restoring the stranded women and children as far as possible to their parents or relations, the speaker thought it to be the best kind of rescue work that could be done. He however deplored that the present Hindu community had not yet realised the importance of taking a humane and broad view of the errors of women. "We have set up a very high and almost impossible standard of woman's purity," continued Mr. Natarajan, "and I must say to the credit of the Hindu community that that high and impossible standard has been maintained by thousands and millions of Hindu women." There were many things in Hinduism which he had disapproved and discarded but still he was proud of saying that he was a Hindu. Even though he found Hinduism to be honey-combed with so many heart-rending superstitions and beliefs, the one thing in that religion that struck him most was the "most remarkable greatness of the Hindu woman." It was this purity and morality of the womenhood that made several of them stick fast to the Hindu religion, though several other things in the same faith repelled them. He was therefore very glad that leaders like Messrs. Jayakar and Bansilal Motilal had undertaken the rescue work of the fallen women of that community and he thought it to be the duty of every one professing that faith to hold out a helping hand at the critical moment which would save several lives.

NEED OF HELP.

Swami Viswanand said that the women who were the victims of social tyranny and found themselves stranded in the world, needed a light to lead them out of the darkness which enveloped them and this rescue home proved such a light. Hence it was that the movement should be backed up by the goodwill of each and every Hindu.

Mrs. Yashodabai Bhatt, Pandit Anand Priya, Dr. Savarkar and Mavji Govindji Seth also addressed the gathering.

SIR PURUSHOTAMDAS'S APPEAL.

Sir Purushotamdas Thakuradas in appreciating the quiet work which had been done by the Society under the leadership of Mr. Jayakar, assured them of his fullest co-operation and support in such a noble movement in the cause of the fallen among the Hindu Women. He agreed with Mr. Kher when he said that this institution, if it was late at all, was late at least by 30 to 40 years. To his mind it was the lucky coincidence that Mr. Jayakar should have been in the Council when the Leader of the House taunted him with the question "What foundling Home have you got here for Hindus?" that pricked Mr. Jayakar, and perhaps that might be after all at the bottom of the founding of the present institution. "But the humiliation was Mr. Jayakar's in 1924," continued Sir Purushotamdas, "to-day it is yours and mine that the Home is not yet on the sound basis and financial condition as it should be." He only hoped that as a result of this meeting all Hindus would realise their duty towards the weak, the poor and the fallen among them.

NOTHING COMMUNAL.

Regarding the communal aspect of the question, he affirmed that there was nothing communal in it. Even if there was any, they were only following the good lead given to them by the other communities, because the Mahomedans, the Christians and the Parsis had similar Homes of their own. Proceeding Sir Purushotamdas said that it was not necessary for Hinduism to be aggressive in communalism and he thought that it would be a very bad day indeed for Hinduism when it became aggressive. What they have got to do was only to wake up, look round them and prevent anybody from doing harm to Hindus. Every community should have its religious freedom but what he objected to was the encroachment of one community upon another under any guise whatsoever, and in such a case they had every right to protest. "I will always stand by any community which complains of encroachment by other communities," declared Sir Purushotamdas. "Therefore, whenever I get proofs of Mahomedans encroaching upon the ordinary rights of citizenship of helpless Hindus I do complain that it is unjustified and I do say that it shall not be allowed as long as I can help it. It becomes a crime before civilisation when helpless girls and women are being persecuted under the guise of religion. Any decent Mahomedan would resent such an act. It is a crime against God. Therefore what is proposed to be done by this Society is the most angelical and sacred of all benevolent works." And Sir Purushotamdas hoped that it would appeal to the minds of all charitably-minded Hindus and that they would, in future, direct a small portion of those abundant charities that were being poured into places of pilgrimage, etc., to flow into this new channel.

With a hearty vote of thanks to the President, the proceedings came to a conclusion.

STUDENTS IN AMERICAN UNIVERSITIES.

In the course of an interesting article on "Student Migration To America" Mr. J. M. Kumarappa writes in the Bombay Chronicle :—

Among the universities which allure foreign students, Columbia of New York City stands foremost. With its enrolment of 895 students from over fifty nations, it more than doubled the foreign student registration of its nearest rival, Harvard, which had on its roll 380 foreign students. The University of California, with its door facing the Orient, stands only third in point of overseas student attendance. Other seats of learning with more than 200 foreign students enrolled are Chicago University and the universities of Washington, Michigan and Pennsylvania. The Teachers College of Columbia University is growing increasingly popular; it has, of course, come to be recognized as the largest and the most progressive institution of its kind in the world. In 1928 there were as many as 349 students representing 54 foreign countries. During the last five academic years, 1,667 students, representing 72 different lands, have attended the Teachers College of Columbia. These figures do not include, it must be noted, the students from foreign lands enrolled during the summer, for the method of Summer Session Registration does not permit a segregation of those taking work in Teachers College.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF STUDENT MIGRATION TO AMERICA.

The importance of this student migration from Europe and Asia to the United States is, even now, too little recognized. The modern world is a world of democracy; it is quite obvious that cultures can be of the greatest social value only as they are shared by the masses of the people. With the rapid trend towards democracy in different parts of the world, it is natural that the educational processes necessary for a democracy should receive the serious consideration of thinking people everywhere. In view of the present world situation, it is clear that the foreign students of education of to-day have a far more significant role to play in the interchange of cultural achievement than the foreign students of yesterday. During the last generation the American students who went to Germany in quest of knowledge, did much to perfect the technique and organization of higher education in the United States. They acquired the impetus which has resulted in making the study of the process of education a scientific discipline, and now within a generation America has made astounding progress in developing a system of education best suited to the realization of her national ideals.

Admitting all of the defects, which are many, and all of the unsettled problems, which are not any less, the educational system of America is the outstanding achievement for disseminating among the masses of the country a culture which has hitherto been the privilege of the few. The foreign student of education in the United States is, therefore, definitely and consciously interested in studying the entire technique of a democratic education, in making inquiry into the effects of this education on the growth of democracy and the development of industry in America, and in acquiring or adopting such of the educational procedures as may be applicable with necessary modifications to other social groups. We are, indeed, witnessing a cultural co-operation in this generation which is bound to have a far-reaching influence on the spread of democracy. The culture of the past generation was for the few and naturally, therefore, the influence of such cultural interchange was very limited. But now with the world-wide awakening of the proletariat, the foreign student is destined to play a role far greater in its influence and far more significant in its effect upon the culture of the masses. Such cultural interchange through the medium of the foreign student is sure to promote friendliness among the nations and quicken social progress among the peoples of the world.

THE WEST AND EASTERN CHRISTIANS.

Mr. BASIL MATHEWS, writes in the July number of The Young Men of India :—In the next room to mine up in the roof of the house where I work in that world-metropolis of international life, Geneva, Switzerland, is an Indian colleague known in all the continents of the world—Dr. S. K. Datta. When his stalwart figure comes striding into my room, his whole personality radiates challenging thought. The stimulating spirit of comradeship that shines through his eyes, the fighting passion for justice in the set of his jaw, the eagle nose, the eager lips and decisive gestures, all reveal the born leader of men.

Nearly twenty years ago, in our little home in a suburb of London, I led my first Study Circle on Dr. Datta's first book. It was called The Desire of India. Since then, as a National Secretary of the Y.M.C.A. in India; as a foremost leader in the World Student Christian Federation; as a Commissioner examining the condition of Indians in the Fiji Islands in the Pacific Ocean; as a distinguished member of the National Assembly of India, and now leading the World's Alliance of Young Men's Christian Associations in its efforts to Christianize race relationship, Dr. Datta has given decades of service to interpret to the West the Christian Way of Life as seen through Eastern eyes.

To-day, talking with us in a group meeting, his strong, virile face lighted with enthusiasm, he opens up plans for gathering from the areas of the world where inter-racial frictions develop, the fundamental truth as to their causes and for developing a literature that shall reveal to the world the fundamental causes of our antagonisms and some picture of the essential contribution of each race to the world's life. The group to which he is talking contains American, German, French, Swiss, Japanese, Dutch and British.

Dr. Datta, in whom the burning flame of Indian Nationalism is kept white and strong by his deep devotion to Christ, stands in my experience as one of a growing group of leaders coming out of the Orient to bring to us Western Christians a deeper truth and a fuller vision than we now possess; a more spacious atmosphere, a way of handling things, a richer spirit of fellowship and of devotion.

In the corridors of these same offices in Geneva a few weeks ago a man walked, smaller built than Dr. Datta, dressed in a long blue silk gown. He was Dr. David Yui of China.

We sat, men of eight or nine nations round a table under his chairmanship. We worked together on plans by which some of the outstanding Christian Chinese younger leadership may come to America, Britain and Europe to bring fresh vision, and young men—American, European and British—carry their comradeship to the East. Dr. Yui, with his quiet masterly grasp on reality, his swift perception of new ways through ancient and tangled problems, is in my judgment, one of the half-dozen greatest leaders of youth in these tormenting and thrilling days.

On the ridge of the Mount of Olives at Easter this year some two hundred of us from just fifty nations were held breathless under David Yui's spell as he outlined the perplexities and marvellous possibilities lying before his country and the Christian Way.

"I am a Christian; I am a Nationalist; and I am an Internationalist," he cried, "and I find no contradiction between the three."

A lovely and very different figure from the masculine, sturdy, organizing Christian genius of a Dr. Datta or a David Yui stood on that same platform at Jerusalem in the personality of Miss Tilak, daughter of India's most famous Christian poet. Miss Tilak, draped in a brown silk sari, called that gathering of aggressive Western Christian leaders back to the fundamental fact that all progress and all good life between peoples go back at last to the simplicities of sincere, living Christian relationships between individuals. A hush fell on us, a conviction that here was pure spiritual leadership, when, again and again, Miss Tilak intervened in the discussion. It was clear that here once more was an exquisite illustration of the Indian spirit calling the West with its passion for external activity back to the simple, eternal roots of life.

Her presence, indeed, brought back to many minds the loveliness of her late father's poetry. In those verses in which an Indian Christian soul expresses its vision of God were notes that few Western spirits could strike.

A note is struck in those lines such as the East alone sounds in its purity. We do not often hear it in New York, London or Berlin. Yet we respond to it. A most unexpected and astonishing example has recently been given by Western boys.

In preparation for the World Y.M.C.A. Conference at Helsingfors, Finland, boys in forty countries were asked who were their greatest heroes. It was with a delightful shock of surprise that we received from boys in several European countries—Germany, Holland, Switzerland, Sweden, etc.—the name of Sadhu Sundar Singh. Here is a man who, in the flowing toga, with a short black beard, tells a remarkable, unaffected message with the fire of a prophet and the power of an apostle. He is gentle. He is not an aviator, an adventurous explorer, a warrior, or a pugilist. Yet he is the hero of boys.

Why? Surely, because Western boys who saw him on his journeys through America, Britain and Europe, saw that he is indeed an aviator, flying to clear heights of vision with daring intrepidity; that he is an explorer of unseen continents; that he simply does not know what either fear or self-seeking is.

It is, then, no exaggeration to say that in eight or ten countries in Europe, in Britain and in North America, there are a total of scores of thousands of men and women, boys and girls, who have received a fresh sense of the joy, simplicity and realities of the Living Christ through the Sadhu.

It would at once be easy to make a simple catalogue longer than this whole article should be of the names of the living men and women who are, in this way, bringing new light from the East to the West on the Christian Way. We could tell the stories of Mr. T. Z. Koo, who has thrilled the spirit of many thousands of students in North America and elsewhere with his crystal-clear vision of the place of Christ in the life of modern youth; Mr. Ayusawa of Japan, who, in the International Labour Office at Geneva, works on the problem of a Christian Way of Life in industry; Mr. K. T. Paul of India, whose book, The British Connection with India, is itself the shining example of the Christian handling of an embittered situation; or a Miss Tseng of China, the product of a thousand years of Confucian philosophy and the creator of one of the world's most wonderful colleges for girls, breaking this casket of precious incense at the feet of Christ.

It is not too much, then, to say that to-day wise men and women from the East are like the Magi of old bringing riches beyond valuation to the cradle of Christ and light from the East into the noisy clamour of the West. One of the greatest men I have ever met, Dr. Inazo Nitobe of Japan, once said to me—"You in the West have knowledge; perhaps we of the East can add to it—wisdom."

It is by such a blend of truth that we shall in comradeship discover a solution of the tangled and bitter problem of the world to-day.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Geneva Labour Conference:—At the International Labour Conference, states a Reuter's message, Mr. N. M. Joshi spoke of the growing dissatisfaction among Asiatic workers with regard to the slow progress at Geneva. He said that the influence of Moscow, differing from that of Geneva in ideals and methods, was strongly appealing to workers in the Far East by the grandeur of its promise. Unfortunately, Geneva's promise of just and humane conditions was still far off. The ideal slowness of evolutionary method makes revolution attractive to workers in Asia and Africa who are unwilling to wait for many decades to achieve what European workers have achieved in a century. His faith in the League's ideals and methods led him to urge a reinforcement of the efforts to establish just and humane conditions with the shortest possible delay. The International Labour Conference Committee on Forced Labour rejected by 16 votes to 13, the proposal to ask Governments who are members of the League whether they would apply to forced labour the conditions laid down by the Washington. In an address at the International Labour Conference, Sir Atul Chatterjee suggested that the agenda of the Conference should be abbreviated in order more greatly to help the formation of public opinion.

A Notable Widow Marriage:—Under the auspices of the Hindu Widow Reform League, Lucknow, Shrimati Lakshmi Devi, widowed sister of Dr. M. S. Varma (Bhatnagar), Chief Medical Officer, Hindu University, Benares, was married to Babu Bankey Behari Varma (Saksena Dusre) of Moradabad (at present Delhi) on Saturday the 13th July, 1929. The moral courage of the parties is admirable as it is a case of double social reform in the Kayastha community.

The School-Leaving Age:—A message from London says:—The Education Minister Sir O. Trevelyan announced that Government had carefully considered the most suitable date for raising the school leaving age of children to 15. After weighing all circumstances they had decided to prepare necessary legislation to raise the school age as from April 1st, 1931. He was at once asking representatives of the London local education authorities and professional bodies to meet him with a view to consultation and co-operation.

Indian Honoured in Japan:—Mr. S. O. Das, President of the Indian Club, Kobe and Agent of Messrs. Nippon Trading Company, Calcutta, was received in audience by His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Japan, on the occasion of His Majesty's recent official visit to Kobe on June 1929. Such an honour has never been conferred on any Indian by a Ruling Sovereign of Japan.

The Age of Consent:—The Hitaoda throws further light on the recommendations of the Joshi Committee. That the Age of Consent within marital relation be raised to 15 years, that sexual intercourse by husband with his wife below 15 years be made an offence under the Penal Code, dealing with offences relating to marriages, that said offence be called "Marital Misbehaviour," that the age of consent for protection of girls against rape by a person who is not her husband be raised to 18 years that in order to deal most effectively with the evils of early marriage and early consummation, a law be enacted fixing the minimum age of marriage of girls at 14 years, that subject to any provision of personal law for the time being in force, validity of marriage performed in contravention of marriage law be left unaffected, that an accurate marriage register be kept by the administrative department of Government containing the details of marriage including the ages of the couple and that it be made obligatory by law on the parties and guardians of the parties to marriage, either personally or authorised agents to report to a proper authority, that the prescribed authority be required to maintain a register of births within a given area under their control and to prosecute persons who omit to send the report within a prescribed period, that offence of marital misbehaviour do remain bailable and non-cognisable as in the case of rape by husband at present, that the offence be made punishable with (a) imprisonment of either description for ten years and fine when the wife is under 12 years of age, and (b) imprisonment of either description which may attend to one year or with fine or both when the wife is between 12 and 15 years of age, that women police be employed where available to aid in the investigation of sexual offences and that women willing to serve as jurors and assessors be empanelled and in the trial of cases of rape or of marital misbehaviour the law be amended so that the suit by the husband for custody of wife or for restitution of conjugal rights shall not lie with him where the girl is below 15 years, that effective steps be taken to spread general education among men and women and measures be adopted to give wide publicity to marriage and consent laws.

The Hindu Deen Daya Sangh:—The Hindu Deen Daya Sangh, Bombay, has been helping the Hindus in distress for the last five years. It is proposed to open a separate department of this society for the benefit of women, especially widows of the Hindu community. Those ladies who may be willing to work as honorary workers are requested to communicate with or see personally the undersigned. Co-operation of Non-Hindu ladies also will be appreciated. Annapurnabai Karkhanis, Deen Daya Sangh Office, Kalachowki Road, Ohinchpokli, Bombay 12.

LIFE INSURANCE TRUST PLAN

THE outright payment of the Insurance money to the widow or children in one lump sum is a great mistake. To apply a real test you would only ask yourself how your wife would invest such a sum NOW without any help whatever from you. The woman who has been "All the Wife and Mother" is ill-equipped to invest and safeguard funds designed to her family's protection for many years.

Therefore take advantage of

OUR INVESTMENT TRUST PLAN.

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

NOTES.

The Hooligan Problem In Bombay:—Mr. P. A. Kelly is by general consent one of the ablest Commissioners of Police that Bombay has had. During his regime, crime in the city, as he told the Riots Enquiry Committee, has decreased by 30 per cent. during the last five years. These years have, on the one hand, been years of exceptional stress and strain, while, on the other, the Police force owing to reasons of economy has had to be cut down to the bare minimum. In these circumstances, the decrease in crime is a most creditable achievement reflecting highly on the Commissioner and his staff. It is also the fact that much has been done during Mr. Kelly's time to make the Police and the public feel that they are friends and colleagues in maintaining the public peace. That a Police Commissioner of such distinction should hold what are really antediluvian views about the most enlightened, which is also the most effective, way of dealing with "hooligans", is really distressing. Mr. Kelly told the Committee that most of the "hooligans" of Bombay were ex-convicts. It is part of the duty of the Police to keep such persons under surveillance, but Mr. Kelly seems to think that this is not enough. He wants the law to be strengthened so as to keep these bad characters interned, for a number of years after serving their sentences, in a settlement. Mr. Kelly has no faith in reforming criminals. There must be something radically wrong in the jail system which turns out such a large proportion of confirmed criminals, and the Government of Bombay will do well to institute an enquiry into the subject. To establish and maintain factories for the production of habitual criminals and then to require them to be kept in internment practically all their lives, as the only means of protecting society from them, is a wasteful process, to say the least of it. For our own part, we would attach more importance, both from economical and humanitarian considerations, to the reform of the penal system so as to reduce the production of habitual criminals, than to the further stiffening of it as recommended by the Commissioner. Tsarist methods have notoriously failed to check crime and to drive people to despair is not the best way of making them decent men and women.

The Age of Consent Report:—The Report of the Age of Consent Committee is not yet ready for publication, but Government have thought it desirable to publish a summary of its recommendations. The most important of these are, the raising of the age of consent as against strangers to 18, and as against husband to 15, the creation of a separate offence in the latter case to be known as "marital misbehaviour," and the fixing of the marriage age of girls at 14. The other recommendations relate to the graduation of punishments according to age and circumstances and the protection of girl-wives from a repetition of the offence after the first conviction. The Committee has endeavoured to meet all objections that have been urged, and we are not sure that in doing so, it has not made its scheme extremely complex. It will be necessary when the full report is published, to examine it in detail and try to bring its recommendations within easily workable limits.

Dame Mellicent Fawcett:—Dame Mellicent Fawcett whose death was announced lately was one of the great characters of women's movement. Herself a noble hearted woman, she helped her husband Mr. Henry Fawcett, one of the best English friends India has had in parliament. He lost his sight owing to a tragic hunting accident and Mrs. Fawcett was his constant companion and co-adjutor in all his political and literary activities. She was besides, one of the pioneers in the movement for women's higher education in England and in later years she championed the cause of women's suffrage though she was opposed to the militant aspects which it subsequently developed. Her death breaks one of the links in the chain which bound educated Indians to mid-Victorian Liberalism of which she and her husband were distinguished exponents.

A Doubtful Point:—In our news column this week is the report of a case in which Mr. Justice Pandalai of the Madras High Court would appear to have decided that a Hindu widow who remarries, even though the custom of her caste permits remarriage, forfeits her right to her first husband's property under the Hindu Widow Remarriage Act. That Act was passed in order to validate remarriage in castes in which it was prohibited. All the sections of the Act apply to such castes only, and not to castes in which remarriages are sanctioned by custom. The forfeiture clause was inserted in the Act to conciliate orthodox opposition, and reformers have ever since objected to it as penalising a woman for exercising a legal right. The widow who remarries in accordance with the custom of her caste, if not prevented by such custom from inheriting her husband's property, cannot forfeit it because of the Act. It is a well-established principle of Hindu Law that custom takes precedence of written texts.

The Juhu Tragedy:—The tragic circumstances under which four young promising lives were cut off prematurely at Juhu by relentless nature on Sunday last, cast considerable gloom over the city. It is common for a number of people to flock to Juhu on Sundays and other holidays for the amenities it afforded but it had been the sad fate of the four young Parsis to fall a prey, while bathing, to shifting sands and shoals of which they little suspected. It is appalling to think that, while two of the victims were struggling in the water for full ten or fifteen minutes, human ingenuity could do nothing to save them. No precautionary measures were taken by the public or the authorities to warn people off the dangerous spots, although a similar tragedy which involved two lives occurred in the identical place some three years ago. Many and varied are the suggestions put forward in the press to prevent the repetition of such fatal occurrences. Our lack of self-reliance is mainly responsible for invoking the authorities to supply our smallest needs. We hope the public will not wait for them to give effect to the suggestions but will do its bit immediately by providing ropes, buoys and other life-saving appliances and making them available in times of emergency. Within a few days this week, there have been two more swimming fatalities, one at Bassein and the other at Chaupathi. Since the above was written there has been an announcement in the press of a gift of life-belts and life-buoys, made by a philanthropic gentleman whose example will, we trust, inspire others to emulate.

Baby and Health Week Report:—It is in vain one scans the National Baby and Health Week Committee's report for the year 1929 to find if the annual exhibitions and Baby shows have brought about a reduction in infant mortality. That is the crucial test of the Committee's work. In our own belief these exhibitions besides providing excitement for a few days and bringing into limelight a few individuals and officials, have done next to nothing by way of ameliorating the condition of mothers and children in the city. Those babies who have been up to the mark have been so in spite of the efforts of the Bombay Welfare Week organisers and not because of them. Babies in Indian families take the first place in the affection of their parents. If they are not better cared for, it is because the people have not the means to do so. Cinema shows and radio talks fail to impress if they are not followed up with practical work. As in the case of many organisations run under Government auspices we find the Baby and Health Week organisation lacking in human contact.

Primary Education in the Punjab:—A lively discussion ensued some time ago on the resolution moved by a member in the Punjab Legislative Council recommending the appointment of a committee to suggest means for the introduction of compulsory primary education in the province. The Director of Public Instruction whose zeal to promote education in the Punjab has been as great as of any member in the Punjab Council, rightly pointed out the rapid advance made by primary education in the province during the last six years. There has been a marked progress in the number of primary schools and students attending them and also in the number of trained teachers. As compared with Bombay and other provinces, the Punjab easily leads in the matter of primary education in India and bids fair to introduce compulsion at an early period if the progress is to be kept up. Some of the objections raised by Sir George Anderson against the introduction of compulsion will not bear close scrutiny. Our educational enthusiasts are apt to overlook the importance of girls' education in a scheme of compulsion and for that very reason we welcome the stress laid by the Director on its necessity and development. It is however a mistake to suppose that the education of girls will in any way hamper or be at the expense of that of boys. While we entirely agree with Mr. Calvert that without the spread of education a healthy and intelligent peasantry is impossible, we cannot accept his recommendation that the land revenue should be doubled to enable district boards to raise money for compulsory education. The Minister of Education convinced the Council that the Government was anxious to speed up education and accepted the resolution to appoint a special committee.

Unequal Marriages:—In response to a young man from Sholapur who, appalled by the prevalence of unequal marriages in his community, asks Mahatma Gandhi whether he and other youths can offer Satyagraha for their prevention, Mahatmaji concludes that "the rule about not giving in marriage any girl below twenty and against her will should be rigorously enforced"—or in other words the marriage age should be raised to twenty. Before arriving at this conclusion he has a few remarks on what are the qualities essential in a Satyagrahi which, we believe, are in a modified way applicable to the social reformer. He writes:—"A Satyagrahi must never forget the distinction between evil and the evil-doer. He must not harbour illwill or bitterness against the latter. He may not even employ needlessly offensive language against the evil person, however unrelieved his evil might be. For it should be an article of faith with every Satyagrahi that there is none so fallen in this world but can be converted by love. Therefore a person who claims to be a Satyagrahi always tries by close and prayerful self-introspection and self-analysis to find out whether he is not himself completely free from the taint of anger, illwill and such other human infirmities, whether he is not himself capable of those very evils against which he is out to lead a crusade. A Satyagrahi, for instance, must first mobilise public opinion against the evil which he is out to eradicate, by means of a wide and intensive agitation." Whilst it is true that the reformer should be free from the evils which he attacks, it is too great a demand to expect him to be free from anger. History teems with instances of the explosive type of reformers but it has given us only one instance of the ideal here laid down by Mahatmaji. The latter part of his advice in fact, although he may not have meant it, tends to create a feeling not only against the evil of unequal marriages but also against the old men who indulge in it.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, AUGUST 10, 1929.

THE FUTURE OF CHRISTIAN MISSIONS.

Christian Missions from Europe and America represent the best type of contact between the West and the East. The Missionaries, as a class, are men of high ideals and pure character. They do not come here in search of material gain or impelled by love of political power. Of most of them, it may be said that if they had remained in their own countries and devoted themselves to making careers, they would have succeeded without much difficulty. In this country apart from their central purpose of making converts, they have done admirable work in their schools and colleges, hospitals and other agencies of social service. They have inspired Indians to social work and shown them how to do it. Above all, they have spread far and wide a knowledge of the life and teachings of Jesus Christ. All this they have done, but as they have done it more as a means to an end and not an end in itself, both they themselves as well as educated Indians feel no satisfaction in it. If the Missionaries had come here frankly as educationists, doctors and social workers without the ulterior purpose of proselytising, Indians would have appreciated their work without limit, and they too would have no reason to doubt its efficacy. They would, indeed, have become without effort, leaders of modern India like Hume, Wedderburn, Dr. Beasant and C. F. Andrews. Their purpose of conversion, however, has put them and Indians in a false position towards each other. Because of this, their philanthropic activities have the character of interested propaganda and are distrusted, as all propaganda is, even by those who benefit by them. Christian Missions have thus come to be regarded as agencies of religious exploitation just as there are agencies for political and commercial exploitation. But while the foreign administrator and investor do not profess to be superior to the Indian in religion and morals the Missionary lays his axe at the root of Indian culture and civilisation very much like the Bolshevik at the root of the culture and civilisation of the West. The feeling of the Indian to Missions has a close parallel in the feeling of Europeans and Americans to Soviet propaganda. Lest we be suspected of exaggerating, we quote from the first letter which we published in reply to "Perplexed" from Bishop Badley.

While it is wrong to say that Christian missionaries are making a "dead-set" against Hinduisim, it is true that they are and, in keeping with Christ's teaching and commands, must be opposed to much that Hinduisim includes within its practices and beliefs. Idolatory, in all its forms and degrees; the doctrine of Karma; the belief in transmigration of souls; Caste, in all its ramifications; Untouchability; Cow worship, and in any religious sense, the "protection" of the cow; the system of the priesthood as it operates at Benares, Brindaban, Muttra and elsewhere; the practice of having Devadasis; Suttee, with whatever motives it may be accompanied; Child marriage; Enforced widowhood; the entire Pardah system; mendicancy, with its religious basis, resulting in the creation of millions of sadhus and faquirs; and the system of pilgrimages as now in vogue. I am not concerned, for the moment, as to whether Christianity's opposition to these things is right or wrong. The point is that the extent to which Hinduism holds these beliefs and engages in these practices is the extent to which Christian missionaries must be opposed to Hinduism.

Many Hindus have themselves been making a dead-set at some of the things mentioned by the Bishop such as caste, the custom of devadasis, suttee, child marriage, enforced widowhood, untouchability, and the purdah. The reform of the priesthood and the regulation of religious mendicancy are also desirable objects which are being attended to by Hindu reformers. The doctrine of Karma and the belief in the transmigration of souls stand on a different footing. Idol worship is not the highest form of worship, but if the alternative is, as we are afraid it often is, money worship, we should hesitate to make a dead-set at it. Our point, however, is the dead-set of the Christian Missionary against social customs which need reform, unlike the efforts of the Indian reformer, takes the form of an attempt to uproot the whole social and religious system and to plant in its place an alien system. The Bishop's militant declaration invites the counter-question, Are there no un-Christian practices in the West, no prostitution, no class conflicts, no wage-slavery, no colour question nearer home to which the missionary can turn his attention?

When we turn from this self-confident attitude to that of Mr. J. S. Hoyland in his article in the Nineteenth Century, we pass into a wholly different atmosphere. Humility, willingness to learn and to share, and love, he insists, are the qualities most helpful to the Missionary. He is convinced that the West has not rightly understood and applied Christ's teachings to society and the state. He wants Indian co-operation in the task and he thinks Indians have some special gifts for it. Christianity as he sees it is by no means a challenge especially to Hindu civilization but it is a challenge as much, if not more, to Western civilization. Let us work together, he says to the Indian, to evolve a civilization which will be greater than any yet evolved by the East or the West. Few Indians will decline the hand so offered. We may say in passing that Indians are quite able and do distinguish between the religion of Christ and Western Civilization. What is more, they do not look on the whole of Western Civilization as a thing of little worth. They recognise and wish to co-operate in the splendid achievements of Western Civilization in eliminating the barriers to international intercourse, in bringing relief to suffering humanity and in introducing the reign of law in the government of nations. The parts of Western Civilization they dislike precisely are those which are opposed to the teachings of Christ. The Christian Missionary, therefore, need not sit in sackcloth and ashes to earn the goodwill of the Indian. Modern Civilization is in many respects superior to the old Indian civilizations which have to learn much from it. Indian Civilization likewise has many merits which the West does not recognise at present but which a better mutual understanding will help it to appreciate. If the Missionary comes in the spirit so well indicated in Mr. Hoyland's article, he will find a fruitful field for co-operation with Indians. Our answer to the question of "Perflexed", therefore, is "Come back to India by all means but do not think of yourself too much as making a sacrifice for or conferring a favour upon India."

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XXXII. AVIATORS.

(DR. CLIFFORD MANSHARDT, PH.D.).

The air is being conquered. It will be but a few short years until regular air lines are established between the nations and air traffic takes its legitimate place alongside land and water traffic. Day in and day out the experts are at work charting a mail route here, a commercial highway there; a short cut here, a new point of call there. Day in and day out time and distance are being annihilated, and men are coming closer and closer together. The inauguration of regular air mail service carries us far beyond the wildest dreams of our fathers. By day and by night, through sunshine and through rain, through heat and through cold, giant airplanes whiz their way bearing the nations' tidings. The devotion and heroism of the air mail flyer is a chapter almost unparalleled in the history of public service. To those who have made the great sacrifice we pay our silent tribute. For those who are carrying on in line of duty we raise our prayer.

Slowly but steadily, the lines of commercial aviation are being extended. Numerous cities throughout the world have installed airports, and every city planning scheme has within it suitable provisions for aviation. Within the next few years passenger and express planes will be operating between many centres, and more and more young men will be entering the profession of commercial aviation. A new set of transportation problems will develop, problems calling for a high type of statesmanship. The development of aircraft must not be exploited for the benefit of a few, the whole of society must benefit. The time is now at hand when we must "meditate upon these things..... that our profiting may appear to all."

In direct opposition to the essential services of mail and commerce is stunt-flying, which is dangerous and has little justification. A certain amount is required by the military and for purposes of testing, but there is no need for the ordinary aviator to risk his life simply to give a satiated public another thrill. It is being amply demonstrated that the casualties of straight flying can be reduced, but it is very difficult to believe that fool-hardiness will ever justify itself. A public that insists upon such a spectacle is little removed from the public that found its delight in pitting men against wild animals and revelling at the sight of blood. In a world organised upon the basis of brotherhood there dare be no exhibitions that call for the sacrifice of brothers.

The men who have given their lives for the progress of aviation are valiant men indeed. Who is man that he should venture to discover the secrets of the upper air? But what would man be if he should refuse to accept the challenge? The unknown is ever a lure. It sings its siren song and the hearts of men respond. For some it means death, but their spirit lives and is reincarnated in the lives of others. The cause of scientific experimentation knows no defeat. The air will be conquered!

ANGLO-EGYPTIAN TREATY.

Proposals for an Anglo Egyptian settlement have been issued by the Foreign Office. They are embodied in sixteen clauses as follows. (1) British military occupation of Egypt shall be terminated. (2) Alliance shall be established by the consecration of existing friendship. (3) Britain undertakes to support Egypt's application for admission to the League of Nations. (4) In the event of a dispute with a third state involving the risk of rupture with it, the parties will concert together with a view peacefully to settling the dispute in accordance with the League Covenant and any other international obligations. (5) Each undertakes not to adopt in foreign countries an attitude inconsistent with the alliance. (6) Responsibility for the lives and property of foreigners in Egypt devolves on the Egyptian government. (7) Subject to clause 14 in the event of war the contracting parties become allies, Egypt affording Britain all facilities including the use of ports, aerodromes and communication. (8) If the Egyptian army requires foreign instructors they shall be British (9) British forces necessary for protecting the Suez Canal shall remain in certain localities east of longitude 32 east, without prejudice to Egypt's sovereignty (10) Foreign officials engaged by the Egyptian Government shall as a rule be British. (11) Britain undertakes to persuade capital powers to agree to the transfer to mixed tribunals, the jurisdiction of consular courts and the application of Egyptian legislation to foreigners. (12) The contracting parties will be represented by ambassadors in London and Cairo respectively. The British ambassador shall enjoy the highest rank at Cairo (13) the status of Sudan shall remain based on the conventions of 1899, but liberty is reserved to modify them. (14) These proposals shall not prejudice the rights and obligations of the contracting parties under the League of Nations Covenant or the Kellogg pact. (15) Any difference regarding the application or interpretation of these proposals which cannot be settled by direct negotiation shall be dealt with in accordance with the League Covenant. (16) The treaty shall be valid for 25 years.

FELLOWSHIP AND RELIGION.

Prof. P. A. Wadia, M.A., Wilson College, Bombay, in the course of an address to the Bombay International Fellowship Retreat, said:—We have been told that religious experience is the experience of an individual who feels himself to be alone with the divine, that religion in its social aspects has become or tends to become conventional, that the essence of religious experience lies in its originality and spontaneity. The problem of salvation is an essentially individual problem, for no one else can ever face your individual need or leave your personal issues to meet. Others have slightly modified this point of view and they tell us how limited has been the individual's own insight into Truth, how obsessed the individual is by the realization of his own imperfections to think of sharing his experiences with others. We have been reminded of the folly of striving to impart our convictions to others, when we have no guarantee for ourselves of the truth of what we hold—judge not, that ye be not judged. Or yet again, to put it otherwise, a social world where men imitate or oppose one another, where crowds bustle and hurry and the small talk or the exciting events of the passing day fill the mind, is not a world in which the individual can find the life that he is seeking nor is it one in which his own ideals can grow by being shared.

And yet this individualistic interpretation of religious life and experience falls short of an adequate understanding of life at its best. Man is a being that cannot be saved alone, however much his solitude and withdrawal from the world may help him, at times, towards insight and realization. No one liveth unto himself, and no one dieth unto himself. Not even the simplest act of breathing can be regarded as confined in its consequences to the individual; it may react on the lives of our fellow-men for better or for worse; we are bound to our brethren by physical, and infinitely more, by spiritual links that cannot be broken. And if I, as an individual have no guarantee of the worth and preciousness of what I hold to be true, may I not through the co-operative efforts of the group to which I belong, obtain that very guarantee which I lack as an isolated individual? The arrogance which leads to self-deception and which deprives us of our claim to judge need not be confused with the humility which makes us ready to learn and enables us to enrich ourselves by a process of mutual giving and receiving. The varieties of religious experience are endless. The diversity of gifts is as great as the diversity of personalities. And all these differences of approach to the religious problem and all the diversities of individual and corporate religious insight may be necessary to a fully developed religious life and might serve the unity of the spirit, if only they were concerned and used in that spirit of sympathy and humility which Paul described as charity.

Now the Pauline conception of charity is just that form of love and loyalty which marks or should mark a group of men and women who realize that their cause is one and that the spirit which they serve is one. For such a group love, shall we call it loyalty as well, takes the form of a self-surrender that need not seek its own or assert itself aggressively. If the International Fellowship is to be a group of men and women prepared to recognize this visible, and not intangible unity of the spirit, then no one of them will intend to convert others to a new faith, but all will co-operate one with another in more firmly establishing themselves in the faith already recognized by the group. For the best that religion and loyalty to our truest self and recognition of the fundamental oneness of the values that we cherish will require of us, will be to help our brethren not to our own, but to their own. It was because the Corinthians fighting over their diversities of gifts had come to lose sight of the common heritage that linked them into a single family that Paul recalled them to the sense of their oneness by his great poem on charity. We need this charity above all in the world to-day where faith fails to understand faith, where the contrasts and clashes of opinions exclude community of spirit, where the blood even of saintly souls is stirred by persecutions or boils with hatred or seemingly false creeds, where racial distinctions or differences of creeds make it difficult, if not impossible, for us to entertain feelings of love for the persons and practices and beliefs whereby our more distant neighbours embody their spiritual potentialities.

Let us pray, then, that we may have in us some portion of this charity, that we may learn to surrender ourselves to His will, and strive to free ourselves of the suspicion and fear and arrogance that come out of an unbelieving heart. Let us pray that as we grow to understand one another in this group, we may realize more and more the value of what it stands for, that the Kingdom of God which we are striving to help forward in our own small way knows no distinction between black and white, rich or poor, between Hindu or Muslim and Christian, not even the distinction between those whom we conveniently label as good or bad. He sends his rain on the just and the unjust and makes his sun to rise on the evil and on the good. Let us pray that as we increasingly cherish the ideals for which we work, we may be prepared for the risks that their pursuit may involve; for the value of our ideals will and can only be judged by what we are ready to give or to do for them; and of Him who is with us and in our midst, whose abiding presence in us all has brought us together for these two days, of Him we only ask that as we strive for the realization in ourselves of the ideals which the Fellowship symbolizes, we may in our lives grow into that oneness of experience which includes and absorbs into itself all differentiations of outlooks and creeds. Where there is life, there is differentiation: and if the differentiations of our individual interpretations of life are unquestioningly accepted as adding to the richness of the larger life of our own narrow church or of the historic religion to which we belong by the accident—shall we call it?—of birth, why need we feel any concern about the richness of the larger life to be that may result from the co-operative strivings for a common purpose of men and women professing different creeds and born and bred by the mystery of birth in different races following different historical religions? "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh and whither it goeth; so is everyone that is born of the Spirit".

Let us join together in our desire for the increase of life in ourselves: too often are we busied with questions of efficiency: we have been too many times asking ourselves what is the good that the Fellowship is going to do, what tangible results is it going to achieve. We have often placed our faith in machinery and organization, in getting things done or making them go. But our absorption in these things is itself perhaps evidence of the fact that we are lacking in the fulness of life. And if the life which gives them meaning is lacking, what is the use of machinery and organization? Our wineskins are useless lumber if we have no new wine to pour into them. If we only seek for the life, all other things can be added unto us.

But this increase of life that we are seeking may make more demands on us than we are ready for: it may not perhaps be enough to wait for it that it may come to us. Let us pray for the strength and the courage to foot untrodden ways; for the patience to bear and forbear; let us draw together for a few moments in fellowship and offer our silent thanksgivings; let us learn to be quiet before God and to wait for His word, so that if only we are prepared we may listen and grow into the fulness of life by our corporate strivings.

AGE OF CONSENT COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

The Report of the Age of Consent Committee which was submitted to the India Government by the 3rd week of June, 1929, is being considered by Government and is likely to be published shortly. The Committee was appointed on June 25, 1928, and took one year to finish its arduous work.

THE PERSONNEL.

As originally appointed the Committee consisted of 5 members. Subsequently 4 members of the Legislative Assembly were added. The Committee as finally constituted consisted of:—

(1) Chairman—Sir Moropant Viswanath Joshi, (2) Rai Bahadur Pandit Kanhiyalal, (3) Mr. A. Ramaswamy Mudaliar, (4) Khan Bahadur Mabub Mian Imam Baksh Kadri, (5) Mrs. M. O'Brien Beadon, M.B., (6) Mrs. Brijlal Nehru, (7) Mr. Satyendra Chandra Mitra, M. L. A., (8) Pandit Thakurdas Bhargava, M. L. A., (9) Moulvi Mohamed Yakub, M. L. A., (10) Mian Mohamed Shah Nawaz, M. L. A., and Secretary Mr. M. D. Sagane.

TERMS OF REFERENCE.

The terms of reference were:—

(1) To examine the state of the law relating to the Age of Consent as contained in Sections 375 and 376 of the Indian Penal Code, specially with regard to its suitability to conditions in India.

(2) To enquire into the effect of the amendments made by the Indian Penal Code (Amendment) Act of 1925 and to report whether any further amendment of the Law is necessary and if so, what changes are necessary as regards offences (a) without and (b) within the marital state.

THE COMMITTEE'S ITINERARY.

The Committee sent its questionnaire to about 6,000 persons and to 1930 more through the local Governments of whom about 1,200 responded. The Committee examined about 400 witnesses including a large number of women in different parts of the country and comprising various shades of opinion. The Committee did not visit Burmah as early consummation of marriage was uncommon in that province.

SPECIAL SUGGESTIONS BY MEMBERS.

The recommendations of the Committee are unanimous. But while agreeing with the report in the main, Maulvi Mohammad Yakub, M. L. A., appended a note making a few observations on the religious aspect of the question according to the Moslem point of view and suggested that like the Wakf Law, the application of the marriage law should be extended to those provinces only where three-fourths of the Moslem members of the local legislature vote for its application.

Mrs. Brijlal Nehru in a short supplementary note suggested graduation of punishment on seriousness of offences and not on age of the girl.

Pandit Kaniyahlal suggested there should be exemption in marriages in really hard cases but not on conscientious religious objections.

Pandit Thakurdas Bhargava also appended a note objecting to the recommendation by the Committee regarding the institution of suits by husbands in respect of custody or restitution of conjugal rights of girls below 15.

COMMITTEE'S MAIN RECOMMENDATIONS.

Following is a summary of recommendations of the Committee.

(1) That the age of consent within the marital relation be raised to 15 years.

(2) That sexual intercourse by a husband with his wife below 15 years of age be made an offence, and that the said offence be included in Chapter XX of the Indian Penal Code dealing with offences relating to marriages.

(3) That the said offence be called "Marital Misbehaviour".

(4) That Sections 375 and 376 of the Indian Penal Code be confined to rape outside marital relations.

(5) That the age of consent for the protection of a girl against rape by a person who is not her husband be raised to 18 years.

(6) That in order to deal most effectively with the evil of early marriage and early consummation, a law be enacted fixing the minimum age of marriage of girls at 14 years.

(7) That subject to any provision of the personal law for the time being in force, the validity of a marriage performed in contravention of the marriage law be left unaffected.

(8) That measures be adopted to give wide publicity to the marriage and consent laws and to carry on educative propaganda.

A MARRIAGE REGISTER.

(9) That an accurate marriage register in a prescribed form be kept, through an administrative department of Government, containing details of the marriage including the ages of the couple and that it be made obligatory by law on the parties and guardians of parties to the marriage, either personally or through authorised agents, to report the same to a prescribed local authority.

(10) That certificate of marriage be issued to the parties concerned, free of cost, when the marriage is reported.

(11) That the officer keeping the register of marriages be empowered and also be charged with the duty to complain of any breach of the marriage law or any omission to report a marriage or of a false entry in the details required in the registration of marriages, to the nearest magistrate having jurisdiction to try such cases, after such preliminary enquiry as he thinks fit to make.

A REGISTER OF BIRTHS.

(12) That in all urban and rural areas the father or the guardian of every child born shall, where not already required by law, report the birth of the child in such form as may be prescribed, within a stated time to a prescribed local authority and make a further report mentioning the name given to the child, if surviving, within a year of the birth, to the same authority.

(13) That the prescribed authority be required to maintain a register of births within a given area under its control, and to take stringent steps to enforce registration and to prosecute persons who omit to send a report within the prescribed period.

(14) That birth certificates giving the date of birth, sex, parentage and name of the child and such other particulars as may be prescribed, be issued free by the prescribed authority to the person making the report, when the name of the child, if alive, is reported to the said authority.

(15) That the Registers of marriages and births be permanently preserved.

TREATMENT OF "MARITAL MISBEHAVIOUR".

(16) That the offence of marital misbehavior do remain bailable and non-cognisable as in the case of rape by husband at present.

(17) That the offence be non-compoundable if the girl is under 12 years of age, and compoundable with the permission of the court, if she is between 12 and 15.

(18) That it be made punishable with (a) imprisonment of either description for 10 years of age, and (b) imprisonment of either description which may extend to one year with fine or both when the wife is between 12 and 15 years of age.

(19) That by the addition of a suitable subsection to section 562, Criminal Procedure Code, it be provided that in the case of marital misbehaviour the bond may, in addition to the present provisions, also provide for the custody, separate living and maintenance of girls and for such other conditions as the judge may deem necessary to ensure the prevention of repetition of the offence, the bond being executed either by the offender or by his parent or guardian.

(20) That where the accused is sentenced to fine or imprisonment in cases of Marital Misbehaviour, a new provision be made for bonds, with or without sureties being taken from the husband, or if he is a minor from the parents or guardian for separate living, custody and maintenance of the wife till she completes the statutory age of consent, and the court be empowered to rescind or vary the order or the terms thereof as may be necessary from time to time.

(21) That the provisions of Sections 122, 126-A and 406-A of the Code of Criminal Procedure be extended so as to make them applicable as far as may be to sureties in cases of Marital Misbehaviour referred to in 19 above.

PUNISHMENT SHOULD BE BOTH IMPRISONMENT AND FINE.

(22) That the punishment prescribed for a breach of the law of marriage referred to in para 6 be imprisonment or fine or both, and not a bare fine.

(23) That the Court trying a case of contravention of the marriage law be empowered on conviction, to require the offender to furnish a bond, with or without sureties, for separate living, custody and maintenance of the girl and for preventing the husband from consummating the marriage before she completes statutory age of consent.

(24) That the provisions of sections 122, 126, 126-A and 406-A of the Code of Criminal Procedure be extended so as to make them applicable as far as may be to, sureties in cases of breach of the marriage law.

(25) That where girls under the prescribed age are made over to the custody of any individual or institution under the foregoing recommendations, the Court be empowered to receive and examine periodical reports from the party concerned as to progress, good behaviour and other particulars essential to enforce a compliance of the law and the conditions of the bond and to pass orders from time to time rescinding or varying the order or the terms thereof.

(26) That suitable aid and encouragement be afforded to the establishment of institutions giving protection to girls dealt with under the foregoing recommendations.

EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN POLICE.

(27) That women police be employed, where available, to aid in the investigation of sexual offences, in taking statements of girls or women witnesses in cases of marital misbehaviour, rape and the like, and in protecting or accompanying the girls or women witnesses where necessary, when going to or from the court-house or for medical examination, and that where women police are not available, any respectable and disinterested woman of the locality or neighbourhood be invited to be present, while the statement of the girl concerned or of any female witness is being taken by the police.

(28) That women willing to serve as jurors and assessors may be empanelled in trial of cases of rape or of marital misbehaviour.

(29) That instructions be issued to trying judges and magistrates that in cases of marital misbehaviour, the discretion under Section 352, Criminal Procedure Code be invariably used.

(30) That where a medical examination of girls is necessary it be carried out by a woman doctor.

(31) That separate waiting-rooms wherever available be provided for girls and women witnesses in all court-houses.

CASES OF EXEMPTION.

(32) That a provision corresponding to Section 4 of Act XXIX of 1925 be made exempting from the operation of the proposed amendment in sexual intercourse with a wife between 13 and 15 years of age if the girl-wife was married and had completed 13 before the new Act comes into force.

(33) That no complaint in regard to an offence for marital misbehaviour be entertained after the expiry of one year from the date of the alleged offence.

(34) That in clause 1 (a), Section 561, Criminal Procedure Code the words 'Marital Misbehaviour' be substituted for the words beginning with 'rape' and ending with 'wife'.

(35) That consequent on recommendation 5, Section 361, Indian Penal Code, be amended by substituting the word 'eighteen' for 'sixteen'.

(36) That Section 552 Criminal Procedure Code, be also amended by substituting the word 'eighteen' for 'fourteen'.

(37) That Section 60 of the Indian Christian Marriage Act XV of 1872 be amended by substituting 14 for 13.

(38) That the law be amended so that a suit by a husband for the custody of a wife for restitution of conjugal rights shall not lie where the girl is below 15 years.

(39) That effective steps be taken to spread general education amongst men and women.

LAW OF SUCCESSION AMONG DEVADASIS.

His Honour Mr. N. Chandrasekhara Aiyar, the District Judge, Tinnevely District, delivered judgment this forenoon in an interesting civil appeal in which the law of succession among the Hindu dancing girls was involved. The judgment appealed against, was that of the Subordinate Court, Tuticorin. The facts of the case are briefly as follows:—Gomathi, Ammakannu, Pachavadiva and Amritham were five sisters of the dancing girl caste. The plaintiff Shanmugathammal was the daughter of Palanesam now dead. Ammakannu and Pachavadiva had given up their profession, married and were leading the lives of family women. Gomathi had been given in adoption to another dancing girl. The dispute is about the inheritance to the properties of Amritham, the last of the five sisters. The plaintiff claimed her properties on two grounds and filed a suit in the Sub-Court for a declaration of her title to the properties of Amritham. The first ground was that of an oral will in her favour by Amritham. The second ground was a custom among the Devadasi community whereby those relations who are practising the profession are preferred as heirs to those who lead the lives of married women. Alleging that Pachavadiya and Ammakannu, the third and second defendants in the case had married and were living as family women and claiming that she was practising her profession as a devadasi; Shanmugathammal set up her claim for the properties of Amritam. The Sub-Court gave an adverse finding against the plaintiff on the question of oral will, which, it was held, had not been proved but on the question of the custom, found that such a custom existed and on the strength of this gave a decree in favour of the plaintiff declaring her right to the properties of Armitham. The two married sisters of Armitham, appealed to the District Court, Tinnevely, against the judgment of the Sub-Court and the appeal was heard on the 29th.

JUDGMENT.

In the course of his judgment, the District Judge, after referring to the facts of the case observes :—

It would be seen that the evidence in support of the custom is negligible and worthless. Realising the weakness of his case the learned pleader for the respondent took up the position that when the consciousness of the community to which the parties belong is in favour of such a custom the court should not scan the proof of such a custom too jealously. He also urged that there were judicial decisions recognising such a custom. What the community thinks of such matters cannot be recognised by courts, except when it is based on statements of witnesses, or when the usage or custom is recognised in the well-known or prevalent books of unimpeachable authority. My attention has not been invited to any text book or manual of usages and customs, laying down such a rule of preference in the matter of succession to Dasis' properties.

13 Mad, 133 appears at first sight to enunciate the proposition contended for by the plaintiff. The actual decision itself is certainly in her favour, for it lays down that for Lakshmi, the deceased dancing girl, the Devadasi niece is a preferential heir to the undegraded brother. The ground of this decision was however stated to be that the legal relation between a prostitute dancing girl and her undegraded relatives remaining in caste, becomes severed. Later rulings, have quashed the correctness of this proposition and definitely laid down that the legal relation is not severed in such cases (see 33, M. L. J. 217, 38, Mad. 1144 not to speak of decisions to the same effect of other High Courts in 29 All. 4 and 40 Cal. 650 F. B.).

Moreover, the rules applicable to degraded women i.e., women, who marry and then lose caste by reason of unchastity and prostitution, are not necessarily applicable to dancing girls, who could never be regarded degraded in this sense, for they knew no antecedent state of wedlock and chastity. In 13. Mad. 133 Their Lordships refer to and seem inclined to follow 12 Mad. 277, which however is a case of succession to a degraded Marava woman's property. That there might be and in all probability that there is much difference in the laws and usages governing the two sets of people, is recognised in 33 Mad. 1144 and 33 M. L. J. 217. So then it is extremely doubtful if 13 Mad. 133 could be considered as good law even as regards succession to degraded women and the principles on which the decision rested have been assailed. It is really impossible to use it as authority to the support of the plaintiff's contention in this case that any Dasi relation however remote, will exclude a nearer relation in caste. It is true that laws of inheritance and succession among dancing girls are governed by and largely rest on, usage or custom. But this does not mean that every custom or usage set up must be accepted as correct. It must be proved as any other usage or custom before it could be recognised and acted upon by a court. There is no authority for the position that because the community to which the parents belong, is a community mostly regulated by custom, courts can dispense with proper proof of a custom set up, and view the evidence on which it is sought to be based, with a liberal eye, if not with absolute favour.

In the end, the learned Judge reversed the finding of the lower Court in favour of the custom, and set aside its decree based on that finding.—Hindu, Madras.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Age of Consent Committee:—In a press communique the Government of India says it had hoped that it would be possible to publish the report of the Age of Consent Committee about the end of July or early in August. There has, however, been some unavoidable delay and accordingly as the Government of India are anxious that the recommendations of the committee should be made widely known as early as possible they now publish for general information chapter XI of the report which contains a summary of the recommendations together with a brief explanatory note. After mentioning the committee's personnel and the terms of reference, the communique states that a questionnaire was issued direct or through the local Governments to some 8,000 persons and response was wide and general. The Committee toured throughout the whole of India and examined a large number of witnesses including many women. To ascertain the views of orthodox women unable to appear and give evidence pardah parties were arranged which a lady member of the committee attended. A number of villages were visited in order to ascertain rural opinion at first hand. The report of the committee has been signed by all members. The communique then mentions the recommendations made by the committee which have already been published and concludes these recommendations have been supplemented in separate minutes by some members of the committee. It is hoped that the text of the report and of these minutes will be published in full by the middle of the month.

To Untouchables:—A Free Press message says:—Swami Vimalanandji, with the approval of the trustees and a majority of the managing committee, got thrown open to all Hindus, touchables and untouchables alike, the Dattatraya temple wherein are also idols of other deities such as Laxminaryan and Shiva. On this occasion Acharya Vinoba spoke impressively on the importance of opening temples to the untouchables. Acharyaji said that a temple is no house of God if it is not open to all Hindus alike without any distinction of caste and creed. He explained that temples were built for realisation of God before whom no differences could stand. The sanctity of temples demanded that they must be thrown open not only to Hindus but to the whole humanity. The work of removal of untouchability must begin with throwing open the temples to all touchables and untouchables alike. This is the second example of its kind in this part of the country, the first being that at Wardha last year, Seth Jannalal Bajaj declaring the temple open congratulated the trustees and the members of the managing committee on the noble example and courage shown by them. Sethji especially congratulated Swami Vimalanandji appreciating his sacrifice and labours done for the great cause of removal of untouchability. Just after the ceremony an address of welcome was presented to Bajaji on behalf of Hindu Sabha of the city.

Sir P. C. Roy's Munificence:—At an ordinary meeting of the India Chemical Society held at the Chemical Theatre Hall, University College of Science, it was announced that Sir P. C. Roy had made a second donation of Rs. 10,000 to the Society for a permanent habitation. He had also placed a sum of Rs. 15,000 at the disposal of the Calcutta University for the construction of an advanced inorganic research laboratory, and had intimated his desire to found a Research Fellowship in the University College of Science. His total munificence, amounted to about a lakh of rupees, which represented the great scientist's earnings during the last decade.

Indian Schools in Natal:—Sir K. V. Reddi in an interview with Reuter said he had just concluded a visit to thirty Indian schools in Natal where he had received utmost courtesy and assistance from the educational authorities. The Government grant in aid of Indian education had been raised from thirty-three thousand to fifty-six thousand which was the maximum grant on this year's estimates. Fourteen new Government aided schools had been opened and two new Government schools, while two mission schools had been converted into girls' high schools. The agent was delighted to say that the building of the Sastri College had been completed and would be opened in February with the commencement of the school term. He had found the education position in the Transvaal and the Cape completely adequate. The Agent further announced that he was introducing the co-operative movement among small Indian farmers in Natal.

Forfeited by Remarriage:—Mr. Justice Pandalaitting on the original side disposed of a preliminary issue in a case in which one C. Gajapathi Naidu, as the nearest reversioner of Madanagopal Naidu, deceased, sued for his share of the property in the estate of the deceased. The point raised in the case was whether a Hindu widow after remarriage, though allowed by custom, forfeited her right for the first husband's shares.

In this case Jeevammal, widow of Madanagopala Naidu, remarried in 1923 and inherited her deceased husband's estate. His Lordship held that, as per section (2) of the Hindu Widows Remarriage Act, a widow forfeited her right for the first husband's property after remarriage.

Travelling Expenses of Cadets:—Director of Information, Bombay, has issued the following notification: According to a recent decision of the Government of India, the claims of candidates selected for admission to a Cadet College in England for travelling expenses in respect of their journey within Indian limits from the place of residence to the port of embarkation for England, may be submitted by their parents or guardians direct to the Controller of Military Accounts of the military District in which the parents or guardians reside.

Social Reform Week:—The Social Reform week celebrations commenced yesterday, when a small procession passed through the city urging "down with caste" "down with those who marry in old age" etc.

In the course of the evening Swami Ramanand delivered a lecture on the "Curse of Caste" at the Arya Samaj Mandir, Chawari Bazar.

The Bombay International Fellowship:—A Meeting of the Fellowship will be held on Monday, August 12th at 6 p. m. at the Home of Mrs. MacLean, U. F. O., Mission Compound, Gowalia Tank Road. Dr. G. Y. Chitnis will address the gathering at 6-30 p.m. on "FELLOWSHIP AND FAITH". The Committee is thinking of starting a Study group and members are invited to suggest subjects of interest to be taken up by the group.

Indian Civilisation in Africa:—A telegram from Johannesburg says that Zimbabwe was a central temple erected by Indians who came from India seven thousand years ago and civilised the whole of south, eastern and central Africa, is the considered opinion of Dr. Leo Frobenius the eminent German scientist who has just returned after a lengthy study of Zimbabwe's ancient ruins. Dr. Frobenius believes that this great race through intermarriage with bush men sank into barbarism, their empire collapsed and, thousands fled northwards. The relics of this civilisation surviving at Zimbabwe may have been concerned, Dr. Frobenius thinks with their religious system. Their remarkable knowledge of geology and mining, is shown by the discovery of beautifully constructed shafts one of which is at Rooiberg. It is 45 feet deep with a horizontal gallery ninetyfive feet long. During the height of this civilisation nickel and bronze articles were manufactured and exported to Egypt, Samaria and Crete where they have since been unearthed. The implements used for working the metal, however, were made of wood.

Buy more Indian goods:—In a speech which was broadcast Sir Atul Chatterjee opening the Indian section of the Newcastle Exhibition appealed to all British housewives to buy more Indian goods and thus help India to buy still more British goods. He emphasised the superiority and cheapness of Indian rice.

Water Diviner:—The Director of Information, Bombay, has issued the following note:—"Government have decided to discontinue the appointment of Water Diviner with effect from 1st March 1930 as a measure of retrenchment necessitated by the prevailing financial stringency.

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

NOTES.

Mr. Jahnalal Bajaj:—Last week the name of Sheth Jahnalal Bajaj was forced into undesired publicity by the insensate act of an underling of the Excise Department in subjecting him to what can only be characterised as an unwarranted outrage. It is the duty of the Minister in charge of this Department to make a thorough investigation personally of this scandal and deal with the person or persons responsible for it in an exemplary way. The details of the incident have been published in the daily papers, and we need only add that Sheth Jahnalal's behaviour throughout was what one would expect it to be, dignified, straight-forward and devoid of a trace of personal resentment. Our object in writing this to-day, however, is not to call attention to this unsavoury incident so much as to Mr. Jahnalal's splendid work in the removal of "untouchability." Sheth Jahnalal, before he was discovered by Mahatma Gandhi, was a Marwari banker like hundreds of others of the class—keen in business and strict in his orthodoxy. At least we think so, as he was not known to have been in any way different from his class. Contact with Mahatmaji gradually transformed him, as it has done several others but more effectively and completely, into a doughty fighter in the cause of truth and justice, particularly in the social and religious spheres. He has made the question of "temple-entry" of the untouchables especially his own, and he personally set the example not long ago, of throwing open his own family shrine to the "untouchables." His example has been infectious, as all courageous deeds are, and he officiated ten days ago in opening another temple at Wardha to all Hindus irrespective of caste. The temple bears on its gateway the following announcement: "This temple is thrown open from today for free access to Mangs, Mahars, Chamars, and all Hindus alike for purposes of darshan, bhajan, for offering worship and prayers, and for attending religious discourses." In performing the opening ceremony, Sheth Jahnalal made an earnest speech exhorting all Hindus to join in extending the hand of religious fellowship to their brethren and sisters of the depressed classes. It is a man of this type, who was marked out for personal humiliation by a subordinate government official probably when he was returning to Bombay after fulfilling his mission of peace and goodwill at Wardha.

Mr. Ramanand Chatterjee's Conviction:—The conviction of Mr. Ramanand Chatterjee, by a Calcutta Magistrate, for sedition for publishing the book "India in Bodage" by Dr. J. T. Sunderland, the well-known American Unitarian divine, is another event of last week showing how the Government system is setting in sharp conflict with what is best, most reputable and most worthy in Indian Society. A recent English writer—Aldous Huxley if we remember—says in one of his books on India that at a party which he attended in Delhi the most intellectual and cultured faces belonged to men who had spent some time in jail for political offences. Mr. Chatterjee's case is an instance in point. Mr. Ramanand Chatterjee is best known to the outside public as the editor of the Modern Review, easily the first English monthly in the Country. By his own countrymen, he has long been a much respected leader of modern Indian thought in educational, social and religious reform. A man of pure character and lofty ideals, Mr. Ramanand stands in the front rank of India's public men at the present day. Notwithstanding his liberal views on caste and religion, the Hindu Mahasabha elected him as its President at Surat this year, and his address at the Conference was full of candid and constructive suggestion for the betterment of the Hindu community. For some two years there had been published in the Modern Review a series of articles by Dr. Sunderland on British rule in India. It was a strong indictment of that rule and much better authenticated than Miss Katherine Mayo's indictment of the Hindu religion and society. Dr. Sunderland's book passed into a second edition without attracting any notice from the authorities. It was not proscribed as other publications are being proscribed almost every month. Suddenly, the authorities woke up one fine morning and launched a prosecution against Mr. Chatterjee and his printer for sedition. The result in such cases is nearly always a foregone conclusion, and Mr. Chatterjee in his old age—he is nearly 70, we should think—has been awarded the distinction of being convicted of sedition. We say if he is guilty of sedition for publishing that book, very few Indian journalists can be exonerated of the offence. The Magistrate made a point of the fact that the foreignness of British rule has been stressed by Dr. Sunderland in the book. Evidently, his Worship is of opinion that British rule is an indigenous rule. If that be the case, he would find very few people to agree with him. We can cite no less an authority than Lord Curzon not for proving not only that British rule is a foreign rule but that it should continue to be a foreign rule, if it is not to meet the fate of Roman rule. If the law penalises truth, so much the worse for the law, as Robert Stephenson tersely remarked when some one asked him what would become of a cow if it should cross a railway line when an engine was passing.

The Bombay "Public Safety" Bill:—The empirical method of dealing with crime and criminals is being steadily replaced by methods which take into account the conditions which favour their production, and there is a growing tendency, accordingly, in civilised countries to proceed on carefully thought out principles for reduction or elimination of those conditions. This development has, generally speaking, synchronised with the growth of popular Government. A bureaucratic system on the other hand, knows only the method of repression and relies almost wholly upon them to carry on the administration. The Bombay Commissioner of Police is a very able man. But he publicly declared the other day before the Riots Enquiry Committee that he does not believe in the reformation of criminals and that the only way dealing with them is to imprison or deport them wholesale whenever the City shows signs of disturbed conditions. A Bill has been introduced in the Legislative Council in accordance with his views, to empower the Commissioner to order any person or persons whom he suspects of being likely to commit serious offences, to clear out of the city and its suburbs. The Bill has been referred to a Select Committee which, we hope, will make drastic changes in it. It is badly drafted and if it becomes law in the form in which it stands, the Commissioner of Police will, on the declaration of an emergency, have the liberty of every citizen of Bombay in the hollow of his hand. If it is unfair to assume that he will deliberately abuse his power, it is no less unjust to assume that he will rival Providence in his strict appraisal of justice. With the best of intentions, he will largely have to depend on the reports of his subordinates who have perhaps no more faith in the human behind the criminal's nature and are apt to judge of men by appearances rather than by facts. If the Bill becomes law without rigorous safe-guards, it is bound to work considerable hardship to innocent people, and thus provoke a counter-movement which cannot be put down by force, Police or Military. Government should not shut their eyes to what is taking place elsewhere. There is a new spirit abroad and the number of people who hold that unjust laws should be resisted in the interests of good citizenship is increasing rapidly. The Bill is so loosely worded that demonstrators against the Simon Commission, if it had been in force last year, could have been deported by the Police Commissioner on the ground that their conduct is likely to provoke a breach of the peace. Another grotesque provision is that the Commissioner can order any suspect who and whose father were not born in the Bombay Presidency to remove himself to his native province. All Europeans under this provision may be ordered to go to their respective countries, but this is not likely to happen. The Bill goes clean against every principle of civilised jurisprudence and it should not be allowed to become law without very considerable alterations.

Widows' Inheritance On Remarriage:—A Lawyer Friend writes:—"As regards your comments on the case about a widow's right in her deceased husband's property on her remarriage, amongst those castes in which remarriage has been recognized by custom, it is not correct to state that all sections of the Hindu Widow Remarriage Act apply only to those castes in which remarriages were prohibited and not to those in which they are sanctioned by custom. The Act does not state like that. You will be interested to know that all the High Courts in India except Allahabad have ruled that the Act applies to all castes. In Bombay this was decided by a full Bench case Vithu v. Govind I. L. R. 22 Bom. 321. The judgment in that case was delivered by Mr. Justice Ranade. This ruling is now followed by the other High Courts except Allahabad which is the only court which takes the view which is taken by you. You will also be interested to know that it has been held by a full Bench of the Bombay High Court that on remarriage a Hindu widow loses the right to give in adoption her son by the first husband".

A Medical Officer on Baby Shows:—We had occasion to comment adversely last week on the Baby and Health Week Organisation's work in Bombay. We are indebted to the Pioneer of Allahabad for the following:—"I was once entrapped into a baby show. Some 900 mothers brought over 1,000 infants. They were divided into classes, on lines similar to a cattle show, said Dr. F. E. Wynne, the Sheffield medical officer, at the Manchester congress of the British Medical Association. Approximately one prize was awarded per 100 exhibitors. The result was, a dozen triumphant mothers and nearly 900 women wounded in their tenderest susceptibilities. Nearly all the babies were made ill, and there was a material rise in the scarlet fever and measles rate."

Anti-Purdah League:—"Bihar has the privilege of an Anti-Purdah League", writes the Liberator, "functioning in the province. The first anniversary of the League was celebrated recently in the Radhika Sinha Institute Hall at Patna. There was a public meeting in the evening and a goodly number of ladies and gentlemen took part in the meeting. The Province of Bihar has had the remarkable distinction of a Minister opposing the enfranchisement of its women—so deep is the conservatism of the province. That in such an area there should have arisen an Anti-Purdah League is an occasion for considerable satisfaction. Rai Bahadur Brijnandan Singh, the President of the League, gave a short account of the progress of the society during the year and observed that the same should be considered not unsatisfactory. Purdah has to go. Of that there is no doubt." Just as women's education organisations have been established throughout India, we trust that Anti-Purdah leagues will be widely formed specially in the provinces in Northern India to abolish the pernicious custom.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.
BOMBAY, AUGUST 17, 1929.

THE RIGHT APPROACH TO COMMUNAL PROBLEMS.

In India just at present communal rivalries are being made the basis of demands affecting constitutional reform. The idea is that these rivalries are fundamental facts of Indian life and the political system should reproduce them faithfully. An extreme assertion of this kind was made last week in an article contributed by Sir Ibrahim Rahimtoola to the Times of India. Starting with the formula that India, in area and population, was equal to Europe minus Russia, he proceeded to lay down that just as Europe consists of several nations, India too should be carved out into several states. A truer analogy would have been the United States of America, which is one of the largest states in area and population and which is the melting-pot of all the races of Europe. In India the Hindus, Mussulmans and other communities, have lived together for centuries, whereas in the United States the different groups of immigrants have not dwelt together for even two or three generations. The differences and rivalries and prejudices of these groups, is a problem of equal if not greater difficulty in America. Any one who suggested that the American constitution should be amended so as to correspond to the race and language divisions of the population, will be laughed out of court. America has a different way of approaching the problem. Some of the best minds in the country are engaged in studying the communal problem from different points of view. The economic aspect of it is the subject of a monograph lately issued in the Chicago University of Social Studies. Last week, we received two books from America of great interest, "Race Attitudes in Children" by Bruno Lasker, and "Community Conflict", both published by The Inquiry, the national organization of the group of social, educational and religious workers who are pursuing these inquiries. We commend those volumes to Indian workers and we should like to have a similar inquiry started in this country.

"Community Conflicts" is described in a sub-title as "a formulation of case studies in community conflict, with discussion outlines." A passage in the "Introduction," clearly explains the problem which it is sought to solve. "Where men are alert and progressive", says the writer, "they will never be free from interest clashes. The community which knows no conflict is too often the stagnant, torpid community. Here differences are tolerated because the interests they connote are not vital enough to prompt to action, and we find a fatuous peace where what is most needed is activity based on understanding and adjustment of these interests. But where action is undertaken, where one group cuts across the interests of another group, these conflicts ensue. How are such situations to be dealt with? How is such conflict to be utilized? How may men acquire that understanding and control that shall make of conflict, not a dis-integrative, but an integrative force? How may we develop such techniques for redirecting cross-purposes as shall further, not frustrate, community progress and shall create opportunities for further achievement?" This in a nutshell is precisely the problem which confronts us in India as the Americans in their country. Instead of vainly bewailing the existence of communal divisions, we should set ourselves resolutely to utilise them in building up the nation. The "Case-studies" in this book comprise a wide circle of conflicts and attitudes. There is one relating to two towns in Connecticut River Valley where there has in recent years been a large influx of Poles. In one of the towns, the "Yankees" refused utterly to recognize the Poles or admit them to a part in the community life. The town, says the writer, is now paralyzed by disunion. The other town encouraged the new-comers to take an integral part in the development of the community with the result that it has progressed rapidly and is now a thriving market centre, its prosperity being laid largely to the amicable relations between natives and Poles. The important point to be noted here is that the Poles were encouraged to work through communal organizations and to teach the Polish language to their children, but this did not alienate them but attached them to the rest of the population. "Integration within the Polish group led directly to integration of the Polish group within the community." In another town where there was an Italian group, it was long left out of the civic life because of the language handicap and a lower educational level. At last, a liberal-minded citizen hit upon the idea of inviting Italian representatives and seeking their co-operation. The result in a short time was to add a valuable force to the city's civic life. The writer, however, warns us that the method is one which will require much patience and perseverance, to be carried to a successful issue. "Our community habits are not wholly in tune with this conception of difference, conflict, and integration; many of us still hold a philosophy of victory or defeat, my right and your wrong, and a great deal of behavior reconditioning is needed to bring the community process to peaceful and creative levels." As Dr. MacIver writes:—"The more a common interest is established, the more society is established, and every increase in society is an increase in economy." Bruno Lasker's book is an even more arresting one, emphasising the part of the home and the school in fostering communal harmony. It deserves separate notice,

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR

XXXIII. THE DISCOURAGED.

(DR. CLIFFORD MANSHARDT, PH.D.).

There are two ways of meeting a difficult situation. One way is to quit. The other way is to push ahead. The quitter is always discouraged. You can see it in the slump of his shoulders. You can read it in his eye. It is always evident in his talk. Other people are getting the best gifts of life. For him there is nothing left save a poor remainder. He believes it, and hence for him it is so. A man cannot lift himself any higher than his thoughts.

But fortunately there are other men who come to the day of adversity and faint not. For them difficulty is the stimulus to effort. They fight the good fight; they keep the faith; and in due course they will receive the crown of victory.

The way to a better world is always fraught with difficulty. The road is rough and dusty. It leads through desolate country. The pilgrims thirst for water and often murmur. But the true prophet sees the gleam ahead and urges his friends to push forward. The rewards of life do not come to the despairing, but to those who persevere. Character is the result of effort. The social conscience is a gradual growth. Some seed falls by the wayside, upon stony places, and among thorns. But other seed falls into the good ground and brings forth fruit. It is this other seed...changed lives, vitalized neighbourhoods, an awakened social conscience,..... that renews our courage and sends us forth with new vigour. Some seed is wasted, but the other... who can tell what it may become?

It is hard for those who live in a more or less sheltered environment to fully appreciate the attitude of discouragement that prevails among their less fortunate brothers. Hundreds of thousands of people have tasted the fruits of life and have found them bitter. And to such people there is no need of saying, "Go in peace." Our responsibility is much deeper. Our challenge is to change an industrial system that wears down and bruises. It is our duty to see that people have fit houses to live in, and that young men and women have a chance to go right. Ours is the responsibility for a happy and wholesome childhood. It is for us to give light to him that is in misery, and life to the bitter in soul. If we fail in the day of our brother's adversity, our strength indeed is small.

The discouraged are found in every village. It is the rare person whose life has never been clouded by disappointment. We make great plans for ourselves and for those who are dear to us, but somehow or other our plans fail to materialize. We hope for a better world, and then comes industrial strife, political disagreement, class hatred, communal clashes and even war. We feel ourselves to be helpless and completely hemmed in. But the darkest moment is just before the dawn. The forces of disruption are a clear challenge to men's sanity and intelligence. The enemy is now in the open. We see him for what he is. We gather our own forces, strike hard, and press forward. The day is at hand.

THE LATE REV. R. A. HUME.

BIRTH, PARENTAGE AND EARLY LIFE.

Robert Allen Hume was born in the American Mission bungalow at Byculla, Bombay, India, on March 18, 1847. When asked the question, to what nationality he belonged, he replied: "I am a Scotch-American-Indian. Genealogically my forebears were Scottish. Legally, I am an American citizen by birthright. Chronologically and by association, I am a son of the Orient, born in India. Really, I am a citizen of the Universal Kingdom of God and of Man, at home in the world."

His pedigree is traceable from the Royal House of Scotland,—Alpine, King of the Scots (died 850 A. D.), Kenneth MacAlpine (King of the Scots, 850–860 A. D.), Donald (reigned 860–864 A. D.), Constantine (reigned 864–867 A. D.), etc. This Royal House of Scotland includes Duncan, King of Scotland, 1034–1040, who was killed by Macbeth.

The Founder of the Family of Hume was the first Baron of Dunbar, who died in 1081. He built the Hume Castle on the summit of a rocky hill (or "hom") in what subsequently has been called the village of Home or Hume in Berwickshire, Scotland. The second Earl of Dunbar and Baron of Hume married Ada, daughter of King William the Lion. In succession there followed Sir William, first Lord of Hume, and Sir Galfredus de Hume, and Sir Alexander Hume, and Sir David Hume, first Baron of Wedderburn, and Sir Thomas Hume, and Sir Patrick Hume. A certain Patrick Hume who died in 1599 was a strong promoter of the Protestant Reformation.

The great-grandfather of R. A. Hume was Robert Hume, who was born at East Gordon, Berwickshire, Scotland in 1739. He was an elder of the Church at Stichel, Kelso, Berwickshire, Scotland, for the last thirty years of his life. During the latter part of his life he was the Ruling Elder of the Church. He married Alison Wilson, daughter of a noted Scottish Border family. The father of R. A. Hume in his middle name carried on tradition of this other well-known Scottish family.

The grandfather of R. A. Hume was another Robert Hume, who also was born at East Gordon, Berwickshire, Scotland—on February 25, 1787. This Robert Hume at the age of eight accompanied his parents to the United States. They settled first at Galway, Saratoga County, New York, later removing to Stamford, Delaware County. There on July 20, 1807 he married Catherine Rose. In 1836 they moved westward from New York State. After a month at Monroe, Michigan, they finally settled in Lima (later re-named Howe), LaGrange County, Indiana. There he died on July 24, 1859, and lies buried in Pretty Prairie Cemetery.

The father of R. A. Hume was Robert Wilson Hume. He was born at Stamford, New York on November 8, 1809, the eldest son and also the eldest among the ten children of his parents. He went to the near-by Union College at Schenectady, New York, graduating with the degree of B. A. in 1834. Then he took the theological course at Princeton Seminary, graduating with the degree of B. D. in 1837. On March 25, 1839 he married Hannah Derby Sackett of West Springfield, Massachusetts. The latter had been a school-teacher. She had desired very much to study in the Mount Holyoke Female Seminary, which was being projected by Miss Mary Lyon as the first institution of higher learning for young women in that region. But it was not started as yet.

R. W. HUME'S WORK IN INDIA.

On April 1, 1839, Rev. and Mrs. Robert Wilson Hume set sail from Boston for India on board the two-masted brig "Waverley". Fellow passengers under similar appointment for India under the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions were Miss Cynthia Farrar, who was the one to start the very first school for girls in West India (if not in all India) and Rev. and Mrs. Ebenezer Burgess, who later were located in Satara under the same American Marathi Mission. The first port for the ship, after rounding the Cape of Good Hope, was Zanzibar. On this stretch of the journey Mrs. R. W. Hume taught the colored cook of the ship to read and write; and under her influence he decided to become a professing Christian. In the port of Zanzibar there happened to have just arrived a private yacht, a present from Queen Victoria to the Sultan. The American Consul, Mr. Waters, took the American missionaries to see the yacht. On it was a piano, which nobody knew how to play. The Sultan was greatly pleased to have Mrs. R. W. Hume play that piano. She was the first white woman, along with her fellow American missionary ladies, whom the Sultan of Zanzibar had ever seen.

Twenty weeks after having started from Boston, they reached their destination, Bombay, India, on August 20, 1839. They labored there in the general missionary work for fifteen years. Rev. Robert Wilson Hume in 1841, two years after arrival, helped to start the "Dnyanodaya," meaning "The Rise of Knowledge," a bi-lingual weekly newspaper in English and in Marathi. Now in its eighty-eighth year, that missionary newspaper is the second oldest newspaper in all India, being antedated only by the "Times of India". Beside this literary work, Rev. Robert Wilson Hume also did valuable service as the Secretary of the Bombay Bible Society and as Secretary of the Bombay Book and Tract Society. Mrs. R. W. Hume also did educational work, starting schools for girls in and around Bombay. In area they extended southward into the District of Roha; and in number they increased to thirty. Not for the next thirty years did the American Marathi Mission have as many pupils in their schools as under Rev. and Mrs. R. W. Hume. She personally nursed through to life from almost a fatal sickness the mother of Mr. Narotamji Morarji Goculdas, who later became Sheriff of Bombay. This episode is narrated in the Gujarati biography of the latter's father. A son of one of the converts of Rev. and Mrs. R. W. Hume is Mr. John Bhore, M. A. of the Indian Civil Service, who recently has been one of the Secretaries of the Simon Commission.

R. W. HUME'S DEATH.

Afflicted with tropical dysentery, Rev. R. W. Hume was ordered by his physician to try a change from India to the cooler climate of South Africa, and early in September 1854 was carried on a stretcher on board the sailing vessel "Merchantman". The captain was drunk, and did not attend to the lading of the ship properly. A storm on the Indian Ocean drove the ship far out its course; and the Captain was obliged to put in to Colombo, Ceylon, in order to re-adjust the cargo and ballast. In the stuffy little cabin, and especially in the heat of Colombo Harbor, the patient became much worse from his sickness. In a letter dated Cape town, December 9, 1854, his wife wrote:

"After leaving Colombo the (seven) children were all sick, and little Robert [then seven years old] had a most distressing convulsion. We expected in two or three days to reach the end of our voyage. But then we had a fearful storm. Rolled and knocked from side to side, it seemed as if he would sink under it. In the midst of it all he was so quiet and uncomplaining! I did not realize how much he was exhausted. Our bulwarks were broken, and partly washed away; and every wave washed over the deck. Our dead-lights were down; still our cabin could not be kept dry; and for hours I was standing in water. The cries of the children, the noise of the seamen and the tumult of the ocean seemed almost enough to overwhelm the stoutest heart; but it told most on the poor invalid. He never complained. But we had to keep him tucked in on every side with pillows. I often feared that he would be thrown out of the couch. Even the sides of the couch gave way. Many times that week he said: "I don't mind, so that we get on shore before the Sabbath". And I did not think he had any fears but that he would live to reach the shore. Certainly he never expressed them. His conversation was often "going ashore." Twelve days before his death, when I had told him that the Doctor spoke discouragingly about his recovery, he replied thoughtfully. "But I trust all to Christ and His righteousness. I know that He is able to do all that is best for us." Whatever be the weather, or however feeble he might feel, he had been anxious, all the voyage, to have morning and evening prayers. Saturday evening, when we gathered as usual in the evening, he prayed with us in a distinct voice. "Do more or better for us than we can ask or think, for the Blessed Redeemer's sake!" This was his farewell to his children. They all kissed him, and said "Good-night," to which he replied pleasantly. It was near eleven o'clock before he got well asleep; but he did not complain and did not think him worse. For two weeks I had not been in bed. And for several nights I had sat beside him most of the night, getting a little sleep, with my head on the corner of the table or the couch, or leaning back in my chair. But that night he urged me to lie down; and I did lie down on a box so near that I could reach my hand to him, and we both slept.

"In the morning I said, "It is a beautiful Sabbath morning." But he did not respond, as usual, from which I knew that he felt very bad. I heard two rough, but not hard, breaths. I sprang to the side of the couch; but the eyes were closed, and the chin fallen. Death to him was no sting. About half past seven o'clock on one of the loveliest Sabbath mornings you ever saw, he exchanged the earthly Sabbath for an unending one above. I was perfectly overwhelmed. And my dear children wept till their hearts were ready to break. Added to all the rest, we had to see those rough sailors with tearless eyes come and tear him from us. The children cried loud and long "They must not throw our dear, dear papa into the sea!" But there was no alternative. He must find his resting place beneath the waves of the sea. The passengers asked for a coffin; but it was not supplied. All the circumstances were trying in the extreme; but he whom we loved, knew it not."

The death of R. W. Hume occurred on Sunday, November 26, 1854, while the ship was in sight of land, off Cape Seal. He was buried in the southern reaches of the Indian Ocean at latitude thirty degrees and twenty minutes south, and longitude twenty-three degrees and eighteen minutes east. The oldest son, Robert Allen Hume, said to the widowed mother: "All right, mother! God and I will help to take care of you."

While waiting in Cape Town for a vessel proceeding to the United States, Mrs. R. W. Hume made the acquaintance of Rev. Andrew Murray of Wellington, South Africa, and inspired him with the thought of founding in Africa an institution of higher education for young women. He begged her that, when she shall have arrived back in the United States, she would go to South Hadly, Massachusetts, and try to secure some teachers from Mount Holyoke College to come out to Africa and to continue in that country the ideal which Mary Lyon had started in the United States.

AMENDMENT TO INDIAN SUCCESSION ACT OF 1865.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In the leader, in the Justice of the 29th July 1929, it is stated that the orthodox pandits have appealed to the Legislators in the Assembly to introduce Bills to give effect to their proposals that the property, whether self-acquired or ancestral, should be shared by the wife and vice versa; that methods should be devised to enable daughters to inherit property equally with sons; and that a woman and her children should succeed to the self-acquired and ancestral property of her brother dying issueless in preference to his male agnate.

2. It would appear that all these objects can be gained if the Indian Succession Act of 1865 is made applicable to Hindus. At present, the provisions of this Act do not apply to the property of any Hindu, Mahomedan or Buddhist; only an exception has been made in the case of the Hindu, Buddhist, Sikh or Jain who marries under Dr. Gour's Special Marriage Amendment Act XXX of 1923, succession to the property of whom and to the property of the issue of such marriage shall be regulated by the provisions of the Indian Succession Act.

3. To move for the application of this existing Act to Hindus would be much easier than to introduce new bills or Acts.

4. In spite of the proposals of the orthodox pandits referred to in the Justice article, opposition may be expected from the general Hindu public, for either extending the application of the Indian Succession Act to Hindus or for enacting any new Act to serve the same purpose. This is always the case and in view of this opposition, it is desirable to move for a ruling that any individual person who wishes to have the benefits of the Indian Succession Act applied to his property and to the property of his issues may, on application to any suitable Court of Law or other authority (to be fixed by Government), be admitted to such privilege, the customary Hindu Law being not applicable to him and to his descendants from that date onward.

5. For the one or the other of the two proposals in paragraphs 3 and 4 above, a slight amendment of the Indian Succession Act is necessary and I would appeal to any of the Legislators interested in the matter, to introduce a Bill in the Assembly for the purpose.

6. In this connection, I may add a word or two regarding the dowry system which, I think, is in a way connected with the subject. It would appear that after the female child was dispossessed of her share of the family or parental property, it was found that she had no chance of standing on her own legs and leading a decent life in these days of economic distress, should she happen to lose her husband or his support and that consideration of this economic aspect led to the introduction of the dowry system as an insurance for maintaining herself when rendered helpless otherwise. The dowry has, however, been recently converted into a bride-groom purchase money, and it is now demanded to meet all sorts of the personal needs of the husband or the requirements of his parents and family. It is a known fact that nobody likes the demand as such, except the selfish husband or his parents in individual cases, who have not the self-respect to mind the shameless and demoralising character of a male seeking such a help from the weaker sex. If the share of the female child is now restored under the provisions of the Indian Succession Act, it may reasonably be expected that the demand of dowry from the girl's guardians is bound to disappear in due course.

SCOUT MOVEMENT IN INDIA.

(BY S. D. CHITALM)

In all the free countries all the movements, political social and others started by the Government have a legitimate right to exist and such movements always receive the general support of the public. But in countries where the Government and the public are at variance, where the interests of the rulers and the ruled are antagonistic to each other any movement started by the Government is bound to be anti-nationalist, anti-country and anti-people. It will not, therefore, be a surprise if such a movement is looked upon by the people with a certain amount of suspicion.

Judged from this stand-point the Scout Movement in this country which is initiated and patronized by the Government, though not anti-nationalist in the real sense of the term, is bound to be pro-Government when the Government in power and the nation at large as represented by the people, are at loggerheads. And therefore whether such a movement should be encouraged or discouraged by the people is a question which all serious-minded nationalists should try to decide.

Each presidency in India has a Scouts' Headquarters and the Governor of the province is the Chief Scout. Primary and middle-school boys join this movement in large numbers. They are trained for civic service. They are trained and disciplined in drill, signalling, swimming and all other sports which tend to make the boy a good and useful citizen. So far as the technical side of this movement is concerned all that is done is very useful. Various sports are held often and the boys are taken to different places for camping. All this is quite good. What, I however seriously complain of is only this, that while proper attention is given to make him physically a good scout, no attention is absolutely given to develop the scout nationally. And therefore a scout however good, well disciplined and physically strong he may be is practically of no use to the country if left undeveloped on national lines. I contend that in the present day Scout Movement in this country, the most important factor of developing the Scout on national lines is entirely ignored and to that extent the movement is a complete failure. If a foreigner were to ask us as to what part the Scout Movement in this country plays in the nation's struggle for freedom, we have, I think no answer to give except a pessimistic and disheartening "Nothing". In the ordinary and every day routine life of the country, no doubt, the Scout is very useful. If a man is drowning, a scout may go at great personal risk to rescue the drowning man. If a fire breaks out in a village a scout is of tremendous use. Similarly if there are any non-political troubles his presence is useful. But this is not all what the nation expects from him. The utility of the Scout Movement will entirely depend upon the part he plays in the nation's struggle for freedom. How many of the scouts will offer their services when the nation's premier Assembly, viz., the Congress, meets to decide the nation's future policy? If a great man like Mahatma Gandhi is to be given an address how many scouts will offer their services to maintain order at such a function? How many scouts will offer their services if a legitimate campaign like the Bardoli Satyagraha is started tomorrow? These are not at all ordinary questions but the most important ones and these questions alone are the best criterion to judge the utility or otherwise of the Scout Movement. Judged from this stand-point the Scout Movement in this country is a complete failure and does not deserve the support of the nation.

Many Scouts have recently sailed from this country to take part in the world Scout Jamboree at Birkenhead. They are, at the moment of writing this article, freely mixing with the scouts of different nations of the world. But, alas, how uncomfortable the nationally-minded of them must be feeling when they are reminded that they belong to a subject race! They will look at England's glory with a mixed feeling of awe and reverence.

The Congress has already felt the want of national Scout Movement, and the Hindustani Seva Dal is the off-spring of the earnest efforts of patriotic leaders like Dr. Hardikar... nation's devoted scout.....and other patriotic leaders. I wish all glory and success to them. The spirit of the movement is alright but it has many handicaps. If this movement is afforded all the technical facilities that the present all India Scout Movement enjoys, I have every hope that it will be of tremendous use to the cause of India's peaceful struggle for freedom which lies ahead.

PROBLEMS OF MODERN HINDUISM.*

To-day being an occasion sacred to the memory of Lokamanya Tilak, I wish to speak to you on a subject which was near and dear to his heart. Possibly you only know of him as a person completely devoted to politics. You may not be aware that there was something dear to his heart even more than politics, to which he often referred in his private conversations. That was the idea of spreading the message of Hinduism all over the world, but not in the narrow sense of a religion or cult of a few people in India, but in the larger sense in which the Bhagavad Gita and the Upanishads have conceived it.

RELIGION ACCORDING TO GITA.

You will be surprised to hear that, in the Bhagavad Gita and the Upanishads, there is nothing spoken of as Hindu Religion. The word 'Hindu' does not occur anywhere in these books from cover to cover. The Religion is referred to as "the ancient immemorial faith," the faith or culture which has come down from immemorial times as the possession not of a particular community or country, but as the possession of the entire human race, the combined treasure-house of religious experiences and religious inquiries, acquired and pursued by individuals from time to time. Religion in these books is regarded as the common out-put of religious inquirers in India of various sects and denominations, a common heritage on which has descended from generation to generation and is espoused by temporary spokesmen from time to time. The ancient law-giver conceived religion on the broad basis of being a means of solace of the entire human species and of all those who dared to contemplate on God and Nature as divine mysteries.

* Being the Speech delivered by Mr. M. R. Jayakar, at the Bombay Brahman Sabha on 25th July.

LOKAMANYA'S FAITH IN GITA'S POWER.

What I wish to speak to you this evening is about this vast cultural possession of India, which the Hindu has to push forward in all directions. Lokamanya's conception was so wide. He was once asked:—"If you were going outside India to spread India's message of civilization, what book amongst all those you have read so widely would you like to take with you? What book you think will have the power of carrying persuasion to the intelligent as well as the unintelligent, the cultured as well as the uncultured, the literate as well as the illiterate, in every clime and community? His reply was:—"Give me the Bhagavad Gita, and I will perform the miracle. I will then go from region to region, country to country, individual to individual and spread the cultural mission of my ancient faith." In this expansive sense he conceived of Hinduism, and it is in this broad sense that it has an interest for the human species, not in the narrow sense of a cult of a few people who go on adding to the number of its adherents for the sake of the political vote. I do not wish you to contemplate Hinduism in this narrow light, but in the large sense of a faith which has immense potentialities of cultural appeal and absorption.

PLEA FOR LIBERALISING HINDUISM.

The practical question, therefore, before us is:—How can we make Hinduism once more so broad and liberal in its principles, and so increase its power of absorption that we could regard it as fully capable of satisfying the religious cravings and requirements of the ordinary man? How can we so expand its liberalism, toleration and sympathy that the humblest individual can find solace, enjoyment, safety and comfort within its fold? The need of making Hinduism so expansive is very great to-day, especially when we remember, that the ravages made on this ancient faith by militant and aggressive religions are many. As a public worker I have had opportunities, which many of you may not have had, of observing the course of national events and I have come to the conclusion, after various observations and experiences, that there is great need to-day for Hinduism to assume this broad, liberal and expansive basis.

QUESTIONS AT THE RIOTS COMMITTEE.

I was asked yesterday, in my examination before the Riots Inquiry Committee:—"Why cannot Hinduism regard with perfect equanimity and composure, the few hundreds of its followers who stray every year from its fold? Hinduism has got 22 crores of people, and what does it matter to it if a few men, women and children are taken out of it?" My answer was—and I will repeat it with the warmth with which it was delivered then—"So far as Hinduism is concerned it resents even a single man, woman or child being decoyed out of its fold by deception, temptation, or fraud". This answer of mine, I am sure, represents the view which many Hindus entertain about their own religion, and I want you, especially the young and the orthodox, to adopt a broad and tolerant attitude of the mind which makes such a view possible. Hinduism of all other religions has need to-day of conserving its energies and consolidating its position as an important religion in India.

NECESSITY OF BEING VIGOROUS HINDUS.

We unfortunately find that the best among us are unwilling often times to admit that they are Hindus. I have not seen any Englishmen, Mahomedans or Parsis, however high their position, who, when the time and occasion require, are afraid of saying that they are Christians, Mahomedans or Parsis. I wish we Hindus would imitate their vigour of faith and of conviction. Possibly our philosophic toleration interferes with the intensity of our beliefs, and to-day we find ourselves a scattered, divided, feeble, intolerant and exclusive set of people to whom there is no religious or political liberty possible, unless they acquire vigour in whatever they do or believe. Our present state represents, to my mind, a similar one which was centuries ago, depicted by a poet in the Mahabharata, when in the Shanti Parva, he wrote, "When politics and the traditional statecraft of a people have departed from a land, its religious books are submerged, its religious tenets, however well developed, perish, the well ordered landmarks of society disappear, and its warlike traditions, however ancient, perish." The author then goes on to say:—"Therefore politics is the one essential thing in a country. All sacrifice is merged in it, all sacraments are to be found in it, all knowledge lies buried in it, and all the worlds are included in politics." It was so said years ago and you can admire the wonderful vision of the poet who wrote this verse centuries ago.

SOME INSTRUCTIVE FIGURES.

So the present state of Hinduism is of a religion without any vigour of faith, or action. When you have regard to the depletions which our feebleness is entailing on Hinduism, you will see the necessity of our acting with vigour. I will give you a few figures for the years between 1881 and 1921. In 1881, the Hindus were 70 per cent. of the population. In 1921 they shrank to 65 per cent. On the other hand, the Mahomedans rose from 22 per cent. in 1881 to nearly 25 per cent. in 1921. So that, while the Hindus fell by 6 per cent., the Mahomedans rose by nearly 2 per cent. The Census Reports available for the period prove a similar story. According to them, in 1881 the Hindus were 7,581 per 10,000. In 1921 they descended to 6,841. Between 1911 and 1921 the Christians rose by absorbing 7 lakhs Hindus. Hinduism appears to be completely unconscious of those depredations, and unless it takes steps to preserve itself and rid itself of its febleness, divisions and intolerance, I see a clear sign in front of me that it will gradually go on losing more and more.

SENSATIONALISM IN RELIGION.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I read with interest the article published in the Weekly Observer, Allahabad, dated the 25th ultimo, under the caption "A Great Complaint" by Miserere. It seems to me that Miserere's feeling is very much upset by Dr. May Shave's speech in the Legislative Council in which she is reported to have said:—"In this twilight time, when all the creeds are in the melting pot, and we wait for a world Religion". Yes, it is a question of vital importance and worth consideration and I feel sure, by discussing the topic, the clergy themselves will no doubt be abundantly benefitted. But seeing I also agree with Dr. Shave's expression to a certain extent, I wish to ask a few questions before the matter is finally taken up for contemplation and discussion.

To believe in Christianity, is to believe in Christ, and to disbelieve in Christianity, is to disbelieve in Christ. Am I not clear and obvious in my meaning? Undoubtedly, you would question me; Why, oh! why, I hold such opinion? Let me explain. Not very long ago, there was an emotional discussion on the production of filthy films. The general trend of this discussion was to abrogate the production of such sensational films, through which a bad moral is reflected on the character of young men and young girls. But the film-owners vigorously protested against this. They said, if they would only screen such films where, there is no flirtation, courtship, etc., the public would not be interested and, in consequence, they would suffer a serious loss.

Now I desire to ask, is not this the case with some of our clergy. Seeing they have no spiritual power in them to convince people or to bring to Christ, are they not adopting the most sensational method, i.e., dances, concerts, picture shows, etc.? Has not Church-going now practically become mechanical? Is it not true that people may and do go for years, but with no spiritual gain? Am I not correct when I say, Church-going is gradually falling off, and that very few independent people go to Church nowadays?

And is it not true, that by advocating corruptible activities in Churches, people will take a keen part in the functions, and so utilize their times, in listening to the service until the dance or picture-show is commenced, and through this medium the clergy would be able to fill their Churches? The Rev. Guthrie says "he filled his long deserted Church with people by allowing dances in his Church." Now you may satisfy yourself as to how far Dr. Shave's statement and her opinion about creeds is justified. It is quite clear, therefore, that the clergy have lost their hold on the people, because they themselves are searching for new phases in religion that will create something of a sensation.

BENGAL WOMEN DEMAND FRANCHISE.

With reference to the question of giving the Indian women the right of standing for the legislatures, Mrs. Latika Basu in a statement to Free Press said:—

It has given me great pleasure to see that the question of giving women the right of standing for the legislature is to be raised in Bengal Council once more. Bombay and Madras have led the way and it is hoped that Bengal will not remain in the background long. But it has pained me to read the contemptuous reference to, and sweeping condemnation of 98 per cent. Bengal's women made by Mrs. P. K. Roy. I cannot help protesting on behalf of my mute sisters.

Mrs. P. K. Roy would restrict suffrage only to the educated women and in defence of her opinion she writes:—"It is possible to manage household duties or even carry on zemindary administration with the help of gamashita or agents but civics and politics are quite different subjects altogether". Is this not making a fetish of education on the one hand and of civics and politics on the other? I should reply "Sabbath was made for man and not man for Sabbath". A man or woman's humanity rises far above the changing standards of education. What is regarded as education to-day may be regarded as ignorance to-morrow but the human mind with its native potentialities will march on triumphantly from age to age to higher and higher aspirations and accomplishments.

INFERIORITY COMPLEX.

While emphasising that it is the birth-right of every man and woman to receive the best education which the age has to give, it is mere inferiority complex and confusion of issues to make a certain type of education the measuring rod by which we are to decide whether we should or should not exercise rights which we claim as members of human society. I maintain that all men, women and children should be given political and civic education to make them efficient members of society, but our present bookish and examination-ridden system is no true test. I even maintain that mere literacy may be an aid, but it should not be regarded as in itself a test. Mrs. P. K. Roy is going against the very spirit of the suffrage movement by claiming the right for a microscopic minority. Indian women may not be educated in the Western sense of the term, but to regard them therefore, as ignorant and irresponsible or incapable of understanding political and civic issues, if explained to them, only shows a snobbishness above which our so-called educated sisters should rise.

From my intimate association both with the average women of the West and of this country, I can say that our women even without education show a far shrewd intelligence and common sense than the average women of the West. Our political life has suffered and is still suffering from this bogey of the "ignorance of the masses" raised by our rulers in order to frighten us from claiming what is our birth-right. Let not this bogey be raised once more to keep back the women's movement. Even in the case of men it is an extension of the suffrage that is needed and we as mothers of the race claim our rightful position as equal members of the social and political units.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Prize for Cottage Spinning-Wheel:—The Council of the All India Spinners' Association has decided to award a prize of Rs. 1,00,000 or £. 7,700 to the winner who will hand over to the Council a spinning wheel or a combination of spinning wheel and carder fulfilling the following conditions: 1. The spinning wheel should be worked by hand or by foot in an ordinary Indian village cottage. 2. It should be such as one woman may work at it for 8 hours a day without undue strain. 3. It should be capable of utilising hand-carded slivers or have attachment for carding. 4. The output of yarn should be 16,000 yards of 12 to 20 counts in 8 hours' continuous working. 5. The machine should be such as can be made available in India at a price not exceeding Rs. 150. 6. The construction of the machine should be substantial and capable of being used, say, 20 years with occasional replacement of wearing parts. The replacement charges should be reasonable and may not exceed 5 per cent. of the cost of the machine per year. 7. The competitors should deliver at their own cost at Sabarmati their machines for examination on or before the 30th October, 1930. The competitors may protect their machines by patent during examination. The winner will have to transfer patent rights to the Council of the All India Spinners' Association without reservation. 8. The judges shall be Sjt. Satis Chandra Das Gupta of Khadi Pratisthan, Sjt. Lakshmidas Purushottam, Technical Director, Swaraj Ashram, Bardoli, and Sjt. O. Rajagopalachariar, Director, Gandhi Ashram, Tiruchengodu. In the event of disagreement between the judges, Gandhiji shall be the referee and failing him Sjt. Shankerlal Banker, Secretary, All India Spinners' Association. All further enquiries should be addressed to the undersigned at A. I. S. A. office, Mirzapur, Ahmedabad (India).

Shankerlal Banker, Hon. Secretary, All India Spinners' Association.

A Widow Remarriage in Bombay:—A widow-remarriage was celebrated on Sunday the 11th August 1929, at Shet Bhagvandas Madhavdas Bungalow, the parties to the marriage being Mr. Laxman Sakharam Ohitale and Shrimati Manubai Joshi, who both belong to the Konkanaatha Brahmin community. Several friends of the bride and bridegroom, as well as sympathisers with the widow-remarriage movement, were present including Mrs. Shantabai Kashalkar, Mrs. Malatibai Karve, Prof. R. D. Karve, Shet Bhagvandas Madhavdas, Messrs. B. S. Turkhad, Y. V. Bhandarkar, D. V. Thathe, J. V. Marathe, P. K. Karandikar, V. S. Raut, B. R. Madgao- kar and P. B. Gothoskar. The ceremony was performed according to Vedic rites.

Middle Class Unemployment:—The departmental committee, appointed to suggest solutions for the unemployment prevalent among the middle-classes in the United Provinces have submitted their report, saying that they have no radical remedy to propose. The limit for absorption into Government service and the legal profession, the main occupations of the educated classes at present, had been reached, and an increasing proportion of lads with high school and university education would have to find employment in other spheres. The Committee recommend the establishment of experimental Employment Bureaux at Lucknow, Allahabad, Cawnpore and Agra to maintain a register of students, to ascertain what are the available openings for employment and to give advice to parents and help students to obtain employment. The Government, the committee recommend, should give a grant of Rs. 200 monthly to each bureau.

Agitation in Benares:—The resentment caused by the marriage of a well known Vaidya of Benares at the old age of 73 with a minor girl of 13 continues. Meetings condemning the marriage have been held in several centres in the town under the auspices of different social and communal organisations. Under the auspices of the Benares Hindu Sabha a public meeting was convened at the town hall last night, when a resolution condemning the marriage was passed unanimously. The meeting was largely attended and strong speeches were made. The resolution passed, emphasised the necessity of taking steps so that such marriages, which were against the teachings of Sanatan Dharma, should not take place in future.

The Congress and Indian Princes:—In compliance with the resolution passed by the Calcutta Convention, Pandit Motilal Nehru has written to the Chancellor of the Chamber of Princes inviting the Chamber to appoint its representatives to confer with the Committee of the Convention at a Round Table Conference on the constitutional position and the status of the Indian States in the future Commonwealth of India and the relations that should subsist between the Indian States and the Central and Provincial Governments of the Commonwealth. Similar invitations have also been sent to the Nizam of Hyderabad, the Maharaja of Mysore and the Maharani Regent of Travancore.

Ramanand Chatterjee Sentenced:—Mr. Ramanand Chatterjee, editor, and Sajanikanta Das, printer, Modern Review, were sentenced to-day to a fine of Rs. 1,000 each, in default three months' simple imprisonment, on a charge of sedition by the Chief Presidency Magistrate for publishing the book "India in Bondage," by Dr. J. T. Sunderland of America.

LIFE INSURANCE TRUST PLAN

THE outright payment of the Insurance money to the widow or children in one lump sum is a great mistake. To apply a real test you would only ask yourself how your wife would invest such a sum NOW without any help whatever from you. The woman who has been "All the Wife and Mother" is ill-equipped to invest and safeguard funds designed to her family's protection for many years.

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

NOTES.

(Sir Frederick Sykes on Education:—
During the short time that he has been Governor of Bombay, Sir Frederick Sykes has impressed the public as a Governor who thinks for himself and is not content to take his opinions second-hand from the official hierarchy of which he is the head. The address which he delivered as Chancellor at the Convocation of Bombay University on Wednesday, bears out this impression. Sir Frederick intimated at the outset that much of what he was saying was drawn from his own personal observation and experience as one in the middle of life, with an outlook stretching both behind and before. This, while it endows the address with a human interest, has necessarily its limitations. What one observes, depends very much on where he observes from and what he is disposed to observe. There is a famous passage in one of Cardinal Newman's essays on universities, in which he describes how to the scholar Mount Hymethus would speak of the classics, and to the merchant of the commercial possibilities of the honey to be gathered on the hills. Sir Frederick's standpoint, in the nature of things, cannot be exactly that of the young Indian graduate emerging from the shelter of the University into the freedom and anxieties of life. The young Englishman has potentially the whole world in which to make himself a career: the young Indian, on the other hand, is barred by racial discrimination from large parts of it and even in his own land his opportunities are limited by the exigencies of a system which, though it has been declared seditious to call foreign, cannot by any stretch of imagination be styled indigenous. Notwithstanding this wide gulf, Sir Frederick did his best to put himself in the position of those whom he was addressing, and this he could do the more easily as he is personally a believer in its effect on the individual as the supreme test of all organisation industrial, educational or, we doubt not he would agree, political. This is the view of many of the most advanced thinkers in Europe and America, and it is pleasing to see one in Sir Frederick Sykes's position inclining to them. We are convinced that it is along the lines suggested by this principle that the solution is to be found for most of the problems which perplex modern life not less in India than in the West. The address touched at points a very high level of thought as when the Chancellor spoke of the sense of duty. "To my mind", he said, "there is no higher quality in the world. For it means that, where it exists, a man's life is governed by a law transcending his own egotism; and to have achieved this is, in my opinion, very nearly to have solved the problem of life itself. To have broken that slavery to the personal self, which is the greatest of all bondages, is to have risen above the ordinary level of humanity and to have become definitely a spiritual being." This is precisely the Hindu idea of dharma and Sir Frederick's words seem to us as we read them almost a word for word paraphrase of passages in the Bhagavadgita. We must confess there are more men who have grasped it in the West than in India to-day, and that is why we are lagging sadly behind the West not only in material but in moral and—we do not hesitate to say—spiritual things as well.

Next Congress President:—What we cannot help regretting as an unseemly situation has arisen over the election of President of the Next National Congress to be held at Lahore in December. For weeks before the election day, a propaganda was conducted with the help of News Agencies in favour of the choice of Pandit Jawharlal Nehru. To those who followed the reports broadcasted from time to time of the number of provinces which were stated to have voted for the junior Pandit Nehru, it was a surprise to find that only three out of twenty provinces actually cast their votes for him. Mahatma Gandhi was the choice of ten and Mr. Vallabhbhai Patel of five provinces. A day or two after the result was announced, Mahatmaj announced that he could not accept the Presidency and asked that Pandit Jawharlal should be chosen instead. Mr. Vallabhbhai who has the next largest number of votes, would in the ordinary course become President, if Mr. Gandhi is incapacitated from acting in that position. Mr. Vallabhbhai, of course will not, after his leader's expressed preference, accept the position, though as between him and Pandit Jawharlal, there can be no question as to who is the more tried and experienced man of the two. We have expressed before, our appreciation of the Pandit's many sterling qualities, but somehow he gives the impression that he has yet to find himself, and before one does that, one can hardly aspire to guide a national movement. Even those who favour his election do so on the tacit assumption that the Mahatma and Pandit Motilal Nehru will, in any event, be there to help him round difficult corners. There is only one previous analogy that we can think of, and that was when Sir Pherozeshah Mehta stood behind Mr. (now Sir) Dinshah Wacha when the latter occupied the presidential chair of the Congress. Pandit Motilal Nehru and others are reported to have urged Mahatmaji to waive his demand and to agree to be President. The fact is, Mahatma Gandhi has, by his four-anna franchise, khaddar, non-co-operation and other devices made it impossible for any other man with an open mind on these questions from being anything but a humble camp-follower in the Congress. Whoever is nominally President, the real though invisible President is Mahatmaji himself. He has a keen sense of humour and the humorous aspect of the situation can not fail to appeal to him. Having raised a Frankenstein, Mahatmaji should not leave others to face the monster, and that is really the significance of the pathetic appeals which are being made to him not to experiment with the fortunes of the Congress as with his own dietetic possibilities.

Treatment of Prisoners:—The prolonged hunger-strike of several of the accused in what is known as the Lahore sedition case, has compelled the Government of India to issue a circular requesting Provincial governments which control prisons to revise the rules relating to the treatment of prisoners. The contention of the Lahore hunger-strikers is that persons accused of political offences which involve no moral turpitude, are entitled to more considerate treatment than persons guilty of murder, rape and dacoity and as at present no distinction is made between the two classes, they refuse to take any food and prefer to starve to death as the only way of calling possible attention to the anomaly. The only distinction now recognised by the Jail rules is racial, that is to say, Europeans and Anglo-Indians, which means practically all who wore hats and boots, are given a more expensive diet than persons who adhere to their ancestral faiths and garments. According to one estimate, while the former are fed at a cost of 12 annas a day, the latter have to be content with one-sixth of that expenditure. The Indian authorities are deplorably behind the times in their ideas regarding the treatment of criminals. Even in Great Britain which, next to India, is perhaps the most conservative country in the world, considerable improvement has been made in the treatment of prisoners which, notwithstanding the efforts of Howard and Bentham, was in the middle of the last century such as to merit Leckey's observation that "England which stood so high among the nations of the world in political, industrial and intellectual eminence, ranked in this matter shamefully below the average of the Continent." We in India are always at least thirty years behind in most matters, for the simple reason that the British officials who control the administration, are always a generation behind in their ideas than the rest of their countrymen. An additional reason for the tardy pace of progress here is the lack of social contact between the rulers and the ruled. The Bombay Government during the last session of the Legislative Council introduced a Borstal Bill for the treatment of adolescent male offenders, which is a move in the right direction. We trust that they will go forward and introduce measures for rationalising and humanising prison treatment generally.

Anglo Indians or Indian Christians:—The Indian Witness writes:—"The Anglo-Indian Association of London is disturbed because a correspondent of a Calcutta journal wrote that on a recent visit to England he discovered several Indian Christians posing as Anglo-Indians and holding membership in the London Association. Whether the correspondent wrote correctly it is not for us to say. He may have done so or the Association may be entirely correct in its denial. But the significant fact that the keen observer of today notes is the reversal of what was a frequent occurrence a few years ago. The trend today is not for Indian Christians to represent themselves as Anglo-Indians but for Anglo-Indians to identify themselves with the Indian Christian community. And the new trend is better than the old. The Church of Christ has suffered whenever an Indian Christian has denied his nationality and represented himself as an Anglo-Indian. The Defence Force of India, by admitting to some of its units only supposed Anglo-Indians and giving certain material inducements for joining, and the Railways by invidious distinctions in their scale of payments to their employees have unwittingly encouraged these false representations. It is a good sign of the times that more resistance is being offered by Indian Christians to these evil and disintegrating forces. And it is another good sign of the times that an increasing number of Anglo-Indians are proud to regard themselves as Indians." We are able to confirm the statement of the Witness. We have heard from more than one friend in England that girls who used to wear western dress in India adopt the Indian sari in England, as they find that it ensures them greater regard. One Indian Christian mother who wears western dress told this writer that her daughter who is an undergraduate refused to accompany her to England, unless she was allowed to wear the sari. "How can I", she asked "myself wearing dress"?

The Late Rev. R. A. Hume:—We publish elsewhere under this caption the second of a series of three articles on the late Rev. R. A. Hume, for which we are indebted to his son Dr. R. E. Hume who sends us the matter from America. The articles contain much data which enables us to appreciate the persons and incidents that influenced the late Rev. R. A. Hume and will be read with interest by our readers. The first article which was published last week dealt with the early life of R. A. Hume, the one published this week deals with his education and his life in India, and the last which will appear next week treats of his contributions to Indian life and his friends in India.

The Skeleton at the Feast:—Considerable excitement was caused in America by Mrs. Hoover's invitation of the wife of a Negro Congressman to a White House tea. The Southern Press in particular seems to have strongly resented Mrs. Hoover's action. We take the following from the World Tomorrow. "It is a clear indication of the fact that the race situation victimises a white man almost as much as the coloured man.....All honour to Mrs. Hoover for her stand. We regret only that the President found it necessary to offer an explanation. Complete silence would have been not only better morals, but better politics." This is another instance of the difficulty which people find in getting over prejudices.

We referred last week in our leading article to Mr. Bruno Lasker's suggestive and helpful book on "Race Attitudes in Children." The publishers rightly describe it as a highly revealing study of the origins and growth of race prejudice. Mr. Lasker demonstrates, by means of vivid case evidence and objective enquiry—we are quoting them—that attitudes are of chief importance in determining the relations between different racial and national groups in American (we may add, in Indian) life; that racial attitudes in children are not instinctive and personal, but the consequence of prevailing folkways and environmental circumstances. Mr. Lasker analyzes in turn the various race attitudes in children, how they have been acquired, what intentional teaching has gone into their formation, and how they may be modified. The interplay of social forces between whites and blacks, natives and foreigners, immigrants and immigrants, help to make the book not only an absorbing study of social life in America, but a most timely and valuable guide to similar studies in this country. The general conclusion Mr. Lasker draws from his study is that up to the age of five children are free from notions of race superiority or inferiority, or of race differences at all. After that they pick up phrases and attitudes which they see around them and rather mechanically adopt them without any special mental significance. A typical instance is that cited in the book of a little coloured boy, four years old, who called any child who made him angry a "nigger". He thinks of the word obviously as something to make one angry because he sees other children get angry at being called "nigger." The age at which children discover group differences, another authority says, is generally between nine and twelve years. But race consciousness definitely comes into life at the age of adolescence. Mr. Lasker quotes the superintendent of a Mission in the North-West who has noticed Japanese, Chinese and White children study and play together with no hint of differences based on race lines. But as the Asiatic children, or those of Asiatic parentage, grew older and came to the marriageable age, they almost invariably gravitated to their own race. This was especially true of the children of Japanese parentage, even in Hawaii. The superintendent thought for a long time that this was due to race instinct, but after talking to the young people, he is now almost convinced that race has nothing to do with it, in itself, but that the separation is caused by American social standards and usages. "Society", he says, "is a most despotic ruler and has decreed that persons of non-white extraction shall not be admitted to good standing in social circles. As soon as the young people of Asiatic descent realize this, they begin to "take their places"—though reluctantly and with some bitterness."

The most interesting and inspiring feature of the book is the evidence it gives of the existence in such a society of a considerable proportion of men and women who have made it a mission, so to speak, to set themselves in their own homes to counteract race prejudice. These are the salt of American life. The most effective antidote to race prejudice is to be found in this direction because, as a high-school teacher who is quoted by Mr. Lasker, says: "Home influence is stronger than precepts laid down at school in forming attitudes. I have been strongly impressed with the imitativeness of children and the strong tendency to imitate other children more than older people; so the influence of one home probably acts through those children on other homes." Parents are often responsible for instilling race prejudice in their children. Mr. Lasker cites the following instance. Mary, five years old, shrinks back and clings to her mother when she sees another child who lives a few blocks away, saying, "She's 'talian." Her mother and father had been discussing in her presence the small section of Italians near by, resenting the fact that they were there. And Mary had been told to avoid the children because they were dirty "not nice." At the age of seven her prejudices were even stronger. Here is a very different case of a cultured and broad-minded mother saving her child from falling a victim to race prejudice. A New England mother was quietly reading the story of the Crucifixion to her three children. In the midst of the story one interrupted and asked, "So, it was a bunch of Jews who killed Jesus?" The mother started to nod assent when her eye fell on the occupants of several adjacent chairs and, like a flash, she said, "Yes, it happened to be Jews who killed Jesus, but He Himself was a Jew. If he had been living in America today, it would have been Protestant Christians like ourselves who would have killed Him." Much mischief is caused, which is almost irreparable, by the loose talk in which even educated people indulge generalizing about other communities. An important fact brought out by Mr. Lasker is that education in common institutions is a very valuable means of counteracting racial prejudice. He lays especial stress on common recreational associations. "The mixed play-group" is a good adjunct to neighbourhoods with mixed ethnic population. He would not approve of our quadrangular cricket matches where the teams represent different communities. From this point of view, it is perhaps not altogether to be regretted that cricket is waning in popularity in Bombay, and is being replaced by lawn tennis where no communal associations have, so far, grown up.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XXXIV. RECREATIONAL LEADERS.

(DR. CLIFFORD MANSHARDT, PH.D.).

The character-forming values in organized play have not yet been fully realized. The desire to play is deeply rooted in man, and the perversion of this desire leads to far-reaching social consequences. How much simpler the moral problem would become if every neighbourhood would recognize the constructive value of play, and would organize play upon a neighbourhood basis. There is scarcely another person who can draw as close to the boy or girl as the sympathetic leader of recreation. Practically every competitive game presents the opportunity for unsportsmanlike conduct and cheating, as well as for the highest type of sportsmanship. Left to their own devices a group of boys may develop into a gang of cunning tricksters. Playing under the direction of a trained supervisor these boys soon learn the meaning of honesty and to live by the code of the sportsman.

Juvenile delinquency is in large measure simply a misuse of spare time. During school hours the child is occupied, but when he is presented with free time he does not know how to use it. The most of our boys and girls are not wilfully vicious. They go wrong simply because they do not know what else to do with themselves. They will respond with willingness to a well-planned wholesome programme of recreation. The city that cares for its boys and girls will not allow them to drift. It will meet its opportunity and gain its sure reward.

The leader of recreation must not only know games, he must also know physiology and anatomy. The child enters into the game with zest. He forgets everything but the game, and before he is aware of it he has exhausted his energies and has become petulant and weary. The supervisor must study each child and allow no child to pass beyond limits that are injurious to his health. Proper recreation and guidance during the formative years of childhood mean much for the future health of the nation.

The strenuous demands of the present day can only be met by the fit. It is of no avail to raise up a generation of students if these same students are physical weaklings. The war opened our eyes to the importance of this matter, and the question that now faces us is whether we are willing to see it. Some cities, such as Bombay, are beginning to provide recreation facilities on a city-wide scale. Others are making partial attempt to meet the situation. Many more are doing nothing. It is for us who believe in the social values of play to preach our gospel, that the movement may spread to the enrichment of our common life.

THE LATE REV. R. A. HUME.

(By His Son). •

2. EDUCATION, MARRIAGE AND LIFE IN INDIA.

When Mrs. R. W. Hume started from Boston in 1839, little did she think that, before reaching her missionary work in India, she would have a share in educating and Christianizing the children of the Dark Continent, in the person of the negro cook of the American brig "Waverly." And when she gave a copy of the "Life of Mary Lyon" to a Christian missionary in South Africa, little did she think that, consequent upon her husband's sickness and being ordered for a change of climate to South Africa, she would have the opportunity of doing pioneer educational work for females in a third continent.

EARNING A LIVING.

The ten-weeks' voyage of R. A. Hume from Bombay to Cape Town, Africa, ended on Sunday, December 3, 1854,.....just a week after the death of his father. The next ship sailing to the United States, the "Springback", occupied seven weeks from Cape Town, bringing the widow and her seven fatherless children to Boston. An uncle, Mr. Charles Burchard, who was a prosperous wholesale grocer in Framingham, Massachusetts, having no son or heir or prospective successor in his business, offered to take care of the boy R. A. Hume, and to adopt him. Other relatives offered to take over some others among the seven children. But Mrs. R. W. Hume determined that, so long as possible, she would keep the family together in Springfield, Massachusetts, near her own old home. R. A. Hume has often expressed his profound gratitude to his own devoted mother because, instead of having brought up in ease and for a life of money-making and apart from the sense of responsibility to his immediate family, he was reared by his own loving mother, and trained to industry, economy, mutual helpfulness and profound godliness. One of the ways in which R. A. Hume earned money and helped with the family's expenses, was by working in delivering the newspapers of the Springfield Republican. In this work he was so efficient and reliable that, during his course on the High School, he was made the foreman over all the other delivery-boys. Among these comrades and business subordinates of his was the son of a Judge and the son of the Superintendent of Schools. In this work he had to report for duty between four and five o'clock in the morning. In the winter time his overcoat was sometimes frozen stiff upon his body from the rain and sleet and snow, so that it would stand upright of itself upon the floor of the kitchen. He has thought that perhaps one reason why he was short of stature was because his physical growth was hindered by that exposure and lack of sleep during his growing years. But he has ever been grateful for the growth in character and by his steadfast loyalty to his family which he experienced even amid those early hardships. Another hard experience in that early period was the burning down during mid-winter, of the wooden house in which the family were then living, now the site of the fine South Congregational Church on the corner of Maple and High Streets in Springfield.

HIGH SCHOOL AND YALE.

The mother of R. A. Hume had never had the opportunity of studying in any institution beyond High School. And in those days it was not yet the custom even for the sons of wealthy and educated families all to go to College. However, both she and her two sons were determined that, despite their limited financial circumstances, Robert Allen and Edward Sackett Hume, should go to Yale College. The Springfield High School at that time, did not teach Greek, nor profess to prepare for College. R. A. Hume was sixteen when he graduated from that High School. His mother joined in the plan that he should take another year in preparation for College. So he went to the near-by College Preparatory School, Williston Seminary, in Easthampton, Massachusetts. The way in which he earned his board there, was by working as a manager of an Eating Club for the richer boys. Weekends he would walk the sixteen miles from Easthampton to Springfield, in order to be with his mother and family, and in order to purchase more cheaply the food-supplies needed for his Eating Club. That year, 1863-1864, was the last momentous year of the Civil War. R. A. Hume organised in the School a Debating Club and a school-paper and a course of lectures by prominent men. Later, on looking back upon that first year when he was altogether "on his own," he wondered that he dared to, and that he was able to, undertake so many lines of activity and of initiative. However, while in that important age of sixteen-seventeen, R. A. Hume was exercising the same qualities of alertness, self-reliance, courage administrativeness and leadership which in later years as a man he exercised on a much wider scale.

When R. A. Hume was ready to enter Yale, it was decided that his mother and the whole family should go along, and reside in New Haven. His younger brother, Edward S. Hume, was thus able, while still living at home, to attend the fine Hopkins Grammar School for two years. The mother conducted a students' boarding house at the corner of Crown and Howe Streets in order to support herself and the younger children, even while making a home for the two sons, while they should be studying for and in College. Robert A. Hume earned considerable money by tutoring. In Sophomore year he won the third prize in English Composition and the second prize in Declamation. In Junior year and also in Senior year he won an Oration Appointment. He was a speaker at the Junior Exhibition. He was awarded the Clarke Scholarship for Senior year. He was an editor of the Yale Courant. He was elected a member of Gamma Nu. Alpha Delta Phi, and Phi Beta Kappa. He was a member of Brothers-in-Unity, and won the third prize in its Debate in Senior year; he represented the Society as Orator in the Statement of Facts. He was treasurer of the Yale Missionary Society. Beside being active in various College activities, both scholarly and social, he was also active during College in active Christian work. He was the Superintendent of the Sunday School which he along with some other Yale students, conducted on William Street. On Sunday afternoons he used to accompany his mother in calling upon some sick or poor folk. He looked back with great gratitude upon that Christian life and work in which his mother trained him. When they moved to New Haven, all the family became members of the old Third Church, then on Church Street, facing the Green near Chapel Street. Later that Third Church united with what used to be the North Church, the two together becoming the United Church, on the Green near the corner of Temple and Elm Streets. Its pastor, Dr. Theodore T. Munger, and R. A. Hume became very intimate friends.

SEVEN YEARS A TEACHER.

After graduating from Yale with the degree of B. A. in 1868, R. A. Hume continued in New Haven through the academic year 1868-1869, teaching in General Russell's Collegiate and Commercial Institute on the Lower Green. During the next two years he studied in the Yale Divinity School, also taking the degree of Master of Arts from Yale in 1871. Then for the academic year 1871-1872 he taught in the Edwards School at Stockbridge, Massachusetts. Then he completed in Andover Theological Seminary the usual three years course of theological study, taking the degree of B. D. in 1873. Again for a year he taught in New Haven. Thus by means of teaching he and his younger brother Edward S. Hume, who graduated from Yale in 1870, earned and saved enough money with which to purchase a house for their widowed mother, at 24 Home Place (subsequently renamed Court Street), in New Haven. This undertaking being completed, R. A. Hume felt that he could leave her, and go back to India, to continue with the missionary work to which his father had given his life.

MARRIAGE.

In July 1874 R. A. Hume married Abbie Lyon Burgess, daughter of the fellow missionaries who in 1839 had travelled with his own parents from Boston to Bombay. Her father became quite a linguist, writing a Grammar of the Marathi language, and translating into English the Sanskrit astronomical work, "Surya-Siddhanta," which was published by the American Oriental Society. That Rev. Ebenezer Burgess, before starting for his missionary work in India, had been Instructor in Sacred Literature in Union Theological Seminary, New York City, during the year 1837-1838. And after returning to America from India, he was Lowell Lecturer on the Lowell Institute Foundation in Boston in the year 1865 and again in 1867. Rev. and Mrs. Ebenezer Burgess had been located in Ahmednagar as missionaries of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions during the years 1839-1851, later being transferred to Satara, where the daughter Abbie Lyon Burgess was born. Her sister was named Mary Lyon Burgess, both of them bearing in their middle name the maiden name of their mother, Mary Lyon, who in turn was named after her aunt, Mary Lyon, the Founder of Holyoke Female Seminary (later named Mount Holyoke College). The Biography of the latter records how her favorite niece, who had helped her in that educational enterprise, was going away to India as a foreign missionary.

A PREACHER THROUGHOUT.

On August 12, 1874 Rev. and Mrs. Robert Allen Hume sailed from New York for India, reaching Bombay in October 29, 1874. They were located in Ahmednagar, 150 miles inland from Bombay, where most of his years were lived. On the day after his arrival, even before he could speak Marathi, he began to preach through an interpreter. And he ever remained a preacher. He preached in Dearfield, Massachusetts, on February 10, 1929, and in New Haven, Connecticut in March, before he had to go to the Corey Hill Hospital, Brookline, Boston, Massachusetts, in April 1929. Even while in the hospital he accepted tentatively a preaching engagement to preach in the first Presbyterian Church, Buffalo, New York, on August 11, 1929. And he was to have spoken and been a guest of honor at a missionary meeting in Chatanqua during July 1929.

THE TRAINING OF INDIANS.

One of his important services in India was the training of Indian ministers. One of his first accomplishments in Ahmednagar was to help organize a Theological Seminary, the very first one in Western India. At first he was the Dean, Dr. Lemuel O. Bissell being the President. On the death of the latter, R. A. Hume became the President, continuing in that position until he finally left Ahmednagar. From that Ahmednagar Theological Seminary there were graduated under him over two hundred Indian Christians, who went into the ministerial service of every Mission in the Marathi-speaking area, as well as into other Presidencies. His educational work in Ahmednagar included for a while the Principalship of the High School and also of the Girls' School.

Another important local piece of work which was placed upon him in the Marathi Mission was the superintending of the Parner District immediately to the west of Ahmednagar. When he began, the Parner District contained thirteen Indian Christians in one pasterless church. During the period of his service there, he took over one thousand men and women into the Christian fellowship. Finally he reared up Indian leaders to carry on the main responsibilities for Christian work in that Parner District with eighteen substantial churches and schools.

ARABIC INFLUENCE ON MUSIC.

The Editor, the Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

My attention has been called to an article in the Indian Social Reformer (11th May) by Khan Bahadur Mir Muzheruddin, B.A., entitled,— "Arabic Influence on Music." This article is based entirely on a brochure of mine entitled The Arabian Influence on Musical Theory, except for the several stupid blunders which reveal your contributor's inability to read plain English. He has not however, had the common decency to acknowledge his indebtedness to my work, nor to even mention my name. I will be glad therefore if you will publish my letter.

The Editor, the Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I am much obliged to you for your letter of the 12th instant, forwarding a copy of Dr. Henry Farmer's letter before publishing, it for my explanation. I am extremely sorry that I omitted to acknowledge my indebtedness to his work or to mention his name. I am an ardent admirer of music and when Dr. Henry Farmer's book was given to me by a friend of mine I read it with great interest and found it most valuable and in my zeal to use in my article extracts I forgot to admit my obligation to Dr. Henry Farmer. I had no idea of claiming any originality but only to publish it for the benefit of those interested in music. I tender an apology for my omission and request you to very kindly forward a copy of this letter to the eminent Doctor and ask him to accept this apology and forgive me for my omission which was quite unintentional. I request you to keep the publication of letter under reference in abeyance until you hear from him.

CHRISTIAN MISSIONS IN INDIA.

I.

The Editor, the Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

I have been greatly interested in the letter written by "Perplexed", and in the answers to it which have appeared in your columns. Your leading article on "The Future of Christian Missions in India" is a fitting close to the subject under discussion. For my own part I feel that the future of Christian Missions in India will have to be more upon the lines of co-operation between Indians and Missionaries. There will be a subtle change in the relationship of Missionary Societies to the Government of the country when "Swaraj" (whatever that may imply) is attained. If the Missionary Societies accept the new conditions in the in right spirit their usefulness and their influence for all that is best will be greatly enhanced. The main handicap in Missionary work is the "foreign atmosphere", and consequent lack of sympathy with, and understanding of, Indian aspiration. I have often thought that if I were a member of an Indian organisation which was engaged in similar work to my present task that I could be of more use to India than I am—as a member of a foreign organisation. It is probable that many other Missionaries feel as I do. Our one desire is to help India onward to a fuller and happier life—some as educationalists, some as doctors, some as agriculturalists. Can India offer us a more useful sphere of work than we find at present under a foreign Missionary organisation?

NEGRO SPIRITUALS.

(By Mr. C. F. ANDREWS.)

One of the most remarkable things I have learnt in America, during my visit is the immensely rapid progress of the Negro race in intellectual and spiritual things. No other people in the world have achieved such an advance in so short a time during the last century. At the present moment I am writing this article at the Institution called Tuskegee, which was founded fifty years ago by Booker Washington. From the very first negroes themselves have been the builders of the fabric in every direction, while the white race has looked on with sympathy the Institution which Booker Washington founded in 1881 has remained steadily independent. Again and again I have been struck by the fact that every part of it is a creation of the Negro race itself.

As a consequence of their Creative energy the Negro people, who have worked night and day to build up this institution, pouring in their wealth of Sacrifice in unstinted measure, have attained an end which no one could have dreamt of fifty years ago. Everything to-day is so well conducted and efficiently managed that it compares favourably with any American Institution in the land. No one can ever say, henceforth, that the Negro race, is less capable than other races of mankind.

But this is only half the picture. The most vital factor of all still remains to be explained; for there is a spirit in this Institution which breathes of life and health and young vigour. There is a soul in it which tells of faith and hope and love and that is highest in man. I have met the same exalted spirit in such Creative Institutional work in India, as that which I knew at Shantiniketan. I have seen the same spirit still renewing its youth in beautiful old Marburg in Germany. It is easy to recognize it, because it goes far deeper than that which outwardly appears and it immediately touches the heart. When I first came to India and visited the Gurukul on the banks of the Ganges at Hardwar,

I felt in a moment the same spirit of the divine in Man, creating new human forms.

Here at Tuskegee, in the midst of practical America, the outward things are at first more evident than in India with its dreams of the divine, and Germany with its mystical philosophy. There was at first an emphasis on practical achievement in bricks and mortars and technical machinery, which in one sense was a matter of natural pride to the Negro race, whose talents had been previously despised. But these did not really touch the heart, or make the appeal to the very highest that is in our human nature.

But when I heard the singing of the songs which had been composed by the forefathers of this American Negro race from the very depths of slavery, now sung by the children who were free, in a school of their own creation, immediately my heart was touched and the very same spiritual vision seemed to come before my eyes, that had been apparent to me in those other creative impulses of the human heart that I have already mentioned.

The words themselves of these Negro Spirituals were often almost childishly simple, yet they were none the less profound. For instance the solo 'Were You There, when they crucified My Lord,' followed by the chorus, 'O, sometimes it causes me to tremble,' repeated many times has a pathos of its own, which goes almost too deep for tears. It is impossible to describe the impressions made by these Spirituals when they are sung by Negro voices, with all the wonderful rhythm which comes from the depth of the soul. They are profoundly religious and at the same time they give an interpretation of the bible story which brings its message to us in a strangely moving way. They represent the religious impulse which moved the hearts of these oppressed people more than a century ago and sustained them during a captivity that nothing except the pure white light of the Soul within could have transmuted it with a blessing instead of a curse. James Weldon Johnson who himself belongs to the race whereof he writes, has stated the historical fact in the following words:—

"The Negro took complete refuge in Christianity, and the spirituals were literally forged out of the Sorrow in the heat of religious fervor. The thought that the Negro might have refused or failed to adopt christianity leads to some curious speculation. One thing is certain; there would have been no Negro Spirituals. His musical instinct would doubtless have manifested itself, but is it conceivable that he could have created a body of songs in any other form, so unique in the musical literature of the world and with such a powerful and universal appeal as the Spirituals. Indeed the question arises, would the Negro have been able to survive slavery in the way he did? The story of the trials and tribulations of the Jews, in the Old Testament fired the imagination of the Negro bards and they sang, sang their hungry listeners into a firm faith that as God saved Daniel in the lion's den, so He would save them; as God preserved the Hebrew children in the fiery furnace, so He would preserve them; as God delivered Israel out of bondage in Egypt, so He would deliver them. How much this strong faith had to do with the Negro Physical and Spiritual Survival of two and a half centuries of slavery cannot be known.

Thus it was by sheer Spiritual forces that African chants were metamorphosed into Spirituals; that upon the fundamental throb of African rhythm were reared those reaches of melody that rise above the earth and saw into the pure ethereal blue. And this is the miracle of the creation of the Spirituals.

Here in Tuskegee these melodies and harmonies form as it were the heart impulse of the whole living Institution. One hears their refrain murmured by some little child who wanders past, or taken up with a chant by some group of boys or girls as they pass from their lessons to their dormitories. At night time they sound through the night air as they are echoed by over a thousand voices at the close of the evening worship; and in my own experience and probably that of others who visit this place, the haunting melody of them remains in the sub-conscious mind, mingling with one's dreams and stirring one's soul in the wakeful moments of early dawn, when sleep departs and a new day begins.

In consonance with this perpetual uprising in the soul of man, of those emotions that lie deep within there is one factor at Tuskegee which seems to belong to the Negro race more richly than to any other in mankind. Laughter, merry laughter, sweet and natural, childlike and simple breaks forth everywhere from these boys and girls and their teachers. This surely is a glorious gift to have rescued out of suffering for the blessing of mankind. A people who can achieve this triumph in their historical beginnings, can surely accomplish much, as their history advances. It seems to me that there is no race upon the earth more richly endowed with gifts for the future than the Negro race.

PROBLEMS OF MODERN HINDUISM.

(Concluded from the last issue.)

THE ONE NEED OF THE TIMES.

The one need of the times, therefore, is to expand the spirit of Hinduism, to liberalise it so that all those who profess it, however, low and depressed, will find in it a living solace, a guide on all occasions when their minds are troubled. We must so reconstruct Hinduism that its meanest adherents, however degraded, will find in it solace, comfort and even enjoyment and respect. Unless we do that, the divisions which are at present to be found among us and which reduce many of its adherents to a state of helpless poverty, will not disappear. To-day the non-Brahmans refuse to join the Brahmans, out of suspicion and hatred, even on questions like the Land League. I am not blaming the non-Brahmans for it. I am merely pointing this out as an instance of how our divisions are causing havoc in our community. We ought therefore, to look round and find out what is wrong with our religion, and what means would make it more united and vigorous. There is no use blaming other religions for their activities. After a long time we find ourselves driven away from our position of safety as the sole religion of India and confronted with Semitic rivals which are extremely vigorous, organised and inclusive.

NECESSITY OF CHANGING METHODS.

Hinduism, therefore, has to change its methods and take on a spirit which will enable it to hold its place against these strong rival faiths. Our action must commence by reforming our own faith and not by blaming other faiths, for doing what they think is their duty. The tolerance of Hinduism, its doctrine as embodied in the teaching of the Bhagvad Gita, do not disturb the faith of any man, however ignorant he may be—must be given a new meaning. It must always prevent violent conversions to Hinduism of any other man's faith but those gentle and silent changes which are necessary for the purpose of furnishing a solid foundation for the faith of the low class Hindu, have to be taken up. Hinduism must take heed of the religious sentiments of the poor and the fallen. It has devoted too much attention in recent times to the cultured few. It has left practically unprotected the lowest orders of society, and not cared to descend into their midst and offer to them a solace, a guide and a protection. It is no use resting on our oars and boasting of our past exploits.

ANCIENT POWER OF ACCOMMODATION.

In times gone by, when similar needs arose of consolidating into Hinduism the aboriginal and inferior classes, Hinduism did make a tremendous effort to find for them a strong foothold in its teachings. It was then most intensely national. Its power of absorption increased. It touched round about itself every important religious and cultural force and transmuted it so as to conserve its position. New religions, have shown such a power of slow and intelligent absorption as Hinduism has done in the past. It has absorbed men, sentiments and deities. Take for instance the deity called Kali. It was an aboriginal deity whose chief characteristic was to kill human beings. The ancient Hindu took it up, gradually purified its contents, until, in the hands of Shankaracharya, it came to assume the aspect of the Mother of the World. It furnished, in later days, a fit object for the adoration of every householder who thought of her as an affectionate mother who could never do him wrong.

WIDE CONCEPTION OF NATIONALITY.

You will find that ancient Hinduism adopted a few principles which I should like the younger and the orthodox sections of the present times, to pay special heed to. Hinduism adopted a wide and liberal conception of nationality. Asked to describe what "Bharatavarsha" (India) meant, the old law-giver said:—"Bharatavarsha is the country, wherever it may be situated, where the nationals of Bharatavarsha stay." It may be in India, it may be outside India. Asked to state what the people of Bharatavarsha consisted of, the lawgiver said:—"Men and women. However different their temperaments and ideals, however different the deities which they worship and however different the avocations which they follow, these are all the nationals of Bharatavarsha in spite of their diversities of faith, actions and avocations." It is this spirit, which, in ancient times made the Hindu faith so vigorous tolerant and pushful.

SPIRIT OF ADJUSTMENT.

Time after time the ancients adjusted their faith so as to include in it different kinds of worship from the idealist to the corpse worshipper. As an ancient verse says:—"The worship of the Brahman is the highest. Next after it, the worship of the Saguna Brahman; then comes the third stage when adoration is offered to personages (like Avatars and their actions. Next after, comes the worship of the Pitrus, the Devas and the Rishis. Next is the worship of inferior entities, and the lowest is the worship of corpses etc." You see how wisely Hinduism gave a footing, as if it was a kindergarten system of religion, to the professors of every faith! It grasped the spirit of adoration and worship, irrespective of the object towards which it was directed. It then gradually went on improving the notions of the Godhead, thereby raising up almost imperceptibly the nature of the worship and the worshipper. The sage wisely held the view that you cannot cure people by condemning their deities. You can cure them by raising their notions of the deity. "It is extraordinary," he said, "in what curious objects men find their deities. Some people find their deity in the water (Apsaras). The more enlightened seek their God in heaven. The uneducated seek it in logs of wood and stone. The perfectly enlightened seek it in their own heart. A vigorous people find their deity in fire. The self-controlled man finds it in his own heart. Half-educated find it in an idol, and the truly knowing man finds his God everywhere."

CONNOTATION OF EXPANSIVE HINDUISM.

This represents an attempt to link into Hinduism the different stages or the religious mind with which Hinduism had to come into contact from time to time. This is what I mean by "expansive Hinduism," expansive in the sense that it pushes forward its bounds of recognition, sympathy, toleration and inclusiveness. It never troubled about the deity, and everybody who recognised a deity and showed the spirit of worship and reverence, was given a footing in its fold. I still think there is hope for us if we make once more an attempt, as the ancients did on several occasions, that Hinduism should not be the religion of the cultured classes alone, but should afford daily solace to the poor and the afflicted. Its work lies more amongst such people than amongst the high and the cultured, because we find that owing to the neglect by Hinduism, of these classes and the absence of endeavour to take care of their faith they are gradually straying away. It is our defective religion that is making conversions so easy. The conquests of rival religions over Hindus first began with our apathy. Before we blame the Mahomedan and the Christian, let us try to find out what makes their work of conversion so easy amongst our inferior classes. It is no exaggeration to say that the conquests of the Mahomedans and Christians are mostly made amongst those whom Hinduism has ceased to care for in any tangible way.

NEED OF MEETING THE LOWLY.

Take the case of fallen women. See, for instance, what a Mahomedan offers to a fallen woman, the street walker. He says to her:—"I will marry you with all your misdeeds and escapades of the past. My religion is a cure for all your evils, past as well as present. My faith has the power of curing you. I will therefore take you as my wife." What a faith in his own religion the man must have to make possible this extraordinary offer! We content ourselves with abusing the man and his faith but we never take steps to create amongst us men who will have a similar faith in the curative power of their own religion. How can Hinduism compete with a religion? How many Hindus are prepared to give shelter and happiness to a street woman as a Mahomedan does? What attempt are we making to create a place for such women in our own fold? Mere abuse of other religions will not help. To-day our difficulty is to reconcile Hinduism to practices which, in the orthodox sections are regarded as irreligious. Hindus must learn to take more tolerant and liberal views of the infirmities of human life. It must indulgently take in hand the reformation of human lapses. It must accord itself more and more to the requirements of ordinary human nature, and not merely of the exalted one. Other religions offer to the degraded Hindu, a place of enjoyment, respect and safety which Hinduism denies. Hinduism offers them, instead, rigorous discipline and ascetic monasticism. It must come to dwell in the homes of the infirm, the lowly and the fallen.

DELICATE POSITION OF THE RECONVERTED.

Hinduism has another disadvantage which I should like to speak to you about. Those who are taken back into Hinduism are placed at a great disadvantage. The present law is that all those who were once Hindus and have come back into Hinduism become Sudras, whatever their previous status might have been. That means that if a Brahman becomes a Mahomedan and after some time becomes once more a Hindu, he ranks as a Sudra. He does not regain the place from which he fell off. His social position is gone, and he has to begin once more in the lowest rung of the ladder in the Hindu social scale. As long as the law is allowed to stand, Hinduism places itself at a great disadvantage with other religions. The Mahomedan convert for instance, is completely absorbed and placed on a footing of equality. I have seen women whom Mahomedanism has converted from Hindu prostitutes into women cheerfully carrying on their duties by the side of the husband. I have seen cases where the miracle has been achieved in the course of a few days. What has Hinduism to offer like this? It must therefore increase its power to effect such cures. It will be judged in modern competition by its power to draw and keep into its fold men and women who have fallen from the strict path of virtue. I would, therefore, appeal to you all, especially the younger and conservative elements amongst you, to raise your conception of Hinduism in the way I have suggested. Take a broad, tolerant view of your ancient faith, and regard it as a means of social regeneration and not merely of intellectual refinement, and having conceived it in that light, act on your conceptions without fear or hesitation.

HINDU TEMPLES AND UNTOUCHABLES.

Under the auspices of the Anti-Untouchability Committee, Indian National Congress, the famous Dattatraya Temple at Ellichpur (Berar)—a former capital of the province under the Nizams—was thrown open on the 31st July last.

The unanimous sanction of the trustees for throwing the temple open to all Hindus alike was then announced and Seth Jamnalal Bajaj performed the opening ceremony by removing the curtain from over the sign-board mentioned above and entering the temple in company with some of the guests and a group of about 50 untouchables. The following is Seth Jamnalalji's speech on the occasion:

"In calling upon me to open this temple to those whom we have hitherto neglected, you surely do not expect me to treat you with a learned discourse. You perhaps know that I am a layman incapable of Shastric acrobatics and innocent of even ordinary Sanskrit. In my humble opinion this question of our treatment of the untouchables is a very simple one and needs no special pleading. It is barest justice and if you allow me to say so, penance. I am sure you will agree with me that the treatment we have hitherto accorded and which we still accord to the untouchables is absolutely untenable. Our domestic law requires that the elders shall carry a greater burden and shall be responsible to provide for and protect not only the weaker and the disabled in the family but even the idiot and the elder and treat them on an equal footing irrespective of their merits or demerits. For the law that governs our domestic conduct is not the law of reciprocity, but of Love. The same law applies on an extended scale in a bigger family called the community, where it finds its expression in what is known as the principle of "Noblesse oblige"—nobility involves obligation. If the so-called untouchables are disabled members of the Hindu community,—ignorant, superstitious insanitary and so on,—that is all the more reason why the elders viz. the class Hindus, should take them closer and provide for them means of a healthier living and of light and knowledge so that they may feel they are men. But unfortunately what have we been doing? We deny them the very house of

God. It is one of the cruellest ironies of fate and a galling humiliation to us class Hindus, who are wont to describe God as "Jagat Pita" i. e. the Universal Father, "Jagan Mata" i. e. the Mother of the Universe, "Patita Pavan" i. e. the Purifier of the fallen, that we should have come to evolve a conception of that same God which is a travesty and a negation of those very attributes—a God who is supposed to get polluted Himself by the sight of his own less fortunate children instead of purifying them and who therefore eternally bans these untouchables from His view!

THE DOMESTIC LAW.

"But I am speaking to you of the domestic law. What would you say to a father who makes a distinction between his own sons? Or better still, what would you say of those elders in a joint family promulgating an ordinance that the younger, the weaker, the disabled brothers in the family shall have no access to their common mother, that they shall remain in eternal separation? And just think of the agony of the mother whose children are thus banned and kept away from her bosom by her very first borns! I tell you we kill the very intent underlying the institution of the temple by banning a portion of our fellow-beings—our own brothers in faith—from its use. How can we, who happen to be more fortunately circumstanced instead of stooping to help the less fortunate of our kith and kin, deprive them of what is intended to be a free gift to all, viz. right to worship? How can we make the temple a preserve for the few and yet call it the abode of God? Is God for the fortunate few only? As you well-know He is no preserver of any particular set of human beings however high in social scale or intellectual attainments but is of all, of high as well as low, more likely to be for the latter since they need Him more and call upon Him ceaselessly. A mother's love, you all know goes out much more for her idiot son and for the less fortunate than for him who is well off.

A CLEAR DUTY.

"If therefore our temples are to function in the right way, they must represent truly what they stand for. We must protect ourselves from being the world's laughing-stock in respect of the objects of our most sacred sentiments. Our temples must be, to say the least, a fair representation of our spiritual idealism and its catholicity. Otherwise they can but represent our hypocrisy and excite justly our neighbour's ridicule.

"The task therefore of allowing free access to untouchables to our temples is to my mind nothing beyond taking back to the bosom of the Mother her own dear little children who were wrested and forcibly kept apart from her, to her great grief and agony up-till now by reason of our own iniquities.

"With these words, gentlemen, I desire this temple of "Datta Darbar" open to all men and women of Hindu outlook on life without reservation. Here, henceforward, man shall sit beside man without any invidious distinctions and here under the eye of Narayan all His children shall seek, through silent communion with Him, inspiration and light that will sustain them through life's trials and tribulations. I offer once more my congratulations to all those who have brought about this happy event of great religious merit. May God bless these pioneers and lead them."

NOTES.

Communal Conflict in Palestine:—What began as a difference between Arabs and Jews over their respective rights in what is known by the latter as "the Wailing Wall" and by the former as the spot where the Prophet of Islam dismounted from his horse at Jerusalem, has developed into a serious political situation involving the Balfour Declaration regarding the National Home of the Jews in Palestine and the continuance of the British Mandate under the League of Nations in that country. The situation is complicated by the intervention of Arabs in the neighbouring territories and of Jews in Europe and America. There have been demonstrations against the British Legation in Warsaw by Polish Jews who blame the British Government for not sufficiently protecting their co-religionists in Palestine. Politically of much more importance are the protests from the United States where members of the Jewish community occupy a controlling position in finance and the Press. These protests have taken concrete shape in an unprecedented offer to send 10,000 fighting men to restore peace and order in Palestine, the implication being that the British Government by their own unaided efforts are unable to cope with the trouble. While the Arab leaders demand the abrogation of the Balfour Declaration, the Jewish leaders demand its strict and more emergent fulfilment. Indian Mussalman organizations like the Khilafat Committee have issued a manifesto protesting against what they call the "pro-Jewish" policy of the British Government, and their anxiety will not be allayed by the report published in Friday's papers of an interview between Lord Passfield, the British Colonial Secretary, and the President of the World Zionist Organisation, Dr. Weizmann, in the course of which the former is said to have expressed himself sympathetically disposed to the latter's demands. Dr. Weizmann's version of the interview has been officially repudiated, but the mischief done, we are afraid, cannot be wholly removed. The methods adopted by the Mauda-tory Government in Palestine to deal with the situation were the same at first as are adopted in India. Owing to the isolation of this country from the main currents of international life, there has not been much careful scrutiny into the equity or efficacy of these methods. The Palestine trouble, however, has brought them in the international searchlight, and the verdict has already gone against them.

Mr. N. C. Kelkar on Hindu Re-construction:—In the address which Mr. N. C. Kelkar delivered at Dacca as President of the Conference convened by the Hindu Mahasabha of the Province, he clearly laid down the lines on which Hindu society stood in need of reconstruction. He described the disorganised, distracted state of Hindu society at the present day, and called upon Hindu leaders to turn the searchlight inwards and find out the weak points of "this creaking, squeaking machine of Hindu religious polity" and strengthen it on these points. Among other things, Mr. Kelkar advocated the dilution or tempering of the present caste-system so as hardly to be felt for practical purposes, greater freedom of selection in marriage, equalisation of standard of morality and laws of property for men and women, abolition of untouchability, and the cultivation by Hindus of a broad outlook upon life and world-conditions. He briefly described the objects of the Hindu Sangathan movement as being "to rope in all the kindred sectarian Hindus and bring them in a line with the main stock of the Hindus." The only difference between Mr. Kelkar and nationalist reformers like Mahatma Gandhi and Mrs. Sarojini Naidu is that while his eyes are fixed exclusively on Hindus and kindred sects, they want to "rope in" into nationalism all communities which inhabit India. Many of the reforms which the Hindu community stands in need of are, as Ranade pointed out thirty years ago, also more or less needed by Indian Mahomedans who are the next largest community in the country, and there is both economy and power in utilising our energies to bring about a common evolution of the whole population. While Mr. Kelkar would have the Hindu community evolve apart from, and though not in antagonism to, Musalmans, the nationalist wants both to work in mutual sympathy towards their common destiny. This does not mean the merging of the identity of either community but their development in a common political framework so as to be in the international economy fully representative of all the rich and varied culture and the distinctive genius of the country.

The same principle applies to all other Indian communities. The leaders of the national movement, therefore, have as far as possible to endeavour to look with an equal eye on the interests and sentiments of all the communities. From this point of view we are distressed to notice the tendency among a section of politically-minded Musalmans to obstruct the much-needed social legislation in the Indian Legislature.

Communalism in the Indian Census :—

There is one important point, among several others, in Mr. Kelkar's address, which we should like to emphasise. It is the manner in which Indian Census Reports have been the means of communal propaganda. The Census Commissioner in one instance laid down some arbitrary tests to discriminate between several classes of Hindus, which Mr. Kelkar had no difficulty in showing were without justification in the actual conditions of life. Such distinctions should have no place in the Census Report. We go further. The Census in almost every other country except India does not concern itself with the religious beliefs of the population. No question is permitted to be included as to a person's religious belief in the Census schedule. It is high time that this wholesome practice was introduced in this country. The next Census is due to be taken in 1931, and the preparations for it will have to begin soon. We suggest to Government that they should make the Census of 1931 absolutely undenominational and that questions relating to caste and creed should be omitted in the schedule. If any community wants to collect statistics relating specially to itself, it should organise its own special census as is done in other lands. Such omission will not in the least detract from the demographic value of the Census. It will rather increase it, as the communal differentiation certainly tends to cloud the purely demographic issues by extraneous considerations. It has been pointed out by more than one Census Superintendent that such sociological facts as the proportion of the sexes, for instance, conform more to territorial than to religious or racial groupings. The true significance of Indian demography can be studied only if we divest our minds of preconceptions about castes and communities. One such preconception, namely, that child marriages, prohibition of remarriages and so on are peculiar to the Hindus, is shown to be erroneous in the Age of Consent Committee's Report. Another preconception is also corrected in the same Report, namely, that child marriages are more prevalent among the higher than among the lower castes. The Census Reports for 1921 indulge less freely in ethnological and socio-religious speculations than the previous ones, and the Reports of 1931 may, with advantage, confine themselves to purely demographic issues.

Physical Training in Schools :—The most important recommendation of the Physical Training Committee which published its report recently, is the immediate establishment of a Department of Physical Education as an integral and indissoluble part of the Education Department. The Committee was appointed in 1927 and its terms of reference were to inquire and report on the question of physical training of pupils in Primary and Secondary Schools in the Presidency and to suggest means for its improvement. The conclusions arrived at by the Committee with regard to the existing conditions of physical education in schools show that they are inadequate, not well distributed and unsystematic. Enumerating the difficulties in the way of an introduction of an exhaustive scheme of physical training, the Committee is of opinion that it is the duty of the State to take the step, as it has behind it all the necessary resources. The Committee further states that uncoordinated private activities in this direction are not likely to be effective and therefore, postulates that an activity which would ensure the physical well-being of its subjects ought to be a first charge on the resources of the State. While we entirely agree with the Committee's opinion on the responsibility of the State in this matter, we do not think that it is justified in belittling private activities. With the creation of a new Department the Committee recommends the appointment of a director of Physical Education to organise it. The suggestion of the establishment of a Central Board of Physical Education has been put forward in order that the public should be intimately associated with the activities of the Department of Physical Education. We are glad that the Committee has taken into consideration the physical education of girls, the conditions governing which, they observe, are disappointing. The Committee's recommendations in regard to girls include the introduction of Indian exercises and games in purely Indian girls' schools and the appointment of a lady Physical Director for the Presidency.

Sind Relief Fund :—The province of Sind is having the most critical time on record. What with heavy rains and consequent bursting of the Shyok Dam there is much suffering and hardship. The much-dreaded disaster predicted by the rise of water in Attock passed off without affecting Sind. But the terrible floods in the Indus river still threaten to have serious consequences in Sind. The level in the Sukkur barrage is undiminished and more floods from Attock would bring disaster and desolation in their wake. The position in Sind is acute. The Governor of Bombay will inaugurate "the Governor's Fund for the Relief of Distress in Sind", on Monday the 2nd of September. It is the duty of every citizen in the Presidency to respond liberally to the appeal. The heart-rending cries of the stricken in Sind will not, we trust, go unheeded.

Flood Relief :—We have received from Mr. E. L. Bevan, Nizam's Dominions, two cheques for Rs. 50 each to be forwarded to the Treasurers of the Sind and Assam Flood Relief Funds. We have forwarded the donation to the Assam Fund to Mahatma Gandhi who is collecting for the Assam Flood Relief, and the Sind donation has been sent to the Servants of India Society.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, AUGUST 31, 1929.

AGE OF CONSENT COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

The Indian Social Reformer was started in the midst of a fierce agitation against a Bill to raise the "age of consent" from 10 to 12. To-day when it completes the thirty-ninth year of its existence, the country is again faced with proposals to raise "the age of consent" again. But how different are the conditions now from what they were then! Then, those who supported the small measure of reform were branded as traitors and apostates and at some places they were actually subjected to physical violence. To-day it is the opponents of the proposal to raise the age of consent and to fix a minimum age of marriage, who are a small minority and they keenly realise that they are pleading for a lost cause. There are persons who in and out of season declare that the efforts at social reform have failed and that only revolutionary methods have a chance of success. The great and radical change which has come over public opinion in the last forty years on the question of the "age of consent" is a conclusive answer to that asseveration. The efforts of reformers have, of course, been seconded and supported by the changes which have come over the country in the political and economic spheres. Even the communal movements which are often decried without discrimination have been of help. As the result of all these influences, there is to-day a deeper appreciation of the importance of social reform—the remodelling of society in the light of reason and experience—as the foundation of national advancement. Indian Society has been slow to move but now that it has started to move, the need for regulating its course and pace is as much a concern of social reformers as to lift it out of the rut in which it had stuck, a generation back.

The Report of the Age of Consent Committee which was appointed by Government in June last year, was issued this week. (Price Re. 1-6-0). Sir Moropant Joshi was its chairman and its terms of reference were to examine the state of the law relating to the Age of Consent as contained in the Indian Penal Code specially with regard to its suitability to conditions in this country; and to enquire into the effect of the amendments made by the Indian Penal Code and to report whether any further amendment is necessary as regards offences without and within the marriage relation. The terms contained no reference to the Sarda Marriage Bill pending before the Legislative Assembly. The Committee found no difficulty in fixing the "age of consent" as against strangers at 18—the present limit is 14—which was definitely favoured by the large majority of witnesses who appeared before the Committee and most of the witnesses, says the Report, who in their written statement suggested 16, readily and willingly agreed to 18 when orally examined before the Committee. The objections to 18, are easily disposed of by the Committee which points out that the change will bring the law of "age of consent" in line with the law relating to procurement and selling of minor girls for purposes of prostitution. It recommends that the ages in the law relating to enticing from lawful guardianship and the abduction of minor girls which at present are 16 and 14 respectively should be raised to 18 concurrently with the raising of the "age of consent." The Committee points out that these changes will be particularly helpful in dealing with the growing evil of brothels in big cities. It has been found by experience that the age-period at which girls are most in danger of being misled is between 16 and 18. Protection afforded to them at this critical stage, will be the means of saving them from a life of shame. The Committee recommends a more lenient sentence in the case of rape on girls between 16 and 18 than on girls below 16. Such distinctions in the criminal law are apt to be difficult to work in practice. The judge may be left to exercise his judicial discretion to modulate the sentence in the light of the circumstances of each case. The same remark applies to the exemption, proposed by the Committee, of the tribes in Assam and other places where a sort of "companionate" relation is customary prior to regular marriage.

The bulk of the Report is taken up with the difficult question of the "age of consent" in the marriage relation. In societies where child marriages are practically unknown, as in most modern countries, this question does not arise. Owing to the unfortunate fact that such marriages are still the rule in this country and that the evidence before the Committee showed that early marriages are in a large number of cases followed by early consummation, it becomes necessary to protect girl wives from being injured in health by premature consummation. This was the point which aroused the greatest opposition years ago. Four years ago a small advance was made by raising the "age of consent" in the marital relation to 13, but the Committee finds that this has not been effective in checking the evil. The Committee proposes to raise it to 15 but it has been forced to the conclusion that without a marriage law fixing a minimum age the raising of the "age of consent" alone would not be effective in giving sufficient protection to girl wives. It accordingly recommends the passing of a law fixing 14 as the minimum marriage age for girls. This may seem too low to many people in the cities where it is no rare thing for girls to remain unmarried at higher ages, but, as a first step, the Committee's recommendation may be accepted. It is worth consideration, however, if the age of consummation should not be fixed at 16 and not, as the Committee proposes, at 15. The Committee has recognised 16 as an age above which the offence by strangers must be considered to be deserving of less punishment than below, and the same limit may be fixed for the marriage relation. Above 16, there will be no offence in the case of husbands and a lighter one in case of strangers. It is desirable, as the Committee recognises in the case of offences against minor girls generally, that there should, as much as possible, be uniformity or at least not too many variations in these matters.

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

REFLECTIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XXXV. THE AGED.

(By DR. CLIFFORD MANSFORD, PH.D.)

Methuselah, with a reported age of nine hundred and sixty-nine years, is generally awarded the palm for longevity, but when we endeavour to discover his actual accomplishments the record is strangely silent. "He begat Lamech, ... and begat sons and daughters." Now the rearing of children is by no means to be disparaged, but one would hope that a man with such a lifetime before him would hand down to posterity a record of real achievement. Of what avail are years unless they are the symbol of work well done, of a world made happier and better. The great question of life is not "how long," but "how", and the answer for which we seek is, "Abundantly."

Though the tendency of youth is to feel itself self-sufficient, it has much to learn from age. The man who through long years has read widely, has thought deeply, has conversed wisely, has listened well; the man who has lived with the masters of art, music, literature and religion; the man who has taken part in civic enterprises and proven himself a friend of man; the man who has made progress towards understanding the meaning of life; such a man has a real contribution for those who will receive it. The message of age to youth is simple. It is but one word—"Live!"

Old age may be a benediction or a curse. It may be a time of remorse or a time of rejoicing. It may be the fitting crown of a life well-spent, or the dying wail of wasted years. What a tragedy to walk down "the sunset trail" and to find there darkness. What a triumph to stand at its end and to find there beauty. Life is very largely a product of our own workmanship. As we sow, so we reap. A life frivole away in empty nothingness brings little of joy in remembrance. A life that has conceived values in their proper relationships, that has placed first things first, can be lived and re-lived with the deepest pleasure. We, as we go through life, are living epistles "known and read of all men." May we make our writing clear!

THE LATE REV. R. A. HUME.

(By HIS SON.)

3. ACHIEVEMENT IN INDIA AND INDIAN FRIENDS.

The most obvious external single monument of his work in India was the building of the New Church in Ahmednagar. With its beautiful white dome built on the model of the Taj Mahal, and with the lotus flower as the chief decorative design, this was the second instance in all India of Oriental architecture being adapted for purposes of Christian worship. Dr. Charles Cuthbert Hall, President of Union Theological Seminary in New York City, when he visited that church on his Barrows Lectureship to India from the University of Chicago, wrote of it as follows:—

"I knew this church when it existed only in the soul of Dr. Hume. It is literally the achievement of faith and prayer.

"It stands in the frequented part of the city of Ahmednagar, not an ornament of the Cantonment where Europeans congregate. It stands where Indians live and pass and observe. It is not far from Hindu temples and other shrines of non-Christian worship. Silently and beautifully, as if with the conscious self-respect of a Christian apostle not ashamed of his Master and His message, this fair church plants itself in the thoroughfare of Oriental life, so that the people may worship, and even at noon-day may rest in its refreshing shadow.

"Outwardly it has the extraordinary beauty of being in architectural harmony with its Indian environment. It is not a bit of the West, set down in the East. In spirit and mode, it is an Oriental building. It is crowned by a dome which from a distance blends in the city's outline with the grace of a mosque. The Oriental eye, as it looks on this House of God, is not offended with any austere suggestion of Anglo-Saxonism. The lotus-flower, whose beautiful outline reappears in all the decorations, speaks its welcome to the Oriental sense of beauty.

"And yet it is distinctively a Christian House of Worship. The most casual visitor could not mistake it for anything else. Near the door-way on the outer wall is a board, modest and appropriate, with an invitation to all who pass by, to come in and rest within the open house of God. It is a beautiful contrast to the restrictions that hedge the entrance-way to so many non-Christian places of worship.

"Great is the wealth of promise represented by this church. The architectural spirit in which this building has been conceived is delicately sympathetic towards the preferences of the Oriental consciousness. May this be the accepted spirit in which, through the years to come, Christian churches shall be builded in India!"

HIS WORK IN INDIA.

He was an active literary worker and an incessant reader. For some years he was editor of the Dnyanodaya. He published two books in the United States,—“Missions from the Modern View” in 1905, and “An Interpretation of India’s Religious History” in 1911. In India he published about two-hundred pamphlets, both in English and in Marathi. Some of these were translated into other vernaculars in India.

Besides education and evangelism, he was keen on every kind of improvement, both industrial and social and national. He was a member of the Ahmednagar Municipality. An Indian electorate returned him as their representative to the Indian National Congress. The Governor of Bombay appointed him on the Presidency’s Committee on Problems of Religious Mendicancy. He was the only American to be summoned to give testimony before the Montagu-Chelmsford Commission on problems of political progress. In the great famine of 1898–1900 he organised famine relief from the United States under a Committee, the Chairman of which was the late Mr. John Crosby Brown, senior partner of the firm of Brown Brothers, Bankers, Wall Street, New York, who also was the President of the Board of Directors of Union Theological Seminary. The Christian Herald, an enterprising weekly of New York City, also opened its columns for gathering money and a ship-load of corn to be sent to India. By these means in the United States and through a representative committee in India he helped to raise and to distribute over two million dollars of charitable relief to the distressed people of India. He was not satisfied with temporary rescue from starvation. But, without any financial assistance from the Mission Board, he secured, and brought to India, an agricultural expert and an industrial expert to teach improved methods of raising food and of artisanship. Both of these American experts proved themselves so valuable that the Government invited them over to permanent higher-salaried positions.

FRIENDS IN INDIA.

He was an intimate friend of many Indian leaders. He enjoyed much his association with the Indian Christian leaders, both those in the Marathi Mission and in various other Missions. He prized also his personal friendship with Hindu leaders, such as Gopal Krishna Gokhale, one of the early leaders in the Indian National Congress, member of the Viceroy’s Legislative Council, and Founder of The Servants of India Society, whose utterances he often quoted. Dr. Hume also enjoyed the friendship of Sir Narayan Ganesh Chandavarkar, Justice of the High Court of Bombay, Vice-Chancellor of the University of Bombay, and leader of the Prarthana Samaj wing of Hinduism. Dr. Hume, who himself had studied Sanskrit in Yale with the eminent American Sanskritist Professor William Dwight Whitney, enjoyed scholarly and personal comradeship with that most eminent Sanskritist of the Bombay Presidency, Sir Ramkrishna Gopal Bhandarkar of Poona. In 1907 and again in 1923, when his eldest son arrived in Bombay, Dr. Hume took him, even before they should go up to the Mission bungalow in Byculla, to call upon his especially esteemed Indian friend, Mr. K. Natarajan, the Editor of the Indian Social Reformer. In all his philanthropic work he found a ready co-worker in the Parsi philanthropist, Mr. B. N. Malabari. In his religious work, and even in personal religious devotion, he had a dearly esteemed comrade in the Buddhist Dr. Nair, who received him into the family devotions upstairs over the Medical Hall on Lamington Road, Bombay. At the centenary celebration of the beginning of the Marathi Mission and of America’s missionary connection with India in the Town Hall, Bombay, on November 7, 1913, the address expressing “India’s Appreciation of America’s Interest and Help” was delivered by his good Hindu friend, Mr. Gopal Krishna Devadhar, now the First Member of the Servants of India Society. The Chairman of that Centenary Celebration in the Town Hall was Sir Henry Proctor, head of the British India Steam Navigation Company.

Dr. Hume was a friend of many Government officials. To Lord Lytton, Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, he said in Government House, Calcutta, “Your Excellency! The finest code of statesmanship ever written, which you will find efficacious in your dealings with the people of India, is summarized in the single word ‘Love’ in Saint Paul’s Epistle to the Corinthians at the thirteenth chapter.” He knew personally every Governor of the Bombay Presidency during his fifty-two years of residence in that Presidency. When he heard that his friend Mahatma Gandhi had to be operated upon for appendicitis in Yeravda Jail, Dr. Hume travelled to Bombay, in order to call upon the new Governor, Sir Leslie Wilson, who had arrived only three weeks previous. Dr. Hume said to him. “Your Excellency! As it was the unhappy lot of your predecessor in this office to issue the order for the arrest of Gandhi in this Presidency, I believe that it will prove to be your most effective stroke of diplomacy and most glorious personal act in your five years of office, if you will issue an order to release Gandhi unconditionally.” The Bombay Governor of course had to take counsel with the Government of India. But in two days that recently arrived Governor of Bombay did issue the order for the unconditional release of Gandhi from jail. The same Sir Leslie Wilson, on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the beginning of Dr. Hume’s missionary work in India, wrote for that occasion a letter which included the following sentences:

“I am confident that any words of mine, expressing gratitude for his services, would be echoed by my predecessors in office, who, I know, have fully recognised the value of Dr. Hume’s services during this long period. I believe that there is no one of any community in India who does not feel grateful to him for the work which he is doing, and has done.”

Dr. Hume was the first American missionary to be awarded the royal decoration, the "Kaisar-i-Hind Gold Medal for Public Service in India." This was conferred upon him by Queen Victoria's last New Year's Honors List on January 1, 1901.

His services in various distinctively Christian organizations were both recognized and given further opportunities, when he was elected Presidency Representative Missionary Council, and President of the National Christian Council, and President of the Christian Endeavor Union of India. One of the accomplishments for which he labored especially and eagerly was in the direction of co-operative unity among Christians. This was accomplished through the organisation of the United Church of India North, which elected him as its first Moderator, although he was to remain in India only another year. In the summer of 1927 he travelled from the United States and back in order to represent that United Church of India North at the World-Conference on Christian Faith and Order in Lausanne, Switzerland. In 1919 he was elected Vice-Moderator of the National Congregational Council of the United States.

He died in the Corey Hill Hospital, Brookline, Boston, Massachusetts, on June 24, 1929 at the age of eighty-two. In accordance with his strongly expressed wish, his body was cremated, to accord with the most usual custom of disposal of the dead in India. His ashes were taken in a small urn from the Mount Auburn Crematory near Boston by his brother-in-law, Rev. Dr. Edward Fairbank, who was returning to missionary work in India on July 12, 1929 from New York. These last earthly remains will be deposited in Ahmednagar, the place where Dr. Hume has lived through most of his fifty-two years of missionary service in India.

"THE SCOUT MOVEMENT IN INDIA".

The Editor, the Indian Social Reformer,

Sir:—After reading in the Reformer for August 17th, the article "Scout Movement in India" by S. D. Chitale, I am constrained to make the following remarks. First I will mention four points in which I think the views of Mr. Chitale are not quite correct and then I shall outline briefly the the good points of the All India Movement.

1. In the first paragraph it is said that the government started the Scout Movement in India. This is not true. For a long time the government refused permission for the Scout Movement to be put into the schools. Several independent groups of Scouts were organized. Finally when permission was given some of these independent groups joined the All-India Scout Movement. Encouragement from the government has helped greatly in the movement but the Scout Organization has no connection with government as such.

2. Next the inference is made that any organization which government aids or approves is bound on all occasions to be pro-government. Here it should be pointed out that the Scout Movement has no political purpose and cannot properly be called pro-government, anti-nationalist or nationalist. The members of the organization are free to adopt any political views which appeal to them after they reach the age at which politics would interest them. Boys between the ages of 8 and 16 are not likely to have very definite political convictions. To think that all Scouts will blindly follow government all their lives is as reasonable to think that all boys educated in government and aided schools will do the same. Practically all of the leaders in even those political groups most violently opposed to government got their education in such schools.

3. It is further stated that in the very important matter of helping in "the nation's struggle for freedom", "the Scout Movement in this country is a complete failure and does not deserve the support of the country." In reply to this I would say that one of the first efforts of the Scout Movement is to teach every scout to love his country. Each scout is also developed in the spirit of self-confidence and love of freedom which will make him a good citizen and a true patriot. If all the people of India knew and believed the principles of scouting and practised them faithfully there would be no struggle for freedom. Freedom would be here just as naturally as the sun rises in the morning.

4. Lastly Mr. Chitale thinks there would be gain in promoting a rival movement. India is already divided in too many things where there should be unity. I believe that the advantages of the present movement are such that efforts to rival or supplant it would do more harm than good. If we are to have a variety of scout organizations based on political differences the next step would be communal scout organizations. This would be a great calamity.

The good points of the All-India Scout Movement may be briefly summed up as follows:—

1. The movement is based on the principles of Loyalty, Brotherhood and Service which are the real foundations of true patriotism and love of liberty. It keeps carefully away from political or party propaganda or any other activity that is likely to obscure its real aims.

2. The Scout Movement unites boys of all races, nations and creeds. This is an advantage that should not be lightly given up.

3. The movement has shown itself capable of adaptation to the conditions and needs of each country where it has gone. Many such adjustments and changes have already been made in the organization and more can be made as they are needed. Any really desirable thing that is now lacking in the movement may be aided by the sympathetic co-operation of all those who are interested in preparing the boys of to-day to be the good and loyal citizens of the India of to-morrow.

CHRISTIAN MISSION IN INDIA.

II.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,
Sir,

We have been reading with great interest the series of articles and discussions that recently appeared in the Indian Social Reformer in regard to Christian Missions, and in the issue of August 3, we find an editorial with the caption "The Failure of Christianity". To support his arguments the editor gives excerpts from an article by Prof. J. S. Hoyland in the Nineteenth Century and After. We will just quote two of them:—

"It is, of course, an extremely difficult task to convince the educated Indian that Christianity can be separated from Western civilisation. It can only be accomplished by the missionary's frankly, and freely acknowledging to him the un-Christlikeness, even the anti-Christlikeness, of much in the West, especially of the Western State system, and by his taking up the attitude that the West needs the help of the East in finding the true meaning of Christ.....Hence the missionary now goes, and must recognise that he goes, as the representative of a discredited order of civilisation which has led directly to world warfare, a religious system which failed to prevent that appalling catastrophe."

As we read the challenging words from a missionary who has given the best part of his life to the service of India, we wonder after all whether the great war is the test for the failure or success of Christianity in India. Only 15 years have elapsed since the War, but how are we to judge the failure or otherwise of Christianity before this event. Are we to take it for granted that it was a success? War is as much a human institution as slavery, duelling and absolute monarchy, and most of these cruel institutions have disappeared as a result of strong public opinion. In this age of democracy when public sentiment finds easy expression and public opinion is brought to bear upon the legislators of the nations, the institution of war is not likely to last long as we have evidence already in the enactment of the Kellogg Pact. The great war did not come as a surprise to Indians. Any student of modern history could have easily predicted that terrible cataclysm. War was bound to come in the nature of things. When there was a competition of armaments, when nations vied with each other in the exploitation of weaker races, and when nation after nation was fighting hard for the industrial and commercial supremacy of the world, just a shot in Sarajevo was enough to set the world ablaze. Indians did not in the least expect Christianity to stop the war. The fact that Christianity with its emphasis on meekness, humility, mercy and love did not stop the war was more a shock to the Christian nations than to the people of India. We must admit that what went under the name of "Christian Civilisation" was greatly discredited after the war,

Then what is the cause of the failure of Christianity in India? Prof. Graham Wallas writing in his Human Nature in Politics says,— "Christianity has conspicuously failed even to produce a tolerable working compromise," and "on the practical point.....whether the stronger race should base its plans of extension on extermination of the weaker race or on an attempt, within the limits of racial possibility, to improve it, Christians have, during the nineteenth century, been infinitely more ruthless than Mohammedans, though their ruthlessness has often been disguised by more or less conscious hypocrisy." (pp. 288-89).

This is a very serious indictment against Christianity, and it is made not by an extremist, an amateur, or even an anti-Christian, for Prof Wallas is one of the foremost of social scientists and has won admiration and respect from both sides of the Atlantic by his important contribution to the study of social psychology. As we ponder over the treatment given to Indians in the British Dominions and Colonies, the injustice meted out to Indians in some cases, when arrayed against Britishers in Indian courts of law, and when we realise the extent of exploitation of the Negro in Africa and America in the name of "civilisation" we cannot but agree with Prof. Wallas. We read in the Bible, "God created man in His own image", "God made of one blood all nations of men", and "This is my commandment that ye love one another", and at once we are struck with the cardinal principles of Christianity,—Fatherhood of God and Brotherhood of Man. This is the only justification for Christian Missions in India, and day in and day out Christian missionaries have been presenting Christianity as superior to other religions on the strength of these principles. But yet what do we see around us to-day? Mahatma Gandhi and many other thinkers, Christian as well as non-Christian, have been noticing a great difference between the practice of Christianity and of Islam. The blackest of Zulus admitted into Islam are eagerly and immediately claimed as brothers by the whitest of Moslems. This is real brotherhood at least as far as that religion goes. Now what about Christianity? Brotherhood as taught by Christianity is, of course, more comprehensive. But what is the practice? Let us imagine an Indian Christian being introduced to an American. The American, though himself a Christian, at once thinks of his fellow Christian in terms of his colour and race and not in terms of his religion. To him the newcomer is an Indian, darker in colour and racially inferior to him. Anyway this is his presumption. The white Moslem on the other hand, thinks of the Zulu in terms of his religion and not in terms of any particular colour or race. Indians, though caste-ridden, are usually colour blind and have no racial arrogance about them. It is easy to preach, to heal and render other kinds of social service. One could easily content himself by living in a remote village and working for the poor, the outcaste and the down-trodden. It was some years ago that a young English curate coming out to India as a missionary wrote to Dr. Tagore about his decision. In Dr. Tagore's reply we find:

"Do not be always trying to preach your doctrine, but give yourself in love. Your western mind is too much obsessed with the idea of conquest and possession, your inveterate habit of proselytism is another form of it. Christ never preached himself any dogma or doctrine; he preached the love of God. The object of a Christian should be to be like Christ, never to be like a coolie-recruiter trying to bring coolies to his master's tea-garden. Preaching your doctrine is no sacrifice at all; it is indulging in a luxury, far more dangerous than all luxuries of material living. It breeds illusion in your mind that you are doing your duty, that you are wiser and better than your fellow beings. But the real preaching is in being perfect, which is through meekness and love and self-dedication. If you have in you pride of race, pride of sect and pride of personal superiority strong, then it is no use to try to do good to others....."

All these forms of philanthropic service are nothing when compared to the courage and sacrifice required to condemn injustice and exploitation in high places, to face persecution and scorn and to lead a lonely and unhappy life being misunderstood by one's own countrymen. India is at the parting of the ways, and in this hour of her travail and darkness when mighty forces are arrayed against her coming to her own, when capitalistic and racial interests are choking and stifling her, and when subsidised propaganda is freely used against her attaining self-government, she needs the inspiration, love and sacrifice of missionaries of the type of Mr. C. F. Andrews, who has so completely identified himself with the cause of India. He is not an arm-chair missionary who believes he has done his duty if he preaches, "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ and you will be saved." Such a kind of Christianity is cheap and easy and the religion of Jesus was not of this flabby and nerveless kind. If he had taught and followed such an easy religion he would not have had to suffer and die such an ignominious death on the cross. Mr. Andrews, on the other hand, is the friend of the oppressed and the suppressed and in him we see the Spirit of the Master manifested in a unique manner.

Is it any wonder that the name of Mr. Andrews is a household name throughout India, Burma and Ceylon, and how naturally Hindus, Mahomedans and members of other communities look upon him as the ideal missionary! Would that we had half a dozen missionaries of his type? Thomas Arnold, at a time when the British Government was taking a course that he felt was wrong, wrote in a letter, "I suffer from a daily painfulness, a moral east wind that makes me uncomfortable, although I have no ailment of my own."

There are quite a number of sincere missionaries who feel that way, but who would have the courage and depth of conviction to accept the challenge and come to the open to fight against injustice, exploitation and wickedness as Andrews has done? He has taken the wrongs of India on his own heart and has willingly borne persecution, scorn and sham. He never quailed but has boldly paid the cost of such a sacrifice. His is not "a fugitive and cloistered virtue unexercised and unbreathed, that never sallies out and seeks her adversary, but slinks out of the race where that immortal garland is to be run for, not without dust and heat." India would eagerly welcome missionaries of this type and it is such men and women who have helped the progress of Christianity in this country. There was a stage in the evolution of India when she needed the love and devotion of such pioneering missionaries as Duff, Carey and William Miller, and we are grateful to God and to the host of missionaries who have given themselves freely and untiringly to the service of India. But that stage is now past. What is demanded now is a more virile form of Christianity, missionaries and Christian leaders who dare to face the battle and its dangers, and who would condemn in the strongest terms possible, wherever it may be found, the racialism that is eating into the very vitals of personal and international relationship, and embittering all that is holy and sacred in human personality. The acid test of Christianity does not consist in founding hospitals and orphanages, in the establishment of schools and colleges, not even in the 'saving' of souls, however good, noble and laudable these may be, but it consists in the willingness to pay the cost of a sacrifice which would involve suffering, persecution, misunderstanding and even imprisonment and death; it would require the courage of a Wilberforce, William Lloyd Garrison and Gandhi to fight and expose the wickedness in high places, to bring reconciliation between the Indian and the Britisher, between the Hindu and the Moslem; it would need a prophet's vision, his fearlessness and his spiritual insight to feel the woes, the pathos and tragedy of a suffering humanity. Such a kind of religion and such a kind of Christianity are well worth living and dying for.

"THE FUTURE OF CHRISTIAN MISSIONS."

The able Editor of the Indian Social Reformer has written an editorial leading article on this subject in its issue of August 10. A Perplexed Missionary had written to the Editor expressing doubts if he was needed in India as a Missionary. The Editor published the full text of the letter and invited other missionaries and the public to express their opinions on the issues raised. In the article the Editor has given his point of view on the subject. His advice to Mr. Perplexed is simple: "Come back to India by all means, but do not think of yourself too much as making a sacrifice for or conferring a favour upon India."

Mr. Natarajan is very appreciative of Christian Missionaries, but he believes that their purpose of conversion has put them and Indians in a false position towards one another. "Because of this," he goes on to say, "their philanthropic activities have the character of interested propaganda and are distrusted, as all propaganda is, even by those who are benefited by them. Christian Missions have thus come to be regarded as agencies of religion-exploitation just as there are agencies for political and commercial exploitation. But while the foreign administrator and investor do not profess to be superior to the Indian in religion and morals, the Missionary lays his axe at the root of Indian culture and civilisation very much like the Bolshevik at the root of culture and civilisation of the West"

These words are written by one who can be regarded as a friend of Christian Missions in India. It cannot be denied that there is an element of truth in them, but the Editor of the Social Reformer cannot be unaware that many Missionaries themselves have repudiated the charge that they are only propagandists, merely interested in service to the humanity from the point of view of narrow proselytism. A book has just been published by Macmillans, edited by a well-known educational Missionary of the very City from which the Reformer is published. In this book experienced and responsible Christian workers have dealt with "The Christian Task in India". The Editor of the Reformer will find in the book a clear and undisputed recognition of the principles he has been trying to enunciate, with perhaps two qualifications. In the first place, the Christian Missionary can only assume the task that he has undertaken, because the deeper spiritual purposes in his own life constrain him to do so. His philanthropy must be based on some inward experience that drives him to the mission field. Otherwise even as pure philanthropy it will be futile, as very often it is. In the second place he cannot but desire to express his own spiritual purposes and experiences in his daily tasks, and to share them with those with whom he comes in contact in a natural way. While he must give the best he has to those whom he seeks to serve in the fashion of His Master, mere conversions, in the sense of the multiplication the Christian Community can have no charm or appeal to him. * INDIA AND ENGLAND.

(By MR. J. S. HOYLAND, BIRMINGHAM.)

The coming twelve months may well be the most important period in the history of the relationships between England and India. For in that period there has to be decided the question of the future government of India. There is not much time left for consideration. The condition of affairs in that country is now rapidly approaching that which obtained in Ireland before 1920 and in America before 1775. To one like the present writer, who spent many years in intimate contact with educated Indians, there would seem to be no possibility of doubt that unless England is now at last generous to India in the gift of self-government, a tragedy is inevitable whose magnitude will exceed proportionately those of the two dates just named.

* The Indian Ferment. By H. G. Alexander. (Williams & Norgate. 7s. 6d.)

At such a juncture it is fortunate that there should appear a book by an English Quaker—for Quakers have ever been both lovers of truth and friends of freedom—giving an impartial and detached impression of the position of affairs in India. H. G. Alexander is an outstanding proof of the soundness of the principle that 'the onlooker sees most of the game.' There is a class of writer who makes a 'three-months' tour through India, and then writes a hasty volume, whose rashness in unfounded assertion is only equalled by its cocksureness. H. G. Alexander does not belong to this class. His judgments are put forward diffidently and with modesty. Yet he travelled far and wide through India, in his pursuit of facts about opium, and he took an infinitude of pains in the endeavour to make himself thoroughly conversant with the position of opinion not only amongst the British officials (though these also he frequently consulted), but also amongst the Indians themselves.

In consequence he has produced a volume the soundness of whose judgments may be vouched for at almost every point by those of us who have found these same opinions built up in us inexorably, through years of work in a particular part of India, and yet could never have spoken with such weight ourselves, since we have not had the same opportunity of seeing things in the large, on a nationwide scale. At almost every point, as I read this book, I find myself endorsing whole-heartedly both the analysis of existing conditions given by H. G. Alexander, and his opinion regarding what is needful in the political future.

First, as regards existing conditions: H. G. Alexander quotes melancholy evidence, even from Indian Government officials, regarding the gulf which yawns between the British and the Indians. 'Is it not really amazing that men should be appointed as Ministers to defend their policy in a Council (that of Bengal) when they cannot understand the language of the country?' 'The worst feature of the present system seems to me to be the almost complete lack of understanding or sympathy between the English and the educated Indian.' 'An Indian sub-judge who seemed to me to be one of the most reasonable men present said fiercely that the British officials are perfectly ignorant of the real life of India.' 'The Englishman constantly declares his belief that the East can understand nothing but force. The Easterner naturally comes to believe that this Western Trust force proves that the Westerner himself can understand no other argument. From what I have seen of Indian students I certainly think many of them want to use force. Amongst young English business men in Calcutta the recognised opening for a conversation with a stranger about India is to abuse all Indians as incompetent, untrustworthy, deceitful, and so on.' 'Pandit Motilal Nehru (the Swarajist leader) thought the exploitation of India was necessary to English prosperity, so it was useless to believe in England's fair promises.' 'I believe the notion that magnificence makes a good impression on Indian people is quite false.' Above all, this 'No Indian seems now to believe in the possibility that we British as a people can ever understand their needs or meet them with generous, humble sympathy.'

This is a dark picture, but it is a sound one, of the present position of opinion in India. As regards the future, H. G. Alexander says some weighty truths regarding the liberation of the depressed classes in India by Indians who have a Christ-like spirit. It must be a work done by Indians for themselves in freedom, through the permeation of Indian life and society by the ideals of Christ. He draws attention also, in an arresting way, to the great Women's Movement which is the most hopeful sign of the present-day reform of India from within. In the sphere of politics he is convinced that freedom is the only solution to the present situation. 'We have sown the seed,' but our Western methods of tending the crop will not do. If it is to ripen, those who know the nature of the soil must tend the crop, even though they seem to us incompetent.' These are wise words.

He insists, and rightly, that there is no risk of India by some other Power if the British loosen control. The case of China in recent years proves this. The whole matter is thus summed up, 'There seem to be only two alternatives: to yield full responsibility, or to rule by the sword. Our immediate duty to India is to hand over complete responsibility for the government of the country without delay.' If we do the generous thing by them at this juncture, the Indian leaders will meet us half-way, with reciprocal generosity. 'Is there a Campbell-Bannerman in Britain to-day?'

This book has appeared in the nick of time. It is even yet not too late for England to be generous to India. If that greatly to be desired result is to be achieved, opinions like those of H. G. Alexander must be read and disseminated as widely as possible.

The book is diversified with delightful observations on the bird life of India.

SOCIAL PERSECUTION.

(By MR. HAR BHAGWAN, LAHORE).

The people of the North are not so conservative in social matters as those of the South. The incessant inroads of the foreigners from the North-West, which culminated in the Mahammadan conquests, and the consequent migration of the Brahmans to the South, have been responsible for weakening the forces of orthodoxy. The effects of the superiority of the Brahmans are, therefore, not so terrible in the Punjab as in other Provinces. There are places—especially towns—where the cobra of caste distinctions has been made quite impotent, but the citadels of orthodoxy are also not wanting, where organised opposition is offered whenever a spirited soul ventures to break away from the fetters of caste.

Recently two inter-caste marriages have been celebrated under the auspices of the Jat-Pat Torak Mandal, Lahore—one at Chiniot, district Jhang, (Punjab), and the other at Lhaksar, district Saharanpur (U. P.). The opposition was so strong at Chiniot that the parties concerned have had to smuggle through at Lahore for getting the marriage consecrated. At Lhaksar, social persecution grew so bad that the marriage ceremony was performed under police vigilance. At Chiniot the brother of the girl, who is a doctor, was subjected to severe persecution. He was not only expelled from his caste brotherhood but was also forced to vacate his rented shop. Hindus did not give him any place for carrying on his business, for which he was willing to pay any rent. When a shop was secured from a Muhammadan the Hindus were audacious enough to have a theft effected and his things carried away. But our hero was not cowed down, and we are glad he is still suffering persecution patiently and cheerfully. The bridegroom, on the other hand, has been advised not to return to his home as yet for fear that his wife might be snatched away from him, and he may have to remain in exile for good.

At Lhaksar Mr. Vidya Brat, the only guardian of his sister, was threatened by the caste panchayat who, with a view to dissuade him from marrying her out of his caste, said that only then could he save himself and the bridegroom's party from bloodshed. After the culprits were bound down and the police had placed a picket at the village, our comrade was able to have the marriage celebrated, boycotted by his relatives and caste people.

These spirited souls are the members of the Jat-Pat Torak Mandal, Lahore, and we are proud of the determination and capacity for patient suffering that they have displayed. The movement for caste destruction is sure to flourish with the increase in men resolved definitely to break caste and we are happy that our members are made of such stuff. These persecutions are bound to disappear with the multiplication of intercaste marriages, and even if they persist they will add fuel to the fire. The foundations of orthodoxy are shaken, and we can visualise the day when North and South will combine in their effort to purge India of the evil of caste system.

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.
