PREFACE

THE Tracts contained in the present Volume carry out still further the programme of the Series set forth in the Preface of the first Volume.

Two of the popular non-theistic systems of the day are examined, and their effects and tendencies are pointed out. In one case a careful comparison of the system discussed with Christianity is instituted.

The testimony of history to the age of man, the testimony of the most ancient religions to the primitive beliefs of man, the witness of the moral nature of man to the religion of Christ, and the witness of the Holy Land to the Holy Scriptures,—all of them questions of Present Day interest and importance,—are topics also discussed.

That the Series is doing the work intended by the Society in issuing it, is abundantly proved, not only by the steady and continued demand for all the numbers,—some of the earlier ones have been reprinted twice, and others once,—but also by the instances, which come to light from time to time, of its real usefulness in confirming the faith and removing the doubts of readers.

Busy men too, whose own faith is established, who have very little leisure, but who take an interest in the controversies of the time, have expressed their thankfulness at having discussions of the subjects treated in the Tracts which they can read in such spare time as they can command for the purpose. That the Series may continue to exercise an ever-deepening and extending influence for good on the side of truth and righteousness will be the prayer of every Christian reader.

October, 1883.
