CONTENTS.

INTRODUCTORY CHAPTER.

Rapid survey of the history of Rome from the death of Julius Cæsar to the battle of Actium PAGE I

CHAPTER I.

AUGUSTUS: B.C. 31—A.D. 14.

The change in Octavianus after he gained absolute power, not a mere change of policy, but of temper and demeanour—The change in the forms of the constitution—The proposal to resign—He avoids the title of king, or of dictator—Had already taken the name of Cæsar—Is styled Augustus—Takes the old republican titles—The old offices of the executive—New offices created—The Senate—Privy Council—The government of the provinces—Senatorial provinces—Imperial provinces—General character of the new régime—The homely manners of Augustus—Liberal outlay for public objects—Ready acquiescence in these changes—The chief ministers of Augustus—Agrippa—His energy, self-sacrifice—Public works—Marries Marcella—Retires to Lesbos—Marries Julia—Dies—Mæcenas—His diplomatic skill—The chief adviser of Augustus—Influenced the tone of Roman circles through the poets—His domestic trials—Livia—Sources of her influence over Augustus, and its nature—Suspicion of her sinister dealings to secure the succession of Tiberius—Treatment of Agrippa Postumus—Story of Livia poisoning Augustus—Julia—Her betrothals and marriages—Extravagance and profligacy at last made known to her father—Her banishment and misery—Disasters in Germany—Defeat of Lollius—Loss of Varus with three legions—Panic at Rome, and grief of Emperor—Augustus grew morose, and resented criticism—Leges majestatis enforced against authors—Ovid—Banished to Tomi—Augustus at last less popular at Rome than in the provinces—Died at Nola—His survey of the Roman world, and summary of official statistics, and advice to his successors—The Monumentum Ancyranum—Augustus deified—Explanations : 1. Polytheism less scrupulous ; 2. Eastern peoples had deified their kings ; 3. The rationalising tendency ; 4. The Italian worship of the Lares especially fostered by Augustus—Augustales PAGE 6

CHAPTER II.

TIBERIUS : A.D. 14-37

The early life of Tiberius—Little liked by Augustus—His retirement to Rhodes—He wished to return to Rome, but was not allowed—His danger and suspense—Livia procures his recall and adoption by Augustus—He was usually away from Rome with the army—Recalled to the death-bed of Augustus—Precautions of Livia—Claim to succeed based on adoption and tribunicia potestas—Consent of the legions all-important—They were in mutiny—Caution of Tiberius, and ambiguous language—He shrank from titles of honour and from flattery—Referred all business to the Senate, but neglected the popular assemblies and the amusements of the people—Seemed anxious to govern well—The great influence of Livia, now called Augusta—Her politic patronage of art—Tiberius showed jealousy of the honour paid to Augusta—Fear of Germanicus, who was recalled from Germany and sent on a mission to the East—The appointment of Cn. Piso to be governor of Syria—His offensive conduct to Germanicus, who believed that he was poisoned by Piso—Grief at Rome when the death of Germanicus was known—Popular suspicions—The people disliked Tiberius from the first—Reasons—The 'delatores' of the Empire now first appeared—Their influence under Tiberius, and increase in numbers—The character of Sejanus—His rise in power and favour—He schemed to revenge himself on Drusus for the insult of a blow—Seduced Livilla, and poisoned Drusus, widened the breach between Tiberius and Agrippina, and urged Tiberius to leave Rome—Tiberius retired to Capræ—The death of Augusta, followed by the fall of Agrippina and her children—The fate of Asinius Gallus—The great power of Sejanus at Rome, his haughtiness—Suspensions of Tiberius at length aroused—His dissimulation—The scene in the Senate-house, where the Emperor's letter is read, and Sejanus is dragged off to death—Cruelty of Tiberius—The trials and bloodshed at Capræ—His death—The pleas of later critics in favour of a new estimate of the character of Tiberius—The testimony of Valerius Maximus and Velleius Paterculus—The marks of bias and exaggeration in the common story—The assumptions as to the memoirs of Agrippina, and the guilt of the victims of Tiberius—Ancient writers have formed too harsh an opinion of his motives in some cases, and reported scandalous gossip too lightly PAGE 42

CHAPTER III.

CALIGULA: A.D. 37-41.

The general joy at the death of Tiberius, and at the succession of Caius, named Caligula—The claims of the young grandchild of Tiberius were ignored—The general gladness—The Emperor's popularity and sense of power turned his head—He claimed divine honours—Could bear no rival greatness, as in the case of Seneca and Domitius Afer—Was jealous even of the dead—Thought himself raised above moral laws, and indulged in wild caprices—His devices to refill his exhausted coffers—Resorted to confiscation—Morbid ferocity—The campaign in Germany—Audacious close—His wild dreams of massacre 71

CHAPTER IV.

CLAUDIUS: A.D. 41-54.

The hesitation of the Senate after the murder of Caius—The soldiers meantime saluted Claudius Emperor—In early life he had been weak in mind and body—He had sorry treatment from Tiberius and Caius, and indulged in coarse habits, but he had literary tastes—As Emperor he was ruled by wives and freedmen—The domestic position of the freedmen of Rome, and in the imperial household—Their ambition and greed and opportunities of gaining wealth—Pallas—Narcissus—Polybius—Callistus—Felix—Posides—Claudius kept in good humour by his freedmen—His love for judicial work, and care for provisioning Rome—Want of dignity in his proclamations—A campaign and victory arranged for him—Scandalous traffic of the freedmen—They confiscate the property of the rich by working on their master's fears—His wives—Messalina—Her unbounded wantonness and cruelty—At last she causes public scandal by marrying Silius—Narcissus tells Claudius, and procures her death—Debate among the freedmen as to the choice of a new wife—Agrippina, his niece, carried off the prize, and showed at once her intention to rule supreme—Had Octavia betrothed to her son, and the trusted servants of Britannicus removed—Afraid of Narcissus and delay, she had Claudius poisoned—The satire of Seneca on the deification of Claudius PAGE 81

CHAPTER V.

NERO: A.D. 54-68.

The early life of Nero—Saluted as Emperor by the soldiers—His mother, Agrippina, tried at first to govern, but Burrhus and Seneca took her place and ruled in his name—He showed a passion for the fine arts and for low dissipation—His impatience of his mother's restraint—Treatment of Britannicus and Octavia—The attempts to poison Agrippina failed—The dark scheme to drown her in the Bay of Naples—Its failure followed by her murder—Burrhus and Seneca defended the deed—Nero gave himself up to his pleasures, drove freeborn Romans on the stage, and at last appeared on it himself—Nero had a real love of art, but the art was bad—Nero's extravagant display, especially in building—The great fire of Rome—The strange rumours of his conduct and suspicions—He had the 'Golden House' built for him—Its most privileged inmates—To turn suspicion from himself Nero made the Christians his victims and his scapegoats—His victims generally of a higher rank—His aunt—His wife Octavia—Poppæa—Burrhus—Seneca spared for a time—Philosophers were looked on with distrust—Stoicism especially distasteful to the prince, but spread rapidly through society—The character and fate of Thrasea Pætus, of Seneca, and of Corbulo—Other victims—Lucan fell into disgrace at court—Took part in a conspiracy and lost both life and honour—Petronius Arbiter excited the jealousy of Tigellinus, and died with frivolous indifference—The rising in Britain and great loss of life and other disasters of the time—The revolt of Vindex in Gaul, taken up by Galba after the death of Vindex—Nero's indifference at first, followed by despair—He fled to a freedman's house and hid himself, then at last found nerve to kill himself—Strange affection for his memory shown by some of the populace—Pretenders appeared in his name PAGE 99

CHAPTER VI.

GALBA : A. D. 68-69.

The career of Galba before his accession—As governor of Spain he had only a small force—Rival pretenders rose and fell, and Galba made his way to Rome without a struggle, but preceded by ugly rumours—Discontent of the marines, prætorians, legionaries, and city populace, of Nero's servants and favourites, and of the Senate—The favourites of Galba shamelessly abuse their power—Galba adopted Piso as his colleague, but Otho intrigued with the soldiers of the guard, and was saluted Emperor—Galba set out for the camp, but while on his way was set upon and killed, and Piso, who had fled to sanctuary, was killed at the temple steps 122

CHAPTER VII.

OTHO : A.D. 69.

Otho's early career of dissipation—Of better repute in provincial rule—Returned to Rome with Galba and displaced him—He gained the soldiers' loyalty and love—But the armies of the Rhine had chosen Vitellius, and were on the march to Rome—After fruitless overtures of peace, Otho marched to meet them—His generals urged delay, but he would not wait—His army was routed on the battle-field of Bedriacum, and he died by his own hand PAGE 128

CHAPTER VIII.

VITELLIUS : A.D. 69.

The antecedents of Vitellius—Sent by Galba to command the army on the Rhine—Glutton and spendthrift though he was he won the affection of the soldiers—Valens and Cæcina, being disaffected to Galba, stir the army and put Vitellius forward ; he is proclaimed Emperor—The march into Italy and victory of Bedriacum—The entry into Rome of the soldiers of the Rhine with Vitellius—His favourites governed while he feasted—But in the East Vespasian was soon in arms—The treachery of Bassus and Cæcina, and second battle of Bedriacum—Sad fate of Cremona—Vitellius tried to abdicate but was prevented by the soldiers, who stormed the Capitol—In the fray the temple of Jupiter was burnt—Antonius entered Rome and slaughtered the Vitellians—Vitellius was dragged from his hiding-place and slain 132

CHAPTER IX.

VESPASIAN : A.D. 69-79.

The humble origin and chequered career of Vespasian—He is sent to command in Judæa—He showed his skill and won the soldiers' trust—Titus and Mucianus pressed him to make himself Emperor, and he consented with reluctance—The rebellion in Gaul and Germany : Its causes, early successes, and speedy failure—

Vespasian restored order at Rome—The causes of the insurrection in Judæa, and earlier relations of the Jews to Rome—A hasty rising at Jerusalem spread widely till Vespasian was sent to command the army—The siege of Jerusalem was left to Titus to finish—The obstinate defence and utter destruction of the city and temple—The triumph after the Jewish war as described by Josephus—The economy and homely tastes of Vespasian—He needed and raised a large revenue, and imposed new tolls and taxes—But the money was well used for public objects—He was free from jealousy and suspicion, yet was persuaded to put to death Helvidius Priscus, and also J. Sabinus, in spite of the story of his wife's faithful love—Vespasian worked hard and died in harness—The characteristic jest at his funeral . . . PAGE 141

CHAPTER X.

TITUS: A.D. 79-81.

The bright prospects of the early life of Titus—His ambitious hopes and intrigues in Judæa—Skill in the siege and cruelty to the prisoners—He shared the imperial power with his father, and studied magnificence of outward show—Money was spent largely on great works—His relations with Berenice were so unpopular that he had to yield—Sinister rumours about him—The change after his father's death—His courtesy and liberality made him loved, and universally lamented—The disasters of the time—The eruption of Vesuvius—The account of the younger Pliny—The scene at Pompeii, and various forms of death and ruin—The objects since collected 155

CHAPTER XI.

DOMITIAN: A.D. 81-96.

Domitian's early life and danger from the soldiers—Sudden change turned his head—He was kept in strict tutelage by Vespasian—He ill requited the tenderness of Titus—His power of self-restraint as Emperor and wish to rule well—He discouraged informers and legacies to himself—The probable causes of the marked change of temper—His complete failure as a general—

Conspiracy against him—Want of money—His numerous victims—The Philosophers—Apollonius of Tyana—The generals—Julius Agricola—Literary men—Martial—Statius—Juvenal—Tacitus—Domitian assassinated by his wife and freedmen PAGE 164

CHAPTER XII.

THE POSITION OF THE EMPEROR.

The Emperor virtually the source of law: he interprets the law, and enforces it, as head of the executive—His powers unique in kind, without check or balance—There was no escape from the Emperor's power, nor for him—His power was based on military force, but his policy was commonly not warlike—Little police force needed 173

CHAPTER XIII.

THE RIGHTS OF ROMAN CITIZENSHIP

The citizens of Rome a mixed race—Their rights and privileges—Jus suffragii—Jus honorum—Right of appeal—Immunity from personal violence—Jus exilii—Freedom of speech and writing—Religious liberty—Right of assembly—Right to food . . . 176

CHAPTER XIV

LIFE IN THE PROVINCES.

Great variety of political status in the provincial towns, and large amount of self-rule—Scanty reference in literature to the life of the provincial towns—Fuller details in the inscriptions—The executive officials, duumviri juri dicundo, sediles, quaestors, quinquennales—The town council or ordo decurionum—Popular assemblies—Offices were burdensome rather than lucrative—Public spirit and munificence—The attractions of Roman culture—The liberal outlay of the rich lightened the burdens of local government—General well-being—Evidences of improvement and of prosperity—But no guarantees of permanence . . . 181

CHAPTER XV.

THE STATE OF TRADE.

The early contempt for industrial art at Rome—The contempt extended to professions and the fine arts—Disdain of retail trade did not extend to commerce on a large scale—Growth of a class of merchant capitalists who enrich themselves without benefit to the world—What the Empire did for trade—It secured the roads and seas—Confined war to the frontiers—Removed a variety of hindrances—Diminished indirectly the supply of slave labour—Lessened the competition of war and politics—The Emperors favoured the higher branches of industrial art—Influence of Eastern sentiment—The higher status given to industrial classes through magistri vicorum—A vast system of free trade flourished—Balance of trade against Italy PAGE 193

CHAPTER XVI.

THE GROWING DEPOPULATION OF ITALY AND GREECE.

The ominous signs of depopulation—Strabo's account of Greece—Polybius notices the diminishing military force of Italy—Remarks of Livy—Pliny—Dion Cassius—Attempts of Augustus to meet the evil—The causes of decline: 1. War; 2. Changes from peasant proprietors to large estates with slave labour; 3. Slavery was wasteful of life; 4. Attraction of town life and discouragement to industry; 5. Influence of vice and profligacy. 200

CHAPTER XVII.

THE FRONTIERS AND THE ARMY.

The frontiers well defined—Dependent kingdoms and diplomatic relations—The pacific policy of the Empire—The standing army of Augustus, and the stations of the legions and of the fleets—The legions recruited from the distant provinces were loyal and steadfast, and attached by many ties to their camps—The moral qualities fostered in the camps by work and discipline—Two examples of the break-down of discipline—The pay and pensions of the soldiers and 'missio honesta' PAGE 206

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE MORAL STANDARD OF THE AGE.

The natural tendency to believe that there was a moral decline in the first century of the Empire: 1. But satire is not fair evidence; 2. Juvenal was too vehement to be fair; 3. Literature deals with the life of Rome; 4. Complaints about luxury need to be carefully weighed; 5. Philosophy became a great moral power—the case of Seneca; 6. The change of tone and thought on the subject of slavery; 7. The change in the estimate of women's character; 8. The evidence of a higher tone in Pliny's letters 213

CHAPTER XIX.

THE REVIVAL OF RELIGIOUS SENTIMENT

Religion seemed to be losing its hold on the Romans of education—The policy of Augustus to strengthen the old religion—Reasons for believing that the reaction left enduring traces: 1. The legends might be given up without loss of religious faith; 2. The tone of philosophy was earnest and devout; 3. The introduction of new creeds and rites; 4. The change in the literary tone; 5. Monumental evidence—Paganism died hard 227
