PUBLISHER'S NOTE

WHEN THE Russians occupied Berlin in 1945 they went through the German official archives with more vigour than discrimination, shipped some material to Russia, destroyed some, and left the rest scattered underfoot. They often followed a system that is difficult to understand of emptying papers on the floor and shipping to Russia the filing cabinets that had contained them.

Considerable fragments of Dr. Goebbels' diaries, from which the following pages were selected, were found in the courtyard of his ministry, where they had evidently narrowly escaped burning, many of the pages being singed and all smelling of smoke. Apparently they were originally bound in the German type of office folder. Thin metal strips in the salmon-coloured binders were run through holes punched in the paper, bent over, and locked into place.

At that time all Berlin was one great junk yard with desperate people laying hands on anything tangible and movable that could be used for barter. The unburned papers were taken away by one of these amateur junk dealers, who carefully salvaged the binders and discarded the contents—leaving more than 7,000 sheets of loose paper. A few binders had not been removed but most of the pages were tied up in bundles as waste paper. It later proved a considerable task to put them together again in the right sequence, as they were not numbered.

Other binders had odds and ends from Goebbels' files, and in the same batch were found papers, like the diaries, removed from folders. Many of the papers were water-soaked and showed signs of dirt and the imprint of nails where they had been walked on. The edges of some were scorched, showing that attempts to burn them had failed.

Among the papers in this miscellaneous batch were found the following:

The rough draft, headed Entwurf, of a message to Hermann Goering congratulating him on his fiftieth birthday.

A receipted bill from a jeweller for repairs to a Nazi party emblem—75 marks, dated June 20, 1939.

A six-page radio address, corrected by Goebbels in blue pencil, dated October 3, 1944.

A list of fifteen articles of old clothing, dated June 10, 1942, given by Goebbels and his wife to a charity collection. A note was appended that Frau Goebbels could do nothing about getting her donation together until she had talked with her husband.

An expense account, taking up five sheets of paper, for Goebbels' trip on March 8, 1943, by aeroplane from Berlin to Hitler's G.H.Q., where Goebbels remained one day and then flew back to Berlin after a conference with Hitler. Expenses totalled 85 marks.

A letter dated June 2, 1931, signed before a notary public by two women, replying to a request published by Goebbels in the newspaper, Angriff, asking for witnesses to an incident on June 1, 1931 (before Hitler came to power). The letter reads:

"Dr. Goebbels and another came out of the police station in the Maikaeferkaserne with the Fuehrer. As he came through the door, the police brought one of our brown shirts (S.A. Maenner) by force up the steps to the entrance. Dr. Goebbels, who stood in their way at the door, was hit on the shoulder by one of the police officials and pushed out of the way so that he fell down the steps. The handling of our Fuehrer started a demonstration on the part of the crowd, which hooted at the police, and Heils for the Fuehrer broke out. Then the police attacked the crowd with blackjacks and we were driven off."

A letter of January 26, 1939, notifying Goebbels that the taxes on his Schwanenwerder property had been increased and that he owed some back taxes for the previous year.

A report by one of Goebbels' subordinates on the moving of Goebbels' property from his Schwanenwerder home to safe places; some to Lanke, and some into the air raid shelter in the Hermann Goeringstrasse. The inventory includes oriental rugs, furniture, Gobelin tapestries, lamps, cut glass, silver, porcelain, linen, etc. The report concludes that Goebbels' valet, Emil, would be responsible for taking Goebbels' pistols into the Hermann Goeringstrasse shelter during an alarm. And "pistole" was underlined in the original.

A letter dated January 2, 1933 (about four weeks before Hitler took control), showing that Goebbels was in trouble about his income tax. The letter was written by a Nazi tax consultant, who reported that in dealing with the tax people he "registered a complaint on the ground that such a payment is impossible and would result in the destruction of your economic independence". A subsequent letter, dated March 28, 1933 (two months after the Nazis were in power), indicated that the tax specialist, Schuler, had been able to fix up the matter of the arrears satisfactorily.

A telegram sent by Goebbels six weeks before his death (March 13, 1945) to Colonel Berger, thanking the German troops at the Neisse River bridgehead for their donation of more than a quarter of a million marks for Winter Relief.

A memorandum dated June 4, 1942, to Goebbels, calling attention to four birthdays coming the following week:

In red crayon was a notation, erledigt, or taken care of, about the birthday of the Minister of Posts, Dr. Ohnesorge, aged 70.

Beside the name of Professor Paul Schultze Naumburg, aged 73, Goebbels wrote Nein.

Beside the name of Richard Strauss, Garmisch-Partenkirchen, aged 78, on Thursday, June 11, Goebbels also wrote Nein.

Beside the name of Jenny Juge, Goebbels wrote Blumen/Karte (flowers and a card).

There was also a typewritten undated balance sheet showing Goebbels' income, the allowance he made to Frau Goebbels, etc. For income tax purposes he declared a total income of 10,281.55 marks, of which he paid 6,481.55 to his wife, leaving 3,800 for himself.

There was a handwritten analysis of Goebbels' income for the years 1933 to 1937 inclusive. It was done in thirteen columns, showing income from book royalties, salary, interest, deductions for various taxes, etc. His total income before taxes and deductions was:

1933 . . .	34,376 marks
1934 . . .	134,423 "
1935 . . .	62,190 "
1937 . . .	66,905 "

One sheet of paper, handwritten, but not in Goebbels' writing, was headed: Account with Central Publishing Company of the National Socialist Party. From December 16, 1935, to December 23, 1936, he drew advances amounting to 290,000 marks against future royalties. His book royalties from December 31, 1935, to December 31, 1936, amounted to 63,416.31 marks. So he was in debt to the Nazi Publishing Company (Centralverlag der N.S.D.A.P.) to the amount of 226,583.69 marks.

It is an interesting sidelight on Goebbels' financial methods that whereas in 1936 he declared a total income of 63,654 marks, his income from book royalties alone amounted to approximately the same—63,416.31 marks.

An account for the purchase of paintings showed that 154,000 marks' worth were bought, on which a 5 per cent commission was paid for purchase or handling. This was dated January 30, 1945—three months before Berlin fell. The paintings, with a few exceptions, were all by German artists. Six gifts of paintings were noted, with dates of gift, to:

Sauckel, on his fiftieth birthday, October 27, 1944.

Gauleiter Streicher, on his sixtieth birthday, February 12, 1945.

Dr. Ley on his fifty-fifth birthday, February 15, 1945.

Dr. Hierl, on his seventieth birthday, February 24, 1945.

Schaub, on his birthday, August 10, 1944.

Minister Dr. Meissner, on his sixty-fifth birthday, March 13, 1945.

There are a number of drafts of birthday telegrams. Apparently Goebbels had a system whereby his office automatically produced drafts of birthday greetings which he then corrected.

There was a file on Goebbels' mortgage of 100,000 marks on his Schwanenwerder estate, which he apparently bought after the outbreak of war in 1939.

The diaries were typed on fine water-marked paper, which was rare in wartime Germany and available only to high government officials. In looking over the material offered for sale or barter, a customer was struck by the impressive quality of the paper and realized that he must have fallen on something of interest and importance. He acquired the lot for its value as scrap paper. The bundles, roughly roped together, passed through several hands, and eventually came into the possession of Mr. Frank E. Mason, who had made a number of visits to Germany since the war. Mr. Mason has had long experience in Germany, first as Military Attaché at the American Embassy in Berlin at the end of World War I and later as a correspondent. It was obvious to him that the material consisted of fragments of Dr. Goebbels' diaries. An examination by Louis P. Lochner, former chief of the Berlin bureau of the Associated Press, revealed the authenticity of the documents, as Dr. Lochner himself explains in detail in his introduction to this volume. Publication was decided on only after this had been clearly established.

Goebbels indulged in free and easy abuse of everybody who disagreed with him. His entries are given as he wrote them, with the gutter language into which he frequently lapsed. This was essential to a faithful presentation, although the publishers obviously share neither his views nor his expression of them.

The selections reveal Goebbels as the unflagging motive force behind the vicious anti-Semitism of the Nazi regime. He urged Hitler on to the excesses which shocked the world; his aim was the extermination of all Jews. A number of examples of this distasteful material have been reproduced, not only because they reflected Goebbels' mentality, but more particularly because his views were translated into action and are therefore of vital importance. Goebbels also reveals himself as violently opposed to the Christian churches. He makes it clear that while he wants to devote himself to the extermination of the Jews during the war, he plans to deal with the churches after the war and reduce them to impotence.

The task of selecting, editing, and translating the text of this important document was exacting. It called for a man with knowledge and scholarly background. It is fortunate that Dr. Lochner was available for this work. He brought to it long experience, knowledge of European politics, wide acquaintance among political figures under the Weimar Republic and the Nazi regime, and complete command of the German language. For more than twenty years he was chief of the Berlin bureau of the Associated Press, and on his return to the United States in 1942 he wrote What About Germany? a book that has had considerable success. He had unique standing in Berlin, as is shown by the fact that for many years he was president of the Foreign Press Association and for some time president of the American Chamber of Commerce.

The publishers regret that it was possible to make use of only a small part of the original material in a single volume. The level of interest could have been maintained if far more space had been available. The original diaries will serve as source material for many future writers, and to this end they are to be deposited in the library of an American university; where they will be accessible to scholars.

INTRODUCTION

I APPROACHED the task of selecting representative material for this book with a good deal of trepidation. Here were some 7,100 pages (approximately 750,000 words) of German text to select from, yet the book had to be limited to about five hundred printed pages. It was much the same sort of situation I faced constantly during my years of newspaper service as chief of the Berlin Bureau of the Associated Press of America: whenever Adolf Hitler delivered one of his addresses to the German Reichstag, which often lasted for two hours, I was faced with the problem of remaining within the number of words that the newspapers having membership in the Associated Press could absorb, yet missing nothing of importance to the reader.

The Goebbels Diaries, from which representative sections have been selected for this book, cover the following periods:

January 21 to May 23, 1942, with the entries for March 22 to March 25 and April 10 missing.

December 7, 1942, to December 20, 1942.

March 1 to March 20, 1943.

April 9 to May 28, 1943, with the entries for May 2 to May 6 missing.

September 8 to September 30, 1943.

November 1 to November 30, 1943, with the entries for November 5 and November 23 missing.

December 4 to December 9, 1943.

No doubt some of the missing pages went up in flames, for there is a smell of burnt paper about the whole collection, and some pages are singed.

It is also likely that large sections of the diaries, indeed whole volumes, were destroyed in ignorance of their content and importance. If this be true, the world has lost documents of inestimable value.

Each day Joseph Goebbels dictated at great length an account of what transpired the previous day. This fact should be kept in mind by the reader, who may occasionally be puzzled to find the Propaganda Minister referring to an event as having occurred on one day when obviously it must have happened the day before.

For his diaries he used an especially heavy water-marked paper and large German-Gothic script of a sort one seldom finds on typewriters. There was triple spacing between the lines, and the margins were wide. No ordinary mortal in those days could have commanded such paper or permitted himself the luxury of such large type and generous spacing.

Although Goebbels seems never to have failed to record his daily observations, which in some cases took up as many as eighty-five typewritten pages, he apparently seldom, if ever, took the time to read over what he had previously written. It thus happened that he frequently repeated himself; in fact at times he used almost the same words on two consecutive days to describe the same event.

Every day's entry began with Die Lage (The Situation). It was a recapitulation of the daily military communiqué—the confidential and complete communiqué to which only privileged persons had access. In a few cases Die Lage is followed by the words "To be inserted later". The little doctor's busy life was such, however, that he never seems to have bothered to have this material inserted later. To save space, these recapitulations have been omitted.

Paul Joseph Goebbels was born October 29, 1897, in the smoky factory town of Rheydt in the Rhineland. He was the son of a factory foreman, Fritz Goebbels, and his wife, Maria Oldenhausen, a blacksmith's daughter. His parents were devout Roman Catholics, as were his various relations.

The boy Joseph—or, as he was nicknamed, Jupp—attended a Catholic school in this textile centre of 30,000 inhabitants, and also went through the Gymnasium, or high school, of his native city. He was rejected for military service during World War I because of a deformed foot.

He managed to secure a number of Catholic scholarships and attended eight famous German universities—Bonn, Freiburg, Wuerzburg, Munich, Cologne, Frankfurt, Berlin, and finally Heidelberg, where he took his Ph.D. degree in 1921 at the age of twenty-four. He studied history, philology, and the history of art and literature.

His ambition was to be a writer. In the year of his graduation at Heidelberg he wrote an unsuccessful novel, Michael, and followed it by two plays, Blood Seed (Blutsaat) and The Wanderer (Der Wanderer), which no producer would accept. He also applied, unsuccessfully, for a reporter's job on the Berliner Tageblatt, the well-known liberal newspaper.

All these experiences, together with the loss of the war and the collapse of the German Empire, embittered him and kept him restlessly wandering from Rheydt to Cologne, Berlin, and Munich, until, more or less by accident, he heard Adolf Hitler speak at Munich in 1922.

Young Joseph Goebbels tried to interest university students in Hitler's message and thereby discovered that he had the gift of eloquence. That was just the sort of man Hitler needed. The Fuehrer tested his disciple's abilities in the Rhine and Ruhr, then under Allied occupation. Working under an assumed name, Goebbels managed to win converts to Nazism and set up an office at Hattingen in the Ruhr Valley. In 1924 the French occupation authorities ejected him.

Goebbels then drifted to Elberfeld, where he became editor of a Nazi organ, Voelkische Freiheit. His articles against the French Negro troops of occupation were especially vitriolic. That same year he was appointed business manager for the Nazi gau, or district, of Rhine-Ruhr.

I have been fortunate in having access to an important document dealing with this period of Goebbels' life. Ex-President Hoover, during a visit to Germany in 1946, was given a hand-written diary kept by Dr. Goebbels from August 12, 1925, to October 16, 1926, which he has kindly placed at my disposal. This diary is important in its revelation of a little scoundrel in training to become a great scoundrel. In addition, it gives valuable evidence of the authenticity of the later diaries.

The accounts of those days are replete with references to beer-hall fights, street brawls, and encounters with the police. Goebbels turned his back completely upon the church in which he was raised, and abandoned the faith of his fathers.

His father and mother were greatly displeased at their son's apostasy. He complains, on the occasion of a visit to his parents at Rheydt, September 11, 1925, "Father is serious and uncommunicative. That depresses me." He writes on the occasion of his twenty-eighth birthday at Elberfeld: "Not a word from home. How hurt I feel!" Two days later he observes: "Not a word from home for my birthday, nor anything else. That rather pains me. I am gradually losing contact. And yet I think so often and with such love of home. Why do I have to lose everything, yes, everything?"

In speaking of his visits he occasionally refers to his much younger brother, Konrad. He does not mention his brother Hans, his senior by two years, probably because Hans no longer lived at home in 1925-26. He did manage, however, in 1933 to secure a lucrative position for Hans as Director General of the Provincial Fire and Life Insurance Companies of the Rhine Province. He seemed especially attached to his sister Maria.

I cite a few examples from the handwritten earlier diaries:

September 30, 1925: "Dr. Ley is a fool and possibly an intriguer."

October 2, 1925: "Stresemann has started for the Locarno Conference, to sell Germany out to capitalism. That fat, complacent swine!"

October 12, 1925: "In Munich (Nazi) scoundrels are at work—nit-wits who won't tolerate real brains. . . . That's the reason for the opposition to Strasser and me."

October 26, 1925: "Streicher spoke. Like a pig."

January 26, 1926: "Kaufmann arrived with Lucas. I don't like it. Lucas is a stupid camel. Likes to show off. But there's nothing in him."

March 27, 1926: "Went to the office for a moment. Found that camel, Dr. Ziegler, there. He had been saying bad things about me, defaming me. I can tell it by the looks of the scoundrel."

These examples are sufficient to establish a similarity of vituperative expressions between both sets of diaries, and to indicate that the later diaries, although typewritten, chronicled Goebbels' real thoughts.

This is true also of Goebbels' comments on Hitler. If one had only the typewritten diaries to go by, one might conclude from the adulation amounting almost to deification of the Fuehrer that Goebbels was writing with a view to expediency rather than from conviction—witness an entry like that of January 31, 1942: "As long as he [the Fuehrer] lives and is among us in good health, as long as he can give us the strength of his spirit and the power of his manliness, no evil can touch us." Could such an apotheosis have been written in sincerity by as coldly calculating a realist as Joseph Goebbels, by a man who from time to time even disagreed with the leader?

Here again the earlier diaries furnish corroborative evidence. They prove that Joseph Goebbels, who otherwise seemed to love no one but himself and his children, did indeed adore Adolf Hitler.

I quote a few significant entries:

November 6, 1925: "Brunswick. We drove to see Hitler. He was just eating his dinner. Immediately he jumped up and stood facing us. He squeezed my hand. Like an old friend.

"And these large blue eyes! Like stars! He is glad to see me. I am supremely happy. . . .

"Later I drove to the meeting and talked for two hours. Tremendous applause. Then heils and hand-clapping. He has arrived. He shakes my hand. He is completely exhausted from his great speech [delivered elsewhere]. Then he took the floor here for half an hour.

"Wit, irony, humour, sarcasm, earnestness, passion, white heat—all this is contained in his speech. This man has everything needed to be king. The great tribune of the people. The coming dictator."

November 23, 1925: "Plauen. I arrive. Hitler is there. My joy is great. He greets me like an old friend. And lavishes attention on me. I have him all to myself. What a fellow! (So ein Kerl!)

"And then he speaks. How small I am!

"He gives me his picture. With a greeting to the Rhineland.

"Heil Hitler. . . .

"I want Hitler to be my friend. His picture is standing on my table. I simply could not bear it if I ever had to despair of this man."

December 29, 1925: "Rheydt. Awakened early in the morning. Schmitz brought me a package. A Christmas greeting from Hitler. His book, bound in leather, with a dedication, 'In recognition of the exemplary manner of your fighting.' I am happy!"

April 13, 1926: "Munich. At 8 P.M. by car to the Buergabraeu. Hitler is already there. My heart beats as though it were about to burst (zum Zerspringen). Into the hall. Frenzied greetings. Man after man, the house packed. Streicher opens the proceedings. Then I speak for two and a half hours. I give everything there is in me. The people simply rave. They applaud noisily. As I conclude, Hitler embraces me. His eyes are filled with tears. I am happy."

April 19, 1926: "Stuttgart. Hitler embraces me when he sees me. He lavishes a lot of praise on me. I believe he has taken me to his heart as no one else."

June 14, 1926: "Elberfeld. I am so glad that Hitler is coming. I venerate and love him."

June 16, 1926: "Duesseldorf. Hitler has been here for two days. . . . Hitler, the dear old comrade. One cannot fail to like him as a person. In addition he is an outstanding personality. One always learns something new from this obstinate man. As a speaker he combines gesture, mimicry, and language in great harmony. The born agitator. With that man one can conquer the world. Unleash him and he makes the whole corrupt republic totter. His beautiful words yesterday: 'God showed us mercy beyond measure in our struggle. His most beautiful gift to us is the hatred of our enemies, whom we in turn hate with all our hearts.' "

July 6, 1926: "Weimar. Hitler spoke. About politics, the Idea, and organization. Deep and mystical. Almost like a gospel. One shudders as one skirts the abyss of life with him. I thank Fate which gave us this man."

When one reads these earlier diary entries, one cannot but conclude that the diaries of 1942 and 1943 are sincere in their portrayal of a very close relationship of mutual trust between Hitler and Goebbels. The postscript to the diaries, too, bears testimony to the sincerity of Goebbels' adoration of his Fuehrer and to the sincerity of the diaries; immediately Hitler passed out of life, he ended his own.

Space does not permit the systematic inclusion of excerpts from the earlier handwritten diaries. Nevertheless some sections of them seem to me essential for a proper understanding of Goebbels and his time.

There is, first of all, Goebbels' revelation of his attitude toward his fellow men. The diaries for 1942-43 convey this only by inference. On August 12, 1925, however, he put down in black and white: "As soon as I am with a person for three days, I don't like him any longer; and if I am with him for a whole week, I hate him like the plague."

On October 15, 1925, he observed, "I have learned to despise the human being from the bottom of my soul. He makes me sick in my stomach. Ugh!"

On April 24, 1926, he had occasion to write, "Much dirt and many intrigues. The human being is a canaille."

On August 9, 1926, he found that "The only real friend one has in the end is one's dog". This was followed on August 17 with a further tribute to his dog Benno: "The more I get to know the human species, the more I care for my Benno."

The earlier diaries further reveal, as already pointed out, that Goebbels' parents by no means approved of his conversion from Catholicism to Nazism.

Apparently young Joseph attempted occasionally to argue things out, for I find the laconic entries, Krach mit Vater (row with Father), and Krach zu Hause (family fight) recurring from time to time. On January 20, 1926, he wrote: "For a long time no word from home. They are angry with me. I am an apostate."

The earlier diaries afford insight into the little doctor's personal habits for which one looks in vain in the 1942-43 versions: his love life. Goebbels' amours were a matter of notoriety throughout Germany. His philandering even after he had become a Reich Minister was so well known and so scandalous that his wife, Magda, would on more than one occasion have sued for divorce had not Hitler insisted that he would allow no marital scandal in the case of a person so highly placed as Dr. Goebbels.

In the wartime diaries, however, the chronicler of his life and work, otherwise so candid, chooses to be silent on this sphere of operations.

The Goebbels diaries for 1925 and 1926 make essential reading for anybody interested in the amours of men of affairs. His loves in those years were Alma, Else, Anke, and two unnamed girls from Franconia and Munich—not successively but simultaneously.

Here are some entries:

August 14, 1925: "Alma wrote me a postcard from Bad Harzburg. The first sign of her since that night. This teasing, charming Alma! I rather like the child.

"Received first letter from Else in Switzerland. Only my dear Else can write like that. . . . Soon I'm going to the Rhine for a week, to be quite alone. Then Else will come to call for me. How happy I am in anticipation!"

August 15, 1925: "In these days I find myself thinking so often of Anke. Why just now? Because it is a time for travel? How wonderful it was to travel with her! This wonderful wench!

"I am yearning for Else. When shall I have her in my arms again? . . .

"Else, dear, when shall I see you again?"

"My dear Alma, you are light as a feather!

"Anke, never can I forget you!

"And now I am, oh, so lonely!"

August 27, 1925: "Three days on the Rhine. I am lazy, go for walks, and sleep. . . .

"Not a word from Else. Did she fail to receive my postcard? Or is she angry with me? How I pine for her!

"I am living in the same room as I did with her last Whitsuntide. What thoughts! What feelings! Why doesn't she come?"

"I am standing by the Rhine waiting for you. Come, oh come, you kindly one, and bless me!"

August 30, 1925: "I received an invitation to give an address in Recklinghausen. How peculiarly that strikes me! I should like to speak there if only I could be sure Anke was sitting among my listeners."

September 3, 1925: "Else is here! On Tuesday she returned jubilantly from Switzerland—fat, buxom, healthy, gay, only slightly tanned. She is very happy and in the best of spirits. She is good to me and gives me much joy."

October 14, 1925: "Why did Anke have to leave me quite alone? Was it a case of a broken pledge? On her part or mine? I just mustn't think about these things. Only work can relieve me. . . . Probably that is best, after all!"

October 29, 1925: "Birthday! Twenty-eight years old. . . .

"I am getting old. I notice that today with a shudder. My hair is thinning out. On the way to baldness.

"But I want for all eternity to remain young at heart!"

December 21, 1925: "There is a curse on me and the women. Woe to those who love me! What a painful thought! It makes one despair."

December 29, 1925: "To Krefeld last night with Hess. Christmas celebration. A delightful, beautiful girl from Franconia. She's my type. Home with her through rain and storm. Au revoir!

"Else arrived."

January 20, 1926: "I yearn for the loving hands of a kindly woman."

January 31, 1926: "Missed the train. Swore and cursed. But a charming chambermaid from Munich!"

February 6, 1926: "I yearn for a sweet woman! Oh, torturing pain! Do you call that life?"

Elsewhere in this introduction I have referred to Goebbels' radicalism. Two entries (among others) in the earlier diaries show how close the then young agitator felt to the Communists:

October 23, 1925: "In the final analysis it would be better for us to end our existence under Bolshevism than to endure slavery under capitalism."

January 31, 1926: "I think it is terrible that we and the Communists are bashing in each other's heads. . . . Where and when can we talk things over with the leading Communists?"

It was over the issue of radicalism, in fact, that Goebbels in 1926 for a while entertained grave doubts about Adolf Hitler.

On February 15, 1926, Goebbels heard the Fuehrer speak at Bamberg. The little doctor wrote:

"Hitler talked for two hours. I feel as though someone had beaten me. What sort of a Hitler is this? A reactionary? Altogether lacking in poise and assurance. Russian question: quite off the track. Italy and England our natural allies! Terrible! Our task, he says, is the destruction of Bolshevism. Bolshevism is a Jewish creation. We must break Russia. A hundred and eighty millions! . . .

"I am unable to say a word. I feel as though someone had hit me over the head. . . . How my heart hurts! . . . I should like to cry. . . .

"Certainly one of the greatest disappointments of my life. I no longer have complete faith in Hitler. That is the terrible thing about it: my props have been taken from under me. I am only half a person."

A month later, however, Goebbels begins to regain confidence that Hitler, after all, is right. On March 13 he wrote:

"I read Adolf Hitler's The South Tyrol Question and the Problem of Germany's Alliances, a wonderfully clear and broad-minded brochure. He's a great fellow, all right—our chief."

His last doubts were dispelled when he heard Hitler speak in Munich on April 13. Here is the story of his capitulation:

"Hitler arrived. . . . He spoke for three hours. Brilliantly. He can make you doubt your own views. Italy and England our allies. Russia wants to devour us. All that is contained in his brochure and in the second volume of Mein Kampf which is to appear soon.

"We disagree. We ask questions. He gives brilliant replies. I love him. The social question: he opens great new vistas. He has thought everything out. His ideal: a just collectivism and individualism. As to the soil—everything on and under it belongs to the people. Production to be creative and individualistic. Trusts, transportation, etc., to be socialized. That's something! He has thought it all out. I am now at ease about him. He is a real man. He takes everything into account. A hothead like that can be my leader. I bow to the greater man, to the political genius."

Goebbels' handwriting is one of the most difficult I have ever deciphered. When I first looked cursorily at these early diaries, the neat German script appeared regular and clear. On closer inspection, however, the Goebbels calligraphy proved anything but easy to read.

It seemed, indeed, like a mirror of the man Goebbels as I knew him: apparently frank and straightforward, with a disarming smile and ingratiating voice, he was in reality a master at hiding his true thoughts behind a mask of urbanity.

In his handwriting, too, he evidently tried to hide something.

More difficult than deciphering Goebbels' handwriting, however, was the translation of his innumerable German colloquial and slang phrases. I could meet the problem only by using equivalent English expressions.

From the beginning of his career as a National Socialist Goebbels was a glutton for work. He spoke night after night, edited his paper, attended to a multitude of details of political organization, and still found time with Gregor Strasser to start the National-Sozialistische Briefe (National Socialist Letters) which were soon eagerly read by German workers. Goebbels could truly claim that he and Strasser secured Hitler his working-class following—Hitler himself had appealed mainly to the middle class, the petite bourgeoisie, as well as to ardent nationalists of every persuasion.

These Briefe were also a powerful weapon in the Goebbels-Strasser fight within the young and uproarious Nazi party against the "conservatives" such as Gottfried Feder, Hermann Esser, and, strangely enough, Julius Streicher. Goebbels was always to be found on the side of the radicals.

The Goebbels-Strasser duumvirate did not last long. At the Nazi party convention of 1926 at Bamberg, Bavaria, Goebbels soon sensed that Strasser and the Fuehrer did not see eye to eye, and decided that his bread was buttered on the Hitler side. He voted with his idol against his friend. Hitler rewarded him on November 9, the anniversary of the ill-fated beer-cellar putsch of 1923, by making him Gauleiter for Greater Berlin, a task well calculated to test to the full the abilities of the little doctor, as an organizer, writer, strategist, and political leader.

The capital in those days was known as das rote Berlin (Red Berlin). It polled a large communist vote, and the Socialists were the dominating party. That was grist for the fiery doctor's mill. Street brawls and beer-hall fights were the order of the day. In 1927 Goebbels founded a weekly paper, Der Angriff (The Attack), which by 1929 became a bi-weekly and from 1930 onwards a daily. If the Communists hitherto held a monopoly on guttersnipe vituperation, they now had a thing or two to learn from the venomous Nazi editor.

Goebbels' career as a parliamentarian began in 1929, when he was elected to the German Reichstag. A year later he also became a town councillor of Berlin.

Time and again the Nazi organization of Berlin came into conflict with the police and was forbidden. Nevertheless Goebbels managed in 1927 to make his appearance at the Nuremberg party convention with 700 Berlin S.A. Brown Shirts.

Adolf Hitler was much impressed with der gescheite Dr. Goebbels (the adroit Dr. Goebbels), as I once heard him call his Propaganda Minister in a Reichstag speech. This young man showed that he possessed something which many an older politician could well envy him: an uncanny understanding of the psychology of the German people. Goebbels was very often wrong in his estimate of foreign peoples; he did, however, know his fellow Germans.

In 1929 Hitler made Goebbels, who was then thirty-two, Reich Propaganda Leader of the Nazi party. "Propaganda has only one object," the new Reichsleiter said on one occasion—"to conquer the masses. Every means that furthers this aim is good; every means that hinders it is bad." He had already given samples of his skill at propaganda not only in his articles and the innumerable handbills and posters he designed, but also in the books, all written before 1930, The Unknown S.A. Man, Lenin or Hitler?, The Second Revolution, Buch Isidor, and Knorke.

Goebbels was quite willing to admit that his speeches and writings were usually on the "primitive" side. "Our propaganda is primitive," the Associated Press reported him as saying, "because the people think primitively. We speak the language the people understand."

In his Battle for Berlin (Kampf um Berlin), written in 1934, after he had already become Reich Propaganda Minister, but dealing with his years as Gauleiter of Berlin from 1929 onwards, he wrote: "Masses are unformed stuff. Only in the hands of the political artists do the masses become a people and the people a nation."

Goebbels proved to be a wizard as a demagogue. He mixed satire with humour, irony with sombreness, quips in the vernacular with pontifical adjurations. His dark piercing eyes, his straight black hair brushed back, his taut skin made one think of Mephistopheles.

January 30, 1933, brought the accession of Adolf Hitler to undreamed-of power. In the first official announcements the name of Dr. Goebbels was conspicuously absent. Hermann Goering and Wilhelm Frick were the only two National Socialists besides Adolf Hitler in the first Hitler cabinet.

Goebbels could well afford to wait. Hitler had great plans for him. On June 30, 1933, he decreed the establishment of a new cabinet office, that of Reich Ministry for Public Enlightenment and Propaganda, with Joseph Goebbels at its head, stating that the new venture would be "responsible for all tasks having to do with influencing the mental and spiritual life of the nation, for winning allegiance to the state, its culture and economy, for informing the public at home and abroad about the nation, and for administering all institutions and installations contributing to these ends".

Decree followed decree, expanding Goebbels' powers and functions. There was the Reich Culture Chamber Law of September 22, 1933, channelling all intellectual and cultural life into this one chamber with its six sub-chambers (Reich Radio Chamber, Reich Theatre Chamber, Reich Press Chamber, etc.) and appointing Goebbels as president which, under Nazism, meant dictator. There was the Journalists' Law of October 4, 1933, which made all newsmen servants of the state and subject to license by Goebbels. There was the decree of November, 1936, forbidding all artistic criticism.

Soon Goebbels unblushingly forbade the publication of speeches by cabinet members. He even decreed that nobody could quote past utterances of the Fuehrer without the approval of his Propaganda Ministry.

Goebbels unscrupulously used his vast powers to foster anti-Semitism by fabricating stories about atrocities allegedly committed by the Jews. As World War II loomed on the horizon—and no Nazi besides Hitler himself knew better than Goebbels how certain it was to come—he kept up a constant barrage of stories alleging maltreatment and even torture of German nationals by the populations of neighbouring states.

He thus prepared the ground well for Hitler's war on civilization. Even after his phenomenal rise to power Goebbels never lost sight of the desirability of making himself persona gratissima to Adolf Hitler. He could not impress Hitler with a war record like that of Hermann Goering, the Pour le Mérite aviation ace of World War I, as he was physically incapable of military service. The Fuehrer, however, laid great stress upon large families.

Goebbels had married the comely and presentable Magda, a woman who by her first marriage to a German industrialist named Quandt already had one son, Harald. It was a matter of common gossip in Berlin society circles that Joseph Goebbels insisted that his wife deliver one baby a year. The offspring consisted of six children at the end of the Hitler regime. Goebbels, coldly calculating that these children would probably not have much chance in a world to which Nazism was anathema, poisoned them all and prevailed upon Magda likewise to die with him.

Before the war, however, the wife and children were quite an asset in Goebbels' bid for Hitler's affection. The children were taught to say nice things to "Onkel Adolf". Goebbels records with pride that the Fuehrer during his private talks usually inquired about Hilde, Holde, and Helga. He apparently knew the three younger children less well. Also, he vowed that after the war he would see that his family devoted itself to his idol even more than before the great conflict.

Such was the Joseph Goebbels of pre-World War II days; such were his powers. The diaries will show that even these powers did not satiate his inordinate ambition, but that he used the Fuehrer's absence at the front to set himself up as virtual dictator in domestic affairs.

I saw Dr. Goebbels for the first time in 1932 during the brief chancellorship of Franz von Papen, when the ban on Nazi party public meetings in Prussia and on the wearing of Party uniforms was lifted by this wily diplomat and politician, who told me he permitted the Nazis to meet freely "so that they might hang themselves by their own words".

The Nazis immediately staged a series of demonstrations all over Greater Berlin, among them one in the famous Sports Palace. In those days the Nazis craved international attention, and the foreign press was assigned good seats on the huge platform, near the speaker's lectern.

What struck me as I heard Dr. Goebbels that first time, and what made me watch him closely thereafter, was the fact that this diminutive man, one of the most versatile spellbinders Germany has had for generations, was absolutely cool and self-possessed, while at the same time he gave the impression of being deeply stirred and carried away by his own eloquence.

His voice, of a deeply resonant quality, seemed to quiver with emotion. His gestures seemed passionate. His general attitude seemed to be that of a man so wrapped up in his fanaticism that time meant nothing so long as he had a message to deliver.

I noticed something else, however: his fascinatingly delicate hands moved in powerful gestures without the slightest trembling and belied the quiver in his voice. His gestures, although seemingly spontaneous, indicated careful planning, for he always threw himself into position for a particular gesture before actually beginning to execute it. Beside him lay a watch which he consulted from time to time by a stealthy glance, clearly showing that he was well aware of the passage of time.

In short, here was a showman who knew exactly what he was doing every moment and who calculated in advance the effect of every spoken word and every gesture. Though Adolf Hitler's raucous voice grated disgustingly and frequently broke as he talked himself into a high pitch of frenzied exaltation, the hearer nevertheless had the impression that here was a man who believed what he said or at least intoxicated himself into this belief with the sound of his own fulminations. With Goebbels I had the feeling that he would have defended Communism, monarchy, or even democracy with the same pathos and emotion, yes, even the same fanaticism, had his idol, Hitler, chosen to sponsor any of these.

About three years later a German friend told me of attending a party at which Goebbels amused all present by successively delivering a speech on behalf of the restoration of the monarchy, the re-establishment of the Weimar Republic, and the introduction of Communism in the German Reich, and, finally, on behalf of National Socialism.

"I assure you," this friend said, "that I was ready at the end of each speech to join the particular cause Goebbels had just advocated. He had compelling and convincing arguments for each of the four forms of government."

A striking example of Goebbels' capacity for unabashed prevarication was given to the foreign correspondents accredited at Berlin on November 10, 1938, the day after Hitler had given his hordes the go-ahead signal to loot Jewish shops, demolish Jewish property, set fire to synagogues, and arrest innocent Jews. We were asked to come to the Propaganda Ministry late that morning, as Dr. Goebbels wished to make a statement.

Ordinarily at our daily press conference, which was usually conducted by the sectional chief in charge of foreign press matters for the Propaganda Ministry, we sat in armchairs, which made it easy to write. Also, there was always ample opportunity for asking questions. This time we were led into the so-called "Throne Room", a large, ceremonial hall of the Leopold Palace, which housed the Propaganda Ministry. There were no seats. We stood about until it was time for the Minister to appear.

Suddenly he entered with quick, nervous steps, invited us to stand in a semicircle about him, and then delivered a declaration to the effect that "all the accounts that have come to your ears about alleged looting and destruction of Jewish property are a stinking lie (sind erstunken und erlogen). Not a hair of a Jew was disturbed (den Juden ist kein Haar geprüemmt worden)."

We looked at one another in amazement. In all our journalistic careers no one among us had experienced anything like it.

Only three minutes from the Wilhelmplatz, where the Propaganda Ministry was situated, was Berlin's famous shopping street, the Leipziger Strasse, at the head of which stood Wertheim's, the well-known department store, with its great show windows broken and its celebrated displays a pile of rubble. Yet Goebbels dared tell us that what we had seen with our own eyes was a "stinking lie".

After a few paralysing moments we had recovered sufficiently from this shock to want to press Dr. Goebbels with questions. He had disappeared. He had used the moment of our consternation to eliminate any possibility of our asking him embarrassing questions.

What Goebbels failed to take into account when he launched this coup was that while all of us truthfully reported his words and, in order to be able to remain at our posts in Germany, refrained from tearing his statement to pieces, we had the previous day sent long eyewitness stories of burning synagogues, demolished shop windows, beaten Jews, and Nazi gangsters moving through the streets and shouting "Juda Verrecke [Wipe out the Jews]!"

My wife and I had spent hours the night before watching frenzied Nazis at their work of destruction. Also, some of us had filed stories just before the Goebbels news conference began, describing how we had picked our way to the Wilhelmplatz by making many detours in order not to cut our tyres on the smashed glass from costly display windows that littered the main thoroughfares.

The effect, therefore, of our truthful reporting of Goebbels' statement was quite different from what Hitler's Propaganda Minister had expected.

The whole civilized world was shocked when on the evening of May 10, 1933, the books of authors displeasing to the Nazis were solemnly burned in the immense Franz Joseph Platz between the University of Berlin and the State Opera in the Unter den Linden. I was a witness of the scene.

All that afternoon Nazi raiding parties had been going into public and private libraries, throwing on to the streets such books as Dr. Goebbels in his supreme wisdom had decided were unfit for Nazi Germany. From the streets Nazi columns of beer-hall fighters had picked up these discarded volumes and taken them to the Franz Joseph Platz.

Here the heap grew higher and higher, and every few minutes another howling mob arrived, adding more books to the impressive pyre. At dusk, university students, mobilized by the little doctor, surrounded the bonfire and greeted the first flames with songs, cheers and a war-dance.

When the orgy was at its height, a cavalcade of cars appeared. It was the Propaganda Minister himself, accompanied by his body-guard and a number of fellow torch bearers of the new Nazi Kultur.

"Fellow students, German men and women!" he said as he stepped before a microphone for all Germany to hear him. "The age of extreme Jewish intellectualism has now ended, and the success of the German revolution ^{of} again given the right of way to the German spirit. . . .

"You are doing the right thing in committing the evil spirit of the past to the flames at this late hour of the night. It is a strong, great, and symbolic act—an act that is to bear witness before all the world to the fact that the spiritual foundation of the November Republic has disappeared. From these ashes there will arise the phoenix of a new spirit. . . .

"The past is lying in flames. The future will rise from the flames within our own hearts. . . . Brightened by these flames our vow shall be: The Reich and the Nation and our Fuehrer Adolf Hitler: Heil! Heil! Heil!"

The few foreign correspondents who had taken the trouble to view this "symbolic act" were stunned. What had happened to the "Land of Thinkers and Poets"? they wondered.

Goebbels always played the double role of living a luxurious life and pretending to be simple—the true representative of the common man in Germany. It would not do for the people to read what a gay party he was giving—the drab enumeration of prominent people who attended gave his communiqué the flavour of a stilted official reception.

It is true that at the very beginning of his career as a cabinet minister he forgot for a short while that he had chosen to pose as the outstanding exponent of the proletarian sector of the Nazi movement. A newsreel, Father's Birthday, was released showing the private life of the Goebbels family. The Minister made the psychological mistake of permitting a scene to be filmed which showed his children, with a groom for each of their ponies. At some of the showings the audience booed and whistled, and within a few days the newsreel was withdrawn.

He also made a psychological mistake when he prevailed upon his wife, Magda, to become head of a Nazi fashion centre in July 1933. Public ridicule resulted in the closing down of this venture.

Goebbels was quick to profit from these two mistakes. Thereafter he was the simple man who contrasted sharply with his then closest rival, the pleasure-loving, epicurean, spendthrift Hermann Goering. In fact Goebbels even made use of his prerogatives as Minister of Propaganda to forbid the publication of certain pictures of Goering's costly Opera Ball on January 12, 1936. For purposes of window dressing the bemedalled Minister of Aviation had invited to this ball such social luminaries as Ex-Czar Ferdinand of Bulgaria the former German Crown Prince Frederick Wilhelm and his family (one son, Prince Louis Ferdinand, however, refused to attend, as he saw through the manœuvre), Duke Charles Edward of Coburg and Gotha, Krupp von Bohlen und Halbach, Werner ^{els} Siemens, and others. Goebbels did not want the German public to know that any high Nazi was consorting with the former German aristocracy and plutocracy. Nor did he want the public to know that the vast Opera House was redecorated in white satin and that more than a million marks had been spent to give lustre to the occasion.

In this connection I recall a so-called Bierabend (in other words, a buffet supper with beer, sandwiches, and salads) given in the Propaganda Ministry in honour of provincial journalists from all over Germany who had come to Berlin for what was called a convention, but in reality was an indoctrination week in Nazi news policies. The vice-president, the secretary, and I were invited as representatives of the Foreign Press Association and were the only foreigners present.

We were asked to take seats informally. A functionary of the Propaganda Ministry presided at each round table for eight to ten persons. Fortunately for me I happened to sit down at a table over which someone from the moving-picture division of the Ministry presided, a man who did not know the newsmen. I was careful not to pronounce my name distinctly when all of us in that group introduced ourselves, and was happy to note that the Propaganda Ministry representative regarded me as just another provincial correspondent.

It was not long before he delivered himself of something which, by comparing notes with my other colleagues, I learned was being said in almost the same words at all the other tables.

"Our Minister, Dr. Goebbels, is one of the most modest men I ever knew," his handy man told us. "He hates all pomp and luxury. He is therefore very much embarrassed that he has had to move into a large villa at Schwanenwerder on the Wannsee. But he realizes that as Minister of the Reich he owes something to his official position. After all, he can't receive a distinguished guest like Count Ciano in a five-roomed flat! So he is putting up with the inconvenience of a rather fashionable villa as a national duty."

Goebbels was clever enough to have learned from the newsreel fiasco that a luxurious suburban estate would draw unfavourable comment. What better way of forestalling criticism than letting the men throughout Germany who controlled public opinion through their newspapers know how chagrined he was at having to live in luxury?

Costly parties were the order of the day in Hitler's Third Reich. The beer-hall fighters who had won their way to power and position by brute force considered themselves entitled to the spoils of war, and Hitler approved. Even Goering's sumptuous Opera Ball, however, was nothing, compared with the Venetian Night given by the man of the people, Joseph Goebbels, in July 1936 in honour of the delegates to the convention of the International Chamber of Commerce.

Peacock Island, charmingly situated in idyllic Wannsee, some fifteen miles outside of Berlin on the way to Potsdam, with its romantic castle erected in 1794 for Frederick Wilhelm III, had been converted into a scene from the Arabian Nights. As we crossed over from the mainland on a pontoon bridge, the path leading to where Dr. Goebbels and his wife waited to receive their guests was lined on both sides with hundreds of the prettiest girls from Berlin's numerous high schools. All of them were dressed in white silk breeches and blouses, white silk stockings, and white leather slippers. Each held a white wand. They bowed as the guests slowly walked several hundred yards to the reception line.

On a beautiful lawn, tables had been set for groups of twelve, ten, eight, and smaller parties. There were some three thousand guests. A sumptuous dinner was served, the like of which we had not eaten in Berlin for years, for these were the days of "Guns before Butter". Fringing the lawn on one side was the longest bar I have ever seen, with eighty attendants at our service to concoct any drink that might be wanted, or to serve champagne without limit. Every lady guest was presented with a statuette from the Prussian State Porcelain Factory.

In another part of the island a gigantic rotunda had been constructed on which the guests could dance, and on which, later in the evening, the ensemble of the civic opera performed a charming ballet and other members of Berlin's artist colony put on a show.

All for the glory of the Third Reich! But the official communiqué for the German press was stilted and drab. The common people were not to know that the days of Augustus the Strong of Saxony and Poland had returned to Germany under the auspices of the tribune of the people, Joseph Goebbels.

During the first year of the Nazi regime the foreign correspondents had hardly any contact with the newly created Propaganda Ministry. Goebbels ignored the foreign press (except for certain satellite journalists), since the majority of the newsmen from other countries on duty in Berlin were critical, to say the least, of Nazism.

Gradually Goebbels realized that such a condition of affairs was untenable; that so long as foreign correspondents were tolerated there must also be some official contact between them and the German authorities. Even unfavourable publicity would be better than no publicity at all. Besides, Hitler might at any time accuse him of having failed even to try to win over the foreign correspondents to an understanding of what he and his movement were attempting to do.

In the spring of 1934, therefore, Goebbels reversed his policy and invited the foreign correspondents as well as the diplomatic corps to a tea-party in Leopold Palace.

Shortly afterwards the Foreign Press Association gave its traditional annual banquet in honour of the German Government, the diplomatic corps, and leaders of German thought. In Republican days most members of the cabinet had attended. The German Chancellor or the Foreign Minister had always delivered an important speech. The Nazis snubbed us. No cabinet member came—only a few minor officials.

In the years of the Weimar Republic it had not been difficult for me to find appropriate words of welcome to our German and foreign diplomatic guests. The leaders of the short-lived German republic were anxious to fit themselves into the pattern of a co-operative, peaceful world.

But to speak on an occasion like this, when the Nazi Government deliberately snubbed us, without risking deportation, was far more difficult. Unwittingly the absent Dr. Goebbels came to my rescue.

Some days before our banquet a representative of Der Angriff had been ejected from Rumania. (That, of course, was before Ion Antonescu.) I cannot remember what the specific charges were. In general they were the same as those made—and rightly so—against so many German correspondents abroad after the Nazis took over. Most of these men were now no longer reporters; they were political agents of the Nazi regime.

Goebbels seized upon the occasion to write a scathing editorial, protesting against the eviction. He posed as a champion of free speech and untrammelled inquiry into facts. The foreign correspondent, he held, must be permitted to keep in touch with not only the Government but also the opposition, must have the privilege of writing both complimentary and uncomplimentary things about the country of which he is a guest. In short, Goebbels advocated for his correspondents abroad all those things that we had been permitted to do under the Weimar Republic but which we were being reprimanded and even threatened for doing in the Third Reich.

My speech on this occasion was "Made in Germany". I stated that it was a comforting thing for a foreign correspondent to find that his conception of his duties coincided with that of the country to which he was assigned. I therefore took pleasure in quoting the official German position on this matter.

After concluding the reading of the Goebbels editorial, I said that every foreign correspondent present no doubt agreed with this official Nazi view as expressed by Dr. Goebbels, wherefore I raised my glass to that freedom of the press on which we were all agreed, and which had been aptly defined in Der Angriff.

If I ever saw people look silly, it was those few Nazis present.

Quite by accident I came to hear Goebbels make a pronouncement which put the final touch on Nazi regimentation of the German mind. Among the numerous invitations to public ceremonies which constantly passed over my desk in the Associated Press Bureau at Berlin there was one asking me to attend a meeting of the Reichskulturkammer (Reich Chamber of Culture) in the Philharmonic Hall at noon, November 29, 1936. Goebbels was to be the speaker. This meant that we would receive the text of his address via the German News Bureau soon after he had finished. Therefore, why bother to go to the meeting?

Before and after the address, however, the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra was to play. I was willing even to listen to a tirade by Goebbels if I could hear Beethoven and Schubert performed by the Berlin Philharmonic. I hastened to the nearby hall.

Goebbels arose and, in cold, biting language, and without his usual effort to ingratiate himself with his listeners, calmly announced that musical, theatrical, literary, and artistic criticism was hereafter forbidden. The professional press and radio critics were ordered to limit themselves to Betrachtungen (reflections or contemplations), which meant that they might write something about the artist himself and his methods of work, possibly even a word or two as to how the musical composition or the play had originated, but nothing to indicate a critical attitude toward either the performer or his work.

The representatives of every sector of German art present looked at one another in amazement. The newspaper critics bit their lips angrily. The last vestige of relative freedom of the press was thus eliminated by the dictum of the Propaganda Minister.

I was glad I had gone. To observe the smugness with which Goebbels addressed the leaders of art and culture in Germany, to catch the malicious glint in his eye as he noted the helpless consternation of his listeners, and to hear the raucous applause of the Nazi party leaders of the beer-hall type who were sprinkled among the writers, musicians, painters, sculptors, and other artists—that was worth coming for.

Strangely enough, my last experience as a free man in Germany had to do with Joseph Goebbels. Stranger still, although Goebbels and I had a mutual aversion toward each other—Goebbels said in his diary entry for May 19, 1942, what he thought of me—my last experience was a gratifying one.

Here is the unusual story. At Hanover there was a close friend of our family, Frau Lotte B., a Jewess. She was arrested and ordered to be deported to the Baltic States, then under German occupation.

Her husband had been a naval captain in World War I and had a distinguished record. He had taken his son to the United States where news reached him of the November 1938 pogroms. He saw that a return to Germany meant disaster. Therefore he moved heaven and earth to have his wife join him, and actually secured for her a visa to Cuba. Friends in Germany were instrumental in obtaining transit visas through France and Spain.

Although Frau B. possessed the necessary papers for emigration, the Nazis placed her on one of the cattle trains filled with Jews who were to be shipped to some Baltic ghetto—Riga, if I remember correctly.

It was at this stage that friends acquainted me with the situation. I ran from office to office, only to learn that, in the last analysis, Jewish affairs were in the hands of none other than Joseph Goebbels.

If ever it was difficult for me to become a petitioner it was now. I loathed Dr. Goebbels. I hated to ask him for anything. I feared he might ask something of me in return which my conscience would forbid me to do. Yet the thought of this splendid woman being permanently separated from her husband and child and left to perish miserably in a concentration camp would not let me sleep.

For the first and only time in my life I therefore asked a favour of Dr. Goebbels. I reminded him that in the first place the Nazis on assuming power had specifically stated they would treat Jews with a distinguished war record differently from others of their race or religion. Captain B.'s record as a naval hero was beyond challenge. Therefore he was, I argued, entitled to special consideration.

— Secondly, I argued that the purpose of the evacuations obviously was to drive all Jews out of Germany. Then what objection could there be to letting Frau B. start westward for America instead of eastward to the Baltic States? In either case Nazi Germany would be rid of her.

On more than one occasion I have been baffled by the unpredictable workings of the Nazi mind. To my surprise, Goebbels sent me word through Dr. Semler, of the Propaganda Ministry, who had been very helpful to me in this matter, that he would see to it that Frau B. was taken off the ghetto train and allowed to proceed to Spain. He attached no conditions. He did not try to make a deal with me. Dr. Semler told me privately, however, that I had "shamed" him into taking favourable action by my reference to Captain B.'s war record.

Pearl Harbour followed soon after, and four days later, on December 11, 1941, Adolf Hitler declared war on the United States. We journalists were permitted to join the embassy and consulate staffs for internment at Bad Nauheim where we had to wait five months before being allowed to proceed to Lisbon and there board the New York-bound SS Drottningholm which had just brought the Axis diplomats and journalists to Portugal.

On the morning of December 14, just as my wife and I were about to drive to the American Embassy to join the rest of the internees, the telephone rang. It was the Postal Ministry which read a telegram to me from Frau B. stating that she had arrived safely in Madrid.

What was Goebbels' place in the Nazi scheme of things? I remember a talk I had in 1930 with Ernst Roehm, the only man in the Nazi hierarchy who addressed Adolf Hitler by the familiar German "Du". He was brought to my office by a Bolivian diplomat, Federico Nielsen-Reyes, who thought it high time an Associated Press representative knew some of the men of the coming regime in Germany. Roehm in turn introduced me to Hitler several months later.

Discussing the various leaders of the Nazi movement, Roehm pointed out that Goebbels often annoyed Hitler by the guttersnipe language used in the Angriff. "Goebbels is a special case, and the Fuehrer at first did not know what to do with him," Roehm told me. "He finally decided that, since Berlin was so 'red', Goebbels might as well work off his energies there."

Step by step, moving rather cautiously at first, Goebbels entrenched himself. He took sides against Roehm and was in Hitler's immediate entourage during the crisis of June 30, 1934, when the fate of the regime seemed to hang in the balance. At the same time he seems to have looked for a possibility of securing a berth elsewhere in case the repercussions of the Roehm revolt and the attendant wholesale purges proved too great for Hitler to retain his dictatorship. Coming to Prague soon afterwards to cover a story there, I received an unexpected visit from Otto Strasser, leader of the "Black Front" which for a while played with Hitler and had then broken away from him because he was not radical enough. Strasser at that time claimed that Goebbels was in contact with him and was ready to join the Strasser forces in case Hitler were overthrown.

I believe it is no exaggeration to say that by the time the Goebbels diaries were written the little doctor was the most important and influential man after Hitler, not even excepting the seemingly all-powerful Heinrich Himmler. Goering, the successor-designate to Hitler, was already in eclipse. Himmler had only brute force at his command. He was not a man of exceptional intellect. Nor was he powerful in his own right. His power, like that of Martin Bormann, depended upon Adolf Hitler. His clumsiness in trying to negotiate a separate peace in the closing days of the war shows what was bound to happen to him once he failed to act on Hitler's orders.

Goebbels, on the other hand, undoubtedly had brains. He was vested with more and more authority as time went on, until by 1943 he was virtually running the country while Hitler was running the war.

One indication of the power exerted by Goebbels is his repeated statement that he issued orders to arrest this or that person. The following entry, dated November 19, 1943, illustrates what I mean:

"There is some complaint about the attitude of certain classes of our population toward English prisoners of war. . . . I have given orders that people so unmindful of their honour as to behave thus are to be summoned into court and given heavy prison sentences."

In fact, a careful reading of the diaries makes one feel that Goebbels was a law unto himself, apart from his respect for Adolf Hitler, whose will he obeyed, even though he did not meekly accept an adverse decision but kept reverting to the subject until he had either changed the Fuehrer's mind or found him adamant.

What other personal characteristics does Goebbels reveal in his diaries for 1942-43?

Overshadowing all the rest was his inordinate ambition. Obsessed with ambition, he became a glutton for work—not because he was overconscientious, but because he was driven on by an almost psychopathic lust for power.

To achieve power he needed to be in the know about what was going on around him. Accordingly we find him listening by the hour to the gossip of men who could inform him of the foibles and weaknesses of possible rivals. We find him sticking his nose into everything, even in matters which in nowise concerned him.

I could turn to almost any page of his diaries and find him occupying his mind with such matters as potato rations, how women should do their hair in wartime, Nazi terminology in foreign-language dictionaries, grumbling by the average citizen, requisitioning of copper and pewter ware, the administration of justice, new taxes, houses of ill fame for foreign slave workers, fees for troop entertainers, diet for dancing girls, women in industry, experiments in artificial insemination, an itinerary for Countess Ciano, civilian behaviour in wartime, character of radio programmes, German foreign policy, attitude toward occupied countries, corruption in high places—just to mention a few topics at random.

So ambitious was Goebbels that he refused to take time for necessary rest. Apparently he feared that by being away from his duties for even a fortnight he might miss something of importance in the determining of which he should have a hand.

He writes about trouble with his nerves, about an itch that has become unbearable, about being very tired and badly in need of rest, about the terrible pain caused by a bad kidney attack, etc. Yet such is his ambition and jealous concern for keeping power in his hands that he refuses consistently to heed his doctor's orders to go to Karlsbad for a cure.

Hand in hand with his overweening ambition went a colossal vanity.

"The Fuehrer told Speer he never once discovered a psychological error in my propaganda," he wrote jubilantly on April 24, 1943.

"I was in top form and used persuasive and pointed arguments," he exclaimed on February 7, 1942. "My articles are as fascinating for Germans as they are for foreign readers," was his comment on April 6, 1942.

A little flattery—and Goebbels was ready to change his opinion about a person. This is strikingly illustrated in the case of King Boris of Bulgaria. Goebbels hated royalty and aristocracy. The Hohenzollerns weren't "worth a hoot", the Italian royal house was "despicable", Queen Wilhelmina of the Netherlands "surely a sad sight". Quite in keeping with this general estimate was his opinion of King Boris as expressed in his diary for January 25, 1942: "a sly, crafty fellow", who "is said to be playing a somewhat double-faced game".

Then Boris did him the honour of summoning him for a private audience which, although scheduled to last only twenty minutes, stretched out for more than an hour.

Goebbels hears that his articles are "everyday reading" for the Bulgarian monarch, that he uses Goebbels' arguments in talking to his military staff, that Goebbels would have prevented German defeat in 1918 had he then been Minister for Propaganda.

Suddenly Goebbels went into reverse; he now wrote of Boris (see diary entry for March 28, 1942): "He is a real people's king . . . an impassioned devotee of Hitler's genius as a leader . . . sympathetic."

Goebbels was undoubtedly one of the most radical of the Nazi leaders. His early doubt about Hitler, as I have pointed out, revolved about the question whether the Fuehrer saw social and economic problems radically enough.

But this radicalism extends to all fields other than the social-economic. He insists upon a fundamental change in the administration of justice, even to the extent of throwing overboard existing legal concepts and substituting Hitler's supreme will and the "sound common sense of the people" as the basis for legal findings. It is he who suggests to Hitler that he should have the sham Reichstag expressly confer upon the Fuehrer the right to dismiss from office anybody he pleases without a hearing. He wants Hitler to authorize the shooting of enemy parachutists and is disappointed that the Fuehrer does not agree with him.

Above all, Goebbels' radicalism was attested by the fact that he, more conspicuously than any other Nazi leader, demanded "total war". The whole nation must take part in this war, he felt. He therefore opposed so-called "soup money" for civil servants when they had to work longer hours, insisting that the civilian should fare no better than the soldier. He advocated the drafting of women into important war industries—again on the theory that the entire nation must wage this war.

With Goebbels, only a Nazi was a full-fledged human being. However often he may lose his temper over the shortcomings of his fellow leaders, in the last analysis they rank higher with him than non-Nazis. To him the Waffen-S.S. is a military element far superior to the regular army. General Sepp Dietrich is admirable because he is the leading general of the S.S. troops. Next come Field Marshal Erwin Rommel, Colonel General Eduard Dietl, and Colonel General Heinz Guderian, all of them ardent Nazis. The leftovers from imperial and republican days, men such as Brauchitsch, Manstein, Bock, Busch, Kuechler, List, Halder, Fromm, Stuelpnagel, are either not to be trusted or are inept or lacking in imagination.

Even Party considerations failed to count with him, however, when the interests of his own Propaganda Ministry were involved. He will not permit the Party to establish a general news service of its own. He intervenes when Gauleiter Joseph Buerckel tries to set up an independent cultural office. He resents any attempt by the Ministry of the Interior, which is technically in charge of civil-service appointments and at the head of which is one of Hitler's oldest collaborators, Dr. Wilhelm Frick, to have any say about appointments in the Propaganda Ministry; and denies the Finance Ministry its right to be consulted on these appointments on the ground that the budget is involved.

Goebbels was a peculiar mixture of realist and wishful thinker. Despite his vanity he often viewed situations with a greater sense of realism than did some of his colleagues. He saw, for instance, what a mistake it was for the Nazi regime not to drive a wedge between the conquered peoples of the East and the Bolsheviks by promising the Ukrainians, White Russians, and others land for the peasants and religious freedom.

Ardent Nazi though he was, he was acutely aware of the danger to the regime inherent in its leaders' love for good living, even in wartime.

Not because he was humane, but because he was a realist, Goebbels advocated decent food and pay for slave labour. Only by offering food and monetary inducements, he felt, would these forced labourers step up production.

Parenthetically I may add that he was an extreme realist when it came to his own health. When he had his violent kidney attack he preferred to entrust his precious body to the care of Catholic nuns as nurses, spurning the much-advertised "Brown Sisters" of the Nazi regime.

On the other hand Goebbels frequently shows that wishful thinking could easily sidetrack his innate sense of realism. He refused to believe, for instance, because he did not want to believe, that America really had great potentialities for war production. Instead, he poo-poohed American claims and accused President Roosevelt, General Marshall, Colonel Frank Knox, the Secretary of the Navy, and Harry Hopkins of exaggerating American production.

Wishful thinking led him to prophesy that the Allies, on reaching Italy, would indulge in wholesale looting of art treasures, that Italy would never declare war on Germany, that Sir Stafford Cripps would not accept an appointment to go to India, that President Roosevelt was trying to seize India and the French colonial empire, and that Germany proper could never be invaded.

Space forbids dealing in this introduction with numerous other aspects of the Nazi regime on which the diaries cast new light. It will suffice merely to indicate some of them. Totalitarianism is revealed as amazingly inept and bungling, in contrast to the popular notion that authoritarian regimes are at least efficient, however brutal they may be. The Luftwaffe is shown to have been far weaker in the years under discussion than the outside world assumed. The aims and methods of Nazi foreign policy are disclosed with a frankness and cynicism which make National Socialism stand forth as absolutely amoral and immoral, as ready to cheat friend, foe and neutral alike. Hitler's and Goebbels' contempt for other nations and their public men was abysmal. Goebbels gloatingly planned the extermination of all Jews, and the reduction of the Christian Churches to impotence.

The Goebbels diaries are also calculated to cause wide discussion whether Allied psychological warfare was waged with the necessary acumen, and whether the doctrine of Unconditional Surrender did not needlessly prolong the war.

The diaries become almost humorous reading in those passages in which Goebbels feigns moral indignation at certain occurrences in the Allied camp. For instance, he pretends to be sickened on reading about the telegrams sent to Stalin by the "plutocracies" on the occasion of Red Army day—as though this were any different from what the Nazis did during their brief marriage of convenience with the Bolsheviks from the autumn of 1939 until June 22, 1941.

Time and again he assumes a holier-than-thou attitude toward the Western Powers about the alleged falsification or withholding of news. Yet his diaries are replete with cynical admissions that he has doctored the news and kept the German public in ignorance of important developments.

The Goebbels diaries are by no means merely a vain public official's reflections on his own importance and his non-authoritative interpretations of contemporaneous events. They are the day-by-day record of occurrences in Germany and the world, written by one of the three top men in the Nazi hierarchy, who in the early days of the regime were often called "the Nazi trinity".

Adolf Hitler, of course, was the Number One man. If any further evidence of this is needed, the Goebbels diaries clearly establish this fact.

Next there was Hermann Goering, designated by Hitler as his successor in the event of his death or incapacity.

And finally there was the little doctor, Joseph Goebbels, the third figure in the trinity, whose story is told in the following pages in his own words.

January 21, 1942

Japan has notified us that it has requested Siam not to declare war on England for the present, nor to adhere to the Three-Power Pact, since the Japanese desire to use Siam as much as possible for assembling their forces against Burma unhindered without being disturbed by enemy air raids.

Immediately upon my return to Berlin I gave the cabinet a detailed report on the general situation, based on my discussions with the Fuehrer.

I gave a rather long report and supplied a considerable number of details, but pledged all participants to strictest secrecy.

[Goebbels was summoned to Hitler's headquarters in East Prussia from time to time. Cabinet meetings were practically a thing of the past, at least as far as Hitler himself was concerned. This was an exception.]

After that I talked at length with Martin. I tried to persuade him to tell me the names of all officers in the O.K.W. and the O.K.H. who are guilty of fostering defeatism, and to make a written report on them. The Fuehrer has called for such a written report from me so that he may take proper measures.

[O.K.W. stands for Ober-Kommando der Wehrmacht, or Supreme Command of the Armed Forces. O.K.H. stands for Ober-Kommando des Heeres, or Supreme Command of the Army. Lieutenant Colonel Martin was the Wehrmacht liaison officer with the Propaganda Ministry.]

I told Martin it wasn't right for him to spare these people, but that on the contrary he must stand by his oath of allegiance to the Fuehrer. He agreed with me absolutely and declared himself willing to proceed in accordance with my proposals. That won't make his colleagues love him, but the Fuehrer has expressly guaranteed to take him under his personal protection if he makes such a report. That should be sufficient for an officer, apart from the fact that he must summon enough courage to report defeatist currents to the top level. At the end of World War I all responsible men stated in their memoirs what they thought and what they really ought to have done, but nobody had done it. Now we don't want to do so much thinking, but rather act and do what our conscience commands us to do. Martin is quite open-minded toward my line of reasoning. . . .

[In view of later developments, which culminated in the attempt on Hitler's life on July 20, 1944, it is interesting to note that certain officers were spreading defeatist propaganda more than two years before this attempt.]

With Gutterer I discussed our tactics with regard to other ministries. I consider it my duty not only to keep my own Ministry in order, but also to proceed generally against the defeatism prevalent in Berlin Government quarters. I won't shirk this duty, no matter what the consequences. I fear neither facts nor persons but only the possibility of losing the war. In times of crisis fear of persons is a most dangerous thing and there is but one sin, as Nietzsche put it; namely, that of cowardice. It is sometimes much more difficult to be courageous in civilian than in military life. That sort of courage is now à propos and necessary.

[Leopold Gutterer was under-secretary in Goebbels' Propaganda Ministry and ranked directly under the minister. In this first available diary entry Goebbels already stands revealed as considering it his duty to act as Hitler's deputy in domestic matters. The impression given by the diary throughout is that Hitler ran the war while Goebbels ran the country.]

We are receiving reports about the extraordinarily low morale of the Bolshevik troops along the border of Manchukuo. But I prevent publication of such information because it might awaken too great hopes in the German people. I am very keen about holding such reports back. The German people must face the hard facts of war and must not nurture empty hopes.

An American newspaper [sic], The Reader's Digest, with a circulation of 5,300,000, has published a sensational article which asserts that the United States in the last analysis is unable to undertake anything against the armed forces of the Axis. America's war was a hopeless undertaking and could only result in bleeding the nations white. At least one voice in the wilderness! It remains to be seen, however, whether this viewpoint will make headway.

Heydrich has now installed his new Government of the Protectorate. Hacha has made the declaration of solidarity with the Reich that was requested of him. Heydrich's policy in the Protectorate is truly a model one. He mastered the crisis there with ease. As a result the Protectorate is now in the best of spirits, quite in contrast to other occupied or annexed areas.

[Reinhard Heydrich, known as The Hangman, was Heinrich Himmler's right-hand man as chief of the Security Police of the Gestapo until his appointment as Protector of Bohemia-Moravia, succeeding Baron Konstantin von Neurath, who was considered too mild. Heydrich was notorious for his ruthless methods. Goebbels was wrong in characterizing Heydrich's administration as a "model" one under which the Czechs were happy, for Heydrich was later assassinated at Prague in May 1942 by a group of exasperated Czechs.]

Former Supreme Court Judge Emil Hacha became Hitler's satellite "president" of the Protectorate after the partition of the Czechoslovak Republic in 1938 and the flight of its president, Eduard Beneš.]

I have ordered my men to proceed rigorously against Berlin defeatism and if necessary even to box the ears of some particular grumbler, thereby creating a fait accompli and teaching all potential defeatists a lesson. We are living in extremely tough times, and tough measures are necessary.

[Goebbels never hesitated to invoke rowdy measures. About a year before the Nazis took Germany over, he had his henchmen release mice during a Berlin performance of the motion-picture version of Erich Maria Remarque's All Quiet on the Western Front. The panic which ensued resulted in the cancellation of later showings.]

My visit to the Fuehrer's G.H.Q. has had the most beneficial consequences for me personally. Not that I needed to be buoyed up by the Fuehrer, but, thank God, the Fuehrer absolutely approved the course on which I have embarked. This is both reassuring and inspiring. I now feel secure and can approach the solution of the difficult problems in store for us in the immediate future with sovereign certainty.

The Japanese Foreign Minister, Togo, delivered an extraordinarily firm, manly, and diplomatically clever speech in Parliament. He rejected the theory of race struggle, stretched out the hand of peace to the South American states, and above all handled the peoples in East Asia, who are oppressed by the English and Americans, with exceptional psychological skill. The Japanese are pursuing a tactical course fraught with extraordinary danger both for England and the United States. It is evident that the Japanese have had considerable political and diplomatic experience. Added to their great military powers this experience is calculated to achieve corresponding successes.

[Shigenori Togo, born 1882, was Japanese Minister for Foreign Affairs in 1941-42 and Minister of Education in 1943. He had previously been Secretary of Embassy in Berlin and Washington, Counsellor of Embassy in Berlin, Director of European and West Asiatic Affairs of the Japanese Foreign Office in 1933-36, and Ambassador to Germany in 1937-39, to Russia in 1939-40.]

The debate in England still revolves around the argument that a victory must be won at least in one theatre of war, and that this theatre is Libya. Churchill has now become a collector of deserts. That is an activity into which England only a few years ago tried to force Mussolini.

Our relations with France are being subjected to severe strain. I discussed this subject at length with the Fuehrer during my last visit to G.H.Q. The Fuehrer doesn't want any preliminary peace. Nor does he believe that France is in any way ready to help us to create the new order in Europe. Even Pétain wants to bide his time and seize upon an auspicious moment for restoring France to the position of a Great Power. The French could render us some service in North Africa, but it isn't sufficiently important for us to meet their wishes. The French Fleet, too, can't be placed at our service at present since it lacks the necessary fuel.

The Fuehrer has become somewhat suspicious of Abetz. However great Abetz's achievements may have been in the question of German-French relations, the fact must not be overlooked that he has a French wife and that he will therefore always be under a severe psychological strain.

[Otto Abetz, a former member of the German Democratic party and in his younger years an ardent pacifist, became a member of the French section of Ribbentrop's Intelligence Bureau soon after Hitler's accession to power in Germany. From 1935 until 1939 he was a professional propagandist for the Nazis in France, but was expelled in 1939, some months before World War II began.

The German Foreign Office sent him back to France in June 1940 as plenipotentiary to the Army of Occupation in France. From August 1940 until 1944 he was German envoy to the Military Administration in Paris.]

Lieutenant Colonel Martin has handed me his written declaration for the Fuehrer. His doing so was an act of extraordinary courage, which I value highly in him. The Fuehrer now certainly has the data for proceeding energetically against defeatist tendencies in the O.K.W. and especially in the O.K.H. An example must be made here, for if such tendencies exist among officers, how can one blame the common man for gradually losing courage and getting depressed? [Den Kopf haengen laesst.]

The reports of the S.D. reveal the following:

The anxiety of the German people about the Eastern Front is increasing. Deaths owing to freezing are an especially important factor in this connection. The number of cases of freezing revealed by transports from the Eastern Front back home is so enormous that it is causing great indignation here and there. Unrest is, however, not sufficiently great to constitute a threat. People continue to criticize the O.K.W. communiqué because it gives no clear picture of the situation. Soldiers' letters, too, have a devastating effect. Words cannot describe what our soldiers are writing home from the front. This is partly because every individual wants to appear important. The passion for showing off here plays a considerable role. When the soldier writes and exaggerates he doesn't stop to think that he may be causing his family and his relatives a lot of worry. I suggest once more that the O.K.W. indoctrinate the soldiers on this point, but I don't expect much. It is a question of a human weakness against which one is powerless.

[The S.D.—Sicherheits-Dienst or Security Service—was a special section of the Gestapo and was especially responsible for the security of the Nazi leaders. It undertook constant sampling of opinion.]

Film production is flourishing almost unbelievably despite the war. What a good idea of mine it was to take possession of the films on behalf of the Reich several years ago! It would be terrible if the high profits now being earned by the motion-picture industry were to flow into private hands.

I talked with Stephan about the question of buying up news concerns abroad. I believe we should continue to do so, for the greater the number of news outlets, especially newspapers, we own abroad, the better will this be for our future role of leadership in Europe.

[Dr. Werner Stephan was secretary of the Democratic party before the Nazis took over, but changed his politics quickly and became the right-hand man of Dr. Otto Dietrich, under-secretary in the Propaganda Ministry. He was later taken over directly by Goebbels, who entrusted him with the task of quietly buying up facilities for German propaganda in foreign countries.]

I saw the new American propaganda movie, Foreign Correspondent. It is a first-class production, a most exciting crime study, which no doubt will make a certain impression upon the broad masses of the people in enemy countries. Significantly enough this film, with its absolutely anti-German tendency, was allowed to run for months in Sweden. The Swedes and the Swiss are playing with fire. Let us hope they will burn their fingers before this war is over.

Rommel's boldly conceived attack in North Africa is extremely gratifying. The English are again trying to excuse themselves with weather difficulties. In the course of the day, however, they must nevertheless admit being pushed back quite a distance. Rommel is praised highly by the English press. He is altogether one of our most popular generals. We could well use a few more such big shots.

[Field Marshal Erwin Rommel, born in 1891, a product of Tuebingen University, received Imperial Germany's highest decoration, the Pour le Mérite, for bravery in the Isonzo battle in 1917. After the war he became a teacher in the Dresden Military Academy. An early Nazi, he was attached to Hitler's body-guard, and commanded the Fuehrer's headquarters in the Austrian, Sudetenland, and Czech occupations, and during the Polish campaign of 1939. During the 1940 campaign in France he commanded a Panzer division, and in 1941 was transferred to North Africa, where he acquired the sobriquet of "Desert Fox" as commanding general of the Afrika Korps. In 1943 he was put in charge of northern Italy as commander in chief, and in 1944 placed in command of an army corps in France. He finally lost faith in Hitler and joined the opposition. After the great purge following the attack on Hitler's life on July 20, 1944, Rommel was visited by two high brother officers who had orders to bring him in. On the way he was handed poison and told he had the choice of committing suicide, whereupon his name would remain an honoured one and he be given a military funeral, or he would be tried for treason and executed, whereupon all his possessions would be confiscated and his family rendered penniless. He chose suicide and swallowed the poison while in the car—hence the legend of a "motor accident." (See the Von Hassell Diaries for interesting additional information.)]

Negotiations in Rio are continuing. Argentina is resisting pressure by the United States in every way possible. . . .

Sumner Welles is trying very hard to obtain results, but the South American states, I suppose, would first like to see some military successes by the Americans before they jump into the war. One can hardly expect them to engage themselves on the side of so undependable a partner. Roosevelt no longer enjoys the reputation and prestige that he had even a few months ago.

Once again I must concern myself with O.F.I.-Havas. The French have a truly detestable news policy, especially as regards conditions in the East. I demanded that the Foreign Office launch an energetic protest in Vichy and, if necessary, threaten and apply reprisals. What an idea, to let defeated and conquered nations create difficulties for us with news! But that's what happens when you show too conciliatory an attitude toward the defeated enemy. Our policies toward France have, in my opinion, just about failed. We have made peace without concluding peace [Wir haben Frieden gemacht, ohne Frieden abzuschliessen] and are beginning to feel the results more and more.

[Before the war, the semi-official French news agency was the Agence Havas. Its assets were taken over by the Vichy government of France, and the name changed to Office Française d'Information, or O.F.I. for short.]

In view of this situation between ourselves and France I have declined a request to raise the ban on French literature and music in the German Reich. There is no reason why I should. We are still in a state of war with France. I don't know whether tomorrow or the day after tomorrow open war won't break out again. It is wise, therefore, for the intellectual and cultural leadership of the nation to take this possibility into account.

I am about to release some three hundred officials of my Ministry to the Army and the munitions industry and to replace them by women. That involves some difficulties, but these will be gradually overcome. The Party, especially, will have to help me with this. I should like also to force society ladies and women from our better strata into this work. I therefore had a long discussion about this with Frau von Dircksen who is very enthusiastic about my plan and who has promised to support me to the utmost.

[Ella von Dircksen, mother of the former German Ambassador to Japan and Great Britain, Herbert von Dircksen, was one of the first leaders of society to embrace the Nazi faith. Once a week she held open house in her spacious Berlin residence, and Goebbels was a regular caller. At Frau von Dircksen's home he was introduced to many men and women of fashion, and it was probably there that he had his first lessons in social behaviour.]

Geheimrat Opel of the Opel Works came to me to complain of the great number of "confidential", "strictly confidential", and "secret" reports and news services emanating from different Reich offices and organizations. That has gradually become a cancerous growth. I am going to put an end to this nonsense and will replace this over-production of confidential reports by one single news service to be issued by the Ministry itself. In excited and strained times the hunger for news must somehow be satisfied. If that isn't done, conditions such as those here referred to arise which can be remedied only by great effort.

[Wilhelm von Opel, head of the Adam Opel automobile works, was an ardent nationalist who, in this editor's presence, delivered a super-patriotic speech during an international motor show in Berlin in the days of the Weimar Republic, claiming that the German motor industry, hard pressed though it might be for lack of capital, would never sell out to any foreign interests. Only a few years later, in 1929, General Motors of New York absorbed the Opel plants.]

At last all government departments are in accord about regulating the question of listening to foreign broadcasts. I have arrived at an agreement even with the Foreign Office. Lammers has meanwhile issued a circular letter to the highest functionaries of the Reich. It is therefore to be expected that order will gradually be established in this sector also, and that rumourmongering will eventually be stopped, particularly in Berlin Government quarters. That is imperative, for especially in the so-called government circles the number of defeatists and grumblers is legion. It is not true that these circles can take it when unpleasant news reaches them. They are the very ones who are most susceptible; therefore it is they who must be especially protected against defeatist tendencies or rumours. This can best be done by referring them for their reading to the regular news sources and by not letting them have any secret information at all. That applies even to a large number of ministers of the Reich who have no general conception of the situation as a whole but have only to administer their own departments. They really don't have to know anything more than what is necessary for their department. It wouldn't matter if they could be correctly informed about the general situation. It is half-knowledge that is always most dangerous.

[Dr. Hans Heinrich Lammers had slowly climbed the ladder of German bureaucracy as an administrative official under the aegis of the German Nationalist party until Adolf Hitler loomed large on the political horizon. Lammers then joined the Nazi party. When Hitler became Chancellor in 1933, he needed someone with long administrative experience to organize and run his chancellery. Lammers was given the post. By the time World War II started he had risen to the rank of a Reich or cabinet minister although his job was still that of Chief of the Chancellery. He was exceedingly fond of decorations, and his uniform of an Obergruppen-fuehrer of the S.S. (with general's rank) was almost as spectacularly studded with decorations as was Goering's. Friction arose between Goebbels and Goering on the one hand and Lammers on the other over Lammers' considering himself as a sort of acting chancellor while the Fuehrer was at the front running the war. This whole conflict is described dramatically later, when Goering, Goebbels, Ley, Funk, and Speer "ganged up" against Lammers, Bormann, and Keitel. See especially the diary entry for March 2, 1943.]

O.F.I.-Havas still continues to issue tendentious and insolent reports about the Eastern Front. Following my suggestion, the Foreign Office has now drafted a note of protest for Vichy. It will be delivered during the next few days. We shall possibly cut the Frenchmen off from their teletypes and veto the establishment of an O.F.I. office in Paris and in Berlin unless they accustom themselves to reporting quite differently.

Rommel's latest success is wonderful. To be sure the English blame bad weather; nevertheless they must admit that our Afrika Korps has once again surprised and outguessed them by all rules of the game. The English press calls Rommel a rascal who has once again pulled a rabbit out of the hat. The propaganda which the English are carrying on for Rommel is exceedingly near-sighted from their point of view. They are making him one of the most popular generals in the entire world. That's perfectly all right with us, for Rommel deserves it, and he is such an exemplary character and outstanding soldier that propaganda on his behalf can do no harm. For once propaganda is being done for the right person.

The Americans are so helpless that they must fall back again and again upon boasting about their arms production. Their loud mouths produce a thousand aeroplanes and tanks almost daily, but when they need them in eastern Asia they haven't got them and are therefore taking one beating after another.

The Rio conference has entered upon a serious crisis. Argentina is rearing on her hind legs, and Chile is now taking her side. Despite all his eloquence Sumner Welles has until this moment not attained his goal, and it is very questionable whether he will ever reach it. Argentina and Chile at the last moment refused to agree to a common formula and negotiations are beginning all over again. Roosevelt has played a somewhat unlucky hand in recent weeks. The chief reason is that he can't produce any military victories. If it is true that nothing succeeds like success, it is also true that nothing defeats like defeat.

[The Pan-American Conference for Foreign Ministers opened in Rio de Janeiro on January 15, 1942, with an appeal by Sumner Welles, United States Undersecretary of State, for unity in breaking away from the Axis. It ended on January 28, and Mr. Welles was able to state that the delegates of twenty-one American republics "officially and unanimously proclaimed that they jointly recommended the severance of diplomatic relations between all the American republics and the governments of Japan, Germany, and Italy, because of the aggression committed by a member of the Tripartite Pact against one of the American family of nations; namely, the United States".]

In London, too, things look none too good. Even though, in my opinion, the recurring rumours of a government crisis are grossly exaggerated, nevertheless one cannot overlook the fact that the English people are very restive and apprehensive, and that Churchill must work very hard to dispel this unrest and worry. But I suppose he will succeed once again, all the more so since England has nobody to put in his place.

I have received a confidential report about a talk which one of our special informants had with Pétain. The situation at Vichy, according to this report, is exactly as it was characterized in my recent entry. Vichy desires neither a Bolshevik nor a complete German victory. Pétain, according to our informant, is absolutely vigorous in mind and body. He is the real force behind the policy of watchful waiting. He would far prefer to have Germany and the Soviet Union grind each other to pieces and bleed each other white, thereby enabling France to resume the status of a Great Power, at least to a certain extent. The French are certainly cutting into their own flesh and, when the war is ended, will have to pay the piper for having maintained a waiting attitude far too long.

[Marshal Henri-Philippe Pétain, who became Chief of State of the Vichy Government after the collapse of France in 1940, was condemned to death on August 14, 1945, for collaboration with the enemy, but in view of his advanced age of eighty-nine years his sentence was commuted to life imprisonment.]

I had a long talk with General Schmudt concerning conditions in the O.K.W. The Fuehrer sent him to Berlin expressly to remedy the situation.

[Major General Rudolf Schmudt was chief Wehrmacht adjutant to the Fuehrer, who, in addition, had five personal adjutants taken from Nazi party formations. Schmudt kept the official military diary of Hitler's G.H.Q. He was killed when the bomb that was to end Hitler's life went off on July 20, 1944.]

To a great degree the defeatist tendencies in the O.K.W. and the O.K.H. arise from far too irresponsible distribution of news material, especially on the part of the Seehaus. I am going to put my foot down and see to it that our own departments do not engage in defeatist propaganda. Admiral Canaris has given me quite a number of hair-raising examples showing the irresponsible handling of confidential material. These examples suit me admirably. They furnish the basis for taking exceedingly severe and radical measures.

[The so-called Seehaus Service was a thorn in Goebbels' flesh, and with reason. This monitoring service, which issued a daily news letter, derived its name from the fact that it was located in what was once a very popular Berlin suburban restaurant, the Seehaus (House on the Lake), situated on the Wannsee halfway between Berlin and Potsdam.

To workers in the German Underground it was known that the men and women who were responsible for the German Foreign Office's monitoring service were for the most part anti-Hitlerites who did much to stir up defeatism in Germany. They were even called the "Sabotage Club" by people in the know.

While their job was the strictly technical one of listening to and taking down informative broadcasts from all over the world, the responsible officials of this service cleverly put the material together in such a manner as to raise doubts about the authenticity of news distributed by Goebbels' Propaganda Ministry. If, say, Goebbels kept from the public some defeat on the Eastern Front, the Seehaus people would spread news of the defeat to the various government departments by simply copying down what the B.B.C. reported about it. When later developments showed that the B.B.C. report was right and the Goebbels handout wrong, naturally readers of the Seehaus-service became more and more sceptical of Goebbels' news reports.

Admiral Wilhelm Canaris, chief of German Intelligence, was a bitter enemy of the Nazi regime. He played his part so cleverly, however, that the Nazis did not become aware of his subversive activities until 1944.

Even as sophisticated a man as Goebbels evidently did not see through him, but felt so flattered that Canaris paid him a visit that he took a liking to the admiral. When the Nazis finally found out that he had been one of the main conspirators of the group which on July 20, 1944, attempted to assassinate Hitler, they were so enraged that the admiral was tortured, hanged, revived, and hanged again.]

From Upper Silesia I received information to the effect that wounded soldiers are still being transported in unheated goods vans, and that the soldiers are lying, some with frozen limbs, in these trains, without blankets, neglected, and unfed for seventy or eighty hours. I am raising Cain with the hospital echelons of the Army and am arranging for the Party to take over in order that at least this extremely difficult and embarrassing problem may be solved.

The Red Cross will send its advance columns also into the occupied areas close to the front so that everything possible may be done to guarantee competent care for the wounded. This shows once more that the various departments of the Wehrmacht are not in a position to meet a really difficult problem by clever improvisation. Trains of goods vans for wounded are not mentioned in the Mob.-Calendar, hence they don't exist.

[The Mob.-Calendar was a book of instructions as to what was to be done in the event of mobilization.]

Morale among the people is so-so. There is still a lot of talk about the dismissal of Brauchitsch. People haven't quite made up their minds whether he left because he wanted to or not. It certainly isn't true that this incident has already dropped out completely in public discussions.

[Field Marshal Walter von Brauchitsch succeeded Colonel General Werner von Fritsch in 1938 as commander in chief of the German Army. Hitler soon won him over by quietly arranging for his divorce and giving him an estate. The two got on well together at first. In his famous speech to the generals at Berchtesgaden on August 22, 1939, a week before World War II broke out, Hitler said: "Colonel General von Brauchitsch has promised me to finish the war in Poland in a few weeks. Had he reported that I need two years or even only one year to do it, I should not have issued the order to march but should have allied myself temporarily with England instead of with Russia. For we are not in a position to carry on a long war." After the conclusion of the campaign in France in June 1940, Hitler in his Reichstag speech of July 19 gave unstinted praise to Brauchitsch.]

I also have the impression that foreign broadcasts are again being listened to more extensively. About this, too, the right word must be said at an early opportunity.

The Reich Food Ministry is insistent that the price of potatoes be raised. I am against that. While it is true that the farmers must get better prices as an incentive for increasing the crop acreage, on the other hand one cannot overlook the fact that an increase in the price of potatoes chiefly affects the masses, for in the budget of the common man the price of potatoes plays quite a different role from its part in the expenditure of the wealthier classes. I therefore favour a policy of premiums financed by the state.

At noon the state funeral of Field Marshal General von Reichenau was held. The ceremony was planned by the O.K.H. It was unbelievably bad, psychologically clumsy, and the music absolutely amateurish. Following the national anthems the first movement from the Fifth Symphony was played by pupils of the Army Music School; well, what else can you expect? I arranged with General Schmudt that in future the state ceremonies of the Wehrmacht, too, should be turned over to our Ministry, since we alone can guarantee that they will be performed in a manner worthy of the state.

[Field Marshal Walter von Reichenau (1884-1942) was one of the first high officers to embrace the Nazi faith. As chief of the Wehrmacht chancellery he exercised considerable influence, but apparently feared that remaining at his desk might condemn him to home duty in the event of war. He therefore requested Hitler to let him have an active command. In 1935 he was appointed commanding general of the Seventh Army Corps, with headquarters at Munich.

He distinguished himself during the brief war against Poland in 1939 as commander of Army Group South. Always devoted to sports, he swam across the Vistula at the head of his troops. When the war in the West started, von Reichenau, now a colonel general, commanded the Sixth Army, with headquarters in Belgium. At the conclusion of the campaign against France and the Lowlands in 1940, Hitler promoted him field marshal. Hitler replaced Field Marshal von Rundstedt with von Reichenau in December 1941.

He died on January 17, 1942, so far as this editor has been able to learn, from an infection suffered in the campaign against Russia. There have, however, also been rumours that von Reichenau met a violent death. The Von Hassell Diaries interestingly relate how Hitler exploited his death from the Party point of view.]

We have issued a special communiqué to the effect that German submarines have succeeded in sinking 125,000 tons of enemy shipping off the American Atlantic coast. This is an exceedingly good piece of news for the German people. It bears testimony to the tremendous activity of our submarines and their widely extended radius of action, as well as to the fact that German heroism conquers even the widest oceans. At last a special bulletin! We certainly needed it, and it acts like rain on parched land. Everybody regards the communiqué as a very effective answer to the warmonger Roosevelt, whom the whole German people curse. Many people are in a quandary whether to hate him or Churchill more.

I talked with Sepp Dietrich, who has just returned from the southern front to get married in Berlin. He gave me a briefing on the situation along his sector of the front. He is very optimistic. In sharp contrast to the leading gentlemen of the Army, the leaders of the Waffen-S.S. have had National Socialist training. For them difficulties exist only to be overcome.

[General Joseph (Sepp) Dietrich was commander of the Leibstandarte Adolf Hitler, a division, or Standarte, of the Nazi S.S., assigned especially to the duty of protecting the life of the Fuehrer. It was armed better than any other military formation. During the war it was given precedence over other divisions, especially when it came to entering conquered cities triumphantly. Much to the chagrin of the regular Army, the seizure of a city was often postponed until the Leibstandarte could come to the scene of action for the final kill.

Dietrich had been Hitler's personal chauffeur for many years. When Hitler appeared at Wiessee, Bavaria, on June 30, 1934, to arrest the rebellious Ernst Roehm, chief of staff of the S.A., and his accomplices, one of Roehm's men aimed a revolver at Hitler. He was overpowered by Sepp Dietrich. From then on his rise in the Nazi hierarchy was rapid.]

Rommel is generally feared in London. He is already regarded as a sort of legendary figure. It seems a miracle that he succeeded in almost surrounding a part of the British forces. That shows what the initiative, courage, and imagination of a real soldier can do, even under the most unfavourable circumstances. In Rommel's favour is, of course, the fact that he is still very young and can stand punishment.

The Australians are extremely angry because English aid for Australia is so long in coming; at present not even the initial stages of it are discernible anywhere. The Australian Government has therefore by-passed Churchill and turned to the English people with a most urgent appeal for help. This problem may become pretty precarious for England. I am issuing orders to continue to probe this open wound and to rub salt into it.

The Rio conference seems to be ending in a compromise formula. Despite the energetic exertions of Sumner Welles, no unanimous resolution to declare war on Germany was passed. It was finally agreed to recommend the severance of diplomatic relations with the Axis Powers. Argentina prevailed with her obstinacy and finally prevented a complete solution, despite continuous North American pressure.

I have received confidential information concerning the probable successor to the Archbishop of Canterbury. He will be Bishop Temple, who is much more dangerous than the old Canterbury gentleman. Temple is close to the Labour party, was formerly a moderate friend of Germany, and is now a real German hater. He stands 100 per cent behind Churchill, is clever at dialectics and, because of that fact, extremely dangerous. That means we may expect a number of severe attacks from the English clergy. But for the moment I see no special danger in this fact.

Our adversaries lament the fact that they have no compelling peace slogan. Quite obviously they would like to use it to deceive the German people. I won't permit this theme to be discussed by our writers because I am convinced that so delicate a problem had best be put on ice and killed by silence. We can surely congratulate ourselves that our enemies have no Wilson Fourteen Points. Of course, if they had them, we wouldn't be duped by them as were the German people of 1917 and 1918.

Several reports indicate that anti-German sentiment in certain Bulgarian Government circles is slightly on the increase. Especially King Boris is said to be playing a somewhat double-faced game. He is a sly, crafty fellow, who, obviously impressed by the severity of the defensive battles on the Eastern Front, is looking for some back door by which he might eventually escape. This is a very shortsighted policy which will, of course, immediately be reversed, once our offensive has started again.

The Fuehrer sent word to me that he does not desire the circulation of the Stuermar reduced or that it should cease publication altogether. I am very happy about this decision. The Fuehrer stands by his old Party members and fellow fighters and won't let occasional trouble and differences affect him. Because he is so loyal to his co-workers, they, in turn, are equally faithful to him.

[The Stuermar was a pornographic anti-Semitic weekly published by Julius Streicher, Gauleiter of Nuremberg. Streicher's debaucheries and graft became so scandalous that Hitler had finally to relieve him of his Gauleiter job. But he permitted him to continue publication of the Stuermar. All over Germany there were glass-covered bulletin boards for exhibiting the current editions of this publication. Parents protested vigorously that their children were being corrupted by reading filthy articles and seeing the pornographic cartoons in the Stuermar. Streicher was hanged as a major war criminal.]

I, too, believe that our propaganda on the Jewish question must continue undiminished. How much still remains to be done about this can be seen from the following: in connection with the evacuation of a prominent Berlin Jew, an examination of his personal papers and effects revealed that as late as the middle of 1941 the German Crown Prince wrote this Jew very cordial letters and presented him with photographs with exceedingly friendly inscriptions. The House of Hohenzollern of today isn't worth a tinker's damn.

[Goebbels had no use for members of the House of Hohenzollern, whereas Goering was always proud of his friendship with Crown Prince Frederick Wilhelm. The former Crown Prince had many friends among the Jews.]

The problem of sexual activities of the numerous foreign workers now on German soil is a difficult one. This situation in some cases is absolutely grotesque. I suppose the final solution lies in a liberal policy of establishing houses of ill fame. But that is a rather delicate matter which must be dealt with carefully.

I had a long talk with Admiral Canaris concerning the reprehensible attitude of a number of O.K.W. and O.K.H. officers. In his opinion one of the chief reasons is because the Seehaus Service is being distributed so widely among officers and officials. I had a list of subscribers furnished me from which it appears that the Seehaus Service has become a veritable fountainhead of defeatism. The Fuehrer has urgently requested that the list be submitted to him. He won't be very happy when he sees that one hundred and eighty officials of the Foreign Office alone are daily subscribers to the Seehaus Service.

I immediately put an end to this nuisance as far as the O.K.W. is concerned. I am permitting only two copies of the Seehaus Service to go to the O.K.W. At the Foreign Office, too, vigorous steps will have to be taken. In my opinion only such persons as received permission from the Fuehrer to listen to foreign broadcasts should also receive the Seehaus Service. Their number is very limited and I see no real danger there.

* [It was generally forbidden in Nazi Germany to listen to foreign broadcasts. Special permits were issued to a few persons in official positions who were dependent upon these broadcasts for their work. The foreign correspondents accredited in Berlin also received the special permit. In signing a receipt for it they had to pledge themselves to silence about what they heard.]

The officials of the Propaganda Ministry, especially the editors of the foreign-language broadcasts, must, of course, for the most part receive the Seehaus Service. But that is nothing to worry about, since I indoctrinate them daily and there is no possibility of their becoming gradually infected. Admiral Canaris fully agrees with me in this matter and promises to see to the sources of defeatism being stopped up in the O.K.W. and the O.K.H.

Officials are now to work fifty-eight hours per week instead of forty-six. The Ministry of the Interior immediately proposed that twenty-five marks per month be paid them as so-called "soup money". I regard that as wrong. Officialdom should do its duty. If it is demanded of officials that they work a few hours more in war-time than under normal peace conditions, they ought to look upon that as a sort of service of honour.

I have received a report from a commanding general at the northern front which is extraordinarily favourable. The general says the Russian forces there are very weak and are being bled white. He believes the Soviet Union will collapse in the spring, provided we are in a position to deliver a few decisive blows. Even though I am not able as yet to share this optimism I nevertheless believe there is something in what he says. It may well be that the times through which we are now passing will later be regarded as the most advantageous in the entire history of this war; possibly it is actually true that the Bolsheviki are now using up their last resources and will break down under a severe blow.

But let us not cling too much to such hopes. Our preparations for the coming spring and summer must be made just as though the Bolsheviki still had very great reserves. That will make us immune to surprises and we won't have moral setbacks like those of last summer and autumn. The more difficult we imagine war to be, the easier it will prove in the end.

Roosevelt has nothing positive to report in the way of victories. His loud-mouthed speeches before the war are still remembered by everybody. The discrepancy between what he prophesied and what has actually happened is so obvious that he can get out of this dangerous situation only by lies and rumours.

Churchill, on the other hand, continues merrily to prevaricate. He must, for opposition against him, and especially against his co-workers, is constantly growing.

Siam has now officially declared war against England and the United States. That is no doubt a great help for Japan, even though the striking power of the Siamese armed forces must not be overestimated.

A moral breakdown such as we experienced in November 1918 can be brought about in England only with great difficulty, if at all. We should have no illusions in this respect and should not place hopes in a type of warfare that was once successful in the case of the German people, but in all likelihood will never succeed with the English.

I spent considerable time today looking into the so-called Seehaus Service, and carefully studied one day's output of this subversive office, which is being financed out of funds of its own. I have arrived at the conclusion that this service must be limited as much as possible. I hope the Fuehrer will confer the necessary powers on me to enable me to intervene rigorously. Everybody who counts now agrees with me that the dangerous manipulations of this service must be curbed to prevent a collapse of morale among the leaders of the state and the Wehrmacht.

I have again spent a lot of time trying to limit the distribution of the Seehaus Service to a minimum. But I must overcome resistance after resistance because all departments of the Reich and all allegedly prominent persons are very anxious to continue to receive this material on the wrong assumption that it will give them a picture of the overall situation. That is not at all true. The Fuehrer shares my point of view completely. He goes even further. He believes the Seehaus Service should be distributed to only a few persons in the entire country.

I talked about this at length to General Schmudt. The Foreign Office is trying very hard at G.H.Q. to place the blame for the failure of the Seehaus Service on the Propaganda Ministry. But it can't succeed in this, for after all the Seehaus Service was founded by the Foreign Office and could develop into such a mammoth concern for the spread of tendentious news only by competition with the Propaganda Ministry.

Whether or not I already have full authority for so doing, I am intervening vigorously and have especially forbidden the distribution of material to higher officials and officers since they are most easily demoralized by such a news service.

Gradually all other important Reich ministers are beginning to realize that my standpoint is right, that we have been altogether too lax in this matter, and that we must pay for our negligence, as sentiment in Berlin government and military circles is essentially different from that among the masses of the people. The reason for this is that these people in a position of leadership have depended solely upon this defeatist material and received no objective reports on the real condition of things. It is self-evident that persons who are supplied daily with such material must at the same time be told how to interpret it. That's what is happening in our Ministry but not in the other ministries and departments.

The United States is trying desperately to drag us into a discussion of racial questions, especially with regard to Japan. The American press has launched impassioned articles against the yellow race and is trying, via Stockholm, to get them published all over the world. Several Stockholm newspapers have fallen for this palpable propaganda. I suppose the Americans believe we can be persuaded to reply to this propaganda and get dragged into the discussion. That's where they are mistaken. I have forbidden the German news services even to mention these somewhat ticklish and delicate problems, as I am convinced we can't win any laurels here. As a matter of fact our position with Japan and the problems of eastern Asia is rather precarious, since we are uncompromising in our racial views. It is best to overcome this difficulty by silence.

I have received a report from Croatia. Sentiment toward us there is getting worse all the time. There are reasons for it, chiefly the fact that the Poglavnik Fuehrer has by no means firmly established himself. His pro-Italian policy, especially, finds no echo among the Croatian people. At first the attitude toward us was very friendly, but as no help is to be expected from us against the Italians, anger at the Italians is extended to us also. The Italians have already cost us considerable sympathy in the world.

[Ante Pavelić, born in 1869, the self-appointed dictator (Poglavnik) of the Axis puppet state of Croatia, lived in Italy for many years as an exile and was there given much aid by Mussolini. When he assumed power, he had as his praetorian guard, just as Hitler had the S.A. and S.S., the Croatian "Ustachi" organization. He embarked upon a pro-Italian policy. The Croatian people, however, have always hated their next-door neighbour Italy, with its aspirations for the port of Susac and the Dalmatian coast, while they tolerated the Germans, who were strong supporters of Croatian tourist trade.]

Knothe reported to me on the results of his purchasing activities in the south-east. He has bought up a large number of cinemas. They give us certain outlets for our film distribution in the Balkans. The German motion picture now completely dominates the Balkans, and American films have been pushed back more and more. I am trying most earnestly to expand our holdings still further in the south-east so that, when peace comes, we may be so firmly entrenched there that nobody can dislodge us again.

[Knothe was one of Goebbels' staff in the Propaganda Ministry.]

Sepp Dietrich is a real comrade and makes one think of a Napoleonic general. If we had twenty men like that as divisional commanders we wouldn't have to worry at all about the Eastern Front. He told me in detail how the bourgeois generals on the southern front lost their nerve and how this weakness of character naturally communicated itself to the troops. For troops are always like their leaders, both in a good and a bad sense.

The incidents that Sepp Dietrich related to me about the Russian people in the occupied areas are simply hair-raising. They are not a people, but a conglomeration of animals. The greatest danger threatening us in the East is the stolid dullness of this mass. That applies both to the civilian population and to the soldiers. The soldiers won't surrender, as is the fashion in western Europe, when completely surrounded, but continue to fight until they are beaten to death. Bolshevism has merely accentuated this racial propensity of the Russian people. In other words, we are facing an adversary about whom we must be careful. The human mind cannot possibly imagine what it would mean if this opponent were to pour into western Europe like a flood.

Terboven intends to deliver a radio address bitterly attacking the Bishop of Norway, who has acquired notoriety because of a number of stupid remarks. I advised him most urgently to keep his hands off. I consider it beneath our dignity and harmful to our authority for a Reich commissioner in an area occupied by us to attack a public personage without, at the same time, saying how he will punish him. You attack without punishing only when you have no power. If you have power, you arrest or punish and give the reason why.

[Josef Terboven, Gauleiter for the Essen area, was appointed Reich Commissioner for occupied Norway by Hitler in 1940. He was sent to Norway because he was regarded as particularly "tough." Soon it became evident, however, that he was too robust after all. Goebbels later speaks of him as "the most hated man in Norway" or "a bull in a china shop." (See also diary entries of December 5 and 6, 1943.)

Dr. Eivand Josef Berggrav, born in 1884, was at that time Lutheran Bishop of Oslo. He resigned later in 1942 as a protest against Nazi persecution of the church and was arrested in March 1943.]

During an alert tonight I was able to sit down with a number of my old colleagues. We discussed the situation in general and in particular. I was happy to observe that my collaborators, no matter where they may be or in what office or army outfit, are doing their duty, and have very clear and uncompromising views. All the good training I gave them over a period of years is yielding results. I don't believe there is a single person who "graduated" under me who will lose his nerve easily.

Churchill has spoken at last. . . . The tenor of his speech is extremely gloomy and pessimistic. He must admit that Rommel is undefeated. He compares the position of England with that of a drowning man who has only his head above water. He admits very serious losses in North Africa. But he cleverly assumes responsibility for them so as not to have to kick anybody out. The fact that he defends his colleagues awakens sympathy for him. I shall not have this section of his speech released for the German press and radio.

Stalin's bust has been unveiled in the London Exchange. That's where it belongs. The collaboration between Bolshevism and super-capitalism is thereby publicly symbolized. England has sunk low. She is facing difficult times. She can thank Churchill, a political gambler of the first order who can only live from hand to mouth and cannot do any long-range planning. I regard Churchill as the real grave-digger of the British Empire.

Churchill hasn't the faintest intention of permitting truthful news reporting. He always admits only what he can't avoid admitting or what can't be denied.

I had the Foreign Office give me a report on our relations with Sweden. Sweden has, after all, done more for the German war effort than is generally assumed. More particularly, Sweden has given us valuable support in our fight against the Soviet Union. While she insists on remaining neutral, that after all is very much in our favour. There can be no doubt but that she would defend her neutrality by force of arms if we tried to put her under pressure.

It isn't possible in Sweden to get after Professor Segerstedt, publisher of Goeteborg's Handels-och Sjoefahrtstidning. His paper is most embarrassing to the Swedish Government, but it must be permitted to continue publication because of English pressure.

[Torgny Karl Segerstedt, D.D., former professor of the history of religion at Stockholm University, became editor in chief of the Goeteborg Trade and Shipping News, one of the best-known dailies in the Scandinavian peninsula, in 1917. He was an outspoken opponent of Nazism.]

The King and the Crown Prince are undoubtedly on our side. The King has already once offered his abdication when a decisive question was at issue. The abdication was to become effective if his government did not concede him such support for the German-Finnish war effort as he desired. We must therefore be satisfied with Sweden's contribution to the German-Finnish war effort, meagre though it is, despite the provocative and insolent attitude of a part of the Swedish press, and not talk out of turn.

[Dr. Goebbels seems muddled in his own mind about Sweden's position. In this day's entry he draws comfort from the fact that Sweden is neutral and regards this as an indication that Sweden is helping Germany and is on her side. In the very next sentence, however, he states that Sweden would not hesitate to take up arms against Germany if her neutrality were threatened.

Goebbels further makes the mistake of interpreting the Swedish King's offer to abdicate as a sign that he is "undoubtedly" on the German side when in fact this was a gesture to his own people to prevent Sweden's being involved in the war; in other words, a purely pro-Swedish attitude.

Later references in the Diaries teem with accusations about Sweden, the "state which has no right to existence anyway," the "Germanic renegade," which is "playing with fire"; the country which refused to join the International Film Chamber created by Goebbels; the nation that becomes more insolent every time Germany suffers a reverse.

His contempt for Sweden is expressed in the entry for April 15, 1942: "It would have been better if we had taken Sweden, too, during our campaign in the north."]

Just now a hot fight is on in Sweden for control of the press—a fight between Bonnier and Kreuger. Kreuger is trying desperately to retain control of the nationalistic section of the press, which in a great measure is on our side. Bonnier, however, is doing everything possible to destroy this last remnant of national press freedom in Sweden and to get the nationalistic press of Sweden into Jewish, that is pro-English, hands.

I hope that the severe frost of the last fourteen days will gradually grow milder. At the moment, it is true, no improvement is noticeable, and it would be terrible if we had to live through another winter like that at the beginning of 1940. But we shall find some way out; if necessary, the people at home will have to assume added burdens. The front suffers so many trials and tribulations that it is certainly reasonable to ask the people at home to contribute their share to the war effort.

I am authorizing Seyss-Inquart to open a theatre in the Hague in which opera, comic opera, and drama are to be produced; I do this with one eye weeping and the other laughing for, really, the Dutch don't deserve such great cultural support. Perhaps they don't even have the proper appreciation for it. But Seyss-Inquart is very insistent, and after all the Germans in Holland have some right to such a theatre.

[Arthur Seyss-Inquart, more than any other Austrian, was responsible for the Anschluss with Germany. Misusing his personal friendship with Chancellor Kurt von Schuschnigg, he managed to become Minister of the Interior in February, 1938, in the last Schuschnigg cabinet. That gave him, an ardent Nazi, control of the police and of Austrian officialdom. He reassured Schuschnigg again and again that he would observe the Austrian Constitution, but secretly made all preparations for Hitler's coup of a month later. The Fuehrer then appointed him Austrian Chancellor and Minister of Defence. After the integration of Austria into the Reich and its subdivision into several gaus, Seyss-Inquart in 1939 became a minister without portfolio in Hitler's so-called cabinet, which, however, never met. He was appointed deputy governor of occupied Poland late in 1939 and Reich Commissioner for the Netherlands in 1940. He was tried at Nuremberg and hanged.]

Rosenberg's office has worked out a scheme of agrarian reform for the occupied areas which envisages the gradual elimination of the kolhose [collective community farm] and the return of land to private ownership. I expect very much from this scheme when it is brought to the attention of the broad masses of the farmers. If we should be in a position actually to give the farmers land, they would look forward to an eventual return of the Bolsheviks with decidedly mixed feelings.

[Alfred Rosenberg, Nazi party Reichsleiter for ideological indoctrination and editor of the official Party organ, the Voelkischer Beobachter, was one of Hitler's earliest followers and author of an exceedingly abstruse and involved book, The Myth of the Twentieth Century. He was one of the bitterest opponents of Christianity and worked for its complete abolition in Germany.

Born in the Baltic States and educated in the University of Riga, he always sidestepped his opponents' questions about what he had done during World War I.

As the German armies swept eastward in 1941 after Germany's declaration of war on Soviet Russia, Hitler appointed Rosenberg Reich Minister for the Eastern Occupied Areas. The appointment was made purely on the basis of personal loyalty to an old fellow-Nazi and because Rosenberg knew the Russian language. He was a notoriously poor administrator, however. Throughout the Goebbels diary this inefficiency of Rosenberg's is harped upon. Rosenberg was hanged at Nuremberg.]

The landing of American troops in Northern Ireland created a great sensation. Although southern Irish territory is not involved, De Valera protested vigorously. Possibly the Americans, acting on behalf of the English, merely wanted to try out how the Irish Government would react. This reaction was probably stronger than was anticipated in London, and I suppose there is for the present no danger that the English will occupy Ireland proper. In the United States De Valera's reaction meets with feigned astonishment: But this pretended surprise offends the Irish more than it enlightens them.

Terboven telephoned to me from Oslo. He intends to proceed against the Bishop of Norway, in whose home have been found papers of an extremely compromising nature concerning his collaboration with the English. I refused his request to have the controversy aired in the Reich. He will start things in Norway alone, where it is fitting and proper.

I had to clear up a number of domestic questions, especially the problem of allocating paper for the production of books. The Eher Verlag is making unjustifiable claims which must be rejected. On the other hand it is true that naturally the official publishing house of the Party deserves a higher priority than any other firm. My task consists in finding the right balance.

[The Eher Verlag, was the Nazi party's official publishing establishment. Hitler's Mein Kampf, Rosenberg's The Myth of the Twentieth Century, the daily Voelkischer Beobachter, and countless other books, pamphlets, and periodicals were published there. Hitler was generally believed to be one of the main stockholders, while the Party owned the rest. Its general manager was Max Amann, who had been the drill sergeant of Hitler's company in World War I. Like all the other "empire builders" of the Party, Amann kept increasing the holdings of the Eher Verlag by placing so many difficulties in the way of non-Party bourgeois newspapers, even though they all now supported the Nazi regime, that they sold out on terms decidedly favourable to Amann. The firm came to be known as "Amann's Octopus," and stretched out its tentacles in every direction in the publishing world. Amann had the title of Reichsleiter of the Nazi party, in charge of the press and publications. This gave him cabinet rank.]

Snow has enveloped all Berlin in a white garment. It's no fun, however, to contemplate this beautiful spectacle of nature, since every change in the weather creates a whole series of new problems. One can hardly conceive of weather ideal to meet all demands.

In the evening I had a long talk with my mother who, to me, always represents the voice of the people. She knows the sentiments of the people better than most experts who judge from the ivory tower of scientific inquiry, as in her case the voice of the people itself speaks. Again I learned a lot; especially that the rank and file are usually much more primitive than we imagine. Propaganda must therefore always be essentially simple and repetitive. In the long run basic results in influencing public opinion will be achieved only by the man who is able to reduce problems to the simplest terms and who has the courage to keep forever repeating them in this simplified form, despite the objections of the intellectuals.

It is interesting to observe what importance the clever exploitation of religion can assume. The Tartars at first had a none-too-gratifying attitude toward the German Wehrmacht. But they changed about completely when permitted to sing their religious chants from the tops of minarets. Their change of attitude went so far that Tartar auxiliary companies which fought actively against the Bolsheviks could be formed. Our efforts there were supported by our propaganda companies who distributed a picture showing the Grand Mufti of Jerusalem visiting the Fuehrer. That was extremely successful.

[Haj Amin el Hussein, the Grand Mufti, visited Germany early in November 1941, then went to Italy for about a month, and on his return to Berlin was received by Hitler on December 8, 1941.]

Churchill's stock is beginning to rise again. Although opposition to him in the Lower House is apparently strong, nobody dares propose a vote of no confidence. He had, however, to stand up to some pretty outspoken criticism. On the whole this criticism was more moderate than might have been expected, after the attacks in the press these last weeks.

Rommel has marched into Benghazi again and found an unbelievable amount of booty. This is a wonderful piece of news which will prove extremely handy in this period of stagnation. The Fuehrer is very happy about it. He promoted Rommel to colonel general.

[In the German Army generals ranked as follows: major general (there was no brigadier), lieutenant general, general, colonel general, field marshal general. Also, there was the special rank of Reich Marshal given to Hermann Goering by Hitler. That gave Goering a unique title and raised him above all field marshals.]

The United States newspapers are asking anxiously what has happened to their Pacific Fleet. For the most part the fleet is lying at the bottom of the ocean.

[Goebbels at first believed Japanese news reports implicitly. Only much later his diary entries indicate doubt in their veracity.]

Knox delivered a very pusillanimous speech. While claiming that the Japanese have become very jumpy and nervous, he tried to get himself out of his rather precarious psychological fix by telling lies. He who before the outbreak of war had been the principal spokesman, in fact the megaphone of the Roosevelt government, is now a sorry sight indeed. Apparently he feels subconsciously that, if America were faced with a crisis, he would be made partly responsible for it, as he was one of the chief warmongers.

[The late Colonel Frank E. Knox, U.S. Secretary of the Navy, was a favourite target for Goebbels' jibes. The little doctor was especially fond of reminding Knox of statements made before America's entry into the war.]

In the Anglo-Saxon countries a bitter fight is still going on about the relative order of importance of the theatres of war. Whenever the English sustain losses in North Africa they say the European theatre of war is more important; whenever they have reverses in Europe they claim the East Asia theatre has precedence; but when they are defeated in East Asia the North African theatre again holds higher rank. In short, precedence is always enjoyed by the theatre of war in which they aren't getting a drubbing, whereas the theatre in which at that time they are having reverses is always far less important.

I have received pitiful reports about the situation in Greece. Hunger there has become an epidemic affecting the entire population. People are dying from undernourishment by the thousand in the streets of Athens—a result of the brutal British blockade—a blockade directed against a people who foolishly wanted to pull the chestnuts out of the fire for the English. That's how London thanks them.

In Finland, too, food conditions are horrible. The Finnish people this winter are showing a heroism worthy of the greatest admiration. We could use more such allies. The German people won't find it too difficult to give up part of their bread ration in favour of Finland.

Lammers told me a lot about certain goings-on in top government departments. In the Ministry for Eastern Affairs, for instance, things don't seem to work at all. Rosenberg, after all, is more of a theoretician than a practical organizer. . . . Everywhere he is building up a gigantic apparatus of which, in the end, he loses all control.

Lammers also argued that something must be done for the government officials. He mentioned an article in the National Zeitung of Essen which criticized officialdom severely. I gave orders forbidding all such attacks in the future. It won't do to have two professions in Germany—namely, teachers and government officials, subjected to public criticism, whereas an editor would of course not dare to reproach a leading Party member of a prominent military officer.

I had a long talk with Viktor Lutze who told me of a number of complaints of the S.A. He also wanted to get a general briefing on the situation. Apparently his conscience isn't very clear. Probably he has again been talking out of turn and is looking for an excuse. I warned him earnestly to restrain himself in the future and in no way to criticize or cast doubt on the political or military conduct of the war. I told him emphatically that the Fuehrer will stand for no monkey business. He seemed to get the point, and I believe he will hold himself in better check hereafter. Considering his disposition, however, I doubt whether he will be able to keep this up long.

[Viktor Lutze became supreme commander of Hitler's Brown Shirts, the S.A. (Sturmabteilung Storm Troops) after Ernst Roehm, one of Hitler's closest friends, had been executed on the Fuehrer's personal orders during the blood purge of June 30, 1934, for allegedly plotting the overthrow of the regime. Under Lutze the S.A. became a negligible quantity. Goebbels evidently did not regard him very highly. In an entry on April 15, 1942, he criticizes him even more severely. When the S.A. chieftain was killed in a motor accident in May 1943, however, and given the most pompous state funeral accorded any follower of Hitler, Goebbels sang Lutze's praises in highest terms in his diary entry of May 8, 1943.]

The Fuehrer returned from his G.H.Q. to Berlin at noon. I immediately had a long talk with him which was extraordinarily favourable and satisfactory. It fills me with joy to note how well he looks and how splendid is his spiritual and physical condition. He started in on the Churchill speech, which the Fuehrer regards as exceptionally weak and wearisome. He, too, does not believe that Churchill is any longer sitting on top of the world, but on the other hand he sees no possibility of an early collapse of the Churchill regime. . . .

Churchill, by the way, remarked in his speech that Hess had really flown to England in order to unseat Churchill and bring about a suitable peace. That he made this remark is a proof of his nervousness, for it is certainly exceptionally shortsighted and is grist for the mill of those who are ready for an understanding with us.

[Rudolf Hess, born in 1894, Hitler's shadow until his sensational flight to Britain in 1941, joined the Nazi party as early as 1920 and became the Fuehrer's private secretary. He was arrested, tried, and sentenced with Hitler to imprisonment at Landsberg, Bavaria, where Hitler wrote Mein Kampf, dictating most passages to his faithful disciple, Hess.

On taking over the government of Germany in 1933, Hitler made Hess a minister without portfolio and appointed him his deputy for Party matters. It is not surprising, in view of the constant intrigues among Nazis sparring for position, that Hess was unpopular with the Party membership. Trouble-makers seldom are popular. Recalling that he had been born in Egypt of German parents, they nicknamed him der hinterhaeltige Aegypter ("the treacherous Egyptian"). Also, in view of his unctuous manner of speaking, he was called der Prediger ("the Preacher"). It was his task every year to open the Party convention at Nuremberg and to preside over the plenary sessions. He was an extremely dull speaker. In 1941 he flew to Scotland, thinking he could persuade the British people and leading politicians to make peace with Nazi Germany and join with the Germans in fighting the Soviet Russians. (See also the entry under date of February 13, 1942, last paragraph.)]

The Tories are no doubt playing a decisive role behind the scenes in England. Churchill has never been a friend of the Tories. He was always an outsider, and before the war was regarded as half crazy. Nobody took him seriously. The Fuehrer recalled that all Englishmen whom he received before the outbreak of the war were in agreement that Churchill was a fool. Even Chamberlain said so to the Fuehrer.

The Fuehrer profoundly regrets the heavy losses sustained by the white race in East Asia, but that isn't our fault.

[The Nazi alliance with the Japanese was never popular in Germany. A nation which was so indoctrinated with the conception of Nordic racial supremacy found it difficult to understand why the Japanese should be considered the racial equals of the Teutons, and why intimate relations with Jews should be punished by death whereas similar relations with the Japanese met with no official disapproval.]

Churchill's closing speech in the House of Commons before the ballot on the vote of confidence was a collection of demagogic utterances. The ovation given him at the close of the session by the members was naturally a show put on for the world and has no political significance.

Rommel's advance produced a veritable shock in London. There is embarrassed stammering about the recapture of Benghazi. The Reuter Agency up to this hour has not been able to offer any plausible explanation. By way of providing a good excuse, however, Rommel is praised beyond measure. No doubt he deserves it and nobody grudges it to him, but on the other hand one must not overlook the fact that the English pour out this praise only in order to present themselves to the world as polished gentlemen, who are fair and more than fair to the enemy even in defeat. We know these English tactics and are no longer taken in by them.

I continue to receive an enormous number of letters which on the whole are very favourable. Above all there is praise for my articles in the Reich, which apparently are exerting the greatest influence upon public opinion.

At noon I attended a reception at the Fuehrer's in honour of a delegation of Italian party members who came to Berlin for the celebration of our accession to power. The Fuehrer was in an exceptionally good mood, and talked very animatedly and convincingly to the Italian Gauleiters. The most impressive thing is his absolute and firm conviction that victory is ours, which he expressed so clearly and irrefutably that it made the deepest impression upon the Italian gentlemen. Our guests waxed enthusiastic about the fascinating personality of the Fuehrer, and especially at the youthfulness and poise of his behaviour. Most of the Italian gentlemen had never before seen the Fuehrer and the impression he made on them is therefore all the more profound.

Later the Italians were received for lunch in my Ministry. Most members of the cabinet also attended. I could now converse at length with these gentlemen. They are an impressive elite of leaders, comparable to the best of our own Gauleiters. There isn't a single one among them who isn't full of enthusiasm for the Axis. Mussolini appears gradually to have eliminated from party leadership all elements which tried, even though only passively, to oppose his course. I received the very best impression of these Italians.

After dinner there was an exchange of speeches. I talked briefly to the delegation. Alfieri and the leader of the Italian delegation also spoke. Both events, at the Fuehrer's and in the Ministry, are evidence of the cordial friendship which binds the two Axis powers together.

[Dino Alfieri was Italian Ambassador in Germany at that time. He had been Goebbels' opposite number for a while as Italian Minister of Propaganda. The two men never got on very well.]

Very drastic and explosive expression was given to this friendship at the afternoon mass meeting in the Sports Palace, in the course of which the Fuehrer spoke. The Sports Palace was, as usual, filled to the rafters, and turbulent enthusiasm was manifested. It reminded me of the old days during our struggle for power. The meeting was as successful as those in 1930, 1931 and 1932.

[January 30, 1933, was the Tag der Machtergreifung (Day of Seizure of Power). Its anniversary was declared a legal holiday, and Hitler usually addressed the nation on January 30 in a Reichstag session or at the Sports Palace.]

When I extended words of greeting to the Fuehrer I could hardly finish any sentence, because the audience interrupted me again and again with stormy applause. I welcomed the Italian party delegation and this welcome, too, was greeted with salvos of applause by the politically alert Berliners. That was clever of them. The Berliners know the score and realize that the main problem of the moment is to keep the ally on our side. That is of course more difficult in winter than in summer, for in summertime our victories prevent our allies from becoming uncertain factors.

Thereupon the Fuehrer spoke. . . . The general purport of his speech was to strengthen morale at home and to educate the people to become tough politically.

The address made a tremendous impression both upon those present at the meeting and on the entire German nation. We may now rest assured that the main psychological difficulties have been overcome. We are now standing with both feet on the ground again. . . . The enthusiasm of the audience exceeded anything that the human mind can imagine. . . . The Fuehrer has charged the entire nation as though it were a storage battery.

As always, the Fuehrer is at his post. . . . As long as he is there, one need not worry about the future. My assertion that the Fuehrer is in good health created the deepest impression. As long as he lives and is among us in good health, as long as he can give us the strength of his spirit and the power of his manliness, no evil can touch us. The entire people became convinced of this anew today.

Japan is acting with great self-assurance. Indeed the Japanese propagandists, in my opinion, often overshoot the mark.

Nothing of importance has happened internationally except that Franco has delivered a speech, intended chiefly for home consumption, in which he declared that the Spaniards are God's chosen people and will remain faithful to the Catholic Church. It would be far more fitting for Spain to remain faithful to the Axis, for no special laurels are to be had from the Catholic Church. Franco, as we know, is a bigoted churchgoer. He permits Spain today to be practically governed, not by himself, but by his wife and her father confessor. That's a nice revolutionary we placed on the throne! But after all it is better for him to sit there than for any old Bolshevik who would undoubtedly be on the side of our enemies.

The German people ought not to do any grumbling. They still have a standard of living that is impossible in any other country of Europe, whether in the war or not. People at home have thus far felt the war very little, so that one need shed no tears if somewhat heavier sacrifices are now placed on their shoulders.

I had reports submitted to me about a number of deficiencies. The coal situation is critical in Berlin, and if we don't adopt proper measures, it will undoubtedly become very serious in the second half of February. We shall then be forced to close the schools and even to stop production in some sections of the munitions industry. I don't want things to go as far as that.

I spent a lot of time on the problem of increasing production. I don't believe that it can be solved by laws. I incline to the belief that something can be accomplished only by appealing to national discipline and to a sense of national duty. Also, premiums must be offered. Factories that produce especially well should receive special rations of cigarettes and alcohol. I therefore forbade the general distribution in Berlin of such alcohol as is available, and insisted that available liquor be used as rewards for special performance in the factories.

February 2, 1942

The English have become decidedly more modest since the Fuehrer's speech. . . . One really wonders on what grounds the English had the insolence to declare war on the Axis Powers. Either they did not know our superiority and their inferiority, or else—and this seems more plausible—they intended from the very beginning to have other countries and peoples do their fighting for them. At any rate, that's where I attack the English vigorously in the German press and also in our foreign-language broadcasts. But the English won't let themselves be disturbed in the complacency of their arguments. They are a very peculiar people with whom it is difficult to have an argument. They are obdurate to a degree that gets on one's nerves in the long run. But possibly that is a national advantage rather than a disadvantage.

February 3, 1942

A number of developments that, according to the maps, seem unfavourable to us have led the Bolsheviks once again to utter cries of triumph. They now declare that Kharkov is in immediate danger and that this enables them to strike at the very heart of our troops. Well, we shall see! . . . The Bolsheviks don't seem to have confidence in their own strength any more. Even their loudest reports of victory indicate that they have their secret doubts. Certainly their special bulletins don't have the same assurance as those in mid-December.

The Japanese are so cocksure and positive about their prognoses that one can hardly doubt their successes. On the other hand, of course, one must not fail to observe that the Japanese now and then exaggerate grossly and that their propaganda is very juvenile. Thus, for instance, the navy spokesman declared at Tokyo that the Japanese intend to land on the American continent and march into Washington. I call that pretty strong medicine and claim the Japanese are only hurting their cause by such pronouncements. I therefore gave orders that grossly exaggerated Japanese news items must not be published in the German press. Mistakes of this type usually occur only at the beginning of a war when the tricks of the trade have not yet been mastered.

The English boast that General Auchinleck is about to start a counter-offensive [in North Africa]. That is something, however, that the English always do when things are in bad shape. Anyway, their news policy is something that we could never afford to imitate. Apparently the English people don't make their government responsible tomorrow for what it said today. It is extremely easy to lead the English people. The German people are much more sensitive about these matters. Even today utterances of leading men of the Reich dating back to September and October 1939 are still thrown up at us if things have not come off as prophesied.

In the United States there has been a noticeable let-down. Boastful figures concerning the potentialities of American arms production are no longer published. My attention has been called to the fact that the American war industry would of course be able to manufacture enormous quantities of armaments if life in America were directed completely toward war. So far there are no signs of this. But of course that may come more quickly than people imagine. We see by the example of the Soviet Union what a big people can do in that direction. Public and private life there has for a quarter of a century been geared solely to war. The success is enormous.

Quisling's appointment as premier has created a sensation in the countries at war with us and has drawn in its wake great waves of angry commentary. Quisling is hated violently in the entire enemy world and is now the target for vile calumny. He has actually succeeded in becoming a symbol, although he doesn't really deserve it. But the more he is attacked abroad, the more it becomes our duty to support him. I therefore gave the German press instructions to give his appointment a good build-up and to see to it that with us, at least, he receives favourable publicity. On the other hand I forbid using the word "Fuehrer" in the German press when applied to Quisling. Even if he calls himself Foerer in Norway, and even if the word Foerer can easily be translated as Fuehrer, I nevertheless don't consider it right for the term Fuehrer to be applied to any other person than the Fuehrer himself. There are certain terms that we must absolutely reserve to ourselves, among them also the word Reich. We must not tolerate any other state calling its confines a Reich. The whole world must in future understand that by Reich is meant only the German Reich.

[Vidkun Quisling, born in 1887, was educated in the Royal Norwegian Officers' School and Military Academy. He was an officer of the Norwegian General Staff, 1911-23; Military Attaché in Petrograd, 1918-19; and was charged with the care of British interests in Russia during the interruption of diplomatic relationships,

1927-29. He was Norwegian Minister of Defence, 1931-33, and then became leader of the Norwegian Nationalist movement which made the entry of German troops into Norway in April 1940 easy. He became head of the German-controlled Norwegian Government in April 1940 and was appointed Premier in 1942. On October 24, 1945, he was executed for treason.]

Seyss-Inquart wrote me a letter importuning me to include the wild purchases by German officials in the occupied areas in my campaign against the black market. These purchases have become a veritable pest. Heydrich punished them severely in the Protectorate. In the long run similar measures can probably not be avoided in other areas. Various departments of the Reich Government have acted very shamelessly in this matter. They did tremendous harm to German prestige and it will take some time before we regain the respect of the peoples in the occupied areas.

I received word from the western part of the Reich that eleven clergymen who are under indictment for listening to English broadcasts are soon to be tried. I informed the Fuehrer, since this trial will undoubtedly assume a pronouncedly political character. If things went my way, I would inflict the heaviest punishment on these parsons and would possibly even condemn them to death for doing such damage to the Reich. But of course such a question cannot be handled by itself but must be viewed as part of a larger picture, and it is for the Fuehrer to decide whether or not he considers such a trial desirable at this moment.

Owing to the absence of Hinkel the radio programmes have deteriorated very much. During the hours set aside for entertainment almost nothing but symphonic music is offered. That's what we get for letting Glasmeier put a musical director general, Schulz-Dornburg, in charge of the entertainment programme. People of this type usually sit in an ivory tower and don't know what the common man wants and what he needs most. It is wrong to appoint a musical expert for so difficult a task. Experts are always handicapped in their relation to the common people. They lack the necessary instinct for realizing what the people are thinking.

[Hans Hinkel, who was on leave for a special mission at the time of this entry, was one of the Nazi "Old Guard" who took part in Hitler's ill-fated beer-cellar putsch in Munich in 1923. He became state commissioner for the Prussian Ministry of Science, Arts, and Education in 1933, and supervisor of Jewish cultural activity in 1935. Later he joined Goebbels' Propaganda Ministry and was put in charge of its radio section.]

Dr. Heinrich Glasmeier was superintendent of broadcasts and deputy to Hinkel. He was also used in other capacities by Goebbels. (See, for instance, the diary entry for November 13, 1943.) When the Nazis came into power in 1933 he was appointed general manager of the Cologne Radio Station. He was on the executive board of the Reich Radio Chamber. Rudolf Schulz-Dornburg was an orchestral conductor.]

February 4, 1942

In the United States, people are extremely concerned about the situation in the Pacific. Even that loud-mouthed exaggerator, Knox, delivered a speech which was diametrically opposed to his emanations before the outbreak of the war. He who previously always boasted that the United States Fleet was big enough to conduct a two-ocean war must now suddenly admit very modestly that the American Fleet is hardly big enough for one ocean, that it cannot fight a two-ocean war, that the necessary labour is lacking to increase the fleet and especially the air force, that one must envisage a war of long duration, that the workers don't want to do any night-shifts, etc.

All this gives one the impression that the United States is for the first time seriously facing the problems of the war. They could have done that at less cost if they had studied developments in Germany. Had they done so, however, they would not, in all likelihood, have entered the war. It's great fun to observe how the big mouths on the other side, who three months ago boasted how they would polish off Japan in six or eight weeks, now suddenly hem and haw and are compelled to face the facts. I permitted the release of the Knox speech to the German press and news services so that they could pick it to pieces. It is excellently suited for polemics, all the more so since we can also use this occasion to refute the pompous array of figures with which Roosevelt tried to bluff the world in his last speech.

Quisling gave the D.N.B. representative a long interview about his policies. He makes the somewhat grotesque claim that in his hands as premier is concentrated all the power formerly held by the King, the Parliament, and the Prime Minister. That's laying it on a bit thick, for after all there is a Reich commissioner standing beside him! Nevertheless we release this version, since naturally we are highly interested in letting the Norwegian Government appear as big and independent as possible.

[D.N.B. stands for Deutsches Nachrichten-Buero (German News Bureau), the official news agency of the Nazi regime.]

News comes from Budapest that Horthy intends to make his eldest son his presumptive successor. That would be a great misfortune, for this son is even more friendly to the Jews than Horthy himself. I hear, however, that Horthy is again in excellent health, so that the problem of his successor for the present is purely academic.

[The son of Nicholas Horthy, Regent of Hungary, was married to a Jewess. Horthy, on being taken prisoner by the Americans in May 1945, tearfully told a group of American correspondents in Bavaria that his son was a victim of the Nazi war.

Nicholas Horthy de Nagybanya, admiral of a country without a navy and head of a kingdom without a king, was born in 1868 in Kenderes, Hungary, the fourth son of a member of the House of Magnates. He was educated in the Imperial Austrian Naval Academy in Fiume. During World War I he commanded the battle ship Habsburg for ten months with the rank of captain, and then the cruiser Novara. Later he became a hero overnight by breaking through the Allied blockade in the Straits of Otranto. Emperor Charles I promoted him rear-admiral in command of the Austro-Hungarian fleet over the heads of older officers. The next year he was made vice-admiral. He crushed the Communist Revolution of Bela Kun in 1919, and in 1920 was elected Regent of Hungary by the Hungarian National Assembly.]

Figures are now available about casualties due to freezing. We must differentiate between first, second, and third degree injuries. First-degree frostbite comprises the light cases. Generally speaking, the soldier remains with his unit and is treated there. Up to January 20 there were 4,000 third-degree frostbite cases, in other words, most serious cases. These 4,000 cases include 1,856 necessitating major amputations. Besides these 4,000 third-degree cases, 46,000 cases were recorded of first and second degree, that is, injuries of a lighter or medium nature.

Churchill's preparations for the East Asia conflict are being revealed more and more as amateurish. Parliament would undoubtedly have sent him flying long ago if there were an adequate successor. But look as you will far and wide, there is none to be discovered.

The fact that the Fuehrer in his Sports Palace address spoke such exceptionally appreciative words about the Party made a very favourable impression on the Party.

The Brauchitsch question may now be regarded as settled by the Fuehrer's speech, but a last remnant of suspicion still remains with the German people. The fact that the Fuehrer himself has taken over the active command of the Army is having a wonderful effect. Recent German successes in the East are credited to him, and rightly so. He has actually saved the Eastern Front.

The Jewish question is again giving us a headache; this time, however, not because we have gone too far, but because we are not going far enough. Among large sections of the German people the idea is gaining headway that the Jewish question cannot be regarded as solved until all Jews have left the Reich.

Some difficulties arise for us from the fact that the churches, especially the Catholic Church, are trying to use our seizure of church bells for war purposes as an excuse for unrestrained propaganda against National Socialism. I have therefore given orders that bells are to be taken away only after the population has been adequately informed by the Party of the reasons.

A confidential report concerning internal conditions in Hungary indicates . . . that the Hungarians are actually ready to risk more lives [in the war effort]. It is gradually dawning upon them that they can't just sit in club chairs while the new Europe is being shaped, and later share in the successes. The Hungarians must risk blood if they want to get more territory.

I have written an article about increased production and courtesy which undoubtedly will prove a major sensation on publication. I chose my arguments very carefully and believe they will dominate public discussion. I may possibly put this exposé of mine through the entire German press in order to acquaint all the people with the ideas and arguments there laid down.

February 6, 1942

One of the armies [in the East] has reported that marching orders can't be carried out because there is no petrol.

Moscow is exceedingly dissatisfied with the British contribution in other theatres of war. The Bolsheviks are gradually beginning to understand what a ball and chain they tied to their feet by allying themselves with the British Empire. They admit that our troops offer great resistance and that it is difficult to attain objectives when facing them. . . . Generally speaking one can say that the Eastern Front is no longer under severe strain.

Despite Wavell's appeal to the troops in Singapore to hold out, there is almost no hope of further resistance by the island fortress. The position has become untenable chiefly because there isn't sufficient fighter-plane protection. Those 100,000 planes that Mr. Roosevelt was going to build are not yet ready; there aren't even enough ready to provide adequate defence for a relatively small space. . . . I am convinced that no matter how nonchalantly they may act about Singapore, its loss will be a real shock to the English people. Churchill is already having a hard time calming public opinion.

Most [British] newspapers think Churchill hasn't gone nearly far enough in reshuffling his Cabinet. People thought a number of strong men would be included; instead, Churchill got stuck with Beaverbrook. Beaverbrook seems to have obtained pretty far-reaching powers. But no man with imagination or strong character can maintain his position long beside Churchill. Churchill delivered a very thin and pretty confused speech in the House, explaining the reconstruction of his Cabinet. He dwelt especially on the difficulties the British Empire faces in its relations with Australia. Australia is becoming more and more obstinate and the English world empire faces the danger that, if the crisis within the Commonwealth should develop, Australia may someday incline more toward the United States.

[Goebbels' estimate of Lord Beaverbrook underwent quick changes. Here he is represented as a strong character; on September 26, 1943, he is depicted as a great enemy of Sovietism; on September 29, 1943, as a man who favoured an understanding with the Soviets.]

Had a minor set-to with Rosenberg about the manner of conducting our ideological celebrations. He knows nothing about organization, that's why he is monkeying so much with it. I shall hold my own against him, however.

In the evening I was able to be with the children for an hour. After that I took a look at an Italian motion picture, starring Gigli, The Tragedy of Love, the artistic level of which is so far below normal that it really ought to be prohibited. The Italians are not only doing nothing about the war effort, but they are hardly producing anything worth while in the realm of the arts. One might almost say that fascism has reacted upon the creative life of the Italian people rather like sterilization. It is, after all, nothing like National Socialism. While the latter goes deep down to the roots, fascism is only superficial. That is regrettable, but one must recognize it clearly. National Socialism is really a way of life [eine Weltanschauung]. It always begins at the beginning and lays new foundations for life. That's why our task is so difficult, but also so beautiful, and the goal ahead is well worth our best effort.

February 7, 1942

Rommel continues to be the pronounced favourite even of the enemy news services. He has succeeded in becoming a real phantom general. He is just as popular today in the United States as in London and Berlin, and one of the few figures in the German Army with a world reputation.

We got hold of a secret message of the [British] Foreign Office to its embassies and legations. It is a warning not to be optimistic about the situation in the East; the German Army was by no means defeated; its power to resist was unbroken; and, as the weather improves, it must be expected to start new offensives.

Nahas Pasha has issued a pro-British declaration, stating that the Anglo-Egyptian treaty will be carried out both in letter and in spirit.

We don't place too great hopes on Nahas Pasha; nevertheless one must not forget that he simply had to make such a declaration because he and his government are under the thumb of the English and he can't afford to oppose a pro-British course in any way.

A number of minor bomb explosions are reported as having occurred in the baggage rooms of Berlin railway stations, among them the Anhalter and Stettiner stations. I sense a certain danger in this. Any ruffian can hand in his suitcase with a time bomb at the cloakroom counter, and two or three hours later a part of the railway station is blown up. I am having an inquiry made as to whether luggage can't be controlled more effectively. But here, as everywhere else, we lack the manpower necessary for work like this. Lack of labour here, as everywhere, is the greatest problem with which we are faced at present.

At noon I received the representatives of the Auslands Organisation, who have come to Berlin from all European and overseas countries, and gave them a comprehensive survey of the military and political situation. I was in my best form, used persuasive and pointed arguments, and won fervent applause from the representatives of the A.O. I am sure they will return to their heavy labours spiritually elated.

[The Auslands Organisation or A.O. (federation of Germans living abroad) was the contact organization for the Nazi regime to keep up its connection with, and to indoctrinate Germans who emigrated to foreign countries or were in these countries on duty. As the Nazis became more powerful and efficient, the A.O. developed into both a propaganda and an espionage organization. Many of the rank and file of the membership probably did not realize that they were being used for espionage purposes; they merely thought they were giving information useful to the leaders of the A.O. in the discharge of their duties.]

The reconstruction of the Egyptian Government has brought no sensational changes. Nahas Pasha declared that he intended to carry out the treaty with England without any reservation. He was clever enough, however, to obtain authority to dissolve Parliament. That, undoubtedly, is right. We did the same thing in February 1933. He must first get parliamentary backing before he can bring about fundamental changes. I still hope that he may act more favourably for us than we are inclined for the present to assume.

Anglo-American collaboration is the principal theme of the Anglo-Saxon press. There seem to be all sorts of difficulties about it. That is because in the much-advertised democracies nobody knows who is to give orders and who is to obey. Undoubtedly, too, the personal vanities and rivalries between Churchill and Roosevelt play an important role. We may consider ourselves lucky not to be opposed by a front that is united ideologically. Lack of organization results in many chances being missed, especially in this war, where everything depends upon who strikes first and most devastatingly.

Rosenberg wrote me a letter stating that he intends to oppose the idea of a fight against the religious denominations. That's really too funny for words! Now, when we are in a tight pinch, everybody poses as a champion who fights against the very things that he himself started. I suppose the final result will be that those of us who have for years opposed the folly of our pronouncements on the religious question and similar things will be regarded as the real originators of the difficulties resulting from this folly!

I consider it absolutely essential that the news bureaus be owned by the Reich. News policy is a sovereign function of the state, which the state can never renounce. News policy is a cardinal political affair; and political matters of this character must be in the hands of the Reich and not the Party. The Party is in no position to establish a real news service. In a news service 99.9 per cent of the items deal with news about the state leadership and only the remaining small percentage deals with the work of the Party. There will be some fights about this, but I won't give in.

February 9, 1942

A serious explosion has occurred in Tangier. The Secret Service is badly compromised. The Spaniards are raising the devil of a row. Tangier last Saturday evening teemed with giant demonstrations against the English. Reuter is spreading the most insolent lies, claiming that it was a question of a bombing attempt by the Axis Powers.

In the course of the day a shattering piece of news reached me. Dr. Todt crashed and was killed on leaving the airport of Rastenburg this morning following a visit to G.H.Q. The plane dropped from a height of four hundred metres and exploded on the ground. The passengers were so badly burned that it was hardly possible to gather up the corpses. This loss is absolutely overwhelming. Todt was one of the really great figures of the National Socialist regime. A product of the Party, he fulfilled a number of historic tasks, the effects of which cannot even be estimated at the moment. With the genial, spark-plug power of his personality he combined an extremely pleasing simplicity of behaviour with such a compelling objectivity in his approach to his work that no one could fail to esteem and love him. The ensuing months will show what we have lost in him. The Fuehrer, too, is hard hit by this loss. We have recently had to endure such heavy personnel losses that one really begins to believe that troubles never come singly.

[Dr. Fritz Todt, born September 4, 1891, Minister of Munitions, was one of the leading Nazis whom foreigners liked. He had none of the strutting, arrogant mannerisms of the typical Party brass hats. Modest and unassuming, he made many a foreign visitor wonder how he ever got mixed up with Nazism. His first outstanding achievement was the construction of the Reichsautobahnen, or super-highways, that proved so advantageous to the Allied armies as they swept through Germany. Next he constructed the gigantic Siegfried Line, or Westwall, opposite the Maginot Line, and later started the Ostwall as an opposite number to the Stalin line to the east. In 1941 Hitler created a new Ministry of Munitions and appointed Todt to head it. The labour battalions which built the fortifications and followed directly behind the combat elements of the German Army to repair bridges and roads were called the Organisation Todt, or O.T. for short.]

I spent the entire day preparing the funeral ceremony for Todt. A solemn state funeral in Berlin is to honour him before the entire world. The Fuehrer wants personally to come to Berlin to pay him a tribute on behalf of our nation and thereby to confer the last and highest honours on him.

Throughout the day I feel numb over this loss. I hardly have time to think. There are so many people in public life who are as superfluous as a goitre. Death does not dare touch them. But when there is someone among them who has the ability to help make history, a senseless and cruel fate tears him from our ranks and he leaves a void that simply cannot be filled.

February 10, 1942

Generally speaking, Dr. Todt's fatal crash is regretted throughout the world. Even the English feel they must pay a tribute to his great talent for organization. Of course there are also a few English voices stupid enough to doubt the official version of the cause of Todt's death. That's the way English gentlemen are: they are nonchalant and polite as long as everything is well with them, but they cast off their masks and reveal themselves as brutal world oppressors the moment one trespasses on their preserves or a man appears on the scene with whom they must reckon.

Beginning on April 6, food rations must be reduced. Emphasis is laid upon the fact, however, that the workers performing the hardest labour and the children are not to be affected too much. That is important, especially so far as the children are concerned.

There can be no doubt that the rations in force after April 6 will no longer be sufficient to guarantee health and the maintenance of reserves of human labour power. We must therefore expect a number of developments which we have hitherto been in a position to avoid.

We are now gradually entering upon conditions that in some ways resemble those of World War I during its third year. It is quite obvious that a war which extends over so long a period of time, and encompasses such tremendous spaces of earth, is bound to encroach on the people's food economy. It is satisfying and comforting, however, to know that similar conditions obtain in England also, so that our difficulties are not so much due to the blockade as to the long duration of the war.

Hinkel reported to me about his experiences during a trip to Bavaria. Conditions in certain parts there are nothing to be proud of. Some of the Bavarian leaders, including those of the Party, are trying in every way possible to escape war duty. After all, they aren't Prussians!

[Goebbels was a Westphalian, hence a citizen of the state of Prussia, of which Westphalia was a province.]

Once English world domination has been broken, one element of constant unrest and nervousness in world politics will without doubt have disappeared. The English succeeded in conquering one-sixth of the earth by their methods. But that was during an epoch when the great national states were not yet ready. Now, however, that Germany is ready, Italy is trying hard to get ready, and Japan is on the point of being ready, England will have to reckon with these three new world powers. It's a fight for the highest stakes. No matter how long it lasts, we shall have to see it through. For if we don't succeed in shattering English domination in the world, all sacrifices of World War I and World War II will have been in vain.

[The idea of putting an end to British world domination obsessed the Nazis. This editor recalls meeting one of the best-known and best-informed Nazi editors on the day England and France declared war on Germany because of the invasion of Poland. His first words were, "No matter what happens—this is the end of the British Empire."]

In conservative English circles opposition to Cripps is beginning to grow. He has a disquieting way of warning and admonishing, so that they'd like to banish him to some distant diplomatic post. Cripps, however, shows no inclination to accept such a post. He is a simon-pure parlour-Bolshevik and believes his hour has come. Undoubtedly Bolshevism is making progress among the English people and it is quite possible that at some future time a prophecy of the Fuehrer's may find its fulfilment, to the effect that it will not be Europe that will be corrupted by Bolshevism, but rather England and the United States.

The English press hasn't yet made up its mind on which side to array itself, whether on Cripps' or Churchill's, who hasn't yet publicly committed himself. One section of the English press enthusiastically praises Cripps, another section denounces him just as vigorously. All these happenings are extraordinarily full of meaning for us and are excellently suited to commentary in the German press.

The fact that Cripps proclaimed Berlin as the future capital of Bolshevism is, of course, grist for our mill. The German public likes to read that sort of thing. There are always nitwits on the other side who throw us the ball whenever we want it. All we have to do is to hold up our hand and a propaganda ball flies into it from the enemy side.

[Goebbels at first placed great hopes in Sir Stafford Cripps, who, he expected, would bring about a cleavage in Great Britain. He changed his tune, however, when to his great surprise the British statesman accepted the mission to India. From then on he was "a greatly overrated man" !]

Because of transport and material shortages we are compelled to cancel all fairs in 1942. This was a difficult decision to make but one that was inevitable. In Leipzig, especially, there is great lamentation, as the fair had been almost entirely prepared. But there is nothing to be done about it. The needs which we must obey are more compelling.

The fall of Singapore has made a very deep impression on the German public. The Japanese rate exceptionally high with us. They are regarded as an ally worthy to fight on our side.

Morale in the Ukraine is none too good. It would be a great help if we could promise land to the peasants. But as things are this is impossible. The intelligentsia is solidly on our side. The Ukrainian intellectuals know perfectly well what Bolshevism would do to them if it should return. For that reason they regard National Socialism and the German occupation as the lesser of two evils.

How serious the English crisis is may be seen from the fact that Hore-Belisha, the Jewish former Minister of War, has deserted the Liberal party with two other members. Rumour has it he intends to form a new anti-Churchill party with Cripps.

A number of domestic problems demand solution. Administrative reform is under discussion. Frick is trying to inject himself into the work started by Dr. Lammers, but he is only partially successful in this. The Ministry of the Interior as a simplifier of administration is a real joke.

[Wilhelm Frick, the first Nazi to attain high political office in Germany—he was Thuringian Minister of the Interior—led the Nazi party in the Reichstag and became Reich Minister of the Interior when Hitler came to power in 1933. The feud between him and Goebbels was particularly bitter, even for a regime in which fights and jealousies among the leaders were the order of the day.

Goebbels was an ultra-radical; Frick, a bureaucrat by training and profession, was averse to extreme measures. Goebbels was aggressive and ruthless; Frick rather mild-mannered and at times even timid.

But there was also a personal reason for their enmity. Goebbels as Minister of Propaganda was also president of the Reich Culture Chamber and as such controlled the cultural and artistic life of the nation. He therefore resented it very much that Frick from time to time invited friends and associates to an evening of music in his home. Both Frick and his wife were very fond of the fine arts. Goebbels did not like this "competition". It was through Goebbels' intrigues that Frick was eased out of office in 1942 and appointed Protector in Bohemia-Moravia.]

It is disgusting how many prominent persons are now trying to prove to me that they can't continue their work unless they receive permission to listen to foreign radio broadcasts. In almost all cases I refuse their requests. I agree to place at the disposal of every individual only such material as is essential for his special work. The task and duty of listening to foreign broadcasts must devolve on the political offices created for this purpose. Administrative offices have nothing whatever to do with it.

Diewerge returned from Paris and gave me a detailed report on conditions there. He has spoken to Bonnet, who is ready to testify in the murder trial of the Jew Grynzpan which is to take place soon. Bonnet is ready to testify that he opposed the declaration of war against Germany, but that the French Government was put under such heavy pressure by the Jews that it could not avoid declaring war. This shows in what an irresponsible way this war was started and how heavily those must be punished who acted so rashly.

[Diewerge was a member of Goebbels' staff in the Propaganda Ministry. Georges Bonnet was Minister for Foreign Affairs in the Daladier cabinet at the time of the outbreak of World War II. In September 1939 he became Minister of Justice, a portfolio which he held until March 1940. In 1941 he became a member of the National Council.

Hershel Grynzpan was a Polish Jew who came to the German Embassy on November 9, 1938, and killed his friend, Ernst vom Rath, in what was described by the Nazis at the time as a fit of homosexual jealousy. When Hitler was informed of the incident in Munich, where he and his Old Guard were celebrating the anniversary of the 1923 beer-cellar putsch, he gave orders, in a fit of rage, for a general pogrom of the Jews. This was followed later by a terrific money fine on all Jews within the Reich.]

The Fuehrer returned to Berlin for the funeral ceremony in honour of Reich Minister Dr. Todt. I went to see him immediately at noon and noted that the loss of Dr. Todt has shaken him badly. . . . Todt was one of the men closest to the Fuehrer. . . . The Fuehrer told me privately how hard this loss had struck him and how sad he was at the idea of one friend after another gradually being lost to our group.

The general situation gives the Fuehrer every reason to be satisfied with developments. He is somewhat worried about our three men-of-war, the Gneisenau, Scharnhorst, and Prinz Eugen, which have left Brest to seek a safe harbour. They are on their way, and we are all trembling lest anything happen to them. It would be terrible if even one of these three ships were to share the fate of the Bismarck. Up to this moment the English haven't noticed anything, but undoubtedly they will attempt to attack the ships, as they are sure to be informed of their departure by spies. The Channel passage will be difficult but the attempt must be risked, so that the ships may at least reach a secure haven. Foreign countries will no doubt be alarmed to realize that these three ships, which have been reported sunk so often, are now majestically sailing the seas.

The Fuehrer regards the fall of Singapore as a very serious thing for the English. He believes a crisis may possibly arise for the British Empire. Churchill's position may be badly shaken. I am not prepared as yet to believe it. Churchill is already trying to minimize these events, and as the English know very well that Churchill's fall would provoke a most serious crisis for the British war spirit, they will shrink from this last measure for settling scores with the arch liar.

Week by week the Tories are becoming more and more distrustful of the Churchill policies. This distrust has been especially fed by the silly declarations of Cripps. The Fuehrer agrees that Cripps is a real treasure for us, to be guarded carefully. His latest effusions have created such a sensation in neutral countries that we may in future expect all sorts of good things from this fair-haired boy [Edelknabe].

The Fuehrer has the greatest respect and highest praise for the way the Japanese are conducting the war. The Japanese deserve this. They are fighting so bravely and with such an enviable national idealism that one could only wish we had more such allies.

The Fuehrer's extreme confidence and his firm grasp of all domestic, foreign, and military problems are truly wonderful. He won't let anything confound or mislead him. He believes in victory more firmly than ever, and of course he has every reason to do so. We shall achieve victory provided we continue to fight for it with the same energy and with the same selflessness.

At 3 P.M. the state funeral for Dr. Todt was held in the Mosaic Hall of the Reich Chancellery. It was profoundly touching. Every person of prominence in the state, Party, and Wehrmacht attended. One could weep at the thought that so valuable and indispensable a collaborator has been taken from our ranks in such a senseless way. The Fuehrer gave most eloquent expression to this idea in his address. As he spoke the Fuehrer was at times so deeply moved that he could hardly continue. But that made all the deeper impression upon those present and no doubt upon the public as well. We all have the distressing feeling of taking leave of a man who belonged to us as though he were a part of ourselves.

The Fuehrer once more described all the dead man's achievements in detail and said he had at first intended to confer the Knight's Cross upon him, but that he had abandoned this idea because the Knight's Cross, despite its high rank, did not do justice to Todt's meritorious service. He therefore conferred upon Todt, as the first to be thus honoured, the highest class of the new German Order created by himself. Todt certainly deserved this. If anybody had a right to be awarded posthumously the highest honours that the Reich can confer, it was he.

The ceremony was sad and sorrowful. When the remains of Todt were carried out of the Reich Chancellery it seemed to all of us that a brother was leaving us.

On this day I was not really in the mood to attend to all sorts of petty details. The Fuehrer, too, retired. I occupied my mind with a number of problems that will assume importance only in the distant future. Work is always the best antidote to attacks on the soul and spirit. I passed the evening in a melancholy mood. I had a growing feeling of loneliness. It is terrible even to imagine that the men who embarked upon this gigantic struggle and are responsible for so doing might be removed from their work before the conclusion of the war. Just as we won a revolution together, so we want also to win a war together. Reconstruction after the war won't be so difficult as winning victory. That's why we must now concentrate all our energies upon the achievement of victory.

February 12, 1942

After Singapore, Moscow is the principal theme of international discussion. Cripps' speech met with the sharpest criticism in the neutral countries. Individual English papers, too, object to his statements. But I give hardly any publicity to these voices, for it is not in our interest to classify Cripps as an outsider. On the contrary, he is to be, so to speak, the mouthpiece of the group in power in England. That gives us a much better basis for arguing against him.

I have given instructions for our Ministry to prepare dictionaries for the occupied areas in which the German language is to be taught. They are, above all, to use a terminology that conforms to our modern conception of the state. Especially those expressions are to be translated that stem from our political ideology. That is an indirect form of propaganda from which I expect rather good results in the long run.

In our propaganda we must take into consideration the impending reduction of food rations, the reasons for which must be given to the population in detail. I am having all the best arguments put together to explain the reduction effectively. While they are very convincing, I am inclined to doubt whether they will be fully effective, for no one will listen to well-reasoned arguments if butter and meat are taken away from him.

If I were an Englishman I would tremble for the fate of the Empire. But as I am not an Englishman and as I am convinced that our victory can be attained only through the collapse of the British world empire, I view developments with firm confidence. There was a time when we considered the existence of the British world empire a necessity for the welfare of Europe. This time is past. . . . Churchill gambled away the chance we gave England. England will have to pay very dearly for this statesman. But that isn't our worry. Our worry is to wage war so that the Axis Powers may soon attain complete victory.

What disappointments the American people must be experiencing these days! All hopes awakened in them seem to prove false. I am convinced that the American statesmen themselves believed what they prophesied. The United Press, for instance, reports that Hull is very much depressed over American failures to date and is thinking of resigning.

Cripps continues to carry on agitation on behalf of the Bolsheviks. For us he is a propagandist whom we simply could not pay with money. I therefore ordered the press not to picture him as an outsider. On the contrary, we must represent him as a sort of mouth-piece for Churchill. Of course he isn't that actually, but he is most useful to us in that way.

It is claimed that Hore-Belisha and Cripps intend to found a new anti-Churchill party. It remains to be seen whether they will actually succeed in this. It would be best, of course, if Churchill were defeated and Hore-Belisha took his place. Today we would most heartily welcome a Jew as Prime Minister.

Lieutenant Colonel Hermann, Dietl's adjutant, gave our ministerial conference a survey of the present situation on the northern sector of the Eastern Front. Conditions at times are really gruesome there. Some of the mountain troops have not had leave since the beginning of the campaign in Norway. They are exceedingly homesick and their morale is kept up only by the challenging example of Dietl. He is a true people's general. He is constantly with his troops and has achieved a popularity that is indescribable.

[Colonel General Eduard Dietl, commander of the German forces in the extreme north, was a Bavarian mountaineer who distinguished himself by boldness and bravery during the Norwegian campaign in April 1940. He was a member of the Epp Freikorps in 1919, joined the Nazi party in 1920, and participated in the Hitler putsch in 1923. As a colonel he commanded the Ninety-ninth Alpine Regiment at Kempten. He participated in the occupation of Austria in 1938, and was commander of an Alpine division in Poland in 1939.]

Despite their depressing surroundings, the troops themselves are in good spirits. They have gone through several crises which, however, could be overcome by joint effort. The way our people at home are taking care of these troops is most praiseworthy, Lieutenant Colonel Hermann told me. I did something extra for them and assigned a three-quarter litre bottle of schnapps to every soldier at the northern front. That means I am diverting 150,000 bottles intended for the Berlin population. The Berliner will have to get along without this schnapps; the soldiers in the north need it more.

I discussed the present position of economy and foreign exchange with Funk. He is having great difficulties with Rumania. Antonescu does not deliver what he promised. To some extent he isn't in a position to do so. The dilatoriness of the Rumanians isn't so much the fault of the marshal as it is of young Mihai Antonescu, who is playing a rather disastrous role in the economic life of his country.

[Walter Funk, born in 1890, was Nazi Minister of Economics and President of the Reichsbank, and was sentenced for life at Nuremberg, having been found guilty of major crimes against humanity. Funk himself exclaimed in this editor's presence, shortly after his appointment to the Economics Ministry in 1938, "Who would ever have thought I'd land up here!" For he started as an obscure journalist when his dream of becoming a musician did not materialize. He finally rose to the position of financial editor for the conservative Berliner Boersenzeitung, and joined the Nazi party early. Goebbels first took him into his Propaganda Ministry as chief of the press section and with the rank of Staatssekretaer. There he had to give Hitler a daily review of press commentary. Hitler liked him so well that he promoted him to a cabinet post when Dr. Schacht's "orthodox" financing no longer suited the Nazis.]

Ion Antonescu was Rumanian dictator from 1940 to 1944. He had been one of the leaders of the Iron Guard. King Michael dismissed him and he was classified as a war criminal by the Allies upon his arrest. Mihai Antonescu was deputy Prime Minister and president of the Liberal Youth Association. He, too, was arrested and classified as a war criminal. Both Antonescus were executed on June 1, 1946, at Bucharest.]

It is a grotesque thing that neither the Italians nor the Spaniards are willing to have the armaments which we furnish them credited against the deliveries they are to make to us. They demand that this be postponed until after the war. In other words, we are supplying the Italians with weapons but must make separate payment for the goods the Italians furnish us. This is a real headache. [Es ist schon ein wahres Kreuz.] We are waging this war not only by shedding our blood but also by supplying the materials and the labour. It is only right and just that we take the leadership of Europe definitely into our hands after the war and not let ourselves be pushed off our course by any other state, no matter how big it may be or what exaggerated claims it may put in. The German people must suffer and endure so much; they have actually won the hegemony of Europe and have a moral right to it.

At noon I was a guest at the Fuehrer's. He gave a small luncheon in honour of Quisling who is in Berlin at present and conversed at length with the Fuehrer. The Fuehrer is naturally very happy that our warships succeeded in breaking through. He believes we gained enormously in prestige while the British lost correspondingly. He is still of the opinion that Churchill has been manoeuvred into a dangerous position and that his fall may possibly be expected.

[The Gneisenau, Scharnhorst, and Prinz Eugen had left the French harbour of Brest (see February 11, 1942), sailed through the English Channel unmolested, and arrived at a northern port.]

Singapore, too, has weakened his position very much. As the crisis extended it would exhaust the energies of the English public more and more and someday a catastrophe would result. Although I am not so optimistic in these matters as the Fuehrer, I believe, nevertheless, it may be assumed that Churchill's position has been weakened, and that he must watch his step. . . .

As to Quisling, he developed very naïve ideas in his talk with the Fuehrer, as the latter confided to me. He thinks he will be permitted to build up a new Norwegian Army, protect the Norwegian harbours himself, and finally create an entirely free Norway. That, of course, is very childish. The Fuehrer replied evasively to these claims.

As for myself, I have the impression that Quisling is in fact nothing but a Quisling. I can't feel any sympathy for him. He is a dogmatist and theoretician whom one can evidently not expect to develop great statesmanlike qualities.

I discussed a number of internal Party measures with Bormann. He is very critical of Dr. Ley, who is smashing a lot of china with his hysterical articles. The Fuehrer has had to scold him severely because of his articles on increased production, since they contained veiled attacks against the Ministry of Munitions. In my presence the Fuehrer gave Ley a tongue-lashing and, when the latter tried to reply, told him that it just won't do for anybody to start things on his own at a time when other departments and other personalities are concerning themselves with the same problem. He gave orders that nothing is to be done in the matter of increased production without the permission of the Ministry of Munitions.

[Reichsleiter Martin Bormann became Rudolf Hess's successor as Hitler's deputy in party matters after Hess's flight to England in 1941. He proved to be one of the most uncompromising Nazis, filled with a hatred for the Church. He was tried in absentia at Nuremberg, but no definite proof of his death was produced. He was with Hitler in his bunker almost to the last.

Dr. Robert Ley, who committed suicide at Nuremberg shortly before the big war crimes trial began, was head of the German Labour Front, besides being Reichsleiter, with cabinet rank, of the political division of the Nazi party. In the early days of the Nazi regime Robert Ley was Gauleiter for Cologne-Aachen. In May 1933 he engineered a coup d'état against the German trade unions which at that time were still a power. The trade unions, not fully realizing the revolutionary character of Nazism, thought they could best overcome Nazism by seeming to play with it, but actually boring from within, and therefore agreed to participate in the annual demonstrations on Labour Day, May 1. While Hitler was haranguing them on Tempelhof Field, Berlin, and the workers throughout the Reich were assembled at their customary demonstration centres to listen to the broadcasts of the speech, Ley and the S.A. invaded trade-union headquarters everywhere, seized the books and funds, and wrote "finis" to the German organized labour movement. Instead, Hitler commissioned Ley to organize the German Labour Front, which both workers and employers were compelled to join.]

Increased production, in any case, isn't a question that everybody can solve for himself, but an enormous problem that can be tackled only by common effort. The Fuehrer believes that rigorous measures must be taken, that the entire process of production must be examined anew, and that the captains of industry who are unwilling to follow our directives must lose their factories, no matter whether that means their economic ruin or not. After all, nobody cares whether a soldier is ruined economically or even physically when he goes to war, and the soldier certainly does as much personally for the war effort, if not more, than the industrialist who manufactures arms and munitions. The Fuehrer has ordered the munitions producers to come to him in the afternoon, when he will give them instructions and tell them off.

Bormann complained bitterly about Rosenberg, who has managed to create complete chaos in his Ministry and is picking quarrels with every Tom, Dick, and Harry. Rosenberg, too, is a sort of Quisling type. A good theoretician but no practitioner, he is completely at sea as far as organization is concerned, besides having rather childish ideas.

Hess has written a letter to his wife. It is disarmingly naïve. He still thinks he has done a great thing for the war effort and declares he believes the dream of Professor Haushofer, that he will some day return home with peace in his hands, will yet come true. As for the rest, he is chiefly concerned about his health. In other words, he hasn't stopped his quackery. He is certainly not in the condition in which we thought him to be. He is past hope of redemption. [An ihm ist Hopfen und Malz verloren.]

[The reference to Hess's "quackery" recalls the fact that Hess did not believe in orthodox medicine but supported all sorts of "nature healers" and prevailed upon Hitler to have them licensed as practitioners on a par with regular medical men.]

February 14, 1942

The fact that we sailed through the Channel with our three big ships is today's great sensation in London. People act as though they were stunned. There is talk of a great sea battle, and an effort to prove that the German squadron sustained heavy losses. There isn't a word of truth in that. Meanwhile the facts are seeping through.

It is characteristic that the French on the Eastern Front are not giving a good account of themselves. These people are no longer worth anything. They have lost their military punch. A macabre nation, bent upon pleasure, which has rightfully suffered a catastrophe. We need no longer have any fears—the French won't cross our path for a long time to come.

The Spaniards are extraordinarily courageous, but have military peculiarities which we simply cannot understand. For example, they just can't comprehend that horses must be looked after and fed. On the other hand, however, they go after the enemy like Bluecher. They have thought out a new system of defence in which the Soviet population must help, and the Russian peasants put up with this without raising an eyebrow.

In that connection it is significant that most of the local population leave with us wherever our troops are compelled to withdraw. Bolshevism is a doctrine of the devil, and anybody who has once suffered from this scourge doesn't want to have anything to do with it again. The sufferings of the Russian people under Bolshevism are indescribable. This Jewish terrorism must be radically eliminated from all of Europe. That is our historic task.

World Jewry will suffer a great catastrophe at the same time as Bolshevism. The Fuehrer once more expressed his determination to clean up the Jews in Europe pitilessly. There must be no squeamish sentimentalism about it. The Jews have deserved the catastrophe that has now overtaken them. Their destruction will go hand in hand with the destruction of our enemies. We must hasten this process with cold ruthlessness. We shall thereby render an inestimable service to a humanity tormented for thousands of years by the Jews. This uncompromising anti-Semitic attitude must prevail among our own people despite all objectors. The Fuehrer expressed this idea vigorously and repeated it afterward to a group of officers who can put that in their pipes and smoke it.

[Inasmuch as pages 9-36 of this day's diary entry are missing, it is not apparent what the occasion was for this diatribe of Hitler's against the Jews. The Fuehrer remained in Berlin for some days after the funeral of Dr. Todt, and constantly received his underlings. This may have been one of Hitler's conversations "unter vier Augen" (literally under four eyes) with Goebbels alone, of which the diarist was so proud.]

The Fuehrer realizes the full implications of the great opportunities offered by this war. He is conscious of the fact that he is fighting a battle of gigantic dimensions and that the fate of the entire civilized world depends upon its issue.

The Fuehrer continues to have the greatest admiration for the Japs. They prepared everything secretly. We have now heard that Kurusu and Nomura negotiated in Washington without having the faintest idea what the Japanese war leaders were planning. That's a good thing. When you are gambling for the existence of your own people you should employ all methods of a tricky and superior war strategy. It means, of course, that Kurusu and Nomura played an exceedingly ludicrous role, but that is of less importance. They deserved to make fools of themselves, for these two diplomats had always been the representatives of Japanese appeasement, which has now proved entirely senseless and inimical to Japan.

[Goebbels knew Saburu Kurusu well because he had been Japanese Ambassador to Germany before his mission to Washington. It was he who signed the pact of alliance in Hitler's chancellery on September 27, 1940. Berlin society at the time was agog with the rumour that Kurusu, forgetting that he was surrounded by agents of Hitler who understood Japanese, turned to his counsellor of embassy as he sat down to sign the pact and said, "I don't think I am rendering my country a service with this signature." At any rate Kurusu was recalled soon thereafter, allegedly because the remark was promptly relayed to the Fuehrer.]

We, too, have employed such methods again and again. Our Ambassador in Moscow, Count von der Schulenburg, also hadn't the faintest idea that the Reich was determined to attack. He kept insisting that our best policy would be to make Stalin our friend and ally. He also refused to believe that the Soviet Union was making tremendous military preparations against the Reich. There is no doubt that one does best if one keeps the diplomats uninformed about the background of politics. They must sometimes play a role for which they don't have the necessary theatrical abilities, and even if they did possess them, they would undoubtedly act an appeaser's role more convincingly and play the finer nuances more genuinely if they themselves were believers in appeasement. Genuineness in playing an appeasement role is sometimes the most convincing argument for their political trustworthiness.

[Count Friedrich Werner von der Schulenburg was purged in connection with the mass executions of leading Germans implicated in the plot which culminated in the abortive attempt on Hitler's life, July 20, 1944. Born in 1875, he had a long career of diplomatic service, his last posts having been Minister to Iran, Minister to Rumania, and Ambassador to Russia.]

How stupidly diplomacy sometimes does these things was illustrated by the Fuehrer in an incident before the offensive in the West. At that time there was at our Legation in the Hague an obvious traitor, a certain attaché named von Prittwitz, who collaborated with the [British] Secret Service. The attention of our Legation was called to this fact. The minister thereupon very cleverly called the entire staff together, explained the situation, and thereby gave the traitor a chance to escape to England just in time. With that kind of diplomacy you get nowhere. It is therefore better if the diplomats know nothing, neither a part nor the whole. They will then do stupid things, to be sure, but they won't do any harm.

The weakness of diplomacy is its social ties. These can never be quite overcome, and one must therefore be conscious of this weakness when determining one's policies. One must not stick to old methods that have long been outmoded but must conduct politics and war with modern methods.

February 15, 1942

When one surveys the general situation critically one becomes convinced that there is deep moral and political depression in London as well as in Washington. This should not be overestimated for it can of course still be overcome. Nevertheless the Anglo-Saxons have taken such heavy blows during the last week that their knees are beginning to tremble.

What I do personally continues to meet with general approval. What I've done with broadcasting as well as newsreels is lauded in terms of highest praise. My articles are having the greatest effect throughout the world, nor need I complain of their echo among the German people.

The hundreds of thousands of foreign workers now employed in the Reich are a headache. The danger exists that intercourse between these workers and German women will cause a gradual deterioration of our race. This danger must be checked by every possible means. But it is difficult to discuss such a question in public because the peoples and nations affected immediately take offence. For example, the Italians fight tooth and nail against being regarded as racially inferior to, or even different from, ourselves.

I had a long talk with Heydrich about conditions in the Protectorate. Sentiment there is now much more favourable to us. Heydrich's measures are producing good results. It is true that the intelligentsia is still hostile. But we must rally the rank and file of the people to our side and against them. The danger to German security from Czech elements in the Protectorate has been completely overcome. Heydrich operates successfully.

He plays cat and mouse with the Czechs and they swallow everything he places before them. He has carried out a number of extremely popular measures, among them first and foremost the practically complete conquest of the black market. . . . Slavs, he emphasized, cannot be educated as one educates a Germanic people. One must either break them or humble them constantly. At present he does the latter. Our task in the Protectorate is perfectly clear. Neurath completely misjudged it, which is why the first crisis in Prague arose.

[Baron Konstantin von Neurath, former German Foreign Minister, was too old and easy-going as first Protector of Bohemia-Moravia to suit Hitler. He was persuaded to resign for reasons of health, and Heydrich was put in his place.

When President von Hindenburg appointed Hitler Chancellor on January 30, 1933, he stipulated that Foreign Minister von Neurath was to be retained. Hitler agreed, but on von Neurath's sixty-fifth birthday, on February 2, 1938, relieved him of his duties and replaced him with the more robust and unscrupulous Joachim von Ribbentrop. Soon thereafter he appointed him Lord Protector of Bohemia-Moravia at Prague. Von Neurath was condemned to fifteen years' imprisonment as a major offender in the Nuremberg War Crimes Trial in 1946.]

Seyss-Inquart gave me a survey of the present situation in Holland. . . .

The Dutchman is, generally speaking, unpolitical. Calvinism and a materialist love of good living have made him very individualistic. His character is in many respects quite strange to us. You therefore can't do very much in Holland with cultural institutions, since the Dutchman is not used to them and, in fact, hardly knows them. His pigheadedness can't be beaten. Nevertheless I believe that further developments will improve sentiment toward us in the Netherlands. Seyss-Inquart is pursuing a policy of restraint which, though not altogether National Socialistic, is nevertheless purposeful.

Sentiment in Paris is not hostile to us. However, the critical food situation does stand between us and the French people. If we were in a position today to supply sufficient food to the occupied areas, we could win countless moral victories. Cultural propaganda is still the best propaganda in dealing with the French. I shall therefore increase it even more.

It is, by the way, a significant thing that our front-line soldiers are always missionaries for German prestige. The soldiers of the third and fourth line, however, i.e., the military bureaucracy, merely disgust a people that attaches much importance to personal bearing. But there isn't much we can do about it. Our manpower is limited, and our men are now needed more urgently for fighting the war than for making a favourable impression by their appearance in Paris.

February 16, 1942

Singapore this afternoon offered to capitulate after having fought desperately. For the first time in this war the English are obliged to hoist the white flag in grand style. That is certainly a blow to English prestige. That fact finds expression in the British press. A feeling of deep shame permeates the entire world empire. They ought to thank Churchill for having brought England into such a mess.

The differences between England and the United States are growing quite naturally and so quickly that we shall desist from trying to increase them by our commentary. The English might otherwise take up some of our comments and use them to prove to the Americans how undesirable such conflicts are. A precious plant like this must be allowed to grow with the aid of natural rain and natural sun under God's free sky. I expect a lot from these differences of opinion, but the time has not yet come for making them grow by artificial means.

Franco delivered a very aggressive speech against Bolshevism. It would be far better if he declared war on Bolshevism. But what can you expect from that sort of general?

Late at night Churchill spoke. The same old stuff. A certain hopelessness finds expression. . . . But his slogan of "Blood, Sweat, and Tears" has entrenched him in a position that makes him totally immune from attack. He is like a doctor who prophesies that his patient will die and who, every time the patient's condition worsens, smugly explains that, after all, he prophesied it.

February 17, 1942

For the further progress of the war we cannot possibly think of a prime minister who would be better for us than Churchill. Apart from the fact that we are accustomed to his personality and his policies, it must not be overlooked that Churchill's strategy is so short-sighted that he will certainly lead the empire from one reverse into another. Let us therefore rejoice that he continues at the head of the world empire. If the empire is to be laid to eternal rest anyway, it is comforting to have an experienced grave-digger at hand.

[Goebbels was evidently experiencing chagrin at Churchill's latest victory in Parliament. Both he and especially Hitler, it will be recalled, had considered the parliamentary crisis in London to be very grave.]

Roosevelt broadcast a speech to Canada urging subscription to the war loan. Like his little handyman [sein kleiner Moritz] Knox, he has become extremely modest. I have the impression that the leaders in the Anglo-Saxon camp are imbued with a spirit of deep resignation. Hull is again reported to have spoken very pessimistically to the men around him. In other words, conditions in the enemy camp are not what the somewhat frivolous commentaries in the press would have us believe.

I am having some trouble with the press because it doesn't take to my suggestions as I should like. Unfortunately Fritzsche is altogether too much on the side of the press. Why, the press ought to howl with joy [wiehern vor Freude] at being given such excellent material for commentary. Instead, the bourgeois papers especially seem to be so tired of using this material that I could burst with anger. I therefore consider it my duty to keep exhorting and goading them on. Unless you constantly build a fire under the people responsible for informing the public, and as constantly push them on, they gradually become dull and tired.

[Hans Fritzsche was Goebbels' principal radio commentator and his deputy for news releases to the German press. He was tried at Nuremberg and acquitted but was re-arrested by the Germans for trial under the de-Nazification laws.]

Statistics on suicides show a decreasing curve. It looks indeed as though nobody wants voluntarily to depart this life. Everybody wants to live to see the end of the war, and rightly so, for it will surely be a joyful occasion for the entire people.

February 18, 1942

The participation of the Japanese in this war is a real gift from the gods for us. They have changed the situation fundamentally during this fateful winter. Thanks chiefly to them we have survived the greatest crisis.

Churchill was forced to justify himself in a brief declaration in the House of Commons. His declaration is about the limit of anything he has so far done. He admits that the German Fleet succeeded in forcing its way through the Channel, but now suddenly claims that when you consider it in the right light, this is a tremendous advantage for England. The R.A.F. no longer needs to attack Brest but can now concentrate on air raids against the Reich. Besides, the German Fleet at Brest had been a constant threat to the Home Fleet. This threat was now practically eliminated. . . .

During the forty-minute debate in the House so much dirty linen was washed that we can only be very happy about it.

In the evening I had a look at the Polish-Yiddish motion picture, The Dybuk. This film is intended to be a Jewish propaganda picture. Its effect, however, is so anti-Semitic that one can only be surprised to note how little the Jews know about themselves and how little they realize what is repulsive to a non-Jewish person and what is not. Looking at this film I realized once again that the Jewish race is the most dangerous on the face of the earth, and that we must show them no mercy and no indulgence. This riffraff must be eliminated and destroyed. Otherwise it won't be possible to bring peace to the world.

February 19, 1942

It is typical for the English to try to relieve their feelings by announcing abnormal war aims. The fact that in their periodicals they are letting their imagination run wild with plans for revenge shows how furious they are with us. The worse their military situation becomes, the more they blow themselves up. But that has always been a national disease of the British and one need not take it too seriously.

These press commentaries suit us exactly. Nothing better could happen to us than to have the English at this very moment openly proclaim their intention to destroy Germany completely, that is, not only the Nazi regime, but the entire German people.

American newspapers claim that Stalin has been pre-ordained to save Christianity. What queer intellectual jumps the plutocratic spokesmen make in their present distress! Nothing is too nonsensical to be thought, said, printed, or written during this war.

I am having the question investigated as to how we may in future obtain authentic news from the United States. We have established a number of news bridgeheads in South America. For the present they still function, but of course we don't know how long that will continue. The situation in the South American countries is becoming more difficult from week to week, and possibly we shall have to expect a number of declarations of war there also. As far as the military situation is concerned, they are only of secondary importance.

We have published a diplomatic report sent to Daladier by the former French Minister in The Hague. It claims that the former Dutch Foreign Minister, Kleffens, at the end of 1939 suggested a plan for an attempt on the Fuehrer and Ribbentrop. There is no exact proof of this, however, as the language of the report is somewhat obscure.

[Joachim von Ribbentrop, born in 1893, whose title of nobility (von) was obtained irregularly through adoption by an uncle who had only a personal but not a hereditary title, was at first a personal agent of Hitler's. He became Foreign Minister in 1938 and was hanged at Nuremberg.]

Personally I should have preferred to hold back things like that. In wartime one should not speak of assassination either in a negative or an affirmative sense. There are certain words from which we should shrink as the devil does from Holy Water; among these are, for instance, the words "sabotage" and "assassination". One must not permit such terms to become part and parcel of everyday slang.

The food difficulties in all occupied areas are enormous. For some time to come we shall not be able to overcome them. The wonder to me is that the peoples in the occupied areas are remaining so quiet.

The Catholic Church continues to act in a dastardly way. A number of pastoral letters have been laid before me which are so unrealistic [weltfremd] and treacherous that nothing need be added. Nevertheless we shall not proceed against them. Let the "parsons" [Pfaffen] have their say; we'll present our bill to them after the war.

Complaint has been made about the behaviour of French prisoners of war, who evidently don't appreciate their relative freedom. We shall watch this carefully and possibly take away their privileges.

February 20, 1942

In the United States a lot of criticism is at present directed against Churchill. We take no note of this criticism because we don't want this tender plant of disagreement between the two allies to die prematurely.

Vansittart has aligned himself with the periodical, John Bull, and has declared that the German people must be completely disarmed for an entire generation and re-educated. We know that type of education by English capitalists and hard-boiled brutalists [sic]! It's a good thing, however, that the English are now letting the cat out of the bag. That can only help our domestic propaganda.

Although England is fighting at present against tremendous obstacles it cannot be said that morale among the common people is low. The English people are used to hard blows, and to a certain extent the way they take it compels admiration. In times of crisis the British Government profits by the pigheadedness of the British national character but someday, somehow, this pigheadedness will end; namely, when the blows begin to be staggering and deadly.

Nobody in all Europe wants to have anything to do with Bolshevism. Thus from the viewpoint of foreign policy it suits us exactly for Cripps to continue his activity. Yes, we really ought to wish that Churchill would take him into his government, a thing that according to latest reports is by no means outside the range of possibility.

The Riom trial of French war criminals has begun. Daladier, Gamelin, and Blum are the chief defendants in the dock. It does not look as though there will be a real squaring of accounts. The whole trial will probably be conducted according to the principle, "Wash my skin but don't make me wet". Besides, the court is to sit only three days a week, and for only a few hours per session, so that we must count upon the trial lasting a long time, especially considering the maze of material that must be gone through. The defendants began immediately to defend themselves vigorously. It remains to be seen whether political sensations will develop. We had really thought the causes of the war would be gone into. Instead, the intention is to determine the causes for the French defeat. We are certainly not particularly interested in that.

In Brazil they are wondering whether they ought not to declare war on us on account of torpedoings by our submarines. For the moment, however, everybody is extremely careful in this respect. The South American nations know perfectly well that war can no longer remain purely theoretical for them, but that they will at least have to count on German torpedoes in the event of war. That is something which, after all, might give some trouble to the corrupt characters that are now governing the South American nations.

The Italians are causing us difficulties in various ways. Now they are trying to horn in on the newly founded movie industry at Bucharest, which was really to be our field. Of course they are doing it with insufficient means, but nevertheless they would like to keep their fingers in the pie. There isn't much to be done about it for the moment.

They also proposed that we buy the Berlin exhibition of Italian books at a price of 400,000 marks. It is worth about 50,000 marks. This is a very delicate subject which I am referring to the Foreign Office for disposal, for German foreign policy and especially relations with our allies are chiefly its concern, and I don't see why I should spend such sums out of my budget for such trifles.

The eldest son of Horthy has been designated as his [father's] deputy by acclamation of the Hungarian House of Representatives. This is a piece of first-class political skulduggery. But we are keeping hands off. . . . Horthy's son is a pronounced Jew-lover, Anglophile to the bone, a man without any profound education and without broad political comprehension; in short, a personality with whom, if he were Regent of Hungary, we would have some difficulties to iron out. But this isn't the time to bother about such delicate questions. When in need the devil will eat flies, and in wartime we will even put up with an objectionable deputy regent of Hungary. After all, we must have something left to do after the war!

By a decree of the Fuehrer all intercourse with Polish girls by soldiers stationed in Poland is forbidden and punishable. I doubt very much whether this decree is practical. Experience points to the contrary. The question of intercourse of German soldiers and officials in occupied areas with the female population there is exceedingly difficult and delicate. As long as German women are forbidden to follow the armies in these areas one can't be too severe, for in one way or another nature will claim its rights in the end.

It is really amusing to see how all ministers now approach the Fuehrer, asking his permission to listen to foreign radio stations. The reason they assign is nothing short of grotesque. For example, the Minister of Education declared he must know what our enemies are supplying in the way of anti-German news in order that he may indoctrinate youth against such reports! The Fuehrer rejects all such requests brusquely and encourages my efforts to keep news distribution as restricted and limited as possible.

During the night the news reached us that Churchill, under pressure of public opinion, has been forced to reshuffle his Cabinet. The most outstanding characteristic of this reconstruction to me seems to be the fact that Cripps has been taken into the Government. We really ought to celebrate. We could not possibly have expected anything more favourable to us. Cripps is Stalin's messenger in London.

The appointment of Cripps has placed in our hands a propaganda argument that could not possibly be more favourable. It is effective for domestic as well as for foreign and also for military politics. It is good for our people, it is good for our allies, it is good for the neutrals and it is fateful for our enemies. What better could we wish for or imagine?

The trial at Riom is going its prescribed slow course. Gamelin, Blum, and Daladier are quite insolent in court. They act as though they were the prosecution and, as has always been the case with us, too, in similar circumstances, the judges are impressed. I suppose it won't be long before Pétain and his men will be sitting in the defendants' dock instead of the warmongers and the defeatist clique.

Bishop Preysing of Berlin continues to criticize the German war leaders. I had at first intended to order him to come to see me personally and then to tell him off, but I gave up that idea because I am convinced this would lead to nothing. He would in all likelihood present me with a list of his complaints and then either deny his misdeeds or else hypocritically promise improvement. It is best not to touch on this theme at all but rather to postpone it to the end of the war.

[Count Konrad von Preysing, Catholic bishop of Berlin, was one of the ablest men in the hierarchy of the Church of Rome, as was indicated by his elevation to cardinal in 1945. The real reason why Goebbels did not summon him was probably that he feared the bishop would come out on top in any argument.]

There is complaint about too much loose talk among the people, especially by men in uniform. Our soldiers are boasting too much. They try to make an impression upon the civilians, especially upon the women, and thereby merely create unrest and mischief. But there isn't much one can do about it. We have issued warnings so frequently that we almost feel ashamed to raise the issue again. Human beings, especially the Germans, are talkative. You can't change them. You must take them as they are, and must put up with the deplorable consequences.

In the afternoon Magda returned from her cure at Dresden. She brought Harald with her and our family is now complete again. The children are very happy to have their mother with them again.

Magda told me about a number of incidents in Saxony that are nothing to be very proud of. Political conditions there are deplorable. It is a great pity that overwork prevents me from attending to all these details. The little kings throughout the land naturally make good use of such a situation.

[Goebbels at this time considered himself a sort of deputy to Hitler. It was really none of his business as Minister of Propaganda to take a hand in the political situation in the various gaus.

Relations between Goebbels and his wife, Magda, had often, as described in the Introduction, been extremely strained. During the war, however, they apparently improved, although Goebbels never speaks of his wife in the same terms of affection as he evidently felt for their children.]

February 22, 1942

The situation on the Eastern Front has become somewhat more critical. Here and there conditions are developing that are not exactly a cause for rejoicing. It looks as though Stalin were making a special effort to achieve a number of noteworthy victories so that he might report them during the exercises of February 23, Red Army Day.

As a result the Bolsheviks attacked with unheard-of fury. They succeeded here and there in attaining isolated tactical results. Although the situation is not too critical, nevertheless it may cause us some trouble.

Our troops are pretty well knocked out by the continuous hard fighting. At many points, too, the supply lines are not functioning. The troops do not enjoy being sent from place to place. Hardly have the soldiers dug themselves in when they must start moving again. The distances they have to cover are pretty big but the speed with which these are negotiated is very slow indeed.

We can certainly thank God that we have an equivalent for the Eastern Front in East Asia and especially in the Atlantic. Our latest news flash reporting the sinking of 100,000 more tons off the American coast is giving a great fillip to morale at home.

A confidential report is presented to me giving me the real background to Cripps' policies. It appears that Cripps desires the Sovietization of English industry and, especially, greater participation of British production in the war. But he certainly does not desire to bolshevize the country. That, of course, is no good for our propaganda. For us Cripps is the prototype of the Bolshevik in England. Whether he actually wants bolshevism or not is really beside the point. It all depends on the effect.

Bormann issued a decree to the Party demanding greater simplicity during appearances of leading personalities and simpler banquets; also an admonition to the Party to set a good example for the people. This decree is very commendable. Let's hope it will be observed. I'm a little sceptical.

I talked to Hinkel about checking up on the teachers of dramatic schools. A whole crowd of them would be better locked up in a concentration camp.

Our enemies abroad have unfortunately gained possession of a circular letter by Bormann concerning the church question. Why does Bormann at this time have to let loose a pronouncement on the church question anyway? It is not a problem of any decisive importance in winning the war.

February 23, 1942

Stalin issued [a programme of] thirty points to his army. These points are about as naïve as can be imagined. But I suppose he knows how to treat his Russian people. They are as primitive as the language he uses to talk to them.

February 24, 1942

I have issued orders to the German press to handle the situation in the East favourably, but not too optimistically. Otherwise we might go to the opposite extreme from the preceding weeks. Our people would cease to worry at all about the situation in the East. That would be most unfortunate at this moment.

Temple is to be the new Archbishop of Canterbury. He, too, is under suspicion of favouring Socialist-Bolshevik ideas. We therefore note the same development there [in the church] that we have been able to diagnose in the reshuffling of the Cabinet.

The whole tendency in England now gives us an opportunity for starting a broad-scale discussion along lines which enable us more and more to appeal to conservative circles [in England] in effective terms and especially to work on the neutrals. Until now I never expected the English people would offer us a special opportunity for effective propaganda. Now, however, a little door seems to have opened for the first time by which we can slip in.

Stalin addressed an appeal to the Bolsheviks and the world. While his appeal is replete with misrepresentations and false news of victories, it is, on the other hand, characterized by an impressive realism. Stalin declared the German Army by no means defeated and it would be unworthy of a Soviet soldier to underestimate the enemy. The German Army would surely be beaten in the end, but that time was still a long way off.

Stalin received a great many telegrams of congratulation from the plutocracies. No billionaire from Wall Street missed the chance to transmit his best wishes. This whole business looks like a complete travesty of political thought and conception. Moscow is today the last hope of capitalism. What we have prophesied for many years is coming true in a most dreadful manner. The Bolsheviks no doubt are none too elated over the plutocratic congratulations. England and the United States send telegrams of homage but no arms. Stalin could certainly use weapons much better than homage.

The official Turkish news agency has issued a somewhat insolent declaration about a démarche of Von Papen which, however, is of no special importance. Turkey, after all, is compelled, in the interests of her neutrality, to have the pendulum swing now to this side, now to that. One need not take this too seriously.

[Ambassador Franz von Papen was apparently greatly overrated by foreign countries. At this time he had very little influence on German foreign policy. But every time he moved, there were reports that he was engaged in a new peace move. He was, however, one of those chiefly responsible for Hitler's rise to power.

He first intrigued against Bruening, then had himself appointed Chancellor by von Hindenburg. When the funds of the Nazi party ran out, von Papen arranged for a meeting between Hitler and the great industrialists of the Rhine and Ruhr at the home of Baron von Schroeder in Cologne, and later agreed to be Vice-Chancellor in Hitler's first cabinet. In 1934 he accepted appointment as Special Minister to Austria, where he prepared the Anschluss. He was tried at Nuremberg in 1945-46 and acquitted. Then the Germans themselves tried him and condemned him to eight years' hard labour.]

We shall have to change our propaganda and our policies in the East, as already arranged with the Fuehrer. These were hitherto based on the assumption that we would take possession of the East very quickly. This hope, however, has not been realized. We must therefore envisage operations of longer duration and are accordingly compelled to change our slogans and our policies fundamentally. It may even become necessary to set up sham governments in the occupied countries.

[Hitler's whole conception of the war he planned and unloosed upon the world was that it would be a Blitzkrieg of short duration.]

Roosevelt has spoken. His address is nothing but a bluff. He advised all his listeners to arm themselves with a globe as they might not otherwise understand him, but we recommend to his listeners that when they read his speech they had better arm themselves with the addresses Roosevelt delivered before his election, since such a comparison would undoubtedly be much better than a comparison of his somewhat jumbled prognoses with the real situation on the globe.

The English people seem to me to be rather constipated. Things must come to a pretty bad pass before they lose their nerve. We must handle them much more carefully. The German people remind us even today of careless turns of speech used during the first weeks of the war. They have a good memory in that regard. The English sometimes give you the impression that they haven't any memory at all.

The United States boasts of a gigantic victory in the fight for Bali. They claim to have sunk all Japanese ships, but unfortunately the Japanese nevertheless landed on Bali. In the Anglo-Saxon countries you can mislead the people with tall stories like that. We wouldn't dare claim anything of the sort. The German people would box our ears right and left at such news.

Arrived in Munich early, and immediately had a number of talks.

[It must be remembered that Goebbels always wrote his diary on the following day. In other words, he really arrived at Munich on February 24, the anniversary of Hitler's proclamation in 1920 of the Nazi party's programme of twenty-five points. Usually on February 24 the Gauleiters and other high functionaries of the Party assembled at Munich.]

It looks as though we shall have to take draconian measures. All building activity in the entire Reich is to stop completely. The Gauleiters have been ordered to watch this situation personally.

Reinhardt gave a survey of the finances of the Reich. He proved in detail that there is no possibility of inflation either now or after the war.

[Fritz Reinhardt was undersecretary in the Reich Finance Ministry. An ardent Nazi and a very aggressive personality with a strident, loud voice, he completely eclipsed the Finance Minister, the mild-mannered Count Lutz von Schwerin Krosigk, who was a hold-over from the last cabinet of the Weimar Republic and a former Rhodes scholar. Reinhardt insisted in every public speech that the German reichsmark was more solidly founded than any other currency in the world, as it was based on the personal integrity of Adolf Hitler and the working capacity of the German people, and not on any gold or other medium of value. He never mentioned that the reichsmark was pegged, and that it was obtainable in the black market even before the war at one-tenth of its official value and even less. Even the Reichsbank made deals in which the reichsmark was given a much lower value than the official rate.]

I discussed the Fischer case with Schwarz. Schwarz, too, believes Fischer should not be put on trial, either in an ordinary or a Party court, but should gradually be eliminated from office and given a business sinecure. I agreed to get it for him.

[Particulars of Erich Fischer's offence are not available. He was chief of the political division of the party's press section and it was normal Nazi practice to hush up cases of corruption involving Party members.

Xaver Schwarz, one of the oldest of the Nazis, was treasurer of the party throughout its existence. Immediately the Nazis came into power, he "acquired" an estate on one of the Upper Bavarian lakes and built himself a sumptuous residence which, according to rumour, was to cost 50,000 marks.

He proved such a slave driver, however, that the workers grew rebellious and one day put up a placard which read: "Xaver Schwarz, where did you get those 50,000 marks?"

Schwarz flew into a rage, sent for the Gestapo and had each of the workmen cross-questioned to discover who had put up the sign. None would confess, so Schwarz put up one of his own: "Five thousand marks reward for anyone who will reveal who perpetrated this outrage."

The answer came promptly next morning with a new sign: "Xaver Schwarz! Where did you get those 55,000 marks?"

Ley, of course, is very sad that the campaign for increasing production was wrested from him by Speer. But there is nothing to be done about it.

[Prof. Albert Speer, born in 1905, an architect by profession, joined the Nazi party early—in 1933—and won the favour of Hitler, who had very decided views on architecture and permitted no ideas except those which accorded with his own to find expression in public buildings. Speer rebuilt the Reich Chancellery at Berlin into the gaudy edifice it later became, and erected the Party buildings at Nuremberg. Hitler, in 1942, appointed him to succeed Todt; among added duties gradually heaped upon him were those of Director of War Production, Director of Roads, Water and Power, and Plenary General for the Supervision and Reconstruction of Bombed Cities. Speer was indicted at Nuremberg as a major war criminal and sentenced to twenty years imprisonment.]

The Fuehrer has issued a decree by which members of the S.S. who violate Article 175 will in future be punished by death. This is a very wholesome decree which will render the élite organization of the Party immune to this cancer.

[Article 175 in the German criminal code dealt with homosexuality. The number of the article was so well known that Germans spoke of homosexual persons as "Hundred and seventy-fivers."]

February 26, 1942

Churchill's last speech is the chief topic of discussion. It is a speech of deep pessimism. Seldom has Churchill painted the situation in such sombre colours. Fate is gradually catching up with him. He admits that England drove the United States into the war; he had hoped, however, that Japan would not be an enemy. That, of course, is an insolent lie, for Churchill was well aware that Japan was compelled by the Three-Power Pact to take active part in the war from the moment the United States attacked the Axis Powers.

[The Three-Power Pact between Germany, Italy, and Japan was signed in Hitler's Reich Chancellery on September 27, 1940. Germany and Italy declared war on the United States and not vice versa.]

An attempt was made at Ankara to assassinate Ambassador von Papen and his wife. The man who threw the bomb was torn to pieces by it whereas Papen and his wife remained unhurt. The origin of this attempt is perfectly clear. It was without a doubt prepared by the [British] Secret Service in collaboration with the G.P.U. . . . We are publishing the news of the attempt with the proper commentary. But we avoid playing it up too much because lavish publicity about such attempts may serve as an encouragement.

Publication of the plan to murder the Fuehrer at first shocked the people, then angered them. The people don't want news of that sort. There are certain things that should not be discussed too publicly. Among these are the life and health of the Fuehrer.

I talked to Hinkel about considerably reducing the fees for troop entertainers. A sort of war profiteering has developed among the artists which must be eliminated at all costs. We surely can't permit artists to act at the front as though they were the great spiritual mentors of the soldiers and then pay them three, four, or five hundred marks per evening just for reading a poem! If our soldiers were aware of that they would in all likelihood treat the artists quite differently.

Cripps delivered his maiden speech in the House of Commons. It was cleverly done and he wove into it a number of arguments which are somewhat dangerous for us. For instance, he berated the plutocrats and the parasites who are not taking part in the war, etc. One can see where he is headed.

I gave orders to the German news and propaganda services for the present not to report such utterances of Cripps'. We must not present Cripps as the representative of a new, socially conscious group with a pietistic background which espouses a sort of cleansed form of Bolshevism, quite different from the one sponsored in Moscow. A situation might arise by which certain elements in Germany which are somewhat inclined toward Communism might look upon him as a sort of saviour of the idea of Bolshevism. That must not happen in any circumstances. . . . Cripps must be presented to the German people, and especially to the neutral world, as the man who is carrying forward the Bolshevization of Europe on the orders of Stalin and Moscow. There mustn't be a word about social arguments.

I read a detailed report on the real condition of American war industry. For the moment we need have no fear.

The inhabitants of the occupied areas have their fill of material worries. Hunger and cold are the order of the day. People who have been thus hard hit by fate, generally speaking, don't make revolutions.

I have started taking serious care of the submarines. The U-boat men deserve it. I am especially concerned that they should receive light, relaxing literature. I ordered all my collaborators to let practical rather than theoretical considerations determine with what they will provide the troops and the German people for uplift and entertainment.

There are always ideologists in our midst who believe a man from a submarine crew, on emerging from the engine room dirty and oil-despattered, would like nothing better than to read the The Myth of the Twentieth Century. That, of course, is sheer nonsense. The man is in no mood for such a thing and has no intention of letting himself be taught a way of life. He is living our way of life and doesn't have to be taught it. He is anxious to relax and we must make it possible for him to do so by furnishing him literature of a lighter nature, light radio music, and similar things. I am pursuing this policy in our broadcasts, our motion-picture programmes, and also our literature.

After the war we can talk again about ideological education. At present we are living our ideology and don't have to be taught it.

February 28, 1942

The would-be murderers of Papen have been found. They are said to be Poles. Nevertheless England's hand can't be denied. The English, of course, would not hire one of their own people to make an attempt on Papen's life.

The epidemic of assassination is spreading alarmingly in French cities. Our Wehrmacht commands there are not energetic enough in trying to stop it. General Stuelpnagel in Paris has been relieved; his successor is another Stuelpnagel. It looks, therefore, as though our military administration in Paris were to go to pieces because of the Stuelpnagels.

[The two Stuelpnagels he referred to are General Otto von Stuelpnagel, born 1878, who was military commander of France, 1940-42, and General Heinrich von Stuelpnagel (1886-1944), an infantry general who succeeded his namesake Otto, 1942-44. He was arrested and tortured to death by the Nazis after the July 20, 1944, attempt on Hitler's life.]

Hadamovsky vigorously denies that Paris is hungry. The reports coming from there have been exaggerated. It is true that the food rations regularly allotted to the French are none too high, but everybody gets something in a roundabout way. The food is not rationed so effectively there as with us. One therefore must not judge by normal rations but take into account the rations that individuals secure for themselves privately.

[Eugen Hadamovsky was the Nazi party's radio expert. Born on December 14, 1904, in Berlin, he joined the Nazi movement early and was appointed head of the Radio Section of the Berlin gau in 1931 by Goebbels, the Gauleiter of Berlin. Later he was made director of the Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft (Reich Broadcasting Company).]

The Paris Embassy complains about the lack of clarity in German policy toward France. It is true that we are steering a zig-zag course. One ought to deal differently with the Frenchmen—either make peace or wage war. This constant oscillation between severity and appeasement is an evil thing.

The Philharmonic Orchestra has attained splendid heights. Its entire membership has been excused from army service, because it has important tasks to fulfil at home and because, besides, as an ensemble it has so high a value that it must not be torn asunder.

The English parachute raid [at Bruneval] is of course of quite secondary importance militarily. Merely the loss of our "Wuerzburg gadget" [Wuerzburg Geraet] may bring us some trouble. Undoubtedly the defences along the French coast did not function properly. Apparently our men have been asleep. I suspect the Fuehrer will take care of that situation.

[The "Wuerzburg gadget" was one of the pieces of secret equipment captured in the successful British raid on the German radar station at Bruneval, near Le Havre, on February 27, 1942.]

The fact is that living in France has never yet been a good thing for occupation troops. I hear things about our occupation forces there that are anything but flattering. It would be a good thing soon to replace the troop elements stationed there by others, and to have these replacements occur more frequently. Unfortunately this is impossible chiefly on account of the transportation problem.

In any case, we have now been warned. If the English should undertake similar raids in the future, we would know how to meet them with the proper countermeasures. Undoubtedly the English made this sally only for reasons of prestige. Mr. Churchill needs a victory and of course is going to make a terrific sensation of the parachute landing.

Stafford Cripps is making himself more conspicuous. In a radio broadcast he appealed to the workers of Europe to go slow on their work. We don't take any notice of it. It is difficult to pose a counter-slogan to such a slogan, for the slogan of "go slow" is always much more effective than that of "work fast". It is best to kill such a thing with silence.

The Manchester Guardian now admits that morale in England was about as low as possible before the reshuffling of the Cabinet. I am now convinced that a crisis of dangerous proportions existed during these days in London. One never learns about such things until much later. That's the way it was, too, during World War I. The English people show fantastic national discipline, especially in wartime. Anything they want to keep to themselves simply doesn't get out.

The Indian crisis is on the upgrade. We have succeeded in prevailing upon the Indian nationalist leader, Bose, to issue an imposing declaration of war against England. It will be published most prominently in the German press and commented upon. In that way we shall now begin our official fight on behalf of India, even though we don't as yet admit it openly.

[Subhas Chandra Bose was head of the Zentrale freies Indien (Central Bureau for a Free India), which had its Berlin office at No. 2 Lichtenstein Allee. With Pandit K. A. Bhatta as editor, he brought out a monthly magazine, Azad Hind, with Nazi money. It was published with the English text on the right side, the German on the left. Later he left for Japan. He was officially reported to have died in hospital at Formosa on August 18, 1945, after being injured when an aeroplane, in which he was flying from Singapore to Tokio, crashed.]

We have held back for a very long time, for the simple reason that things had not advanced far enough as yet in India and that one must not waste one's powder as long as the enemy is near.

Listening to enemy and neutral broadcasts in Italy has been forbidden. At last! At last! It might just as well have been done immediately upon Italy's entry into the war. As it was, the enemy stations did lots of harm in Italy.

As soon as the transportation situation has improved, we shall be able to ship potatoes into the big cities again. The potato supplies themselves are quite sufficient. We must, however, make fairly extensive preparations for the new harvest. We are in a dilemma inasmuch as farmer's wives whose husbands are in the services receive such high allotments that they don't care to work. They would rather go to the nearest large town and have their hair waved. I therefore propose that, while continuing allotments to the wives of servicemen, we do not pay them out, but deposit them in savings accounts which can't be touched until after the war. Anyway, these women, who never had much money in their hands before, are simply being spoiled by what they now receive. They are getting used to a standard of living that they won't be able to keep up after the war. That will only make them dissatisfied. They must be kept to their work. We can't conquer the food situation if the hands that hitherto worked on the soil don't continue to do their part.

Our giving several weeks' home leave to Polish farm and factory hands, which stirred up such a rumpus, has been an extraordinary success from a propaganda viewpoint. The Polish labourers who worked in the Reich did plenty of talking when they got home. They described the Reich as a veritable paradise. It's no longer so difficult to hire new hands. Labour is what we need most urgently today.

Bose's appeal has made a deep impression on world public opinion. The crisis in India can no longer be denied. We are doing everything possible to pour oil on the fire without being caught at it. Things aren't yet far enough for us to incite the peoples of India to open rebellion. The Japs must win some more victories before things have progressed enough for this.

This morning the British still declared with sonorous confidence that Java was to be held. In the evening they had modestly to admit that the Japanese had succeeded in landing. The communiqués both in London and Washington are becoming more restrained from hour to hour. The situation in Burma, too, is regarded as exceptionally serious. The Americans are now straining at the leash [springen jetzt auf die Kette]. They demand energetically that the English open a second front and start an offensive. But nobody seems to know quite where the English are to attack. Some plead in favour of attempting an invasion in the west, others are for an attack on Italy. All these possibilities have naturally been taken into consideration by our war leaders, and we would give the English a warm reception were they to come.

Chile sent a note warning the Axis Powers about further torpedoings. The South American states are now gradually awakening from the doped condition into which the United States put them and are viewing the general situation with perceptibly greater realism. They probably thought they could fulfil their obligations towards the Anglo-Saxons by issuing empty threats. Now, however, they see German submarines everywhere off the North and South American coasts, and must pay in blood and treasure for the Anglo-American war. That is somewhat more expensive than merely issuing bombastic declarations. This war has developed from a European war into a real world war. Anybody who puts his hand in the fire must expect to get burned.

In the course of the afternoon the Japanese announced the sinking of a heavy British cruiser and two British destroyers. The Japanese are gradually inflicting mortal wounds upon the enemy fleets in East Asia. Once they have gained absolute superiority in the air and on the sea in this entire area, neither the British nor the American world empire can be saved.

I have received a secret report on the situation in London, from which it appears beyond doubt that a large section of the Tories is working for a separate peace with Germany. Only nobody knows as yet how to do that practically. Churchill, of course, isn't thinking of entering into any sort of discussion with us. He can fight the rebellious factions of the Tories with the dangerous weapon of Parliamentary dissolution. Undoubtedly Churchill would come out on top in an election since it would be impossible for reasons of national policy to conduct a rigorous election campaign against him. But this may change overnight. The situation in England has become so fluid that one cannot prophesy anything about the future.

De Gaulle has been recognized by Roosevelt. The operatic general has for a long time fought for this distinction. It is most revealing, however, and indicative of the weak position in which the United States finds itself that it must publicly link itself up with this adventurer.

In Oslo, Bishop Berggrav and the other bishops have resigned. The chief reason for this lies in the fact that Quisling has issued a number of decrees by which Norwegian youth has been placed under the aegis of the Nasjonal Samling. This whole affair is still somewhat obscure. In any case a new problem has arisen that is certainly going to cause us some trouble during the next few weeks, especially in the Scandinavian countries. But nowadays developments race along so fast that time will soon pass over these also.

[Vidkun Quisling was trying to absorb Norwegian youth in his fascist party, the Nasjonal Samling, just as Hitler had virtually compelled all German children to join the Hitler Youth.]

Here at home we are face to face with new shortages. We shall have to collect copper and pewter ware on a large scale since our war industry is in dire need of these raw materials. Unfortunately we can give only a limited number of substitutes for the requisitioned and collected utensils. How, for instance, are housewives to do their washing if they haven't any laundry equipment? The Ministry of Economic Affairs declares it is powerless in this matter. Nevertheless we must try to get hold of these raw materials because otherwise arms and munitions production will receive a serious setback.

The forged Moelders letter to a [Catholic] dean in Stettin is being passed around secretly in the entire Catholic and Protestant world. I am going to see to it that one of the clergymen who circulated this letter be summoned into court and that the dean be made to say under oath that he never received such a letter from Moelders. . . .

The means the churches are trying to employ are absolute effrontery. But one can see that they really have no telling arguments and must resort to lies and calumny to make any impression on the public.

[The "Moelders letter" caused a considerable stir in Germany at this time. Werner Moelders (1913-41) was the No 1 ace of the Luftwaffe of World War II. An ardent Catholic, he protested violently when the Nazi party, after the great raid of Muenster in 1941, seized a convent in which his sister was a nun. On another occasion he was reported to have entered his name in the guest book of some prominent club and to have written in the space for profession or business, "Night pirate." When urged to change this, he is said to have replied: "The R.A.F. fliers are always called 'night pirates' in the official communiqués—isn't that what I am when I fly to England?"]

The so-called "forged letter" was a document purporting to have been written to his confessor, in which, it was claimed, he severely criticized the government. Moelders died in an aeroplane accident over Breslau on November 22, 1941, and there were many rumours that his death was not accidental. One credible version had it, however, that the transport plane in which he travelled was mistaken for a Russian bomber by the German Luftwaffe and that Moelders was shot down by his own comrades. He was at that time colonel and inspector of fighter planes.]

Reuter has practically given up the Burma Road as lost. It is hard to understand why the English are so wedded to an ideology of retreat and why they have so little appreciation of the precarious situation in which their world empire finds itself.

In London there is boundless wrath about the appeal of Bose, whose present abode is fortunately not known. At the last moment I prevented the Foreign Office from revealing it prematurely. For the present it is a good thing to have Bose functioning from an anonymous centre. There will always come some proper moment for us to reveal that he is in our midst.

The situation in Oslo is heading for a crisis. The question of the bishops continues to give trouble. A large number of teachers have identified themselves with the rebellious bishops. They have therefore been told either to resume their work immediately or be sent to northern Norway as forced labour. That is a very practical threat, for in that way we get rid of a part of the opposition, and we obtain the necessary manpower for northern Norway. There must be no sentimentality in this matter. We are fighting for our lives and whoever crosses our path must pay for it.

There has been another assassination in Paris. A German guard was shot to death in the street. The new military commander, still a Stuepnel, but apparently a better one than the first, had twenty Communists shot immediately and threatened to have an additional twenty Communists and Jews, whose names are published, executed if the culprit is not found. That's the method I proposed. If rigorously applied it will lead to visible results.

On the domestic sector there was nothing new. Jannings has turned out to be a petty political mischief-maker. He claimed that an anti-Nazi demonstration had taken place in his studio. When I had this matter looked into, it developed that he made this claim merely because he was envious of a better actor. I sent him a serious warning and made it quite clear to him that I will not tolerate film actors who spread foolish and silly rumours that can only be grist for the mill of our enemies. I won't stand that sort of thing from men prominent in the films. Herr Jannings is to submit to the general national code of moral law and if he doesn't do that, he will suffer the consequences.

[Emil Jannings, the film actor, who made his name in "The Last Laugh" and "Vaudeville," spent some years in Hollywood. On his return to Germany he appeared as Kruger in a violently anti-British picture.]

Bose is trying to organize Indian resistance from Berlin. . . . They still don't know in London where Bose really is. I shall see to it that he continues to remain camouflaged. He is to be uncovered only after he has been received by the Fuehrer.

Queen Wilhelmina has issued an appeal to Java that puts in the shade everything that has hitherto emanated from her. This Wilhelmina surely is a sad sight. [Diese Wilhelmine ist in der Tat ein Stueckchen Malheur.] One can see what happens if women have a decisive word to say in politics.

The bomb raid on Paris is the most sensational event of the day. Its extent was far greater than at first imagined. The number of casualties is given differently by different sources, but it is certain that there are at least six hundred dead. There is even talk of one thousand dead and several thousand injured. The Vichy Government says the De Gaullists are responsible for this crime. We are exploiting this incident to the utmost in our propaganda in France, especially in the areas occupied by us. . . . Pétain has issued a few tear-jerking, sentimental communiqués, but they show that he is a thoroughly worn-out old man who knows as much about politics as a cow knows about the Spanish language.

[On March 3, R.A.F. bombers blasted the Renault factories in Billancourt in the course of heavy raids on the industrial suburbs of Paris.]

It is reported to me that emotions have reached the boiling point in Paris. I gave our propaganda offices there exact instructions as to how to make use of the incident. How I would like to be chief of propaganda in Paris for a fortnight! With this material one could with little effort make the Paris population raving mad.

It cannot be denied that we are facing far more difficult problems during the third year of war than we could even conceive of during the first year.

The purchasing power that is straying about the country without being invested is causing us considerable anxiety. I shall persuade the Fuehrer to talk about this problem in his next speech on winter relief. Nobody but the Fuehrer today has sufficient authority to dispel the fear and worry of our people about a coming inflation.

I have received a report about the fate of the German minorities in Hungary. The Hungarians still dare to commit acts of effrontery toward us that go far beyond what we can tolerate. I suppose, however, we must keep quiet for the moment. We are dependent upon them. But every one of us is yearning for the moment when we can really talk plainly to the Hungarians [wenn wir einmal Fraktur reden koennen].

Our losses in the East for the period of June 22, 1941, to February 20, 1942, were 199,448 dead (including 7,879 officers), 708,351 wounded (including 20,992 officers), 44,342 missing (including 701 officers)—a total of 952,141 (including 29,572 officers).

Until February 20, 112,627 cases of freezing or frostbite were reported, including 14,357 third-degree and 62,000 second-degree cases.

According to these figures it appears we had almost one million casualties in our entire campaign in the East, among them about 200,000 fatalities. That is, of course, a considerable number. Nevertheless it cannot be compared with the figures of World War I.

The number of those who suffered from freezing is considerably higher than we had at first imagined. The number given us at the beginning of February did indeed seem rather unlikely. The higher number is chiefly owing to the fact that the earlier figure was based solely on individual reports. Even as it is, the final figure is only a small fraction of what is being spread around among the people in the form of rumours.

As things stand today, I do not feel it opportune to make these figures public at once. One must wait for a more favourable moment.

The most suitable time for publication will come when we can claim new military victories.

There is a lot of sub rosa talk in the neutral countries about the possibilities of a separate peace with the Soviet Union. In London they are already scared about it. Such fear, however, is unwarranted. The Soviet Union will and must be knocked out, no matter how long that may take. The situation is ripe for putting an end to Bolshevism in all Europe, and considering our position we can't give up that aim.

A frontal attack on black markets was made in the House of Commons. No bones are made about the fact that Jews were chiefly implicated in profiteering in the food market. Heading the procession were the Jewish immigrants who went from Germany to England. Jews always remain the same. You must either stigmatize them with a yellow star, or put them in concentration camps, or shoot them; or else let them saturate all public life with corruption, especially during a war. There is no halfway measure.

In London they are at present busy threatening further air attacks on the Reich. That has now happened so often that we don't have to take it seriously. Nevertheless I won't let reports of that kind get into the German press, because there are still half-wits among us who fall for such threats.

The extraordinarily unfavourable effect on public opinion of the English air raids on Paris has put London decidedly on the defensive. The latest estimate in Paris is between eight hundred and one thousand dead; exact figures are still not obtainable. Feelings in France have reached boiling point. At present the English are not at all popular with the French people. How well they are aware of this can be seen from the fact that their broadcasts stammer new but unconvincing excuses practically every hour. The British Government has even felt impelled to express its sympathies with the French people. Such expressions of sympathy are of so hair-raising a cynicism that we can well claim that nothing like it would be possible anywhere else in the world. The style of the message [of condolence] is so typically Churchillian that it is not difficult to discover his hand in it. The man must have a hide like a rhinoceros!

Information from Paris indicates that sentiment there has become more anti-British than it has ever been before. To intensify this condition, I now propose a gigantic state funeral for those killed in the bomb raid. I planned this state funeral down to the smallest details, and the agreement of the French authorities is to be sought. I am sending Waechter to Paris to arrange everything. It is to be very demonstrative and to be so staged that no Frenchman with any heart can fail to be impressed by this ceremony. In addition I am having posters put up in Paris quoting especially provocative statements by the De Gaullists in London.

[To Goebbels a message of condolence is evidence of "hair-raising cynicism"; a state funeral for the victims for purposes of propaganda, when arranged by the Nazi regime, is a virtue.

Werner Waechter was head of the propaganda section in the national propaganda office of the Nazi party. There were various departments, such as culture, films, radio, etc.]

The Americans had hoped that Eire would, without further ado, join their side as soon as troops landed in the English part of Ireland. They obviously overestimated the ties of the Irish to the Irishmen in America. De Valera isn't thinking of yielding to such a psychological squeeze.

A S.D. report informed me about the situation in occupied Russia. It is, after all, more unstable than was generally assumed. The Partisan danger is increasing week by week. The Partisans are in command of large areas in occupied Russia and are conducting a regime of terror there. The national movements, too, have become more insolent than was at first imagined. That applies as well to the Baltic states as to the Ukraine. Everywhere the Jews are busy inciting and stirring up trouble. It is therefore understandable that many of them must pay with their lives for this. Anyway, I am of the opinion that the greater the number of Jews liquidated, the more consolidated will the situation in Europe be after this war. One must have no mistaken sentimentality about it. The Jews are Europe's misfortune. They must somehow be eliminated, otherwise we are in danger of being eliminated by them.

The food situation in the occupied eastern areas is exceptionally precarious. Thousands and tens of thousands of people are dying of hunger without anybody even raising a finger. We shall undoubtedly face exceptional difficulties and problems there for a number of years to come. Very much water will still have to flow down the Rhine before this area has been integrated into the European economy and its rich products made available to our section of the globe.

Seldom, I believe, in our generation has spring been awaited so fervently as the one now in the offing. We Germans and untold millions of human beings in the fest of the world expect the decision to come during this spring and summer. We shall do everything possible to fulfil this expectation. I do not dare to prophesy whether we shall succeed. The imponderables involved are so manifold that one can hardly include them as stable factors in a political and military estimate. One must therefore take this standpoint: Do everything that can be done, miss nothing in the way of preparations, do one's duty wherever necessary, but for the rest enter upon one's work with firm trust in one's own strength. Then success is assured.

The Foreign Office gave me a report on our relations with Vichy France. Before the entry of the United States into the war we believed a bridge to European peace might be built starting from Vichy. This hope is now gone for good. The Vichy Frenchmen would be ready under certain circumstances not only to give up their neutrality, but also to take an active hand in the war if we now offered them an acceptable peace. That, however, is something the Fuehrer does not want to do. And he is right. For the situation has not reached a stage where we are in any way dependent upon France's military support, which would in any case always be limited. We should not give our trump cards away too early. What really matters is that the war against France must affect history. While France retains even a breath of life she will remain our enemy. We must definitely eliminate France's military and political power from any future armed conflict in Europe. Here the Fuehrer is following a very subtle [fein reagierenden] national-political instinct, even though many members of the Foreign Office disagree.

I read a detailed report from the S.D. and police regarding a final solution of the Jewish question. Any final solution involves a tremendous number of new angles. The Jewish question must be solved within a pan-European frame. There are 11,000,000 Jews still in Europe. To begin with, they will have to be concentrated in the East; possibly an island, such as Madagascar, can be assigned to them after the war. In any case there can be no peace in Europe until every Jew has been eliminated from the continent.

That, of course, raises a large number of extremely delicate questions. What is to be done with half-Jews? With people related to Jews? In-laws of Jews? Persons married to Jews? Obviously we still have a lot to do and undoubtedly there will be a multitude of personal tragedies before this problem is solved. But that is unavoidable. The situation is now ripe for a final settlement of the Jewish question. Later generations will no longer have either the will power or the instinctive alertness. That is why we are doing good work in proceeding radically and consistently. The task we are assuming today will be an advantage and a boon to our descendants.

The Ministry of Justice must admit, to its disgrace, that it sees no possibility of taking effective steps against reading the forged Moelders letter; there is no law which applies [unsere Gesetzgebung bietet dafuer keine Handhabe]. That means it is no insult to say of a man, even though he is a popular hero, that he was a Catholic and practically an enemy of the state. That kind of justice is utterly worthless [ist keinen Schuss Pulver wert]. I am now going to have a number of the clergymen, who read Moelder's letter from their pulpits and who refuse to publish a denial despite being taught the facts, taken into a concentration camp. I shall then publish a bulletin about it. If I were Minister of Justice, I would find a passage somewhere in the thousands of existing regulations which would enable me to fight such infamous conduct by the church. But our justice is being administered, not in a National Socialist, but in a bourgeois manner. There is nothing one can do about it.

[Evidently Goebbels had enough power to send priests to concentration camps even when the Ministry of Justice declared that they had done nothing illegal. He had only to ask Himmler to arrest anyone he chose. Himmler was responsible to Hitler alone.]

We are having great difficulties everywhere. For instance, in one army corps alone, 18,000 horses fell during February, 795 of them from exhaustion.

Stalin continues to fabricate pompous and mendacious reports of victories. He has once again encircled our 16th Army and destroyed nineteen German divisions. If everyone had been killed, taken prisoner, or destroyed whom Stalin claims to have killed, taken prisoner, or destroyed since the middle of last November, not a single German soldier would be left on Russian territory today.

The reaction of world public opinion to the happenings in Paris is extremely embarrassing to the English. Pétain issued a proclamation that amounts to nothing. It is rather tearful and shows that the marshal has grown very old, and above all, that he wishes in no way to commit himself to an anti-English policy, which of course is understandable. While he used a few strong words against the English crime, they amount to nothing politically.

The Vichy people, incidentally, are seeing to it that the victims of the English bomb raid are buried as quickly as possible. They are being interred in various cemeteries early in the morning. Attendance, I am told, is very small because nothing is said about the place and time of burial.

[This hardly accords with the diarist's reference on March 10, to the success of the state funeral which he had organized.]

I find it necessary to take further measures against the "Yellow Peril" propaganda which certain anonymous circles in the Reich are spreading. They are thus torpedoing our foreign and military policy. That is a typical example of how little we Germans know about politics. We are far too easily inclined to judge foreign and military questions by our feelings and sentiments, and not to consider them realistically. I am now mobilizing our Party against such nonsense.

The Dutch communiqué [about Java] is really the last word on the situation. It criticizes the English severely for their lack of readiness to help and asserts that the Dutch risked all their armed forces to save Malay, whereas now they themselves are being left high and dry by the English and Americans. . . . Their communiqué strikes one as partly tragic, partly comic. No sympathy need be wasted on such weak peoples. It is bad and regrettable for Europe that Holland should lose her colonial possessions, but in the last analysis so small a people has no right to any overseas possessions while a nation of Germany's rank has none.

We are faced with the difficult task of making clear to the German people that if Churchill falls England need not necessarily collapse; on the contrary, it might mean an even more vigorous and energetic prosecution of the war. This, of course, cannot hurt us much in the long run, but it might cause us temporary trouble.

[The Nazis still felt sure that Sir Stafford Cripps would replace Mr. Churchill as Prime Minister.]

The Times has become the loud-speaker for Anglo-Bolshevik collaboration. Whatever has happened to this organ of the London gentry? It now demands a three-power pact between England, the United States, and the Soviet Union. As it makes this cynical demand, it seems to have no ideological inhibitions whatever.

Late this evening came the news, unconfirmed for the present, that Rangoon has fallen. If this is true, the Anglo-American war leaders have once again suffered a blow from which they cannot soon recover. England is on the toboggan. The misfortune which has overtaken her in these weeks is like an avalanche that begins with small snowflakes and later, with thunderous noise, rolls irresistibly down into the valley.

Cries of distress are heard from Australia. The possibility of a separate peace with Japan is already being discussed on the quiet. The Japanese have come so close to Australia that it seems to lie directly before their eyes as ready and enticing booty. It has always been Tokyo's territorial aspiration to possess this fifth continent as territory for emigration. The English and the Americans' shortsighted, stupid policies and the way they have conducted the war have brought the Japanese a good deal nearer to their goal.

Cripps is endeavouring to push the India problem into the foreground again. A bitter fight about India seems to be going on behind the scenes. Churchill doesn't want to yield, but Cripps believes that he can mobilize the people of India to help the British war effort by relaxing their bonds. I believe it is too late for that.

Our funeral ceremony in the Place de la Concorde seems to have been tremendously impressive. On Sunday hundreds of thousands of people filed by the catafalque.

Nevertheless we are not making much of this event in the German press, since there have also been heavy air raids on the Ruhr which we cannot splash in the German press. The German people would consider it an insult and find it hard to understand if German newspapers shed tears for the Parisians but gave only a few lines to our own losses.

I received a report from Spain. Franco has paid a visit to Catalonia. He must have been relatively clever about it. His clerical ties have been strengthened. German observers also accuse him of monarchistic tendencies. Germany and Italy were not mentioned in his speech. Franco is only mediocre. One must not expect too much from him.

What a variety of domestic questions are laid before one in the course of a day! Should dancing girls be inducted into the Women's Labour Service? If not, they fail to get the necessary Nazi indoctrination; if one agrees, they become fat, ungainly and unfit to dance. We are now trying to put them through special courses, and while organizing them as in the labour service, to give them the kind of work which will not disqualify them for their profession.

Van Mook upon his arrival in Australia gave an exceptionally pessimistic interview in which he stated quite clearly and without beating about the bush that he expected greater help from the Allies. The fact that he did not say more is, I suppose, because he has been given a sizeable cheque.

[Hubertus Johannes van Mook, born in 1894, was at this time Lieutenant Governor General in the East Indies. He was later appointed Minister for the Colonies in the Netherlands Government-in-exile in London.]

Cripps made some further statements attempting to whitewash Bolshevism. He expressed his unqualified admiration for Stalin and predicted certain victory for 1942. Cripps was replying to twenty questions put to him by the American periodical Life. He expressed himself rather more carefully about the Bolshevization of Europe. Nevertheless he indulged in a few turns of speech which, with minor corrections, we can use for exceptionally effective propaganda.

I don't believe Churchill will succeed in sending Cripps to India. Cripps will be careful not to give up his favourable position in London by absenting himself for a long time.

For the present it is impossible for us to exert any influence upon the formation of the Hungarian Cabinet, since we must ask a great deal of the Hungarians during the next few months and must therefore keep them in good humour. But later we can catch up with what we are neglecting today.

I took energetic measures to stop discussion of the "Yellow Peril". This theme cannot be discussed at all today, either positively or negatively. The excellent reasons which we can give for our present attitude are unsuitable for public discussion because they would undoubtedly offend the Japanese and furnish the English with valuable material for argument against the Axis. Nor are other reasons, historic or philosophical, at all convincing. We must therefore try to carry the real reasons to the people by word-of-mouth propaganda, but refrain from discussing this problem openly.

A pastoral letter by Bishop Preysing about the religious question has put us in a rather precarious situation in Berlin. Unfortunately a number of church buildings were requisitioned by the Party and the Gestapo without my knowledge. Although I had strictly forbidden this, a couple of know-alls have been at work, so that we have now conjured up the kind of church conflict in Berlin which I had been trying in all circumstances to avoid. Here am I, trying in every possible way to keep controversial matters away from my district at least, but now these rowdies and beer-hall fighters come and make trouble for me [bereiten mir noch Unrat] in the Reich capital itself. As far as possible the church question is not to be discussed at all during the entire war, no matter how recalcitrant the parsons may prove to be. After the war there will certainly be other ways to make them see the light.

I had a few hours' time tonight to read Wirsing's new book, The Continent Without Limit. Wirsing gives us a picture of American life, business, culture and politics. The material he has assembled is simply shattering. Roosevelt is one of the worst enemies of modern culture and civilization. Unless we succeed in definitely defeating the enemy, made up as it is of Bolshevism, plutocracy, and lack of culture, the world will be headed for utter darkness. That is why we must courageously and uncompromisingly accept all inconveniences and hardships. We carry in our hands the torch that brings light to humanity.

[Giselher Wirsing was editor of the Muenchner Neueste Nachrichten. Foreign policy was his speciality.]

March 12, 1942

Eden has delivered a speech in the House of Commons accusing the Japanese of frightful atrocities against English prisoners of war in Hong Kong. We know his line. It is above all an eloquent sign that the English are in a very bad way. Every time they encounter defeat after defeat they begin dealing in sentimentality and weeping crocodile tears. The Japanese immediately gave a tart and convincing answer. For reasons of courtesy we are displaying this reply prominently.

The House of Lords has once again taken a stand against the Arabs and for the Jews. It is surprising how much Jewish influence there is among the English people, especially in the upper crust, which is hardly English in character any longer. The chief reason is no doubt that these Upper Ten Thousand have become so infested with the Jewish virus by Jewish marriages that they can hardly think in English.

The problem of the "Yellow Peril" is assuming more and more dangerous forms in popular discussion. I am now trying to get Ambassador Oshima to give us a detailed interview stressing Japan's readiness to let the Axis Powers share in the tremendous wealth and sources of raw-material which they have acquired.

[General Hiroshi Oshima was Japanese Ambassador to Germany. He had previously been military attaché in Berlin. The Nazis kept him under the influence of alcohol most of the time.]

Irresponsible and unpsychological publication of various court decisions has had embarrassing results. Hereafter I am having all court verdicts of any national importance released jointly by the Ministry of Justice and ourselves. Our law reporters lack the necessary judgment to select and publish verdicts according to psychological considerations. Publication of court decisions is not merely a question of publicity but of public education. With every verdict we must ask ourselves whether publication at this moment will have a favourable or unfavourable effect. That is a matter which only our Ministry can finally decide.

In the evening I started on a trip that is to take me first to the Ostmark [Austria] and then to Munich. Tomorrow I am to speak in Graz for the first time in my life. I am already happy in anticipation.

Naumann has already mastered his tasks very well, and is an indispensable assistant to me. He is keenly concerned with my prospective purchase of land near Berlin. I should very much like to have an estate of my own, earned by my own labours. It is, of course, very difficult at the moment to buy land because nobody wants to sell. But I will continue to pursue this aim. It is especially desirable for the sake of the family to own something that is stable, keeps its value, and which one can later pass on as an inheritance.

[Dr. Werner Naumann was right-hand man to Goebbels in his capacity as Reichspropagandaleiter of the Nazi party. Naumann had the rank of Ministerialdirigent and was paid by the public exchequer. Goebbels apparently saw nothing unethical in Naumann's acting as his personal land agent.]

The reception in Graz was very large and warmhearted. The Styrians are wonderful. The young people, especially, have a capacity for enthusiasm which shows they are far from blasé.

In the evening I spoke in the new Volkshalle to more than 25,000 people and tried to outline the prospects for the future on a somewhat higher plane. The audience followed me wonderfully, and the meeting was a great success.

Tojo has delivered a speech. It is noteworthy for the unmistakable hints he gives Australia as well as India and China. He offered to negotiate separately with the Australians and threatened that if the offer is not accepted, Australia will suffer the same fate as Java. Undoubtedly he is right.

Cripps's mission to India is a world sensation. The English are placing high hopes on it. But these will presumably not be fulfilled in the way the English think. One has the impression that the British are letting the pound sterling play an important role. The Indian princes, of course, are all corruptible and being paid by England.

Whether the Indians will take their fate into their own hands is very doubtful. They are divided by so many religious sects and so many racial elements that they are scarcely capable of a unified and energetic expression of will.

Bose has issued a new proclamation which we are pumping into India. He is an excellent worker.

There are rumours that armed conflicts have already broken out in Calcutta. Unfortunately these are not confirmed; nor has there been any confirmation that important circles in Australia favour a separate peace.

We left Graz in the morning. The population gave us a very cordial and touching farewell. I am most deeply impressed with my visit to Graz, which for the first time brought me into close contact with the population of Styria. The leadership of the gau is splendid. The population is showing a spirit that deserves admiration. One can work excellently with Ueberreither, a Gauleiter with whom we can do something. . . . In the afternoon we arrived in Vienna. . . .

[Dr. Siegfried Ueberreither was Gauleiter for Styria.]

In the late afternoon there was a great Anschluss celebration in the Hero's Square, with about 100,000 people taking part. The enthusiasm was indescribable. Schirach spoke first, then myself. In a few monumental sentences I gave a picture of the present situation which drew storms of applause. The Viennese evidently intend to put their best foot forward. . . .

[Baldur von Schirach, the former Reich Youth leader, was Gauleiter for Vienna.]

One need have no fears about Vienna. The passages of my address that drew the wildest applause were those in which I spoke of the insoluble union of this city with the Reich. Vienna has indeed become a Reich city.

March 15, 1942

There were raids on the Reich with Cologne as the principal target. Five major, twenty medium, and thirty-five smaller fires. The country near by was hit by phosphorous bombs. Several railway lines are temporarily out of commission. One cable factory was heavily damaged. To date five dead and twenty-nine wounded. An enemy plane was shot down by night fighters. A bomb struck the bridge across the Rhine at Muehlheim; traffic there has been interrupted. The cinema office of the gau has been completely destroyed. One department store was burnt out.

My speech and my last article about the British Empire's sneak tactics commanded much attention abroad, especially in Spain, Portugal, and among the Axis Powers.

I believe it is very useful for our propaganda to have German opinion channelled through the neutral press practically every week-end by quotations from my weekly article.

The Fuehrer has offered a reward of 100,000 marks for the apprehension of the author of the forged Moelders letter. Through Schirach I learned that this letter was distributed very widely in Vienna by officers of the Wehrmacht. Among others even General Streccius personally participated in the distribution, believing it to be genuine. When Schirach challenged him and proved the forgery, he had to admit that the letter was sent him by Field Marshal General von Mackensen. This old gentleman, who knows pitifully little about politics, has for years busied himself with church questions. Unfortunately one cannot do much against him because he is such an important personality. Nevertheless I shall have to call the Fuehrer's attention to the disloyalty of his conduct.

[Field Marshal August von Mackensen, the last remaining German field marshal from World War I, was a Nazi showpiece. He was a staunch member of the Lutheran Confessional Synod, however, and therefore opposed the anti-Christian tendencies of Nazism. He often intervened with Hitler and other Nazis on behalf of Protestant clergymen, among them Pastor Niemoeller.

General Streccius was military commander of Vienna.]

Waechter returned from Paris. He reported that sentiment among the Parisians is by no means as anti-English as we here imagined. The Parisians are peculiar people. At first they rejoiced that the English had inflicted damage upon the Germans with their bombs. Then, when they learned that hardly a German died, but that casualties occurred only among Frenchmen, they suddenly complained that Paris had not been protected sufficiently by anti-aircraft guns and that no alert had been sounded. You can't do much with Frenchmen today. As a whole they are a macabre people, evidently doomed to national and political destruction.

The Moelders letter is now going the rounds of foreign countries. The B.B.C. has seized upon this forgery to argue against the National Socialist regime. In view of the communiqué we issued this can no longer do us real damage. Nevertheless it is interesting to note to what defeatist work the German generals, headed by Field Marshal von Mackensen, have lent themselves, even though unwittingly. Either these gentlemen are too foolish to discern the motives behind procedure launched very cleverly by the Church, or they are knowingly siding with the enemies of the state—a thing that I should not yet like to assume. In any case I think I must report this whole matter to the Fuehrer, and I shall do so next time I visit G.H.Q.

I read a report of the S.D. about the situation in the occupied East. The activity of Partisans has increased noticeably in recent weeks. They are conducting a well-organized guerrilla war. It is very difficult to get at them because they are using such terrorist methods in the areas we occupy that the population is afraid of collaborating with us loyally any longer. The spearheads of this whole Partisan activity are the political commissars and especially the Jews. It has therefore proved necessary once again to shoot more Jews. There won't be any peace in these areas as long as any Jews are active there.

Sentimentality is out of place. Either we must renounce the lives of our own soldiers, or we must uncompromisingly prevent further propaganda by criminal and chaotic elements in the hinterland.

In the East, nationalist currents are increasingly noticeable in all former Baltic States. The populations there apparently imagined that the German Wehrmacht would shed its blood to set up new governments in these midget states, which at the end of the war, or possibly even during the war, would veer over to the side of our enemies. Such childish, naïve imagination makes no impression upon us. One would have to take the imperial regime of Kaiser Wilhelm as a model to inaugurate so short-sighted a policy. National Socialism is much more cold-blooded and realistic in all these questions. It does only what is useful for its own people. In this instance our people's interest undoubtedly lies in establishing rigorous German order without paying any attention to the claims, whether justified or otherwise, of the small nationalities living there.

The enemy is now making use of horoscopes in the form of leaflets dropped from planes, prophesying a terrible future for the German people. But we know something about this ourselves! I am having counter-horoscopes prepared for distribution, especially in the occupied areas.

The Fuehrer spoke on Memorial Day in Berlin. It was an excellent, indeed a classical speech both in style and content. . . . He gave expression to his absolute confidence that the Soviets would be completely destroyed this summer, which would therefore be the decisive phase of the war. . . . The Bolsheviks would be thrown back so far that they could never again touch the cultured soil of Europe.

[The Heldengedenkentag, literally Heroes' Memorial Day, was celebrated on the third Sunday in March. Whenever possible Hitler himself delivered the address.]

The Viceroy of India assembled the Indian princes about him and adjured them most solemnly to remain on the side of England. The Indian people haven't much to expect of these princes: They are, for the most part, corrupt and bribed characters, who will side with the English as long as they receive money there. The Indian people will have to look to other quarters for liberation.

The Japanese have become somewhat insolent and overconfident. Their new ambassador to the Soviet Union at Kuibyshev has rashly declared that a victory naval parade of the Axis Powers in London or New York was no mere dream or fantasy, but would really happen.

My insistence on central control of how trials are reported was not intended to support and prevent people knowing about verdicts which do not accord with public sentiment. My attention has been called to this danger and I am wondering whether I ought not to send Party comrades as observers into the various courts so that they may quietly inform me and enable me to take measures against verdicts which are out of keeping with the times.

Sumner Welles has spoken highly offensive and vulgar words against the Fuehrer because of his speech on Memorial Day. His invective is so insulting that it is the best proof that things are going badly on the enemy side.

[Sumner Welles was at this time American Under-secretary of State.]

Lord Halifax is much more modest in his utterances. This bigoted itinerant preacher, who, after the western offensive, declined the hand which the Fuehrer stretched out to him on behalf of peace, can now prophesy nothing but dark and difficult times. No doubt he would think twice today if the same opportunity were offered him again.

March 19, 1942

In Australia they are playing with the scorched earth slogan. These states and countries that are tied to the apron strings of the English will never grow up. One can only explain their attitude on the ground that they are rewarded with good cheques.

The Turkish Foreign Minister, Sarajoglu, has given an interview to an Italian newspaper in which he favours absolute neutrality toward the Axis as well as towards the Anglo-Saxon powers. Nevertheless he uses turns of speech to which we haven't been used before. His attitude is typical of Turkey. Ankara doubtless has no intention of deciding in favour of one side or the other until victory for that side is absolutely sure.

[Skukri Sarajoglu was Turkish Minister of Foreign Affairs from 1938-42 and returned to that office in 1944. In 1942 he was Prime Minister for a short time.

The Nazis had placed great hopes in Ambassador von Papen's being able to draw Turkey into the Axis camp, or at least to prevent her from joining the Allies.]

In the Ministry of Justice they don't really know what to do about the war. Since Guertner's death this Ministry has become an orphan so far as leadership is concerned. I shall suggest a change of personnel to the Fuehrer. Otherwise we shall be working in a vacuum.

propose a multitude of reforms, improvements, and drafts of laws, but they are ineffective because a sort of quiet sabotage is going on in the central offices. Bourgeois elements dominate them, and as the Fuehrer is far away, it is very difficult indeed to prevail against this tough and solid bureaucracy. But I won't desist. I am convinced we shall have to adopt much more stringent measures in our conduct of the war.

The slogan of increasing production will not prove very effective once the reduction in food rations becomes known. I have given orders that the announcement about the decrease should leak out quietly here and there, so that there may be no severe shock at the time of publication. Also, the German press has been ordered to report on the difficulties of the English food situation, so that the public may deduce that our shortages do not result from the English blockade but merely from the general war situation.

Goering has now signed the law against profiteering and black marketeering. However, the text presented to him by the Reich Economic Minister had been drastically amended and was much milder at decisive points than the original. Now it will certainly not achieve its purpose in full. I shall have to report this matter once more to the Fuehrer, and I expect to be supported by Bormann and the Party. It is really despairing how the bureaucracy of the civil service tries again and again to cramp the style of those who favour a radical conduct of the war, and to create one difficulty after another for them. This bureaucracy always rests its case on so-called common sense and the wisdom of experience. Now the point is that our great successes in the past were achieved thanks to neither of these qualities. They were the result of clever psychology and a pronounced ability to sense the thinking processes of the broad masses of the population.

In Paris the bomb damage was not so bad as at first appeared. The population has already forgotten it. The French will never learn. Some of them have already become very insolent. But we'll deal with these when the time comes. Their arrogance is intended to compel us to make a preliminary peace with them. That will never do, least of all when they find out what the Fuehrer really intends to demand of them. It is best to let the whole thing hang fire for the present.

Whether we shall succeed this spring and summer in defeating the Bolsheviks no man can say. We know what we have and what we must risk, but we don't know what the Bolsheviks have and what they can risk. One might conjecture that they risked everything this winter, but one cannot be certain. We must rely to some extent upon our good luck, and fight. Many such situations arise during a war. The victor will always be the one with the greater courage and the stronger nerves. Undoubtedly it is we who have both.

Will this winter never end? Is a new ice age in the offing? Judging by these constant, repeated attacks of freezing weather, one might almost think so.

We drove directly to G.H.Q. through snow and frost. Morale there is extraordinarily good, although the endless winter has a depressing effect.

My work in Berlin is praised by everybody. My decision to conduct our propaganda along more severe lines now meets with full approval at G.H.Q.

The Fuehrer, thank God, appears to be in good health. He has been through exceedingly difficult days, and his whole bearing shows it. The Fuehrer is really to be pitied. He must take the entire burden of the war on his own shoulders, and no one can relieve him of responsibility for all the decisions that must be made.

I became especially conscious of this during a talk with Schaub. He told me that the Fuehrer had recently been not too well. One can understand this, for even physically it is impossible for one person to carry such a gigantic load over an extended period. Added to this, the Fuehrer practically lives in a concentration camp. Whether the guards before his G.H.Q. are furnished by the S.S. or by some prisoners of war camp—the effect is the same. The loneliness of G.H.Q. and the whole method of working there naturally have a depressing effect upon the Fuehrer in the long run. He has absolutely no opportunity for relaxation, and as long as he is awake is surrounded by work and responsibility. The solitude in which he is compelled to perform his duties must sooner or later affect him deeply.

[S.S. Group Leader Julius Schaub was Hitler's personal adjutant. He had been with him for many years.]

If during the past winter he managed to pull through relatively well, that only proves that his constitution is as strong as a bear's. Nor have the generals, for the most part, helped matters. Opinions about the leadership of the German Wehrmacht are quite different today from what they were, for instance, after the offensive in France. High general staff officers simply cannot stand severe strain or cope with heavy spiritual crises. It is just something they haven't learned. They were not taught sufficiently to emulate the example of Prussian generals. Besides, their initial successes in this war have convinced too many of them that everything can succeed at the first attempt and that serious difficulties cannot possibly arise anywhere.

The Fuehrer alone saved the front during the past winter. The fact that he would not yield and gave no sign of weakness whatever was the real reason why the front did not become shaky but, on the whole, stood firm.

Realizing this situation, I consider it all the more my duty to let the Fuehrer now and then have reports, news, and information which will to some extent distract him from his immediate war tasks. It must be done adroitly, so that he won't notice it, because when he does, he resents all such efforts. I am glad that during the past weeks I always sent material to G.H.Q. that interested the Fuehrer from the purely human side, especially items about art and cultural life from which he is completely cut off, although in normal times they are one of his main preoccupations.

Towards noon I had my first, and in the afternoon my second talk of several hours with the Fuehrer. They touched me deeply and enabled me to realize that the work I have thus far done in Berlin corresponds in every respect with the Fuehrer's idea of civilian war conduct.

Our greeting was extremely cordial. One cannot fail to notice how happy the Fuehrer is to welcome one of his old collaborators and especially to be able to say in complete privacy all those things that he can't tell a larger circle.

The Fuehrer's healthy appearance is rather misleading. Superficially he seems to be in the very best physical shape. Actually, however, that is not the case. In our intimate talk he told me that recently he has not been very well. From time to time he has had to fight off severe attacks of giddiness. The long winter has affected his spiritual condition in a way that has left its mark.

The Fuehrer, I recall, never cared very much for winter. In the old days we sometimes used to laugh at his physical revulsion against frost and snow. For instance, he could never understand how some people in spring could look for altitudes where there was still snow for skiing! Now his aversion to winter has been cruelly and terribly justified. He certainly never imagined that a time would come when winter would so unrelentingly take advantage of his instinctive antipathy and inflict such suffering upon German troops. But it happened with a severity one would have considered unbelievable. This long, hard, cruel winter be damned! It has confronted us with problems that we should not have regarded as possible. This winter put not only the German Wehrmacht but especially its Supreme Commander under a cruel strain. It is nothing short of a miracle that we stood it. It is still too early to appreciate fully what the Fuehrer suffered during these months. He told me he would later have occasion to talk and possibly write about all this.

The war has reached its highest intensity since the end of November. Sometimes, the Fuehrer said, he feared it simply would not be possible to survive. Invariably, however, he fought off the enemy's assaults with his last ounce of will and every time he succeeded in coming out on top. Thank God the German people learned about only a fraction of all this. This shows how right it is to spare the people the heaviest burdens of the war, especially those of a spiritual nature. . . . What worries and torments the Fuehrer most is the fact that the country is still covered with snow, and that frost and cold are still stalking through field and forest. Although he doesn't talk much about it one can feel how unhappy he is about the long duration of the winter—a winter that came so suddenly and is departing so unwillingly.

I told him about my experiences in Vienna, Graz, and Linz. He asked me about the smallest details and admitted how deeply he yearns to return to these beautiful places which mean so much to him.

The Fuehrer has no misgivings about sentiment at home. He is well aware that the German people, if correctly led, will survive the severe strains of this war. I described to him in detail how difficult it will be in the next few days to make people understand why food rations must be reduced, and how hard it will be to put these reductions into effect. The Fuehrer has done everything possible to avoid them. He will still make every effort to ensure greater supplies of food, especially from the Ukraine. For the moment, however, this is utterly impossible in view of the exceptionally strained transport situation. . . . I don't share the Fuehrer's optimism that we shall succeed within a reasonable time in getting worth-while supplies out of the Ukraine. We lack the manpower, the organization, and especially the transport to do this. It is very doubtful whether the food situation will be any better in the summer than it is now.

This damnably long winter still prevents our opening the vast supplies of potatoes which are buried underground. Here we are at the beginning of spring, and still we are struggling with problems of the winter as though it were only the turn of the year! As soon as the storage places can be opened, the Fuehrer approves of speeding up potato transport as much as possible.

Unfortunately the Ministry of Transport has failed again. The necessary number of locomotives is lacking. We sold locomotives to foreign countries in peacetime instead of building up a reserve for times of need. The old fogeys in the Ministry fumbled the ball so criminally that an example ought to be made of them.

The Fuehrer has decided to rule with a stricter hand henceforth. I told him of individual cases where justice had miscarried. These matched his own observations. He is now determined to invoke the most drastic measures.

I proposed passing a law that whoever violates the commonly known principles of National Socialistic leadership should be punished with imprisonment or in very serious cases with death. Such a law would enable us to put our domestic war effort on an entirely new basis and especially to lay hands on those who have hitherto eluded us. Schlegelberger, the under-secretary in the Ministry of Justice, who since Guertner's death has headed the German judiciary, always refuses my requests on the grounds that there is no legal basis for action. The proposed law would create that basis. Moreover, the failure of justice is really a question of personalities rather than of any lack of laws. It is essential that the Ministry of Justice be placed in new hands. I proposed the president of the People's Court, Thierack, who is a real National Socialist and certainly won't stumble over a thread. . . . Justice must not become the mistress of the state, but must be the servant of state policy.

[Franz Schlegelberger was a survivor from the days of the Weimar Republic, having been appointed under-secretary in the Ministry of Justice in 1931. When Dr. Guertner died in 1941 no successor was appointed, but Schlegelberger became Acting Minister of Justice.]

S.S. Group Leader Otto Georg Thierack was vice-president of the German Supreme Court during the first years of Nazism, and in 1939 became presiding judge of that notorious star-chamber, the People's Court (Volksgerichtshof). In recognition of his vigorous Nazi practices there, Hitler now followed Goebbels' suggestion and appointed him Reich Minister of Justice. He was instructed by Hitler to make German justice, which still rested on Roman law, conform to the Nazi principle that "right consists in whatever is of service to the National Socialist State" (Recht ist was dem National-Sozialistischen Staat nuetzt.)

The Fuehrer would like the Reichstag to vote him special powers for a thorough political and military housecleaning, so as to let the wrongdoers know that he is fully supported by the entire people. He intends to summon the Reichstag soon to vote him absolute authority to proceed against saboteurs and especially against officials who neglect their duties. . . .

[Reduced to a sounding board for Hitler during the Nazi regime, the Reichstag was jokingly called the "world's best-paid singing society," for its members assembled once or twice a year to listen to Hitler, then stood up to sing "Deutschland ueber Alles" and the "Horst Wessel Lied," and drew a salary of about £750 a year for this periodical manifestation of lung power.]

The mere existence of such powers for the Fuehrer, authorizing him not only to dismiss officers who fail to do their duty, but to discharge them dishonourably, would work wonders. All we need to do is to select a single case and make an example of it. That would clear the atmosphere. The same should be done on the civilian sector, for in civilian jobs, too, there are officials who are not functioning in the way demanded by the exigencies of war. Men in public life, no matter what their field, who are guilty of gross neglect of duty should be punished, possibly even shot; men who are not equal to their tasks because they lack intelligence or qualities of leadership should be subject to dismissal without pension. . . . The Fuehrer was in a frame of mind to agree completely with all my proposals for a more drastically all-out war effort. I needed merely to touch lightly on a theme, and I had at once gained my point. Everything I proposed was accepted item by item and without objection by the Fuehrer.

I told the Fuehrer about Streccius of Vienna in connection with the forged Moelders letter. He simply fumed with anger. He asked me to prepare a written report for him, and he will then throw Streccius out without warning. As a matter of fact he did not even know this ludicrous general. . . . Unfortunately nothing can be undertaken against Mackensen. But the Fuehrer made up his mind about the old field marshal general's political views long ago.

His opinion about various leaders of the Wehrmacht has changed fundamentally during the past winter. He does not think as much of the generals as he did. For many of them he has nothing but contempt.

I told the Fuehrer about the disgusting incidents at German railway stations and in express trains, and explained that the wealthier people simply will not heed our advice and requests. He authorized me to invoke concentration-camp punishment to put an end to this nuisance.

[Goebbels refers to the fact that society women and rich people could secure sleepers and first-class seats, whereas German servicemen had to put up with inconveniences of every sort. On one occasion, arriving from outside Berlin, Goebbels tried to argue some of the more comfortably situated passengers into making room for soldiers, but was snubbed.]

Unfortunately I had to complain about Dr. Ley. The publicity which he is conducting to increase production is most inopportune, especially at this moment of reduced food rations. The Fuehrer recommended me to talk personally to Ley and point out his mistake.

We then talked over a number of political matters. The Fuehrer is very much attached to Mussolini and regards him as the only guarantor of German-Italian collaboration. The Italian people and Fascism will stick to our side as long as Mussolini is there. The Fuehrer had intended to present him with a new Condor plane, but is not going to because he knows that Mussolini will immediately take the controls, and if anything happened to him, he would never forgive himself. Flying is Mussolini's great passion. During a war, however, a statesman in such a position has other things to do than indulge his taste for aviation. The Fuehrer spoke about Mussolini only in terms of the greatest respect. He has made of the Italian people whatever it was possible to make of them. If here and there German-Italian collaboration doesn't function, that is not Mussolini's fault, but is due to the Italian people's own lack of military qualities.

~~Then the Fuehrer~~ spoke about himself. It is really touching to hear him complain about the winter that has caused him such terrific worries and difficulties. I noted that he has already become quite grey and that merely talking about the cares of the winter makes him seem to have aged very much. . . .

The Fuehrer described to me how close we were during the past months to a Napoleonic winter. Had he weakened for only one moment, the front would have caved in and a catastrophe ensued that would have put the Napoleonic disaster far into the shade. Millions of fine soldiers would have been exposed to death by hunger and cold, and in all likelihood our workers—not to mention the intelligentsia—would have been led into slavery. Brauchitsch bears a great deal of responsibility for this. The Fuehrer spoke of him only in terms of contempt. A vain, cowardly wretch who could not even appraise the situation, much less master it. By his constant interference and consistent disobedience he completely spoiled the entire plan for the eastern campaign as it was designed with crystal clarity by the Fuehrer. The Fuehrer had a plan that was bound to lead to victory. Had Brauchitsch done what was asked of him and what he really should have done, our position in the East today would be entirely different.

The Fuehrer had no intention whatever of going to Moscow. He wanted to cut off the Caucasus and thereby strike the Soviet system at its most vulnerable point. But Brauchitsch and his general staff knew better. Brauchitsch always urged going to Moscow. He wanted prestige successes instead of factual successes. The Fuehrer described him as a coward and a nincompoop. He also had tried to weaken the plan of campaign for the West. But here the Fuehrer was able to intervene in time. . . .

The Fuehrer again has a perfectly clear plan for the coming spring and summer. He does not want to overextend the war. His aims are the Caucasus, Leningrad, and Moscow. If these aims are attained, he is determined, whatever the circumstances, to end the campaign at the beginning of next October and to go into winter quarters early. He intends possibly to construct a gigantic line of defence and to let the eastern campaign rest there. A winter like the past can never again surprise us. Possibly this may mean a hundred years' war in the East, but that need not worry us. Our position toward what remains of Russia would then be like that of England toward India.

Our offensive will in all likelihood not begin before the end of May or early June. It will then, however, start out with a devastating impact. The Fuehrer has no intention of attacking along the whole front, but rather to launch assaults on one sector at a time and there to undertake advances of really decisive importance. The first advance against the Bolsheviks will start in a couple of days in the Crimea, which the Fuehrer desires to clear completely of the enemy.

The Fuehrer, incidentally, has a rather high regard for Soviet war leadership. Stalin's brutal hand saved the Russian front. To hold our own we shall have to apply similar methods. This toughness has sometimes been wanting on our side, and we must try to find the equivalent.

It is not difficult for me to gather from this whole presentation of the situation that the Fuehrer alone saved the Eastern Front this winter. His determination and firmness have put everything back in shape again. If today he is a sick and ailing man, that was a high price to pay, but it is worth it.

I can only hope that when spring comes the Fuehrer will soon be at the peak of health again. What he needs now is air, sunshine, spring, and the prospect of good weather. The whole atmosphere at G.H.Q. is most depressing. Always surrounded by snow, ice, and frost, no man can live there happily, not even a superman.

The Fuehrer on this occasion really worries me. I have never seen him so serious and grave as today. I told him that I, too, was not in the best of health. We spoke intimately as man to man. War takes a severe toll on the nerves of us all. But that can't be helped. I hope when the war is over only a memory of it will remain.

My work meets with the Fuehrer's highest approval and gives him great satisfaction. It is wonderful for me to be able to talk over all sorts of personal things at length with the Fuehrer. He has the effect of a dynamo. After spending an afternoon with him, one feels like a storage battery that has just been recharged.

Our discussion turned to England. The Fuehrer regards the English crisis as more profound than I had assumed. He believes there will be a sharp movement either to the right or to the left. Either Cripps will Bolshevize England, or the Tories will take control again. At present the Fuehrer is more inclined toward the latter possibility. He believes England is about to face a situation that will no longer permit the Tories merely to look on. For the moment they are letting things drift, but undoubtedly they will be heard from when the crisis comes to a climax.

The Fuehrer is rather disposed to believe that the United States will be ripe for Bolshevism at a certain moment, but today nobody can say just when that will happen.

According to the Fuehrer's information, Japanese aspirations are approximately as follows: Tokyo intends first to gain a foothold at various points in Australia without trying to take possession of the entire continent, and then to advance upon India. To begin with, Ceylon is to be overrun, so as to paralyse all shipping around India. That will strike at one of England's main arteries. The British Empire cannot stand such a strain for long. That will be our best chance for finally knocking England out. But it will take time, and you can't measure such a development with a yardstick. It is, of course, possible that England's collapse will occur quite suddenly, but one should not count too much on it or rest one's chances solely on such a possibility.

I told the Fuehrer how wonderful it is to imagine peace again. He feels the same. We all long for the day when we can take part in reconstruction and not experience only the austere side of this tremendous revolution. Every one of us has a strong yearning for life itself, for the kind of life no one can lead in wartime.

The Fuehrer inquired solicitously about everybody at home—how Helga, Hilde, and especially Holge were, how the entire family was, and how and what they were doing. He remembers everyone, but regrets that he can pay so little attention to matters of this kind. I decided then and there that my family and I must look after him more after the war.

[Helga, Hilde and Holge were three of Goebbels' children.]

Finally we talked about the Jewish question. Here the Fuehrer is as uncompromising as ever. The Jews must be got out of Europe, if necessary by applying most brutal methods.

For the present he does not want to become very active in the church question. He would like to save that up until after the war. . . .

Our whole conversation was most cordial and intimate. I was happy to be with the Fuehrer again. The Fuehrer was glad to be able to talk in so personal a manner in absolute privacy. His devotion and meticulous care are touching. He inquired into all sorts of details that interest him, both of a personal and factual kind.

A little dog which he has been given now plays about in his room. His whole heart belongs to that dog. It can do anything it wants in his bunker. At present it is nearer the Fuehrer's heart than anything else.

The Fuehrer had dinner served earlier than usual to enable me to share it before my departure. We talked at length about the gigantic military successes achieved by the Japanese. The Fuehrer is full of admiration for the Japanese Army. Apart from that, however, he naturally views the strong ascendancy of the Japanese in eastern Asia and the recession of the white man with certain misgivings. But there is nothing to be done about it.

The Fuehrer regretted that Antonescu did not succeed in collaborating with the Iron Guard. Conditions in Rumania are stagnant as a result. The parties are all gone and Antonescu has no political group on which to lean for support. He will have to pay dearly for it one day.

But we, too, must realize that we shall have to fill the wide spaces we are going to conquer in the East with human beings. In geography there can be no spaces without human beings, just as in politics there can be no vacuums. Every space must be filled, and if we don't fill those which we control, someone else will. Therefore our chief task will consist in filling up these areas in the East and in creating human beings to take possession of these spaces and establish their homes there. That is the question which the Japanese, too, are facing. To conquer Australia will not be hard, but to fill up Australia will be difficult. The English failed and that is why they are going to lose Australia.

At 8.30 P.M. I had to go. The Fuehrer was very much touched when I took my leave. He wishes me to visit him again soon. I am almost benumbed at having to leave him. . . .

A long, dreamless sleep. When we arrived in Berlin about noon, the capital was again enveloped in a white robe of snow. No sign of spring anywhere. Winter has returned again.

March 21, 1942

General Schmundt complained bitterly about the indolence of a number of senior officers who either do not want, or in some cases are unable to understand the Fuehrer. They are thereby robbing themselves, as General Schmundt put it, of the greatest happiness any of our contemporaries can experience—that of serving a genius.

Vansittart has delivered his maiden speech in the House of Lords. He directed a sharp attack against the German émigrés who are active in London and who are opposed to the Nazis but not to the Germans. He demands propaganda directed against Germany as such and not against National Socialism. He wants to destroy Germany, not the National Socialist movement. That's music for our ears. Let Vansittart carry on. He is merely supplying grist for our propaganda mill.

Rumours of peace have once again cropped up, especially in connection with Papen's trip to Berlin. Papen is always described by our adversaries as a great poisoner which he really isn't at all. Allegedly he is now inquiring into the possibilities of peace, especially a separate peace with the Soviet Union. That, of course, is stuff and nonsense.

I received a report about the latest developments in German science. Research in the realm of atomic destruction has now proceeded to a point where its results may possibly be used in the present war. Tremendous destruction, it is claimed, can be wrought with a minimum of effort so that the prospects for a longer duration of the war and for a later war are terrifying. Modern developments put into the hands of human beings means of destruction which are simply incredible. German science is at its peak in this matter. It is essential that we should keep ahead of everybody, for whoever introduces a really revolutionary novelty in this war has the greatest chance of winning it.

Hilgenfeldt told me about his difficulties with Wehrmacht officers in taking care of wounded men back from the East. They are fighting about procedure at a time when our wounded are in most urgent need of aid. I pounded vigorously on the table. The Wehrmacht has proved unable to solve these problems; the least it can now do is to let other competent and willing departments go to work instead of hindering them constantly with childish objections. The Wehrmacht leadership has failed so generally this winter that it must be relieved of many tasks for which it has until now been responsible, especially anything which can only be accomplished by improvisation. There are other offices, especially in the Party and its sub-organizations, which handle such matters better, because they know how to improvise and, so to speak, to get results out of thin air.

[Erich Hilgenfeldt was head of the Nazi Social Welfare Organization known as the N.S.V. (National Sozialistische Volkswohlfahrt). Goebbels was always seizing upon every opportunity to take jobs away from non-Nazi offices and put them into Party hands.]

In the afternoon I had a talk, lasting more than three hours, with Goering, in an atmosphere of the greatest friendliness and cordiality. I was happy we could be so frank. We surveyed the general situation, and I was gratified to find that we agree entirely on all important problems. Without having consulted each other we have arrived at almost exactly the same appraisal of the situation.

Goering is in exceptionally good condition physically. He works hard, achieves enormous successes, and brings sound common-sense, without much theorizing, to bear on his problem. For this reason he is pretty sceptical about certain trends in the Party. I can't blame him for this. He has the rare good fortune not to be dependent on the Party in his work, so that he can risk taking a more individual line. In many respects he is to be envied.

We started with the transport problem. . . . Then we talked in detail about the forged Moelders letter. Goering already knew that it had been distributed chiefly by Mackensen. . . . He has been ordered by the Fuehrer to ask Field Marshal von Mackensen to come to see him so that Goering can give him a piece of his mind. Mackensen has for some time been active as a sort of old grandfather to the Christian churches. Shortsighted as he is, he jumped to the conclusion that Moelders had spoken on behalf of the Protestant Church, because he believed that only the Protestants have deans. As a matter of fact, the letter was addressed to the only Catholic dean in Germany—the one at Stettin. So Mackensen put his foot in it properly.

Now that Hindenburg is no longer alive the old gentleman is being used a little too much by subversive elements for their propaganda. But we won't allow that. Goering will give him an unequivocal telling off. Goering has also addressed a sharp letter to Bishops Galen of Muenster and Berning of Osnabrueck. He reminded them of their oath, pledged to him, of fidelity to the state and reprimanded them severely for their treasonable attitude.

[Bishop Count Clemens von Galen of Muenster belonged to one of the oldest families in Germany, whose title of nobility dated from the ninth century. He was a bold opponent of Nazism and an outstanding figure in the Catholic hierarchy of Germany. He received the cardinal's hat in February, 1946, but died of exhaustion on his way home from Rome. His colleague, Bishop Berning of Osnabrueck, was another doughty fighter against Nazism.]

While I was with him, the answers to this letter happened to arrive. They were relatively meek. The bishops are trying, with many circumlocutions, to prove that they kept their oath. Goering naturally won't accept that. I suggested to Goering that he should write another letter, particularly to Galen, charging him directly with having created extreme unrest in the Reich by his claim that seriously wounded soldiers were being liquidated, and pointing out that his utterances are being used by the English propaganda services against the National Socialist regime.

On the one hand, it can't be denied that certain of the Party's measures, especially the decree about crucifixes, have made it altogether too easy for the bishops to rant against the state. Goering, too, is very much put out about it. His whole attitude toward the Christian denominations is quite open and aboveboard. He sees through them, and has no intention whatever of taking them under his protection. On the other hand, he agrees with me completely that it won't do to get involved now, in wartime, in such a difficult and far-reaching problem. The Fuehrer has expressed that viewpoint to Goering as he often has to me. In this connection the Fuehrer declared that if his mother were still alive, she would undoubtedly be going to church today, and he could not and would not hinder her. . . .

[The Nazis insisted upon the removal of crucifixes from schools and hospitals.]

We are in complete agreement about the Wehrmacht. Goering has the most abysmal contempt for the cowardly generals. . . . Field Marshal General Keitel, he said, was not tough enough. He was probably responsible for the fact that the plan of campaign in the East did not function properly. He carried the Fuehrer's commands to the O.K.H. with shaking knees. Brauchitsch was not the only one at fault. While he bore a great part of the responsibility he was not told sufficiently plainly [by Keitel] that he must obey the Fuehrer, and that if he did not do so, he would soon feel the consequences. . . .

[Field Marshal Wilhelm Keitel, born in 1882, an officer from World War I, became chief of the Wehrmacht office of the Minister of War in 1935, succeeding General Walter von Reichenau, who had applied for an active command. Throughout World War II Keitel was chief of the Supreme Command of the German armed forces; the title was imposing, but in reality he acted merely as a rubber-stamp for Hitler. He was hanged in Nuremberg in 1946 as a major war criminal.]

Goering is not yet clear in his mind whether the pending spring and summer offensive will succeed in smashing the Russians. He hopes for it, but so little is known about the Bolsheviks' preparations that an exact prognosis is impossible. If we succeed in beating the Bolsheviks militarily, all will be well. But if we fail, we shall face a period in which only extraordinarily sharp inroads on the life of every individual will keep the country safe.

In southern Italy there have been a number of embarrassing incidents between the Luftwaffe and the female population. Goering, however, succeeded in straightening the matter out during his last visit to the Duce.

We talked at some length about Hess. Goering has nothing but contempt for him. Undoubtedly he brought us into a position last summer in which we were pretty close to ruin. Had Churchill actually succeeded in discrediting our loyalty to our Allies, the war might conceivably have taken an entirely different turn. All of us were justified in being extremely worried at the time and having the gravest doubts about the immediate future. But a kind fate held its protecting hand over us.

Goering told me of his amusing experience when last he visited the ministries in the Wilhelmstrasse and Unter den Linden on his birthday, which was a Sunday. Nowhere could he find anybody. Everybody had taken the Sunday off. That is a situation I have criticized and complained about throughout this entire war. An emergency service has at last been established in one ministry.

He spoke of Frick as a complete nincompoop, and he's right. He criticized sharply Darré for doing nothing but write letters and memoranda. . . . He expressed very serious doubts whether Rosenberg, in the long run, will prove competent to perform his tremendous task. We all know, of course, that he is incapable of organizing anything; he is a pure theoretician. How, then, can he be expected to be the practical organizer and administrator of a stupendous area almost as large as a continent?

[Walther Darré, Minister of Food and Agriculture, figures prominently in the diary on May 19 and May 21, 1942.]

Actually Russia is a land of unlimited possibilities. The dividing line between Asia and Europe has been drawn quite arbitrarily. One day a large part of Asia may be joined to Europe; we could then form a sort of Eurasia. That continent will then possibly have to settle scores with the United States, who also represent a real continent. But that is something to worry about later. For the present we must bring the war to a victorious conclusion. Nobody knows just when we shall succeed. Goering, too, is exceedingly cautious in his prognosis. Perhaps we shall reach our goal sooner than any of us think; possibly, however, it may still take a very long time.

Goering spoke in terms of the highest praise about our work. We resolved to meet more frequently and to have frank talks about everything. In these times it is especially necessary that the leading men about the Fuehrer should understand each other well, know exactly what they want, and permit no differences to arise between them. The result of my talk with Goering is exceptionally satisfactory and favourable. It is extraordinary how much one can clarify and settle in three hours like these!

In the evening I saw the Russian Bolshevik picture, Suvorov. It is a strongly nationalistic film, in which the Bolsheviks try to establish a connection between the Russia of today and the old heroic history of the country. Certain passages are as naïve as if a twelve-year-old child had shot the scenes. Others, again, are of extraordinary vitality. There are lots of possibilities latent in the Russians. If they were organized really thoroughly they would undoubtedly represent the most tremendous danger possible for Europe. Preventing that is an objective which we must attain during the coming offensive. May God grant us success!

Fear of an offensive is the one dominating factor on the other side. The loud noise about victories and triumphant successes is over. Harsh reality is again asserting itself. Churchill's phrases have proved barren.

Bose's propaganda, conducted from Berlin, is extremely embarrassing to the English. It is being heard more widely than I at first thought possible. All the better that we have not yet revealed where he is. This makes his propaganda all the more effective.

Vernon Bartlett has written an article about British propaganda to Germany, which he considers absolutely wrong. He said Vansittart's latest speech had merely been grist for my mill, as in fact it was.

[Vernon Bartlett, M.P., was at this time diplomatic adviser to the News Chronicle.]

The more the English prophesy a disgraceful peace for Germany, the easier is it for me to toughen and harden German resistance. We should be in a dangerous situation by now if British propaganda from the beginning of the war had consistently respected the German will to live and the German conception of honour. That was how Chamberlain began on the first day of the war. Thank God, the English did not continue along that line. Even though we should always try to discredit them by citing 1918 as an example, they would nevertheless have found foolish adherents here and there, especially since the domestic situation must always become more strained the longer a war lasts.

The same would, of course, apply to Italy. There, however, the English are proceeding somewhat more cleverly. The United States has now proclaimed Sforza as the standard-bearer of a future Italian regime. He is the spokesman of a so-called "Free Italy". For the present such nonsense is ineffective.

[Count Carlo Sforza, the "grand old man" of the Italian anti-Fascist émigrés, had been Foreign Minister in 1920 and 1921. He was then appointed Ambassador to France, a post he resigned when Mussolini attained power late in 1922 and led the opposition until the suppression of opposition parties in 1926. He went into exile and spent much of his time abroad lecturing. He returned to Italy at the age of seventy-one to become a member of the Badoglio cabinet in April 1944; he was president of the Italian consultative assembly in 1945, and became Foreign Secretary in 1947.]

The Foreign Office has given me a report about the situation in Brazil. A bitter fight is going on between President Vargas, who is pretty much on our side, and Aranha, the Foreign Minister, who has evidently been bought by Roosevelt and seems to be doing everything he can to provoke a conflict with the Reich and the Axis Powers.

We have, alas, no facilities for reprisal. We have about six hundred Brazilians in our hands whereas in Brazil alone there are 150,000 Germans. The possibilities of economic retaliation are also extraordinarily limited, as we don't own one-tenth as much Brazilian capital as the Brazilians possess of ours. So we have to be fairly careful.

The S.D. report paints the situation in rather sombre colours [grau in grau]. It declares no news during the entire war has had as depressing an effect as this [reduction in food rations], and that morale has reached its lowest ebb. I think that is seeing things rather too pessimistically.

It is simply disgusting how the Catholic Church is continuing its subversive activity in every way possible; now it is even extending its propaganda to Protestant children who have been evacuated from regions threatened by air raids. Next to the Jews these politician-parsons [politisierenden Pfaffen] are about the most loathsome riffraff that we are still sheltering in the Reich. The time will come after the war for a proper solution of this problem. There can be only one master in the state, either the Church or the state itself. National Socialism is faced with the task of establishing its supremacy uncompromisingly over the political claims of the Church.

The people at the Metropole Theatre are very grateful that I can devote a few late hours to them. It is not, however, very good for my work; it distracts me. It engenders too deep a yearning for peace, and that won't do in wartime. Just as a wanderer in the desert should not always be thinking of water, so a man who helps to run a war must never think of peace. If and when peace comes, there is plenty of time to think about it; if it doesn't come, then only one task remains—to go on waging war.

[The speciality of the Metropole Theatre was musical comedy.]

March 27, 1942

Nothing of importance has been reported from East Asia. The American and British press is babbling about an offensive in Australia which the Allies are alleged to have begun. Their claims are now so modest that the mere presence of a better-known general in a certain country is regarded as an offensive.

[Goebbels is referring to General MacArthur.]

Cripps is evidently trying to force a decision [in India], for not only does he want to achieve practical results, but success is extremely important to him personally. He received the journalists and cracked foolish, typically English jokes. He wouldn't commit himself. It seems quite clear that the English will try to promise the Indians dominion status after the war—a promise that they certainly wouldn't keep if England were to win the war and could further expand her imperial might.

Churchill, incidentally, took the floor himself in the House of Commons. His speech was larded with obscure phrases. He speaks in generalities, declaring that the position has improved tremendously. He is such an insolent liar that it hardly pays to argue with him.

The German Embassy in Rome has sent me a speech by Mussolini which was delivered to the Party leaders on January 3. The speech is exceptionally caustic and is directed especially against the defeatist bourgeois circles which criticize the war effort. In this confidential address, Mussolini declared his unalterable determination to march to the end with Germany and the Fuehrer. . . . He really deserves a better people than the one he now leads.

A much more clever form of propaganda against the Reich has been proposed in the United States. The idea is not to attack the German people but Nazism. I perceive a certain danger. Fortunately enemy propaganda is not unified and consistent enough to stick to such a propaganda slogan for a period of years. If this were done, we would face great difficulties every time we came under any new and heavy strain.

If I were on the enemy side, I should from the very first day have adopted the slogan of fighting against Nazism, but not against the German people. That was how Chamberlain began on the first day of the war, but, thank God, the English didn't pursue this line. I have given orders that the German press is not to publish or discuss turns of speech such as are being used increasingly in the American press. One should simply not talk about these things. Even arguing about them only spreads them.

The German people must remain convinced—as indeed the facts warrant—that this war strikes at their very lives and their national possibilities of development, and that they must fight it with their entire strength.

The Wafd party has achieved a glorious victory, gaining 216 out of 264 seats. That makes it possible for Nahas Pasha to act. Of course one cannot expect much of him, as he has probably been a satellite of the English for some time already.

Beginning with Lublin, the Jews under the General Government are now being evacuated eastward. The procedure is pretty barbaric and is not to be described here more definitely. Not much will remain of the Jews. About 60 per cent of them will have to be liquidated; only about 40 per cent can be used for forced labour.

[General Government means German-occupied Poland. This entry makes it clear that Goebbels knew of the gas-chamber atrocities. It is perhaps significant that there was any form of activity resorted to by Nazis which he was prepared to describe as barbaric.]

The former Gauleiter of Vienna, who is to carry out this measure, is doing it with considerable circumspection and in a way that does not attract too much attention. Though the judgment now being visited upon the Jews is barbaric, they fully deserve it. The prophecy which the Fuehrer made about them for having brought on a new world war is beginning to come true in a most terrible manner. One must not be sentimental in these matters. If we did not fight the Jews, they would destroy us. It's a life-and-death struggle between the Aryan race and the Jewish bacillus. No other government and no other regime would have the strength for such a global solution as this. Here, once again, the Fuehrer is the undismayed champion of a radical solution, which is made necessary by existing conditions and is therefore inexorable. Fortunately a whole series of possibilities presents itself to us in wartime which would be denied us in peace. We shall have to profit by this.

[Addressing the Reichstag on January 30, 1939, Hitler said: "I want today once again to make a prophecy: if the international Jewish financiers within and outside Europe succeed once more in hurling the peoples into a world war, the result will be, not the Bolshevization of the world and with it a victory of Jewry, but the annihilation of the Jewish race in Europe."]

The ghettos that will be emptied in the cities of the General Government will now be refilled with Jews thrown out of the Reich. This process is to be repeated from time to time. The fact that Jewry's representatives in England and America are today organizing and sponsoring the war against Germany must be paid for dearly by its representatives in Europe—that is only right.

Commander Hartenstein reported to me about a submarine trip into the Caribbean Sea. Our submarines are finding plenty of booty there. The Americans are not at all well prepared and have almost no defence against submarine attacks. The submarines are at sea for about sixty days all told. They keep shooting until their last torpedo is gone and on their return try, if possible, to destroy transports they meet by artillery fire. Morale among the submarine men is splendid, especially since their last great successes. It is astonishing how quickly combat transforms young men into genuine leaders. This particular submarine commander, who seems almost to be still in his teens, is a real man and a leader from head to foot.

Things are relatively quiet in East Asia. The Japanese seem to be waiting to accumulate strength for their next blow. Australia is making a murderous row [einen Mordskrach], arguing with everybody all round. Behind it all, however, there is no military power whatever. MacArthur has no easy task so far as Australia is concerned. Those in power in Australia at present are descendants of the former British penal colony. They don't mince words. They would be pretty surprised, however, if one of these days the Japanese established bases on their continent.

Churchill's last speech is being debated in London. In fact he spoke much more pessimistically than at first appeared. The gloomy beginning of his speech was forbidden for Reuter's foreign service and was quoted only in the domestic English service. We nevertheless got hold of it and can now contrast how Churchill strikes a note of relative optimism for countries abroad while he describes the situation exactly as it is for the people at home. The London propaganda offices claim that Churchill spoke the simple truth. In other words, there are two kinds of truth for the British Prime Minister, one for foreign countries and one for home consumption.

Hamsun wrote a very witty and exceptionally biting article against Roosevelt. Hamsun, one of modern Europe's outstanding intellectuals, has always stood by the flag of the new order.

[The subsequent visit to Germany of Knut Hamsun, the celebrated Norwegian novelist and winner of the Nobel Prize for Literature, is described in detail in the entry for May 19, 1943.]

The English are about to introduce their double summertime. That again gives us the problem of interrupting our entertainment broadcasts to make room for the news service in English. I am trying to persuade the Luftwaffe to give me one of the broadcasting stations in occupied France, for at present we can hardly afford to have the general entertainment programme interrupted.

Sauckel has been appointed Reich Plenipotentiary for manpower. When he comes to Berlin the next time I am going to talk to him and outline my wishes. Undoubtedly his strong National Socialist hand will achieve miracles. It should not be difficult to mobilize at least a million additional workers from among the German people; one must merely tackle it energetically and not be scared by the constant difficulties.

[Fritz Sauckel, Gauleiter for Thuringia, was regarded as one of the toughest of the Old Guard Nazis, and was put in charge of the whole problem of forced labour. The Nuremberg International Military Tribunal found him guilty of crimes against humanity because of his ruthless treatment of slave labourers from all occupied countries, and had him hanged. Later, Goebbels speaks very disparagingly about him.

It was Sauckel who had the sarcophagi of Goethe and Schiller removed from their resting place in the royal mausoleum of Weimar and taken to Jena to an air-raid bunker. He then ordered that both bodies should be blown to bits if the Americans advanced into Thuringia. The workers of Jena considered this sacrilege, however, and hid the two coffins. They informed the American military governor of Weimar what they had done, and the remains were ceremoniously brought back to Weimar.]

I have ordered an investigation into the nuisance of questionnaires. This has really become a public scandal. One can hardly buy an orange today without answering one of these absurd questionnaires. It is high time this was stopped. If I succeed, I shall undoubtedly have rendered a great service to domestic tranquillity.

The heads of the Waffen-S.S. look after its members materially and spiritually in a model way. That means, of course, that conflicts are constantly arising between the Waffen-S.S. and the Army, which is very lax in these matters. But the Waffen-S.S. really cannot be expected to stop looking after its troops merely because the Army is inactive in that respect! Quite a number of cases have been reported to me which are simply hair-raising. One can scarcely put into words what the Army neglects to do in the way of taking care of the troops and supplying them with munitions and weapons. The gentlemen of the O.K.H. are nothing but frustrated German National or People's party bureaucrats. If National Socialism hadn't come, they would in all likelihood be sitting somewhere inconspicuous as obscure attorneys or local representatives of the bourgeois parties. Now they are pretending to be brass hats. They are entirely unfit for leadership, especially since they have no initiative and cannot improvise. Their chief task consists in creating difficulties for people who do something and who know something. But the S.S. won't let anybody scratch the butter off its bread!

[Many of the older officers who were discharged at the end of World War I, since Germany was permitted to have a professional army of only 100,000 men, found employment as lawyers or low-ranking officials of the ultra-conservative German National party and of Stresemann's People's party. Goebbels always felt much closer to the Communists than to former members of the defunct middle-class and conservative parties.]

The London press has started a major campaign against Bulgaria, especially on the question whether she wants to attack Turkey. That, of course, is utter nonsense; nevertheless London is trying thereby to torpedo King Boris's trip to Germany.

King Boris expressed a wish to talk with me at leisure. I visited him at Bellevue Castle where he is spending a few days. Our talk, which was intended to take only twenty minutes, lasted more than two hours. The King is extraordinarily charming and has returned from the Fuehrer full of new ideas, suggestions and enterprises. The Fuehrer has this time given him a complete briefing on everything which concerns him. Boris is an impassioned devotee of Hitler's genius as a leader; he really looks upon him as a sort of emissary of God.

He shows the greatest understanding for my work. He follows what I do with such alert interest that I am really surprised at how much he knows and what he asks about. My articles in the Reich are part of his everyday reading. Indeed, he even told me that he uses the arguments advanced in these articles in all his diplomatic negotiations. He is full of admiration for the sensitiveness of our psychological approach in leading the German people which, he claims, differs most strikingly from that of World War I.

He is a real, people's king. He describes to me how he travels incognito through Bulgarian villages to learn about the sentiment of the people. Undoubtedly it was pro-Russian even a short time ago, but with the presence of German troops it has veered over noticeably to our side. The King has observed marked friendliness to Germany even in such sections of the country as were hitherto known to be pro-Russian. He is very happy that the Fuehrer does not expect more of him than to be a stabilizing factor in the Balkans.

The Fuehrer is showing himself extremely liberal toward Bulgaria. Bulgaria, after all, cannot easily take an active part in the war, since it has almost never lived in peace throughout its short history as a nation. It can, however, supply auxiliary troops here and there, as indeed it has done, for example, in Serbia. For this we can only thank the King.

Bulgaria's national aspirations have mostly been satisfied. The King, of course, is not thinking of fighting Turkey.

It is truly astonishing with what love and devotion he stands behind the Fuehrer. If all our allies were like that, we could be satisfied. The King has made intensive studies of German morale and is very well satisfied by the results. He knows just what conditions were during World War I and realizes that they are in sharp contrast with those of today. He is surprised at the quiet composure of the population, especially in Berlin, and praises it highly.

It was late at night when we parted in the most cordial spirit. One cannot but find this king sympathetic. If all heads of states in Europe were as open-minded and ready to support the new order, practically nothing could obstruct the way of the future Europe.

[As was pointed out in the Introduction, this entry should be compared with that of January 25, 1942, where King Boris is described as a "sly, crafty fellow", was "playing a double-faced game". See also the conversation with the King recorded in the Von Hassell Diaries.]

March 29, 1942

The English are continuing their infamous and infernal campaign against King Boris, claiming he had mobilized in order to take a hand in the campaign in the East. Not a word of this is true. On the contrary, as I gather from a confidential report, the situation in Bulgaria is distinctly confused. It isn't true at all that only elements friendly to the Axis are dominant there. There are also quite a number of pro-Russians, besides Freemasons, who are by no means ready to yield the field without resistance. Boris has many difficulties to overcome before he can balance the political situation at home. In any case the English are groping in the dark completely if they believe that Bulgaria will attack Turkey. As a matter of fact they probably don't really believe it themselves, but are merely claiming to do so.

The Bolshevizing process to which England is now subjected is gradually extending to the United States. While this is happening only very slowly, it is nevertheless quite visible to the eye of any informed person and is continuing with frightening consistency. If this war lasts much longer, certainly the prophecy of the Fuehrer will be fulfilled according to which the states that have vomited Bolshevism on to us will themselves be devoured by it.

There are rumours, as yet unconfirmed, that Pétain wants to take Laval back into his government. Pétain has, in fact, had a secret talk with Laval, the results of which are still unknown.

[Pierre Laval had been Minister for Foreign Affairs in Pétain's collaborationist cabinet of 1940, but soon quarrelled with the chief of state, whose functions he was trying to take over. In 1942 Pétain invited him to join the cabinet again, this time as Premier. Laval accepted. He was found guilty of treason by a Paris court and, after trying in vain to commit suicide by swallowing poison, was executed by a firing squad in Fresnes Prison on October 15, 1945.]

Our navy journals have asked me to let them have my editorials a little earlier. They are published in all the navy papers. Sailors are extremely interested in them and agree with them completely. I am happy that my editorials are held in such high esteem by the fighting forces. It proves that I have found a method of argument that is very effective both at home and at the front.

For the first time the Wehrmacht communiqué points out that winter may be regarded as having ended. When I hear this sentence I grow quite hot under the collar, it excites me so much. Just to think what this winter brought us in the way of sacrifices, worries, and spiritual and material torment! How long have we waited for this hour! Now it has come at last.

MacArthur is being praised more and more in the United States like a general in the movies. I am having this gentleman taken down a few pegs by our propaganda services. The Americans are trying to blow him up into the greatest general of this war. All he really has to show in the way of heroic deeds and achievements is his relatively brief resistance on Corregidor. Imagine what the Americans would do if they had a Dietl or a Rommel! This shows how modest we really are in our propaganda.

Cripps is hoping for success in India within about a fortnight. He is proceeding rather cleverly, and there is a danger that he may actually succeed in attaching India once again to England's apron strings. He still has some resistance to overcome, but one never knows to what extent the English pound sterling is brought into play at the decisive hour. I therefore order our propaganda to be reversed to some extent. We are now taking the line that the German people won't be greatly disappointed if a compromise is worked out in India.

This Sunday has been thoroughly spoiled by an exceptionally heavy air raid by the R.A.F. on Luebeck. In the morning I received a very alarming report from our propaganda office there, which I at first assumed to be exaggerated. In the course of the evening, however, I was informed of the seriousness of the situation by a long-distance call from Kaufmann. He believes that no German city has ever before been attacked so severely from the air. Conditions in parts of Luebeck are chaotic. Kaufmann took a hand with great energy and started the necessary rescue measures, but he isn't being given proper support from Berlin.

[Karl Kaufmann, one of the Nazi Old Guard, was Gauleiter of the Hamburg area which included the Hanseatic City of Luebeck.]

Immediately afterwards the Fuehrer called me from G.H.Q. and was very much put out about the negligence of the Ministry of the Interior, which did not even succeed in calling departmental heads together on Sunday evening to discuss the necessary relief measures. The Fuehrer therefore took the matter of caring for bomb-damaged areas out of the hands of the Ministry of the Interior and conferred sweeping powers on me. . . By midnight everything was arranged that could possibly be done. The Ministry of the Interior has once again fizzled out completely. But that's all right as far as I am concerned. It means that I at least have been given plenary powers to take action without being constantly hindered by the bureaucracy.

[This was probably one of Goebbels' happiest days in the year. He not only received additional power, but the man from whom it was removed was his bête noire, Dr. Frick.]

Cripps has made public the British plan for the pacification of India. It's the old trick—exactly the same that England tried during World War I: after the war India will be given dominion status, but it will be for the individual states of India to decide whether to join or not. That makes it possible for England either not to keep her promise at all, which is most likely, or, alternatively to play off one Indian state against the other and thereby condemn the entire plan to sterility. It is quite clear that this mess has been cooked up in Churchill's kitchen.

Cripps worked on the Indian press at a conference lasting several hours and was obliged to answer numerous questions. He dealt with them rather cleverly, so perhaps English tactics may, after all, succeed, with the aid of sizeable cheques in sterling, in straightening the Indian situation out again.

The situation at Luebeck is far from pleasant. I telephoned several times to Kaufmann, who gave me a vivid description of the destruction. Eighty per cent of the old part of the city must be considered lost. Stupendous numbers of works of art have fallen victims to the British craze for destruction. . . .

Commander Endrass has failed to return from a mission. The German submarine force has thereby lost one of its ablest officers and I a good, sympathetic, charming acquaintance with whom I was on most cordial terms. I have been thinking with sorrow of the splendid evening I spent with Endrass at Schwanenwerder. All this young blood must now be shed for the Fatherland. War is a negative selection. It would be much better if a couple of hundred idle plutocrats at home had to walk the plank [verschuettingen]. As it is, however, the very best that we have are lost to us.

We shall naturally prepare much better for next winter than we did for the last. The difficulties of the past winter were mainly due to our having had no real experience in an eastern campaign. Now, however, we know the difficulties we shall take the necessary counter measures during the summer and early autumn.

I cannot imagine that Churchill expected a real operational success at St. Nazaire. The man in the street felt the need for some sort of offensive action and so, although very serious sacrifices were involved, Churchill started it as a propaganda affair. But as the English were chased home with bloody heads (in so far as they got home at all), he will presumably think twice in future before setting out on such ventures.

According to a report I have received on the internal situation there, Hungary is in the midst of some kind of state crisis. Kállay, the new Prime Minister, has long been known to be hostile to Germany. Also, he was involved in rather shady deals when he was Minister of Agriculture. Bárdossy resigned, as I at once suspected, because he violently opposed the appointment of the Regent's son as Deputy Regent. Young Horthy is a pronounced friend of the Jews and does not want to have much to do with the Axis Powers. . . .

[Dr. Miklos Kállay de Nagy Kálló was Hungarian Prime Minister from 1942-44, after having served as Minister of Agriculture in the Fascist cabinet of Goemboes from 1932-35. He was sent to Dachau concentration camp in 1944.]

Fortunately we never had any illusions about the Hungarians, so that now we are not disappointed. We shall merely make sure that no harm is done. . . . There can no longer be any talk of comradeship in arms, which the Hungarians love to prate about in their official speeches.

It is small comfort for me that everything I proposed in good time is now being done rather too late. First it was collecting woollen goods, now it is manpower. Suddenly all the influential officials are becoming much more open-minded about the question of drafting women for labour. The Russian civilian population, too, is to be drafted on a very large scale to work in Germany. That means, of course, they must be fed better than Russian prisoners have been so far. Also, of course, they must be given certain privileges, or their performance will not be satisfactory.

Winkler gave me a report on the film industry. A number of personnel questions must be discussed. The Finance Ministry is trying to soak us so hard with new taxes that it will hardly be possible to build up any capital reserves for post-war operations. But Winkler is a pretty shrewd financier himself, and knows more about these things than the bureaucrats in the Finance Ministry. He has already found an extraordinarily clever and original way out which will no doubt work successfully.

[Dr. Hermann Winkler, a German industrialist, was formerly democratic member of the Prussian diet. In 1933 he became a Nazi. He assisted in the Nazification of German newspapers; later Goebbels entrusted him with many of his ministry's financial deals, especially those connected with the film industry.]

Fortunately the destruction of works of art at Luebeck has not reached quite the proportions which we had at first feared. St. Mary's church has been completely destroyed, and with it the great organ, the altars, and the famous painting, "The Dance of Death." Only the little tabernacle and two paintings by Overbeck were salvaged from this church. Nothing could be saved from St. Peter's church. The Cathedral has been destroyed; only the altar by Memling and the "Cross of Triumph" by Bern Notker could be saved. St. Jacob's church, St. Catherine's church, and St. Ann's Museum are unharmed, and the City Library and archives have been saved. The Hospital of the Holy Ghost also remains unscathed. The Burg Gate and the Holsten Gate are still standing. St. Aegidia's church is only slightly damaged. The most important big patrician houses have all been destroyed.

We have received a secret report from the United States that, according to eyewitnesses, an extraordinarily bad situation obtains in the Soviet Union. Stalin can scarcely master the food problem; morale has sunk far below zero. The Soviet system can in fact only maintain itself by terrorism. I don't believe this report is too pessimistic.

Roosevelt has thought up a new kind of Christian propaganda for Easter. He compares Europe with the road to Golgotha, and claims that he of all people has been divinely ordained to protect Christianity against neo-paganism—this, of course, with the aid of those exceptionally Christian Soviets, who have distinguished themselves in the past by their religious fanaticism!

We must not place too great hopes on developments in France. I consider the French people sick and worm-eaten. No notable contributions towards the reconstruction of Europe can be expected from them. . . . Once again it has been proved that the Fuehrer's policy toward France has been absolutely right. The French must be put on ice. As soon as you flatter them, they misinterpret it. Keep them on tenterhooks, and they will see reason much sooner.

Observers in the United States report that there isn't the slightest enthusiasm for the war. Roosevelt has not succeeded in interesting the broad masses at all. At a press conference he has announced that he intends to engender enthusiasm by military parades. He might just as well have elephants march through the streets.

The Ministry of Justice is extremely offended that Freisler is not to be allowed to conduct the Grynspan trial and that Thierack is to take his place. When Schlegelberger heard the decision, he immediately protested to the Fuehrer. But the Fuehrer said "no", and stuck to his decision. This means we shall take charge of the political side of the trial while Thierack looks after the legal. In normal times, of course, the two under-secretaries of the Ministry of Justice would have to resign in view of such a decision. It is most desirable that they should, but they aren't thinking of it.

[Roland Freisler, under-secretary in the Ministry of Justice, had been a Communist before he turned Nazi. Hitler regarded him as a pedantic bureaucrat and refused to appoint him special judge for the trial of Herschel Grynzpan, who had killed vom Rath of the German Embassy in Paris. (See diary entry of February 11, 1942.) Dr. Schlegelberger was Under-secretary in the Ministry of Justice.

Freisler later became president of the People's Court, where his shouting and ranting at his victims became notorious. A newsreel of his behaviour in court was shown in Nuremberg during the war crimes trial.]

April 4, 1942

The English claim they dropped one-thousand-pound bombs on Luebeck. The damage is really enormous. I have been shown a newsreel of the destruction. It is horrible. One can well imagine how such an awful bombardment affects the population. Thank God, it is a North German population, which, on the whole, is much tougher than the Germans in the south or the southeast.

Nevertheless we can't get away from the fact that the English air raids have increased in scope and importance; if they can be continued for weeks on these lines, they might quite conceivably have a demoralizing effect on the population.

April 5, 1942

The Foreign Office still opposes publishing news about the torpedoing of Norwegian ships which were trying to go from Sweden to England. The Foreign Office claims that negotiations are under way which will make Swedish policy harden one way or the other. The Swedes seriously intend to resist actively if the British attack Sweden. It remains to be seen whether this will actually happen. In any case that is the impression they are now trying to give us. Consequently it is extraordinarily difficult to comment officially on their insolence in wanting to surrender the Norwegian ships under their control to the English.

I now consider it necessary to let the German public know the reasons for the daily and nightly air raids on Malta. Otherwise they will get the wrong impression from the reports about them which recur in every O.K.W. communiqué. We should frankly tell the German people that we are not interested in conquering Malta, but merely in interfering as far as possible with the supply lines for North Africa. Which is the truth, anyhow.

Dorothy Thompson delivered an absolutely insane speech against Hitler. It is humiliating and irritating that such idiotic females, whose brains can consist only of straw, have the right to speak at all in public against a historic figure of the greatness of the Fuehrer.

[Dorothy Thompson was a constant thorn in the Nazi flesh. She was one of very few American commentators who really knew Germany and the German language and mentality. She had studied at Vienna University and had been chief Central European correspondent of the Philadelphia Ledger and New York Evening Post, with headquarters in Berlin, from 1924–28.]

I am having a great deal of work preparing the Grynzpan trial. The Ministry of Justice has deemed it proper to supply the defendant, the Jew Grynzpan, with the argument of Article 175. [See note under February 25, 1942.] Grynzpan until now had always claimed, and rightly so, that he did not even know the Counsellor of Legation whom he shot. Now there is in existence some sort of anonymous letter by a Jewish refugee, which hints at the likelihood of homosexual intercourse between Grynzpan and vom Rath. It is an absurd, typically Jewish claim. The Ministry of Justice, however, did not hesitate to incorporate it in the indictment which was sent to the defendant.

This again shows how foolishly our legal experts have acted in this case, and how short-sighted it is to entrust any political matter whatsoever to the jurists.

I have proposed to the Fuehrer that he should forbid German soldiers to visit the Pope. These visits have really become a public danger. The Pope, of course, seizes every opportunity to receive German soldiers in order to impress them with the whole pomp of the Vatican's ceremony. Besides, the present Pope is clever enough to use these things for obvious propaganda. He speaks German fluently and his entire bearing creates the impression he desires on naïve soldiers, especially officers. That's why this evil must be stopped.

My campaign against black-marketeering is being very favourably received by the people. But the people insist that when such principles are proclaimed, the behaviour of persons prominent in political life should be made to accord with them.

[A jibe at Goering, Frick, many of the Gauleiters, Raeder, Brauchitsch, and others who were reported still to be living a life of luxury.]

April 6, 1942

Bose's propaganda, conducted and guided from here, is gradually getting on the nerves of the British. In their broadcasts they blame me especially for Bose's activity. It is evident that the English—as their history proves—always look for a scapegoat when their imperial policies, founded as they are on cynicism and brutality, run into difficulties. The Indians would be complete idiots if they allowed themselves to be influenced by empty British phrases.

Gandhi has broken into print. He published an interview against British exploitation, but can offer nothing as a counter-measure except passive resistance, which won't cause the English much trouble. Gandhi's policies have brought nothing but misfortune to India. Had these four hundred and fifty million people been led by an energetic nationalist, Indian politics, and especially the Indian freedom movement, would be much further advanced than they are today.

The Americans and the British are trying hard to interpret my last article as a sign that I am alarmed about morale inside Germany. But they are not having much luck with it as far as the public is concerned. Nations which survived World War I and are now on the point of surviving the second have no respect for diplomatic intrigues and misleading propaganda. They want to know exactly what's what and what is likely to happen. That's the main reason why my articles are as fascinating for Germans as they are for foreign readers. They state bluntly what we mean and talk a language which is otherwise rare in political circles. All the more reason why such language should be heard.

With Lieutenant Colonel Martin, who visited me for two days in my country home, I discussed the possibilities of camouflaging our impending offensive. Unfortunately the eyes of all international observers are turned towards the southern sector of our Eastern Front, in other words, to the very point where the first offensive action is to take place. The task of German propaganda will therefore consist of focusing international attention on either the central or northern front. It remains to be seen what chances we shall have to do so. We have already published a number of articles in military periodicals pointing out that possession of the capital is always the determining factor in war, but so far the opposition hasn't bitten on this.

I am now going to try to send Dr. Kriegk of the Nachtausgabe, a journalist well known in Germany, to the central Eastern Front for a week and after that dispatch him to Portugal with exact instructions. He is there to attempt to divert attention into another direction by spreading rumours. I don't know yet whether he will succeed, but in any case Kriegk is talkative enough to carry out a task of this kind with a certain virtuosity.

[Dr. Otto Kriegk, political commentator for Alfred Hugenberg's daily Nachtausgabe, was a loud-mouthed, boisterous, bulky journalist, who had been political adviser to Hugenberg and the German-National party, but became an ardent Nazi after 1933. The sequel to this venture in propaganda is recorded in the entries for May 20 and 21, 1942.]

April 7, 1942

From Lisbon we had news via Sweden that the internal situation in the Soviet Union is desperate. Hunger is rampant to an unimaginable degree. Unless Stalin soon achieves military successes on a huge scale, the Soviet system is doomed to collapse.

While I don't believe the situation is quite as dramatic as this, there is no doubt some truth in this analysis.

April 8, 1942

I complained to the O.K.W. about the O.K.M.'s exceptionally poor reporting on the British attack on St. Nazaire. They missed the bus here completely. . . . The O.K.M. is laying down its own independent news policy. Only Raeder knows everything that is happening within the Navy. The Fuehrer hears only part of it and others only a small part. That won't do. I am going to report this to the Fuehrer with the O.K.W.'s approval.

[The O.K.W. was the Supreme Command of the Wehrmacht; the O.K.M. (Oberkommando der Marine) was the Supreme Command of the Navy.]

The Foreign Office's news policy also leaves much to be desired. You can't base news policies on diplomatic considerations. It is simply unbearable that our own people should be the only ones in the world to know nothing about their own soldiers' successes. A drastic example of this is the sinking of a number of the Norwegian ships which left Sweden in the service of the English, and were torpedoed in the Skagerrak. The Foreign Office still sits on this news and won't even condescend to publish a perfectly objective item. Meanwhile even the last Bantu Negro knows what really happened. The German people alone are not in the know. By that sort of policy we are simply compelling the German public to listen to foreign and enemy broadcasts!

I have received a report by General von Falkenhausen about conditions in Belgium. . . . In my opinion Falkenhausen is not quite up to the task. What we need in Belgium is an energetic and uncompromising National Socialist. The political and military situation, however, for the moment prevents us from converting the military administration of the country into a civilian commissariat.

[General Alexander von Falkenhausen, born in 1878, was Military Commander of Belgium, but was dismissed by Hitler in 1944. He was arrested by the Gestapo after the July 20, 1944 attempt on the Fuehrer's life, but was liberated at the end of the war. Until 1938 he had been military adviser to Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek.]

which have hitherto been made for the solution of this problem, turned against the Indian political parties, declared that there was practically no chance of solution left, and voiced the opinion that England should establish direct connection with the Indian people, by-passing the parties. In his usual way, he clothed this rigorous and brutal plan in humane, religious phrases. It is perfectly clear what he really intends. He wants to subdue the Indian people and at the same time to make himself the mouthpiece for the Indian cause.

The Japanese Ambassador in Russia, who is going from Kuibyshev to Japan on leave, has given an interview about conditions in the Soviet Union. The picture which he draws seems quite true. He declared that the Russians are living under the most primitive conditions, are feeding solely on bread and pickles, but are nevertheless remaining firm, tough and confident of victory. All the difficulties of everyday life were overcome with the centuries-old philosophy of nitchevo.

[The Japanese Ambassador to Russia was General Yoshitsugu Tatekawa. In 1932 he had been Japan's military representative at the League of Nations in Geneva, and had also been chief of the General Staff.]

According to Lippert the situation in Greece is pretty desperate. The food situation has developed into a real catastrophe. Untold numbers of men and women are dying of hunger. The Italians have taken rigorous possession of the country and the Germans are only fifth wheels to the cart. We are certainly making great sacrifices to maintain the friendship of our southern ally on behalf of the Axis. The Greeks can hardly understand why we Germans are so liberal. They look on the Italians with open disgust and even contempt, and are more and more disposed to feel contempt for us also as allies of the Italians. We are in no position at present to make any moral conquests in Greece.

[Julius Lippert was formerly mayor of Berlin but quarrelled with Albert Speer about Berlin's building programme and was deposed by Hitler. Later he became an officer in the Army.]

Prostitution in Berlin is causing us trouble these days. During a raid we found that 15 per cent of all the women arrested had V.D. and most of these have syphilis. We must certainly do something about it at once. In the long run we cannot possibly avoid setting up a "red-light district" in the Reich capital like those in Hamburg, Nuremberg, and other large cities. You simply cannot organize and administer a city of four millions in accordance with the conceptions of bourgeois morality.

I spent the evening making the first draft of my speech for the Fuehrer's birthday. I work on it with special care, because I believe it will be especially important this year. It will help to strengthen love and confidence in the Fuehrer throughout the entire nation.

The Fuehrer is and always will be the central and focal point of our national life. Around him are centred the hopes of the entire people. As long as he is in our midst and in good health, nobody need worry about Germany's fate.

[Hitler was born on April 20, 1889, at Braunau-on-the-Inn, Austria.]

April 9, 1942

Knox, the American Secretary of the Navy, who, as is well remembered, used to open his mouth rather wide [der ja das Maul ein bisschen sehr voll nahm], before the war, has suddenly become extraordinarily reserved and modest. In general one can see that the Americans are trying hard to prepare their people gradually for the seriousness of the war and its consequences. Public opinion in the United States has become far more sceptical. The people as a whole have become greatly disillusioned.

I find it necessary to start a new campaign for greater politeness in public life. Our propaganda hitherto has not had the desired result. In the streets, in buses, in restaurants and theatres, extremely coarse language [ein Sauherdenton] has gradually become general. This is bad for the nerves and cannot be tolerated any longer.

April 11, 1942

A black day for the enemy. The Americans must admit they have evacuated Bataan. They now have nothing more to defend in the Philippines except Corregidor. . . .

The whole United States is in a turmoil. The halo they gave MacArthur is fading. We are naturally going to seize upon this opportunity. This much over-rated character, whom New York only a few days ago was still trying to sell as the outstanding genius of the century, will now be unmasked completely by our propaganda.

I have received confidential information that the Pope has appealed to the Spanish bishops to ensure in all circumstances that Spain stays out of the war. He supports his argument with humanitarian phrases. In reality he thereby gives expression to his enmity for the Axis. It is clearly nonsense for a spiritual and ecclesiastical power to meddle so much in political and military questions. After the war we shall have to see to it that, as far as our country is concerned at least, such attempts at interference are made impossible.

A new, heavy conflict with the O.K.H. has started. The successor of Colonel Hesse, Lieutenant Colonel Schwadtlo-Gesterding, arranged that Lieutenant Mansfeldt, who in private life is a publicity man for I. G. Farben, should deliver a speech to the P.K. men, which is really intolerable. According to Mansfeldt, P.K. war correspondents are only to report about the Army; if they see anything in a theatre of war which has been done by some other element of the Wehrmacht, they are to keep quiet about it.

[Colonel Hesse, Lieutenant Colonel Schwadtlo-Gesterding, and Lieutenant Mansfeldt were in the public relations department of the Supreme Army Command.

P.K. stands for Propaganda-Kompagnien, military companies of journalists. These correspondents were part of the Army and were not on the staff of newspapers. They could be sent to any war zone on Army orders; and many newspapers welcomed the arrangement because they had to pay no salaries to P.K.s]

I shall take energetic action about this and demand that the O.K.H. remove these two officers at once, since I have no intention of bothering with half-wits in the troublesome business of collaboration between the Propaganda Ministry and the Wehrmacht. I shall demand that in future only specially selected propagandists be placed in key positions; otherwise I cannot guarantee success for our joint endeavour.

Before his departure, Cripps admonished the Indian population to hold itself in readiness for its fight for liberation—a thing it will undoubtedly do, but in quite a different way from what Mr. Cripps had in mind. . . .

By and large, the failure of British diplomacy in India is an eloquent sign of the increasingly critical developments within the empire. As a result, pessimism in England is growing from hour to hour. One almost has the impression that a "Daemmerung" [twilight] of Parliament and Party may be at hand.

April 13, 1942

India is still in the forefront of the international situation. The British are now making earnest attempts to unload the blame for the breakdown of negotiations on the Indians themselves. That is childish and absurd, but corresponds exactly to the British character, which never finds faults with itself but always with others. London declares pompously that the Cripps mission has not been a failure. The gods only know where they can find success in it.

In the United States, they still haven't recovered from the heavy loss of equipment and prestige occasioned by the fall of Bataan. American pride and national sensitiveness received a heavy blow. The Jews acted somewhat prematurely when they inflated that movie hero MacArthur into a great general. You don't become a great general by letting members of the public wear your picture in their buttonholes—you have to achieve at least a couple of victories. MacArthur hardly seems able to produce one.

The Fuehrer approved my speech for his birthday without a single change and feels very happy about it. He especially liked the parallel I drew with the critical times of the Seven Years' War. My article against the "War of Paper" has also received his complete approval.

It is my opinion that existing evils within the Reich cannot be removed merely by propaganda and enlightenment. We must put more blood into our propaganda. I am going to try that in our campaign for greater politeness. This propaganda venture is to be given real substance by calling upon the public to help actively. I shall offer prizes, for instance, for the most polite traffic officer, the most polite official at the ration centres, the most polite waiter, etc. I shall make larger sums of money available for this campaign. Possibly the first prize might be 1,000 marks in cash. The public itself is to be the judge. By this method I hope to achieve more tangible results than by mere exhortations.

April 14, 1942

In the near future we intend to provide the Eastern Front with large quantities of mosquito netting. The mosquito plague was simply unbearable for the soldiers last summer. The O.K.W. has already made some preparations, but after my experiences in connection with supplying the troops with winter clothing I don't expect much of them. I am therefore having this matter looked into carefully, and if, as far as any human being can foresee, the measures they are undertaking are not sufficient, we shall help once again with a popular campaign. The Wehrmacht is not in a position to carry out improvisations of this kind.

The Grynspan trial is now to start in the middle of May. I still have a few preparations to make. The Department of Justice's preparations are not very clever psychologically. Thus, for instance, the problem of homosexuality, which really isn't under discussion, has been drawn into the trial procedure, and the question of Jewish evacuations is also to be dealt with publicly. I think this is about as clumsy as possible. . . . I shall see to it that these two questions are not raised in court at all. All the other preparations were made in accordance with my directives and, if they are carried out, will undoubtedly make the trial a complete success.

Gluttony in foreign missions here is creating a lot of bad blood. Thus a reception was recently held in the Croatian Legation at which a thousand of our people, prominent in state, Party, and Wehrmacht, stuffed their bellies. This is so unworthy and shameless that something must be done against it. I demanded that the Foreign Office should reduce diplomats' rations, and especially cut the allocation of petrol down drastically, since certain diplomats have recently been getting themselves "petrol girl-friends" with whom they go on week-end excursions into the country. This naturally causes severe criticism by the public. Diplomats should adjust themselves to the general usages of the country. They have no right to live the lives of drones at our expense, more especially when they represent powers which are fighting the war on our side.

The Americans have launched a naval building programme in the columns of the neutral press which is nothing short of grotesque. But we know what to think of American statistics. The Americans are trying to impress world public opinion by fantastic figures. The course of the war thus far has shown convincingly how little there is behind it!

Churchill delivered his speech in the House during the afternoon. . . . His language is exceptionally modest. He has, after all, nothing outstanding to report in the way of success, merely plenty of setbacks, defeats, and reverses. Nevertheless I don't believe that English morale is in any way rotten at the core. The English can stand a lot of beating before they become rebellious and notice things. Churchill certainly is the mouthpiece of the English people in so far as his imperturbability, his bragging, and even his naïve lying are concerned. The Englishman doesn't regard a lie as immoral; for him it is only a political weapon; if it seems opportune, he uses it cynically and unscrupulously.

The Japanese Ambassador in Kuibyshev, Tatekawa, who has returned to Tokyo, has made very favourable statements about internal conditions within the Soviet Union. These reports have been written for a definite purpose and do not therefore offend us. The Japanese have one or two things up their sleeve for the coming summer. They must create an alibi for themselves. They are following a very logical policy and diplomacy. That was proved by the example of America. One need have no doubts whatsoever concerning the loyalty of Japan toward her allies. If once in a while they make detours, this is done purely for tactical reasons.

Tatekawa spoke too loudly about conditions in the Soviet Union. Our Ambassador, Ott, objected, and as a result the Japanese Foreign Office has censured him and called him to order.

Almost no hopes are entertained for Corregidor. Even the Americans admit they can hold out for only a few days more. The situation there must be simply horrible. Meanwhile General MacArthur sits in Australia and issues fervent appeals to his troops—a thing that is possible only in America. We should by now be throwing stones at a general of that sort.

Interrogations of English prisoners of war at St. Nazaire indicate that our propaganda in England has been more effective than we imagined. The English pay more attention, however, to news than to argument. I conclude from this that all our foreign-language broadcasts, especially those beamed to England, must be changed fundamentally. This is no longer the time for long discussions. Just as during the fight of the National Socialist movement against the Republic there was a stage when the handbill was no longer effective because it was outmoded, so there is a stage now when argument is no longer effective. I am particularly stressing news in our foreign-language broadcasting services, but am seeing to it that news items are properly slanted.

I have received an exhaustive report about internal conditions in Sweden. Sentiment for the Reich has decreased. I believe the chief reason for this is our weak diplomacy. Of course it can't be denied that events in Norway are having considerable effect upon Swedish sentiment. The Church fight started by Terboven and Quisling seems as superfluous to me as a goitre.

The English had intended to establish a connection with the eastern theatre of war through Sweden. But the Swedes are determined to take arms against anybody who attacks their territory. That, at least, is what they say today. It would have been better if we had taken Sweden, too, during our campaign in the north. This state has no right to national existence anyway.

The situation in Vichy has now been clarified enough to show that in all likelihood Laval will enter the government in a few days as Prime Minister. This is a tremendous advantage for us, and for that reason it is causing alarm in London and in Washington. In any case, France under Laval, even though he is personally most unsympathetic, is far more acceptable than a France of attentisme, with which you never know where you are.

Von Neurath visited me. He feels rather on the shelf at a time when he is enjoying the best of health. His attitude toward the Fuehrer is most loyal. All in all, von Neurath is a gentleman, who has never been guilty of incorrectness or disloyalty toward the Fuehrer. The next time I report to the Fuehrer, I shall tell him about this visit. Perhaps the Fuehrer will see a new possibility for making use of him.

Vikt or Lutze visited me and aired many complaints. He is an unfortunate character. Everywhere he offends people, everywhere he criticizes and grumbles. He neglects the work nearest to hand and occupies his time instead with all sorts of nonsense which has no relation to the war at all. Everywhere he suspects filth and treachery, everywhere he feels that his S.A. has been put in the shade, and that he, personally, is being left in the cold. But meanwhile he arranges for meeting Gauleiter Wagner, whom we have dismissed, keeps up his personal contact with Brauchitsch, etc. I hardly think he can be helped.

Naturally I once more appealed most emphatically to him. He realizes that the course he is pursuing is wrong; but heaven alone knows how long the effect of my admonitions will last. It is too bad about this old, doughty Party comrade and disciple of the Fuehrer. He has got into the wrong hands, and doesn't possess sufficient intelligence and strength of character to withstand harmful suggestions. I shall keep him under further observation.

Laval's appointment as Prime Minister is the principal theme of the Anglo-American press. Our enemies realize that important consequences may result from this change in the course of French politics. For this reason Laval is being insulted and called the worst possible names. He is called the Quisling of France, traitor to the Anglo-American cause, and the like. Anger in the United States and England is very great.

Roosevelt delivered a speech in which he said the war was likely to last two or three years. Nevertheless he still believes firmly in victory. His arguments to support this view are very thin and without substance.

The transport situation at Easter appears to have been nothing short of horrible. My decree had no real effect because the railway administration did everything possible to annul it quietly. Conditions in the trains were simply indescribable. It is high time for the head of the Transport Ministry to be changed. Old Dorpmueller has neither the technical nor personal qualifications to master our communication and transport problems.

[Dr. Julius Dorpmueller, Minister of Communications and Transport, was retained by Hitler, even though he was not a Nazi, because of his expert knowledge of railways. What probably irked Goebbels was the fact that such a key position was not in the hands of an orthodox Party member.

Dorpmueller was a survivor from the Bruening and Papen cabinets. At private parties he often made fun of Nazi leaders; some years earlier a gang of radical Nazis, at Goebbels' instigation, marched into Dorpmueller's offices, demanding his resignation. Hitler, however, stepped in and insisted on retaining his Transport Minister, who, as head of the German railways, could boast of being the largest single employer of labour in Europe.]

Our arms and munitions situation is exceptionally strained. On the other side, however, things are undoubtedly the same. Nevertheless there is cause for some alarm. Unfortunately there was much neglect in this respect; we took the matter of arms and munitions production far too lightly and now have to pay for it.

The United States has already cut off its charities for France. There are pious Christians for you! They sing anthems when they want to subjugate small peoples, but the moment something doesn't quite suit them they throw their Christianity and their Bible overboard, and revert to their aboriginal instincts of a hyena-like greed for booty.

I had a long talk with the director of the Ministry of Justice, and made it clear to him that it is the function of Justice, especially during a war, to serve the leaders of the people and not vice versa. The Ministry of Justice very much regrets not having closer contact with political leaders during the war, especially with the Fuehrer. I indicated my willingness to establish this liaison. I shall now direct my attention more to the administration of law. Mere criticism won't change anything; one must attempt to do one's best with the existing forces, as they cannot be changed anyhow. In any case, the gentlemen of the Ministry of Justice are quite willing and ready to follow a legal course that will ally them more closely with the people; they must, however, be told what is wanted, and I shall certainly do this in no uncertain manner.

[By a "legal course that will ally them more closely with the people," Goebbels really means mob law. He consistently advocated justice based on the "healthy common sense" (gesunden Menschenverstand) of the people. Instigated by Party headquarters, Nazis would often march to a court of law and demand "justice."]

I also had a long talk with Dr. Ley. He told me his impressions of sentiment among the people and showed that he had some pretty strong illusions; I cured him effectively of these. Dr. Ley hasn't the faintest inkling of what's happening among the people, although he is constantly travelling about among plants and factories. He pursues a policy of self-deception which, if it became general, would someday bitterly avenge itself. I consider it my duty to open his eyes, and did so very successfully.

He also told me a lot of details about Party happenings, especially the case of the demoted Gauleiter Josef Wagner, which was entirely mishandled when it reached the Reich Investigation and Arbitration Committee. Judge Buch looks at matters of this kind from a purely juridical point of view. This, however, was eminently a political question. No wonder the Fuehrer was in a rage about the verdict and expressed his determination not to take it into account in any way! That's right. Why should the Fuehrer, as the Party's leader of the German people, bother about the Investigation and Arbitration Committee? Judges are the same everywhere, whether they are active in the state or in Party life! A jurist seems predestined to falsify and confuse every case that is perfectly clear and straightforward.

[Josef Wagner (1889-1945), who is not to be confused with Robert Wagner mentioned in the entry for April 15, above, was Gauleiter and governor of Silesia until 1940, when he was dismissed by Hitler. He was also Price Commissioner at the time. He was not regarded as radical enough by the Fuehrer. Wagner was executed early in 1945 for complicity in the plot to remove Hitler. Von Hassell speaks favourably of him in his Diaries.

The Reich Investigation and Arbitration Committee was a Party organization and handled cases of Party members only. Its presiding judge was Walter Buch. Ordinarily Hitler respected its findings.]

Speculation in London and Washington concerning the appointment of Laval continues. He is developing into the most sensational and mysterious personality of present-day international politics. The enemy powers worry more and more about him: They already have visions of the French Fleet operating in the Mediterranean with the Italian and German fleets. They see Malta and Alexandria lost, etc. The appointment of Rundstedt as supreme commander in the West also elicits great interest. It has only just become known to the enemy.

I received a report written by Davies, the former United States Ambassador in Moscow, entitled, "What we did not know about Russia." It is extraordinarily favourable to the Soviet Union. Davies has a very high opinion of the ability of the Bolsheviks to resist. The Bolshevik leaders, headed by Stalin, are described as true friends of the people. Obviously Potemkin villages were shown to this gentleman.

[When Catherine II visited the Crimea in 1787, the governor general for the southern Russian provinces, Prince Gregory Potemkin, had fake villages, complete with happy dancing villagers, erected along the way, thereby greatly impressing the Empress with his achievements. Joseph E. Davies was U.S. Ambassador to Russia from 1936 to 1938. In 1942 President Roosevelt sent him on a special mission to Stalin.]

The Daily Express has published a report on sentiment in the United States. According to it, the Americans are at present anything but friendly to England. England is blamed for having let the United States slide into this war. The British correspondent states with resignation that one can hardly discover a single friend of England in the United States. I believe, on the whole, that is true. The Americans are bound to be furious with the British who concocted this soup and are now asking the Americans to eat it. I am taking no notice in German propoganda of controversies between England and America. They should develop of their own accord.

Magda visited a hospital in the afternoon. Unfortunately conditions there are none too good. The head physician seems unable to handle the wounded right, so their morale is pretty low. I am going to take a hand and see that things are changed. The wounded have a right to proper psychological, as well as physical, treatment.

At the northern end of the central Eastern Front the Bolsheviks have been indulging in some curious loud-speaker propoganda: they announced that they would attack in four days. Once before the enemy made known his intentions in this way and then actually launched the attack. One just doesn't know what to make of this queer conception of propoganda. For the enemy the net result was that his losses were all the greater.

Lieutenant Colonel Martin reported information reaching him from officer levels on the Eastern Front. It appears that my articles in the Reich are at present the most popular material for discussion on the entire front. Officers and soldiers agree that my articles point up the situation with rare realism and that the impression is as though I were there among the soldiers to record their sentiments so accurately and clearly. This is a very encouraging proof of the close contact existing between our ministry and the front. It shows that we are not surrounded by a Chinese wall but that, on the contrary, we know exactly what's what, where the shoe pinches our soldiers, and what must be said to them so that they won't lose confidence in the leadership of the Reich and the state.

From the interior of the country I have received similar reports. It fills one with joy at so critical a time still to have the ear of the people.

The Americans are being insolent to the French. They declare that Leahy will be withdrawn for good. Welles has handed press representatives a communiqué that fairly bristles with insults and threatens the French so provocatively that he himself must realize it can achieve very little. The Frenchmen would have to be eunuchs to consider such gangster threats.

A merry fight has broken out in Australia about MacArthur's jurisdiction. The Americans would like to give him the supreme command without any strings attached, but the Australians don't seem very much inclined to approve. It appears they have seen through this American movie general with his somewhat unmilitary propaganda methods. In any case, the Americans' political and military prestige has sunk very low. You just can't conduct war with nice words alone. You must be able to record victories, and the Americans at present have exceptionally little to offer.

I had a little set-to with Gauleiter Buerckel who is again trying to push his plan for creating a new cultural office which would not come under the Reich propaganda office. I won't permit that. Such procedure would be absolutely senseless, especially now in wartime, when there is such a chronic lack of manpower.

[Joseph Buerckel was Gauleiter for the Saar region which the Nazis renamed Gau Westmark.]

Mutschmann is having a fight with the mayor of Dresden, who is pursuing plans of his own about the theatre. I am going to order him and Mayor Nieland to come to me and will give them both a piece of my mind.

[Martin Mutschmann was Gauleiter of Saxony.]

Thank God, it now develops that the O.K.H. has made proper preparations for mosquito netting and scarves for the coming summer period in the East. At least in this respect they have learned something from their failures last winter.

April 20, 1942

All signs indicate that the American public is extremely disappointed at the course of the war. It had expected much more from what Mr. Knox advertised a few months ago as the "beginning of the shooting war". The Americans are therefore bragging about millions of soldiers whom they are training by all rules of the book for every theatre of war. It would be better if some tens of thousands of these soldiers were already in the war zones where fighting is actually taking place, and not on alleged training fields where you merely practise playing at war.

The French Cabinet shift still elicits great interest throughout the world. We continue to maintain our reserve on the subject. The Americans have to some extent come to their senses. They are going to leave Leahy in Vichy after all. The reason advanced is that his wife has fallen ill. Plutocratic government must have an excuse for everything; however, it is still put forward.

[In fact, Admiral Leahy's wife was gravely ill and died soon afterwards. The admiral returned to America on June 1, 1942.]

The latest act of sabotage [in France]—against a German military train, resulting in several deaths—will be punished with severe reprisals. The number of people to be shot will be doubled, and over a thousand Communists and Jews will be put into goods vans and shipped East. There they will soon cease to see any fun in disturbing Germany's policies for order in Europe.

Gandhi gave an interview in which he once again urged non-resistance. He is a fool whose policies seem merely calculated to drag India further and further into misfortune.

The birthday of the Fuehrer was celebrated in the late afternoon by an impressive demonstration in the Berlin Philharmonic Hall. All who have rank or power in the state, the Party, and the Wehrmacht, were assembled there. The remainder of the Hall was reserved for soldiers, wounded, and munition workers. It was a very dignified and solemn occasion. The celebration began with the air from Bach's suite in D-Major. My speech . . . met with great approval. . . .

In the evening, Goering issued a birthday proclamation to the German people in which he paid tribute to the personality of the Fuehrer in very dignified language.

Unfortunately my health at present is none too good. The eczema caused by nerves is giving me a good deal of trouble. I shall have to relax for two or three weeks to recover.

How happy we may all be that winter is now finally over! The worst worries it brought are past. That doesn't mean that we are without worries, but with the sun brightening every prospect, we can again consider how we stand and where we are going. Soon we shall have to move into new territory in our military activity. For a moment one shrinks back and again calculates the dangers and risks involved. But experience teaches that once the first step—always the hardest—has been taken, the second and third follow automatically. Then the march into the future really develops.

April 21, 1942

The military commander in France has adopted more stringent measures on account of the railway sabotage on April 16. Thirty hostages (Jews and persons close to the perpetrators) are to be shot instead of the twenty originally intended. If the perpetrators are not caught within three days, an additional eighty will be shot and a thousand Jews and Communists (instead of the five hundred originally proposed) will be deported eastward.

The English are at present in a very difficult military position. The Bolsheviks are demanding more of them than they are at present ready or even able to give. So they have to do a lot of bragging. This causes us a certain embarrassment since we consider it better not to deny the crazily exaggerated reports they issue about the success of British air raids. The German people, of course, are quite aware of the "efficacy" of these air attacks. When, for example, the English claim they have destroyed and ruined the Ruhr region almost completely, everybody knows this is a stupid and obvious lie with which to impress the Bolsheviks. When, on the other hand, our exceedingly heavy air raids on Malta are represented by the English as fun for the Maltese population, that merely shows with what cynicism the London plutocrats fight their war.

We have received a report from a deserter from Leningrad, according to which conditions there must be simply catastrophic. Even though there may be some exaggerations, the food situation in this city of millions apparently cries to high heaven. The deserter claimed that more than a million people had already died of hunger. That may not be true, but nevertheless tens and hundreds of thousands of human beings are living there in dire and most unbearable distress. The deserter claimed that a great part of the population was now feeding on so-called human flesh jelly, made of the flesh of dead or fallen citizens and soldiers. The whole report is so revolting that it makes one's stomach turn to read it.

The De Gaullists and Communists claim—and they are not entirely wrong—that Laval was earlier involved in French corruption scandals and is not qualified to represent France in the New Europe. To us, that is a matter of indifference. We could hardly find a better man than Laval for our policies. . . . We shall probably have to pay him something if he fulfils the hopes we place in him. But first it is for him to show what he can do.

During the night another fatal attempt was made on the life of a German soldier in Paris. The reprisals are very severe. Ten hostages are being shot, five hundred Communists, De Gaullists, and Jews shipped to an eastern labour camp, the curfew hour is being set much earlier, and theatres, cinemas and places of amusement closed altogether. I am insistent that at last we publish in advance the names of all hostages who are to be shot (die schussreif sind). By doing so we will at least ensure that the relatives and friends who usually stem from the same circles as the perpetrators bestir themselves and at least try to find the culprit. The military commander in Paris is quite ready to adopt my suggestion. For the present, however, he has no hostages, and will first have to look around for some.

Marshall and Hopkins, who have returned to the United States, fairly outdo each other bragging. They issue insane figures about production, and claim that within three months activities will have begun on the continent. The only thing they were still worried about was the scarcity of shipping space. I see in these Anglo-American threats nothing but an attempt to frighten us. By telling such tales they would like to induce us to leave as many troops as possible in the West. They think they are thereby making an effective contribution to the Bolshevik war. That, of course, is a calculation which they have made without consulting us. We shall determine for ourselves what we need for the West; indeed the Fuehrer did so long ago. No changes need be made in this respect. Enough is concentrated there to beat back immediately any Anglo-American attempts to gain a foothold on the continent.

Willkie wants to take control of the Republican party. No doubt this corruptible character has lost all credit with the Republican voters.

[The fact that Wendell Willkie had German ancestors but nevertheless vigorously opposed the Nazis meant but one thing to Goebbels: obviously Willkie had been bribed by the Allies.]

April 23, 1942

Neutral reporters indicate that London is full of rumours about invasions in both directions. Churchill is certainly thinking up desperate measures to galvanize the English public.

All reports from the United States agree that there isn't a spark of enthusiasm for war to be seen there. That explains why Willkie in the Republican committee meeting demanded a more aggressive policy.

We have received amazing reports about conditions in Kuibyshev. Hell has broken loose. One can understand, of course, that Stalin is having very serious difficulties about food. The loss of the Ukraine cannot be dismissed simply with a wave of the hand. While the disastrous results of this loss will have their full impact only later, it is nevertheless inescapable.

It is reported from the United States that the Americans have declared our patents void. That fits their mentality exactly. I have the impression anyway that the Americans participate in a European war every quarter of a century in order to be able to seize as cheaply and easily as possible whatever cultural work has been done in Europe. The American continent is hardly in a position to achieve anything of its own in the cultural realm. It is dependent upon imports from Europe, and as the Americans are so crazy about money they naturally like to grab the results of our creative and inventive labours without paying for them whenever they can.

The Metropolitan Opera [in New York] has been closed. And that happens in a country that has only a single opera and whose leaders are insolent enough to wage war on behalf of the European culture which we are supposed to be threatening! We certainly live in a crazy world.

That a man like Willkie in America today can stir up feeling in favour of war even more violently than Roosevelt is a further sign of America's moral decadence. I suppose it is chiefly due to Jewish leadership.

Former Democratic Reichstag Deputy Lemmer, who is now a foreign correspondent in Berlin, accompanied Oshima on a trip to the southeast. From his detailed report we gather that Oshima spoke extremely eloquently in favour of Axis policies. Oshima behaved very cleverly and tactfully. He made no bones about his opinions, especially not about being pro-German, and thereby achieved great successes both in Bucharest and Budapest. At the moment Oshima is engaged in clearing away a large number of misunderstandings which are prevalent in Tokyo about conditions inside Germany. Oshima is really one of the most successful champions of Axis policies. A monument ought later to be erected in his honour in Germany. To this man we chiefly owe the fact that Japan took a hand in the present conflict.

[Ernst Lemmer during the Nazi regime was correspondent for Hungarian and Swiss newspapers. He is now co-chairman with Jakob Kaiser of the Christian-Democratic Union party of Berlin.]

My articles are described as being exceptionally effective. The article about the "War of Paper" has indeed wrought a veritable miracle. My definition of grumbling as the "soul moving its bowels"—so I am informed by the S.D. service—has already become a household word throughout the nation.

Sweden and Switzerland still have not formally joined the International Moving Picture Association. I am now having these two states boycotted by not supplying them with raw material. They will soon begin to feel the effects of acting in such an aloof way.

Italian films in Germany are earning the Italians much more money than our German films get for us in Italy. That fact is gradually causing us some foreign-exchange difficulties. The U.F.A. has worked up a new export plan whereby we can gradually lay our hands on all Italian film exports in Europe. I hope the Italians fall for it.

Gauleiter Grohé of Cologne reported to me about the sentiment in the western provinces. He has taken over his new duties as Reich Defence Commissar which are a great responsibility. Sentiment, he says, is absolutely consolidated and unified. Even British air raids have been unable to change the attitude of the population much. Grohé declared—and undoubtedly he is absolutely right—that the unfavourable reports on morale sent to Berlin do not correspond with the facts. The people who wrote them did not have sufficient ability to estimate public opinion correctly. His estimate of morale agrees fairly well with my own experience.

[Joseph Grohé, Gauleiter of Cologne, was a voluble Old Guard Nazi who stuck up posters all over Cologne just before the victorious entry of the American troops, in which he admonished every inhabitant of the city to remain at his post, come what might. He himself, however, led the procession of Nazi office-holders who crossed the Rhine in a panic at the last moment, abandoning the city to its fate.]

The number of [Russian] deserters is on the increase although the Bolsheviks have heard about executions, exposure to freezing, and bad treatment in our prisoner-of-war camps and are therefore afraid of German imprisonment. The Bolsheviks made clever use of such information. For instance, they gathered together soldiers who had returned from German imprisonment in schools where they were briefly indoctrinated and then sent round various troop elements to deliver lectures about the cruel treatment of prisoners by the Germans. Instructions have now been issued by us for better treatment of Soviet prisoners and for differentiation between the treatment of deserters and of real prisoners.

It is clear that Churchill is again playing an extraordinarily insolent and impudent game. He can dare play it only with the English population. We would have to beware of doing anything like it to the German people. For instance, if in the autumn of 1940 we had advertised an invasion of the British Isles with equal noise and publicity but without having planned it and knowing that it could not be executed, the effect on our propaganda would have been nothing short of disastrous. The British can do a thing like that. The British people are like children; in addition they have the limitless patience of sheep. They put up with having the invasion theme played again and again without compelling Churchill to justify it.

Unfortunately we were rather behind the times in connection with the English undertaking at Boulogne. The reason, of course, was that the motor-cycle rider who was to bring the report to the Army Group command point had an accident. As a result the English had a few hours' start, and experience shows that whoever speaks the first word to the world is always right.

[British Commandos on April 22 raided Boulogne, withdrawing after a two-hour engagement. It was intended as a foray only, but Goebbels' Ministry did its best to claim that a major attempt at invasion had been repelled.]

I have received statistics about the number of Jews in the American radio, film, and press industries. The percentage is truly terrifying. Jews are 100 per cent in control of films, and 90 to 95 per cent of the press and radio.

That fact explains the confused spiritual conduct of the war by the enemy. The Jews are not always as clever as they would like themselves to believe. Whenever they are in danger they prove to be excessively stupid.

To put a damper on public indignation Roosevelt has announced he intended to tax war profits very highly. On the other hand the dividends declared by the American munitions industry simply make your hair stand on end. Our prognosis regarding this war is surely right. It is being conducted by the capitalists of all countries against the German social commonwealth. Should the latter—as is not to be envisaged—lose the war, the world would relapse into the darkest social reaction.

Dorpmueller during his conversation with Gutterer, was insolent about me. This old man, to whom we owe the fact that transport difficulties during the past winter almost got the better of us and who in 1933 was accepted into our regime only as a gesture of grace and charity, now dares to get cheeky [pampig] just before reaching retirement age. But I shall finish him off all right.

The Fuehrer telephoned me from G.H.Q. He has now at last decided to deliver the speech, which has been planned for some time, before the Reichstag concerning the situation and all the conclusions which he must draw from it.

We deliberated as to which day would be most suitable, and agreed that the Reichstag is to be summoned for 3 P.M. next Sunday.

I immediately made the necessary preparations and am very glad that the Fuehrer is coming to Berlin for a few days. He gave me an exceptionally optimistic picture of the situation along the various fronts. He himself is in the best of health. Naturally we cannot go into details over the telephone because there is always the danger of being overheard. I am always happy when the Fuehrer comes to Berlin because I can then have several long talks with him.

The evening brought me a lot of work accumulated from the afternoon. You need only leave your desk a few hours to find it snowed under when you return. I hope at the end of the coming week to be able to go to Lanke and relax for a short time. That is absolutely necessary. My health leaves much to be desired at present, and I believe I shall need health more than anything else during the difficult months ahead.

April 25, 1942

The Japanese Ambassador in Kuibyshev, General Tatekawa, now reports rather differently about internal conditions in the Soviet Union. It appears that rose-tinted spectacles were put on him in Kuibyshev and have now been taken off again in Tokyo.

In the United States they are continuing to bore away at the British world empire. Roosevelt makes no bones about his appetite for India. The Indians in a bellicose declaration turn against these American attempts at penetration.

Our Admiralty has energetically denied the allegation that the air defences did not function properly during the last raid on Kiel, in the course of which several battleships and the Monte Sarmiento were seriously damaged. This denial by the naval command is not very convincing. The leadership of the German Navy isn't what it ought to be. There is too much praying going on there and not enough work.

[Grand Admiral Erich Raeder was a staunch Protestant.]

Field Marshal General von Mackensen again pleaded with me to lift the ban on the Christian weekly, The Best Friend. I have sent repeated warnings to this paper, but in view of the delicate character of this request I shall refer the whole matter to the Fuehrer at the next possible opportunity.

I had a long talk with Governor General Dr. Frank. He described conditions in the General Government. They are extremely complicated. Dr. Frank and his collaborators have succeeded absolutely in balancing the budget of the General Government. He is already squeezing all sorts of money out there. The food situation, too, has been brought into equilibrium. Frank is convinced that much more could be got out of the General Government. Unfortunately we lack manpower everywhere to carry out tasks like these. He must get along with a minimum of help.

[Hanns Frank, Governor General of Occupied Poland, had defended Hitler during his numerous political trials under the Weimar Republic. Hitler at first rewarded him by making him Reich Leader of the Legal Profession and president of a newly founded Academy of Law. While Governor General of Poland he acted like an oriental potentate. He wrote a diary of some sixty volumes which proved highly incriminating at Nuremberg where he was hanged for atrocities against the Jews.]

An article appeared in the Nationalzeitung of Bern written by the publisher . . . in which he pointed out that it is owing chiefly to the arguments which I have kept repeating over and over again that of all nations the German people has the most realistic attitude towards the war. He is quite right about that!

The inhabitants of the Ukraine were at first more than inclined to regard the Fuehrer as the saviour of Europe and to welcome the German Wehrmacht most cordially. This attitude has changed completely in the course of months. We have hit the Russians, and especially the Ukrainians, too hard on the head with our manner of dealing with them. A clout on the head is not always a convincing argument—and that goes, too, for the Ukrainians and Russians.

During the evening we had a little party at home and I had an opportunity to speak at length and alone to the daughter of the Duce and wife of the Italian Foreign Minister, Countess Ciano. In contrast to previous visits, she impressed me this time as exceptionally serious and earnest. She is extremely intelligent and when one talks to her at length, she reveals herself as the real daughter of her father.

I explained our view of the general situation. From her replies I gathered that the Italians pin all their hopes on the success of our impending summer offensive. As things stand, the Italians cannot be expected to last through an endless continuation of the war. Not that they have become tired of it, but the difficulties and worries of war naturally grow at a much faster pace with them than with us.

April 26, 1942

The British are publicizing their last air raid on Rostock in the grand manner. It has been, it must be admitted, pretty disastrous. The anti-aircraft didn't function properly so that damage to public buildings was more extensive than in all other English air raids since Luebeck.

I sent a couple of robust journalists into occupied France with an assignment to give proper press treatment to undertakings such as that of Boulogne. Our reporting hitherto has been too dry and therefore could not compete with the flowery reports of Reuters. To impress the English you must present an undertaking of that kind more as though it were a sporting event. You must not limit yourself to a mere rehearsal of facts but must fill out the data with details to which the English and especially the Americans are known to be very susceptible.

It appears that British air raids on German cities are not taken as seriously by the Bolsheviks as the English would like. They have now chosen the expression "to luebeck" in place of the expression "to coventrize" invented by us. We are going to do everything possible to prevent this expression from being used in international terminology.

An English periodical has given expression to deepest pessimism on the part of the British Empire politicians. The low morale and even the actual collapse of the British world empire are described in so drastic a manner as to leave nothing to be desired. We ourselves could not give better expression to it. One almost has the impression that the writer of the article had cleverly assembled the ideas laid down in my Reich articles.

All Reich departments affected are now in favour of new regulations for the employment of labour from the East. In the long run we cannot solicit additional workers from the East if we treat them like animals within the Reich. They must, after all, receive at least enough food and clothing to retain their capacity for work. Everybody is now in complete agreement about this.

The Fuehrer arrived in Berlin at noon. I immediately had a talk with him. He looks wonderfully healthy and is in the best spiritual and physical condition. However, he is in extremely bad humour about the poor anti-aircraft defence at Rostock which caused him endless worry. The Luftwaffe wasn't adequately prepared and this alone made the damage to the Heinkel works possible.

[The Heinkel factories at Rostock and Travemuende were among the most important aeroplane producers in Germany.]

In addition, the Fuehrer is in a black rage about the escape of General Giraud, whom we still haven't succeeded in recapturing. He agrees that the press should take a hand in the search for him, and offers a reward of 100,000 marks for his capture. Anybody who extends aid and protection to him is to be punished by death. Giraud is extraordinarily dangerous.

If he succeeds in fleeing to England, he will surely replace General de Gaulle, who is of weak spiritual and moral calibre. This would be very embarrassing, for the French émigré movement suffers at present, thank God, from not having any real head. General Giraud succeeded in escaping from German imprisonment once before, in World War I. He refused to give his word of honour not to escape. That ought to have been double reason for the guards to keep a most careful eye on him, but this seems not to have been the case, for otherwise he could not have escaped. That is what enraged the Fuehrer, and rightly so. Let us hope that Giraud may still be recaptured. One report via Vichy claims that he has already escaped over the Swiss border, but this is as yet unconfirmed.

The Navy's building activities do not meet with the Fuehrer's approval. For a long time he has demanded that the "Strength-through-Joy" steamers should be converted into aircraft carriers. The Navy declined, claiming this was impossible, whereas the Americans and English are now carrying out such rebuilding with playful ease. Anyway, the Navy is about as unmodern as anything can be. It has no leadership of any calibre, and therefore does not exhaust the possibilities that present themselves. And inventions which are offered to the Navy are used only sparingly.

In this connection the Fuehrer expressed the opinion that the state should buy up every invention even though it cannot be used for the moment. Inventions must never be sold to foreign countries. Unfortunate experiences in World War I ought really to deter us from irresponsible treatment of German inventive genius. The tank was invented by a German-Austrian, but was then sold to England because there was no interest in it in Germany. The state must be much more careful in this matter. But just as you cannot expect a cow to lay eggs, so you cannot expect a bureaucrat to look after the interests of the state properly in such matters.

In judging our possibilities [for an offensive in the East] the Fuehrer is exceptionally optimistic. He has received very depressing reports about internal conditions in the Soviet Union. They have nothing to eat, they live from hand to mouth, and the population feeds on bread and pickles. The soldiers' equipment is said to be the poorest imaginable. There are heaps of examples and proofs of the widespread eating of human flesh not only by the Bolshevik Army, but also by civilians.

As things now stand the offensive can begin in the not-too-far-distant future. Possibly the weather god is anxious to make amends for some of the things he did to us.

The Fuehrer devoted an extended chapter of our talk to the vegetarian question. He believes more than ever that meat-eating is harmful to humanity. Of course he knows that during the war we cannot completely reverse our food system. After the war, however, he intends to tackle this problem also. He may be right. Certainly his arguments are very compelling. It is actually true that the great majority of humanity is living a vegetarian life and that animals which live on plants have much greater powers of resistance than those that feed on meat. It is also significant that human beings, generally speaking, eat only the meat of animals which themselves feed on plants rather than on those which are carnivorous.

The Fuehrer's dominating thought is his joy at the majestic coming of spring. He tells me that never before in all his life has he awaited it with such fervour. During the coming years he never wants to see snow again; it has become physically repulsive to him—as I can well understand.

As regards the French, the Fuehrer is of the opinion, as before, that we shall never come to a friendly agreement with them. Talk about collaboration is intended only for the moment. He wants to see deeds before words. However the war may end, France will have to pay dearly, for she caused and started it. She is now being thrown back to her borders of A.D. 1500. This means that Burgundy will again become part of the Reich. We shall thereby win a province that so far as beauty and wealth are concerned compares more than favourably with any other German province.

[Hitler had always regarded it as axiomatic that France and Germany were "hereditary enemies" (Erbfeinde) and despised the Briand-Stresemann policy of rapprochement. The plan for annexing Burgundy has not, as far as this editor is aware, been publicly referred to elsewhere.]

Last night the heaviest air attack yet launched had the seaport of Rostock once again as its objective. Tremendous damage is reported. During the morning hours no exact estimate can be made, as all long-distance communication with Rostock has been interrupted. But reports from all sides agree that Gauleiter Hildebrandt initiated rescue measures in a model manner and that he is master of the situation. Seventy per cent of all houses in the centre of Rostock are said to have been destroyed.

I now consider it absolutely essential that we continue with our rigorous reprisal raids. I also agree that not much is to be accomplished with raids on munition centres. Like the English, we must attack centres of culture, especially those which have only little anti-aircraft. Such centres should be attacked two or three times in succession and levelled to the ground; then the English probably will no longer find pleasure in trying to frighten us by their terror attacks.

London continues to harp on the theme of invasion, but no longer with the same pep and enthusiasm as last week. Our reaction has already taken effect. The English have got cold feet. We continue to act insolently and arrogantly and thereby spoil the intended effect of this English war of nerves.

It is reported that the English have already stationed demolition squads in the Caucasus. That's exactly like them! They have proved themselves throughout the world to be great destroyers of other people's property. History would lose its meaning if the Englishmen were not beaten decisively in this war.

At noon I had lunch with the Fuehrer. He is very angry about the latest English attack on Rostock. But he also gave me a few figures about our attack on Bath, according to which ours on Bath must have been much more extensive than the English raid on Rostock. The Fuehrer declared that he would repeat these raids night after night until the English were sick and tired of terror attacks. He shares my opinion absolutely that cultural centres, health resorts, and civilian cities must be attacked now; there the psychological effect is much stronger, and at the present moment that is the most important thing.

The munitions industry, he said, cannot be interfered with effectively by air raids. We learned that lesson during our raids on English armament centres in the autumn of 1940, and had a similar experience when, vice versa, the English attacked German munitions plants. Usually the prescribed targets are not hit; often the fliers unload their bombs on fields camouflaged as plants; and in both countries the armaments industry is so decentralized that the armament potential cannot really be interfered with. Our task now must be to reply to terror with terror and to respond to the attempted destruction of German centres of culture by razing English cultural shrines to the ground. That is now to be done on the biggest scale possible. The Fuehrer has already given orders for preparing and working out such a plan of attack on a long-range schedule. The English, I suppose, will be surprised when this undertaking is launched on a big scale. There is no other way of bringing the English to their senses. They belong to a class of human beings with whom you can talk only after you have first knocked out their teeth.

In that connection the Fuehrer talked in favour of a much more drastic conduct of the war and politics. That will be the main theme of his speech before the Reichstag this afternoon. He complained bitterly of General Giraud's success in escaping. It was possible only because of the negligence and carelessness of the guards. The old reserve officers who are in command of prisoner-of-war camps suffer from a false humanitarianism [eine falsche Humanitaetsduselei] for which we are now paying dearly, as in this case.

I talked to the Fuehrer once more in detail about the Jewish question. His attitude is unrelenting. He wants, in all circumstances, to push the Jews out of Europe. That is right. The Jews have brought so much misery to our continent that the severest punishment meted out to them is still too mild.

Our military command [in Paris], even since the new man has been installed there, is proving quite inadequate and especially unapproachable regarding my work. In the long run it makes me tired always to have to bother with the same problem, the ABC, so to speak, of propaganda. I shall now attain my goal via Jodl, who seems quite amenable about these problems. We shall simply have to do things by command that cannot be put through by friendly suggestion.

[Colonel General Alfred Jodl was Hitler's personal military Chief of Staff. When taken prisoner at Flensburg in May 1945, he was carefully carrying Hitler's last secret military orders in his brief-case, saying they should be preserved for posterity. He was hanged at Nuremberg as a major war criminal.]

The Reichstag convened at 3 P.M. It presented the familiar old picture. Many uniforms; also several wounded among the deputies. There was an atmosphere of great tension.

Shortly before the session began I got hold of Dorpmueller once more and gave him a good tongue-lashing. [Ich kaufe mir noch einmal Dorpmueller und stauche ihn nach allen Regeln der Kunst zusammen.] He became very modest. He will be quite surprised at what the Fuehrer will have to say about the "beneficial" work of his Ministry.

After a brief introduction by Goering the Fuehrer spoke. He was in good form, even though he spoke rather haltingly at first. He told me after his speech that he felt rather numb. The terrific physical and spiritual exertions which he had to make during the winter have taken their toll after all.

Soon, however, he became fired with enthusiasm. His initial hesitation was overcome. His somewhat rapid manner of speaking, which made him rather difficult to understand during the first passages, soon ceased, and he went on to give the German people and the world a report on the past winter that had a truly shattering effect. . . .

He began with the origins of the war and analysed the British Empire and the reasons for its progressive collapse. He criticized Churchill in a superior and extraordinarily ingenious manner. The Fuehrer contrasted what the English consider as encouraging in their defeats with what we believe to be encouraging in our victories. To this contrast the Reichstag replied with stormy expressions of hilarity.

The generals were put in their place, but this only appeared between the lines. He also spoke of individuals who failed at critical moments and lost their nerve. In this connection the Fuehrer demanded absolute plenary powers during wartime for himself to do whatever he considers necessary, even with reference to individuals, without having to take into consideration any so-called well-earned rights. This demand was approved enthusiastically and noisily by the Reichstag. . . .

In the speech of the Fuehrer's I see nothing but complete vindication of the psychological line I took through the entire winter. . . . All in all, the Fuehrer delivered one of his best speeches.

Goering then introduced the new bill giving the Fuehrer full powers to remove officials and judges whenever he considers it necessary and when this is demanded by the exigencies of our war effort. The new law was passed unanimously by the Reichstag amid stormy salvos of applause.

After the speech I had another long conversation with the Fuehrer. He was very happy to have talked himself out. I reported to him what effect his speech had had as I could judge it sitting in the Reichstag. He is now determined to proceed very drastically, especially in the administration of justice, which he regards as being out of contact with the people. He won't put up with anything more from that quarter. I cited several examples of their way of administering justice, which are merely a corroboration of the correctness of his course. The Fuehrer is also determined to invoke sharper measures against certain types of armchair generals and against the bureaucracy as a whole.

We embarked on a long discussion of the importance and value of well-conducted propaganda. So far as propaganda is concerned, the Fuehrer has no criticism whatever to offer.

The Fuehrer told me that the condition of his health was such that he simply must take three months' leave sometime. But when, how, and where can he go on holiday? He realizes himself that it can't be done. And yet he is distinctly overworked. Thank God, at least he will now go to the Obersalzberg for a few days, even though it be for important talks with the Duce. The Obersalzberg always has a soothing effect on him. The Fuehrer must now be very careful about his health. For this reason we installed no spotlights in the Reichstag. There is always the danger that he might suffer a dangerous collapse during a very severe strain.

It is touching to hear the Fuehrer express his wish that he may be privileged to live to see the day of victory. The visions he has of the coming peace are truly intoxicating. God grant that we may be permitted to enter upon that period! Then the restrictions under which we live and work today will, for the most part, disappear like a nightmare. But for the present we don't want to think about it.

The air raid last night on Rostock was even more devastating than those before. Community life there is practically at an end. . . The situation in the city is in some sections catastrophic.

I gave orders to have handbills printed with pictures of the damage done by the English in Luebeck and Rostock, and, under them, the Fuehrer's announcement of his Reichstag speech that reprisal raids are coming. These handbills are to be dropped in great quantities over the English cities that are to be attacked. I expect quite a psychological effect from this.

The Fuehrer's speech is in the foreground of world discussion. The English and Americans are making convulsive attempts to deny that it has any importance. Insofar as they express any opinion about it, they infer a far-reaching internal crisis, owing to differences partly between the people and the leadership, and partly between the Fuehrer and the generals. . . . The charge that the Fuehrer was nervous is absolute nonsense. Unfortunately Goering, in his opening and closing remarks, spoke very indistinctly and haltingly and thereby showed a certain lack of assurance. . . .

In the United States, astrologists are at work prophesying an early end for the Fuehrer. We know that type of work as we have often done it ourselves. We shall take up our astrological propaganda again as soon as possible. I expect quite a little to result from it, especially in the United States and England.

The latest S.D. report does not yet deal with the Fuehrer's speech. But it does speak of the exceptionally deep impression created among the German people by our celebration of the Fuehrer's birthday in the Philharmonic Hall. The speech I delivered there was received exceptionally well and favourably everywhere.

Ministerialrat Seiffert and the liaison officer from the Research Office, Severith, reported to me about the work of the Research Office. This work is very extensive, uses all modern technical gadgets, and manages to pick all sorts of secret information from the enemy news services. Above all it has proved possible to break down most of the enemy codes, so that we can today spy to a certain extent on telegraphic communications between Ankara and London or between Moscow and London. The results are to be laid before me regularly in future. One can draw a number of important conclusions from it. Naturally the work must be kept exceptionally secret, or its effectiveness will be wasted. The English, incidentally, are exceedingly careless in these matters. I hope that isn't equally true of our secret communications. For if the English know as much about us as we know about them the consequences might be very serious.

In the course of the day we learnt that the effect of the Fuehrer's speech at home was much more favourable than we had at first supposed. Latest reports from the Reich propaganda offices are unanimous in conveying that impression. Unfortunately Goering's opening and closing remarks were rather badly received. Their tone was too careless and too little adapted to the seriousness of the occasion. I shall tell Goering about this when the occasion presents itself.

Thirty high explosive and one thousand incendiary bombs (according to other reports fifty high explosive and several thousand incendiary bombs) were dropped on Cologne. The fires started within the municipal area and spread rapidly because of a strong wind. Some residential sections were burned out completely. About a hundred fires were started, among them twenty of great magnitude. They included fires in the Finance Office in the old part of the city, in the harbour, the town hall, a bank, five churches, two hospitals, and one chassis factory. One factory of the Kloeckner firm was completely destroyed.

The political scene is still dominated by the Fuehrer's Reichstag speech. . . . All past lies, dating back to times of peace and war, are warmed up again with new adornments. The conclusion arrived at is that the Fuehrer's speech represents, as it were, the cry of a drowning man. To think what the enemy countries can make of a turn of speech that in itself is harmless! For instance, the dressing down which Justice received is exaggerated into a gigantic internal revolution. As though the judges had the ambition and the ability to start a revolution in the Reich! Ten per cent of the lowest officials of the N.S.V. would be sufficient to quell it.

[The National-Sozialistische Volkswohlfahrt, or National Socialist People's Welfare, was an institution which collected vast sums for welfare purposes; a large part of its takings were, however, regularly diverted to war purposes.]

Molotov issued a new atrocity note to the world powers. In it there has been gathered together almost everything that can be said about us in the way of lies. It is very comprehensive and is intended especially for the populations in the areas we occupy.

I received a report on the situation in Finland. Things there are anything but satisfactory. But the fighting morale of the Finns is entirely unbroken. The Finns are determined, with their accustomed vigour, in all circumstances to continue the war. Their losses of men are enormous. It is especially regrettable that, when an entire Finnish regiment is liquidated, this usually means that the entire male population of villages or even cities is eliminated. The Finns are a very courageous and heroic people.

Roosevelt has addressed a message to Congress. It is rather colourless and deals mainly with economic problems. But in contrast to his pompous speeches before the entry of the United States into the war he, too, must now admit the seriousness of the situation. There are no more signs of rosy optimism.

The S.D. gave me a police report on conditions in the East. The danger of the Partisans in the occupied areas continues to exist in unmitigated intensity. They have caused us very great difficulties during the winter, and these by no means ceased with the beginning of spring. Short shrift is made of the Jews in all eastern occupied areas. Tens of thousands of them are being liquidated.

The new slogan, "Land for the Peasants!" appealed especially strongly to the rural population. We could have achieved this success much earlier if we had been cleverer and more farsighted. But we were geared altogether too much to a brief campaign and saw victory so close to our very eyes that we thought it unnecessary to bother about psychological questions of this sort. What we then missed we must now attempt to catch up with the hard way.

I received a new report about the effect of the Fuehrer's speech on the German people. There has, after all, been some objection. Although trust in the Fuehrer continues undiminished, nevertheless the German people are asking, in surprise, why he had to be granted new plenary powers and what reasons might have guided him to castigate and criticize domestic conditions thus publicly. Unfortunately one cannot very well explain these reasons in public. But the people always ask questions of that sort.

There is also some scepticism about the military situation. Above all, since the Fuehrer spoke of a second winter campaign in the East, people believe that he, too, is not convinced that the war against the Soviet Union can be finished this summer.

The questions raised by the Fuehrer's speech are very numerous. In one sense the address has spread a feeling of insecurity. The people want especially to know what the Fuehrer now intends to do to improve the conditions he criticized and to call to account the people responsible for them. Undoubtedly speeches frequently draw such psychological consequences in their wake. The main thing is that the people have been made to realize the seriousness of the situation and on the whole are aware that it is now a question of to be or not to be.

A report from the Reich Health Office goes into elaborate detail to prove that the food rations authorized at present are not sufficient to maintain a normal state of health. We know that! I notice it in my own case. But there is no alternative. If we lost the war, the rations at our disposal would suffice even less to keep up the health of the German people.

During the Ministerial Conference I objected strenuously to the increasing craze for the primitive in some departments of my ministry. It is nonsense, without any compelling reasons, to want to cut out things belonging to normal civilian life. Thus, for instance, the Schwarze Korps recently wrote an article against barbers. Now, really, we cannot run about with hair like the apostles! Nor is it a crime if ladies have their fingernails attended to so long as there is sufficient personnel for that purpose!

Waechter presented his plans for a great anti-Soviet exhibition in the Berlin Lustgarten. It promises to be an event of the first magnitude and to show the justification for our war against the Soviet Union. Of course I am going to see to it that nothing is included that might in any way be an advertisement for Bolshevism.

April 30, 1942

Of thirty-five aeroplanes flying into the Reich, twenty attacked the city of Kiel and dropped fifty high explosive and two thousand incendiary bombs. According to latest reports seven persons were killed, twenty-one wounded seriously, and nine lightly. Strong winds again spread the flames considerably, setting many houses on fire in about thirty streets. Thirty houses were totally destroyed, thirty-two damaged heavily, and ninety lightly. The patients from two burning [private] hospitals were immediately carried into the city hospital.

Apparently opinion in England about air warfare is by no means unanimous. An American officer has reported that the English have poor, over-aged machines, and that they can only hope to accomplish real results with American equipment.

In recent air raids on Germany the English have been using some extraordinarily dangerous phosphorous incendiary bombs which they drop over rural areas. As a result cattle have already been set on fire in various places. Although this method of fighting has not yet assumed large proportions, it is nevertheless a cause for anxiety.

The English have appealed once again to Vichy France. They have still not given up hope of possibly winning Laval over to their cause.

Roosevelt has delivered another "fireside chat" to his people. He also appealed to the French. His speech was simply dripping with hypocrisy. It is an interesting footnote that part of his speech was addressed to the German and Italian people. Evidently he intends to make up for what British propaganda has missed and to prove himself a skilful pupil of Wilson.

I have received a detailed report from Hildebrandt about conditions in Rostock. Seven-tenths of the city have been wiped out. More than 100,000 people had to be evacuated. It is now becoming clear that the success the English have been having with their air raids is due in some measure to sabotage by foreign workers. A detailed inquiry by the police is being conducted into this and we await the result with some curiosity. Unquestionably, there is an element of danger in the presence of such large contingents of foreign workers. In the event of panic, such people must be carefully watched. At Rostock, there was, in fact, panic; in all probability it was stirred up by the Poles.

Vichy would very much like to conclude a separate peace with us. But the Fuehrer is undoubtedly right in refusing. France would never consider such a separate peace binding if we were defeated; but if we win, France would insist upon observing it. The amputation of France would be practically out of the question. At best the French would be ready to cede Alsace to us; even in the case of Lorraine they would create the greatest difficulties. One might well ask in such circumstances why we had a war with France at all. If the French knew what the Fuehrer is one day going to demand of them, their eyes would probably fill with tears. It is just as well for the present to say nothing about this and to try and get as much as we can out of French attentisme.

The Fuehrer wants to cut short his holiday on the Obersalzberg. Nature has very thoughtfully covered it with snow. That, of course, is the very milieu for the Fuehrer to have during a few days' rest! He told me again during his last visit to Berlin that he would be physically unable to look at snow again for the next two years. And now, unfortunately, he must change his plans for no better reason.

Several British Members of Parliament have demanded that some sort of gentlemen's agreement should be concluded with the Reich to prevent further attacks on cultural monuments. The British Deputy Premier, Attlee, refused the proposal. We had not really expected the British Government to entertain such an idea. But it is very significant that the British people consider this question much more realistically now than they did eight days ago. They are suddenly beginning to realize that they are not attacking a defenceless country, but one which, despite the severe strain on our Luftwaffe in the east as well as in the Mediterranean, still has reserve power enough left to pay back the English in full for what they are doing.

The American craze for statistics is being met with great distrust in London, according to a whole series of confidential reports. The British do not think much of the Yankees, and regard them as people who open their mouths wide but do little else.

Significantly enough, the stock market in London is on the upward grade, whereas in the United States it is falling. The rise in stocks in London is because the English are really hoping for an Italian collapse, whereas in the United States the Jews on the New York Stock Exchange know just how to differentiate between truth and propaganda in estimating the American war effort.

For the present we are refusing to discuss Giraud's escape into unoccupied France. Our Ambassador, Abetz, has been ordered to demand that Laval should exert pressure on Giraud to return to German captivity of his own accord. Certainly this attempt must be made, but I don't expect much of it.

The commander of the fortress at Koenigstein really deserved to be shot. Through his neglect, the German Reich has been so seriously harmed that he should by rights be punished with death. He can consider himself lucky that I am not the one to decide his fate.

The Fuehrer has approved my draft for his telegram to the German people for May 1. It is an exceptionally compelling and far-reaching declaration in favour of a people's social state and will be excellent for our propaganda at home. For the first time we can record the fact that the Fuehrer is committing himself so completely about the future aims of the National Socialist state.

I have ordered official censorship to be imposed on foreign correspondents' reports on the air situation. The English are naturally making frantic efforts to obtain information about the results of their raids. We cannot be expected to support their efforts.

The phrase, "Baedeker attacks", is playing an important role in English commentaries. Unfortunately, one of the gentlemen in our own Foreign Office invented this phrase and thereby did us tremendous damage. I censured this in the sharpest terms and took measures to prevent the repetition of such folly.

[The culprit was Baron Braun von Stumm, of the Foreign Office press department.]

Incidentally, London now admits that intense damage has been done in Bath, Norwich, and other English cities which we have attacked. There is talk about scenes like those at Coventry. That's the sort of music we like to hear. Certainly the German Luftwaffe and German propaganda between them have succeeded within scarcely two weeks in changing the entire situation.

Burma is regarded as a total loss by the English. Both in London and in the United States there is great pessimism about this. Communications between the English and the Chinese have been broken off. That is an irreparable blow to Chiang Kai-shek. Some English critics even claim that this is the decisive event of the war in East Asia. They may be right.

Stalin has treated his henchmen to a May Day appeal. His arguments are nothing short of insane. He claims that we are neither Socialists nor Nationalists but simply aggressors. According to him we are fighting only in the interests of our bankers, and the German people must now see the war through so that plutocrats on our side may make more money. The whole appeal is so frothy that nothing can be done with it. It is hardly worth arguing about.

Paltzo has presented me with a report on conditions in the Ukraine. In this report Koch complained bitterly about the ineptitude of the Ministry for Eastern Affairs. In that department plans are being hatched for the far distant future, whereas in reality the problems of to-day are so urgent that they cannot be postponed. The Ministry is inept because it contains too many theoreticians and too few practical men. Every sectional chief builds up his department as he himself pleases. Rosenberg himself is a pure theorist, and it is quite evident that he must have constant clashes with a man of such pronounced action and brute force as Koch.

[Erich Koch, Gauleiter for East Prussia, was made Reich Commissioner for the occupied Ukraine by Hitler, and as such, was responsible to Alfred Rosenberg, the Minister for the Eastern Areas. Joachim Paltzo was head of the propaganda office for East Prussia and an old colleague of Koch's.]

Koch asked me to support him in propaganda matters and stated that our work was the only thing which had so far helped his difficult task in the Ukraine.

As regards food, we must not expect too much in the immediate future. German troops have devoured everything there. There are no cattle left and there is a dearth of horses and other draft animals, so that the ploughs are once again having to be drawn by human beings. It is not hard to imagine the results. It is no good possessing land unless you can work it.

I received a report about the present position of [German] agriculture which is far from encouraging. There is a dearth of seeds, of manpower, of petrol, horses, cattle, good weather—in short of just about everything essential to guarantee sufficient food. It may be necessary next autumn to tighten our belts still further.

We are much worried by what an exceptionally large number of doctors have fallen on the Eastern Front. It is imperative that measures be taken to prevent this. I appealed to the Fuehrer. We simply cannot let our quota of doctors, which is already very small indeed, and hardly sufficient to insure our health, shrink still further.

The Fuehrer was very angry about the draft of Ley's appeal for May 1. He was especially annoyed by the style, which was like that of a schoolboy. The Fuehrer sent word to me that he really does not propose to become a schoolmaster at this stage. I would please take a hand in future and see that such exercises are not submitted to him until they comply with the most elementary rules of grammar.

[Dr. Robert Ley, whose cultural attainments are here revealed, was Reichsleiter of the Political Division of the Nazi party, and was therefore of Cabinet rank. All political leaders came under him; he was also leader of the Labour Front.]

I received detailed information about the Fuehrer's meeting with the Duce. The Fuehrer is exceedingly happy about it. Nothing unfavourable transpired. The meeting took place in perfect harmony.

In the afternoon I was able to go out to Lanke. The weather has become very cool again. Spring just doesn't seem to want to appear. That is nothing short of catastrophic for our harvest prospects. What we need is warm rain followed by sunshine. Instead of that it neither rains nor will the sun shine. Sometimes one is tempted to despair.

The London commentary on the Fuehrer's meeting with the Duce proves how wrong the English mentality is about German-Italian relations. The Duce, as for years past, is again described as the Fuehrer's Gauleiter. They are trying to sow discord between the Reich and Italy, but doing it in such a stupid and childish way that each line reveals the uncertainty of present English policy.

The English now admit heavy destruction at Norwich. It is as I thought from the beginning—they can't hold their tongues about such a difficult question. Two or three days later, they always talk, as this example shows.

Great mass demonstrations for neutrality have taken place in Argentina. We shall have to handle Argentina very, very carefully in our comments. It may become extremely important for future developments in South America.

There have been two more attempts to kill German soldiers in France; also a large-scale attempt on an army leave train which resulted in almost twenty deaths. Severe reprisals were taken. But again our military commander did not have the initiative to publish the names of the Communists, Jews, and De Gaullists who were to be shot. That means that our countermeasures are again rather meaningless and futile. I am now going to appeal personally to the Fuehrer and insist upon my view.

Otherwise nothing of consequence happened on May 2, which was set aside as a national holiday instead of May 1. Ley delivered a pretty unfortunate speech on the present position of Labour in the Mosaic Hall of the Reich Chancellery. Every time he opens his mouth, he puts his foot in it.

All the film producers have been visiting me. In the evening we saw an American Technicolor picture, Swanee River, which gave me an opportunity to make a number of observations on the creation of a new German film based on folksongs. The fact of the matter is that the Americans know how to take their relatively small stock of culture, and, by up-to-date treatment, to make of it something which is very à propos for the present time. We are loaded down far too heavily with tradition and piety. We hesitate to modernise our cultural heritage. It therefore remains purely a matter of history or for the museums, and is at best understood by groups within the Party, the Hitler Youth, or the Labour Service. The cultural heritage of our past can only be made fruitful for the present if we present it with modern technique. We shall have to do something about it. The Americans have only a few Negro songs, but they present them so topically that they conquer large parts of the modern world which is, of course, much attracted by such melodies. We have a much greater fund of cultural assets, but we have neither the artistry nor the mind to modernize them. That must be changed.

The [Japanese] government won 81 per cent of all votes cast. That means, practically, that [political] parties in Japan have ceased to exist. Tojo's tactics were exceptionally clever. Even the fact that he called the Japanese people to the polls at this time was acute. By a skilful move on the chess-board he eliminated the very thing that always stood in Konoye's way—the paramount supremacy of the parties, behind which stood the industrial concerns and trusts. Japan is on the direct road toward an authoritarian regime camouflaged as a parliamentary one. Every state creates that sort of regime after its own fashion. This form is suited to the Japanese mentality.

Rostock is a gruesome picture of destruction. I am informed that its centre is more than seventy per cent destroyed. Incidentally, it was exceedingly unwise of the Foreign Office to make it possible for Countess Ciano to visit Luebeck and Rostock, of all places. Anything more foolish can hardly be imagined. The effect, of course, was what one would expect. Countess Ciano visited us in Schwanenwerder on Saturday afternoon and described her experiences on that trip. It was obvious that she had been deeply shocked. Her wish to see areas destroyed by air action should have been side-stepped adroitly and her trip restricted, say, to Hamburg and Bremen. In fact she visited these cities also and there, of course, received the best possible impression. One can never entrust tasks of this kind to our diplomats. The Foreign Office gentlemen busy themselves a great deal with propaganda, but have absolutely no faculty for calculating psychological effects in advance. To make matters worse, the Italian Ambassador's wife and a number of ladies-in-waiting at the Italian court accompanied Countess Ciano. They will, of course, not hesitate to spread their observations about in every way they can among aristocratic and monarchist circles in Rome. Then it won't be long before it reaches the English. I am having a thorough investigation made into this case and am going to protest to the Fuehrer that such embarrassing happenings must not recur.

Naturally the effects of bomb warfare are horrible when considered as individual cases. But one must make the best of it. Besides, these female amateur politicians haven't enough imagination to envisage the other side of the picture. More particularly, they have not seen the English cities that were raided by us. Nor have they brains enough to take the general world situation into account and thus realize that bomb warfare is only a single episode. Women who dabble in politics are always a nuisance.

Negotiations with the French Government about the fate of General Giraud have achieved nothing. An attempt will now be made either to persuade Giraud to return to German imprisonment, or to obtain his word of honour that he will not place himself at de Gaulle's disposal. I take a sceptical view of the outcome, since I am sure Giraud has no intention of pledging himself in any way. Were he to do so, it would almost be a miracle.

The weather remains terrible, and fatal for our harvest. Still neither rain nor sun and the temperature has gone down again. If this continues, the crops will be an utter failure.

Lieutenant Colonel Scherff of G.H.Q. has sent me a compilation of quotations on the nature of genius by great Germans. It has been assembled very cleverly. Scherff presented it to the Fuehrer for his birthday. These quotations are very comforting in judging the present situation. Taken as a whole they almost give one the impression of an apotheosis of the Fuehrer. One cannot imagine a more complete justification of his nature, his personality, and his actions.

[Lieutenant Colonel Walter Scherff was attached to Hitler's G.H.Q. to write the official history of the war.]

Reports from East Asia give us more details about Japanese victories in Burma. Mandalay, unfortunately, has been completely destroyed. The English are bragging about this. They are always quick to destroy other people's property. This time that is London's sole consolation, for from an operational or strategic standpoint the setback suffered in Burma is nothing short of fatal.

Cripps delivered a speech about his mission to India. It was disarmingly harmless and naïve. I consider this man insanely over-estimated—one more indication of the chronic lack of leadership from which England is at present suffering. Among the blind, the one-eyed man is king.

The English report that they almost captured Rommel. This is unfortunately true. Rommel is altogether too careless about his life and security. It would be a terrible national misfortune if he were captured by the English. He should be advised to move about more circumspectly. In any case I shall make sure that the German people learn absolutely nothing about such a possibility; they would otherwise be very much disquieted.

In Norway eighteen spies and persons in communication with England have been shot. These executions have had a very sobering effect on the Norwegians. They seemed to imagine that we should never do anything but threaten. Now they know that in wartime there is very little consideration for the life of the individual, especially when he is an enemy. I hope these executions will have their effect in changing the attitude of the Norwegian population. If they don't want to learn to love us they must at least fear us.

Molotov's atrocity note was distributed in large quantities both within Soviet territory as well as in the areas we occupy. While it was not well designed for foreign consumption, it will nevertheless not be without effect domestically. We shall reply with a massive flood of our own handbills, aimed to neutralize any unfavourable effect it might have.

Our eastern campaign would long ago have succeeded if we had to do with a civilized people; but the Russians are quite unpredictable. They show a capacity for suffering that is simply impossible for others. The men at present in control of the Soviet Union are well aware of that and make their plans for the summer accordingly.

In the Netherlands, too, seventy-nine executions have taken place. They were of spies and messengers to England who thought the patience of the German occupation troops and of the Reich Commissariat was such that they could play their nefarious game with impunity. They have now been given an energetic lesson.

General Giraud, it transpires, reached the Swiss border with an ordinary railway ticket and while en route even talked at length with a German officer about the condition of our tank army in North Africa.

The food situation is becoming increasingly critical as the bad weather continues. The scarcity of fats which we are soon going to have to put up with will be an exceedingly dangerous shortage; allocations will probably soon have to be considerably reduced again. In my opinion that will tremendously lower morale. It won't help matters either that we may possibly be able to increase the meat rations slightly. Our present meat reserves come from our having had to slaughter a lot of cattle because of the lack of fodder.

In long, tedious sentences, the English are trying to show how and why they have a right to occupy Madagascar. It is a veritable witches' Sabbath of democratic logic. The enemy hardly attempts in any way to gloss over this flagrant violation of international law.

Corregidor has capitulated and the Americans admit it. The loss of this island fortress has come as a shock to the United States. There is deep mourning throughout the country. As a marginal note it should be recorded that General MacArthur, a sort of national hero in the United States, took a hand in the controversy in a most loud-mouthed way from Australia—whereas he in fact has every reason to keep quiet. He declared that under his leadership Corregidor would be recaptured. Of course he doesn't divulge how he intends to bring this about.

Another whole series of attempted assassinations has been made in France. I have proposed most urgently to the military commander that he should requisition all or at least most of the bicycles in cities where such attempts occur. In most cases the assailant sneaks up to his victim on a bicycle. Besides, bicycles are now an indispensable means of communication in France. Requisitioning them would be an extraordinarily severe punishment. But as my proposal is so good, the military commander will inevitably fail to appreciate it. I am therefore turning it over to General Jodl as a precaution, so that it may reach the Military Commander in the form of an order.

Switzerland has recalled her representative in the International Motion Picture Association. It looks as though this stinking little state [dieser kleine Dreckstaat!] is trying deliberately to provoke the International Motion Picture Association. I am going to insist that the Association respond with a general boycott.

The Fuehrer did not accept my proposal for an appreciable reduction in the diplomats' rations. He believes that their good rations are one reason why they report so favourably on Germany. I can't quite believe this and am going to try once more to present my viewpoint to the Fuehrer.

At Lanke I must pay a great deal of attention to my ailment. It gives me a lot of bother. The itch has become almost unbearable. The cure is most annoying. I can hardly sleep. My health is pretty poor. The doctors tell me, however, that once I have gone through this period, things will be better. Let's hope so.

Churchill himself took the floor concerning Madagascar. He spoke in the House of Commons and issued pompous reports on the war like a victorious field marshal. This man is a real ogre. He is brimful of lies and bumptiousness. The British Empire will owe its collapse to him.

Vichy already admits the retreat of the French troops [in Madagascar]. I feared from the very beginning that the French could not and possibly would not offer any notable resistance. France's world empire is on the point of collapse. Democracies are simply not in a position to hold vast empires together. It can only be done with the kind of authoritative, determined, and definite leadership, which is discernible neither in England nor France.

Exceptionally happy news came during the night about a great Japanese naval victory in the Coral Sea. The battle is still in progress. This, of course, means that the Anglo-Saxon East Asiatic fleet has sustained an irreparable loss.

The Foreign Office had intended to allow Belgian children to be sent to Switzerland. I forbade this. The Swiss are doing this merely to advertise themselves and to influence the children along their lines. Anyway, only five hundred children are concerned. If the Swiss really want to do something, they should send food to the Belgians.

The Giraud case has been taken out of the diplomats' hands and given back to the military. The Fuehrer has given orders that proper reprisals are to be taken against French prisoners of war in Germany.

I have proposed to the O.K.W. that since Giraud got out of his German prison illegally, he should be brought back again illegally. This could be done very easily. Half a dozen picked S.D. men could be sent into unoccupied France, observe Giraud there for a few days, shove him head over heels into a car, and drive him across into the occupied area. We should then have him again. There would be an outcry for forty-eight hours in the enemy press, but that happens whatever we do.

My proposal to confiscate about 10,000 bicycles in occupied France as a reprisal for every attempt at assassination has been given a very favourable reception in the O.K.W. This not only enables us to inflict a heavy punishment on the French, but we can also make excellent use of the bicycles for our own troops. I think this reprisal will soon be effective. It shows once again that punishment must be thought up and meted out with an intelligence which our military authorities completely lack.

The churches continue to raise trouble. The best way to handle it is to ignore them.

Roever has issued a circular letter stating that he will not become honorary godfather to children whose parents are still church members. Roever is a boor [ein Tolpatsch]; sometimes he acts like a bull in a china shop.

[Carl Roever, one of the oldest Party members, was Gauleiter for Oldenburg.]

May 9, 1942

I am having much trouble with the lack of discipline in Berlin. That's what happens when I am not on the spot. Nevertheless, I must now carry through my cure and rid myself of that infernal itch at last. I hope that I can accomplish this in a fortnight. The healing process, thank God, is going on nicely.

May 10, 1942

Fear about Australia is tremendous in the enemy camp. It is expected that the Japanese may attempt an invasion of Australia on the completion of this battle [Coral Sea]. Personally, I don't believe this will happen.

News policy is a weapon of war. Its purpose is to wage war and not to give out information.

Eden insolently declared that it is England's intention and her mission to lead the Europe of the future. He indulges in most impudent insults to National Socialism and the Fuehrer. Eden is a hollow brain and need not be taken seriously. England, he claims, intends to form police troops to keep Europe in order. There can be no question whatever, he said, of peace with Hitler. The question really is whether Hitler is willing to conclude peace with him.

Australian stocks are going down on all exchanges—a proof that no one has much confidence in Australia's future.

The Americans are trying to get their share of the swag and to match the English rape of Madagascar by sneaking up on the French possessions in Martinique. They give the windiest of arguments for their procedure. But we are used to that with Anglo-Saxon governments. Once again they are being humane and liberal; they are only taking control of these possessions on behalf of the real France, etc. Behind all these resounding phrases there is the naked greed of imperialist robber nations trying to compensate themselves for what they have lost elsewhere.

[Martinique was restored to France and given the status of a department of France as from January 1, 1947.]

The Bolsheviks are now dropping forged handbills over the German front which are supposed to have been issued by the Party or the Propaganda Ministry. They are phrased very cleverly, in that they imitate our slang and contain only two or three dangerous points. I have arranged for the O.K.W. to explain the danger of these leaflets to the troops.

Schach reported to me on questions regarding the gau of Berlin. We must again tackle the Jewish problem. There are still 40,000 Jews in Berlin and despite the heavy blows dealt them they are still insolent and aggressive. It is exceedingly difficult to send them off to the East because many of them work in munitions factories and Jews are to be evacuated only in whole families.

[Gerhard Schach was Goebbels' chief assistant in his capacity as Gauleiter of Berlin.]

I hear confidentially that Mussolini has had a talk with the Indian nationalist leader Bose, in the course of which he pleaded for Bose to appear more conspicuously and especially to set up a counter-government. We don't like this idea very much, since we do not think the time has yet come for such a political manoeuvre. It does appear, though, that the Japanese are very eager for some such step. However, émigré governments must not live too long in a vacuum. Unless they have some actuality to support them, they only really exist in the realm of theory.

Our progress near Kerch is extraordinary. The Fuehrer is highly satisfied with the present state of things. These operations afford us an interesting insight into the power of resistance still available to the Bolsheviks. According to our experience at Kerch it must be considered greater than had generally been supposed.

The most extreme reports of successes [on the Eastern Front] come from London, whereas the Bolsheviks are significantly silent. It must be said that the Bolshevik news policy, despite everything, is more decent than the Anglo-American. In the democracies the lie has become unavoidable. It is a principle of democracy to spread false reports under the guise of free speech.

In Paris an assault was made on our short-wave radio station "Alois". Unfortunately it was successful. Two transmission plants were destroyed. As a result very serious reprisals are necessary. The military commander asked me whether he should requisition all wireless sets throughout occupied France. I don't regard this as a happy thought, for we should thereby sacrifice our own possibilities for propaganda. He accepted my proposal to requisition sets individually, that is, to take them, to begin with, from enemies of the state. In that connection I urged him most seriously to prepare dependable lists of persons in communication with England and enemies of our policies, so that we may always have hostages available for arrest.

The weather is still exceptionally fine. But that causes no pleasure, since we need rain so badly. Our harvest prospects could not be worse. Unless a radical change comes, we must expect an absolute crop failure. The consequences of that would indeed be disastrous.

The Japanese Foreign Minister, Tojo, has delivered a speech in which he came out strongly for the independence of India. The Japanese are showing exceptional wisdom in their approach to the peoples suppressed by the English. We could learn a lot from them; this applies especially to our political leadership in the occupied areas of the East. Unfortunately Rosenberg has again failed to take this topic up with the Fuehrer. There is nothing left but for me to do so the next time I speak with the Fuehrer.

The S.D. report indicates that the Fuehrer's speech is still the chief topic of discussion among the people. The civil servants and the lawyers simply won't keep quiet about it. They feel that the speech treated them very severely. Perhaps it would now be timely to give them a little pill to soothe their nerves. There is no purpose in humiliating two professions so deeply that they lose all interest in the war and in their work. I shall await a favourable moment.

I took a look at another French film, Annette et la Dame Blonde. It is as witty and elegant as the Darrieux movie, Caprices. We shall have to be careful to prevent the French building up a new reputation for artistic films under our leadership that will give us too serious competition in the European market. I shall see that the most talented French film actors are gradually engaged for German pictures.

Our attack on the Kerch peninsula has been completely successful and we were able to issue a special news bulletin. The question arises whether we should publicize this news over the radio with great ceremony. I finally decided to do so. We must accustom people to the idea that special bulletins may now deal only with individual incidents.

[During the first part of the war special news bulletins were only broadcast to mark the victorious close of a whole series of operations.]

Most appalling conditions are reported from Iran under Bolshevik-English rule. A terrible famine is said to have started there. Englishmen don't know how to organize a country. At best they know only how to exploit it rigorously for their war effort.

By agreement with Ribbentrop, the Grynspan trial has been postponed until next autumn. It is against the interests of German foreign policy to have the former French Foreign Minister [Georges] Bonnet advertised so much.

We have launched an "unauthorized" article in the Frankfurter Zeitung discussing the economic and operational possibilities of an attack on Moscow. With this article we are trying to divert the enemy's attention to a different sector from the one in which we actually intend to attack. Whether we shall succeed in getting the Bolsheviks to fall for this is very doubtful.

[The Frankfurter Zeitung was chosen because it still had a fairly liberal reputation abroad. The Nazis, realizing its importance as a possible medium for veiled propaganda, continued to give it an appearance of liberalism although in fact it was as much regimented as every other newspaper in Germany.]

Our victory at Kerch has greatly impressed the neutral press. As a matter of fact, more is expected of it than we intend for the moment.

The Fuehrer has now given orders for stern measures to be applied in the treatment of French prisoners of war as a reprisal for the escape of General Giraud. The French prisoners may thank their own general if all joy has been taken out of their lives. They are no longer allowed to leave their compound, they are to be placed under strong guard, and the French generals in our hands are to be put into solitary confinement.

A report from Paris informs me that a number of those responsible for the last acts of terror have been found. About ninety-nine per cent of them are eastern Jews. A more rigorous regime is now to be applied to these Jews. As far as I am concerned, it would be best if we either evacuated or liquidated all eastern Jews still remaining in Paris. By nature and race they will always be our natural enemies.

[Most of the Jews referred to came from Galicia and Poland.]

The situation in the East, according to reports of men on leave and letters from the front, is being interpreted very favourably by the people. Of course the feelings of hope which derive from our military position are somewhat neutralized by the extraordinarily strained food situation. Most people are no longer able to satisfy their hunger, and an empty stomach always tends towards subversiveness. Unfortunately the prospects for an improvement in the food position are very unfavourable for the moment. The weather is about as bad for a good harvest as it could be.

In the evening we viewed a new film produced by our Continental-Gesellschaft in Paris with a scenario written round the life of Hector Berlioz. The film is of excellent quality and amounts to a first-class national fanfare. Unfortunately, therefore, I cannot release it for public showing.

I am very angry to think that our own offices in Paris are teaching the French how to represent nationalism in pictures. This lack of political instinct can scarcely be surpassed. But that's how we Germans are. Whenever we go into another country, our first task seems to consist in putting it in order, regardless of the fact that in a few years or decades it may go to war against us. This lack of political instinct among Germans is the result of their passion for work and of their idealistic enthusiasm. You have to put on the brakes constantly to avoid evil and damaging consequences.

I have sent for Greven from Paris, to give him absolutely clear and unmistakable directives to the effect that for the moment, so far as the French are concerned, only light, frothy, and, if possible, rather unsophisticated pictures are desired. No doubt the French people will be satisfied with that too. There is no reason why we should encourage their nationalism.

[Greven was the Propaganda Ministry's film representative in Paris.]

All actors of more than average talent in French films should so far as possible be hired by us for our own. I see no other way of achieving satisfactory results. The consequences might be serious if we did not take a hand.

As citizens of the world, we Germans have as yet no vision. We grew up as the product of many little states which is why we lack political practice and experience. We shall now have to catch up in a very few years on what we missed during centuries.

We issued a special communiqué about the sinking of an American heavy cruiser by the Luftwaffe near Spitzbergen. Special communiqués are again becoming more numerous and have had particular reference to the Americans. While that particularly pleases the German people, because they would really like to treat the Americans with affection, it also awakens certain reactions in the United States.

[Goebbels' propaganda always represented the United States as having declared war on Germany and did its best to make people forget that Hitler, to the surprise of even some of his close collaborators, declared war on America at the request of the Japanese.]

It is a pity that our great operational success on the Kerch Peninsula can be discounted by the enemy through the Bolsheviks' successes at Kharkov. I issued instructions to our news services serving other countries to argue strongly against regarding these operations as on the same level.

The English report that they have had one thousand fatal casualties in air raids. The number killed on our side was not even one half this number. This shows once again how grossly the English exaggerate and that I was right in giving more publicity to our successes in the air than before. Without a doubt our raids on English centres of culture and plutocracy will prove at least as effective as those of the English on Rostock, Luebeck, Kiel, etc.

The Research Office has sent me background material on a number of interesting political matters. Relations between Turkey and the Soviet Union have very much deteriorated. In private conversation the Turkish Foreign Minister, Sarajoglu, was strongly critical of Soviet policy. The English are trying to calm him down. But Moscow has certainly provoked the Turkish Government.

The Bolsheviks suffered heavy losses at Kharkov, but of course our own losses in men and equipment are also considerable. The important thing is that the German troops succeeded in capturing Kerch.

The reports reaching London from the English troops in Burma are simply despairing. The debacle which occurred there baffles description. This example shows clearly how cynical and mendacious Churchill is when he declares that the situation has improved. It is a sign of the moral decay in English public opinion that London is now boasting that British troops were able to accomplish their withdrawal without having contacted the enemy. Wavell characterized this withdrawal as a notable military achievement.

Churchill delivered an impromptu speech in which he declared that while England had not yet climbed over the mountain ridge and the summit was not yet in sight, nevertheless the ridge itself was already visible. That reminds one very much of Bruening's dictum when he berated the National Socialists for opposing the argument that he was only one hundred yards from his goal. In reality he was never farther from his goal than at that moment. And anyway, it is perfectly possible to wander through deep valleys and see the top of Mont Blanc without ever being able to reach it. Churchill's argument, therefore, is anything but convincing.

[When Heinrich Bruening was Chancellor he had almost succeeded in convincing the major European powers that Germany could not continue paying reparations. For this purpose in the summer of 1931 he had travelled to Chequers, Paris, and Rome and asked his opposite numbers, "What would you do in my place?" He could truly tell the members of the Reichstag after his return that he was "only one hundred yards from his goal," for arrangements were then in hand for Germany to make one more token payment, after which reparations were to be a thing of the past. That was precisely, however, what the Nazis did not want, since Bruening's success would have taken the wind out of their sails. They therefore managed to force his resignation in May 1932, before the reparations issue was finally settled.]

Our old party member, Roever, Gauleiter and Governor of Oldenburg, has passed away. We have thus lost one of the Fuehrer's oldest and most faithful fighting companions. Another member of the Old Guard has left us. One has the depressing feeling that those closest to the Fuehrer are gradually beginning to thin out.

The Fuehrer commissioned me to prepare a state funeral in the Mosaic Hall of the Reich Chancellery. The plans which Gutterer handed me for it are quite inadequate. Gutterer proposed a ceremony of an essentially civilian character. I consider that completely inappropriate. With the Wehrmacht always bearing its important men to the grave with great pomp and high military honours, it will not do for the Party to have a solemn ceremony like this conducted, as it were, by any old undertaker. It would set a bad example for later funerals and reduce the Party to the importance of a mere civilian administrative organization. I telephoned the Fuehrer, who agreed with me completely and gave orders that the obsequies were to include the highest honours.

Personally I feel Roever's loss deeply. He was always a good comrade and friend. He was a good, dyed-in-the-wool National Socialist. It will hardly be possible to replace him in Oldenburg.

At noon Magda and the children came out here [to Lanke]. That always cheers me up. Magda is to deliver a speech before a thousand Berlin women on Mother's Day in the Friedrichshain Hall. She is scared almost out of her wits.

It is relatively easy now to manage a German news service and conduct German propaganda with the necessary spirit. We again have plenty of material. Every second or third day there is either a special communiqué from the East or about our war against shipping.

Our diplomats and journalists have now arrived in Portugal [from America]. They gave exceptionally good interviews to the German and the foreign press and described conditions in the United States in terms well suited to our propaganda line. We helped them a little, but this enables us once again to make a relatively deep impression on international opinion about conditions within the United States. Our old D.N.B. representative, Sell, from Washington, made some extremely clever psychological observations which cannot fail to be effective.

[Kurt Sell was for many years chief D.N.B. correspondent in Washington and used to broadcast to Germany about conditions in America once a week.]

Spieler sent me a letter from occupied France. He complains bitterly about the provocative attitude of the French, who continue to live just as they did in peacetime and have everything in the way of food that their hearts desire. Even though this only applies to plutocratic circles, it nevertheless angers our soldiers, whose rations are scanty. We Germans are too good-natured in every respect. We don't yet know how to behave like a victorious people. We have no real tradition. We must catch up on all this during the coming decades.

The S.D. report calls attention to extraordinary transport difficulties. This situation is indeed more than serious. The Transport Ministry is quite incapable of overcoming these difficulties. As a result there has been a large-scale stoppage of production in munitions factories. In addition, the calling-up of men into the army has thinned out the ranks of skilled workers. Although one need not take this development too tragically, as it most certainly has its counterpart in the enemy countries, it is a reminder that we are in the third year of war.

Partisans blasted the railway tracks in the central front between Brjansk and Rosslawl at five points—a further proof of their extremely discomfiting activity. South of this region Hungarian elements are fighting under great difficulties. They must now capture one village after another and pacify it, a thing that has not proved exactly a constructive process. For when the Hungarians report that they have “pacified” a village, this usually means that not a single inhabitant is left. In consequence, we can hardly get any agricultural work done in such regions.

In East Asia the French possessions are further endangered. The Americans can hardly satisfy their appetites and no longer make any effort to camouflage their imperialist aims with democratic phrases. It is a sign that the time of liberal slogans is coming to an end.

The declarations issued at Lisbon by our diplomats on their return from America were extremely clever and are getting good publicity in the outside world. But the American diplomats and journalists returning from Germany have also issued statements making exactly similar claims about the Axis countries. On the whole, therefore, these interviews cancel one another out. I was especially on the look-out to make sure that all sentimental remarks were taken out of the interviews given by our representatives. It wouldn't make much impression on the German people, for instance, to have our spokesmen deplore the fact that they were allowed only one newspaper a day during their internment. You have to report something more serious than that to make any impression on people who have already gone through three years of war.

[The Axis correspondents in America were interned from December 1941 to May 1942 at White Sulphur Springs, West Virginia, while the American correspondents in Germany and Paris were interned at Bad Nauheim, Germany.

There were few faults to be found with White Sulphur Springs where the Axis journalists enjoyed every comfort, even the use of golf courses, whereas the Americans at Bad Nauheim were kept strictly to the Grand Hotel and could go for a walk only twice a week under Gestapo guard.]

As regards the American journalists, the representative of the United [sic] Press, Lochner, is behaving in an especially contemptible way. His attacks are directed above all at German propaganda and he is aiming at me personally [nimmt mich persoendlich aufs Korn]. I have never thought much of Lochner. We made too much fuss of him. We can now see what happens in time of crisis.

[Goebbels was a little mixed. This editor would no doubt have been happy to serve a news association as distinguished as the United Press. In fact, however, as he is proud to record, he devoted himself for almost a quarter of a century to the Associated Press.]

Darré is completely discredited with the Fuehrer. He deserves it. In these serious times he has been occupying himself with writing essays and books instead of getting order into the food situation, even though the means at his disposal are limited. The Fuehrer deals only with Backe. Darré is a complete flop and quite unequal to the tasks of war.

[Walther Darré, who was born in the Argentine, was so incompetent that even his long record of service in the Party did not help him. Herbert Backe, his successor as Minister for Food and Agriculture, had been running the department for years.]

Berndt has drawn up a plan demonstrating how we could enlist the aid of the occult in our propaganda. We are really getting somewhere. The Americans and English fall easily for that type of thing. We are therefore pressing into our service all the experts we can find on occult prophecies, etc. Nostradamus must once again submit to being quoted.

[Alfred Ingomar Berndt was a rather stupid young newspaperman who enjoyed a meteoric career under Goebbels as a typical "yes-man." He was one of Goebbels' most trusted lieutenants, and was attached to Rommel's Army as a sort of personal spy for him. He was nicknamed Roes'chen (Rosie).]

In the afternoon I had a long argument with Hippler and with Greven about the aims to be pursued in our French film production. Greven has an entirely wrong approach in that he has considered it his task to raise the level of French films. That is wrong. It isn't our job to supply the Frenchmen with good pictures and it is least of all our task to give them films that are beyond reproach in their nationalistic tendency.

If the French people on the whole are satisfied with light, cheap stuff, that is the sort of trash we ought to make it our business to produce. It would be lunacy for us to promote competition against ourselves. We must proceed in our film policies as the Americans do in their policies toward the North and South American continents. We must become the dominating cinema power on the European continent. Insofar as pictures are produced in other countries, they must be only of a local or limited character. It must be our aim to prevent, so far as possible, the founding of any new national film industry, and if necessary to engage for Berlin, Vienna, or Munich all stars and technicians who might help. After I talked to him for a long time, Greven realized the wisdom of this course and will pursue it in future.

Meanwhile the article in the Frankfurter Zeitung, which was inspired by us and is intended to divert the attention of the enemy from the southern front, has appeared. It has been officially suppressed and was denounced at the press conference.

[This was the "unauthorized" article which, in his entry for May 15, Goebbels said he intended to launch in the Frankfurter Zeitung.]

Things have advanced to the point where I can send the journalist Dr. Kriegk, who has now made his trip to the Eastern Front, to Lisbon to commit several indiscretions on instructions from me. He is to get tipsy and, with his own impressions as a background, is to spread stories that the German attack is planned not for the south, but for the centre. I hope it will be possible thus to launch this canard in the world's publicity organs. The coming weeks will show how far one can actually mislead the enemy. I suppose one must not count on too great a success. But it is always worth trying whatever one can.

In the evening we were able to issue a lengthy special bulletin on the complete conquest of the Kerch peninsula. Our booty is tremendous. The number of prisoners has risen to about 150,000. The first great victory of the year against the Soviet armies! We take a deep breath ourselves and feel as though all the people were doing the same.

The American journalists who were transported from Germany and Italy to Lisbon have issued the funniest reports about internal conditions in the Axis countries. They are completely harmless for the simple reason that they all immediately disagree with each other.

New American units have arrived in Ireland. The purpose of this is not yet clear. Americans seem determined by demonstrations of this kind to put the English gradually under moral compulsion to create a second front. But the English are merely standing by their guns for the present. They especially lament their heavy shipping losses and believe that in view of the catastrophic tonnage position an invasion of the European continent can scarcely be attempted.

Churchill's conduct of the war was attacked with exceptional vehemence during the House of Commons debate. He is coming under cross fire from all parties. It is nothing short of an enigma how this man can still be so popular.

From Madrid, student riots are reported, partly directed against the Franco regime. These riots, however, originated with the Falange and are explained on the grounds that, under pressure of the priests, Franco failed to tap the true sources of nationalist power. Never has a revolution yielded so few spiritual and political results as Franco's. He is today practically the pacemaker for political reaction.

In Rumania measures are being taken against the Germans—of all people. They have been forbidden to wear uniforms and have had to undergo all sorts of other humiliations. The situation has become so bad that Killinger for a while thought of resigning. Thereupon the Rumanians yielded on a number of unimportant points. Antonescu further promised, as a result of a protest by von Ribbentrop, to call the deputy premier, Mihai Antonescu, to order for constantly interfering with Axis policies in the Balkans. I don't suppose much will come of it, however.

[Manfred Freiherr von Killinger, an old Nazi S.A. leader, of the beer-cellar type, was appointed Minister to Rumania when Ribbentrop was "Nazifying" the Foreign Office more and more. Until March 1935 he had been Prime Minister of Saxony, but he was at odds with Martin Mutschmann, Nazi Statthalter, or Governor of Saxony.]

I received Kriegk, the chief editor of the Scherl Verlag. He is to write a series of articles in the Nachtausgabe and the Lokalanzeiger about his trip to the eastern front. These are to continue until next Tuesday. After that he is to fly to Portugal, there to commit several indiscretions about how our coming offensive is not planned for the south, but for the centre. He is to say that he has exact information on this matter and that he has been able to convince himself of its accuracy by a personal visit. These remarks are to be made in a bar, where he is to give the appearance of being drunk. I hope that they will then quickly reach the ears of neutral and even enemy journalists, who will report them with lightning speed to London and Moscow.

[The Scherl publishing company (Scherl Verlag) was the largest conservative newspaper and magazine concern in Germany, and was controlled by Alfred Hugenberg, chairman of the German National Party, whom Hitler took into his first cabinet for a while as Minister of Economic Affairs, but gradually eased out later. Hugenberg was also heavily interested in the leading German film company, U.F.A.]

The food situation is causing us great anxiety. According to a report from the Food Ministry the question of seed is especially depressing. Next autumn, we shall lack the necessary grain and shall again be compelled to reduce the bread rations considerably. That hits the broad masses of the people hardest. It would help matters if we at least had an abundance of potatoes, but if this swinish weather continues, as at present, there isn't a ghost of a chance of that.

As regards bread, we won't be able to avoid mixing barley into it to a large extent. That will further reduce both the quality and the nutritive value of the bread. In short, we are faced with a problem which human intelligence and talent for organization are powerless to solve. Every day we look to heaven with fear and trembling to see whether the right mixture of rain and sunshine will come. We are certainly a much-tried people, and if we continue to exist at all as a nation it is only thanks to our industry and intelligence.

The Fuehrer has at last decided to boot out Darré. Backe is to be his successor. I begged the Fuehrer urgently, however, not to make a public front-page announcement, because that might lead to all mistakes made in our food policies and all curtailments of rations being blamed on Darré and through him on to the National Socialist regime, for Darré is, after all, a National Socialist minister. The Fuehrer agreed to this and was willing merely to have an item published about Darré's illness which, for the present, prevents him from attending to the duties of his office; meanwhile he is to be replaced by Backe.

Backe does his job in an exemplary manner. You can depend upon him. He is not a pale theoretician like Darré, but a real, first-class, practical man. I never thought much of Darré. His theories are pure fiction. He doesn't understand much of practical farm life. And as for his slogan of blood and soil, he and his henchmen have so ridden it to death that you can hardly tempt a dog away from behind the stove with it.

[Darré's "blood and soil" slogan was to the effect that man's position in the scale of human values is determined by the blood in his veins and the soil from which he stems. Nordic blood was the best in the world, and there could be nothing more perfect than to have been born on German soil.]

Nobody in Ankara believes in a second front. It is claimed that England merely wants to bluff the Axis Powers. I am not quite clear whether the real camouflage at the moment centres round this question or the threats of massive R.A.F. attacks on the Reich. In any case it is extremely curious—without wanting to draw premature conclusions—that the English air raids have ceased along the whole line.

We have finally had the good sense to issue a decree guaranteeing absolute religious tolerance in the eastern [occupied] areas. The Fuehrer decided that this decree is not to be signed by Rosenberg himself but by the commissars for the different sections. Rosenberg's signature in this matter would not mean very much to the world.

Personally, I believe we must change our policies essentially as regards the peoples of the East. We could reduce danger from the Partisans considerably if we succeeded in at least winning some of these peoples' confidence. A clear peasant and church policy would work wonders in this respect. It might also be useful to set up sham governments in the various sectors which would then have to be responsible for unpleasant and unpopular measures. Undoubtedly it would be easy to set such governments up and we would then always have a façade behind which to camouflage our policies. I shall talk to the Fuehrer about this problem in the near future. I consider it one of the most vital in the present situation in the East.

The differences between the American and the English conception of how the war is to be waged are becoming more pronounced from week to week, at least judging by press commentary. The Chicago Tribune for the first time launched a very heavy attack against English war leadership and especially against the London press meddling in internal American affairs. This newspaper, which was always isolationist and would have nothing to do with the war, has exploded in a manner hitherto unknown. As we have no interest in causing the little plant of Anglo-American enmity to wither by turning our sun lamps of publicity on it too officiously, we shall take no notice of this editorial in our news and propaganda services.

I received a report about the present food situation in Berlin. It gives cause for the greatest anxiety. Again there is a shortage of potatoes. What we have accumulated in the way of reserves must now be issued as seed potatoes. The early harvest will keep us waiting a good many weeks more, and we can hardly expect anything from Italy. We must therefore attempt to tide over a whole series of weeks. There is no possibility of getting extra bread or flour; so here again the situation is precarious and there is not much doubt that it may become the regular one in the coming autumn and winter.

Letters from various parts of the country indicate that the general public are getting increasingly angry about the food situation. For this reason I think that the dismissal of Darré at this moment was more than dangerous psychologically.

Fairly exact figures going back to March now prove that during that month there was a record expenditure of all important types of munitions, so that even the reserve supplies lying behind the front were completely exhausted. Inasmuch as, for the most part, there are no reserves of these types of munitions at home, this means that the front in future will always use up whatever has just become available.

We can be exceptionally well satisfied with the way things stand in the East. I have induced the O.K.W. to have a camouflaged article written to divert attention to the central front. I am going to try to have this placed through middlemen either in the Turkish or the Portuguese press. That will be quite difficult, as the authorship of this article may well become evident, in which case it would do more harm than good. But one must now try everything possible to cover the whole situation with a veil of secrecy until the big assaults begin.

The opinion is voiced at Ankara that the Bolsheviks would in all likelihood throw up the sponge if we gained possession of the Caucasus and the city of Moscow. I consider this possible but not probable. The men who govern Russia today are hardened wrong-doers, who fully realize that they have a choice only between victory and complete destruction.

The American soldiers who have landed in Ireland gave interviews to the big news agencies. These are of a strange and disarming naïveté. One might wish that the Yankees could sometime come in contact with tried and tested front-line soldiers. Their illusions about the European war would disappear very quickly.

Our broadcasts in English are, after all, very effective, as I have been able to determine from a dependable source. However, an aggressive, superior, and insulting tone gets us nowhere. I have so often said so to our various departments and shall now insist that this nonsense be eliminated immediately. At present you can only get anywhere with the English by talking to them in a friendly and modest way. The English speaker, Lord Haw Haw, is especially good at biting criticism, but in my opinion the time for spicy debate is past. During the third year of a war you must wage it quite differently from during the first year. During the first year of war the people still listen to the delivery; they admire the wit and the spiritual qualities of the presentation. Today they want nothing but facts. The more cleverly, therefore, the facts are put together and the more psychologically and sensitively they are brought before the listening public, the stronger is the effect.

[Lord Haw Haw was the name applied to William Joyce, an unsuccessful Irish actor who was hired by the Nazis to broadcast in English each night. He was seized by the British when Germany collapsed, taken to England, tried for treason, found guilty, and hanged.]

In the British House of Lords there was an interesting debate, dealing chiefly with how the German people are to be treated after the war. There were some voices urging that a difference be drawn between the Nazis and the German people, as English propaganda could not otherwise affect the German people. Criticism turned especially against Vansittart, who is known to favour not only destroying National Socialism but also the German people. Vansittart's speech has not yet come into our hands. I am moving heaven and earth to obtain the text, for undoubtedly it will be of tremendous value for our domestic propaganda.

The English are very foolish to insult the German people thus brusquely. If they were to make a difference between the people and ourselves they could undoubtedly gain more than they do now. I perceive a certain danger in the tendencies aired in the House of Lords, and am forbidding the German press to make any mention of such utterances. The less we talk about them, the less easily will these political germs become virulent.

I allocated a large sum from our Winter Relief fund to developing obstetrical services in the newly acquired eastern provinces. It is becoming more and more evident that repopulation is the cardinal problem of Europe. The power which has more full cradles than full coffins will be victorious in the end.

Gauleiter Florian of Duesseldorf paid me a visit and presented me with a folder of photographs showing how Rheydt Castle in my native town is being renovated and made habitable. The renovation is in excellent taste. The castle is to be placed at my disposal as a residence. I shall be glad after the war to spend a few days there now and again.

The Fuehrer has returned to Berlin from his G.H.Q. He wants to take part in the state funeral for Gauleiter Roever and also to speak to all the Reichleiters and Gauleiters. He called me immediately and had a talk about the general situation.

The Fuehrer has a very favourable opinion of the situation in the East. He is convinced that the battle near Kharkov is going to prove a victory with the most far-reaching consequences. Our overrunning of the Bolshevik divisions on the Kerch Peninsula is also most encouraging as regards further military operations. It is true that we still have a hard road to travel, but this can be done.

I reported to the Fuehrer about my attempts to divert general attention from the southern to the central front. He approves absolutely.

The Fuehrer places great hopes in the war on shipping. It is apparently quite true that an American battleship was sunk by an Italian submarine. That means that the Americans have once again lost a unit they simply won't be able to replace.

In the course of the next month we are going to put into service one and a half times as many submarines as are at present on the firing line. That means that the curve of sinkings will rise rapidly again. In the Fuehrer's opinion we shall here strike at an especially sensitive enemy nerve. If Churchill and Roosevelt a few months ago were hopeful that the German submarine danger was eliminated, the hard facts of the situation will convince them of the opposite. They are going to get so many unexpected blows in the submarine war that all their loud-mouthed boasts that they can cover the losses easily by new construction will be relegated to the realm of fantasy.

The Fuehrer once more explained his point of view about the administration of justice in wartime. He said a people always consists of three parts: a small negative part, made up of criminal elements, a small positive part consisting of idealists, and then the broad masses which are in constant doubt whether they should swing one way or the other. In wartime, the idealists grow alarmingly fewer, but the criminal elements, on the whole, maintain themselves. Justice must be administered rigorously and one must strive for a balance. It will not do for the best sons of the people to fall at the front and for the criminals at home to be, as it were, preserved by lax justice. All they need to do to be locked up in prison for two or three years is to commit some criminal act, and then, once the war is ended, they emerge free, fresh and unused, whereas the counter-weight of idealists who will always vigorously oppose them no longer exists. That's why one should not shrink from brutal punishment in wartime. If the soldier must risk his life because of idealism, the criminal should at least know that he must forfeit his life for his criminal attitude or deeds. Our Ministry of Justice is unable to understand so obvious a line of reasoning. It still moves along formal grooves. That's why it is necessary to watch Justice constantly, and the Fuehrer is grateful for every suggestion. After his last speech in the Reichstag, it will be remembered, he received full powers, even in the opinion of hide-bound judges, to do what he considers necessary. . . . I now proposed to the Fuehrer that we requisition bicycles in France to punish attempts at assassination and place them at the disposal of German soldiers. The Fuehrer regarded this proposal as wonderful and immediately ordered Jodl to see to its practical execution.

With Amann and Wagner I discussed our Reich Investigation and Arbitration Committee's sorry policy. Buch has too little brains and is in no way equal to his tasks. But the more foolish a man is, the more insolent he becomes. That is the case here too. He seriously defends the view that he may judge even the Fuehrer. One simply cannot think of a more childish conception. Buch is nothing but a laughing stock among the circles of old Party members; he is a male governess.

I talked with Schmundt about the tasks devolving upon Colonel Scherff at the Fuehrer's G.H.Q. Colonel Scherff is outstanding for his exceptionally clear and plastic style. He is to write the history of the war, and it is a good thing that its chronicler should be living at the point where the real decisions are made. Attempts to falsify the history of certain military events are already noticeable here and there. It is all to the good that there is someone at G.H.Q. whose task it is to keep an exact score and whose documentary material will in future serve to guarantee a correct historical evaluation of the war. It is quite impossible to write the history of our war simply from dry official papers.

I had a telephone conversation with the Reich Marshal. He complained about the O.K.W.'s protest against the new Leander motion picture; this shows an aviator spending a night with a famous singer. The O.K.W. considers itself insulted morally and insists that a Luftwaffe lieutenant wouldn't act in that way. Goering, on the other hand, correctly considers that if a Luftwaffe lieutenant didn't make use of such an opportunity, he simply wouldn't be a Luftwaffe lieutenant. Goering pokes great fun at the sensitiveness of the O.K.W. That's fine grist for my mill, since the O.K.W. creates many difficulties for me anyway in my film work. In this case we can depend upon Goering as the greater expert on the Luftwaffe and won't have to fear any jurisdictional difficulties.

[Zarah Leander was a German film star.]

The Fuehrer is still in Berlin. He wants to talk to the Reich- and Gauleiters on Saturday and give them a picture of the situation. The fact that he can leave his G.H.Q. for two days during the battle of Kharkov is a sign of how favourable the situation now is and with what great hope we can face the future.

[There is a gap of more than six months in the diaries at this point. It is to be feared that the entries for this period were destroyed. The following is a brief recapitulation of some of the main incidents during the interval before the next available entries.

On May 27, Heydrich was wounded at Prague and died on June 4. On June 10, the Germans retaliated by obliterating the Czech town of Lidice.

Britain and the U.S.S.R. signed a twenty-year treaty providing, inter alia, that neither party would make a separate peace with Germany or seek territorial aggrandisement. Meanwhile, in North Africa, Rommel not only captured the important fortress of Tobruk, but drove the British back to the Egyptian frontier. Then, however, his luck turned. At El Alamein the British forces rallied under General Montgomery and, slowly but surely, beginning in the second half of October, the Axis armies were forced westward under the supreme command of General Alexander and with Montgomery in charge of the British Eighth Army.

On June 25, Washington announced the creation of a European Theatre of War, under the supreme command of Major-General Dwight Eisenhower. On November 8, the Allies landed on the Mediterranean and Atlantic coasts of North Africa. Oran was captured on November 9, Casablanca surrendered two days later. Darlan appeared on the scene and was placed "temporarily" in charge of French interests, despite protests from General de Gaulle.

Hitler, however, apparently refused to see what was coming, for, in an address at Munich on November 8, he promised counter-blows against the Allies in North Africa "in due course". Stalin, on the other hand, proclaimed on November 13 that the Anglo-American operations in Africa had turned the tide of the war in Europe and opened the way for the early collapse of the Axis.

The siege of Stalingrad, which Hitler had undertaken against the advice of some of his more far-sighted generals, began on August 24; on the Kharkov front the Russians, after the failure of an offensive they had launched there, started to retreat on June 23. They evacuated Rostov on July 27, destroying the important Maikop oilfields in the Caucasus as the Germans advanced in mid-August. The loss of the Black sea base of Novorossisk was admitted by Moscow on September 11. The appointment of Marshal Zhukov late in August as First Vice-Commissar for Defence brought no immediate relief to the Russians; a few weeks later, in October, they announced that the political commissar system in the Soviet army had been abolished.

On the home front, Germans were feeling the severe results of the non-stop, round-the-clock air raids which the Allies had started on such important industrial centres as Cologne, Wilhelmshaven, Essen, Danzig, Flensburg, Munich, Nuremberg, Bremen, Duesseldorf (which experienced its fiftieth raid on September 11) and Berlin. The only retaliation which an already weakening Luftwaffe could muster up was to raid Canterbury on May 31 and October 31.

Other events during these six months were Mr. Churchill's visits to Washington and Moscow in June and August; the Dieppe raid of August 19, Franco's dismissal of Suñer and his appointment on September 5 of Jordana to replace him as Foreign Minister, Pétain's severance of diplomatic relations with the United States on November 8 as a protest against the American landings in French North Africa, and the French scuttling of their fleet at Toulon on November 27].

MUSSOLINI ASSURES THE ITALIANS THAT VICTORY IS CERTAIN. HEAVY ALLIED AIR RAIDS ON MILITARY OBJECTIVES IN NAZI-OCCUPIED FRANCE AND HOLLAND. HITLER APPOINTS GENERAL KURT ZEITZLER CHIEF OF GENERAL STAFF. DARLAN DENIES PERSONAL AMBITIONS. HITLER HOLDS TWO-DAY CONFERENCE WITH CIANO AND LAVAL. ASSASSINATION OF DARLAN. FLYING FORTRESSES RAID WAKE ISLAND. GIRAUD SUCCEEDS DARLAN. THE POPE DENOUNCES "GODLESS TOTALITARIANISM".

December 7, 1942

Kalinin has delivered a pretty gloomy and pessimistic speech. But one must not draw wrong conclusions from it. The Bolshevik leaders are doing everything possible to keep up the Soviet peoples' spirit of resistance this winter.

[Michael Ivanovich Kalinin was president of the Presidium of the Supreme Council of the U.S.S.R.]

The newspaper Madrid has created a sensation by misrepresenting a speech in Tokyo as indicating that separate peace negotiations are under way between Berlin and Moscow via Tokyo. I am at once going to take energetic steps against this newspaper and its Berlin representative. We simply won't have papers which are friendly to us misrepresenting our political intentions just to support untrustworthy and sensational reports by their correspondents.

De Gaulle has again spoken from a British broadcasting station and rounded vehemently on Darlan and the French opportunists. He said French territory would forever belong to France and French soldiers were fighting only for the honour of France and her possessions. This speech is undoubtedly a shaft poisoned in Churchill's laboratory. Churchill is making use of de Gaulle to oppose American imperialist and plutocratic demands in French North Africa. The fight between the City of London and Wall Street for the French colonies continues with unabated severity.

In Paris, Doriot has again sharply criticised Laval. His speech teemed with insults against the present French Premier. I think we shall have to gag Doriot sooner or later, as he is beginning to be quite a problem.

[Jacques Doriot, the French politician, was a leading collaborator with the Nazis.]

My address in the Sports Palace attracted unusual attention in the domestic and foreign press. We ought really to deliver speeches more frequently. The English are better than we in that respect. They assault the ears of the world at regular intervals with ministerial speeches and thus insure tremendous publicity for their arguments.

December 8, 1942

Practically all our troops have been supplied with excellent winter clothing. A catastrophe such as we faced last winter is simply out of the question this time. The northern and central fronts are equipped 100 per cent with this winter dress; the southern front at the present only eighty per cent, but the remainder is in process of manufacture.

I wish experienced German combat troops could engage the Americans. The formations which put the Americans on the run in Tunisia were not even a select body. Some had been thrown together in a haphazard way; nevertheless we achieved an outstanding success. How much greater would our triumph be if the Yankees, who have big mouths but no combat experience, were to clash, let us say, with the Leibstandarte! We would not even have to be curious about the result—everybody could work it out for himself.

The Japanese have issued a balance sheet for one year of naval warfare against the United States and England. The figures are highly impressive. Possibly some are exaggerated, but on the whole one can see that the war in the Pacific has gone completely in favour of the Japanese.

A big espionage trial against Germans has been started in Buenos Aires. A number of stool-pigeons were paid to admit they had taken part in espionage. Naturally they are hastening to reveal the names of others who are supposed to be implicated. The whole procedure has undoubtedly been initiated on orders from Roosevelt and is intended to injure our relations with Argentina.

The publication of part of my Sports Palace address by the B.B.C. five hours after I spoke is explained in a way that makes me think I'm in a madhouse. This passage of my speech was not transmitted to London by spies, but by our own Transocean Bureau! It's incredible that such a thing could occur. But that's the way things happen. There is always only one method of doing the right thing but thousands of doing the wrong one. You simply cannot protect yourself against them all. There will always be some one among us who hits on the one possibility not foreseen in our directives and makes use of it.

[Transocean (Transocean) was a German wireless news service owned by the German Government and distributed widely in every part of the world. A subscription fee was asked, but rather than lose the opportunity for propaganda which this biased news service afforded, papers were supplied with it free of charge if they objected to the price.]

Thierack reported to me about the administration of the law. He has already introduced a number of innovations which augur well for the triumph of the National Socialist conception of justice.

The Fuehrer, he said, agrees with me about dealing with certain moral aberrations on the part of women. In the fourth year of war one can't be too strict about morals and must take into account the conditions which give rise to laxity. But the Fuehrer won't permit any change in the law about German women having intercourse with prisoners of war. That is undoubtedly right. One must draw the line somewhere.

December 11, 1942

Darlan still provides a cause célèbre for our adversaries. Roosevelt does not seem to be willing to yield to the covert or open threats of the English. He continues to support Darlan, whom he no doubt regards as reliable since one is dependent upon the other.

I read a detailed report from our Research Office on the Darlan case. It traces the treachery of this French admiral from its very beginning. The report proves convincingly that Darlan started for North Africa to desert us and that his son's illness was only an excuse. One might even suspect from the data that Pétain was hand-in-glove with him. But it can't be proved.

Italy has published a new list of casualties. It is nothing to be proud of. During November, 300 Italians were killed in action in Africa but 23,000 were missing. The ratio is more than devastating. While it is true that Mussolini's speech made a good impression on the German people, the disproportionate Italian casualty rate has had a very bad effect. I ordered that no notice is to be taken in the German press of this list.

The English have again made a massive air raid on Turin. The Italian Army communiqué speaks of very heavy losses. I have the impression that these Italian reports are somewhat exaggerated. A couple of days ago they spoke of an exceptionally heavy air raid, yet it resulted in only sixty-five fatalities.

The Fascist periodical, Gerarchia, which is edited by Mussolini himself, discussed at length the question of religion in Europe after the war. Christianity is pointedly placed in the foreground. Obviously the Duce feels that he must somehow appease the Church. He has always been dependent on many domestic factors that we need not be much concerned about in the Reich. One can well imagine why he is now taking a stand in favour of Christianity. But that is all the more reason for us to say nothing about these utterances of his.

[The Nazis were determined to eliminate Christianity altogether from Germany after the war. Alfred Rosenberg had already prepared a decree for Hitler's signature by which even the lowest-paid worker on the public pay roll was to lose his job if he continued church membership.]

The question of compulsory women's labour has now become acute. The Reichsbahn [State Railway] opposes the new decree, not because it provides for compulsory women's labour but because the women conscripts are to be used only for the Luftwaffe. The Reichsbahn wants to have its share. I expected that and am glad of it. Once the question of compulsory women's labour has passed the theoretical stage, nothing can stop it—a development that I welcome heartily.

The Swedes have recently become very reserved and insolent in their attitude towards us. We are in no position at present to put pressure on them. The better we hold our own on the Eastern Front, the more impudent the Swedish press becomes. It believes it need not fear us for the moment. Also, it feels safe under the protection of England. Whenever the Anglo-Saxon nations achieve merely mediocre victories, the Swedes regard themselves as on top of the world.

December 12, 1942

We started for Dresden early in the morning. The weather was so wonderful that it made this trip a pleasure. For the first time for a long while we can move freely along the road. We drove on the Autobahn. The scenery was wonderfully calm and austere. I felt happy as in times of peace. . . . We arrived in Dresden shortly before 11 A.M. Even from a distance the city seemed stately, wonderfully bright and clean. Just imagine what one could make of Dresden if it had far-sighted cultural leadership! But this famous centre of the arts has become a Sleeping Beauty under Mutschmann; more than that, it has slowly drifted in a direction that is absolutely devoid of culture. I felt this all the more keenly during my present visit, because it was so long since I had been there.

The funeral ceremony took place in the Great Hall of the Exhibition Palace. It was very impressive. My eulogy of Director Posse was exceptionally warmhearted and affectionate. I did this on purpose, because Posse deserved it. He had no easy time in Dresden under the aegis of Mutschmann; his memory should at least be honoured. . . .

[Hans Posse had been director of the Saxon State Art Galleries.]

Frau Raubal visited me at the hotel. She had a lot of family news to tell me. Her husband has been at the Eastern Front for more than a year, although he is almost sixty-five. Frau Raubal has developed very favourably and appealingly. I chatted with her and refreshed memories of days gone by. She, too, complained very much about the way Mutschmann has deteriorated. He has recently become exceedingly headstrong. His entourage, which is composed only of fellow sportsmen, eggs him on. His wife, too, has an exceedingly bad influence on him.

[Angelea Raubal was Hitler's half-sister, who kept house for him during all the years of his struggle for power. The world learned of a disagreement between the two only when a news item announced on February 29, 1936, that the Fuehrer was too busy to attend his sister's wedding in Berlin.]

Before starting home I learned of the death of Director von Stauss. That means that the German Academy has now lost its vice-president as well as its president. Stauss fell ill after attending Siebert's funeral. The way men in public life are dying almost frightens one. . . .

[Emil Georg von Stauss was one of the best-known financiers of Germany, a director of the Deutsche Bank and of many German industrial undertakings.]

The latest reports of the S.D. and the Reich Propaganda offices were presented to me. In both of these, as well as in the reports of the Gauleiters, there is very sharp criticism of our news policy regarding the situation at the front. I feel absolutely not guilty; I have always urged greater frankness in news.

The Duce's speech has been excellently received by the German people. The Duce is looked upon as an outstanding historical personality. Of course the casualty figures announced by the Duce have raised grave doubts as to the fighting qualities of the Italian Army.

My article about "Political Passion" has drawn a large number of letters which, without exception, agree with my ideas while some are very enthusiastic about them.

In Tunisia, terrible winter rainstorms have started quite suddenly. That is unpleasant for the enemy but good for us. The more time we gain, the better. That enables us to transport a lot of equipment and many troops there and strengthens our position more every day. The American-English airports are completely flooded. They can't start any air operations from there.

Mrs. Roosevelt has rendered her husband a poor service. She informed a mayor on the West coast that not five but six battleships were lost at Pearl Harbour. So now, a year later, and after much hemming and hawing, the whole truth will out; namely, that the Japanese reports were quite accurate and the Americans have always lied. . . . If in future the Americans dare to deny Japanese figures we shall simply refer to the events of Pearl Harbour to prove that the Americans like to pose as being sincere about news, but actually are anything but truthful.

The English have meanwhile taken the fetters off the German prisoners in Canada. The English papers unite in the slogan, "Never again!" The whole affair has been exceedingly unpopular in England. We hope that by December 15 we can also unshackle the English prisoners. Then we, too, shall be out of this loathsome affair.

It is interesting to note that the General Government [of Poland] is furnishing food far beyond the figures imposed upon it after I made my demands. In other words, the occupied areas are in a position to supply the Reich to a much greater degree than they admitted. They must be kept to it energetically, and those in charge must be held responsible. If they know that failure to meet the most elementary requirements will cost them their jobs, they will naturally work more energetically to find solutions.

In the evening quite a number of Gauleiters paid me a visit. They had been at the Reich Ministry of the Interior for a meeting of the Reich Defence Commissars. The meeting must have been nothing short of catastrophic. Frick told them things they knew ages ago, and the meeting merely skimmed the surface.

Among my guests may be especially mentioned all the Gauleiters of Austria, also Grohé from Cologne, Greiser from Posen, Giesler from Munich and Koch from the Ukraine—in short a cross-section of our old top-notch leadership. I reviewed the whole political and military situation for them. They were most grateful. Many questions regarding economics, politics, and war morale were discussed. Among these men I feel as though I were with my own family. Here one can speak quite openly. Problems need merely to be hinted at. All are of one mind, and all are perfectly clear about everything. The evening was one of unadulterated joy for me. We sat reminiscing till the small hours.

I am now going to seek a closer and more personal contact with the Gauleiters. A leadership corps that represents the cream of the German people has developed here. When one can get the Gauleiters to support one's work, one can always be sure of success. And there is no place where co-operation with the Party is more necessary than in my work!

December 13, 1942

Submarine warfare is our trump card. Both the English and the Americans are at last admitting it. . . . Doenitz knows how to use his weapon in a dashing and imaginative way. The submarine is just as effective an instrument of war for us as the air force is for the English; it enables us to strike the enemy at his weakest point

[Grand Admiral Karl Doenitz, born in 1891, was an ardent Nazi and succeeded Raeder in 1943 as Commander-in-Chief of the German Navy. Just before committing suicide, Hitler appointed Doenitz Reich President to succeed him as head of the German State. Doenitz was sentenced at Nuremberg to ten years' imprisonment.]

The question of Jewish persecution in Europe is being given top news priority by the English and the Americans. . . . Fundamentally, however, I believe both the English and the Americans are happy that we are exterminating the Jewish riff-raff. But the Jews will go on and on stirring up the British-American press. We won't even discuss this theme publicly, but instead I gave orders to start an atrocity campaign against the English on their treatment of Colonials.

Efforts are under way to declare Rome an open city, so that it won't be bombed. The Pope is studying the question of air raids on Italian cities and seems to be exerting pressure on the English to spare at least certain districts. The declarations issued by the Vatican on this question are extremely clever and cannot fail to win favour for the Pope, at least in Italy. But the Italians are willing to accept any help offered them in this painful situation.

The Italians are extremely lax in the treatment of Jews. They protect Italian Jews both in Tunis and in occupied France and won't permit their being drafted for work or compelled to wear the Star of David. This shows once again that Fascism does not really dare to get down to fundamentals, but is very superficial about most important problems. The Jewish question is causing us a lot of trouble. Everywhere, even among our allies, the Jews have friends to help them, which is a proof that they are still playing an important role even in the Axis camp. All the more important that they have been shorn of power within Germany itself.

Another matter causing us difficulties with our Axis partners is the treatment of foreign labour. In Lower Silesia a handbill was issued on this question by the gau leadership which can only stir up and deeply embitter our Axis partners. They are there very definitely characterized as second-rate, especially in discussing the relationship of foreign workers to German women. Protests are flooding the Foreign Office because of this handbill and the general treatment of foreign workers. I contacted the gau leaders of Lower Silesia and insisted upon the withdrawal of the handbill. The new Europe presents many questions to us which cannot yet be answered. We must try to balance these problems so that we can work our way gradually through the existing undergrowth. With many of these questions you cannot, as Bismarck put it, go through the forest holding your stick horizontally; you must carry it vertically to get through.

The supply train from the Ukraine that Koch placed at my disposal has arrived in Berlin. It brought great quantities of high-grade food, especially butter. I have given orders that this food be distributed only to the wounded, families with many children, and old people.

Distribution is to take place on a rather smaller scale than originally planned, so that every beneficiary may receive a really decent portion. One must not spread an operation of this kind out too widely, because that does not impress the public. This food from the Ukraine does not have only intrinsic value; it is also to serve a propaganda purpose.

It is especially desirable for the Party to be credited with this operation. It has so many unpleasant things to tell the citizens and so many demands to make upon them, that it is only right and just that it should now, for once, bring them something pleasant. It is, for example, very disagreeable for the Party that the local group leader has to break the news to the bereaved when a son, brother, or husband has died a hero's death. Formerly the Church did this. Now the Party has been charged with it, with the result that in little villages people are scared to death whenever the local group leader comes to their home. The local leader is frequently looked upon as a funereal character and in some parts of our country has been nicknamed "Bird of Death". Before this innovation, I gave an impressive warning as I foresaw the results. But certain sections in the Party in their shortsightedness and in their blind hatred of the Church insisted upon driving out the devil with Beelzebub. The results now are anything but pleasant.

December 14, 1942

The city of Hanover looked almost as it did in peacetime. Almost no trace is left of past air raids. . . . I immediately drove to the Kuppel-halle (Hall of the Cupola), and addressed the representatives of the gau. There was an attendance of about five thousand. I was in very good form and evoked storms of applause. No one can say that morale in this section is not good. The Party has given an excellent account of itself despite the blows of recent weeks, and again carries our banner on high. I am exceedingly well satisfied with the spirit prevailing at this meeting. It is the old fighting spirit of the National Socialist movement, comparable with that which existed in our ranks during the second half of 1932. The present situation impresses me as bearing a striking similarity to those six months preceding our seizure of power [in 1933].

[The New City Hall in Hanover, built in 1910-13, was surmounted by a vast gilded cupola, visible for miles.]

We were back in Berlin at 6 P.M. Nothing of importance had happened meanwhile. Gutterer called for me at the railway station and reported. I was free in the evening and could devote it to my own purposes.

Willkie has violently attacked Darlan in a speech, but opposition papers report that large portions of the address were struck out by the United States censor. The Darlan theme is still a cause célèbre in the enemy camp and we keep adding fuel to the fire.

Willkie is being played up by certain circles which want him to be the next presidential candidate for the Republicans. Willkie as President would possibly be even more dangerous to us than Roosevelt, for he is an opportunist, a politician without character and firm convictions, with whom nothing can be done. He would certainly be the very man to intensify the United States war effort.

Jewish rabbis in London have held a great protest meeting. The theme was "England, Awake". It is just too funny for words that the Jews are now compelled, after fifteen years, to steal our slogans and to call upon the pro-Semitic world to fight us, using the same battle-cry with which we once called upon the anti-Semitic world to fight Jewry. But all this will avail the Jews nothing. The Jewish race has prepared this war; it is the spiritual originator of the whole misfortune that has overtaken humanity. Jewry must pay for its crime just as our Fuehrer prophesied in his speech in the Reichstag when he said that the Jewish race would be wiped out in Europe and possibly throughout the entire world.

December 15, 1942

Montgomery had the American and English correspondents routed out of their beds to tell them that Rommel had slipped through his fingers. That certainly isn't a very proud occasion to make such a sensational announcement!

Pétain has written the Fuehrer a letter asking for a new army and indulging in generalities about collaboration. But he must admit, even though with a heavy heart, that the actions of the Reich in recent weeks are justified. The letter is somewhat cooler in tone than the two letters which the Fuehrer addressed to Pétain. But that need not worry us. The main thing is that now, step by step, we are approaching our goal vis-à-vis the French.

The Jews are making a terrible rumpus about the revival of Mosley's Fascist party. Generally speaking, Jewish propaganda has become extraordinarily active of late. The Jews in London proclaimed a day of mourning for the atrocities we are alleged to have committed on Jews in Poland.

Sentiment has turned very much against us in Sweden and in Switzerland. I learn from the Foreign Office that there has been a great change. My articles in the Reich are for the present about the only source of information on which the elements friendly to Germany in the neutral countries can depend for moral encouragement.

I talked about the Party's Reich Propaganda Office with Hadamovsky. He is on the wrong track at present since he has no real connection with me. He is trying to set up his own film production and radio broadcasts in the Reich Propaganda Office. I consider that quite wrong. While the war is on we just can't afford to have both a Reich production unit and, on top of it, an organisation looked after by the Party. We lack the necessary personnel and also the material. Hadamovsky just wouldn't see the point and I had to be pretty tough to bring him to his senses. I must win Hadamovsky over to my side and get him back on the rails.

My work keeps me busy until long past midnight. Now during the Christmas season there are a great number of seasonable duties to be attended to in addition to the regular daily work. I'll be glad when this whole Christmas racket is over. One can then devote oneself quietly again to real tasks.

December 16, 1942

The English are extremely angry about Rommel and are personally offended that he did not offer battle. They cannot refrain, however, from admitting that he retreated of his own volition and not under pressure by them. They complain movingly that they are now more than a thousand kilometres away from Cairo and that half of their transport must be devoted merely to carrying water. Montgomery talks nonsense in claiming it is now a battle of wits. That, of course, is an absurd excuse and just an alibi for letting himself be fooled by Rommel. . . .

That reminds me: I saw Rommel in a documentary film compiled by our Archives for Contemporary Events. He talked for more than three-quarters of an hour about his successes at the beginning of this year. Without making any gesture he talked in a classic style, practically without correcting himself a single time. What he said and the way he said it, the play of his features and his whole appearance—all gave evidence of the greatness of an outstanding personality. It is not hard to imagine why the English don't trust him and feel their way with the greatest caution. He has already put so many riddles to them that they don't want to let themselves be surprised a second time.

Gienanth, who interrogated prisoners of war in the transit camp at Oberursel, has sent me a report about morale among English and American prisoners. The Americans are behaving exceedingly badly. They are quite inexperienced in battle. The airmen are still affected by the shock of their crash. They cry from homesickness and are ready for any unpatriotic misdeed. From all this one can see that the United States is in no real sense a nation.

The people are simply a hodge-podge who have attained no unified expression of nationality. The English, of course, are behaving much better. They are in the main experienced combat soldiers who have already gone through a lot. But all are afraid—afraid of things to come, of further developments in the war, and most especially afraid of the German soldiers. Not one believes in an absolute victory for the Anglo-Saxon powers and the Soviet Union; on the other hand, none believe in a decisive German victory. Without exception they are convinced that the war will end in a compromise peace. Characteristic of both the English and the American prisoners is their wholly unpolitical attitude. They are without knowledge of even the most elementary causes of this war. Almost all of them talk against the Jews, but that is due more to a certain emotional reaction than to any clear perception of the problem.

Churchill had to defend himself against charges about the poor quality of British tanks. In so doing he went back to the time after Dunkirk. From the figures he produced one can see how extraordinarily precarious the situation of England was at that time. It is an open question whether we might not have achieved success had we followed through energetically in the autumn of 1940.

Our military attaché at the Embassy in Rome, General von Rintelen, is quite "black", and behaves accordingly. He is surrounded by only clerical or aristocratic elements. Instead of looking after supplies for Northern Africa he has been much too busy with church questions. Visits of German soldiers and officers to the Pope have by no means diminished in number despite his assurances to the contrary. These visits are subject to his permission and of course he approves them most generously. It would be a good thing to bring about a change of personnel there. I am gathering data to take to the Fuehrer.

[By his reference to General Enno von Rintelen as "black", Goebbels means, of course, that he was an ardent Catholic.]

The Berlin Kreisleiter, Kehrein, is in charge of military propaganda for the Ukraine. He reported to me about conditions there. The Ukrainians are a very friendly people and quite ready to work; if they are treated right something can be done with them. Women are the predominating element. They are very clean and wholesome. The men loaf all day long and need firm, strict leadership to make them do anything at all. . . . We Germans just don't know the art of running a big population or a large country from a few key positions. We are much too thorough and are always in danger of administering instead of leading, and of installing a bureaucracy instead of building up a mere supervisory apparatus. This proves it.

Leni Riefenstahl reported to me about her motion picture, Tiefland, which has become involved in innumerable complications. Already more than 5,000,000 marks have been wasted on this film and it will take another whole year before it is finished. Frau Riefenstahl has become very ill from overwork and worry, and I urged her earnestly to go on leave before taking up further work. I am glad I have nothing to do with the unfortunate affair, and bear no responsibility.

[Leni Riefenstahl, the former ski champion, attracted Hitler's attention by her snow and mountain films. He placed her in charge of directing all pictures made for German propaganda during the 1936 Olympic Games. Tiefland was an opera by Eugène d'Albert which was very popular in Germany.]

December 17, 1942

For the first time German prisoners of war in Russia have been heard from. Between four and six hundred postcards have arrived in the Reich from Russian prisoner of war camps, all of them without any propaganda. Nevertheless the Bolsheviks no doubt have a propaganda purpose in mind with these tactics. Although they have not signed the Geneva convention, they are now trying to pose as civilized and cultured people. Undoubtedly they intend first to establish a connection between these prisoners and their homes with non-committal postcards and later to follow these up with open propaganda. We are handling this whole question very delicately. The postcards were delivered to the families, but an explanatory covering letter was added. In future the wishes of the prisoners expressed on such cards are to be met by the Reich, but the cards themselves are no longer to be handed out to next of kin. Extreme caution must be exercised in this matter, otherwise a door is opened to Bolshevik propaganda in Germany.

Axmann reported to me about the status of work among the young people. He is very much worried lest the drafting of juveniles for anti-aircraft duty might deprive his Hitler Youth leadership corps of its most promising members. About 40,000 well-trained young people are affected. While the anti-aircraft can ill afford to do without them, I believe, nevertheless, that the work of the Hitler Youth must be kept up in all circumstances, especially during the war. The young must be guided by a firm hand as far as possible. If left to themselves, the mischief will be all the greater.

[Arthur Axmann succeeded Baldur von Schirach as Reich Youth Leader.]

December 18, 1942

In the East developments have not been as favourable as we expected. . . . Apparently the ring around Stalingrad can't be broken as easily as some of our people thought.

In Tunisia the situation was quite critical several weeks ago. We had the good fortune, however, of being opposed by General Anderson, an exceedingly careful tactician who always plays safe. Had a Rommel been in his place we might conceivably have fared very badly.

General Nehring has been recalled from his present assignment. As Berndt described him, he was an outspoken pessimist and did not believe we could win. He is being replaced by General von Arnim, who seems to be of better calibre. It is a pity that we failed to make room for able and dependable National Socialists in the Wehrmacht before the war. Quite obviously in critical situations not military ability alone but also character plays a very decisive role. General Staff Officers do not lack superior military knowledge, but in certain situations they are without the necessary moral stamina. Much more depends on that at certain moments than on military knowledge.

[General Walter Nehring commanded troops in North Africa under Field Marshal Erwin Rommel. He was replaced by General Juergen von Arnim.]

We learn . . . that Churchill intends to go to Washington about Christmastime. The visit is to be concerned solely with the question of who is to be boss in the French colonial area, England or the United States. Roosevelt is obviously pressing for redemption of the promissory notes which Churchill so thoughtlessly signed. He proposes to the English that the French colonies should be turned over unconditionally to the Americans to meet the debts incurred by lend-lease. That makes it obvious why Roosevelt went into the war. It has nothing whatever to do with humanity or civilization. Wall Street, whose exponent he is in his war policies, persuaded him to take this step. The English will some day realize how dependent upon Washington their alliance with the United States has made them.

People in the United States are none too happy about the practices in which Roosevelt is indulging. Opposition newspapers fear that his methods will lead more and more to a sort of dictatorship, and that by the end of the war the devil, to be sure, will have been driven out, but Beelzebub will remain. Roosevelt is a man without restraint. He is a very selfish, headstrong personality who shoots straight at his target.

The situation in the East has compelled the Fuehrer to remain at his G.H.Q., contrary to his original intentions. Developments at Stalingrad give cause for some anxiety; the situation isn't sufficiently under control for him to leave G.H.Q. It is a great pity that this year, too, the Fuehrer can't possibly go on leave, even on a brief one.

Ciano, instead of the Duce, will visit the Fuehrer. The Duce is in poor health, and as the meeting can't take place on the Obersalzberg, Ciano is being sent to G.H.Q. as substitute. The French problem is to be talked over first with Ciano; after that, Laval is to come.

The Fascist Revolution, a periodical belonging to a nephew of the Duce, Vito Mussolini, has published an article opposing our National Socialist conception of religion. This article deals with the same theme that was discussed recently in Gerarchia, its tenor being that Europe is a Christian continent and that the Christian leadership of the continent must continue. It is obvious that the Italians are trying to lay claim to the spiritual leadership of Europe, since leadership in military affairs and in power-politics has slipped completely from their hands. I am ignoring this article in our commentary. There is no point in replying to such provocations now, as we are not yet in a position to publish all our arguments. We shall have to await a more favourable opportunity. We shall probably not be able to tackle the church question bluntly until after the war.

My latest article on "The Claims of the People" is being quoted very widely in the foreign press. My new book, The Heart of Iron, which has just appeared, is reviewed most favourably in the Italian press.

The Jewish question is receiving widespread attention both in the enemy and in the neutral news services. The Swedes protest hypocritically against our treatment of the Polish Jews, but are by no means willing to receive them in their own country. The leading Stockholm newspapers issue emphatic warnings against having the Ghetto Jews from Warsaw forced upon them. It would probably be a good thing if the Swedes were to admit several thousand such Jews into their country. That would give them a practical lesson in the Jewish question. In all likelihood they would understand our measures much better than they seem to today.

The Jews of Jerusalem have held noisy demonstrations of protest against us. They had a day of fasting. At the Wailing Wall they invoked the Old Testament Jewish curse against the Fuehrer, Goering, Himmler, and me. Until now I haven't noticed any effect on me. One must know these Jews to be able to handle them properly. They are now trying to stir up the entire world merely to incite public opinion against the National Socialist Reich, and its anti-Semitic convictions. There is only one answer to this,—to continue as at present, rigorously and without compromise. It is fatal to give the slightest indication of weakness.

Goering addressed the officer candidates in the Fuehrer's place at the Sports Palace. Colonel Martin says the speech was not a very happy one. The delivery was poor, and some of his remarks about death on the field of battle were in rather poor taste. But I can't venture any opinion as I didn't hear the speech myself.

The Christmas programme for radio and the press has been submitted for my approval. We are limiting ourselves to only a few broadcasts and editorials dealing exclusively with Christmas. It won't do for the people in these difficult times to fall too much for the sentimental magic of this season.

December 19, 1942

The enemy press describes our situation in the East as almost desperate. German counter-blows for the relief of Stalingrad are said to have failed completely. In Moscow they lie about great victories without, however, going into painful details. The Don Basin, it is claimed, was the sepulchre of the German Wehrmacht.

While it is true that the Italians are under a terrific strain, they have until now been able to stand it. There is no truth whatever in the reports about heavy inroads upon our front, nor is it true that our attempts at relief have failed. On the contrary, they give promise of considerable success in the near future. Obviously the enemy is anxious to invent victories as incidental music to Churchill's Christmas trip to Washington.

Churchill evidently hopes to strengthen his position to some extent so that he will not be coming to Roosevelt with empty hands. . . .

It is true that Rommel's position is actually anything but favourable. I have received a letter by courier from Berndt, who reports rather alarming details. According to him the situation of our tank army is terrible. The real trouble is that Rommel has no petrol. He did succeed in beating his way through the English pincers. He could undoubtedly have expanded this success into a strategic victory had his tanks been able to move. But the English are torpedoing almost all the tankers we send to North Africa. It's a real catastrophe that we can't supply Rommel with petrol. If he had fuel, he would undoubtedly find ways and means to outwit the English once again. Now, however, that is impossible because of this fatal lack which naturally has a very depressing effect on Rommel and his entourage. What about our position in North Africa, anyway? It depends upon so many imponderables that I don't dare to prophesy. The fortunes of war always depend on the potential means at one's disposal. Rommel has been virtually cut off from all supplies. What is he to do with his tanks if he can send them neither forward nor back?

Donald Nelson has issued a report about American armament production. It exceeds all previous American exaggerations. We simply must do something to offset this American munitions propaganda. Unfortunately our own propaganda about armament production has had a serious setback because of the unfortunate news item about two German weapons that hadn't yet been put into actual use. At present all those concerned with this press release have cold feet and don't want to venture on this decidedly slippery pavement again. I shall do everything I can, however, to give a new impetus to our munitions propaganda.

[Donald Nelson was chairman of the U.S. War Production Board.]

Eden delivered a speech in the House of Commons on the Jewish problem and answered planted questions. Rothschild, the "venerable M.P.", as the English press calls him, took the floor and delivered a flood of sob-stuff bemoaning the fate of the Polish Jews. At the end of the session the House observed a minute of silence. All members of Parliament rose from their seats as a silent tribute to Jewry. That was quite appropriate for the British House of Commons, which is really a sort of Jewish exchange. The English, anyway, are the Jews among the Aryans. The perfumed British Foreign Minister, Eden, cuts a good figure among these characters from the synagogue. His whole education and his entire bearing can be characterized as thoroughly Jewish.

Schirmeister attended a session of the military court at my request. A traitor who planned an attempt on my life was condemned to death. A mine was planted under the bridge leading to Schwanenwerder, and the plan was to make it explode from a distance. Things did not get as far as that, however, thank God. The would-be murderer was arrested before he could carry out his plan.

We are having some trouble about Stalingrad. Air transport isn't functioning as it should because of bad weather. Our troops are not getting enough to eat.

Rommel has again succeeded in forcing his way out of the English pincers. But even though London is very much disappointed and claims the battle was not decisive, we must realize that Rommel's situation is extraordinarily critical, not to say desperate. The English, to be sure, also have their difficulties about supplies, but these can be overcome. They are facing an opponent who they themselves admit fights very well. They expect some sort of surprise from Rommel and believe he still holds some trick up his sleeve. But those in the know see quite clearly that Rommel cannot do anything if he doesn't have petrol. That is decisive.

I received another letter from Berndt informing me eloquently of his troubles. The people around Rommel have come to the point of taking everything with a sort of graveyard mirth [Galgenhumor]. They are doing everything possible. We on our part have also left nothing undone. But the forces of the elements are stronger than we. Our supplies sent across the sea are, for the most part, lost. The English, we learn, have stationed approximately fifteen submarines in this area. One can well imagine how they are lying in ambush, determined to let nothing through.

Nor is the situation in French Africa exactly rosy. The Americans are quite obviously bent upon taking Morocco away from the Spaniards. Their newspapers are already beginning a transparent agitation against the Franco regime. The intentions of such a press campaign are too obvious. The Spanish public is therefore in a state of great alarm and nervousness. Possibly Franco will at last have to pay for having been so dilatory. Had he risked seizing Gibraltar at the time we suggested it, he would today be in an absolutely secure position. He certainly can't claim that now.

Ciano has now arrived at the Fuehrer's G.H.Q. The Fuehrer is conducting the negotiations personally. At last there is no mincing of words. We are trying to persuade the Italians to assign larger naval units to carry supplies to North Africa. Everything hinges on that. If the Italians believe they can keep their fleet intact as a trump card for the future, they are pursuing a strategy which is absolutely reprehensible and exceedingly harmful. A fleet must be put in service; only then is it of some use. The Italians can't excuse themselves by claiming they have no petrol and oil. So many fuel ships have been torpedoed by the English on their way to Rommel that it would have been an easy thing to take something out of each ship for provisionally supplying the Italian Fleet. Possibly the Fuehrer will even demand that we have a decisive word to say about the Italian Fleet. The situation in North Africa can be saved only by making use of all available reserves. That the Fuehrer himself is conducting the negotiations is very reassuring. Italy's bitter pill can be sweetened by making them greater concessions about France.

The appointment of Zeitzler has done a lot of good. Zeitzler has introduced a new method of work at G.H.Q., clearing away everything except essentials. This has relieved the Fuehrer of a lot of detail, and everything doesn't depend upon his decision.

[General Kurt Zeitzler, a tried and trusted Nazi, succeeded Colonel General Franz Halder, a Bavarian monarchist whom Hitler never trusted, as Chief of the General Staff of the Army. Zeitzler had served in World War I as a lieutenant. After participating in the Polish campaign in 1939, the French campaign in 1940, and the Balkan campaigns in 1941, he was made chief of staff of General von Kleist's first Panzer group in South Russia.]

The Fuehrer had been far too much tied down by military details because the post of Chief of the General Staff was previously filled so badly. Ninety-nine per cent of the Fuehrer's energies are devoted to the military side of the war; that leaves little over for civilian affairs. If Zeitzler were to succeed in changing the ratio somewhat in favour of the civilian sector, that would indeed be a great achievement. For while the Fuehrer must sometimes be bothered with ludicrous trivialities in the military sector, the most important things in the civilian sector are often neglected.

Enemy propaganda is exceedingly aggressive. The Jews, too, are talking again. Emil Ludwig Cohn, in an interview in the American press, demands the complete destruction of German economy and the German war potential. The Jewish campaign against us is growing in volume. What won't the Jews do to discredit the Reich! They are working arrogantly and on a large scale. But they won't reach their goal in the end, any more than they have attained it in the Reich.

[The person here referred to is better known by his pen name of Emil Ludwig.]

Letters addressed to me are very much in favour of my work. All my writings are praised to the skies.

In the evening I am able to devote a little time to the children, with whom I have much fun. It is such a pity that one can so seldom be with one's children. . . . Once the war is over I shall be able to devote much more of my time to their upbringing. I could not wish for any more beautiful task in the coming peace.

[Ten weeks of diary entries are missing here—weeks crowded with highly significant events.

On December 24, 1942, Darlan was assassinated and General Giraud was appointed French High Commissioner.

The new year began with a flamboyant declaration by the Fuehrer to the effect that victory was still in sight for the Axis, while at the same time the Russians jubilantly announced that 22 Axis divisions had been trapped in Stalingrad. Thirty days later, Moscow announced the surrender of Field Marshal von Paulus and ten other generals and the taking of 330,000 German prisoners at Stalingrad.

Churchill and Roosevelt, meeting at Casablanca on January 24, gave their reply to Hitler's boasts:—unconditional surrender of Germany and her allies.

In January, the siege of Leningrad was considerably eased; the German offensive in the Caucasus came to a halt later in the same month. In February the Russians recaptured successively Kursk, Belgorod, Rostov, Voroshilovgorod, Kharkov, Krasnogorod and Pavlograd. Immediately afterwards, Russia made known her claims to Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania and Rumanian Bessarabia. On February 23, Stalin claimed that Russia's armies alone were bearing the whole weight of the war, despite events in Africa and Stettinius's announcement that more than 2,900,000 tons of equipment had been shipped by the United States to Russia.

The gravity of the Axis position in Africa was disclosed when the Allies reported, on January 19, that fourteen vessels carrying supplies to Tripoli had been sunk and three damaged, and, four days later, that Tripoli had fallen to the British Eighth Army. Rommel staged a temporary come-back with his huge Mark VI tanks by forcing the American and French troops back to the Algerian border, but on February 25 American troops were able to occupy the Kasserine Pass in central Tunisia.

Further troubles for Hitler were indicated by the following occurrences: on January 30, Grand Admiral Raeder was retired and Admiral Karl Doenitz, the submarine specialist, was put in his place. Two days before, Hitler had mobilized the entire civilian population for the war effort. On February 2, more than 100,000 German restaurants and many amusement centres and large shops were closed to secure additional manpower.

In Italy, Mussolini removed his son-in-law, Count Ciano, and twelve other prominent figures from their posts and personally assumed the entire burden of conducting the war and the administration of Italy. Ciano was sent to the Vatican as Ambassador.]

Conditions in Finland are steadily becoming more complicated. Kivimaaki, the Finnish Minister in Berlin, has been called to Helsinki. In the course of the next week a new government is to be formed. But I don't believe that Finland is in a position to desert us.

[Toivo Mikael Kivimaaki, who had been Finnish Prime Minister from December 1932 to October 1936, was sent to Berlin as Minister in 1940 to replace Aarne Wuorimaa, who had little love for the Nazis.]

Our anti-Bolshevik propaganda has achieved notable successes. Already all the leading London papers are warning against dangerous Axis propaganda whose sole purpose is that of sowing discord between the allies. This discord has already become strikingly visible. The quarrel between the Soviet Union and Poland about the drawing of frontiers is far beyond the bounds usually respected by allies in wartime. The English newspapers are striving hard to soft-pedal this discord, but the Polish émigré government naturally won't be content with cheap promises.

Regarding the fear of Bolshevism—to return to this subject once more—it is significant that even Dorothy Thompson is now commenting about this. She is apprehensive that, unless the Allies create a second front, the Soviet Union alone will determine the peace in Europe.

There's a lot of commotion in and about the Vatican. The North American Archbishop, Spellman, has arrived and has had various talks with Vatican people who count, and also with the Pope. Even Reuters expresses the view that it must be a question of peace feelers. Our reaction is cold.

In the afternoon I visited Magda whose health, thank God, has improved a great deal. She is in pretty good shape again and takes an interest in everything that is happening in the outside world. I am very happy that she is absolutely uncompromising and radical on the question of total war. If all Nazi women thought as she does, total war would be much more of a reality.

In the afternoon Speer called me from the Obersalzberg. He had two long talks with Goering. Goering was at first somewhat ill-humoured and distrustful about a number of things on which he had been misinformed. In the course of the afternoon, however, he agreed fully and wholeheartedly to my proposals as transmitted by Speer. He wishes urgently to talk to me before his trip to Italy. I have decided to fly to see him next Monday. I hope that this talk, which is due to take several hours, will be of decisive importance for our entire war strategy. Speer is very expectant and hopeful. I believe he did excellent spadework. If I should succeed in winning Goering over entirely to the new war policy, that would be a positive achievement, the importance of which cannot be exaggerated. I shall certainly do my best. . . .

Let's hope perfect solidarity among the men closest to the Fuehrer will result from our meeting. We shall then be able to place a personal guard of collaboration at the Fuehrer's disposal such as he had only in the greatest periods of our struggle for power.

While the new government in Finland has not yet been formed, it seems certain that the Foreign Minister, Witting, won't return. I believe we are worrying prematurely about Finland's attitude. It is true that the Agrarian party continues to oppose the government, but for the moment at least it has no real influence.

During the afternoon Ryti delivered his anxiously awaited speech in Parliament. It is pretty much in our favour and hardly differs from previous pronouncements. He declared Finland was compelled to continue its defensive war and must concentrate all efforts on it. Although Finland did not intervene in the fight of the Great Powers, it must nevertheless have its national security guaranteed for the future. That's something, and we can certainly be satisfied. I was right in assuming that Finland's position would not permit the government to desert us.

[Risto Ryti was at this time President of the Finnish Republic; he had previously been governor of the Bank of Finland from 1923 to 1945 and Prime Minister in 1939-40. He was a member of the Progressive party, and had been generally credited with pro-British leanings until he laid these aside when his country entered the war on the side of the Nazis. He was arrested and indicted for war activities in 1945.]

General Zeitzler has written to me about my proposal for a proclamation for the East, saying it was not approved. This letter is anything but flattering to Rosenberg. Rosenberg double-crossed Zeitzler. He tried to influence Zeitzler to side violently against me, without telling him the real purpose for this step. Zeitzler is very angry about it. What he wrote about me in the letter is very encouraging for my work. I believe I have found a good friend in Zeitzler. He said that in future he would support my work in every way possible, and that he was exceedingly happy to have established such friendly relations with me. He characterized his recent talk with me as the most delightful he had had for months.

England and the United States are considerably worried about developments in Tunisia. Fear of Rommel is a sort of children's nightmare. The English and Americans have suffered a new setback on Tunisian soil. If only our supply lines were better!

We are now definitely pushing the Jews out of Berlin. They were suddenly rounded up last Saturday, and are to be carted off to the East as quickly as possible. Unfortunately our better circles, especially the intellectuals, once again have failed to understand our policy about the Jews and in some cases have even taken their part. As a result our plans were disclosed prematurely, and a lot of Jews slipped through our hands. But we will still catch them. I certainly won't rest until the capital of the Reich, at least, has become free of Jews.

The drive up to the Obersalzberg awakens a multitude of nostalgic memories. How often and in what different moods have I made the journey! There isn't much left to indicate the grand-scale life of days gone by. The Fuehrer's residence seems to be sleeping the sleep of Snow White.

Speer awaited me and we talked immediately about his discussions with Goering. Speer has done splendid preliminary work which has created an atmosphere which makes me hope my talk with Goering will not only go smoothly, but have positive results. . . . The great danger seems to be that Goering, as Speer described it, is in a somewhat resigned mood. This makes it all the more necessary that I should use the right arguments to make him see things more clearly.

At 4 P.M. I drove up to Goering's home. His house is high up on the mountain in almost wintry quiet. Goering received me most charmingly and is very open-hearted. His dress is somewhat baroque and would, if one did not know him, strike one as almost laughable. But that's the way he is, and one must put up with his idiosyncrasies; they sometimes even have a charm about them. . . .

[Goering's alpine home was only a short distance from that of Adolf Hitler on the Obersalzberg above Berchtesgaden. When American troops entered it in May 1945, they found 25,000 bottles of champagne stored in the cellar.]

After exchanging a few pleasantries we immediately got down to brass tacks. He gave a general survey of the situation which seemed rather superficial to me, but which, on the whole, went to the core of things. He regards the situation in the East as essentially favourable, although he naturally realizes that we are still on fairly uncertain ground there. He is also disturbed at the degree to which we have stripped the West in order to bring things to a standstill in the East. One dreads to think what would happen if the English and the Americans were suddenly to attempt a landing.

Events in Tunisia have not developed the way he expected, either. He wants to go to Italy for several days to inspect supply lines. The quartermasters' offices in the Army have again made a lot of mistakes, and in Goering's opinion even Rommel is not quite equal to his task. Goering does not think very much of Rommel; he believes that he is splendid when it comes to advancing, but unable to meet serious crises and setbacks. That may be true. Rommel has served in North Africa under terrific conditions far too long for time not to have had some effect on him. But I suppose Goering bases his opinion partly on the judgment of Kesselring, who has always been opposed to Rommel. Be that as it may, Goering says we must either try to achieve a decisive success in Tunisia or else swallow the bitter pill of giving up North Africa. He believes we'll lose Africa to the Americans anyway. Should we succeed, however, in breaking through in the East, our loss of Africa would not be irreparable. Goering certainly still thinks very highly of the military power and war potential of the Anglo-Saxons. He has no illusions about those.

[Field Marshal Albert Kesselring, of the Luftwaffe, was in supreme command of German operations in Italy. He was later tried by an Italian court for authorizing inhumane warfare and condemned to death, but his sentence was commuted to life imprisonment on July 4, 1947. He appeared as a witness in the Nuremberg Trial on March 3, 1946.]

With regard to England he finds it difficult to understand how the British plutocracy can make as close an alliance with Bolshevism as was made especially evident on the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Red Army. Goering looks at these things a little naively and is unable to differentiate between expediency and real conviction.

He seemed to me somewhat helpless about Soviet war potential. Again and again he asked in despair where Bolshevism still gets its weapons and soldiers. In my opinion this question is unimportant. The essential thing is that it still has them and always manages to get more. But Goering has learned a lot. He, too, now believes that we must expect our enemy in the East to remain strong and that it would be decidedly unwise to take things too lightly. That means—and this is the essence of my argument—that the German war potential must be used to the limit regardless of all else.

We still have one great opportunity against the Bolsheviks—with our propaganda. Its intensity should be increased as much as possible. Great results can be expected from it. My description of what I intend to do along this line impresses him very much. He is amazed at what we have already achieved on this sector and what I have scheduled for the coming weeks and months.

With regard to the Soviet potential, he agrees that we can meet it effectively only with sweeping measures.

In that connection I described the situation to him as I interpret it. I went far afield and proved my case with much assurance and great skill. He was greatly impressed. After we had talked for an hour he was completely in accord.

It seems to me that Goering has been standing aside too long from the political factors which supply the real driving force. As a result he has a number of wrong ideas. But that can be corrected easily. His advantage is his healthy common sense which always enables him to pick his way through confused situations. As he is no longer closely connected with our political leaders, he has probably become rather tired and apathetic. It is therefore all the more necessary to get his views straightened out. For he is a first-rate factor of authority. A determined leadership can't possibly be set up without him or even against him for long.

The little dissensions that have crept into our work from time to time were not even mentioned. They seem quite unimportant compared with the historic tasks that we have to discuss. Goering evidenced no inclination whatever even to touch upon them. He knew perfectly well that everything was at stake in this meeting, and that we must come to an agreement on a long-range programme. I dismissed our misunderstandings with a wave of the hand and then went on to discuss the absence of any clear leadership in our domestic and foreign politics. With him, too, the Committee of Three carries very little weight. He has no regard for any of the three "Wise Men from the East", as he calls them.

[The "Three Wise Men from the East" were Hans Heinrich Lammers, chief of Hitler's chancellery for political affairs; Martin Bormann, chief of Hitler's chancellery for Nazi party affairs; and Field Marshal Keitel, chief of the Supreme Command of the Wehrmacht.]

He hates Lammers from the bottom of his soul. He regards him as a bureaucrat who is attempting to get the leadership of the Reich back into the hands of the civil servants. Unfortunately the Fuehrer does not yet quite see through him and considers this super-jurist to be a non-jurist and this super-bureaucrat a non-bureaucrat. The Fuehrer's eyes will have to be opened about him slowly. Goering is not quite certain about Bormann's true intentions. There seems to be no doubt that he is pursuing ambitious aims. Keitel, in Goering's opinion, is an absolute zero who need not be taken seriously, but whom the other two use to make it look as though the Wehrmacht had a hand in their measures.

Goering judges G.H.Q. very harshly. He is especially antagonistic towards Jodl, who, he tells me, has even begun to tell jokes against the Fuehrer. That certainly won't do. The Fuehrer trusts these people altogether too much. To his face they are naturally very friendly but in their hearts they think quite differently.

Goering considers the working methods of G.H.Q. quite wrong, especially the fact that stenographers are always present during staff conferences and take down every word. In the long run this will of course put the Fuehrer at a disadvantage. For the Fuehrer never makes any bones about his opinions, while the generals—Zeitler, of course, excluded—always talk for the written record.

Goering sees clearly that events on the Eastern Front this last winter seriously disturbed confidence. The generals are doing everything possible to reproach the Fuehrer for this. They are taking their revenge for the previous winter, when the Fuehrer's measures exposed them as having been wrong.

Goering considers General Schmundt as the only honest and trustworthy personality at G.H.Q. The rest of the generals, including those who are at the front, are taking advantage of the situation by creating difficulty after difficulty for the Fuehrer. For example, Manstein, as Goering told me, was once even prevailed upon to suggest to the Fuehrer that he should lay down the Supreme Command. This didn't actually happen, as his intention was suppressed before he could carry it out, but the Fuehrer got to know of it anyway and has drawn the necessary conclusions about Manstein. The Fuehrer really intended to dismiss Manstein during his trip to the southern front, but has refrained from so doing for the present.

[Field Marshal Fritz Erich von Manstein commanded the German troops in the Crimea and before Sebastopol in 1941, and in 1942 was placed in supreme command of the German front in southern Russia. Hitler dismissed him in 1944.]

We must certainly be on our guard about the old Wehrmacht and Reichswehr generals. We have very few good friends among them.

They are trying to play us off one against the other. So far as I am concerned, I won't have any part in such questionable dealings.

We also spoke at length about Paulus, whom Goering criticizes severely. He tells me that the Fuehrer, too, is now convinced that Paulus acted in a cowardly way in surrendering to the Soviets. Goering expects this captured field marshal soon to appear as a speaker in a Moscow broadcast. That would be just about the limit.

[Field Marshal Friedrich von Paulus, commander in chief of the Sixth Army Corps, surrendered to the Russians at Stalingrad when the hopelessness of his position was evident to everybody. He afterwards played a leading part in the Union of German Officers in Moscow and was a witness at the Nuremberg trial.]

Goering evidenced the greatest concern about the Fuehrer. He, too, feels that the Fuehrer has aged fifteen years during three-and-a-half years of war. It is tragic that the Fuehrer has become such a recluse and leads such an unhealthy life. He never gets out into the fresh air. He does not relax. He sits in his bunker, worries and broods. If one could only transfer him to other surroundings! But he has made up his mind to conduct this war in his own Spartan manner, and I suppose nothing can be done about it.

But it is equally essential for us somehow to make up for the lack of leadership in our domestic and foreign policy. One must not bother the Fuehrer with everything. The Fuehrer must be kept free for military leadership. One can understand his present mood of sometimes being depressed with this life and occasionally even saying that death holds no terrors for him; but for that very reason we must now become his strongest personal support. As was always the case during crises of the Party, it is the duty of the Fuehrer's closest friends in time of need to gather about him and form a solid phalanx around his person. What we must now suffer in the way of torture to our souls will pass; what we do to master our difficulties, however, will remain.

Goering realizes perfectly what is in store for all of us if we show any weakness in this war. He has no illusions about that. On the Jewish question, especially, we have taken a position from which there is no escape. That is all to the good. Experience shows that a movement and a people who have burned their bridges fight with much greater determination than those who can still retreat.

I made it clear to Goering that war must be waged not only militarily but also politically. In this connection I spoke about the proposed proclamation for the East. Goering is as firmly convinced of its necessity as I am. He does not believe, however, that Rosenberg can be persuaded to issue it.

He has the lowest possible opinion of Rosenberg. Like myself, he is astonished that the Fuehrer continues to stick to him and clothes him with powers which he is incompetent to use. Rosenberg belongs in an ivory tower, not in a ministry that must look after almost a hundred million people. The Fuehrer thought of the Ministry of the East as a guiding and not an administrative instrument when he created it. Rosenberg, following his old inclination to fuss with things which he knows nothing about, has made a gigantic apparatus of it which he is now unable to control.

Goering also thinks little of Ribbentrop. He referred very critically to our complete and obvious lack of an active foreign policy. He especially blames Ribbentrop for failing to draw Spain over to our side. Franco, of course, is cowardly and irresolute; but German foreign policy ought nevertheless to have found a way to bring him into our camp. Ribbentrop also lacks the elegant touch in handling people. Goering gave me some quite devastating examples by way of illustration. Goering consistently claims that this war is Ribbentrop's doing, and that he never made any serious attempt to achieve a modus vivendi with England, simply because he has an inferiority complex. But there's no point in brooding over this today. We must deal with facts and not with the reasons behind them. There will be plenty of time for that after the war.

There is the same trouble about our domestic policy. Everybody does or leaves undone what he pleases, because there is no strong authority anywhere. The Party goes its own way and won't let anyone interfere.

This was where I introduced my proposals. I expressed the opinion that the first great essential is for us to succeed in getting responsibility for political leadership of the Reich transferred from the Committee of Three to the Ministerial Council for the Defence of the Reich. This Council would have to be composed of the strong men who assisted the Fuehrer in the Revolution: it is they who will muster the strength needed to bring this war to a victorious conclusion.

I reproached Goering very seriously for having let the Ministerial Council for the Defence of the Reich become inactive. He could excuse himself, however, with the fact that Lammers always torpedoed his efforts by constantly butting in and reporting to the Fuehrer. This chicanery must be stopped. If Goering can muster the strength to surround himself with courageous, upright, and loyal men, such a group could undoubtedly relieve the Fuehrer of most of the daily routine, and thus set him free again for his high mission of leadership. The Fuehrer would certainly approve of such a solution as it would make his long-term tasks much easier.

Goering was very much impressed with my statement that I had not come to get something from him but rather to bring something to him. I talked at him with all the persuasiveness at my command and finally succeeded in bringing him completely over to our side.

The Party must again be put on its mettle and its ranks set in order. The tiresome church question must be left until after the war. The petty chicaneries still practised here and there in public life must be done away with. We must no longer waste time on side issues, but keep our eyes fixed upon the war itself. Only thus can we succeed in concentrating the strength of the nation on a single aim.

While talking, I gained the spontaneous impression that Goering was visibly stimulated by what I said. He became very enthusiastic about my proposals and immediately asked how we were to proceed specifically. I suggested that he make a number of nominations and I would try to win over the rest. We won't tell them about our real intentions—gradually to freeze out the Committee of Three and transfer its powers to the Ministerial Council. That would only create unnecessary trouble.

We have no other ambition than to support each other and to form a solid phalanx around the Fuehrer. The Fuehrer sometimes wavers in his decisions if the same matter is referred to him from different sides. Nor does he always react to people as he should. That is where he needs help.

Goering is fully conscious of his rather weak position today. He knows that it is decidedly to his advantage for strong men to come to his side and assume the task of relieving the Fuehrer of his worst worries. We are all determined to make a new contribution to the war by our action.

Goering himself wants to win over Himmler. Funk and Ley have already been won over by me. Speer is entirely mine. Thus we already have a group which includes all those who today enjoy the greatest prestige and authority in our political life.

Goering wants to come to Berlin immediately after his trip to Italy and there to meet with us again. Speer is to speak to the Fuehrer before then—and, if possible, I shall, too. Questions of personnel and of the division of work can, I believe, be settled relatively quickly. We want to show the greatest loyalty in forming this group. We shall pursue no other object save that of victory. We shall allow no intrigue of any kind. The loyalty of these men to the Fuehrer is to be beyond compare.

I believe we shall render the Fuehrer the greatest possible service by our action. One just can't stand by any longer and see him so weighed down with worries great and small that he can hardly breathe. The cause is greater than any of us; that goes without saying. The men who helped the Fuehrer to win the revolution will now have to help him to win the war. They were not bureaucrats then; they must not be bureaucrats today.

We will have many aces up our sleeves. It cannot be true that we are playing an empty game. If we make use of every possibility, we shall be able, I believe, to effect a fundamental change in the war within a relatively short time. Our problem today is not the people but the leadership. That has been true, incidentally, in nearly every war.

The Committee of Three was given a task with a time limit, as the Fuehrer's decree expressly stated. The Ministerial Council for the Defence of the Reich, on the other hand, was given a task for the entire duration.

This first talk with Goering lasted almost four hours. I then had Speer brought in so that Goering himself could tell him what we had agreed upon.

We improved the occasion to touch upon a number of specific questions and thus to round out the picture. At the end of our talk each of us had the feeling that all problems that in any way come within our wide radius of action had found a solution in principle. As Goering put it, we shall manage the "Three Wise Men from the East" in no time, after which we shall go to work with a driving power and an enthusiasm that will put into the shade anything that ever existed.

I am very happy that a clear basis of mutual trust was established with Goering. I believe that the Fuehrer, too, will be very happy about this. I hope we shall render him the very greatest service possible.

March 3, 1943

I learned at Halle, on our trip to Berlin, that Berlin had undergone a bad air raid during the night. From the first report which reached me I did not realize the seriousness of this attack. I became aware of it, however, when the train slowly pulled into Berlin. We were more than an hour late. The tracks were torn up. The report Schach gave me at the station indicated it was the most serious air raid thus far experienced by the Reich capital.

A tremendous number of places have been damaged. Industrial plants and public buildings have been badly hit. St. Hedwig's Church was burned to the ground, together with four other churches and a number of hospitals, homes for the aged, etc.

I am told that the morale of the population is exemplary, although the civilian anti-aircraft protection failed to some extent, in that the Berliners sat in their basements too long and let their houses burn meanwhile. The Party, too, failed in some respects. It is no longer fully conscious of its real task of leadership and no longer knows how to adjust itself to exceptional circumstances.

I immediately took the necessary measures. The population must in no circumstances be given the impression that the Party is not equal to the tasks imposed by such heavy air raids.

Things look pretty bad in the business sections of Berlin, but in the suburbs they are even worse. The damage is extraordinarily heavy. We have registered about two hundred casualties, a number that is not very big compared with other raids, but which nevertheless is far from negligible.

A rumour went round Berlin that this attack was launched because of Air Force Day, which had been given some unfortunate publicity. On the whole it appears that the Luftwaffe has lost much of its popularity. Goering is quite unjustifiably blamed for it. The situation is aggravated by the unfortunate circumstance that he is neither in Berlin nor in his G.H.Q., but up on the Obersalzberg.

I immediately toured the city and viewed several damaged places. I began with St. Hedwig's Church, which looks absolutely hopeless. The priests there importuned me to have at least one of the small chapels restored and to let them use the Singakademie for divine service. I readily granted this request. Small gifts foster friendships!

[The Singakademie, a concert-hall known for its excellent acoustics, was built in 1825 according to the specifications of Karl Fasch, founder of the Berlin Choral Society.]

I also inspected a bombed-out hospital in Luetzow Street. Several corpses were just being carried out—a touching picture. One of the nurses killed was an air-raid warden. It drives one mad to think that some Canadian boor, who probably can't even find Europe on the globe, flies here from a country glutted with natural resources which his people don't know how to exploit, to bombard a continent with a crowded population. Let's hope we can soon deliver the proper reply. . . .

I have ordered the Kreisleiter and the Gauamtsleiter to report tomorrow for a good dressing-down. I immediately dismissed two local leaders in western parts of the city who were altogether too lax in trying to cope with the damage.

[The Kreisleiter were the district leaders; the Gauamtsleiter the responsible executives at the Gauamt, or office for the whole gau of Berlin.]

Dr. Ley asked me quite excitedly about the results of my trip to the Obersalzberg and was exceedingly happy about what I told him. . . .

Tass has issued an exceptionally sharp official communiqué directed against the Polish Government-in-exile in London. It charges this government with imperialism because it insists upon the old borders of 1939.

The Bolsheviks are now throwing off the mask wherever they can. A blind man can feel with his cane what Europe could expect if they had power. The official Russian declaration brushes aside the Atlantic Charter with an elegant wave of the hand. Roosevelt and Churchill would be astounded to know what would happen to their little document if the Russians were in a position to tear it to pieces.

Tass also published a wild attack on my last article, "The Crisis of Europe." That shows that our anti-Bolshevik propaganda is slowly getting on Soviet nerves.

The Duce issued an exceedingly emphatic order of the day to the Italian troops returning home on leave from the Eastern Front. This order is historically untrue; nevertheless we must put up with it, as we badly need the Italians. . . . The Duce is really our only completely dependable support in Italy. As long as he is in control we need have no fear.

March 4, 1943

Our anti-Bolshevik propaganda is achieving enormous success. It is now actually the main subject for discussion in our own camp, in the camp of the neutrals, and especially in the camp of our enemies.

The Polish Government-in-exile is greatly distressed that the Soviets handle them so high-handedly. Stalin has no intention of considering himself bound in any way by the Atlantic Charter, and the English are getting nowhere by importuning him. He is heading straight for his target, the Bolshevization of Europe, and wants to begin with former Polish territory.

Bohle handed me a report about propaganda abroad. This criticizes the Foreign Office's so-called foreign propaganda in the sharpest terms. Bohle is right—it is about as bad as can be imagined. Diplomats are not fitted to conduct propaganda abroad. I could undoubtedly draw up a wonderful system for foreign propaganda in conjunction with the A.O., but our diplomats keep getting in my way. The harm that the present Foreign Office has already done to our propaganda is simply incalculable.

[Ernst Wilhelm Bohle held a number of important State and Party offices. He was an under-secretary in the Foreign Office, directly under Ribbentrop, responsible for looking after the interests of Germans living outside the Reich. For the Party he was a Gauleiter, his gau or province, however, being the abode of all Germans abroad, no matter where they might live. Also, he was chief of the Auslandsorganisation, (A.O.), the Nazi party organization which ministered to the ideological needs of Germans overseas.]

In the evening I saw a Bolshevick propaganda picture, One Day in the Soviet Union. This movie is a first-class piece of agitation, although anyone who really knows conditions can easily contradict it. Undoubtedly it will be effective in neutral and enemy countries, as it is cleverly adapted to their mentality. It seems rather significant to me that this picture is running unchallenged in Sweden with Swedish captions. That's how low the so-called Nordic states have sunk!

This film, however, once more made it clear to me that we have to be exceptionally careful about Bolshevism. Russia is not a bourgeois but a proletarian Jewish state. If we don't exert every effort it may someday overrun us. Our slogan should be, now more than ever: "Total War Is the Imperative Need of the Hour."

March 5, 1943

The enemy represented events at Rshév as a great success. We say nothing as it is to our interest not to have the situation in the East presented as favourably as it actually is. The O.K.W. distinguished itself by a couple of silly denials of our own news item concerning Rshév. It shows once again that officers are absolutely incompetent as journalists.

Knox, the American Secretary of the Navy, has delivered a speech proclaiming that the United States wants to dominate all oceans of the world. The English will certainly be delighted. As a matter of fact the English have already lost the war. They have had to give up so much property and territory that the Americans can call themselves the victors already.

According to American reports, the Japanese suffered a major defeat in the Bismarck Sea. The Japanese have so far said nothing themselves. But Japanese news reports have not been very dependable recently. The Japanese are not, in fact, so greatly blessed by the fortunes of war as they were in the first months. We believed they would accomplish much more late this winter than they actually did. On the whole they limited themselves to defending areas they had conquered the previous winter.

Gandhi has ended his fasting. I think he put on a great act for the world. The English papers so characterize it and add their own derision and contumely. Gandhi is a very clever fellow. I think that he is anything but a man of God. This time, however, the English were not bluffed by his theatrical fasting.

Lots of fuss is still being made about the American Archbishop Spellman. He is in Seville, where he talked to the British Ambassador, Hoare. The Vatican denies that he engaged in any peace talks with the Pope. I believe that is true.

In the afternoon, the twenty-fifth anniversary of U.F.A. was celebrated. Klitzsch delivered a long but interesting speech about the history of U.F.A. He showed how hard a few patriots had had to fight against Jewish-American efforts to control the German film industry during the Systemzeit.

[U.F.A. (Universal Film Aktiengesellschaft) was Germany's largest film concern. Its executive director was Dr. Ludwig Klitzsch, its principal stockholder Dr. Alfred Hugenberg.

Systemzeit (literally "System Time") was the way the Nazis always referred to the period of the Weimar Republic (1919-33).]

I was able to announce a number of honours conferred by the Fuehrer. Hugenberg received the Eagle Shield, Klitzsch and Winkler the Goethe Medal, and Liebeneiner and Harlan appointments as professors. As these honours had been kept secret they made the men thus distinguished very happy. Hugenberg was simply flabbergasted at the public tribute paid him. I treated him with special friendliness and courtesy and made a deep impression on him.

[Winkler was a go-between for Goebbels with the film industry and negotiator of contracts with foreign countries. Wolfgang Liebeneiner and Veit Harlan were two popular movie stars. The title of professor was a coveted one in Germany, and did not necessarily signify that its holder was engaged in academic activity.]

In the evening Speer paid me a brief call. He was about to leave for G.H.Q. I gave him exact directives for his report to the Fuehrer on the domestic situation and especially about my talk with Goering and the many conversations of our intimate group in my house. This will clear the atmosphere.

Late at night I went for a short visit to Professor Froelich. All the heads of the U.F.A. were assembled there. They were very pleased that I sat down with them for an hour. People, on the whole, are friendly. That applies even to the intelligentsia. All you have to do is to handle them right and give them support in these difficult times. After all, they have a right to this. One would sometimes like to split oneself into a million parts and take a hand wherever necessary. But unfortunately one has but a single entity.

March 6, 1943

The Soviets seem to be quite conscious how effective our anti-Bolshevik propaganda is proving. They have now issued a formal declaration in the German language disclaiming all territorial aims in this war. That, of course, is bunkum. Their territorial aims would become apparent very quickly if the Soviets were likely to achieve them within the near future. They and even their Anglo-Saxon friends make no bones about their claim to the Baltic States, to a large part of what was formerly Poland, and to Bessarabia. As compensation, East Prussia, Silesia, and the Mark of Brandenburg are generously placed at Poland's disposal. The neutral countries are extraordinarily alarmed at these exorbitant territorial demands of the Bolsheviks.

Salazar delivered an exceptionally sharp anti-Bolshevik speech which, however, has not been released for general use. He delivered it to a small group. It sufficed, however, to enable us to conclude that as long as Salazar is in power in Portugal, nothing really hostile to us will be done.

Reports from the Rhineland indicate that in some cities people are gradually getting rather weak in the knees. That is understandable. For months the working population has had to go into air-raid shelters night after night, and when they come out again they see part of their city going up in flames and smoke. The enervating thing about it is that we are not in a position to reply in kind to the English. Our war in the East has lost us air supremacy in essential sections of Europe and we are completely at the mercy of the English.

In Tunisia, affairs are in relatively good shape. I received a letter from Berndt telling me that Rommel seems to have a new lease of life as a result of his most recent successes. He gives the impression of a very active person, even though one must expect that in the event of a setback he will again suffer a relapse in health.

What Berndt wrote to me about my speech in the Sports Palace is very flattering. He said it had reacted on the troops in Tunisia like a battle cry and was received by them with the greatest enthusiasm.

The worries of the English people about shipping losses keep increasing from day to day. People are asking themselves what is to happen after the war if they have lost their entire tonnage and the United States, whose shipping is more or less intact, starts competing with them. The English will then lose a large part of their world trade: they know this perfectly well. If the English were to recall why they began the war—namely to prevent Danzig from becoming German, and what it has already cost them, they would probably become a little sceptical about whether it was really worth while.

Antonescu has delivered a speech which exactly fits in with our line. He throws down the gauntlet before his aristocratic critics in the capital. On the whole, Antonescu is behaving very well. If the Rumanian soldiers were as upstanding as their marshal, things on the Eastern Front would be better than they now are.

Our fight against Bolshevism has created a very great impression in Italy and in all friendly and neutral countries. Todenhofer showed me a number of diplomatic reports which are extremely flattering about propaganda and my personal activity. All missions report that my speech in the Sports Palace had the effect of a clarion call.

[Todenhofer was another of Goebbels' assistants.]

I had a very lengthy talk with Seyss-Inquart. He is an enthusiastic supporter of my policies and has great expectations for them in the occupied areas. He reported that our generals sometimes get weak in the knees. But that, after all, has always been the case with the generals! I can see from this talk that the chances for the success of my political directives are everywhere on the increase.

This view is confirmed by a long talk with Colonel General Guderian, who paid me a call as the new deputy of the Fuehrer for tank warfare. We discussed the abuses prevalent in the Wehrmacht. Guderian is a very sharp critic of these obvious improprieties. He impressed me as an exceptionally wide-awake and alert commander. His judgment is clear and sensible and he is blessed with healthy common sense. Undoubtedly I can work well with him. I promised him my unstinted support.

[Colonel General Heinz Guderian, born in 1886, commanded an armoured corps in 1940, and was Commander-in-Chief of the Second Panzer Army from 1941 to 1943, when he became Inspector General of Armoured Troops. After the putsch of July 20, 1944, he was promoted Chief of the Army General Staff.]

Again hundreds of letters have reached me which are for the most part extremely flattering. . . . Confidence in me is happily on the increase everywhere.

I am continuing my fight with the Ministry of Justice for the simplification of our entire judicial system. It is very difficult for people there to get out of their old grooves. They don't think, for instance, that appeals in civilian litigation can be dispensed with. I consider that absolute nonsense.

Schach gave me a long report on the situation in Berlin resulting from the last air raid. It is extremely serious, after all. The damage done to the Reich capital is very heavy, and it will take us six or eight months to repair it even halfway.

Yet this is the moment that the S.D. chooses to continue evacuating Jews! Unfortunately there have been some regrettable scenes at a home for aged Jews, when a large number of people gathered and some of them even sided with the Jews. I ordered the S.D. not to continue evacuating Jews at such a critical moment: we can save it up for a week or two and then resume all the more thoroughly.

In the evening Funk and Ley visited me. I gave them the details of my talk with Goering. They are very happy about the result. But they have certain misgivings whether it will be possible to arrange things without friction as we had thought. Goering is unfortunately somewhat inactive and resigned, and it will take a lot of work to get him going again. Ley weeps on my shoulder about the inactivity of the Party, which is a thorn in his flesh. No doubt that is chiefly owing to Bormann's unduly bureaucratic conduct of Party affairs. Bormann is not a man of the people. He has always been engaged in administrative work and therefore has not the proper qualifications for the real tasks of leadership.

We remained together until the small hours and touched upon a thousand questions and problems. We shall certainly endeavour to be a real help to the Fuehrer and to relieve him of countless secondary problems. At this moment he is carrying a load of responsibility that would break an ordinary man.

My colleague Dr. Splett wrote to me from Tunisia about the strange war customs of the Americans. This letter, based entirely upon his own observations, indicates that the Americans are still in a sense a half-savage people. They have no clear political conception whatever. The American soldiers, for the most part, have no idea why this war is being fought. If we could face them with numbers and weapons equal to theirs, we could indulge in a regular rabbit chase.

MacArthur trumpeted very loudly about the alleged victory of the Americans over the Japanese in the Bismarck Sea. It really looks, in fact, as though the Japanese had suffered a severe setback there. Until now they haven't published anything about the defeat. But sometime or other they will have to say something!

During the night Essen suffered an exceptionally severe raid. The city of the Krupps has been hard hit. The number of dead, too, is considerable. If the English continue their raids on this scale, they will make things exceedingly difficult for us. The dangerous thing about this matter, looking at it psychologically, is the fact that the population can see no way of doing anything about it. Our anti-aircraft guns are inadequate. The successes of our night fighters, though notable, are not sufficient to compel the English to desist from their night attacks. As we lack a weapon for attack, we cannot do anything noteworthy in the way of reprisal.

I attended the funeral, in Dahlem Forest Cemetery, of six young men of the Luftwaffe, the youngest soldiers of the Reich to be killed during the last bomb attack. I witnessed very touching scenes. A young minister delivered an excellent speech. We ought really to requisition him for our movement.

The entire German people have serious doubts about the fidelity of the Italians to their alliance. The rank and file of the people surely show a very keen instinct. Although they have no proofs, these suspicions nevertheless exist.

March 8, 1943

The Dutch bishops have had an exceptionally insolent pastoral letter read from the pulpits, in which they incite the people to open opposition against the Reich Commissar's measures. Seyss-Inquart, however, took action in time to avert what might have been embarrassing results.

This Sunday was very quiet, both politically and militarily. There was wonderful spring weather in Berlin. The whole population of the capital seemed to be out and about. Places where damage was done in the last terror attack were the main goals of the pedestrians. However, I had these damaged areas roped off. They are not to be exhibitions for the public out for a stroll.

I studied the pros and cons about the reduction of the meat ration by fifty grams [$1\frac{1}{2}$ oz.] as proposed by the Food Ministry. I regard this as absolutely necessary to avoid having to slaughter the last cattle in the Ukraine. That would have a very bad psychological effect since even the Bolsheviks left at least one cow to each farmer. I shall speak earnestly about this to the Fuehrer since we cannot found our food policies on illusions. The occupied areas must of course do their part in feeding the Reich, but you can't expect a cow to give milk and let herself be eaten at the same time.

About 1 P.M. we arrived at the airport of Winnyzja. A large number of fighter planes were assembled there for overhauling. Already one gets a whiff of the atmosphere of the front. The fighter pilots who were also being overhauled here, gave me a very friendly reception. I could see that my recent oratorical and journalistic efforts had met with great approval at the front.

On to Winnyzja. The countryside is fairly awful. Everywhere there is poverty and neglect. The clothes and especially the shoes in which the natives present themselves are indescribable. People would not appear in Berlin as they do here even as an exception.

We arrived at the Fuehrer's G.H.Q. about 1.30 P.M. Speer awaited me to give me a briefing on the talks he had had with the Fuehrer. As always, he did wise and clever spadework. He told me the Fuehrer was in exceptionally good form, owing, undoubtedly, to the fact that our position on the Eastern Front has become completely stabilized and we have again achieved notable successes.

The Fuehrer is having lots of trouble, especially with the war in the air. He is thoroughly dissatisfied with the measures Goering has taken. They lack system and are not carried out on an elaborate scale. Goering is often given entirely wrong information by his generals.

Unfortunately the utter failure of the Luftwaffe has reduced Goering's prestige with the Fuehrer tremendously, not only in this but also in other respects. That somewhat upsets my plans for making him more conspicuous. The Fuehrer, according to what Speer reports to me, is rather unapproachable at the moment as regards Goering. Speer therefore did not continue his spadework on that matter. Nevertheless I am of the opinion that we must not give up our plan. Goering, after all, has strong political and military authority which was gained in the course of years and certainly cannot be made to vanish into thin air overnight.

The Fuehrer is very much prejudiced against Fromm. He, too, has noticed that Fromm cannot put over the 800,000-manpower programme in a big way. Also, he has already had difficulties with Guderian, which makes the Fuehrer especially angry.

[Colonel General Fritz Fromm (1888-1945) was commander in chief of the Replacement Army at this time. For a while he played with the officers' group who plotted to assassinate Hitler, but took fright at the decisive moment and was arrested by his fellow officers. Soon afterwards he was released and had several of these brother officers executed. He was in turn executed on Hitler's orders in March 1945. Von Hassell in his Diaries describes Fromm as weak-kneed.]

The Fuehrer continues to be very well satisfied with Zeitzler, who is at present his most effective assistant in the conduct of the eastern campaign. Keitel plays only a very subordinate role. But the Fuehrer keeps him because he does not want to cause comment by changes of personnel, and also because at the moment he has nobody to put in his place. The lack of real leaders in the Wehrmacht is truly terrifying. That is no doubt chiefly because the selection process has been entirely wrong, in that social position, wealth, and education counted for more than natural endowment and good character. This system may be adequate in peacetime but will sooner or later bear bitter fruit in war. Now we have to pay for what we failed to do in the past.

At 2 P.M. the Fuehrer came away from his staff conference. His health, thank God, seemed to be excellent; that is, he did seem tired, but otherwise appeared very active. He was happy that I came to G.H.Q. for a whole day. . . .

I first gave him a detailed report about the last air raid on Berlin. He listened with great attention and concentration. I noticed immediately that he was very suspicious of Goering, claiming that he did not appreciate the decisive importance of air warfare. Goering was being thoroughly misled by the generals of the Luftwaffe and therefore took an altogether too optimistic, not to say unrealistic, view.

The Fuehrer's opinion about the generals was unfavourable. They cheated him, he said, wherever they could. Besides, they were uneducated and did not even understand their own profession of arms—the least one could expect of them. They could not be blamed for lacking culture, for that wasn't part of their upbringing, but the fact that they knew so little even about the purely material questions of war told heavily against them. Their training had been wrong for generations. We could now see the results of such education in our corps of higher officers. I was able to give him some examples from my own experience to confirm the Fuehrer in his views.

I told the Fuehrer how worried I was about perfecting the 800,000-manpower programme. The Fuehrer himself had also worried about it. He gave me a number of directives for stirring up this programme and issued the necessary plenary powers.

The debacle of the past winter, the Fuehrer explained, was chiefly owing to the utter failure of our allies to do their part. Now the front was in order again. This was a military achievement of the first magnitude, and simply cannot be overestimated. The Fuehrer doesn't want to see any more allies on the Eastern Front. He has fully made up his mind that only our own soldiers can finish off the Bolsheviks.

My first talk with the Fuehrer took place in the presence of Speer. Then the Fuehrer invited me into his air-raid shelter where we had a four-hour discussion in private [unter vier Augen].

First I completed my report on the Berlin air raid and gave the Fuehrer my views regarding air warfare in general. . . . The Fuehrer hardly let me finish talking but said quickly that that was the very thing that kept him awake worrying until the small hours of the morning. He then criticized Goering with extraordinary sharpness. He had let his generals transport him into the realm of illusions. While his optimism was no doubt extremely valuable in times of crisis, it also easily made him a victim of wishful thinking. That, however, was very dangerous in wartime. He thought the influence of General Bodenschatz, whom he regards as a cold cynic, was especially harmful. Field Marshal General Sperrle, too, in France, was not equal to his tasks. Like all air-force generals, he had withdrawn to a castle and was there leading the life of a sybarite. Air warfare against England probably didn't interest him much more than, say, an excellent luncheon or dinner. The Fuehrer wants to recall him.

[General Karl Bodenschatz was Goering's personal aide and his liaison officer between the Fuehrer's G.H.Q. and the air force G.H.Q.]

Field Marshal Hugo Sperrle was commander in chief of the Western Air Command.]

Of the Luftwaffe he now thinks well only of the chief of the general staff, Jeschonnek. Jeschonnek was an absolute fanatic for truth, he said; he saw the situation very clearly and had no illusions.

[General Hans Jeschonnek's rise was meteoric. He was devoted to Hitler.]

Naturally the Fuehrer will in no circumstances let air warfare continue in a slipshod way as hitherto. One need only think six months ahead to see us facing ruin in many cities, sustaining thousands of casualties, and finding the morale of our people impaired. This must not be, come what may. The Fuehrer is going to see to it, whatever happens, that British terror will be answered by terror from our side. To make that possible, everything must be scraped together from the Luftwaffe that can possibly be collected. All new construction of the Luftwaffe is to serve this one purpose. In place of Sperrle, he wants to send to France a young, capable officer who is to be given special powers exactly like those of Doenitz for submarine warfare. He is to have no other task save that of carrying on air warfare against England so systematically and unyieldingly that the English will no longer relish being troubled us every night. Moreover, the Luftwaffe command staffs must be taken out of Paris; in fact, not only these, but other command staff as well. Paris is a dangerous place. No occupation force has ever held out in this city without harm to its soul.

The Fuehrer is very angry at the Italians because they are actually doing nothing. They are no good for the Eastern Front; they are no good for North Africa; they are no good for submarine warfare; they aren't any good even for anti-aircraft at home. The Fuehrer is right in asking why they are in the war anyway!

Production for the Luftwaffe should again be reduced to simple principles. There has been too much experimenting; consequently really convincing results have not been obtained. Here, too, Goering's illusions have had evil results. Goering likes to hear things that are pleasant. That's why his boon companions won't tell him anything unpleasant. That refers not only to the Luftwaffe itself, but especially to the damage done by the English. This is always minimized to Goering and never presented in its full extent. The Fuehrer blazes with rage at this conscienceless entourage of the Reich Marshal which is largely responsible for bringing us into this extremely embarrassing situation.

The Fuehrer's judgment of the moral qualities of the generals—and that applies to all arms of the service—is devastating. He doesn't believe any general a priori. They all cheat him, fawn upon him, furnish him statistics which any child can contradict, and thereby insult the Fuehrer's intelligence. . . . The Fuehrer certainly won't have anybody misdirecting him on questions of air warfare. He knows exactly how things are and won't rest satisfied until Goering, too, has a clear conception of it.

I proposed to the Fuehrer a series of changes in the directives for civilian air-raid protection, along the lines proposed last Saturday to my Ministry. On the whole the Fuehrer approved, especially as regards the placing of fire wardens on the roofs, but not on every roof and only one on each block of buildings.

In view of his general state of mind I thought it inopportune to introduce the question of Goering's political leadership. This is not the proper moment. We must postpone it to a later date.

I reported to the Fuehrer the severe punitive measures I took in cases of looting in Berlin. The Fuehrer approved. He is extremely satisfied with civilian defence in the Reich capital.

At my suggestion, he will hereafter award the casualty ribbon for injuries sustained in air warfare. I think this is only just, and that it will prove extremely effective psychologically.

In this connection I warned earnestly against the plan to create now, during the war, a medal in the form of a black mourning ribbon with an Iron Cross for the relatives of men who fell. It would then be easy to estimate our exact losses, a thing which would not be very timely.

I also pleaded earnestly with the Fuehrer about the lack of political leadership in Berlin. He realizes the importance of this problem and instructed me to intervene here and there with a helping hand. The Fuehrer is not yet well acquainted with the working methods of the Committee of Three. Since I can't discuss the problem of Goering, I thought it better not yet to speak about this committee. Bormann still has the Fuehrer's confidence to a considerable extent, whereas Keitel is already out in the cold.

The Fuehrer shares my worries about the carrying through of the 800,000-manpower programme. He has now become rather distrustful of Sauckel, who lacks the ability to carry through in practice the necessary transition process for this programme. He depends too much upon the labour offices, which are quite unsuitable for this purpose.

The Fuehrer would be quite ready to remove Fromm from office if he had a proper successor. He believes, however, that only Zeitzler would be equal to this job. However, he needs Zeitzler as chief of the General Staff of the Army. The Fuehrer justly blames Fromm for not being able to improvise; that's the crux of the whole matter.

I related some incidents illustrating conditions in the occupied areas to the Fuehrer, but he already knew most of them. In this connection we happened to talk about the case of the Governor General [of Poland], Dr. Frank. The Fuehrer no longer has any respect for him. I argued with the Fuehrer, however, that he must either replace Frank or restore his authority, for a governor general—in other words, a viceroy—of Poland without authority is of course unthinkable in these critical times. Added to everything else, Frank is unfortunately mixed up in a divorce, about which he is not exactly behaving nobly. The Fuehrer refused to let him get a divorce. This, too, serves to play havoc with the Fuehrer's relationship to Frank. Nevertheless he wants to receive him within the next few days to determine whether he can still be saved, and if so, to strengthen his authority once more. Frank is not acting very sensibly in this whole situation. He vacillates between brusque outbursts of anger and a sort of spiritual self-mortification. That's no way, of course, to lead a people. One must have absolute self-assurance, as it is the only thing which can radiate assurance to others.

My measures concerning total war meet with the Fuehrer's full approval. In that connection he referred to my last address in the Sports Palace in the most flattering terms and characterized it as a psychological and propaganda masterpiece. He said he had carefully studied it from beginning to end, had heard of the echo it had awakened abroad, and had arrived at the conclusion that we had scored a bull's-eye. He was full of enthusiasm about its effect.

The Fuehrer fully endorses my anti-Bolshevik propaganda. That is the best horse we now have in our stable. He also approves of my tactics in letting the Bolshevik reports of victories go out into the world unchallenged. Let Europe get the creeps; it will regain its senses all the sooner. Besides, our anti-Bolshevik propaganda is the apple of discord in the enemy camp.

Nevertheless the Fuehrer does not want to consider a proclamation for the East at this time. The situation in the East does not yet seem to him stabilized or promising enough. He believes that Bolshevism is so hated and feared by the peoples of the East that the anti-Bolshevik tendency of our propaganda is quite sufficient. I tried again to convince the Fuehrer to the contrary. I believe, however, that the real reason [for his opposition] is his reluctance to do anything which might be interpreted as readiness to yield at a moment of temporary weakness. Once the situation in the East has become more clarified, I shall approach him again.

[Goebbels consistently opposed Rosenberg's policy of letting matters drift in the occupied sections of eastern Europe, and favoured a proclamation for the East, promising land to the peasants and freedom of worship.]

The Fuehrer was more approachable on the question of broad outlines for a European programme. Even though he does not want to go into details at this time—which was never my intention—he nevertheless gave me permission in my next address in the Sports

Palace to allude to this theme and even to outline it to a certain extent. I can do something with this permission.

To my great satisfaction I was able to inform the Fuehrer that one million labourers have now been mobilized by our measures.

I discussed Doenitz and Guderian at length with the Fuehrer; both enjoy his complete confidence.

I made complaint about a number of Reichsleiters and Gauleiters, whose standard of living is very much out of tune with the times. The Fuehrer had heard about this, too. He is going to forbid hunting for the duration of the war and the use of alcohol at any events sponsored by the Party. In principle only a one-course meal is to be served. That would mean considerable progress. As the Fuehrer informed me, some very unfortunate scenes took place in Munich on February 24, and these were even cases of complete drunkenness. The Fuehrer is disgusted. I hope he will take proper measures.

The Fuehrer is absolutely in the dark about the number of reserves the Bolsheviks still have at their disposal. They are already calling in the class of 1926, which is proof that they have made extremely heavy inroads on their manpower. The Fuehrer ventured the opinion that it was by no means impossible that they might collapse sooner or later. He does not want to build his policies and his war strategy, however, on such an assumption.

I also proposed to the Fuehrer that we should change the staffs more frequently in the occupied areas, especially in the West. The dangers of the city of Paris are very noticeable. The staffs in the Netherlands, according to Seyss-Inquart, are also exceptionally defective. The Fuehrer is now going to institute a system of guard replacements.

I told the Fuehrer about my visit to the bombed St. Hedwig's Church, about the feelers put forward by the Pope, and about the question whether in breaking up a number of publishing houses we should retain a few Christian ones. He heartily approves of my tactics in going carefully about the church question at present. We must proceed very smoothly and not get too embroiled in doctrinaire ideas.

There isn't much to be done with the Fuehrer about Bouhler, who has permitted quite serious corruption to gain a foothold in the Fuehrer's private chancellery. The Fuehrer is distinctly angry about it, and blames Bouhler for not having intervened in time. Certainly there seems no chance of getting him a new job at present.

[Hitler maintained four different chancelleries, each with a responsible chief. There was first, a chancellery charged with dealing with matters that came to Hitler in his capacity of chief of state—questions of pardons, etc. At its head was Dr. Otto Meissner. Next there was a chancellery which looked after matters devolving upon Hitler as chancellor, with Dr. Hans Lammers in charge. Then there was a chancellery dealing with Nazi party affairs, which was originally headed by Rudolf Hess, and later by Martin Bormann. The fourth, administered by Philip Bouhler, was for purely personal affairs.]

The Fuehrer then told me some funny stories about Grand Admiral Raeder and his somewhat bigoted Christianity which—and this was new to me—is not anchored in the Church but rests on pure fantasy.

The Fuehrer talked with a certain regret about Von Blomberg, whose loyalty towards him personally he praised very warmly. If all generals in important positions were equally faithful to the Fuehrer, things would be better with the Wehrmacht.

[Field Marshal Werner von Blomberg was Hitler's first Minister of War. Through an intrigue of Himmler's, a woman was brought into his life whom he married in ignorance of her past. Also unaware of her questionable reputation were Hitler and Goering, who were witnesses at the wedding. When the facts became known, General von Fritsch protested to Hitler who responded by discharging both Blomberg and Fritsch.]

Ribbentrop's conversations in Rome were a complete success. The Duce is now willing to take an energetic hand, both politically and militarily, but the Fuehrer doubts whether he will achieve results. Actually, the Duce has less power than would appear; the aristocracy and the court sabotage all his decisions. The Duce wants to hold Tunis at all costs, for reasons of domestic politics apart from anything else. But what is to happen if we are forced to abandon Tunis? That would be a heavy blow to Fascism.

That is why the Fuehrer would like to leave our anti-aircraft in Italy; he would then have a certain feeling of security about Italy. Also, he would like to propose to the Duce having ten to fifteen divisions of blackshirts trained in the Reich in methods of the Waffen-S.S. divisions. The Duce would then at least have a dependable guard in case the worst came to the worst. He can't depend upon his generals; they cheat him wherever they can.

The purpose of the general-post in Italy is undoubtedly to put Ciano in a corner. The Duce made a great fuss about it so that the elimination of Ciano should not draw so much attention. In any case, the Duce once more assured the Fuehrer most positively that he would go through thick and thin with us and never be unfaithful to the Axis. That is quite true. As long as the Duce is in control in Italy we can rest assured of the fidelity of Fascism.

As regards the military situation, the generals have been deceiving the Duce. He was given information about a number of painful facts. He immediately took very sharp measures. Whether he can prevail in the long run remains to be seen.

The last Rommel offensive was again betrayed by Italian prisoners of war. You simply can't trust the Italians. They are undependable, both militarily and politically.

The Fuehrer became exceptionally open-hearted and personal at the end of our discussion. He hides absolutely nothing from me. Intimate talks like that really strengthen one's heart. The Fuehrer assured me again and again that he was not only extremely satisfied with my work, but that he had the greatest admiration for it. German war propaganda was a masterpiece from beginning to end. I can therefore feel very proud of the recognition given me.

His only worry at present, he said, was his health. He doesn't know whether he will come through the war completely intact physically. "Once this war is ended!"—this turn of speech keeps recurring more frequently now with the Fuehrer. With a certain bitterness he observes he must conduct it with the present corps of generals. But once the war is over he wants to withdraw more than ever from military affairs and again devote himself to things that suit him much more personally.

He is most deeply shocked at the disloyalty of the generals. They are ungrateful, too, and there is no dependence on them.

The Fuehrer then withdrew for an hour as he had had no sleep until early in the morning.

Meanwhile I had a long talk with Speer on the results of my talk with the Fuehrer. He, too, believes that we should not touch on the question of Goering at the moment for tactical reasons. We must wait a while.

Speer showed me an interesting exchange of letters with Zeitzler and Fromm. Speer certainly took a high-handed line with these military gentlemen. Perhaps he even went a bit too far. But they make demands upon him that simply can't be met.

We talked about the new tank production. In point of numbers, we are of course far behind the Bolsheviks, English, and Americans taken together; with us the man and the quality of our material must decide the issue. Speer believes he can soon eliminate the mechanical defects of the "Tigers". The "Tiger" went through no real period of testing; it went, so to speak, from the factory directly into the battle. Naturally there are now faults to be eliminated. Nevertheless we save more time that way than when we let the customary full testing time elapse. The enemy at present has nothing to equal the "Tiger". Nevertheless the enemy's tank production is exceedingly dangerous for us. When we take into consideration what a reservoir of men and weapons the enemy still has, and add to it his general war potential, we must envisage a very long war. But I don't want to prophesy, for sometimes fate takes an unexpected turn and gives developments an entirely new turn.

In the evening I dined with the Fuehrer and Speer. The Fuehrer again briefed us on the general war situation. He gave high praise to the courage and slugging ability of the S.S. divisions. Sepp Dietrich enjoys his unlimited confidence. He considers him one of our best troop commanders and expects miracles from him. He is, so to speak, the Bluecher of the National Socialist movement.

If there were ever an attempt at revolt in Berlin by foreign workers, the Fuehrer would send his Leibstandarte to the capital; it would make an example of them that would quench any other hot-heads' desire for such excesses. After all, Sepp Dietrich once before beat down a revolt during the Stennes Rebellion; how much better would he do it now! There is, of course, the danger, as long as there are any Jews left in Berlin, that the Semitic intellectuals may combine with the foreign workers. That is why I shall have to get the Jews out of Berlin as quickly as possible, even though this involves some psychological problems.

‡ [Walter Stennes was one of the most extreme of Hitler's early adherents. Finding the Fuehrer too conservative, he staged a rebellion which was put down chiefly by Dietrich. Hitler excommunicated him from the Party on April 4, 1931, and there were a number of clashes between Stennes' adherents and Hitler's men in Berlin.]

The Fuehrer once more gave detailed expression to his opinion of the generals, for whom he has nothing but contempt. Like myself, he thinks you need only imagine these gentlemen in civilian clothes, to lose all respect for them. About Keitel, the Fuehrer can only laugh. The Fuehrer's experiences with the generals have embittered him beyond measure. He even becomes unfair and condemns decent officers as well en masse. One must therefore soft-pedal rather than resort to a crescendo.

After the war he wants to put his brown uniform cheerfully on again and have as little as possible to do with generals.

The Fuehrer is very angry about the behaviour of Field Marshal General Paulus. He believes, exactly as I do, that Paulus acted as the enemy reporters describe. After the war he is determined to make Paulus face a court-martial with all his generals since he acted contrary to a specific order to resist to the last round of ammunition. These generals hate the Fuehrer because they are uneducated, because they regard him as an upstart, and because they haven't the intuition to recognize his genius. That applies also to the Luftwaffe generals. The Fuehrer feels very hurt that Goering places such confidence in them.

The Fuehrer is making every effort to inject new blood into the officers' corps. Slowly but surely the basis of selection for officers is being changed in the Wehrmacht. Schmudt is here making a clean sweep just as Doenitz is doing in the Navy.

The Fuehrer is also very indignant about the Wehrmacht generals' lack of technical knowledge. They always pretend to know everything when in fact they know nothing. Even their great heroes are no exception. One need merely to think of Seeckt in that connection. But the Fuehrer won't let himself be influenced by any of these things. He sweeps clean wherever he finds dirt and doesn't hesitate about it. I believe that at the moment he is giving expression to his ill-humour more in words than in deeds, but everybody knows that with him that is always a prelude to action. . . .

[Colonel General Hans von Seeckt is generally credited with having been the father of the German postwar Reichswehr, a professional army of 100,000 men enlisted for a period of twelve years and staffed with officers from World War I. He took part in and spoke at the meeting of National Socialists, German Nationalists, and men unattached to any party, at Harzburg in 1932, which formulated plans for bringing the Weimar Republic to a fall. Dr. Schacht was also present and spoke.]

The Fuehrer showed the greatest understanding of psychological questions raised by the war and spoke in sharp terms about the impudence of prominent people and their wives. He criticized especially the behaviour of Frau Lutze and to some extent that of von Ribbentrop who acted disgracefully during the last air raid in Berlin. He confirmed once more that in situations like that I am the supreme and sole commander of the capital. The ministries, too, are to obey my orders. The entire public life is subordinated to me. In times of catastrophe only one person can give orders.

With regard to the Jewish question he approved of my measures and specifically ordered me to make Berlin entirely free of Jews. I shall see to it that there is no concubinage between Berlin Jews and foreign workers.

After the war we want to give Berlin a new profile. At present, of course, its municipal buildings cannot compete with those of Vienna. That, in the long run, constitutes a great psychological danger. Not to speak of Paris. After the war, therefore, tasks are awaiting us of a magnitude far beyond our imagination.

In the course of the evening we received the news that Nuremberg had suffered a heavy air raid. The Fuehrer is very much worried about the fate of this city. I telephoned to Nuremberg twice and asked for reports. The damage was not so great as we at first thought. The old part of the city, especially, has not been seriously hit, only Maut Hall has burned down. The Fuehrer ordered General Bodenschatz, who had just returned from Rome, to be pulled out of bed, and gave him a very serious talk about the air war. He had been with Goering and on the Fuehrer's order had informed him of the grave anxiety that the development of air raids is causing the Fuehrer. Goering now knows that it is the eleventh hour for him. . . .

The Fuehrer is certainly extremely dissatisfied with the present situation. He expressed his ill will in the bluntest fashion. He recapitulated how many orders he had given the Luftwaffe since the beginning of war, and even before, and how few of them were really carried out. Generals always knew better than the Fuehrer. That's what the German people now have to pay for.

This midnight discussion developed into a full-sized row. Speer and I had a hard time trying to calm things down. This was where our new friendship with Goering stood its first test. In spite of everything I considered it right to support him, for his authority must be preserved in all circumstances. Bodenschatz was very grateful to me. . . . He was very much alarmed by the Fuehrer's words. He wanted to telephone Goering in Rome that same night.

A long and intimate exchange of views followed, lasting until three in the morning. The Fuehrer was very open-minded and talked about all questions raised with a frankness that one seldom experiences with him. I am very happy that the Fuehrer sees things so clearly and so unvarnished, despite his seclusion at G.H.Q. That gives me all sorts of hope for the future.

He was very much touched when I bade him farewell. Once again I gained a large measure of strength and know what I must do.

March 10, 1943

During the evening, Naumann spoke to Walter Hewel at G.H.Q. Quite a number of the young men in the Foreign Office are enthusiastic supporters of my policies. They expect much of them for the future and impatiently watch the results that I have already achieved and am achieving.

[Walter Hewel was the Foreign Office liaison officer with the Fuehrer.]

I had a lot of work to do in the plane. Long dictation about my talk with the Fuehrer. Many other things. Hardly a chance to rest. I slept for only a little more than an hour during the night.

Brief landing in Warsaw. But I take no notice of the city; I would only get angry anyway.

Between Warsaw and Berlin we received news of an air-raid alert in Berlin. A couple of Mosquito planes managed to get through to the capital. We had to land at Frankfurt-on-the-Oder because of the Berlin anti-aircraft guns. That delayed us another half-hour, so that we did not arrive at Tempelhof until almost 2.30 p.m.

The alert had lasted for more than an hour. That shows how very inferior we are to the English in the air. They are constantly sitting on our necks. It is simply maddening that a great power that once enjoyed air superiority over all Europe can now be annoyed by such pinpricks of air warfare. This is an added proof that the measures indicated by the Fuehrer for the conduct of war in the air must speedily be carried out; otherwise the German people will become very impatient indeed.

Regarding Tunisia the English claim that Rommel has now been defeated completely. He has made no advance similar to El Alamein, they say, and Montgomery is now ready to make a final breakthrough. The situation in Tunisia has in fact become somewhat critical, especially along the Mareth line. We ought soon to make up our minds whether we can and want actually to hold Tunis or not. Half-way measures such as have hitherto been the order of the day simply won't do for us in the future. ;

The English plutocracy has turned against Cripps because of his pro-Bolshevik speeches. A series of letters from industrialists has been published in English papers that fits exactly into our line. Because of our well-planned campaign, anti-Bolshevism is the principal theme of discussion in the enemy camp today. English Government circles are afraid not only of the effects of our propaganda, but also of the allegedly energetic activity of German diplomacy in the neutral countries, of which I have until now observed but very little.

Opinion in the United States seems at present to be even more anti-Bolshevik than in England. The United Press, for instance, praises my propaganda very highly, although it also fears it.

Standley, the American Ambassador in Moscow, has made the sensational statement to the press that the Soviets have said nothing in their papers about the extent of United States aid to the Soviet Union in this war. There is pretty deep disappointment about this in the United States. Some people agree with Standley, others criticize him for letting the cat out of the bag. When Standley claims that the Soviet Union is acting as though it waged the war single-handed, that is actually true. This is certainly added proof of the extent of the differences in the enemy camp.

[Admiral William H. Standley was a member of the Anglo-American Mission to Moscow in 1941 and Ambassador to the U.S.S.R. in 1942-43.]

The former Italian Minister of Education, Bottai, has published an article; I haven't made up my mind whether it was inspired by Mussolini or directed against Mussolini. He declared that Italy's capacity for waging war must be drawn upon more completely than has hitherto been the case. The Fascist party must devote itself to serving the people more than before. Social justice was being demanded more and more insistently by the people. Now and then open criticism was quite legitimate. Technical knowledge rather than mere good intentions was essential in the ministries. Politeness in public offices toward the public was urgently desired. All that, Bottai claimed, did not constitute criticism but was an indication of Fascist maturity!

[Giuseppe Bottai was Italian Minister of Education from 1936 to 1943.]

March 11, 1943

My propaganda has now become the main theme of enemy news commentaries. A tremendous fuss is made about it—certainly a good thing for us. . . . The English newspapers state quite frankly that German propaganda is inspired and calculated to cause the greatest confusion in England and the United States.

The Research Office sent me a report commenting on a despatch from the Turkish Ambassador in the United States. The report reflects great fear and trembling about the growth of Bolshevism not only in the military field but also as regards propaganda and politics. From this report it can be inferred that the appetite of the Soviets has caused great consternation in Turkey. All this convinces me that our own greatest chance lies in anti-Bolshevik propaganda.

Sooner or later we must decide whether we can send greater reinforcements to our troops in Tunis, or whether we must give up our position there. Rommel has been to see the Duce about this. The Duce is naturally very much interested in the retention of Tunis. But there are other factors. Rommel will fly from Rome to the Fuehrer's G.H.Q. to discuss the entire problem once more with him.

Last night's air raid on Munich was extremely heavy. Many cultural monuments were damaged and some even destroyed. Again one asks: How is this to go on? If the English are in a position night after night to attack some German city, one can easily imagine how Germany will look after about three months unless we take effective countermeasures.

I discussed the reorganization of our civilian air defence with Schach. We have abandoned the idea of putting a fire watcher on every roof during an air raid. That would cause too many casualties. We'll try a compromise measure and merely have regular patrols of the houses under the direction of the air-raid warden. Unfortunately these wardens are not always very efficient, but that is mainly owing to the fact that all the men worth anything are now at the front.

From a letter from Murr I gather that prominent army officers at home are criticizing the Fuehrer very much. That is low-down and disgusting. Naturally a man like Keitel hasn't the necessary authority to stop this sort of thing. One can only agree with the Fuehrer's opinion of the top officers. They aren't worth a hoot.

[Wilhelm Murr was Gauleiter for Wuertemberg-Hohenzollern.]

The evacuation of Jews from Berlin has led to a number of untoward happenings. Unfortunately a number of Jews and Jewesses from privileged marriages were also arrested.

[Jews married to Gentiles were registered by the Nazis as living in "privileged wedlock". This meant that they were not originally liable for deportation and extermination. In the closing months of their regime the Nazis began arresting these Jews, too.]

The scheduled arrest of all Jews on one day failed because of the shortsighted behaviour of industrialists who warned the Jews in time. We therefore failed to lay our hands on about 4,000. They are now wandering about Berlin without homes, are not registered with the police and are naturally quite a public danger. I ordered the police, Wehrmacht, and the Party to do everything possible to round these Jews up as quickly as practicable.

The arrest of "privileged" Jews and Jewesses caused a terrific commotion, especially in artistic circles, since these marriages are still prevalent among actors. But I can't be squeamish about them. If a German still finds it possible to live with a Jewess as his legal wife, that's a point against him, and it's out of place to be too sentimental about this question in wartime.

In the evening I learned from G.H.Q. that the Fuehrer has started for the front. He wants to visit Manstein again to express his appreciation to him for the way he has conducted operations in the south. I don't like this at all. The Fuehrer doesn't seem to know how infamously Manstein behaved toward him, or, if he knows it, is too good-natured about the military leaders. Of course one must not forget that the Fuehrer is in a somewhat precarious position. At present his main interest naturally lies in quieting things down again at the front.

The Fuehrer has visited the southern front and was very favourably impressed. Morale of the officers and the soldiers is fantastically good, compared with his last visit.

Roosevelt seems to be cleverer than the others in the enemy camp. He let it be known through the press that he would attempt to arrive at an agreement with Stalin about territorial aims. Stalin, of course, will be careful not to fall for such an obvious American trick. There's certainly great excitement and deep discord on the enemy side.

The last air raid on Munich gave the English great satisfaction. They talk about the damage caused there with real cynicism.

The Fuehrer has ordered Goering back from Rome because of the constant increase in the number of English air raids on the Reich. Their meeting is to take place in the course of the day. The Fuehrer is determined to express all his misgivings about the war in the air and to insist that we make every effort to regain the initiative.

It is a good thing that Rommel, too, is to be at G.H.Q. during the Fuehrer's talk with Goering. He gave a report about Tunisia which pleased the Fuehrer tremendously. Rommel again holds all the trump cards. His talk with the Fuehrer went off wonderfully. In the afternoon there was a conference between the Fuehrer, Goering, and Rommel during which the question of reinforcements for Tunis was also discussed. It was agreed for the present that Tunis is to be held in all circumstances from special consideration for our Italian ally.

I went into the question of closing publishing houses as a measure of total war. I shall permit two Catholic and two Protestant houses to continue as a conciliatory gesture.

Total war is still the principal theme of public discussion. The whole people have taken to it enthusiastically. Some measures are widely criticized, not because they are too stringent but rather because they do not go far enough. A number of specific questions are debated, especially that of beauty parlours for the ladies. These play a curiously important role, especially in the large cities. Perhaps one must not be too strict about them.

The Fuehrer spontaneously awarded Rommel the diamonds to his Oak-Leaf Cluster decoration after their talk. Rommel certainly deserved this, for he is not only a great troop commander but also a courageous man who has proven himself worthy of this high distinction by his personal courage.

[The Nazis' highest decoration was the Knight's Cross of the Iron Cross. But this was subdivided. There were the Knight's Cross, the Cross with crossed swords, the Cross with oak-leaf cluster, and, in very exceptional cases—ordered by the Fuehrer himself—the oak-leaves were surrounded by diamonds.]

March 13, 1943

The Bolshevik steam roller has been brought to a standstill, and the Germans have wrought another miracle. They have triumphed over the peril in the East. All those who during the past winter lived in the utmost anxiety and fear, even though they praised Bolshevik successes, now feel born anew.

Sinclair, the English Minister for Air, delivered a speech that puts into the shade anything ever said. He proclaimed the British intention of causing a German migration of peoples from the big cities. The cynicism underlying such a statement simply cannot be beaten.

I have given instructions for greater restraint in reporting air raids. We reveal too much and thereby encourage the English to continue their attacks from the air. The English are very reserved about their own air warfare. We have to date not been able to reach even fifty per cent accuracy in estimating the effect of our raids on England, whereas the English know almost everything about the results of their attacks on Germany.

Reports from France indicate that the people there are very depressed, owing especially to the Sauckel programme. But we can't be squeamish now about French feelings and touchiness.

Goerlitzer has been my deputy as Gauleiter of Berlin for ten years. I invited the Kreisleiter and the Gauamtsleiter for a little celebration of this anniversary.

After the ceremony, I addressed the Berlin party sub-leaders on the present military and political situation, with special emphasis on the duties now devolving on the Party in Berlin. I discussed especially the theme of total war and its relation to the sort of proletarian cult of which there has been evidence here and there. It has happened, for instance, that well-dressed ladies have been insulted in the streets or in public conveyances on the ground that they were not living up to the requirements of total war. That, of course, is arrant nonsense. We must not make total war unpopular by such excesses. Total war does not involve a conscious and planned cult of the primitive. We do not become more primitive because of hatred or envy, but because the exigencies of war necessitate it. In no circumstances must it become a habit to look upon everyone who wears a starched collar as a less dependable Party member or as a poor representative of the idea of total war.

It won't do for total war to be interpreted in a lax manner in one province and very strictly in another. The fact that hair dyeing is forbidden to ladies in some provinces, but permitted in others, has resulted in the better-class ladies travelling from one gau to another for their beauty treatments. That, of course, is not what is meant by total war.

In the evening Speer, Funk, and Ley visited me. I gave them a brief survey of my last talk with the Fuehrer. They are well satisfied. All three are sad, however, that at present Goering's position with the Fuehrer is not very strong, so that I could not touch upon the particular question at issue. They realize, however, that my approach was the right one.

Funk is alarmed lest Krosigk's and Reinhardt's new tax decrees lead to complete extinction of private enterprise. This must not be allowed. If, after earning a certain income, people must give up 120 per cent of it in the form of taxes (as has actually happened in certain cases) no one will want to work hard or exert themselves, but will only do what is absolutely necessary.

In this connection I brought up the question of large families of children. We all agreed that parents with a high social standard who have many children must be accorded greater tax exemption than hitherto. At present the only parents of large families who benefit in this way come from the lower social classes.

Later in the evening the news reached us of another exceedingly heavy air raid on Essen. This time the Krupp plant has been hard hit. I telephoned to the Deputy Gauleiter, Schlessmann, who gave me a rather depressing report. Twenty-five major fires were raging on the grounds of the Krupp plant alone. Air warfare is at present our greatest worry. Things simply cannot go on like this. The Fuehrer told Goering what he thought, without mincing words. It is to be expected that Goering will now do something decisive.

[Fritz Schlessmann, although only Deputy Gauleiter, was in charge of the Essen area because the Gauleiter, Josef Terboven, was in Norway as Reich Commissioner.]

At midnight Funk suddenly rose to extend his congratulations upon the tenth anniversary of my taking over the Propaganda Ministry. Yes, indeed, ten years have passed since I created the Propaganda Ministry as a new instrument for leading the German people. I don't believe I need be ashamed of my ten years of labour. A ministry that then seemed something like a blank card has meanwhile become one on which we have written very legible and clear letters, easily readable both at home and abroad. I believe nobody in the world would deny the tremendous importance of the Propaganda Ministry to the German state in the shaping of its policies during the past ten years.

It is interesting to note from a letter from an important person at the front that the attitude of the German troops toward the Russian people and Bolshevism is occasionally quite different from what we believe. Here, for instance, the point is made that one can only get along with the Russians by being severe with them. There is no talk in that letter of any proclamation for the East. There is something to be said for this point of view, even though, on the other hand, more can be done with good propaganda than by none at all.

S.S. Group Leader Kaltenbrunner sent me a general report on enemy sabotage activity during the year 1942. It appears that it was rather over-estimated. While it is true that a number of regrettable events occurred, they did not affect the situation seriously. We can be quite satisfied with developments thus far, considering, after all, that we are now in the fourth year of war.

[Ernst Kaltenbrunner succeeded Reinhard Heydrich as chief of the Security Service. He was convicted of crimes against humanity at Nuremberg in 1946 and hanged. Kaltenbrunner was born in 1901, in Austria. He took part in illegal Nazi activities in Austria until the Anschluss in 1938 and was appointed by Hitler as S.S. and police leader for the Ostmark, as Austria thereafter was called.]

At noon I received the representatives of the foreign press accredited in Berlin to tell them, in a question-and-answer period, about the most important political, military, and personnel problems. Some very ticklish themes were touched upon, but I was easily able to out-play the questioners. I believe I have once again fought an important news battle by this reception. The echo in the foreign press will no doubt be very great, possibly even sensational.

During a war, news should be given out for instruction rather than for information. Not every item of news should be published; rather should those who control news policies endeavour to make every item of news serve a certain purpose. Unfortunately we do not always keep this in mind.

Eden had scarcely arrived in Washington before he unburdened himself of a series of pronouncements to the American press. In typical Yankee manner, he held forth on the international situation. All the commentaries on what he said indicate that the Anglo-Saxon powers are more violently opposed to the Soviets than ever. Washington is even outdoing London. The principal complaint is that Moscow will show no one its hand on either military or political questions: the Anglo-Saxon powers are increasingly annoyed at having to grope in the dark about the military situation in the East.

My recent interview with the foreign correspondents has had great repercussions in the neutral press. On the whole it was given splendid publicity and my arguments were reproduced pretty accurately. Neutral papers praise my interview especially for its astounding frankness and assert that among all the warring powers there is probably no other statesman who talks about the general situation with such candour. I am gradually beginning to believe that that is a very good trick. In war-time one can achieve certain successes by silence, but one can also gain certain results by very frank and candid talk. Since silence is normally the rule, speech seems something extraordinary. Its effect is all the more sensational and convincing.

Now that air raids on German cities are increasingly frequent, we are naturally getting shorter and shorter of artisans and materials for even partly repairing the damage. We are already being forced to transfer to Essen or Munich the companies of skilled workers which we sent, for example, to Duisburg. They can make only essential repairs and must then immediately be sent off to work where the damage is even worse. We should by no means believe that the worst is already over. The worst is yet to come!

The Bolsheviks have sustained terrible losses because of the wonderful preparations we made for our withdrawal [on the middle Eastern Front]. They ran into mine fields which we had laid out very trickily and they lost quantities of tanks and men.

Late in the evening the Fuehrer called me to brief me on the general situation. He was exceptionally happy about the way the S.S. Leibstandarte was led by Sepp Dietrich. This man has personally performed real deeds of heroism and has proven himself a great strategist in conducting his operations. The Fuehrer awarded him the Swords for his Knight's Cross tonight.

You just can't trust the Jews across the street. I therefore told the Fuehrer emphatically once more that I deemed it essential to force the Jews out of the entire Reich as quickly as possible. He approved, and ordered me not to cease or pause until not a single Jew is left anywhere in Germany.

The Fuehrer was in complete accord with my interview [for the foreign press]. He had read it with the greatest interest. . . .

The Fuehrer has awarded the Oak-Leaf Cluster to Manstein. Perhaps he deserved it because of his military achievement, but certainly not because of his human qualities or strength of character.

Giraud has again attracted attention by a speech. He praised democracy as desirable for the European states, prided himself on the fact that in Algiers he rescinded the anti-Semitic laws decreed by Vichy, and on the whole proved himself a devoted servant of the Anglo-Saxon powers. It is quite interesting to note that, wherever the English and the Americans go, their first act is that of rescinding the restrictions against Jews. It proves that in London, as well as in Washington, the Jews are playing a decisive role, even though behind the scenes.

There is much movement by the English along the Mareth line, and it is only a question of time before they launch their offensive. I doubt very much whether we shall be able to resist effectively. Rommel, incidentally, because of his impaired health, has gone to his family at Wiener Neustadt. That means that he will be entirely out of the next great battle in North Africa.

Florian gave me a telephone report on the results of English air raids on his province. These are more than serious. The dropping of forged food-ration cards from English planes is causing a lot of trouble. I had a press notice published in the provinces affected, stating that the use of forged food-ration cards will be punished severely, in certain cases even by death.

A new decree by the Fuehrer gives Sauckel complete authority over the departments of the Ministry of Labour now under his jurisdiction. Here we have another case of a ministry being done away with bit by bit without its head being removed. That is a very dangerous procedure which in the long run is harmful to authority. We are living in a form of state in which jurisdictions are not clearly defined. This is the reason for most quarrels among leading personalities and between the departments. In my opinion it would be a good thing if Sauckel or, better still, Ley were put in Seldte's place. That isn't done, however. Seldte is left at his post but is gradually undermined. The same is true of many other departments. As a result, German domestic policy completely lacks direction.

[Franz Seldte, who lost his right arm in World War I, was appointed Minister of Labour by Hitler as part of the bargain by which the Stahlhelm, a German veterans' organization of which Seldte was co-chairman with Colonel Theodor Duesterberg, agreed to support the Nazi regime. Duesterberg, who refused to collaborate with Hitler, was ousted from office and often persecuted. The Old Guard Nazis, such as Goebbels, Ley, and Sauckel, made no secret of their dislike of Seldte. Dr. Ley, especially, was very eager to succeed Seldte.]

I complained to Hunke because of his collaboration with the Foreign Office. The Foreign Office is creating great difficulty for us in our foreign propaganda. Unfortunately the Foreign Office lacks clear and purposeful leadership. Ribbentrop avoids decisions by simply not being where he can be found. I demand of Hunke that he hold his own energetically with the gentlemen of the Foreign Office. Now is the best moment for us to regain absolute and unlimited charge of foreign propaganda.

Since the invasion theme is again being emphasized [abroad], I have told our news and propaganda services to beat the big drum very hard. We must in no circumstances give any impression of weakness, even though our troop reserves in the West are at present very weak and we are still running a dangerous risk.

But I believe that sooner or later the English and the Americans will attempt to invade Europe and we shall inevitably have to beat them back. We must therefore handle the question with more assurance than the facts really warrant. Any indication of weakness would serve as an invitation to the enemy to invade.

I have therefore issued instructions for a firmer line to be taken on this question than hitherto. I am also having a trip to the occupied areas of the West organized for a number of journalists and broadcasters. I hope in this way to decrease the urgency of the invasion theme. Each day that we win is a clear gain. If the English wait another four or six weeks, their invasion—assuming they have really planned one—would stand very little chance of success.

Unfortunately I didn't get any farther on the question of propaganda in the occupied areas of the East and the Soviet Union. Following Lammers' report on my jurisdictional clash with Rosenberg, the Fuehrer made a compromise decision whereby my influence upon eastern propaganda is to be exerted in the same way as it is on other propaganda abroad; namely, through the so-called attaché system. I don't expect very much from this system; nevertheless I shall try to work along these lines and see how far I get. Next time I report to the Fuehrer I shall revert to this question. I can in no circumstances accept the present decision. The matter has quite obviously been reported wrongly by Lammers, and the Fuehrer's decision does not do justice to the facts. But I hope to get this remedied before very long.

Berndt visited me and reported about the present situation in North Africa, which is more than troublesome. We have about 75,000 men in North Africa and the Italians about 200,000. That is quite a concentration of troops, but it lacks weapons, fuel, and in some places even food. Only sixty per cent of the supplies reach Tunis; forty per cent must be written off as lost. What is being sent to the bottom of the ocean in the way of equipment almost baffles description; consequently we are short of these supplies at decisive points on the Eastern Front. Nevertheless the Fuehrer has decided that Tunis must be held as long as possible and has opposed every compromise proposal.

Rommel described in detail to the Fuehrer his difficulties with the Italians. Hearing his description one can understand why he fell ill. In North Africa actually almost half a dozen different command points are functioning one against the other—Rommel, Kesselring, Arnim, the Comando Supremo in Rome, the local Italian commander, etc. It is simply hopeless to try and wage war with authority and jurisdiction in such a muddle.

The English have concentrated considerable troops along the Mareth line and Berndt does not expect our own resistance to be great. Rommel was always against our trying to hold the Mareth line and really wanted to withdraw to the Gabes line. But this, too, was prevented by the different command points. . . . I believe we are facing very serious days in North Africa.

If the Italians were also to lose Tunis, a very serious crisis might conceivably ensue at this critical moment. If it were to happen in the summer, however,—that is, when we again have greater freedom of movement on the Eastern Front,—it could be neutralized to a great extent.

Rommel is now in Wiener Neustadt on several weeks' leave. The Fuehrer ordered him to have a complete medical overhaul. He may perhaps give him a command in the East, possibly that of reorganizing the Sixth Army and taking over its leadership. That, of course, would be a task worthy of Rommel's great talents and ambition.

As regards the general political situation, it is noteworthy that the Vatican has issued an extraordinarily sharp declaration against the forgery of a Spellman speech. The Vatican stated it had nothing whatever to do with the war aims of our enemies. This would indicate that the Pope is possibly closer to us than is generally assumed. Certainly there is no point in provoking him unnecessarily and offending him. He may eventually be very useful to us in a certain situation.

Neither Spain nor Portugal wants the enemies of the Axis to march through their territory. It is understandable that Spain has an appetite for Algiers, but for the present there seems to be no practical way of gaining possession of Algiers except by entering the war. But that is exactly what the Spaniards do not want to do.

The damage to Essen was very considerable. The evacuee problem there has assumed great proportions. There isn't a room available. Possibly we shall have to embark upon some form of compulsory billeting if we are to find any place at all for the homeless. I am informed that in Duisburg, for instance, certain families who were bombed out in mid-December of last year are still sleeping on straw. Conditions like that must not continue.

From a report by Petzke I gather that the industrial damage done to Berlin during the last air raid, while pretty extensive, could nevertheless be repaired within a short time. That is what I have always expected. Damage to industry is repaired more easily than damage to civilian objectives, for industry naturally can improvise much more easily than private individuals. Once again practical developments have proved my prognosis correct.

[Petzke was the Nazi in charge of industrial production in Greater Berlin.]

The Committee of Three met in the afternoon. There were a number of heated debates. The administration of justice is being overhauled exactly according to my ideas. Appeals in civil trials will no longer be possible in future.

The universities are not to be closed en masse, but only where mobilisation has made systematic teaching impossible. The students' relative importance to the state and their political dependability are to be investigated, and preference given to disabled and discharged soldiers. In future we shall see to it that daughters of rich families do not go to college to escape the labour call-up.

Next, a Fuehrer's Decree, drafted by Lammers, was read out, admonishing prominent persons in the state and the Party to behave according to wartime requirements. This decree is quite inadequate and I demanded something more severe. Some of those present opposed this, but I was able to press home my arguments on the basis of what Helldorf had told me about the Noethling affair.

This is a trial for profiteering, in which a number of prominent state and Party figures are involved, including Dr. Frick, Rust, Darré, and even Hierl, with Brauchitsch and Raeder as well. It is simply scandalous that such outstanding men should sabotage our war effort in this way. Now one can understand why there is so much whispering about the so-called "diplomats' ration". If such great quantities of food can be obtained without coupons, the fact cannot possibly remain a secret. I shall see to it that this evil is eradicated. I shall not, in any circumstances, permit any corruption which in the long run endangers the war effort. This is especially true of my own gau; if the failings of prominent people there go unpunished, the whole morale of the capital will suffer.

[Count Wolf Heinrich von Helldorf was one of Hitler's earliest followers, who achieved notoriety by staging anti-Semitic brawls in Berlin. Soon after the Nazis came into power he was appointed chief of police in Potsdam and then in Berlin. During the closing years of the regime, however, he lost faith in Hitler, was involved in the plot of July 20, 1944, arrested and executed.]

Noethling is not identified, but was probably a food dealer and seems to have been supplying food without coupons to Dr. Wilhelm Frick, Reich Minister of the Interior, Bernhard Rust, Minister of Education, Walther Darré, Minister of Agriculture, Konstantin Hierl, head of the Nazi Compulsory Labour Service, Field Marshal von Brauchitsch, and Grand Admiral Raeder.]

Terboven called me late in the evening from Oslo. He had taken a trip to the northern front and was very favourably impressed. He is happy about the deep impression my Sports Palace address made on Dietl, his officers, and men.

The second front theme is again being widely discussed. Our military men have let themselves be influenced by all this talk, and are expecting an attempt at invasion by the English this summer. I don't believe this will happen, but the second front is certainly the theme the enemy is emphasizing. We are using strong language and pointing out emphatically that we shall meet an invasion, no matter where it is attempted, with rigorous opposition, so that it will most likely end as Dieppe did.

Our submarines have again become a grave threat to England. An anti-submarine conference is being held to combat it, but to date nothing concrete seems to have developed. The resolutions adopted lack punch. After all, you can't conquer submarines with resolutions! Our strongest counterweapon to English air warfare is our submarine. I believe it inflicts at least as heavy wounds on England as the R.A.F. does on us.

Dr. Dietrich made an excellent short-wave broadcast to America in answer to the most recent effusions of the American Vice-President Wallace. The address was well organized and contained a number of extraordinarily effective anti-Bolshevik arguments. It showed up the pseudo philosophy of the American plutocracy.

[Dr. Otto Dietrich, Hitler's personal press chief, was in the anomalous position of being, on the one hand, one of the Fuehrer's most trusted collaborators—one of the few men who could report to him at any time without previous appointment—and, on the other hand, an undersecretary in the Propaganda Ministry, hence a subordinate of Dr. Goebbels. In addition, Dietrich, like Goebbels, was a Reichsleiter of the Nazi party, which gave him the rank of a cabinet member. It was therefore not easy to press him into the Goebbels mould.]

During the afternoon Speer, Ley, Funk, and I talked with Goering for almost three hours. We agreed on the course to be followed as regards domestic leadership.

Goering at first gave us a rather detailed exposé of his conception of the present division of power. On the whole he uses the very arguments that I presented on the Obersalzberg. It gives me great satisfaction to note what a deep impression my arguments have made on him. Next he analysed the Fuehrer's psychology, pointing out that it is all-important to handle him the right way and at the right time to support one's proposals with the right arguments. Unfortunately we were distinctly negligent in this respect, whereas Bormann, Lammers, and Keitel proceeded much more cleverly. That must be changed. Goering does not think very much of them.

So far as their authority and power are concerned, their relative importance is first Bormann, then Lammers, with Keitel an absolute zero. He is a locomotive that has run out of fuel, puffs out its last steam, and then suddenly stands still. Unquestionably these three intend to establish a sort of kitchen cabinet and to erect a wall between the Fuehrer and his ministers. The Committee of Three is to be the instrument for putting this scheme into effect. This is simply intolerable.

Goering made the serious mistake of letting the Council of Ministers for the Defence of the Reich fall into desuetude because it created so many difficulties for him with Lammers and the Fuehrer. Had he kept it active from the beginning of the war, German domestic policy would not have got into its present mess. But Goering can say in self-defence that the right men with power, who have genuine and not delegated authority, were not at his disposal. The Council of Ministers for the Defence of the Reich ought to be revived with the essential proviso that it be supplemented by several strong men. We are thinking mainly of Speer, Ley, Himmler, and myself. Funk is already a member, and we shall have to put up with Frick whether we like it or not, since he has been a member from the beginning in his capacity as plenipotentiary for the Reich Administration.

We agreed to proceed by having Goering propose in his next report to the Fuehrer that German domestic leadership be made more definite and that for this purpose the Council of Ministers for the Defence of the Reich should be revived and supplemented.

Goering wants to make an early appointment with the Fuehrer, if possible within the next few days, since they will both be on the Obersalzberg in connection with the Duce's visit. After that we want to go to work without much ado and not concern ourselves so much with negotiations and intrigues as with practical measures. Goering is extremely enthusiastic about my plans. He undoubtedly realizes clearly that things can't go on as they are at present and that something fundamental must be done if his authority and his position are to be saved and if domestic policies are to be redirected into the right channels.

Whenever Goering cannot himself preside over the Council of Ministers for the Defence of the Reich, which is to meet every week, he wants me to be chairman. This is to develop into my becoming his permanent deputy. Lammers would thereby be relieved unostentatiously of his post as deputy to Goering and pushed back into the secretarial position which had always been intended for him. Bormann and Keitel, too, are really nothing but departmental secretaries to the Fuehrer and have no authority to act on their own. They are assuming authority at present because the persons who were given far-reaching powers by the Fuehrer failed to use them. I am thinking chiefly of Goering who, during the past three-and-a-half years of war, has committed very grave errors. He realizes that perfectly today. Lammers can of course continue to prepare the minutes of the Council of Ministers for the Defence of the Reich, but he must not blow himself up into a sort of Reich chancellor and try to act as a superior officer to other ministers.

Once we have a clear domestic leadership, it won't be difficult to curb some of the more recalcitrant Gauleiters. We are thinking, for instance, of summoning any Gauleiter who refuses to obey before the Council of Ministers for the Defence of the Reich, where his eyes will be opened. Of course we must proceed very carefully so that the members of the Committee of Three do not get wind of our scheme prematurely.

We also talked at length about air warfare. Goering still is not fully aware of the extent of the damage done to property and persons. For instance, he was absolutely flabbergasted when I told him almost seven hundred people had been killed in Berlin. Nor did he know the full extent of the material damage to Berlin. But he, too, now realizes that the English air raids can be stopped only by counter-terror. There is no point in attacking English industrial cities and ports; one must strike the English where they are most easily inclined to defeatism; namely, in the residential sections and the homes of the plutocracy.

Goering can't understand why the English don't attack the Ruhr Valley without respite, for we have there a number of very dangerous bottlenecks. But English air strategy has never been anything but an imitation of the German. The English have never really invented anything original, but have always merely imitated what others did before them.

The whole tenor of our talk with Goering was excellent. I have the impression that the serious situation of the Reich has brought the responsible men together much more closely than seemed possible in peaceful and happy times. Goering seemed somewhat more positive than on the Obersalzberg. Obviously, the fact that I told him to wake up had made a deep impression on him. Speer, Funk, and Ley are of one mind. They are working most energetically for me. I believe our group will have a determining influence on war and peace.

In the evening I received the latest news from the Fuehrer's G.H.Q. about the present situation. In the East everything is going well. The S.S. formations, especially, are winning one victory after another. The Fuehrer desires that Sepp Dietrich's achievements should be given more publicity. He is not to be classed as a mere "also ran" among the generals. This idea of the Fuehrer's strikes me as absolutely right. I had already myself suggested that the S.S. should be given a bigger build-up than hitherto in the news releases.

The Fuehrer has reached a decision about the so-called Exhibition of Young Art in Vienna. He has expressed violent disagreement with Schirach's cultural policies and has ordered that Vienna's cultural affairs are to be placed under my direct supervision. If the Viennese object, all subsidies from the Reich will be cut off. That would, of course, mean the ruin of Viennese cultural life. This shows again that the Fuehrer is quite amenable to strong arguments provided they are presented to him in the right way.

¶ [Goebbels considered cultural matters to be exclusively under his jurisdiction, and when a younger leader like Baldur von Schirach, former Reich Youth leader and now Gauleiter of Vienna, dared to inaugurate policies of his own, Goebbels was quick to denounce such an upstart to the Fuehrer. In this case it was easy to get Hitler's ear, as the Fuehrer had ideas of his own about art and thoroughly disapproved of modernism.]

Magda, unfortunately, is not well. She is having a hard time recovering from her illness. She hopes, nevertheless, to be able to come home for a few hours this week end. I'm quite worried about her illness. The war depresses her not only physically but also psychologically.

I have received a number of reports from the front about our retreats during the past winter. The events that transpired were nothing to be proud of. The road from Rostov to Taganrog looked very much like another Dunkirk. Evidently enormous quantities of equipment, especially of the heavier kind, were lost.

A number of regrettable incidents occurred in Kharkov. Courts-martial are still pending. The commandant of Kharkov had reported that all supplies were destroyed before retreating. When our troops regained possession of Kharkov again, however, they found large quantities of our supplies still undestroyed. The Fuehrer ought really to take severe action. The zones behind the front lines have developed into real centres of corruption during these three-and-a-half years of war.

The Jews all over the world are trying hard to make Bolshevism look innocuous and to represent it as a lesser danger than National Socialism. The present slogan of Jewish circles in London and Washington is that the Soviet Union is destined to lead Europe. That, of course, is grist for our anti-Bolshevik propaganda mill.

The English are now making daylight raids more frequently, and it is surprising how few losses they sustain. I wonder whether they intend to attack Berlin with large formations on Heldengedenktag [Memorial Day]—who knows? We have taken precautionary measures in case this happens; the people, too, seem to fear something of the sort.

The Turkish Foreign Minister delivered an exceptionally pro-British speech. We fared rather badly in it. We are releasing only a few lines to the German press. In this speech he emphasized the great friendship that binds Turkey and England together. This must be about the last aftertaste of our great losses in the winter. They are still having very formidable political repercussions.

Franco, too, addressed the Cortes, the new sham parliament of Falangism. While he sharply attacked Bolshevism, he also expressed himself as very sceptical about the war. He suspects it may last another six years, and doubts whether at the end of it there will be either victors or vanquished. Otherwise the speech contains nothing of importance. Franco is the typical bourgeois coward who is glib at turning phrases but vanishes into thin air when action is necessary.

I received a report about the activities of the "young French Revolutionaries" who have withdrawn into the mountains to escape being drafted for work in the Reich. It is, so to speak, a revolution of lazy people who want to defend their right not to work. It strikes one as very provincial stuff.

Many rumours are afloat. Not even the Fuehrer is exempt, since most of them are concerned with the condition of his health. It is essential that he speak next Sunday. This whole wave of gossip will then be calmed in no time.

[The occasion of Hitler's Sunday speech was the Heldengedenktag, or Heroes' Memorial Day.]

March 20, 1943

It still remains to be seen whether an invasion will actually be attempted. Should the English and the Americans do so, they will most assuredly look for a point where we are not very strong. I don't believe that the invasion will take place in the west, but more probably in the south or south-east. But these are mere conjectures without any basis of fact.

North Africa has priority in all the enemy news reports. We have evacuated Gafsa, and the Englishmen blow this up into a gigantic success. The Americans boast of their alleged victory. In reality it isn't a victory at all.

Gienanth has sent me a report about our psychological position in Tunisia. The French have proved exceptionally poor soldiers.

They desert and are happy to be transported back to France. Nothing is to be expected militarily of the French. The American soldiers are considered by our troops to be the worst possible, not only because they have had no combat experience but also that they are simply not cut out to be soldiers.

Our propaganda in Tunisia is having excellent results. We are especially successful with the Arabs, who are absolutely hostile to the English and the Americans. The Americans, ignorant both of the situation and the Arab mentality, have made a number of psychological blunders which are having their effect.

In London as well as in Washington there is great disappointment about the lack of Soviet successes; at least a show of disappointment is being put on. In reality I believe Anglo-Saxon statesmen are as relieved in their hearts as if they had shed the burden of tons of rock.

The Americans undertook a great daylight raid on Bremen and inflicted heavy industrial losses. It is really infuriating to think that the Anglo-Saxon air powers are now in a position to blast the Reich with such formidable day raids. We shall have to make a tremendous effort to regain even half of the ground we have lost.

Gauleiter Florian made a number of valuable suggestions during a long talk about air warfare. Florian has seen the damage in Essen and described it to me as exceptionally heavy. The English operated there with absolute precision, and even if the claim that Krupp has been 80 per cent destroyed is terribly exaggerated, we must nevertheless expect serious stoppages of production.

From a report by Fritzsche I gather that the English and the Americans have greatly expanded their broadcasts to Axis countries and intend to increase them even more. If we don't want to be put completely on the defensive, we, too, will have to do more about this. It is very difficult, however, to make arrangements with the Postal Ministry, for the Post Office Department is mostly filled with bureaucrats who lack any understanding of improvised intellectual warfare.

Both Moscow and London have turned vehemently against the Polish émigré clique, which is making exorbitant territorial demands. The Moscow jargon is absolutely Bolshevistic. It attacks them as derelict landed nobility and reactionaries. The leaders of the neutral countries are here getting a foretaste of what events would be if the Soviets were actually in power.

I discussed the question of better propaganda for the German Navy with Commander Meckel. A lot was left undone in this respect by Raeder. Doenitz, on the other hand, is very anxious that the Navy should be given more publicity than hitherto.

The Ministry of the Interior is a bureaucratic hydrocephalus entirely unsuited to political leadership.

I discussed with Schach how the women who have volunteered for work can be integrated into the industrial process. The labour offices are mostly quite unable to cope with this situation. On the one hand industry lacks manpower, on the other hand the labour offices are not in a position to send the volunteer women to their jobs quickly. I am going to get the Party to handle this in Berlin, so that the process of inducting women into the munitions industry will move a little faster.

The new taxes are almost ready to be announced. I prevailed in practically every instance, and my suggestions were accepted by the Finance Ministry. In other words, the tax on cinema and theatre tickets will be only 50 per cent, and the income-tax for fathers with many children in the better classes of society will also be reduced.

Colin Ross delivered a speech in Salzburg which is very open to challenge. He acted the part of a fanatic for truth and even criticized the German leadership quite unjustifiably. I am going to stop him short.

[Colin Ross frequently visited the United States and wrote many articles about America, as representative of the Berliner Morgenpost and other publications of the Ullstein Publishing House. The Dies Committee on December 28, 1939, recommended his expulsion from America. The German Embassy in Washington on August 30, 1940, protested against his being described as a Nazi spy. On the same day Ross himself issued a statement denying all these allegations.]

In the evening the Fuehrer arrived in Berlin. He asked me to come and talk over a number of things. I was happy to find him so cheerful and healthy. At the moment he is most concerned about air warfare. I reported my experiences about Essen. For the most part he was already aware of all this. I am very happy that the Fuehrer accepted Schlessmann's suggestion and placed empty or sparsely inhabited villas at the disposal of the evacuees.

I proposed to the Fuehrer that in future we should bomb not slums but the residential sections of the plutocracy when making air raids on England. According to my experience this makes the deepest impression. The Fuehrer agrees. It doesn't pay to attack harbours or industrial cities. At present we haven't sufficient means for such attacks. The Fuehrer agrees that air warfare against England must now be conducted according to psychological rather than military principles. It is of course very difficult to make this clear to the Luftwaffe since it has remained completely in its old rut. Our air reprisals cannot begin for another five or six weeks. Then, however, they can be carried out on a pretty large scale. The Luftwaffe has accepted this new policy for air warfare, but only slowly and grudgingly. The Fuehrer remains deeply dissatisfied with the Luftwaffe generals.

As regards the situation in the East, the Fuehrer is very happy that he has succeeded in completely closing the front again. The Soviets are now running into German defence positions and suffering enormous losses of men and equipment. The Fuehrer, of course, doesn't know exactly how long the Soviet Union can still hold out, but he believes that, once this colossus begins to totter, it will suffer a historic collapse. The Fuehrer thinks this will begin, not with a lack of supplies, but of manpower. The Soviets have sustained such bloody losses during the past winter that they simply cannot stand them much longer, though of course no one can say for how long. We must continue to fight stubbornly and tenaciously until the enemy is knocked out. At that moment the war will have taken a decisive turn. Our army will then be recognized as the best and most experienced in the world, fitted with the best equipment, and made up of men who are entirely confident of victory. Then we need no longer fear the Anglo-American invasion, which at present is still something of a nightmare to us.

The Fuehrer intends to give a comprehensive picture of the present situation on the Eastern Front in his [Memorial Day] speech which is comparatively short, running to only fifteen pages. I am glad that the speech isn't too long, for if a British air raid were to take place during the address, it would be very unnerving.

I discussed with the Fuehrer the damage inflicted by air raids. In Munich the English caused terrible destruction. The Fuehrer showed me a city map of Munich on which the places hit were indicated. Cultural monuments, especially, were irreparably destroyed.

The Fuehrer agrees on the whole with the measures for total war. He merely complains of the way in which the bureaucracy always resists them. In some cases this opposition is simply intolerable and, as I tried to impress on the Fuehrer, can be broken only by severe punishment.

The Fuehrer is pleased with my report that the Jews have for the most part been evacuated from Berlin. He is right in saying that the war has made it possible for us to solve a whole series of problems which could never have been cleared up in normal times. The Jews will certainly be the losers in this war, whatever happens.

The Fuehrer asked me a lot of questions about my health. Unfortunately what he tells me about his own is none too good. He has stomach trouble, but Professor Morell has succeeded at least in freeing him of pain and bodily discomfort. Otherwise he is in good form. I was able to confirm that during our talk. At midnight the Fuehrer went to his private rooms.

[Professor Theodor Morell was Hitler's personal physician. In his The Last Days of Hitler (Macmillan, 1947), H. R. Trevor-Roper describes him as a "quack . . . a gross but deflated old man, of cringing manners, inarticulate speech, and the hygienic habits of a pig—a charlatan."]

If the Wehrmacht were really combed out, we would not have to worry about the lack of manpower at the front. The trouble is that the front usually doesn't get the men; they are simply swallowed up by the zones farther back.

In this connection it is interesting to note that the Wehrmacht demands food rations for thirteen million soldiers, whereas actually only about nine million have been called up. I brought this matter to the Fuehrer's notice, because it may enable us to avoid a cut in meat rations. The Fuehrer is having the figures checked. One can see from this incident how irresponsibly certain circles use figures. Statistics not only prove, they also lie. Anybody who depends wholly on statistics risks serious trouble.

[Entries for the next nineteen days are missing.

During this time, the British Eighth Army penetrated the Mareth Line in North Africa and captured Gabes; United States troops pierced a twenty-mile hole in the enemy's lines in central Tunisia. De Gaulle and Giraud had their final clash, which resulted in Giraud's withdrawal from the scene.

The troubles the Nazis were incurring at home and in the occupied countries was indicated by the blowing up, by saboteurs, of the large bridge across the river at Frankfurt-am-Oder on April 4, and the announcement next day that Daladier, Blum, Gamelin and Reynaud had been transferred from France into German prisons.

On April 9, when the entries are resumed, Hitler and Mussolini were still conferring. Their meeting had started on April 6.]

The situation in Tunis offers the enemy a welcome opportunity to blow the trumpet of victory. Events there are represented as a complete victory for the Anglo-Saxons. It is claimed that the English and Americans have meanwhile joined forces and that central Tunisia is completely in the hands of our enemies. Their only problem is what to do with the numerous prisoners. Rather modestly they add that at present it is only a question of Italian prisoners. Their triumphant cries really get on one's nerves, and unfortunately they are not entirely without background and reason.

A report on the interrogations of American prisoners is really gruesome. These American soldiers are human material which can in no way stand comparison with our people. One has the impression one is dealing with a herd of savages. The Americans are coming to Europe with a spiritual emptiness that really makes you shake your head. They are uneducated and know nothing. For instance, they ask whether Bavaria belongs to Germany and similar things. One can imagine what would happen to Europe if this dilettantism were to spread unchallenged. But we, as it happens, shall have something to say about that!

Eden made a statement in the House of Commons about his trip to the United States. It contained only generalities—another proof that his journey was not very successful. Eden admits openly that England and the United States have different views about the postwar period. It may be supposed that this question was the main reason for Eden's visit. As he could produce no practical results he resorted to cheap phrases; the House gave him a frosty reception and the Labour party urged an early debate on his speech.

Dependable reports by our espionage services indicate that the Soviets will after all be able to call up another two and a half million soldiers this summer and during the autumn. However, they will certainly be of poor quality.

Polish mass graves have been found near Smolensk. The Bolsheviks simply shot down and then shovelled into mass graves some 10,000 Polish prisoners, among them civilian captives, bishops, intellectuals, artists, etc. Above these mass graves they built installations of various kinds to cover up any possible traces of their dastardly deeds. The secret of these executions leaked out through local inhabitants, and their gruesome aberrations of the human soul were revealed. I saw to it that the Polish mass graves were inspected by neutral journalists from Berlin. I also had Polish intellectuals taken there. They are to see for themselves what is in store for them if their wish for a German defeat at the hands of the Bolsheviks should ever be fulfilled.

I received Gauleiter Giesler of Munich. He told me about the extraordinary difficulties with which he is having to cope in the capital of our movement. He has made a number of psychological mistakes, and now everybody is trying to get their own back. Hermann Esser is especially active as he is gambling on getting the Munich Gauleiter post. Giesler did the cleverest thing possible—he went straight to the Fuehrer, reported the situation, and assured himself again of the Fuehrer's absolute confidence. Giesler is certainly having a very difficult time. He complains a lot about the prima-donna behaviour of Clemens Krauss, who is gradually getting on everybody's nerves. I am going to tell the Fuehrer about this.

[Paul Giesler, former Gauleiter for southern Westphalia, succeeded to the Munich post when Adolf Wagner, one of Hitler's oldest associates, died in 1943. Clemens Krauss was formerly conductor of the Vienna and Berlin state operas, and at this time was musical director general of the Munich State Opera. Hermann Esser was one of Hitler's earliest followers and collaborators, but not a man of outstanding ability. He held Nazi party membership card No. 2, and, as he looked rather like Hitler, tried in every way to copy his mannerisms and gestures. He was finally given a berth in Goebbels' Propaganda Ministry, where he held the high rank of Under Secretary—second only to Goebbels—in charge of travel propaganda. Hitler dreamed of making Germany the greatest tourist country on the European continent.]

Admiral Canaris gave me a verbal report on the work of our counter-espionage. I gather that it has done better than I assumed.

Unfortunately the results of its work were mishandled. Thus, for instance, our counter-espionage reported the North African undertaking of the English and Americans as well as the meeting at Casablanca well beforehand, but these facts were not reported to the Fuehrer sufficiently clearly. Canaris told me a number of details about his work which were extremely interesting.

Canaris also claims that our counter-espionage predicted Russia's war potential correctly, especially heavy tank production for the Bolshevik Army. Unfortunately the right conclusions were not drawn from this report. I arranged with Canaris that we should work together more closely in future. He wants to report to me at regular intervals so that, if necessary, I may bring my influence to bear on the Fuehrer. Canaris on the whole makes a good impression, certainly better than I expected.

Schloesser reported to me about his trip to Vienna. Schirach was given a harsh dressing-down by the Fuehrer on the Obersalzberg because of his policy about art. I do not think we shall have to worry about Viennese art in future. Schirach will no doubt be more careful and will refrain from delivering irresponsible and dilettante speeches on the subject.

[Rainer Schloesser, born July 28, 1899, was official Reich Dramatist in Goebbels' Propaganda Ministry. Before Hitler's advent to power he had been the Kultur editor of the Nazi official organ, the Voelkischer Beobachter.]

During the afternoon I worked on my speech for the Fuehrer's birthday. The task is especially difficult this time, calling for infinite tact in its presentation. But I believe I succeeded in developing a convincing argument.

In the evening I started for Essen with a large entourage. We had long discussions in our special coach. Field Marshal General Milch spoke in terms of sharpest criticism about the Reich Marshal. He blames him for having let technical research in the German Luftwaffe run down completely. The Marshal, he said, had gone to sleep on the laurels won by the Luftwaffe in 1939 and 1940. The worst factor of all had, in his opinion, been the part played by General Udet who, before his collapse, had committed sins of omission on a scale deserving to be commemorated by history.

He then described in detail the various measures he has undertaken to remedy the situation. In his opinion it will not be possible to make any sort of showing against the English before November and we shall not be able really to pay them back in kind until next spring—a year from now. A number of new types [of planes] have been developed but it will be a long time before large-scale production is under way.

Until then the English can lay a large part of the Reich in ruins if they go about it the right way. Milch regards our situation in the air as very serious. He is much worried about it, and says that the Reich Marshal's prestige has suffered very much. One cannot call Milch a pessimist. While he sees the tremendous danger threatening us in Tunis, nevertheless he does not consider the situation there as lost. He claims that our Sixth Army in Stalingrad could have been extricated and that, had he been in command, he would have retreated even in the face of the Fuehrer's orders to the contrary.

This led to a long debate about the right of a military leader to act in violation of orders from his supreme commander if he deems this in accordance with his duties. I opposed this view energetically. Possibly examples can be cited from history to prove that such action was successful now and then, but one must never establish it as a principle.

Milch confirmed reports that the Fuehrer was exceedingly angry about the development of the German Luftwaffe. He expressed himself in the most furious and unrestrained language before the generals of the Luftwaffe, not even sparing the Reich Marshal. For these reasons, again, it is urgently necessary to give Goering greater support. His authority must in no circumstances be lost.

[Field Marshal Erhard Milch did not show much gratitude or friendship in discussing Goering and Udet. Milch was one of the three head directors of the German Lufthansa, or civilian airways corporation, at the time the Nazis took over. Goering, who had known Milch as an army pilot during World War I, made him Under-secretary in the Air Ministry as soon as that new department was organized by the Nazis in 1933 with Goering as minister. This made Milch his second in command. Later, when Goering defiantly announced to the world at a dinner of the Foreign Press Association in 1935 that the Nazis had rearmed in the air in violation of the Treaty of Versailles, Milch was given the rank of lieutenant general of the air force, again second only to Goering. His rapid rise continued—in 1936 he was made a full general, in 1938 chief of staff, and in 1940 field marshal. He may therefore be presumed to have had quite as much responsibility for the Luftwaffe's failure as Goering.]

Milch was often to be seen dining at Horcher's, the fashionable Berlin restaurant, with General Ernst Udet, the well-known stunt flier and air "ace" of World War I, whom Goering had put in charge of all technical inventions and developments in the Luftwaffe. Udet committed suicide in 1941. The official explanation was that he had been killed while trying out a new weapon.]

April 10, 1943

The English have issued pompous communiqués about their air raids and the damage caused. Their claims on the whole are accurate. English espionage service in the Reich is functioning alarmingly well.

The world is full of rumours, such as, for instance, that King Boris has met Inonu near Constantinople and has had a number of talks with him. The English are guessing at the reasons for the Duce's visit to the Fuehrer. They claim the meeting took place on the Brenner and that the only question at issue was the defence of the southern Italian coast. The English don't know that the meeting is still in progress, on the Obersalzberg. So we needn't reproach ourselves for having known only about a meeting of Churchill and Roosevelt but not that it took place at Casablanca.

Kallay addressed the (Hungarian) Government party. His speech was only partially firm. He blew a little incense in our direction, but only weakly. He talked much more enthusiastically about his trip to Italy. He declared tactfully that the Duce had assured him of his wholehearted support of Hungary's policies. He forgot to add what these policies are and to what goal they will lead. Nor did he say that Hungary would fight until victory is won—merely that he intends to continue the war.

We arrived in Essen before 7 A.M. Deputy Gauleiter Schlessmann and a large staff called for us at the railway station. We went to the hotel on foot because driving is quite impossible in many parts of Essen. This walk enabled us to make a first-hand estimate of the damage inflicted by the last three air raids. It is colossal and indeed ghastly. This city must, for the most part, be written off completely. The city's building experts estimate that it will take twelve years to repair the damage.

The senior city officials reported to me on the extent of present damage. A map on which total destruction is indicated in red gives an over-all picture of the extent of the damage. It is terrifying. I believe Essen today is the city hit hardest of all by English raids.

At ten o'clock there was a meeting in the Saalbau, attended by the Gauleiters of all western provinces, the members of my own official party, Dr. Ley, and a number of mayors from the cities which suffered most.

[The Saalbau was a large municipal auditorium in the City Park on the southern outskirts of Essen.]

The Gauleiters in their observations on the situation severely criticized the bureaucracy in Berlin. They exempted only the Propaganda Ministry and, surprisingly enough, also the Food Ministry. Backe, who was present and did some talking, was told that the food situation in the various gaus is exemplary. . . .

On the question of evacuating women and children I spoke earnestly against coercion. A little moral persuasion can be applied, but I am sure it is not feasible to take children away from their mothers by force and evacuate them.

The construction of bunkers and bombproof shelters is the most immediate problem. In some cities, the population is defenceless and completely at the mercy of English air raids; there is a shortage of manpower and materials for building bunkers, and here the rest of the Reich will have to lend a helping hand.

Anti-aircraft was partly praised, partly criticized. The main criticism was that there is too little of it. Quite right. All the speakers criticized the Luftwaffe and Goering unsparingly. Milch replied to these charges.

In a concluding word I summarized all the questions raised. Our meeting lasted almost four hours and was one of the most useful that I have experienced in the history of the Party. Here real men were talking—man to man. We minced no words and each problem was tackled squarely. Nobody acted like a cat walking around a hot dish.

Then we all made a tour of Essen. Only by going on such a trip can one really estimate the damage. It was terrible. One's heart shudders on revisiting and seeing, in their present condition, streets and squares which were once so beautiful. I suffered almost physically at the sight, for I have known Essen well ever since my childhood and I can draw comparisons between what was and what remains.

I paid a short visit to Krupp's to inspect the destruction there. I was received by young Bohlen, who has taken over the management of the plant in the place of his father. Old man Bohlen, now seventy-two years old, is already rather gaga. Young Bohlen does not impress me as very active but he has great charm. Only time will tell whether he is equal to managing this gigantic undertaking employing nearly two hundred thousand workers, including branch offices and plants.

[Gustav Krupp von Bohlen und Halbach was born Gustav von Bohlen und Halbach. His immediate predecessor, Alfred Krupp, a son of the founder, had but one child, Bertha, after whom the German big gun of World War I was named. When Herr von Bohlen, then a young diplomat in the German Foreign Office, married Bertha Krupp, his name was changed with the Kaiser's permission to Krupp von Bohlen und Halbach, thus perpetuating the name of Krupp. Gustav Krupp von Bohlen und Halbach was among the twenty-two Nazis indicted for major crimes, but by the time the Nuremberg trial opened was suffering from such severe arteriosclerosis that the indictment was dropped.]

I demanded a substantial increase in the number of anti-aircraft at Krupp's. Milch tried energetically to defend the Luftwaffe. But he is in a pretty hopeless position.

Nobody can tell how Krupp's is to go on. Everyone wants to avoid transplanting Krupp's from Essen. There would be no purpose in doing so, for the moment Essen is no longer an industrial centre the English will pounce upon the next city, Bochum, Dortmund or Duesseldorf. The position must be maintained as long as possible.

It does seem important to me, however, that we should evacuate the women and children from Essen.

Finally we went through the old part of the city. Sometimes we walked, as vehicles can only get through some of the streets. Destruction is complete in many places. Sometimes one would like to avert one's eyes and not see all this devastation. Now at last I have a real picture of what English air warfare means. My views on this problem are not only confirmed, but more than confirmed. I foresaw developments correctly and tried in good time to draw the necessary conclusions.

April 11, 1943

Although the English and Americans have become more reserved in their boasts about the situation in Tunis, we must not deceive ourselves, but realize that our situation there is almost hopeless. The enemy press is now attacking Rommel in an infamous and shameless way. That is too bad, especially since he has had nothing whatever to do with Tunisia recently. The Fuehrer is keeping him in reserve for a greater task.

Our North African undertaking has cost us much equipment and blood. When all is said and done, the Italians are really responsible. They ought at least to have prepared sufficiently to hold their overseas possessions. Worse than that, they can't even protect their own country. Our allies are certainly the worst in the world!

An imposing funeral has been arranged by the local authorities for the victims of an American bomb attack on Antwerp. The English and Americans have so far taken no notice whatever of our propaganda about Antwerp. That is proof of their bad conscience. It supports our idea of making a first-class propaganda matter of the Antwerp incident.

[On April 5, 1943, United States planes, convoyed by British and Canadian aircraft, bombed the industrial area of Antwerp at a loss of nineteen planes. Berlin claimed 2,000 Belgians had been killed.]

The British are at present waging an intense war of nerves in Turkey. It looks as though the British Government were determined at all costs to draw Turkey into its strategy.

Further proof of this was brought to me by Admiral Canaris who came with several officers to brief me on the enemy's intentions about an invasion. It would appear that the English and the American invasion will have Sardinia and Sicily as its target, and possibly also the southeast, so as to come close to the Rumanian oil fields.

In the West, only diversionary manoeuvres will probably take place, assuming the secret reports of our agents to be correct. Personally I consider this quite plausible. I don't believe that the English and the Americans will attempt to break in on us in the West as they know only too well that they will bleed to death there.

Morale is changing constantly. All sorts of things are criticized, but what depresses the people most is the fact that they no longer have any general picture of what is happening. No one can picture just how the war is to end and how we are to win the victory. Everybody is worried about the coming summer offensive on which great hopes are based. It is dangerous for the people to keep arguing that we may not last through a third winter of war if we fail to smash the Soviet Union this summer. Of course that isn't true, but for the moment I am not going to do anything to counteract this sort of talk. The time will come when it can be discussed publicly.

Sauckel has delivered a lecture to the heads of his labour offices. He again aired the question of women's compulsory labour in a way that certainly does not help total war. Sauckel is one of the dullest of the dull. Unfortunately he has allowed the heads of his labour offices to take him completely in tow. These individuals are for the most part quite unregenerate. He still keeps a whole retinue of former Centrists and Social Democrats who naturally are having the time of their lives leading the stupid fool from Weimar by the nose.

[Fritz Sauckel had been employing former members of the Catholic Centre and the Social Democratic parties without realizing they were sabotaging his efforts.]

April 12, 1943

It is a curious fact that we shun the phrase "European co-operation" just as the devil shuns Holy Water. I can't quite understand why. Such an obvious political and propaganda slogan ought really to become a general theme for public discussion in Europe. Instead, we avoid it wherever possible.

But, after all, the English are making the same mistake, no doubt at Churchill's instigation. They refrain in every way from saying anything tangible about their war aims. I can only add, thank God; for if they were to put up a peace programme on the lines of Wilson's Fourteen Points they would undoubtedly create great difficulties for us.

My last article in the Reich caused a great commotion abroad. But my speech in Essen had even greater repercussions, both in neutral countries as well as among our allies.

In the evening I started for Berchtesgaden with Funk to take part in the conference called by Goering.

The leadership of our country is passing through a critical phase and it is high time that the Fuehrer made a clean sweep. Funk told me a number of stories about Goering's entourage that simply make one shudder. . . . Funk is very unhappy about these developments. He has every reason to be. The events in question are connected with the Reichsbank, and Funk naturally knows the exact details. The Fuehrer must be informed about this. I am going to do that next time I report to him, come what may.

[Goebbels evidently refers to corrupt financial practices, possibly involving black market dealings in foreign exchange, by leading Nazis.]

I remained with Funk until the small hours of the morning and had him brief me on all details. All in all, they throw no favourable light on part of our National Socialist leadership. Nevertheless one must not lose courage. Such phenomena will always occur. It isn't really important that they happen; what matters is that they are eradicated.

April 13, 1943

We arrived at Freilassing early in the morning. En route (shortly before Freilassing) I had a terrible kidney attack. I suppose a kidney stone got loose. The pain was so barbaric that I couldn't get up at all. I immediately had Professor Morell summoned from the Obersalzberg. He did not arrive until an hour later. During that hour I suffered almost unbearable pain. Professor Morell immediately gave me a big shot of morphine that relieved me to some extent.

Unfortunately it was totally impossible for me to take part in Goering's conference. I couldn't even move and had to spend the entire day in the private railway coach. Professor Morell put me into a sort of narcotic sleep; only in that way was I able to bear the pain.

By evening there was slight relief. It was touching how the Fuehrer, Goering, Ley, Speer, and all the others were concerned and worried about my condition. On the way to the meeting Ley even picked flowers and sent them to my compartment. Funk was touching in his solicitude about me.

There were some very serious clashes between Sauckel on the one side and Speer and Milch on the other. The meeting was not particularly harmonious. Sauckel had prepared for this meeting whereas Speer and Milch came totally unprepared. They had depended completely on my familiarity with the situation and on my professional knowledge, which, alas, was not available to them. As a result Sauckel had somewhat of an advantage and won the race by default.

But for the moment I can't think about these things. The state of my health so disturbs me that I have neither the urge nor the desire to do anything. Added to my terrible pain, continuous vomiting set in which almost made me despair of life. I had a terrible night. To make it half-possible for me to stand the pain, Naumann had to give me two more injections. I was thankful to reach Berlin in the morning. On the way, at Leipzig, we took an army doctor on board who took care of me after a fashion.

April 14, 1943

When I arrived in Berlin, I was rather better. We had the train stopped outside the Anhalter Station, so that my getting off would not be conspicuous, for, if it were noticed, violent rumours would start. But I had to go straight to bed. I'm now going to try to cure this kidney ailment.

The chief editor of the Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung, Silex, has written a report on how the press conference is run. While the tone of this memorandum is very impudent, he does hit the nail on the head. No decent journalist with any feeling of honour in his bones can stand the way he is handled by the press department of the Reich Government. Journalists are sat on as though they were still at school. Naturally this will have very serious consequences for the future of journalism. Any man who still has a residue of honour will be very careful not to become a journalist.

[Dr. Karl Silex was married to an Englishwoman whom he divorced when foreign marriages became unpopular. He had been London correspondent for his paper, 1925-33. On Hitler's seizure of power he was made editor in chief.

Goebbels earlier in the regime often addressed the press conference himself. Now he left it to his young men, some of whom had exaggerated ideas of their own importance.]

Berndt presented me with a report on how best to inform the German people when the end comes for us in Tunis. He has assembled a lot of wonderful arguments, stressing especially our constant inferiority in arms and manpower. I don't want to consider this question for the moment; fortunately things have not yet reached the stage when we must impart such sad news to the German people.

We are now using the discovery of 12,000 Polish officers, murdered by the G.P.U., for anti-Bolshevik propaganda in the grand manner. We sent neutral journalists and Polish intellectuals to the spot where they were found. Their reports now coming back to us from abroad are gruesome. The Fuehrer has also given permission for us to hand out a dramatic news release to the German press. I gave instructions that the widest possible use should be made of this propaganda material. It will keep us going for a couple of weeks.

I received news from the General Commissariat at Kiev that the area under cultivation has receded by 130,000 hectares since the occupation. That is very regrettable, and is partly due to the fact that the peasants are not being properly treated by us. If they were treated better we would in all likelihood have more grain in our barns.

Quisling wrote a report about the campaign in the East and sent me a copy. This document, too, states clearly and decisively that Germany neglected to make the most of political warfare in the East. The solution of the Russian problem depended upon a reconstruction programme for the East. The very absence of a proclamation for the East was having a most deleterious effect on the whole conduct of the war. We would certainly be able to stir up many of the peoples of the U.S.S.R. against Stalin if we knew how to wage war solely against Bolshevism rather than against the Russian people. Therein lay our only opportunity of bringing the war in the East to a satisfactory end. Quisling knows Eastern mentality very well, as he lived in Russia for many years.

I heard from the Obersalzberg that the atmosphere during Antonescu's visit was very cordial and frank. The Fuehrer is well satisfied. A visit by Horthy is to follow; then the first series of visits will be over.

The Fuehrer wants nevertheless to remain on the Obersalzberg for several more weeks. I believe this is the very best thing he can do. If he uses this opportunity to restore his health at least half way, it will be advantageous for us all and especially for German politics and the war effort. We all overspent ourselves last winter. There is a limit to physical and spiritual strength. If you draw too long upon your reserves you face a vacuum after a while. I believe I, too, shall have to slow up a bit. Otherwise I am in danger of collapsing someday. . . : That would not only be purposeless, but also irrational, and so I won't let things come to that pass.

Naumann had a long talk with Field Marshal General Milch. Milch would like to see the entire civilian air defence united under one head. He wants to propose to the Fuehrer and to Goering that I should be made responsible. I don't know whether I can take on this additional job. It does seem to me, however, that unification would be best, for the wild mix-up that exists today can't be tolerated much longer. Civilian air defence is one of the most important problems to be solved at home. Possibly if it can't be done in any other way, I might have to abandon a number of other jobs in order to devote myself wholeheartedly to this task. For the moment, however, I am in no position to do so. I spent a very difficult afternoon. My fever increased and I am afraid that my kidney trouble may be rather serious.

This Luftwaffe of ours has now discovered that something could be achieved against the British-American air war by using all our short waves to North America. General Martini has had a brainstorm and thought up a scheme which is calculated to torpedo our entire broadcasting war against the United States, but which really can hardly be expected to force the British-American air war into more modest channels. I am therefore opposing the idea with every means at my disposal. It is bad enough that General Martini has succeeded in compelling us to stop our local broadcasts every night. If he wants also to make our foreign propaganda impossible, he will have me for an enemy.

[Goebbels firmly believed that propaganda was as important as military operations, and resisted every attempt to interfere with his activities. Broadcasts for domestic consumption had to be interrupted every time enemy planes approached, because they served as direction finders.]

An American news agency announces that Roosevelt and Eden have decided to re-establish the old borders of pre-war Poland. As though Roosevelt and Eden had anything to say in the matter! It is exclusively a matter for the Axis Powers and the Soviet Union, and, as regards the Soviet Union, we still have the decisive word.

Colonel Martin gave me a report about the measures the Bolsheviks took after the recapture of Kharkov. It made me realize that the Soviets are masters in the art of improvisation. They have been able to do things that our authorities behind the lines could never have accomplished. It is obvious that one can make even a lazy fellow industrious if organizations and state regulations are enforced by severe punishments.

From a number of statements by Bolshevik prisoners, I gather that General Vlassov's appeal caused some discussion after all in the Soviet Army. It will be even more effective if we give it more energetic support. Of course this depends upon our issuing the proclamation for the East which the Fuehrer cannot yet be persuaded to release. We must not only wage war in the East, we must also do a political job there.

[The Russian Lieutenant General Andrej Andrejevitch Vlassov was captured by the Germans and formed a Free Russian Army to fight alongside the Nazis. After V.E.-day the Western Allies extradited him to Russia. He has not been heard of since.]

April 16, 1943

The enemy regards their position in Tunis as still more favourable. It has indeed become more serious for us. The enemy now asks whether we intend to evacuate. For the present, at least, there can be no question of it. We shall try to defend ourselves to the last ditch. The English claim that the Italians have already begun evacuating. There's not a word of truth in this. They are certainly sitting on a high horse in London and congratulating themselves. They look upon Tunis as absolutely safe for them. We can't do very much about it in our propaganda; we must be content to divert attention from this theme to other matters.

Major Balzer reported to me about his visit to Field Marshal General Kluge's headquarters. There they are placing great hopes in me and expect me to persuade the Fuehrer to issue a proclamation for the East. I don't know what to do. For the present I can't raise the subject again with the Fuehrer, as he has taken such a positive stand. I do believe, however, that some time in the near future there will be a more favourable moment for broaching the subject again. I am very much discouraged that so obvious a political matter cannot be discussed at present.

[Field Marshal Guenther von Kluge (1882-1944) committed suicide in August 1944 to escape arrest by the Gestapo.]

An exchange of letters and decrees between Koch and Rosenberg has been laid before me, demonstrating the completely chaotic administration of the occupied eastern areas. Rosenberg favours a more moderate, Koch a more radical, course. Both act as though they were great experts on the East; Koch as a native of Elberfeld and Rosenberg as a Baltic emigrant have every reason to do so!

In Finland a nationalist movement has started which is very sharply directed against the defeatist news policies of the Finnish press. The Finns think they can carry water on both shoulders. They are thereby gradually causing a breakdown of the home front which will involve them in the greatest difficulties if they want to continue the war—as indeed they must. It is a good thing that at least a few courageous men in Finland are trying to prevent a collapse at home.

My kidney trouble is still bothering me. I had Professor Huetepohl X-ray me in St. Hedwig's Hospital. The X-ray examination, thank God, indicated nothing serious. It was simply a case of a small kidney stone which was extremely painful and made me lose a lot of weight, but will not otherwise impair my health. Naturally I would not like a repetition of this attack in the near future, but no doctor can give me any guarantee on that score.

In St. Hedwig's Hospital I have been able once again to observe the excellent order and splendid management of such a denominational hospital. I am very glad I forbade the closing of denominational hospitals in Berlin. They are very useful. The nuns should be allowed to continue their nursing. Here they can do no harm; on the contrary, they are true benefactors of suffering humanity.

[It is interesting to note that Goebbels, when his personal health was involved, did not go to a Nazi hospital, with the so-called "Brown Sisters" in charge, but to a Catholic institution.]

In the evening Roellenbleg showed me the picture of the mass graves at Katyn taken for the weekly newsreel. These shots are terribly gruesome. One hardly dares to imagine what would happen to Germany and Europe if this Asiatic-Jewish flood were to inundate our country and our continent. All hands must be set to work to the last breath to prevent such a misfortune.

April 17, 1943

Tunis is slowly moving back into the foreground. The English express the hope that it may soon fall. They want to prepare a second Stalingrad for us there, and claim that evacuation is impossible. Apparently they have no conception of the resistance we are determined to offer.

A number of English papers and periodicals have been laid before me which give evidence of great respect for my person and my work. The News Chronicle calls me the most dangerous member of the Nazi gang. I can feel very proud of this praise. If the English continue to respect my work so much, I believe I shall gradually also win the approval of the German people.

[Although Goebbels enjoyed a certain popularity in the city of Berlin, he was by no means a favourite of the German people at large. His extremely radical viewpoint did not suit the average middle-class German. This is the first indication, however, that Goebbels himself was aware that his policies were not always popular at home.]

The United States has published statistics according to which there are 5,000,000 orthodox Jews in the United States. The United States can certainly be described as a Class-1 Jew state. We are going to step up our anti-Semitic propaganda so much that the word "Jew" will again be pronounced in the derisive manner that it deserves, just as it was in the time of our struggle for power. It must come to pass that even an enemy statesman won't dare to be seen in the company of a Jew without immediately being suspected by his own people of being a stooge of the Jews.

The Katyn incident is developing into a gigantic political affair which may have wide repercussions. We are exploiting it in every way possible. Since ten to twelve thousand Polish victims have sacrificed their lives anyway—it was probably at least partly their own fault, for they were the real instigators of this war—they might as well now serve to open the eyes of the peoples of Europe about Bolshevism.

In the evening a Globe Reuter report reached us containing a declaration by the Polish Government-in-exile. This declaration changes the whole Katyn affair fundamentally in that the Polish Government-in-exile now demands that the International Red Cross should take part in the investigation. That suits us perfectly. I immediately got in touch with the Fuehrer, who gave me permission to send a telegram to the International Red Cross, requesting it to collaborate to the utmost in identifying the corpses. This telegram is signed by the Duke of Coburg and Gotha, whose name is well known in England and who has many family connections there. In my opinion, something has thus been started which may have simply unimaginable repercussions.

I received secret reports from the Research Institute indicating that Roosevelt intends to meet Stalin somewhere. These reports are unconfirmed as yet. I deduce from statements made by diplomats that there has been some reconciliation between the views of the Soviets and the United States. Eden's visit to the United States seems not to have been as unsuccessful as we at first assumed.

The Spanish Foreign Minister, Jordana, delivered a long speech in which he mentions the war only incidentally. It contains a great fanfare against Bolshevism. That, however, is mere theatrical thunder. He offers Spain as a mediator and places great hopes, as he put it, on the Holy Father in Rome. Of course we cannot use these passages of his speech in Germany.

One might almost think it would be a good thing if the English were to bomb Paris and the other western European capitals to hell, so that their inhabitants would at last come to their senses.

The S.D. report is full of mischief. Its recent issues displease me deeply. It is entirely unpolitical and is sent to the various offices unsifted. That involves a certain danger, for most readers of these S.D. reports haven't enough political discernment to distinguish between side issues and main issues. Above all, these reports contain too many details. The leaders of the Reich certainly don't need to know whenever someone living in the back of beyond unburdens his anguished heart. Just as the Fuehrer need not know if somewhere in some company people complain about the way the war is run, it is unnecessary for the political leaders to know if here or there someone damns the war or curses it or vents his spleen. The nature of the S.D. report must be quickly changed. I ordered Berndt to arrange for collaboration between the S.D. and the Reich propaganda offices.

If the S.D. material, which in itself is good, is sifted politically and brought into line with the political views of the Gauleiters and the Reich propaganda offices, it can develop into a good source of information.

April 18, 1943

The English and the Americans are again placing Tunis in the foreground. They emphasize, however, that the series of flashy victories is over and that the difficult finish is yet to come. Quite superfluously the Italians have issued a detailed report about the battle in North Africa in which they lavish great praise on the English. That wasn't exactly necessary! The English certainly fare better in this report than the Germans. It is quite obvious why the Italians are doing this. They are trying to make plausible their own disgraceful defeat and their cowardly behaviour. The report is simply terrible.

One cannot spare the Italians from the reproach that in their news reports, at least, they are rendering a service to the enemy and are thereby greatly weakening our position. Of course it is understandable why the Italians try to blow up their soldiers into heroes, although nobody in the whole world believes it. No matter what Rome may do, I believe the military reputation of the Italians is gone once and for all. There wasn't much left, anyway; the emergence of Fascism alone gave the friends of the Italian people a hope that the earlier period of weakness of the Italian nation might be overcome. That, however, is not at all the case.

In the United States, Jordana's guarded offers of mediation are brusquely declined. While the language used is not as strong as after the Casablanca conference, nevertheless there is unanimity of opinion in the United States that only unconditional surrender by the Axis Powers will be considered. They will have to wait a good long time for that!

It was an exceptionally good idea that we raised the Jewish problem again on orders of the Fuehrer. Anti-Semitism is growing rapidly even in the enemy states. Reports to that effect reach us, especially from England. If we continue to stress the anti-Semitic question, the Jews, in the long run, will be much discredited. All one needs is to be tough and determined, for the Jewish problem has now been frozen so tight that it will be difficult to thaw it out again.

From a secret report of the Research Institute I learn that the Swedish newspapers did everything they could to prevent publication of their Berlin correspondents' reports [about Katyn]. It shows again how unneutral Sweden really is.

In the evening photographs of Katyn were shown me. They are so terrible that only part of them are fit for publication. The documentary evidence offered in the form of photographic reproductions is absolute and undeniable proof of the Bolsheviki's blood-guilt.

Horthy's visit on the Obersalzberg has come to an end. On the first day it was conducted in a very heated atmosphere. The Fuehrer minced no words and especially pointed out to Horthy how wrong his policies were both in general and especially with reference to the conduct of the war and the question of the Jews. The Fuehrer was very outspoken. He charged the Hungarians with having tried to contact the enemy via Spain, and Portugal. Horthy denied this but that did not help him very much.

On the second day the conversations were more normal. A communiqué was drafted similar to the one on Antonescu's visit. On the insistence of the Hungarians, however, the passage about our fight against the Western plutocracies was eliminated. I suppose the Hungarians believe that in the house of a man who has been hanged one should not talk about rope!

I gave orders to investigate all Jews still left in Berlin. I don't want to see Jews with the Star of David running about in the capital. Either they must be classed as privileged, and the Star taken from them, or they must be evacuated altogether from the capital of the Reich. I believe I shall have completed one of the greatest political achievements of my career once Berlin is free of Jews. When I consider how Berlin looked in 1926 when I came here, and how it looks now in 1943 when the Jews are being evacuated completely, I get a feeling of what has been achieved in this sector.

The condition of my health is such that I find it difficult to continue to work with the intensity to which I have been accustomed. I am often exceedingly tired and must use every effort to overcome my sleepiness.

Here and there certain groups of Germans, especially the intellectuals, express the idea that Bolshevism really isn't as bad as the Nazis represent it to be. That is owing to the fact that our consideration for the families of men missing in action in the East has been such that we have not described the atrocities of Bolshevism as they actually happened. The Katyn case now offers a welcome opportunity to catch up on this. The families of our missing men in the East simply must accept this sacrifice so that the German people won't some day have to face a greater one; perhaps even that of their national existence.

The Jews in England are now demanding laws to protect them against anti-Semitism. We know those tactics from our own past when we were struggling for power. It didn't help much. We were always able to find loopholes in the law. Besides, anti-Semitism cannot be eradicated by law once it has taken root among a people. A law against hating Jews is usually the beginning of the end for the Jews.

The English are in no position to strike at our vitals. When I look at the picture of the Atlantic Wall, I have a feeling that we are sitting in Europe in an absolutely secure fortress.

The Poles continue to press for an investigation [of Katyn] by the International Red Cross, which has not yet given its final reply. Their considerate excuse is that nobody works in Geneva on Saturdays and Sundays! These neutrals are certainly sitting pretty! There they are—far away from the firing line, and then they are invited to play the role of arbiter between the Great Powers.

The communiqué issued about Horthy's visit to the Obersalzberg is very downright. According to it, the Hungarians will fight unwaveringly on our side until the final victory. Would to God it were true!

At 6 P.M. the demonstration in honour of the Fuehrer's fifty-fourth birthday took place in the Philharmonic Hall. . . . My speech created a very deep impression.

April 20, 1943

The statements of the Red Cross in Geneva are really funny. The Red Cross is in continuous session. I can just imagine how they talk themselves into a blue funk about whether to go to Katyn or not.

I received a report on the situation in Croatia. That country is certainly to be pitied. The Italians are putting the Croats under such pressure that there is no semblance whatever left of a free state. It isn't quite clear what the Italians are really after. Possibly they are merely trying to prove that the Croatian state cannot survive. But there's a much easier way of doing that than supplying arms to the opposition and thereby directly and indirectly supporting the Partisan movement. The reign of terror which the Italians have established in some sections of Croatia baffles all description. The Italians are obviously playing with fire. No matter what orders the Duce gives, his army officers do not dream of obeying them. The more the Italians extort from the Croatians the more will they be inclined to come over to our side. Unfortunately, we cannot help them as we should like to, because of our treaty obligations to the Italians.

Dr. Ley visited me. It is touching how anxious and worried he is about my health. He told me about the meeting at Goering's on the Obersalzberg in which I could unfortunately not take part because of my kidney attack.

Dr. Ley was not very happy about the whole atmosphere on the Obersalzberg. He doesn't believe that Goering has the stamina to take a leading part in the direction of the Reich's affairs. Besides, air war is making so many demands upon him that he really has no enthusiasm or strength left for other plans.

Dr. Naumann had a talk with Sepp Dietrich, who is setting up a new tank corps on the Fuehrer's orders. Many of his men are taken from among the leaders of the Hitler Youth. With this human material he is to organize an S.S. regiment that is to be called "Hitler Youth". I regard this name as very unfortunate. It certainly will not help our cause, for the simple reason that other nations will conclude that calling up the young is the only way we can raise sufficient manpower to wage our war. Sepp Dietrich, however, is very happy about this new assignment.

Dietrich told Naumann that the Fuehrer has expressed himself as extremely satisfied and pleased with my work. He told Dietrich I was one of the few people who knew how to do something constructive about the war. The Fuehrer is not too well satisfied with Goering. Nevertheless he believes, as I do, that Goering's authority is indispensable to the supreme leadership of the Reich. We must strengthen and support this authority, no matter how difficult it may be at times. It is of decisive importance for the war effort and the Reich. The Fuehrer is glad that I have established a more intimate relationship with Goering. When his authority and mine are combined, something useful for the administration of the Reich is bound to result.

Sepp Dietrich is shocked at the Duce, who has become an old man. He looked sick and frail, and gave the impression of being tired and washed-out. The Fuehrer could only pity him. His army is cheating him wherever it can and he has no one on whom he can absolutely rely.

Sepp Dietrich requested that expressions of his great admiration for my work should be transmitted to me. He urges me in all circumstances to stick to my course and let no one crowd me off it. The Fuehrer—so he assured him—would support me in every way. Also, the front was united to a man behind my policies.

A number of deserving front-line soldiers of the Waffen-S.S. troops who recaptured Kharkov were my guests. They told me about the fights for Kharkov. They have very clear and decided views concerning the Bolsheviks' greater ability at improvisation. They feel certain that a war cannot be waged without imposing punishments. That's what I, too, have often emphasized. What they told me about conditions behind the German lines, especially in Kharkov, baffles all description. Our army supply organizations have been guilty of real war crimes. There ought really to be a lot of executions to re-establish order. Unfortunately the Fuehrer won't agree to this, at least not for the present. Sooner or later, something must be done. The conditions prevailing during the German retreat make your hair stand on end. Our supply services abandoned tremendous quantities of food, weapons, and munitions without destroying them; on the other hand, during the retreat, they took with them carpets, desks, pictures, furniture, even Russian typists, claiming that these were important war booty! One can imagine what an impression this made upon the Waffen-S.S. when they met these caravans on their forward march against the Bolsheviks.

The S.S. men claim that it is possible to polish off the Bolshevik soldiers without much ado. Whenever they are confronted with troops that are their equal, imbued with a philosophy and given proper military training, the Russians immediately show the white feather and run. There were German divisions, they said, which had failed just as badly as some elements of our allies. Of course I believe that the S.S. people are exaggerating somewhat for reasons of esprit de corps. Nevertheless the facts they reported are anything but pleasant.

The English, who have started a new attack in Tunis, are at present saying nothing about it. Apparently they are not too sure of themselves. The closer the space into which we are crowded together, the better, naturally, we can defend ourselves. It all depends upon the security of our supply lines. Fortunately some more shipments have arrived, but English supremacy in artillery is enormous. Critical days are again ahead of us. It is simply impossible to make predictions.

The English are celebrating the Fuehrer's birthday—with unprincipled, vulgar insults. They aren't behaving at all like gentlemen. In the domestic press a proclamation by the Reich Marshal and my speech for the Fuehrer's birthday were the main features.

An embarrassing incident occurred when a German merchant ship fired on a Swedish submarine. The Swedes are making a great fuss about it. The Swedish press, especially the section hostile to the Axis, is indulging in language which it only dares to use because our military position is not very secure at the moment. But one day there will be a change—and then we can talk differently to the Swedes.

April 22, 1943

The Times has suddenly discovered that our position is exceedingly weak and our propaganda equally so. As a matter of fact in recent weeks we have limited ourselves too much to defensive propaganda. This must be changed at once. I have given suitable orders to the press and radio.

Again and again it is claimed that the Japanese intend to declare war on the Soviet Union. I don't believe it. The Japanese are at present engaged so fully that they can hardly afford another theatre of war, although most certainly every knowledgeable person in Tokyo is aware that Japan cannot win the war against England and America if we are bled white in the East.

For the present we don't see clearly the significance of the cabinet change in Tokyo. Some believe that Shigemitsu, who is an expert on China, is to work for a closer relationship between Nanking and Tokyo; others are of the opinion that Shigemitsu is charged with attempting to mediate between Berlin and Moscow. For the moment I confess I can't imagine what such mediation would look like. Some facts, nevertheless, seem to point in that direction. The Japanese have always tried hard to end the conflict between the Reich and the Soviet Union in one way or another. If this were possible in some way the war would assume a totally different aspect. Of course I don't believe that such an eventuality will arise in the foreseeable future.

[Mamoru Shigemitsu, the new Japanese Foreign Secretary, had earlier served as Ambassador in Russia, Britain, France and China.]

A tapped telephone disclosed that the wife of our Ambassador Abetz has been expressing herself very irresponsibly to some French politicians. Well, she is a Frenchwoman. That is further proof that diplomats must marry only among their own people.

April 23, 1943

Roosevelt protested in an extraordinarily sharp note against the conviction by a Japanese court-martial and execution of the United States airmen who bombarded Tokyo last year. We are seizing upon this opportunity to join the Japanese in taking violent issue with the Anglo-Saxon powers on the question of air warfare. The Japanese aren't at all impressed by the Americans. They carried through the proceedings against the American aviators according to the established rules and are determined to continue doing so. Possibly air warfare will take a new turn as a result of this stand. The proofs against the English and American airmen are truly overwhelming. Undoubtedly very strong aversion against bombing would crystallize even in aviation circles if every captured flier were executed who bombarded residential quarters or was not sufficiently briefed on what military targets he was to hit. I'm very much tempted to propose that to the Fuehrer. Naturally it has its bright and its dark sides, but I believe in this case the bright side outweighs the dark, because the English and Americans probably would not have the guts to reply with adequate reprisals, whereas we of course would. The Fuehrer gave orders that the execution of the American airmen is to be given great prominence in the press: it will provide the main headline for the Good Friday editions.

The Katyn incident continues to command attention. The Red Cross is still investigating. We can just see these little cantonal diplomats sitting in a sweat box.

From the Research Office's reports I learn that the Rumanians were by no means as enthusiastic about the meeting on the Obersalzberg as we imagined. They felt the lack of a clear aim in our policy and our war effort. Mihai Antonescu seems to be especially busy pointing this out. He is very unreliable. In a diplomatic report, I read about a conversation of his in which he emphasized that the Italians knew all about his aims and plans. It looks as though Bastianini were playing a somewhat dubious game.

[Giuseppe Bastianini was at this time Undersecretary for Foreign Affairs. He was sentenced to death by Fascists at Verona, but escaped to Switzerland in April 1944.]

Terboven passed through Berlin. He, too, has heard something about the rather ill-starred conference at Goering's on the Obersalzberg. He doesn't believe that Goering has the stamina to assume leadership at home. Terboven thinks a great deal of Field Marshal General Milch. I think he is right.

April 24, 1943

Winkelkemper reported to me on our broadcasts to foreign countries, which are exceptionally effective. Here my directives are being followed extremely well. Winkelkemper is a faithful old disciple of mine with whom it is a matter of honour to compose and transmit foreign broadcasts exactly in accordance with my intentions.

[Toni Winkelkemper was employed by Goebbels from the beginning of his Ministry. His first position after Hitler came to power was that of propaganda leader in the Cologne-Aachen gau.]

Speer came late in the afternoon. He remained until the evening, which gave me a chance to discuss the general situation fully with him. He has had a long talk with Goering and what he reported to me about it was all to the good. Goering has so far adhered to our line and intends to do so in future. Speer, however, also reported that he still gives the impression of a rather tired man.

For our next meeting, I am going to arm myself with material to hit back at Sauckel. Speer told me about a so-called manifesto that Sauckel addressed to his organization within the Reich and the occupied areas. This manifesto is written in a pompous, terribly overladen, baroque style. It smells from afar and gives me a pain. Sauckel is suffering from paranoia. When he signs the manifesto with the words, "Written on the Fuehrer's Birthday in an Aeroplane over Russia", it smells of the crude old Weimar style. It is high time that his wings were clipped.

What Speer reported from the Obersalzberg was encouraging. The Fuehrer is more convinced than ever that total war is our salvation. He won't let anybody push him off the course on which he has started. Gauleiters Eigruber and Ueberreither and, as Speer reported, also Dr. Jury, deserve great credit in this connection. Schirach hasn't the faintest idea about total war and tries again and again to torpedo it. Far from being influenced by his mouthings, the Fuehrer spoke very disparagingly to Speer about Schirach. He fears Schirach has fallen into the clutches of the Viennese reactionaries and that he no longer sees the interests of the Reich clearly. That is too bad, for fundamentally Schirach is a good boy, who merely lacks the necessary political experience.

[August Eigruber was Gauleiter for Upper Danubia; Dr. Siegfried Ueberreither for Styria; Dr. Hugo Jury for Lower Danubia; and Baldur von Schirach for Vienna. Von Schirach was the youngest man to be appointed to such a high position, and earned his rapid promotion because of the zeal he showed in indoctrinating German youth with Nazism as Reichsjugendfuhrer. He was indicted as a major war criminal and sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment at Nuremberg in 1946.]

Otherwise everything is in apple-pie order on the Obersalzberg. The Fuehrer spoke to Speer in terms of the highest praise for my articles in the Reich. He told him he read them every time and had not once discovered a psychological error in them. He regards them as the best political prose now being written in Germany.

He is rather worried, however, about my health. Speer, too, most urgently advised me to see that it is restored at least to its old level, since I would not be worth very much for total war if I were a sick man. I shall heed this advice. Next week I hope to go to Dresden for a fortnight to have myself overhauled.

Vansittart has published a new book of hate containing a programme that fits wonderfully into our propaganda line. I am giving orders to answer him in the German press with the most massive counter-arguments. This fellow Vansittart is really worth his weight in gold to our propaganda. After the war a monument ought to be erected to him somewhere in Germany with the inscription, "To the Englishman who rendered the greatest service to the German cause during the war".

The Red Cross has finally arrived at a decision. We received a telegram to the effect that it is ready to send experts, but only on condition that all parties concerned, in other words, the Soviets also, request this. That is exactly as though a man indicted for murder were not only to face the court as a defendant, but also to act as an expert witness during the trial. Naturally we cannot agree to the condition proposed by the Red Cross. It is absolutely unacceptable. Nevertheless I don't think it advisable to attack the Red Cross. We are so dependent upon it in the matter of prisoners of war that it does not seem opportune to start a fight. I am having this whole matter of the Red Cross put on ice for the time being. And anyway, I suppose it wouldn't be proper to send an answer without having previously asked the Fuehrer his opinion.

The news that the American Minister has left Helsinki is interesting. While a chargé d'affaires is to remain, nevertheless the departure of the Minister is evidently to serve as a means of bringing pressure upon the Finns to make a separate peace with the Soviet Union. Practically speaking, the Finns are in no position to conclude such a separate peace, as they are completely dependent upon us for food. They know only too well that, while the Americans would like to turn them in the direction of disaster, they cannot help them with food, not to speak of other things. The fact that the Finns let the situation develop to the point where the American Minister departed is proof that our somewhat dictatorial attitude toward them is gradually beginning to yield results. We certainly went after the Finns exceptionally hard in recent weeks. But that was very necessary, for without our interference they might conceivably have deserted our front. That would, of course, have been a great misfortune for Finland. Democracy has always brought nothing but bad luck to the Finnish people. Finland is a football between the big powers. Were it ever to come under the domination of the Soviet Union, Finnish independence would be gone for good.

From a report reaching me from the occupied areas I gather that a truly grotesque situation obtains in Warsaw. The Jews tried to leave the Ghetto by subterranean passages. Thereupon these underground passages were flooded. The Ghetto is now under artillery fire. When such conditions prevail in an occupied city, it certainly cannot be said to be pacified. It is high time that we evacuated the Jews as quickly as possible from the General Government.

In Warsaw conditions are chaotic not only in the Ghetto, but also among sections of the Polish population. It would be a good thing if the post of governor general were filled by a new man—a person who could put an end to these difficulties.

The S.D. has taken the so-called Clemens Chapel away from the Catholics of Berlin. I have been urged to return the chapel to the Catholic congregation. I did this immediately and gave the S.D. a dressing down for taking action in direct violation of my directives.

I learn that terrible conditions prevail in the Messerschmitt aeroplane works. The designing offices have a great deal to do and the production plants very little. The claim is made in the report that for a year and a half no planes worth mentioning have been sent on to the front, because too much work went into designing, and such samples as were produced proved failures. Truly charming prospects for the future! In general I have the impression that our Luftwaffe has lately had lots of bad luck. It is high time for it to bestir itself.

That explains why the Luftwaffe is urging the Fuehrer with all possible eloquence not to start an offensive in the East this summer; the Luftwaffe needs a pause for rest.

The Fuehrer would like to talk to me before I go on leave, especially to discuss the next moves in the Jewish question, about which he has very great expectations.

A more careful reading shows that the manifesto which Sauckel issued on April 20 while in an aeroplane above Russia, is pure nonsense. Sauckel must be told that he can't make such irresponsible use of words. The manifesto fairly bursts with superlatives; on every page there are seven to ten of them.

April 26, 1943

It is reported that the churches in Moscow were overcrowded [on Easter day]. The Soviets, to a certain extent, have restored freedom of religion. That's very sharp and clever tactics. It would be a good thing if we also were somewhat more elastic in these matters.

The Swedes sent us an exceedingly insolent reply to our last note. They claim the statements in our note are not true. They surprise us by saying they found anchored German mines in Swedish waters. The tone of the note is exceptionally arrogant, and the commentaries which appeared in the Swedish press about it outdo each other in insolence. This shows that our military situation has become somewhat unstable. Two years ago the Swedes would not have dared to come to us with such a document. But this is not yet the end. Scores we can't settle with the Swedes today can be settled tomorrow.

My article about air-raid areas has attracted great attention at home and abroad. Without any pressure on my part it was reprinted verbatim in the western and north-western provinces of the Reich. In a certain sense it is balm for the wounds inflicted on the inhabitants there by air raids.

The fact that our troops succeeded in restoring their position in Tunis strikes me as nothing short of miraculous. German steadfastness and German heroism can be appreciated only if it is known how little material we are able to send over to North Africa, how extremely precarious the food situation is for our soldiers, how little they must get along with, and how meagre is their supply of munitions.

It is surprising how openly and cynically the Americans reveal their war aims. Thus, for instance, a project was published in the American press, according to which the United States Government intends to install its own Gauleiters in every German province after Germany's defeat. That's certainly a long way off! I am having our foreign-propaganda section give the Americans a reply to this plan that will knock them cold.

The Katyn incident has taken a really sensational turn through the fact that the Soviets have broken off diplomatic relations with the Poles, giving the attitude of the Polish Government-in-exile as the reason. Reuter issued a lugubrious and tragi-comical report about it. I am withholding this sensational news item for the present; I want to watch developments for another day, to see what I can do with it.

LaGuardia has inflicted himself upon the Italian people with a speech. His address is so dull and foolish that it doesn't even deserve mention. This Italian from the New York Ghetto seems to judge all Europe from the point of view of an American gangster. It staggers the imagination to envisage what would happen to the civilized nations of Europe if they were to fall into the hands of the Bolsheviks or the American gangster politicians.

According to a report by an officer who has come from Rommel, the supply situation [in Africa] is very difficult because munitions have priority in shipping. During the last few days the troops received daily only two slices of bread per man.

The most important theme of all international discussion is naturally the break between Moscow and the Polish Emigré Government. . . . All enemy broadcasts and newspapers agree that this break represents a 100 per cent victory for German propaganda and especially for me personally. The commentators marvel at the extraordinary cleverness with which we have been able to convert the Katyn incident into a highly political question. There is grave apprehension in London about this success of German propaganda. Suddenly all sorts of rifts are noticed in the allied camp the existence of which nobody had hitherto admitted. There is talk of a total victory by Goebbels! Even important American senators publish worried comments. Alarm in London has reached its highest pitch. The Poles are admonished for their precipitate action and are blamed for having played right into the hands of German propaganda.

One can call it a complete triumph of German propaganda. Throughout this whole war we have seldom been able to register such a success.

Field Marshals Manstein and Kleist have introduced somewhat more humane treatment of the inhabitants in regions that have again come under military administration because of our retreat. Koch's measures, which could not be executed anyway, were modified considerably.

[Field Marshal Paul Ludwig Ewald von Kleist commanded the German armies in the Ukraine, serving on the Eastern Front from 1941-45, when he was captured by the Allies. In 1940, he served in France and Belgium with the Panzer troops. He was born in 1881.]

The military men at the Fuehrer's G.H.Q. have actually succeeded in eliminating the pictures of Katyn from the weekly newsreel. Unfortunately the Fuehrer did not have time to see the film himself. He may possibly authorize their release next week. But by then they will be so old that they won't have any news value. The military rest their case on the morale of the families of our men missing in action. We have to choose between the feelings of these individuals and the interests of the people as a whole. I regard the latter as more important and therefore advocate that we expose Bolshevism exactly as it is.

I have finished my article against the Jews. It is going to attract considerable attention. In my opinion it is necessary once more to speak with authority on the Jewish question. Public interest is still focused on it, but it is too frequently tackled from an entirely wrong angle, even in our circles.

April 29, 1943

The Polish conflict still holds the centre of the stage. Seldom since the beginning of the war has any affair stirred up so much public discussion. The Poles are handled as coldly by the English and the Americans as if they were enemies. It is admitted that I have succeeded in driving a deep wedge into the enemy, thereby provoking a much greater crisis than that between Darlan and de Gaulle some time ago.

The Americans insist upon denying categorically that the Ranger has been sunk. It is hard to believe that a German captain should be so greatly in error. It is also possible, however, that it was an English, not an American aircraft carrier which was sunk. I suppose we'll get fuller information after a time.

The Russian General Vlassov, who is fighting on our side in the Separatist Army, has been pretty much shelved by the Ministry for the East. He wrote a report that rather grips at one's heartstrings. One cannot but be astounded at the lack of political instinct in our Central Berlin Administration. If we were pursuing or had pursued a rather more skilful policy in the East, we would certainly be further advanced there than we are.

I received a report on the treatment of occupied areas by the Japanese. It makes one green with envy to realize how cleverly that sort of thing is done in East Asia. The Japanese attach the greatest importance to treating every area occupied by them in accordance with its own peculiarities. They have everywhere installed territorial governments which naturally are tied to the apron strings of the Japanese military commander, but which nevertheless keep up the semblance of national liberty. Why don't we do that in the East? The Japanese procedure might well be a model for us.

In Croatia things are at sixes and sevens. True, Pavelič has visited the Fuehrer, but such a visit can only strengthen his prestige abroad. In Croatia practically all German officers are working at cross-purposes. In addition the Italians are confusing the issue further, while the Croatian Government itself is being kicked about by the Partisans. If an invasion were to take place in the southeast, there would be cause to fear that large parts of the population would immediately desert us. The Balkans are still the powder-barrel of Europe. It is to be hoped that the English and Americans are not aware of the chances beckoning them there. I am more than ever convinced that if they attempt an invasion, that's where it will come.

Our propaganda is suspected everywhere of having aggrandized the Katyn incident to enable us to make a separate peace either with the English or the Soviets. That, of course, is not our intention, although such a possibility would naturally be very pleasing.

Christiansen, our military commander in the Netherlands, has found it necessary to issue a decree ordering all Dutch soldiers back to captivity as prisoners of war. Groups plotting against the occupation have been at work among the former Dutch soldiers. These have caused us much trouble, consequently the mercy shown by the Fuehrer towards Dutch soldiers in 1940, after the campaign in the West, is now no longer deserved. Dutch families who now lose their relatives can thank English propaganda for this.

[General Friedrich Christiansen commanded the German naval base at Zeebrugge during World War I. He subsequently became an expert on naval aviation for the Dornier works at Friedrichshafen. Goering appointed him leader of the Aviation and Sports Department of the Air Ministry. He was appointed Military Commander of the Netherlands in 1940.]

In the Union Club in Berlin a number of defamatory rumours have been spread about me personally, not one word of which is true. I am having the Gestapo investigate them. The men involved are almost exclusively higher ex-officers. At the next opportunity I am going to give these men a thorough piece of my mind.

The conflict between the Polish Emigré Government and the Soviets still holds the world's interest. The Soviets at the moment are extremely insolent and arrogant. They are quite conscious of the security of their position. They have no consideration whatever for their Anglo-Saxon allies, nor need they have, as they are under no obligation to them for military achievements. The men in power in the Kremlin know exactly how far they can go. There is great bitterness in London and Washington about it which no one seeks to disguise. The Anglo-Saxon camp is terrified by the success of propaganda in driving so deep a wedge into the enemy coalition.

Unfortunately submarine warfare did not come up to our expectations this month. April has twice been our most unfavourable month, owing chiefly to the fact that our submarines did not succeed in engaging enemy convoys in major battles. To do so you need extraordinary cleverness and luck, which, unfortunately, eluded us during April.

Reports from the occupied areas contain no sensational news. The only noteworthy item is the exceedingly serious fighting in Warsaw between, on the one hand, the police and part of our Wehrmacht, and the rebellious Jews on the other. The Jews have actually succeeded in making a defensive position of the Ghetto. Heavy engagements are being fought there which even led to the Jewish Supreme Command's issuing daily communiqués. Of course this fun won't last very long. But it shows what is to be expected of the Jews when they are in possession of arms. Unfortunately some of their weapons are good German ones, especially machine guns. Heaven only knows how they got them. Attempts at assassination and acts of sabotage are occurring in the General Government at far beyond the normal rate.

My recent article about the general situation has had a most favourable reception in neutral countries. Its effectiveness derives from the conviction which is carried by my clear and realistic manner of presenting evidence.

[There is a gap here of five days in the diary. During this period the 800-acre Krupp armament plant was bombed for the fifty-fifth time and Dortmund sustained the heaviest raid since Cologne.

Tunis was captured by British and Bizerta by American and French troops, and Reggio di Calabria and Taranto on the Italian mainland were bombed.

On May 3 fierce battles were in progress in the Kuban and Novorossisk sectors of the Eastern front.]

May 7, 1943

[Hitler arrived in Berlin on May 7, 1943, to attend the funeral of Viktor Lutze, supreme commander of the brown-shirted S.A., who had been killed in a motor accident. Soon after his arrival the Fuehrer summoned Goebbels.]

We talked briefly about the military position. The Fuehrer, too, regards the situation in Tunis as pretty hopeless. It is simply impossible to transport reinforcements there. If we could regularly deliver supplies to Tunis we might possibly hold on for a long time. But this is prevented by the watchfulness of the English, who won't let our ships get through.

I explained my apprehension to the Fuehrer about how we should make this clear to the German people. At any rate we ought to use language in our O.K.W. reports that will give some intimation that the end is in sight.

It will, of course, be very difficult to explain to the people that Rommel is no longer in North Africa. Rommel is put in a most painful position. He has received the diamonds to his Oak-Leaf Cluster and the people know nothing about it; he has been on the Semmering for several weeks and, again, nobody has the faintest idea of it! Everyone thinks he is in Africa. If we now come out with the truth, when catastrophe is so near, nobody will believe us.

The Fuehrer told me that the Duce had been really restored to his old form during their four days' discussions. The Fuehrer did everything he could, and by putting every ounce of nervous energy into the effort, succeeded in pushing Mussolini back on the rails. In those four days the Duce underwent a complete change at which his entourage was also amazed. When he got out of the train on his arrival, the Fuehrer thought he looked like a broken old man; when he left again, he was in high fettle, ready for anything. We can see by the policies he is now pursuing that his regeneration is continuing.

[This was Hitler's first opportunity to tell Goebbels personally about his conference of April 7 to 10 with Mussolini.]

Horthy heard very little that was pleasant from the Fuehrer. But he does not seem to have taken this very much to heart, for he has so far fulfilled none of the promises he made on the Obersalzberg. Possibly the Fuehrer was too brusque. . . .

The Duce understands clearly that there can be no other salvation for him except to win or die with us. The Fuehrer is very happy that he will now adopt a tougher tone in Italy. That has become absolutely necessary. Only the future will tell how long Italy can stand air raids if the English are able to launch incessant attacks from North African bases.

In the East, the Fuehrer will soon start a limited offensive in the direction of Kursk. He may, however, delay this to see whether the Bolsheviks want to get in first. That might offer us an even more favourable chance than if we took the initiative. Be that as it may, we are prepared in every way. There are arms and soldiers galore, so that we need not worry very much.

It is quite a different question about air warfare. Here the Fuehrer, too, is rather pessimistic. Goering has not succeeded in taking the initiative. The Fuehrer regrets very much that Goering is rather ill and hopes that he will be a changed man after his leave.

It is a pity that the Fuehrer has to do everything himself whenever one of his principal lieutenants fails him. Gradually the task is becoming so heavy, even for him, that he can hardly carry the load alone. He complained to me about the somewhat precarious state of his health. That, naturally, is something that can't endure for ever.

Events in the General Government have now reached a point where Governor General Frank can no longer be retained in his post. The Fuehrer will in all likelihood put Greiser in his place. Recent events in Warsaw finally broke Dr. Frank's neck.

[Arthur Greiser, who succeeded Hermann Rauschning as head of the Danzig Government when Rauschning, realizing Hitler's true character, resigned and fled, was later appointed Gauleiter of Wartheland when the so-called Polish Corridor and adjacent territory were incorporated with Germany. Greiser was tried by the Poles and hanged.]

The Fuehrer is thinking of Giesler as successor to Lutze. . . . I can only say: if the post of Gauleiter in Munich were offered to me, I would rather be the lowliest Kreisleiter in Pomerania than rise to highest honours there.

The Fuehrer was extremely nice and obliging to me. I am happy to enjoy such a cordial personal relationship with him. The state of his health disturbs me. But I hope that when the present crises have passed, it will change for the better.

I must also be careful about my own. I consulted Professor Morell again. He is pleased at having succeeded in curing my skin eczema, except for small scars, but urgently advised me to go to Karlsbad for a few weeks. How can I do that? In view of the extremely precarious situation in Tunis, which may possibly result in a major defeat, it is impossible for me to sit still in a health resort. I suppose I shall once again have to forgo my holiday.

The end is in sight in North Africa. Bizerta and Tunis are the next targets for the Anglo-American troops. The battle for them has already begun. In the end the Axis will be thrown out of Africa entirely. There is tremendous confidence of victory in London, and rightly so. I see hardly any chance for us. The problem of North Africa is one of reinforcements, and as things now stand it cannot be solved.

Much to my surprise, my article "The War and the Jews" has attracted much attention, even in neutral countries. I should have thought the Jews would try to treat it with silence. But that is not the case. It is being quoted to an extent that is simply amazing. That shows the Jews are either foolish enough to let my arguments get out into the world, or else that there are secret opponents of the Jews in every editorial office who gladly identify themselves with my anti-Semitic arguments by publishing the article.

Unfortunately German ammunition has been found in the graves of Katyn. The question of how it got there needs clarification. It must either be ammunition sold by us during the period of our friendly arrangement with the Soviet Russians, or else the Soviets themselves threw it into the graves. In any case it is essential that this incident remain a top secret. If it were to come to the knowledge of the enemy the whole Katyn affair would have to be dropped.

At noon the state funeral for Viktor Lutze was held in the new Reich Chancellery. It developed into a huge demonstration of the solidarity of the Party and especially of the S.A. Never since the founding of our Reich have such high funeral honours been accorded to a man as to Viktor Lutze. The ceremony itself was very dignified. My memorial address created a deep impression. The Fuehrer himself then took the floor and in a brief tribute eulogised Lutze. He concluded by conferring upon him the highest category of the German order—an honour to Lutze and the S.A. far beyond what is usual. But I am glad Viktor Lutze received it. He was such a decent and fine fellow that this decoration at least had to be awarded to him posthumously. I escorted Paula Lutze and the other members of the family out from the Mosaic Hall. Outside, in the Wilhelmstrasse, a very impressive funeral parade was held.

[Paula Lutze was Viktor Lutze's widow.]

In the afternoon there was a meeting of Reichsleiters and Gauleiters at the Fuehrer's. Everybody was invited to lunch. This gave me a chance to talk to a number of people. Wegener told me about the American day raids on Bremen. These have been very severe indeed. The Americans drop their bombs with extraordinary precision from an altitude of eight to nine thousand metres. The population has the paralysing feeling that there really is no protection against such daylight attacks. This again shows that we are purely on the defensive in the air, and even that to a wholly inadequate extent. It will be difficult to make up for our air force's failure.

[Paul Wegener was Gauleiter for the Weser-Ems area.]

After luncheon the Fuehrer called together the entire leadership of the Party, that is, the Party, the S.A., the S.S., and the H.J. [Hitler Youth], to warn them in very impressive words against reckless driving such as has been the vogue within the Party. The Fuehrer was extremely outspoken and was not sparing in reproaches. The lesson he drew from Lutze's motor accident is that all Party members' cars should never be driven at more than 50 m.p.h. I consider this very sensible. In no other way can the Party be brought to its senses.

The Reichsleiters' and Gauleiters' conference followed. The Fuehrer honoured his Party sub-leaders by giving them a detailed survey of the situation. He began with the fact that in this war bourgeois and revolutionary states are facing each other. It has been an easy thing for us to knock out the bourgeois states, for they were quite inferior to us in their upbringing and attitude. Countries with an ideology have an advantage over bourgeois states, in that they are based upon a firm spiritual foundation. The superiority resulting from this fact was of extraordinary advantage to us until we began the campaign in the East. There we met an opponent who also sponsors an ideology, even though a wrong one. The Fuehrer recalled the case of Tuchachevsky and expressed the opinion that we were entirely wrong then in believing that Stalin would ruin the Red Army by the way he handled it. The opposite was true: Stalin got rid of all opposition in the Red Army and thereby brought an end to defeatism. The introduction of political commissars, too, has greatly enhanced the striking power of the Red Army. When one takes into account that the primitive human material of the East can be taught discipline only by strictness, one can imagine what purpose Stalin had in mind when he introduced political commissars and what he has actually accomplished thereby. . . .

[Goebbels here refers to the great purge of the Soviet Army and Communist party leadership in 1936 and 1937, one of the most famous victims of which was the commander-in-chief, Marshal Tuchachevsky, who was always regarded as pro-German and hoped to bring about an alliance between the military leaders of Germany and Russia. All over the world it was predicted that the Russian Army would not survive the purge; Hitler claimed it was a healthy cleansing process. Curiously enough Hitler began instituting a system of political commissars just about when Stalin was discarding it.]

Stalin enjoys a further advantage over us in being opposed by no "high society." He rid himself of this opposition by liquidations during the past twenty-five years. Although the opposition of our "high society" constitutes no danger, it can create all sorts of petty annoyances. It grumbles and complains without having any knowledge of the facts and thereby greatly reduces our driving power. Bolshevism got rid of this danger in good time and can therefore devote all its energy to fighting the enemy. There is virtually no opposition left within the country.

[Goebbels always distrusted German "high society". At the same time he, like other Nazis, liked to have aristocratic personal assistants. His adjutant was Prince Stephan of Schaumburg-Lippe.]

Opposition from the churches, which is giving us so much trouble, no longer exists under Bolshevism. If there is talk today of a Metropolitan of Moscow, that is of course just a Jewish swindle. The Fuehrer rightly points out that a few months ago this Metropolitan was probably still a furniture mover. In that respect Stalin has a much easier time than ourselves. His people have all been set in one groove. They are subjected either to Bolshevik education or to the Bolshevik whip; no other opinion prevails in the Soviet Union save that of the Kremlin bosses. It is evident [the Fuehrer said] that lasting resistance to the Soviet Union can be offered in Europe only by the Germans. Even our allies are not equal to the fight against Bolshevism. The Fuehrer drew the lesson from the past winter that the war in the East should hereafter be waged exclusively and solely with German troops. The Rumanians made the best showing; second best were the Italians; worst of all were the Hungarians. The Fuehrer regarded this as being mainly because there has been no social adjustment in Hungary, not even an indication of it. As a result the troops just do not realize the necessity of the war. Whenever occasional officers gave a good account of themselves they were left in the lurch by their men.

In the opinion of the Fuehrer—and I believe he is right in this—the S.S. formations did so magnificently because of their unified National Socialist indoctrination. Had we brought up the entire German Wehrmacht exactly as we did the S.S. formations, the struggle in the East would undoubtedly have taken a different course.

The Duce, too, is now in difficulties because he commands no formations like our S.S. He must depend upon his royalist army, which of course is not equal to such a brutal war of ideologies. The Fuehrer was absolutely right when he emphasized the fact that the essential condition for the successes of our S.S. formations consisted in the fact that they were set up by divisions and not battalions. Had they been distributed in battalions among other divisions of the Army, they would undoubtedly have been relegated to a very minor place by the divisional commanders

The Fuehrer argued that the anti-Semitism which formerly animated the Party and was advocated by it must again become the focal point of our spiritual struggle. He thinks a great deal of the anti-Semitic movement in England, although he is naturally aware that it lacks organization and therefore cannot constitute a political factor. Nevertheless this anti-Semitism is most embarrassing to the Churchill Government. It is comparable to the anti-Semitic endeavours of certain bourgeois organizations in Germany in the old days. These, too, would never have achieved their aim unless the revolutionary National Socialist movement had taken up the campaign.

The Jewish question is being solved least satisfactorily by the Hungarians. The Hungarian state is permeated with Jews, and the Fuehrer did not succeed during his talk with Horthy in convincing him of the necessity of more stringent measures. Horthy himself, of course, is badly tangled up with the Jews through his family, and will continue to resist every effort to tackle the Jewish problem aggressively. He gave a number of humanitarian counter-arguments which of course don't apply at all to this situation. You just cannot talk humanitarianism when dealing with Jews. Jews must be defeated. The Fuehrer made every effort to win Horthy over to his standpoint but succeeded only partially.

From all this the Fuehrer deduced that all the rubbish of small nations [Kleinstaaten-Geruempel] still existing in Europe must be liquidated as fast as possible. The aim of our struggle must be to create a unified Europe. The Germans alone can really organize Europe. There is practically no other leading power left. In this connection the Fuehrer re-emphasized how happy we can be that there are no Japanese on the European continent. Even though the Italians today give us many a headache and create difficulties, we must nevertheless consider ourselves lucky that they cannot be serious competitors in the future organization of Europe. If the Japanese were settled on the European continent the situation would be quite different. Today we are practically the only power on the European mainland with a capacity for leadership.

The Fuehrer sometimes asks himself in a worried sort of way whether the white man is going to be able in the long run to maintain his supremacy over the tremendous reservoir of human beings in the East. There have been developments in history when he was prevented from doing so. In this connection the Fuehrer referred to the wars of the Turks and to the conquests of Genghis Khan, which led him far into the heart of Europe, since, at that time, the Germans could not resist successfully. From all this we must learn that we ourselves must assume the main burden of this fight. As long as we live, our main task will be the attempt to solve this problem. We don't know how subsequent generations will stand up to the task. It is therefore desirable that we pass the Reich on to our successors in a condition which will make it immune to any serious damage.

In this connection the Fuehrer defended the politics of Charlemagne. His methods, too, had been right. It is entirely wrong to attack him as the "Butcher of the Saxons." Who will guarantee to the Fuehrer that at some later time he himself will not be attacked as the "Butcher of the Swiss?" Austria, after all, also had to be forced into the Reich. We can be happy that it happened in such a peaceful and enthusiastic manner; but if Schuschnigg had offered resistance, it would have been necessary, of course, to overcome it by force.

[This is a revealing passage. In the first place, Hitler was completely disavowing Himmler, who, with his pro-Saxon cult, had always maintained that Charlemagne was really the enemy of Germany, since he had ruthlessly butchered the Saxons when he created the Holy Roman Empire. The shrine of Henry I, King of the Saxons, at Quedlinburg in Lower Saxony, was a shrine for regular S.S. pilgrimages.

Secondly, the entry strongly suggests that, in the event of victory, Hitler would have compelled Switzerland to become a part of Germany.]

Charlemagne was right to push the Ostmark forward so far. What then happened in a limited zone must now be repeated in an area of tremendous dimensions. Moving our boundaries forward so far in the East has proved of great advantage to the German Reich proper. Modern war can be conducted successfully only if you have operational freedom. But this pre-supposes wide spaces. During certain military crises you must be able to retreat five, six, or even eight hundred kilometres. If this retreat, however, takes you back into the very heart of the Reich, you can no longer fight the war with any prospect of success. Last winter our own experience showed how correct this observation of the Fuehrer is. Had our troops stood near the German borders, the Reich would have cracked.

The East will always regard Europe as an attractive jewel, and will again and again try to break into this continent in order to dominate it. Our constant, untiring effort must therefore centre upon taking the steps necessary for our security. If it be true today that the Bolshevism of the East is mainly under Jewish leadership and that the Jews are also the dominant influence in the Western plutocracies, then that is the point at which our anti-Semitic propaganda must begin. The Jews must therefore be thrown out of Europe. . . .

For the Fuehrer there is practically no possibility of a compromise with the Soviets. They must be knocked out, exactly as we formerly had to knock out the Communists to attain power ourselves. At that time we never thought of a compromise either.

The Fuehrer once more traced in detail the parallel between 1932 and today. It is truly amazing and most convincing. Everything that happened then is being repeated today, and just as in 1932 we attained victory only by a stubbornness that sometimes looked like veritable madness, so, too, we shall achieve it today.

The Fuehrer gave expression to his unshakable conviction that the Reich will be the master of all Europe. We shall yet have to engage in many fights, but these will undoubtedly lead to magnificent victories. Thereafter the way to world domination is practically certain. To dominate Europe will be to assume the leadership of the world.

In this connection we naturally cannot accept questions of right and wrong even as a basis of discussion. The loss of this war would constitute the greatest wrong to the German people, victory would give us the greatest right. After all, it will be only the victor who can prove to the world the moral justification for this struggle.

As regards the war itself, the Fuehrer expressed the opinion that it is chiefly a problem of movement. We lost Stalingrad because of the impossibility of mastering the problem of movement. We are now passing through a serious military crisis in North Africa because of the impossibility of mastering this problem of movement. Whoever has the organizational power to solve the problem of movement will be victor in this war. In this respect we have the advantage over our adversaries, for they must attack on exterior lines whereas we can defend ourselves on interior lines.

Besides, our submarine warfare is a dangerous weapon to cut the arteries of the enemy's war of movement. The Fuehrer is firmly convinced that submarine warfare has not reached the end of its development, but is only at its beginning. The Fuehrer thinks it still has tremendous possibilities.

We still have so many chances to hand that we can await further developments with a clear conscience. The Fuehrer rightly recalled that his prophecies in 1919, 1920, and 1921 seemed insolent and impudent. Today they are proved to have been the results of his realistic thinking and of his comprehensive view of the general situation. We must never have the slightest doubt of victory. The Fuehrer is firmly determined in all circumstances to fight this fight through to the end.

There will never be any rebellion within the Reich against our leadership. The people would never think of such a thing. There is no Jewish leadership here for it. The criminals in such a serious crisis would be stood up against the wall.

In the evening I had a lot of work to do at home. Events at Tunis cast a heavy shadow over the whole day. Special bulletins issued during the evening by the English portend evil. We shall have to prepare ourselves for extremely heavy blows. Nevertheless I believe we can and will survive them.

The capture of Tunis and Bizerta is naturally exaggerated by the English as a sensational event. They speak about facing a brief final struggle, after which they believe, the whole of North Africa will fall into their hands. All London is drunk with victory, the English newspapers report. Italy is treated as a negligible quantity.

We are slowly informing the German people what the North African campaign really meant. Actually our soldiers there have written a hymn of heroism that will be eternally graven on the pages of German history. They retarded developments for half a year, thereby enabling us to complete the construction of the Atlantic Wall and to prepare ourselves all over Europe so that invasion is out of the question. We can certainly claim that on the whole the purpose of our operations in North Africa was achieved.

Of course, on the other hand we must realize that our losses there are enormous. We are indeed experiencing a sort of second Stalingrad, although under quite different psychological and material conditions.

It is understandable that the English speak of a first-class victory. They have so far never won any decisive victories. It is quite different, however, for the English to drive us out of the African continent, which is not our living space [Lebensraum], than for us to chase the English out of the European continent whose balance of power, as they always claimed, is a conditio sine qua non of English politics. We can therefore stand a comparison with Dunkirk without having to blush.

We must now tell the German people what has happened to Rommel. That isn't easy. Rommel is at present setting up a command staff which will become active if the English or Americans attempt an invasion in any part of Europe. Rommel is undoubtedly the right man for such an operation. Even if he is given only a limited force, he will be able to deploy it at the right point at the right moment and invoke his pronounced talent for improvisation.

The question has been put to me whether radio sets in the Netherlands should be seized. Undoubtedly British propaganda in the Netherlands was a decisive factor in the recent strike. I am therefore in favour of taking radio sets away from the Dutch as quickly as possible. Anyway, we can make good use of them in our air-raid areas.

The compulsory closing of businesses is gradually coming to an end. It has stirred up a terrible lot of dust and has undoubtedly had a poor effect on morale at home. But I hope we shall be able to overcome this.

Ley talked to me about his earnest wish to have charge of a gau again. He would like to get back to his old gau of Cologne-Aachen, which was wrested from him by Strasser. I don't believe the Fuehrer will agree, as this would tax Ley's energies more than is good for him and have a bad effect upon his other duties.

[Gregor Strasser, Ley's rival in labour matters, was purged on June 30, 1934, for alleged complicity in the Roehm plot. Since Goebbels and certain others retained the position of Gauleiter at the same time that they held national offices, Ley was eager to become a Gauleiter again. He was such a notorious drunkard, however, that Hitler hesitated to increase his responsibilities.]

Frick and Rust were guests with me at the Fuehrer's. Their comments and remarks were so idiotic as to reveal how completely out of the picture they really are. They delivered themselves of stupid phrases, acted as though they were really important, and merely showed that they know nothing about the actual state of affairs. Funk, who was also present, teased them a lot.

We talked about all sorts of problems. Unfortunately the Fuehrer is very tired from overwork. He ought to take better care of himself. The Tunis affair naturally hit him hard. Our position there is very serious, not to say impossible. I don't believe that any hope remains.

Our envoys in south-eastern Europe who stem from the S.A. have, in the opinion of the Foreign Office, by no means proved themselves capable. That shows that diplomacy, too, must be learned. You cannot simply assign good S.A. goose-steppers to a diplomatic post, for problems cannot be solved merely by manly courage and insolence. It would certainly be better if representatives of the Party entering upon diplomatic careers were first given a certain amount of training before being let loose on neutral or friendly states.

In this connection we talked at length with the Fuehrer about what is left for diplomacy to do today in the period of war. The Fuehrer believes that in this war diplomacy hasn't so much of a role to play as in former wars. He certainly does not think that, once the war is ended, a personality like Talleyrand can attain any success. Talleyrand's achievements can be measured only by comparing him with his opposite numbers, who were, in fact, of poor calibre.

The Fuehrer was stirred to the very depths of his soul by the state ceremony for Lutze. The Goetterdaemmerung music quite upset him.

During the afternoon, the Fuehrer discussed the necessary official appointments with Bormann, Ley and me. He would like to appoint the new S.A. chief of staff either from the S.A. or from the Party. Whoever is appointed will have to make sure that the S.A. is once again given clear and definite tasks to perform; Lutze made rather a muddle of this. Relations between the S.A. and the S.S., which are somewhat strained, will have to be improved. Unfortunately Lutze allowed his wife and the family's friendship with Brauchitsch to manoeuvre him into excessive opposition to the S.S. It won't do for these two fighting organizations of the Party to be enemies of each other.

The Fuehrer has a low opinion of von Schirach, who has let himself be infected by the Vienna atmosphere. He has not shown any political sense and is not really an adult Nazi. He has now suddenly begun to talk with an American accent and to roll his "rs" like an actor. He spends too much of his time with artists, which does him no good. Certainly the Fuehrer has nothing in mind for him, but would like, sooner or later, to divert him into diplomacy, for which Schirach is much better suited.

Terboven is out of the question. He did not come up to expectations in Norway, where his actions were too drastic. He considered the Norwegian problem a job, so to speak, for an S.A. man, whereas it really demanded tremendous political astuteness, which Terboven did not possess. Jagow cannot be considered for the S.A. post. The Fuehrer does not want any more members of the nobility given positions of leadership in the Reich and the Party. No matter how favourable their attitude towards the Party may be, the Fuehrer does not know how things will develop in future and he will not have people with outside interests playing a role in public life. Men with close clerical or aristocratic connections will therefore no longer be considered for key positions. They will slowly be retired and no new ones will be appointed. For this reason the post of Reich Sports Leader must also be filled by a non-aristocrat. The Fuehrer regards it as significant that Tschammer-Osten wanted Count von der Schulenburg appointed as his successor, and isn't dreaming of complying.

[In the early days of the movement, Hitler and the other Nazi leaders were eager to show that they had good connections with the nobility. The Kaiser's fourth son, Prince August Wilhelm, was given a high rank in the S.A., and had the title of Reichsredner (Reich Orator). Later Hitler became eager to get rid of the nobility, whose education and manners were better than those of most Nazis.

Hans von Tschammer und Osten was Reich Sports Leader during and after the Olympic Games; Lieutenant Hans-Georg von Jagow was Regierungspräsident, or provincial governor, at Magdeburg.]

Schwede-Coburg has the Fuehrer's complete confidence. As an administrator he would naturally succeed in Munich and Bavaria, but he does not have the necessary artistic sensibilities to make him the ideal choice. . . .

[Franz Schwede, so long identified with Nazi activities at Coburg that his name became hyphenated, was one of the "original" pre-1923 Nazis.]

Munich, of course, is extremely difficult. I wouldn't want this post if it were served me on a platter. The Fuehrer said if he had a dozen persons like myself he would appoint me, but I don't even want to imagine such an assignment.

During this discussion we did not arrive at any final decisions. The Fuehrer wants to sleep over the matter once more. At least we had an opportunity this afternoon to discuss with him all personalities in public life. To my great surprise I noticed how tremendously well informed the Fuehrer is about the so-called "swells". He knows all about them, even though he never makes public use of his knowledge. He sees more clearly than any of us. He notices with regret that there isn't a single leader in the S.A. of sufficient stature to become Lutze's successor. Naturally he would very much like to have me in the Munich post, but there can really be no question of that. This talk made us realize anew that men of real calibre are few and far between. If you have to fill two posts of decisive importance in public life you can search with a lantern and find no one.

These two hours with the Fuehrer were very beautiful and engendered much confidence. Bormann acted exceedingly loyally. I must say that the criticism levelled at him is mostly unjustified. When you think how many promises he keeps compared with Goering, the latter is undoubtedly at a disadvantage. One can no longer really depend on Goering. He is tired and somewhat washed out.

Backe has reported to the Fuehrer. The Fuehrer simply won't approve a 100-gram reduction in the meat ration. Yet it is so necessary. If we don't put it through we are headed for a catastrophe.

I feel that my health has been pretty badly undermined. I really ought to go on leave. But in view of developments in Tunis I just can't go to Karlsbad now. The public would not understand it and I can't explain to everybody that I have really earned a holiday.

May 10, 1943

I received a report from the Army Group Centre [on the Russian front] about the absolute lack of unity in our political procedure in the occupied Eastern areas. This report is quite remarkable. Our Eastern policy lacks a clear basis. Everybody does what he likes. It must be very depressing for a soldier at the front to experience how little direction there is in German politics.

The fights in the Warsaw Ghetto have largely petered out. I received a secret report on the mysterious question how the Jews got hold of the large supplies of arms with which they defended themselves. For the most part they bought them from our brave allies, who, fleeing homeward, got rid of their weapons in Warsaw for good money. There are soldiers for you!

At noon I had a long talk with the Fuehrer. . . . He is very much opposed to centralization in the Food Ministry and especially in the Ministry of the Interior. Speer is wrong in trying to bring all electric and water power under the control of the Reich. The Fuehrer does not at all approve of this. The conception of property must not be toyed with lightly. It won't do simply to take local property away by government pressure. A contract is a contract; that is true not only in private but also in public life.

The Wehrmacht and the centralized instruments of political leadership are an exception. There can be no thought, for instance, of putting broadcasting and the press into the hands of low-ranking authorities. They are centralized instruments of political leadership which must be retained exclusively by the Reich.

Frick, who was present at this talk, cut a very poor figure. The centralized administration that he built up is neither approved of nor even appreciated by the Fuehrer. The Fuehrer criticized the Ministry of the Interior so outspokenly that Frick ought to draw certain conclusions. But he is too old and too fond of his office for this.

The painter, Gerhardinger, has refused to let the Munich Art Exposition have his canvases because he fears they might be destroyed by air raids. The Fuehrer ordered that he is to be punished very severely. It won't do for an individual painter to arrogate to himself the right of avoiding part of the national risk.

Gerhardinger was a poor and hungry painter who became a rich man only through National Socialism. Things would come to a pretty pass if behaviour like this went unchallenged and artists were allowed to shrink their national duty! The Fuehrer decreed exceptionally severe punishment in this case as an example to others. . . . The Fuehrer spoke in terms of highest praise of the Dresden painter, Kriegel, who was discovered by my wife.

Next the Fuehrer discussed Frank of the General Government. He is now firmly determined to remove him and to name Greiser as his successor.

In the early afternoon the Fuehrer asked me to come to the chancellery for a private talk with no one else present. We sat in his study on the second floor and I had abundant opportunity to present all problems now on my mind.

The Fuehrer was very much impressed with the Katyn incident. It showed him what tremendous possibilities are still inherent in anti-Bolshevik propaganda. The Wehrmacht has no business to interfere in this matter. It should concern itself with military questions only. Questions of psychology are exclusively the concern of the Propaganda Ministry.

The Fuehrer attaches great importance to powerful anti-Semitic propaganda. He agrees that success depends upon constant repetition. He is immensely pleased with the way in which we have sharpened up anti-Semitic propaganda in the press and on the air. I informed him about the extent to which this anti-Semitic propaganda was being pushed in our foreign broadcasts. At present about 70 to 80 per cent of our broadcasts are devoted to it. The anti-Semitic bacilli naturally exist everywhere in all Europe; we must merely make them virulent. . . . Unfortunately we have too few journalists to do this job. The Fuehrer gave me permission to call back from the P.K.s a considerable number of young journalists and distribute them over the entire German press.

The press section of the High Command, which has always given me a lot of trouble, is now to be transferred to the Propaganda Ministry. Keitel and Jodl are opposing this with every means at their disposal but the Fuehrer asked me to send him a report on this question, whereupon he will issue the necessary decree. Propaganda, he said, is a function of the Propaganda Ministry and not of the Wehrmacht.

Our propaganda in the East, too, is to be linked up more closely with the Propaganda Ministry. It isn't Rosenberg's business to engage in propaganda about which, as the Fuehrer rightly observes, it is notorious that he knows nothing. Here, too, the Fuehrer agrees completely with me.

Unfortunately my views did not prevail in the question of continuing the Frankfurter Zeitung. The Fuehrer gave a number of reasons why the Frankfurter Zeitung should be eliminated. Personally I believe the reasons for retaining it are stronger than the Fuehrer realizes, but he is stubbornly of the opinion that it would be better to do away with it. I shall now carry out his wish and bring about the liquidation of the newspaper.

The Fuehrer has no intention of following the Japanese procedure of court-martialling airmen shot down over German soil and having them executed. He fears the English have too many opportunities for reprisal and that we might stumble into a situation of which one can see the beginning but not the end. I must make sure that, while we let our press mention the strong language employed by the Japanese and also more recently by the Italians, we do not suggest to the German public that we should indulge in similar practices.

Turning now to the theme of total war, the Fuehrer was on the whole satisfied with the measures taken. But even during total war, one must not fight the women. Never yet has such a battle been won by any government. For women constitute a tremendous power and as soon as you dare to touch their beauty parlours they are all up in arms against you.

The Fuehrer vigorously opposes high taxes on cinema and theatre tickets. Cinemas and theatres are all that is left for the little man to go to for recreation. If we take them away, where is he to turn to forget the war for a couple of hours? The Fuehrer would much rather have us establish more lotteries or expand the existing ones, because by that means the money gets into the hands of the state without offending or angering the little man.

I then raised some problems of personnel. The Fuehrer agreed that Voegler should be appointed president of the German Academy. This is a happy solution of a difficult problem. The Fuehrer can't reconcile himself to the candidacy of Bouhler, whom he considers to be a decent National Socialist but a man without self-assurance and self-confidence. If Bouhler were his wife and the wife were Bouhler, the Fuehrer would be ready to give him the German Academy. . . .

[Geheimrat Albert Voegler, head of the United Steel Works of Germany, was one of the industrialists who cast his lot in with the Nazis. Philip Bouhler, who had the title of Reichsleiter, enjoyed cabinet rank, but really was only a glorified secretary to Hitler. His official job was Chief of the Chancellery of the Leader of the National Socialist party.]

The Fuehrer shares my opinion about most of the leading men in public life. He is very critical of Frick. He doesn't think Seldte worth anything. Rosenberg is more of a theorist than a man of practical affairs.

The Fuehrer was very enthusiastic about what we have been doing in Linz. It is touching how concerned the Fuehrer is to balance the pronounced industrialization of Linz with even stronger emphasis upon its cultural character. The Fuehrer wants to erect grandiose buildings in Linz with the aim of making it a German Budapest. Vienna, of course, is fascinating as a city. Von Schirach succumbed to its charm. The Fuehrer told me that even he was completely captivated by the architecture of Vienna when he visited it the first time in his youth. It will need a lot of effort to turn Linz into a real competitor of Vienna.

[Although born in the little village of Braunau on the Inn, Hitler regarded Linz on the Danube as his "native town," as he went to school and grew up there.]

The Fuehrer spoke in glowing terms about the days ahead of us once the war is ended. Nothing will make him happier than to exchange his grey uniform for the brown, to visit theatres and cinemas again, to go to the Wintergarten with me in the evening, or to drop in at the K.d.d.K. and be a human being again among humans.

[For purposes of World War II Hitler had a field-grey uniform designed in advance which was the exact counterpart of his brown Nazi party uniform. He and his entourage appeared dramatically in their brand-new grey uniforms for the first time in the Reichstag session of September 2, 1939. Hitler then vowed he would not change back to brown until victory was won. Many foreigners erroneously believed Hitler wore a military uniform. That was not the case—it was the Party uniform in grey. The Wintergarten of Berlin was a famous music hall. K.d.d.K. stands for Kameradschaft der deutschen Kuenstler—a Berlin club for artists.]

He is absolutely sick of the generals. He can't imagine anything better than having nothing to do with them. His opinion of all the generals is devastating. Indeed, at times it is so caustic as to seem prejudiced or unjust, although on the whole it no doubt fits the case. He also told me why he no longer eats at the generals' mess at G.H.Q. He just can't bear the sight of generals any longer. He has not become a misanthrope; on the contrary, his old friends are more welcome to him today than ever, but his new collaborators don't enjoy his confidence and haven't known how to work their way into his heart. All generals lie, he says. All generals are disloyal. All generals are opposed to National Socialism. All generals are reactionaries. While that is not true, he is nevertheless right in some respects. He just can't stand them. They have disappointed him too often. They have no spiritual or cultural outlook and therefore there is no basis of understanding with the Fuehrer. They are faithless, they are not loyal to him, for the most part they do not understand him. For example, at the home of Colonel General Schmidt's brother, who had to be arrested for treason, a number of letters from the colonel general were found which spoke very disparagingly of the Fuehrer. Yet he was one of the generals of whom the Fuehrer thought especially well! So once again he suffered a great disappointment. As a class, the generals seem like total strangers to him and he will in future stay farther away from them than ever. . . .

The Fuehrer had a talk with Field Marshal Rommel. A communiqué is to be released explaining the Rommel case to the public and pointing out especially that he has not been in North Africa for months. The Fuehrer is particularly concerned about the latter point because otherwise Rommel will be regarded as being responsible for our defeat in North Africa, which would damage his reputation. Rommel ought to be very happy about the communiqué which the Fuehrer dictated on the subject. Everything in it is calculated to reassure the German people, including the fact that the Fuehrer awarded Rommel the diamonds to his Oak-Leaf Cluster some months ago. Rommel is to remain in the immediate entourage of the Fuehrer for the present. The Fuehrer wants to save him for the first difficult task that may arise and to send him into action at points where improvised leadership is most needed.

I am glad that the Fuehrer has such a high opinion of Rommel. Mussolini must pay dearly for being so insistent about Rommel's recall. He always claimed that his generals did a better job. Now he can see the result of his miscalculation. Thank God, it was indirectly responsible for Rommel's name being saved. That is of great value to further operations, for military prestige such as Rommel enjoys just can't be created at will and then taken away at will.

The Fuehrer believes that our position in Tunis has become quite untenable. One of the reasons for our collapse is the fact that Mussolini got Rommel out of North Africa. The Duce no longer sticks to a clear line, either in his policies or in his war strategy. As a personality, to be sure, he is a man of genius, but his entourage is worthless. There is no one he can rely on for help, either in waging the war or to execute his policies. If it be true that the Fuehrer, despite his tremendous powers, has nevertheless been lied to and cheated so often by the generals, how much more must it be so with Mussolini! As for the rest, he has become an old and tired man. While the Fuehrer invigorated him on the Obersalzberg, it remains to be seen whether the effect will be lasting. Mussolini arrived on the Obersalzberg completely grey and passive; he left like a new man.

His new Party secretary, Scorza, is exceptionally active. Nevertheless the Fuehrer is not at all convinced that the Italians will stand up to it when a really heavy strain comes. Should they fail, this would not be a complete catastrophe for us, but it would nevertheless be exceedingly embarrassing, not so much militarily as politically and psychologically. But we would of course survive even such a blow.

I then talked with the Fuehrer about many matters of general interest. He yearns for the day when he can end this war. He wants then to return to his old comrades in the Party and also to the families here in Berlin in whose company he always felt so much at home. We want then again to devote our energies chiefly to the fine arts, the theatre, films, literature, and music. We want to begin being human beings again. The Fuehrer raves about the possibilities of organizing festivals again and receptions, and for surrounding himself with people he likes. From all this I gather that the Fuehrer has not become a misanthrope, despite his long loneliness at G.H.Q. It is just generals that he doesn't want to see any more; that's all. He has remained his own self towards the Party and especially towards his old friends. Times may now be difficult but they will be happier once we have brought the war to an end. Let us hope this will happen soon.

However much our misfortune in Tunis may depress the Fuehrer personally, he has never for one second lost his firm faith in our final victory. That was proved to me anew by these two beautiful hours during which I could talk to him quite alone and he opened his whole heart to me. Even though he gives the impression of being rather tired and overworked, he is still the old Fuehrer, though fatigued and a little shaky. But within him there glows a fiery spirit, which takes all cares off our shoulders. The German people simply don't know what they owe to their Fuehrer.

It is interesting to note that many of the London papers have printed my article against the Jews. I can't explain this. Are the Jews foolish enough to believe that this article would militate against us rather than strengthen anti-Semitic feeling in England?

The Foreign Department of my Ministry has proposed that we should improve declining morale in Italy by German propaganda. I'm against this. The last thing we want is to do the propaganda for the Italians! They wouldn't agree anyway; on this point they are exceedingly touchy.

At noon I went to see the Fuehrer. We discussed the situation in Tunis in detail. The Fuehrer now regards it as hopeless.

I touched upon a number of domestic questions. The Fuehrer sharply denounced the Ministry of the Interior's centralization of administration in Berlin, as a result of which the provincial and communal authorities can hardly move. It requires great skill to centralize the Reich's leadership, and at the same time to decentralize its administration. The Ministry of the Interior has no conception how to do this. It has created a tremendous bureaucratic apparatus which acts like a sponge on officialdom, sucking up all initiative.

The Fuehrer's idea is that the Reich offices should have only a few well-paid officials; good pay would guarantee efficient results. As laudable examples of where this has been successfully achieved, he cited the Reich Chancellery and the Propaganda Ministry. As an example of how things should not be done, he cited the Air Ministry, which is really nothing but an administrative factory.

In our discussion the Propaganda Ministry cut an exceptionally good figure. The Fuehrer endorsed my principle that it must never have more than 1,000 employees. The Fuehrer observed that it would be a good thing if my ideas were observed throughout the entire administration of the Reich. Our leadership at home would certainly be much better than it is at present.

I vehemently opposed the idea that the Reich Finance Minister or the Minister of the Interior should have any say in making appointments in my Ministry. I alone can determine who is qualified to carry out the work for which I am responsible.

I then discussed with the Fuehrer a number of questions about culture and art. He is well satisfied with the plans designed by Professor Kreis for monuments in honour of our heroes. Professor Kreis is at present one of our best architects.

[Wilhelm Kreis, born in 1873, a Dresden architect and senator of the Reich Chamber of Culture, built the Augustus Bridge at Dresden, the Bismarck Hall at Stettin, the Duesseldorf Art Museum, the Museum of German Hygiene at Dresden, and the War Ministry Building in Berlin.]

On this occasion the Fuehrer was exceptionally interested in personal questions. He inquired minutely about the welfare of my ^Wson. I was sorry that he had not seen the children for so long, and ^{son-}for the moment when he could again devote himself ^m to a families of his closest friends. . . .

It is nothing short of touching to observe the Fuehrer ^{work} confidence during these days. No matter how much ^{humann} catastrophe in North Africa may gnaw at his heart, ^{promise} he ^{tactics} notice and it can in no way affect his determination ⁿ to hope

In the afternoon Rommel visited me. He looked s made a magnificent recovery during his leave; nev me that he had spent many a sleepless night. Devel Africa are almost breaking his heart, but the Duce it otherwise. He and his generals pushed Rommel African theatre of war. Italy didn't have the courage to use such means as were at its disposal, especially its fleet, and must now pay for it. Rommel's opinion of the Italians is devastating. He thinks nothing of them and is convinced that if the English or Americans were to land in southern Italy, the Italians neither would nor could offer effective resistance. . . .

Rommel doesn't think much of the Duce now either. He described him as an old and tired man who occasionally still had a political or military inspiration but who lacked the ability to issue clear military or political orders.

I improved upon this occasion to explain the general war situation to Rommel both from a political and military standpoint. He listened to me for more than an hour with intense interest. I think the confidence I displayed reassured him very much and strengthened his backbone. Certainly Rommel is one of the best officers we have today.

We sat together until midnight. These were fine and interesting hours for me. If all our marshals were cut from the same cloth as Rommel, we would no longer need to worry about our military leadership. Unfortunately, however, Rommel is not the rule, but the exception.

Events in Tunisia overshadow everything else in the field of international news. The English, and especially the Americans, are publishing fantastic reports about capitulations by Axis troops which, however, have been put together so stupidly that they have hardly any value. Naturally the Americans are happy as children at this first opportunity to take German troops into custody. But I hope we shall soon have an opportunity to pay them back for this. . . . Our generals are behaving rather better under interrogations than those at Stalingrad.

The Bolsheviks have held a pan-Slav congress in Moscow, designed to win the Slav peoples of the Balkans over to the Bolshevik cause. I won't permit the propagandist slogans of this Moscow Congress to be quoted; the less attention paid to them, the better.

Total war is giving me a lot of work to do, but matters are progressing according to rule and programme. I have received a great number of letters—more than 15,000 in only a few weeks. All of these letters testify to the unqualified agreement of public opinion with my views, and show what great confidence their writers have in me—a thing about which I am very happy. I must try to justify this confidence; in other words, I simply cannot fade out of the picture in case errors are committed in the realm of total war. The people identify the idea and conception of total war with me personally. I am therefore in a certain sense publicly responsible for the continuation of total war.

Naumann has had a long talk with Himmler. Himmler is now ready to have the S.D. report stopped, or at all events to stop supplying it to every sort of minister, as its effect is too defeatist. Himmler now wants to have a special report made up by the S.D. for me personally, containing everything which has hitherto been submitted to a larger circle. Himmler spoke in most flattering terms about the work of the Propaganda Ministry and about myself. He told me that I am one of the few strong men now fighting without compromise for the great aims of the war; that I had pursued the same aim in 1932 with the greatest success, and that there was reason that my present tactics would also lead to success. On the whole he didn't think much of Goering. He especially deplored the fact that we had no domestic policies, that the Ministry of the Interior had become nothing but a bureaucratic goitre [ein reiner Verwaltungskropf], and that it showed no ability for leadership.

[Heinrich Himmler had long aspired to take the place of Dr. Wilhelm Frick as Minister of the Interior. His ambition was realized somewhat later, when Frick was appointed Protector of Bohemia-Moravia. Himmler, as head of the German police, was technically under Frick, but as leader of the S.S. was responsible to Hitler only.]

Everybody is against Dr. Frick. I simply cannot understand why the Fuehrer still keeps him.

At noon I went to see the Fuehrer.

The Fuehrer has received a letter from Cardinal Bertram complaining bitterly about the alleged suppression of the churches. The Fuehrer intends to reply informing Bertram that many Catholic clergy are assuming such a treasonable attitude towards the war that the Cardinal had better look after these matters, instead of grumbling about conditions which the Fuehrer regrets himself and is constantly trying to remedy.

I took the position in talking with the Fuehrer that the old cardinals of the type of Faulhaber and Bertram are much less dangerous than the young clergy who are serving at the front as army chaplains and even wear the Iron Cross of the First Class. These give us much more trouble, for people think highly of them. They are the fighting type and know how to talk with their war experience as a background. The Fuehrer agreed with me. We must be on our guard about them.

[Cardinal Adolf Bertram of Breslau was the senior cardinal in Germany, and, as such, presided at the annual Fulda Bishops' Conference which, during the Nazi regime, issued pastoral letters to be taken secretly to the individual parishes for reading to the congregations.]

The churches have always played a dubious role in wartime, at least with us. They won't let a leader go his own way, especially if he has his own point of view on religious matters. The Fuehrer characterized it as nothing short of absurd that Frederick the Great, for instance, was buried under the cupola of the Potsdam Garrison Church, although he wished to be interred beside his dogs in the w^{er}k of Sans Souci. Thank God, English air raids have compelled offer eⁿd this condition. The coffin of Frederick the Great has been

Rom^l where it is safe from bombs. The Fuehrer will never restore him as a Potsdam Garrison Church. Either an imposing mausoleum military ins^tyle is to be built for Frederick the Great in the park of or political b, or he is to be laid to rest in the great Soldiers' Hall of a

I improve Ministry yet to be constructed. Personally I should prefer to Rommel I wish of the great king fulfilled and him given his last resting place in Sans Souci. The Fuehrer, too, rather inclines to this view. But these are problems for the future.

The Fuehrer spoke very critically about the arrogance of the higher and lower clergy. The insanity of the Christian doctrine of redemption really doesn't fit at all into our time. Nevertheless there are learned, educated men, occupying high positions in public life, who cling to it with the faith of a child. It is simply incomprehensible how anybody can consider the Christian doctrine of redemption a guide for the difficult life of today. The Fuehrer cited a number of exceptionally exaggerated and even grotesque examples. These opinionated parsons, of course, know exactly how the world is constituted. While the most learned and wisest scientists spend a whole lifetime studying, but one of the mysterious laws of nature, any little country priest from Bavaria is in a position to pronounce judgement on the basis of his religious knowledge. One can only regard such a disgusting performance with disdain. A church that does not keep step with modern scientific knowledge is doomed. It may take time, but it is bound finally to happen. Anybody with both feet on the ground, who can only faintly imagine the mystic secrets of nature, will naturally be extremely modest about airing his views on the universe. Clergy, however, who have not caught a breath of such modesty, adopt an entirely opinionated attitude towards questions of these dimensions.

The Fuehrer showed that he had read about all these problems and studied them. There is hardly a fact, hardly a theory, hardly a date, that he doesn't know and that he cannot cite from memory. I have the greatest respect for the Fuehrer's tremendous intellectual achievement in all fields of knowledge. It is a pity that such talks can't be made known to more people. Their veneration for the Fuehrer could only be increased thereby.

The Fuehrer is an enthusiastic advocate of pure science. . . . It was a great mistake that we failed to win science over to support the new state. That men such as Planck are reserved, to put it mildly, in their attitude towards us, is the fault of Rust and is irremediable. It makes one sad to think that the Fuehrer is so tremendously interested in the tasks and researches of science, and yet our research men and scientists are unaware of the fact. The mediocre talents in the Reich Government are a wall between the Fuehrer and many sectors of public life. That is true of science, of administration, of justice, and of many other things.

[Professor Max Planck, born in 1858, was one of Germany's greatest physicists and a close friend of Professor Albert Einstein. He was the originator of the quantum theory. He was permanent secretary of the Prussian Academy of Science and president of the Kaiser Wilhelm Society for the Advancement of Science.]

It is characteristic that during the war the Ministry of the Interior has done practically nothing about domestic politics. Whatever there is in Germany in the way of domestic policy stems from me. Naturally I can be very well satisfied about this development. If a strong man were in Frick's place, he would be in a position to cause me much trouble; as things are, I have been able to have my way in domestic politics. According to an old principle of mine, I never give up what I have once taken into my hands.

My thoughts often turn to North Africa and to our soldiers who are there engaged in their last heavy struggles. The only consolation is that they are falling into the hands of a civilized opponent. If our entire tank army in Africa were compelled, as was our Sixth Army in Stalingrad, to face death to the last man, that would be a gruesome thought. This time, however, we may regard tens of thousands of soldiers as saved.

The fight for Tunisia may end any day now. The comforting thing about it is that if the English want to measure their strength against us again, they will have to step on to European soil. We shall then give them the reception they deserve.

There is talk in London of 100,000 prisoners.

Knox declared that Sicily would be occupied next. We pay no attention to these unfounded rumours and attempts at camouflage.

The situation in Croatia was by no means settled by the last purge; it is still strained. More than 13,000 rebels were killed, among them a great many intellectuals. The fight against the unification of Europe by the Axis Powers is mainly carried on by intellectuals. The broad masses of the people, on the whole, are uninterested in this struggle.

I have been devoting exhaustive study to The Protocols of Zion. In the past the objection always was that they were unsuitable for present-day propaganda. In reading them now I find that we can use them very well. The Protocols of Zion are as modern today as they were when published for the first time. . . .

[The Protocols of the Elders of Zion was a scurrilous publication describing alleged Jewish plans for world conquest and the existence of an occult Jewish Government. It was the subject of a celebrated libel suit at Berne, in 1935. Experts from a number of countries, including Germany, gave evidence. The ruling of the court on May 14, 1935, was that the Protocols were forged and faked.]

At noon I mentioned this to the Fuehrer. He believes the Protocols are absolutely genuine. The Jewish question, in the Fuehrer's opinion, will play a decisive role in England. In all the world, he said, the Jews are alike. Whether they live in a Ghetto of the East or in the bankers' palaces of the city or Wall Street, they always pursue the same aims and without previous agreement even use the same methods. One might well ask why are there any Jews in the world order? That would be exactly like asking why there are potato bugs. Nature is dominated by the law of struggle. There will always be parasites who will spur this struggle on and intensify the process of selection between the strong and the weak. The principle of struggle also dominates human life. One merely needs to know the laws of this struggle to be able to face it. The intellectual cannot naturally resist the Jewish peril because his instincts have been badly blunted. For this reason the nations with a high standard of civilization are exposed to this peril first and foremost. In nature, life always takes measures against parasites; in the life of nations that is not always the case. It is from this fact that the Jewish peril actually stems. There is therefore no other recourse for modern nations than to exterminate the Jew. . . .

There is no hope of leading the Jews back into the fold of civilized humanity. They will for ever remain Jews, just as we are for ever members of the Aryan race.

The Jew was the first to introduce the lie into politics as a weapon. Aboriginal man, the Fuehrer believes, did not know how to lie. The higher the human being developed intellectually, the more he acquired the ability to hide his innermost thoughts, and give expression to what he did not really feel. The Jew, as a primarily intellectual creature, was the first to learn this art. He can therefore be regarded not only as the carrier but as the inventor of the lie among human beings. Because of their thoroughly materialistic attitude, the English behave very much like the Jews. In fact, they are the Aryans who have acquired most of the Jewish characteristics. The nations which first saw through the Jew and were the first to fight him are going to take his place in the domination of the world.

During the night there was another exceptionally heavy air raid on Duisburg. Even though it did not prove quite as disastrous as we had reason to assume after the initial news, it was nevertheless an exceedingly heavy bombardment, and unspeakable sorrow and great distress have come to the sorely tried city.

In Tunis the fight is ended. I write this with a heavy heart. I simply cannot read the exaggerated Anglo-American accounts. They are full of insults to our soldiers, who fought with legendary heroism to their last round of ammunition. These Anglo-American emanations demonstrate how badly English public opinion has already been infected by Jewish conceptions. One would at least have thought the enemy would be clever enough not to speak in derogatory terms of the adversary since this merely depreciates the heroism of their own soldiers. I cannot endure flying into a black rage every day about such reports and fairly tearing myself to bits with anger. Therefore I don't even read the accounts, especially as we are saying nothing in reply. We stand aloof in hard and stubborn pride and simply take no notice of barking dogs.

Naturally the English now speak of the greatest defeat in our military history. But one must not judge defeats by the size of the figures but only by the foreseeable consequences. . . .

Atlee gave a final report to a jubilant lower House. His basic note, too, is triumph. We must now swallow these bitter pills, disgusting though this may be.

The failure of our submarines to win victories is having regrettable consequences. The defence of the Anglo-American convoys is now so formidable that, if it continues, a new situation in submarine warfare will have arisen. Our technical development both as regards submarines and air warfare is far inferior to that of the English and the Americans. We are now getting the reward for our poor leadership on the scientific front, which did not show the necessary initiative to stimulate the willingness of scientists to co-operate. You just can't let an absolute nitwit be at the head of German science for years and not expect to be punished for such folly.

[Goebbels here refers to his fellow cabinet member Bernhard Rust, Minister of Education, who as a young man had been in an insane asylum.]

My colleague Lapper sent me a summary of conditions in the Ukraine, which are very sad indeed. Our administrative and policy-directing offices there have not succeeded in spurring the Ukrainian people on to collaborate with us. Accordingly the harvest will be poor. We shall barely be able to feed our soldiers from the grain surpluses there. There can be no thought of transporting food to Germany. We Germans are not very well fitted for administering occupied territory, as we lack experience. The English, who have done nothing else in all their history, are superior to us in this respect.

That the fight in Tunisia has ended is very depressing. I sometimes feel that we lack the necessary initiative for fighting the war. During the past five months the enemy has had the upper hand almost everywhere. He is defeating us in the air, he has inflicted heavy wounds on us in the East, he is beating us in North Africa, and even our submarine warfare is not as successful as we really expected. It is high time now for us to attain tangible results in the East. That would considerably brighten the whole scene.

The submarine command and the Luftwaffe have done everything in their power, but we were not adequately prepared for this military drama. The Luftwaffe especially is having a continuous streak of bad luck. That is not exactly an accident. We rested on our laurels. The essential thing to me, however, is that at last we are realizing our position clearly.

In the evening we issued a final communiqué about Tunisia. The Fuehrer issued an order that it was not to be broadcast. I don't think that was necessary. We should not suddenly introduce new methods into our news policies. In a great military crisis like this they lead people to think that we must have a bad conscience!

Air raids are becoming more frequent again. During the night the Skoda works near Pilsen were hard hit. Among other targets the drafting room [Konstruktions-Buero] was destroyed. That is quite a setback for us. However, the number of planes we shot down is colossal. Within forty-eight hours the English lost seventy-eight four-engined bombers.

Meanwhile Beneš has arrived in Washington. He is to attend the conferences there as an expert for the south-east. That is not at all good for morale in the Protectorate. The more Beneš' finger is in the pie of great-power politics, the greater will be the hopes people there will place in him. Evidently Beneš is regarded as the appropriate person to bring about a reconciliation between the Poles and the Soviet Union. He is soon to travel to Moscow.

The United States is again boasting of enormous production figures. I consider it necessary for us to publish at least a part of our production figures. It cannot be denied that the American statistics are making a deep impression on world public opinion.

Much criticism now appears in the letters reaching us. Morale among the masses is so low as to be rather serious. Even people of good will are now worried about the future. The man in the street no longer sees any way out of the military dilemma. As a result there is criticism of the leaders, in some cases even of the Fuehrer himself.

Rosenberg criticized our motion-picture production in a letter to me. I could give him a stiff answer by criticizing conditions in the East, but I won't do so because the whole matter seems too unimportant to me. At any rate I should have thought that Rosenberg had other things to worry about rather than which film did not turn out successfully.

The well-known physics expert, Professor Ramsauer, Director of the Research Institute of the German General Electric Company and chairman of the Deutsche Physikalische Gesellschaft, has presented me with a report on the status of German and Anglo-Saxon physics. This report is very depressing for us. Anglo-Saxon physical science has completely eclipsed us, especially in research. As a result, the Anglo-Saxon powers are very superior to us in the practical application to warfare of the results of research in physics. That is noticeable both in air and submarine warfare. Professor Ramsauer proposed a number of changes which I shall attempt to bring about as far as I can. He believes we can catch up with the Anglo-Saxon physicists by concentrating our research facilities, by combining the various research institutes which are doing substantial work, by raising the standards of the profession, and by increasing the number of physical scientists, both students and teachers. Of course this will take considerable time. It is better, however, to make a beginning and to count on certain results for the future rather than to let things merely go on as they are now.

The general military situation causes us some anxiety. War in the air is becoming more and more bitter from day to day. The day raids by American bombers are creating extraordinary difficulties. Thus, for instance, at Kiel, we counted more than one hundred dead and found very serious damage to naval installations. If this continues and we find no proper antidote for these day raids, we shall have to face exceptionally serious consequences which in the long run will prove unbearable.

Developments in submarine warfare are very disagreeable. Our submarines again made contact with various convoys, but soon had to give up as the enemy's defence was exceptionally strong. No worth-while ships were sunk. If this continues, we shall have to accustom ourselves to the thought that submarine warfare, at least for the present, has taken an unfavourable turn. The enemy air force, especially, is causing our submarines much trouble and worry. Technical developments on the enemy side are further advanced than ours. Professor Ramsauer pointed this out convincingly in his report. Undoubtedly our technicians and physicists will in a relatively short time find the proper way to make our submarines again take the offensive. But for the moment, the situation does not seem to be very favourable.

News has reached us that Roosevelt intends to meet Stalin soon. In any case the Americans seem very eager either to gloss over or to iron out the differences that have arisen between the Soviet Union and the plutocratic powers.

The report from the occupied areas indicates no fundamental change in the situation. Our chances have decreased generally because of events in Tunisia. These are having a very unfavourable influence on public opinion in the countries under our military administration.

I was handed an appeal signed by Cardinal Bertram, which the Catholic bishops had addressed to the Reich Government. The manner in which the complaint is made about the relationship between State and Church is absolutely unrestrained. Significantly enough this appeal was published in the American press shortly after it was written. The Catholic clergy are collaborating with our country's enemies in an entirely treasonable way. I could burst with rage when I think that we cannot possibly call the guilty ones to account now. We must save our vengeance until later.

During the night we had a fairly long air alert. Many provinces throughout the Reich were affected. In reality, however, only ten nuisance planes flew over them. We must therefore record the absurd fact that ten nuisance planes drove fifteen to eighteen million people out of bed.

Judging by a number of reports, our captured soldiers in Tunis are being treated relatively well. The Fuehrer will now do something about the treatment of English prisoners of war. They are still fettered and the English will undoubtedly very shortly approach us through the protecting power to ask certain questions. The Fuehrer has therefore decided to remove the chains quite inconspicuously from prisoners of war so that, when the English make inquiries, we can say it has already been done. We can no longer indulge in a prestige fight with the English in the matter of fettering, since the English hold many more German prisoners in custody than we do English.

[Switzerland had taken over the protection of British interests in Germany.]

Air raids during the night inflicted heavy damage on us. The attacks of British bombers on the dams in our valleys were very successful. The Fuehrer is exceedingly impatient and angry about the lack of preparedness on the part of our Luftwaffe. Damage to production was more than normal. Naturally the Gauleiters in all gaus containing dams which have not yet been attacked are very much worried, since the anti-aircraft measures there are quite inadequate.

[The Ruhr Valley was flooded after R.A.F. bombings breached the Eder, Sorpe, and Moehne dams.]

The United States is talking of an Anglo-Saxon peace offer to Italy to be accompanied by an ultimatum stating that air raids against Italian cities would be increased horribly if it is not accepted. None of these reports is based on fact, any more than the headlines in London papers claiming that the Fuehrer has sent me to Italy. We must expect the English and Americans to continue to wage a war of nerves on Italy, but I assume that Mussolini and the Fascist party will be equal to it.

To intensify this war of nerves the allied G.H.Q. in North Africa repeatedly broadcast to the French people telling them to sit at their radio sets until late into the night and wait for important news. I think this whole thing is a gigantic bluff. The English and Americans won't stage an invasion yet. They haven't prepared sufficiently for it, and it is all too uncertain.

Herr von Gienanth, who has just returned from Tunisia, gave me a report on the last skirmishes there. This report is very dramatic. The German soldiers regarded the fighting qualities of the Americans as very inferior and mediocre. Every German soldier is convinced that the Americans will be defeated without the slightest difficulty once we meet them on an equal basis on the European continent. The crime that Roosevelt and his Jewish clique committed against these men is positively outrageous.

The Fuehrer has given instructions to start an anti-Bolshevik legion made up of English prisoners of war. These are to take part in the fight against the Soviet Union as volunteers. The propaganda to which these English prisoners of war are to be subjected must be handled with exceptional care. I shall take a hand myself in this important matter.

The whole day brought nothing but work and worry. Alarming news kept piling in. One must certainly keep one's mental balance and hold one's nerves in check so as not to become jittery under the impact. But there can be no question about this in my case. I know that war is a tough business; I also know that one must see it through; I realize clearly that it involves an exceptionally severe strain; but when one tackles the job courageously and survives the crisis, victory beckons in the end.

The English and Americans are discussing practically nothing but air warfare. Their successful raid on the German dams created a great sensation both in London and in Washington. Of course they know exactly what they have achieved by this time. The former Berlin Reuter correspondent, Bettany, claimed that the plan for the attack stemmed from a Jew who had emigrated from Berlin. I had this written up as a short news item for papers in the Reich, especially in the areas that suffered the disaster. This shows once again how dangerous the Jews are and how right we are to put them behind bars.

I feel certain that treason was involved in this whole attack, for the English were so well informed, and after their attack had such exact knowledge of what damage was done, that it is hardly credible that they ascertained this solely by air reconnaissance.

The English and Americans claim they took 109,000 Germans and 63,000 Italians prisoner in Tunisia. It may therefore be presumed that most of our troops there are in captivity. In the last analysis that is a comforting thought. It certainly does not leave so bitter a taste as did the collapse of our defence in Stalingrad.

The psychological pressure which is being brought to bear upon the Italian public at the moment is extremely heavy, and, I suppose, also painful.

A Hollywood film about the Soviet Union, based on the book, Mission to Moscow, by the former American Ambassador in Moscow Davies, has created a great sensation in the United States. It pleads for friendship with the Soviets in such an evil-smelling manner that even the American people are protesting.

The reduction of the meat ration by one hundred grams has, after all, had a very serious psychological effect. Criticism is directed especially at Goering's speech of last autumn in the Sports Palace, in which he claimed that from then on everything would be better.

Knut Hamsun has published an exceptionally favourable appeal in Fritt Folk, organ of the Nasjonal Samling. In the afternoon the great Norwegian author visited me with his wife in Hermann Goering Street.

[Goebbels' official residence was in Hermann Goering Street, next door to the American Embassy.]

I was deeply touched by this visit. When Hamsun saw me for the first time tears filled his eyes and he had to turn aside to hide his emotion. I saw before me an eighty-four-year-old gentleman with a wonderful head. The wisdom of old age was written on his brow. It was exceedingly difficult to converse with him, as he is so deaf that he does not understand a word and his wife had to translate everything I said into Norwegian and shout it into his ear. Nevertheless I was overwhelmed at his visit. To me he is the embodiment of what an epic writer should be, and we may consider ourselves fortunate to be his contemporaries. Whatever he says makes sense. He speaks only a few words, but they reflect the experience of age and of a life rich in struggle. His faith in German victory is unshakable. From childhood on he has keenly disliked the English, for whom he has nothing but contempt. He lived in the United States for a long time and describes the people there as completely devoid of culture. He is visiting the Reich to look after his daughter Ellinor. I placed every facility at his service for his family mission. I am very happy that I came to know the famous author personally at this late period of his life. He is of a touching modesty that fittingly matches the lustre of a great personality.

Again and again I gazed at the high brow behind which sprang into existence the figures of Victoria, of Lieutenant Glan, and all the many other characters who have been my life-long companions since earliest childhood. Hamsun is a poet who has already transcended good and evil [der bereits jenseits von Gut und Boese steht]. He does not describe people as they ought to be; he does not regard them through the spectacles either of optimism or pessimism, but exclusively through the glass of a fascinating realistic objectivity. Undoubtedly he will later be ranked among the great epic writers of the world. It is a disgrace for Sweden, Denmark, and especially his native country, Norway, that the Scandinavian countries no longer publish his books because of his friendship for Germany.

I gave immediate orders to print a new German edition of 100,000 copies of his works. Hamsun very modestly tried to decline. He said he was so near the grave, there was so little paper available, and his works were printed so much that he didn't know whether he deserved such an honour. This great personality again proves that real genius is always coupled with an almost touching modesty. When Hamsun and his wife left me after two hours I felt I had experienced one of the most precious encounters of my life. I hope we shall see the poet at our home very often.

Magda, too, was deeply impressed by his visit, especially since Hamsun had always been one of the favourite writers of our whole family. Hereafter, when I read his books, I shall be able to conjure up the image of the author himself. May fate permit the great poet to live to see us win victory! If anybody deserved it because of a high-minded espousal of our cause, even under the most difficult circumstances, it is he.

The Americans have made another day raid on Flensburg and Kiel. First reports were that they had dropped fountain pens and other articles filled with explosives. After a few hours this information, which was issued by the naval command at Kiel, proved unfounded. Such events show how nervous the Wehrmacht commands have gradually become under pressure of Anglo-American air raids.

The damage to the dams has not been quite so serious as at first feared. The reports by Berndt which caused me such a headache the first day are now proved to have been tremendously exaggerated. It is quite obvious that Berndt got his information from the B.B.C. This fact illustrates once more how impractical and irrational it is to forward alarmist reports of this kind to the higher leadership.

I have received eyewitness reports from Katyn, based on interrogations of Russian labourers, especially railwaymen, who witnessed some of the dreadful executions. These reports make one's flesh creep. I had them worked up as news items for our foreign service. I don't need to use them at home, for the material already published has completely convinced the public.

At Goering's suggestion, the Fuehrer issued an order to direct evacuees from the air-raid regions of the West into the occupied French areas, especially the province of Burgundy. Of course that is more easily said than done. If we stick bombed-out families into French surroundings, they will very soon filter back to their old homes. It is hard enough to settle them in Bavaria, let alone France. But the Fuehrer does not want to see compulsory housing introduced in the Reich until we have first exhausted the housing capacity of the occupied areas. I shall sound out the Gauleiters of the threatened provinces and ask them for proposals how to carry out this rather curious measure.

Speer got in touch with the Reich Marshal to persuade him to speak [about increased production in the munitions industry]. I don't know whether the Reich Marshal has any desire to do so at present, especially as the Fuehrer has issued an order that all speeches that are broadcast must be submitted to him beforehand in writing. This decree is directed especially at Goering, who, during recent months, has made several unfortunate public statements which have harmed not only himself but also the whole regime.

The English at present are making a sport of driving as large sections of our population as possible out of their beds by air raid warnings. Recent damage, except that done to the dams, has been relatively small. In the daytime, too, we have more alerts now, even in Berlin. The English accomplish this with their small Mosquito machines which are exceedingly hard to hit.

I did my work at Lanke today. The weather was beautiful and I was able to work out of doors so that at least I breathed a little fresh air. I needed it urgently. Since my badly-needed holiday has again gone by the board because of recent events, I am confronted by the rather impossible situation that on the one hand my health is no longer quite equal to the constantly increasing demands, yet on the other hand I see no possibility of getting myself into shape. I shall therefore have to try and get a little recreation on the instalment plan.

We just cannot stand air warfare indefinitely. We must try to develop counter measures as fast as possible, especially reprisal attacks. Milch has every reason to get up on his hind legs and create an aggressive Luftwaffe to attack England. Otherwise, sooner or later, the war in the air will become unbearable for us.

During my absence Colonel Martin made certain statements in the [press] conference which I must challenge sharply. He declared that people no longer believed German news reports. He said we were absolutely discredited, no matter how hard we tried; people no longer believed the government. Even though I must admit that the news situation there is rather critical at the moment, Colonel Martin must not mistake the attitude of the O.K.W. towards our news policies for that of the German people. The German people, as far as the broad masses are concerned, are quite uncontaminated. All they need is a little stimulant for their hearts. I am hoping that the coming offensive in the East will give them what they need.

The London public fears that a German air Blitzkrieg will suddenly break out again overnight. Would to God that we were in a position to do it! Obviously the English people consider us to be better armed in the air than we actually are.

Brendan Bracken made a very excited statement in the House of Commons against the Polish émigrés. He declared that wherever there is a single Pole anywhere a newspaper is launched. He isn't far wrong about this. I imagine the English are having very grave difficulties with those émigré governments. They have to pay them, they have to provide a setting for them, they have to cover up their political mistakes—and all that just so that they can play their childish charades.

It is a pity that we are issuing no final report on Tunis. My last article in the Reich, entitled, "With Sovereign Equanimity", was to some extent a substitute for it. The Italians are issuing one communiqué after another.

My article on Tunis made a deep impression on the public opinion of the whole world. The arguments developed in it are absolutely convincing. If in addition a final military report were issued, I believe we would get out of the psychological depression into which our misfortune in Tunisia led us.

The French bishops have issued a pastoral letter against the labour call-up. We are accustomed to that in the Reich as well as in the occupied areas. The high Catholic clergy always opposes National Socialism. Terboven made short shrift of the matter and simply arrested the (Protestant) bishops who protested to him. He is somewhat too rigorous in such matters. One can certainly not describe his policies as especially flexible and clever; he acts like a bull in a china-shop. Evil consequences resulted in Norway, and Terboven is now the most hated man in all Scandinavia.

The battle of the Warsaw Ghetto continues. The Jews are still resisting. On the whole, however, resistance is no longer dangerous and has virtually been broken. Within the area of the General Government, assassinations, acts of sabotage, and raids by bandits are on the increase. Conditions there are in some respects quite chaotic. Unfortunately the Fuehrer has refrained from the change of personnel in the General Government which had been intended. Greiser returned to Posen without accomplishing anything. Frank is to be given one more chance to prove his worth. I should have thought it better to kick Frank right out. When you are once convinced that a man is in no way up to his job, the necessary conclusions should be drawn.

New reports on morale in the Reich have reached me. They are nothing to be happy about. They all agree about a drop in morale throughout Germany. This is ascribed to Tunisia, to the increasing severity of air raids, to the temporary failure of submarine warfare, and to the reduction of meat rations. It is quite natural that the people look for a scapegoat, since the facts themselves can't be changed. The scapegoat, as has always happened in the past, is the press and the radio. The smallest tactical mistakes that we chance to make in newspapers or broadcasts are chalked up against us. It is high time to devote one of my articles to this theme. The communiqué about Rommel, too, has not absolutely convinced certain sections of our people. There is sharp criticism of Goering. He is blamed for having given a wrong picture of the German food situation in his speech in the Sports Palace and for having failed to master air warfare. I regard this criticism of Goering as exaggerated. Nevertheless I believe it is time for him to say something in public. He ought to speak or at least pay a few visits to areas threatened with air-raids. The fact that he has withdrawn to his lonely abode and says nothing is, to a certain extent, grist for his critics' mills. There are even mumblings of a crisis developing about Goering. I think these reports are exaggerated, but we shall have to be on the alert about him. His authority simply cannot be replaced, and in wartime it can be exhausted faster than one might expect. The people are somewhat impatient at not getting a clear picture of the further progress of the war. Again and again I am appealed to, urged to publish something along these lines. But so long as we still remain inactive in the East, that is very difficult.

The strained domestic situation makes the common folk keep a very sharp eye on how the so-called prominent people are living. Unfortunately not all the prominent people care about this. Some of them are leading a life that cannot in any way be regarded as conforming to our present position.

Letters, too, which reach me are full of criticism. . . . There is nothing but praise, however, for my work. In the present situation it seems to be of decisive value.

The discussions which my colleagues had with Director Menzel of the Ministry of Education had little success. Professor Ramsauer's report was handed to him. Menzel corroborated the charges fully but claimed that the scientists' failure was due to poor pay and to continuous public attacks on science, especially by the Party. I don't regard his objections as well founded. It should have been the duty of the Ministry of Education to remedy this situation during the past ten years. It should have protected science against insults and have provided sufficient material means. That did not happen.

I discussed with Fritzsche and Winkelkemper the question of commentaries in German broadcasts to foreign countries. These talks are, if possible, to be eliminated altogether. I shall, however, permit very brief comment. In the main, our broadcasts are to consist exclusively of news. It is much more difficult to invent argument-provoking news whose bias is not noticeable; it takes more brains to do this than to read tedious commentary.

I had a sharp conflict with Cerff about our present broadcasting programme. Cerff takes a somewhat super-national-socialistic attitude. If he had his way music, for instance, would be played only on lyres. You can't operate a radio service for the masses that way. Broadcasts must have diversified and manifold programmes. Cerff just won't see this. I strictly forbade him to criticize broadcasts in the bulletins of the Reich propaganda office. I regard it as simply impossible that one of my departments should attack another publicly. We haven't sunk that low in the National Socialist state! We still have enough power to remedy known defects. But in no circumstances will I tolerate bringing about changes by stirring up the mob.

[Karl Cerff was taken into the Propaganda Ministry by Goebbels from the Hitler Youth Organization, where he had been chief of the radio section. He was one of the "Reich Orators" both for the Hitler Jugend and the Nazi party.]

In the evening I was visited by Speer, Ley, and Funk. Once again we talked over the entire situation. All three agree that the most critical aspect of our problem relates to Goering. Goering is lethargically letting things drift and does nothing to offset the way in which his prestige is falling. I think that the right thing for him to do would be to face the public. The people are not unjust, and they would immediately applaud him if he had the courage to step before them. Funk believed Goering couldn't do this now. I regard Funk's objections as grossly exaggerated; he gave expression to a number of defeatist ideas which I rejected very sharply. But, coming from Funk, they aren't to be taken seriously; he always swings from one extreme to the other.

Naumann reported to me about his visit to the Arado factory in Brandenburg, where he was very favourably impressed. Our new bombers are now being tested there. As soon as the final test flights have been carried out, full production will begin, in all likelihood early in August. While we must start again from small beginnings, it is better to begin than to do nothing whatever. The failure of our Luftwaffe in technical respects is chiefly due to faulty construction. Far and away the greatest blame for this falls on Udet. He tried to atone for this by committing suicide, but of course that didn't change things. . . .

The people show a very healthy instinct when in their word-of-mouth propaganda they blame Goering personally for the failure of the Luftwaffe. Goering pushed his old comrades of World War I too much into the foreground. They were obviously not equal to the heavy tasks imposed by this war.

Our talk continued until 2 A.M. A vast number of personnel matters were discussed, and we found ourselves on the whole in agreement about them. Ley again proved to be a very wise observer. He is by no means so extreme in his views as his speeches would sometimes lead one to think; on the contrary, his opinions are remarkably realistic. He hasn't anything good to say about Thierack, whom he regards as not at all competent for his job. Nor does he think much of Backe. He believes that Backe's policies will gradually lead to the complete ruin of our stock of cattle. He deduces this from his own experiences with his farm in western Germany. . . . I believe he is more pessimistic than the situation warrants. Nevertheless I believe he is right in his contention that Backe is too much of a theorist and getting more and more impractical. The whole Food Ministry—but this is more the fault of Darré than of Backe—is a dogmatic institution, totally unsuited to war.

In London, people believe that an Eastern offensive is near but that it will fail and that a German catastrophe will follow. Each side involved on the Eastern front is waiting for the other. For this reason the Fuehrer has postponed his trip to Winnyzja and, changing his mind suddenly, returned to the Obersalzberg. He wants first to recuperate there so that his health may be equal to the tasks of the next weeks and months. That is the best thing he can do. . . . The Fuehrer intends to let the Bolsheviks start things.

My article about Tunis continues to be front-page news for the neutral press. It is a case of having hit the bull's-eye.

A report about Turkey claims that in no circumstances is there any danger of Ankara's swinging over to the enemy before the autumn. Leading Turkish circles, however, expect us to wage war not only in a military but also in a political sense. According to influential Turks, we achieve wonderful military successes, but our enemies are superior to us in political strategy. That is probably largely true. But I know that I am free from blame in this matter. The report regards Papen as the great diplomatic authority in Ankara. He enjoys the confidence of all leading Turkish circles; in Turkey he is the best horse in our stable.

I issued instructions to the press to pay more attention to the domestic than foreign questions during the coming weeks. The Foreign Office is always eager for questions of foreign policy to take precedence. The present period, however, is so critical that it seems more important to me that we should concern ourselves with the worries of the man in the street rather than with foreign policy. The Foreign Office cannot see the point, but I regard myself as responsible for the morale of the German people. From that fact I derive the right to keep out of the German press everything which is harmful or even fails to be useful.

Goering, together with Speer, intends to discuss the question of munitions in the Sports Palace. I welcome this. The fact that the Reich Marshal is at last to appear again in public will be of decisive importance not only to him personally but to our entire regime. I shall personally make sure that his speech has the right tactical approach.

Churchill addressed the staff of the British Embassy in Washington. He predicted a long war without committing himself on its further progress. Otherwise the speech is marked only by nonsensical triviali-lies without any significance. Generally speaking, all the nations now involved in the war are showing signs of great anxiety lest it should be unduly prolonged. Four years have, after all, been enough to lower anybody's morale. The only reason everyone endures it is the knowledge that whoever loses the war will also lose their national existence.

The Social Democratic parties in all countries, including England, fear they are now being gradually undermined by the Communists. The English Communist party has already given hints along that line and will undoubtedly present a motion at the next Labour party conference for amalgamation with British Labour.

The night raid by the English on Dortmund was extraordinarily heavy, probably the worst ever directed against a German city. . . . Reports from Dortmund are horrible. The critical thing about it is that industrial and munitions plants have been hit very hard. One can only repeat about air warfare: we are in a position of almost helpless inferiority and must grin and bear it as we take the blows from the English and Americans. One can now see what a very short-sighted proposal it was of Goering's to evacuate bombed-out people to Burgundy and other sections of occupied France. In Dortmund, between eighty and a hundred thousand people are homeless. Let the Reich Marshal go to Dortmund himself and propose that they evacuate to France! Decisions of this kind can be made at the conference table, but they cannot be put into effect in practice.

The English are naturally putting out a lot of propaganda about Dortmund. They have every reason. The one redeeming feature about all this misery and distress is the fact that a respectable number of planes was brought down. If that had not happened, we would hardly know what to say about such a dilemma.

Schaub telephoned from the Obersalzberg in great distress. He had received reports from Bochum and Dortmund indicating that morale was lower than ever before. The reports are somewhat exaggerated, but we must recognize that the people in the West are gradually beginning to lose courage. Hell like that is hard to bear for any length of time, especially since the inhabitants along the Rhine and Ruhr see no prospect of improvement.

The Moscow decisions have created almost no impression whatever in the neutral countries. There isn't a single newspaper in Switzerland or Sweden or Turkey which takes them seriously. Everywhere there is frosty rejection or at least the strongest distrust of them. A Swedish newspaper points out that the Comintern possesses a handy under-cover organization in the Red Aid. That is true. In the Reich the Red Aid always served to absorb the Communist party when it was officially forbidden. Personally I regard Communist parties operating illegally as much more dangerous than those under official surveillance, unless one is ready to extirpate them completely.

[During the Weimar Republic the German Communists maintained an organization known as the Rote Hilfe (Red Aid), which claimed to be non-partisan and non-political. Whenever any section of the Communist party was forbidden in any German state the members continued their subversive activity in the Red Aid under the guise of political neutrality. At the head of the organization was Willy Muenzenberg, a member of the Reichstag who enjoyed parliamentary immunity.]

The Times has once again sunk so low as to publish an almost pro-Bolshevik article. It praised the Bolshevik Revolution and used words that make one blush with shame. Otherwise, however, the English papers are rather depressed. The kowtow to Stalin is lacking in sincerity.

I had a long discussion with Admiral Canaris about the data available for forecasting English intentions. Canaris has gained possession of a letter written by the English General Staff to General Alexander. This letter is extremely informative and reveals English plans almost to the dotting of an "i". I don't know whether the letter is merely camouflage—Canaris denies this energetically—or whether it actually corresponds to the facts. In any case the general outline of English plans for this summer revealed here seems on the whole to tally. According to it, the English and Americans are planning several sham attacks during the coming months—one in the West, one on Sicily, and one on the Dodecanese islands. These attacks are to immobilize our troops stationed there, thus enabling English forces to undertake other and more serious operations. These operations are to involve Sardinia and the Peloponnesus. On the whole this line of reasoning seems to be right. Hence, if the letter to General Alexander is the real thing, we shall have to prepare to repel a number of attacks which are partly serious and partly sham.

Admiral Canaris also had data about the present situation in Italy, which is anything but encouraging. He believes the mood of the Italian people has become exceedingly critical, the reason being that the man in the street no longer has any clear picture of the progress of the war and that the Fascist party on the whole is letting things drift. I don't believe the Fascist party intends to surrender voluntarily at any point in this war. On the contrary, I am convinced the Italian people, once they defend their own soil, will fight much more bravely than they did in North Africa, not to mention on the Eastern Front.

The English have assembled so great an invasion fleet in the Mediterranean that one must conclude they are preparing their operations with the greatest care. They have at their disposal five completely fresh divisions, not counting the somewhat groggy ones that fought in North Africa. The coming summer will therefore be something of a strain on our nerves. Added to this—so Canaris reports—is the somewhat critical situation in Spain. The Franco Revolution has achieved no visible successes there; one cannot crush a modern revolution merely by arresting the Red and Socialist elements; one must have positive ideas to support one's own action. That, apparently, is not the case there.

Personally I shall look upon our situation as critical only if we fail in replying to the English air raids with a series of reprisals. The English have now, for the first time, had a taste of our new bombs, which are attracting considerable attention among their people. They are apparently very much afraid of a recurrence of our blitz air raids. If we had only one thousand modern bombers, air warfare would soon become a secondary problem. Of course we are working hard to bring that condition about, but it will take several months more.

The correspondent of The Daily Express, on his return from Moscow, reports pretty gloomily about conditions inside the Soviet Union. He calculates that the Soviets have lost about 30,000,000 men [sic] by death, fatal injuries, hunger, and freezing. That is, of course, a steep figure. Although it looks somewhat exaggerated to me, the remarkable thing is that it is being discussed publicly by the English. According to this report, food and living conditions inside the U.S.S.R. are horrifying. Any other country would have collapsed long ago under such stress. The Soviet Union is alive only because it is peopled with Russians and because Bolshevism dominates it as its dictator. We must get accustomed to the fact that the Soviet Union is still alive and pretty energetically so.

Zoerner has resigned as governor of Lublin. He called on me to give the reasons for his resignation.

[Ernst Zoerner, an Old Guard Nazi, was the first member of the Party to be elected president of any German Parliament, viz., that of the state of Brunswick. In 1932 he was elected to the Reichstag, of which he became a vice-president. Soon after Hitler took over in 1933 Zoerner was appointed mayor of Dresden.]

He had succeeded on the whole in squeezing an unusual amount of food out of the Lublin district. Understandably so, for this district is the most fertile in the entire General Government. Suddenly, however, he received orders for resettlement that had a very bad effect upon morale. Some 50,000 Poles were to be evacuated to begin with. Our police were able to grab only 25,000; the other 25,000 joined the Partisans. It is not hard to imagine what consequences that had for the whole area. Now he was to evacuate about 190,000 more Poles.

This he refused to do, and in my opinion he was right. His district will now be governed from Warsaw by Governor Dr. Fischer. Although Dr. Frank, the Governor General, agreed with Zoerner's views he hasn't sufficient authority to put his foot down on the encroachments of the police and the S.S. It makes you want to tear out your hair when you encounter such appalling political ineptitude. At home we are waging total war with all its consequences and are subordinating all philosophical and ideological aims to the supreme aim of final victory; in the occupied areas, however, things are done as though we were living in profound peace. I could spend hours boxing the ears of the men responsible for this. They deserve nothing better. This example again demonstrates the need of leadership in the Reich and in the occupied areas. We are suffering from a lack of clarity and logic in our policies that may someday have serious consequences.

Our propaganda within the Reich also doesn't seem to have the right spark to it, as I gather from a number of reports from Gauleiters. Here again the sad fact is that we are without a governing hand at home. I should be quite willing to undertake to solve all these problems, provided I were given the necessary plenary powers. But at present one can't do anything without running into opposition here, there, and everywhere. There are reports, for instance, from the gaus that many people are again listening to foreign radio stations. The reason for this, of course, is our completely obscure news policy which no longer gives people any insight into the war situation. Also, our reticence regarding Stalingrad and the fate of our missing soldiers there naturally leads the families to listen to Bolshevik radio stations, as these always broadcast the names of German soldiers reported as prisoners.

In the evening I received a report on the extent of the damage in Dortmund. The fires were under control by the afternoon. Destruction, however, is virtually total. Gauleiter Hoffmann informed me that hardly a house in Dortmund is habitable. He expressed the opinion that the other big cities on the Rhine and the Ruhr can work out for themselves what is soon in store for them. The fact is that the Royal Air Force is taking on one industrial city after another and one does not need to be a great mathematician to prophesy when a large part of the industry of the Ruhr will be out of commission. We must now face the problem of evacuating the population. I believe we shall be more easily able to keep our industry going if we move such sections of the population as are not necessary for industrial production and maintenance away to other parts of the Reich.

[Albert Hoffmann was Gauleiter for Southern Westphalia.]

Churchill has issued a declaration to the press in which he stated, without being in the least ashamed, that he was ready to travel round the whole globe with Roosevelt just to bring about a meeting with Stalin. Politics in the British Empire have sunk so low that Bolshevism is being kowtowed to in a way that upsets one's stomach.

Monitored reports by our Research Office give me an insight into the mentality of Roosevelt's Ambassador Davies, who is at present staying in Kuibyshev. It appears that he is a convinced friend of the Soviets. That stinks all the more since he comes from capitalist circles, has married a million-dollar heiress, and is now only concerned with making himself a career. He is a menace to clear, realistic politics. We must regard him as a sort of parlour-Bolshevik. Parlour pinks of this type must be thought of in terms of the Bible; they should be forgiven, for they know not what they do. It is certainly naïve for Davies in his talks with diplomats in Kuibyshev to voice the opinion that Stalin is waging this war without any territorial designs. I can imagine what Homeric laughter there must be in the Kremlin about this amateurish American diplomat. If Davies calls himself an unqualified admirer of Marshal Stalin, this plutocratic diplomat is merely showing that he hasn't the faintest idea of what is at stake in the world today.

According to an interesting report about the conference at Casablanca, it was decided that the Anglo-Saxon powers would create a national home for the Jews in Palestine after their eventual victory. This national home is to take care of 20,000,000 Jews, who are to engage chiefly in intellectual and managerial tasks; the work is to be done, as decided in Casablanca, by workers from Central Europe and especially Germany. This would entail a large-scale resettlement which would, to a certain extent, depopulate Central Europe. It isn't hard to imagine what's going on in the brains of these plutocratic statesmen who are dependent upon the Jews; but we also know what we must do to protect the German people against such a fate.

A Communist hangout was raided in Berlin. To start with, some forty arrests were made, but more are expected. This group has no political importance whatever, but it is significant that resistance groups like this are gradually beginning to form. The group worked its mischief especially in workers' quarters. Its head was a seventy-three-year-old retired rentier who obviously had nothing to do and therefore indulged in activities hostile to the state. We will make him a head shorter.

The new undersecretary in the Foreign Office, Steengracht, paid me a visit and proved to be a rather mediocre figure. At best he is only a high-grade private secretary. There can be no thought whatever of his having any influence on foreign policy.

[Baron Gustav Adolf Steengracht von Moyland, born 1903, joined the S.S. in 1933, and was appointed to the staff of the "Ribbentrop Bureau," where he was liaison officer between Himmler and Ribbentrop, 1936-39. In 1938 he was appointed to the regular staff of the German Foreign Office.]

As I predicted, there will be no final communiqué about Tunisia. I regret that exceedingly for the sake of our news and propaganda services.

[The prediction was wrong. There was a final communiqué.]

May 27, 1943

Churchill still claims that unconditional surrender is the Anglo-Saxon powers' war aim. He will have to wait a good long time before he attains it. He praised the superiority of English and especially American production over ours, but his estimates are absolutely wrong. We are taking occasion to prove it in our reply. His language is as coarse and cynical as possible. He says he is planning a knock-out blow against us. We are planning something quite different for him. Only it is essential that we soon succeed in overcoming England's nerve-racking air supremacy.

The English are giving sensational publicity to their successes in the air. They exaggerate a lot, but unfortunately much of what they claim is true. Their attack on Dortmund, especially, is praised as a great accomplishment by the Royal Air Force. As a matter of fact we have extraordinary difficulties to overcome there. Even though the English admit that the Ruhr region is defended splendidly, and that we cause them serious losses when they attack at night, conditions of today must not be compared with our predictions in 1940. A single plane today does much greater damage than was possible in 1940, owing to technical developments. Consequently good strategy does not demand as long a life for a plane today as then. If a plane actually participates in inflicting disastrous blows four or five times on an average, it has undoubtedly done us much more serious damage than that suffered by the enemy through its loss. Important English military critics nevertheless believe that air raids are by no means substitutes for an invasion. They are right in that. You must conquer a country if you want to take possession of it unless, indeed, a people loses its morale and voluntarily surrenders to the enemy under the pressure of extraordinary events. That's what we did in 1918. We shall certainly not repeat it in 1943.

A lot of fuss is being made in England, and, significantly, in Italy, too, about our new bombs. These are not so new as the Italians claim. Pavolini sang a veritable hymn of praise about the bombs in an editorial. Of course that is done more for domestic than military reasons. It is understandable that he wanted to awaken some hopes in the hard-hit Italian population by his evaluation of air warfare.

[Alessandro Pavolini, born in 1903, held a number of important posts under Fascism, including president of the Fascist Professions and Arts Confederation, president of the National Institute of Cultural Relations with Foreign Countries, and Minister of Education. He died with the Duce.]

Hadamovsky reported to me about his visit to Warsaw. Conditions in the General Government appear to be more than catastrophic. Every day there are attempts at assassination and acts of terror, without our authorities being able to do anything about them.

One worry after another piles up on us and we hardly know how to meet them. I avail myself of all the relief that the Reich can supply. But that is only a drop in the bucket. It makes me shudder as I wonder what city is going to be hit next.

The Fuehrer has decided to confer a very special honour on Yamamoto, chief of the Japanese Navy, who fell in action. He is going to award him the Knight's Cross with Oak-Leaf Cluster and Swords. This is the first time a foreign military officer will have been awarded such high honours by us. Of course there are some formalities still to be straightened out with the Emperor.

The English wrested air supremacy from us not only as the result of tremendous energy on the part of the R.A.F. and the British aircraft industry, but also thanks to certain unfortunate circumstances and to our own negligence. Why cannot we in time wrest it back from the English, if once we abandon the thesis that the war in the East must be ended first? It seems to me that the air situation should be considered one of the most critical phases of the war and that it should be conducted quite independently of developments in the East.

We hear occasionally that Roosevelt intends to mediate between Moscow and the Vatican. Stalin is at present pursuing a very realistic policy with reference to the church question, quite the opposite of ours. Obviously he intends to dissipate Europe's suspicions about him by playing the role of a respectable gentleman.

Secretary of State Frank received the Government of the Protectorate and revealed the background of the attempt on Heydrich's life, stressing especially the directives issued by Beneš. Undoubtedly this speech will attract great attention in the Protectorate. For obvious reasons we are devoting only a few lines to it in the German press.

[Karl Hermann Frank (not to be confused with Dr. Hanns Frank, Governor General of occupied Poland) was the power behind the throne in the Protectorate of Bohemia-Moravia.]

Goering is to speak on June 6 in the Sports Palace on the occasion of the award of the Knight's Cross of the War Service Cross to workers and plant managers. I am trying to find out whether he actually intends to deliver a big political speech. If so, I should like to have a hand in drafting it. I would far prefer, however, that he did not talk. That would give me a chance to discuss the pressing problems of the present situation. I believe I could succeed in clarifying the most important issues. . . .

An interesting transformation is taking place among the German people. Those who are confident of victory have become even more fanatical in their belief, while the defeatists, especially the intellectuals, are outdoing each other with pessimistic utterances. These positive elements should have their backs stiffened by a great speech and the doubtful elements should be restrained. The citizens who are faithful to the state must be given the arguments necessary to combat defeatism during discussions at their places of work and at street corners.

[During the two months between May 28 and July 25, for which no diary entries were found, the major military event was the invasion of Sicily, beginning on July 10—something which Goebbels' Propaganda Ministry had always said was unlikely to happen.

Accordingly, on July 19, there were hurried conferences in northern Italy between Hitler and Mussolini. Three days earlier, Italy had been warned by Roosevelt and Churchill that she must overthrow Fascism if she wished to survive. On the very day they met, Rome was raided for the first time by 500 U.S. daylight bombers. Their talks were scarcely over when, on July 22, the American Fifth Army captured Palermo and, on July 24, Marsala.

The stage was thus set for Mussolini's forced resignation, with the story of which the diaries resume.

Other important events during this short period were: a ten-day series of raids on Germany, with Cologne and Hamburg as principal targets, beginning on June 18; interruption of the 101-day lull on the Russian front on July 5 when the Germans opened an offensive in the Orel-Kursk-Belgorod sector; and the appointments of M. Mikolajczyk to succeed General Sikorski, who had been killed in an aeroplane accident, as premier of the Polish government-in-exile, and of Field Marshal Sir Archibald Wavell as Viceroy of India on June 18.]

July 25, 1943

In the course of the day we received confidential information that a certain change was taking place in Italian domestic politics. Led by Farinacci, the Old Guard Fascists have requested the Duce to call a meeting of the Fascist Grand Council. At this meeting, according to Mackensen, the Duce is to be requested to initiate more energetic policies. He is to be persuaded to get rid of the burden of holding so many offices so that he may regain his initiative and strength for guiding the over-all policies and the war effort of Italy. Farinacci seems to have assumed the leadership in this demonstrative action by the Old Guard. Possibly he will play a most important role as things develop further in Italy. If so, we could only welcome it, for Farinacci is not only an energetic man, but also a pronounced friend of Germany. We can depend upon him blindly. His nerve would certainly last through any crisis, no matter how great.

[Hans Georg von Mackensen, son of the German Field Marshal August von Mackensen, was German Ambassador to Italy; Roberto Farinacci was one of the radicals of the Fascist Party. A journalist by profession, he was a member of the Grand Council, and was killed with Mussolini.]

Developments in Sicily are giving the Italian war leaders good reason to be more energetic than hitherto. Thus far only the Germans have stood their ground in Sicily. Every time the Italians were involved in serious fighting, they capitulated, sometimes a whole division at a time, headed by the divisional commander. Air warfare on Sicily, too, is being conducted almost exclusively by the Germans.

Unfortunately this means that our preparations for reprisals against England during the ensuing winter must once again be interrupted. I don't believe we shall be able to make reprisal attacks in the foreseeable future.

In the Sobranje [Parliament] of Sofia the former Prime Minister, Mushanoff, criticized Bulgaria's foreign policy rather insultingly. He used distinctly disquieting language. But I believe King Boris is man enough to hold his own against these opposing elements.

[Nikola Mushanoff, leader of the democratic party of Bulgaria, was Prime Minister from October 1931 to May 1934 when he was deposed after a military coup d'état.]

The results of English air raids are gradually becoming evident. Our textile industry has been pretty badly hit. We are not in a position to redeem the Reich textile coupon card, that is, we can't call up the unused points. Whatever we still have in the way of reserves must be pumped into the distressed areas.

The letters addressed to me are disturbing; they contain an unusual amount of criticism. Above all, they keep asking why the Fuehrer does not visit the bombed areas, why Goering is nowhere to be seen, and especially why the Fuehrer doesn't talk to the German people and explain the present situation. I consider it very necessary for the Fuehrer to do this, despite his heavy military burdens. One cannot neglect the people too long; in the last analysis they are the very kernel of our war effort. If the people ever lost their will to resist and their faith in German leadership, the most serious crisis we ever faced would result.

The letters are full of praise for my work. My activity as a writer and speaker is especially appreciated and is contrasted with the activity of a number of prominent people who hardly ever face the public.

July 26, 1943

During the night there was an exceptionally heavy raid on Hamburg, with most serious consequences both for the civilian population and for armaments production. This attack definitely shatters the illusions that many have had about the continuation of air operations by the enemy. Unfortunately we shot down very few planes—twelve, all told. That, of course, is wholly inadequate when you consider that about five hundred took part in the attack. Unfortunately only two days previously Colonel General Weise took the heavy anti-aircraft guns away from Hamburg and sent them to Italy. That was the last straw! One can imagine what a field day the enemy must have had over Hamburg. The eastern section of Altona was particularly hard hit. It is a real catastrophe. Heavy damage was done to civilian property. For the moment no one can estimate how many people were killed. It is believed that new quarters must be found for about 150,000 to 200,000. I don't know at this writing how we are going to solve that problem.

A serious crisis seems to be developing in Italy. That may be why the enemy is not particularly active in Sicily. Probably he wants to await developments in the hope of attaining his objectives without high and bloody losses. The Pope is said to be playing an important role in the development of this crisis.

In the United States there is much dissatisfaction with the Committee for a Free Germany which has been formed in Moscow. Its establishment has created a sensation in the enemy press. The deduction is made that the Soviets are determined that if anybody is to inherit authority in Europe, especially in Germany, it must be themselves.

Stalin has issued an order of the day to the Red Army claiming that the Wehrmacht's summer offensive failed, and that we had not been able to make a decisive break-through. The Soviets were again in the positions in which they were surprised by the German offensive. The Wehrmacht no longer had the power, as in previous summers, to compel the Soviets to yield much territory. Unfortunately what Stalin says is, for the most part, correct. His claim that we lost rather than gained ground near Kursk is also in accordance with the facts. This shows that we must make every effort on the Eastern Front to hold our own even halfway against the advancing Soviets. I suppose we can't possibly change the situation by offensive operations as we have been able to do in the past two summers.

Throughout the afternoon news kept pouring into Dresden. All of it was calculated to cause us worry and headaches. I was glad to return to Berlin in the evening. . . . Gutterer awaited me at the railway station. He gave me a first report on Hamburg. Developments there have been very tragic. Air warfare is our most vulnerable point.

When I reached my home I was immediately called by telephone from the Fuehrer's G.H.Q. The news from there sounds almost unbelievable. It is to the effect that the Duce has resigned, and Badoglio has taken over in Italy in his place. The whole situation, I was informed, was still very obscure; such news as we received had come over the radio and had been given out by Reuter. At G.H.Q. nobody can determine just what has really happened. The Fuehrer wants me to proceed immediately to his headquarters. He wishes there to evaluate the situation with his closest collaborators. . . .

We received news to the effect that there was violent opposition in the Fascist Grand Council to Mussolini, his policies, and his conduct of the war. The main figures in this fight were Ciano and Grandi. They criticized the Duce and his policies extremely bitterly. Unfortunately Farinacci was also involved, but from quite another angle. He had been prevailed upon to criticize Mussolini, but wanted to give the whole attack a Fascist trend. He failed to prevail and thereby did great harm to the Fascist cause.

The King, too, addressed an appeal to the public. The noteworthy thing in this appeal is a sentence stating that Italy remains true to her tradition and her word. You can't do much with that! There are reports of demonstrations of loyalty to the new government in Rome. Personally I believe that, for the time being at least, the end of Fascism has come. By losing initiative and waiting too patiently, Mussolini has permitted the opposition to grow. His frequent "changes of guard" have robbed him of any real and loyal following.

We can't tell as yet how things will develop. In any case it is well for us to be prepared for anything and everything.

I tried to get one or two hours' sleep before starting on my journey.

July 27, 1943

I arrived at the Tempelhof aerodrome early. Dr. Dietrich flew with me to G.H.Q. He, too, was tremendously distressed about events in Italy. He developed a series of theories that seemed somewhat far-fetched and unconvincing. As long as we have no more exact information about what actually happened in Rome, we can venture no opinion. At the moment we don't even know what the revolution was all about. In any case, following my instinct and my sound common sense, I believe we may assume that the Roman camarilla intends to get out of the war in some elegant manner.

Before I could speak to the Fuehrer, I had a talk at G.H.Q. with Himmler and Bormann. They don't believe Mussolini resigned voluntarily. I, too, regard this as out of the question. I believe the crisis developed as follows: as a curtain raiser, the radical Fascists like Farinacci were put up to criticize the Duce. That started the ball rolling. Badoglio and his henchmen used this occasion to trip up Mussolini. Presumably he was then called to the Quirinal, where he was arrested stante pede and compelled to resign. It is simply shocking to think that a revolutionary movement that has been in power for twenty-one years could be liquidated in such a way.

But this isn't the end yet. I believe there are still possibilities to direct things into a different channel. Both Himmler and Bormann indulge in the most varied theories. But these are of no real value, as they are based upon suppositions and not on facts. I look at the situation more realistically. According to the reports thus far available, I believe I can assume that the Duce actually had lost most of his authority with the Italian people. It is always true that as soon as a dictator has fallen, the man in the street makes himself heard. I suppose, therefore, we shall not have to wait long before this happens in Italy.

At ten o'clock, together with Goering, I had my first talk with the Fuehrer. The Fuehrer impressed us with his quiet self-assurance and his sovereign superiority. Although what has happened in Italy has made a deep impression upon him, it has not succeeded in throwing him off his equilibrium. On the contrary, his brain was already at work feverishly formulating and preparing new decisions. Half an hour later, Ribbentrop, who had come by plane from Fuschl, joined in this decisive discussion. He had just come through an attack of pneumonia and was still very weak.

The Fuehrer first gave us his analysis of the situation. He was convinced the Duce had not resigned voluntarily. He had been arrested. Nobody could know whether he was still alive. Personally I don't believe that Badoglio and his henchmen laid violent hands on him. The Fuehrer believes the crisis was provoked by the session of the Fascist Grand Council. Farinacci had behaved there like a clumsy bear and, possibly with the best will and noblest intentions, had played a role which proved fatal. Then, after the Fascist Grand Council had hurled its criticisms at the Duce, the Crown had come into the picture. The whole coup had undoubtedly been prepared for a long time, and Farinacci played a decidedly minor role [Chargenrolle] in this high drama. Undoubtedly the Duce was no longer a free man, nor could he make any decisions. That meant Fascism was in mortal danger. If there was any possibility for us to avert this danger, it must be seized. Italian Freemasonry undoubtedly stood behind the whole development; though dissolved, it still exists clandestinely. The Masons wanted to wreak revenge on Mussolini and deliver a crushing blow against the authoritarian conception of the state. The Italian King was too foolish and short-sighted to understand this development. He was not only physically but spiritually and morally in Badoglio's hands completely. Badoglio was the head of the camarilla which was now bent upon bringing down Fascism and everything it had created in the way of historical values.

In the final analysis this crisis was, of course, directed against Germany. The idea was to get Italy out of the war so as to create an exceptionally dangerous situation for the Reich. Undoubtedly the English and the Americans sponsored the crisis. The Fuehrer was firmly convinced that Badoglio had already negotiated with the enemy before he took these decisive steps. The assertion in his proclamation that the war would continue meant exactly nothing. There was nothing else he could say, for any statement to the contrary would immediately have called the Wehrmacht into action, and Italy would then have become a theatre of war—the one thing she is now trying to avoid. The English would certainly try to land at the most opportune moment, possibly in Genoa, in order to cut off the German troops stationed in southern Italy. We must anticipate this, he said.

The Fuehrer intends to deliver a great coup. In this manner: a parachute division now stationed in southern France is to land all round Rome. This parachute division is to occupy Rome, arrest the King with his entire family, together with Badoglio and his henchmen, and fly them all to Germany. Once we have the King, Badoglio, and all the men behind the scenes in our hands, the whole situation will be completely changed.

I don't think the Fuehrer is right in believing in the possibility that the Duce is already dead. My instinct is that the hostile camarilla in Rome has taken him into custody to prevent him from making himself heard. In any case we believe we shall get more detailed news from Farinacci, who, hearing that he was to be arrested—incidentally a suitable reward for his clumsy behaviour—is reported to have gone to the German Embassy where he was handed over to Kesselring. Early on Monday morning he was then flown from Rome to Munich in a German plane and he is now on his way to G.H.Q. The Fuehrer intends to use Farinacci for setting up an Italian counter-government. This counter-government is to be in power and supported by us so long as we cannot get hold of the Duce. Personally I doubt whether the Duce would agree to form a counter-government against the King. Of course if the King were once in our hands, this possibility, too, could be envisaged.

In order to create immediate possibilities for publicity and propaganda, I had a number of broadcasting stations in southern France changed over into illegal stations on orders of the Fuehrer. The stations involved are Toulouse, Bordeaux, and Monte Carlo. Farinacci might use these broadcasting stations to address the Italian public in case he proves serviceable for our purposes. But we shall first have to wait and see what attitude Farinacci assumes.

According to the reports reaching us, the Vatican is in a state of feverish diplomatic activity. Undoubtedly it is supporting the revolt with its great world-embracing facilities. The Fuehrer at first intended, when arresting the responsible men in Rome, to seize the Vatican also, but Ribbentrop and I opposed the plan most emphatically. I don't believe it necessary to break into the Vatican, and I would regard such a measure as exceptionally unfortunate because of the effect it would have on world opinion.

Despite the fact that every hour brings us additional news, often of a conflicting character, the whole crisis is still hard to understand.

News reports at noon stated that the scum of the streets is beginning to take a hand. That is understandable and was to be expected. The insignia of Fascism were publicly removed; a Mussolini Street was rechristened Matteotti Street. The masses moved through the streets of the Italian capital, hailed the King and Badoglio, and clamoured for peace. That is a development we welcome heartily.

The more things are at sixes and sevens in Italy, the better it is for what we are planning. The fact that the demonstrations are in favour of Badoglio is a sign that in all likelihood he arranged them himself. Of course, he will have to see that they don't get out of hand and that he does not experience the truth of the proverb that spirits once called up often can't be recalled.

Undoubtedly the Italian people have a deep yearning for peace. Everything now depends on how they are approached. If an austere and manly appeal were addressed to them, it would undoubtedly have the same effect as an appeal to defeatism and compromise. That the official insignia have been torn down and that the mob is storming the Fascist party offices proves that Badoglio intends to liquidate everything connected with the Fascist revolution.

Apart from his hostility to Fascism, he is undoubtedly trying to curry favour with the enemy. That proves that one must not pay too much attention to his statement that the war will continue. This whole episode is the greatest example of perfidy in modern history. The Fuehrer is firmly determined to see to it that Italy does not betray the German Reich a second time.

[Hitler was referring to Italy's having abandoned the Austro-German-Italian alliance and joined the Allies during World War I.]

In the morning, Mackensen called on Badoglio, who declared that the war would continue, but said nothing as to how or in what form, and especially not in what relationship to the Reich and the Wehrmacht.

In the late afternoon, Badoglio received Kesselring, who was favourably impressed. He believes Badoglio actually intends to continue the war with all the military means at Italy's disposal. Very evidently Kesselring was taken in by a well-staged show. Generals are usually much too unpolitical to understand the background of such a scene. Kesselring is convinced there is no reason to worry much at present.

Again and again reports reached us that the Pope is feverishly at work during this entire crisis.

First of all we took stock of the troops we still have in Italy. There are none too many, but if we reinforce them energetically we can still expect some success, considering the weakness of the Italian armed forces. Difficulties would arise only if the Italians decided to take up their positions on the Brenner Pass and to defend them, cutting off bridges, streets, and tunnels, and thus preventing us from moving. The situation in the southern Tyrol is very critical.

Quite gratuitously there was a day raid of two hundred enemy planes on Hanover with very damaging results, owing chiefly to the fact that the fire department had just been lent to Hamburg. There was therefore practically nothing to be done about the heavy conflagration that started. I ordered the Hanover fire department back from Hamburg immediately.

It is quite obvious that the German people are uneasy and deeply distressed because we can't tell them anything at present about the background of the Italian crisis. What are we to tell them, anyway? We can't say, much less write, what we think personally. Anything we can write will fail to explain the Italian crisis to our people. We must therefore be satisfied for the present with publishing the momentous news without telling the people that the question at issue in Rome is not only Mussolini's resignation but a very profound organic and ideological crisis of Fascism, perhaps even its liquidation. Knowledge of these events might conceivably encourage some subversive elements in Germany to think they could put over the same thing here as Badoglio and his henchmen have accomplished in Rome. The Fuehrer ordered Himmler to see that most severe police measures are applied if any such danger seems imminent here. He doesn't believe, however, that much of the kind is to be expected. The German people are much too hostile to the Italians to regard the crisis in Rome as a precedent. And anyway, the common people have long anticipated and expected what is now happening in Rome.

The big question during our conference in the Fuehrer's G.H.Q. is whether the measures planned against the Badoglio clique and Italian treachery should be prepared with great care, which would certainly require a week, or whether it is necessary to act quickly and by improvisation. The Fuehrer would naturally like to act as fast as possible. That is undoubtedly right. The situation in Italy is as yet not so consolidated that one might not reverse it by an improvised stroke. On the other hand, Rommel, as an experienced soldier, is more conservative in estimating the possibilities. He would prefer preparations to be made on a more permanent basis, with a greater certainty of success. The Fuehrer placed Rommel in supreme command of O.K.W. operations in Italy. Keitel and Jodl fought hard against his also making Rommel, at the same time, supreme commander of our troops in Sicily. They don't like giving him too much power and too many troops, as they are jealous of him. That, however, is no reason for not doing what is necessary, and the Fuehrer therefore decided to place Rommel in supreme command of our troops in Italy.

Until noon it wasn't possible to get a clear picture of the situation in Rome. The news reaching us was contradictory.

After our conference with the Fuehrer I discussed the situation with a number of people. Speer views developments anyhow but lightly. While on the one hand he is rather glad that we shall now probably not have to deliver as much coal and iron to Italy as before, on the other hand he realizes quite clearly what a tremendous psychological effect the defection of Italy from our front will have.

At noon I had to withdraw for a rest. I had slept hardly at all during the night. I rather imagine the afternoon and evening are going to be very exhausting.

At lunch we were all gathered about the Fuehrer. Besides myself, there were Goering, Ribbentrop, Rommel, Doenitz, Speer, Keitel, and Bormann. The top political and military leaders of the Reich thus had an opportunity to talk the entire situation over once more. This conference developed nothing unusual. Generally speaking the men present saw the situation as the Fuehrer analysed it. All agreed that something decisive must be done. If we succeed in changing the whole situation by a bold coup, our prestige will of course grow tremendously. We must, however, realize that the Fuehrer's plans involve exceptional dangers and a unique risk. But our situation is such that only dangerous decisions can change it.

The Fuehrer again expressed his conviction that the Duce had been arrested. I think there can hardly be any question about it. That, of course, poses the question whether Fascism still has enough vitality left to be saved by generous action on the part of the Reich. According to the information thus far available, this seems to be possible only to a limited degree. Be that as it may, the actions of the Italian royal house show what is to be expected of monarchs. The monarchs and the aristocrats are always conspicuous for the most provoking ingratitude. Just to think of all the Italian King owes to the Duce and how he now kicks him out!

From all over the country we are receiving reports reflecting the concern of the German people over the Italian crisis. Some sections of the population are almost in a state of panic. The people demand information, and wish the Fuehrer would speak. Naturally he cannot at the moment. The people will have to wait, exactly as we must wait, for further developments.

The most outlandish rumours have been spread about Goering. It is claimed he has fled, has committed suicide, and things like that. It would be a good thing if Goering undertook something that would at least make him visible to the public.

Farinacci has arrived. The Fuehrer first had him dealt with by Ribbentrop.

Prince Philip of Hesse, who happens to be at G.H.Q., is to be kept out of the picture as far as possible. The Fuehrer therefore instructed me to take charge of him personally. Prince Philip told me some intimate details about Italian society. I gather that the Roman aristocracy is entirely opposed to Mussolini. Only five days before the crisis, the Italian Crown Prince told Prince Philip that Mussolini must really be regarded as a criminal. The whole Roman aristocracy blames the crisis on Mussolini's inactivity. It does indeed seem as though the Duce had made a number of fatal mistakes. He is reproached most for simply having let things drift. That, however, is no reason for casting to the winds a twenty-one-year-old revolutionary movement which attained historical importance. The Roman aristocracy without a doubt seized upon this favourable moment to join with the Freemasons in getting rid of the hated dictator.

What Prince Philip of Hesse told me about Mussolini is more in the nature of court gossip than serious political criticism. But his account proves that in Germany we can't depend upon our princes either. Thank God the Fuehrer's view on this is the same as mine; in fact, much more radical.

[Prince Philip of Hesse was married in 1925 to Princess Mafalda, daughter of King Victor Emmanuel of Italy. He was the Nazi district governor for the province of Hesse-Nassau, and had the rank of S.A. Obergruppenfuehrer (General).]

Farinacci was received by Ribbentrop and then by the Fuehrer. He behaved very unwisely during these talks. The Fuehrer expected he would express his profound regret at developments and at least stand unreservedly by the Duce. This, however, he did not do. His report to the Fuehrer consisted mainly in severe criticism of the Duce's personality and conduct. As he described events, the Duce was violently attacked by Ciano, Grandi, and several other defeatists during the session of the Fascist Grand Council. Farinacci, as I have already pointed out, found fault with him more from the viewpoint of Fascist ideology. These criticisms upset the Duce terribly. Farinacci, together with Scorza, later that Sunday conferred at length with the Duce, who was then called to the Quirinal but failed to return.

[Carlo Scorza, Italian journalist and politician, was at this time secretary of the Fascist party.]

Farinacci's description proves that our interpretation is right. He still believes that the King acted loyally towards Mussolini, and that the Duce resigned voluntarily; but how then is one to explain that Mussolini, before driving to the Quirinal, knew and foresaw nothing of this whole development, gave no intimation of his decision to resign, and then failed to return? It looks to me as though that clumsy fool Farinacci had been coaxed into taking part in a knavish plot of the Italian aristocracy and Freemasonry, and now, of course, does not want to admit his guilt, even though it was involuntary.

From the Fuehrer's talk with Farinacci, it is evident that we cannot use this man on any grand scale. Nevertheless we are making sure of keeping control of him. The Fuehrer handed him over to Himmler to look after for the present.

Farinacci is a completely broken man. It is gradually dawning on him how he has blundered. He was to have been arrested immediately the crisis broke out. But he saw the men who were to seize him standing before his house when he returned from swimming at Ostia, and hastened to the German Embassy. He came without a hat, dressed in the lightest of summer suits, and his brown face still reflected something of the sun of Ostia. . . .

His last talk with the Duce was exceedingly characteristic. The Duce had not given the slightest indication of expecting the development that was then secretly in the making, in typical Masonic fashion. The Duce was, however, deeply shaken by the scenes enacted at the Fascist Grand Council.

Meanwhile Badoglio has taken exceptionally severe measures. Martial law has been declared throughout Italy. No more than three people may walk or stand together in public. Houses must be kept unlocked at night. Curfew lasts from 8 P.M. until 5 A.M.

Badoglio's measures are typically bourgeois. They may do as a transition, but can't be kept up permanently. I imagine Badoglio is going to install a regime similar to that of Franco, or even of Primo de Rivera. Whether he can thereby avert the danger threatening the Italian people remains to be seen.

The new Cabinet was installed. We know only two men. First there is Guariglia, until now Italian Ambassador at Ankara. He is the man who in all probability has already been negotiating with the enemy.

[Raffaele Guariglia, born in 1889, was Italian Ambassador in Paris, 1938-40; Ambassador to the Vatican, 1942-43.]

Then there is Rocco, Minister of Education. I know him from my numerous meetings with the various Italian ministers of education.

[Guido Rocco, born in 1886, had a long diplomatic career before becoming Mussolini's Director General of the Foreign Press Service from 1936-43.]

Rocco was always regarded as the "Grey Eminence"; I never trusted him across the street. The rest of the Cabinet consists only of bureaucrats and military officers. With a Cabinet like that you can of course do something, but it will certainly not prove equal to a grandiose and daring coup on our part. If I were to try to imagine the composition of the Cabinet in terms of German politics, I should say it was as if Ministerial Director Greiner were made Minister of Propaganda. We would have an easy time with him as an adversary.

[Greiner was one of Goebbels' assistants.]

The decisive point, of course, is whether Fascism or the Duce intends to do anything about the situation which has now developed. Mackensen sent us a letter from the Duce in which he expresses his thanks to Badoglio for the courteous treatment accorded him. He was still as loyal to the royal house as he had been during his twenty-one years of service to it. He was happy about Badoglio's declaration that the war would continue on the side of Italy's allies. He would like to be taken to Rocca della Camminata to do nothing but rest.

It is hard to tell whether this letter is forged or genuine. If genuine, it would be an eloquent indication that the Duce no longer has any intention of interfering with developments. On the other hand one must, of course, realize that this cannot be determined with certainty. Should a German coup create an entirely new set of circumstances in Italy, the Duce would surely be ready to take an active hand again.

I had a long talk with Guderian. He told me about his grave concern over the present status of the war. He pleaded for concentration at some point, since we cannot afford to be active on all fronts. He complained about the inactivity of the O.K.W., which does not contain a single real leader. Guderian again made an excellent impression. He is certainly an ardent and unquestioning disciple of the Fuehrer.

The Fuehrer was extremely busy all the evening. He received us one after the other. He was therefore very tired and dined alone. A large group of the rest of us dined together, and the wildest conjectures and illusions were aired about developments in Italy. I have an idea that not all the gentlemen yet realize the seriousness of the situation. . . .

At night there was another conference with the Fuehrer. He again developed his view that action against Italy or against the rebellious camarilla must be undertaken as quickly as possible. Rommel thinks this action should be prepared adequately and after mature reflection. The debate lasted until long past midnight. Unfortunately it led to no final result as the number of participants was too large; about thirty-five persons were there. I sided with the Fuehrer. I, too, believe that at present you can accomplish much more with a small force than will be possible in a week's time with greater forces and after more careful preparation. The Fuehrer is right in claiming that success is the more certain the sooner we act. The measures proposed by the military seem to me to be faulty in that they ignore what the enemy may do. Undoubtedly the English won't wait a week while we consider and prepare for action.

All of us, including the Fuehrer, now agree that the Vatican is to be exempted from our plans. A coup by parachute troops would certainly be successful within the next twenty-four hours. Personally I doubt whether the Duce is willing to sponsor such a policy as we have in mind. But I suppose we will get more information on that during the next few days.

Our conferences lasted far beyond midnight. I was completely exhausted when they ended. Dead tired, I fell into my bed and slept a dreamless sleep.

July 28, 1943

Official [Italian] communiqués already speak of the “dissolved” Fascist party—a proof that Badoglio and the Royal House intend to tear up Fascism by its very roots. The Giornale d'Italia which, like all important Italian newspapers, has an entirely new editorial staff, reports the last session of the Grand Council. According to this report, Grandi and Ciano were especially severe in criticizing the Duce, his policies, and his conduct of the war. In the vote which followed, only eight ballots were for the Duce, two were blank, and eighteen against him. I take it that this report just about corresponds to the facts. A resolution was adopted appealing to the solidarity of the Italian people and announcing the decision to return power to the Crown. It's difficult to imagine anything sillier and more un-revolutionary. I can hardly assume that this report is fully accurate. No doubt it has been falsified by Badoglio and his henchmen for home consumption.

In the morning news reached us that Churchill intends to speak in the House of Commons. The old rogue will no doubt ride triumphantly on his high horse.

It is very regrettable indeed that Mussolini's resignation gave world Fascism such a heavy blow. After all, it was his movement which gave a name to the doctrine of the authoritarian state. I can hardly imagine that Fascism has thereby ceased to be a fact.

The Italian editorials available at noon are positively malicious. They talk about twenty years of slavery, and the creatures who now occupy editorial chairs hasten to assert that at last they feel free again. This freedom consists in being able to offer capitulation to the enemy.

The building of the Popolo d'Italia in Milan has been stormed. Fascist insignia are being removed throughout the country. Political prisoners are being liberated. It won't be long before the criminals, too, are freed.

Franco has instructed his press to report events in Italy without commentary and to be strictly neutral. This inflated peacock owes it to the Duce alone that he is sitting on his pretender's throne.

The last raid on Essen caused complete stoppage of production in the Krupp Works. Speer is much concerned and worried.

The idea in the heads of our enemies, that an authoritarian state can be overthrown in this manner [i.e., as happened in Italy] is, of course, very dangerous. These shortsighted elements fail to realize that conditions in Italy simply cannot be compared with those in the Reich.

At noon I had another long talk with the Fuehrer. He is firmly determined to act, no matter what the cost, and preferably by clever improvisation rather than by over-systematic preparations which begin late and let things become consolidated in Italy. He is tremendously disappointed in Farinacci. He expected to see an enthusiastic follower of the Duce and instead found a broken man, trying to slander the Duce by criticizing him in a tearful voice. With a fellow like that you can't do much. I fear the Fuehrer entertained grave illusions about Farinacci. Today he is still over-optimistic about the Duce and the possibilities of a Fascist come-back. Let us hope military events support these illusions.

The Fuehrer has the right ideas about the King. He sees in him a weakling, senile, decrepit and easily won over by any group which offers him support.

Alfieri's whereabouts is still in doubt. In all probability he, too, voted against the Duce. That fits his character exactly. He has always been a clerical and a royalist. I don't believe he remained loyal to the Duce.

The Italian yellow press is now bubbling over with froth and foam. It makes one blush with shame to read it. When the time comes, we shall have to do some house cleaning there and mete out severe justice. Anyway, we now know what we have to do in our own country to prevent such a thing ever happening.

I requested the Fuehrer to let me return to Berlin as I have the feeling that a man of authority should be there at this critical time. The Fuehrer agreed. He will keep me informed by telephone and if necessary call me back to G.H.Q.

People are clamouring more and more insistently for an authoritative person, preferably the Fuehrer himself, to speak. But what can one say in the present situation? Events in Italy are still in a state of flux and we naturally can't say anything about the steps we are taking. I am extremely happy over the equanimity with which the Fuehrer judges the situation and our possibilities for mastering it. I firmly believe he will succeed. At our parting he was exceptionally friendly and charming to me. I believe I can be a very strong support for him in these critical times.

I am somewhat confused about the results of our conferences. We are doing too much on the military and too little on the political side of the war. At this moment, when our military successes are none too great, it would be a good thing if we knew how to make better use of the political instrument. We were so great and resourceful in that way at the time of our struggle for power; why shouldn't we achieve mastery in this art now? The English owe most of their successes to their virtuosity in handling political possibilities. I am sure we could prove equal to them if only we made use of the available facilities.

Himmler told me something about a question that is rather secondary; namely, that of the International Bible Students. These Bible Students are a queer mixture of contemporaries living outside our time. Their refusal to bear arms is usually not because of cowardice, but a matter of principle. That's why Himmler rightly takes this view: objectors to military service who are beyond draft age should be put behind bars so that they cannot proselytize; objectors to military service, however, who are of draft age, should be condemned to death for cowardice and desertion. Some of them accept the death penalty with absolute stoicism. The older Bible Students are giving an excellent account of themselves in concentration camps and are exceptionally able and dependable workers; they give us the least trouble of anybody there.

[The International Bible Students were a small sect claiming to be serious searchers into the truths of Holy Writ. The conception of the "conscientious objector" was unknown to the Nazis.]

After finishing my work I drove to the airport at Rastenburg. A wonderful day. I can only shake my head at the folly of human beings who wage war where nature is so beautiful. After a flight of almost three hours we returned to Berlin.

We are having a lot of trouble about the relationship between German and Italian workers. German workers wouldn't think of fraternizing with the Italians; on the contrary, there have been frequent fist fights. In 1918 it would undoubtedly have been different.

July 29, 1943

During the night we had the heaviest raid yet made on Hamburg. The English appeared over the city with 800 to 1,000 bombers. Our anti-aircraft succeeded in shooting down only very few, so that one cannot claim any serious enemy losses.

Kaufmann, in a first report, spoke of a catastrophe the extent of which simply staggers the imagination. A city of a million inhabitants has been destroyed in a manner unparalleled in history. We are faced with problems that are almost impossible of solution. Food must be found for this population of a million. Shelter must be secured. The people must be evacuated as far as possible. They must be given clothing. In short, we are facing problems there of which we had no conception even a few weeks ago. Kaufmann believes the entire city must be evacuated except for small patches. He spoke of about 800,000 homeless people wandering up and down the streets not knowing what to do. I believe Kaufmann has lost his nerve somewhat in the face of this undoubtedly exceptional situation. Maybe he is a bit too lyrical and romantic for so great a catastrophe.

I immediately summoned Berndt. He has already inaugurated a number of measures, and has, for instance, in the course of the morning begun moving 300,000 loaves of bread to Hamburg.

Besides our great concern about this catastrophe, developments in Italy are increasingly disturbing. The parties in power in Rome have now issued a declaration which is quite a retreat in our favour. It is declared that Italian foreign policy will remain absolutely unchanged; that Italy stands by her pledged word; that the resignation of the Duce is of only domestic significance. As Knight of the Order of Annunciata the Duce retains the privileges of his rank. No decision has as yet been made about the final fate of the Fascist party. . . .

I don't believe, however, that the growing revolutionary sentiment in Italy can be checked with bourgeois-military declarations of this sort. Other measures would have to be taken to accomplish that. The fact is that the barrier that stood in the way of Italy's downfall has been demolished. Just as when a dam breaks down, we now see floods of dirt sweeping into the open country.

The Corriere della Sera contained a detailed report about the session of the Fascist Grand Council from which stemmed the outbreak of the crisis. It reports that industrialists, intellectuals, and high court officials waited in a well-known hotel, while the Grand Council was in session, to learn the results. At the same time troops were already on the move in the Italian capital. Grandi led the opposition in the session. It was he who formulated the declaration against the Duce and insisted upon a vote. De Bono, De Vecchi, Bottai, and Federzoni had taken his side. I assume Alfieri was also on the side of the rebels; that would be in character for him. Undoubtedly he regretted that he could not deposit three ballots, one with "yes," one with "no," and one with "I abstain." Scorza and Polverelli are said to have stayed on the Duce's side to the end.

[General de Bono was commander-in-chief of the Italian troops in Africa in 1935; Marshal of Italy and Minister of State; and inspector of Italian overseas forces in 1939.

Count Cesare Maria de Vecchi was president of the first Fascist group in the Italian parliament of 1921-22 and a permanent member of the Grand Fascist Council. He was a lecturer on modern history at the University of Turin.

Giuseppe Bottai was Italian Minister of Education, 1936-43. He had previously been Minister of Corporations, Governor of Rome, and Civil Governor of Addis-Ababa.

Luigi Federzoni had been Italian Minister of Colonies, Minister of the Interior, President of the Senate, and President of the Royal Academy.

Gaetano Polverelli was Minister of Propaganda from February to July 1943.]

According to reports from Rome, efforts are under way to bring back the Italian workers from the Reich. We suppressed early signs of unrest among these workers by suitable measures; that was not very difficult.

There has been a complete about-face in the Italian press. The Fascist journalists have been dismissed and replaced by half-Jews and Freemasons—in short, all those old scoundrels whom we knew only too well in the period of our struggle. They will see to it that Italy heads for chaos.

The Japanese military mission in Berlin has given me a memorandum on our present military situation. They believe we should, in no circumstances, give up Sicily. The loss of Sicily would create a totally new military situation. The Japanese urge that extraordinary measures be taken. They declare that if they were in a similar situation, they would operate with suicide torpedoes and suicide fliers so as to deliver a devastating blow to the English Mediterranean fleet. I, too, believe that it is necessary to do something beyond the normal. You cannot master the present situation with orthodox measures.

A great deal of unrest has been created in Berlin by the way in which certain Berlin public offices have been evacuated. By letting thousands of people discuss and consider this problem, not only have our real plans been disclosed, but also hypothetical possibilities. The Berliners therefore believe that if there are more serious air raids, the government would be the first to run away. Naturally there can be no thought of that. I have therefore started propaganda by word of mouth to offset it.

[Geobbels' diary entries for the last two days of July, the month of August and the first seven days of September, 1943, are missing. The following is a summary of relevant events during the interval.

On July 30, President Roosevelt warned neutrals not to give asylum to war criminals. Sweden reacted by withdrawing permission for German troops to be sent across that country on their way to Finland and Norway.

By August 17, the Allies were able to announce that the whole of Sicily was in their hands. Sweeping onwards, they established a bridgehead in Calabria on September 3, thus establishing their first permanent foothold on the European continent. The new Badoglio government realized on August 14 that further resistance was useless and declared Rome an open city. On September 8, they surrendered unconditionally.

The German offensive in the Orel-Kursk-Belgorod region, which had started on July 5, proved ineffective and the Soviet Armies recaptured Orel and Belgorod on August 5, Kharkov on August 23, Taganrog on August 30, and Stalino in the Donetz Basin on September 8.

Mr. Churchill met President Roosevelt at Quebec and in their communiqué after their talks the hope for early Anglo-American-Russian discussions was emphasized.

During this period there were two American air raids of the first magnitude—on the Ploesti oilfields in Rumania on August 1, and on Berlin on August 23. The Germans found it necessary to evacuate from the capital all persons not essential to the war effort. To curb rising unrest within the Reich, Hitler on August 24, appointed Heinrich Himmler Minister of the Interior, instead of the elderly Wilhelm Frick.]

The air raids on Stuttgart and Strasbourg were not too serious. Besides, the number of planes brought down was so large that the Americans will once again be busy licking their wounds. The night attack on Munich, too, was only moderate.

In Berlin the situation has become completely normal. Transport is functioning again, and the damage to industrial plants, while serious, can nevertheless be repaired slowly. While it is true that in some factories there is still a 50 to 80 per cent stoppage of production, Petzke nevertheless hopes to make up for it within a short time.

The situation in Rheydt is pretty hopeless. I telephoned to Doemens. He reported to me that the textile industry in Rheydt has almost completely ceased production. Eighty per cent of the business area was destroyed.

Grohé told me that life in Cologne had again become semi-normal despite the ruins. He had only favourable things to report about the morale of the population. Morale, of course, depends very much upon how quickly air raids follow one another. When a city is forced into air-raid shelters night after night, nerves give way after a certain time.

Grohé again pleaded with me for two types of night alerts, but I am unable to prevail upon the Fuehrer in this matter. Lack of sleep is sometimes more difficult to bear than the damage inflicted by the enemy. Fatigue, especially, affects productive capacity—a thing that is anything but pleasant for Speer.

Churchill is to be regarded as nothing but a muddlehead when it comes to questions of a future order and an international regime. On the other hand, he is undoubtedly the right man for England when it comes to the practical conduct of the war.

The Fuehrer is still convinced that the English and Americans are merely carrying out a camouflage manoeuvre in Calabria. He believes they will shortly try an invasion in the West. The increasing concentration of air attacks in the West and certain accumulations of shipping in the harbours of the mother country [England] seem to point in this direction. . . . But the Fuehrer is on the lookout. He doesn't, in any circumstances, want to be surprised by Churchill and Roosevelt.

The Italian press hardly mentions the war any more, a fact which even the small neutral countries are commenting on with indignation. It is concentrating on the fight against Fascism. Italians could hardly offer a more degrading spectacle to the world.

But all these lesser worries disappear in the face of our great anxiety about the Eastern Front. The Soviets have reported enormous successes because of the capture of Makejewka, Konstantinovk, Kramatorskaja, Slavyansk, and Konotop. While the reports are not quite accurate, there is much truth in all of them. Obviously Stalin still intends to make an all-out effort this summer, at least in the south and the centre of the Eastern Front.

The fall of Konotop is bad news. It may be necessary to retreat on a larger scale than was originally planned, especially in the Donetz Bulge. The situation has become so critical that the Fuehrer may fly there himself to take charge. In any case, there is once again a full-grown crisis in the East. While I am firmly convinced that the Fuehrer will succeed in mastering it, the energies that must be expended to do so are enormous.

Gernant has reported to me about conditions in Denmark. From his report, prepared at the request of Best, I gather a situation has arisen which can only be called critical, because of the rather lax and feeble way in which the Danes were handled by the Reich's Plenipotentiary, Dr. Best. The Danes put a wrong interpretation on the generous treatment accorded them. Especially in Copenhagen events occurred that are more than shocking. German soldiers could hardly appear on the streets; German girls had swastikas branded on their bodies; acts of sabotage against Wehrmacht barracks and communication installations increased day by day; and the government was neither willing nor able to do anything about it. Best was ordered to the Fuehrer's G.H.Q. and given a vigorous dressing-down. He thereupon had to transfer his powers to the military command. The Danes at first tried to oppose martial law by a few stupid tricks, but when German tanks appeared they quickly became subdued. Since then everything has been going its normal way.

[Dr. Karl Rudolf Best, born in 1903, was an old Nazi who was sent to Copenhagen in 1943 to replace Dr. Renthe-Fink as Minister Plenipotentiary. One of Best's first acts, according to the Von Hassell Diaries, was to liquidate the "wholly impossible Danish Nazis." Best is credited with the doubtful achievement of having "only" two Danes shot in reprisal for acts of sabotage instead of the five demanded by Hitler.

Gernant was probably a Propaganda Ministry official attached to the German Legation at Copenhagen.]

I have the impression that the treatment of populations in the occupied areas is being handled best in the Netherlands. Seyss-Inquart is a master in the art of alternating gingerbread with whippings, and of putting severe measures through with a light touch. One can tell that he has good Habsburg schooling. The Austrians had to hold their multi-nation state together for centuries. That gave them great experience in how to treat people even in times of crisis.

During the evening critical reports reached us from the Eastern Front which were anything but pleasing. At this stage of developments we are thrown from one scare into another. We are living in a phase of the war in which strategy—to quote Schlieffen—is nothing but a system of substitutions.

September 9, 1943

A sensational development took place in Italy during the day. In the morning the British and American papers were already able to report the news—which proves that the Italians have cheated us. The Anglo-American press declared that Churchill remained in the United States to await this development. It spoke of an Italian intention to capitulate unconditionally.

During the afternoon we received more detailed news, and the actual facts became apparent at 6 P.M., first via the London radio. Without telling us a single word about it in advance, Badoglio has offered unconditional surrender and concluded an armistice with the enemy powers. This armistice is to be effective immediately. Eisenhower, who concluded the armistice, urged the Italians to chase the German troops out of the country.

At about seven o'clock, the Fuehrer telephoned asking me to come to G.H.Q. the same night. He is incensed about developments.

Only a few hours before his unexampled treachery, Badoglio informed our Counsellor of Legation, Dr. Rudolf Rahn, that he wasn't thinking of leaving the fighting Axis front, and that we would still have occasion to see how an Italian general keeps his word. Well, now we certainly know how he does it!

The Fuehrer, thank God, can rightly claim that he suffered no disappointment on the human side regarding Badoglio. Ever since Mussolini's exit we have anticipated and expected this development. We shall not therefore have to make essential changes in our plans. We can now set in motion what the Fuehrer really wanted to do immediately after Mussolini's fall.

The Italians are deserting us in our most critical hour. But I suppose they realize fully that they have thereby chosen the most disgraceful political fate that history can record. They have lost face. Certainly one cannot break one's word twice in the course of a quarter-century without smirching one's political honour for all time to come.

In the course of the evening Badoglio broadcast an appeal to the Italian people. He announced the conclusion of an armistice, declared that firing at the English and Americans must cease (a superfluous order, since all this time they haven't fired at them anyway), but that arms must speak if Italy is attacked by any other power (doubtless meaning us). That need not scare us. I take it that the Italians who put up their hands in all theatres of war just as soon as they smelled powder will do the same thing when confronted by German soldiers. Badoglio naturally cannot claim that he yielded to the superior power of the enemy's weapons and armed forces.

Is Stalin really ready to negotiate with Churchill and Roosevelt? The Americans seem exceptionally firm and sure of their ground in saying so. I can hardly imagine it. A great change must have taken place in Moscow if it is true. Until now not the slightest sign of it has been discernible anywhere.

The Spanish Government is trying to revise its foreign policy drastically. Franco and the Spanish people no longer believe in German victory and are therefore inclining more and more toward the Anglo-Saxons. The theory now advanced by official Spanish circles is nothing short of funny: they really earnestly believe that if the Reich were no longer the outstanding bulwark against Bolshevism in Europe, the English would award this position to Spain, of all countries! Proceeding from this assumption, Franco thinks that his position vis-à-vis the European powers is pretty secure. There is no subterfuge that is too foolish for a cowardly person to use in rationalizing his cowardice! Franco would be surprised at what would happen to him if such a development actually occurred.

We have not much influence in Spain at present. The Spanish Government has initiated a new press campaign with a twelve-point declaration that inclines more towards the English than the German side. The dirty thing about it is that the Franco Government has not even considered it necessary to give us any detailed reasons for it. This shows once again that there is nothing worse in politics than weakness.

A Swiss report provides further details concerning the Duce's fall. The Fascist sub-leaders themselves really brought about the downfall of Fascism. The proverb here applies that infidelity strikes back at its originator. Ciano was the ringleader against his own father-in-law. He is a scoundrel and a contemptible traitor, unique and unparalleled in all history. The King hasn't proved much better. But what else can you expect of a King? The Duce can at most be blamed only for being so unsuspecting about the people round him. Thank God, everything here combines to prevent any similar occurrence with us.

September 10, 1943

A grey day dawned. It poured with rain. Just the right weather, in keeping with this critical day of decision. The impression prevails that a deep resignation pervades the whole country. . . .

When we reached Rastenburg, the weather was almost like November. We drove immediately to G.H.Q. On the way, I was able to discuss a few minor matters with Dr. Naumann. At G.H.Q. there were few signs of life. Everybody had been up until five in the morning. The Fuehrer, too, was still resting, since the exertions of yesterday and last night were naturally enormous.

I first talked over the military situation with General Schmundt. He was somewhat depressed. That is easily understandable. The situation in the East is none too good. Italy's treachery has upset many of our plans. In the field of foreign politics we shall have an extraordinarily heavy task on our hands to keep our allies in line and to calm down the neutrals. . . .

It begins to be a problem as to which side we should turn to first—the Russian or the Anglo-American. Somehow we must recognize that it will be very difficult to wage war successfully against both sides. First of all, of course, we must set our various fronts in order. That, in turn, involves the problem of shortening them. Wherever we now stand, we are represented by weak formations only and it is no soothing thought to imagine the English attacking us at any point they please with relatively small forces. But all these problems can be tackled only after we have succeeded in stabilizing at least the Eastern Front, in re-establishing order in Italy, and in recapturing air supremacy. . . .

The Fuehrer anticipated Italian treason as something absolutely certain. He was really the only one who firmly counted on it. And yet, when it actually happened, it upset him pretty badly. He hadn't thought it possible that this treachery would be committed in such a dishonourable manner.

The Fuehrer had hardly got up when he summoned me for a first conference. Contrary to my expectations, he looked exceptionally well. It is always to be noted that in times of crisis the Fuehrer rises above himself physically and spiritually. He had had hardly two hours' sleep and now looked as though he had just come from a holiday. He regards the whole Italian problem as a gigantic example of swinishness and realizes clearly that we must exert every effort to master it. But he also considers that one never knows what the consequences will be in the long run. Something that today looks like a great misfortune may possibly prove a great boon tomorrow. During the early struggles of our movement and of our state, crises and setbacks, seen historically, always proved to have been for the best.

On the previous day the Fuehrer had been in Zaporozhe to restore a semblance of order in the southern sector of our Eastern Front. He was quite favourably impressed, although our situation there is critical and our troops have to fight very hard. But during the day the Fuehrer was overcome by a queer feeling of unrest which drove him back immediately to his G.H.Q. Hardly had he arrived here and retired than the first distressing news came from Italy. He then went to work at once.

We now began to examine the situation in detail. In the foreground naturally stood the Italian problem. Our Counsellor of Embassy, Rahn, only a few hours before the Italian treachery, had had a talk with the King, to whom he was being presented. He put a number of critical questions to the King, which the monarch answered either evasively or with absolute assurance. The tenor of their talk was that Italy would remain true to the Axis and in no circumstances desired to desert our ranks. Two days earlier, Badoglio had confirmed this expressly to Rahn in conversation. Badoglio even gave Rahn his word of honour as an officer and a general. Now we know what to think of that!

The news of the Italian treachery reached us first via a London broadcast, an occurrence that undoubtedly is unique and without precedent in history. Exactly as we imagined and suspected, surrender negotiations had been going on for a long time and had been signed as early as September 3. The English had insisted upon postponing publication until the moment which promised the best publicity and the greatest political effect. That explains why the Italian troops in Calabria offered almost no resistance.

The real traitor in the whole hostile clique in Italy is Badoglio. He had prepared both the fall of the Duce and the whole capitulation negotiations at long range with the evident intention of hoodwinking and cheating us. The King was his ready tool, a man without character and will and therefore most useful for Badoglio's ambitious plans.

The Fuehrer immediately drew the right conclusions as regards the royal family, and had Prince Philip of Hesse arrested at G.H.Q. that very night. He was transferred to Gestapo headquarters at Koenigsberg. He was very much surprised at being put under arrest; he had not thought such a thing possible. He must be held in custody in any case for reasons of state policy, for he has found out so much during the weeks he has been staying at G.H.Q., that he might become very dangerous.

Up to this hour the Duce's whereabouts are unknown. The Fuehrer fears the Italians may want to give him into the hands of the English and the Americans. Pavolini, Ricci, and the Duce's son are now at G.H.Q., drafting an appeal to the Italian people and the Italian armed forces. They have been selected to form a neo-Fascist government and to act in the name of the Duce. They are to take up residence in northern Italy as soon as conditions there have been consolidated. They are working very industriously and the appeals which they have composed are quite effective from a propaganda viewpoint. Farinacci is to arrive in the course of the afternoon to complement the work of this triumvirate.

[Renato Ricci was Italian Minister of Corporations, 1939-43, and in 1943 became leader of the Republican Fascist Militia. Vittorio Mussolini was the eldest of the Duce's three sons.]

The explanation that we have issued to the press was drafted personally by the Fuehrer. Its tone is extremely sharp and gives the German people full details concerning the background of the Italian treachery.

For the present we will say nothing against the Italian people since we may need them, especially for our supply lines and communications. Nor is the Army to be defamed, no matter how much we may itch to do so, for we must at least prevail upon it not to offer resistance and to turn its weapons over to our troops.

The Poglavnik has issued a sharp declaration against Italy. He stated that at last he was in a position to create a free Croatian state together with Dalmatia; the Fuehrer had already promised him that. He now rejects Italian suzerainty. What a pity that one doesn't observe that kind of spirit and speedy work in other European nations!

The resistance offered by the Italian troops is, for the most part, only a token resistance. The Italians simply don't want to fight, they are happy when they can lay down their arms, and even happier if they can sell them. Best of all, our troops succeeded in getting the power plants on Lake Garda into their hands. That is important for the entire railway system in northern Italy, as it is fed by current from these plants.

We have about eight divisions in northern Italy and also eight in southern Italy; in other words, a total of some sixteen divisions of the best possible human material, splendidly equipped. The Fuehrer is firmly convinced that we shall succeed in getting the job done in Italy with these sixteen divisions. Among them are a number of tank divisions against which the Italians have nothing. Unfortunately about 50,000 of our men are still on Sardinia and 4,000 on Corsica. The Fuehrer wants to try to get the troops at least back to northern Italy; their equipment must be regarded as lost. Nevertheless it would be a great piece of luck if at least the men were to return. We have lost so much manpower during the past year because of Italian cowardice and treachery that we can hardly afford a further heavy loss like that.

The Italian Fleet has partly left its anchorage. The Fuehrer fears it may be on its way to the English. Unfortunately our submarines arrived in the port of Spezia too late. Their assignment was to torpedo part of the fleet. Now the Luftwaffe has been given that task and will undoubtedly smash a few vessels.

The Fuehrer is firmly determined to wipe the slate clean in Italy.

The reasons for treachery are now quite obvious. The Fuehrer was right in being suspicious from the first moment after the Duce's fall. Both our military men and our diplomats in Italy were fooled by Badoglio. That applies especially to Kesselring, Mackensen, and Rintelen. They actually believed that Badoglio had honest intentions towards us and that it would be easier to work militarily and politically with his regime than with Fascism, which was too heavily mortgaged by its friendship with us. Now they have had their reward. They approached the Italian problem with a naïveté that staggers the imagination. They therefore failed to make the indispensable preparations for the moment of treachery, because they did not want to believe such deceit possible.

Nevertheless the Fuehrer believes he will master this situation, albeit with some difficulty. Naturally we shall not be able to hold southern Italy. We must withdraw northward beyond Rome. We shall now establish ourselves on the defence line that the Fuehrer always envisaged; namely, the line of the Apennine Mountains. The Fuehrer hopes we can withdraw and build up a first line of defence at that point. It would of course be a good thing if we could remain in Rome. But in Rome our flanks would be too long and too vulnerable. We would always be in danger there. Of course, if we permit the English and Americans to go into Italy as far as the Apennines, this will constitute a steady threat to the Balkans, for Italy is the best spring-board for the southeast.

If the English and Americans don't attack Croatia directly, we shall master the situation there without difficulty. The Poglavnik will see to this. He has gained the upper hand by his declaration of independence of the Croatian state.

The Fuehrer does not yet want to restore independence to Albania. The Albanian Government itself must proclaim it, and the Fuehrer can then do nothing but confirm it.

The aim of our military operations in Italy must be to free a number of divisions for the Balkans. For without a doubt the spear-head of the Anglo-American invasion will be pointed in that direction in the immediate future.

We must now do everything possible to pacify the Italian regions which we are taking over. We naturally haven't sufficient police to set up a regime of force there. For the same reason we must defer political changes in the Italian area for a while. For instance, we cannot seize the southern Tyrol now, because that would absolutely flabbergast the Italian people and condemn every neo-Fascist government to political inactivity. Similarly, Hofer cannot be sent to the southern Tyrol as civilian governor. His appearance there would be like a red rag to a bull.

[Franz Hofer was Nazi Gauleiter of the Austrian Tyrol and Vorarlberg.]

The other Austrian Gauleiters immediately swung into action. Eigruber has already brought the Italian workers at Linz, who are very numerous, to their senses. They wanted to start a rumpus, but it was put down in a hurry. I have issued a decree that Italian labourers working in the Reich are not to be subjected to insults, for which there is considerable inclination in the factories.

We also heard from Gauleiter Rainer. Our Austrian Gauleiters certainly excel at making territorial claims. There can naturally be no talk of that at present. But one can understand why the Austrian Gauleiters are now feeling their oats. As everywhere else in life, appetite comes with eating.

[Dr. Friedrich Rainer was Gauleiter for the Salzburg area.]

Things are in quite a ferment in the Balkans. The Hungarians don't know exactly what to do. While the Rumanians are firmly in favour of Axis policies and conduct of the war, Mihai Antonescu is very undependable. The situation in Bulgaria is absolutely insecure. The Fuehrer told me that it must now be regarded as certain that King Boris was poisoned. The German doctors have arrived at the conclusion that he was killed by snake poison. It is not yet known who mixed the poison. The German doctors wanted to perform an autopsy; the Bulgarian Government agreed, but the royal family refused. I would not regard it as impossible that the poisoning was engineered by the Italians. After their latest act of treachery I am ready to credit the Badoglio regime and the Italians generally with anything. I believe that in the entire course of history no people has ever humiliated itself and besmirched its honour as much as the Italians. For the present they are in favour with the English, but in their heart of hearts the English no doubt despise them. It will take months, possibly even years, before the Italians fully realize what they have done to themselves.

The Fuehrer is somewhat worried lest the English now attempt an invasion in the West. While we have very strong lines of fortifications, there is behind them nothing but a thin veil of reserves. Our endeavour must therefore be to beat back any invasion attempt by the English and the Americans at our very first blow. In no circumstances must they gain a footing. The Fuehrer is pretty hopeful about our chances, even though he is naturally rather worried. . . .

The Fuehrer expects the Anglo-American invasion attempt to come in the Netherlands. We are weakest there, and the population would be most inclined to give the necessary local support to such an undertaking. As everybody knows, the Dutch are the most insolent and obstreperous people in the entire West.

The exceptionally heavy bombing attacks which the English have launched against the western lines of communication for some days are rather suspicious. Can this be the prelude to an attempt at invasion? The fleet, too, has repeatedly come up close to the European western coast and started fireworks, but has then always left again. The time of the year is the best imaginable for an invasion in the West. But only a short while remains; after that the weather will again be less favourable.

We must therefore wait and see. That gnaws at one's nerves, especially when one considers that we cannot face such a situation with absolute assurance and preparedness.

In addition, the situation in the East continues to be extremely critical. Nevertheless the Fuehrer believes that he will succeed in mastering it. It means, of course, that we shall have to withdraw to a line lying far back; namely, that of the Dnieper. The retreat is to take place in a very orderly manner.

The depressing thing is that we haven't the faintest idea what Stalin has left in the way of reserves. I, for my part, doubt very much whether under these conditions we shall be able to transfer divisions from the East to the other European theatres of war. This fact is a new proof of the unexampled treachery committed by the Italians against our cause. The present crisis would never have arisen if the divisions that we had to send to Italy after the Duce's fall could have been assigned to the Eastern Front. For the superiority of the Bolsheviks over us is only very slight. One can see this from the tremendous difficulties they have in advancing. Well, there is no point in discussing the treachery of the Italians; the whole world recognizes it as unique in history.

I asked the Fuehrer whether anything might be done with Stalin sooner or later. He said not for the moment. That is right, of course, considering the critical situation in the East. And anyway, the Fuehrer believes it would be easier to make a deal with the English than with the Soviets. At a given moment, the Fuehrer believes, the English would come to their senses. But I can't see that for the present.

It is true, of course, that Churchill is absolutely anti-Bolshevik. Churchill is naturally pursuing imperialistic British aims in this war. The seizure of Sicily gives him a great advantage. Sicily will never be restored to the Italians, for Sicily, possibly with Calabria added, will absolutely guarantee English domination in the Mediterranean and render it secure for all time. Undoubtedly the English will also snatch Sardinia and Corsica. If they can make their exit from this war with all this as booty, they will have gained a good deal. The Fuehrer believes they will then possibly be amenable to some sort of arrangement. I am rather inclined to regard Stalin as more approachable, for Stalin is more of a practical politician than Churchill. Churchill is a romantic adventurer, with whom one can't talk sensibly.

The Fuehrer also isn't at all clear how much the Soviets still have up their sleeve. If we had fifteen or twenty first-class divisions to throw into the East intact, we would undoubtedly be in a position to repulse the Russians. Unfortunately we must put these fifteen or twenty divisions into combat in the Italian theatre of war. It is therefore nothing but a pious wish to imagine such a possibility.

The Fuehrer is rather more hopeful about air warfare. He believes we shall regain mastery in two or three months.

Our defensive power has increased extraordinarily in recent weeks. Added to this are our progressive preparations for reprisals. Unfortunately the English raids on Peenemuende and on our O.T. work in the West have thrown our preparations back four, or even eight weeks, so that we can't possibly count on reprisals before the end of January. The Fuehrer places great hopes in rocket bombs. He believes that through them the whole picture as regards England may possibly change.

[Peenemuende, on the Baltic, near Stettin, was the top-secret laboratory and experimental station for rocket bombs. By O.T. work is meant the Western fortifications built by the Organisation Todt.]

I described to the Fuehrer my observations of the effect of air raids on the civilian population. I could claim truly and sincerely that the German people can stand up to air warfare as at present conducted. The Fuehrer was profoundly stirred by my description of the air raids on Berlin. One cannot picture such an attack unless one has witnessed it oneself.

The Fuehrer was very much pleased with my measures against air raids. He believes I shall succeed in so mitigating the worst effects of air warfare on civilians that they will be almost bearable.

The Fuehrer places great hopes in the fog season which is due in England soon.

Submarine warfare seemed more promising to him. The new gadget for neutralizing English radar has proved its worth. Since its introduction there have been no more submarine losses. The submarines are once again about to sally forth in packs to attack convoys. There isn't sufficient anti-radar equipment as yet, so that returning ships must hand theirs over for installation in submarines which are starting out. But the new equipment seems satisfactory. The English can no longer determine the position of our submarines. We gather that from intercepted radio messages which often state that a submarine was discovered but that contact with it was lost afterwards.

The Fuehrer expects more impressive submarine successes soon. It would be wonderful if at least we could show greater submarine activity. The Fuehrer is, generally speaking, extraordinarily optimistic in many respects. To me he seems even too optimistic. But he, of course, must look at things from this angle. If he were to let bad news affect him, it would be a national calamity. The Fuehrer certainly diffuses a healthy optimism all round him with a tremendously heartening effect upon his collaborators. But in this case Doenitz, too, is hopeful, and Doenitz is a very cool and realistic calculator.

Sooner or later we shall have to face the question of inclining toward one enemy side or the other. Germany has never yet had luck with a two-front war; it won't be able to stand this one in the long run either. I pointed out to the Fuehrer that in 1933, too, we did not attain power by making absolute demands. We presented absolute demands on August 13, 1932, but failed for that reason. After that, we had to suffer a whole series of defeats before we came into power on January 30, 1933, with more modest demands. Very soon thereafter, however, we forced all our demands through.

¶ [Goebbels here refers to the fact that Adolf Hitler, accompanied by S.A. Chief Ernst Roehm, on August 13, 1932, visited President von Hindenburg, demanding that the entire government be turned over to the Nazis. Hindenburg refused. On January 30, 1933, Hitler agreed to head a coalition cabinet with non-Nazis such as Franz von Papen, Alfred Hugenberg, Konstantin von Neurath, Eltz von Ruebenach, et al. Gradually these men were eased out.]

In all probability, similar circumstances prevail today. In the case of revolutionary or military developments one cannot anticipate with mathematical precision how matters are going to progress. Too many imponderables are involved.

So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly convinced that the English don't want a Bolshevik Europe in any circumstances, and that, if given the choice between a National Socialist and a Bolshevik Europe, they would most certainly choose the National Socialists. At present they still entertain the hope of gaining the mastery of Europe themselves after both the National Socialist Reich and the Soviet Union have bled to death. Once they realize that this is impossible, and that they have a choice only between Bolshevism or relaxing somewhat towards National Socialism, they will no doubt show an inclination towards a compromise with us. I'm not even sure that it would be a good thing for Churchill to be ousted in England. His successor would no doubt be Eden, but Eden is more contaminated by Bolshevik ideology than Churchill. Churchill himself is an old anti-Bolshevik and his collaboration with Moscow today is only a matter of expediency.

The only thing certain about this war is that Italy will lose it. Its pusillanimous treachery to its own leader was the prelude to cowardly treachery towards its ally. The Duce will enter history as the last Roman, but behind his massive figure a gypsy people has gone to rot. We ought to have realized that sooner, but for ideological reasons we always were too accommodating to the Italians. Once again our old German inheritance, our sentimentality, has had evil consequences when applied to politics. Added to this was a totally inept German diplomacy which didn't have enough vision to foresee what has now taken place in Italy.

All this must teach us a great deal. National Socialism must undergo a renovation. We must link ourselves more socialistically with the people than before. The people must always know that we are their just and generous guardians. The National Socialist leadership must have no ties whatsoever with the aristocracy or with so-called society.

As regards the situation within the Reich, I pleaded energetically with the Fuehrer to address the German people. I presented every argument I knew and succeeded in convincing him of the justice of my demand. He isn't very anxious to speak, since he cannot yet make a clear estimate of developments in Italy. But we can't afford to wait. The people are entitled to a word of encouragement and solace from the Fuehrer in this difficult crisis.

With reference to Italy, our people were undoubtedly cleverer than their government. The German people never had their heart in the alliance with Italy. They always viewed it with strong doubts, unspoken scepticism, and restrained suspicion. This suspicion has now proved well founded. As a result, the Italian treachery was no surprise to the German people, but nevertheless gave them a shock. We shall no doubt feel the effects of this shock within the next few days.

Himmler naturally is very anxious that we should have at least a semi-effective Fascist government in northern Italy. He hasn't got enough police troops there to govern by force.

It seems suspicious to me that the English openly announced they would land in central Italy to cut off our forces in the south. They aren't talking at all about the West. Some reports claim that the English have landed near Naples, but we can't tell whether that is right, since we are without Italian news. The Luftwaffe alone can make observations.

It has now been proved beyond doubt that the surrender negotiations were being conducted between the enemy and Badoglio for a long time. Since Sunday they have been going on in Rome itself. One unconfirmed report is that the King now intends to dismiss Badoglio too. I regard this as quite possible. Now that Badoglio is compromised by his disgraceful act of treachery, the King would naturally be glad to get rid of him. . . .

The Finnish, Rumanian, and Hungarian press reported Italy's treachery practically without comment. It is quite evident that Finland, Rumania, and Hungary want to wait and see how things develop. An official Japanese declaration criticized the Italians very sharply, saying it was a clear case of treason, that the Italians had lost their military honour, and while they might not want to fight, Germany and Japan would continue the struggle with unmitigated vehemence. The Japanese must truly be held in very high esteem as allies. The press of Tokyo, too, has used language such as we have not been accustomed to from that source. Undoubtedly Italy is today nothing but an object of disdain in Japan.

Badoglio wrote a letter to the Fuehrer, giving a number of sanctimonious and hypocritical arguments for his defection. Although the letter is very courteous in tone, it is the most shameless and treacherous document ever to issue from the pen of a statesman. One wants to vomit—so nauseated does one feel on reading those lines.

The neutral countries naturally feel they are on the top of the world. The Axis Powers have already been written off. But Italy gets a kick in the behind. . . .

The question still remains as to where the Duce is. Nobody knows. I expect the Italian Government is trying to hand him over to the English or the Americans. The English seem to have demanded this as one of their armistice conditions.

I was able to work for a few hours. In the evening I had a talk with Colonel General Dietl, who happened to spend a day at G.H.Q. He had just completed his leave and was sorry not to be assigned to duty against the Italians. For him as a Styrian this, of course, would be particularly desirable. He is therefore very reluctant to return to the Finnish front.

According to the picture he gave, we need have no fear about Finland for the moment. The Finns are not fighting a great deal, but they do fight well. They are doing what they can. They do not wish to become too much involved in this war, but the main thing is that they do not desert us. The Finns are dependent entirely upon our military support. Like all our allies, they are taking advantage of us, but in their case there can be no question of deserting the fighting front, at least not for the present. . . .

Dietl complained bitterly that the Swedes were behaving very insolently in their personal relationships and in the press. The Swedish press is chiefly dependent on the English plutocracy and Jewry.

Dietl doesn't think very much of Mannerheim. Mannerheim is pro-English at heart, and would naturally like to get out of the war just as soon as possible. This war demonstrates once again that, generally speaking, the military people are more cowardly than the politicians. In Finland, too, President Ryti is the strong man and not Generalissimo Mannerheim.

[Field Marshal Gustav Emil Mannerheim, born in 1867, showed his contempt of Nazism on many occasions. He was one of the few senior officers in the countries allied with the Axis who failed to come personally to Germany to be awarded a high decoration. When he received one, it had to be conferred on him in Finland.]

A small group of us had dinner with the Fuehrer; besides those who were present at noon, Goering and Dietl were also there.

Goering is furious about the treachery of Italy. He, too, has seen it coming. There isn't anybody among us now who doesn't claim to have foreseen it! Only nobody prepared for it to the necessary extent! Goering gave voice to his conviction that the King himself bore the greatest responsibility for the Italian treachery. The royal family is due to leave Rome this evening, no doubt for fear of being caught by the German troops. . . .

The war of nerves started by the English and Americans against us doesn't impress anybody here at G.H.Q. But Goering is energetically in favour of the Fuehrer now making a public utterance. People are not only fairly crying for it at home, but the entire Eastern Front calls for a speech by the Fuehrer. Goering's air commanders in the East telephoned to him about it; they claimed that an address by the Fuehrer would at this moment be worth ten divisions.

Meanwhile the Fuehrer has already worked up his speech; all he has to do is to edit it. I can only hope before I leave to persuade him to deliver it.

Goering is now somewhat more optimistic about air warfare than he was; in fact, in my opinion somewhat too optimistic. But it is always a good thing if the responsible man views his situation optimistically. You cannot master a problem as difficult as air warfare with pessimism.

An animated debate started as to what kind of regime we should set up in the occupied sections of Italy. The Fuehrer is right in believing that we cannot afford to install immediately the sort of regime that we would really like to have. Nor is this the moment to attack the King personally, for the King is still respected by all Italians.

All of us feel sorry for the Duce. We fear that he has already been handed over to the English and is on a British man-of-war. The English stated in their press that if they got hold of him they would make him face an international court. But that will take some time. . . .

Goering believes that the Italian Fleet will in all likelihood head for Spanish harbours, but I agree with the Fuehrer that it will place itself in the enemy's hands.

Reports from northern Italy indicate that severe resistance was offered in a couple of places. But that is being broken up everywhere by our troops.

The military measures adopted during the past six weeks are a certain guarantee that the Italian treachery won't become a national misfortune for us. Military and political measures are in process of execution. The so-called provisional Fascist government is diligently at work in the Fuehrer's G.H.Q. even though one or another of its members is getting cold feet because he does not agree with the general political tendencies that we advocate. But what else can these gentlemen do except work for us? It is better for them, whatever happens, to work in the Fuehrer's G.H.Q. for a new, albeit reduced, Fascist Italy, than to go to prison in Italy, or even to be shot.

Thank God the Fuehrer has finished writing his speech! It is about twenty typewritten pages. At my suggestion it is to be broadcast at 5 P.M. Friday afternoon from the Fuehrer's G.H.Q. I shall have it repeated a number of times by transcription so that everybody at the front and at home may hear it.

We came to discuss decorations. The Fuehrer regards it as very difficult, if not impossible, to distribute decorations and badges of honour justly. Even in the case of the Knight's Cross this is sometimes exceptionally difficult. The Luftwaffe has an advantage over the Army because its successes can be measured in numbers whereas this is not possible with the Army. Colonel General Dietl, who took part in these talks, spoke fervently on behalf of the infantry, but, as already observed, it is very difficult to measure the bravery of the infantry in statistics. As a matter of fact every brave infantryman who has faced the enemy for four years ought to receive the Knight's Cross. . . . The Fuehrer believes that the only decoration that is really being distributed justly is the Mother's Cross, since at least its lowest category, even though not the upper, is sharply defined.

[The Mother's Cross was awarded by the Nazis to mothers with more than three children. There were three categories, depending upon the number of offspring—bronze, silver, and gold.]

We chatted until 4 A.M. The Fuehrer had great fun with his dog Blondi, who has become his faithful companion. It is surprising how much this animal has adjusted herself to him. It is a good thing that the Fuehrer has at least one living thing constantly with him.

September 11, 1943

The enemy hasn't the faintest idea as to the actual situation in northern and central Italy. Fantastic rumours persist that we are transporting our divisions over the Brenner back into the Reich. Now, suddenly, a colossal attack on Berlin is planned, to be started from Italian airports.

Here and there news reports claim that the Duce has been surrendered to the English or Americans. I can imagine that the Italians might let him fall into enemy hands, but to deliver him officially would be about the most low-down thing that ever happened in the history of any war. Some reports claim that he has already been taken to North Africa and will soon be brought before an international court-martial. The London newspapers are naïve, of course, when they claim that Badoglio intends to declare war on the Reich. Badoglio, as matter of fact, has deserted Rome and entrusted the security of the Italian capital to an insignificant general.

An article in The Economist deserves mention because it claims that the raids on Berlin are costing the Allies too much. Their losses thus far have been so heavy that they could not afford them long. Would to God that were true! It would be a tremendous help to me if I could at least be even partially relieved of the burden of air raids on the Reich's capital.

A new Regency Council has been constituted in Sofia, composed of Prince Kyrill, Premier Filoff, and the War Minister, Michoff. This Regency Council is positively on our side; we can get somewhere with it. The Fuehrer intends to transmit to Prince Kyrill the findings of the German doctors on the poisoning of Czar Boris, which he believes was in all likelihood inspired by the Italian Court. For it is very suspicious that Princess Mafalda, the worst wench [groesste Raabenaas] in the entire Italian royal house, was on a visit in Sofia for weeks before King Boris's death. It will be remembered that she is a sister of the Bulgarian Queen.

[Princess Mafalda, daughter of King Victor Emmanuel, was married to Prince Philip of Hesse. She died in a Nazi prison on April 19, 1945.]

There can be no thought of any crisis in German morale. The German people are too politically minded not to draw the necessary conclusions from events in Italy. What they do want is the publication of the names of the new Fascist Government whose members for the present are sleeping on the floor at G.H.Q. The trouble is we can't publish these names, as they are too unimportant.

Before my conversation with the Fuehrer I had a long talk with Dr. Dietrich about our propaganda and press departments in the occupied countries. He was agreeable to having his public-relations officers integrated into the propaganda sections. If he were to start a new organization for his public-relations officers, we would have two sets of machinery in the occupied countries with resulting confusion. At present Dr. Dietrich and I are collaborating splendidly. I suppose he realizes it's no fun to pick a fight with me.

The German people, as I have emphasized repeatedly, are waiting for a speech by the Fuehrer. . . . Everybody realizes that a totalitarian decision must be made. Nobody doubts any longer that this is a war of to be or not to be. The Eastern Front is causing the German people considerably greater worry now than in past weeks. The state of depression because of air raids has increased as a result of the most recent heavy attacks. Very few are left who believe reprisals are likely to be carried out.

Naumann has had a lengthy talk with Himmler. The differences that have arisen between Himmler and myself were cleared up. Himmler attaches the greatest importance to collaborating with me harmoniously. That's something that I, too, desire. He will surely be careful in the future not to send me insolent teletype messages as he did the last time.

At noon I went to see the Fuehrer. A little group of us, including Doenitz, Ribbentrop, and Keitel lunched with him. He told us the latest news. Affairs in northern and central Italy have developed exceedingly favourably, and there is hope for their complete clarification by evening. In view of this development, however, the Fuehrer was again inclined to postpone his address to the German people. This time I would not be side-tracked. I insisted on his speaking that very evening. We must not let the right psychological moment slip by; it has already been missed so often that we must now really take advantage of it. . . .

The Vatican has inquired of our Ambassador whether its rights would be safeguarded in the event of our occupying Rome. The Fuehrer sent an affirmative reply.

Meanwhile Badoglio has left the Italian capital. The royal family, too, has scampered away—a proof that the circles responsible for treachery don't think much of Rome's chances. The Italian Crown Prince has gone to an island. We monitored a telephone conversation between Churchill and Eden during which Eden complained bitterly that the Crown Prince was creating difficulties for the English. He was unwilling to accept an English officer as his adjutant. In other words, so low has the Italian monarchy already fallen that it is completely in the hands of the enemy.

Conditions in Italy are unbelievable. The Italian people are today experiencing what we lived through in the November days of 1918. They are being punished more quickly and terribly for the treason committed by their government than we could ever have expected or thought possible.

[The Nazis always maintained that Germany capitulated in 1918 although undefeated. The German people, they claimed, would have continued the struggle and Germany would finally have won, but a weak and corrupt monarchy showed the white feather and gave up the fight prematurely. One reason why Hitler now continued the struggle even when the entire world regarded Germany's doom as certain was his obsession with the idea that victory was "just round the corner" in 1918, and that the Reich should merely have held out a little longer. To him German victory now was a matter of holding out in the face of terrific odds.]

While we were lunching Jodl brought the latest news. The garrison at Rome, including its best Guards regiments, has surrendered to Kesselring. The German troops are marching on Rome. Most of the northern Italian cities are in our hands. Above all, contact with our troops in the south has been re-established and secured. Thus the main problems connected with our security in Italy have been solved. . . .

This is an added reason for me to appeal once more to the Fuehrer to deliver his address in the evening. The Fuehrer was not quite so much opposed to the idea now as he was in the early afternoon. I must see to it that the speech is finally fixed up before I leave. The Fuehrer would prefer to wait for further developments. I rightly countered, however, with the argument that a development never comes to a standstill at a certain point, but continues, and that undoubtedly the present moment is most suitable. The Fuehrer said he wanted to think it over until late in the afternoon.

A long discussion followed, with the Italian question as the main theme. The Fuehrer again related how often he had warned the Duce against the monarchy and the aristocracy, but the Duce was too trustful. He must now pay for it dearly. The monarchy thanked him in a manner that he certainly had not expected.

The King can no longer be spared in our propaganda. The Fuehrer once more expressed his conviction that Princess Mafalda was the trickiest bitch [geriebenste Aas] in the Italian royal house. He thought her capable of having expedited her brother-in-law Boris to the hereafter. It was also possible that the plutocratic clique administered poison to Mussolini, for Mussolini's illness, too, was somewhat mysterious. No words need be wasted about the treacherous Italian generals, he said. They had so besmirched Italy's military honour that it could not be washed clean for a long time to come. The plot hatched against us in Rome was backed by the monarchy, aristocracy, society, higher officers, Freemasons, Jews, industrialists, and clerics. The Duce became the victim of this plot. We have no intention of going his way. We are going to prevail, come what may.

The Fuehrer invoked final measures to preclude similar developments with us once and for all. He ordered all German princes discharged from the German Wehrmacht. I proposed to the Fuehrer that all the estates of the former ruling-families should be seized as quickly as possible. Real estate is the foundation of economic independence, and economic independence always furnishes a basis for political influence. The Fuehrer was quite in accord with this view.

As regards the Duce himself, I believe that from a sentimental point of view it would naturally be most regrettable if we could not liberate him. From a political standpoint, however, I wouldn't much regret it. We must assess all these questions with a cool opportunism. If the Duce were to lead a new Fascist Italy, we would undoubtedly owe him consideration in many matters on which we can now act without restraint. Even though he denies it, I don't believe the Fuehrer would have the courage to take, say, South Tyrol away from a Fascist Italy led by the Duce and which had been behaving itself for the rest of the war. However, we must not only get back South

Tyrol, but I envisage a boundary line drawn south of Venetia. Whatever was once an Austrian possession we must get back into our hands. The Italians by their infidelity and treachery have lost every claim to be treated as a national state of the modern type. They must be punished most severely, as the laws of history demand.

I talked to General Schmundt about the question of making use of princes in the German Wehrmacht. Their elimination will create some difficulties because some have given an exceptionally good account of themselves as front-line fighters. We cannot remove them from the Wehrmacht without being grossly tactless. Nevertheless it must be done. Here, too, reasons of state must prevail over all other considerations.

The Fuehrer later took a walk with me through the woods surrounding G.H.Q. I pleaded once more with all my energy for him to deliver his speech this same evening. We read it through once more after the last corrections had been made. It is about twenty typewritten pages long and has turned out to be excellent. In it the Fuehrer tells in detail about the Italian treachery. In very impressive words he testifies to his friendship with the Duce, which will continue beyond the present. He was not changeable in such matters, he said. The Duce was the greatest son of Italy since the collapse of antiquity. The clique that brought him to his downfall was properly characterized by the Fuehrer. Next he described the measures taken for securing our position in Italy. This part of the speech, together with the special bulletin about our successes in northern and central Italy, will undoubtedly create a deep impression in the entire world. The Fuehrer said a few words about air warfare and the struggle on the Eastern Front. His whole speech was filled with the spirit of Clausewitz.

There followed an admonition to the Party and the assurance that the Italian precedent never can and never will be repeated in Germany, and that Germany will finally carry off the palm of victory despite all tribulations. The speech is bound to serve as a clarion call to the entire German people.

I then put the Fuehrer before the microphone and had the speech, which he read in an exceedingly impressive manner, transcribed on to a magnetophone band in Berlin over the direct wire. I was very happy when I heard from Berlin that the reception had been good. Thus I have at last succeeded in bringing the Fuehrer before the microphone for the first time since Memorial Day last March. I can now return to Berlin with my mind at ease. The main purpose of my trip to G.H.Q. has been fulfilled. I believe Goering is right in telling me that we have won a battle. This speech will do the work of several divisions at the Eastern Front and in Italy.

I had a short final chat with the Fuehrer. He, too, seemed very happy to have the speech out of his system at last. He extended best wishes for my health and my work.

He promised me to come to Berlin soon to speak in the Sports Palace at the opening of the Winter Relief Campaign. I shall see to it that he re-acquires the taste for establishing direct contact with the people.

Our parting was very cordial. I wished the Fuehrer every success.

At 8 P.M. we heard the broadcast of the special bulletin concerning our successes in Italy. It seemed very effective. Following it came the speech of the Fuehrer which, thank God, went over all stations without interference. Not even the Bolsheviks pulled themselves together to interfere on our air waves. That means we really scored a bull's-eye.

Some additional work; some more talk; after that I fell into my bed dead tired. A mountain of work will await me in Berlin.

September 12, 1943

Returning to Berlin I found a wonderful spirit prevailing. . . . The news of our heavy blows against Italy—especially the capture of Rome—as well as the Fuehrer's speech acted like champagne on the people. It was almost as though we were on a great and successful advance comparable to that of 1939 and 1940. The seizure of Rome, especially, has given great satisfaction to the German people, for their anger at the Italians is indescribable. I am very happy that this profound change in morale has taken place so quickly and radically. . . .

Since the last terrible catastrophe in Hamburg morale had obviously sunk very low. The worst is now behind us. The women are largely responsible for this essential improvement in our sentiments, chiefly because the arguments advanced in the Fuehrer's speech appealed particularly to women's feelings. The hatred of Italy is indescribable and is directed not only against the Badoglio regime but against the Italian people as such. The entire German people want us to succeed in liberating the Duce—a proof that our politics are still based too much on sentiment and too little on intellect. If the King were to fall into our hands it would be difficult not to have him shot, for the German people would demand it.

During the days of the Italian treachery a few enemies of the state in public office and even in the Party indulged in loose talk. There were only a few cases of this kind, but I proceeded against them with unflinching determination. Hereafter I will have anybody who says anything whatever publicly against the war or the Fuehrer either beaten up, sentenced by the courts, or incarcerated in a concentration camp.

The whole world is pouring scorn and derision upon the Italians. The English have already informed them politely that they cannot supply them with any coal for general use; coal can be furnished only for munitions factories working for the Allies. The English press added that the Italian people might as well freeze during the coming winter; they deserved nothing better since they took part in the war. That's the treatment you get when you lay down your arms!

One can only smile at the intimation of the Badoglio Government that it intends to declare war on us. With what? The Italian Government has neither soldiers nor weapons.

Even England admits that the Fuehrer's speech is one of the most powerful delivered by him during the entire war. It came at the right moment for us, and the wrong moment for our enemies. I am very happy that I prevailed upon the Fuehrer to deliver it. I believe it can be put down as the equivalent of a battle won. Its effect upon the German people simply cannot be overestimated.

The situation was such that I was able to take time off to go out to Lanke in the afternoon. The entire family, Magda and the children, awaited me and greeted me with great joy and enthusiasm. I was happy to be back with my family. Even though I had a lot of work to do, the relaxation did me good.

I had to deal with a number of questions; for example, how to prevent the English and Americans from stealing Italian works of art. Undoubtedly they intend to do this, and the Italians won't have the strength to stop it.

As already pointed out, we are continuing to retreat in the East. There is no question, however, of this retreat taking place in a disorderly manner. It is quite orderly and gives no indication of a rout. Nevertheless we must be clear in our own minds that the areas we are yielding are valuable and important militarily.

I am very happy that the Fuehrer has been so re-invigorated by developments. We are, too. I believe the German people are gaining new strength as a result of the Italian crisis. Misfortune is beginning to turn slowly into good fortune.

September 13, 1943

The English have made public the thirteen points of the capitulation arranged with the Badoglio regime. No traitorous clique of generals has ever signed a more shameless document. The conditions of the armistice are dishonourable and humiliating.

It makes my blood boil to think that the King and Badoglio have addressed the Italian people urging resistance to the Germans and stuttering hypocritical explanations for having deserted Rome. The King talked twaddle about manly decisions which must now be made. He was ready to do his duty as King to the last breath, and he hoped God would help him. One just can't have any other opinion about Italian dishonour—it is now nothing short of comic and ludicrous. It smells particularly bad when one remembers the boastful claims that Fascism emitted about the rebirth of Italy. All these are now proving to have been nothing but empty words.

Our Japanese allies are naturally of a different calibre. The Japanese press and government are adopting an attitude toward the Italian problem that does credit to their manly pride and deep sense of honour.

The Swedish press had become more insolent again, though it is not quite so arrogant as it was a fortnight ago. Obviously Italian behaviour has had a beneficial effect upon Swedish mentality.

In the evening we heard the happy news that by a tour de force, the Duce has been successfully liberated. It was an act of heroism on the part of the S.D., Student's parachute troops and the Waffen-S.S. With the Duce was Caballero, who had not been executed after all. The Duce is already on his way to Vienna. His family is at present in Munich. Tassinari, the former Italian Minister of Agriculture, a man of some stature, is also in our custody.

[Colonel General Kurt Student was commanding officer of the German parachute troops. By "Caballero" Goebbels probably means Count Ugo Cavallero, Italian senator, who helped Mussolini, 1925–28 to reorganize the Italian armed forces along Fascist lines. Giuseppe Tassinari was an agricultural expert who, before becoming Italian Minister of Agriculture, directed the Institute of Agricultural Economy at Bologna.]

Added to this is the news that our position near Salerno is relatively favourable. We are sending reinforcement after reinforcement, but the English and the Americans are doing likewise. It is therefore a race against time as to whose reinforcements will arrive first.

Naturally on the human side we are all deeply touched that the liberation of the Duce has proved possible. No one can as yet foresee, however, what political consequences will follow. At any rate, I went back to Berlin [from Lanke] in the evening.

Towards midnight the Fuehrer called me on the telephone. Naturally he was delighted about the Duce's deliverance. The Duce had been held prisoner in a small mountain hostelry on the highest peak of the Apennines. The Badoglio regime had at first interned him on the Island of Maddalena, but his stay there was regarded as too insecure. The S.D. had trailed him and had already prepared an attempt at liberation which, however, could not be carried through because of the Duce's transfer.

happy. The English admit it. The Duce has eluded them. . . .

The fact that the Fuehrer has demonstrated by his deed that he is a friend and foe alike to the liberation. The Americans have made a national story of it. A news item by Reuters now admits that Bagoglio had undertaken to deliver the Duce to the English and Americans.

Japan, especially, admires the heroic spirit of Germany, which found expression in this act of liberation.

It is interesting to note how Vichy tries to contrast the Italian capitulation with the French and to make moral capital of it. The French and Italians are fighting about who acted in the more cowardly and dishonourable manner. Undoubtedly the Italians will come out on top in that scuffle.

In northern Italy, Fascism is taking a new lease of life. In Milan, the German troops worked with the Fascists to establish order. The Fascist party insignia are again to be seen in the streets. Many of the anti-Fascists have fled and others have been put behind bars by the Fascists. Swiss agents report that great Fascist demonstrations of joy are taking place in northern Italian cities. But there is no reason for such manifestations as yet. The Italian Army seems to have completely collapsed. No great army has ever been disarmed more quickly than Italy's of today.

The Fascists are pinning all their hopes on the Duce, but I don't know whether these will be fulfilled. The Duce is sick and frail; whether he will be in a position to play a decisive political role will be revealed during the talk with the Fuehrer at G.H.Q. next Tuesday.

The Fuehrer is very happy at being able to meet the Duce again soon. Talking to Gauleiters Hofer and Rainer he said, however, that our policies regarding Italy are not to be changed. I welcome this. I had already feared that the Duce's reappearance might change our line of approach. It looks, however, as though the Fuehrer were determined to remain tough.

During the last air raid on Berlin the Ploetzensee prison was hit; a number of people condemned to death escaped. Thierack therefore gave orders that clemency pleas were to be disposed of as quickly as possible and the executions to take place during the days immediately following. It would be beyond a joke if several hundred men condemned to death were let loose upon the population of the capital after every air raid!

September 15, 1943

The enemy press continues to treat the liberation of the Duce as a sensation. There has hardly been a military event during the entire war that has so deeply stirred the emotions and evoked such human interest. We are able to celebrate a first-class moral victory.

The English correspondents claim that German resistance near Salerno is the toughest the Allies have ever encountered. Resistance is really the wrong word, as our troops have meanwhile gone over to the offensive.

One thing is certain—the Allies have failed, at least for the present, to attain their objectives in Italy. They tried to be too clever about it and have accordingly been too stupid. That explains, too, why London public opinion is so violently critical of Churchill. The military and political situation in Italy has changed completely within a few days.

As regards the Soviets' situation in the hinterland, statements by prisoners of war indicate that morale has improved considerably because of the [Soviet] military successes of the past two months. Nevertheless the desperate food situation is having a depressing effect. Anti-Semitism is said to be on the increase throughout the entire Soviet Union. It's a pity that we can't reach the people of the Soviet Union by radio propaganda. We would have a great chance there. The Kremlin has been clever enough to prevent the Russian people from receiving broadcasts from the outside world and to limit them to their local stations.

The Fuehrer has signed the decree for an emergency housing scheme, with Dr. Ley in charge. That gives Dr. Ley a chance, for once, to get results from a big assignment. In the past he has always been concerned about being vested with authority, and fought energetically to get it. Once obtained, however, he would fail to use it, but start another fight for new authority.

The Duce has arrived at the Fuehrer's G.H.Q. Mutual greetings were exceptionally cordial and friendly. The Fuehrer awaited him outside his bunker with the Duce's son Vittorio. Hitler and Mussolini embraced after their long separation. It was a deeply moving example of loyalty between men and comrades. I suppose there is nobody in the world who can fail to be impressed strongly by so touching an occasion.

The Fuehrer then withdrew for a private talk with the Duce. No doubt I shall learn details about it soon. Obviously not only personal but also political matters have been discussed. The Duce will no doubt have to renounce certain things that he had hitherto been taking for granted, for in the last analysis we must receive some sort of compensation for Italy's gruesome treachery against the Axis.

I used all the eloquence at my command to obtain authorization to issue a communiqué about the rescue of Mussolini. At first the Fuehrer was against it, but finally he became convinced that such a report would have tremendous publicity value today. The item was then composed in a classical manner. The real secret of liberation, namely that it was carried out by glider formations, was not divulged; beyond that, however, the account of the liberation was so interesting, so full of suspense, so touching and moving, that it will undoubtedly create a deep impression throughout the world.

September 16, 1943

How wrong the Anglo-Americans were about the situation in Italy can be seen from the fact that, in New York, telephone books were already being torn up for use as confetti to celebrate victory. Now they are sitting with their telephone books in shreds while the situation in Italy is at present even more favourable for us than it was before the Badoglio gang capitulated. For the English and Americans at Salerno are in serious trouble. There is consternation about it in London and Washington. Even that big mug, Knox, had to admit at a press conference that the American troops at Salerno had been given a very hot reception and that the battles in North Africa and Sicily could not be compared with those for this bridgehead. . . .

The English papers spoke of the possibility that Churchill might meet severe criticism when he gets back from the United States. He expected a different kind of homecoming! It is now admitted by the enemy that he wanted to return in triumph, so to speak, with captured Italy as a present for the English people.

The Duce has issued five Orders of the Day from the Fuehrer's G.H.Q. over the Italian broadcasting systems. They state that the Duce has resumed the leadership of Fascism as from September 15. He has appointed Pavolini as temporary Secretary General of the Party, which is hereafter to be called the Republican-Fascist party. All who were removed from office by the Badoglio clique are immediately to resume work. The Fascist party is undertaking the task of making all possible support available for the German Wehrmacht which is fighting against the common enemy. It is to give the common people essential moral and material aid. Members of the Party are to be investigated as to their attitude during the coup d'état, and those who were cowardly and unfaithful will be punished severely. In addition, a national militia is to be created anew.

From these Orders of the Day one can gather that Mussolini is determined to take things into his hands again and that he has learned a lot from earlier events. Although the House of Savoy is not mentioned by name in these Orders of the Day, Mussolini is determined to do away with the monarchy.

One cannot yet estimate the political consequences of the liberation of Mussolini. Certainly the Fuehrer will do all in his power to bring him back on the right road. . . . Jointly with us the Japanese have issued an exceptionally firm declaration concerning the Italian defection. They express their determination to continue the war with unabated fury until final victory.

A report was presented to me about the situation in our universities. It appears that there are almost exactly as many women studying as men. The percentage of students of medicine is exceptionally high. I regard that as a very bad sign for the future of our young intellectuals. Students of medicine enjoy a period of exemption from service with the colours. The sudden rise in the number of medical students is therefore not only a sign of enthusiasm for the science of medicine, but also of a lack of enthusiasm for fighting at the front. The decrease in the number of students in the technical and natural sciences is alarming. Although there are already too few of them, the figures are decreasing rather than increasing. It would be a good thing to extend to students of the natural and technical sciences the same privileges as to those of medicine.

The Duce's visit to the Fuehrer continues. Their talks are almost entirely private. The Duce is in splendid physical and mental condition. One can see this by his Orders of the Day which certainly breathe the old Revolutionary-Fascist spirit. I will go to G.H.Q. next week. The Fuehrer will give me the details of his talks with Mussolini. The visit has certainly proved very harmonious. The Fuehrer is very well satisfied with the result of his conversations thus far.

September 17, 1943

At Salerno there is a race against time. Our General Staff still believes it can master the situation and hurl the English and Americans back into the ocean. In the course of the day, however, the situation changed somewhat in favour of our enemies. Every hour is of irredeemable value.

There is great bitterness in the enemy camp about the Duce's Orders of the Day. They now realize how much they lost by our liberation of Mussolini.

With the support of the German local commander, government commissars have been appointed in Rome to take over the work of the partly fugitive, partly arrested Badoglio Government. I learned confidentially that the super-profitier, Volpi, married a Jewess a few weeks before Badoglio's treachery and was therefore expelled from the Fascist party. Obviously he wanted to provide himself with an alibi for the future by this marriage. I consider Volpi one of the greatest war racketeers the Italian people ever produced.

[The late Count Giuseppe Volpi di Misurata, born in 1877, founded the Adriatic Electric Company. He was in charge of the negotiations for the Treaty of Rapallo in 1920. Later he was president of the Assicurazione Generale of Trieste and Venice.]

In the evening the very distressing news reached us that we must give up Novorossisk. We were unable to evacuate the city according to plan; the abandonment took place under tremendous pressure from the enemy. Let us hope that the seasonal rains will soon fall in the Ukraine. That would give us a certain amount of relief.

Many acts of sabotage are reported from every occupied section. According to reports from Norway even the Nasjonal Samling has been somewhat obstreperous. The ministers of the Nasjonal Samling are offering much opposition, evidently with the intention of having themselves dismissed and thereby providing an excuse for themselves later on.

The quietest spot, relatively speaking, is the Protectorate. The Czechs evidently have no desire to burn their fingers. On the other hand acts of sabotage and terrorism have increased enormously in the General Government of Poland.

The Duce is still at the Fuehrer's G.H.Q. He intends to remain there a few days more. He has arranged with the Fuehrer not to return to Italy for the present. He wants to establish his temporary seat of government somewhere in southern Germany. A suitable locality is being looked for. All our political and military measures remain intact; the Fuehrer has insisted that no change be made.

The Duce intends first to rebuild the Fascist party. Next, with its help, he wants to start rebuilding the state, beginning with the lower administrative echelon. As the crown of this work he then proposes to call a constitutional convention. Its task would be to eliminate the House of Savoy. The Duce is still somewhat hesitant about taking this action as he is of course aware of the strong ties between the Italian people and the royal house, and knows that these ties cannot be severed lightly. Besides, his measures will depend very much upon military developments.

In any case there will be news during the coming days and weeks. On the whole I am very glad that the Fuehrer has stuck to his original intentions. Obviously sentimental, emotional considerations no longer influence him. The Italian problem must be considered and solved anew.

September 18, 1943

The Eighth [British] Army is now only eighteen miles from the Salerno theatre of war. We must therefore attempt to change the front radically with the aid of our reinforcements so that we do not fall into a trap. The declarations by General Clark, issued during the day, became more insolent from hour to hour. The Germans, he claims, will shortly face an entirely changed situation. No wonder that morale in London has been given a great fillip!

[General Mark Clark was in command of the Fifth American Army in Italy, and later became American Military Governor of liberated Austria.]

I realize again that our military propaganda for foreign countries has failed completely. Despite my earnest warnings, it stressed Salerno quite superfluously as a German victory. The military news sources under General Jodl have been writing about a Dunkirk and a Gallipoli, and now the whole pack of enemy propagandists attacks me and holds me responsible for this totally faulty news policy! I can no longer accept such responsibility and am going to take the offensive against our discordant news policy. It won't do for my good name to be dragged in the dirt by the world and then, when things go wrong, for those who are really responsible to fade away into the background, leaving me to take it on the chin. . . .

I have always held that victories must be announced only after they have actually been achieved and that the skin of the bear must not be distributed until the bear has been killed. Our military public-relations offices have again sinned grievously against this elementary principle of war-news policy.

The Italian defection has brought us a few advantages after all: Kaufmann reports that he has seized 400,000 tons of Italian commercial shipping. That's a real swig from the bottle!

I saw some sensational newsreels dealing with the liberation of the Duce. These pictures show with what élan the undertaking was carried through. The Duce himself appears on the screen for quite a time. He is in civilian clothes and looks rather dashing. His expression, however, is suffering and careworn. He has grown thin of late, but his eyes still sparkle with the old lust for combat. Judging by that look, one can imagine his staging a come-back in Italian politics.

I hear that the Duce has protested against some of the Italian broadcasts sent over our networks. After all, these emanate exclusively from his own collaborators, especially from Pavolini and his own son. It is obvious that the Duce is trying to get Italian radio propaganda back into the hands of the Fascist National Committee. We shall soon be feeling the adverse effects of the Duce's re-entry into Italian politics.

Stalin is playing politics with his popes. He is having a new Holy Synod convened. English bishops are on a visit in Moscow to underline this sycophantic action of Stalin's with their propaganda speeches. It makes one sick to think of this hypocrisy, but there is something clever about the way it has been launched.

To date we have evacuated about a million people from Berlin. That is a tremendous achievement in organization. By comparison, the migration of peoples in the Middle Ages was only a small and modest movement.

September 19, 1943

The Anglo-American press attacked me violently because of my allegedly premature reports of victories. But these didn't come from me; on the contrary, as I have already emphasized, I protested energetically against them. At the Fuehrer's G.H.Q. there were a couple of generals who could not wait. They distributed the skin of the bear before it had been killed and trumpeted to the world a victory which we hadn't achieved. Developments in actual fact have been just about the opposite. . . .

I have made it clear both to the responsible men in my Ministry as well as to the Fuehrer's G.H.Q. that I shall no longer put up with such premature and unsubstantiated reports of victories. No military news must hereafter be issued unless it has had my approval. I have also written an energetic letter to Keitel and have demanded an end to the mistakes made so often during this war by his collaborators.

What the army did at Salerno is an outstanding scandal. The exuberant reports of victory emanated from our supreme command for the south—almost directly from Kesselring.

The Italian press is now slowly veering over to the Duce in the sections of Italy which we occupy. The only dishonourable exception is the Corriere della Sera. It would be a good thing to eliminate this dirty sheet as quickly as possible.

In the evening, the Duce spoke over the German and Italian broadcasting systems from Munich, where he has been staying at the Prince Karl Palace since his visit to the Fuehrer's G.H.Q. His speech was clear, determined, and of high quality. He did not try in the least to be sentimental. He spoke quite coolly, realistically, and without exaggerated pathos. His arguments were effective and convincing. They will certainly not fail to impress the Italian public. The Italian Fascists will no doubt draw new hope and new fighting courage from this speech.

The Duce again described the events leading up to July 25. A new item in his presentation is the fact that his talk with the King lasted only twenty minutes. This was followed by sharp criticism of the King and of the Crown Prince. He simply poured derision on the House of Savoy for its infidelity and ingratitude. He found words of warm praise for the Fuehrer's fidelity, which he said was typical of the attitude of the whole German people.

Fascism, he said, would henceforth be socialist, nationalist, and anti-plutocratic. The Duce believes a new Italy can grow from such a kernel. I don't know whether his hopes will be realized. Be that as it may, that is the only possibility for Italy to get out of the present terrible dilemma. It remains to be seen whether the Duce himself will stage a comeback. Certainly his speech was very dignified. It carried conviction more because of its arguments than from any pathos in its delivery.

At noon I had a talk with Dr. Ley. He wanted to be informed about latest developments. He has rather odd ideas regarding our intentions in the east and in the south. One can see that much of the information at my disposal is being withheld from him, otherwise he would judge the situation more realistically and not let his imagination run wild. But it is a good thing that the men who frequently address the masses should be free from any knowledge of unpleasant news. This gives them much more self-assurance when they talk to people.

A report from Essen is very impressive. The population, especially in the former Communist quarters of the city, has to a large extent made shift for itself. The same fanaticism with which the workers formerly sponsored Communism is now focused upon national tasks. The population isn't thinking of depending solely upon government help as is so often the case with bourgeois circles. The workers help themselves so far as possible.

There was a great deal of telephoning back and forth during the day between the Fuehrer's G.H.Q. and myself concerning the fiasco of our news about Salerno. My protest was received with greatest uneasiness in the Fuehrer's G.H.Q. They feel guilty and have a bad conscience. Dr. Dietrich blames his military informers, who in turn blame the information liaison office. I shall certainly find out who was guilty. In the last analysis Kesselring was really responsible, for it was he who radioed the premature reports to the Fuehrer's G.H.Q.

September 20, 1943

The English seem much embarrassed by the fact that the Duce spoke with such sovereign confidence. They would certainly rather have him in their hands than see him devoting himself to the political resurgence of the Italian people. I think he will give them some cause for worry.

Large quantities of weapons have fallen into our hands and gigantic columns of Italian prisoners are on their way into the Reich. They will be very welcome here as skilled workers.

The situation in Dalmatia has become a little difficult for us because the Partisans are being strengthened by deserters and weapons from Italy. I don't believe that we can master the crisis there by propaganda alone, as has often been urged. A sharp sword must always stand behind propaganda if it is to be really effective.

A new tabulation of losses in the East is available. . . . Our total losses in the East, exclusive of Lapland, from June 22, 1941, to August 31, 1943, were 548,480 dead, of whom 18,512 were officers; there were 1,998,991 wounded, of whom 51,670 were officers; 354,967 missing (11,597 officers); total 2,902,438, of whom 81,779 were officers.

It is a curious thing that although every individual soldier returning from the Eastern Front considers himself personally superior to the Bolshevik soldier, we are still retreating and retreating. The Soviets are able to publish new and justified reports of victories every day. Nor will it do to excuse ourselves by claiming that we are shortening the front. As a matter of fact, far from shortening it, we are even extending it at some points. It is true that our front so far has neither been broken down, nor torn up. But that is meagre comfort considering the extremely valuable industrial and agricultural terrain and the tremendous quantities of supplies which we have had to abandon.

The neutral countries are asking themselves whether our retreat is really based on military considerations. They cannot imagine that our fighting spirit should have sunk so low in a single summer as to compel us thus to withdraw our front. Many regard it as a tactical move to enable us to arrive at a separate peace with the Soviets. Personally I cannot imagine how that could be arranged.

The neutrals believe we intend to withdraw slowly from the East and to divert Stalin's attention to the Near East and India while we negotiate with him. We could certainly discuss such a development; unfortunately it has no bearing on the facts.

Some English periodicals take quite a radical view of the political conduct of the war. They regard the situation with an amazing realism, and are aware that, if the Reich were to suffer a military collapse in the East, the European balance of power would be infinitely worse disturbed than if Germany became the dominating power in central and western Europe.

I do not have much time for reading. At present I am reading the English novel, How Green Was My Valley. It is very informative about English mentality. I don't believe that England is in any present danger of becoming Bolshevized. English mentality is anchored too much in the British tradition.

The Fuehrer has invited me to come to his G.H.Q. on Wednesday for a talk.

September 21, 1943

The Duce's speech has created a deep impression on the Italian people, principally because it was sensational and because the Duce is the only person talking to the Italians. Nothing whatever is at present heard from the King and Badoglio. According to an official English news item they have gone to Sicily and placed themselves under the protection of the enemy.

The Japanese are now speaking of a successful evacuation of Salamaua. These "successful evacuations" are getting the upper hand with the Axis. I don't believe we shall be able to use the expression much longer; it makes us more of a laughing stock each time. The Axis Powers in the course of one year have done so much successful evacuating that a large part of their former war potential was lost in the process. We must finally start giving a clear picture to our people and the world about our situation and our methods in this war.

In the East, too, this is now a burning question. . . It gives one the creeps to look at the map and compare what we had under our dominion about this time last year with the distance we have now been thrown back. Certainly the Soviet Union is in a much better position now than it was a year ago. At that time the Soviet Union was actually struggling with military and economic death. Now there can be no talk of that.

The Italian question has created great difficulties for us in the Balkans. The Slovenes are now in open rebellion and have gone almost entirely over into the camp of the Partisans. At the moment we lack sufficient police powers to knock out this rather dangerous movement.

The fact that the percentage of planes shot down by us has decreased within one year from twenty to five makes us worry. While it is true that we shot down more planes each month than the one before, yet the number of enemy flights to Germany has increased four times as fast as the number of planes downed. That naturally makes one wonder.

Speer claims that the production deficit in the armament industry is not too great after an enemy air raid. The fact that bombed cities undergo pretty bad dislocations of public life, as a result of which the workers often stay away from their workbenches for weeks, is far more aggravating. Thus, for instance, the Lanz works at Mannheim have been completely ready for production for a fortnight, yet only 60 per cent of the workers have thus far returned. This explains our large production deficit. That is also the reason why the English are more interested in destroying cities than in destroying the munitions industry. Destruction in the munitions industry can be more easily repaired than is the case with the disorganization caused in cities and especially in residential sections.

Lammers has issued a decree from the Fuehrer according to which only he may submit disagreements between ministers of the Reich and chiefs of the highest administrations to the Fuehrer for decision. The Fuehrer wants Lammers to examine such disagreements and to arbitrate them so far as possible. Lammers is operating very cleverly. One has the impression that he is being groomed for some such office as that of Reich Chancellor. But I shall find enough confederates to prevent that!

A huge stream of fugitives is moving from the southern Italian regions occupied by the English and Americans, into central and northern Italy. We are increasing this stream by our radio propaganda, especially by our claim that the English and Americans will compel all men of draft age to enlist. Our intention is to send the whole male population into the Reich as workers.

I had a very serious clash with Dr. Dietrich and General Jodl about the Salerno news handouts. They both felt badly compromised. They would like, in all the circumstances, to prevent my reporting this questionable matter to the Fuehrer. I can only refrain from doing so, however, if given binding assurances that incidents of this sort won't be repeated. I have no mind to let my good name be discredited by the journalistic amateurishness of inferior officers.

September 22, 1943

At the moment things look very bad on the Eastern Front. Our retreats are no longer orderly and troops naturally lose a lot of equipment owing to the speed of their movement. Once again there is a serious crisis. The Soviets blow up their victories to impress the world and to put the British under pressure politically. They are doing it also by founding a so-called Association of German Officers which has published an appeal against the Fuehrer containing much propaganda criticizing our politics and conduct of the war. A number of generals and of high officers in captivity in Russia have signed this appeal. Naturally one cannot determine whether the signatures are genuine and, if so, whether they were given under pressure or voluntarily. Nevertheless this declaration does exist, and it will not fail to have its effect on public opinion. . . .

Criticism in this declaration is chiefly aimed at the catastrophe of Stalingrad. The real point of the appeal is to be found in the demand for a direct peace which these officers claim they want to prepare for the German people.

Badoglio has issued an appeal to the Italian public. This appeal is about the most shameless thing that has ever come from the pen of a marshal. He calls upon the Italian people to engage in guerrilla warfare; he places himself on the side of our enemies; he declares that we betrayed Italy and left the Italian divisions in the lurch on all battlefields, and that we are now plundering Italy. His aim is a strong and faithful Italy—in short, he commits to paper whatever the human tongue can fabricate in the way of lies and hypocrisy.

Meanwhile someone close to the Duce has published further details about his imprisonment. These are very interesting and indeed sensational. They convey the impression that the Duce had really expected to be delivered over to the English and Americans but that he intended to thwart this by suicide.

As a marginal note I may register the fact that the Negus has demanded the extradition of Badoglio. He wants to place him before an Abyssinian court as a war criminal. There is no species of madness that the human brain is not capable of thinking up in this war.

I had a long talk with Under Secretary Esser. He told me about his wish to get assigned to some sort of political job and begged me to communicate this request to the Fuehrer. Evidently he would like to be Gauleiter for the Bavarian Eastern Mark. I don't know whether the Fuehrer is ready just now to take this gau away from Gauleiter Waechtler and especially whether he wants to assign Esser, of all people; to this post. Esser told me many flattering things about the effect of my editorials in the Reich on Bavarian public opinion. He claimed that I had acquired a political reputation there in recent months that simply could not be surpassed.

September 23, 1943

Churchill indulges in orgies of hatred against the Reich, against National Socialism, against an alleged Prussian Junker clique that is to succeed National Socialism, etc. . . . Italy in future is again to enjoy the advantages and blessings of democracy as the English understand it. The Reich is to expect total destruction. There could be no question of mercy for us. England would fight to the end to eliminate the totalitarian states. . . .

He called the Italian front the third front, inasmuch as the second front was to be in the West and was, in fact, already practically in existence, since the divisions now in the British Isles were keeping a large number of German divisions immobilized in the West. . . .

The most important result of the Italian armistice was the seizure of the Italian Fleet. . . .

Churchill's speech is naturally accorded high praise in the English press. But one need not take that very seriously in wartime. Things like that can easily be made to order and are no real barometer of public opinion.

Eden, speaking in the House of Commons, denied that England intended to take possession of Sicily and Sardinia. I suppose they will make crown colonies of them as in the case of Malta.

Eden gave a detailed statement about the Hess case. He described Hess's mysterious trip pretty much in accordance with the facts. It is very surprising that such a statement is made at this stage. I wonder what the English have in mind?

I have received a report by Schwarz von Berk about the present situation in Finland. Naturally, like all other nations, the Finns would like to have the war brought to an end. But there is very little possibility of their deserting our front since the Finns are practically no longer engaged in war. The Finnish people are living under relatively bearable conditions. The food situation has improved tremendously as compared with the first winter of war.

[Schwarz von Berk was editor in chief of Das Schwarze Corps, official organ of the S.S.]

Group Leader Bormann, who met us on our arrival at the Fuehrer's G.H.Q., brought me the sad news that Kube, our regional commissar in Minsk, was killed by a bomb during the night. A mine with a time fuse had been placed under his bed; he was literally torn to pieces. This shows what dangers leading National Socialists must face, especially in the occupied countries in the East. To remain alive in the present crises one cannot be too careful.

In the occupied areas a number of other attempts were carried out last night, but on personalities of less high rank. They were fairly successful. It looks as if the Bolsheviks intend to start a new wave of assassinations.

I am exceedingly sorry to lose Kube. He was a courageous, decent fighter for the National Socialist movement and I owe him much devotion and friendship. Even though I often had altercations with him in the old days of our fight for Berlin, these were always on a very honourable and decent plane. He certainly never did anything to hurt me, and that's why I, too, gave him a helping hand when he faced a very serious personal crisis at one time.

[Kube was one of Hitler's earliest disciples. When the Nazis came to power, he was made Gauleiter for the Mark of Brandenburg. His "personal crisis" arose when his embezzlements and maladministration became so notorious that Hitler was reluctantly compelled to dismiss him. Goebbels and other senior members of the Party repeatedly interceded for him and when there was a need for tough administrators to keep order in eastern Europe Kube was reinstated in Hitler's favour and appointed a regional commissar in the Ukraine, under Alfred Rosenberg, Minister for the Occupied Areas.]

Shortly after I arrived at G.H.Q. the Fuehrer asked me to accompany him on his morning walk. The Fuehrer seemed to be in exceptionally good health. Apparently he has recuperated well in recent weeks. He told me his morning walks with his dog Blondi did him a lot of good. In contrast to last year he at least gets into the open air every morning and every afternoon. That is excellent for his health. His condition gives no hint of the difficult days through which we are now passing; on the contrary, he seems to be in the best of form. That, in my opinion, is the most important thing for our political and military situation. Whenever the Fuehrer is in good spirits, things always move forward again after periods of stress and strain.

The Fuehrer began by telling me the happy news that submarine warfare is beginning to take a new large-scale lease on life. Nevertheless one must not forget that the English and Americans have built three to four million tons of new commercial shipping during the period when our submarines had to be inactive. Also, the Mediterranean had been cleared by the enemy through their successes in North Africa and southern Italy.

The Fuehrer was very glad that Doenitz had withdrawn our submarines at the right moment, namely, when we were technically inferior. Had he continued to leave them on duty the majority would undoubtedly be lying at the bottom of the ocean today.

Our new magnetic torpedo has proved its worth in that the sinking of nine destroyers can be credited to it. The Fuehrer places great hope in this torpedo. He believes that possibly we shall now have four months of increasingly great successes on the high seas. If that were the case, the English position would be shaken considerably.

As regards the West, we have seventeen divisions there at the moment. This, of course, is not enough to ward off a large-scale enemy invasion. But the Fuehrer will earnestly press for the increase of these divisions. We have fourteen divisions in Italy at present. That is enough for our purposes there. There are seventeen divisions in the Balkans, some of them first class; but they have their hands full to maintain even a semblance of order there. By the spring of 1944, the Fuehrer hopes to have thirty-five divisions set up. These will have exceptional fighting value. He wants to station thirty-four of them in the Reich itself as a central operational reserve which can be thrown east, west, south, or southeast as needed.

The Serbian Prime Minister, Nedic, has paid a visit to the Fuehrer. He acted very obediently and loyally during this visit. The Fuehrer believes he can make good use of him in re-establishing order in Serbia.

[General Milutin Nedic, born in 1882, was Yugoslav Minister of War at the time the Nazis overran his country. He became Serbian Prime Minister during the German occupation.]

As regards air raids, he is naturally pleased that they have decreased appreciably. He attributes this chiefly to the weather but also to our growing measures of defence. As to a weapon of attack, the Fuehrer expects a great deal of our magnetic bombs which are soon to be put into service. Now, as before, he is unflinchingly determined to inflict reprisals on the English which will pay them back for what they have done to us. Construction of rockets as a weapon of retaliation is under way.

The Fuehrer is determined to strip the Italian cities completely of their anti-aircraft defence. The Italians deserve nothing better than abandonment to their military fate. . . .

The Fuehrer believes that our great reprisal campaign by rockets can begin at the end of January or early in February of next year. Things have been made considerably easier by the fact that we have got away from electric rays in connection with our rockets. This leaves the English no technical possibility of interfering with the course of a rocket.

If submarine warfare develops as we hope and if in January or February of the coming year our retaliation weapon swings into action, both these German successes will hit the English hard at a time when they are tired of the war. Possibly a fundamental change can be effected in the British attitude towards the war.

The nusskern (literally nut-kernel) rocket also offers some prospects of success. It weight 850 kilos [about 17 cwts.], hence is by no means so harmless as is supposed. I learned for the first time from the Fuehrer that our big rocket weighs fourteen tons. That, of course, is a murderous tool. I believe that when the first of these missiles descends upon London a sort of panic will break out among the English people. . . .

As regards the disturbing question of the Eastern Front, the Fuehrer takes a much more optimistic view than most of the General Staff. Our present retreats merely mean that we are retiring to a line behind the Dnieper. Of course we must leave behind large supplies, especially of food and munitions, but that is unavoidable in the case of such quick withdrawals.

If we should be hard pressed, the Fuehrer is determined to give up the Desna also, and to withdraw behind Lake Peipus. That, of course, would be quite serious, for we would then have to give up Leningrad, too. The Fuehrer expects, however, to hold the line along the Dnieper through the winter. By this operation we would save about 350 kilometres. That would make available the divisions we need for the new central operational reserve. This central operational reserve, in my opinion, is the alpha and omega of our present strategy. . . .

The Fuehrer's standpoint in this matter is absolutely right. We must not allow the English and Americans to determine our course of action, and it would be wrong for us to keep our eyes fixed almost hypnotically upon our front lines everywhere in Europe with the thought that we must defend them all alike. Just let the English or Americans enter at one point or another; if we possess a large central operational reserve, we shall be able to throw them out again at a convenient moment.

The Fuehrer does not believe that anything can be achieved at present by negotiation. England is not yet shaky enough nor sufficiently tired of war and would interpret any attempt at negotiation as a sign of weakness. In the East, naturally, the present moment is entirely unfavourable for indicating any readiness to negotiate. At present Stalin has the advantage, and however easy it may be for someone in an advantageous situation to indicate his readiness to come to an arrangement, it is quite impossible for anyone at a temporary disadvantage to do so. We must therefore try to survive this crisis, whatever the cost.

The Fuehrer, furthermore, is naturally uncertain what Stalin really is planning and what reserves he still has. One never can tell in the case of Bolshevism. His present combat troops certainly are in the worst condition imaginable and are very poorly equipped. On the other hand, they enter the fray in such great masses that our troops can hardly resist their onslaught. Besides, our troops are over-tired and urgently need a rest.

It is refreshing to note the Fuehrer's optimistic attitude regarding the entire situation at the front. Seldom throughout this whole war have I seen the Fuehrer so tough and aggressive. It proves what I have claimed so often: The more furious the storm, the more determined is the Fuehrer to face it.

The Fuehrer told me in detail about the Duce's visit, which had stirred him deeply. The Duce's personality did not impress him as powerfully this time as at their earlier meetings. The main reason may be that the Duce now came to the Fuehrer without any power and that the Fuehrer accordingly looked at him somewhat more critically. The Duce has not drawn the moral conclusions from Italy's catastrophe which the Fuehrer had expected. He was naturally overjoyed to see the Fuehrer and to be fully at liberty again. But the Fuehrer expected that the first thing the Duce would do would be to wreak full vengeance on his betrayers. He gave no such indication, however, which showed his real limitations. He is not a revolutionary like the Fuehrer or Stalin. He is so bound to his own Italian people that he lacks the broad qualities of a worldwide revolutionary and insurrectionist.

His daughter Edda and, through her, his son-in-law Ciano are exerting an unwholesome influence on him. Edda Mussolini has succeeded in completely reversing the Duce's opinion of Ciano. Immediately upon her father's arrival in Munich she had a long talk with him, which resulted in a reconciliation between the Duce and Ciano. Ciano has again been accepted in the good graces of the Duce. That means this poisonous mushroom is again planted in the midst of the new Fascist Republican party. It is obvious that the Duce cannot start criminal proceedings against the traitors of Fascism if he is not willing to call his own son-in-law to account. His son-in-law should have been the first to be tried. If he were a man of really great revolutionary calibre, Mussolini would have asked the Fuehrer to hand Ciano over to him and would personally have taken him to task. This he won't do, and that handicaps him seriously in proceeding against the other traitors to Fascism. The Fuehrer had the greatest difficulty in convincing him that at least Grandi was a deliberate traitor to the Fascist party and to the Duce. The Duce at first wouldn't believe that either. But punishment of the Fascist traitors is indispensable to any resurgence of Fascism.

The little Fascist out in the country cannot believe in the honesty of a new beginning of Fascism if those who led Fascism into this life-and-death crisis are not made to account for it. The Fuehrer was deeply disappointed at the Duce's attitude. I am more than pleased at this. I had feared that the meeting between the Fuehrer and the Duce might again lead to a close friendship with embarrassing political difficulties for us. But that has by no means happened; on the contrary, I have never before seen the Fuehrer so disappointed in the Duce as this time. The Fuehrer now realizes that Italy never was a power, is no power today, and will not be a power in the future. Italy has abdicated as a people and as a nation. That is in accordance with the law of nature and the principles of justice in historical development.

Churchill's revelation that he demanded the extradition of the Duce and that the Carabinieri had orders to shoot him in the event of a German attempt at liberation, is worth its weight in gold to us. The Fuehrer is delighted about it because he believes the Duce cannot now, in any circumstances, make a deal with his adversaries. He would simply be playing with his own life.

Personally I am very sorry that the Duce is turning out as he is. Politically, however, I am content, for many steps which we would otherwise have taken only with a heavy heart, or perhaps not at all, are made easier for us.

The Fuehrer is convinced that mere territorial guarantees can give us no security where Italy is concerned. If, after all his bad experiences the Duce again puts himself in the hands of his daughter Edda, who is really a vulgar and mean wench, he can't be helped politically. He will never stage a great come-back. It is certain that he has not lived up to political and personal expectations and has thereby spoiled his great chance for the future.

The Duce, incidentally, is not as ill as was generally assumed. Professor Morell has examined him thoroughly and found no symptoms of any acute or dangerous ailment. It is especially not true that the Duce is syphilitic. It may be that he was once, but he was undoubtedly cured completely. Morell diagnosed only a circulatory disturbance and overworked and disordered bowels—in other words, the typical ailment of a modern revolutionary politician, from which we all suffer to some extent. In the case of the Duce, it is in an advanced state, but Morell believes that it can be cured absolutely.

There was, of course, no actual quarrel between the Fuehrer and the Duce. But even the Fuehrer's observation that the Duce has no great political future signifies a great deal, considering his former admiration for him.

The Duce told the Fuehrer the details of the entire drama of his personal and political crisis. On the whole we were accurately informed about developments, with the exception of the King's behaviour. It is not true that the Duce had a two-hour talk with the King on the decisive twenty-fifth of July; this conversation lasted only twenty minutes. It precluded discussion of even the most elementary questions of Italian politics and strategy. The King immediately reproached him most bitterly, told him that the war was lost, that there was no hope, and that he had already entrusted Badoglio with the government. After his twenty minutes' talk Mussolini was arrested in the hall by Carabinieri and hustled into an ambulance. At first they tried to deceive him, saying he was being taken into custody because of a plot against his life from which he must be protected; but he pretty soon realized that he was under arrest. The royal house and Badoglio then had the Duce dragged from one place to another.

Churchill evidently was looking forward to the liquidation of the Italy question, an English and American advance to the Brenner, the extradition of the Duce and his public exhibition in New York. This was prevented only by our stroke of genius. The Duce told the Fuehrer very happily that he had always believed in his liberation by the Germans and had firmly counted on it. On the other hand he had always been fully determined never to surrender to his enemies but rather to put an end to his life with a pistol.

The days at G.H.Q. passed in the greatest harmony except that the Fuehrer was inwardly reserved toward the Duce. We may consider him absolutely disillusioned concerning the Duce's personality. That is extremely desirable for our further conduct of the war. The Fuehrer is no longer determined to make the personality of the Duce the corner-stone of our relationship with Italy. He now demands territorial security to prevent any further crisis.

The Duce intends to call a new Italian national army into being from the remnants of Fascism. I doubt whether he will succeed. The Italian people are not equal to grandly conceived revolutionary politics. They don't want to be a great power. That desire was injected into them artificially by the Duce and the Fascist party. The Duce will therefore not have much luck with his recruiting.

Old Hindenburg was undoubtedly right when he said of Mussolini that even he would never be able to make anything but Italians out of Italians.

The Duce is naturally very much handicapped by conditions in his family. His wife, Rachele, hates Edda from the bottom of her heart. One can easily understand that. The Duce, on the other hand, trusts Edda more than he does his wife. Edda visited the Fuehrer some days ago. On that occasion she created a very bad impression. All she asked for was permission to emigrate to South America via Spain. In this connection she tried to settle some money questions. Ciano has brought about 6,000,000 lire with him from Italy. She wanted to exchange these for pesetas and actually offered the Fuehrer the difference in the exchange rate, a tactlessness that nauseated the Fuehrer. Ciano intends to write his memoirs. The Fuehrer rightly suspects that such memoirs can only be written in a manner derogatory to us, for otherwise he could not dispose of them in the international market. There is therefore no thought of authorizing Ciano to leave the Reich; he will remain in our custody, at least for the present.

All these circumstances show by what vile elements the Duce is surrounded and how little trust can be put in him if he lets a rabble like that influence him. If the Duce were a man whose politics were uninfluenced by family considerations, he would have Ciano executed, instead of forgiving him, and would have his daughter whipped. But there is no thought of that; on the contrary, he is putting up a pretence that they are a loving family. The Fuehrer has a much higher opinion of the Duce's son, Vittorio. He is modest, decent, industrious, and touchingly devoted to his father during the crisis.

Fascism seems still to show no political strength whatever. We must now proceed very coolly and realistically in all these matters. We must use Fascism as far as possible, but of course must not expect the impossible. In the Fuehrer's calculation, Italy used to be a factor of power. That is no longer the case. Italy was just as poor an ace in this war as it was in the last.

As soon as he has settled a little more firmly into the saddle, the Duce wants to transfer his residence to Bellazzo. It is doubtful, however, whether he can feel at all secure on Italian soil. He does not yet seem to have his personal bodyguard absolutely under control. The Fuehrer would very much like to place S.S. guards of his personal regiment at his disposal, but then the Duce would be regarded as being completely in German hands.

One good thing about Mussolini is the obviously fine state of his health. Everything would be all right if he had the same abysmal hatred for other traitors that he has for King Victor Emmanuel. About him, at all events, he has no illusions; he expects nothing more from the King and wants to overthrow and eliminate him. But I fear he will hardly succeed if he proceeds according to the plans he has made so far. His whole political conception is without real clarity because he is too much bound to his family. He is undoubtedly an exceptionally inspired thinker and a high-grade political strategist, but in the last analysis he is nothing but an Italian and can't get away from that heritage.

The Fuehrer criticized the Fascist Grand Council very severely. He is now happy that he never approved of Frick's proposals for creating a senate out of elements which were partly very undependable. Frick had suggested setting up a senate composed of the presidents of German universities, the high clergy, etc. What a senate that would have been! It would rather have overthrown the Fuehrer today than tomorrow. . . .

Someday the Fuehrer will establish a senate made up according to entirely different principles. Men will be called into it, not on the basis of their positions, but of their achievements. He wants, so to speak, to create a College of Cardinals whose only task will be to elect a fuehrer as occasion demands. That, of course, is the highest political function that can be exercised in the modern National Socialist state. Possibly a system may develop whereby several thousand families, the cream of the National Socialist leadership, will govern the Reich for centuries, just as is the case today in England with several hundred families, except that these families will be chosen and selected on an entirely different basis.

This College of Cardinals, or Senate, should naturally comprise only the very first men of the Reich, chosen on the basis of their attitude and character, not merely for their intelligence. The Fuehrer explained to me that on the basis of this principle Frick would not belong to it, whereas Gauleiter Grohé would. The Fuehrer is very happy that he did not establish the Senate prematurely. Had he done so it would have been set up solely on the basis of revolutionary selection, whereas there is now the additional testing-ground of war which is even more exacting than revolution.

In that connection I asked the Fuehrer how our marshals were doing now. He is quite satisfied with their attitude. He spoke very favourably about Guenther von Kluge, Georg von Kuechler, and even Fritz Erich von Manstein, although he regards him as rather excessively ambitious. Paul Ludwig Ewald von Kleist has made a very close approach to the Fuehrer and to the National Socialist movement. Fedor von Bock is leading more of a sickly pensioner's existence. Of Walter von Brauchitsch one hears hardly anything; I suppose he has a bad conscience. The Fuehrer spoke in great praise of Field Marshal General Ernst Busch. His opinion of Albert Kesselring's military abilities is higher than my own. Unfortunately Erwin Rommel had to undergo an operation for appendicitis during the critical days in Italy; otherwise he would undoubtedly have been able to take a hand at Salerno. Here one misfortune followed another. Even of Wilhelm Walter List the Fuehrer now has a more favourable opinion than several months ago. List, too, is ill; he was not equal to the wear and tear of a war lasting four years. Taken as a whole, our generals bear no resemblance to the Italians. Treason such as the Italian generals committed against Mussolini is impossible considering the mentality of the German and especially the Prussian generals. . . .

I put the question to the Fuehrer whether his G.H.Q. was sufficiently protected against possible attacks by parachutists. The liberation of Mussolini has shown how easily such a manœuvre can be carried out if it is quite unexpected. The Fuehrer, thank God, was able to assure me that security measures at G.H.Q. have been strengthened considerably; nevertheless there are certain eventualities against which one cannot prepare in advance.

It touches one's heart that the Duce again and again emphasized to the Fuehrer that he assumed full responsibility for developments in Italy. But in so doing he whitewashed a large number of traitors who are close to him personally. That makes no sense. The Fuehrer repeatedly pointed out to him that he had warned him in time. The Duce admitted this but had been unwilling to listen. He finally failed because of his excessive loyalty toward the King and the House of Savoy, although experience should have taught him that this King and his House simply don't know what fidelity means. Today the Duce admits that.

The Fuehrer asked me what I imagined he would do about such treachery. I believe he wouldn't have hesitated for a moment to inflict a punishment that would have permanently scared away anybody who thought about treason even in the remotest corner of his heart. Where, by the way, is the dividing line between treason and folly? It is very hard to draw it, especially since every traitor can always claim he was merely foolish if his treachery fails to succeed.

I then posed the very serious and important question to the Fuehrer as to how far he intends to extend the Reich. His idea is that we ought to advance as far as the Venetian border, and that Venetia should be included in the Reich in a sort of loose federation. Venetia would be all the more willing to accept this, since the Reich alone would be able after a successful war to supply it with tourist trade, to which Venice attaches the greatest importance. I regard such a boundary line as the only practical and right one. I only hope that the Fuehrer won't let anything, especially not his reawakening friendship for the Duce, divert him from this decision. . . .

I then talked to the Fuehrer about a lot of questions of personnel. I told him how unbearably indolently and sleepily Seldte had behaved during the last session of the Committee on Air-Raid Damage. The Fuehrer had nothing but gracious pity for Seldte, who is a sick man. But the Fuehrer rightly explained that he could boot Seldte out at any time, whereas he could not do that with Ley.

I also told the Fuehrer of the critical attitude which Popitz had assumed during this session. He is absolutely convinced that Popitz is our enemy. He is already having him watched so as to have incriminating material about him ready; the minute Popitz gives himself away, he will close in on him.

[Dr. Johannes Popitz was Prussian Minister of Finance, a survivor of the von Papen cabinet of 1932. He was executed by the Nazis in February 1945 for being implicated in the plot which culminated in the July 20, 1944, attempt on Hitler's life.]

The Fuehrer is full of praise for Seyss-Inquart. He governs the Netherlands very cleverly; he alternates wisely between gentleness and severity, thereby indicating that he has had excellent Austrian schooling.

In contrast to him on the one hand is Terboven, who only knows the hard-fisted way, and on the other is Best in Denmark, who knows only the velvet glove. Incidentally our quick action in Denmark re-established peace and order there very rapidly. . . .

The Fuehrer misses Heydrich very much when it comes to personnel questions. He would be the proper man to establish law and order in the General Government. Frank is undoubtedly not equal in any way to his heavy task.

But who is to be put in his place? Frank, incidentally, has made it up with his wife, but in a typically legalistic way. Jurists will always be jurists. The Fuehrer has just found that out in the case of Thierack. However much of an improvement Thierack may be over Guertner, he is still not an ideal Minister of Justice. In the end he keeps sticking to his legalistic eggshells. . . .

The Fuehrer has nothing in mind for Esser. I put in a good word for him but did not succeed in changing the Fuehrer's opinion of him. . . .

I could easily eliminate Dietrich as the Reich's press chief, if I had a position open for which I could recommend him. Unfortunately the Fuehrer does not think him capable of handling any important task. I therefore have to put up with him.

The Fuehrer has great regard for the personality of Keitel, but doesn't think much of his ability. But at least he is satisfied that he is an honest, straightforward character. On the other hand the abilities of Jodl are much greater. He is in fact a very good and solid worker whose excellent general staff training is revealed time and again.

I told the Fuehrer in detail about my difficulties with the press section of the O.K.W. The Fuehrer was simply flabbergasted that I should be hindered thus in the development of my work. He had always been told by the gentlemen of the O.K.W. that their press section had already been dissolved. He is now determined to wipe the slate clean. I proposed to him that he should first receive General von Wedel and size him up personally.

[General Hasso von Wedel was chief of the Wehrmacht public relations section.]

The Fuehrer was most ready to accept this suggestion. I believe Von Wedel's reception will constitute a great triumph for me. Just as soon as the Fuehrer sees who it is that is responsible for the propaganda at the O.K.W., he will undoubtedly and without reserve subordinate the Wehrmacht's propaganda to me and my Ministry. I am very curious to see how this meeting comes off. The Fuehrer is determined to put a number of very touchy and difficult questions to Wedel. There is no doubt that he will make a mess of them.

Propaganda in occupied areas is also to be subordinated to me, not only in regions with civilian commissars, but also where military governors are in charge of the administration. The Fuehrer is totally opposed to the Wehrmacht engaging in tasks that are not germane to it. There are always too few officers available for the front, and a superfluity of them in the occupied areas and in various sectors of civilian life. These are usually third or fourth raters who were merely taken out of civilian life and stuck into uniform. On the one hand they hinder civilian officers in their work, while on the other their absence from civil life creates shortages. The Fuehrer wants not only to make changes in propaganda, but also to take from the Wehrmacht all economic, legal, and social-security questions. The Wehrmacht is to limit itself to conducting the war in a military sense and to leave everything else to civilians. The Fuehrer complained very bitterly about the military administration in the occupied areas. Parasites have gained a foothold there, to an extent which cannot continue unchallenged.

I developed my ideas to the Fuehrer about the nature of propaganda. I believe that when a propaganda ministry is created, all matters affecting propaganda, news, and culture within the Reich and within the occupied areas must be subordinated to it. I emphasized that I insist upon totalitarianism in carrying out the propaganda and news policies of the Reich. He agreed with me absolutely and unreservedly.

I complained to the Fuehrer that subordinate officers again and again try to tell me their orders were issued by the Fuehrer's G.H.Q., especially when rather shady matters are involved. The Fuehrer empowered me to reject all such attempts categorically. All his wishes—in my case he will not speak of orders—are to be made known to me through the channels with which I am familiar. If anybody else should claim that he is speaking with the authority of the Fuehrer's G.H.Q. I can be sure it is not true.

I told the Fuehrer about the impertinence of Paula Lutze who is now laying claim to the house on the Wannsee which was abandoned by Alfieri. The Fuehrer authorized me to reject her demand categorically. Frau Lutze has completely lost the Fuehrer's sympathies by her insolent behaviour. . . .

I am to have dinner alone with the Fuehrer tonight. . . .

I was able during the meal to talk over a number of personnel and art questions with the Fuehrer. News had just been received from England about the information that Eden gave the House about Hess. The Fuehrer keeps asking himself in vain why the English are discussing the Hess case now, without any apparent urgent reason.

I asked the Fuehrer whether he would be ready to negotiate with Churchill or whether he declined this on principle. The Fuehrer replied that in politics principles simply do not exist when it comes to questions of personalities. He does not believe that negotiations with Churchill would lead to any result as he is too deeply wedded to his hostile views and, besides, is guided by hatred and not by reason. The Fuehrer would prefer negotiations with Stalin, but he does not believe they would be successful, since Stalin cannot cede what Hitler demands in the East.

Whatever the situation, I told the Fuehrer that we must come to an arrangement with one side or the other. The Reich has never yet won a two-front war. We must therefore see how we can somehow or other get out of a two-front war.

The Fuehrer once more conjured up before me what would have happened if, on Hess's arrival, the English had taken the initiative and had so exploited this incident as to make our allies distrustful. The war might then possibly have taken a catastrophic turn for us. The Italians would probably have deserted us and the Japanese might have failed to join us. On this occasion the English missed their greatest political chance of the war.

The question when England might be inclined toward peace is naturally difficult to answer at the moment. The yearning for peace, widespread among Germans, is also to be discerned elsewhere. All people are human, and after four years of war nobody sees any fun in it. Personally, too, we ourselves are yearning for peace. The Fuehrer stressed this. He said he would be happy to be in contact with artistic circles again, to go to the theatre in the evening and to visit the Artists' Club. He praised the theatres of Berlin about which he has been receiving reports.

He has great plans for Linz. On the other hand he wants to push Vienna back artistically, as he has already emphasized to me a number of times.

The Fuehrer does not like Goering's ideas of art, and is especially annoyed at the way Frau Goering always butts in on theatre questions, and at her rather unfortunate manner of indulging in personal politics.

[Emmy Sonnemann-Goering was an actress in Weimar before Hitler became Chancellor. During the first years of the Nazi regime, she often interceded with her husband on behalf of Jewish stage people. Later she became more aloof, had herself addressed as hohe Frau (Exalted Lady), took to dressing rather conspicuously, and had her only daughter, Edda, constantly attended by a nurse, a governess, and a bodyguard. She was arrested by the Germans during the spring of 1947.

In the evening there was a tea in honour of Field Marshal General Keitel who was celebrating his sixty-first birthday. Only generals took part in this tea party; I was the only civilian in the group.

Just then an air raid occurred which we at first believed to be on Berlin. I was naturally very much worried, especially since I could not be in Berlin personally. In the course of the attack it developed, however, that Hanover had been singled out. Although I am sorry that Hanover was the victim, I was nevertheless quite elated that the attack had not been launched against the Reich capital during my absence.

In this circle of generals the Fuehrer reverted to the theme of Russia; but he spoke much more reservedly before the generals than when talking to me privately.

It is doubtful, really, whether we are in a position to choose between Russia and England. If we actually had a choice it would naturally be much more agreeable to start talks with London than with Moscow. One can always make a better deal with a democratic state, and once peace has been concluded, such a state will not seize the sword for at least twenty years to come. Psychologically the English would not be in a position to make war, and besides the English people are too tired of it and possibly also too exhausted. It is different with the Bolsheviks. Because of their close-knit system they are naturally in a position to embark upon war at any time.

We talked about the Italian question. A new government is to be installed in Rome on Thursday. The Duce agreed with us on its composition. Apart from Graziani, there is no personality of importance in the lot. Graziani is naturally a first-class military man, but he is said to be not quite dependable politically. However, he sided immediately and unmistakably with the Duce on July 25 after Mussolini's fall.

[General Rodolfo Graziani, Marchese di Neghelli, born in 1882, was Viceroy of Ethiopia, 1936-37; honorary governor of Italian East Africa, 1938; chief of army staff, 1939-40; commander of the Italian forces in North Africa and Governor of Libya, July 1940 to January 1941; commander in chief of the Republican Fascist Army in North Italy, 1943-45.]

Pavolini is in Rome to build up the Fascist party and the Fascist militia. He isn't having much luck. In response to his first appeal for re-creating the Fascist militia, exactly fifteen men in the Italian capital reported! That is a distressingly small number and carries no weight whatever. But one can see from it to what depths Fascism has already sunk in public esteem.

The Fuehrer showed me a copy of a letter that Edda Mussolini addressed to her father, the Duce. This letter beats everything. Edda Mussolini is acting like a wildcat in her Bavarian villa. She smashes china and furniture on the slightest provocation. This time she complained to her father because she could not get through to him on the telephone on one occasion and because she was once denied a car. She uses ridiculous trivialities to threaten her father with blackmail. She states in the letter that unless he helps her immediately and takes her along to Italy, she will involve him in a gigantic scandal, so that curses and disgrace will be showered upon her father's head before the whole world. It is hard to imagine that the daughter of a great man dares to act thus toward her father.

Of course the Fuehrer and I asked ourselves whether possibly Edda Mussolini and especially Ciano know something about the Duce which might compromise him in public opinion; otherwise she would hardly be in a position to write that sort of blackmail letter. Should that actually be the case, most of the riddle about Fascism would be solved. One could then explain why the Duce always yielded to Ciano, even this time—a thing that would otherwise be completely incomprehensible. The letter certainly bears testimony not only against Edda Mussolini but against the Duce himself. What sort of upbringing must the Duce have given his daughter if she dares to write him such a letter in the circumstances!

I urgently warned the Fuehrer against permitting Ciano to escape to Spain. Edda Mussolini had urged this upon him. She said she wanted a separation from her husband, while Ciano wished to write his memoirs there. One can imagine what these memoirs will be like. Ciano has no special talent as a writer; he cannot, therefore, achieve literary success by style or quality. He can do it solely by sensationalism, stemming from his hostility to Germany. I am firmly convinced that this dirty scoundrel [Miststuoock] would start writing against us before he had been gone a month, and that he would intrigue against us in the most contemptible manner. Ciano is the satan of the Fascist movement and the curse of Italy. We must safeguard ourselves against him, now that he is in our hands. The Fuehrer doesn't know exactly how that is to be done, but, to begin with, he wants to put strong pressure on the Duce to create order at least in his own family. Only then will he be able to establish it within the Fascist party, and, after that, in Italy.

Johst, who is a neighbour of the Cianos in Upper Bavaria, has written a series of letters to the Fuehrer about their behaviour. These letters are literary tit-bits. Johst described conditions at the Villa Ciano as simply grotesque. But he sees the essential point: Ciano and his wife are absolutely worthless creatures who under normal conditions would be put in prison. Since they are so closely related to the Duce, however, they are accorded special consideration. The Fuehrer would like the Duce to hand Ciano over to him. He would stand him up against a wall immediately and send his wife, Edda, to a house of correction, where she would probably soon come to her senses.

[Hans Johst was a Nazi novelist and dramatist whom Goebbels advanced rapidly, appointing him president of the Author's Academy and Reich Leader of German Writers.]

All this gives us the more reason to look to our military security in the south. Italian soldiers are to be brought into the Reich as prisoners and will here be integrated into production. This Italian debacle has proved good business for us, since we can seize their weapons and take over their manpower.

As regards the possibilities of treachery by other satellite states, Horthy would like to desert us, but the Fuehrer has already taken the necessary precautions. Kallay, his Premier, is certainly a swine. But he doesn't show his hand; he is too careful to expose himself. Consequently we must put up with him for the present. Antonescu is a dependable ally in so far as one can say that of any person from the Balkans. But he is in the hands of the corrupt and pro-British Mihai Antonescu, who would rather desert us today than tomorrow.

Our security service succeeded in arresting the Princesses Mia and Mafalda of Savoy. They are acting exceptionally insolently and insultingly, but they are being taken into the school of hard knocks. . . .

After the generals had taken their leave, long after midnight, the Fuehrer asked me to come to him once more quite alone. For hours we walked up and down in his map room and discussed the Italian question from its most intimate angles. The Fuehrer told me that, while he had no proofs, he thought it quite possible that it may at one time have been the Duce's personal intention to desert us. Badoglio referred to this in his last appeal to the Italian people, declaring that the Duce, too, had entertained the idea of ending the coalition with us. The Fuehrer fears that this is the blackmail material which Ciano and his wife have in their hands. Only that could explain the daughter's letter to her father. I don't believe that is the reason. Neither Ciano nor Edda Mussolini is clever enough to realize what consequences such revelations would have. I believe we attribute more intelligence to our opposite numbers than they possess. Edda

Mussolini knows some secret about her father which is either of a criminal nature or compromises him socially and politically. It is either a question of love affairs or of money. I have heard on a previous occasion that Ciano helped the Duce to transfer large sums from Italy to Switzerland. Such a revelation would naturally be an almost mortal blow to the Duce. But I don't regard that as likely. The whole affair is certainly very strange and it is desirable that we should hold on to the personalities involved so that no disaster may result. With Fascism we got ourselves into rather mixed company. But the reason lies exclusively with the Duce and his weakness. . . .

In any case we must begin slowly to write off the Duce politically. However much we may like him personally, and however valuable the services were which he rendered to us, there must be a limit somewhere, especially when the interests of the Reich are involved. The Fuehrer is very loath to do this, for after all it was thanks to the Duce that he was able to bring about the rearmament of the Reich, to annex Austria, and to integrate the Protectorate into the Reich. All this was essential for re-establishing a strong German Reich authority both at home and abroad. The Fuehrer certainly won't forget this so far as the Duce is concerned. But now that things have come to their present pass, we are compelled to consider the Reich's interests without inhibitions and without consideration for anyone else. The Duce was spoiled by Ciano. He is no longer his old self, and one can no longer count upon him firmly as a political factor, especially since he no longer has any power.

If Edda Mussolini was employing more than a mere literary turn of speech by her blackmailing threat, and if there actually is some unfathomed secret behind it, that would probably also be the secret of Fascism itself. I suppose that one day we shall somehow get on the trail of that secret. For the moment it is only right that we should assume it exists and for us to make sure that we obtain guarantees which will prevent the political interests of the Reich being harmed.

It was 4 A.M. when I bade farewell to the Fuehrer. He invited me to visit him at least one day each week. Even if I had nothing special to report it would be a great relaxation and comfort to him if he could talk to me for a couple of hours. I was glad to promise that.

I drove back to Rastenburg with Naumann. While I talked to the Fuehrer Naumann had conducted a whole series of discussions at G.H.Q., especially with the generals. The reputation that I and my Ministry now enjoy everywhere at G.H.Q. is tremendous.

September 24, 1943

The raid on Hanover last night was fairly extensive. While there was no heavy damage to industrial plants, residential districts were hard hit.

Our rocket bombs are the subject of most sensational reporting and rumour mongering throughout the world. Churchill's remarks during his last House of Commons speech gave an impetus to this. Exact details aren't known, nevertheless several English newspapers published reports indicating that the British on the whole are aware of the nature of these rocket bombs.

Badoglio has again addressed the Italian people. Obviously the resurgence of the Fascist party is giving him some trouble. His latest declaration contains eight points for Italian conduct. These points are nothing but a heterogeneous collection of lies and malicious slander. He declared that we exploited Italy during the war, that we seized Italians and dragged them to the theatres of war in Greece and North Africa, that the King was the exponent of the Italian people's will, that it was the duty of the Italian people to drive us from Italian soil, that Fascism was dead and could never be resurrected, and that Italy would emerge from this war stronger and freer than ever. It is hardly possible to comment on this aggregation of empty phrases and cowardly excuses. Nobody in the world takes Badoglio seriously.

The situation in the East has become more critical. We must try under all circumstances to hold the Dnieper line; if we lose it I do not know where we might gain a new foothold.

On Stalin's orders the Free German Officers' Committee in Moscow has gone in for propaganda on a large scale. General Seydlitz has even made a broadcast. Certainly no general of old Prussian stock can sink lower.

[General Walter von Seydlitz was one of the officers who capitulated with Field Marshal Paulus at Stalingrad. He was descended from General Friedrich Wilhelm von Seydlitz, whose victory at Rossbach in 1757 was regarded as one of the greatest in the history of cavalry warfare. General von Seydlitz was a leader of the Free Germany Committee in Moscow.]

Rumours about alleged peace negotiations between Berlin and Moscow keep growing daily throughout the world. There naturally isn't a word of truth in them, but they show that Stalin is trying to intensify his war of nerves. Again and again it is claimed that Tokyo is negotiating between the Reich and the Soviets. This, too, in no way corresponds to the facts.

Late at night there was another heavy air raid on Mannheim and Darmstadt. Details are not available since telephone communications were interrupted.

Unfortunately our concentrated submarine attack on a convoy in the northern Atlantic did not really get under way. Nevertheless our submarines succeeded in sinking twelve destroyers and 15,000 tons of shipping. It would be wonderful if submarine warfare took a new lease on life. We must achieve success somewhere. A kingdom for a victory!

September 25, 1943

The English and Americans are boasting of having set Naples on fire. One ought really to be quite sad about the barbaric acts against culture that this war entails. Undoubtedly later generations will curse us for having brought such ruin upon the peoples of Europe.

The situation in the East is engaging public attention far beyond any other topic. Moscow claims our retreat was not orderly but developed into a wild rout. That is not in accordance with the facts, but it is true that we have had to abandon tremendous quantities of supplies which we could neither take with us nor destroy; and of course it is impossible to dynamite all military installations. Their advance is giving the Bolsheviks tremendous material advantages which will cause us grave difficulties.

I have been shown a collection of letters written by captured or fallen Red Army men to their home folk. These letters indicate real fighting spirit. There is no hint whatever of dejection. The Soviets are living on their victories. The Red Army soldiers believe they can advance up to the German border by autumn. Of course our Wehrmacht will be a barrier to that ambition!

In the afternoon I spoke in the Kroll Opera House to all the Reich orators, the heads of the Reich propaganda offices, and the local Nazi sub-leaders of Berlin. I called them together to give them a survey of the situation and to supply them with material for a gigantic propaganda campaign for the Party. I talked for almost two hours, was in good form and gave them a series of valuable suggestions. Their morale was excellent. Here are first-class people trained in politics. They will never fail in a crisis.

[“Reich orator” was an official title conferred by the Nazi party on especially effective spellbinders.]

My article about the Italian question has had a fine reception. People now understand why I had to keep quiet for a while, and heartily welcome the resumption of my literary activity. Quite a number of letters state that my weekly article is regarded as the political directive for the week.

A number of Catholic and Protestant ministers have been sentenced to death. They had offended the German armed forces in a most cowardly manner. I proposed to the Fuehrer that the verdicts, together with the opinion of the court, be published. The Fuehrer will decide about this soon.

My new book, The Steep Ascent, is being put together by Schirmeister. A number of articles and speeches of last year cannot be used because they contain wrong forecasts. I don't want to edit them but prefer simply to omit them. There is enough unchallengeable material available to fill more than a book.

I am feeling rather ill. I caught a bad cold on my trip to G.H.Q. I shall therefore have to take care of myself over the week-end so as to be in top form again next week.

September 26, 1943

Churchill has had to reconstruct his Cabinet. Among others he has taken in Beaverbrook as Lord Privy Seal. The deeper significance of this appointment is not yet apparent. Beaverbrook is known to be a friend of the Americans and foe of the Bolsheviks.

Terrible news reaches us from India about the awful famine raging there. The English authorities are proving themselves totally unable, not to say unwilling, to do anything about it. They have put the leading Indian politicians behind the bars; the Indian people are quite unable to defend themselves against the English; the English therefore have a thoroughly easy and comfortable time of it putting the four freedoms of Roosevelt and the Atlantic Charter into practice there.

In the East the fight for the Dnieper has begun. Quite understandably, Moscow is in a state of jubilation as never before during this war. We evacuated Smolensk during the night. I question very much whether we can hold Kiev. Naturally we are losing enormous quantities of supplies during this overhasty retreat.

There's nothing special to note about air raids. I intend to award a badge to all who have been totally bombed out. This will label them as such when they reach their new abodes. Practice has shown that many doubtful elements are using the raids to secure unauthorized advantages for themselves. This makes the people in the gaus designated to receive bombed-out persons less generous.

September 27, 1943

Graziani is proving a valuable asset to the Duce's Government. He appealed to the Italian people in a very plucky broadcast in which he arrayed the best possible soldierly arguments. He denounced the King, the Crown Prince, and Badoglio in bitter terms. Graziani does not mince words. He told the House of Savoy what it must hear whether it wants to or not.

Our public-relations policy dealing with the section of Italy occupied by the English and Americans is not very clever. We are doing too little, in fact, almost nothing about it. When I think what news the English are reporting from the areas occupied by us and compare it with how little we do, I am all the more anxious to achieve effective results.

September 28, 1943

The Americans are trying to impress the Bolsheviks with a gigantic programme of armament production for 1944. They are talking of 102,000 aeroplanes to be produced during that year.

Sumner Welles has definitely resigned. His place will be taken by Stettinius, who has thus far administered Lease-Lend. Stettinius is one of the most die-hard imperialistic capitalists in the Roosevelt entourage.

The Duce has transferred his seat of government to Italy and is trying feverishly to obtain recognition by any government he can. Naturally the German Reich Government has already extended recognition. The Japanese followed in Germany's wake.

Alarming rumours have come from Madrid, too, about separate peace negotiations by Moscow and Berlin of which naturally not a word is true but which throw a significant light on the general situation.

The French politician, Chateaubriant, sent me a long letter about the present situation in France. He complains of the fact that the Reich has not sent any man of stature to Paris and that the position of the collaborationists has become very difficult. Laval, he said, was forever hesitating; he could be made to act only if a German diplomat of rank stood behind him and kept driving him. Chateaubriant is proceeding from the wrong assumption that the Fuehrer intends to do something special on behalf of France. That is not the case.

[Alphonse de Chateaubriant, French novelist and essayist, won the Goncourt Prize in 1911. He edited La Gerbe, a pro-Nazi review.]

The state funeral for Gauleiter Kube took place at noon. Rosenberg delivered the memorial address. It was characterized by unusual tactlessness. Rosenberg is not the man to touch the hearts of his listeners.

I had a long talk with Gauleiter Florian about conditions in Rheydt. He had talked to a big gathering there the day before and reported to my satisfaction that the morale of the Rheydt population is beyond all criticism. The city wishes me to visit it as soon as possible. I shall try to do so some time next week.

September 29, 1943

The daylight raid on Emden was played up sensationally in London. Actually the Americans did achieve a success in that they flew in with fighter escort and therefore had no heavy losses.

The reports on interrogations of United States flying officers have been submitted to me. These reports don't speak very favourably for the United States air force; the Americans want to get home as soon as possible. European differences seem very remote to them and they therefore have no real enthusiasm for the war. They also complain of the exceptionally high losses sustained in day raids on the Reich. They describe every flight into Germany as a sort of suicide mission.

The Americans and English are making a lot of fuss about the capture of the south Italian airport of Foggia. They hope to use it as a jumping-off place for targets in southern Germany.

The Americans and English have become much more modest about the situation in southern Italy than they were at first. They speak of exceptionally heavy losses and of very tough and harassing fights with our troops there. The Germans, they say, defend themselves in hand-to-hand combat and when captured behave very arrogantly, like typical National Socialists. We can only be proud of our soldiers.

The neutral countries are naturally afraid of taking any stand regarding the Fascist Republican Government. Even Franco declines for the present to follow our procedure in this matter. That's the Spaniards' way of thanking the Duce for the great aid he gave them in their civil war for liberty!

Unfortunately we have had to give up Katyn. The Bolsheviks undoubtedly will soon "find" that we shot the 12,000 Polish officers. That episode is one that is going to cause us quite a little trouble in the future. The Soviets are undoubtedly going to make it their business to discover as many mass graves as possible and then blame them on us.

We have received news via Tokyo that public life in Moscow has become distinctly more normal. Soviet successes of this summer are naturally having a notable effect on their home front.

Churchill evidently took Beaverbrook into his Cabinet in order to dispatch him to Moscow on a special mission. Beaverbrook has always favoured an Anglo-Soviet understanding. I regard the fact that he has now been taken into the Cabinet as proof that Churchill is determined under all circumstances to bring about an accord between London and Moscow, at least for the present.

Foreign countries are laughing at our observations concerning the Three-Power Pact. It must be admitted they are somewhat hysterical. Since the Italian treachery they lack the punch they used to have.

Ritter, Sauckel's representative, has been shot to death in the street in Paris. We shall have to take extremely severe measures to make the French De Gaullist population understand there is a limit to German patience even in our present military situation.

[The man referred to is Julius Ritter, Sauckel's deputy for forced French labour.]

I had a long talk with Speer. He now intends to carry out the idea of total war by a number of seemingly unsensational measures. By putting the brakes generally on civilian production he expects to make 800,000 workers available for the munitions industry and 300,000 men for the Wehrmacht during the next few months. In addition Sauckel will pull 500,000 men out of civilian production, so that we shall actually see the entire German civilian production come to a standstill in a few months. The total war which I have demanded for years will then become a reality. . . .

[German production for civilian needs stopped completely a year and a half before V.E.-day.]

The Fuehrer wants me to speak at the Harvest Festival in place of Goering. He would rather have Goering attend the coming military talks. Obviously, however, he also fears that, as in previous speeches, Goering may make some oratorical blunders. I shall use this opportunity to deliver a big speech on the general situation which will be broadcast over all networks. Since I don't believe the speech will be effective if given in the Mosaic Hall of the Reich Chancellery, where the meeting was due to be held, I am having it transferred to the Sports Palace. The address will keep me extremely busy during the next few days, but I believe the people want me to speak now, and that I shall succeed in giving a big boost to the morale and spirit of the German working people.

Worry after worry, both in my official and personal life. But that's war for you! Nevertheless we must never forget that, once these anxieties are a thing of the past, they will later constitute our most beautiful memories.

September 30, 1943

Churchill made an appearance in the Albert Hall and delivered a completely meaningless speech to the women against war fatigue. Apparently in England, too, there is no longer that enthusiasm for war that we are always reading about in the English press.

The Soviets believe they will shortly be in possession of Kiev and thereby in a position to recapture the whole Ukraine. London confirms this hope. Neutral public opinion clings to the belief that negotiations between Berlin and Moscow are already under way. Evidently the wish is father to the thought.

Again many complaints by fine soldiers have been received here against conditions on our lines of communication, especially in the West. A situation there has developed which baffles all description. I am going to send the data to Field Marshal General Keitel. At the last meeting of the Committee of Three he doubted their authenticity.

During the night several hundred aeroplanes again flew over the Reich. This time the Ruhr was on the programme. Bochum especially was heavily attacked. Damage there was pretty substantial. Unfortunately the weather was such that our defence could not do much.

[The month of October, 1943, which is missing from the diaries, was principally notable for Badoglio's declaration of war on Germany (October 13) and for the visit of Mr. Cordell Hull, American Secretary of State, and Mr. Eden to Moscow (October 18), to confer with Molotov and to see Stalin. The outcome of these talks was not disclosed until later.

The Russians continued to regain lost ground, announcing on October 7 that they had crossed the Dnieper, on October 9 that all Germans had been cleared from the Caucasus, and on October 14 and 25 respectively, that they had recaptured Zaporozhe and Dnepropetrovsk.

On the Italian mainland the Allies occupied Naples on October 1 and crossed the Volturno—Calore line on October 16. The Germans evacuated Corsica on October 5.

Portugal came to the aid of the Allies by permitting the British to use the Azores as anti-submarine bases as from October 12.

It was a month of constant heavy air raids on German industrial centres—Hagen, Frankfurt-on-Main, Bremen, Muenster, Schweinfurt and Hanover.

Field Marshal Rommel was put in charge of German forces in Yugoslavia on October 14.]

November 1943]

MOSCOW CONFERENCE REITERATES THE ALLIES' DEMAND FOR UNCONDITIONAL SURRENDER, AND CREATES EUROPEAN ADVISORY COMMISSION. RUSSIAN ARMIES CAPTURE PEREKOP, CUTTING OFF THE GERMAN RETREAT IN CRIMEA. HEAVY RAIDS ON MANY GERMAN CITIES. RUSSIAN ARMIES RECAPTURE KIEV, ZHITOMIR, GOMEL. HITLER DECLARES HE WILL NEVER CAPITULATE. CHURCHILL FORECASTS THAT 1944 WILL ENTAIL TREMENDOUS SACRIFICE. TOULON AND SOFIA RAIDED. ROOSEVELT, CHURCHILL, AND CHIANG KAI-SHEK CONFER FOR FIVE DAYS AT CAIRO.

November 1, 1943

The Moscow conference is about to end. As was to be expected, the English and Americans were unable to get anywhere with their demand for fixing western Soviet boundaries; on the contrary, Moscow is now energetically demanding a second front.

The neutral countries realize perfectly what went on in Moscow. Almost everywhere there is doubt and concern. Despite our military misfortunes, our political position has seldom been so strong as at present.

London already concedes to the Soviets that the small states of Europe no longer have any right to existence. It makes one's hair stand on end to think how the British plutocracy plays on the gullibility of the people. This war was started because of a midget state, but now, when it has reached its decisive culminating point, such states apparently have no right to survive. All fundamental conceptions of how nations are to live together have been turned upside down in this wild spiritual and political confusion. Therein lies our great chance.

November 2, 1943

The closer the hour approaches for the publication of the Moscow communiqué, the greater is the scepticism of neutral countries regarding the results to be expected. It now seems certain that boundary questions were not discussed at the conference. That is no doubt because of the tremendous pressure Stalin exerted on the negotiations.

The Moscow Conference is regarded more as a theatrical propaganda display than as a meeting of minds resulting in practical achievements. The fact that a committee is to be established in London to deal with controversial questions is devilishly reminiscent of the League of Nations, which also used to appoint committees, sub-committees or sub-sub-committees whenever agreement could not be reached on a debatable question.

News has reached us via Ankara that Maisky and Litvinov can be regarded as dethroned. They were overthrown by Vyshinsky, who, after Molotov, is now closest to Stalin in matters of foreign policy. Stalin's expulsion of these Jews can be explained only on the ground that they were too friendly with capitalistic circles in the plutocratic countries. They were too obliging to Churchill and Roosevelt, and that, of course, did not suit Stalin at all.

In the evening we received the preliminary draft of the final communiqué. Stalin has agreed to unconditional surrender as demanded by Churchill and Roosevelt. The Reich and Italy must deliver up their so-called war criminals. Austria is to be independent again. Fascism is to be eliminated in Italy. In addition, an international organization for the safeguarding of peace must be called into being. In other words, this conference ended with a communiqué that is a jumble of Bolshevik and League of Nations phraseology.

Casualty figures for the East covering the ten days from October 11 to 20 inclusive are now available. The number of killed in action during this period is 9,279, of wounded 39,540, and of missing, 5,225. We just cannot stand such a drain for long. When we consider that our eastern campaign has cost us 3,000,000 casualties—killed, missing, or wounded—nobody can deny that we have paid exceedingly heavily for this campaign. Naturally the Soviets, too, have sustained tremendous losses, but they are in a much better position to stand them than we are. At some point or other we simply must try to get out of this desperate blood-letting. Otherwise we are in danger of slowly bleeding to death in the East.

Reports based on interrogations of prisoners of war about morale in the United States indicate that the American people are not so tired of war as the English. Nor have they any great difficulties about food. On the whole the United States is still living very much as in peacetime. Hatred of Japan is very great. Anti-Semitism is only beginning to sprout here and there. In short, morale in the United States may be described as being virtually untouched by the war. Only the strikes give some hope of an early change.

The English and Americans are again talking about a generals' plot in the Reich which is to overthrow the Hitler regime. It is very suspicious that, whenever the enemy speaks of a domestic crisis in the Reich, he always thinks of the generals. That is hardly an accident.

I have had a long talk with Seyss-Inquart. I have chosen him as president of the German Academy, and the Fuehrer has given his approval to his candidature. I informed him in detail about the work awaiting him at the Academy. He will no doubt plunge into it with great energy. Seyss-Inquart told me what he thought about the general political situation. His ideas coincide exactly with mine. Seyss-Inquart is a clever politician who undoubtedly could accomplish greater tasks than administering the Netherlands.

A report from Kassel describes conditions in that city as pretty desolate. Weinrich has in no way proved equal to the demands made on him by the recent air raid. The number of people killed is at present estimated at 5,000; it may even increase to 6,000.

[Karl Weinrich was the notoriously inept Gauleiter of Hessen.]

The problem of reopening the Berlin schools keeps cropping up. So far I have said no. Once we reopen the schools, the stream of inhabitants returning from their evacuation quarters will become unmanageable. In a matter like this one must not yield to the wishes of the people, since the people naturally cannot foretell how the war in the air will develop. Now, as Christmas approaches, people begin to get homesick; so they will just get on a train and hurry back, especially if the schools have been reopened. But if air raids should be resumed on a large scale in February or March, these same people will be anxious to leave again for the evacuation gaus. Thus the railways would have to cope with these gigantic loads two or three times, a task for which they are, quite understandably, not equipped. We shall therefore have to try to erect a dam against this homeward flow. If it can't be done by friendly talk, pressure will have to be exerted. It isn't true that compulsion achieves no results. Of course it attains results if the public has been clearly told that it is coming, and if it is then actually put into operation.

Late in the evening I obtained the Fuehrer's approval for our commentary on the Moscow communiqué. We shall chiefly stress the point that the English got nowhere with their wish to specify the Soviet Union's territorial aims. Stalin was victor all along the line. He is no doubt the man of the hour at present.

November 3, 1943

The final communiqué about the Moscow Conference has now been issued. London is indulging in such conspicuous rejoicings that the neutral observer must grow suspicious. The United States, too, let itself be infected by this wave of enthusiasm. I think all this is a show put on to mislead and to bluff us. Above all, however, it constitutes an attempt to reassure public opinion in the neutral countries.

I am firmly convinced that the Moscow negotiations have gone very much in our favour, improbable as this may seem at the moment. Discord between the Soviets and the Anglo-Americans has not been eliminated; on the contrary, it has been aggravated.

As regards the situation in the East, the advance of the Bolsheviks to Perekop and Armjansk of course is anything but pleasing to us. Judging by the map, the Crimea must be regarded as cut off. But things are not quite so bad as that. We can always retreat by sea. Operations there are at present largely a question of nerves. We can be very happy that the Fuehrer has the fortitude and equanimity to stand so heavy a strain.

Air raids⁵ have started again.¹ The Americans made a day raid on Wiener Neustadt. They flew in from southern Italian airports some 200 strong, and bombed the aeroplane factories. They did considerable damage there. Some of the factories were destroyed completely. For at least a month there will be a seventy to ninety per cent deficit in production.

We are now naturally waiting with strained nerves for the arrival of our relief forces in the East. Much will depend upon it. If we succeed, as the Fuehrer intends, in recapturing the whole Dnieper, we shall face an entirely new situation in the East. Such a situation would offer us a whole series of incalculable military and political chances. But we must not be happy prematurely. Fortune is very fickle in wartime.

November 4, 1943

Scepticism about the results of the Moscow Conference is still growing in neutral countries, which are very much worried but fail to grasp the advantage of aligning themselves more firmly with Germany. The German Wehrmacht, after all, offers the only protection against a Bolshevik inundation of Europe.

How much the Soviets dominated the Moscow Conference can be seen from the fact that Beneš now wants to visit Moscow. England's little satellite governments are now trying to orient themselves more and more in the direction of the great power.

The Soviets have sent a delegation to Bari to participate in the administration of Italian areas occupied by the enemy. They are beginning to cash in.

The war of nerves is continuing against us with undiminished severity. The most impossible reports about conditions in the Reich are being distributed in enemy countries; for example, that martial law has been declared in Berlin and about forty other major cities. Obviously the disappointed peoples of England and the United States are being fooled in this way. But lies like that usually have short legs.

Ciano has actually been arrested on orders of the Duce and put into a military prison. The Duce has sent his daughter Edda into a sanatorium. That's the best thing he could possibly do.

The London press urges King Victor Emmanuel to abdicate. This cowardly traitor is now getting the expected kick for his treachery. He didn't deserve anything better.

During the day Wilhelmshaven was attacked heavily by American planes. As the weather was very unfavourable for our anti-aircraft, our fighter planes were not able to do much. We shot down only a very small number of planes, about seven to ten. With only small losses like that, the Americans can cheerfully continue this form of warfare.

In the early evening there were very heavy air raids on Cologne and Duesseldorf. Cologne was hard hit, and Grohé told me that the Cathedral has been badly damaged. The air raid on Duesseldorf was even worse. All communication with Duesseldorf was interrupted until late into the night. I then finally had a telephone talk with Florian, who told me the English raid had struck parts of the city which had hitherto been spared destruction.

I was given a report about the corruption of German blood by foreign labour. Several thousand illegitimate children of foreign workers and German women or of foreign women and German men are recorded. The numbers, however, are not high enough to cause excessive worry. In view of what is happening at the front and in the air, this problem can be considered later.

November 6, 1943

During the night, there was a minor air raid on Leverkusen. The damage, however, was considerable, chiefly because, to protect the plant, a fog screen had been laid over the city. This greatly hampered the work of putting out fires.

Mihai Antonescu delivered a rather curious speech at Bucharest University. He pleaded, among other things, for a modern edition, as it were, of the Peace of Westphalia. I don't believe, however, that this is a case of premeditated villainy on his part, although he'd be equal to it. Apparently he just doesn't know what the Peace of Westphalia really meant.

[The Peace of Westphalia was signed at Muenster in 1648. It ended the Thirty Years' War. Germany was divided into a multitude of small states, and the treaty was therefore anathema to the Nazis.]

The English are now demanding that not only the Italian King but also Prince Umberto should abdicate. Another kick for the traitors!

I arrived at Kassel early in the morning and was awaited at the railroad station by Weinrich. It was too cold for him to ride in an open car with me, and so Prince Waldeck accompanied me during my trip through the damaged areas of Kassel.

[Prince Josias of Waldeck and Pymont was an S.S. Obergruppenfuehrer (General) in charge of the Fulda-Werra sector of the Kassel area.]

The impression is devastating. The entire centre of the city and most of the outlying sections have been destroyed. It is a gruesome picture. Destruction here can be compared only with that in Hamburg. A catastrophic fire of vast extent ran its course unhindered.

I believe much might have been prevented or at least mitigated, if suitable precautions had been taken by the gau leadership. During a conference with the responsible authorities, in the course of which reports were made on each question involved, I learned how little had been done. Weinrich played a very sorry role. He hadn't the faintest idea of the actual facts, didn't even know who was to talk at the conference, and had to keep questioning other people so as to be able to reply to me. I shall certainly report to the Fuehrer the pitiful part he played as Gauleiter and urge that he be quickly replaced.

Then I talked to the political leaders of the gau in the undestroyed city hall and surveyed the political and military situation. I created a profound impression with my speech. My impression of the population is excellent. It will endure this great trial. Of course better political leadership must be given.

On the way to Hanover Prince Waldeck gave me some details to illustrate how Weinrich has fizzled out. These were simply terrible. The situation cries for remedy.

Lauterbacher called for me at Kassel for the visit to his gau. Wonderful autumn weather for the first time in a long while made driving a pleasure. We stopped on the way at the state farm where the Lauterbacher family is living. Frau Lauterbacher was most hospitable.

[Hartmann Lauterbacher, then only thirty-four years old, was Gauleiter for southern Hanover and Brunswick. He had had a meteoric career in the Hitler Youth.]

Then we arrived at Hanover. On my way I became conscious of what tremendous reserves still exist in the German countryside. The province was quite undestroyed. One must bear these reserves in mind if one wishes to make an objective estimate of the present situation.

I then spoke in the city hall while thousands of people stood outside in the square. The impression created by my speech was even greater here than at Kassel. The population of Lower Saxony is determined not to bow before British air terror. The points I made in my speech, were greeted with storms of approving applause. I had the impression I was living, not in the fifth year of the war, but in the first year of our seizure of power. It is quite obvious that political leadership in Hanover is well in control of the situation. I heard nothing but praise for Lauterbacher.

Dr. Lapper gave me a report on the situation on the Adriatic coast. It is anything but encouraging. The Fascists are completely done for in all the cities along the Adriatic. . . . Mussolini is building on sand. The Italian people are totally unsuited for a strong nationalistic leadership, and the Fascist party is no longer qualified to go before the people with any claim to such leadership.

November 7, 1943

The enemy has threatened to continue the air offensive in intensified form, and I believe will carry out this threat if it is at all possible. During yesterday's daylight raid alone, we lost thirty fighters. That is an enormous loss, and simply cannot be borne in the long run. The Americans are now accompanied by fighter planes when they attack in the daytime. These carry first-class equipment and our own are not equal to them. It is very humiliating to see how the enemy is leading us by the nose in air warfare. Every month he introduces some new method which it takes weeks and sometimes months for us to catch up with. Once handicapped by the enemy in any phase of warfare, it is exceedingly difficult to catch up with him. We have to pay very dearly for what we failed to do in air warfare hitherto. But that was to be expected.

My articles in the Reich about the domestic situation in England drew angry rejoinders from the British press. That's a proof that I hit the bulls-eye. For if my arguments had not been based on truth, the English wouldn't take the trouble to reply.

In the East a new crisis is under way near Kiev. We have had to evacuate the city. The capture of Kiev has naturally caused a great sensation among the Bolsheviks and in the entire enemy camp. The English are boasting that the Soviets are now only 200 kilometres from the former Polish boundary.

Colonel General Model sent me a report about the present situation on the central front and about the morale of our troops. Model points out that, while the troops are still bearing up relatively well, the enemy is infinitely superior to our soldiers both in man power and in quantity of equipment. That, of course, has a depressing effect on the troops, especially when they realize how overstuffed we are in the rear areas.

[General Walther von Model—later promoted field marshal—was at this time in command of the Second Tank Army. In February 1944, he was placed in charge of the northern Russian front. Later, in September of that year, he became commander-in-chief of the Western Front, and then replaced Field Marshal von Runstedt as Supreme Commander in the West.]

Speer's speech to the troops was a complete fiasco. One reason why the Bolsheviks crossed the Dnieper was because our soldiers simply had no more ammunition. They therefore ask in consternation what has happened to the increased production which Speer promised. Model also complained bitterly that the soldiers are no longer receiving any political material. Model has the best of intentions but lacks the necessary means to carry them out. The propaganda department of the Wehrmacht has failed here completely. Oh, if only the Fuehrer would decide to subordinate it to me! I believe I could master this relatively difficult problem in a short time. But officers are not suited to conduct propaganda, especially if they judge the situation from Berlin.

The troops are naturally indignant that no Eastern Wall has been built along the Dnieper. That is the question officers as well as men keep repeating. No convincing answer can be given.

Air raids at home also cause deep concern to the troops. Hatred against England exceeds all bounds. For the present, however, it is an impotent hatred. The troops would naturally like to know something about our plans for retaliation. But we can't oblige them on that score.

Model spoke in very appreciative terms about my articles in the Reich and claimed that at present they constitute the only political material available to officers and men. He pleaded that many more copies of the Reich should be sent to the front. With those at least something could be done. I am very happy that my own writings are having such a great influence at the front.

The problem of letters from our prisoners in the Soviet Union is causing us many a headache. These letters now no longer number a few hundreds, but arrive by thousands and tens of thousands. It cannot be denied that they make a deep impression upon the people and that it is impossible in the long run to be silent about them officially or to hold them back. I shall present this matter once more to the Fuehrer and propose that the letters be delivered to the relatives by officials of the Party. These Party wheel-horses can always counteract their propoganda effect and warn the relatives not to accept every statement as God's truth.

We are very much worried about the question of reopening schools in Berlin and other evacuated cities. The subject has already been debated for days by the authorities concerned. Beginning on December 1, travelling is to be drastically restricted. In addition certain regulations about food distribution are to be made compulsory. We all agree that these things must not be allowed to drift any longer, but that a regulating hand must take hold if we are not to face chaos in communications during the Christmas season.

Our German press is, generally speaking, not at its best. Our editors have somewhat lost courage or have gone stale writing about problems of the war so much in recent years. Perhaps some editors ought to be recalled from the front and others from home sent out in their place. In other words, a change of personnel should be brought about to inject fresh blood into German journalism.

If possible, the Fuehrer intends to go to Munich on November 8 to speak on the general situation. Although I don't believe he'll be able to do this, it would be wonderful if he could. In our present situation the people must be cheered up. They have been made rather lethargic by continuous alarming news and misfortune. If the Fuehrer could persuade himself to survey the situation in a big speech, this would amost be equal to winning a battle.

In the evening I started on a three-day trip to Munich. A meeting of the Reichsleiters and Gauleiters is to take place and they are to be given a survey of the military situation. Personally I think it quite out of place for the entire political leadership of the Reich to sit at Munich for three days. When one has in mind the general situation, especially the position at the front, one can find any amount of more important things to do than sitting at Munich for three days. But for the present there is nothing to be done against this method of Party leadership. Possibly even harder blows must come before we are taught the toughness necessary in conducting the war. I have the impression that we sometimes take the war altogether too lightly. It has become a bitter life-and-death struggle. The sooner the German people, and especially our leadership, realize this, the better it will be for all of us. It would be tragic if at a certain point in this war we should have to say, "too little and too late."

November 8, 1943

Eden's negotiations with Menemenjoglu are in the forefront of public interest in Cairo. The English are making quite a theatrical show of this conference in their papers and act as though Turkey were to enter the war tomorrow. I regard this as quite outside the realm of possibility. There isn't the slightest reason for Turkey to abandon her neutral position. The English will make every effort to persuade them, but the Turkish statesmen are much too realistic to enter upon so daring an adventure; especially at this moment. I am therefore firmly convinced that Ankara is not thinking of yielding to English wishes.

[Numan Menemenjoglu was Foreign Minister of Turkey, 1942-44. In 1944 he was appointed Ambassador to France.]

We have again achieved great military defensive successes in Italy. The English and Americans are simply not advancing, and must pay for every kilometre of ground with rivers of blood. But that's good. It will put a damper on them and they will be better able to imagine what awaits them if they attempt an invasion in the West at a moment favourable to us.

In Moscow there was a celebration of the anniversary of the Bolshevik Revolution. It just makes you want to be sick when you see how hypocritically the plutocrats in England and the United States are pretending to be interested in it. Stalin delivered a speech at the Bolshevik Congress characterized by a lack of the usual Bolshevik bombast. He talked of a turning point in the war that had taken place this summer. The English press has seized upon this expression and claims jubilantly that the danger is now definitely over. Of course they won't be quite so happy in England about Stalin's pointed demand for a real second front. Stalin spoke of 4,000,000 casualties suffered by us this year. We would be happy if we had so many soldiers to put into the Eastern Front! On the whole Stalin is full of hope for victory. He threatened the severest punishment to so-called German war criminals, and sang the praises of the Western allies in tones more resounding than we have ever heard before from his mouth. It is obvious that the Moscow Conference is still having repercussions. The Bolsheviks have evidently put so much pressure on the English and Americans that they must now be slightly more affable to them.

The Fuehrer has decided, after all, to speak in the Loewenbreaue Beer Cellar this afternoon and is already on his way to Munich. I think that is excellent. It is high time for the Fuehrer to deliver a long speech in public and instil courage in the German people, who are now somewhat confused as to their opinions, conceptions, and hopes.

During the morning meeting of the Reichsleiters and Gauleiters I had a long talk with Bormann. I told him about my experiences in Kassel. He agrees with me that Weinrich must be got rid of as quickly as possible. He wants to press the Fuehrer again about this.

I also had a talk with Schwarz and Amann. All responsible leaders of the Party now have a desire to get closer together. The critical situation is weakening a feeling of comradeship and solidarity in the Party.

It is a good thing that the Army was given the floor during this meeting of Reichsleiters and Gauleiters. At the last meeting in Posen, the Army was not even mentioned, and consequently it was ignored in the communiqué about the meeting. That created a lot of bad feeling. This time the Army is to be satisfied.

Late in the evening I had a long talk with Himmler about the general situation. I noted that our views agree absolutely. Himmler's judgment is very clear and realistic, and he knows very well that in this war we must avail ourselves not only of military but also of political methods if we are to be victorious. I developed my thesis about such possibilities to Himmler, and he agreed with them 100 per cent. He, too, deplored the complete lack of an elastic foreign policy and sharply criticized Ribbentrop, whose views have lately become completely inflexible.

Himmler also told me about the existence of a group of enemies of the state, among whom are Halder and possibly also Popitz. This circle would like to contact England, by-passing the Fuehrer, and has already entered into relations with the former Reich Chancellor, Dr. Wirth, in Switzerland. I regard these amateurish attempts as innocuous in themselves, but naturally one must keep one's eye on them. Himmler will see to it that these gentlemen do no major damage with their cowardly defeatism. I certainly have the impression that the domestic security of the country is in good hands with Himmler.

[Colonel General Franz Halder was Chief of Staff of the German Army and often clashed with Hitler on matters of strategy. Halder advised the Fuehrer, for instance, to invade England immediately after the fall of France. Although opposed to Nazism, he was lukewarm to any effort to overthrow the regime forcibly. Dr. Joseph Wirth was German Chancellor in the early days of the Weimar Republic. It was under his chancellorship that Walther von Rathenau, Germany's martyr Foreign Minister, negotiated the Treaty of Rapallo with Soviet Russia in the spring of 1922. Wirth fled from Germany when the Nazis came into power.]

As regards the Army, Himmler is naturally rather prejudiced. But his criticism of army leadership is absolutely justified. The Fuehrer would do well to replace a number of our divisional and even several army group commanders. Himmler was especially opposed to Manstein, whom he regards as a first-class defeatist. The crisis in the southern sector of the Eastern Front would not have had to become so serious had a man of real calibre been in Manstein's place. As I learn from Berlin, the Fuehrer received Manstein at G.H.Q. Contrary to expectations, the interview is said to have passed off well, and it is assumed that Manstein is to return to his post. I regard this as a grave disaster. But one must wait and see what actually happened during the talk.

November 9, 1943

After the conclusion of the [Cairo] Conference a very frosty communiqué was issued, merely stating that Eden had informed Mene-menjoglu about the Moscow Conference. The Turkish newspapers are leaving no doubt that Turkey does not intend to abandon her position of neutrality. In other words, developments at the Cairo Conference were exactly as we anticipated and as Papen predicted.

The English are trying to launch a gigantic sensation by asserting that Papen has been called to G.H.Q. All that is intended to intensify the campaign of nerves for November 9. The Fuehrer will take occasion during his speech in the Loewenbrenn Cellar to tear this whole structure of fantasy to shreds. I believe November 9 will be a heavy propaganda defeat for the enemy. The people were promised that the German nation would collapse on that day. There is not the slightest sign of a breakdown to be seen anywhere.

The dropping of some enemy bombs on the Vatican City is still creating a world sensation. Under the pressure of comment in the neutral press the English have been compelled to deny responsibility and to attempt to blame us. They are doing so, however, in such a clumsy and transparent manner that nobody will believe them. Their lies are too brazenly foolish.

Unfortunately the Osservatore Romano is taking up only a very moderate attitude concerning this event. Obviously the Pope does not want to forego the possibility of acting as mediator between the Reich and the Western enemy powers, at least not for the time being, although there isn't the slightest occasion for such mediation at the moment.

The enemy is continuing to press the Italian royal house vigorously for King Victor Emmanuel's abdication. It is impossible for the present to determine what the English really intend to do with the Italians. The plan they are pursuing seems to be to remove everyone who had anything whatever to do with Fascism; they believe things will then take care of themselves. They are obviously toying with the idea of revolutionizing the whole of Italian political life. They are proving their lack of political instinct, however, by selecting the eighty-year-old Count Sforza for this purpose.

The situation in the East continues to be critical. The Bolsheviks have started an advance from Kiev that may possibly be dangerous to us. They have already taken Fastov. This development is more than dastardly.

I spoke with Sepp Dietrich. The Leibstandarte has assembled for an attack which is to start at 7 A.M. next Tuesday. It has been given orders to advance up to Melitopol. Dietrich is very hopeful about the prospects for this assault. He will start out with more than 220,000 men and a total of 1,000 tanks. That certainly is something worth while.

In Helsinki there have been deliberations about the possibility of a separate peace. These conferences have fortunately ended with complete success on our side. Even the Social-Democratic party published a declaration which emphasized once more that Finland had no part in the war among the Great Powers, that Nordic collaboration must be planned for the future, and that Finland has a feeling of solidarity with the peoples of Norway and Denmark; it insisted, nevertheless, that no one was playing with any thought of capitulation.

I have a thousand and one things to do at the hotel. A report from the leader of the medical profession about artificial insemination was handed to me. This artificial aid to procreation is now to be regulated by decree! I think this is absolutely impossible. This ticklish proposal is about the one thing we have been waiting for! So far as I am concerned, the draft will be put aside until after the war. We shall have enough time then to concern ourselves with this kind of delicate problem.

This afternoon Goering delivered a two-and-a-half-hour address on aerial warfare. The speech did not achieve the effect that he evidently expected. He repeated many things that Milch had already told us about during the meeting of Gauleiters in Posen. Goering insisted especially that we had already made our reprisals in advance against England by our raids in the autumn of 1940. That, of course, is very cheap. Goering also explained a whole series of new weapons and new aeroplane models which, however, can't be produced in quantity until the dim and distant future. A certain lack of assurance was noticeable in Goering during his address. That is quite understandable. One cannot stand before this critical aggregation of Reichsleiters and Gauleiters who know all the answers with declarations of so little substance. Nevertheless I think it was a good thing that he established contact again with the Reichsleiters and Gauleiters.

During dinner I had a long talk with Goering, who tried in every way possible to renew his old connections. Personally he is an exceptionally lovable character. He is obviously suffering from the fact that he did not find the right collaborators in the past and that he did not keep the reins sufficiently firmly in his hands.

The Fuehrer arrived from G.H.Q. to talk to his old comrades in arms. He seemed vital and healthy, a fact that naturally has a very consoling effect upon his old associates. During his speech the Fuehrer was in his best form. He used many sparkling turns of phrase, and his uncompromising obduracy in proclaiming our will to resist was extremely convincing. This speech will undoubtedly have a deep effect on the German people. Foreign countries, too, will be very much impressed.

The Fuehrer devoted a great part of his address to the Eastern Front and to enemy air warfare. Here, too, his presentation was brilliant. Especially when discussing air raids he told the German people how much he was suffering with them during these weeks and months, but how firmly he was determined to overcome the present crisis and what gigantic reconstruction work throughout the Reich he was planning for after the war. The speech had an unexpected fascination for this gathering. That is a good thing, because it will be noticeable in the radio broadcast also. With the Fuehrer's permission, I struck out a few clumsy turns of phrase when preparing the broadcast. I then had it delivered at 8.15 P.M. over all networks.

I am very glad that the Fuehrer has spoken again after such a long interval. It was high time. It was, so to speak, a case of his speaking the redeeming word. The Fuehrer, too, seemed deeply gratified to stand among his fighting comrades again and talk to them.

In the evening we were assembled with the Fuehrer in the Fuehrerbau.

[This was a gaudy edifice erected in the Koenigsplatz at Munich as part of a series of structures intended to bear testimony to the grandeur of Nazism. Next to it stood one of the two Greek temples containing sarcophagi of the men killed during the ill-fated beer-cellar putsch of November 9, 1923. The fate of Czechoslovakia was decided at the Fuehrerbau by Chamberlain, Daladier, Mussolini, and Hitler on September 30, 1938.]

Here I had an opportunity for a long talk with Hofer and Rainer, who told me extraordinary things about the occupied Italian areas. According to these reports nothing is to be expected either of Fascism or the Duce. The Duce hasn't the faintest idea of his real position. He overestimates the power of the Fascist party. He is living a life of make-believe and struts around in a heroic pose that has no place in a world of realities. He actually thinks he can persuade the Italian nation to re-enter the military struggle on our side. I think that is absolutely out of the question. One can measure his unrealistic attitude by the fact that he seriously intends to speak in public at Milan. Sepp Dietrich told me that if he really insisted on doing this it would have to be under the protection of German arms; otherwise he would be booed off the stage, or worse.

The personal conduct of the Duce with his mistress, whom Sepp Dietrich had to bring to him, is a cause for much misgiving. One can see from it that he has no clear understanding of the seriousness of his situation, and that, accordingly, the reconstruction of the Fascist party is more a matter of theory than of practice. While he has had his son-in-law arrested, all those in the know understand clearly that he won't have him condemned to death. It is assumed that the absent Count Grandi will be condemned to death only because he is missing, whereas the rest will get off with terms of imprisonment or perhaps life sentences, which will then be commuted after a few weeks. One certainly can't begin reconstructing a great revolutionary movement in that way! It is tragic to think how far the Duce has drifted away from his original ideals. Had he remained faithful to them he would never have lost Italy and the King would not have been able to give him the sack.

November 10, 1943

The Fuehrer's speech in the Loewenbreaux Cellar has simply amazed the enemy. They had expected quite a different song. They thought the Fuehrer was sick, nervous, depressed, and devoid of all confidence in victory. Also, they had already joyfully anticipated that November 9 could be looked on as a day of great triumph for them. Now the English are sitting there like some sorry tanner whose pelts have swum away. Everything they prophesied in their propaganda has failed to happen. Now they suddenly say that the Fuehrer has spoken aggressively and boastfully, that he was a different Hitler from the one known in recent months. The significant thing is that his pronouncements are again being taken seriously. Nobody any longer pokes fun at the reprisals threatened by the Fuehrer. On the contrary, the enemy considers this very realistically and without scepticism. I have the impression that this eighth and ninth of November signified a great psychological achievement for us.

In reply, Churchill delivered a speech at the banquet of the Lord Mayor of London which fitted like a fist in the eye. He praised the Soviet Union eloquently for its military contribution, which no other people could have made. He said 1944 would probably be the most difficult year in English history, unless there was some extraordinary piece of luck. During that year the English people would have to make the heaviest and greatest sacrifices of blood. He talked of the fact that the battles to be fought during that year would put Waterloo far in the shade. He no longer made sarcastic remarks about retaliation, but considered the possibility very earnestly, said he expected it in all circumstances, and emphasized that the English people would meet it manfully and courageously.

Roosevelt, too, delivered an address. He spoke of a world of decency which the plutocracies intended to create and promised the occupied areas large-scale help in the way of food and clothing after their liberation. The inhabitants of Sicily know what such help looks like in practice. It would be far more to the point if the English and the Americans were first to offer aid to the hungry peoples of India.

The situation in the East has become more complicated. It must in fact be admitted that the Soviets, as they themselves report, have achieved a great success near Kiev. Even though our losses were not nearly as grave as Moscow claimed, the territory gained by the Soviets is considerable.

I received a detailed report about the latest developments in Hungary. It is anything but comforting. Influential circles in Hungary are at work for a direct break with us. The Regent is trying to create the impression that he is neutral about these efforts. That is, however, not at all the case. I even suspect him of being the mainspring of this development. If the English were to attempt an invasion of the Balkans, Hungary would be the first country to desert us. The Hungarians are also interested in keeping their Wehrmacht intact because they are still flirting with the idea of fighting the Rumanians. This attitude of Hungary is perfidious and shameless.

After three days' stay in Munich I have at last finished my work here. At 10 P.M. we started again for Berlin. I am happy in anticipation of the work that awaits me there.

November 11, 1943

There is no longer any talk in the English press of the possibility of a moral collapse of the Reich. On the contrary, we are credited with much greater military prowess than we really enjoy at the moment. The theme of retaliation against England has struck home. The English people are in a state of great unrest, especially since they don't know how this retaliation is to take place. Rumour-mongering is therefore the order of the day.

The American chief of production, Nelson, has delivered a pro-Bolshevik speech which contains just about everything. A layman would think there is hardly any difference left between capitalism and Communism.

The situation in the East is no longer so very critical, at least not in the south. On the other hand, our situation at Kiev and Smolensk is again very threatening.

I have at last reorganized my propaganda machinery in the occupied areas of the East. Unfortunately the decision in this matter came very late, almost too late. But I'll try, nevertheless, to save what I can.

I have received a detailed report about the situation in Portugal. From it the following can be gathered: Salazar is undoubtedly the master of Portugal, but he relies on his armed forces. Unfortunately he has lost his faith in us to some extent and therefore keeps swaying to and fro between the two warring sides like a pendulum. The same is true of Franco. The dictators would fare better if they openly took sides with us, for if our side doesn't win they are lost anyway. English influence predominates in Portugal. The English are carrying on very clever propaganda, especially by word of mouth, not without success. Our diplomacy is evidently not equal to these practices. I shall now increase our propaganda in Portugal considerably. As regards the placing of German films in Portugal, we must try to purchase several cinemas, for the Jewish boycott among exhibitors is so effective that a German picture cannot normally be shown there.

Immediately on reaching Berlin I learned that the Fuehrer's speech had made a tremendous impression upon the German people. The effect has been simply amazing. The passage in which the Fuehrer assured the German people they might be at rest, for victory would be on our side, acted like balm on an open wound. The categorical threat of reprisals against England and the promise to reconstruct the destroyed cities in a very short time after the war also evoked great enthusiasm.

Naturally we have one worry on top of another and can scarcely find a solution. For instance, the problem of a petrol shortage has cropped up here in Berlin and has already led to some stoppages of work in the armaments industry.

The Fuehrer arrived safely at G.H.Q. His meeting with his old Party comrades acted on him like a refreshing bath. It was a very good thing he left the circle of generals surrounding him and resumed direct relations with the Party. His contact with the people, too, did him much good.

November 12, 1943

From a very confidential source I learn, via Lisbon, that Stalin put forward the argument [at the Moscow Conference] that he had already lost 16,000,000 men, that he could not continue the war without a second front, and that he was determined to conclude a separate peace with the Reich, if England and the United States did not hasten to his aid. Impressed by this presentation, both Eden and Hull naturally yielded all along the line. They had to make far-reaching concessions to Stalin regarding the Balkans, not to mention that of course the Soviet western frontiers were not debated at all. One can therefore speak of an outright defeat of the English and Americans. They are now completely in the tow of Bolshevism. If all Great Powers engaged in this war were able today to select their positions anew without any previous ties, the whole picture would most probably be changed completely in twenty-four hours.

The Leibstandarte has not yet entered the fray. That will take another two or three days. Their deployment did not function as we thought it would. . . .

There is rain on the Southern front, and the dreaded thaw for which we waited so anxiously in the past weeks has set in, but that won't help now.

Our series of meetings has proved a tremendous success. Thousands of them were held and they were overcrowded almost everywhere. The everlasting grumbling has also diminished considerably since death sentences against defeatists have been pronounced, executed, and published. That had a very sobering and deterrent effect on the defeatists. Our Reich propaganda officers claim that one single victory on any one front would completely change morale at home.

November 13, 1943

A new tendency is slowly developing in the English war policy. The Soviets seem to have rather overplayed their hand, and as a result British plutocracy has been more than sobered up. The British Communist party, too, is beginning to get busy. Evidently Stalin is not satisfied with the results which he has been able to extort from England and America, or else he doesn't have complete faith in the present situation.

English periodicals for the first time have published reparations demands on the German Reich. They are so insane that one can visualize what we would be threatened with if we were to weaken. I am having these English demands published prominently in the German press. The German people should realize clearly what fate is in store for us in case of defeat.

I have received confidential information which enables me to appraise the Moscow Conference. I gather from it that Stalin categorically demanded the opening of a second front. The English and Americans were not in a position to comply with this demand at present. They had therefore to be satisfied with a promise from Stalin not to conclude a separate peace with the Reich. In return the English were to refrain from any action concerning the Balkans. No agreement was reached about Poland or the Baltic States and Finland because the Soviets permitted no discussion whatever on these topics. On the whole, England and America had the short end of the deal at the Moscow Conference.

Eden negotiated in Cairo with Menemenjoglu. He submitted the Soviet demand for military bases in Turkey. Menemenjoglu refused and insisted that the constitutional authorities in Turkey, especially the Turkish People's party, would first have to be consulted. Eden presented the Soviet demand in only a half-hearted way and did not make it hard for the Turks to decline it. There certainly can be no talk of Turkey being put under pressure.

My new article, entitled, "The Inevitable Conclusions," which deals with the Moscow Conference, has attracted the greatest attention, especially in the neutral press. It is very significant, though, that the English are taking no notice of it. That shows me they don't want to discuss in public the ideas it contains. The arguments are too obvious and too strong for the British to believe they could gain anything by discussing them.

Glasmeier has gone to work in Paris. He is meeting with great difficulties there. The O.K.W. had really intended to throw the Paris propaganda section into the Foreign Office lap. By sending Glasmeier, I anticipated this move. Keitel has now hit on the typical way out by submitting the question to the Fuehrer's decision. I'm not worrying about that decision.

The Fuehrer's speech is still being discussed everywhere by the people. Reports from all gaus state that this speech had an immensely invigorating effect.

Vice-President Lange of the Reichsbank reported to me about the present state of our finances. It is relatively favourable. We shall certainly suffer no reverses for financial reasons. On the whole our war financing rests on firm ground. That is especially because we have a modern monetary system which is independent of the gold standard and is therefore quite untouched by monetary crises in enemy countries.

November 14, 1943

The enemy press is devoting more space to discussing reparations. The English are set on handling the problem on a commercial basis while the Bolsheviks are more concerned with manpower. There is no more terrible prospect for the German people than to fall into the hands of Bolshevism. That's why this news will frighten our people.

One can well imagine that international Jewry is behind all these machinations. It believes the moment has come to satisfy its hatred of Germany. On the other hand, anti-Semitism is growing in the entire world. I have news about that both from the United States and from England.

The situation in the East is very sad at present, although not as yet hopeless, as claimed in Moscow. But we shall have to work hard to overcome the present crisis. It is undoubtedly one of the most dangerous that we have experienced in the entire war.

At noon, about three hundred and fifty American bombers flew over north-western Germany. Their formation was pretty well scattered by our anti-aircraft, so that the concentric attack on Bremen did not take place as planned. A considerable number of planes are said to have been shot down; the Luftwaffe spoke of more than forty. On the other hand we lost some twenty fighters. The Americans are now flying in by day with fighter protection, a thing that is naturally very hard for our anti-aircraft to cope with.

I had a heavy set-to with Ribbentrop about our propaganda section in France. Ribbentrop claims that France must be regarded as a foreign country and not as a defeated state because it has a chief of state and a prime minister. Consequently, only the Foreign Office has a right to political activity there. I opposed this standpoint violently and Field Marshal General Keitel joined in my protest. For, after all, we have defeated France and there is a military occupation force in France. The Embassy in Paris is only, so to speak, an outside sub-bureau of the Foreign Office, but it can in no way be considered a diplomatic representation of the Reich in a free and sovereign France. The argument went back and forth. Ribbentrop is trying to solve the situation by a fait accompli, by-passing the Fuehrer. But I shall in no circumstances agree to this. It is amazing with what fanaticism the Foreign Office, and especially Ribbentrop, deal with points of such subsidiary importance, whereas they simply push aside questions of great moment. Our foreign policy today has become completely sterile and frozen. If it were more fluid, undoubtedly a different turn could be given through political means to a war that today has progressed so unfavourably on the military side.

Goering, thank God, is showing himself more often in public. He has evidently recovered from his recent period of stagnation. I am very happy that he is again in evidence and that his authority is gradually being strengthened as a result.

November 15, 1943

The enemy press again endeavours to claim that the German generals intend to make peace. In this connection the same names keep cropping up again and again. That looks a little suspicious. Undoubtedly the men mentioned have said very indiscreet things on this or that occasion. Only Army generals are named. There is no talk of the Navy or the Luftwaffe, to say nothing of the Waffen-S.S. Politically our Army is not as it should be. The reason for it, no doubt, is that it has had no political education.

The Lebanon crisis keeps growing. In their procedure against de Gaulle's France, the English are making sure of the support of Moscow and Washington. The Lebanon crisis is a cleverly conceived manoeuvre of camouflage and intrigue on the part of London imperialism, which evidently took de Gaulle in, as he hasn't the faintest understanding of politics. Now that de Gaulle has advanced in a very rude way, the London press is playing the role of an innocent angel. It pretends to be quite stirred up, takes the side of the Arabs, and at the same time does a wonderful piece of propaganda. One cannot but admire this English policy of intrigue. It would be a fine thing if we understood a little more about this business than may be assumed from present achievements of our Foreign Office.

[The outbreak of rioting led French officials to arrest the Lebanon leaders who had proclaimed the independence of this French-mandated Arab state.]

Badoglio can't even form a cabinet. All men in Italian public life who were asked, declined to enter his government. He must therefore content himself with a cabinet of so-called experts. Sforza declared that he would have nothing to do with any Italian government until the King abdicated. This eighty-three-year-old fogey pretends to represent Italian youth!

The situation in the East is causing us great anxiety. What is it to lead to? The Soviets have reserves at their disposal of which we hadn't the faintest idea, despite our very realistic consideration of their possibilities.

Practically a complete hospital has been installed at Lanke. Almost the entire family is sick in bed. Misfortune seems to be hitting us both in the general war situation and in our family.

There is no rest for me all day. One piece of bad news follows another. We are passing through weeks of extreme worry. Usually, however, a period of this kind also means that you are speedily approaching a decisive point in developments.

November 16, 1943

I have ordered all our propaganda services at home and abroad to start a great, new anti-Bolshevik campaign. This will be based upon the military successes of the Soviets and is to give Europe and our enemies the creeps. I don't want them to stop being frightened about Bolshevism. I hope especially to stir up Anglo-American public opinion against the war with this campaign.

It is very sad that a number of German generals, especially aristocrats, have placed themselves at Stalin's disposal in the Free Germany Committee of Moscow. That does us a lot of harm. There is especially a certain Count Einsiedel, scion of one of the oldest German officer families, who is attracting attention to himself in a most obnoxious way. This proves again that our officers lack all political instinct. In their folly and amateurishness they haven't the faintest idea what they are being used for. Stalin's camouflage about the churches is a ruse to reconcile these bigoted officers to Bolshevism. Stalin picked up an exceedingly old Metropolitan and made him Patriarch of Moscow. He is using him as propaganda throughout the world, and the Anglican Church is acting as though it believed in this swindle. Naturally nobody among the leaders of the Church of England really believes that Stalin has become a faithful servant of the Lord!

[Count Otto von Einsiedel, a grandson of the Iron Chancellor, Prince Otto von Bismarck, became a leader in the Free Germany Committee formed at Moscow with Field Marshal von Paulus and General von Seydlitz as the prime movers.]

The Vatican has issued a note about the minor bombardment of Vatican City. It is directed at all warring powers, accuses everybody and nobody. We can't do anything with such a note in our practical political fight.

Morale among our people at present is excellent. This is partly owing to our good propaganda, but partly also to the severe measures which we have taken against defeatists.

After a meeting tonight, I visited the new command point in the Wilhelmplatz air-raid shelter. It is now completely equipped and adequate for all emergencies. We shall be able to conduct our defence of the Reich capital from here. I hope very much, however, that we shall not have to make use of it too often.

[The Wilhelmplatz was the large square in front of the Reich Chancellery, the Propaganda Ministry, the Finance and Transport ministries, and the Kaiserhof Hotel. One of the largest air-raid shelters (bunkers) in Berlin had been constructed under it, and the main command point for the defence of the capital installed there.]

November 17, 1943

The Soviets have taken a hand in the Lebanon. Everything is at sixes and sevens there: Nobody knows who is opposing whom. Unfortunately the German press was infected by this confusion and rather ran amok on the question. I have insisted upon clearer instructions for the press.

In this fifth year of the war, Socialism has become a favourite theme, especially with those who don't want to have anything to do with it. The Fascist party, too, during its Milan convention came out with a new social programme that contains just about everything. If this social programme were really put through, we would have reason to be ashamed of ourselves in face of the radicalism of the Fascists. But I deliberately say "if". At the decisive moment the Fascists will abandon their radicalism and neutralize everything by bourgeois respectability.

In Moscow there was a great celebration in honour of the Bolshevik party. It was hailed as the originator of the Red Army victories. It would be beautiful if the same thing could be said about the National Socialist movement in the Reich. I regard it as a cardinal error in the relationship between Party and Wehrmacht that the Party has not had the opportunity and possibility of injecting its ideas into the Army. As a result the Army today is not so dependable as it really ought to be in times of severe strain.

There is constant talk among Soviet prisoners about a joint war, with Germany and the Soviet Union on one side against England and the United States on the other. Interestingly enough, the English and American prisoners talk about a war in which Germany and the Anglo-Americans would fight the Soviet Union. That means that although each warring side wants to destroy us, it would nevertheless like to use us as allies against the other side after such destruction. This circumstance, which now represents only the wishful thinking or the dream of individual soldiers and officers, may at some future time bring us to a decisive turning point of the war.

Rather disagreeable developments are observable in France. Laval keeps hesitating. It's not quite clear whether he is delaying from apathy or intrigue. Certainly Pétain is very much dissatisfied and would like to get rid of him. That is why he has been wanting to regulate the question of his succession anew and to announce the change in a broadcast. However, at the last moment German censorship prevented the speech. Now both Pétain and Laval have gone in for watchful waiting. Both, in their innermost hearts, are quite naturally opposed to the Reich and its interests. We therefore cannot trust them across the street. Pétain is nursing the wishful dream that France may be called upon to establish peace between Germany and the Western Powers!

Our representatives have negotiated with agents of the Italian Government in Venice about German-Italian film relations. The Italian Fascists are actually planning to start producing pictures in Venice. Obviously they still haven't learned anything. Instead of fighting a war they are taking time out for minor questions. I imagine that if we were in as desperate a situation as the Italians, we would have something else to do than build film studios. I shall certainly see to it that Italian pictures don't enter Germany for the present.

I had a minor altercation with Rosenberg about my press agreement with Dr. Dietrich regarding the Eastern areas. Rosenberg is constantly trying either to torpedo the Fuehrer's decree about propaganda in the East or to render it innocuous. It is hard for an outsider to realize what difficulties I have to face. These difficulties invariably stem from second-class personalities. Usually one can work well with personalities of real stature because they know their own limitations. The smaller the brain, the bigger the appetite.

Dr. Naumann received General Heinrich Scheuch, the last Prussian Minister of War during World War I, who wanted spontaneously to express the opinion that we would also have won World War I if I had been a member of the Government at that time. He regards our present moral power of resistance against the afflictions and adversities of the war as owing chiefly to the National Socialist movement and to National Socialist propaganda as conducted by the Party and the State. I can be very proud of this appraisal by an old and meritorious leader of World War I.

November 18, 1943

At noon it was reported that Leros has capitulated. Some 3,000 English and 5,000 Italians surrendered. Apparently the English depended as much on the Italians as we did, and were disappointed exactly as we used to be by their lack of fighting qualities and their unwillingness to take any risks. Naturally London is very much dissatisfied about the quick fall of the island.

The Italian Minister of State, Preziosi, paid a visit to our Ministry. His report on the situation within Fascist Italy gave much food for thought. He even criticized the Duce very severely and blamed him for not having followed the right line in his treatment of Jews and Masons. That, he said, was the reason for his fall.

From many parts of the Eastern Front I have been receiving letters from National Socialist soldiers who complain of a decided lack of political orientation. They always contrast it with the political education of the Red Army, which is something quite different. Often these letters end in the desperate cry, "Where are our political commissars?" I sent a number of these letters to the Fuehrer for his information. I assume he will take proper measures to correct the situation.

During the burial of victims of the last bomb attack on the Bulgarian capital, the Bishop of Sofia delivered a speech in which he attacked the Bulgarian Government rather severely. Barring exceptions in only a few countries, bishops are almost always opposed to the temporal power, not for reasons of Christian conviction but rather because of a yearning for power. Therefore their wings must be clipped as much as possible.

Major Gaza, who is a product of the Hitler Youth, also complained very much about the lack of political education in the Army. That is a complaint against the leadership of the Army which upright National Socialists voice again and again. . . .

[Major Gaza was one of Germany's best-known tank aces. He received one of the highest decorations, the Oak-Leaf Cluster to the Knight's Cross of the Iron Cross.]

There is also much complaint about the government section of Berlin as a rumour factory. No doubt that is because all bad news reaches this central point and the higher officials give too little attention to strengthening their own morale by talking to the broad masses of the people. I believe I shall have to talk to a larger meeting of government officials and lace them up in moral corsets.

November 19, 1943

Papen visited the Fuehrer and reported about conditions in Turkey. He is very optimistic about our chances there. The Turks are not thinking of abandoning neutrality; there isn't the slightest prospect of their yielding to English-Soviet pressure within any foreseeable time.

There is some complaint about the attitude of certain classes of our population towards English prisoners of war. Their behaviour must be characterized as lacking in dignity. I have given orders that people sufficiently unmindful of their honour as to behave thus are to be summoned into court and given heavy prison sentences. I shall have these sentences published. They will certainly have an educational effect.

I had a long talk with Dr. Ley. . . . In Cologne various people seriously proposed that the carnival should be held there as usual this coming winter. It is simply surprising what vitality our people manifest even in the fifth year of war.

The English appeared over the Reich with large formations. One formation of 200 to 250 bombers attacked Mannheim. The city took pretty heavy punishment. Some 500 to 600 explosive bombs hit the northern part of the city. Damage to buildings and plants was considerable, but casualties very few.

November 20, 1943

A number of authentic reports confirm that during his Cairo negotiations Eden asked Ankara for air bases in Anatolia and for Turkey's early entry into the war. The Turkish Government called together the constitutional authorities, especially the People's party, and obtained a categorical veto against yielding to Eden's demands.

The English and the Americans are in for a lot of joy with the Italians. That serves them right. The Italians gave us so much trouble in the earlier years of war that it is only fair that our enemies should also get their share.

The Fuehrer will in all likelihood go to Breslau next Saturday to speak to 10,000 young cadets in the Century Hall. It's good for the Fuehrer to speak to a larger audience. He not only radiates strength, but becomes charged with it himself.

November 21, 1943

The Soviets have repeated their demand that Germany furnish 10,000,000 workers for five years for reconstruction purposes on the conclusion of peace. Demands like that are wonderful for our propaganda. They stir German public opinion deeply. The idea that our soldiers might not return home at all but might have to remain in the Soviet Union as forced labour is a terrible thought for every woman and every mother. The German people would prefer to fight to their last breath.

Although Pétain has thus far given no indication of any intention to resign he is nevertheless very much offended and blames the German occupation authorities for the failure of his plan. Laval, following his old tactics, has kept out of the conflict. His attitude towards Pétain and ourselves is less clear than ever.

Reports from the Ruhr Valley indicate that the women are determined to get back to their husbands, come what may. They would rather live in destroyed cities under the most primitive conditions than in the districts to which they have been evacuated where, incidentally, conditions are none too rosy either. Strange examples have been given me of the cleverness which women show in trying to get home despite all orders to the contrary.

November 22, 1943

To compensate for vanishing hopes of victory the London press is now supplying its readers with tall stories about the damage alleged to have been done to Berlin during the last air raid. It is claimed, for instance, that even now communications in Berlin are completely interrupted. As a matter of fact not a single tram or train has failed to run because of the raid. Nevertheless I shall refrain from denying these English reports. It is a good thing for the English to imagine that their new tactics achieved great successes; they will cling all the longer to these tactics, much to our advantage.

It seems grotesque and almost as though the devil had taken a hand to think how good the weather is in all those areas along the front where the Soviets are becoming active and how bad at the points where we must attack.

The Fuehrer spoke to the cadets at Breslau. I am told that his speech was exceptionally good. The Fuehrer laid special stress on the political education of the officer corps. The young officers gave the Fuehrer a stormy ovation. He was very happy to speak before such a large gathering of men.

A sad piece of news reached us: Count Reventlow has died at Tegernsee. The National Socialist movement mourns the loss of a very unselfish idealistic champion of its ideas. Even in the days of the Kaiser, Reventlow distinguished himself by an exhibition of highest civil courage. His articles in the Reichswart, which appeared week after week up to the very end, were on an exceptionally high plane. Reventlow is one of the great spiritual phenomena of our movement. I requested the Fuehrer to have the Party take charge of the funeral. The Fuehrer agreed. It is to take place in the New Palace in Potsdam, and at my suggestion Dr. Frick, as party leader of the Reichstag majority, is to deliver the commemorative address.

[Count Ernst von Reventlow was a stormy petrel in the Reichstag in the days of the Kaiser, his pet aversions being the Jews and the British. He joined the Nazis in 1927, after having previously been very active in the Deutsch-Voelkische party, an anti-Semitic movement.

The New Palace in Potsdam had been the regular residence of Kaiser Wilhelm II.

Although the Nazis were in complete control of the Reichstag after 1933, they still went through the formality of maintaining a party leader. He was called the Fraktionsvorsitzende, or chairman of the Nazi "fraction," an expression dating back to the Empire and in the Weimar Republic, when every political party had only a fraction of the seats, and each party leader was known as the Fraktionvorsitzende. Until the Nazis took over, they, too, were only a "fraction," and Dr. Wilhelm Frick was their chairman. Hitler himself never stood for election before he became Chancellor.]

Unfortunately our radio, by its exceedingly sentimental programmes, adds to the depressed state of our morale. I shall have to take a hand. It won't do for sadness to be featured on the programme in this saddest of all months. Once November is behind us, we shall all thank God.

November 24, 1943

Trouble began early this morning. First, Schach gave me a general picture of the situation in Berlin; which is a sad one indeed. I just can't understand how the English are able to do so much damage to the Reich's capital during one air raid.

The picture that greeted my eye in the Wilhelmplatz was one of utter desolation. Blazing fires everywhere. The Propaganda Ministry was spared, for the most part, chiefly because of the courageous fire fighting of our own air-raid guards. Although damage in the Reich Chancellery is quite heavy, it is nothing compared with other ministries. Schaub called on me and described the destruction in the Reich Chancellery. Although he defended the private apartments of the Fuehrer with the fury of a bear, he could not prevent their suffering some damage. From the outside the chancellery looks almost unscathed. It is owing mainly to Schaub's intervention that it is standing at all.

Transport conditions are still quite hopeless but I trust we shall soon master our difficulties sufficiently at least to start an emergency service to all sections of the city. Transport is the heart of all public life. Once it no longer functions, business stops, supplies cease to move, and difficulties increase by the hour. In our home in Hermann Goering Street things are pretty desperate. The top floor is burned out completely. The whole house is filled with water. It is practically impossible to live there; there is no heat, no water, and all rooms are filled with pungent smoke. Magda has come to Berlin to salvage what she can. The impressions she gained on her trip, especially driving through the Wedding district, were terrible. The poor people, who are the victims of these low-down methods of English warfare, are really to be pitied. But it would be even worse if they fell into enemy hands, especially the Bolsheviks. In this case sufferings which now can be limited to weeks or at least months would continue indefinitely.

[The "home in Goering Street" was Goebbels' official residence, but his wife and his children did not spend much time there. They were usually at their suburban home, Schwanenwerder, on the Wannsee, or at an estate at Lanke, some twenty-five miles from the city.

The Wedding district of Berlin, named after a metallurgist, Gustav Friedrich Wedding, was one of the poorest in Berlin. In republican days it was known as a hotbed of Communism.]

Ley has returned meanwhile. He had carried out a number of assignments I gave him. . . . He was furious because the fighter planes did not take to the air during the unfortunate night. What if the weather was bad! After all, the English fly in bad weather from their southern English airports all the way to Berlin; but the German fighters can't rise from the ground in Berlin because the weather is unfavourable! You can't simply surrender the capital of the Reich to the terror of the enemy. If we conduct war on such squeamish principles we won't get very far. Ley is undoubtedly right. . . .

In between I am able to sleep for half an hour. Then, however, duty again calls me. Large English formations are once more on their way, headed straight for the capital. It means we must stand a second blow. . . .

Meanwhile I learn that my mother and my mother-in-law were bombed out completely in Moabit. Their homes have simply vanished. The house in which they lived was transformed into one vast shambles. But what is that at a time of universal misfortune which has now fallen upon this city of four and a half millions!

[One of the largest prisons in Berlin was in the Moabit section of the capital. The expression "to go to Moabit" usually meant to go to gaol.]

The attack began shortly after the alert sounded. This time more explosives than incendiary bombs were used. Again it was a major, grade-A attack. I was in the bunker on the Wilhelmplatz. It wasn't long before fires started all round. Large bombs and land mines were dropped over the whole government quarter. They destroyed everything around the Potsdamer Platz. The pressure was so strong that even our bunker, though constructed deep underground, began to shake. Unfortunately the fighter planes arrived twenty minutes late. This gave the English a big lead. During those twenty minutes the anti-aircraft guns were forbidden to shoot because it was believed our fighters had already arrived.

Devastation is again appalling in the government section as well as in the western and northern suburbs. The workers' quarters in Wedding and the region along Wolgast Street are especially hard hit. The State Playhouse and the Reichstag are ablaze, but fortunately we can localize these fires. People keep coming and going in our bunker just as at a command point. Well, after all, we are living in a war and many a sector at the front would certainly not want to change places with us, so enormous is the strain. Hell itself seems to have broken loose over us. Mines and explosive bombs keep hurtling down upon the government quarter. One after another of the most important buildings begins to burn. As I look out on the Wilhelmplatz after the attack, the impression of the evening before becomes even more gruesome.

I went over to the Propaganda Ministry. It was burning at two points. The air-raid wardens, under the leadership of Gutterer, are fighting these fires with the greatest energy, but sometimes things seem to hang by a silken thread. Only with the aid of large fire-fighting units were we able, after hours of fighting, to control the fire. Unfortunately I can't bother about these things myself, as I am too busy worrying about the city as a whole.

Meanwhile Ley returned to offer his aid. It is most touching the way he is concerned about me and my gau. But he can't help me very much. What I now need is not good advice but fire-fighting units. They are being requisitioned from nearby cities all the way to Hamburg. We must risk stripping other cities of their fire departments, as it can be taken for granted that Berlin will be the main target in future attacks. The enemy leaves no doubt on that score!

The Kaiserhof was hit by countless incendiary bombs and soon went up in flames. Although the largest fire-fighting units were put to work there, the edifice could not be saved; it burned to the ground. Nothing but the outer walls remain standing.

[The destruction of the Kaiserhof Hotel must have been especially hard for Goebbels to bear, because of its many historic associations for the Nazis. Throughout the years immediately preceding Hitler's appointment as Chancellor in 1933, the Nazi Fuehrer stayed at the Kaiserhof, within a stone's throw of the chancellery, whenever he was in Berlin. As he returned to the Kaiserhof after Hindenburg appointed him Chancellor on January 30, 1933, a huge crowd of adherents gathered before the hotel and cheered him. Describing the struggle for power in a book which appeared soon after Hitler's assumption of power, Goebbels significantly chose for its title, "Vom Kaiserhof zur Reichskanzlei" ("From the Kaiserhof to the Reich Chancellery").]

In the Reich Chancellery, too, a big fire started in the Hall of Models, but we were able to contain it pretty well. Everything is at sixes and sevens in the Reich Chancellery, but that is equally true of my own home, where almost all the windows and doors are gone because of the terrific blast from the explosive bombs and land mines.

[The Hall of Models was a huge space in the top story of the chancellery. Hitler spent his spare time there making architectural plans for big public edifices. Models were then cast from his plans.]

The government quarter is nothing short of an inferno. One can hardly recognize the Wilhelmplatz. . . .

The gau is in flames. Unfortunately Goerlitzer was rather too optimistic in his report on this fire so that we sent the fire-fighting units too late. As a result serious damage has been done to the gau, which cannot be used for the present.

[By the gau, Goebbels evidently meant the office building at No. 14 Hermann Goering Street, which housed the administrative headquarters of the gau or district of Greater Berlin. Greater Germany was divided by the Nazis into forty-three gaus, each with a Gauleiter, a deputy Gauleiter, and a large staff. Goebbels was Gauleiter for Berlin, but the daily routine was handled by his deputy, Arthur Goerlitzer.]

The work that has to be done at about 3 A.M. is maddening. My head aches from pain and fatigue, but that can't be helped. We must now do our part; the decisive hour has come.

Towards 2 A.M., thank God, the Wehrmacht arrived from Potsdam. It is under the command of a first-class lieutenant colonel named Friedrichs, a son of General Friedrichs, the present mayor of Potsdam. He took steps that made sense. It was chiefly owing to him that the fires in the government section were got under control within a relatively short time, as far as could still be done. It was too late, for instance, to save the Kaiserhof and large parts of the Finance Ministry.

A cause for misrepresentation arose from the fact that the Wehrmacht units from Potsdam had no other vehicles except tanks. That meant that the Army appeared in the government section with very threatening-looking vehicles, and outsiders might have assumed that we needed them for our protection. To avoid such a bad impression, I saw to it that the tanks were withdrawn to the Berlin barracks by morning, otherwise we would certainly have read in the enemy press the following day that the Nazis had had to call upon the Wehrmacht to protect themselves from the furious people! And so one has to pay attention to a thousand big and a thousand small things. It is wise always to be at hand, for sometimes absolute trifles can cause great difficulties.

It was 4 A.M. when I finally enjoyed a little rest. There are but few opportunities now to rest one's weary head. This time I slept in the shelter in Hermann Goering Street where Magda, too, took up quarters for the night. The house is a sad sight. I would far prefer to close my eyes and see nothing. This is one of the worst nights of my entire life. But I believe we got the upper hand. Although flames are still soaring sky-high and in a part of Berlin large surface fires are still burning, we hope to overcome the worst difficulties by noon, and then to get ready for the next night. It would be a wonderful thing if we had one day's rest so that the fire department and the Party formations could for once get a little sleep.

Before taking my nap, I was able to read a few telegrams from abroad that I had neglected completely during the day. Naturally the raid on Berlin was the main theme of enemy propaganda. Cynical admission was made of the intention to ensure the same fate for Berlin as for Hamburg.

The initial communiqué issued by the Luftwaffe about the first air raid is very bad. Too much emphasis is laid on the damage done. That gave the enemy press the text for extensive comment. Malicious joy is expressed. But I'll stick to my course. I glanced only fleetingly at the telegrams. I have more important things to do than to get angry with the English.

London expects a new German peace offensive. It is believed that Bismarck, who is at present visiting relatives in Sweden, and the former Foreign Secretary, Kuehlmann, have been selected to conduct these peace negotiations. In reality there isn't a word of truth in either report.

[Prince Otto von Bismarck, grandson of the Iron Chancellor, entered politics in 1924 during the Weimar Republic as a Reichstag deputy for the German Nationalist party. He later joined the Foreign Office staff and held a number of diplomatic posts, among them that of secretary of the German Legation at Stockholm, where, in 1928, he married the daughter of a Swedish architect named Tengbom.]

Baron Richard von Kuehlmann was one of the last Secretaries of State for Foreign Affairs during the Imperial regime, after having previously been Minister to the Netherlands and Ambassador to Turkey during World War I. He negotiated the treaty of Brest-Litovsk in 1918. After his retirement he was a frequent contributor on foreign affairs to German newspapers, especially the Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung of Berlin.]

I read the latest speech delivered over the Moscow Radio by General von Seydlitz. This high-born aristocrat is the greatest swine in the German officer corps. I'd like nothing better than to spit contemptuously in his face. An honest, decent German worker would never stoop to such cowardly treachery; for that you have to find an aristocrat, preferably a general.

The hatred of the English among the population of the Reich capital knows no bounds.

November 25, 1943

The [second] heavy air raid equalled the first in intensity. Though at first we thought it might be weaker, this hope was not realized. The damage was quite as extensive as the night before. In character, too, it resembled its predecessor. It was mainly the inner city that was hit and also the working-class suburbs. Unfortunately only about twenty planes were shot down. Our fighters took a hand but arrived too late and meanwhile the anti-aircraft was forbidden to shoot. The English therefore got away pretty cheaply with this attack.

Conditions in the city are pretty hopeless. The air is filled with smoke and the smell of fires. The Wilhelmplatz and the Wilhelmstrasse present a gruesome picture. There was nothing to be done except to press everybody available into service and wait for rain, which came later in the day.

Gradually we are learning to accustom ourselves again to a primitive standard of living. In the morning in Goering Strasse there is no heat, no light, no water. One can neither shave nor wash. One must get up in the shelter by the light of a burning candle.

I got up at an ungodly hour with my head throbbing worse than ever before. All day long headaches pursue me. What of it? I simply must go to work. I drive straight to the office to wash and shave. I am very much hampered in my work. All telephone lines are down; I can reach the outside world only with the help of messengers. Most of the Reich ministries have been bombed out. Ministers and departmental heads can be found only with difficulty. That makes my work more difficult in some respects, but easier in others.

I had the various gau authorities report to me in a conference about the general situation. Critical conflagrations are still raging in some sections of the city, but surface fires have stopped.

Fire-fighting units have been summoned in large numbers from other cities as far away as Hamburg and Breslau. These are naturally a great help to us. Petzke has tried to organise food supplies, but it is extremely difficult because the streets have not yet been cleared and supply lorries can't get into the destroyed areas. I must therefore do everything to get communications started again. The streets must be cleared before repairing the worst damage. For this, however, the manpower available is not sufficient. The Wehrmacht must therefore help, not only with troops stationed in this defence area, but from others as well. The Wehrmacht supported my plans willingly and promised to furnish me in twenty-four hours with two-and-a-half divisions, or 50,000 men. These 50,000 men are to do nothing except clear the main traffic arteries of the Reich capital so that motorized transport may be resumed, and the most necessary articles of food and necessities conveyed into the bombed-out sections.

I have received detailed reports from various sections. It appears that even more bombs were dropped on the workers' quarters, especially on Wedding, than in the government section, although this looks like a heap of rubble.

We must now face the problem of evacuation to emergency quarters. About 400,000 people in Berlin are without shelter. Some are lodged in municipal emergency quarters, others must spend their nights in underground tunnels. But I hope in two or three days to solve this problem too.

The first trains of homeless people left the city. But the Berliners have so far refused to make much use of them. Everybody wants to stay here to save the things most needed, and to await further developments. This morning no papers came out. I am doing everything possible to see that at least a few newspapers make their appearance on the streets. The papers with a circulation outside Berlin, especially, must resume publication because of the effect on foreign countries. The Deutscher Verlag remained unhurt, thank God, so that we can have most of the Berlin dailies printed there. Papers appearing twice daily must be reorganized on a once-a-day basis.

[The Deutscher Verlag was Berlin's largest publishing house and commercial printing plant. It was for generations the property of the Ullstein family and was officially known as The Ullstein Verlag until the Nazis in pursuance of their anti-Semitic policies compelled the Ullstein Brothers to sell out for a song. The name was then changed to Deutscher Verlag.]

The potato situation in the Reich is not so serious as to prevent us in an exceptional case like this from making a special allotment. I also ordered that Berliners should get fifty grammes of extra meat per week. Ten cigarettes are being distributed to everybody, also some other delicacies. If everybody gets something into his stomach, and is given something to stimulate nerves strained to breaking-point, it helps a lot all round.

On the Fuehrer's orders I am now to organize an air-raid inspection service based on my experience in Berlin. Inspectors are to travel to all regions in which air raids have not yet taken place and to test the anti-aircraft facilities. This air-raid inspection is to be under my chairmanship and is to have authority to issue orders. I consider this inspection extremely important.

The midday news report pictures the situation in Berlin as still very serious. Contrary to expectations, the number of people killed is, thank God, quite low. During the first air raid we registered 1,500 and during the second about 1,200 dead. I attribute these low figures chiefly to my evacuation measures, to far-sighted emergency measures, and to the good sense of the Berlin population.

There is no dearth of food, but for the present we are unable to deliver it. The problem of people without shelter is naturally a pressing one, for it is hard to control a great mass of people without a roof over their heads. The Fuehrer ordered the Reich Chancellery to be opened to the homeless. I issued similar instructions about my residence in Hermann Goering Strasse. Of course it is hardly usable, as it is still partly filled with water, has no heating, and the taps give no water. For the present, therefore, we shall have to make a great number of people spend their nights in the underground. But the Berlin population is very patient about it.

What the enemy press is writing about the raids on Berlin simply can't be beaten for impudence. Their triumphant tone is enough to make one go mad. Accompanying their reports is an ultimatum to the German people to the effect that the end of the Reich capital will have come unless it offers to capitulate. Churchill, Roosevelt, and Stalin allegedly are to meet soon to launch this ultimatum.

The enemy now places his hopes chiefly on breaking down our morale. In an appeal to the Berliners I am calling their attention to what is at stake and what these days must prove. Not only the German people but all foreign countries are looking to developments in Berlin with bated breath. Some foreign newspapers have expressed undisguised approval of the Berliners' morale during these exceedingly heavy air raids.

Compared with all these problems, of what importance is the speech that the English King delivered in Parliament? It is as inane as can be, and bubbles over with childish phrases. England, he maintains, has won victory with the aid of God. He lavishes special praise on Stalin, the murderer of the Czars. He praises the successes attained by English arms, but forgets to add that it was the weapons of air pirates operating chiefly with blockbusters to destroy dwellings. He feigns hypocritical sympathy with hungry India, and for the rest entrusts England's cause to God. This cheap, bigoted hypocrisy really makes one's blood boil.

After a short alert in the evening, which, however, was not followed by a raid, I was able at last to make a tour of some of the ruined sections of the city.

I drove via the Tiergarten, Zoo, Knie, and Kaiserdamm. What I saw was truly shattering. The whole Tiergarten quarter has been destroyed, so has the section round the Zoo. While the outer façades of the great buildings are still standing, everything inside is burned to the ground. This is true especially of the buildings all about the Zoo—Ufa Palace, Gloria Palace, the Kaiser Wilhelm Memorial Church, Romanisches Café, etc. The Kurfuerstendamm looks terrible, not to speak of the Knie. Here you see nothing but remnants of walls and debris. Along the Kaiserdamm everything is still burning but the fire department hopes to master the situation in the course of the night. Groups of people scamper across the streets like veritable ghosts. Your heart turns in your body as you go through these parts. How beautiful Berlin was at one time and how run-down and woebegone it now looks! But of what avail are all this sorrow and pain? They won't change conditions. This war must be seen through. It is better that our workers should crawl into cellars than that they should be sent to Siberia as slave labour. Every decent German realizes this.

Arriving in Schwanenwerder about midnight seemed like being transported into paradise. Here everything is as though we were at peace. The house is delightfully warm. I can wash again, take a bath; telephone and radio are functioning; in short, for a few hours I enjoy a happiness which I thought I no longer deserved. It is not hard to imagine what thoughts keep stirring.

I worked for another hour and then fell into a deep, dreamless sleep. When I awoke, the whole tragedy of the hard-hit city was again on my mind. I shall leave nothing undone to insure some kind of decent life for the unfortunate people who were stricken by this catastrophe.

November 26, 1943

The English are achieving nothing with their attempts to unload the responsibility for air warfare on us. Everybody in Germany knows that the English started it and that the blood guilt falls on them. The English now openly admit the terrorist intentions underlying their air raids. They talk with brutal cynicism about the blockbusters that were at work on the capital and which will continue to come.

In the early afternoon I visited the Reich Chancellery. It looks terrible. All the rooms that were once so beautiful and dear to us are now destroyed, burned out or full of water. My heart turned in my body when I saw all that has been destroyed here by air raids. During lunch in the Reich Chancellery, I had a talk with Lammers. He wants to have his main headquarters in the Fuehrer's bunker in the Reich Chancellery. I think he's right. According to a directive by the Fuehrer, the ministries and other highest offices of the Reich are to remain in Berlin just as long as possible. I regard this directive as extremely effective psychologically. I have no intention of leaving Berlin anyway. I shall stay here as long as there is even the remnant of a wall. Difficulties have arisen over the fact that homeless people have been lodged in the bunkers of the chancellery, but I hope soon to transfer them to other quarters.

The appearance of the Wilhelmsplatz has already undergone quite a change. The fires are out, the atmosphere is clear, smoke has disappeared. There is no blaze left to extinguish. In short, although one sees bare ruins of buildings projecting into the air, the most serious catastrophe has already been overcome. It is remarkable how fast everything goes. I thought it would take weeks; in reality only two days were needed. I have now installed the air inspections for other air gaus, as ordered by the Fuehrer. The Fuehrer will give me extensive plenary powers, including the right to issue orders. Advice alone won't do.

At last I have got the Fuehrer to agree on our giving two types of air alert in Berlin: one, a genuine alert, when bomber formations are on their way here, the other a mere warning in case of a few nuisance planes. That is necessary, for I don't want to throw a city of four-and-a-half millions into a panic every night merely because of two Mosquitoes. While the Fuehrer has given his permission for this differentiation between types of alerts for Berlin only, I hope this method can be applied soon in other gaus also. In future, broadcasting stations are no longer to interrupt their programmes when nuisance planes appear; they are to do it only when large bomber formations fly into the Reich.

In the evening the situation at first appeared somewhat critical. Fires have broken out again in many places, so that Berlin is still ablaze. I instructed Helldorf to resume fire fighting energetically. As soon as phosphorus dries, it begins to ignite again.

I arranged with Bormann and Ley for political leaders from other gaus to be placed at my disposal in large numbers, for I must now and then replace my own officials, especially the Kreisleiters, or they will collapse physically.

I keep receiving reports about the increasing seriousness of the situation in France. Many people even claim that an uprising will take place there sooner or later. I don't believe, however, that things are as critical as they are made out.

November 27, 1943

Last night it was Frankfurt's turn to suffer fairly heavy attacks. The damage is not too bad, except for cultural monuments. Thus, for instance, the Goethe House has been hit. One's feelings are already so blunted by air raids that this hardly seems like sacrilege. There's nothing one can do about it anyway! Air raids hang over us like fate.

As a marginal note, it may be recorded that the Duce is suddenly singing a Socialist song. He has installed an Italian Social Republic, as he calls his new Fascist State. I don't believe much will result from it. Fascism is compromised too badly to put a social-revolutionary movement on its feet.

As regards our situation in the East, the enemy credits us with more than we really have. Our difficulties there are enormous, chiefly because of the weather. Our attack did not really get under way. It got stuck, as it were, in the mud. We had expected so much of it, and so little came of it. We are having a streak of bad luck this year that is simply unique. All one can do is to hope that it may before long change into an equally enduring streak of good luck.

During the last ten days, thank God, our casualties have not been too high. They totalled 6,473 killed in action, among them 180 officers; 26,000 wounded; 3,800 missing. That is bearable. On the other hand sickness has increased, and, above all, the troops' morale has sunk, physically and spiritually, because of our continuous retreats. They must be given a rest and an opportunity for recreation to recuperate.

In the morning I undertook an extended trip through the damaged areas of Berlin. Sometimes I'd like to close my eyes so as not to see all this horror. The diplomatic quarter along the Tiergarten looks like one gigantic heap of rubble. One can hardly pass through the streets, so deeply are they covered with debris. At one point, when the rubble of the "Rheingold" was just being blasted, I had to wait because the streets were roped off. The Berliners gather around my car. I was amazed at their excellent spirit. Nobody cries, nobody complains. People slapped me on the back familiarly, gave me good advice, prevented me from continuing because, as they put it, nothing must happen to me since I am still very much needed. In short, the morale shown here by the Berlin population is simply magnificent.

[Soon after the Nazis came into power they reserved a special section along the Tiergarten as a diplomatic quarter and gradually eased various foreign missions which had hitherto been scattered all over the city out of their buildings and persuaded them to go to the new section. This made it much simpler for the Gestapo to check on the comings and goings of visitors.

The Rheingold was a famous wine restaurant near the Potsdamer Platz.]

Letters addressed to me breathe a very resolute and manly spirit. Berlin is appealed to with the slogan, "Persevere and don't give in!" That isn't necessary, for we won't do that anyway. My articles are praised most warmly, especially by soldiers at the front. Now it's the turn of the front to encourage the people at home. It does this very eloquently. Only the complaints about the rear zones continue. The Fuehrer is now determined to do some general house-cleaning there. He ordered the Wehrmacht to release at least a million soldiers from the rear zones for combat duty. I don't believe the Wehrmacht can do it, but it will nevertheless squeeze out a certain number. If I were the Fuehrer, I would appoint a man of calibre and make him responsible for this work. I believe if he had full powers and were a real man, he would perform the miracle of getting the million combat soldiers out of the Wehrmacht itself.

At noon I had a long talk with Speer. The punishment Berlin took has shaken Speer considerably. Even though industrial plants were not hit very badly, nevertheless things of irreplaceable value have been destroyed. He is somewhat sceptical about our prospects in air warfare, especially since reprisals can begin only in March. The zero hour is being postponed again and again. That's the terror of terrors. If we could only strike back at the English soon! But, look where you will, no such possibility is to be seen.

Schaub took me through the Fuehrer's private apartments. These have been completely destroyed. It makes me sad to find these rooms, in which we enjoyed so many hours of spiritual uplift, in such a condition.

With Naumann and Schaub, I then took another trip through the damaged areas. We also stopped at some soup kitchens. I inquired into even the smallest details. The people show a touching devotion. The misery that meets my eyes is indescribable. My heart is convulsed at the sights. But we must grit our teeth. Sometimes I have the impression that the Berliners are almost in a religious trance. Women come up to me and lay their hands on me in blessing, imploring God to preserve me. All that is very touching. But then I am doing everything I can for the people. The meals are everywhere praised as excellent. People without shelter are gradually being provided with quarters. They are weighed down with sorrow about loved ones who fell, but are getting over it. The attitude and morale of the population are exemplary. We shall never lose the war for reasons of morale.

I took several women from the soup kitchens with me and had them driven to other parts of the city, where they could not get with normal transport facilities. They are more than happy. Show these people small favours, and you can wrap them around your finger. I can hardly believe that this city started a revolution in November 1918. It would never have happened under my leadership.

Work and nothing but work piles in on me at my office. In addition I must write my speech for the Sunday demonstration of the Hitler Youth as quickly as possible. I am going to say some pointed things in it about England. This time I'm going to draw on my lexicon of abuse. I must use hard-boiled, invidious language in dealing with England. That's the kind of talk people want to hear today.

The Ministry has become a bit more habitable again. The windows have either been pasted over with paper, or cardboard has replaced glass. But at least the rooms are warm again so that one can work.

In the early evening attention was naturally focused on the question of a possible air raid. At first it looked as though everything was to be perfectly harmless, and that only nuisance planes would fly over us. Then a stronger formation started after all for Frankfurt-on-Main and we received news that this city would be attacked again. But that was merely a camouflage manoeuvre. The English turned off from Frankfurt unnoticed and sneaked over the Thuringian Forest toward Berlin. In Berlin it was at first doubtful whether any alert should be sounded at all, as it seemed that only nuisance planes were approaching. Suddenly, however, we realized that a major attack was again in the offing. It had merely been camouflaged cleverly to mislead our fighter planes. The starry sky was clear so that the fighters, once they got here, could take a hand splendidly. They did arrive at the last moment, thank God.

And then things started. Once again a major attack descended upon the Reich capital. This time it wasn't the centre of the city that was the target as much as the suburbs of Wedding and Reinickendorf, and particularly the large munitions plants in Reinickendorf. Some of the main traffic crossings in the centre of the city also were badly hit, among them the Spittelmarkt and the Gendarmenmarkt. But the important thing was the damage to industry. The news that the Alkett plant was on fire was especially depressing. Alkett is our most important factory for the production of field artillery. There we produce one half of our entire output of these guns, amounting to 200 pieces. That must not be lost. In agreement with the Fuehrer, I ordered the fire-department companies to be concentrated on Alkett, but they arrived a bit too late. For hours we discussed the question whether the Alkett factory could be saved. I sent Helldorf there. Companies of the fire department and of auxiliary troops were hurried out to Alkett. Nevertheless they could not prevent the assembly hall from burning to the ground. That is a heavy blow. The Fuehrer, too, is very much depressed.

I then drove quickly to the Deutsches Theatre and the Kammer-spiele, which were also on fire. We did succeed in so localizing the fires that the theatres on the whole have remained more or less intact. Unfortunately I had to withdraw the fire fighters from the theatres at a critical moment and send them to Alkett to the big industrial plants. Nevertheless we are able to save the theatres.

[The Deutsches Theatre and the Kammerspiele were contiguous and before the Nazi regime belonged to Max Reinhardt.]

The scenes at the Gendarmenmarkt were horrible. All around it whole rows of houses are ablaze. The State Playhouse alone is still undamaged. But how much longer? I fear its days, too, are numbered, if enemy air raids continue.

[The Gendarmenmarkt was one of the most attractive squares in Berlin. In the centre stood the Staatstheater, or State Playhouse, a beautiful building constructed by Frederick the Great's famous architect, Schinkel. It was flanked on one side by the Garrison Church and on the other by the French Church, erected by French Huguenots. Along its sides were offices, chiefly of the clothing trade.]

Back to the bunker at the Wilhelmplatz. The situation has become even more alarming, since one industrial plant after another has been set on fire. The main damage, however, is at Alkett.

The sky above Berlin is bloody, deep red, and awe-inspiringly beautiful. I just can't stand looking at it. . . . It seems as though all the elements of fate and nature have conspired against us to create difficulties. If only frost would set in, so that our tanks might move again in the East!

Profound peace prevails in Schwanenwerder. I had only a brief restless sleep. What a life we are leading! Who could have prophesied that when I was born! I don't believe anyone could be leading a more dramatic and nerve-racking life. Nevertheless it has great and impelling impulses. One must throw oneself into this life with abandon both to taste it to the full and to help to shape it. Later generations will not only admire us but be jealous that life entrusted us with such tremendous tasks.

November 28, 1943

The British are greatly over-estimating the damage done to Berlin. Naturally it is terrible, but there is no question of twenty-five per cent of the capital no longer existing. The English naturally want to furnish their public with a propaganda morsel. I have every reason to want them to believe this and therefore forbid any denial. The sooner London is convinced that there is nothing left of Berlin, the sooner they will stop their air offensive against the Reich capital.

This time the munitions industry was especially hard hit. The Alkett works received a blow from which they won't recover easily. At Borsig's, too, there was tremendous destruction. It must be remembered that Borsig produces a large percentage of our gun output and has 18,000 employees. Naturally everything is being done to get munitions production started again. But that is more easily said than done.

In the evening, the so-called "Calais Soldiers' Broadcast", which evidently originates in England and uses the same wave length as Radio Deutschland when the latter is cut out during air raids, gave us something to worry about. The station does a very clever job of propaganda and from what is put on the air one can gather that the English know exactly what they have destroyed in Berlin and what they have not.

Ellgerin was given special orders by me to find alternative quarters and shelters for the homeless. Ellgerin has had a vast amount of experience in this matter in the West. He promised to see that, within twenty-four hours at the latest, everybody would have at least a roof over his head. It's high time for the people to get out of the underground tunnels, for that's no way to live. Infectious diseases start there; possibly they are even breeding places for political decadence. This won't do at all.

At noon I and my colleagues addressed the Reich Cabinet. . . . The Cabinet was extremely interested and for the first time in its history broke into applause at the end of my talk.

London reports that more than a million people met their death in Berlin. That, of course, is arrant nonsense, for the number of fatal casualties due to three heavy air raids totals between three and four thousand. But I am not issuing any denial of these exaggerations. The sooner the English believe there's no life left in Berlin, the better for us.

The Soviets are outdoing themselves in their demand for unconditional German surrender. They ask us for 1,600,000,000 gold marks as reparations and declare quite insolently that they don't want this sum paid to them in cash, but instead will regain all Germany's production facilities plus the workers to be surrendered to them. We would rather defend the last remnants of our walls than accede to such mad demands.

The English are already giving hypocritical support to these insane Soviet requirements. They naturally would like to use this occasion to mortgage the entire future of Germany. The English would then have no further worries in Europe, at least as they see it. The most surprising thing about the whole matter is that nobody in England seems to recognize that once the Soviet Union is in Europe, it will be a much more dangerous opponent of the British Empire.

There was a storm in a teapot in the Hungarian Parliament. The representative of the Small Peasants' party delivered a speech in which he protested vigorously against Hungary's participation in the war and berated the Reich. This speech is really the climax in meanness to an ally. But one must not take the Hungarians too seriously. They have lost their nerve and are acting crazily.

November 29, 1943

We spent a quiet evening. This was balm for the wounds of the Reich capital. I started early from Schwanenwerder for the Hitler Youth demonstration in Steglitz. Fortunately the Titania Palace is undamaged, so that our meeting for the Hitler Youth and their parents could be held there. Axmann awaited me.

As we enter the cinema hall, earsplitting applause greeted me. Never before have I seen the Berlin public so receptive to a message as now. My address seemed to be made to order. The public broke into stormy applause at every fighting phrase. I believe this speech will make a very deep impression not only on the German people but on the entire world. I am very happy that I spoke, despite the objections which were raised. The right word at the right time sometimes achieves miracles.

The Berlin munition industry is still in bad shape. Alkett is almost completely destroyed, and, worst of all, valuable and virtually irreplaceable tools and machines have been put out of commission. The English aimed so accurately that one might think spies had pointed their way.

It's surprising that the theatres and cinemas have opened their doors again and that people are fairly streaming into them. There are queues before all of them. People crave recreation after the gruelling days and nights of the past week. They want solace for their souls.

I drove to Reinickendorf and Wedding. At the Gartenplatz I took part in feeding the public. The men and women workers received me with an enthusiasm as unbelievable as it was indescribable. This section of Wedding, all around Acker Street, was at one time full of Reds. I should never have thought it possible that such a transformation of spirit and viewpoint could take place. . . .

I had to eat with the people and was lifted on to a box to talk to them. I delivered a very earthy and slangy speech which won the hearts of the workers. Everybody accosted me with "Du" and called me by my first name. The people wanted to carry me on their shoulders across the Platz and I had difficulty preventing it. Women embraced me. I had to give my autograph. Cigarettes were distributed and I smoked one with them. In short, people were in as high spirits as if they were at a carnival.

Naturally the destruction is enormous, but insofar as the people themselves are involved, they take it with the best of humour. They are firmly convinced that we shall be able to overcome all difficulties. They have only praise for the measures thus far taken.

Wedding itself is for the most part a shambles. The same is true of Reinickendorf.

I took leave of the people. There were deeply touching scenes. One woman had given birth to a child during an air raid two or three days ago; nevertheless she insisted on getting up when she heard I had come, dressed, and hurried to the Platz. We can never lose this war because of defective morale.

I discussed at length with Dr. Ley how we can get the men back to work who have not yet returned to their factories. We shall have to do something to stimulate this. We want especially to give cigarettes and liquor to workers who return on time, and beyond that to appeal to their sense of duty, which is by no means a thankless task in the case of Berlin workers. Work must be resumed as quickly as possible. Also, the workers must help to clear the rubble. They must not leave that to the soldiers, who know nothing whatever about the plants, and possibly are destroying more than they are putting in order. The Berliner will stand on his head for a cigarette!

I was called by the Fuehrer's G.H.Q. The Fuehrer and all his colleagues are enthusiastic about my speech and in full agreement with it. They characterize Berlin as a combat company that is doing its duty with the finest esprit de corps.

The Fuehrer has issued a decree to the Wehrmacht to reform conditions in the Army's rear zones. I place this decree chiefly on the credit side of my ledger, for my incessant appeals to the Fuehrer contributed essentially to its being issued.

November 30, 1943

London replied to my speech in the Titania Palace with an outburst of anger. The fact, especially, that I described the English airmen as cowards has made the blood of the English propagandists boil.

A typically English thing is happening in London, where a prayer racket for India has been organized. The bishops and priests have been mobilized for it. They are to address fervent prayers to God to let the Indians have the food which the English stole from them!

Exposés about the Duce and his entourage written by Professor Preziosi were submitted to me. They are very depressing. Despite his grave debacle the Duce has learned nothing. He is still surrounded by traitors, former Freemasons and Jew-lovers who give him consistently wrong advice. His son, Vittorio, is playing a pretty loathsome role, not so much because of his lack of character as because of his stupidity. It is nauseating to read these reports. The Duce has learned nothing and forgotten nothing.

My visit to Wedding has had a tremendous effect on the working-class population there. Veritable legends about it are being spread throughout the northern and eastern quarters of the city. We make no mention of it in the press; it is much better that propaganda by word of mouth should do its work.

I discussed a number of personnel questions with Bormann. He, too, is worried about German foreign policy. Ribbentrop is too rigid to be able to spin his web in this difficult war situation. But I don't believe the Fuehrer is ready to part company with his Foreign Minister. Yet Ribbentrop would not be able to negotiate either with London or with Moscow were such an eventuality to arise. Both sides consider him too heavily compromised.

Bormann expressed himself as very much concerned over the war in general. It is so hard to get the Fuehrer to make any decision, and of course we can't win the war with morale alone; we must have arms and manpower. Our arms production, however, is being destroyed by enemy air raids to a very noticeable degree.

ROOSEVELT, CHURCHILL AND STALIN MEET AT TEHERAN. ALLIED RAIDS ON GERMANY CONTINUE. YUGOSLAV PARTISANS FORBID KING PETER TO RETURN. PRESIDENT INONU CONFERS AT CAIRO WITH ROOSEVELT AND CHURCHILL. RUSSIANS HALT GERMAN COUNTER-OFFENSIVE IN KIEV AREA. CHURCHILL ILL WITH PNEUMONIA. EISENHOWER NAMED SUPREME COMMANDER. FOR INVASION OF WESTERN EUROPE. BATTLESHIP SCHARNHORST SUNK OFF NORWAY. December 4, 1943

A speech which Smuts has delivered in London is truly sensational. He declared that the Reich would disappear from the map for a long time. That's nothing new to us. Then, however, he continued with observations which must be taken more seriously—to the effect that the Soviets would become masters of Europe. The Russian colossus would dominate the entire European continent. England would come out of this war with honour and glory but poor as a beggar. The United States would in large measure be the heir to the British Empire. England would no longer have much to say in Europe since the Soviet Union would take its place.

I received a detailed report about the situation in the East from Major Voss, who for more than a year has been on duty on the Eastern Front at various command points. Passing over many things already known to me, the essential thing appeared to be Major Voss's emphasis on the fact that we made a big mistake in not evacuating the male population in time from regions about to be abandoned. During their advance the Soviets immediately recruited this male population for their troops. Most men were not even given uniforms but are merely wearing a red armband. In this way Stalin secured some 400,000 to 500,000 soldiers for himself in a very simple way. As long as we left the male population directly behind the front lines, the danger of Partisan formations could not be eliminated. Major Voss's report seemed so important to me that I shall send it as an item of information to the Fuehrer.

Incidentally, the information which I send to the Fuehrer always attracts extraordinary attention at G.H.Q. and much use is made of it. Usually the Fuehrer takes my reports to the staff conference to bring them to the notice of his generals.

Our hate propaganda against England is falling on most fertile soil with the German people. My speech in the Titania Palace is regarded as one of the most effective to have issued from the mouth of any German during this war.

In Italy the enemy has started new assaults on our front. They have succeeded here and there in making inroads. But considerable reserves of ours are on the march, so that people in the Fuehrer's G.H.Q. are not worrying about further developments. The operations are chiefly under Jodl's command. But Jodl does not seem to me any too competent at evaluating a critical military situation. He has so often been wrong in his prognoses that personally I am unable to drop my worries about the southern Italian front.

December 5, 1943

We have received a valuable report via Lisbon about the domestic situation in England. According to it the fear of German retaliation is almost indescribable, especially in the English capital. The English have a bad conscience.

According to the English yellow press, the conference of the Big Three is to decide on military plans of great magnitude against Germany. The Anglo-Americans have asked Stalin for airports within the territory of the Soviet Union so as to be able to bombard Germany from the east as well. Churchill again intends to cede the whole of eastern Germany to the Poles as an equivalent for the Soviet's laying claim to eastern Poland. I can hardly imagine that the leading English statesmen are so stupid and shortsighted as to put that sort of an estimate on Bolshevism. Stalin won't think of fulfilling obligations he has entered upon with England and America.

In the margin I may note that the French press took sharp issue with Smuts because he claimed that France has lost her position as a Great Power.

Rediess, head of the higher S.S. and police in Norway, has visited the Fuehrer to report on the Oslo students. The Fuehrer was distinctly put out—and rightly so—at the sledge-hammer fashion in which this question has been handled. The Fuehrer is also sceptical about the success to be expected. Undoubtedly it would have been possible to achieve an essentially greater effect with less effort, for there are only a couple of dozen rebels among the Oslo students and these could have been arrested without the public noticing it. Most decidedly it was a big mistake to arrest all the students in Oslo. Terboven is especially to be blamed for not having informed the Fuehrer before taking action. The whole affair would have run an entirely different course had he done so.

The Swedish Government has protested to us because of the arrest of the Oslo students. At the Fuehrer's orders this protest is to be answered by Ribbentrop in the sharpest language. Naturally we can't beat a retreat on this Oslo student question now. But it would have been better to think matters over beforehand rather than afterwards.

Unfortunately the air raid on Leipzig last night was exceedingly severe and fateful. The city was not prepared for such a massive attempt at terrorization. The fire department was not adequate. As a result whole rows of houses went up in smoke. The centre of the city was especially hard hit. Almost all public buildings, theatres, the university, the Supreme Court, exhibition halls, et cetera, have either been completely destroyed or seriously damaged. About 150,000 to 200,000 people are without shelter.

December 6, 1943

The Conference in Teheran has become something of a mystery. The enemy has so far refrained from issuing any sort of informative communiqué about it, so that we are still groping in the dark. There are a number of conjectures, however, about it, but they contradict each other and therefore have no political value. In the spring, after the German cities have been reduced to ruins, the English allegedly want to start the invasion. Of course chills run down their backs even at the use of this word. They want, above all, to intensify their air offensive against us during January, because that is the coldest month and it is to be expected that air raids will then affect German morale more adversely.

In the evening it is claimed that an editorial committee has been appointed in Teheran to compose an appeal to the German people. But that appeal is not forthcoming! At any rate we have already taken massive countermeasures in our propaganda against anything of the kind. If it should actually come, it will find us by no means unprepared. The German people will surely treat it as a scrap of paper which has no political significance.

In Sweden and Finland the turmoil about the Oslo students continues. Ribbentrop received the Swedish Chargé d'Affaires in Berlin and gave him a very juicy and cutting reply to the Swedish demarche. His reply summarizes all the reasons why it ill becomes the Swedes to raise an accusing finger in this matter. Nevertheless the whole Oslo affair stinks. The Fuehrer is quite angry about the way it was handled. He received two representatives of Terboven and gave them an energetic scolding. Terboven has once more behaved like a bull in a china shop. Himmler is furious about the effects of Terboven's action. He was going to enlist about 40,000 to 60,000 volunteers in Norway during the coming months. Prospects for this seemed to be excellent. By Terboven's stupid action a good deal of the plan has fallen through. Here you can see again what dire consequences result if everybody does as he pleases. It was Terboven's duty to seek the Fuehrer's advice in this matter; the Fuehrer would surely have absolutely forbidden the coup he had planned.

December 7, 1943

In the morning we were still ignorant of what happened at Teheran. Everybody is tense and full of expectation. As a result, there is very little news, because the entire world news machinery is geared to the long-awaited Teheran communiqué. In the evening it was at last issued. It is neither flesh nor fowl. There is no talk whatever about any appeal to the German people. One might expect that a little more would result from three days of conference, but apparently Stalin could not agree to Churchill's and Roosevelt's plans. Stalin was undoubtedly the guiding spirit of the Teheran Conference. It is like a blow in the face when they talk of democracy, freedom of the peoples, and the elimination of intolerance and slavery in a document bearing his signature. I believe that the plan for an appeal to the German people was dropped mainly because of our anticipatory propaganda. I regard this communiqué as a complete German victory.

In the evening I telephoned my commentary on the Teheran Conference to the Fuehrer. He expressed complete agreement with it. He, too, is of the opinion that the communiqué reveals anything but success. We can publish it almost verbatim in the German press; it contains nothing dangerous to us. I imagine that our seed is at last beginning to sprout. If things develop further on these lines, we may yet find ourselves facing undreamed-of changes in the general situation this winter.

□ Goering travelled west, on the Fuehrer's orders, to prepare a retaliatory blow against England. We need about 200 heavy four-motored planes for it. They are to fly to England twice in the course of one night and strike a heavy blow against the British capital. Naturally we cannot repeat such an assault as often as we would like, but it will give the English something to think about. I expect great psychological results from it.

I now hope to reach an agreement with Rosenberg about the question of managing the press in the occupied Eastern areas. Rosenberg's collaborators complain bitterly that it is impossible to work with him because he is too rigid. They say he has an inferiority complex as regards myself, which leads to a number of differences for which there is no real reason.

Reuter reports that Count Ciano has been executed. Unfortunately this report does not correspond with the facts.

The great task of the hour is to see that law and order prevail in the occupied areas. In Copenhagen, for instance, a German soldier was shot. The military levied a penalty of two million marks on the city. That's an effective method of punishment. You have to grab the Danes by their purse strings. They are most sensitive there.

The English are waging war in Italy most effectively. It is by no means true that they lack combat experience. On the contrary, they are making very clever use of every advantage. Their most striking advantage is their superiority in the air. Every day they lay a curtain of bombs on us in numbers hitherto unknown in this war. In southern Italy one can speak of battles comparable, in the amount of equipment expended, to those of World War I in the West.

December 8, 1943

The enemy press naturally accompanies the Teheran Conference and the communiqué with the required anthems of jubilation. When Reuter declares that the communiqué is tantamount to a military death sentence for the Axis, the obvious reply is that military verdicts of death are written not in conference but on the field of battle.

It was to be expected that the communiqué would be characterized as the "Magna Carta of the Twentieth Century". The whole world is to be reorganized for centuries to come. But who still cares about these phrases and subterfuges? To me what seems much more important is that even the English admit that Stalin undoubtedly dominated the conference. The English journalists claim that Stalin had grown very grey and that there were deep furrows of worry on his brow. That is easily understandable.

The German press and radio are attacking the Teheran Conference communiqué in a big way. Our reply is biting and insolent; we pour buckets of irony and derision over the conference. Our sarcasm is superior and I must say German propaganda has reached the very heights of what can be achieved in publicity.

At noon I addressed a meeting at the People's Theatre in celebration of German Railwaymen's Day. Even as I stepped on the stage a veritable hurricane of applause greeted me, such as I experienced only in the time of our struggle for power. Every point I made evoked an enthusiastic echo from the railway workers. The spirit shown was excellent, and in no respect inferior to that of the recent Hitler Youth demonstration at the Titania Palace. The people were simply mad with enthusiasm when I pointed out what the enemy intended to do against German war morale in the way of propaganda.

December 9, 1943

A pompous, phrase-laden communiqué has been issued about Roosevelt's and Churchill's meeting with Inonu in Cairo. No doubt the Turks consented to this communiqué only because they wanted partly to camouflage their opposition to the Anglo-American demands. It is quite obvious that Turkey is showing no inclination to enter the war in favour of England or the United States, not to speak of the Soviet Union. But the enemy is still not giving up hope.

[General Ismet Inonu succeeded the late Mustapha Kemal Ataturk on November 11, 1938, as Chief of State.]

The second front has now been graciously announced as due within three months, and Churchill declared before his old regiment in North Africa that the year 1944 would bring the decision. We look forward to it with great confidence, for we shall beat the English and Americans back when they attempt an invasion.

A serious epidemic of influenza has broken out in England. The King, too, is ill. How wonderful if the epidemic were to prove fatal! That would exactly suit us. But that's too good to be true.

The Japanese celebrated the beginning of the third year of war. Tojo delivered a speech about Japanese successes to date and also predicted the decision would be reached in 1944. I can only warn him against fixing dates. We have had some very unfortunate experiences in that direction during this war.

How badly we are doing our political job in the East can be seen from the fact that Rosenberg has still not carried out the Fuehrer's order to transfer propaganda there to us. He is doing everything he can to sabotage and torpedo it. I don't understand how the Fuehrer can leave such an obstreperous nincompoop in his job. If I were in his place, I would clear the boards in a hurry. Rosenberg has done more harm than good, not only in the East, but also in the realm of politics generally. It is high time for a show-down.

Lammers, at my request, reported the situation about the Paris propaganda department to the Fuehrer and told him of Ribbentrop's attempt to take it out of my hands via the O.K.W. The Fuehrer was enraged and turned against Ribbentrop, using very harsh and insulting expressions. The Fuehrer described the report given me by Ribbentrop through Minister Ritter as absolutely untrue and mendacious.

The Fuehrer was very much excited during this talk and told von Ribbentrop he would not allow him ever again to approach him privately about such matters. He decided that for the present everything should remain as it is until I've had an opportunity to present the case to the Fuehrer. One can see how unscrupulously Ribbentrop proceeds in such matters and how little true comradeship he shows a colleague. If Ribbentrop is as clever in his foreign policy as he is towards his colleagues in matters of domestic politics, I can well understand why we achieve no notable successes in our dealings with foreign nations.

[The entry for December 9, 1943, was the last found among the Goebbels papers. It is characteristic that the outstanding impression it conveys is of jealousy and disunity among Hitler's entourage.

On June 6, 1944, the invasion of Western Europe was launched.

Hitler committed suicide at 3.30 p.m. on April 30, 1945, in the air-raid bunker of the Reich's Chancellery in Berlin. In his last political testament, drawn up the day before he died, he appointed Doenitz President of the Reich, and Goebbels Chancellor. Goebbels added an "appendix" to this testament, saying that for the first time in his life he "must categorically refuse" to obey the Fuehrer's orders and adding "I believe I am thereby doing the best service to the future of the German people. In the hard times to come, examples will be more important than men. Men will always be found to show the nation the way out of its tribulations, but a reconstruction of the national life would be impossible if it were not inspired by examples that are clear and easily understandable. For this reason, together with my wife and on behalf of my children, who are too young to be able to speak for themselves, and who if they were sufficiently old would agree with this decision without reservation, I express my unalterable decision not to leave the Reich capital even if it falls, and at the side of the Fuehrer to end a life that for me personally will have no further value if I cannot spend it at the service of the Fuehrer and at his side."

Goebbels survived Hitler by twenty-four hours. On May 1, his six children, who were in the bunker, were poisoned. In the evening, after Goebbels had told his adjutant to see to the disposal of their bodies, he and his wife went out into the garden where the corpses of Hitler and Eva Braun had been burnt the day before, and were shot by Goebbels' S.S. orderly. Petrol was poured over them and ignited; their charred bodies, unburied, were found by the Russians next day.]
