WARTIME RATIONING AND CONSUMPTION

(Ser. L.o.N. P. 1942.II.A.2)

Rationing of consumers' goods is becoming increasingly important as a measure to regulate and restrict consumption in the wartime economy.

The chief purpose of this study is to show the impact of rationing and other consumption controls on actual consumption and standards of living in countries for which such information is available. The main emphasis is laid on food rationing and its effects on nutrition and health in the belligerent countries and in those affected by the war. Chapter II gives a comprehensive account as possible of food rations in the spring of 1942. The elaborate systems of differential rationing according to varying needs of various consumers' groups are discussed and comparisons of the nutritive value of rations with normal requirements and with peacetime consumption in the countries affected are given.

Rationing however is not confined to foodstuffs, its scope is steadily widening; a subsequent chapter discusses its application to various other consumers' goods such as clothing, household implements, etc.

A brief consideration of the effects which the wartime restrictions on private spending have had on the aggregate volume of consumption in various countries concludes the study.
