NOTES.

The Sarde Marriage Bill:—This Bill as reported by the Select Committee came up for consideration in the Legislative Assembly on Wednesday. The Select Committee had overhauled the original draft Bill in the light of the criticisms passed on it. It had dropped the clause invalidating child marriages and adopted one prescribing penalties for them. It had made the Bill applicable to all communities and not only to Hindus as the original Bill contemplated. It had defined "child" to mean boy below 18 and girls below 14 years of age. In presenting the revised Bill to the Assembly in March last year, Mr. Sarde moved that it be re-circulated for opinion, as in its new form it contained many important alterations affecting the scope and policy of the measure. It was accordingly sent round. Meanwhile, the Age of Consent Committee was appointed and, although the Bill was not included in its reference, Sir Moropant Joshi and his colleagues on reviewing the operation of the law relating to the age of consent, came independently to the conclusion that the Bill was essential to give effect to the aim of the legislature to protect girls from the consequences of premature consummation which, they found, was more common than was generally known in the country. The Bill when it came up for consideration on Wednesday had, therefore, behind it the weight of the Committee's recommendations based on a wide survey of conditions in the country, and supported by a large volume of public opinion. The effect of this was to convert the Government of India from their earlier attitude of neutrality which, in effect, was one of opposition, to one of cordial and strong support to the Bill. This is one more proof if proof were needed that Indian reformers are not speculative or theoretical agitators, but that they are in close touch with and keenly alive to the vital needs of the population. The grateful acknowledgment of reformers are due to Government for their strong support of this long-delayed measure of reform, which was eloquently voiced by the Home Member, Sir James Crerar, in his speech at an early stage of the debate on Wednesday.

Orthodox Opposition To The Bill:—Orthodox opposition to the Bill was voiced in the Assembly by Mr. M. K. Acharya who has been fighting tooth and nail against the Bill from the first. It is significant, however, that even he did not venture to move the rejection of the Bill as he did last year, but only wanted it to be postponed to the Delhi session three months hence. He knows very well that he is leading a forlorn hope, even Mahomedan members on whom he counted for support having declared themselves not opposed to the Bill. One of the best speeches in the debate was made by Dr. Hyder who mentioned that over 1000 young men, replying to a question put by him as a University examiner, had unanimously declared child marriage to be the main cause of the high death rate in the country. Mr. Price, the European representative from Bombay, quite correctly declared that he could not find one single spot of ill-will against the Bill in the whole of the Bombay Presidency and that those who were trying to postpone the Bill were essentially wreckers of the Bill. The Rev. A. C. Chatterji, voicing the views of the Indian Christian community, strongly opposed Mr. Acharya's motion. The surprise of the debate was the support given to the motion by Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya. Panditjee has lately been showing signs of realising the importance of social reform, and has been advocating the training of Hindu girls in riding, fencing and shooting. He does not yet evidently see that there is not much scope for all these unless girls are redeemed from the crushing burden of early marriage and maternity. The first use which not a few girl-wives would probably make of their knowledge of riding and shooting, will be either to ride away from the forced embraces of their thoughtless, not to say brutal, husbands, or to shoot them dead in desperation as the sole means of escape from the torture of premature cohabitation. Panditjee has rendered distinguished service to the country and the Hindus during his long and gracious public life and we beg of him to add to it signally by throwing the weight of his great authority on the side of the Bill which will be the dawn of hope for millions of Hindu children who look up to him as the father of his people.

An Urgent Appeal:—Mr. Acharya has been so far successful in that he has been able to prolong it till Thursday evening. The next day for non-official business is the 19th instant. But the delay may prove an advantage if Pandit Motilal Nehru who has issued a powerful appeal to members to support the Bill, will attend the Assembly along with other Swaraj members who have been absent in deference to his mandate, and lend the powerful support of voice and vote to carry through a Bill which aims at destroying what he rightly says is a curse which must be completely abolished at all costs. May we suggest to Government that they should at once nominate at least two women members to the Assembly to voice the feelings of their sisters who are in the best position to speak on the merits of the question. The two names which occur are, Mrs. Brijlal Nehru who as a member of the Age of Consent Committee, has acquitted herself with great credit, and Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi, whose indefatigable services in the cause of Indian women, are well-known.

A Strange Decision:—It was announced on Wednesday that the Government of Bombay had ordered the withdrawal of the prosecution of Wahidbux Bhutto and others on charges of abduction and murder of Khanzadi, the wife of a petty Zemindar in Sind. Wahidbux Bhutto is a wealthy Zemindar and member of the Legislative Assembly. He was arrested in January on these charges. The Police placed before the Magistrate the results of the detailed investigation made by the Collector of Larkhana, Mr. Gorwala, I.C.S. The accused were committed to the Sessions to take their trial, and an application to quash the committal was refused so far as it related to Bhutto and some other of the accused by the Additional Judicial Commissioner of Sind, Mr. Aston. This result was announced only a few days ago. The withdrawal of the case at the instance of Government at this stage of the judicial proceedings and in a case of this kind involving charges of abduction and murder, is without a precedent. Government so far have vouchsafed no explanation of their action which savours of undue interference with the administration of Justice. It is to be hoped that a satisfactory explanation will be yet forthcoming. Bhutto might be perfectly innocent of the crime, but having regard to the fact that a strong enough prima facie case had been made out against him to induce the Additional Judicial Commissioner to disallow his application for quashing his committal, the intervention of Government at this stage would appear to be hardly fair even to the accused. The withdrawal of the case against him cannot in the nature of things be as sufficient a proof of his innocence as would have been a verdict of acquittal by the Judicial tribunal to which he was committed.

East African Indian Deputation:—Bombay expressed its sympathy with the cause of Indians in East Africa by according a cordial welcome to the East African Indian Deputation at a meeting held in Jinnah Hall on Wednesday last. Mr. Meyer Nissim who presided summed up the seriousness of the issues involved in the following words: "Kenya is the key to the whole situation. The treatment of our countrymen in East Africa will be the acid test of the position of India in the Empire". The leader of the Deputation, Mr.

J. B. Pandya made a statement in which he presented a balanced and impartial picture of the position of Indians in East Africa. Briefly stated, the grievances of Indians in East Africa are the attempt on the part of the East African Government to force them to accept communal franchise, the reservation of the best lands in Kenya for Europeans and the inadequate provision for education and medical relief. The Deputation is shortly to proceed to England to put their case before the British Government and it is proposed that a British Indian representative should lead it. The one man who is in everybody's mind is the Rt. Hon. V. S. Sastri who has already laboured so much for the recognition of the equality of status for our countrymen abroad.

Indians in Fiji:—In the course of an interesting article the Rev. A. W. Macmillan points out in Pacific Affairs that the position of the Indian in Fiji compares favourably in some respects with that of his countryman in India. As between the ages of fifteen and forty-five there are ten thousand fewer women than men, widow marriages are not rare and hardly one per cent of the Indian women there, are widows. Though the South Indians have established schools where their mother-tongues are taught, Hindi is the lingua franca of the Colony. Caste has disappeared among them and "they eat, drink and smoke together and even intermarry." They have learnt something of modern agricultural methods and are perhaps half a century ahead of their cousins in ordinary Indian villages in this respect. They have, moreover, better ideas of sanitation. In spite of the fact that the Indian and the native Fijian are temperamentally poles asunder, they are living together in perfect harmony. Realising that educationally they have much leeway to make, the Indians are establishing schools for their children. Unfortunately there is a dark side to this picture and we learn that "the morals of the community have suffered by removal to Fiji and the small proportion of women who were brought to the Colony has led to moral confusion and increased crime." Nothing has risen to take the place of caste as a social organisation and this has resulted in a lack of cohesion and a measure of chaos. But all this is attracting the attention of the Indians and they have now entered on a period of activity and are organising for the betterment of their community.

The Way Out of Wedlock:—Hindu law affords absolutely no remedy for aggrieved Hindu wives. Once they are united in the bonds of matrimony, death alone can release them from the bonds. Ill treatment, cruelty and other acts on the part of husbands, which in any other society constitute grounds for divorce are offences against which there is no redress. A Hindu wife has to grin and bear them all without the hope of a better life. This glaring defect in Hindu law should be remedied if only to save our women from changing their religion in order to discard wicked husbands. The recent case in the Calcutta Court in which a Hindu lady graduate embraced Islam and thus obtained dissolution of her marriage should serve as a warning to the community. This, in our opinion, is the second case of its kind.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.
BOMBAY, SEPTEMBER 7, 1929.

RESCUE WORK.

We reprint today from last week's Young India, a letter from Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi to Mahatma Gandhi asking his blessings for a Bill which she proposes to introduce into the Madras Legislative Council for the rescue of minor girls from immoral surroundings. Prostitutes are, by a wise natural dispensation, barren as a rule, and if the recruitment of infant and minor girls is cut off at its source, the evil will be effectively checked in a large measure. We entirely agree with Mahatmaji that the legislation proposed by Dr. Reddi is not in advance of public opinion and that it will receive support from the whole of the enlightened and even, in some other matters, the unenlightened public. But rescue work only begins and does not end with legislation. Unless we have a number of well-conducted institutions in which the rescued girls can be placed for education and training in some useful art or trade, the rescued girls must perforce be thrown upon the streets and their last state will be worse than their first. We are speaking from recent experience of the immense difficulty of dealing with such girls. A few days ago, a Telugu girl of about 13 or 14 years, a bright, vivacious child, was brought to the Hindu Rescue Home at Matunga, an institution which represents the best and most worthy phase of communal awakening among Hindus. The story as told by the girl was as follows: She and another girl were brought away from their village by a man of their own caste, who was said to be doing some cloth business in Bombay. He sold away the other girl and lodged this one in a Mahomedan's house from which she escaped and was brought to the Matunga Home. The girl could not speak any language but her own and she was, therefore, not quite happy there. She has since been received in a respectable family of Telugus, but it is obviously impossible to keep her permanently there. A registered letter sent to her father, at the address given by her, has brought no reply, though it is over a fortnight since it was posted. In the case of another Telugu girl, who also found her way to the Rescue Home, a reference to the Magistrate of the place from which she came, brought the reply that her mother who was traced did not care what became of her daughter as she had misconducted herself. Her father had gone to another place where the girl's husband was. Before these relatives could be communicated with, the girl ran away from the Home.

The case of the latter girl was brought to the notice of Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi, and she was requested to suggest an institution in Madras to which the girl could be sent, as the Matunga Home was finding great difficulty in dealing with her. Dr. Reddi replied there was no suitable institution in Madras, and she can only think of the Christian Home where all denominations are received. This, in the circumstances, may be the only alternative, but it is clearly not the most satisfactory one. Dr. Reddi says in her letter to Mahatmaji that she herself could rescue many girls if she had some legal power to take away children from criminal parents. Well and good. But she should simultaneously with legislation, apply her mind to thinking out where she would place the girls she rescues. In Calcutta, they have, we think, a Rescue Home conducted on non-denominational lines with Government support. A similar institution may be started in Madras, if it is impossible to start one by private agency. We may also say that the management of such institutions requires considerable knowledge, patience and forethought. In passing, we may suggest that not much good is done by antagonising in season and out of season high-caste Hindus in the attempt to reform existing social evils. After all Mrs. Reddi herself is a high caste Hindu lady and nearly all our reformers from Raja Ram Mohan Roy onwards have been high caste people. We must take people as they are.

The main question is how to get rid of the evils, and it is obvious that this can only be done by enlisting the co-operation of the educated middle class. It would be easier to secure the sympathy and support of all castes, if reformers resist the natural impulse to inveigh as much as possible against those who, they feel, ought to but do not help them sufficiently. The Bombay Home is supported exclusively by high caste Hindus who, in fact, founded it some eighteen months ago and are maintaining it. The high caste Hindu is really not such a callous person as he is often depicted to be. Mahatmaji correctly sums up the situation when he writes:—"Public conscience in this country somehow or other is dormant. It often feels the awfulness of many a wrong, but is too indifferent or too lazy to move. But if some active spirit like Dr. Reddi moves, that conscience is prepared to lend such support as indifference can summon up." We will only add that this is more or less the case in all countries, and if it is more so here than elsewhere, it is because of the habit of subjection bred in us by the absence of self-government with the sense of responsibility it creates in the people for their own destiny. Hence, it is that social reformers who have no enthusiasm for politics as such, are obliged to take their share in the movement to obtain self-government, or as much of it as is immediately possible, for the country.

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XXXVI. DOMESTIC EMPLOYERS.

(BY DR. CLIFFORD MANSHARDT, PH.D.).

The domestic employee is first and above all a person. The fact is very simple, but it has not yet been universally recognized. It is surprising to know the number of people who are prominent in all movements for public welfare, who talk much about brotherhood and social justice, who are passionately in favour of the rights of the working-man, but who in their relationships with their own domestic employees are petty tyrants. If brotherhood is to begin any place, it must begin at home. No dwelling place is large enough to house snobbishness. The mistress of the house may not share the general outlook of her cook, but each is a person and each must respect the personality of the other. Each has a place to fill, and each must live life to the full. There can be no satisfactory household save it is builded upon mutual respect and consideration. "There are diversities of gifts but the same spirit."

Every relationship is two-sided. The master has a definite responsibility towards the servants and the servant has an equally definite responsibility towards the master. A man's family and home are his dearest possessions. He is most careful in choosing those who will be intimately associated with his loved ones. He has a genuine concern in the reliability of those who care for his finest treasures. He trusts, and he has the right to expect that his trust be not betrayed. It is expected of a domestic employee that he prove himself faithful.

What a blessing is willingness. Two servants enter the employ of the same household. Both perform their duties—the one as a slave driven to his task, the other with goodwill. The one regards work as a duty. The other regards work as a privilege. For the one, work is ceaseless drudgery. For the other, work is a means of self-expression. The first regards the householder as an antagonist. The second regards the householder as a friend. The first is bondman. The second is free. He has found his freedom in the joy of willing service.

The traditions of domestic service are worthy ones. The intelligence and devotion of elderly domestics serving in the homes of their childhood are a pleasant memory to thousands of men and women. Many of childhood's happiest experiences were the result of simple kindness on the part of friendly servants. Many of life's first lessons in character building were learned from the lips and actions of great-souled domestics. Heirs to a high tradition, it is the privilege of domestic employees that they "walk worthy of the vocation wherein they are called."

MR. KELKAR ON THE OBJECTS OF THE MAHASABHA.

The fifth session of the Bengal Provincial Hindu Conference was held last week. There was a good gathering of delegates and visitors. Mr. N. C. Kelkar, in the course of his presidential address said :

We have got only India wherein to organize and reinforce the Hindu religion and culture. We have not, in this respect, advantages which the Mahomedans and much more so which the Christians enjoy. There is hardly a country in the world where there are no Christians. The Mahomedans can look beyond the Indian Frontier, and see as far as Constantinople to get at least inspiration, if not material help. It is true that with the end of Khilafat, a great shock has been given to the spirit of Mahomedan fraternity, to which was given the name of Pan Islamism. But just as Christianity exists without the rule of the Pontiff at Rome, the Mahomedan Religion, as a religion, exists in spite of the deposition of the Khalifa as the highest office-bearer. The Hindu society whether in India or outside was never under a central spiritual ruler. Moreover Hinduism remains practically confined to India for centuries past.

Indeed, remnants of Sanskrit culture and civilisation are still being discovered in the soil of Asiatic Turkestan in the North, and in the east the influence of Hinduism can be slightly traced through Buddhism, beyond Burma and even as far as China. But the Mahomedan invasions in the North from the 9th or 10th century entirely suppressed communion between India and the world beyond the Northern Frontier. And as for China or Japan, where a kind of Buddhism is still left, the bond between the people of these countries and India is not a bond of spiritual comradeship. But it is replaced by the modern sentiment of territorial patriotism embodied in the idea of Asiatic Federation.

SANGATHAN THE ONLY HOPE.

In times of trouble, both the Mahomedans and Christians can hope to get assistance and sympathy from far beyond India. The Hijarat movement of 1921 was indeed on a small scale, and also egregiously failed, as described by Shaukat Usmani in his most interesting pamphlet. But that little movement gave a concrete proof of the Pan-Islamic impulse which is still felt by the Indian Mahomedanism. But as regards Hinduism, where in the whole wide world is there an inch of space which the poor, unbefriended and threatened Hindu can call his own outside Hindustan? Other communities have their whole basis of operations and world-wide lines of communication and flotillas of boats and transports which can replenish them in India at need. The Hindu society, on the other hand, has long ago burnt its boats, cut off every possible line of communication with the world with its own hands and has cooped itself up unwisely with a ditch around itself, and a foolish contrivance in which the valve shuts against itself but opens out for any hostile soldier, adventurer or camp-follower, to safely come across and give the best account of the slightest capacity of mischief or harm which he may possess. The only hope therefore, of this beleaguered community now lies in strongly fortifying itself at all points of attack, make friends with all amongst itself and take good care of the blind, the lame and the diseased, and to enthuse the whole garrison with the hope that it can save itself, even now, if it makes up its mind, the hope being reinforced by the warning that it is doomed to destruction if it faints or falters for a moment.

But unfortunately, schism still prevails in the ranks of the Hindu leaders. Some of us have not yet been cured of the fallacious idea, injected in our psychology in a moment of frenzied political enthusiasm,—the idea, namely, that politics is everything, and denominational culture or religion is nothing. Even a reasonable regard for the interests of one's own community has come to be branded with the name of communalism. And even then, the idea further seems to be that it is the duty of the Hindu, of all people in India, to forget that he is a Hindu, for the simple reason that the Hindus are a majority community in this country. It is only recently that some of the super-men among our Hindu political leaders, with their heads in the clouds, have begun to condescend and recognize the existence of the Hindu Sabha, and its claim to have a say in the matter, when schemes for the disposal of the political future of India are being discussed at a Round Table. On the other hand, they were sublimely unconscious of the fact that they had allowed the Khilafat Committee to dominate over and almost eclipse the Indian National Congress, as if the Khilafat movement represented only the quintessence of true Indian territorial patriotism, untainted in the least by any communal feeling.

DENOMINATIONAL CULTURE.

I will come to close grips with only the essential factors, in the present situation from the point of view of Hinduism. These are (1) the necessity of internal organisation, from top to bottom, by the Hindu community, with a view to make it strong enough for its own defence and protection and for attaining a progressive measure of solidarity by looking within itself and effecting the rational reforms which are needed for the purpose; and (2) organisation of the public opinion of the Hindu community; for the purpose of preventing any injustice or harm being done to its interests in the realisation of political Self-Government for India. Personally, I regard both these factors as essential to themselves and almost independent of each other, though I admit that both of them have some connection or interaction as between them.

The internal organisation is a matter entirely for the Hindus themselves and no outsider is concerned as to what we may do and how we accomplish it. The measure of our success shall be limited only by the habits of rational thinking, sense of justice as between man and man and a world-outlook commensurate with the needs of economic and political life. We are seeing only nascent growths of all these three vital germs of progress in the Hindu community and we have to cover and reach the end of a very extensive field before we attain something like a passable measure of efficiency. The external organisation has a political bearing, and therein we have to try to reconcile our interests with those of the other communities in arriving at a harmonious scheme of political self-government, and fighting with them with the usual weapons of argument, propaganda, agitation and the verdict of public opinion in our favour. The Hindu community is now determined that all this shall be done; and the Hindu Maha Sabha is the chosen instrument of accomplishing it.

HINDU SABHA'S OBJECTS.

It has been the lot of the Hindu Sabha to have its aims and objects completely misrepresented and misunderstood all along, even by those who should have known better. The annual session of the All India Hindu Maha Sabha as well as its Provincial organizations are remedying this evil to a certain extent. But it is more or less one-sided as it is bound to be. And for this reason, I feel grateful for the unique opportunity that was recently afforded by the enquiry entrusted to the Bombay Riots Committee, for the vindication of the aims, objects and activities of the Hindu Sabha. And I would like to take the earliest opportunity to pay my tribute of appreciation to my friend Mr. M. R. Jayakar, the President of the Bombay Branch of the Hindu Sabha, for the splendid manner in which he vindicated that cause before that Committee.

Mr. Kelkar then dealt at great length with Mr. Jayakar's evidence before the Bombay Riots Enquiry Committee to show how his evidence contained a fair summary of all the points that are naturally involved in a coherent, systematic and detailed vindication of the Hindu Maha Sabha. Then he proceeded to show how the trend of the official view is to minimise both the qualitative and quantitative importance of the Hindus. Even with regard to the numerical strength of the Hindus, the census officers have betrayed a sneaking partiality against the Hindus by doing what may be in their power to secure decreasing returns of the Hindu population. I will illustrate this point by two parallel but contrary, cases of directions given to census enumerators by different census Commissioners. The Census Commissioner for India for 1911 has tried to demonstrate the incoherence of Hinduism, and the Census Superintendents were asked to enumerate classes or tribes returning as Hindus but those who did not conform to a certain standard or were subject to certain disabilities, thus suggesting the inference that those tribes and castes were 'not' Hindus. Thus they were asked to prepare a list of all the minor castes which 'qua' caste.

(1) Deny the supremacy of Brahmins,

(2) Do not receive Mantra from the Brahmins or a recognised Hindu Guru,

(3) Deny the authorities of the Vedas,

(4) Do not worship the great Hindu Gods,

(5) Are not served by good Brahmins as family priests,

(6) Have no family priests at all,

(7) Are denied access to the interior of the Hindu Temple,

(8) Cause pollution by touch or presence within a certain distance.

(9) Bury their dead.

(10) Eat beef and show no reverence for the cow.

Now who can make a mistake about the inner meaning of the hyper-critical inquisition?

SECTARIAN ENUMERATIONS.

But the wrong done to Hinduism by outsiders is less than the injury, unfortunately, inflicted upon it by the Hindus themselves. And here, I allude to the occasional insistence of certain Sikhs, Jains, Lingayats and such others, upon securing their enumeration in Census reports, in a class by themselves, while they really ought to be enumerated under the general heading of Hindus. Not that the Mahomedan religion or the Christian religion has got no sects within itself. But neither the Shaik, nor the Wahabi nor the Shia nor the Sunni nor the Ahamadia would refuse to be enumerated as a Mahomedan, so also any one professing a sectarian Christian religion. Now the Sikhs, Jains and the Lingayats belong originally to the same stock of the Hindu race. Their sects are, as sects are everywhere, slight variations or departures, some protestant, some militant against the main prevalent doctrine of the Central religion. And yet these show a separatist tendency, knowing full well that while by this separation they would not necessarily advance their sectional interests, they would, on the other hand, certainly, prejudice the cause of the Hindu community as a whole. For Government are not easily led away from their path by this sectarian enumeration. They will always use that particular argument which is to their advantage at any moment. For Government the Anglo-Indians are Indians, when they are face to face with the question of the Indianisation of services. But they are something different from Indians, though certainly not Europeans, when they want to train men of that community for the Auxiliary military services or reservation of compartments in Railway carriages etc. To spite the Hindus they would pretend to regard Sikhs, Jains and Lingayats as different from the Hindus. But they would disregard their special denomination when it is a question of showing favour to Musalman or Christians. Even Brahmos have behaved unreasonably in this matter, though they were more enlightened. The separatist tendency has been thus the bane of the Hindu community, and if I may describe the aims and objects of the Hindu

Sanghathan movement in one sentence, I would say that "the object is to rope in all these kindred sectarian Hindus and bring them in a line with the main stock of the Hindus".

DEFECTS IN HINDUISM.

But this is not all. The accomplishment of Sanghathan requires that the leaders of the Hindu community, with the aid of the spiritual guides and preceptors, must turn the search-light of rationalism within itself to find out the defects in the vital points of this creaking, squeaking machine of Hindu religious polity, argue with the orthodox leaders of Hinduism, persuasively win their sympathy to social reform and set up every individual within the society on his feet; man, woman and child whether they belong to the so-called higher or the lower classes, and drill them into efficient units of the society. I have no time nor space to dilate upon the work that yet remains to be done in this direction; and I will, therefore, content myself with making a passing mention of these in almost single sentence statements. The Benares Pandit and the Malabar Brahmin must be taught that they are living in a new age, and must come out into the open field and full day light, leaving their shells behind them. The Hindu Raja must be taught to be democratic, and the rich man to be generous towards good social causes. The middle-class Hindu must be taught to stand up for his human gift of reason and not be afraid of a fair and square argument with the old Smritis and their modern custodians. The present caste-system must be so diluted or tempered as hardly to be felt for practical purposes. And there must be a bold open preaching in favour of the annihilation of the sub-divisions within the four castes. Natural selection in marriage must be given greater play in practice than the time-honoured but also time-worn rigid restrictions. Respectability and decency in sexual life must be strengthened by legal facilities for validation of irregular unions. The woman should be treated as entitled to nearly the same rights as man in respect of the right to inherit ancestral or self-acquired property. Education and civil responsibility should be as much the right of woman as of man himself. Special attention must be given to the physical training of woman, and especially their training in the use of all ordinary weapons of self-defence and protection. Equal freedom of occupation and business pursuits must be declared for Hindus of any castes in the economic struggle of life. Untouchability must 'Go'; and I have here used the briefest word possible, to express the idea of the 'shortest shrift,' that I wish to give to untouchability. The man's private residence may be his own castle, but as soon as he steps into the street or outside his door, he has no right to make any distinction of caste or creed as between man and man. The Brahmin must be prepared to give the same freedom of religious opinion and practice to all others within the Hindu Fold, as he would claim for the Hindu as against men of other religions. The whole Hindu society must be enthused into being fused into one homogeneous mass by trying to evolve, as far as possible, common forms of public worship, public prayer, and the adoption of common books containing the elements of Hindu religious philosophy. And above all, every unit in the Hindu society must be taught to stand up for his community and his religion. And while he must not make any aggressive encroachment upon the domain of any other religion or community, he must not shirk the responsibility of exercising the fullest rights of self-defence, to protect his community and his religion. The Hindu must be taught to acquire a broad outlook upon life, and the world-conditions of even sheer existence. The knowledge of physical science must be put on the same exalted pedestal as the knowledge of Adhyatma Vidya, and the Hindu must be studiously taught to appreciate the real worth of the spirit of adventure and sacrifice and public spirit which has won for the Englishman and the other Europeans their mastery over the material wealth of the world and even the psychology of the people brought under their subjugation. This is my view of the real Sanghathan movement. And I challenge any one to point out what is inimical or antagonistic in this to the other communities or religions in India or outside. To the end of it all is of course a far off cry, but a sure beginning would be made, if we can successfully teach the Hindu simply to stand up and boldly proclaim that he is a 'Hindu,' nothing more nothing less, without any qualifications or reservations even when he is face to face with national politics.

THE DEVADASI.

The following is a letter written by Dr. S. Mutbujakshmi Reddi to Mahatma Gandhi and his comments thereon in the last week's issue of Young India.

"As you have been openly denouncing the Devadasi system in the Hindu temples, I make bold to appeal to you for help in the great task of getting rid of that evil. In this Presidency, I find it an up-hill task, as the so-called educated men and even some of the most prominent Congressmen oppose my reform measures and defend that infamous institution.

"My Devadasi Bill, which has now become an Act, deals only with the Inam-holding Devadasis, but there is a section of that community which practise dedication under the cloak of religion simply to make a living out of prostitution. This is nothing but traffic in children; because children are even bought and adopted (adoption by Devadasis is allowed by our Hindu Law), and at an age when they are innocent and cannot judge or act for themselves, are led into this abominable life from which they rarely escape. I have had many memorials and petitions from the enlightened section of that community asking me to bring about legislation to punish such wicked people who trade upon the children's souls and bodies.

"The Penal Code Sections 372 and 373 have proved ineffective. Hence, I have given notice of another Bill for the success of which I want your blessings. Some may argue that legislation is no good so long as the people do not realize the evil in that custom; but my contention is that a good section of our people perceive the injustice. Now I myself feel that I could rescue many of these girls if I had some legal power to take away children from such criminal parents.

"Among the Devadasi community itself there is a great awakening, and they have been doing propaganda on a large scale, but I am pained to observe that the high-caste people do not help them in that community's efforts to reform themselves. And further, our laws for the protection of children are almost nil in this Presidency compared with the protection that exists for the children of other countries and even the children of other provinces such as Bombay and Bengal.

"We know that in the advanced countries, health and moral reform always preceded the formation of public opinion in their favour as they were themselves educative factors. In this Presidency, we cannot blame the Government so much as the high-caste people who do not sufficiently realise that all children, irrespective of caste or creed, need our care and sympathy, and in this matter of rescuing innocent children from the prospect of a dreadful life, they should rise above their communal and caste prejudices."

I heartily endorse the writer's proposal. Indeed I do not think that the proposed legislation will be in advance of public opinion. The whole of the enlightened public opinion that is vocal is against the retention of the system in any shape or form. The opinion of the parties concerned in the immoral traffic cannot count, just as the opinion of keepers of opium dens will not count in favour of their retention, if public opinion is otherwise against them. The Devadasi system is a blot upon those who countenance it. It would have died long ago but for the supineness of the public. Public conscience in this country somehow or other lies dormant. It often feels the awfulness of many a wrong, but is too indifferent or too lazy to move. But if some active spirit like Dr. Reddi moves, that conscience is prepared to lend such support as indifference can summon up. I am therefore of opinion that Dr. Reddi's proposal is in no way premature. Such legislation might well have been brought earlier. In any case I hope that she will receive the hearty support of all lovers of purity in religious and general social life.

ARYA BHAVAN'S FIRST REPORT.

The Managing Committee presented recently the first annual report of the working of the Arya Bhavan, covering a period of a little over twelve months.

This house is the gift of Mr. G. D. Birla and his friend and relative, Mr. Ramgopal Mohta. It was declared open by Sir Atul C. Chatterjee, K.C.I.E., I.C.S., High Commissioner for India and a person; friend of Mr. G. D. Birla, in the presence of a large gathering of both Indians and Europeans on the 25th June, 1928.

Managing Committee for the Year 1928-1929. Chairman, Hy. S. L. Polak, Esq., Vice-Chairman, Mrs. N. C. Sen, Members, R. J. Udani, Esq., K. B. Mavalankar, Esq., K. P. Kotval, Esq., Dr. K. Pardy, Dr. B. P. Pranjpye, S. N. Mallick, Esq., S. J. Gubbay, Esq., Rev. C. F. Andrews, S. N. Gupta, Esq., Hon. Secretary, K. M. Banthiya.

The underlying idea of establishing this Institution was, and still is, to bring that section of Orthodox Hindu merchants who have been reluctant to travel abroad, owing to their religious scruples, in direct and close contact with the merchants of the West.

Although this lack of facilities had engaged for long the attention of many leading Orthodox Hindu merchants in India, the credit is due to Mr. Birla and Mr. Ramgopal Mohta for giving this idea tangible form.

Mr. Ramgopal Mohta announced a contribution of Rs. 50,000, on the occasion of his son's marriage in December, 1926, towards the establishment of such an institution. About this time Mr. Birla was nominated by the Government of India as Employer's Delegate to the Tenth Session of the International Labour Conference, which was to assemble at Geneva in May, 1927.

During his visit to this country, he took the opportunity of discussing the question with Sir Atul Chatterjee and other friends living here, and on their advice decided to make a start in the shape of a small residential place, by contributing the balance of the cost of such an establishment.

Before sailing for India he purchased the property at 30, Belsize Park, Hampstead, at a cost of £4,600. The premises were thoroughly re-decorated to suit the convenience of visitors, and to give them the same congenial temperature inside the house during the severe winter months in this country, central heating has also been installed. The house has been well furnished to give visitors the comforts and conveniences obtainable at a first class hotel. All this has meant a considerable expenditure, but Mr. Birla has defrayed that with pleasure, in the hope that his Hindu merchant friends would take advantage of these facilities and so add considerably to their material welfare and that of their country.

The total cost of the property, including repairs and furnishing, amounts to £9,834. 5s. 2d. A trust has been created by Mr. Birla and Mr. Ramgopal Mohta of this property whose members are, besides the donors, Sir Atul C. Chatterjee and Seth Jamnalal Bajaj, of Wardha.

We were appointed by Mr. G. D. Birla on the 30th November, 1927, to form the first Managing Committee, which has during the year held eight meetings.

We have great pleasure in recording that since the opening of the Arya Bhavan there has been a very great demand for accommodation throughout the year from visitors from all parts of India. We have done our best to accommodate the maximum number of visitors, even, it may be, at times to their occasional slight inconvenience, and we have to record here our great appreciation and thanks to all our guests who have heartily co-operated with us. In spite of this, however, we have to refuse accommodation to many, and we offer our apologies to those who have been disappointed. We quite realise the great inconvenience which they may have suffered, but this could, to some extent, have been avoided by informing the management of their arrival in this country and booking rooms in advance.

Amongst those who have resided in the house during the year are Mr. and Mrs. D. P. Khaitan, Mr. Walchand Hirachand, the Hon. G. A. Natesan (Delegate to the Empire Parliamentary Conference), Rev. C. F. Andrews, Professor G. B. Abhyankar and Mr. P. L. Chudgar (members of the Indian States Deputation), Mr. Motichand Kapadia, Mr. J. Adwani (Public Prosecutor, Hyderabad, Sind), and Seth Narsidas Jaikisendas. A complete list of those who have stayed at the Arya Bhavan during the year is appended.

We are glad to record that our first year's work has in no respect been disappointing, although expenses have been heavy, owing to our inexperience in the art of house running, the house has paid its way and it is confidently hoped that during the next year we shall be able to make sufficient profit to wipe off part of the loss on this year's account and provide for the necessary depreciation and replacement of furniture, crockery, linen, &c.

We have provided depreciation at the following rates: leasehold property  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., central heating  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., furniture 10 per cent., house linen, crockery, &c., 25 per cent.

There is attached to the house a large garage, which brought in an income of £47. 13s. 6d. during the last year, but which has been since leased at £150 per annum, which means a net saving of £120 per annum after paying rates and taxes, and this we propose reserving for writing off the expenses of re-decorating and repairing the garage and the house.

During the year the Committee invited Rev. C. Andrews, Mr. S. J. Gubbay, Dr. I. S. Gupta and Mr. S. N. Gupta (Deputy Trade Commissioner) to join the Committee.

Mr. K. M. Banthiya, Hon. Secretary, went on leave to India in September, 1928, and Dr. I. S. Gupta acted temporarily as Hon. Secretary until he left London in November, when he was succeeded by Mr. S. J. Gubbay, who kindly acted until Mr. K. M. Banthiya resumed his duties in February last. Both Dr. I. S. Gupta and Mr. S. J. Gubbay discharged their duties at great inconvenience to themselves, and we now take this opportunity of placing on record our high appreciation of their services.

We have to express our thanks to Seth Jaikisendas for presenting the house with a handsome cabinet gramophone, and to Mr. Agarwala for presenting a tea set.

The little library that has been established is the result of the labours of Rev. C. Andrews and we have to express our deep thanks to him, and to the generous donors of books and contributions thereto. We desire also to record our appreciation of the services rendered by the Staff in attending to the comfort of our guests.

We cannot close this short report without expressing our appreciation, especially to Mr. K. M. Banthiya, who has devoted himself with unremitting zeal to making the Arya Bhavan a success, and to Mr. Polak and Mrs. Mavlankar for the help and advice that they have rendered in the re-decorating and furnishing of the house, without which it would have been impossible for the Committee to arrange the opening in June last year.

Thanks are also due to the supervising architect, Mr. Bateman, and also to Mr. R. V. Palmer, our Accountant.

Last, but not least, we take this opportunity of expressing our deep appreciation and obligation to Mr. G. D. Birla and Mr. Ramgopal Mohta for creating this Institution which, in our opinion and in the light of the experience that we have gained during the short time the house has been in existence, has filled a long-felt want, even though only to a partial extent.

There is an ever increasing demand for similar facilities for the vegetarian members of the Indian community which ought also to be provided for, and we trust that Indian philanthropists who feel for the need of the Orthodox Hindus and for the cause of strict vegetarianism, will divert a part of their benevolence to supply this need. This Committee would willingly place their services and experience at the disposal of such generously minded persons.

GLASS HOUSES AND THROWING STONES.

Helen R. Martin writes in Unity:—When I was invited a few days ago to sit at the speaker's table at a luncheon given by the Women's College and University clubs, to hear an American missionary-doctor, just back from her labors in India, "answer" Katherine Mayo's "Mother India," I anticipated a most diverting hour in seeing the smug, self-righteous attitude of the church-going people of our town towards benighted India (the India of Miss Mayo's book—the only India they seemed to know) put to confusion by an intelligent woman physician who had lived in India twenty-nine years.

I was not disappointed, though the diversion proved to be of an unexpected variety.

My first surprise was in hearing the remarkable change in the missionary-doctor's tone and voice from her normal, matter-of-fact manner of speaking to me during the luncheon to her platform or Sunday-School-superintendent tone when she rose to address the roomful of women; as though the clear water I was drinking suddenly tasted of sweet sticky oil. It gave me a shock; for in speaking to me directly she had seemed entirely sincere, while this tone of self-conscious Christian charity seemed to assume a lack of intelligence in her audience that, seeing they were college and university women, might well affront them.

But this insincerity in her voice, I soon realized, accorded only too well with the confused uncertainties of her divided loyalties; her Christian missionary zeal at odds with her knowledge of India's religions; her passionate love of India and Indians in conflict with her perfunctory American patriotism; her dogmatic belief in English rule clashing with her knowledge of damning and admitted facts; her deep hurt and indignation at the Mayo libel kept under by her need to raise money for her medical school and hospital in India which (she had evidently found) could only be raised if people were thoroughly convinced of the truth of "Mother India." Her loves and loyalties being all for her genuinely adored India, where she had lived so long and so happily, the practical necessity of convincing generous, wealthy Americans that India was sufficiently corrupt, benighted and helpless to need sorely their "Christian charity", produced the strangest medley of contradictory statements to which I had ever listened. But only a few of her hearers, I am sure, recognized the discreet ingenuity with which she both ate her cake and kept it; for her audience was neither discriminating nor critical. College and University women? A few years out of college, living the social and domestic life of a small and narrowly religious American city, seems enough to make most of them slump hopelessly from the alert mentality of their college days. It is the exceptional woman that can escape the stultifying effect of Main Street's churches, women's clubs, card parties. Therefore, very few of her audience saw any discrepancy in the doctor-missionary's stating at one moment that everything in "Mother India" was true—and at the next, "I never saw some of the things Miss Mayo saw—she was there a few weeks, I twenty-nine years." "Yes, there are still child marriages in India—as 'Mother India' describes them—oh, yes!—and of course only Christianity can put an end to this"—and then, "Young India is changing all this; the zeal and enthusiasm of Young India in lifting women from her degradation, in wiping out the caste system, child marriages, the curse upon widows, is marvellous, marvellous! One of the most irresistible, forceful, vital movements in the world today is the onward sweep of Young India in the realization of her high idealism!"

"Of course statistics claim that there are almost as many child marriages in the United States as in India—but I never saw them here as I saw them in India"—and a moment later, "Child marriages are being eliminated more and more by the new forces at work in the Young Indian movement,"—and again "without the heartfelt support and cooperation of you American Christians, we cannot wipe out these evils in India as described in "Mother India."

About English rule:—"England has done much, oh, so much for India!" and later, "England, we must admit, forced the opium trade upon India against her earnest protests."—England has established schools and colleges all over India"—"You who are privileged to live in enlightened and Christian America, must help us to give to India, in her darkness and ignorance, the Christian education she so sorely needs." "India—especially Young India—is waking up to the need of education for the lower orders—recognizing the economic fact that so only can a nation or an individual hold any real good securely, when all can hold it equally"—and later, "The people of India are so poor and so heavily taxed that only by your help can we save India by the enlightenment of Christian education."

About Gandhi:—"Gandhi is the most outstanding figure in the world today—the man most devoutly consecrated to the service of his fellow-men." And a few sentences later on, "If only Gandhi were a Christian!" "Every day Gandhi reads and ponders over the words of Christ in the New Testament and he feels that Christ was one of the greatest teachers of right living that the world has ever known." And then, "If only Gandhi would accept Christ as his Saviour!"

She told of the wild fury of indignation all over India when the forty-five Hindus who had come to America, been naturalized, secured high positions in colleges, research bureaus, editorial staffs, and then, after some years, when the American government decided that Indians were not white, had their citizenship cancelled. Up to that time India had looked with friendly eyes upon America, but now an outraged cry went up, "If we are unfit to be admitted into your country, you can't come and stay in our country!"—and only the strong arm of England had saved the American missions from being expelled from India.

Questions followed the formal talk, nearly all expressing the bias of the credulous readers of "Mother India," and all of them being answered by the doctor-missionary with cautious discretion. My own questions, though I tried to put them inoffensively, roused indignation in the audience and embarrassed the well-informed and by-no-means stupid doctor-missionary.

"The evils of India, all of which you attribute to her religions," I ventured, "can be matched by equally grave evils in our Christian America, don't you think so? Our lynchings, labour troubles—"

I was interrupted and answered by one of the audience; "Those troubles are all caused by our lower classes and by foreigners!"

The doctor-missionary gently enlightened me: "The difference between our American evils and India's is just that: in India their religions and their highest social classes, the Brahmins, sanction and uphold these evils. In America any evils we have are all against our religion and not sanctioned or perpetrated and practiced by our highest classes."

This met with applause, in the face of which I suggested, "Isn't it our upper classes and the Christian Church that sanction and uphold industrial exploitation and world wars?—and only a generation ago, Negro slavery? And in England child labor in factories, under Christianity, was quite as cruel as child marriages in India. We still have brutal child labour in the South, sanctioned by the Church and the upper classes. It seems to me we can't throw stones at any one."

The lecturer smiled at me sadly, though there was a gleam in her eyes that I thought I understood. She loved hearing that her beloved India was in some respects no worse than this self-complacent America. But this unholy obliquity must on no account be manifested.

She was asked whether the caste system was as bad as "Mother India" described it. Yes, she said, it was. It seemed part of India's very life. You breathed it in the very atmosphere—"

"How do you American missionaries escape anything so atmospheric?" I asked, and before the doctor could answer, a woman near me at the table spoke indignantly, "Why, how could Christians have that dreadful caste feeling toward their fellow men?"

I mentioned our feelings towards Negroes, especially among Christian southerners.

"Oh, but that's entirely different!"

The universal opinion among these college and university women was that that was "entirely different."

Some one asked whether, in view of Gandhi's interest in the New Testament and his great spiritual influence in India, there was any hope that he might be persuaded to "accept Christ." The doctor feared there was not.

"But he does accept Christ," I said.

"Only as a Great Teacher," the doctor corrected me.

"But how else could he be accepted?" I asked, looking "dumb" and ready to be enlightened.

"As his Saviour," I was gravely told.

"But how else could a man be a Saviour except as a great spiritual teacher?" I persisted, as though I were as ignorant as any native Indian of the bloody dogma of a Vicarious Atonement.

The doctor, meeting my eye across the table, had not the courage to speak of the brutal sacrifice of an innocent Son to an omnipotent Father to appease his wrath against the creatures he had created—"His blood shed for the remission of sins"—which she knew, of course, is regarded by educated Hindus as a plebeian, indecent and barbarous faith.

She spoke of Gandhi's earnest wish that religious differences in India might be reconciled; but the only hope of that, she assured us, was in the Christianizing of all India. As though there were no "religious differences" in Christendom!

We heard, of course, the inevitable dictum, "India is not yet ready for self-government," for if England's restraining hand were withdrawn, India's warring religious factions would at once involve her in universal bloodshed.

"More universal than the bloodshed of the World War, for which England was somewhat responsible?" I asked as one seeking light.

But the missionary was quite sure that England was, in all benevolence, only helping India to prepare herself for self-government.

I had the temerity to suggest (but to her only, not to that audience!) that it might be a good thing if some super-nation stepped in and took a hand in stopping our "warring factions" in Tennessee, West Virginia, South Carolina, and frequently in Pittsburgh and California; or helped our government to eliminate its corruption and the stranglehold of Big Business on our lives, our homes, our children.

But, some one at the table overhearing me, I was informed that never before had business been on a more honest basis than now; that America had proved how "sound at heart" she was by repudiating Tammany Hall and Roman Catholicism. I wondered if they had never heard of the Teapot Dome scandal, the Paper Trust scandal, the Power Propaganda scandal.

At the end of the revel my sense of despair was not for India, nor for the missionary (whom I suspected of being intelligent in private), but for the solidly impenetrable prejudices and superstitions of religious and patriotic Americans in small cities.

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

NOTES.

"Greater India":—We refer in another note to the lectures on Greater India which Dr. Kalidas Nag of the Greater India Society delivered this week at the Bombay University. Dr. Nag's lectures especially towards the end, when the public came to know of them, were followed with breathless interest by crowded audiences of intelligent and educated men and women. They were illustrated by striking magic lantern pictures which brought Dr. Nag's descriptions vividly home to his hearers. The lectures dealt with ancient Hindu colonisation in Indo-China, and the islands of the Indian archipelago right up to Java. Dr. Nag has visited many of these places and studied the monuments on the spot, and he speaks, therefore, of them with an enthusiasm which is infectious. Many of his audience, learnt for the first time that Indian history does not begin and end with India. India's relations with Persia, Greece and Rome have been fairly well-known. Less known are the more recent discoveries of her influence in Asia Minor and Central Asia. Even less known, are her profoundly fruitful contacts with Eastern Asia which Bengali scholars like Benoy Kumar Sarcar and Dr. Kalidas Nag have done much to elucidate. The Poet, Tagore, has been a great inspiring force in this fascinating field of study. In an interview with a representative of the Rand Daily Mail, Geheimrat Professor, Dr. Leo Frobenius, leader of the German Africa Expedition hinted at the existence of Indian influences in the ancient culture of South Africa. Traces of it have been suggested in South America. Professor Leo Frobenius thought that there was at a certain period a civilisation which reigned on the borders of the Indian Ocean. The centre of irradiation of this civilisation would seem to have been India, as Italy later was that of the Mediterranean Civilisation. The "Greater India" Society, of which Dr. Tagore is the President, has been founded to make a systematic study of ancient Indian cultural expansion. Dr. Nag's addresses have done much to arouse interest in the subject in Bombay, which, we trust, will soon find expression in efforts by our young graduates to map out a place for themselves in this wide and fascinating field of research.

Untouchables And Temple Entry:—We publish with pleasure the powerful appeal which Mr. Jannalal Bajaj has issued on behalf of the Committee of the National Congress specially appointed to deal with the problem of the untouchables. As Mr. Bajaj rightly says, no national movement can afford to ignore the present position of these classes which is at once a cruelty to them and a degradation to Hindu society. The amenities for the extension of which to them, he so feelingly pleads, are elementary rights which every member of a community is entitled to claim and possess, notwithstanding any custom or tradition to the contrary. The right to use the public roads, to send children to public schools, to take water from the public sources of supply, are inherent in the idea of society and belongs to every member of it rich or poor, high-born or low-born. To deny it to any individual or class is to court social revolution. We are glad to think that this is coming to be realised by the privileged classes even in those parts of the country where the prejudice against the untouchables has been most rampant. In this appeal, Mr. Jannalal Bajaj specially pleads for the free admission of these classes to all Hindu temples. We have ourselves relinquished temple worship for many years past, finding no temple so inspiring as the open sky and the daily miracle of the rising sun. But as Mr. Bajaj says, the temple in India and, as Professor Kalidas Nag's lectures at the Bombay University this week show, wherever Hindu cultural influence spread, whether in distant Java and Cambodia, has been the centre not only of religious, but also of social, educational and aesthetic life. Many of our temples nowadays hardly maintain this great tradition. It may be, because they have become exclusive. There is no doubt that the depressed classes are a vast reservoir of spiritual and social energy whose liberation will provide the dynamic for want of which national progress is marking time. We earnestly support Mr. Bajaj's appeal, and we would add that in breaking down the barriers which are driving the depressed classes to the verge of revolt, Mr. Jannalal Bajaj is rendering the highest service to the Hindu community and to the Indian nation at large. Because, after all, the Hindu community is the basic stratum of the nation whose characteristics, good or bad, affect the whole population.

The Marriage Bill And The Legislative Assembly.—The Legislative Assembly, when the Sarda Marriage Bill came up again for discussion on Thursday, was a picture of what a national Indian Parliament might be when the country has a responsible, representative government. The distinctions of official and non-official, of Hindu and Moslem and European, which make debates of the Assembly ordinarily so artificial and uninteresting, were cast to the winds. The Government was functioning for once as a truly national Government and by its side stood practically the whole body of enlightened Indian—in which term we include the European and Anglo-Indian who have their homes in this country.—opinion, against a small body of honest but misguided zealots who believed that their religion was in danger of being destroyed if infant girls were prevented from being married away as early as possible. Pandit Motilal Nehru attended and spoke strongly for the Bill. Mr. Jinnah and other Musalman members vigorously replied to other Musalmans who supported Mr. Acharya's dilatory motion. So overwhelming was the weight of support that Mr. Acharya is reported to have left the Assembly without waiting to hear the speeches in reply to his opposing the measure. Mr. Sarda's motion was carried without a division, and the Bill was taken for consideration clause by clause. After an amendment to omit the age limit so far as boys were concerned, had been rejected, the Assembly postponed further consideration of the Bill to Monday. The prospects of its going through practically as it stands, seem to be bright and there is reason to think that it will have an easy passage in the Council of State.

Rescue Work In Madras:—We gladly publish Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddy's letter. It shows that there are homes in Madras for accommodating and bringing up minor girls, but none so far for taking in adult women who are rescued from unwholesome control or company. Dr. Muthulakshmi points out that there is no present need for such an institution as the Matunga Rescue Home, in Madras. The case which we brought to her notice was of a young woman who had run away from a Madras district. No doubt, it is difficult to deal with such cases. But something has got to be done, as it is risky to let young women absolutely without resources, without the means even to pay their railway fares, roam aimlessly over the country. How this particular girl, who seemed to be of more than average intelligence, managed to find her way to Bombay, is a perfect mystery. It is even more of a mystery how she expects to fare now that she has managed to get away from the Home. The Hindu family system is breaking down, but while the educated classes are adjusting their family life to the new conditions, the destructive influence alone has permeated to the masses, and is working havoc in their home life. The true remedy, of course, is to speed up mass education, but meanwhile steps should be taken to stop the process of disintegration. Communal movements have a great field for useful activity in this direction. The high caste Hindus especially have to do much, and, if the matter is brought home to them, they will, we are sure, not fail to exert themselves to counteract a tendency which, if allowed to continue, must lead to the collapse of Hindu Society.

Help For The Blind:—Last week a meeting was held at Vanita Vishram presided over by Mahatma Gandhi to invoke the sympathy and help for the blind. In this connection a demonstration of the work done by the blind scholars of the Victoria Memorial School for the Blind and the students of the Happy Home for the Blind was arranged by the principal Mr. H. D. Chhatrapati. Mr. Chhatrapati has consecrated his life to the service of the blind in devotion to his brother the late Dr. Nilkanth Chhatrapati. There are three ways mentioned of helping these deserving institutions, to furnish funds for the Homes, to send the blind they can get hold of to the Homes and to induce Municipalities and other bodies to do so. Mr. Chhatrapati pointed out that a large number of the blind in India could be saved by proper treatment in time. He also emphasised that prevention is better than cure and that mothers should take every care to protect their children's eye sight. But way of indiscriminate charity, Mr. Chhatrapati mentioned, that the blind beggars in Bombay received from four to five rupees daily and that the money mostly went into the pockets of the conductors whom the blind beggars employed. Such charity defeats its purpose and we commend the following words from the columns of the Young India: "If therefore instead of our charity being blind, as it undoubtedly is today in many cases, it became enlightened and if then we refused to pay anything to the beggars but took the trouble of sending them to the home or homes designed for them and helped the homes, we should save the nation's money and in the bargain make the blind fit for earning their livelihood as they can be made without difficulty."

India And The League:—Sir Muhammad Habibullah, the leader of the Indian Delegation to the League made a striking plea at the Geneva Assembly for greater consideration of India's needs. He declared that there was a feeling in India and other Eastern countries that the West obtained most of the League's attention. He urged for a stronger Indian representation on the League administration. We trust that his plea will not go unheeded, as India's contribution to the League's exchequer is out of proportion to the benefit she receives from it.

The Air-Mail Disaster:—The tragic accident to the air-liner the "City of Jerusalem" which burst into flames and thus caused the death of the pilot and two passengers serves to show how precarious is this mode of transit. This disaster has occasioned much regret as the air service, since it was inaugurated, has been regular and was gaining the confidence of the public. Proper lighting arrangements should be made to ensure the safe landing of the planes should they reach their destination when dark. By the way, the coincidence between the disastrous out-break in Palestine and the destruction of the "City of Jerusalem" will not fail to occur to minds prone to what is called superstition.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.
BOMBAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 1929.

HINDU EXOGAMY.*

In his exhaustive treatise entitled "Hindu Exogamy," Mr. S. V. Karandikar has made a detailed study of the limits within which Hindus are forbidden to marry. Hindu marriage, as Mr. Karandikar says, is governed by two sorts of restrictions: endogamous and exogamous. "Every Hindu must marry within his endogamous sub-caste, and outside the exogamous group, variously known as Gotra, Got, Mûl, Kul, Intiperulu, Tarvad &c." The endogamous limits are being gradually broken down by the permeation of social reform ideas, by judicial decisions and legislation. Marriages between persons belonging to different sub-castes among Brahmins, for instance, though still exceptional are no longer regarded as unorthodox. No case has come before the Courts, but it is presumed that they will hold them to be valid under the Hindu Shastras which know nothing of sub-divisions of castes. Inter-caste marriages of the anuloma, or along-the-grain type, that is, marriages between a man of higher with a girl of lower caste, have been declared to be valid by the late Justice Sir Lalubhai Shah of the Bombay High Court in a judgment which so far has not been over-ruled and, therefore, is the law at least in the Bombay Presidency. Legislation enabling civil marriages among Hindus in the shape of Sir Hari Singh Gour's Act, makes no distinction between anuloma and pratiloma (or against the grain) marriages and, thus, breaks down completely the last endogamous limit laid down by the Hindu Shastras.

While the endogamous limits are being thus gradually enlarged, the exogamous limits, with which Mr. Karandikar's book deals, remain practically unchanged to the great detriment of social freedom. The ban on sagotra marriages, that is, of marriages between persons of the same gotra, is still rigidly maintained, though the gotra itself has become an incomprehensible legend. Mr. Karandikar dwells at great length on the origin and significance of gotra. In the case of Brahmins, a certain group of Rishis, or ancient seers and sages are supposed to be their ancestors or preceptors, and every Brahmin belongs to a gotra which bears the name of one of these. In all religious ceremonies, the performer has first to identify himself before his ancestral shades by reciting his gotra and pravara (certain minor Rishis who are more specially related to the person concerned), and, on the whole, the tradition has been strictly maintained.

The possibility of a man not knowing or forgetting his gotra however, is provided for by the rule that in such cases he should adopt the gotra of his spiritual preceptor who nowadays in most cases is none other than the officiating priest. Deliberate fabrication of gotras when they stand in the way of otherwise desirable matches, is not unknown as in the case of the father who discovering at the last moment when the irrevocable nuptial knot was about to be tied that the bridegroom was of the same gotra as himself and, therefore, of the bride, coolly gave the priest a different gotra and ordered him to proceed with the ceremony. The priest, who must have known that this was a white lie, made no ado and carried through the ceremony before the sacred fire. Attempts to change the law relating to gotra have so far not become effective because of the fact that the sentiment against sagotra marriages, as a cardinal sin, is deep rooted in Hinduism. The absurdity of this restriction may be illustrated by supposing that the English law prohibited the marriage of persons bearing the same names, such as Johnson, Thomson, Nelson and Peterson, wherever they may happen to be born whether in Kent or Birmingham, Plymouth or New York, London or Ottawa. Mr. Karandikar's investigation into the origin and purpose of this institution shows that it does not answer exactly to any similar institution among other races past or present.

How did this restriction originate? Mr. Karandikar has no difficulty in showing that exogamy was not an institution of Aryan origin. It was practically non-existent among Greeks and Romans, and it may be recalled that, as Sir Henry Maine and other Jurists have shown, Roman and Hindu law up to a point followed closely parallel lines of development. Exogamy was alien to the Iranians who, as the Vedic and Avestic literature show, had close racial and religious affinities. Gotra, then, was an institution purely of Indian origin. Ancient societies, we know, did not start new institutions except under the pressure of a vital necessity which had come to be felt for a fairly long and continuous period of time. What was the necessity which led to the evolution of the gotra? Mr. Karandikar is puzzled by the sudden appearance of gotra in the Sutras while in the Vedas they have no definite significance. Such sudden transitions are common in Hindu sociology viewed through purely literary sources. The flesh-eating, wine-bibbing, free-living Vedic Aryans who, as was said of the ancient Hellenes, "with frolic welcome took the thunder and the sunshine," transformed, as it were, overnight into votaries of ahimsa and teetotalism, and obedient slaves of caste and custom! The links are missing in literature and must be furnished by the student of social evolution. Between the Vedic and the Sutra periods there is a gap implying a process of struggle and adjustment with new conditions which engaged the whole energy of the community. This was the period of contact and conflict between the Vedic and the non-Vedic Indians and the gotra most probably is one of the institutions evolved as a means of facilitating intercourse between the two communities henceforth to be united in a single socio-religious commonwealth. It is in Dravidian rather than the Roman and Persian contacts, that we must seek for an explanation of gotra and some other apparently sudden developments in Hindu social life.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XXXVII. THE DISAPPOINTED.

(By DR. CLIFFORD MANSHARDT, PH.D.).

Disappointment is a fact of life. The man who claims that his every wish and desire has been gratified is either simple or an incurable optimist. The world does not operate in this fashion. An element of uncertainty enters into everything we do. Sometimes our plans succeed, and at other times despite our best efforts they fail. Sometimes a work is accomplished rapidly, and at other times unexpected and heart-breaking obstacles arise. A man enlists in the crusade against vice, disease, and ignorance. He campaigns with vigour. He is successful in not a few engagements. But he may not share in the final victory. One has but to run through the names of the leaders associated with the world's great moral struggles to discover how few have actually lived to see the triumph of the cause in which they believed. It takes decades and even centuries to uproot firmly established customs and habits. One plants, another waters, and in the fulness of time comes the harvest.

One of the religious revolutionaries of the Roman world was an ascetic by the name of John the Baptist. Outspoken to the nth degree, he soon found himself in prison because of his criticism of the morals of the royal family. There he was: the stalwart John—inhabitant of the desert, active, vigorous man of the out-of-doors chained in a prison, cut off in his very prime. Disappointed? Of course. But in his disappointment his first concern was not for himself but for his cause. Indifferent to his own welfare, he sent an anxious message of inquiry to his successor and found to his astonishment that even greater results were being accomplished than he himself had thought possible. And it is always thus. John may be imprisoned, but ideals that are worthy will triumph.

The bitterest of disappointments are generally the personal disappointments connected with our own selves or families. We fail to attain desired social recognition, or to secure desired business or political advancement and we are sore distressed. But such disappointments are as nothing to the pain that comes from the moral failure of those whom we love. We surround a son with careful home influences, educate him in selected schools, dream dreams about his future career, and then suddenly he turns his back upon it all and crashes. Hope turns to bewilderment and despair. The parent is stunned and in the deepest anguish. From the depths of his heart the father echoes the cry of the ancient King of Israel: "Oh my son..... would God I have died for thee." But the father cannot die for the son. He can but hope and labour to bring about the return. His wounds are deep, and are not easily healed. But once the healing comes, the parent has new strength. His own life purified, he goes forth as God's own messenger, a healer of the hearts of others.

RESCUE HOMES IN MADRAS.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Reading your editorial on 'Rescue Work' appearing in your issue of 7th September of the Indian Social Reformer—I find that my letter has been rather misunderstood and so I hasten to write a few lines to explain my position. When I said that there was no rescue home for Hindu women in Madras, I meant that at present there is no such institution for adult women who have fallen and show no desire for a better life.

When the Brothel Bill becomes an Act, it will be seen from clause 13 of the Select Committee's report that it will be made incumbent upon the Local Government to provide a suitable rescue home. In the meanwhile, I wish to point out that we have ample provisions, as I said to Gandhiji, for taking any child that needs to be rescued; but I am sorry to state that there is no legal enactment at present in this Presidency to rescue children from ignomina associations, and it is most deplorable that my attempt to bring about any such legislation in this Presidency is being frustrated by people from whom one would expect utmost sympathy and co-operation. I must confess to you that I wrote that letter to Gandhiji in a moment of utter despair and helplessness.

For instance there is the Children's Aid Society which is admitting girls under 18 years, rescued from brothels or run away in disgust from brothel life to the police and the children that are found wandering in the streets. It is largely financed by the Government and their religious persuasions are respected; but we have no law to remove children from the associations of prostitutes.

There is a Society called the Indian Ladies Sama- run by private agencies of which I am the Secretary. That Institution takes up again all girls belonging particularly to the Devadasi Community, and provides them with free lodging, boarding, and education which of course is not intended for those who are already following the profession of Devadasi.

I have now 16 such girls on hand, some studying in the Queen Mary's College and the others in High Schools who have voluntarily sought our help.

We have also been helping women who have once erred and who subsequently, repent and want to be reformed by placing them in suitable surroundings and giving them vocational training. There are about 7 or 8 such cases at present. So you can now understand why I was reluctant to admit this particular girl you referred to who is already 20 years old and who evidently is not amenable to any discipline.

Even when the Brothel Bill becomes an Act, we could have control over only minor girls below 18 and as for the adult prostitutes unless they of their own free will, seek our protection, we will have no legal power to control their movements but I do agree with you that there should be a home for these adult women where facilities should be created, to reform them and train them to a good and useful life.

As there has been no demand here for such cases till now owing to the existence of 600 and more brothels in the city of Madras and as we naturally felt that our first attention should be directed towards "minors" who do not themselves choose that life but who are forced into it by a third party, we have till now confined our humanitarian activities to such girls.

May I now request you to kindly remove the impression that might be created on the public mind by your article (viz.) that there are no institutions in Madras for the protection even of minor girls when rescued from immoral surroundings.

I am also forwarding the papers connected with the Indian Samaj and the Children's Aid Society, for your information.

APPEAL TO HINDUS.

Mr. Jamnalal Bajaj, Secretary, Anti-Untouchability League has issued the following appeal:—

You are probably aware that the Indian National Congress has appointed a separate Committee this year for making special efforts for the removal of untouchability. The work has obviously to be done through the Hindus and the Congress resolution is explicit on the point. In these days of terrific advance in material sciences while the world is shrinking fast India has constantly to be weighed in the scale of nations as a single indivisible unit, and when an evil within the fold of a community apart from its inherent injustice, becomes a nuisance to its neighbours and a reproach to the entire nation, it is only appropriate, you will agree, that the premier national institution such as the Congress should interest itself in it and help the community concerned to achieve its speedy-elimination.

NO ORDINARY EVIL.

Untouchability among the Hindus is no ordinary evil. That a community known throughout the world's history for its religious toleration and its most catholic culture should have established and maintained for centuries, and should still countenance in the name of religion, a social code which brands for life human beings as unworthy of ordinary intercourse and capable of polluting others by mere touch or sight, is a tragedy and a riddle that baffles every right-minded Indian to-day.

You have only to visualise the spirit of Hindu Scriptures and the whole of its culture through centuries, to perceive that such treatment of those lower in the social scale and who are in fact termed the "Younger Brothers" by the Dharmashastras is most reprehensible. It must be unnecessary for me to tax you with a host of Sanskrit texts in support of my contention. Suffice it to say that it is now a matter beyond dispute that the system of untouchability whatever may be its origin or former justification is now only a social usage fossilised and hardened into rank inhumanity, that is usurping the place of intelligent religious conviction and conduct.

NO JUSTIFICATION.

If we turn to tradition we find even less justification for anything like untouchability. The Hindu tradition founded on Vedic and Scriptural lore and nurtured by the most dynamic teachings of Kabir, Gaurang, Dhaneshwar, Eknath, Tukaram, Narsina Mehta and a whole galaxy of Dravidian saints not only broke the barriers in social intercourse between man and man but emphatically repudiated and positively set their face against any such cruel distinctions.

It is an irony of fate that such glorious inheritance notwithstanding, we should have come to treat to-day one-third of our own kith and kin as Pariahs worthy of treatment which is not meted out even to dogs or to domesticated animals. Our weavers, our artisans, our sweepers and scavengers, who are the real toilers of the land and producers of national wealth, who help to keep us clean and healthy and fit for life's vocations—to these our benefactors, meek and lowly 'little brothers' we deny social and civic rights—protection, knowledge, intercourse—everything that makes life worth living. No wonder if under the inexorable law of Karma we are in turn ourselves treated the world over as Pariahs and Untouchables.

HARM DONE TO THE COMMUNITY.

But the evil consequences of this sin do not terminate here. The manifest injustice underlying such treatment and the humiliation it involves for the victim expose him to unrighteous influences outside and makes of him a disintegrating factor. This not only does an enormous harm to the community itself but it corrodes the social foundations of the entire nation. You have no doubt read how movements and counter-movements are launched and conducted with these unfortunate "young brothers" of the Hindus as pawns and targets and how it has sown in recent years seeds of unending bitterness and discord among our prominent communities; how some of the most responsible and respected leaders of the communities have suggested and discussed elaborate schemes of converting these 'untouchables' to their respective faiths for non-religious and sometimes, even unworthy considerations.

SIGNS OF SELF-ASSERTION.

With the modern growth of ideas, with the efforts of the reforming sections from amongst the Hindus themselves and as a consequence of general self-consciousness born of the great awakening that has come upon the land during the last decade, the untouchables themselves are slowly beginning to feel their plight and demand better treatment as a matter of birth right. You even find them sometimes over-shooting the mark. You have perhaps read in the newspapers that certain untouchables of a locality in Berar issued sometime ago what was described as a general ultimatum to the local Hindu community that unless the class Hindus accorded them equal treatment in the shape of free access to schools, water wells and temples, they would discard Hindu religion and embrace another faith in a body. A few individuals did indeed carry out the threat before the Hindus relented and more than met their demands. Such excess, I venture to submit, where they are spontaneous should be viewed as indications of their amount at self-assertion so natural to a sudden self-consciousness and need not exasperate us. Little acts of excesses are bound to happen for a time when centuries old shackles are being broken and gospel of freedom is broadcasted all round.

PLEA FOR EQUAL TREATMENT.

All this must be painful and humiliating to you as it should be to every good Hindu. The remedy however lies in our own hands. We must admit these "little brothers" of ours in the social fold without reservation. The barest justice requires us to let them draw from the village well drinking water, to let their children have the same benefit of learning, the three R's at the village school as our own and to fling open for them the temples of God that are open to the rest of the Hindus. There is neither grace nor wisdom in so doing. We have got to take these unfortunate brethren of ours to our bosom and befriend them in all humility as a matter of penance for all our sins of omission and commission.

To you, a custodian of Hindu religion and trustee not of its monuments in brick and mortar only, but of its true import and dignity, I have ventured to address this appeal. It is the 'Mandir' which has been to the Hindu throughout centuries the repository of all his religious and social idealism. It is blasphemy for him to look upon or think of any living being as inferior or unworthy of Narayan's grace. It is one of the proudest legacies left to us by our great saints—most of whom by the by came from lower classes not excluding untouchables—that we shall consider no human being as inferior to us. It would, therefore, be a tardy performance of duty for you to throw open the temple under your charge to the so called 'untouchables.'

I shall be thankful if you will let me know what action you propose taking on my appeal to you.

SARDA BILL IN THE LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

The debate on the motion to take into consideration the Sarada Marriage Bill was resumed in the Legislative Assembly on Thursday and carried without a division. We reproduce the Associated Press report of the proceedings:—

Mr. Mody (Bombay) was applauded when he rose to make his maiden speech. He supported the Bill, describing those who wanted postponement as wreckers of the Bill. Religious practices, he said, were mere excrescences. He did not think orthodoxy could keep back social reform or political progress, and pleaded for the immediate passage of the Bill in the interests of the nation.

EUROPEAN SUPPORT.

Mr. Stuart-Smith (Calcutta, European) assured the mover and the House that the Bill evoked keen interest amongst the rank and file of the Calcutta European community, which cordially approved of it. He intervened in the debate in order to show that where national interests were involved the European community would not be indifferent or keep aloof. The Bill was indeed a measure of far-sighted patriotism. He submitted that the Assembly should not be discouraged by the argument that it would remain a dead letter in some cases. A similar argument was advanced when sati was abolished. As education spread, people were bound to recognise the necessity for an enactment of this kind. Legislation was the only remedy to prevent the evil of child marriage and the European community of Calcutta and India wished Mr. Sarada well and offered him its support. (Applause).

Mr. D. K. Lahiri Chondhry opposing the Bill was surprised at the Government attitude which should have been neutral. Mr. Jayakar's interpretation of Vedanta, he said, was wrong.

MUSLIM OPPOSITION.

Mr. Ghaznavi (Dacca) opposed the Bill and was frequently heckled. He opposed it as a pernicious measure. He did not believe in social reform being effected by legislation. The Bill affected the personal law of the Muslims and encroached upon Muslim religion. (Question). The original Bill did not affect Muslims whereas the present Bill did. His constituency had asked him to vote against the Bill and Muslims as a whole did not want the Bill. (Mahomedan members: Question). The Bill was a menace to the peace of society and would inevitably lead to needless prosecutions and police zoolum. Proceeding Mr. Ghaznavi referred to the representation signed by a group of 29 members to the Government opposing the Bill in the autumn of last year. The signatories included Mr. Shah Nawaz, who afterwards became member of the Age of Consent Committee, and was now a whole-hearted supporter of the Bill.

An interesting wordy duel then ensued between Mr. Chaznavi and Mr. Shas Nawaz, the former characterising his attitude as somersault and challenging him to seek re-election on this issue even in the Punjab while the latter expressed his readiness to seek re-election and justified his conduct.

ULEMAS OPPOSED TO BILL.

Mr. Chaznavi next alluded to a fatwa signed by 74 Ulemas in India opposing the Bill as infringing the personal law of the Muslims. Referring to those Muslim members who supported the previous Bill last year Mr. Ghaznavi mentioned the name of Mr. Yusuf who, he said, was a Mussalman only in name. There were insistent shouts of 'withdraw' from almost every section, particularly from the Congress Party, and the President also called on Mr. Ghaznavi to withdraw the term which he did. Concluding, the speaker appealed to the Government to remain neutral and leave the voting to non-official elected members.

Mr. Shah Nawaz amused the House by pointing out that he was persuaded by Mr. Ghaznavi last year to sign that precious document of 29 members against the Bill by telling him that the child marriage evil did not exist in Bengal. But during his tour in Bengal which contained 42 per cent. of the entire Muslim population in India he did find the evil to an enormous extent and he would have been dishonest in the face of that, had he not retraced from the position he adopted last year when he signed the representation. (General applause.)

Mr. Sherwani, supporting the Bill, said that he wanted to disabuse the mind of the House that the majority of Mussalmans were opposed to the Bill. He repudiated the suggestion that the Bill was against Islam and challenged any Mahomedan to quote a single 'Hadi' in support of child marriage.

Mr. Keene (U. P. Official) said that after the Home Member's speech, there could not be any doubt as to the attitude of the Europeans and the officials generally. They all believed that the Bill was a righteous measure. It was intended to save millions of girls from becoming child mothers. He quoted from the opinions of the Governments of the United Provinces and Madras in favour of the Bill. He admitted that there were practical difficulties in the way of administering the Bill, but they would administer it, for it was a good and beneficial measure.

MR. JINNAH ON MARRIAGE.

Mr. Jinnah (Bombay) supporting the Bill declared that he had no mandate of any kind from his constituency. He hoped that everyone was convinced that the evil of child marriage existed. He was not, however, aware of the fact that it existed among Mussalmans until Mr. Shah Nawaz had told him so. Now that the existence of the evil was an established fact, the question was how to tackle it. He did not pretend to be an Ulema or an authority on theology, but as a practising lawyer, he had always understood that marriage under the Mahomedan Law, was a contract, pure and simple.

Mr. Mahomed Shaffee and two or three other members challenged this statement, when Mr. Jinnah retorted: "If you deny that, then you have to learn it." (Applause). Mr. Jinnah asked his co-religionists whether there was any religious text which showed that Moslem girls should be married before they were fourteen years of age. He was not convinced that the Bill militated against the civil law applicable to marriages among Muslims. Then, how could there be divine sanction to the horrible, disgraceful and inhuman practice that now prevailed? There was, at any rate, nothing in Islam which prevented them from destroying that evil. (Hear, hear). If any member found his constituency so backward as to ask him to vote against such a Bill, then he should ask that constituency to choose someone else as its representative. Let not the members of the Assembly be frightened by the public opinion which could be created in the name of religion. He was anxious that there should be no postponement of the Bill for, who knew that the Government might not be frightened by orthodox opinion? It was after a great deal of trouble that the Government, which was foreign, had now, in regard to the Bill proved to be national in spirit. He exhorted the Assembly to reject the dilatory motion.

Mr. Yamin Khan mentioned that at the conference of Muslim members held to consider the Bill, the unanimous opinion was expressed that further consideration should be postponed as on the question of the principle underlying the Bill, there was a difference of opinion. They were anxious to hear their Ulemas more fully before making up their minds. Hence his preference for the postponement of the Bill.

RELIGION NOT AFFECTED.

Sir Purshottamdas Thakurdas regretted the disclosure made by Mr. Ghaznavi that Sir James Simpson had promised to support the motion for postponement of consideration of the Bill. He hoped that Sir D'Arcy Lindsay would disown any such undertaking. Sir Purshottamdas wished to leave Mr. Ghaznavi's eloquence alone, because it was entirely vitiated by his (Mr. Ghaznavi's) statement that he was a Muslim first and an Indian next. Therefore, his speech deserved no notice. The speaker greatly admired Mian Shah Nawaz for his courage (applause) in changing his opinion after gathering the full facts bearing on the question as a member of the Joshi Committee. He also paid a compliment to Mrs. Brijlal Nehru, who was the first Indian lady member of any Committee to tour India.

The speaker did not believe that the Shastras enjoined early marriages. "It is for this Assembly, representing the people," said Sir Purshottamdas, "to say to the Government 'Bravo, come and help us to carry through this legislation, which will make the coming generations remember with gratitude the courage shown by this Assembly.' It is exactly a hundred years since Lord Bentinck abolished Sati. Who can say to-day that he hit at the Hindu religion by that reform?"

HEAVY CHILD MORTALITY.

Col. Gidney said that the cold facts about child mortality given in the Age of Consent Committee's report were clear proof that the Bill was needed. If Indian women were members of the House, he wondered what would be the fate of men like Messrs. Acharya and Shafi Dandi. Speaking from thirty years medical experience of India, he said that the death rate among women during child birth in India was more appalling than in any other part of the world. He wondered how educated members representing the culture and civilization of India could forget their high mission, which the Bill called upon them to fulfil.

PANDIT MOTILAL'S APPEAL.

Pandit Motilal Nehru said that he had thrown into the waste-paper basket the opinions he had received both for and against the Bill, for he relied on his observations of a life time, and he knew that the wicked and diabolical custom prevailed and there was no difference of opinion on the point that it must be stopped. Indeed, he was surprised to see many members making eloquent speeches on a Bill like this, for the question admitted of no argument. If the Shastras had any injunction in this matter then the Shastras had no use for him. (Hear, hear.) In his community of Kashmiri Pundits, who numbered at most five thousand in India, no girls were married before twenty. He believed that social reform would come quicker and with better effect if it came from within and was not imposed from without. But the Assembly had a clear duty in this matter, and they all owed a duty to their children and the country. The eyes of the entire world were now on this Assembly, and he urged the members of the Assembly to cast their votes in such a manner that India might rank among the civilised nations of the world. He would personally prefer a Bill laying down 18 years as the minimum age for the marriage of girls and 24 years for boys, but Mr. Sarada's Bill was there, and he hoped that it would be passed with the least delay.

POSTPONEMENT MOTION REJECTED.

CONSIDERATION OF BILL.

Closure was now applied, and Mr. Acharya's dilatory motion was rejected without division.

The motion for consideration of the Bill was passed amidst loud cheers. The Bill was then taken up clause by clause.

THE DEAD-SET AGAINST CONVERSIONS.

Some of our Hindu friends are making a dead-set against the Christian effort to win converts. The Editor of the Indian Social Reformer seems to be in command of a force, of strength as yet undetermined, in this army of opposition. In an editorial in his issue of the 10th of August, Mr. Natarajan says:—

"If the missionaries had come here frankly as educationists, doctors and social workers without the ulterior purpose of proselytizing, Indians would have appreciated their work without limit, and they too would have had no reason to doubt its efficacy... Their purpose of conversion, however, has put them and Indians in a false position towards each other. Because of this their philanthropic activities have the character of interested propaganda and are distrusted, as all propaganda is, even by those who benefit by them. Christian Missions have thus come to be regarded as agencies of religious exploitation."

The writer of the above paragraphs is not waging war upon missionaries—to them he is friendly and in many of their activities he recognizes them as valuable allies—but upon "their purpose of conversion," i.e., if we understand his meaning aright, their purpose to lead men and women to that relation to Christ and men in which they will be known as Christians. He describes the missionaries as men of high ideals and pure character, representing the best type of contact between the West and the East, and adds:—

"They do not come here in search of material gain or impelled by love of political power. Of most of them it may be said that if they had remained in their own countries and devoted themselves to making careers, they would have succeeded without much difficulty. In this country apart from their central purpose of making converts, they have done admirable work."

We have great respect for Mr. Natarajan, and prize very highly his interest in and appreciation of much of the work that missionaries are doing in India. But we are not clearer in any knowledge or conviction than we are in this that Mr. Natarajan is wrong in his conclusions and attitudes on this subject. In their central purpose of making converts missionaries have rendered their best service to India; if they had done social work without seeking converts they would have failed India in respect to her greatest need.

This opposition to the purpose of conversion is more determined and wide-spread than Christians have generally realized. It is revealed in legislation in two leading Indian States imposing severe restrictions upon the legal right to be converted. An even more significant manifestation of this opposition is made in the speech of Mr. M. B. Jayakar, a Hindu Mahasabha leader, before the Bombay Riots Enquiry Committee, in which he made a demand for restriction of the right to be converted and said that the Indian Rationalist, Dr. Paranjpye, now a member of the India Council in London, was about to introduce a Bill in the Bombay Legislative Council with this aim when he decided to resign in order to accept his present appointment. Back of Mr. Natarajan's position and back of Mr. Jayakar's and the legislation of Bikanir and Gwalior States, and lending support to all, stands Mr. Gandhi asserting that it is a sin to even desire that any man should exchange his faith for yours.

The question of conversions does not concern missions and missionaries alone or chiefly. The Churches in India are as deeply committed as are the Missions to "the purpose of conversion." Of the adults who turn to Christ in India each year an overwhelming proportion are undoubtedly influenced to do so more by Indian Christians than by Foreign Missionaries, and a like majority are baptized by Indian ministers. It is significant that at the same time that the dead-set against their purpose to win others to Christ is being launched, many Indian Christians fear that they see the beginning of more active discrimination against them in regard to public life and employment. It is well-nigh impossible for a Christian to win election to a Legislative Council or to a Municipal or a District Board from a general constituency, and whenever one is nominated by the Government a protest is made by the militant Hindu group. One who has watched the selection of applicants for Government scholarships by a Board with a Hindu majority says that over and over again scholarships have been awarded to Hindus who were in all respects less qualified and promising than Christian candidates who were refused. We state these facts because they are troubling patriotic Indian Christians and because they need to be frankly faced and fearlessly dealt with. The demand that the Christian purpose of conversion be dropped is only one of several expressions of a disposition to limit the freedom of Indian Christians and to establish Hinduism in a privileged and protected position.

Dare Christians accept this restriction of their liberty, or dare they act on the advice of Mr. Gandhi and Mr. Natarajan and abandon their purpose of conversion? Can they while loyal to their Lord cease to proclaim him as the Christ, the Saviour, the Lord to whom every heart should be open and before whom every knee should bow? The question needs only to be asked for every true Christian to answer "No."

A position has been reached in India that is very like to that which obtained at the end of the public ministry of Jesus in Galilee, when Jesus and his disciples went to villages of Philip's Caesarea and Jesus asked them, "Who do people say that I am?" This led to Peter's declaration. "Thou art the Christ." And then for the first time Jesus told them that he must endure much suffering and be rejected by the elders and the High Priests and the scribes and be put to death. Until this time Jesus had worked with the multitudes. Much, though by no means all, of his work had been social, of the sort that is now commended by our Hindu friends as the only work to which the missionaries should devote themselves. But at the height of seeming success with the multitude, who were acclaiming him as teacher and physician and were following him from place to place with an intentness that made even work and hunger to be forgotten, Jesus in the full knowledge that it would cost his life set himself to the purpose of conversion. Building on the fact that Peter had recognized him as the Christ he sought to win all of those of the inner circle of his followers to the acceptance of that fact with all of its implications.

Has History not shown that he was right? The multitudes in Galilee are not shown to have influenced the world for good to any recognizable extent because of what they got from Christ, though hundreds had been healed and scores of hundreds had been moved by the beauty, the simplicity, and the power of his teaching. But the world in many phases of its life has been remade by the few who were converted through his ministry.

It is a joyful fact, a wonderful fact that multitudes in India have come to admire Christ, to applaud him and to be thankful for what he is doing through his followers for the healing of disease, the dispelling of ignorance and the diminution of poverty, but it is a more meaningful, joyful, and wonderful fact that some, though their number is smaller, are being converted unto him and are making him their Lord. Christians ought never to abandon their social and educational work—their Lord never did—but in it all their central purpose should continue to be to bring about conversions: The Indian Witness, Lucknow.

CHRISTIAN INTOLERANCE.

The current number of the Maha Bodhi quotes from the Hawaii Hochi, the following incident which shows how intolerant the Christian ecclesiastics can be. The Buddhist priest in this incident has set a better example of Christian patience than the heads of the Catholic and Anglican Churches in Hawaii.

"The occasion was a luncheon gathering of the leaders of all the religious denominations, called by Rev. Henry P. Judd of the Hawaiian Board of Missions, for the purpose of discussing certain community problems involving education of the youth along moral, ethical and cultural lines from a non-sectarian standpoint. Other leaders of Christian denominations had been invited, in in addition to the Catholic and Anglican churchmen, and the Mormons and the Seventh Day Adventists were also represented. As a matter of courtesy, and in view of the fact that the meeting was called to consider matters outside of any creed or sect, Mr. Judd had invited Rev. Ernest Hunt of the Hongwanji Temple, as a representative of the Buddhists, who comprise the largest religious group in the territory and who number over 80,000 young American citizens among their members. Upon his arrival in the lobby of the Young Hotel Rev. Hunt was introduced to some of those who were present, and was cordially received. Then Bishop Stephen Alencastre appeared on the scene and upon being presented to Rev. Hunt displayed deep anger, raising his voice and almost shouting,—“I love Protestants, but I hate the Buddhists! If he is a guest here I will leave. I refuse to eat at the same table with Mr. Hunt!” The gentlemen who were present were aghast at the public insult hurled at the members of the largest religious group in Hawaii by the head of the Catholic Church, and spectators of this demonstration who stood about the lobby could hardly credit their senses. Then Dean Ault stepped up beside Bishop Alencastre and publicly endorsed his stand, declaring that he hated an apostate and would leave if Rev. Hunt was to remain. He took Alencastre's arm and they started for the door. Rev. Ernest Hunt, the Buddhist priest who had been thus publicly insulted, quietly called to them to wait and stepped up to them, saying,—“Do not go, please, Bishop Alencastre and Dean Ault are of greater importance at this meeting than I am, I am the one who will leave.” He then assured Mr. Judd that he was not offended. The Buddhist leader quietly left the hotel and Bishop Stephen Alencastre and Dean Ault returned to partake of their lunch without the disturbing presence of a representative of that religion whose followers they have publicly announced that they hate.”

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Nambudri Women for Reform:—An Associated Press message states that some Nambudri ladies belonging to aristocratic families of North Travancore have created a sensation there by casting off their purdah. They have adopted modern modes of dress and visited public places and attended theatres. They paid a visit to the junior Maharani of Travancore yesterday and had a very long interview and the conversation centred chiefly on social reform. Her Highness is reported to have advised them to send Nambudri girls to public schools and urged the necessity of doing away with the purdah system in the Nambudri community. This is the first instance in the social history of the Nambudris that their women, who are shut up within the four walls of their Zenana had the boldness to come out in public.

A memorial to the Late Rao Bahadur K. Veeresalingam Pantulu:—At a meeting of the citizens of Rajahmundry, it was resolved to raise a memorial to perpetuate the memory of the Late Rao Bahadur K. Veeresalingam Pantulu, a pioneer Andhra social reformer, and a strong executive committee was formed to carry it out. At a meeting of the Memorial Executive Committee held on 26-6-19 it was resolved to collect funds for the purpose of raising a statue of Rao Bahadur K. Veeresalingam Pantulu and maintaining the institutions started by him. It is, therefore, proposed to collect a sum of Rs. 50,000 for carrying out the aforesaid objects, and the Committee is sending forth this appeal in the full confidence that it will meet with an adequate response from not only the friends and admirers of Pantulu Garu, but also the generous public to whom the memory of late Rao Bahadur K. Veeresalingam Pantulu is equally dear. All donations to be remitted to the Treasurer, M. R. Ry. P. Sundaraviva Rao Pantulu Garu, B. A., B. L., High Court Vakil, Rajahmundry.

Pandit Motilal on Sarda Bill:—Regretting his unavoidable absence, Pandit Motilal Nehru has sent the following telegram to the Congress, Nationalist, Independent and the Central Moslem Parties in the Assembly. “I trust that the Congress, Nationalist, Independent and Central Moslem Parties will stand solid in support of the Sarda Bill. Free voting on the Bill, decided upon by all parties in view of the nature of the question, will be a true test of national feeling and opinion. We are to-day on our trial before the civilised nations of the world and the measure of the Assembly's support to the Sarda Bill will be the measure of our fitness to rank among those nations. The custom of early marriage is undoubtedly a curse and must be completely abolished at all costs, the supposed sanction of religion notwithstanding. I hope unattached members will also support the Bill and the Assembly as a whole will rise to the occasion.”

Indian Education in Africa:—In his annual report, states a Reuters message, Mr. Bryan, Superintendent of Education, says that the future of Indian education in Natal can confidently be said to be brighter than it ever has been and notes with satisfaction the definitely expressed desire of the Indian community for the higher education of girls. The training of teachers will be placed on a proper basis when the Sastri College which is at present under construction at Durban is completed. It is intended that this foundation at the outset of its career shall carry both intending teachers and others who may desire a secondary course for professional reasons. The department has recommended that it should be staffed under a European headmaster by Indian graduates, whom Mr. Sastri will personally select. Selected matriculates who have adopted a teacher's career may be sent to India for graduation subsequently returning as masters in their old college so that in time it will be manned by a South African Indian staff. In conclusion, Mr. Bryan says that the Department's debt to Mr. Sastri is inexpressible in mere words and it will retain a grateful and abiding memory of his sage and eloquent counsel and his eminent personality.

Racialism in East Africa:—A Mombasa message to the Indian Daily Mail says that under instructions from the Government all Indians, including those interested in science, were refused admission to the lectures given in Nairobi and Mombassa, by members of the British Association of Scientists who are visiting Kenya. The British scientists are amazed at the racialism.

League of Nations Slavery Convention:—Letter from the India Office to the Secretary-General containing a further memorandum regarding measures for the abolition of slavery in Burma: A memorandum dated August 7th, 1928, communicated to the League of Nations, described the measures adopted for the release of slaves in Burma in the year 1927-28. It was stated therein that slaves to the number of 8,852 had been released at a cost of Rs. 5,16,568-8-0 in the area known as the Hukawng Valley and the Triangle. That year saw the end of slavery in Burma; but the work still remained of seeing that the released slaves were properly established and placed in a way to enjoy the freedom conferred on them, that they were not molested by their late owners, and that economic conditions were disturbed as little as possible in the areas covered by these operations. This work was done partly by the expeditions of 1927-28 in respect of slaves released during the years 1925-26 and 1926-27. It was reported that the released slaves were gradually settling down to the new conditions and were building houses of their own and establishing new villages with headmen selected from among themselves. The owners themselves, with a few exceptions, were found to have taken kindly to the new situation. In pursuance of the same policy, His Majesty's Secretary of State for India sanctioned the proposals made by Government of Burma for the despatch of similar expeditions to the Hukawng Valley and the Triangle in the open season of 1928-29. The arrangements for the expeditions were the same as in previous years. Mr. A. W. Porter, of the Burma Frontier Service, was in charge of the expedition to the Hukawng Valley, and was accompanied by a British officer of the Burma Military Police, commanding an escort of over a hundred men, and the necessary civil and military establishment. The expedition to the Triangle was divided into two columns, north and south, each in charge of a civil officer. Captain V. G. Robert, M.B.E., M.C., of the Burma Frontier Service, was in charge of the northern and Mr. P. M. R. Leonard, O.B.E., of the Burma Frontier Service, of the southern column. Each column was accompanied by a British officer of the Burma Military Police, commanding an escort of a hundred men, and the necessary civil and medical establishment. Transport was by means of mules, of which nearly 1,100 were engaged for both the expeditions.

LIFE INSURANCE TRUST PLAN

THE outright payment of the Insurance money to the widow or children in one lump sum is a great mistake. To apply a real test you would only ask yourself how your wife would invest such a sum NOW without any help whatever from you. The woman who has been "All the Wife and Mother" is ill-equipped to invest and safeguard funds designed to her family's protection for many years.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

NOTES.

A Supreme Court For India:—It is a well-known fact that the Judicial Committee of the British Privy Council, which is the ultimate interpreter of law for British India, is operating as a dead-weight on Indian social evolution. We have from time to time cited instances of this. Mr. Kumar Shankar Roy Chowdhary moved on Tuesday a resolution in the Council of State recommending the establishment of an appellate court in India to take the place of the Privy Council. He emphasised the fact that he did not want to deprive the King of his prerogative, but His Majesty should consult his Indian subjects regarding Indian appeals by appointing Privy Councillors among them who shall be residents in India for offering justice readily to the Indian litigant public instead of the litigants being compelled in all cases to go to far off England. He declared that there were men with sufficient calibre in India and the cost of the Committee like the one he proposed would not be heavy. If this Committee was appointed it would also act as a bulwark of popular freedom and against the vagaries of the executive. In the future federal constitution there would frequently arise matters in which both British India and Indian States might be interested. Such questions could be decided by the Indian Judicial Committee of His Majesty's Privy Council. Mr. Khaparde moved an amendment that Judges to be appointed should be not only from high courts, but also from judges of such courts as exercise the powers of high courts. He further made it clear that litigants might have the option of appealing either to the Circuit House or to the Judicial Committee of His Majesty's Privy Council in England. It is difficult to think of more moderate and reasonable proposals but Sir Maneckjee Dadabhoy, who belongs to the category which is more royalist than the king, opposed it. His arguments make curious reading: "Claiming 45 years experience of the Bar, he said it would be a disaster to India if for the sake of satisfying the sentimental taste of a few individuals India should be deprived of the advantages that India now derived by her contact with the Privy Council in England. The British Privy Council possessed eminent judges and there were available many learned Lawyers. It was not so easy to obtain such qualified lawyers in India. Indeed it would be difficult to compare the knowledge of English lawyers with that of Indian lawyers. It would be criminal waste of time and expenditure to duplicate the machinery and, moreover, the Indian litigant public had great confidence in the decisions of His Majesty's Privy Council." Sir Maneckjee, notwithstanding his 45 years at the Bar is known more as a business-man and a reactionary politician than as a lawyer, and his authority to speak in the latter capacity is not, therefore, unquestionable. Apart from that, his plea that lawyers of the calibre of the members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council are unobtainable in this country, is clearly as sentimental as the arguments for a special tribunal for India were described by him to be. We agree with Munshi Narayan Prasad Asthana that India should have a Supreme Court, and not merely an imitation of the British Privy Council.

Progress of Sarda's Bill:—The Sarda Marriage Bill is making excellent progress in the Legislative Assembly. Amendments to lower the age-limits and otherwise weaken the force of the Bill have been thrown out by large majorities, including one to exclude Mussalmans from its scope. Impossible as it may seem, orthodox Hindus and orthodox Mussalmans, have been working hand in hand to destroy the Bill but without success. Some of the strongest speeches in support of the Bill have come from Mahomedan progressives. The Bill is posted for the third and final reading in the Assembly on Monday. Its passage in that body may now be considered assured.

An Important Decision.—We referred some-time back to the appeals in the Bombay High Court before Mr. Justice Kemp and Mr. Justice Blackwell arising out of the bigamy case in which one Peter Philip Saldanha was acquitted of the charge by the Sessions Judge of Nasik on the ground that his first marriage which was performed before the Registrar was null as opposed to Canon Law. The Bombay Government appealed against this decision and simultaneously another appeal was filed by the accused against the decision of Sir Norman Kemp decreeing the restitution of conjugal rights in a case filed by the first wife shortly after the second marriage. The Times of India gives a report of the decisions in the two appeals. In the civil appeal their Lordships said that in their opinion on the evidence in this case the personal law applicable was the Canon Law of the Church of Rome. The next question arising was whether assuming that the Canon Law forbade the marriage of the parties except in the form prescribed by that law, Section 88 of the Act of 1872 covered the prohibition. In their Lordships' opinion it clearly did not. The whole scheme of the Act of 1872 indicated that it was an act dealing with the forms of solemnisation of marriage. Mr. Justice Blackwell did not think that the words used in Section 88 justified the limitation suggested in the marginal note, that the personal law applicable was the personal law as to prohibited degrees. His Lordship thought that the expression personal law in that section would include any personal law, apart from any personal law as to the form of marriage, which forbade either of the parties from entering into a contract of marriage with one another. In his opinion the prohibition contemplated by the section would certainly not extend to a prohibition as to the form of marriage. Roman Catholics were not expressly excluded from part V of the Act. Accordingly even if it were established that by the canon law the first appellant and the respondent were prohibited from going through a form of marriage before the Registrar, he should hold that section 88 did not cover such a prohibition and that the marriage was valid and binding upon them. If contrary to his opinion, his Lordship proceeded, the true view were that Section 88 did cover a prohibition as to the form of marriage, he should nevertheless hold that on the evidence in this case such a prohibition had not been established. As to the contention that the parties themselves did not regard the marriage before the Registrar as binding, that it was a conditional marriage, and subject to the performance of a religious ceremony, the evidence did not, in his Lordship's opinion, establish this, even if it were permissible in law. Even if such an agreement had been made it would have been of no effect in law, the parties having gone through a ceremony which by the Act of 1872 was a valid and binding marriage.

In the criminal appeal preferred by Government, their Lordships could not agree with the Sessions Judge that the marriage before the Registrar was a contingent or instalment marriage, even were such a thing possible in law. Their Lordships continuing remarked that a suggestion was put forward under Section 79 of the Indian Penal Code that the offence with which the accused was charged was no offence, in that he had by reason of a mistake of fact in good faith believed himself to be justified in doing what he did. As to this, their Lordships thought that the mistake he made was not a mistake of fact at all but a mistake of law. Further they could find no trace of good faith in the conduct of the accused throughout. After hearing counsel regarding sentence, their Lordships remarked that the least sentence which, having regard to the circumstances of this case they could pass was one of nine months' rigorous imprisonment.

Bombay Women's Conference.—The Fourth Bombay Women's Constituent Conference is to be held to day (Saturday the 21st) at 4 p.m. at the Malabari Memorial Hall, Seva Sadan. This is the constituent conference of the All-India Women's Conference which will be held in Bombay towards the end of January 1930. Resolutions will be put before the conference supporting the Sarda Bill and the Joshi Committee's recommendations; the extension of the Compulsory Primary Education Act to more wards in Bombay; the abolition of the Fourth Standard Vernacular Examination as at present conducted; a higher standard of examination for training Matriculate teachers; better hostel accommodation for women in colleges and the appointment of women professors in the colleges; and liberalising the law of inheritance in its application to women. Delegates will be elected to the All-India Conference. All men and women interested in these questions are invited to give their assistance.

Home for Women Students:—Within the short period of one year that the Home for Women Students has been in existence, it has been supplying, as far as its limited means could permit, a long felt want. One of the great handicaps to women's education in this city is want of suitable hostel accommodation for the large number of women who come from the mofussil to Bombay for their education. The Committee of Management of the Home for Women Students are to be congratulated on the excellent beginning they have made in solving this difficulty. But they are unable to extend their activities for lack of funds. The appeal at the conclusion of the report speaks for itself. "The Home Committee had to spend Rs. 1,813-12-9 over and above the income from the students. This year this deficit was met out of the sums that we received as donations and subscriptions and if the same kind interest continues the Home will grow in its usefulness. There is a growing demand for such a Home and we are sorry to have had to refuse many applications for want of space. The Home is in urgent need of larger premises and we take this opportunity of appealing to the generous well-wishers and friends of the cause of Education amongst women to help us in meeting this growing want." The appeal for such a deserving institution as the Home for Women Students will meet with a liberal response from the Bombay public.

Education in Indian Villages:—We published in our issue of February 11, 1928, an article on Ushagram by Mr. Brooks Foley, the Director of that institution. We have now in this issue another contribution from his pen on education in which he emphasises the need for right contacts between the city and the village and the necessity for training Indian youths in their own environment. The educational experiment which Mr. Foley has made at Ushagram is an attempt to achieve this end and Mr. Foley has always been anxious to receive suggestions. We are sure that this article which is a valuable contribution to the Indian educational problem will be read with great interest.

course which events are taking in India is closely parallel to what it took in Ireland. We earnestly trust that the British Government will now at least awake to the actualities of the Indian situation and act in a manner which will prevent their developing into disastrous ways.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.
BOMBAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1929.

JATINDRA NATH DAS.

On Friday the 13th instant after being without food for sixty-two days, Jatindra Nath Das died in the Borstal Jail in Lahore in which he was confined as an under-trial prisoner in what is known as the Lahore Conspiracy Case. This case, it may be explained, arose out of the murder of Mr. Saunders, a Police Officer, who was shot dead shortly after the death of Lala Lajpat Rai, which, according to an opinion expressed by Lalaji's Doctor, was accelerated by the assault made on him by the Police at the demonstration against the Simon Commission when it went to Lahore in December. Saunders was one of the Police Officers, and it was surmised that this murder had for motive the avenging of the assault on Lala Lajpat Rai. As a result of the enquiries instituted to find out Mr. Saunders' murderer, several young men in different places have been arrested and put on their trial at Lahore, where the crime was committed. Some of the accused complained of the treatment accorded to them, and resolved to go without food unless they were treated with greater consideration. They claimed that, as accused in a political case, they should not be placed in the same category as persons charged with offences involving moral turpitude. Government have conceded this point so far as to appoint a Committee to enquire into it and make recommendations. Jatin was one of the hunger-strikers who refused to consider the appointment of the Committee as a sufficient reason for acquiescing in the treatment he and his fellow prisoners were receiving. A few days before his death, Government, seeing the perilous condition of his health, offered to release him on bail. He refused to accept the offer and died in the prison where he was confined.

The news of his death has sent a thrill of horror and indignation throughout the country. Even the official mind, impervious to all other attempts to reach it, has been staggered by Jatin's death which, in a moment, has turned its strength on which it relies, into weakness. The bureaucratic armoury contains no weapon adequate to cope with a resolution which embraces death as a welcome relief from a mechanical regime. Mr. Milner White the special Magistrate who is trying the Meerut Case in which certain persons alleged to be communists are charged with the offence of "waging war with the King," when the accused asked for the adjournment of the trial for a day on account of Jatin's death, made some observations which are worth quoting: "Whatever we may think of Das's hunger strike, one cannot but regret his death. It is a sacrifice of himself for an ideal which we presume he believed in, and he deliberately sacrificed himself. There may be different views regarding Das's hunger strike, but there cannot be any doubt regarding his motive. I am sorry his enthusiasm led him to take the step, which has had such an unfortunate result. I am here representing in many ways the law and order of an imperialistic Government. I am not concerned with Das protesting against imperialism. I do not say anything against men fighting for their beliefs but it is not a case in which the Court should adjourn as a mark of respect to the memory of Das." The Government of India which had introduced a Bill to empower Magistrates to try accused in their absence when it is caused by their voluntary acts such as hunger-strike, in order to meet the situation created by the accused in the Lahore Case, withdrew the Bill in deference to the feeling in the Opposition benches in consequence of Jatin's death.

The effect of Jatin's self-immolation on the mind, particularly of the younger generations, is incalculable. It has found itself. Here was a young man, like any one of thousands and millions of young men, who was born of their own nation, brought up among the same social conditions, educated in the same kind of institutions, a youth of Bengal whom as a class Miss Mayo, improving upon Macaulay, has described as physical degenerates and moral weaklings, who endured the pangs of hunger for over two months refusing to give in to the bitter end. Colleges and schools all over the country have been emptied to commemorate Jatin's heroic deed. A moral resolution has been effected and no system of Government which does not take note of the fact and adapt itself to it, has a chance of success. The law and order of an imperialistic system, as Mr. Milner White described, cannot prevail over the human will tenacious of its right to self-expression in its own national medium. Jatin, the Home Member of the Government of India helplessly exclaimed in the Legislative Assembly, was now removed from any earthly tribunal. He is mistaken. It is true that Jatin is no longer amenable to the jurisdiction of any official tribunal. But there is a far greater tribunal, that of the public opinion of his own people to which Jatin has appealed. And the verdict of that tribunal is unmistakable even by Sir James Crerar. The British nation has been sedulously kept in ignorance of the rapid change in Indian mentality which has been in progress during the last half a century. It was similarly kept ignorant of the change in a country much nearer to itself, Ireland. The

THE NEW EDUCATION FOR INDIA.

( BY MR. WALTER BROOKS FOLEY. )

The schools of India are starting points for re-evaluating and re-vitalizing the whole character of the country. "Where there is no knowledge the people perish" is as true today as before it was written. Any slowness of movement within the nation may be attributed, in large measure, to ignorance. The schools should be used definitely to destroy misunderstanding and to promote high progressive aims.

It is a most interesting and hopeful fact that there are schools all over India which are tending to become experimental centers for the new education that India needs. How often I recall the statement of a Government official in one of the Provincial educational departments that "the educational machine which he found when he came into his position ate up so much of the money of his budget that it was increasingly difficult for him to contribute toward experiments, even though he knew they were worthy of assistance." He likewise intimated that standardization processes precluded the promotion of new methods.

Here is a place in the scheme of things where new educational attempts may function to excellent advantage. Our additional efforts from this time forward ought to be devoted to supplementing what is already being done in Government, district and village schools; to promoting the special phases of education, based on sound psychological methods, which assist in strengthening and promoting sturdy character; to constructing educational methods—both utilitarian and cultural—that will fit into Indian villages.

Nothing can assist Indian youth like a real education. For Youth must sort out the grain from the chaff of modern social living in India. Without a thorough-going knowledge of the finest methods available—East or West—Youth will be handicapped, perhaps fatally. With the right educational opportunities and advantages Indian Youth will emerge with a message for the world.

THE RE-MAKING OF VILLAGES.

The continent of India with its 650,000 villages has a terrific change to undergo as it mixes its life with the life of the modern world. It is an immediate problem for all of us to face, since much of our activity is definitely related to the villages. The realities of India are still compressed within the villages. Its past and its future lie in them as well. Because of this we must be sure to adopt the right approach to our village educational opportunities.

Friendship is the keynote for the successful promotion of character-education developments in any Indian village. I have been in villages where leaders have tried to work and have found there no symptoms of lasting friendship. Down-right criticism of customs, habits and methods had provoked only a look of interest, not even active opposition to the new enterprises. Other villages have shown developed appreciations of new values—led to this belief through co-operative comradeship on the part of earnest leaders. Friendship once established, new plans may be promoted.

The day has passed when educational institutions can be located in isolation and yet exert an influence over surrounding villages. Methods, ideas and practical efforts must be carried out to village centers after a real friendship has been built up. Then the program must be carried from the village out into the rest of Indian society.

Most efforts, thus far, have promoted an overhead system of education in the cities and larger towns. Now we must devote strong efforts to reconstructing foundations located in the village. Wherever possible schools must be in actual villages. We must not continue to draw from the villages the best students and in so doing abstract village Youth from the national culture, giving in return only a mechanized message or a standardized system from a foreign land. We must know where Youth lives, how Youth lives, and what ways Youth may better live in its own communities. We must never lose sight of our desire to recreate the village.

METHOD-AIMS AND ABILITY TESTS.

When we find methods that are useless they should be scrapped. When we find types of study that have no value they should be displaced. If necessary we should develop a curriculum to meet the immediate actual needs of each environment. During this process we should make a careful study of those students who exhibit most intelligence. These should be singled out for advancement along occupational lines of need and possibility. Vocational guidance is an absolute essential if we would place our students in positions for which they are best fitted.

Such curricula should include trades, arts and crafts; agriculture, stock-raising and attendant occupations—such as poultry-raising; household improvement methods; health studies; elementary knowledge of community occupations; community service; and methods of dealing with social divisions.

Each student should have opportunities for actually practicing the theoretical suggestion secured in the class-room. The disinclination towards physical labor should be broken down gradually and surely. Students should be helped to discover that education is more than reading from book. The values of physical effort should be portrayed by example and enterprise of the teacher.

From the purely cultural point of view the past of India should be thoroughly grasped in outline by the pupils from an Indian approach. An understanding of great factors in Indian progress, or the meaning of India's lack of development along some lines should be stressed. Beginner's course on the high values of practices in other countries should be started. The fact that world peace based on the friendship-feeling of childhood should be absorbed to its fullest extent.

The two elements basic in our schools must be self-reliance and self-direction. Any educational system, no matter how well established, that weakens the ability of a student to grow is a bad system—even though it may teach obedience and develop memory. Any system that creates or fosters dependence is a system to be eliminated. Our primary schools, middle schools, high schools, and colleges must be training institutions for character development. In them students must begin the process of vital living in their own world.

Tests must be constantly applied. All knowledge imparted must be tested by experience. All ideals expressed must be proved worthy through practice. All principles suggested as facts must be ground in the mill of the world's wisdom. Youth must face reality.

Abilities must be evaluated by a score of scientific tables and processes. We must not hesitate to apply to our students the strictest of rules that we may be governed not by the emotion of sentiment but by the harshness of logic. We want our young people to be upstanding leaders. Nothing can create this variety of individual save a feeling, on his part, of responsibility for his own life and his own organization.

INTEGRATION OF VILLAGE AND CITY LIFE.

We have taken away from many of our young Indians their ancient heritage of a capacity to suffer and sacrifice. We have made them weak. Now we must make them strong. This practice is hard to promote in our city centers, where the rush of a thousand ideas from north, south, east and west hurry the minds of our students into meaningless decisions and illogical actions. The city is a difficult place for the strongest of students. Our trouble is that we have many students who have not had the preliminary training to stand out against the new and exciting conditions of Indian city life.

There has been little or no development of right contacts between village and city. The student and the graduate of our city college loses his interest in the exacting problems that exist in the villages which surround the cities. And he does not make up for this loss by learning what he must do to save himself and his city from social destruction. He takes what is handed to him and does little thinking of his own. It is our responsibility to see that the city student, whether he has grown up in village or city, has adequate direction in his pursuit of higher education. In this connection we need to study more definitely the subject of college relationships. Freedom of movement in thought and fellowship between students of various religions and races needs to be fostered through intellectual understanding and mutual appreciation. An unhampered search after the best will lead to the finest results.

In planning for practical usefulness, for instance, a training for village service can be arranged for in the city. It is possible for a group in a city college to adopt a nearby village where, through friendly effort, the social life of all the villagers may be improved, the health standards raised, the economic standard of living become more nearly just.

When such a scheme is worked out the student will begin to feel a larger responsibility for his friends. In this case he will think more especially of the Youth in the village. And in the mind of the man who lives in the village, the city school will begin to justify its existence.

We look forward to an early day when the schools of India will attain to and exceed their ancient significance.

MADRAS BROTHEL-BILL.

We give below Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi's dissenting minute to the Brothel-Bill which was introduced in the Madras Legislative Council which has emerged from the select committee stage. A brief history of the brothel Bill and how at long last it came to be introduced in the Council from the pen of a Madras correspondent will be of interest to our readers.

Both the Women's Indian Association and the Madras Vigilance Association drafted the present Bill for the suppression of brothels and immoral traffic some years before and went on Deputation to the then law Member Sir C. P. Ramaswamy Iyer with a request to introduce it as a Government measure. Sir C. P. Ramaswamy Iyer after promising that he would do it failed to do so. A little later a second deputation of women waited again on the Law-member who said that the bill would fare better in the hands of a private member and he himself suggested that Mr. K. R. V. Iyer might be asked to take charge of the Bill. Accordingly Mr. K. R. V. Iyer of Madura constituency consented to the proposal but he took several months even to write and obtain sanction from the Government of India to introduce the Bill. Then after obtaining sanction he failed to introduce it at the first opportunity. Subsequently he introduced the Bill which was referred to a Select Committee. Except one Select Committee Meeting he had not attended any other meeting.

He has put 30 Members on the Select Committee the majority of whom do not attend the meetings while our friends Mr. Sathyamurthi and Mr. Venkatchala Chettiar who advance reactionary views make it a point to attend. Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi who has spared no pains to get this piece of social legislation enacted has appended a strong minute of dissent to the unsatisfactory Select Committee report.

Your readers can imagine what an uphill task it is for the promoter of the Bill to fight against these antagonistic forces. From Dr. Reddi's dissentient note, it will be seen how powerful are the forces here against any moral reform in this Presidency.

All honour to the few splendid men amongst us, as for example, the President of our Local Council whose advice and suggestions in times of difficulty are very encouraging.

Mr. MUTHULAKSHMI REDDI'S MINUTE OF DISSENT.

BILL NO. 16 OF 1928—BILL FOR THE SUPPRESSION OF BROTHELS AND IMMORAL TRAFFIC.

We consider that the Bill as shaped by the Select Committee is defective in two respects.

(1) The Bill does not provide for punishing a person who makes a living out of the earnings of a prostitute.

(2) It does not provide for punishing any person who keeps or manages or acts or assists in the management of a place of assignation.

Any legislation for the suppression of immoral traffic in women and children will be unsatisfactory and ineffective unless provision is made for the punishment of the person who controls a prostitute and lives on the earnings of the prostitute. There cannot be any objection to legislation for punishing any person for such earnings on the ground of impropriety or inexpediency. The exploitation of female destitution and helplessness for personal gains should not be allowed to go unpunished in any civilised community. The only caution that must be observed is to exclude from the purview of the Bill the class of persons who have to reside with prostitutes on account of relationship but do not abet the prostitution or control the movements of the prostitute.

The essential ingredients of an offence of this class are (1) intimate association for gain, (2) direction or control over the prostitute's movements, and (3) abettment of prostitution. Where these conditions are satisfied, there cannot be any reasonable objection to provide for the punishment of this class of offenders. The clause relating to this class of offence is an indispensable supplement to that relating to the keeping of brothels. It is not unlikely that the traffic in women will simply change shape and flourish in spite of the suppression of brothels unless and until this class of offence is made punishable under the Bill. It is therefore necessary to insert a new clause in the Bill to the following effect.

"Whoever knowingly lives wholly or in part on the earnings of a prostitute and exercises control, direction or influence over her movement in such a manner as to show that he or she is aiding, abetting or compelling her prostitution shall be punished with imprisonment which may extend to two years with fine which may extend to Rs. 1,000 or with both.

The corresponding Section—Section 6 of the Calcutta Act runs thus :—

(1) Any male person who knowingly lives, wholly or in part on the earnings of prostitution shall be punished with imprisonment which may extend to three years or with whipping or with both of these punishments and also be liable to a fine which may extend to one thousand rupees.

(2) Where a male person is proved

(a) to be living with or to be habitually in the company of a prostitute, or

(b) to have exercised control, direction or influence over the movements of a prostitute, in such a manner as to show that he is aiding, abetting or compelling her prostitution with any other person or generally, it shall be presumed, until the contrary is proved, that he is knowingly living on the earnings of prostitution.

Section V of the Bombay Act and Section VII of the Burma Act are almost identical in terms to that of the Calcutta Act. The provisions in the English Enactment is to be found in Section 1 of the English Vagrancy Act of 1895, 61 and 62 of Victoria Chapter 39 as amended by 2 and 3 George V—Chapter 20 Section 7 (1) and 7 (4).

By these statutes it is provided that whoever knowingly lives wholly or in part on the earnings of prostitution shall be punished. Where a male is proved to be living with or habitually in the company of, or proved to have exercised control, direction or influence over the movements of a prostitute in such manner as to show that he is aiding, abetting or compelling her prostitution with any other person or generally, he shall, unless he can satisfy the court to the contrary, be deemed to be knowingly living on the earnings of prostitution. Whoever being a female, for the purpose of gain, exercises control direction or influence over the movements of a prostitute in such manner as to show that she is aiding, abetting or compelling his prostitution with any person or generally, shall be punished.

Clause 6 of the Bill provides protection for a girl living in a place of assignation. Clause 10 provides protection for any woman or girl detained in a house for the purposes of prostitution. The Bill should make provision for punishing any man or woman who keeps or induces or acts, or assists in the management of a place of assignation. This can easily be achieved by the insertion of the words 'place of assignation' after the word 'brothel' in clause 5 in all places where the word 'brothel' occurs in this clause.

The person in charge of place of assignation makes money by permitting it to be used for the purpose of prostitution but as the house may not be habitually used for the purposes of prostitution it may not come under the definition of the word 'brothel' as defined in the Bill. It is desirable to bring the place of assignation also within the purview of the Bill.

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.
MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XXXVIII. WRITERS.

(By Dr. CLIFFORD MANSHARDT, Ph.D.).

Much of the charm of literature comes from the way in which the authors dig for us new wells. We enjoy the homely and the commonplace, but we also enjoy the fantastic, tales laid in far away lands, and old truths clothed in new garments. We like to live with giants, with fairy queens and princes charming. We revel in the creations of the author's imagination, and find joy in making the acquaintance of real people who live lives different from our own. The author who can take us out of our every-day environment and cause us to live imaginatively in the life situations of others is doing us a real service. He refreshes us as does a draught of cool, clear, water.

To select the proper word to convey one's meaning is no small problem. The inexperienced writer has a tendency to run to superlatives. He uses words that should be used but seldom with such frequency that when an unusual situation arises he has no words left with which to express himself. There is nothing that gives the trained ear more joy than to listen to proper speech, while the author whom we read and re-read is the man who through years of study and effort has made the language his very own. A word fitly chosen is a veritable apple of gold—a treasure dearly bought.

The writer owes it to his constituency to speak words of truth. There is no harm done by a tale easily recognized as a fantastic one. We catch the author's spirit and enjoy the vagaries of his mind. But there is harm done by a tale which purports to deal with actual situations, while in reality it is a mere distortion. Far too many of our modern novelists consider that the only way to appeal to a jaded public taste is to call evil good, to substitute darkness for light, and to call bitter sweet. It is time that the novel of filth be called by its proper name instead of being passed by as "an interesting psychological study." The reading public can and should demand a literary house cleaning.

The author with a message, the author who believes himself to have complete understanding of the things whereof he writes, is the author most likely to win the human heart. To write a book for the sake of writing a book is of little avail—there are too many such books. To write a book because one believes it is thus that one give one's best self to the world is of much avail—there are too few such books. The writer is a co-operator with God just as truly as is the industrialist, the agriculturist, or the member of any other profession. His talent has been given him for development, and he is under obligation to do the best work of which he is capable. In so far as he uses them wisely the good is furthered. A writer should guard well that which is committed to his trust.

ANTI PROHIBITION ACTIVITIES.

The following Bulletin, World League against Alcoholism, was received by the last mail :—

It is officially announced from Paris that a "world wide war against prohibition has been declared by thirteen wine growing countries of Europe, whose activities are centralized in the Office International du Vin," whose head quarters are in that city. Dr. Leon Donarcho, it is said, "has been named Commander-in-Chief of the anti-prohibition offensive," the slogan of which is "liberty and temperance," etc. They propose to "drive out bad liquor with good" that is, by the use of wine which these folks have for sale.

There is nothing new about this programme. The Wine men have already been doing this very thing ever since Alexander the Great drank himself to death at Babylon, three hundred years before the time of Christ, 2,300 years ago. These wine makers would like to keep up this game for another twenty three centuries. As they have wine for sale, their ambitions are quite natural.

This modern campaign of the wine men is already well under way. The results are indicated in a volume published a few months ago, "The Near East and American Philanthropy" a "survey conducted under the guidance of the General Committee of the Near East Survey," which Committee was appointed in 1925, and whose report has just been published by the Columbia University Press, (New York).

As an outcome of the world war, France demanded and received the "mandate" for the civilization of Syria, and wine making France made the best of her opportunity. Things are going the way the wine makers want them to go. Regarding the use of alcohol under the management of the French "mandate," the report reads :—

"Almost without exception, correspondents testify to a great and growing increase in the use of alcohol, and observe that before the War foreign beverages were very rare in Syria. The native 'araq,' a strong spirit, and wines of the country were, however, in use. It is noticeable that Moslems who formerly defied in private the Koranic injunction against drinking, now do so publicly. Wine shops, and cafes which serve liquors are now to be found in nearly every town. The common attitude, except among strictly orthodox Moslems is complaisance. Only one temperance organization, a woman's society in Damascus, is reported."

And with the increase of the use of alcohol under the French mandate, other vices that usually accompany the drink, are now thriving as never before. We read from the report :—

"In 1922, the Lebanese government legislated that there should be no commercial gambling places in its territory; the law was over-ruled by the mandatory power, and such places were opened in two mountain summer resorts. In native communities, there are no recognized public gambling houses."

In regard to the use of narcotic drugs under the French mandate, the same increase appears. The report states that :—

In most part of the country there is reported an increase in the use of narcotic drugs, particularly hasheesh and cocaine. Some natives allege that there is a laxness in enforcing the laws. No noticeable public sentiment has yet been aroused concerning the subject."

In regard to social vices, the French wine programme has taken the usual course prevailing under wine making countries. The report states :—

"The Mosaic laws inflicting death on the girl who 'plays the harlot,' and in many cases upon her consorts, were the theoretical basis of the general Syrian attitude towards prostitution. Today, however, licensed houses of prostitution are found in many of the towns. In eleven towns there are well over 1,000 licensed prostitutes, and Aleppo and Damascus each has between 300 and 500. The control of the Profession is said to be in the hands of a small group; the Government is not trying to abolish it, and it is spreading widely. 'Maisens de convenience' are established near all important French military posts, with the approval of the military authorities, who believe that they are a definite protection to the residents of the places in which they are located. Formerly prostitutes in Syria were almost entirely foreign women; they are now recruited from almost every group of natives as well. Few Moslem girls, however, enter public houses; but many Moslem widows and divorces are privately engaged in prostitution. Men who patronize brothels may be classified according to their numbers as: (1) Military (2) Native Christians (3) Moslems. Many report a growing tendency to be indifferent to the spread of prostitution, or else regard it as a natural concomitant of the European influence on the country."

It will be seen, therefore, that this French wine making programme is now well under way in Syria, where the wine makers have a free hand. The increase in the consumption of alcohol is decidedly marked, gambling is spreading, officially protected and prostitution is rampant, legalized and protected. The Office International du Vin proposes to make a world wide fight to force these conditions into every part of the world, particularly into the United States where the laws and public sentiment are against all such things. Dr. Douarhe, the leader and "Commander-in-Chief" of the movement states that "our campaign will be educational and we shall strive to make it courteous, dignified and comprehensive."

These folks are making their campaign in Syria "comprehensive" all right enough.

FAILURE OF CHRISTIAN MISSION.*

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

The writer is very much surprised at the changed attitude of the Editor of the Indian Social Reformer according to an article—an editorial in the issue of August 10th.

I heard you speak at the Mid India Missionary Association meeting some years ago. When your address was generally favourably received by all missionaries present. But in this article of August 10th, you are certainly making a number of misleading statements. Is this to show us that you are ignorant of what you are writing about?

1. Is an error in your statement, when you form the wrong conclusion why missionaries are here. No missionaries are here for educational, medical or social work alone. If any are here solely for that purpose, they can no longer be classed as missionaries. Missionaries are in India and in every other country at Christ's command, "Go ye into all the world." They are carrying on educational, medical and social work only as a secondary work. Indians ought to have done that before the missionaries ever came but since the Indian religions did not do this, and did not have any insight and initiative in doing this and were groping in darkness, the missionaries felt called to undertake this for your people in addition to their other work which is heavy in itself.

2. You speak as if the missionaries are here as if they came for proselytizing. This is not true. The missionaries are here because their Lord and Master commands, "Go and preach". And the result is the Holy Spirit takes those words from the lips of missionaries and plants them into hearts of Indians, who also want this religion and its blessings of eternal life, which no religion of India or any other country can give. Forgiveness of sin is found only in the Christian religion and no man ought to object if his fellowman wants sin removed from his heart. Christ will do this blotting out of the heart, if man wants his sin removed. In fact you, yourself ought to welcome this forgiveness of sin to your fellowmen.

3. You say, "their purpose of conversion has put missionaries in a false position." Never. No one, that has been truly converted has ever felt that he has been placed in a false position. Those who feel that they have been placed in a false position, have not been converted. And others, who imagine this falseness, do not know what they are talking about.

*We should have been glad if Mr. Bradford had pointed out wherein the speech at the Jubbalpore Conference to which he evidently refers differs from the article from which he quotes. So far as the first three points he specifically mentions are concerned there can be no inconsistency because in substance we have held and expressed the same views for some years past. The fourth is merely a manner of expression. We may mention that in view of the possibility of misunderstandings such as Mr. Bradford's Mr. Natarajan has declined invitations to address missionary meetings since the Jubbalpore Conference.—Ed. I. S. R.

4. "Christian Missions have come to be regarded as agencies of religious exploitation." No one that has experienced the blessings of the Christian religion, its forgiveness of sin, etc., will ever make such a statement. And certainly those who have passed into eternal life will be grateful to God that missionaries have brought it to them.

Now I think that I have touched the principal fallacies in your editorial. Should you desire to have more light on the subject be free to write to me, and I will illuminate your points in question more fully.

Dharchula, U. P.,
10th September 1929. }

Yours, etc.,
C. BRADFORD.

LIFE SKETCH OF JATINDRANATH DAS.

Jatindra Nath Das, son of Sj. Bankim Chandra Das was born at Shambazar in 1904 and comes of a respectable Kayastha family of Calcutta. His ancestral residence was at Cossipore. His grandfather migrated to Puddopulore, Bhawanipur after the Government had acquired his ancestral residence for the establishment of a gun factory. He was educated at Bhawanipur Mitra Institution and passed the Matriculation Examination from the said school in 1921 and then joined Ashutosh College.

JOINS N. C. O. MOVEMENT.

The year 1921 which saw the birth of non-co-operation movement also marks the beginning of the active life of Jatin Das. He responded to the clarion call of non-co-operation and gave up his studies and began to serve his country as a humble worker. In this connection mention should be made of an incident which brings into bold relief his intense love for country. His father who was vehemently opposed to his son's joining the non-co-operation movement drove him out of his house when his son threw himself heart and soul into the vortex of the movement. But nothing could daunt that brave young man. He left his father's protection and for sometime put up in the office of the Congress Committee. During his stay there he lived only on 'chira' 'muri'. Even when he was reduced to this plight cheerfulness did not forsake him nor his care-free smile fade on his lips. Those who saw Jatindra Nath at the time predicted that he was going to do something great.

SERIES OF ARRESTS.

When the whole volunteer corps was declared illegal by the Bengal Government he wholeheartedly joined the movement and was arrested and sent to jail. After his release he became the Assistant Secretary of South Calcutta Congress Committee and acted in that capacity upto the time of his arrest in connection with Saunders Murder Case better known as the Lahore Conspiracy Case. As Assistant Secretary he went to the flood-stricken area in North-Bengal to lend his helping hand to the people in their distress and was in charge of Patisar centre. After his return from Patisar he was again arrested while picketing at Burabazar for the boycott of foreign cloths and sentenced to six months' rigorous imprisonment. After his release from jail he went on working for the Congress and worked hard with Deshbandhu for the formation of the Swarajya party. He was again arrested in 1925 for the third time under Criminal Law Amendment Act and was a detenu for 3 years.

HUNGER-STRIKE IN MYMENSINGH JAIL.

While in Mymensingh jail he resorted to hunger strike as a protest against the treatment of jail authorities and continued it for three weeks after the lapse of which the Government yielded and he was transferred to Mianwali jail in Punjab.

NATIONAL MILITIA.

The vision of the formation of a national militia always loomed large before him and on his release he concentrated all his energy on the organisation and formation of a permanent volunteer corps and when the Congress was in session in Calcutta he was the Major of the Bengal Volunteer Corps. Such was his passion for the organisation of volunteers that he went from door to door in the scorching rays of the sun to induce the young men of Chetia, Ballygunj and Kidderpore to join the volunteer movement and it will be no exaggeration to say that the South Calcutta Volunteer Corps owed its origin and existence to the untiring energy and activity of Sj. Das. The Volunteer movement was always in his brain and he was arrested on June 14, 1922. His parting words to his friends and co-workers were "Perhaps I shall not come back, but keep the Volunteer movement alive and see that it does not collapse." Even on his death-bed in Lahore Jail he requested all his friends who went to interview him to make the volunteer organisation a living force.

THE IDEA OF FREEDOM.

His activity was not cribbed, cabined and confined to the four corners of the volunteer organisation only. He had an eye on the physical and moral welfare of the youngmen of Bhawanipur and in that behalf he helped to establish libraries, study circles, and gymnasiums in South Calcutta. The list of books shows that he was very eager to inculcate the principles of freedom in the youngmen. He himself drew inspiration from books on Irish Revolution, French Revolution and the lives of Mazzini and Garibaldi.

Now, we come to the last chapter of his life and activities. After Jatin Das was lodged in the Lahore Jail Bhagat Singh and Batukeswar Dutt went on hunger-strike and he followed suit, "I will fight it to the finish" he said and he has right bravely fought it to the finish. Nothing could make him change his mind and even when on the verge of death the Government offered to release him on bail and his bold reply was 'Conditional release is no release' and he spurned the offer of the Government with contempt. His firm will, deathless determination, dogged tenacity of purpose and love of country did not desert him till the last hour of his life. He was a true Soldier of Freedom and died like a hero and a martyr. The motto of this Indian Macswiney was :—

“ A Soldier's life is life for me.

A Soldier's death ; So India is Free.” and he nobly and valiantly lived up to it.—A. B. Patrika.

PROCESSION IN LAHORE.

Jatindra Das who was confined in Lahore Borstal Jail as an under-trial prisoner in what is called the Lahore Conspiracy Case, died on the 13th instant at 1-30 p.m., after having been on hunger-strike for 61 days as a protest against the treatment of political prisoners. The news of the death of J. N. Das spread in the city with electric speed and by three o'clock the principal business quarters had been closed for the day. People started gathering outside the Borstal Jail gate but the authorities did not allow more than about a dozen gentlemen and ladies in the jail compound. Mr. Kiranchandra Das, brother of the deceased, was the only person permitted inside the jail. At about 4-30 p.m. the dead body of Das was brought out on a wooden bier shouldered by his brother and jail menials and was placed on the roadside amidst shouts of “Long live the Revolution,” “Long live Das.” Das's eyes were sunken deep in the sockets, his cheekbone protruded out and his face was ghastly and pale. The bier was decorated with flowers and garlands and it was carried in a procession which consisted of Congress volunteers followed in order by Young men, ladies, leaders, bier and the Crown. The procession swelled as it proceeded and the mourners showered petals on the bier. When it reached the outskirts of the city it numbered roughly two thousand.

When the procession reached Anarkali, a regular sea of heads was to be seen. People placed wreaths of flowers on the dead body and others bared their heads in honour of the deceased.

Complete hartal was observed throughout the City, and the procession became swollen in numbers as it proceeded.

The procession wended its way through Paper Mandi, Macchi Hatta, Dabbi Bazar, Kashmiri Gate and reached Delhi Gate at about 8-45 p. m. The dead body was placed on a raised platform on the extensive lawns outside Delhi Gate and a meeting of about 20,000 was held under the chairmanship of Dr. Mohammad Alam.

The body of Jatindranath Das was kept throughout the night in a railway compartment, guarded by Congress volunteers. There was a large police force at the railway station and Government buildings were strongly guarded throughout the night.

The bogie containing Das's body was attached to the Howrah Express of the 14th morning.

The body was placed inside a wooden box which was covered with flowers and wreaths. Jatindra Das's brother, Kiran Das sat by the side of the body. It was in a third class composite carriage, being the second carriage from the engine, while the other half of it was occupied by a contingent of police officers.

ARRIVAL IN CALCUTTA.

A record crowd modestly estimated at a lakh and a half, had assembled at the Howrah Station and the approaches anxiously awaiting the arrival of the body of Jatindra Das. As a railway official put it it was a scene which Howrah had never witnessed within living memory. People of all classes were present, including a large number of women and intense excitement prevailed.

Almost to time on Sunday night the Howrah Express arrived on the platform which was heralded by deafening shouts of Bande-Mataram. It took some time to remove the body from the carriage. A decorated motor lorry was in waiting but the bier was carried by about a dozen young men and was taken to the Town Hall.

DAS' BODY "LYING-IN-STATE"

The Central Hall of the Howrah Town Hall was bedecked with flowers, foliage and multicoloured lights. The body of Das was placed on a raised platform in the Central Hall beautifully decorated with white lilies. On all sides of the Hall sat men and women to witness the lying-in-state celebration. Flowers and wreaths were placed on the body.

FUNERAL PROCESSION.

The funeral procession carrying the mortal remains of Jatindranath started amidst unprecedented scenes from the Howrah Town Hall at 7-30 a.m. on the 16th, after touching ceremonies performed by ladies who streamed in, long before dawn. From the Howrah Town Hall to Harrison Road, was one seething mass of humanity.

The whole of the Howrah Bridge up to the crossing of the Chitpur Road, a distance of over half a mile was blocked by large crowds. Housetops and balconies were filled with spectators. Traffic across the bridge and other parts of the route was stopped. As the procession reached the crossing of the Strand and Harrison Roads it swelled in number and glided its way along Harrison Road in the College Street. Flowers were strewn en route, from house tops by Marwari women. At the crossing of the College Street and Harrison Road the scene was unprecedented. Here the crowd numbered about five lakhs. The procession still increased in volume and was joined by a large number of students who shouted “Jatindra Das Ki Jai.” It was now over a mile long and the bier was literally covered with flowers and wreaths. The procession reached the Keoratala Burning Ghat, a distance of about eight miles from Howrah at about one p.m.

The body of Jatindra Nath Das was placed on the pyre at 3 p.m. the last rites being performed by Jatindra Nath Das's brother Kiran Das. As the body was taken out of the coffin there was a mad rush towards it for a last look. The cremation was performed according to the orthodox custom ghee and sandal wood being used.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Who is the greatest Muslim Nationalist of India:—The Secretary, Mysore Sarvajanic Sabha, Basavanagudi, Bangalore, writes:—Hindu patriots yearning for national solidarity cherish a special regard for their Muslim brethren who are living examples of inter-communal good will and patriotic zeal. It would interest them to know who is voted to be the greatest Muslim Nationalist of India. Will the Hindu readers of this paper therefore kindly send a letter or post card to the abovementioned address giving the name of the gentleman most esteemed by them as a true Nationalist? Every communication should bear the signature and address of the writer. It may be signed by more persons than one when they vote for the same gentleman. The voting list will be closed on the 30th December and the result announced in due course.

Adjournment-Motion:—When the Assembly met on Saturday the 14th morning Pandit Motilal sought leave to move an adjournment-motion censuring the Government for the death of Mr. Das and the Hunger-Strike situation. It was carried by 55 against 47 votes.

A Remarriage in Bombay:—At the invitation of Dr. and Mrs. S. N. Nayampalli, a large gathering of ladies and gentlemen assembled at Sheth Bhagwandas Madhavdas' residence, Chowpatty, on Sunday, 1st September to witness the remarriage of Shrimati Durgabai Telang with Mr. Laxmanrao V. Kaikini. The gathering included several personal friends and relatives of Mr. Kaikini and the bride and sympathisers with the cause of widow remarriage. The ceremony was performed according to Vedic rites. Mr. G. B. Trivedi delivered a short speech referring to Mr. Kaikini as a confirmed social reformer from boyhood, and congratulated the parties to the marriage on the moral courage they had shown. He was particularly glad to find that a large number of ladies and gentlemen of the Saraswat community were present on the occasion. Mr. Kaikini on behalf of his wife and himself thanked Mr. Trivedi and the gathering for their sympathy. He traced his early leanings towards the problems of social justice to the influence of the teaching imparted in the Sunday classes of the Prarthana Samaj, and said that it really was a question of social justice which ought to appeal to every one and that he and his wife would do their best to deserve the congratulations bestowed on them.

NOTES.

Satyagraha For Child Marriage:—Mr. S. Satyamurthi, member of the Madras Legislative Council, advises orthodox Hindus to break the Sarda marriage Bill when it becomes law and take the consequences. We do not think many people will be and to accept his advice as it virtually amounts to their marrying their daughters in infancy to spite the reformers. Any one who tries to do this will be restrained by an injunction from the courts at the instance of the local social reform organisation, and will, in addition, have to face the opposition of his own female relations whose eyes have been opened to the risks of child marriage. These, in addition to the well-known physical risks include the possibility of the husband marrying a second wife, virtually abandoning his first one, of which there have been several instances. What becomes of the doctrine of the inviolable sacrament of Hindu marriage, Mr. Satyamurthi might perhaps tell us. It is impossible to think of a worse case for Satyagraha than child marriage which is itself the gross asatya—that is to say, a cruel fiction. The enlightened public, however, will have to be prepared to meet attempts to impose child marriage on young children in defiance of the law, by providing homes where children rescued from recalcitrant parents or guardians may find a home until they grow up to years of maternity. Mr. Satyamurthi and others of his way of thinking, will do well to understand that the country is in dead earnest to see child marriages eradicated from it.

Madras Leaders On Sarda Bill:—In happy contrast to the relentless orthodox opposition in Madras to the Sarda Bill are the opinions expressed by leaders like Sir P. S. Sivaswami Aiyar, Mr. Ramaswami Mudaliar and Dr. P. Varadarajulu Naidu. Interviewed by the Associated Press regarding the passing of the Sarda Bill Sir Sivaswami Aiyar congratulated Mr. Sarda, the Assembly and the Government on the passing of the Bill. He further said, "I am of opinion that the age limits now fixed for marriage and for consummation are quite proper and reasonable." Mr. Ramaswami Mudaliar said, "I must express my profound thankfulness and satisfaction that the Sarda Bill has been passed by the Legislative Assembly." He further observed that but for the extreme consideration for the orthodox opinion both by the Age of Consent Committee and the legislature, the minimum age of marriage for girls would have been higher and more in consonance with medical opinion. Dr. Varadarajulu Naidu stated that he was simply delighted that an overwhelming majority voted for the prohibition of early marriage in the Assembly and he added that it filled his heart with joy to see that child marriage had been declared a criminal offence in future. How the women of Madras welcome the measure is well set forth in the interview given by Dr. Muthulakshmi and Mrs. Malati Patwardan who said "It is with feelings of joy and relief that we hear that the Bill has been passed by such a large majority. Women all over India have been most anxious that the marriage age of their children should be raised. The passing of the Bill, we feel, is one of the biggest steps India has taken towards freedom." To people of the orthodox persuasion like Mr. T. R. Ramachandra Aiyar the Bill is unpalatable and they will move earth and heaven in the form of deputations to the Viceroy and the Secretary of State in England to get the Bill vetoed. If opposition to the Bill will release their orthodoxy so far as to allow them to cross the seas to wait on the Secretary of State, it will be a matter for congratulation.

No Extradition For Bigamy:—Peter Saldanha whom the Bombay High Court found guilty of bigamy and sentenced to nine months' imprisonment, has escaped to Goa in Portuguese territory where his second or canonical wife is said to have joined him. According to the Evening News, he was last seen in the Bombay High Court till a short while before the judgment was pronounced in the second of the two cases against him. It appears that as soon as he scented an adverse judgment he left the Court unnoticed by anybody. Presumably according to a pre-arranged plan he left Bombay by the next available train, i. e., the Poona express which leaves Victoria Terminus at 2-15 p. m. It appears that Saldanha went straight to Belgaum and from there took a motor-bus or taxi for Panjim. Saldanha was on bail and the usual procedure in an appeal case of this kind is that after the High Court convicts the accused and awards sentence of imprisonment the copy of judgment is forwarded to the Lower Court (in this case the Sessions Court of Nasik) and the District Magistrate issues a warrant of arrest. It is this procedure which has given the accused an opportunity of making good his escape without let or hindrance either by the district police or the Bombay police. Under article 3 of the Anglo-Portuguese Treaty of 1892, bigamy is not one of the offences for which the convicted person could be extradited from Portuguese India to British territory to meet the ends of justice. This is a curious case in which personal law has been vindicated by merely removing outside the jurisdiction of the civil law. The Catholic community is considerably perturbed by the decision of the courts upholding the civil first marriage as against the canonical second marriage of Saldanha, and it is probable that it will agitate for a change in the law.

Another Book On India:—The Hindu publishes a message from its special correspondent summarising the contents of another book on India entitled "After Mother India." The writer, one Mrs. Herty, makes absurd allegations against Mahatma Gandhi to which, no doubt, he will reply at the first opportunity. We quote from the message: Referring sarcastically to Mahatmaji as the "Twentieth Century Hindu Saint" and as an "outstanding world figure", it is stated that Mahatma Gandhi's memory betrayed him when he denied giving a message to Miss Mayo. The book prints a facsimile of Mahatmaji's letter enclosing the revised interview notes containing the message. The book alleges that "this famous Hindu was anxious that the information calculated to hurt his political activities in Western eyes should not reach the whitemen's countries and be of embarrassment to him and his cause" and in illustration of the charge publishes a sworn affidavit of Mrs. D. O. Herty, the widow of an American engineer murdered—during the riots which occurred on the occasion of the visit of the Prince of Wales in 1921 and the boycott demonstrations organised in that connection. In her affidavit Mrs. D. O. Herty alleges that Mahatma Gandhi sent Mrs. Sarojini Naidu to her and "Mrs. Sarojini Naidu asked frankly for the price for my refraining from discussing and advertising the murder in America and also for refraining myself from returning to America." Mrs. D. O. Herty further alleges that she saw herself Mahatma Gandhi and says "He repeated in substance what Mrs. Sarojini Naidu said even more emphatically and stressed that Americans, because they sympathised politically, must on no account learn of the murder lest it hurt his movements in America and prejudice our people against him." The affidavit is dated 14th January, while the facsimile letter is dated Ashram, April 4, 1926. The notes of the interview are dated 17th March, 1926. The book publishes a vindication of "Mother India" extracts from the Anglo Indian and Indian Press supporting the fact that the reform waves in India are due to the book. It is again alleged that Mrs. Sarojini Naidu acted for the second time as an emissary of Mahatma Gandhi, when she toured America with the object of preventing the Land of Dollars from discovering the facts. The writer claims that he helped Miss Mayo in editing "Mother India" and acknowledges obligations which Miss Mayo and the writer owe to the India Office for statistics and written statements included in "Mother India".

The Opium Commission:—The Commission of Enquiry into Opium Smoking in the Far East left Geneva on September 4th, after a short session in the course of which it has prepared its material and adopted its programme of work. The Commission is composed of the three following persons: M. Ekstrand, Swedish Minister at Buenos Aires, formerly Member of the Mixed Commission for the Exchange of Greek and Turkish Populations, Chairman of the Enquiry Commission. M. Max Leo Gerard, Honorary Secretary to the King of the Belgians, Director-General of the Sinking Fund of the Belgian Public Debt and President of the Belgian Society of Political Economy. M. Jean Havlasa, late Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Czechoslovakia at Rio de Janeiro. This Commission was set up by the Council last March in accordance with a resolution passed by the 1928 Assembly at the request of the British Government. In a memorandum addressed to the 1928 Assembly, the British Government explained that its proposal for an enquiry in the Far East arose out of the difficulties with which it was confronted in the attempt to apply the measures contemplated in the Hague Opium Convention for the gradual and effective suppression of the use of prepared opium. The enquiry will be conducted in the Far Eastern territories of States Members agreeing to this measure. It will be extended to the Philippines, the American Government having intimated that it would receive the Commission in these islands and that the Governor-General would be at its disposal for all information concerning the practical results of the system of prohibition in operation there. The enquiry will bear upon the measures taken by Governments to give effect to Chapter 2 of the Hague Opium Convention and to the Geneva Agreement of 1925, on the nature and extent of the illicit traffic in the Far East and on the difficulties which it causes in the fulfilment of international obligations. The Commission's journey will last some nine months, in the course of which the following districts and countries will be visited: Burma, Straits Settlements, Java and Sumatra, British Borneo, The Philippines, Siam, French Indo-China, Macao, Hong-Kong, Formosa Quantung.

A point Of Law:—There was recently reported from Calcutta that a Hindu married woman who had become a convert to Islam, had her marriage dissolved by the Calcutta High Court on her husband refusing to become a Mahomedan at her invitation. It was stated that the Judge acted under the Mahomedan law in granting the dissolution. We understand that the point will be taken to higher tribunals as it is felt that it is too important to rest on the authority of a single Judge.

Indians in East Africa:—Pandit Hirdaynath Kunzru, President of the East African Indian National Congress, it is stated will go to London to represent the case of the Indians in East Africa to the authorities in London. It is understood that Sir Samuel Wilson's report will be considered by His Majesty's Government on October 16th. Sir Mahomed Habibullah and Mr. G. S. Bajpai are already in London but it has been felt necessary for the East African Indians to have a non-official spokesman there before His Majesty's Government arrive at even tentative conclusions. It is understood that the East African question may be referred to a Joint Parliamentary Committee. Probably the matter will be decided by the Cabinet on October 16.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1929.

THE SARDA BILL IN THE ASSEMBLY.

The Sarda Marriage Bill has emerged from the Legislative Assembly practically as revised by the Select Committee. The Bill as originally drafted by Mr. Harbilas Sarda proposed to make all marriages of girls below 12 years of age null and void. In order to meet the case of parents who were not prepared to go so far, it provided that Magistrates on application might grant licenses for the marriage of girls at 11 years of age. The Bill was limited to Hindus. The Select Committee made changes in the Bill of a radical character. It rejected the principle of making child marriages void and adopted that of penalising them. It raised the marriageable limit to 14 for girls and prescribed 18 for boys. It made the Bill applicable to all communities and not only to Hindus. All these changes were in the nature of improvements, but as they affected the principles of the original Bill, the revised Bill was at the instance of Mr. Sarda himself re-circulated for opinion and criticism to the public. At the same time with reference to a proposal before the Assembly to raise the Age of Consent, a committee was appointed by Government, with Sir Moropant Joshi as Chairman, to enquire and report on the working of the present law relating to that subject and to make recommendations. The Committee was not required to report on the Sarda Marriage Bill or, indeed, to take into its scope the question of marriage legislation. But as it had to deal with the question of protection of minor girl wives, the need for legislation restraining child marriages forced itself on the Committee's attention. The Joshi Committee recommended that legislation on the lines of Mr. Sarda's Bill was indispensable in order to ensure adequate protection to child wives. The enquiry of the Committee brought out another important point which till then had been obscured from the public view. It is that child marriages were not confined to Hindus, but prevailed, though not to the same extent, among other communities also, including Mahomedans. We had called attention to this fact more than once in our comments on the Sarda Bill.

When the Bill came up for consideration at the present Simla session of the Legislative Assembly, a notable change had taken place in the attitude of Government as the result of the Joshi Committee's recommendations. Government which on previous occasions had either sat on the fence or was actually hostile to the Bill, declared that it cordially supported it. It need hardly be said that the support of Government was a great factor in bringing about the successful emergence of the Bill from the Assembly. Next to it, and next only to it, was the strong support of enlightened Mahomedan members, prominent among whom were Messrs. Jinnah, Shah Nawaz and others, against the deadset made on the Bill by their orthodox Hindu and Musalman colleagues who had joined hands for once to throw out this measure of much delayed and urgent social reform. The Shariat and the Shastras were freely cited as being opposed to legislation fixing a limit of age to marriage. But the upholders of orthodoxy knew that they were leading a forlorn hope. With a resolution worthy of a better cause, however, they tried every method of delay, obstruction and attack which the rules of the Assembly allowed. They moved for the further postponement of the Bill to the next Delhi session. When they were defeated in this, they moved to exempt Mahomedans and orthodox Hindus from the scope of the Bill. This of course was absurd and was rejected by a large majority.

They then tried to get the age limit lowered to 12, and in this they had the support of Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya and Mr. N. C. Kelkar. But this too the Assembly would not allow. The next move of the opponents of the Bill was to introduce a sort of conscience clause which would have effected by the back door what they had not been able to achieve directly, namely, the stultification of the measure. Then they tried to reduce the penalties for infringement, which, in all conscience, are none too severe having regard to the serious consequences to the victims of the pernicious custom. The last move was to put off the date when the law comes into operation. But this also was defeated and the law comes into force the moment it receives the assent of the Governor-General after passing through the Council of State. When all these attempts failed, a few Musalman members withdrew from the Assembly, while the self-appointed orthodox Hindu champion, Mr. M. K. Acharya, avowing that he bowed to the inevitable, made a somewhat incoherent speech calling anathema on the supporters of the measure. The Assembly unmoved by his jeremiads passed the third reading by a majority of 68 to 14. The course of the Bill in the Council of State seems to be fairly assured and the Governor-General's assent may be expected to be given as a matter of course after the declaration of the attitude of Government by the Home Member in the Legislative Assembly. The passing of the Bill by that body has been hailed with satisfaction by Indian opinion throughout the country, only a few voices being raised in disapproval.

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDIATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XXXIX. RESEARCH WORKERS.

(By DR. CLIFFORD MANSHARDT, PH.D.).

The function of the research worker is to discover truth. In spite of the great mass of our present day knowledge we live in an undiscovered country. We see nature at work, but we are still in ignorance concerning many of the laws governing the operation of nature. It is to the task of discovery that the research worker has dedicated himself. He desires to help men move from the area of supposition to the realm of fact. He digs deep and lays a solid foundation for the rearing of the social structure.

The man of science is not given to snap judgments. He accepts a theory as a working hypothesis, but before he is ready to declare the theory a fact he tests and re-tests it in his study or in the laboratory. And when he speaks his words have weight. He speaks the things he has experienced, the things of which he knows. In a day when so much loose thinking and hasty generalization is found in our organs of public opinion, it is well to turn to the research worker and to find in his attitude a much needed corrective. "Wisdom is better than rubies; and all the things that may be desired are not to be compared to it."

The research worker is loyal to truth. He starts to work upon a problem that gives every promise of being of benefit to society. Day in and day out he pursues it, following its every lead. Each day seems to carry him a bit further towards its solution, and each day he checks his results with the utmost care. At last it seems as if he is ready to make definite announcement of success, but just at that moment he discovers a slight error which makes the entire calculation unreliable. The scientist does not hesitate. Instead of going ahead and trusting to chance that the error will be undiscovered, he begins at the beginning and painstakingly carries on the entire work anew. He is determined that his mouth shall utter truth.

The research worker is not simply the man engaged in laboratory work. He is the sociologist, the economist, and the historian. He is the philosopher, the theologian, and the man of letters. Every man who tries to organize his life upon an experimental basis is engaged in research. To live by hearsay is not enough. A man must prove the things he hears. He must study and question, submitting all problems to the test of his own reason. He must supplement his own knowledge with the ablest opinions of others. He must select and reject until at last he finds the way of truth. It is only thus that the world attains to progress.

Religion has no monopoly upon faith. Faith underlies every human relationship, and is no where more evident than in the field of research. It is because a man believes that he attempts. It is faith that sends a man far away from home to stalk fever and death-bringing disease. It is faith that sends the technician into the laboratory to discover new serums and hitherto unknown combinations to further the ministry of healing. It is because of faith that human misery is retreating, and the standard of public health is being raised. All things are possible—if we believe.

BOMBAY WOMEN'S EDUCATION CONFERENCE.

Under the auspices of the Bombay Women's Committee on Education and Social Reform, the fourth conference of the Women of Bombay was held on the 21st instant, at the Malabari Memorial Hall, Gamdevi, when Mrs. Sundrabai Sirur presided.

PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS.

The President in the course of her opening speech said:—

It has now become our duty to see that the future of our girls is well guarded and the chief factor that should occupy our primary attention in this respect is their education which is the true foundation of their future career. For the last three years or so, educational conferences are held all over the country and questions as to what sort of education our girls should receive are being discussed. It is very gratifying to note that elderly ladies like H. H. the Maharanee of Baroda and H. H. the Begum Mother of Bhopal, who are types of the ancient culture of this country, have blessed our efforts by presiding over our deliberations giving us sound advice. This fact clearly shows that those who have undertaken to solve this problem do not merely hunt after modern theories and ideas but seek to blend them with what is best in our ancient culture.

WOMEN'S UNITY.

There is another matter for which we might justly feel proud of ourselves. We hear it said often that while a hundred men can work together in perfect harmony, it is difficult for two women to work together even for a short time. But if we cast our glance about us, it becomes clear to us that even while men are occupied in differences such as communal or racial, we women can join hands together in a common cause. Occasions such as this Conference in which women of all castes, creeds and communities representing different interests and working in different spheres come together and co-operate with each other in finding out the way that will lead to the common good not only of our own sex but ultimately of the whole nation also, must, once and for all remove this stigma that is often levelled against us, showing that not only can we work peacefully together but we even display a greater spirit of harmony in some respects, specially in social activities, which is one of the most prominent spheres that occupies our energies. It may be that social work unites while politics which is pre-eminently the sphere of men's activities often has a tendency to divide. However this may be, let us always strive to bring about and maintain a spirit of unity and raise ourselves and the men also above all differences of caste and community which have been the bane of the society.

ARE WOMEN INFERIOR TO MEN?

If this is so, the question is asked how do we account for the notion of the inferiority of woman. I may say without hesitation that the fault is ours and we women are largely responsible for it. From times immemorial the women of India have led a life of sacrifice and complete self-abnegation, and they have thus not only effaced themselves but in doing so they have effaced their sex. As a natural consequence of this, man has got into the habit of considering himself as a superior being thinking that his comforts must come first and naturally the woman's claims are over-looked. However, inspite of all these handicaps, the woman, by her spirit of noble sacrifice, forbearance, patience and above everything else, love, has so maintained her position and fulfilled her responsibility in life that great men and leaders have gratefully borne testimony to the fact that this country has survived all the shocks it has sustained through so many centuries because of the women of this country. It is very difficult for strangers and stray wanderers to grasp the secret of the beauty of Indian home life. Some of the ladies of the West think that Indian women are nonentities and that they have no touch of individuality in them. It is true that they cannot demonstrate their individuality in words, but it becomes manifest in their actions and the atmosphere that reigns in the home over which she presides.

MRS. RAMABAI RANADE

That a woman who is given proper education can work wonders is shown by the inspiring example of Mrs. Ramabai Ranade, the founder and the heart and soul of the Poona Seva Sadan. Mrs. Ranade as a little girl was so ignorant that when her brother received a letter from her father, she could not imagine how a mere scrap of paper that could not speak could convey thoughts. But Justice Ranade from the very day of their marriage made up his mind to educate his little bride and began to teach her from the alphabets and this ignorant girl who received real education at the hands of her husband grew to be one of the greatest women of our times, who, besides being an ideal wife, dedicated her life to the amelioration of helpless women by founding and working the Seva Sadan. This is also an example of how some of the wives of the social reformers tactfully paved their way and made it smooth for us.

WORK OF SOCIAL REFORMERS.

Though we consider our men to be selfish, we must forget that unlike in other countries we have not had to fight for the privileges which we are enjoying to-day; for these we must express our gratitude to the pioneers of social reform in this country who fought for our cause long before we had awakened from our deep slumber and suffered a great deal of persecution at the hands of the orthodox people. Men of all castes headed by Dada-bhoj Nowrojee who started the Students' Literary and Scientific Society, made a beginning in the direction of encouraging female education. Later on eminent citizens identified themselves with this cause and undertook to teach voluntarily in the schools run by the Society. The question before the public at the time this Society was started was, whether girls should be educated or not. It was feared among other things that if girls were educated they would neglect their household duties and would spend their time in reading novels and writing love letters. The very fact that the number of girls going to schools and colleges is increasing shows that people are realising the importance of female education. I do admit that the woman is the maker of the home, and keeping the house is her first duty. But I cannot see eye to eye with those who say that in whatever circumstances she may be, that the kitchen is her sole realm. Do we live to eat alone? Or suppose we do, do we find real satisfaction in such a life? No. As food is required for the body, something is required for the mind and that is knowledge. Even in the primitive stage man displayed a natural instinct for knowledge, and it is knowledge that has raised us from the low primitive level of barbarians to the high position of civilised beings. It is the function of education to systematise our knowledge and naturally every man and woman must obtain it.

COMPULSORY PRIMARY EDUCATION.

The aim of education is the acquisition of knowledge. Coming out of the home, the primary school provides for the first time the education as we understand it in its practical sense. Primary education embodies the simple codes of reading and writing if not anything more. Reading and writing is the gateway to the temple of knowledge. I consider that primary education is absolutely necessary and indispensable to everybody. If parents through poverty or ignorance cannot afford to educate their children it is the duty of those who realise the value of education and the importance of every boy and girl going to school, to see that some provision is made which will make it possible and easy to impart elementary education to every child, and for this the introduction of compulsory and free primary education becomes one of our prime needs. We look up to the State for help in this direction. If the State realises its responsibility towards its subjects and is actuated by a sincere desire to promote its interests, then I think it should consider as its primary duty to meet this crying need of ours and do everything that is possible in their power to assist the Municipality which is striving so hard in this direction to further this cause. It is gratifying to see that compulsory and free education is introduced in the 'F' and 'G' Wards and it is the intention of the Municipality to introduce it in all the others Wards. But this, as is shown in the report of the Municipal Schools Committee, cannot be achieved unless the Government comes to their help. I earnestly hope the dispute that is going on between the Municipality and the Government over the question of Government grant for primary education will be soon settled to the advantage of the cause of education. With regard to the ways in which primary education should be imparted the most important thing is the question of teachers. In this respect it is my humble opinion that women are most suited for this purpose. Primary education is the ground work of all knowledge and provides the fundamental requirements for the growth of mental faculties. As such it should be common to boys and girls. I therefore feel that it is not necessary for the Municipality to have separate schools for boys and girls at least upto the 4th standard.

SECONDARY EDUCATION.

Then comes the question of secondary education. Here I feel the necessity of separate schools for girls. By this I mean not only separate places for education but also different curriculum. In secondary schools for girls subjects like domestic science, gardening, arts and crafts as well as some idea of social work should be given prominence to. Our economic condition must also be taken into consideration. Even in an advanced city like Bombay most of the girls who go to school have to do a good deal of domestic work at home in helping their mothers. If the same course that is assigned for boys who can devote their sole attention to school work, is set up for such girls, it becomes too great a strain on them and naturally their health suffers. This is also due to the great importance that is attached in our present educational system to examinations. Those whose health is robust enough to shoulder the hardships of examinations and who have real capacity both mental and physical may go in for them. But unfortunately it has become the sole ambition of every school-going girl to compete for examinations. She feels she cannot call herself educated in the modern sense if she does not pass them. If culture and scholarships were measured by examinations, then men like Rabindranath Tagore and Count Tolstoy could not be classed in the list of scholars. For these various reasons I feel, that a different course of secondary education must be devised out for girls who do not aspire for higher education.

COLLEGE EDUCATION.

The next question is about college education. The fact that we are in want of lady doctors and lady teachers naturally shows that higher education is desirable for girls. As the number of girls going to colleges is increasing, I think it is desirable to have a women's college for many reasons, one of them being that girls, according to the existing social conditions, are not free in a men's college and thus do not have the scope of cultivating their faculties in a way as would suit their peculiar temperament and capacity. Another drawback is that girls coming from mofussil have to suffer inconvenience for want of proper accommodation. Though this want is removed to a great extent by the hostels which are in existence, it would be advisable to have a women's college with a hostel attached to it.

SARDA BILL.

It will not be out of place if I refer to a question which so greatly concerns the well-being of our future generation specially our girls and which has created a great sensation all over the country. I mean the age of Marriage Bill. It is our fervent hope that the Bill in spite of the opposition from the orthodox section, will be passed and the Government without any delay will enter it into the Statute Book. I take this opportunity of tendering our thanks to Rai Saheb Sarda who has shown much courage, and to Sir James Crerar who has shown a firm attitude towards the Bill and also to the members who have supported it.

In conclusion Mrs. Sirur said; "I am sure you will agree with me in one thing and that is, knowledge is essential. If it is so for a man why should it be denied to a woman who is also a unit of the society? When we think of the different functions of life, we are apt to be led away by the wrong idea that man is separated from woman. A man cannot do without a woman, and a woman cannot do without a man. They have to depend upon each other in all stages of life. A man, rough, and coarse by nature has to be controlled by the tenderness and softness of a woman; and a woman who by nature is physically weak looks up to a man for protection. How many women are there who think that they can endure the life of a battle field for days together without suffering inconveniences, and how many men would you find who can tend infants and take care of them as women do? Though the functions are different the culture that is required for both is the same. So let us women strive to get knowledge by keeping up our womanly grace and qualities and also realising the dignity of the responsible duties that is assigned to us."

RESOLUTIONS.

The following important resolutions were passed unanimously :—

This Conference is of opinion that the legal age of marriage for girls and boys should be 16 and 21 respectively. This Conference supports Rai Saheb Har Bilas Sarda's Bill as amended by the Select Committee as a step in this connection.

This Conference puts on record its appreciation of the recommendations made by the Age of Consent Committee and urges Government to make an early effort to translate them into law.

This Conference is of opinion that the refusal of the Bombay Government to give sanction to the request of the Bombay Municipal Corporation to extend the Compulsory Primary Education Act to B and E Wards is a highly retrograde step and urges Government to reconsider their decision and trusts that the Corporation would preserve its efforts in the direction of introducing compulsion in the rest of the wards.

This Conference regrets that the condition of affiliation of colleges to the University regarding the provisions of lodgings for students has remained a dead letter so far as women students are concerned, and requests the Senate to see that all colleges affiliated to the University are suitably provided with hostel or approved lodgings for their women students and to direct the Syndicate to ask the Committees that are appointed periodically to inspect the affiliated colleges, to include in their inspection report a statement showing to what extent the condition of affiliation in this regard has been fulfilled by colleges.

In view of the University ordinance requiring each college providing Hostel accommodation for its students and in view of the fact of the long hours and strenuous nature of work the Medical Courses entail, this Conference is of opinion that hostels for women students in the immediate vicinity of the medical colleges are a necessity and recommends that such provision should be made by the College authorities.

This Conference is of opinion that the law of inheritance should be liberalised in its application to Hindu women.

The following ladies were then elected as delegates to the All-India Women's Conference to be held in Bombay in January, 1930.

Dr. Miss Kashibai Nowrange, Mrs. Hansa Mehta, Miss Engineer, Mrs. McKenzie, Mrs. Avantikabai Gokhale, Mrs. Shaffi Tyabji, Mrs. Sarojini Mehta, Mrs. Kashalkar, Mrs. Annigiri and Miss C. C. Thompson.

A HANDBOOK OF "FACTS" ABOUT WOMEN.

Mrs. B. NEHRU, Secretary of the Social Section, All-India Women's Conference, in a letter to Miss Rathbone, M. P., Editor of the "Women of India Survey", London, draws her attention to the following passage in a letter dated July 14, of the London correspondent of the Pioneer :—

"I am afraid that India must make up its mind to hear more stories of the Mayo type. Miss Eleanor Rathbone, who is one of the editors of the "Women of India Survey" of 4, Tufton Street, S. W. 1, has been most impressed by Miss Mayo's book, "Mother India" and, in any event, is of the opinion that the Simon Commission should recommend no further political advance in India until the evils mentioned in this work are removed.

A HANDBOOK.

"Miss Rathbone, as representing the Women of India Survey (or, in other words, the National Union of Societies for Equal Citizenship) has in preparation a handbook, 'containing in a short, readable and inexpensive form, all the principal facts concerning the condition of women in India and the organisations working for their well-being.'

"I note that those who are to contribute to the book include Dr. Kate Platt, late Principal of the Lady Hardinge Medical College, Delhi; Mrs. B. M. Gray, who will write a chapter on education; Mrs. G. M. Bell (better known as "John Travers") who is to contribute a section on the "Women of the Indian Army" and Miss Rathbone herself, who proposes to supply the introduction and the conclusion."

MISGIVINGS.

Mrs. Nehru adds :—

This news has caused some misgivings amongst members of the All-India Women's Conference, whose co-operation you, as editor, sought for the preparation of the "Women of India Survey". Our Committee feels that if the information provided by it is likely to be used for purposes such as those hinted by the correspondent of the Pioneer it would hardly be justified in extending its co-operation to the project.

I therefore invite you kindly to state your position for the information of our Committee so as to enable it to make up its mind on the subject.

THE SARDA BILL IN THE ASSEMBLY.

The Sarda Bill was taken up for further consideration in the Assembly on the 18th instant. Amendments to reduce the age to 12 and 11 were rejected by 70 votes and the age of 14 mentioned in the Bill was retained. Attempts to introduce an exemption clause into the Bill to exempt not only individual cases but communities and castes such as the Muslim and the Brahmin also proved futile. The Final reading of the Bill came up on Monday last. Amendments to postpone the date of enforcement of the Bill were also lost without division. All amendments having been disposed of, Mr. Sarda moved that the bill as amended by Select Committee be passed.

MADRAS OPPOSITION.

He affirmed that the Vedas preached adult marriage. Ninety-seven per cent. of the population of Madras were non-Brahmans, among whom marriages of girls were after puberty and even a majority of the remaining three percent. of Brahmins were in favour of the bill as evidenced by a meeting held under the chairmanship of Sir P. S. Sivaswami Iyer, where the speakers included Mr. T. Rangachariar. In Bengal as against the last resolution of the provincial Hindu Conference at Dacca, there was the resolution passed unanimously by the provincial Hindu Sabha supporting the bill. Mr. Sarda warmly thanked the Government and expressed his gratefulness to Sir James Crerar. Concluding, he urged the Assembly to pass the bill, taking note of the spirit of the times.

MOSLEM WALK-OUT

SYED MURTUZA, on behalf of those elected Moslem councillors who were opposed to the bill, read a statement describing the bill as being against the Shariat and as offending against the personal law of Moslems. Syed Murtuza, accompanied by a few others then walked out of the Chamber.

After the House assembled after lunch MR. KARTAR SINGH advocated reform in the interest of the intellectual, physical and moral uplift of the people.

MR. P. NAIDU realised that his cry would be a cry in the wilderness, but he pleaded against the House throwing "this thunderbolt of reform on illiterate people bound by century-old customs."

DAWN OF SWARAJ

RAIZADA HANSRAJ said a similar law had already been in force for five years in the Kapurthala State, where a majority of the population were Moslems and where no difficulties had been experienced.

SIR ABDUL QAYUM, supporting the bill amidst applause admitted that it meant a curtailment of social liberty but when such liberty was abused a check must be put. He was surprised that Government had not made any alteration in the bill as a result of the Age of Consent Committee's report.

MR. GAYAPRASAD SINGH supported the bill. He said his community, the Kshatryas, were not affected by the bill, which he supported because he was convinced that the Hindu religion was not against it.

MR. SHAH NAWAZ, a Member of the Age of Consent Committee, vigorously supported the bill and urged the House to pass it. He remarked that men had no right to keep women in slavery and no right to sacrifice them at the altar of custom. There were really some very orthodox Hindus and Moslems against the bill, but that did not matter at all. In support of his contention that the evil of early marriage and early consummation existed amongst Moslems, he quoted freely from the volumes of evidence of the Consent Committee and challenged any one to disprove the statement. The only effective way of remedying the evil was admittedly penalising child marriages.

SIR D'ARCY LINDSAY (European Group) asked the House to rise to the occasion and save hundreds of thousands of children from suffering by passing this bill of extreme national importance. The people of India would bless the Assembly for passing this bill, which would make a happier India. Sir D'Arcy Lindsay congratulated Mr. Sarma on his noble hearted effort, which had come to a successful conclusion.

MR. NIRMAL CHUNDER affirmed that the All-India Medical Conference had supported the bill and Sir P. C. Roy, in his evidence before the Consent Committee, had also supported it.

MR. NROY asked the House to understand that he spoke not for entire Bengal but only for his constituency, which was opposed to the bill.

MATRIMONIAL CROSS.

MR. B. S. SARMA (nominated) said he knew the conditions prevailing both in Madras and Bengal and he affirmed that judged both by the opinions reflected in the press and on the platform, opinion in both provinces was in favour of the bill. Surely the "Hindu" of Madras reflected the opinion of the Southern Province. And that paper had editorially supported the bill and its editor had voted for it here. Every influential paper in Bengal had also supported the bill. Concluding Mr. Sarma felt sure that Sir James Creer would be remembered for long for having made up his own and Government's mind in the matter and thus he'ped to prevent the womanhood of India from being crucified on the matrimonial cross.

BOWING TO THE INEVITABLE.

MR. M. K. ACHARYA made a long speech. Replying to the criticisms of the reformers, he said what was winning was not the logic of the reformers 'case' but the logic of the Government bloc and the logic of the European group. "I admit," Mr. Acharya proceeded, "that the majority here are against me, but I bow to the inevitable."

Proceeding he warned that the effect of the present bill would be to reproduce in India the conditions prevalent today in England and America. He said: "You cannot suppress human nature and sexual instincts. What you will have by this bill is maternity before marriage. You are therefore undermining the foundations of your society. The whole society is going to be corrupted. You will have more divorces, more loose sexual living, lesser and fewer children. This will conflict with our ideals.

"Maternity is a sacred duty of woman, who must bear children for the preservation of the race and must not have a free will to marry as and when she likes.

"Moreover, society demands discipline, control, subordination of the personal desire to expediency. We have stood the attacks of ages on our social system and we have survived them because of our higher national ideals. And this is what you are aiming at and destroying."

A STRONG NATION.

SIR PURSHOTTAMDAS THAKURDAS admitted that the bill was not quite perfect but it laid a foundation for building up a strong nation. It was a grave misfortune that there should be differences of opinion on the issue raised by the bill, but let it be recognised that those who supported the bill were actuated by the same sincerity of conviction as those who opposed it. He therefore pleaded for all of them putting their resources together and forgetting their differences first to see that the bill was given a fair trial and then to have it amended later in the light of experience.

PANDIT MALAVIYA assured those who supported the bill that they were actuated by the same honest convictions as those who were opposed to the bill,

The speaker for one was prepared to hasten slowly and fix the age of girls for marriage at 12. Though he recognised the evil of early marriages and was in favour of raising the age he felt it his duty to oppose the bill as it stood.

MR. NILKANTA DAS and MR. JOGIAH opposed the bill as it stood.

MR. SETHA IYENGAR opposed the bill as calculated to place a premium on blackmailers.

MR. AMARNATH DUTT, though himself a social reformer and though he did not marry any one in his charge before 14, yet would not thrust penal legislation on others.

MR. K. V. BANGASWAMI IYENGAR said under the bill one who sincerely believed that the religious commandments did not allow post-puberty marriage had no asylum in the British Empire. The President called on Mr. Sarda to reply to the debate.

Mr. Sarda thanked the supporters of the bill for their support.

The bill was then put to the vote. The opposition, demanded a division, which resulted as follows:— 67 for and 14 against the Bill.

The result was received with vociferous cheers, in which even some of the opponents of the measure joined.

The public galleries, though considerably thinned, contained a large number of ladies, who had patiently watched the progress of the bill.

THE ADULT EDUCATION MOVEMENT.

Berta Hamilton writes in the Social Welfare (Toronto):—

The Adult Education Movement of to-day had its birth in the days of struggle, suffering and stress which accompanied the dying of 18th century England and the coming into being of the England of to-day. The Mechanics' Institutes, started at its close, refused to acknowledge man's deep need and the human challenge of the changing social and economic order and soon fell into the discard, so far as adult education was concerned, becoming, instead, the fore-runners of the modern polytechnic and technical schools. The Sunday Schools, by teaching the people to read and write, were the true fore-bears of this movement, which has threaded its way through political and economic movements such as the London Corresponding Society, the Owenite and other early co-operative ventures, the Chartist Movement whose great protagonist, Lovett, urged the people towards knowledge with the cry, "Think you a corrupt government could perpetuate its exclusive and demoralizing influences amid a people united and instructed." The Rochdale Pioneers from the outset both felt and acted on the belief that co-operation, as they meant to practise it, could only succeed if people had "knowledge." They must be induced to think. At first a literary and reading room was maintained by voluntary contributions, but soon an Educational Department became recognized as a necessary charge on the movement and 2 per cent. of the net profits was set aside to maintain it.

Within the new Trade Union Movement which had come into being after the repeal of the Combination Acts, in the Working Men's College, in Ruskin College, the Adult School Movement, through many local political and other sorts of clubs, this belief in education found expression.

The present writer is not concerned to make out a case for any particular embodiment of the desire for and belief in education which grows as the years go on, but only to direct the reader to this strong and vital movement in the life of to-day. It is not a movement which commands the loyalty of the millions—only of the thousands; but if anyone will take time to look into the matter, he will find that those men and women, willing to discipline themselves with the hard discipline that thinking demands go slowly but steadily on to become "free people" no matter within what national boundary or social and economic limitations they find themselves. Oftentimes possessing nothing, they yet possess all things. But do not be misled. These seekers after education are no idle dreamers—apart from the world—caring not for social justice, they are merely those, who, while working hard—usually within some recognized organization—for the removal of political, economic or social hindrances to "the good life" nevertheless know, from their own experience, and that of their forefathers who initiated those movements for reform, that a popular leader or an unpopular dictator may sway a mob or force his will; yet, the moment his presence is removed, the mob is as before. It lives as before in thought and deed. They know, too, that no popular leader, no dictator can sway or enslave those whose minds are clear, active and unafraid of anything, refusing what is false whether the false is in a philosophical argument, an economic theory, or in the political, commercial or industrial practice of the day. Their sense of value has not dollars and cents at its base. These, for them, have a value but are not its determinants.

It is quite impossible in the space of a short article to describe how this principle works within the many existing associations; a few incidents, however may serve to illustrate the spirit which is the movement, for where it does not exist, there may be the dress but no person is within it.

In one section of the movement—the Tutorial Class—a student pledges himself to attend each meeting of the class regularly for three sessions of twenty-four two-hour meetings, also to do regular written work for the class. Writing of this, Dr. Dansbridge says, "The difficulties which beset the workman writer of essays can hardly be grasped by those who have quiet rooms in which to work. Tutorial Class students are often amongst the poorest of working people, and their houses are very much crowded. More than one report has been made of students who rise in the middle of the night to do their essays—their only chance of obtaining quiet. One student who had fallen behind in his essays determined to make a real effort to catch up. He waited until his landlord's family and his fellow-lodgers had retired for the night, then worked till two in the morning. His labours ended, he contentedly fell asleep, in which state he remained until considerably after the time when he should have started work. He was dismissed for being late. He had to leave the town, but secured work in another town where there was a Tutorial Class which he at once joined."

The question of overtime is a difficult one for the Tutorial Class student. The following is an extreme case both of overtime and of the way in which the man concerned dealt with it. He was a man of exceptional determination and physical strength. For some time he was a councilor of his borough, though not while in the Tutorial Class. His work was that of a potter's engineer, and he left school at the age of nine. The record appended covers January to June, 1912, at which time the student was 46 years of age.

Number of hours for 6 normal weeks 1,378.

Number of hours actually worked 1,837½.

Overtime in 6 weeks 559½, or an average of 21½ hours per week.

Number of attendances at Tutorial Class 12.

Number of essays written 14.

Number of papers read to Preparatory Tutorial Class 10.

Number of lectures given to Miner's Class 6.

Number of essays read to literary societies 5.

Number of essays read in helping miner's lecturer who was ill 2.

Number of lecturers given to Workmen's Clubs 2.

Rather an astounding record!

It may be well to remind ourselves that subject, tutor and general conduct of the class are matters for the students. As one member of the movement writes: "Adult study must proceed on lines of complete freedom—ordinary pedagogic methods of a school are unsuitable, even methods of the University are unsuitable, for adult men and women students will not take lectures passively like undergraduates; they desire to diagnose, to criticise or to add to the views of the teachers. They are ready to give their experiences, their cherished ideas to be reconsidered in the light of fuller knowledge and to be fused in a greater whole."

The following story of a young Dane shows the same sort of keenness as does that of the potter's engineer.

During a period of unemployment he was chosen by his Trade Union and other allied organizations to go to the co-operative college in England as an exchange student. After six months there he went to Fircroft. From Fircroft he returned to Denmark to seek work. A few months later the writer received a letter from him in which he wrote: "Fircroft is a residential college for men near Birmingham, England. I am working—. My wages are very good—. All that money I am using for mending all the holes that have come in my budget while unemployed and in England. I have nearly got rid of all my debts—. I soon can take off my hat to my 'little wee self'—no, but I mean it is glorious to be able to pay every man his."

He next describes a new move for a co-operative book-binding enterprise about to be started in his Trade Union and then goes on, "I hope to be going to France in the summer" (only one year after his return from England) to an international school with the object of learning French. I hope to stay there for three months and, now with very good wages I am able to collect so much money, that it even from the financial point of view is possible."

To illustrate the same point, that of keenness, we may consider one aspect of the movement in Germany. In Wurtemberg, an old house within the walls of Castle Comburg, has been given by its Government to the Volkshochschulverein (People's High School Association). Here, during the first year of the school's history, 19-6-27, while unemployment was rife, an arrangement existed between the government and the association to the effect that a man who went to any of the Employment Exchanges, expressed there the desire to attend the school at Comburg, for a one month or a two month course—all other things being equal—might do so. He, in lieu of his weekly unemployment insurance, was given a few marks for pocket money. The school received from the government payment for his board and lodging. Tuition cost the Association looked after. The allowance to his family, if he had one, continued as before. When the writer visited Comburg in the summer of 1927, the school was full to capacity (40 students) of men in age 18 to 50. For those attending it meant literally a new start in life. Something was becoming theirs from which nothing could part them. A sense of liberation—a growing sense of the worth of the "other fellow's point of view." Friendship based on difference rather than on sameness was becoming more and more desirable to them. Friendship which overstepped age, craft or trade, political party and creed. The student thus meeting in his fellow-students many creeds and all political parties, learned or relearned the worth of the fullest investigation and discussion with no apology but no recrimination.

In the Educational Settlements which have become so much a part of the life in many towns and country districts, one finds a merging of the educational methods of which we have written, together with many others; the dance, folksong, the drama, handicrafts, travels abroad. These settlements usually possess a homelike building and provide in the common meeting place an atmosphere which appeals especially perhaps to those who are not contemplating going in for the strenuous discipline of a regular class, but who do want to exchange ideas, to come to know people of different experience. Belonging to such a settlement, whatever else it does, secures for each member some mental jolt. He must ever be ready to answer the question "Why?" Why one thinks as one does on any subject and if one does not think, there is still the necessity of answering "why"?

One's belief in this "intangible, indiscoverable but nevertheless real" thing will be in proportion to one's insistence on a programme or on a reality behind every programme. If the latter represents one's point of view, the form which reality takes will be of little moment, but that the reality may have some opportunity to express itself in some way will be of the deepest concern.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Social Reform in Kayastha Community:—The following news is taken from the Search Light:—On the 8th September, at Radha Bhawan, Solan, (residence of Mr. Saohchidananda Sinha, Bar.-at-law) the marriage of Srimati Janki Devi, a young widow, and niece of Mr. Sinha, was celebrated with Mr. B. L. Verma, late Assistant Engineer, Delhi Municipality, and a gentleman of respectability and character. As Mr. Sinha could not join the marriage, being at Allahabad, Mr. Roshan Lal gave away the bride in marriage. The Kayastha brotherhood and gentry of Solan joined the ceremony and the dinner and gave their blessings to the married couple. Mr. Verma is a Bhatnagar Kayastha and the girl a Srivastav widow. This marriage is in accordance with the resolution passed at the All-India Kayastha Conference, Delhi at which Mr. Sinha presided.

Cable from Mrs Macswiney:—Mayor Sen Gupta has received the following cablegram from Mary Macswiney, Ireland:—"The family of Terrence Macswiney unites with patriotic India in the grief and pride on the death of Jatindranath Das. Freedom will come."

LIFE INSURANCE TRUST PLAN

THE outright payment of the Insurance money to the widow or children in one lump sum is a great mistake. To apply a real test you would only ask yourself how your wife would invest such a sum NOW without any help whatever from you. The woman who has been "All the Wife and Mother" is ill-equipped to invest and safeguard funds designed to her family's protection for many years.

NOTES.

President of the Next Congress:—Mahatma Gandhi having persisted in his refusal to accept the presidentship of the next session of the Indian National Congress, Mr. Vallabhbhai Patel who received the next largest number of votes from the Provincial Committees having likewise declined the responsibility, and new nominations not being permissible according to Congress rules, Pandit Jawharlal Nehru was elected at the meeting of the All-India Congress Committee held at Lahore last week to the office. It was a case of more or less Hobson's choice with the Committee. The result has been received with enthusiasm by few and with frank misgivings by some organs of public opinion. Pandit Jawharlal's own position is not an easy one. To the country at large he stands for independence of the British connection, but he is himself in the position of a captive balloon held down on one side by the pacific idealism of Mahatma Gandhi and on the other by the political realism of Pandit Motilal Nehru. The reasons given publicly by Mahatmaji are not necessarily all his reasons for insisting on the Junior Pandit's election this time to the Congress Presidentship. Politics, national as well as international, is now-a-days largely a matter of gestures, and Pandit Jawharlal's presidentship is a gesture to the British Government. Pandit Jawharlal Nehru may be described as being the most moderate of extremists and Mahatma Gandhi has doubtless calculated the value of his co-operation in keeping the independence school within the bound of practical politics. On the whole, the choice is perhaps the best in the circumstances.

The Next National Social Conference:—We are glad to see that friends in Lahore are taking active steps to hold the next National Social Conference. It is very gratifying that the several organising committees are composed of representatives of all communities. The National Social Conference has always been a non-denominational body. As regards the President, an excellent suggestion was made to elect Mr. Harbilas Sardas, the author of the Marriage Bill now awaiting the assent of the Governor-General to become law. The selection will be a fitting tribute to the patience and perseverance with which Mr. Sardas has piloted his Bill through the Indian Legislature. The general practice of the Social Conference is to select a President belonging to the Province where it is held, although it has been occasionally departed from. In the report of the proceedings of the organising Committee which we reprint from the Tribune, we miss the name of Mrs. Brijlal Nehru who served with great distinction on the Age of Consent Committee.

Women's Medical Service:—Insidious propaganda is being carried on through the columns of Anglo-Indian journals to introduce more English women in this country in some capacity or other. Rosalie Acazon who wrote condemning educated Indian women, has emerged in the role of a Medical expert to plead for a Women's Medical Service for India to be controlled by the central Government—a scheme for which Miss Rathbone is evidently agitating. A spirited protest against this scheme has appeared in the press over the signatures of three well-known lady doctors of Bombay. They write:—We think that Provincial Governments were perfectly justified in refusing grants to the Women's Medical Service as it exists to-day. We really fail to see the necessity for the formation of a Women's Medical Service on lines parallel to the I. M. S. as suggested in the article. If there is any justification for the I. M. S. which was originally intended as a military reserve, there is none whatsoever for a parallel service for women. The W. M. S. even as it exists to-day, is reserved for women with British qualifications only, of whom the larger proportion consists of British women. It is not justifiable at the present day when so many Indian medical women with adequate medical qualifications and hospital experience are available. The idea of reserving the Service for those possessing British qualifications only is wholly wrong. Obviously the service is not run in the interest of Indian women. We can quote instances where Indian women with the highest British qualifications were refused admission on the plea of want of experience. The L. R. C. P. and M. R. C. S., of England is no better than any of the degree qualifications of Indian universities." We are in entire agreement with what the signatories have said and we would further state that Indian medical women with their knowledge of the vernaculars and of the needs of the people have proved more useful and efficient than their western sisters of their profession. An increasing number of Indian women seek training abroad every year and we have already quite a number of them with foreign qualifications and training. Therefore, there is absolutely no excuse for the creation of a Medical service for India such as the one mooted.

The Reversion To Personal Rule :—The Bombay Legislative Council has passed a Government Bill empowering the Commissioner of Police to take summary action against persons whom he considers undesirable at a time of emergency. The idea of such a measure originated in consequence of the recent riots in Bombay, but the Bill as it has been passed has a wider sweep. The Commissioner will be able now to deport writers and speakers as well as roughs and hooligans. The Presidency towns under the jurisdiction of the High Courts were placed under a more liberal regime than the districts, but today in Bombay City the Commissioner of Police has more power over the liberties of the citizens than the corresponding official in Poona or Ahmedabad. This reversion from the reign of law to personal rule, has been made by a law! Apart from this anomaly, the question of preventing the growth of the hooligan element in the city deserves more attention than it has hitherto received. A Government which loads itself with a large number of weapons for every emergency, is in danger of sinking under the weight of its own armoury. There is no provision in the present system for an agency whose duty is to devise not measures to suppress the symptoms but measures to prevent the causes of social wastage.

Opium in Orissa :—One of our foreign subscribers recently wrote complaining of the infrequency of references in the Reformer to the opium problem. The fact is that throughout the greater part of the country, opium is a much less serious evil than drink. There are, however, a few places where the consumption of the drug is more than in others. Orissa is one of these, and the Bihar Government recently appointed a Committee to investigate the reasons for the excessive use of the drug. A summary of the Committee's report is reprinted in another column. The Committee conclude that the climatic and economic conditions of the province are largely responsible for the abnormal use of opium which is believed to be a remedy against malaria, rheumatism and other complaints common in the province. "The artistic temperament" of the Oriya, is said to be another cause. Being unable, on account of his poverty, to express his aesthetic instincts on canvass, marble or bronze, he apparently turns to the medium of the opium-stimulated imagination to find satisfaction for them. If this be the case, the establishment of a School of Arts in Orissa may be expected to bring about a reduction in the consumption of opium.

The Bhutto Case :—We had commented in one of the previous issues of the Reformer on the strange decision of the Bombay Government in issuing the order for the withdrawal of the Bhutto case. When the withdrawal application came up some time back before the Sessions Judge of Hyderabad, the Judge refused to pass orders for the withdrawal. The trial of the case therefore will run its normal course and will be taken up at a date to be fixed later. An adjournment motion to discuss the Government's interference with the regular course of justice was moved by Mr. Lalji Naranji in the Bombay Legislative Council. That is to say that the Executive Government took the case out of the hands of the Judicial Tribunal and sought to decide it outside the established procedure in such cases. It elicited the reply that Government's decision was arrived at after going fully into the merits of the case and the details could not be placed before the House as the case was sub judice. The motion was talked out.

Bombay Women's Conference :—We published in the last issue a summary of the address of Mrs. Sirur who presided over the fourth Constituent Women's Education Conference of the presidency. A frank and liberal spirit pervaded the whole address. Mrs. Sirur gracefully acknowledged the services rendered by men for the women's cause and blamed her own sex for the indifference shown in the past. "We ourselves", she observed, "are past correction. The country has to suffer for our shortcomings or gain by what is good in us". Mrs. Sirur's pessimism in the first sentence is unwarranted. The very fact that Indian women have shaken off their lethargy and are working for their advancement is proof positive that they are not "past correction." Mrs. Sirur in her address pleaded for a separate college for women with a hostel attached to it. A women's college in Bombay would speed up women's education as it has done in the Madras and other presidencies.

Madras Women and Sarda Bill :—Under the presidentship of Lady Sadasiva Aiyar a public meeting of the women of Madras was held this week to express their joy at the passing of the Bill for the abolition of child-marriages and to show their sense of gratitude and appreciation of the great services rendered for the progress of Indian womanhood by the members of the Assembly. Some of the lady speakers pointed out that, with the passing of the Sarda Bill, the work of marriage reform had just begun and it is the duty of the women to see it brought into operation. The Bill is expected to come into force only from first April 1930, and some ladies expressed the fear that many child marriages may be rushed through in the interval. The speakers one and all exhorted their audience to do propaganda work and broadcast the provisions of the Bill.

Social Legislation :—Among Bills introduced by non-official Members in the Legislative Assembly at the end of the momentous Simla session on Friday the 26th instant, are three by Mr. Jayakar regarding adoption, gains of learning, and amendment of the Special Marriage Act, one by Mr. Jogiah dealing with women's rights of inheritance, one by Mr. Chamanlal about publication of Judicial proceedings injurious to morals, one by Mr. Gaya Prasad Sinha for the abolition of the death penalty, and one by Mr. Ghaznavi for amending the Mussalman Waqf Draft Validating Act.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, OCTOBER 5, 1929.

WHAT IS HINDUISM ?

I.

Some years ago the late Dr. J. N. Farquhar wrote a small book which he called "A Primer of Hinduism". It was meant mainly for British and Christian readers and was designed on the model of a grammar of a dead language. Passages regarded as typical from Hindu scriptural literature were placed at the head of the several chapters which led up to the final one suggesting that Christianity is the crown and consummation of them all. We have before us another "Primer of Hinduism" of an entirely different type. The author, Professor D. S. Sarma of the Presidency College, Madras, is a profound and devout believer in Hinduism. The book, as he tells us in his touching Preface, was originally intended for his daughter, Gargi, who died at the early age of 14 and to whose memory it is dedicated. She would seem to have been a deeply religious-minded child as her father did not feel that the subject was not above her comprehension. In fact, in conformity with the ancient principle of Hindu pedagogy of severely testing the earnestness of a pupil seeking instruction before the teacher imparts it to him, Professor Sarma put off from time to time his daughter's request for knowledge of her ancestral faith till he found that she would not be denied. The exposition, in order to suit the tender years of the questioner, is put in the form of questions and answers. As many Hindus of mature years are, as regards their religion even less informed than was little Gargi who had passed her Gita examination held by the Hindu Samaj of her native town, Rajahmundry, this form of presentation will be found easy to follow by them as well. This is one of the best hand-books on the Hindu religion, written by an English-educated Indian, that we have come across. Messrs. Macmillan and Co. are entitled to credit for undertaking the publication of this book which should attract a large circle of readers in India and abroad.

The chief defect which we find in it is that the author, instead of frankly avowing that his Hinduism is the Hinduism of the present day, profoundly influenced by modern philosophic and Christian ideas, makes out throughout that it is the direct and unalloyed outcome of Vedic doctrines. Herein he falls into the common mistake of thinking that it is derogatory to a religion to allow or at any rate to acknowledge outside influence.

Christianity has been profoundly influenced and modified by outside influences and so have been Buddhism and Islam. In fact, a religion which is impermeable to the influences of its environment is a dead and not a living religion. The Hinduism of the educated Hindu to-day is very far indeed from being the Hinduism of the composers of the Vedas or the Agamas. We do not see why that fact should not be frankly acknowledged. No man, wrote Amiel, is his own ancestor.

One of the most common observations about Hinduism which occurs to non-Hindus, is that it evades definition. It has no founder, no creeds, no single book of revelation, nothing in fact which constitutes religion to the Christian, Mahomedan or Buddhist. What the outsider sees is a complex and to him unintelligible social system based upon what appears to him a rigid division of castes and sects. When the ancient teacher in the Upanishad tried to convey an idea of the Absolute to his pupil, he could only do so by saying "neti, neti", "not this, not this" to every description of it which the latter suggested. Even so the seeker after a definition of Hinduism has to fall back upon a like formula. It is not child-marriage, it is not the prohibition of widow-remarriage, it is not pilgrimage or temple-worship, it is not music before mosques, it is not the adherence to caste, it is not even the prohibition against beef-eating. There are many Hindu castes which do not observe early marriage, and in which widow-remarriage is practised under the sanction of hoary custom. Millions of Hindus never go on a pilgrimage to any shrine besides their village temple, and even a visit to that temple is not obligatory on them. No Hindu is required to play music in the streets whether there happens to be a mosque near by or no. Nor is caste an essential of Hinduism, though every Hindu belongs to one. Some of the greatest saints of Hinduism were acknowledgedly outcastes. The prohibition of beef as an article of food is perhaps the most universally recognised tenet of popular Hinduism. But the Vedic seers did not recognise any such prohibition, and some of the untouchables, who are claimed and admitted to be Hindus, are addicted to beef by long-standing custom. The belief in transmigration and re-birth is general among Hindus, but the founder of one of the six great schools of Hindu philosophy denied any First Cause beyond the materialistic one, and the Bhagavad Gita refers to him with the highest respect as the most perfect of sages. Even a belief in God is not essential, because Kapila, like Gautama Buddha, Himself an avatar of Vishnu, dispensed with the Deity in his scheme of the Universe. What then is Hinduism? Prof. Sarma's book is a worthy endeavour to answer this question.

SARDA BILL IN THE COUNCIL OF STATE.

On Saturday last the Sarda Bill was passed by the Council of State in the same form in which it emerged triumphant from the Assembly. The Bill was taken up on the 27th September. Mr. Ramdas Pantulu while moving the Bill for consideration said that the advantages of the Bill far out-weighed the disadvantages. As regards the bogey of religious interference he showed that the custom of "sati" had been abolished and that serious inroads had been made in the rules of Hindu Law. He pointed out to the Muslim oppositionists that Egypt and Turkey had enacted such laws more drastic in their nature. He further stated that the opinion of the religious heads did not count for much, as they never had shown any interest in eradicating social evils. The amendment to postpone the Bill to the Delhi Session was defeated. Mr. G. A. Natesan supporting the Bill referred to the grievous consequences of child marriage and told the Government not to be apprehensive of the orthodox people who, he was sure, will veer round to the reformers' view.

The principal opposition to the Bill came from Mr. Khaparde who made a very incoherent and rambling speech attacking the Government for departing from their pledge of religious neutrality in giving their support to the Bill. He capped his arguments by stating that it was against the genius of the people, which, if Mr. Khaparde's interpretation of it is true, does not deserve to be fostered. Dr. Rama Rau welcomed the measure as beneficial from the medical point of view. When discussion on the Bill was resumed on Saturday, the amendments moved for exemption in favour of Brahmins, Muslims and all others having conscientious objections to the provisions of the Bill, were defeated. Sir Fazli Hussein and Sir Maneckji Dadabhoj effectively demolished the arguments of the opponents of the Bill. The former showed that the extension of the Bill to Muslims was made at the request of the Muslims themselves and that Islamic practice and traditions were in consonance with the provisions of the Bill.

After the rejection of another amendment to postpone the enforcement of the measure to 1936, Mr. Ramdas Pantulu in moving the final passage of the Bill put it to the House that the choice lay between national degeneration and stagnation on one side, and on the other, the nation's progress to its proper place in the commonwealth of the Empire. Concluding he hoped that its opponents would reconcile themselves to the measure and would cooperate by giving due publicity to it. The Bill was then passed by the House by a large majority amid great applause and only waits the assent of the Viceroy to become law.

It is significant that in the Council of State the Bill commanded the support of even members holding orthodox views. The Bill has been hailed as a piece of legislation long overdue by the whole of India with the exception of a few die-hards who predict dire consequences if child marriages are abolished. The few orthodox and pseudo-orthodox persons who keep up the agitation against the Bill in the name of religion, have they conformed in every respect to the tenets of their religion? Do they know what Hinduism is? It is worthy of note that an orthodox gentleman in Nagpur has gone so far as to give up his title of Mahamahopadhyaya as a protest against the Bill. Acts like these are the last shriek of orthodoxy against the abolition of child marriage, which is bound to acquiesce once the Act comes into operation.

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR

XL. LOVERS.

(BY DR. CLIFFORD MANSHARDT, PH.D.)

Love is of God. It is inherent in the universe. "From the beginning of the creation God made them male and female"; and from the beginning of the creation male and female have been drawn together in bonds of love. Love is a fact. We do not explain it. We cannot explain it without robbing it of its wonder and beauty. We simply know that it is and rejoice in the treasure of our knowledge.

The husband-wife relationship at its best is fraught with rare nobility. When two young people leave their parents' homes to set up a home of their own they are entering upon that which may be splendid, or upon that which may be less. In the true home love means far more than physical attraction, it goes far deeper than an external courtesy. To those who really love life is a glorious partnership in which each partner shares of his best with the other. It is a community of ideals, and a community of ideas. It is a drawing force which pulls each partner out of himself and bids him come up higher.

While love is eternal, lovers are human and subject to all the limitations of humans. One of the most common causes of unhappiness between lovers is the unbridled tongue. A sharp word spoken at an inopportune time cuts deeply and makes a wound that is hard to heal. Many young people experiencing this become silent and moody, being reluctant to speak at all. Silence may be golden, but in this instance expression is better than repression. The way to overcome hasty speech is not to refrain from speaking, but to cultivate the art of pleasant speech. "Let your speech be always with grace, seasoned with salt."

The law of love is the law of mutual service. A lover gives himself wholly and without stint to the service of his beloved. He does not ask whether the act performed is commensurate with his dignity or whether it will further his social position. He does not care. He only knows his joy is found in the happiness of the one he loves. That for him is adequate reward. True love knows no rights that work hardship upon another. The love-centric home does not speak in the terms of rights and duties. It expresses itself in terms of privilege. It affirms in no uncertain tone that he who ministers is truly great.

Very few young people can contemplate marriage without experiencing a certain amount of fear. They do not know what the future will bring forth. Will the lover always remain true to the promises that he is making to his beloved? Will the flame that is now burning grow brighter, or will it flicker and grow cold? Can each commit himself to the other with assurance and confidence? And then comes the answer, "Perfect love casteth out fear." It is an adventure of faith, and once the adventure is entered upon the truth itself is experienced. Love develops, expands, and grows richer with the passing of the years.

PROF. S. RADHAKRISHNAN ON RELIGION OF INDIA.

Professor S. Radhakrishnan of the Calcutta University, prior to his departure to England delivered an address at the School of Economics and Sociology, Bombay, last week, expounding some of the salient truths about religion and particularly the religion of India.

He began by saying that his address was being delivered under the auspices of the School of Economics and Sociology—two subjects that had assumed great importance in recent times.

The people were imagining that the study of Economics and Sociology was likely to be more helpful to their country and the impression also prevailed everywhere that these studies were bringing closer together the different nations and races of the world.

One feature of the present time was that the study of subjects like philosophy in which he was interested had been given a go by. There was a tendency to regard such subjects as of no value in modern movements—Labour, Socialist or Communist. There was a tendency to lay more emphasis on what might be considered of material value and a decreasing emphasis on the higher studies like philosophy and religion.

It was argued in defence of such a tendency that religion laid too much emphasis on the soul and had no concern for human welfare; that it developed in the individual a spirit of other-worldliness; and that it did not help in the building up of a better or nobler human society. It was even argued that religion invested a sort of divine sanction on the existing social order and arrangement, in virtue of which they were considered too sacred for rearrangement. Again it was argued that if at all religion was interested in the happiness of human life, it was not for the happiness of human life on earth but for the hereafter. There was then the criticism that religion was not a unifying agency. It was complained by some that the world would be a more religious place if they did not have the religions; that religion was a dividing rather than a welding force.

ONE-SIDED CRITICISM.

There were those who told them that men had no right to be happy as their religion taught them that men should lead a life of suffering and sacrifice and travail. A great prophet had suffered and died, therefore men should suffer and die likewise. If that was the kind of religion they were called upon to accept, then the tendency growing against religion had some justification. Such kind of criticism of religion, the Professor went on to say, was utterly one-sided and unfounded. Whatever historical justification there might be for it, so far as the fundamental value of religion was concerned that was quite untenable.

If he were told that religion was bound up with the present unjust social order, that it was not concerned with humanity but with the soul and life hereafter, he would say that that was not the true nature of religion. Religion was something altogether different in its fundamental nature. It was in that respect that the Indian religion was catholic and right in its emphasis.

Their religion had from the very beginning insisted on the necessity of cultivating social good and promoting the welfare of humanity. There was a great passage in the "Mahabharata", which spoke of the great mystery that there was nothing nobler than humanity. If they had anything in this world with which religion was identified that was the promotion of humanity. Religion was not merely concerned with the soul, it was interested in making life better and happier on earth.

To the question whether religion was not to be interpreted as something that divided man from man he would reply that the religion of India stood for utter catholicity in belief and practice. It was really a universal religion, as wide, as humanity itself.

PATHS TO ACHIEVE THE GOAL

There was no one particular way or plan, no statutory method by which salvation could be attained. Each individual could reach his own goal in his own way, and religion was concerned with providing men a suitable environment to reach out their ultimate end. To realise the presence of God in life, to live in the presence of God was the highest religious realisation. If that was not possible they could meditate and concentrate upon God, striving for a higher life. If that also was not possible there was the way of worshipping an image, an idol to aid them in meditation and concentration. If there were people who could not rise even to that level, to them there was the path of pilgrimage. Thus they had the four paths of achieving their higher goal: the natural realisation of the presence of God, meditation and concentration, image worship and pilgrimage. The four paths applied to men of varying development and capacity.

It was a recognition of the acceptance of every man at the stage at which he was found. It was not a question laying down a common standard for all people, but to provide for each man a suitable environment for working out his own salvation, his own goal according to his stage of development.

The religious life did not regard material comforts as the be all and end all of existence. They had insisted on what might be called the costly character of religion in regard to sacrifice and suffering. It was by suffering and sacrifice they could go higher in their religious ideal. If he were asked if it was not man's right to be happy he would say 'no,' if, by happiness was meant enjoyment of pleasures, pastime and excitement. The world was not to be regarded as a factory of pleasures. The higher attributes, faculties and powers that were latent in every man required to be stretched and developed. That could be done only if they were prepared to go through fire, to suffer and sacrifice.

PATIENT SUFFERING AND CLEAR THINKING

But mere sacrifice or suffering could not be put in the first place. They were not the central things in life. What was necessary to be able to be worthy of a higher life were patient suffering and clear thinking. If they wanted to bring about a new social order they should not only be able to suffer and sacrifice, but they should have a clear vision of their future, their goal, their ideal to be achieved. "Unless we have some clear vision of the goal we are working for, unless great minds are set to work out our ideal and plan, and then try to realise that goal by sacrifice and suffering nothing great is going to be achieved."

The lecturer added that in the political history of India they had instances of men making the supreme sacrifice of their life for an ideal or principle. There was no lack of suffering and sacrifice on their part, but what they wanted was balanced judgment and patient suffering.

The Professor concluded his interesting lecture by pleading for intellectual freedom and exhorting the young men to free their minds from all sorts of bonds and restrictions.

Prof. K. T. Shah, proposing a vote of thanks to the lecturer, wished him 'bon voyage' and expressed his confidence that he would be able to interpret to the West the real religious and philosophical thought of India.

PROBLEM OF EAST AFRICA.

Pundit Hridayanath Kunzru, M.L.A., President of the East African Indian National Congress sailed for England on Saturday by the s. s. "Morea". Interviewed regarding his mission to England, he said that he was going there to lay the grievances of Indians in East Africa before the British Government. Asked to restate the outstanding demands of East African Indians, he said that the East African Indian deputation had already placed before the Government of India their most important demands arising out of the Closer Union Commission with regard to Common Electoral Roll and the constitution of the Kenya Legislative Council and the Federation of East Africa. Indians in East Africa had been agitating for a long time for a common roll and the Closer Union Commission arrived at the decision that a common roll based on a civilisation franchise would be the best in the interest of all the races inhabiting East Africa. The Government of India put forward the same solution as far back as 1920 and vigorously asserted that there was no justification whatsoever for inequality of status between Indians and Europeans in a Crown Colony. It was true that the Closer Union Commission was of the view that a common roll could be obtained only with the consent of the European community. Indians were unable to accept that condition. It has never been suggested by any European that constitutional changes in Kenya should be brought about only as a result of agreement between Indians and Europeans. How could that be then urged with any kind of justification?

COMMON ELECTORAL ROLL.

The question of common roll on which admittedly depended the racial harmony and future welfare of East Africa could not be allowed to remain unsolved because of the European opposition. All those who had given their best thought to the question were of the opinion that the common roll was the only way of creating a common political interest, and unless such an interest was created there could be no hope of healing the differences that existed between Indians and Europeans in East Africa.

MISSIONARIES NO FRIENDS OF INDIANS.

So far as the question of Kenya Legislative Council was concerned there were five Indians on it as against 11 Europeans, though the European population was only half of the Indian population. If in the guise of giving representation to natives, the number of non-official Europeans is increased the inequality between Indians and Europeans would become still greater and the European influence would be inordinately enhanced. Indians were cordially in favour of giving seats in the Council to Africans, but if for some reason the Government thought it impossible to nominate natives to the Council, Indians would strongly urge that the present constitution be retained without disturbing the official majority. Some people were of the opinion that if Missionaries were to represent native interests power would not go to the Europeans. That was, however, a wrong notion; for, it had to be remembered that though there were many missionaries who were genuine friends of natives there were scarcely any who regarded the Indian as anything but an unwelcome outsider.

Mr. Kunzru did not also like the Federation proposal which, though at present confined to economic purposes would in due course acquire political power as well.

• GOVERNMENT'S ATTITUDE.

Regarding the debate in the Legislative Assembly on this question Mr. Kunzru said that he was surprised at the speeches made by Sir George Schuster and Sir Fazli Hussein. At the second meeting of the Emigration Committee to which the representatives of all parties were invited certain satisfactory conclusions were arrived at. He could say both on behalf of himself and Sir Purshottamdas Thakurdas that they were under the impression that the views of the non-officials had been accepted by Sir Fazli Hussein and Sir George Schuster who also attended the Committee. The official speeches in the Assembly, however, created the suspicion that the views of the Government which were forwarded separately with those of the Emigration Committee differed from those of the latter. The Government of India were not required to-day to formulate a new policy. That had been laid down once for all in the historic dispatch of 1920 which was again reiterated in a resolution after the publication of the White Paper of 1923. The Government had taken a heavy responsibility for having departed from the principles which were understood to have guided their policy with regard to Indians abroad during the last ten years. The question of the status of Indians abroad was second in interest only to that of constitutional future of India. The slightest vacillation or weakness on the part of the Government of India would complete the existing estrangement between them and the people which was already bitter and growing.

POLICY OF TRUSTEESHIP.

Questioned about Mr. K. C. Roy's speech with reference to the principle of trusteeship Mr. Kunzru said: "Mr. Roy is reported to have asked whether Government of India accepted the principle of trusteeship meaning apparently that it should be uncompromisingly rejected. If this is his meaning then he expressed his own and not the view of the Indians in East Africa. It was Indians who first insisted in 1923 that his Majesty's Government should regard native interest as supreme. Should this be done, it was obvious there will be no justification for the transfer of political power to white settlers. And once the fear of whites dominating in Kenya was set at rest the relations between Indian and Europeans may be expected to become easier. The Government of India having acted so far on the principle of trusteeship, the remedy for the situation lies not in denouncing the principle of trusteeship but in enforcing its acceptance by all means at our disposal."

MR. K. C. ROY'S ATTACK ON MR. SASTRI.

Regarding the criticism that had been levelled against Mr. Sastri, Mr. Kunzru said that last year the East African Indian National Congress passed a resolution eulogising his services and expressing confidence in him. He was in East Africa when the news of Mr. Sastri's visit to the East African colonies was announced and the new and filariasis are extremely common in all districts. There is a common belief among the people that opium is a valuable remedy for these maladies and that it acts as a tonic and restorative against the depressing and enervating effect of the climate, which bring on decay and old age much earlier than in more healthy parts.

CAUSES ANALYSED.

In the opinion of the Committee the following general causes also seem to have been in operation: the influence of Vaishnavism which forbids the use of alcohol and the poverty of the Oriya and his unstimulating and unnourishing food which requires to be supplemented by some cheap stimulant. Medical evidence shows that opium mitigates hunger to which was attributed the sudden and larger increase of consumption of opium after the great famine of 1866. As for cheapness, a sufficient dose of opium for ordinary purposes can be had for one pice. Then, there is the artistic temperament of the Oriya which is attracted towards opium on account of its effect on the imagination. Another factor, in the Committee's opinion, is the influence of the Mahratta conquerors who followed Mahomedans as the rulers of the country and who were also heavy consumers of opium:—The Times of India.

TRAFFIC IN WOMEN.

Mr. Sachchidananda Sinha, the editor of the Hindusthan Review, writes:—

Certain cases that recently came up in the Allahabad High Court have drawn public attention to the immoral and unlawful traffic in girls and women that is carried on in certain parts in India. There are men and women systematically engaged in this trade, who find it profitable. A girl or woman, either unhappy or foolish, is inveigled on some pretext or other, taken to another part of the country, sold either as a wife, or for immoral purposes. Commenting on one such case Mr. Justice Sen of the Allahabad High Court observed that the Census returns showed a disparity in number between the male and female population in certain western tracts, but that was a problem that did not concern courts of justice. In dismissing the appeal of the convicted persons he very rightly observed that when such an offence was brought home deterrent sentences should be imposed. As a matter of fact, this infamous traffic is not confined to any particular people or country. It is extensively carried on in Europe and America and is widely known as the White Slave Traffic. In the West it is exclusively a traffic for the purposes of prostitution. In India it serves two purposes, marriage as well as the degradation of women. In another case that also came up at Allahabad a man and a woman had been convicted of abducting a married girl of 19 years of age and attempting to sell her to a Jat in the Nabha State for a wife. The piteous appeals of the young woman so moved the Jat that he refused to buy her. For her obstinacy she was thrashed and slashed with a knife, and was afterwards sold to another Punjabi for Rs. 500 at Haripur near Abbottabad. Subsequently she was traced and rescued, and the two original abductors were convicted. The abduction of girls and women, or their seduction by plausible pleas to live a life of shame is carried on in every part of the country. The Devadasis of Southern Indian are to be found in the temples. It is, however, only in the Punjab and Sind that girls and women are sold as wives. This is not possible in other parts of the country because of the prevalence of the caste system. There is no caste among the Jats, and in Sind the only two classes are Amils and Baniyas, with a very small percentage of Brahmins. The traffic in women is very prevalent in the Punjab and is known as bardafaroshi. Perhaps, the traffic is on the decline, but it is perfectly certain that very few cases are detected and the offenders are rarely brought to justice. Usually, a girl or a woman disappears from her village and nothing is heard of her again. If there is a hue and cry it dies down after a short time. When, therefore, the law tracks down the miscreants engaged in this nefarious trade the punishment should certainly be severe.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Greater India Society Formed:—Dr. Kali Das Nag of Calcutta Greater India Society, delivered a series of five lectures on "Art and Architecture of Greater India" under the auspices of the Bombay University. After the last lecture Fr. Heras thanking Dr. Nag for the series of his very interesting lectures, said that Dr. Nag had come to Bombay to communicate the enthusiasm of the Greater India Society of Calcutta to the people of Bombay. First of all, Fr. Heras recommended that the history of India outside India should be introduced in the B. A. Honours course at our University. Fr. Heras said that he had proposed the introduction of this subject in the Honours course to the University four years ago, but during these four years nothing has been done. It is to be expected that our reformed University will do something in this line. Secondly, a tour of all Indian Universities should be organized to visit the places of the ancient Indian colonies, Java, Oambodia, Siam, Annam, Bali, etc. Thus both professors and students will study the ancient monuments 'in situ'. Moreover, it is necessary to foster Indian Historical Research in our Universities, if we do not want to see our University teaching of history converted into the teaching of a secondary school. Under the name of History are naturally included all the manifestations of Indian culture in India and outside India. In this field of historical research we generally meet with three difficulties which are all financial. Financial difficulties for the acquisition of materials of research: books, documents, photographs of manuscripts, copies of manuscripts, etc. Secondly financial difficulty on the part of the student himself, who is to be helped by scholarships; and finally financial difficulty for the publication of the results of research. Fr. Heras at the end said that he had great pleasure in announcing that a provisional committee of representative people had been formed in order to solve all these problems. Thus, he said, we shall help the noble ideals of the Greater India Society, whose message has been brought to us by Dr. Kali Das Nag. After this Mr. Vishvanath P. Vaidya, B.A., J.P., Bar-at-law, read the names of gentlemen who formed this provisional Committee. Rev. Fr. Heras, Mr. Vishvanath P. Vaidya, Mr. G. V. Acharya, Mr. P. V. Kane, Prof. A. V. Gajendragadkar, Mr. K. Natarajan, Mr. R. Paymaster, Dr. V. S. Sukthankar, Mr. Irani, Mr. A. A. A. Faizee, Mr. K. H. Vakeel and Mr. C. Muchhala, Joint Secretaries 103, Mody Street, Fort, Bombay.

"Clash of Colour":—Miss Kinniard on British Rule. Under the auspices of the Women's Indian Association, Calcutta, the Hon'ble Emily Kinniard of the Y. W. O. A. gave a lecture last evening at the Annie Hall on the "Clash of Colour". Miss E. Sarda B.A., L.T., presided. The lecturer said that not only differences of race but also of nationality and tongue often led to a clash. The first thing that was required was to cultivate understanding and sympathy. In India it behoved both British and Indians to understand each other. India had indeed to realise her national aspirations. The President, in the course of her concluding remarks, asked who it was that lacked understanding in India, the Indian or the Britisher? The Indians in their own way had been trying to understand and sympathise with the Britisher; but somehow or other she could not get over the feeling that the Britisher never really trusted the Indian. As for the power of Christianity to heal and to unite, she said that the rock-bottom principles of all religions were the same and, correctly understood and practised, they had the same power. She had often wondered whether Christianity had left its mark on the Britisher at all who was responsible for so many deplorable acts and whose treatment of India was so intolerable. The meeting came to a close with the singing of "Vandematharam" by Srimathi Manjeri Kamalam and a vote of thanks by Srimathi E. Narayanakutti Amma-Hindu: Madras.

Military Training for Indians:—A notification in Fort St. George Gazette says that the third Madras Presidency Urban Infantry class has been formed to provide educated young Indians on upper middle class with the same opportunities for military training as are now given to Europeans and Anglo-Indians. Preference will be given to ex-members of the University Training Corps provided they have attained the age of sixteen and are not over 31 years.

Applications for enrolment should be made to the Administrative Commandant, 3rd Madras Presidency Urban Infantry. Every member of the Urban unit will be liable to undergo a preliminary training of 32 days and an annual musketry course of training to be so arranged as not to interfere with the avocations of the members.

Widow Remarriage Disapproved:—A sensational Hindu widow marriage ending in the police being summoned to restore order and a kidnapping charge against Mr. Baji Krishna Rao, B.A., B. L., president of the local Arya Samaj and others—was celebrated last night. The parties belong to the conservative Vysia community. When the ceremony was about to begin a Vysia merchant, with half a dozen men of the same caste, is alleged to have tried to prevent the marriage by forcibly removing the bride. The police had to be sent for. The bride was subsequently given away in marriage by her mother. Feelings have been wrought to a high pitch, Dominion Status to India:—Presiding over the Women's Delegates Conference on Indian affairs at Bristol under the auspices of the local branch of Commonwealth of India League, Mrs. William Graham, wife of the President of Board of Trade, said that she was convinced that India was not getting justice. The need of redress for India was ten times greater than that which had prompted the suffrage movement. She urged that insistent pressure should be put on all members of the House of Commons. Dominion status could not be tinkered with otherwise we would lose the friendship of a great country. The conference unanimously adopted a resolution urging the Government to take immediate action for granting Dominion status to India.

Prof Radhakrishnan:—Professor Radhakrishnan sailed on the 25th Sept. by the S. S. "Pilana". He will spend some time with M. Romain Rolland in the latter's village, near Geneva, and then proceed to England to deliver his lecture at the Oxford University on the 19th October. On his way back he may visit Rome, where Signor Mussolini has invited him to deliver an address at the University.

Indian National Social Conference:—Arrangements for holding the Indian National Social Conference during the next Christmas at Lahore are making steady progress. Many distinguished ladies and gentlemen of all communities, zealous for Social Reform have become members of the Reception Committee. More are joining it. The passing of the Sarda Marriage Bill by the Legislative Assembly has given much encouragement to Social reformers throughout the country. The Provisional Organising Committee is arranging to publish a number of pamphlets on some of the most important topics of Social Reform by way of propaganda. A fairly large number of subjects has already been suggested for the consideration of the Reception Committee. The Lahore Session of the Social Conference is expected to be highly successful and effective. A general meeting of the Reception Committee will be convened shortly. All persons who are interested in Social Reform in the Panjab are invited to join the Reception Committee and to co-operate in making the Lahore Session a complete success. The subscription for membership of the Reception Committee is only Rs. 5. Communications should be addressed to the provisional Secretaries of the All-India Social Conference, Servants of India Society, MacLagan Road, Lahore.

Rai Sahib Harbilas Sarda Honoured:—An Ajmer correspondent of the Associated Press wires: Rai Sahib Harbilas Sarda, the sponsor of the Child Marriage Bill arrived here, the seat of his constituency, from Simla yesterday morning. He was accorded a public reception by hundreds of citizens. He was met at the railway station and was profusely garlanded, the Agarwal Volunteer Corps presented a guard of honour. A mass meeting of Ajmer citizens was held at the Town Hall to congratulate their worthy representative upon his well-deserved success in getting the Sarda Bill passed. Messages of congratulations were received from the Maharaja Sahib of Bikaner, Dewan Sahib of Kotah, Sahibzada Abdulwahid Khan and others from all parts of India. After the Rai Sahib in the course of his speech had explained that there would be no police interference in marriages, a resolution was passed congratulating Rai Sahib Sarda on his work and expressing the pride of the people of Ajmer Merwara at the services rendered by their patriotic representative in the Assembly. Some orthodox people attempted to raise a counter demonstration by getting people to close their shops and holding a meeting. But their effort proved a fiasco.

Tablets in Raja Ram Mohan Roy's Memory :— Forty distinguished Indians visited Bristol and made a pilgrimage to various places in the city associated with Raja Ram Mohan Roy. After a civic welcome by Lord Mayor and the Sheriff, the visitors were conducted by Lewins Mead Chapel where the Dowager Maharani of Cooch-Bihar unveiled two handsome tablets in memory of Raja Ram Mohan Roy and his successor Keshub Chunder Sen. Afterwards a service was held in Roy's tomb.

Education in India :—At Elsinore, Denmark, in connection with the world conference on New Education held on Aug. 19 Mrs. Beatrice Ensore presided. "Education in India" was the subject taken up. The spacious hall was very crowded. The following were among the speakers :—Mrs. Kamaladevi Chattopadhyaya on 'Some Educational Efforts in India', Prof. D. K. Karve on 'The Education of Women in India', Pandit Ram Narayan Misra on 'The Benares Hindu University', Miss Pope on 'The Usmania University', Mr. V. M. Mehta of Bhawanagar on 'The Education in Indian States', Mr. Inamdar of Aundh on 'The New Education in India', Miss Lowe of Madras on 'The Education in Madras' and Pandit Sri Ram Bajpai on 'Ultra-Mural Education' in Hindi which was translated in English to the audience by Mr. Gauri Shankar Prasad of Benares. After the president had delivered her concluding address she was thanked by Mr. Gauri Shankar Prasad. A group photo of the Indian delegates to the conference with Mrs. Ensore, Srimati Krishna Devi Khana of Lucknow and Miss Dutta of Calcutta, both studying in London, was taken. A dinner was given by the Indian delegates to Mrs. Ensore, Dr. Montessori, Mrs. Reeve and other scholars. Thirty covers were laid. A daily bulletin of the conference called, 'The Kronborg Avisen' was published to which some of the Indian delegates contributed articles.

NOTES.

The Sarda Act:—The Governor-General gave his assent to the Sarda Child Marriage Bill on the 1st October. The Act comes into force on the 1st April 1930. During this time the opponents of the Act will no doubt do their worst to rouse the masses against it. It behoves the reformers therefore, to utilise the interval in making the objects of the Act widely known and to counteract the agitation and demonstration of the opponents of the Act. The Sarda Child Marriage Act is a great step towards social reform. It marks the triumph of the principle of progress and enlightenment over blind tradition and unthinking conservatism. Mr. Har Bilas Sarda's name will go down in history as a great social legislator and he will take rank among the distinguished reformers of our time.

The Woes of a Girl-Wife:—Mahatma Gandhi prints in Young India a harrowing story of oppression of a girl-wife by her husband, from her brother who in helpless indignation asked Mahatmajji for advice as to what he should do to release his sister from the moral and physical torture. He went on, as usual with such types, to inveigh against Hindu religion and society as being at the root of such shameful ill-treatment of wives. Mahatma Gandhi in commenting on the letter administers a well merited rebuke to the writer for his hysterical generalisations against Hinduism. He rightly points out that there are millions of Hindu wives living in perfect peace as queens in their homes. We reproduce Mahatma Gandhi's remarks with which we completely agree. In cases of this kind which, we are sorry to say, are rather on the increase, Mahatmajji recommends that the unfortunate wife should be educated and trained to useful service in institutions like the Seva Sadan. The only other suggestion which occurs to us is that the brother, instead of wringing his hands helplessly and abusing Hinduism, should invest a few annas in a stout cane and try the effect of a sound thrashing on his bestial brother-in-law. Mahatmaji as the apostle of non-violence is precluded from advising this course. But, we are sure, he will not condemn violence if used to bring such brothers-in-law to reason. We may add that there are less chances of the real character of brothers-in-law being hidden until it is too late, if sisters are given a good education and left free to choose their husbands at a proper age.

The Madras Seva Sadan.—The first annual report of the Madras Seva Sadan bears testimony to a striking record of work done among adult women. The Home was reorganised under its present name and was modelled on the lines of the Poona Seva Sadan in April 1928. Its development during the brief period of one year was rapid and the strength of the inmates rose from 10 to 46. The aims and objects of the Institution stated in the report speak for themselves. "Those for whom the Madras Seva Sadan principally exists, are grown-up girls and young women who are poor and destitute, such as, deserted wives and helpless widows. Our aim is to impart to them such training as will make them fit, in course of time, to look after themselves. We expect the inmates to make a stay of about 5 years in the Home of the Madras Seva Sadan. During this period, such training is given to them as will enable them, when the time comes for their leaving the Home, to be thoroughly self-supporting." The Home is not confined to any caste or province and the cosmopolitan nature of the institution is a welcome feature. The institution owes its existence to the untiring efforts and munificence of the Hon'ble Mr. Justice and Mrs. M. Venkatasubba Rao whose fine spirit of service others will do well to emulate. The Seva Sadan has issued an appeal to further develop its work in the direction of medical training and to acquire a building of its own. We commend the appeal for the liberal support of the public of not only Madras, but the whole of India.

Indians In East Africa:—The East African Indian deputation now in this country went up to Simla in the hope of getting the Government of India to back them up in their attempt to secure equal rights of citizenship to Indians especially in Kenya. The deputation has returned to Bombay considerably disappointed. Sir Fazli Hussain who is temporarily acting for Sir Mahomed Habibullah as Member in charge of the Overseas portfolio, they feel, has not been as warm in his sympathy as they expected him, as an Indian to be, and they fear that there has been a retrogression from the policy hitherto followed by Government of identifying themselves with Indians overseas. We do not think that there are good grounds for this apprehension. Sir Fazli Hussain is a staunch nationalist, and he cannot feel less strongly than his predecessors for his fellow-countrymen in Africa, and his seeming coldness is partly due to temperamental caution, but largely to the fact that he is not the permanent Member and is not free to act on his own responsibility. The deputation may rest assured of India's complete sympathy with their aims.

A Plea for Prohibition.—The Rev. J. F. Edwards who, though a Christian Missionary, is a strong Indian nationalist in many directions, has contributed a weighty statement to the Observer of London, emphasizing the importance of the early adoption of Prohibition in this country. The majority of Protestant European Christian Missionaries today are total abstainers, even though they may not be Prohibitionists, and their moral support to Prohibition is of the greatest value to the cause, especially as some Indian Christians argue that, as the Bible contains no prohibition as the Koran and the Hindu scriptures do, they are free to use liquor. It is wrong to say that British rule introduced drink. The very fact of the prohibitory rule of Islam and Hinduism shows that the practice of drinking must have existed and been carried to excess in the olden days. But it is true that while drinking under Hindu and Moslem rule was regarded as a shameful habit, British example has invested it with the sanction of social acceptability. Even non-drinking hosts feel obliged by the laws of hospitality to supply liquor to their drinking guests. We think this is altogether wrong. No guest is entitled to require his host to sacrifice his principles for his entertainment. If he is not willing to accommodate himself to his host's ways, he should seek hospitality only with those who are of his way of life. This, however, is by the way. The opposition of the Government of India to Prohibition undoubtedly detracts from its moral influence with the people of India, which no amount of repressive legislation can replace.

Madras Government and Prohibition:—The current number of Prohibition has an interesting article, showing how the Madras Government was compelled to yield to the agitation for prohibition and how they, in order to gain time, provided for official temperance propaganda at a cost of rupees 4 lakhs in their last budget. The manner in which they have set about their task has led to considerable misgiving in the minds of the people as to the genuineness of the official attempts to bring about temperance. The liquor and toddy shops are left untouched. A proposal to close some toddy shops was definitely rejected for, says the journal, "there is no change of heart, the ministers are weak and the Civil Service is all powerful." The truth of this remark is amply borne out by the recent defeat the Madras Government sustained on an adjournment motion regarding the reopening of a toddy shop in Triplicane. The Government's Excise policy has elicited the following severe comments from the Hindu. "It showed that the Government went back on what was widely understood to be their definite policy of steadily reducing the number of liquor shops in the City. If the Government were not, as they profess themselves to be, apostles of temperance, but tempters of the public and intent on spreading the curse of drink, they could not have achieved their purpose better than by doing what they have done in the present case. The location of the shop in so prominent a place not only reduces their temperance propaganda to a mockery, but also casts serious doubt on the entire bona fides of their excise policy." The role of a prohibition propagandist ill suits the Government of Madras and is only adopted to hoodwink the public.

Wasteful Expenditure:—The prolonged ceremonial and extravagant expenditure which are characteristic of marriages in India have come in for a good deal of censure in an issue of the Young India. Mahatma Gandhi has taken the occasion of the marriage of the daughter of a Karachi merchant to exhort young men to do away with unnecessary ceremonials and expenditure in marriages and to limit them to the essential rites. Sheth Lalchand, and Sheth Jamsalal Bajaj before him, have provided precedents for others to follow. Sheth Lalchand's daughter's marriage ceremony, we are told, did not take more than two hours and the religious ceremony was performed by a learned Bramhin who explained to the bride and bride-groom the meaning of what they were called upon to recite. As regards expenditure Mahatmaji is of opinion that not more than rupees ten need be spent on the occasion. This simplified marriage ceremony will save many people from debt and ruin. No doubt, there will be some loss of publicity which was perhaps the original reason for the ceremonial. To make up for this, registration of marriages should be encouraged. Without registration and publicity, marriages according to the simplified style run the risk of being repudiated easily.

"Uncle Sham":—In noticing Mr. Gauba's book with this title, we said that it was one which had better not been written. The Government of the United States, however, are reported to have proscribed it, which makes us think that, after all, the book might have served a useful purpose. If the American Government, with its high professions, allows one of its subjects to vilify another nation, it should not squirm when one of that other nation, pays back in the same coin.

Door Closed to Brahmins:—At the Non-Brahmin Liberal Federation held at Nellore last week, considerable interest and excitement centred round the resolution to admit Brahmins into the fold of the Party. By rejecting the resolution by a narrow majority, the non-Brahmin Party has stultified itself. But signs are not wanting that the Party is being influenced by its best minds. A resolution of the above nature would have been unthinkable a few years ago. In his presidential address Mr. Munuswami Naidu pleaded for the removal of the ban against Brahmins while all other non-Brahmin castes are admitted freely. "It may be," said Mr. Naidu, "that Brahmins may not join even if the ban is removed; but surely our Federation thereafter will not be open to objection on the ground that it is an exclusive organisation." Organisations based on communal considerations cannot be considered national in the true sense of the term.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, OCTOBER 12, 1929.

II.

Professor Sarma's exposition of the several literary and traditional sources of Hinduism will be read with interest by readers with a scholastic bent of mind. His daughter, Gargi, would seem to have been of this class as her first questions relate to this historical aspect of the subject. The Vedas proper belong to the sacrificial stage of Hinduism which was finally left behind when Buddha came upon the scene. Post-Buddhist Hinduism was based on the philosophic teaching of the Upanishads and more particularly of the Bhagvad Gita which with gentle irony relegated the Vedas to the dust and oblivion of the upper shelf, swept aside the dialectical subtleties of the several schools of philosophy, and proclaimed the religion of faith and works open not only to the twice-born but also to women, Vaisyas and Sudras. The Gita reconciled the antagonisms not only between religious sects and philosophical schools but also between secular and religious and taught that the disinterested performance of one's duty in the position in which one is placed is the surest road to salvation which, it declared, can be attained in this life, without waiting for the next. St. Paul's words to the Colossians almost literally convey the import of the gospel of the Gita. "Whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, as to the Lord, and not unto men." If this gospel of conscientious, disinterested work, so sublime in its simplicity, had been allowed to pervade undefiled the life of the people, Hinduism would have been a powerful dynamic, as it was no doubt intended to be by its illustrious Promulgator, in the national life. Unfortunately, however, sectarians got hold of the Gita and in their commentaries twisted its plain and simple teaching in order to support their own narrow views. Besides the numerous Shastras and Puranas, the Agamas brought, Professor Sarma thinks, an alien strain into Hinduism, though he emphasises that they are thoroughly Vedic in spirit and character. Bewildered by the multiplicity of the sources of Hinduism, Gargi wants quite naturally to know if all these different phases have a common aim.

"India," says Professor Sarma in reply "is a land of religious experiment, and Hinduism is not a simple homogeneous religion. Hinduism is rather a name given to a League of Religions. In its comprehensive and tolerant fold we find all types of religion from the highest to the lowest. For, it does not force all minds into one groove. It frankly recognizes the various grades of culture that obtain in a community." He goes on to say that the common goal of all the different phases of Hindu religion is to make man a perfect spirit like God. We are not sure that this is the Hindu goal, according to any of the recognised schools of religious philosophy. That seems to be some kind of At-one-ment with God. Perhaps this is what Professor Sarma means by being perfect like God. In using English as the vehicle of religious ideas, we naturally fall into the language of the Bible and one of the great sayings of the Bible is, "Be ye perfect even as your Father in Heaven is perfect." Professor Sarma continues: "We, Hindus, consider it a sin to say that any religion is false. With us toleration is not simply a stroke of policy, but an article of faith." So distinctive is this belief in the validity of all religions to Hinduism, that the Rev. Father Heras, in a learned paper published two years ago, maintained that Asoka was a Hindu and not a Buddhist adducing, among other reasons, the fact that he proclaimed the doctrine of "religious toleration" which is not so much a Buddhist as a Hindu doctrine. "Toleration" is not the right word to describe the Hindu idea. It is not merely a putting up with other religions, but an active feeling of reverence towards them and their Prophets and teachers that is demanded of the Hindu. This same principle was laid down by Raja Ram Mohun Roy in the trust deed of the first Brahma Samaj, since copied into the deeds of every subsequent Samaj, in which it is forbidden to speak slightly of any religion or object regarded with reverence by any class or community. This indeed, is the peculiar prerogative of Hinduism.

Hinduism differs fundamentally from the religions of Semitic origin in nothing so much as its conception of sin. Professor Sarma's exposition of the Hindu idea of sin might be simplified. Hinduism does not believe in original sin. Sin is ignorance in Hinduism, the cure for it is to enlighten the heart and not merely the understanding. Knowledge is not mere intellectual apprehension but that which penetrates to the sub-conscious and possesses a man so that he cannot act except in consonance with it. It becomes his dharma, the law of his being. "If I had not done among them the works which none other man did," said Jesus "they had not had sin: but now have both seen and hated me and my Father." That is to say, they had deliberately rejected the evidence of their souls and spirit. Modern thought remarkably corroborates the Hindu conception of crime and sin as the outcome of a condition of inner unenlightenment rather than that of wilful disobedience to the laws of God. Christ's idea of sin was very much the same as the Hindu, though Christianity has adopted that of the Old Testament. His love for sinners while hating their sins, is explicable only on the idea of sin as a manifestation of ignorance, to be got rid of by enlightening the mind and soul of the sinner. Even the worst sinner when he gets true knowledge, says the Gita, becomes a pure soul. The Christian doctrine of sin has no doubt been a powerful agent in restraining the exuberant physical energy of the European, particularly the Nordic, races. But on races like the Indian which by the long course of religious and social discipline have acquired non-aggressive qualities, it has a paralysing effect. The Indian to-day is more sinned against than sinning, the sinners being those who want to instil into him the belief that he is the worst sinner in the world and, therefore, requiring to be dominated by others who are no saints themselves. Hinduism, understood and expounded in its simple, dynamic aspect, is what the Hindu needs to lift him out of the mire of dependency into which he has fallen and into which he is sought to be sunk still further, by the well-meant ministrations of our Christian Missionary friends. This may seem to be introducing politics into religion but Hinduism recognises the relativity of things and adapts its message to the needs of the people as they vary from time to time.

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XLI. FRIENDS.

(By Dr. Clifford Manshardt, Ph.D.)

There is an old proverb which says, "Iron sharpeneth iron; so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend." And this proverb is true. Just as the file sharpens other pieces of metal, so a man is changed by the influence of his friends. Often the piece of iron to be sharpened is rusty. It has been beaten by the elements, but the file soon makes it bright. Often it is necessary that the file should cut very deep into the iron that the resulting edge may be firm and smooth. So it is with friends. The function of a friend is indeed that of sharpening the countenance of a friend. Hardship, sorrow and disappointment may have caused a friend's face to grow dim, but by the skilful application of friendship it may again grow bright. At times there may be rough edges or deep scars to which pressure must be applied, but in due time the imperfections are evened out. Happy is he whose life is being helped by the able counsel of a loving friend.

How delightful is the meeting of kindred spirits. What a joy it is to find one's own inner feelings mirrored in the life of another. What a pleasant discovery to lift the veil of an acquaintance and to recognize there one's own reflection. What refreshment comes from moments of converse with men of like hopes and aspirations. How sacred are the minutes grasped from an unsympathetic world and spent in the companionship of one who understands. Blessed is the man, yes thrice blessed, who sees his own heart in the heart of another.

Friendship is an interchange, not a drawing account. The man who makes friends for the purpose of exploiting them may be increasing his sales slips, but he is smirching the spirit of friendship. A young man should choose his friends not simply with the end in view of getting, but also with the end in view of contributing. If friendship means anything it means mutuality. As the sweetness of ointment and perfume, so is the fragrance of a perfect friendship.

While friendship is beautiful at all times, it is in the hour of trouble that its real beauty is actually revealed. A friend who sticks through misfortune, sorrow and disappointment is a friend who has proven himself to be worthy. He may not be a man of words, and yet the sufferer cannot but feel the stronger because of his presence. True friendship is a spiritual refreshment. No man can bare his inmost life to another and remain petty and small. As friend communes with friend power passes from one to the other. The commonplace fades away, and for the moment each is living in a new and richer environment. As water soothes the parched land, so doth a friend refresh the spirit.

INDIAN INFORMATION BUREAU

IN BERLIN.

HALF YEARLY REPORT.

WORK AHEAD.

The Director of the Indian Information Bureau in Berlin sends us the following half yearly report for publication:—The Indian Information Bureau in Berlin was opened formally on the 15th of February this year as a result of a decision of the Working Committee of the Indian National Congress, mainly for the purpose of giving Indian students wanting to go abroad for higher education, useful and reliable information about the opportunities for the same in Germany, and helping qualified students on arrival in a general way and to obtain admission into Universities and other educational institutions. Experience had shown that ignorance of the possibilities held out by Germany for Indian students to obtain valuable instruction in a number of useful lines, and the absence of an institution capable of attending in a business-like way to the requirements of the new comers till they got fixed up, acted as two of the principal obstacles in the way of Indian students coming to Germany. It was, therefore, felt, that if those obstacles and along with them also the mistaken conception about the language "difficulty" could be removed more students would be found to take advantage of the opportunities offered by Germany. Universities and other educational institutions in Britain are overcrowded. Political circumstances make the atmosphere in Britain increasingly unfavourable for Indian students with few exceptions. America is too expensive and Asiatics are not particularly welcome in the United States. Opportunities offered by France and other European countries are comparatively limited. These considerations were behind the decision of the Congress to open an information bureau in Berlin.

The Indian Information Bureau has been in existence now for six months. The work done by the Bureau within this short period taking into consideration the initial difficulties connected with the opening of an institution, the limited means at its disposal, and the opposition from also unexpected quarters which all organizations unfortunately have to share, fully justifies its founding by the Congress. In a short report it is possible neither to enumerate all the achievements of this Bureau nor to dwell on the significance and importance of the Bureau for advancing the interests of India. We must limit ourselves to a few facts.

Since March, through the Bureau, and as a result of its activities, 17 students have come to Germany for higher education or practical training. This number does not take into consideration students from other European countries particularly Great Britain who have come to Germany on short visits and have availed themselves of the services of the Bureau. Out of the 17 students, 12 have come directly from India and 5 from Britain. According to communications to hand, 11 students are still to come; 6 from India, 4 from England and 1 from France. During the period of its existence, the Bureau has proved of use and help in all to 93 Indians, mostly students. The Bureau has arranged suitable lodgings for 15; obtained admission into schools or universities for 5; secured entrance for 7 for the language course; arranged free German lessons on an exchange basis for 4 students; obtained concessions for 2; supplied commercial assistance to 7 and introduced 4 students to professors. It has helped 18 persons to visit factories of various kinds in different parts of Germany. It has helped educationalists from India to see the schools in which they were interested; medical men to see hospitals and attend operations, and doctors and engineers interested in public health to see various kinds of municipal works. The Bureau has arranged for practical training of 10 students; 2 in oil-refining, 4 for soap manufacture, 2 for photography and 2 for electro-technics. During August alone 9 students have approached the Bureau in connection with their practical training. Since the date of its opening the Bureau has received and answered 214 enquires from India covering every range of subjects. During the same period it has issued 4 Bulletins, the last one in printed form. The publication of a Bulletin in printed form is an expensive matter and the Bureau has no special fund for this purpose. The last publication, excluding the postage charge, has cost the Bureau nearly 600 Marks. A good part of this has been recovered by advertisements and a German professor interested in the work of the Bureau has donated a sum of 100 marks towards the expenses of the Bulletin. We hope that this kind act of the German professor will serve as an example to many Indians. As the Bureau is getting to be known it is being visited by a steadily increasing number for information and assistance, as well as to read papers and periodicals. In March we had 12 visitors, in April 27, in May 34; June 51; July 72 and August 183. The steady rise in the number of our visitors has shown us that it is both necessary and useful to maintain a reading room and library. The obstacle in the way of what is generally stated by all our friends and visitors as an "excellent idea" being translated into action is again lack of funds; we have, however, this month made a start in this direction, hoping that public opinion in India will not be wanting to support a useful venture.

There are several useful lines along which the work of the Bureau could be extended. One such,—the maintenance of a reading room and library—has already been mentioned. There is, besides, the important work of co-ordinating the work of Indian students abroad. The Bureau could do much in this direction. It is also necessary to raise and maintain a loan fund. All these could be undertaken only if the basis of the Bureau itself is first strengthened. Therefore, it is hoped that those who appreciate the work and value of the Bureau will, by timely support, both moral and material, see that the Bureau is put on sound and secure basis.

In concluding this short report, those responsible for the management of the Bureau feel it their duty to express their grateful thanks to the many individuals and institutions in this country, with whom they had to come in contact in the course of their work, and from whom they have received nothing but uniformly hearty sympathy and support. All correspondence should be addressed to the Indian Information Bureau, Berlin W 8, Mauerstr, 52.

RAM MOHAN ROY ANNIVERSARY BANGALORE.

A public meeting to celebrate the 96th death anniversary of Rajah Ram Mohan Roy was held on the 27th September 1929 at the Brahma Mandir, Cantonment Brahma Samaj, Bangalore with Rao Bahadur Kandaswami Chetti in the chair. Rao Bahadur O. Kandaswami Chetty quoting Sri Krishna's saying in the Bhagavat-Gita that whenever there was decay of uprightness and exaltation of unrighteousness, God sent forth into the world a messenger to carry out his purpose. Such a man was Ram Mohan Roy who stands as the fountain head of Modern India, a man like Abraham, the father of a new race and of a new type of civilization. Since the evils he was called on to correct were intellectual, moral, social, religious and political all blended together and interdependent, the reformation had similarly to be on all these lines. Ram Mohan realised the solidarity of Indian Reform, no department being separate from the others, and with no antagonism between one form of reform and any other. This is a fact which requires to be remembered today and the forgetfulness of which has led to a great deal of confusion, misunderstanding and weakness. Ram Mohan realised that the ground work of all reform in India was education on Western lines which alone could introduce the breadth of view and of sympathy so essential to progress, English being the language of unification and of touch with the outer world. This did not mean the neglect of Sanskrit and the vernaculars.

But education was only an instrument of reform in Ram Mohan's hands, reform—religious, social and political. In attacking idolatry, he attacked all forms of superstition, ceremonialism and priest craft and proclaimed monotheism as the essential creed of India, and preached God as the Common Father of all, who being a spirit should be worshipped in spirit and sincerity, with no mummery or memorising but straight from the heart. Ram Mohan Roy's campaign against Sati was inspired by his zeal for the emancipation of women from the selfishness of men in all its forms. He denounced notions of caste superiority based not on merit but on birth. In thus waging war against custom and tradition, he used all the three methods of appeal to the Sastras, to reason and to the legislative power of Government. It is well to remember this fact in connection with the Infant marriage legislation, that when appeal to reason and the Sastras has been carried on for long, it is necessary for rectifying that age-long wrongs legislation should step in with its stamp of authority.

Perhaps the most far reaching act of reform with its social, political and economic consequences was the example he set in undertaking the voyage to England,—the first Brahmin to cross the seas. His object in thus breaking the rules of caste was partly political and partly religious. In celebrating the memory of Raja Ram Mohan Roy, one is apt to forget what Surendranath Bannerjee once called pointed attention to, that he was the father of political agitation in India. Before him there was little public life or public spirit, he was the first to make the people conscious of their civil rights and privileges. He stood up for the freedom of the press, protected against a jury bill based on religion. The greatest achievement of Raja Ram Mohan Roy was the founding of the Brahmo Samaj. In attempting to reform Hinduism, he created a Universal Church in which Islam, Christianity and Zoroastrianism had equal claims with the religion of the Upanishads upon the belief and practice of Indians. If Ram Mohan Roy's activities are to be summed up in one word, it is unity, religious, social and political. He preached the one God, whose nature is righteousness, Love and Truth. If only the evolution of modern India had proceeded on the lines envisaged by Ram Mohan Roy, an enlightened India, united in God, and free both internally and externally, and if Indian Reform had been conceived and conducted as an organic whole with sympathy and perfect understanding between those engaged in its various departments, many of those difficulties which stand in the way of national progress—like Hindu Moslem differences and the Brahmin—non-Brahmin problem would not have made their appearance. And if only the Brahmo Samaj instead of being a merely religious community would again exert its full influence on the whole of national life, it would hasten the day when India will be as Ram Mohan Roy in a note prepared by him for his English friends said, she should be a Free India.

Mrs. Parvatibai Dewal, B. A., and others spoke highly of the moral courage and the self-sacrificing spirit of the Rajah and his untiring efforts for the successful abolition of Sati.

RANI OF MANDI ON SARDA ACT,

Interviewed by our representative, writes the Leader, the Rani Sahiba Lalit-Kumari of Mandi, who presided at the last All-India Women's Conference said: 'I am very glad that the Government have helped a great deal towards the passing of the Sarda Bill and on behalf of the suffering womanhood of India I offer my grateful thanks to them and supporters of the measure.

'Personally I would have been glad if the age for marriage had been fixed as 18 but we have to be satisfied with small beginnings. Mr. Sarda, by piloting the Bill successfully in the Assembly, and Sir Moropant Joshi, by preparing the ground by his work in the Age of Consent Committee, have done yeoman service in the cause of Indian reform and progress.

'The reform was long overdue, and I am sure even those who are opposed to it at present will live to bless it as a humanitarian step like the abolition of "Sati".'

The opposition engineered by the irreconcilable section is sure to die out. A great responsibility rests on the shoulders of the educated and enlightened section of Indians at this juncture. Instead of resting on their laurels they should see that the reform is carried to its logical conclusion by carrying on a ceaseless propaganda in the country for educating the masses.

'The passing of legislation alone will not solve the problem unless people are educated properly and Government are helped further in promoting social reform.

'In this the pioneer work has to be done by educated and enlightened ladies, who should work in an organised manner in rescuing their less fortunate sisters from age-long customs which have proved so baneful.

'Education is the only solvent to remedy this state of affairs.'

The Rani Sahiba was very enthusiastic and hoped that many more reforms would follow.

SIR SAMUEL WILSON'S SCHEME.

The report of Sir Samuel Wilson on the East African question is published with a preface by the Colonial Secretary that his Majesty's Government is not in any way committed to accepting it or to agreement with the views expressed therein. His Majesty's Government will submit their conclusions to Parliament before any final decision is reached.

SIR SAMUEL'S REVIEW.

Reviewing his impressions, Sir Samuel says that all communities, with the exception of some in Tanganyika, appeared to be frightened at any idea of closer political union, and that the Indians in Tanganyika were particularly opposed to any federation. No one during his tour took exception to his view that whatever the circumstances, the Secretary of State for Colonies must retain full control and full responsibility for the direction of policy in East Africa. No one objected to the recommendation of the Hilton Young Commission on the control of native policy, but none favoured making the Central authority directly responsible for the co-ordination of policy on native affairs, and matters concerning the relations between natives and immigrants.

OUTLINES OF THE SCHEME.

The scheme proposed by Sir Samuel Wilson involves the appointment of a High Commissioner, who, as the King's representative will rank senior to the Governors of the three territories, and will exercise complete control, legislative and administrative, over certain common services, namely, Customs, Railways, including Posts and Telegraphs Defence and Fundamental research. The High Commissioner, would in the exercise of his legislative powers, be assisted by a Central Council having an official majority, consisting of the High Commissioner as President, three officials at the central head-quarters and seven representatives from each of the three territories nominated by the Governors of the said territories. The powers of the Central Council are to be limited to transferred subjects, all other matters being left to the local Legislature.

SIR D. CAMERON'S SUGGESTIONS.

This scheme for economic union has been approved by the Governor of Uganda and the acting Governor of Tanganyika, but Sir Donald Cameron, Governor of Tangayika, has suggested the postponement of any scheme of closer union until an authoritative commission in London has inquired into the question of native policy. Sir Samuel Wilson comments on this that the people in East Africa are tired of Commissions and Committees and above all, want the early termination of the discussions that have been now in progress for over two years.

INDIANS IN EAST AFRICA.

Dealing with the position of Indians in East Africa, Sir Samuel says that, he has been informed that Indians do not seek a dominating position and that they would not exclude the possibility of their accepting nomination to the Legislative Council instead of election, provided firstly that his Majesty's Government gave an undertaking that the door was not closed to a common roll and (b) that the Kenya Government would miss no opportunity of using its offices to bring the European and Indian communities together. If these undertakings were given, the Indian community might accept nomination, and have the opportunity of proving its good faith and showing that they were genuinely ready to work for the good of the Colony while not aiming at political domination.

KENYA LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

As regards the reconstitution of the Kenya Legislative Council, Sir Samuel Wilson gives three alternative schemes, one of which proposes the following membership of the Council; Officials 12, elected Europeans 15; elected Arab 1, elected or nominated Indians 6 and nominated non-officials 8. These schemes, he says provide for the decrease, in an abnormally large number, of officials now on the Council, give a small increase to elected Europeans compared with their demands in the past, and so divide the Council as to make it impossible for elected Europeans, with the full Council voting, to carry any measure against the views of the Government, supported by Indians, unless they can get seven nominated unofficials or six nominated non-officials and the elected Arab to support them. The Governor, he says, is left complete discretion in selecting for nomination the best men, irrespective of race, to represent general including native interest.

SIR SAMUEL WILSON'S REPORT CONDEMNED.

Mr. J. B. Pandya, Mr. B. N. Anantani and Mr. Isherdas, members of the East African Deputation, have issued the following statement criticising Sir Samuel Wilson's report. They say :

We have no hesitation in describing this report as a reactionary and one-sided document and an abject surrender to the doctrine of vigorous action of White Settlers in Kenya. Sir Samuel Wilson has attempted to draw a picture with an eye to how it would be acceptable to Europeans without regard to how it would affect Indians and the natives.

The following facts stand out glaringly :

1. The extreme solicitude of Sir Samuel Wilson for the feelings and sentiments however unreasonable or extravagant of the European community in Kenya which he protects and upholds even at the cost of remarkably moderate and reasonable demands of Indians.

2. His hint to the Imperial Government of a possibility of a division among the Indian community based on his impression and private talks with individuals.

3. He was sent by the Conservative Government to soothe the feelings of the European community and make out a case for upsetting the majority report of the Hilton-Young Commission in essential details of federation and constitutional changes in Kenya. This he has done well by adopting the principles of Sir Edward Hilton Young's proposals in regard to constitutional changes in Kenya.

QUOTATIONS FROM THE REPORT.

The following quotations from the report prove our contention. Sir Samuel Wilson says "the Europeans would not accept less than 15 seats and the increase in European seats is a small one as compared with the demand made in the past." He further goes on to say "One or two of the Europeans, whom I interviewed in Kenya were at pains to impress on me that the opinions expressed by the European elected members did not necessarily represent the views of the European community in general. In framing my report I have been guided generally by the views expressed by the accredited representatives, whom I interviewed."

If this procedure was adopted in regard to the European community, why was another adopted in regard to Indians? Sir Samuel Wilson says in his report "judging from the discussions which I had with some of the leading Indians in Kenya I would not exclude the possibility of the Indian community being prepared to accept nominations to the Legislative Council instead of election, so that they could have an opportunity of proving their good faith and showing that they are genuinely ready to work for the good of the Colony, while not aiming at political domination."

In another place he says: "I suggested to the deputation of the East African Indian National Congress that since there appeared to be no likelihood at the present time of getting local agreement on the question of the communal roll it might be desirable to explore other avenues of approach which might eventually lead to such an agreement. My suggestion met with no response from the meeting."

When Sir Samuel was satisfied with representing, European view-point by repeating the parrot-cries of the European community why did he consider it necessary to weaken the Indian case by his imaginary talks with individuals?

To begin with, it is bad taste and a weakness to refer to private conversations in a public document of this kind. They cannot be advanced as a ground for serious discussion of a political scheme.

OPPOSITION TO A COMMON REGISTER.

We confidently assert that Sir Samuel Wilson has misrepresented the so-called private discussions. We say without the slightest hesitation that if the view point is accepted by the Imperial Government they will find themselves completely mistaken and their false hopes as to Indians accepting nominations are not likely to be realised. Of one thing above all we are absolutely confident and that is judging from past experience of Kenya Government's attitude of hostility to Indian interests that Government is not likely to use its so-called good offices to bring the Indian and European communities together. Knowing as we do the opposition of the European community to the common roll, unless the Imperial Government definitely declare for the common roll and introduce the same forthwith, we apprehend that the Kenya Government would hardly get an opportunity to use its good offices.

If the position indicated by Sir Samuel Wilson is really acceptable to any Indian of standing in Kenya why has no one from the Indian community come forward to say so? A clear indication of unity on this question has been given by the Indian community when in Mombasa, where the franchise question does not arise in the Municipal constitution, they refused to accept seats in the Municipal Council in order that they may not be misunderstood or misrepresented on the question of common roll. We, therefore, warn the Imperial Government not to be misguided by false hopes raised by the Wilson Report on this vital issue. We can boldly declare that there is no section of the Indian community in Kenya, who believe in moderate doctrines amounting to betraying the cause of the community and, all efforts in this direction have so far failed and are likely to do so in future.

DEMAND OF EQUAL SEATS IN THE EVENT OF FEDERATION.

We have opposed the principle of federation and in the event of its being inevitable, demanded an equal number of seats for Indians and un-official, Europeans. Sir Samuel Wilson makes the preposterous suggestion that such seats are to be filled on the recommendation of the unofficial members of the Legislative Council. This is likely to deprive the Indian community of any chance of representation on the Central Legislature which will have the control of important economic questions in which they have great vested interests. The majority of the unofficial members in the Legislative Council are Europeans and unless expressly provided as is the case in the Kenya constitution that so many of the members would be Indians, it is highly improbable for any Indian to get nominated to the Central Council. This would provide the Governor with an excuse to refuse to nominate an Indian unless recommended by unofficial members of the Council.

APPEAL TO LABOUR GOVERNMENT.

We are glad of the assurance of the Secretary of State for the Colonies that Sir Samuel Wilson's Report in no way conveys the views of his Majesty's Government. We fervently hope that the Labour Government would take a broadminded and statesmanlike view of the situation and stand by legitimate and absolutely just claims and bring about a lasting solution for the common benefit of all the races in East Africa.

We remind the Government of India that a no time in the history of Indian settlers in East Africa was the situation so serious, demanding a bold and strong stand for Indians' rights and we remind the Government that a little weakness, a little false step at this juncture would place Indians in a position of helplessness detrimental to their status as equal citizens. In our opinion, the time has also come when the Legislative Assembly should seriously consider sending out a deputation to London as they did in 1923 to support the just claims of the Indian settlers in East Africa.

A BRUTAL HUSBAND.

In a recent issue of Young India Mahatma Gandhi writes as follows:—

The following is a summary of a long letter of a brother describing the miseries of his married sister:

'Some time ago my sister was married to a man whose character was hidden from us. This man has been discovered to be a rake, and no amount of dissipation and debauchery can satiate him. He has no sense of honour. My unfortunate sister found soon after her marriage that her 'lord' was sinking down more and more deeply day by day. She remonstrated. The man could not brook this, and in order to 'teach her a lesson' indulged in his excesses in front of her. He would also whip her, make her stand, starve her etc. She was tied to a post to compel her to witness his debaucheries. My sister is heartbroken. Her lamentations make us feel wretched. We are helpless. What would you advise her and us to do? This is one of the most shameful aspects of Hinduism, where woman is left entirely at the mercy of man and has no rights and privileges. If a man chooses to be cruel and heartless, there is no remedy left to the unfortunate woman. The man may go on making random alliances, and not a little finger can be raised against him; but a woman once married is at the utter mercy of her lord. Thousands of such women are groaning and weeping. As long as Hinduism is not purged of these and such like evils, can there be any hope of progress?'

The writer is an educated man. His is a much more graphic description than the summary is of his sister's distress. The correspondent has sent me his full name and address. His condemnation of Hinduism, though pardonable under intense irritation, is based on a hysterical generalisation from an isolated instance. For millions of Hindu wives live in perfect peace and are queens in their homes. They exercise an authority over their husbands which any woman would envy. It is an authority which love gives. The case of cruelty brought to light by the correspondent is an illustration not of the evil in Hinduism, but of the evil in human nature which has been known to express itself under all climes and among people professing different faiths of the world. The facility for divorce has proved no protection against a brutal husband for a pliant wife incapable of asserting and at times even unwilling to assert herself. It is therefore in the interest of reform for reformers to avoid hysterics and exaggerations.

Nevertheless the occurrence to which this article draws attention is not an altogether uncommon occurrence in Hindu society. Hindu culture has erred on the side of excessive subordination of the wife to the husband, and has insisted on the complete merging of the wife in the husband. This has resulted in the husband sometimes usurping and exercising authority that reduces him to the level of the brute. The remedy for such excesses therefore lies not through the law but through the true education of women as distinguished from unmarried girls, and through cultivating public opinion against unmanly conduct on the part of husbands. In the case in point the remedy is incredibly simple. Instead of the brother and other relatives feeling helpless and weeping with the distressed girl, they should clothe her with protection, educate her to believe that it is no part of her duty to placate a sinful husband or to seek his company. It is quite evident that the husband himself does not care for the wife. She may therefore without breaking the legal tie live apart from husband's roof and feel as if she had never been married. Of course there are two legal remedies open even to a Hindu wife for whom a divorce is unobtainable, and that is to have the husband punished for common assault and to insist upon his supporting the wife. Experience tells me that this remedy is in most cases if not in all worse than useless, and it never brings any comfort to a virtuous woman and makes the question of husband's reform more difficult if not impossible which after all should be the aim of society, more so of every wife. In the present instance the girl's parents are well able to support her but where it is not possible, the number of institutions that would give shelter to such ill-treated women is growing in the country. There still remains the question of the satisfaction of the sexual appetite on the part of young women thus leaving the inhospitable roofs of their husbands or being actually deserted by them when the relief given by divorce is unobtainable. But this is really not a serious grievance in point of numbers, for in a society in which custom has discountenanced divorce for ages, a woman whose marriage proves unhappy does not want to be remarried. When public opinion in any social group requires that particular form of relief, I have no doubt that it will be forthcoming. So far as I understand the correspondent's letter, the grievance is not that the wife cannot satisfy her sexual appetite. The grievance is the gross and defiant immorality on the part of the husband. For this, as I have said, the remedy lies in a revision of the mental attitude. The feeling of helplessness is imaginary as most of our ills are. A fresh outlook, a little original thinking is enough to dispel the grief brought about by defective imagination. Nor should friends and relatives in such cases be satisfied with the mere negative result of isolating the victim from the zone of tyranny. She should be induced to qualify herself for public service. This kind of training would be more than enough compensation for the doubtful privilege of a husband's bed.

INDIA'S REVOLT AGAINST ALCOHOL.

J. F. EDWARDS, BOMBAY, writes to the Observer, London:—The Joint Free Conference of the Simon Commission and of the Indian Central Committee has entered, by its sittings in London, on the second stage of the momentous inquiry which directly or indirectly affects one-sixth of the human race. This is therefore a fitting moment to call attention to one of the most striking omissions in the evidence gathered by the Joint Free Conference in India itself. For over twenty years the present writer has lived in Bombay, where his work has brought him into intimate contact with educated Indians of all classes. This contact has convinced him that there is all over India a genuine revolt against alcohol; for indulgence in it is regarded as a sin by India's two chief religions, Hinduism and Islam, and its ruinous effects are seen in every industrial centre of India. Moreover, India considers the liquor trade to be a negation of that "penetrating Christian ethic" which, in the words of Sir Stanley Reed in Bombay's largest hall last year, is "powerfully influencing India."

That India's moral revolt against alcohol should have found no expression before the Indian Statutory Commission, except in a missionary memorandum, must be regarded as one of the most tragic results of India's boycott of the Commission; and that the boycott should have affected such a subject as Temperance on which all India's political parties are united, illustrates how the chasm is widening between India and Britain. On the other hand, temperance organisations in Britain have rightly felt any approach to the Commission should be initiated by India. Meanwhile a golden opportunity may be lost for many missionaries in India and practically the whole of India's intelligentsia believe the liquor traffic to be one of the greatest alienating factors between India and Britain, and no true friend of either India or Britain will minimise such a danger.

REVENUE FROM LIQUOR.

If history answers the charge of some Indian extremists that Britain introduced the liquor traffic to India, it also establishes Britain's responsibility for present arrangements whereby so large a proportion of the Indian revenue comes from the trade in alcohol and drugs. In the Provincial Governments this proportion is about 25 per cent., while for the Central and Provincial Governments combined the Taxation Inquiry Committee puts the figure at 18 per cent of India's total tax revenue, last year's total being about £15,000,000 as against £2,000,000 fifty years ago. India's statesmen, writers, and scientists openly denounce this liquor revenue as "tainted money drawn from the degradation of the people," every bit as tainted as was the revenue obtained from the opium exported to China and other countries by the limiting of which export to medicinal and scientific purposes £1,200,000 net revenue is being nobly sacrificed every year by the Government of India. How direct is the responsibility of the British Government in India for the liquor traffic is shown by the fact that the liquor is manufactured in Government distilleries and sold under a licensing system strictly supervised by Government officials. At the same time this method has the double advantage of preventing India's drink trade from becoming a private vested monopoly as in Britain, and leaving in Government's hands all the factors for solving India's drink problem.

Alcohol is so widely detested throughout India, probably by four-fifths of the population, that when, under the Montagu Chelmsford Reforms of 1919 Excise became a "transferred" subject—that is, transferred to departments under Indian Ministers—a new hope was born in India. This hope, unfortunately has proved illusory, partly because the financial arrangements under the Reforms made liquor revenue necessary to the financial equilibrium of the State, and partly because Indian Ministers in the Provincial Governments have been compelled to leave the control of foreign liquor to the Central Government, with the consequence that, while the consumption of country liquor has diminished in some Provinces, there has been a serious increase in India's consumption of foreign liquor, about 1,320,000 gallons of foreign spirits (half from the United Kingdom) being unloaded annually on India.

WIDESPREAD RESENTMENT.

These and many other facts have led to that deep anger and resentment among all political parties that found expression in the historic Legislative Assembly debate of September 2, 1925, when a solid Indian vote of sixty-nine demanded ultimate prohibition and local option, the European and official Indian opponents numbering thirty-nine. The draft Constitution for India, accepted by the All-Parties Convention last January has for one of its provisions the total prohibition of alcoholic liquor, save for medical or industrial purposes, and a resolution of the same purport was unanimously passed by the Fifteenth All-India Convention of Indian Christians on December 29, 1928. Thus at a time when India is distracted by division a singular unity among political parties and religions is seen on this question. It surely cannot be beyond the wisdom of British and Indian statesmen to devise a plan whereby India's united desire may be met, by eliminating the necessity for liquor revenue within, say, twenty years. The town of Taran-Taran, in the Amritsar district of the Punjab, shows what all India would do had it the power; for out of 2,000 voters 1,600 availed themselves of their privilege under the Punjab Local Option Act, and out of 1,600 not one person voted for the liquor shop.

It is, therefore, of the highest importance that the members of the new Imperial Parliament on whom will fall the responsibility of passing an Act embodying India's new Constitution, should see to it that such provisions are included as shall ensure the carrying out of India's desire on a moral question which is alienating from Britain the best thought of India.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

The Indian Problem:—Mr. Arnold J. Toynbee, Director of Studies, Institute of International Affairs, London, gave an interesting account of his impressions of a month's tour in India. He said: 'I have been passing through countries which are fragments of the great empires now broken up and divided for various reasons. Here in India, one finds the same situation as existed in the Ottoman Empire a century ago. The Ottoman Empire broke up with infinite loss and suffering because the various races and religions contained therein failed to learn how to live and work together. India is a big country which is still run on a big scale. It makes me wonder how it would be possible to bring together the different communities in this country. The vital question affecting India is the co-operation of these communities. I think it depends upon the younger generation to bring about the unity of India.'

Marriages in England.—A surprising feature of the Registrar-General's statistical review of 1928 is the large number of men who married women much older than themselves. A number of youths in their twenties married women twice their ages, and there were cases where the husbands were aged 30 or under and their brides aged 60 years or over and even instances of marriages between septuagenarian women and men of ages ranging from 35 to 50 years. At the other extreme, 67 girls married at the age of fifteen, 440 at the age of 16 and 2,493 at the age of 17. There were 303,000 marriages in England and Wales during 1928. A record number of decrees nisi were made absolute, namely, 4,018, an increase of 828 compared with 1927. Births numbered 660,000, compared with 654,000 in 1927.

NOTES.

Anglo-American Friendship:—The visit of the British Prime Minister to the President of the United States, Mr. Hoover, has been described as a great personal triumph for Mr. Ramsay Macdonald. The immediate object of the visit was to come to an agreement on the question of the limitation of naval armament, but it has been stated that the opportunity has been utilised to pave the way to a friendly understanding covering other outstanding questions in controversy between Great Britain and the States and also generally the relations between the two countries. A century ago, the States had revolted and thrown off the government of Britain. The two today are happy in cooperating as independent nations to secure peace between themselves and of the world. In international politics, when two nations show a special friendliness to each other, the others are prone to suspect that there may lurk behind a plot against themselves. And there generally is. Such apprehensions have been sought to be removed by statements to the effect that Anglo-American friendship is not to be construed as implying any lack of it towards other powers. Such statements, according to diplomatic etiquette, are always publicly accepted at their face value, but privately each nation puts its own construction upon them and steers its course in that direction. A Conference of the principal naval Powers, Britain, the United States, Japan, France and Italy, is to be held next January in London. Outside the naval question, the Anglo-American rapprochement cannot but have reactions which concern the non-European races. Great Britain, her Dominions and the United States are the great strongholds of colour prejudice and a combination of these cannot but be viewed with distrust by coloured races all over the world.

The Afghan Scene:—General Nadir Khan has at last succeeded in entering Kabul after breaking down the opposition of Amir Habibullah's partisans. Pressure is being brought to bear upon the General from Afghans, Musalmans and others outside, to invite the ex-king Amanullah to resume his kingship. The General is too shrewd a man to act on an impulse. Amanullah Khan when he was ruler, had not treated the General very considerably. Apart from personal feelings, General Nadir Khan will no doubt realise that the return of Amanullah will once more rally the conservative and orthodox sections against him. The civil war in Afghanistan served the purpose of a General Election in England. Amanullah voluntarily retired from the contest and Baccha-i-Saqao has failed to maintain a majority in the country. Nadir Khan's success means that the people of Afghanistan are in favour of a middle course between the breakneck reforms of Amanullah and the stubborn conservatism of Baccha-i-Saqao. Amanullah Khan can come back only as the nominee of Nadir Khan and must undertake to act according to the policy laid down by the General. It is doubtful if a high-spirited man like him would like the role of a puppet King which he must be, at any rate for some time, before he is able to consolidate his strength. Since the above was in type, authentic information has been received to the effect that the National Assembly has elected Nadir Khan, despite his repeated refusals, to the Kingship. This is in the fitness of things and we have every hope that under him Afghanistan will make steady progress. The new King has given evidence of the possession of a quality, rather rare among Mahomedan conquerors, of moderation in the hour of victory, which bodes well for the future of the country.

Prohibition in Indian States:—Some Indian States like Bhavnagar and Limbdi have introduced Prohibition and it has been working successfully in them. Both foreign and country liquor is banned except under license for medical purposes. The Begum of Bhopal adopted it for her State, but soon after the present Nawab succeeded her, he rather hastily gave it up on the ground that the loss of revenue was not sufficiently compensated by the growth of abstinence among the people. His Highness was then new to the administration. He is from all accounts a genuine nationalist and we trust that he will soon re-introduce Prohibition with the determination to have it succeed. The question was raised in the Mysore Representative Assembly this week, and the Dewan, Mr. Mirza Ismail who, if he were in British India, would be a Congress leader with Dr. Ansari, undertook to sacrifice up to a crore of rupees in revenue, if he could be sure that the drink evil can be put down in Mysore by that means. He cited the example of Bhopal as showing that Prohibition may not succeed in Mysore. Government, however, agreed to appoint a committee to go into the question. As remarked above, Bhopal's experience, should not be taken as conclusive in the face of the fact that Bhavnagar has been successfully working Prohibition during the past several years. We earnestly trust that Mr. Mirza Ismail's regime will leave Prohibition as its precious legacy to subsequent administrations. Another State which may set the example to British India in this respect, is Hyderabad. Under the skilful and sagacious stewardship of Sir Akbar Hydari, the finances of the State are in a most flourishing condition, the single fly in the ointment being the enormous revenue derived from Excise. His Exalted Highness's Government can better afford to sacrifice the revenue from liquor than any other Government in the country, and we trust that Sir Akbar will initiate an early reform in this direction.

Depressed Classes and Temple Entry:—The claim of the "untouchables" to enter Hindu temples, is being brought to a head at the Parvati temple in Poona. The temple dominates the landscape and is intimately associated with the social and political as well as the religious life of the capital of the Peshwas. On Dassara day a party of "untouchables" went up Parvati Hill with the object of forcing, if need be, an entry. The temple doors were closed—an unprecedented thing—and crowds of caste Hindus swarmed up the hill to prevent the pollution of their shrine by the untouchable invaders. Considering that the latter only ask to be allowed to worship Parvati and have no iconoclastic intentions, the opposition of the caste Hindus, particularly of the Brahmins who no doubt predominate, can only be described as ridiculous and suicidal. Armed police are keeping the peace between the belligerents. We trust wiser counsels will prevail and that the example set by Sheth Jamnalal Bajaj and others in admitting freely all Hindus to their temples, will have due weight with those who are trying to keep out their co-religionists of the depressed classes.

Mr. Bajaj's Exhortation:—Mr. Jamnalal Bajaj has issued a statement or rather an appeal on the Parvati Temple incident, which for its wisdom and moderation merits the attention of both sides to the controversy. The Satyagrahis may be persuaded by his words to give up their attempt, but, we doubt, if the Hindu obstructives will be equally amenable. The community which has produced Ranade, Gokhale, Devadhar, Paranjpye and others of the Liberal school, has an immense capacity for progressive idealism. But this section has been overshadowed in the past by another school which in the pursuit of a narrow political objective has persistently thrown itself athwart the path of social and religious freedom. It was this school which bitterly obstructed social reform in the nineties; it was this school which by refusing recognition to the legitimate desire of the Kolhapur royal family, sowed the seeds of the non-Brahmin movement in Maharashtra; it is this school which in the Legislative Assembly last month played a dual part in relation to the Sarda Marriage Act; it is this school which is responsible directly and indirectly for the enactment of the most unedifying scene round the Parvati temple. We do not expect this school to pay heed to Mr. Bajaj's appeal. But great social forces are at work, and those who set themselves against them will soon be swept away as by an avalanche.

Mr. Wedgwood Benn's Retreat:—It was given out some time back with all the appearance of authority that Mr. Wedgwood Benn, the Secretary of State would visit India to settle the question of further constitutional reform. This is so obviously the most sensible course that people in India were pleased that it had occurred to the British Minister to follow it. The rumour was allowed to gain currency for several weeks, and then the newspapers which represent vested interests took alarm. They said that it would be an affront to the Simon Commission—and if the Commission was a greater concern than the country—and that the Secretary of State should not try to know at firsthand the conditions in this country and the sentiments of the people. Mr. Benn has been frightened out of the sensible course he had apparently entertained and it is now announced that he will not come out to this country. Several other British Ministers have travelled to distant countries to settle matters on the spot—the Prime Minister to America, the unemployment Minister to Canada. But only in the case of India is the bad old tradition of seeing things through bureaucratic spectacles, to continue. It will be found soon, however, that the key to the Indian problem is no longer in England but in India. The country will not accept a British-made constitution unless it is made on a plan previously approved in this country.

Hinduism and Toleration:—The Catholic Leader of Madras of the 10th instant devotes a leading article to prove to its own satisfaction that the "toleration" of Hinduism is "the result of lack of religious belief and of an attitude of indifference towards truth and error." We do not wish to say a word with reference to the claims put forward on behalf of Catholicism which no doubt, embodies an important phase of religious truth. But in answer to the Leader's belittling of Hindu toleration, we may ask where in all the world has there been a land in which ancient communities like Jews, Syrian Christians and Parsees, have been given asylum and protection to follow their ancestral faiths without any attempt on the part of the majority religion to impose itself upon them? The spirit of Inquisition has ever been repugnant to the spirit of Hinduism.

Sarda Act:—We print elsewhere in this issue the full text of the Sarda Marriage Act which was assented to by the Viceroy and will come into operation from 1st April 1930.

were subject when it says "It is true that it has been possible for the Ministers of Education to introduce radical reforms into the existing systems of education, but there is no denying the fact that considerable constructive work has been done and improvements effected." Having regard to the above, criticisms of Government of the administration of education as a transferred subject which find place in the report are hardly justifiable and the changes that have taken place, from the public point of view, are to be welcomed and not regretted.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.
BOMBAY, OCTOBER 19, 1929.

EDUCATION IN INDIA.

The ninth quinquennial Report, surveying the progress of education in India for the five years ending March 1927 was published recently. The striking feature of the report is the remarkable progress of education in all its stages in all parts of the country. During this period, the number of recognised educational institutions showed an increase of double that of the previous quinquennium and the number of scholars rose to eleven millions. It is in the field of primary education that considerable expansion is noted. In the period under report there was an addition of 30 lakhs of literates in the primary stage. This is no doubt a great achievement, but considering the widespread illiteracy in the country it can only be said that only a breach has been effected. Various causes contribute to the enormous prevalence of illiteracy which obstructs the path of education. One of them is the backwardness of the agricultural and backward class of people who do not realise the benefits of education for their children. To secure the lasting benefits of education, it has been found that adult education is an important factor. This has not received the attention of the Government to the extent it deserves. Almost all the efforts put forward in this direction are by private enterprise. Village education and amelioration which have been attempted by individuals and organisations with excellent results, should be introduced widely. A net work of these organisations will go a great way to banish the defects of the present system. With the advance of primary education a corresponding expansion is noted in the secondary and college education. The Director of Public Instruction of Bombay is of opinion that the increase in numbers of those taking secondary education has lowered the standard of efficiency because of the "fact that lower and lower strata are being tapped." The analogy of lower strata and inferior output may be applicable to industries like mining and tapping, but appears singularly inapt in dealing with mental faculties.

The report states that the present prospect of women's education in British India is bright. This is no doubt due to the recent awakening among women to the blessings of education and to the organised propaganda carried on by women themselves all over India. Women's conferences on educational reform have been to a great extent instrumental in bringing about this happy result. The rate of progress of women's education has not been satisfactory in the higher stages and even in the primary stage it has not kept pace with the corresponding rate of boys' education. It has been found that prejudice against co-education to a large extent exists and where there are separate institutions for women the educational advance has been quicker. The report favours spending largely upon higher educational facilities for women so as to secure a supply of trained teachers. The recent enactment raising the marriage age for girls to fourteen should favourably react on their education as it will give them more years for schooling.

When the demand for trained teachers is so great it is disappointing to note that the number of training schools has decreased from 926 to 529 and their strength from 22,774 to 21,610. It is argued that the decrease is due to reorganisation and amalgamation and does not mean any serious reduction in the number of trained teachers. Be that as it may, the increase in the number of pupils without a corresponding increase in the number of trained teachers means inordinate strain on the existing machinery of education. Such a state of affairs spells disaster to the future and efficiency of education in the country. It is disconcerting to find that professional and industrial education and training has not received the attention that it should, specially having regard to growing unemployment among the educated in the country.

Coming to the education of special classes and communities the progress of Mahomedan education has been phenomenal in that the total number of Mahomedan scholars increased by over 850,000. "In spite of all that has been written," says the report, "therefore, about the backwardness of the community the percentage of Mahomedan scholars under instruction to the total Mahomedan population is 0.1 higher than the percentage of all scholars to the total population, and the rate of increase in the number of scholars during the quinquennium has been greater in the case of Mahomedans than in the case of all communities taken together." The education of the depressed classes also advanced appreciably and the adoption of special measures such as the opening of special schools, the remission of fees and grant of scholarships helped to send up the percentage of pupils under instruction to 2.8 to the total population of that community.

The present quinquennial report may be roughly taken to be the history of education in India since the advent of the reforms when education was made a provincial, and in the main a transferred, subject in charge of a Minister. It is the virtual transfer of education to popular control as the Minister is elected and is responsible to the local legislature. The expansion of education during the quinquennium should be deemed eminently satisfactory. The report recognises the limitations to which the authorities

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XLII. CREATORS OF PUBLIC OPINION.

The great need of a people who aspire to self-government is education. If the people are to rule it is essential that they know how to rule. If the nation is to take its proper place in the family of nations it is important that the people understand these other nations. If the nation wishes to become great there must be widespread knowledge of what constitutes greatness. To no man is it given to understand all things. Every man is partially dependent upon the opinions of others. We are a part of all that we meet.

The three most potent factors in the making of public opinion are probably the press, the stage - including the cinema, and the platform. The most powerful representative of the press is the daily newspaper. In every city of size there are not only morning and evening papers, but also several editions of each. The paid circulation of these papers runs high into the thousands and other thousands hear the news from the lips of those who have read. The message of the stage, though at first confined to the larger cities, is now being heard throughout the land. The smaller cities and larger towns are having their regular cinema programs, and even remote villages are staging dramatic performances showing the evils of drink, or the benefits of public health and co-operation. The worth of the platform utterance is dependent upon the worth of the speaker. The speaker may be a man of words or he may be a man of real ideas. Unfortunately the men of ideas are all too rare. The most of our lecturers generate far more heat than light. Each of these agencies of public opinion is falling short of its educational opportunity, but upon each agency there rests a high responsibility. The publicist who takes his task seriously must in all humility join his prayer with the prayer of the Hebrew psalmist: "Let the words of my mouth, and the meditations of my heart, be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, my strength, and my redeemer."

The aim of the propagandist is to assist people in making up their minds. He does not want them halting between two opinions. If a great national movement such as a war is to be carried through successfully, there must be singlemindedness on the part of the people. For this reason every war machine has at its disposal competent propagandists to draw the people into line. Truth matters little, unity is the thing. If proper materials are not at hand they must be created. Organs of public opinion must be subsidized that they may blazon forth broadsides of lies and of hatred. The whole thing is wrong, but it is a part of the war method, and will continue and be elaborated until the people put an end to war. May that day be right soon?

Though the technique of propaganda is elaborated during war-time, the propagandist and his art are ever with us. It may be the religious leader trying to extend the influence of his religion. It may be the politician, the social reformer, or anyone interested in human progress. Propaganda in itself is not bad. It is perfectly legitimate when it is established upon the foundation of truth. But a propaganda that is based upon falsehood is worthy only of condemnation. As one reads the religious literature of a previous day one is constantly impressed by the close relationship that seemed to exist between the gods and men. The gods spoke to men, and they in turn conveyed the sacred message to the people. What would happen in the modern world if writers, speakers, and public leaders could feel themselves to be God's spokesmen? Certain it is that our common life would experience a change, and equally certain it is that the change would be for the better.

THE VISAGRAPH FOR THE VISIONLESS.

(BY MR. H. D. CHHATRAPATI, B.A.)

In this ever advancing age what surprises are daily in store for us! Among the many promises that science holds out to the world, there is none so astounding as the Visagraph. The thought that the visionless can vision through the Visagraph as we the normal people do through sight, must prove thrilling in the extreme. This consists in reading ordinary print. As such for persons blinded late in life, and for those who are familiar with ink-prints, the Visagraph strangely gives a sudden start over others not so blessed. There is no reason, however, for much regret. For those blind from birth may as well master the instrument as those blinded later in life. Robert E. Naumburg, the American inventor, who has given all this information in the "Outlook for the Blind" has actually demonstrated it before several blind people.

D. Loren Davis who furnishes further information in this connection in "The Teacher for the Blind" had the rare pleasure of witnessing the demonstration when the Visagraph was exhibited at a recent meeting of the Printing Industries Division of the American Society of Mechanical Engineers and naturally congratulates the inventor.

It is an electrical device. It consists of a metal block with five plungers all vertically placed. It uses light-sensitive cells. The sightless reader takes a page or book he wants to read and puts it in the instrument. He adjusts the guide or the reading element. He puts the index finger on the metal block. Now the guide runs over each letter, each word, each line. Here the plungers rise differently for different letters. They touch the index finger. Each letter thus produces a new sensation all its own. Each combination of plungers thus represents a single letter different from another which the next may present. Thus though slowly at the start, but more steadily and speedily as experience helps, the reader runs on with the guide till line after line is cleared and he comes to the end of the page. He now turns the page, begins again, and helped by a small lever which aids him in putting every next line into position reads on.

To have a clearer idea of the instrument and its working, it may be noted that while the Visagraph gives no physical eyes, it uses the eyes grafted by nature on the finger tips of the blind as of the sighted, and enables the blind to read with finger-touch all ordinary ink-print as they would have done with eyes. Visagraph thus comes like a great reformer.

Heartily approving the light-giving touch-arrangement of Braille, yet utterly dissatisfied with its rigid caste system that confines the blind to the point or Moon print only, saying "So far and no further shalt thou go" the Visagraph, like a great leveller, with faith in universal brotherhood, breaks their bondage of Braille and Moon print. The Visagraph thus presenting its own peculiar mechanism, like a bridge once more links up the blind with the sighted. Or rather it unlocks the bolts of their cloisters of Braille and Moon literature permitting them once and for ever to freely roam among and shake hands with men of letters of all climes and countries, of all colours and kinds.

May the Lord in His mercy help Mr. Naumburg in perfecting his machine and simplifying it so that not only may it obviate all the difficulties of reading types of varying sizes and shapes even on a single page but He may equally help him so to cheapen it that the blind of all conditions of life may easily take advantage of his extraordinary invention.

UNTOUCHABLES AND PARVATI TEMPLE.

The Temple-entry Satyagraha Committee, writes a correspondent of the Indian Daily Mail, had given a notice to the Trustees of the Parvati Devastan, some time last week. The Satyagraha Committee had asked the trustees of the Devastan to state if they had any objections to the entry into the Parvati temple by the untouchables, in as much as the temple was believed to be a 'sarvajanic' institution. The Satyagraha Committee had been in the meanwhile organising a satyagraha for effecting the entry of the untouchables in the Parvati temple, by holding meetings in the different parts of the city. The movement was being led by Messrs. Rajbhoj, Kamble, Sakat, the leaders of the untouchables having the support of Messrs. N. V. Gadgil, V. Bhuskute and others. It is stated that the Poona Youth League is to help the Satyagraha when launched upon by the Committee. It was stated also that the Poona public in general fully sympathised with this temple-entry satyagraha. But the fact seems to be otherwise. The principles of the removal of the untouchability are gaining ground in Poona, but the opinion of the public in general does not seem to be favouring the methods of satyagraha.

The 'Panchas' of the Parvati Devastan have now come forward to explain their position. They have published a statement pointing out that the Parvati Temple and the other temples surrounding it are the private property under the ownership of the Parvati Sanstas Committee, to whom, as trustees, the management had been transferred. That they, as trustees, were in no way authorised to do anything which was incompatible with the wishes of the founder. The temples were built about 180 years ago, by Shrimant Nanasahab Peshwa, who had maintained them out of his 'Khajgi' (personal) income. The Government took charge of the temples about 110 years ago, and made such arrangements for maintaining them, as were quite in keeping with the traditions and customs. Amongst the present Panchas of the Parvati Devastan are Sardars G. N. Mujumdar, M.L.C., Raste, and Messrs. Onkar and Patwardhan.

Messrs. L. B. Bhopatkar and Mate, the President and Secretary of the Removal of Untouchability Association respectively, have also published a statement on their behalf. They say that they had addressed open letters to the trustees of the temples, requesting them that they should keep the temples open to the untouchables. But they want to make quite clear, (in view of the misunderstanding prevailing in Poona and outside that they have been backing up the temple-entry satyagraha in Poona) that they are in no way connected with the satyagraha movement. They express it as their opinion that the measure of satyagraha could not be adopted fruitfully in all matters and at all places alike. In solving the difficult problem of the removal of untouchability their conviction was that they could depend more on effecting a favourable public opinion than on adopting the methods of satyagraha, and satyagraha would only render the question more difficult to be tackled.

ENCOUNTER WITH THE CASTE PEOPLE.

As was anticipated before, crowds of people had gathered on the Parvati Hill this morning (15th instant) to see what comes out of the Temple-entry Satyagraha, which was to be launched there by the untouchables, with the support of some untouchables who sympathised with their cause. The proposed Satyagraha had created a stir in the city, and in view of the sharp differences arising on it not only among the touchables, but amongst the untouchables as well, it was apprehended that some trouble might arise. Mr. Gould, the District Magistrate, Mr. Isakel the Personal Assistant to the Collector of Poona, the District Superintendent of Police, the Police Inspector, and the City Sub-Inspectors of Police were present on the scene. There was also a posse of armed police ready for a' emergency.

THE TEMPLE.

The Parvati Hill, which presented unseemly scenes of rowdyism this morning is situated at a distance of about one mile to the south of Poona

City. About 280 feet high from foot to top, this Hill is to be climbed up by very broad and well-levelled pavements and convenient steps. The Hill is named after the Goddess "Parvati-Bhawani" whose temple was built by Balaji Bajirao alias Nanasaheb Peshwa. There are five temples in all on this Hill, the chief among them being that of "Devadevashvar." The untouchable Satyagrahis wanted to effect an entry into this temple, this morning.

At about 9 a. m. about 150 untouchables were assembled at the foot of the Hill. They performed "Bhajan" for a few minutes and their meeting was then addressed by Mr. Kamble who insisted on absolute non-violence. Mr. N. V. Gadgil summarised the whole situation, explaining to them the difficult task they had then undertaken.

DOORS LOCKED.

A batch of about 12 untouchables including 4 women surrounded by a few members of the Youth League—Messrs. Gadgil, Bhuskute, Banade, Shinde, and others—then proceeded to climb up the Hill. But they were soon besieged on all sides by a number of rowdies who jeered, hooted and hissed at them. The Satyagrahis did not think it safe to take women along with them and so they were sent back to the foot of the Hill. Facing the odds that stood against them the brave batch of the Satyagrahis marched further while they were being pushed and pommelled by their opponents on all hands. Mr. Gadgil was assaulted, and handled roughly by many of them. The Police had at first assumed quite a non-interfering attitude and Mr. Isakel was actually persuading the turbulent mob to leave alone the Satyagrahis. But when the District Magistrate and the Police officers perceived from the windows of the Nagarkhana, that the Satyagrahis were not only obstructed but were being roughly handled by the crowds they all went down to the place where Mr. Gadgil and the untouchables were prevented from going further. The crowds were dispersed and the untouchable Satyagrahis were taken up to the doors of the chief temple which were closed since yesterday. The Satyagrahis did not linger there any longer but went back immediately. On their return journey to the foot of the Hill they were again hooted at and abused by some people.

TREATMENT UNJUSTIFIABLE.

The Trustees of the Parvati Temples had already locked the doors and it was pretty certain that the unarmed Satyagrahis were not going to use any force or violence to break them open. It was quite a fact that a very large majority of the Poona people did not favour the idea of Satyagraha being used for effecting entry into the temples. But then the treatment which was meted out to a small batch of the touchables and untouchables this morning by overwhelming crowds was to say the least, quite unjustifiable.

FURTHER DETAILS.

It was fortunate that nothing serious happened as police authorities had taken all necessary precautions. Even a small party of armed police was kept in readiness but the occasion to utilise its services did not arise at all. Mr. Gould the District Magistrate, Mr. Isakel the Personal Assistant and Mr. Mills the Police Inspector, tactfully dealt with the situation. What happened in fact was not a free fight. A band of about a dozen unarmed touchable and untouchables calling themselves satyagrahis were climbing the steps of the Parvati Hill with the honest move of effecting their entry into the temples above. On their way from foot to the top of the hill the satyagrahis and their supporters had very unpleasant and provocative experience from the crowds but from start to finish they had remained quite non-violent.

It was however to say the least a miserable sight to see that a few unarmed people being assaulted by an unsympathetic mob and the police had ultimately to intervene to protect them.

Enquiries made show that Mr. Gadgil has received one or two scratches on his anklets and that one Mr. Rajbhoj the leader of Satyagrahi untouchables has received some slight injuries.

SATYAGRAHA MEETING.

Caste Hindus as well as "untouchables" addressed a well-attended meeting held on the 13th instant near Reay Market, Mr. Vithal Ramji Shinde presiding, to record strong protest against the conduct of some of the caste Hindus towards the "untouchable" Satyagrahis on Sunday. Kalvankar Sastri, an orthodox Hindu spoke justifying the attack on "untouchables" and declared even if orthodox Hindus had used swords and spears for the vindication of the purity of the temple, he would congratulate them. A Mahar leader who spoke next asserted "untouchables" were Hindus and loved to remain so. They would court death if necessary to uphold their right of worship of God, but would on no account entertain the idea of going over to another religion.

JAMNALAL BAJAJ AND POONA SATYAGRAHA.

CONDEMNED ATTITUDE OF ORTHODOXY.

Seth Jamnalal Bajaj, Secretary, Anti-Untouchability Sub-Committee, Indian National Congress, who arrived at Poona on the morning of the 15th instant, from his tour in Rajputana has sent the following statement to the Press on the Poona Parvati Temple Satyagraha situation:—

I have read with deepest pain and humiliation the news of the Parvati Temple Satyagraha at Poona. When I first received the news of the Poona "untouchable" friends' resolve to start Satyagraha I felt the step was not warranted to meet the situation. I still hold that the existing conditions not only in Poona but all over the country, do not warrant starting of Satyagraha by "untouchables" for asserting their right of temple worship. Satyagraha should be resorted to as a last measure for the redress of any grievance, whereas the question of entering into temples is a delicate one and needs special handling. There is a constant danger of creating internal jealousies among the various Hindu communities and also jeopardising Hindu unity.

WHO SHOULD REVOLT?

If after all such an extreme step as Satyagraha was justified anywhere and has to be taken I feel the class Hindus themselves should fight with their so-called high class brothers and without the help of "untouchables" rather than that the "untouchables" should take upon themselves to do so. Such are the proprieties of this delicate problem. We cannot afford to land the Hindu community into internecine warfare at this stage of our nation's affair even on the most burning of the domestic problems.

CHANGE FOR BETTER.

Without fear of being contradicted I say that the Hindu's angle of vision in respect of the problem of untouchability and the "untouchables" has been positively changed and an atmosphere is being created all over the country day to day which is bringing the community nearer the solution almost hourly. Already a dozen temples have been thrown open in this part of the country to "all Hindus" without much ado. The doors of many more are being knocked at effectively and without resort to extreme measures. The Ganapati, the Navaratri and the Dusserah festivals all over the country this year have been absolutely unprecedented in the initiative and the warmth with which the class Hindus welcomed and fraternised with their "untouchable" brethren.

A WORD TO "UNTOUCHABLES".

I deeply appreciate the impatience of the "untouchables" at Poona. I have no heart to quarrel with them for seeking to assert themselves without a due regard to the exigency of taking a wider view. I certainly congratulate them on having stood the ordeal at Parvati Hill without in the least losing their temper and for the injuries they have sustained from the hostile crowd; but I commend for their serious consideration the question if it is wise unnecessarily to mar a countrywide atmosphere of good-will by launching an aggressive campaign when there are fairly bright prospects of achieving the end by lesser means.

SHAME AND HUMILIATION.

Having said so much for the Satyagrahis, I am constrained to say a few words about those who have arrayed themselves against the "untouchable" Satyagrahis and their few brave "touchable" friends. I feel thoroughly ashamed and humiliated over the exhibition of temper and worse made by the crowd evidently of high class Poona Hindus at Parvati Hill against the Satyagrahis who had pledged themselves to strictest non-violence. Did those who form the hostile crowd know that they were damning their own case immeasurably by resorting to violence and abuse and making themselves contemptible in the eyes of non-Hindus and foreign spectators who assembled to witness the fun—or should I say—our shame? Poona has the reputation of being the seat of Maharashtra culture and the fountain head of all its inspiration. Are these to be the fruits of intellect and culture?

I cannot close this statement without referring to the Trustees of Parvati Temple. Their manifesto in reply to the letter of the Satyagrahis smacks, I am sorry to say of bad taste and has been couched in unnecessarily offensive language. It contains no reply to the most essential point in the Satyagrahis' letter, viz., that since they were classed as Hindus in the census report and were not considered as outside the fold of Hindu society even by Hindus, the trustees could not consistently ban them from visiting the temple. The plea of tradition does not hold good for the Satyagrahis can point out any number of occasions in which the tradition has not been respected or has been violated with impunity often for the sake of petty private favours. And this is no special instance of the kind.

APPEAL TO THE TRUSTEES.

I appeal to the trustees to read the signs of the times and respond gracefully. Orthodoxy, if she wants to hold her place in the community, dare not continue much longer to glorify the element of blind refusal. The revolution is already on that is to bring about a recasting and a restatement of essential as distinguished from non-essential aspects of Hinduism. "He whose idea has ceased to advance is already in retreat" and orthodoxy must welcome the new fusion in her fold as an advance in power rather than meeting them with terror as a defilement. I hope the Trustees of Parvati Temple will reconsider their position with a cool mind and with a vision for the future and interpret the terms of their trust with dignity and with courage and confer with the Hindu leaders of Poona and with the Satyagrahis to bring this most unseemly, chapter to a happy close.

CHILD MARRIAGE RESTRAINT ACT.

The following is the full text of the Child Marriage Restraint Act, recently passed by the Central Legislature and assented to by the Governor-General. The Act comes into force on April 1930 :—

ACT NO. XIX OF 1929.

AN ACT TO RESTRAIN THE SOLEMNISATION OF CHILD MARRIAGES.

Whereas it is expedient to restrain the solemnisation of child marriages. It is hereby enacted as follows :—

1. (1) This Act may be called the Child Marriage Restraint Act, 1929.
- (2) It extends to the whole of British India, including British Baluchistan and the Sonthal Parganas.
- (3) It shall come into force on the 1st day of April, 1930.

2. In this Act, unless there is anything repugnant in the subject or context, (a) "child" means a person who, if a male, is under eighteen years of age, and if a female, is under fourteen years of age; (b) "child marriage" means a marriage to which either of the contracting parties is a child; (c) "contracting party" to a marriage means either of the parties whose marriage is thereby solemnised; and (d) "minor" means a person of either sex who is under eighteen years of age.

PENALTY.

3. Whoever, being a male above eighteen years of age and below twenty-one, contracts a child marriage shall be punishable with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees.

4. Whoever, being a male above twenty-one years of age, contracts a child marriage shall be punishable with simple imprisonment which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both.

5. Whoever performs, conducts or directs any child marriage shall be punishable with simple imprisonment which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both, unless he proves that he had reason to believe that the marriage was not a child marriage.

6. (1) Where a minor contracts a child marriage, any person having charge of the minor, whether as parent or guardian or in any other capacity, lawful, or unlawful, who does any act to promote the marriage or permits it to be solemnised, or negligently fails to prevent it from being solemnised, shall be punishable with simple imprisonment which may extend to one month, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both: Provided that no woman shall be punishable with imprisonment. (2) For the purposes of this section, it shall be presumed, unless and until the contrary is proved, that, where a minor has contracted a child marriage, the person having charge of such minor has negligently failed to prevent the marriage from being solemnised.

7. Notwithstanding anything contained in section 25 of the General Clauses Act, 1897, or section 64 of the Indian Penal Code, a Court sentencing an offender under section 3 shall not be competent to direct that, in default of payment of the fine imposed, he shall undergo any term of imprisonment.

TIME LIMIT.

8. Notwithstanding anything contained in section 190 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, no Court other than that of a Presidency Magistrate or a District Magistrate shall take cognisance of, or try, any offence under this Act.

9. No Court shall take cognisance of any offence under this Act save upon complaint made within one year of the solemnisation of the marriage in respect of which the offence is alleged to have been committed.

10. The Court taking cognisance of an offence under this Act shall, unless it dismisses the complaint under section 203 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, either itself make an inquiry under section 202 of that Code, or direct a Magistrate of the first class subordinate to it to make such inquiry.

11. (1) At any time after examining the complainant and before issuing process for compelling the attendance of the accused, the Court shall, except for reasons to be recorded in writing, require the complainant to execute a bond, with or without sureties, for a sum not exceeding one hundred rupees, as security for the payment of any compensation which the complainant may be directed to pay under section 250 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898; and if such security is not furnished within such reasonable time as the Court may fix, the complaint shall be dismissed. (2) A bond taken under this section shall be deemed to be a bond taken under the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, and Chapter XLII of that Code shall apply accordingly.

DR. KARVE'S VISIT TO GERMANY.

In the month of August, Professor D. K. Karve, the well-known Indian educationalist on his world tour for the sake of the First Indian Women's University at Poona, paid a visit to Germany.

The reception, Professor Karve received here, was extremely cordial and respectful. The day he arrived in Berlin, one of the most important German newspapers, the 'Berliner Tageblatt', welcomed him by a great article, thus introducing him and his work to the German public. This article had been written by Mr. Kloetzel, one of the travelling correspondents of the Tageblatt just back from India, where he had visited Karve's marvellous work on the spot. The journalist calls Professor Karve the "Pestalozzi of India" and believes him to have done more for his country, than all the politicians together.

The "Deutsche Akademikerinnen Bund" (Association of Ladies Graduated) invited Professor Karve to hold a lecture on the women of India in the Lyceum-Club, one of the most exclusive ladies-clubs in Berlin. At that reception, the Minister of Foreign Affairs and the Home Member of the German Government were represented by high officials of their respective Ministries. As a matter of fact, all important men and women interested in the education of women, had gathered to listen to Prof. Karve.

At Berlin, Leipzig and Hamburg, Prof. Karve visited a number of schools, kindergartens and other pedagogical institutions, in order to find out the facts and ideas suitable to his own work.

The day before he left Germany for America, he was received by Prof. Albert Einstein, the world famous German man of Science. Einstein was very keen to be informed about the conditions in India and Prof. Karve's work. When he learned the details, he wrote a letter to the Carnegie Institution at Chicago, recommending in hearty terms his Indian guest to the board of that enormous American fund.

SAROJ NALINI ASSOCIATION.

Mr. G. S. Dutt, of the Indian Civil Service and author of "A Woman of India" has returned to Calcutta from Europe. In an interview with a representative of the Press, Mr. Dutt said that although his visit was undertaken for the purpose of a holiday, he found himself called upon, in view of the intense interest which was now being taken in England in Indian social questions generally and in particular in those affecting the position of women in India, to devote a considerable part of his time in acting as an interpreter to the Western public of the position of women in India at the present time as well as in the past. Continuing Mr. Dutt said:—

DISCRIMINATING ADOPTION.

The initiative and the power of organization shown by the women of rural Bengal in their numerous Mahila Samitis has come as a pleasant surprise to the British public who have hitherto regarded Indian women as an inert mass incapable of any effort for self-improvement.

The British Press were unanimous in commending the ideal which underlay the programme of work of the Saroj Nalini Association, which was not to adopt European manners and customs indiscriminately and to effect a complete westernization of Indian women as was being attempted, for example, in some Middle Eastern countries, but to conserve all that was best in the ancient ideal of Indian womanhood and at the same time adopt with discrimination all that was best in the West.

The London Committee of the Saroj Nalini Association held several bazaars and other functions in London during the last ten months—such prominent women in Great Britain as the Marchioness of Aberdeen, Viscountess Elibank, Lady Astor, Lady Denman and Mrs. Wintringham according active co-operation. This was in fact the first time that the women of England had an opportunity of coming into direct touch with a purely non-official organization of the women of rural India. They eagerly seized this opportunity of demonstrating their goodwill towards Indian women.

The women of Bristol assembled at a meeting sent a numerously signed message of friendship and goodwill to Indian women and several Women's Institutes in English villages have established direct links of sisterhood with Mahila Samitis in Bengal.

RE-AWAKENING.

Mr. Dutt believed that this direct touch between women would be very helpful in bringing about a better mutual understanding between the two countries.

While there he had pointed out that while women in the West had been fighting to attain a liberty which they had never enjoyed before, in India the women were merely re-awakening into a position which they had enjoyed five thousand years ago; and whereas men in the West, unused to women's liberty, had bitterly opposed the women's movement, India's men, having awakened from their centuries of slumber to the ideals of their own past, were now eagerly thrusting rights and privileges into the hands of their women even more quickly than the latter were willing to accept them. This explained the complete absence of any conflict with men which was such a remarkable feature of the women's movement in India to-day as compared with the West.

On his way back from Europe Mr. Dutt visited several international women's organisations in Geneva which had expressed their eagerness to establish touch with the Mahila Samitis in India.

BENGAL'S EXAMPLE.

In Bombay, several leading Indian women social workers of that Presidency met him at an informal conference. It appeared that while Bombay was far ahead of Bengal in the training of women workers through institutions like the Seva Sadan and the Women's University, in the matter of rural women's organisations Bengal led the way through her Mahila Samitis organized under the Saroj Nalini Association.

At this conference in Bombay a provincial committee had been formed under the name of the Bombay Rural Mahila Samiti Committee to consider what steps could be taken to form Mahila Samitis in the rural areas of Bombay on the lines of the Bengal movement. Dr. Miss Jerbanno Mistri, a well-known social worker of Bombay, is the Secretary of the Committee.

SURE TO SPREAD.

Mr. Dutt believed that the most effective measure for spreading mass education among the millions of India's men and women would be to extend the Mahila Samiti movement initiated by the Saroj Nalini Association throughout India so as to organise women in every village for their own educational, sanitary and economic emancipation.

He was confident that the movement would spread all over India before long. It had already spread into Assam and certain parts of Bihar. Dr. Mrs. Muthulakshmi Reddi was organising Samitis on the lines of the Bengal movement in Madras and both Travancore and the Punjab had sent officers to study the Bengal movement.

SCHOLARSHIPS FOR SANDHURST.

The Director of Information, Bombay, writes:—The Government of Bombay have revised the rules for the award of special scholarships tenable at the Royal Military College, Sandhurst. The revised rules provide that candidates who may gain admission to the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich or the Royal Air Force Cadet College, Cranwell will also be eligible for these scholarships.

Two special scholarships of the value of Rs. 3,000 per annum each, ordinarily tenable for 18 months have been instituted one, primarily for Muhammadans and the other primarily for Marathas domiciled in the Bombay Presidency including Sind. When no suitable candidates from either or both of the communities for whom the scholarships are primarily intended to be reserved are forthcoming, both scholarships or scholarship, so available may be awarded to a suitable candidate of the other community mentioned above or of any other communities domiciled in the Bombay Presidency including Sind. These scholarships are intended only for boys whose parents or guardians are too poor to afford to pay the expenses of the college education. The amount of the scholarship, viz., Rs. 3,000 per annum is the maximum and the amount is liable to be reduced if the circumstances of the candidate do not justify its payment in full.

Applications from candidates who seek admission to a Cadet College in England, for the September and February terms, respectively, should be made to the Government of Bombay, through the Head of the School or institution last attended, and the Director of Public Instruction, Poona, on or before the 31st May and 31st October preceding. Candidates must belong to families of high social standing; preference will be given to those belonging to families whose members have proved their loyalty and martial spirit by coming forward readily for enlistment in the Indian Army.

Candidates who fulfil the necessary conditions will ordinarily be called before a Selection Committee appointed by the Government of Bombay. No scholarship will be awarded unless the candidate approved by the Government of Bombay is finally selected and nominated by the Government of India for admission to a Cadet College in England.

Further particulars can be obtained from the Director of Public Instruction, Poona, or can be seen from the Bombay Government Gazette, Part I of 26th September.

FOREIGN LIQUOR IN INDIA.

A pamphlet with this title has been written by the Rev. Herbert Anderson and published by the Prohibition League of India.

For a long time temperance workers have not been able to get at the facts concerning the import and sale of foreign liquors in India. Mr. Anderson's timely pamphlet states the facts and they are startling ones. Whilst there has been in some Provinces a decrease in the consumption of country liquor this has been more than balanced by an increase in the consumption of foreign liquor and beer and of so-called foreign liquor which is manufactured in India. Mr. Anderson says:—

INCREASE OF IMPORTS.

Despite the fact that beer and spirits of the same alcoholic strength have been locally manufactured and a steady increase of their consumption also secured there has been a gradual and progressive increase in the quantity of imported liquors into India during the last few years. One has only to refer to the annual statement on Seaborne Trade published in March, 1928 for full particulars. Take the following figures of imports in imperial gallons from the British Empire and foreign countries, principally Germany, France and Java.

	1923-24	1927-28
	Gallons	Gallons
Ale, Beer & Port	... 2,836,793	4,487,178
Brandy	... 348,408	425,693
Gin	... 83,182	114,108
Liquors	... 13,905	16,393
Rum	... 123,142	90,659
Whisky	... 526,813	647,359
Total	... 3,934,243	5,681,426

The increase in total number of imported gallons is therefore 17,47,183, in the space of five years.

These figures show that imported liquors, intended originally for the use of foreign residents, have now become articles of common consumption amongst the Indian population and their use is steadily increasing. This is a serious matter for the country and a heavy drain on India's wealth. The Rev. J. F. Edwards has appealed to Englishmen to give up their liquor for the sake of India. This appeal gains additional force as we contemplate the spectacle of rapidly increasing sales of foreign liquor.

THE SHAM OF PUBLIC CONTROL.

The concluding portion of Mr. Anderson's pamphlet is under this heading. Mr. Anderson says "For all practical purposes this share (of public control) is so small as to be worth absolutely nothing." He believes this to be true both of the control by ministers and the local control of Excise Licensing Boards. He says "Autocratic power is completely in the hands of Government officials."

The present writer does not believe that these statements are true of his own Province (The United Provinces). The position is certainly not a satisfactory one. The ministers who control the excise department are largely dependent on it for revenue. The powers of the Boards are limited both in extent, i. e. they do not control the sales of foreign liquor or deal with the licensing of hotels and refreshment rooms, and completeness; i. e. they can only close a third of the licenses in existence at the time of their triennial election.

But it must be stated that these Boards are of great value to temperance. They have closed hundreds of liquor shops and promoted many measures for the lessening of the temptations to drink and drugs. Whilst they do not control foreign liquor licenses they can refuse consent to the opening of additional shops and have done so.

Again it must be remembered that the largest party on the Boards, and the party which can enforce its policy, is composed of elected members from Municipal Boards. These Municipal Commissioners are by no means temperance reformers and have often used their influence to increase the number of licenses and would have succeeded but for the Government veto.

I believe we have in the Licensing Boards of this Province a useful means of fighting the liquor trade and what is chiefly needed to make them fully effective is that the citizens shall be alert to prevent their representatives from putting private interests before public duty.—The Indian Temperance News and White Ribbon.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Women's Conference—Two very successful meetings were addressed by Mrs. B. Nehru who came here in connection with the establishing of a branch of the All-India Womens' Conference at Agra. At both the meetings Mrs. Nehru emphasised the need of women's organisations for the general development and growth of the country. She felt neither of these two objects was possible without women attaining their rightful place in society. She detailed the various handicaps from which Indian women were suffering and pointed out that the handicaps could not be removed unless women made a combined effort to free themselves from them. A committee of ladies was formed to carry on the work of the conference.

Mr. Devadhar on Sarda Act.—Mr. G. K. Devadhar has sent the following letter to Rai Saheb Harbilas Sarda, dated October 8 :—It was such a great pleasure to me to hear this time, after all, that your Child Marriage Bill has passed through all stages to the tremendous success as it deserves and has received His Excellency the Viceroy's assent. While congratulating you most sincerely for this wonderful success, I take this opportunity of expressing my great appreciation for your sagacity and tenacity of purpose and the able way in which you piloted the bill by steering clear of all the difficulties from orthodox quarters. I know this marks the dawn of a new era in the history of our Social Reform Movement and from my experience of such public work and particularly Social Reform activities of over a quarter of a century I can assure you that the result of this Bill will be wide and far reaching in the Social and Economic progress among the classes and masses of India. I wish you long life and health and happiness to continue your noble work for the social reform movement in India.

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

NOTES.

The Religious Crisis:—It is becoming increasingly clear every day that the country is faced with a religious crisis whose consequences may be more far-reaching than those of the political or social upheaval. The demand of the antyajias to be admitted to Hindu temples is being pressed all over the country and must be conceded at no distant date. The columns of the Bombay Chronicle are filled day by day by letters from Parsi protestants who inveigh against the sacerdotalism of the fire-temples. Less prominent but not less real is a parallel movement among Mahomedans to question the authority of the priestly heads of the several sects and castes of Islam in India. Among Indian Christians likewise there is an insistent feeling against the isolation from Indian religious tradition which has been imposed upon them by the foreign character of the Christian Churches in India. In every case, however, the protest is not against religion, though there is a small group of anti-religionists also, but against the corruptions of religion. The aim of the protestants is not to demolish religion but to demolish the barriers which have been erected in the name of religion between man and man, and between man and God. This is a healthy sign of the times, and under wise guidance, this movement is likely to do more to promote peace and harmony between our communities than other and more self-conscious attempts to remove differences.

Essentials of Islam:—Sir Fazli Hussain is acting for Sir Mahomed Habibullah as Minister of Education in the Government of India during the latter's absence in Europe, and is mentioned as the permanent Minister on Sir Mahomed's retirement which is due shortly. Sir Fazli was invited to open the session of the Bombay Mahomedan Education Conference this year at Poona, in the expectation, no doubt, that he would offer important advice regarding education in his community. He, however, merely glanced at education, and devoted the greater part of his speech to emphasising the essentials of Islam which, he said, were unity of God, human brotherhood and sanctity of human life. Touching on communal movements which, he regarded, as a temporary necessity due to imperfect economic and political conditions, Sir Fazli pointed out the necessity of keeping constantly in view the fundamentals of religion in order to prevent them from leading to separatism and intolerance. He maintained that the principles of Islam absolutely forbade the interposition of any kind of hierarchy between God and man. They rule out, he said, all spiritual castes which have arrogated to themselves the administration of religion. Another important principle he laid down is that the injunctions of religion were not for platform uses but should form an integral part of the daily practice of all as example is much more potent than precept with the vast multitude of humanity as it is more intelligible to them. These observations are as valid to Hindus as to Mahomedans. The essentials of all religions do not conflict with one another. Those whose religion is based on experience, and not hearsay, agree in their declarations of what is true and just. The mystics of Islam, Christianity and Hinduism give the same account of their experiences, lay down the same rules of human conduct. The purifying of our religious ideas, therefore, is the surest way of learning to live in peace with our neighbours. Sir Fazli Hussain's opening speech at the Conference, which is printed in another column, is one of the outstanding utterances of Indian public men at the present day.

Lord Irwin's Return:—With Lord Irwin's return yesterday from his four months' stay in England, the political situation assumes a more active phase than during his absence. Two days before, Sir Chimanlal Setalvad and Dr. Besant arrived from England and their statements in the press have led the public to expect that Lord Irwin will take an early opportunity of making a declaration to the effect that it is the purpose of the British Government to confer Dominion Status on India. Sir Chimanlal seems to think that this is necessary in view of the doubts which have been cast upon the Declaration of August 1917, and that an authoritative interpretation to this effect, will produce an atmosphere favourable to negotiations about the time and manner in which India is to be admitted to Dominion Status. Dr. Besant seems to expect something more than a more interpretation of the old Declaration. It is, doubtful however, if Lord Irwin will be free to make even an interpreting Declaration, as it will necessarily commit the Simon Commission to finding ways and means to facilitate the transition of India from the present subordinate position to that of equal status with Great Britain and the self-governing Dominions. Lord Birkenhead scenting the probability, has written a letter to the Press vehemently protesting against any expression of opinion on the Indian question on the part of Government until after the issue of the report of Simon Commission. During the last few months the political situation has been confused and rather aggravated by several prosecutions, prominent among which are the Cawnpore and Lahore ones, Jatindranath Das's death in prison and several minor incidents in Bombay and elsewhere not calculated to enhance mutual confidence between Government and the people. Lord Irwin has a difficult time before him which, it may be hoped, his high idealism will help him to master.

Lord Goschen:—On the return of Lord Irwin from leave yesterday, Lord Goschen who was acting as Viceroy for the last five months, leaves India to-day. His name will be associated with the greatest piece of social legislation since the Widow Remarriage Act passed eighty years ago. His Excellency's part in placing the Sarda Marriage Act on the Statute book was not altogether a passive one. The way in which he met the deputations from the orthodox camp and did what he could to conciliate their opposition and the special facilities which his Government provided for the passage of the Bill through the Legislature, were extremely helpful in expediting this memorable piece of social legislation. In Madras, where Lord Goschen was Governor for five years, he has left a high reputation for quiet strength inspired by a sincere desire to promote co-operation between all classes and creeds.

Economy of Belief:—Some correspondents who have come to look to Mahatma Gandhi for ready-made opinions on all current topics, have been making it a grievance that he had not expressed his views on Jatindranath Das's starving to death in the Lahore Jail. Mahatmaji tells them in the last number of Young India that they should take it that, whenever he does not express an opinion on any subject which is agitating the country, his silence is dictated by the public interests. Mahatma Gandhi goes on to say:—"There are occasions when silence is wisdom. This I hold to be such an occasion. I may inform the reader that there are very many important questions affecting the nation on which, though I hold strong and decided views, I maintain absolute silence, for I believe that it often becomes the duty of every public man to be silent even at the risk of incurring unpopularity and even a worse penalty, as it undoubtedly becomes his duty to speak out his mind when the occasion requires it, though it may be at the cost of his life." There is no man living who has published his opinions on so many subjects, important and unimportant, as Mahatma Gandhi, and one wonders what the other subjects may be on which he holds strong views but remains absolutely silent. Surely he has given room for the impression that, in his opinion, the holding of a belief involves a duty to publish it. The view now expressed will, therefore, come as a surprise to many and as a disappointment to those who, relying on him, have ceased to think for themselves, and perhaps have lost the power of thinking. This is, however, but one illustration of Mahatma Gandhi's latest phase of almost defiant repudiation of accountability to any power or person besides himself.

Campaign Against Purdah:—It is a good sign that the conservative Marwari community has awakened to the needs of social reform. Though belonging to the martial Rajput class, the members of the community are very backward and the purdah system prevails to a great extent among their women. At the recent All-India Maheshwari Conference a number of resolutions condemning evils like the purdah and child-marriage was passed. A striking feature of the conference was that many Marwari women themselves participated in the Conference and discarded the purdah. The excellent example of these ladies is bound to have a beneficial effect on their community and there is every hope that this pernicious custom will soon be a thing of the past. The progressive Marwari youths have determined that the purdah should go, have formed a deputation and are carrying on a wide propaganda throughout the Central Provinces convening meetings and appealing to the people to do away with the baneful custom. The meetings held at Khandwa, Dhamangaon, Yeotmal, Wardha and Akola were attended with great success. The deputationists have fixed November 13th as the anti-Purdah day.

The Dawn of New China:—We publish elsewhere in this issue an illuminating article on the Chinese question for which we are indebted to Mr. Manilal Parekh who is now in America. Mr. Parekh informs us that this article together with other matter dealing with the political, economic and spiritual aspects of the problem which he has sent us, will be the basis of a report which Dr. Shen has been deputed to write. Dr. Shen points out that the politico-military aspect of modern China is not the whole national movement and that there are other aspects which should be taken into account. The nationalist movement in China is an accelerated process of adaptation and change. The economic ideal of China is "the distribution of land ownership and the limitation of capital investment." In the spiritual sphere while the people of China are anxious to assimilate the Western spirit of "quest and adventure", there are many fine qualities they have inherited from their forefathers which they wish to retain. In religion the people are becoming more tolerant and, therefore, less subject to persuasion and proselytism.

The Leader:—Last Sunday a happy function took place at Allahabad when distinguished leaders of all shades of political thought joined in celebrating the twentieth anniversary of the Leader. The Board of Directors of the newspaper company had decided to mark the occasion by opening the new premises of the Leader in which up-to-date machinery had been installed and Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya performed the opening ceremony. The speeches made by Pandit Motilal Nehru, Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru and others must have been gratifying to Mr. C. Y. Chintamani who has with untiring energy worked all these years to establish the paper on a sound footing. The Leader holds a position in Allahabad and in the country which might well be envied by other papers in India and we offer our hearty congratulations to Mr. Chintamani and his friends who will be feeling that their labours are rewarded to some extent by the tributes that the Leader is receiving on this auspicious occasion from all over the country.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, OCTOBER 26, 1929.

EDUCATION AND CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM.

The Great War was entering on a critical phase in 1917. The British Government was striving might and main to mobilise the full strength of the Commonwealth to bring about an early and successful termination of the life-and-death struggle. The Declaration of August 1917 pledging self-government to India was made at this juncture. By the time the Declaration was translated into a scheme of constitutional reform, however, the War had ended in a victory for the Allies. Pledges had to be redeemed but the spirit in which they were made was no longer dominant. Every word and phrase was scrutinised with a view to find out how little they might be interpreted to mean without the appearance of a flagrant repudiation. The late Mr. Montagu, who was then Secretary of State for India, was, however, genuinely anxious to do something substantial, and he was a man of great ability and, at the time, was very influential in the Cabinet. The bitter struggle which he had with the late Lord Curzon who was also a member of the Cabinet, over the reforms, is vividly described in Lord Ronaldshay's "Life" of Curzon. Unable to stop the reforms, the opposition element in the Cabinet managed to hedge them with the condition that they should be reviewed at the end of ten years by a Parliamentary Commission. Among the subjects into which this Commission was required to enquire was the progress of education under the reforms. The idea evidently was that the next instalment of reform should be determined by, among other factors, the measure of educational advance. The Simon Commission appointed an Auxiliary Committee to do this enquiry for it with Sir Philip Hartog, sometime Vice-Chancellor of the Dacca University, and a member of the Indian Public Services Commission, as Chairman. Among the members was Sir George Anderson who was Professor of History in the Elphinstone College in Bombay, in the early part of his Indian career. Sir Arthur Selby-Bigge was nominated from England to serve on the Commission. The Indian members were Sir Sultan Ahmed, Vice-Chancellor of the Dacca University, Raja Narendranath of Lahore and Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi of Madras. The Report of the Committee was submitted to His Majesty and published as an interim report of the Commission last week. The Commission in a covering letter say that they expect that the Committee's report will be of great assistance to them in formulating their conclusions on constitutional reform.

From one point of view the publication of the Committee's report is a disadvantage, in that it exposes its conclusions to public criticism before the Commission has had time to form an independent opinion on them. From the public point of view, on the other hand, the publication of the report is an advantage, as it enables its weak points to be exhibited before the Commission acts upon them. This is the more necessary as owing to the abstention of nationally-minded, as distinguished from communally-minded, Indians from co-operation of any kind with the Commission, the composition of the Committee was not sufficiently representative of the broader aspects of Indian life and thought. The conclusion of the Committee on the main issue before it, namely, the progress of education in relation to the political capacity of the people, is that on the whole there has been little. The value of the vote is not much better understood by the masses now than they were ten years ago. It follows that, in the opinion of the Committee, an extension of the franchise is not justified by the progress of education. The recommendation in the Nehru report of adult franchise, has not been accepted by the maturer minds of the country, and the Nehru Committee itself lighted upon it as the only way out of the impasse regarding communal electorates. What the Indian masses immediately need is sufficient food and clothing, sanitary housing, work which will bring enough wages to keep them in reasonable comfort, opportunities of education for their children and, generally speaking, an increase in the amenities of life so as to relieve them of their present degrading poverty. An extension of the franchise will not directly help them to secure these things. They ask for bread and to give them the vote is no better than giving them a stone.

But it has been found in the West that the possession of the vote has helped the masses to improve their social and economic condition. Sir George Anderson, when he was Professor of History, was rather keen on pointing out that in Great Britain much of the social legislation, including national education, followed successive extensions of the franchise. In India, too, it appears that we may have to tread the same path. The quantitative progress of education during the last ten years is acknowledged to be remarkable. All classes have participated in it—Mahomedans, depressed classes and women. Social legislation, too, has been speeded up. This seems to show that the increase of political opportunity in India as in Great Britain has been followed by increased social and educational activity. It is inevitable that a sudden extension in width should be accompanied by some contraction in depth. Much of the complaint of the Committee about the unsatisfactory qualitative standard, overlooks this condition. It has caught hold of the word "wasteful" and harps upon it somewhat mechanically. Because a large number of boys and girls do not go beyond the primary standard, the Committee calls education wasteful. There is no country in the world where every boy who enters a primary school emerges a ripe scholar at the conclusion of his college career, as everything which enters as a pig at one end is said to emerge as pork at the other end of a Chicago factory. The Committee has overworked this term "wasteful" which somehow seems to have acquired a strange fascination for it like the word "Mesopotamia" for the old lady in the story. After all, no human system can be more economical than Nature. Yet of fifty seeds she often brings but one to bear

So careful of the type she seems
So careless of the single life.

THE DAWN OF NEW CHINA.

(By DR. T. L. SHEN.)

EDUCATION.

The most important development in China in the realm of education is the growth of a modern educational system. As soon as China suffered defeat at the hands of the Powers, she began to realize the importance of the modern facilities of knowledge and training. She observed the futility of merely reading the analects, history and literature of the past, without studying the present day sciences. Accordingly, she abolished the eight legged style of composition and the old examination system for official preferment. In place of the old tutorial institutes, she has inaugurated a system of modern institutions from kindergarten to the university. But Chinese education for the last few decades has been suffering from the fact that its system, though with frequent changes, has not been free from borrowed and transplanted features. There is much room for adaptation and improvement as is instanced by the recent movements for the promotion of the national language, mass education, citizenship training, vocational guidance, etc. Through these new opportunities of training, thousands of Chinese students have been enabled to pursue advanced education abroad. Some have returned to fill positions of usefulness and leadership, shouldering the burden of nation-making and the great task of reconstruction. With similar training, many others have found less exalted but equally useful places in life, venturing with success along many lines of new enterprises in the country. Modern education certainly gives to the Chinese student a wonderful knowledge, a wider outlook on life, a keener power of observation and analysis, a richer imagination, a sounder judgment, more chances for association and better ways of unselfish love and service.

MASS EDUCATION.

Practically all major educational tendencies in China now point to the urgent necessities on the one hand, of education for the mass, and on the other, of education for livelihood. China, although having made rapid progress in increasing the percentage of her educated citizens in the last few decades, still has a tremendous problem to tackle in transforming more than seventy-five per cent of her population into enlightened citizens. The process unfortunately has been retarded by the state of general disorder as a result of internal warfare and the accompanying banditry, pestilence and disrupted communications throughout the country. The same cause has also reduced the number and efficiency of the teaching force with normal training provided for by the government, in that many of them instead of serving in the capacity of teaching for which they were definitely trained, have been turned loose to become agitators and job-seekers unconnected with their proper cause. But the situation has been greatly relieved through the discovery and application of the technique of popular education in the form of one thousand foundation characters and the use of lantern slides as a means of instruction. These tools have begun to penetrate into the farms, factories and even army camps. On top of that, there is a growing sentiment among the educated people for work among the masses. As this sentiment begins to be linked up with the government scheme of mass education, China will certainly see her problem of illiteracy solved in the course of a short period.

NEED FOR BETTER LIVELIHOOD.

Besides plain knowledge what modern education should give to the Chinese people is a means to better livelihood. It is almost universally accepted in China that the problem of poverty is in a way even more subtle than that of ignorance, and therefore should be solved simultaneously. Recently there have been studies made regarding the material needs of the people and the results all help to strengthen the idea that through an adapted process of education, the people could be enabled to become masters of their own resources and to be productive and useful elements in the society in which they live. In this connection there are already different experiments made in various parts of the country in the form of co-operative societies, model villages, etc., and some of them are proving unusual successes. Even among the educated the need for better livelihood is easily shown in the general tendency to emphasize physical sciences and subjects of a technical nature rather than metaphysical and theoretical ones. To them, however, there is the added problem of vocational uncertainties and misfits. They are often up against the deadlock that every position they want is filled, while for the vacant positions they do not possess the qualifications. And when they finally get into a position, it is usually one which does not justify nor utilize what they have learned in their education. Sometimes owing to financial pressure they are apt to choose a low and mean business contrary to their high ideals of life. So the need for vocational training and guidance is evident there.

SOCIAL LIFE.

In the realm of social life, the same influence of modernization is most keenly felt among the Chinese people. As soon as China came into touch with the new mode of life, she found her social relationships multiplied, her horizon of contacts widened and her sphere of thought and action enlarged. Thus the old-type social organizations soon proved to be too narrow and limited in their scope and function in an industrial order of society. The traditional virtues of group relationship also have to be re-interpreted and adapted. The individual begins to occupy a much more independent and responsible position in the changing system of social fabric. The prestige of age, wealth, or power is often subject to criticism and challenge. New forms of class consciousness become more and more evident, notably among the students, the women, and the laborers. The age-long conception of scholarship and officialdom as the principal career in life, with all other occupations as low and subservient, naturally goes out of fashion in favour of equal rights and opportunities in profession.

DECLINE OF THE FAMILY.

One important effect of the modernization process is the decline of the family as the social unit in China. When China came into contact with the West, the most noticeable difference between the two systems of social organization has been the patriarchal or clan system of family of China as over against the Western family based on the individual couple as a unit. Although the former excels in continuity and solidarity, yet it lacks much of the individuality and strength of the latter. It clings too much to the past through worship of ancestors and parents. This together with the habit of obedience and reverence shown to the elder or the patriarch, encourages conformity rather than adventure, and kills the valuable sense of initiative and responsibility of the younger generation. Again, the law and tradition which entitle every male heir to inherit the property of his father also help to further this spirit of dependence and to decrease his capacity of production. But the most objectionable feature of the "old family" to the average Chinese youth, particularly the girl, is perhaps its system of compulsory marriage in which the bond of union is made "by the command of the parents and through the words of the go-between." These aspects of China's family life are being fundamentally challenged by the present generation on the ground that individuals are not to be looked upon as subjects attached to and owned by the family, but are essentially units and members of society as well as the nation. As such, they shall enjoy the freedom of marriage, and once married they shall establish their own home and shall support and manage it with their own labour and resources. Thus in the professional and business life they shall not bother about the conflicting demands upon their loyalties nor about the excessive burdens involved in the "large family" system.

COMPULSION VERSUS DETERMINISM.

Another effect is the changing attitude towards sex relations. The influence of the Confucian teaching of propriety with its emphasis on the isolation and suppression of the sexes, though beginning to be challenged by the present generation is still strongly felt in their thought and attitude towards sex-relations. This teaching is to a large extent an artificial prejudice and restraint on something, alleged to be unclean and debased which does not admit of any fair and substantial proof. Chinese youths are struggling hard to overcome that tradition in order to have more natural and wholesome fellowship between the sexes. The introduction of the system of co-education into China makes such social intercourse possible under the proper atmosphere. As a result, there have been numerous experiments, some successful and others discouraging, in love and marriage on an entirely different plane from the traditional one of compulsion and determinism. New homes have sprung up from these experiments, which give fresh inspiration and hope to the young couples. Through observation of and contact with these experiments others have become saner and more rational in their fellowship with the opposite sex as well as in their choice of their lifemate. In the meantime, however, the dark side of the picture presents a steady increase of divorce cases which still prove the existence of much emotionalism and prematurity of love. They are also the natural consequences of the popular, prevailing romanticism, the crop of cheap literature on sex, the wrong handling of birth control, the moving picture theatres and the dancing saloons, all of which flourish widely in the treaty ports and are now penetrating into the interior cities. These attractions so sap the vitality of many promising youths that their parents and school authorities are beginning to feel the need of proposing some wholesome substitute through a scientific program of sex education.

Space here does not allow one to go on with other important aspects of Chinese social life. Subjects like the labor movement, the women's movement and various attempts along lines of eradicating social evils, such as opium, gambling, concubinage and prostitution, all deserve separate and detailed treatment.

THE FUTURE OF CHINA.

A bird's eye view of the conditions, needs, and problems of China will ultimately land us where we shall want to know what after all are some of the clear and unmistakable lines of new advance on which we can base our reasonable hope. First of all is the gradual crystallization and articulation of public opinion in China. As in no other country in the world, the will of the people is supreme in that where the public opinion goes, there national affairs will take their due course.

THE DEMAND FOR CONSTRUCTIVE WORK.

The second line of advance is that of a popular demand for construction. The revolution has swept away the major obstacles in the way of nation building and before the tearing-down process proves too destructive and expensive for the people, a note of construction has been struck throughout the length and breadth of the country. According to Dr. Sun the concluding phase of the military stage of revolution calls for the ushering in of a period of political tutelage with various plans of rehabilitation. His outline of national construction contains a very comprehensive scheme of important reforms, psychological, social and material, the last item including national projects of industry, agriculture, communications, etc., to be sponsored by the government. Here the political leaders have a much harder task to fulfil than that of military exploitation, and their future support by the people is largely determined by the success with which they can discharge their duties. The various national conferences recently held under government auspices have adequately interpreted the national needs for construction in concrete terms, and it only remains to be seen how the hundred and one recommendations will be put into actual effect. For that purpose a host of trained experts is badly needed, and proper recruiting and placement will help to partly solve the problem of unemployment, speculation and mis-use of talents, and on the other hand to direct useful leadership into proper channels.

THE EMERGING OF A NEW TYPE OF LEADERSHIP.

Another line of advance is the emerging of a new type of leadership hitherto circumscribed in China. With the defeat of militarism, the parasitic mandarin officialdom also begins to be shattered. The moral effect of the revolution in trying to establish an honest and efficient government cannot be overstated. The martyrdom of Dr. Sun leaving after his death a task instead of a fortune is a profound inspiration to the present generation. So we find today a new group of men in public service, of course with many exceptions, men who are young, energetic, honest, conscientious, and capable of standing great temptations. In certain sections of the country, government discipline in simplicity and hardship is strictly enforced among its civil and military officers, perhaps unparalleled anywhere in the world. Incidentally a modern examination system enlisting candidates for government service is being universally adopted and the basis of official preferment is thus changed from favoritism to disinterested qualifications:

THE EMPHASIS ON DISCIPLINE.

The looseness and irregularity of Chinese life can no longer stand the forces of modernization and are gradually giving place to unity and order. Recently there has grown among the people a new appreciation of the positive functions of law as over against the traditional attitude of keeping oneself aloof from rules and regulations. In Dr. Sun's outline of social construction, he also gave the essential requirements of a democratic form of society and emphasized practical training for citizenship. The new system of government which finds its adoption even among the contemporary people's organizations offers large opportunities for such training. In this connection good habits, such as keeping engagements, punctuality, care for public properties, budget-making, etc., are also acquired through accumulated observations and contacts. Everywhere in the country the art of self-government is being taught and exercised and the technique of organization is being put into daily practice. Further, training for normal leaders is being attempted in various centers of the country and those leaders will be expected to carry out the important program of political tutelage. But the idea of discipline, being brought home only recently in China, has as yet little political significance.

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

XLIII. PRISONERS.

The individual whose knowledge of crime and of criminals is based upon the daily newspaper is very apt to have most positive opinions concerning the general degradation of criminals. He lumps them in a class and designates the class as bad. The man, however, who has spent long hours in visiting and interviewing prisoners has a much different view of the situation. There are few cases of crime which, when one is familiar with the entire history of the criminal, do not present some extenuating circumstances. The prison visitor cannot but feel humble, recognizing what a narrow line separates him from his less fortunate brothers.

The criminal is a sick soul. Crime is a disease and should be so treated. The man who wrongs another is in most instances socially maladjusted. He is a victim of his environment or has some hereditary weakness. Imprisonment should not be conceived as society's method of taking revenge. It should rather be conceived as society's attempt at hospitalization. Such a conception means a radical reorganization of the present prison system, but it is the only method of conserving social waste. No prisoner should be committed without first having been examined by a board of psychiatrists to determine his exact mental state. Prisoners differ, and that which will help one man may be the ruination of another. Sympathetic, individual treatment will do much to restore the prisoner to society as a social asset instead of a liability.

There is a glamour about the life of crime that makes a strong appeal to the starved soul of underprivileged youth. The boy who has never had a normal home life, and has never been afforded the opportunity to express himself in normal channels, looks upon crime as a fascinating game and as the means of proving his manhood. The element of risk and of danger overshadows any possible moral considerations. It is not until he finds himself within prison walls that he discovers that he has been digging for himself "broken cisterns, that can hold no water." To help such boys to direct their energy into useful channels is our clearcut duty.

While the jails are public institutions, it is but a small percentage of the public who take any interest in jail conditions. Ventilation, cleanliness, and decency are just as important to the criminal as to the ordinary citizen. A prisoner enters a jail with no criminal record behind him. By all laws of justice he should leave the jail a better man than when he entered. But through our own stupidity we are turning out enemies of society and not co-operators. True penology is a matter of conservation—of gathering the fragments, that nothing may be lost.

The prisoner is not alone the man who is confined within a jail. Wherever men are caught in the meshes of hate, selfishness, suspicion, greed, jealousy, anger and petulance, they are in need of deliverance. Common seekers after a better way of life, let us help each man his brother.

THE SASTRI COLLEGE, DURBAN.

The following account of the Sastri College in Durban appeared in the Servant of India: It may without exaggeration be said that the opening of the College will be a new epoch in the entire history of the Indian Community in that country; for all the social and cultural improvements which will make the position of the Indian supportable in the midst of the European population there, educational improvement is without doubt the very fountain head and matrix. Of the practical appreciation of the basic fact of the Indian problem, by our own countrymen and the Union Government alike, the Sastri College will be a shining embodiment.

Various are the serious shortcomings in Indian education in South Africa and we may confidently expect, they will gradually be rectified by the Sastri College. It is to comprise two Departments: (1) a general High School teaching up to the Matriculation Standard, and (2) a Training School for teachers and primary schools. It will contain spacious class-rooms, well-equipped laboratories, a well-stocked library and ample play-grounds. And it will be equipped with properly qualified Professors—many of them being lent out from this country by the Government of India. Let us hope that these Professors will be men not only of high academic attainments, but also of all those fine social qualities and cultivated manners of life which will at once secure for them the approbation and respect of the Whites and serve as an example for emulation to their own fellow-countrymen. There is some need to emphasise this personal side of the equipment of the Indian Professor going out to South Africa. For some years ago, a Christian Missionary imported a few Indians to serve there under him as teachers; but the experiment to put it mildly was not a great success. The Professors will naturally be looked upon as the best exponents of whatever is good and bright and worthy in India's tradition and culture; and if they do not prove themselves equal to the best classes of the Whites in all matters of conduct and accomplishment, their advent in South Africa can scarcely prove a blessing to their countrymen.

The Sastri College will be financed and managed by the Administration of Natal. This is an unmistakable proof of the radical change that has taken place in the attitude of that Government towards the Indian question. Formerly, not only was the money allotted for Indian education scanty; but part of it was being diverted to other purposes. European public opinion was dead against the addition of a penny to the expenditure on Indian education. But now the Government and the White community at the back of it have begun to show that they realize how the Indian problem is a part of their general responsibility and how they must discharge it if they would earn a name for fairness and honourable dealing in the eyes of the world. The Sastri College will thus be the first important visible vindication of the high principles of the Cape Town Agreement.

But this vindication, no more than just though it be, was facilitated by the practical good sense and patriotism of our own people. They have contributed gladly and liberally towards the cost of the College, and thereby proved that they are sensible of the duty which they owe to their adopted country no less than to themselves, and that they are earnest about discharging that duty well. Of course, they have to do much more that way. They will have to institute prizes and scholarships, and endow chairs for new branches of learning. Then will be the dawn of a new day for the Indian in South Africa. That will be the real fruition of Mr. Sastri's labours.

We cannot on this occasion omit to recall how deeply the Indian community in South Africa is indebted for this happy consummation to the steadfast friendliness and benevolence of Mr. Hugh Bryan, Superintendent of Education in Natal, and his European colleagues. In the dark days of the Indian community three years ago, when the entire White population was hostile, Mr. Bryan and a few of his European Inspectors of Education remained brave and firm in their loyalty to their ideal and in their fellow-feeling for the Indian, thus furnishing a contrast to the bitter antipathy and blind prejudice of the official hierarchy. Their idealism has now at last triumphed; and together with our assurances of lasting gratitude to them, we may well couple our warm congratulations on the happy atmosphere which, largely as a result of their own high-minded struggle, has now come to surround their further labours for the uplift of the Indian.

MUSLIM EDUCATION.

I. MUSLIM LADIES EDUCATIONAL CONFERENCE.

Amidst scenes of enthusiasm the sixth session of the Bombay Presidency Muslim Ladies Educational Conference, the first of a series of Muslim Conferences, commenced this afternoon at Haroon Hall which was gaily decorated for the purpose. The Conference met under purdah arrangements, several European and Indian non-Muslim ladies attending. Mrs. Clayton opening the Conference spoke on the great and urgent need for spreading education among girls and women and hoped that the Conference would carry out its mission successfully.

Miss Mustafa Khan extending a cordial welcome to the delegates explained the present needs of education for Muslim women and thanked the Hartog Committee for recommending that in all schemes of expansion, Government should give special attention to the women's education. On the proposal of Lady Ebrahim Haroon Jaffar, Begum Haji Abdulla Haroon was then elected President. Mrs. Sarlabai Naik of Seva Sadan addressed the Conference on Education.

The President in the course of her address deplored the great illiteracy prevailing among women and asked Muslim Ladies who were "sleeping educationally" to wake up from their slumber and to realise their duty and responsibility to the community. The President wanted instruction in religion, social science, health, nursing, arts, music and home industries, besides school education to be given to girls. She suggested the establishment of industrial homes on the lines of Seva Sadan where women could earn an honest respectable living. She complained that Government had done so far nothing towards the education of Muslim girls, except starting a few primary schools. There was no college for Muslim girls even in Sind. She suggested the establishment of Anglo-Urdu Secondary Schools and Colleges and Ladies Anjumans for the discussion of various problems.

Concluding the President supported the purdah custom but appealed to the audience to do away with antiquated customs. The Conference then passed 8 resolutions affecting women's education in relation to Muslim girls and dispersed.

II. POONA MUSLIM EDUCATIONAL CONFERENCE.

The fifteenth session of the Bombay Presidency Muslim Educational Conference began here this morning at the Haroon Hall. Among those present were Sir Gulam Hussein Hidayatullah, Mr. B. V. Jadhav, Mr. Bottomley of the Bengal Government, Moulvi Shafee Dawoodi, M. L. A., Mr. Fazal Ibrahim Rahimtoola, M. L. A., Syed Murtuza Saheb, M. L. A., of Madras and others. The Hon'ble Mr. Moulvi Rafiuddin Ahmed, Minister of Education, Government of Bombay was absent.

The proceedings commenced with prayers from the Koran. Sir Fazli Hussein was then presented an address of appreciation by the local Anjuman-i-Islam. He then performed the opening of the conference session.

Sir Fazli Hussein in his speech after referring to the past activities of the Conference, said :—

"When thinking what to say when opening this Conference, the question that naturally suggested itself to me was; Why have an organization of this kind at all? Educational activities and provision for orphans fall within the scope of Local Self-Government. Therefore, why not let the Local Self Government discharge the obligations of primary importance? Why have an organization and that of a communal nature? The reason is not far to seek. Local Self-Government in India has not yet developed to such an extent as to discharge its obligations in full. The need for such organization, therefore, is unfortunately obvious and pressing.

ECONOMIC INEQUALITIES.

"Grave and glaring economic inequalities, in some cases, leading to the denial of the means for the physical and intellectual well-being of the next generation, in some cases, leading to denial of even human equality, creating barriers of caste and colour, equally repugnant to the conception of human brotherhood, afford not only justification, but pressing, irresistible demand for institutions which will, in some measure, reduce these handicaps, overcome the obstacles in the way of elevating human society to a stage at which economic and educational inequalities will be reduced to a minimum. As Local Self-Government develops, both in its extent, and in its intensity, or to put it differently, in its scope and in its efficiency, the need for such organizations will become less pressing, and the ideal stage will be reached when it ceases to exist.

"As long as such organizations proceed on communal or racial lines, it is of the utmost importance that their undoubted utility in removing certain inevitable defects and checking equally dangerous tendencies, due to imperfect administrative machinery causing economic inequalities, should, in our present stage of development, not be discounted by their creating angularities which would cause friction in the body politic. We should guard against the possibility of communal organizations leading to separatism and intolerance. It is of the utmost importance that the true principles underlying the faith of a community be kept intact and separate from the excrescences which tend to gather round them. Islam brought no new religion to the world: it was the religion of Abraham that was represented to the world. It should be the duty of all of us to see that the principles of Islam, as such, remain the same as were presented to us 1,300 years ago, and that we should not permit to subsequent developments and adjustments, the same sanctity, the same inviolability which, by right, belongs to the primary principles mentioned above.

THREE GREAT PRINCIPLES.

"I wish to invite your attention to three of these, viz. the unity of God, the brotherhood of mankind, and the sanctity of humanity. It should be noticed that these three primary principles take no count either of race, or of caste, or of colour. These three primary principles are so interrelated that no one of them can be adopted without others also being accepted. From these principles, certain rules of conduct of the highest importance in India can be derived, and the first is that of "Tolerance." If the brotherhood of mankind is a reality, then it is obvious that each human being should adopt the principle of tolerance as the governing rule of conduct of his life.

"In the group of virtues which each religion enjoins, let tolerance occupy the foremost place. The freedom that every human being longs for should be subject to the same freedom being guaranteed to other human beings. Brotherhood of mankind further necessitates the provision of equal facilities to all, so that such handicaps as economic development of society imposes on some should, as far as possible, be removed.

SPIRITUAL CASTES.

"From these primary principles, it also follows that there should be no hierarchy between God and man. This rules out all spiritual castes which have arrogated to themselves the administration of religion. Remember that these are the injunctions not for being reiterated from public platforms, but they should form the integral part of the daily practice of all. It is this spirit of human brotherhood which places the prince and the pauper on the same footing.

"Again, remember that though principles are of the utmost importance, example is much more potent than precept; and for the vast multitude of humanity, far more intelligible than precept. Therefore, the measure of your success as workers in the cause of humanity and also your country, is the measure, by your example, of demonstrating the principles that you stand by. In your daily life, emphasise the principle of human brotherhood, the principle of sanctity of humankind. Remember that India cannot afford to let any community or class wage wars of extermination against any other community or class.

SERVING OTHERS.

"Again, your life should be based on righteousness and sincerity, and the striking element of supreme effort, noble effort, should pervade all your action, and that effort should be effort in the cause of serving others. Let not the service of community be only a phrase which is current in public press, on public platforms. It should be your ceaseless effort to afford equality of opportunity to those who, in the struggle of life, lack it. The achievement of this ideal is by no means easy. Many a noble spirit in this world has passed through dark, disolate, and dreary days of supreme and noble effort, and with failure, fatigue and faintness. Yet, with hope, sublime hope, and determination, it is not impossible to overcome the obstacles. Each effort is its own reward irrespective of the measure of success attending upon it. Effort, continuous effort, supreme effort, accompanied with determination and faith in the success of righteousness, each effort, each success bringing us nearer and nearer to the promised millennium. Life under those circumstances cannot be stale, unoccupied, listless or vain. It consists of moving from effort to effort, success to success, its own reward attended by supreme satisfaction of having done one's duty. Society pervaded by these principles, conducted on these lines, consisting of such action, cannot but succeed in elevating itself. Once more let me repeat; with righteousness, hope and determination, work on, struggle on; your goal cannot be far away."

PROHIBITION AND INDIA.

Rev. John Haynes Holmes writes in the Searchlight Anniversary Number:—It is now nearly ten years since the United States adopted its Prohibition Amendment to the Constitution and thus entered upon its fight to the death against the liquor traffic. This fight is still raging with intensity, and the end is not yet in sight. Even the most optimistic of prohibitionists in this country feel that it will take at least a generation to achieve victory. But two facts of impressive importance are clearly manifest as a result of this ten years' battle.

First, the Prohibition law, although feebly enforced by officials who are either half-hearted or secretly hostile, has greatly improved conditions as compared with the old days when the liquor traffic was free and unfettered in its operations. We have a large minority of citizens who are opposed to Prohibition and seek the abrogation of the law. But no man is "wet" enough to want to return to the old saloon conditions. Prohibition has accomplished one great thing if it has accomplished nothing else, and that is that it has done away with the saloon beyond all hope of any return of the licensed traffic which it represented. This means an improvement of the whole social condition all along the line. Prohibition at its worst in these, its initial and extremely difficult, stages, is infinitely better than anything ever known before the "dry" amendment to the Constitution was enacted.

Secondly, the Prohibition law has placed firm ground underneath the feet of those who are fighting for the conquest of the drink evil. So long as the liquor traffic was inside the law, temperance advocates were battling with the law on the side of their enemies. Now the law is on their side—on the side of decency, morality and the right. This means that, no matter how long the ultimate victory is delayed, victory is now at last certain. The law should always be on the side of what is right. Its highest and noblest function is to vindicate the basic ideals of public good. Its most effective achievement is to establish the conditions under which education in the good morals of citizenship can be carried on with effectiveness and sure promise of success. There are many discouraging conditions in the Prohibition situation to-day in this country, but the law is for us and not against us. And thus does the battle for a temperate nation go on with unfaltering courage and sure hope of victory.

It is this situation in America, our own sure progress toward the "dry" goal, which makes us sympathize so eagerly with the fight for Prohibition in India. In espousing this great cause, Mahatma Gandhi shows his characteristically clear vision of the truth, as well as his unfailing fidelity to the highest social ideals for his people. I am persuaded that there is no one thing which would do so much for India to-day as the establishment of prohibition and thus the annihilation of the liquor-traffic. This would cleanse the lives of the Indian people, and clear their minds for the great work of liberation that lies before them. I believe that the freedom of India cannot come, perhaps should not come, until the people, by their valor, sacrifice, and noble fidelity, show themselves to be worthy of the control of their own destinies. The first and perhaps the greatest step toward this demonstration of their fitness for Swaraj is the accomplishment of the prohibition ideal. The fact that the liquor traffic and the opium traffic are sustained by Government is only one more reason for the fight against it, as it is also one more proof of the need of liberty. As a friend of India, and a humble disciple of your great prophet, Mahatma Gandhi, I would exhort you to give your utmost support to the prohibition campaign. Let the Indian people join hands with the American people in fighting for the destruction of the greatest single social evil that now exists in the civilized world.

REVOLUTION IN MEDICINE.

The "Statesman" understands that when Sir Jagadish Bose delivers his address at the anniversary meeting of the Bose Institute next month, he will have some remarkable revelations to make regarding a hitherto unknown drug made from a plant found in the sub-Himalayas.

The properties of the drug were discovered at the Institute during experiments designed to show whether the hearts of plants and animals are identical in their response to stimuli. It will come as a surprise to many people to learn that plants have hearts; but the fact is, as an assistant at the Institute explained in an interview, plants have regular pulsatory systems, consisting of long tubes through which sap is propelled up and down. Organs of a similar character are found in worms.

The experiment comprised injecting poisonous vegetable drugs into the plants and observing how far the plants revived when other types of vegetable drug were afterwards administered to them. It was discovered that a certain plant extract, originating in the sub-Himalayas, had, when injected, extraordinary powers as an antidote. Plants that had been poisoned and were on the point of death were marvellously transformed by it. In as short a time as two minutes they ceased to droop and appeared as though they had only just been plucked.

Knowing, from other investigations of the remarkable identity of the reaction of plants and animals to chemical agents, Sir Jagadish had the experiment made on a frog. The creature was poisoned and, its heart beat stopping, it became to all intents and purposes dead. A few drops of the new plant extract were then introduced into it by means of a hypodermic syringe.

Not only did the heart beat revive, it acted even more strongly than before. The frog returned to life and seemed little the worse for its adventure.

From the lower stage of animal life the experiment was carried to higher. Its complete non-injuriousness to human tissue having first been established, the drug was applied as a cardiac stimulant to a certain number of hospital patients suffering from serious streptococcal infections and consequently in danger of dying of heart failure.

It is claimed that the drug was a great success. Without being dangerous it is extraordinarily potent. Its main importance, however, is believed to be its power of causing a permanent revival when the heart has failed so completely as to render the ordinary stimulants (strychnine, digitalene, etc.) ineffective. At the Bose Institute the opinion is held that the drug will cause revolutionary changes in this branch of medicine. To the ordinary man it is enough to know that a big step forward has been taken in the seemingly impossible task of conquering death.

Sir Jagadish reached Calcutta on Tuesday from his four-months' European tour. While he was in England, the Statesman was informed, the eminent scientist was invited to demonstrate some of his plant experiments before an audience of M.P.s, including the Secretary of State for India. By means of his infinitesimal Contraction Recorder Sir Jagadish showed how plants react violently to shocks that are negligible to a human being.

On the Continent Sir Jagadish was welcomed by many learned societies and during his tour he took the opportunity of demonstrating the efficacy of the new drug he has discovered. In Vienna the Faculty of Medicine was greatly interested in his experiment with the dead frog. Incidentally, one outcome of his researches into plant life has been that an important Indian research organisation is attempting to produce vegetable serum for curative purposes. Vegetable serum, it is held would be free from the harmful effects sometimes associated with animal serum.

One of the outstanding exhibits at the next anniversary meeting of the Bose Institute will be a new apparatus that shows the action of wireless waves on plants.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Sir J. C. Bose's Return:—Sir Jagadish Bose arrived recently from his world tour. The great interest roused, in Europe by Sir Jagadish Bose's discoveries, particularly in relation to biology, is indicated by full details received by this week's mail of the Bengali scientist's recent tour in England and Geneva. South Africa was amongst the first of the countries to recognise the potentialities opened up by the application of Sir J. Bose's conclusions to practical agriculture, South Africa's staple industry. The result of this recognition was an invitation which was conveyed to Sir Jagadish, through the Colonial Office, to visit the Union as a guest of the Government. Owing, however, to engagements at Geneva and the India Office he could not accept the invitation. In the course of a demonstration at the India Office Sir Jagadish drew special attention to the severe economic danger, which faced India. It was tragic that with her great potential wealth India should be in such a plight. Sir Jagadish demonstrated the recent invention of infinitesimal contraction recorder to an appreciative audience composed of prominent leaders of the House of Commons and eminent scientists. The most recent discoveries of Sir Jagadish will shortly be published by Longmans under the title "Growth and Tropic Movement of Plants". Sir Jagadish, who left for Calcutta by Nagpur Mail, will give a demonstration of his latest discoveries at the time of the anniversary of the Bose Institute on November 30.

All-India Federation of Teachers:—The reception committee of the fifth annual conference of the All-India Federation of Teachers have decided to hold a conference on the 27th, 28th and 29th December and have elected the Rt. Hon. V. S. Srinivasa Sastri as President of the conference.

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

NOTES.

Satyagraha And Social Reform:—The threat that if Hindu temples in Bombay and Poona were not thrown open by a given date to antyajias, the latter would force their entrance into them, has served only to stiffen orthodox opposition. Several trustees of temples to whom the ultimatum was delivered a few days ago, have replied refusing to agree to the proposed reform, and some of them have expressly stated that they would resist by force any attempt to break the long-standing practice on the part of the antyajias. The threat of "direct action" by the more aggressive antyajia leaders, has thus seriously come in the way of the conciliatory negotiations set on foot by Sheth Jamnalal Bajaj and other Hindu leaders to persuade temple authorities in the interests of Hindu religion to let down the barriers raised against this particular class of the Hindu community in respect of temple entry and other social and religious incidents. The problem would have been brought more quickly nearer to a pacific and, therefore, permanent solution, if the caste Hindu reformers had been allowed unhampered to negotiate with the social and religious leaders of the community. We have never believed in "satyagraha" as a method of religious, social or even political reform. There is no hard and fast line between these spheres. When an individual or set of them feel that they are called upon to act in accordance with some high truth which appeals to them as a matter of conscience, they are entitled to obey the call disregarding persecution and injury. But when it is a question principally of getting other people to accept their point of view and act in accordance with it, "satyagraha" is merely a method of coercion—there is no moral element, which always implies disinterestedness, in it. The question of the removal of untouchability, including temple entry, is mainly one for the higher caste Hindus as it involves their giving up a prejudice which has come down to them as a tradition. They will be very foolish if they do not read the signs of the times aright, and rectify practices which are unjust and, in some cases, inhuman. If they fail to do so, Hinduism will be judged by the world at large as a religion with a past but with no future. They may decide that it is better that Hinduism should perish rather than that they should change their old habits. If they do so, their posterity will hold them responsible for destroying a precious culture which, chiefly because of its adaptability to changing conditions, had come down to them in an unbroken chain from the immemorial past.

India And Dominion Status:—The Viceroy has issued a statement, which is printed in another page, giving the result of his conversations with the British Government during his recent visit to England on Indian constitutional reform. Lord Irwin, it will be remembered, is a Conservative in British politics and was appointed by the Conservative Government to the Viceroyalty in succession to the Marquess of Reading. The fall of the Conservative Government in consequence of the defeat at the General Election and the accession to office of the Labour Government in June, necessitated personal consultation between the new British Government and the Viceroy regarding the future of constitutional reform. The Viceroy observes that, he conveyed to the British Government a faithful picture of the political situation in this country and that the latter have authorised him to state clearly that in their judgement it is implicit in the Declaration of 1917 that the natural issue of India's constitutional progress, as there contemplated, is the attainment of Dominion Status. It was so understood by almost everybody, taken particularly in the light of India's signing the Treaty at Versailles and taking her place as an original member of the League of Nations. But Sir Malcolm Hailey speaking as Home Member a few years later in the Legislative Assembly, drew a distinction between responsible Government which the Declaration of 1917 promised and Dominion Status, and since then an explicit declaration promising Dominion Status has been demanded by Indian opinion. The Viceroy's statement makes it clear that the Labour Government understands the Declaration of 1917 to mean Dominion Status. Nothing is said as to whether the leaders of the other British parties accept this interpretation. Anyhow, it is a distinct gain that one important party has authoritatively given its interpretation and may be expected to stand by it.

The Round Table Conference:—The other important part of the Viceroy's statement is that relating to the calling of British Indian and Indian States' delegates in consultation by the British Government before formulating their proposals on the report of the Statutory Commission on Indian constitutional reforms prior to their submission to Parliament. It will be recalled that there was great dissatisfaction in this country amongst people of all shades of political opinion regarding the composition and procedure of the Simon Commission from which Indians were deliberately excluded. The dissatisfaction manifested itself in an almost complete boycott of the Commission by politically minded Indians, most of those who gave evidence or otherwise co-operated with the Commission being representatives of communal and sectional interests who wished special privileges or concessions for themselves. For a long time, the Commission and the Anglo-Indian press pretended that the boycott did not much affect the Commission's enquiry. The fact however, was quite patent, and the Chairman of the Central Committee which assisted the Commission, Sir Sankaran Nair, was quite plain that the Commission and the Committee had to carry out their duties in the face of the opposition of the intelligentsia. The Viceroy could not but perceive it, and His Excellency, no doubt, told the British Government that such was the fact. To rectify the mistake about the constitution of the Commission was impossible, both because it was too late and because Mr. Ramsay Macdonald, as leader of the Opposition, had not only approved but even vehemently defended the exclusion of Indians from the Commission. So a way had to be found in a somewhat roundabout manner, as is usual with Governments, to correct their mistakes without openly acknowledging them to be mistakes. From the first, the National Congress party has taken exception to the pre-amble to the Government of India Act of 1919 which makes the British Parliament the final judge of the course and pace of Indian constitutional reform. It has demanded a Round Table Conference at which representatives of Britain and India can sit as equals and discuss and decide on constitutional matters, as was done in the case of the Irish Free State. The Viceroy announced that representatives of British India and the States will be invited, when the Report of the Simon Commission is ready, to place their respective points of view before the British Government prior to their making any proposals to Parliament. The bringing in of the Indian States, which have so long been encouraged to keep aloof, at this stage into the business is viewed with suspicion in some quarters where, it is regarded, as analogous to the use of tame elephants to break in the new captives of the Keddah to man's service. But it need not necessarily be so. On the other hand, the representatives of British India might influence the State representatives to view their own problem from a new and comprehensive point of view.

Organised Proselytism and Religious Freedom:—Indian Witness of the 10th instant gave the first place to the following under the heading "Gwalior Not Guilty":—

"In our issue of the 22nd August we referred to Gwalior State as having enacted legislation which imposes severe restrictions on the legal right to be converted. Correspondence with a friend living within the State has elicited the joyful information that the legislation in question was not actually enacted. It was proposed as a State Bill but did not become law. Opposition seems to have developed from several realms. That the would-be Hindu dictators were not strong enough to pass the Bill is a cause for gratitude. If Hindu politicians, either in the Indian State or in British India, proceed with such a legislative programme as that they will deserve to be stigmatized as enemies of national well-being. In no other part of the civilized world, except among the Bolsheviks, would a modern State, or a party strong enough to form an alternative Government, propose to interfere with the right of a citizen to be converted to any religion that he believes to be right and best for him."

Gwalior is just at present under a minority administration and it is, perhaps, as well that an important piece of legislation should not be passed by a provisional regime. The opinion of our contemporary that those who promote anti-proselytising legislation are enemies of national well-being, is not shared by many outside professional missionary circles in India or any other country. America prohibits the mere entry of Asiatics except under stringent conditions. As our contemporary mentions the Bolsheviks, it may be pointed out that Bolshevik propaganda which is against private property is forbidden under stringent penalties in British and other Christian countries. Proselytising missions, financed from abroad, which aim at nothing less than the uprootment of the moral and religious basis of Indian civilization, we are solemnly asked to believe, cannot be prohibited without the principle of religious freedom which, we may remind our contemporary, was adopted in this country as an internal part of national policy long centuries before Europe thought of it, and which, therefore, is in no peril of being discarded by the Indian people. The Witness misconceives the prohibition of organised proselytism as being the same thing as the right of the individual to follow the religion which appeals to him. There is a world of difference between the two. Organised proselytism is nothing but an exploitation in the religious field, the same as commercial exploitation in the economic.

University Ideals:—In his opening address at the Inter-University Conference which is now holding its second session in Delhi, His Excellency the Viceroy emphasised the necessity of maintaining a high standard of proficiency in the Universities. He further pointed out that the function of a University is to create and maintain the three-fold standard of learning, judgment and conduct. Continuing Lord Irwin pointed out that they (the Indian Universities) must insist on maintaining such standards of admission as to exclude those who have neither the capacity nor equipment to profit by University training. We find ourselves in agreement with much that has been said in the address but we must confess that the aristocratic theory of University education comes to us as a surprise. It is, we believe, primarily in the field of education that the principle of equal opportunity should be recognized. It is a strange coincidence that Signor Mussolini's views of higher education bear a striking resemblance to this view. In his "Autobiography," Signor Mussolini devotes special attention to the Fascist educational programme which he says "puts on the scrap-heap the democratic conception which considered the State School as an institution for everyone—a basket into which treasure and waste was piled together."

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.
BOMBAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1929.

ANTI-PROHIBITION FALLACIES.

In his concluding remarks at the close of the Dussarah Session of the Mysore Representative Assembly the Dewan, Mr. Mirza Ismail, referred to the discussion on what he called the "time-worn topic of prohibition." The topic is by no means "time-worn" since Prohibition as a policy of State is not quite ten years old, and was the central issue at the presidential election only last year in the United States. Mr. Mirza Ismail's remarks show that he has not made himself thoroughly familiar with the results of the Prohibition policy in that great country and, perhaps, he has derived his information largely from the anti-Prohibition propagandists who are so influentially represented in the Government of India and the Anglo-Indian press. The present prosperity of the United States, it has been repeatedly pointed out, is largely due to the Prohibition policy which has transferred a large part of the earnings of the working and middle classes from the drink saloon to the savings banks, and wrought a striking and altogether beneficent revolution in the lot of their women and children. No administrator, particularly in this country where he generally belongs to classes to which drink and its evils are more or less abstractions, can realise in all its tragic magnitude the seriousness of the Prohibition issue, unless he has constantly before his mind's eye the sordid picture of starving children, ill-used wives and desolated homes of the wage-earners given to drink. "Given to drink"! Many of these men have confessed that they are fully and painfully conscious of the curse of the drink-habit, that they would like to free themselves from it but could not, so long as they have to face the temptation of a liquor shop in their neighbourhood. The mere removal of liquor shops in a village has often put an end to the drink evil. We are not drawing upon our imagination. If Mr. Mirza Ismail has any doubts on the point we suggest that he should ask Mr. Vallabhbhai Patel who is engaged in an intensive campaign against drink in Gujerat. Or, if he thinks Mr. Vallabhbhai is a politician whose point of view cannot be acceptable to a practical administrator, we ask him to consult Dewan Bahadur R. Ramchandra Rao, who retired only last year from high administrative office in the Madras Presidency, and who is devoting his leisure to the work of rural re-construction in one of the poorest villages in the Salem district. We had recently a long conversation with him on his work which in some respects is quite as good if not better than that of Mr. Brayne in Gurgaon of which much has been written. "What do you think of Mr. Brayne's work," the Dewan Bahadur was asked. His reply came promptly. "You perhaps expect me"—we didn't—"to speak disparagingly of it because he is a European. No, it is quite good. The excellence of it is due considerably to the co-operation of his wife, which unfortunately I do not possess as my wife is the daughter of a Jaghirdar." We quote his words in a private conversation to show the spirit of the man so entirely absorbed in his work. To come to the point. Dewan Bahadur Ramchandra Rao took up the work as a Co-operator. He was one of the first Registrars of Co-operative Societies, and his work was so successful that some officials actually suspected him of politically subversive intentions. The intimate knowledge and experience gained during his term of office, he is now utilising in the great experiment he is carrying on in the Salem village. The Dewan Bahadur was led early in his research into the causes which militated against the spread of his co-operation propaganda, to the village liquor shops. The peasants in reply to his enquiries replied in the terms which we have quoted above. He got the shops removed after a struggle with the Excise hierarchy, and he met almost immediately with gratifying improvement in the response to his efforts.

Mr. Mirza Ismail declared that the Mysore Government was as anxious as Prohibition advocates to abolish the drink traffic but they have to consider first the loss of revenue which in Mysore he estimated at about one crore of rupees. This is about one-fourth of the total revenue of the State and to give it up without finding other sources of replacing it is unthinkable. Mr. Mirza asked the Assembly whether it was prepared to forego it. That, we think, is not a fair question to put to the Assembly. When years ago a Temperance Deputation waited on Mr. Gladstone, the greatest of British Chancellors of the Exchequer, one of its members started to suggest how the loss of revenue could be made good. "Leave that to me," interrupted Mr. Gladstone, "If the country wants reform it is my duty, as its Finance Minister, to find other ways of reimbursing the Treasury for the loss." Mr. Mirza Ismail is not the first administrator who has put this question as a poser to Prohibitionists. It is wrong. It is the duty of the Minister to find ways and means for carrying out a policy favoured by the people. Let us ask Mr. Mirza a question. He of course, like every thinking Indian would like to see people giving up liquor. Supposing by voluntary propaganda, the people of Mysore are induced to become total abstainers, there will be the same loss of revenue. What would Government do in that case? No doubt there will be a saving of the expenditure on the preventive establishment but this in India will be very much less than in Western countries, because the sentiment, religious and social against drink, is so strong and widespread. The sentiment against drink is even yet sufficiently strong to be utilised as an asset by the statesman who is anxious to save his people from the demoralising and degrading influence of drink. The very fact that the State depends to the extent of a fourth part of its revenue on the drink traffic, provides food for the statesman's anxious consideration. The crore of rupees revenue from drink means at least four crores worth of waste and demoralisation apart from the expenditure on jails and police which crime associated with drink entails. In this question at least, "the arm-chair critics" whom the Dewan ridiculed are better informed than the practical administrator who is so often the victim of a vicious routine. Mr. Mirza Ismail's observations are calculated to cause deep disappointment to those who, like us, are aware that his outlook on national progress is, in other respects, precisely the same as that of progressive nationalism. And the unfortunate part of it is that he had not only sought to justify the Mysore Government's indifference in this respect, but to place at the disposal of all other governments which are equally indifferently disposed, an argument in support of their lethargy. Prohibition is now one of the first planks of the national programme. From that place it cannot be dislodged by specious arguments of the kind we have criticised in this article.

A PREFACE TO MORALS.*

The generation that has grown up after the War has displayed the world over a tendency to look with distrust not only at the faith of their fathers but at the existing social and economic order. Even the code of morals which has never been doubted by the most ardent "protestant" of the past is now questioned since it is so closely associated with religion. That India which has been regarded as the cradle of religions is herself witnessing such a revolt is amply demonstrated by the controversies raging in the local newspapers on religious questions and by the proposal by a college principal to introduce theistic education in our schools and colleges which is now before the Senate of the Bombay University. Mr. Walter Lippman's "Preface to Morals", therefore, comes at an opportune moment. There have always been, Mr. Lippman points out, a few educated men in all ages who have not found the established religion broad enough for them but now disbelief has become widespread. Moreover whenever men have preached against existing faiths they have invariably set up a new orthodoxy but at present people have begun to doubt their own rebellion. At the same time though the capacity to believe is lost the old need for a religion is still there and the pressing problem is to supply that need. Mr. Lippman's book, as he points out at the outset, has not been written with a view to shake the belief of the orthodox nor is it concerned with those who are still exhilarated by their escape from some form of orthodoxy but with those who are perplexed by the consequences of their own irreligion.

Belief in theocracy has been always a feature of popular religion and though the world counts among its great teachers many who do not accept the conception of God as Sovereign, disbelief in the personal relationship of God and man is regarded as indicative of an irreligious mind. But, says Lippman, religion is not so much a cosmic government as the education and discipline of the human will. The great teachers knew this but they seem to have withheld it from the masses of mankind whom, as our author points out, they never in fact attempted to teach. They believed evidently in an aristocracy of religion. The rigorous discipline imposed on their followers—a discipline which obviously only the few could endure—by some teachers and the fact that others avoided setting up any organization worth mentioning show that they were more concerned with the few who were dissatisfied with the religion in which they found themselves than with the masses who were not moved by doubt. But this view naturally has not been accepted by their followers who having established a new orthodoxy, have glossed over the inconvenient utterances of their masters and have attributed them to misinterpretation and to faults in translation. Now that the majority of the people are moved by doubt the necessity has arisen for high religion to be diffused among the masses. It would be as dangerous and wrong to withhold the truth from a people ripe for it as it would have been to disclose it prematurely. It is now time to search the words of the world's teachers—and not only of the "religious teachers"—because they represent the highest wisdom and the crystallised experience of humanity and not as revelations from on high.

Right through the ages mankind have held in esteem certain qualities which have all had in them an element of disinterestedness. Various attempts have been made to attain a detached attitude through a system of discipline, an extreme instance being asceticism. But the ideal of disinterestedness is inherent in the modern world and Mr. Lippman proceeds to demonstrate this in three important spheres of modern life—business, politics and sex. With the advent of large industrial concerns it is becoming increasingly difficult to control and regulate business without a high degree of socialisation. In politics the work of government in advanced communities is not to rule the subjects but to help the people to rule their own affairs. It is not enough, say Mr. Lippman, that the subjects in a modern state should be a law abiding people, they should also be law-enforcing, else an energetic minority will defeat the provisions of the law. The inapplicability of external control is most evident in the field of sex. The general diffusion of birth control and the economic independence of women has contributed largely to create this situation. In every aspect of life therefore the slackening of external control and the difficulty of exercising it have given rise to the necessity for the development of the internal checks which are inherent in man. The moralist has fallen into disrepute because he has insisted on exhorting the people to good. "But he is irrelevant, if not meddling and dangerous, unless in his teaching he strives to give a true account, imaginatively conceived, of that which experience would show is desirable among the choices that are possible and necessary."

The emphasis in Mr. Lippman's book is laid on education and discipline. Freedom, he points out, can only be made use of by the mature. It is true the process of educating the minds of men and training them to lead the good life is slow and the impetuous reformer may prefer to make men "moral by Act of Parliament." But there are no short cuts to progress and the only certain method is that of education. The law in a modern state, to be effective, must not be too far ahead of public opinion. A good part of the book—particularly the portions relating to business and government—is not applicable to this country. This is due to the fact that India is in the transition stage. During this period there should be an interim rule to train the people to adapt themselves to the industrial system, and Lippman points out that this has happened in Russia and Italy and, we may add, is just what is happening in China. The exposition of general principles, however, applies and we have no hesitation in warmly commending the book to our readers as one of the most thought provoking books we have come across in recent times.

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XLIV. BUILDERS.

The builder is one of God's most important fellow workers, and he should be one of the happiest. Very few men can actually see the results of their labours, but to the builder there is the picture of homes occupied by happy families, schools swarming with eager children, temples of worship thronged with believers, and massive piles pulsating with the life of business. The builder is an artist, a creator, and a master craftsman. Though at times members of the building profession grossly misuse their talents in building cheap and flimsy structures for the sake of profits, the standard of the profession as a whole is a high one. The true craftsman prides himself upon the quality of his work, and looks upon himself as an essential element in the great world enterprise.

The story has been told many times of Sir Christopher Wren inspecting the work of his builders.

Approaching a group of three workmen engaged in the same task, he inquired of the first, "What are you doing?" "I am hauling stone," answered the man, thinking to himself of the hard physical labour which his task involved. "And what are you doing?" asked the architect of the second. "I am earning ten shillings a day," replied the worker, and the thought of gain was to him some compensation for the monotony of his task. "And you," said Sir Christopher to the third, "What are you doing?" "I am building a cathedral, Sir!" and the note in his voice was a note of exultation. To this man work was much more than drudgery or making money. He was a sharer in a great co-operative enterprise. And so it is with all true builders. They are not simply craftsmen, they are builders of cathedrals, taking pride and finding joy in the character of their work.

In the history of the Hebrew people there is a passage telling of the repair of the temple. In this passage we find the significant words: "Howbeit there was no reckoning made with them (the builders) of the money that was delivered into their hands, because they dealt faithfully." Here indeed we have the picture of an ideal building operation. Carpenters and masons are entrusted with funds to buy timber and hew stone, and such is the confidence of the authorities in their integrity that no reckoning is required of them. These early builders were working for more than money. They held before themselves the ideal of a task well done. When a builder once senses the meaning of perfection he does not need to be watched for fear that he will substitute inferior work. He cannot do otherwise than to deal faithfully.

The world traveller stands many times in awe before the building projects of past civilizations. As he sees gorgeous temples carved directly from the solid rock, gigantic stone bulwarks thrown up against the sides of mountains, pyramids, aqueducts, and ruins of cities giving evidence of large scale masonry, he cannot but ask the question, "How was this accomplished?" And the answer probably is none other than the words—"forced labour." Those who built the marvels of the ancient world were slaves driven by the lash of their taskmasters. For the dawn of a new day in which building helpers are rising to the status of persons we give our heart-felt thanks.

APPEAL TO TEMPLE TRUSTEES.

"In view of the fact that the question of solving the problem of untouchability among the Hindus is coming to a head and cannot be further delayed without putting the whole future of the community in jeopardy, and in view of the fact that spasmodic attempts are now and then made to solve the problem by various individuals or organisations in the country according to their own lights, without cohesion and often to great detriment of Hindu solidarity, we are firmly of opinion that the time has now come for the Hindu community as a whole to move from the present untenable position. We, therefore appeal to all thinking Hindus, heads of Religious Orders, leaders of caste organisations, Panchayats, Samajas, Sabhas, and all other Hindu organisations modern or ancient, to fix a day—conveniently the next Kartiki (ray Prabhadas) Ekadasbi—as a day of the extinction of untouchability, disregard thenceforward all conventions that prescribe observance of untouchability and deal or associate without distinction with all castes recognised as being within the fold of Hinduism. All those depressed Hindu classes who have hitherto been termed as “untouchables” and kept at a distance should be re-admitted into the social fold and allowed to share common benefits of free association and intercourse in all outdoor dealings, in all public places and on all public occasions, fairs, festivals, processions, meetings etc. including in temples of Gods which should be considered as the last place for any distinction between man and man.”

The above is signed by the following gentlemen:—
Shantaram Narayan Dabholkar, Purshottamdas Thakurdas, Chunilal V Mehta, M. R. Jayakar, Narottam Morarji, Lallubhai Samaldas, Vasantao N. Dabholkar, G. V. Deshmukh, N. C. Kelkar, L. B. #### MR. JAMNALAL BAJAJ'S STATEMENT.

In releasing the above appeal to the Press, Seth Jamnalal Bajaj, Secretary, Anti-Untouchability Committee, Indian National Congress made the following statement:—

In sending this appeal for publication I desire to make a few observations. The readiness with which the idea of issuing such a general appeal was hailed in all quarters and the promptness with which leaders of both Deccani as well as Gujrati sections in Bombay, many of them well-known for their conservative outlook, signed it has only confirmed me in my belief that the Hindu community as a whole clearly realises to-day the basic injustice involved in the attitude hitherto maintained and that an all pervading earnestness combines the Hindu leaders to-day in one supreme effort to heal this running sore on the body of the community.

It is a pity that some of the leaders of the untouchables should choose just this time for a vociferous self-assertion by “satyagraha” to effect entry into temples and should have issued what are bound to be characterized as “ultimatums.” The caste Hindus, I feel confident, will not, as they never should, hesitate for a moment from discharging what they deem to be their debt of honour, simply because some of the recipients take it with illgrace or even disdain to receive it as a gift. It is regrettable that those who desire to establish their due claims should insist on asserting themselves by an exhibition of power when those claims are already admitted on grounds of justice and when so many of those who count in the community are striving to get them respected in practice. My recent experience of the earnestness of Hindus in this matter emboldens me to say that this curse of untouchability would be a thing of the past throughout the length and breadth of India if the Congress is allowed twelve months more to tackle the problem through propaganda and persuasion and if the extreme wings instead of provoking each other into stiffening their backs help to maintain the present atmosphere of universal goodwill towards its solution.

It is some consolation however that the latest news from the Satyagraha quarters is that they do not favour a hasty precipitation of the methods of direct action if the Hindu community rises to the occasion and makes a reassuring response in time.

More signatures are coming in. Those desirous of joining in the above appeal may send their signatures at 395, Kalbadevi, Bombay.

ALL INDIA WOMEN'S CONFERENCE.

HALF YEARLY REPORT.

AUGUST 1929.

Since the Patna Session, the Third Annual Report has been published in English, and distributed not only amongst our own members, and all those interested in our work in India, but widely in Europe and America by our Organising Secretary Mrs. Kamaladevi Chattopadhyaya, and Mrs. Cousins.

It was decided at the Patna Session to issue the report also in Hindi and Urdu, which had not been done previously; the only vernacular Report so far being a Marathi edition of the first Annual Report, for which a special donation had been received.

In framing the Budget this year special provision was made for these two vernacular reports. It has proved, however, very difficult to obtain a suitable translation into Urdu, and to get estimates within the sum allotted. We owe many thanks to Mrs. Miles Irving for her persistent efforts towards this end in spite of many discouragements and disappointments.

Notwithstanding all her work on the Age of Consent Committee, Mrs. Nehru, Secretary of the Social Section, took up the work of translating the report into Hindi and of seeing it through the Press. We extend to her the grateful appreciation of the Conference for the courage and devotion thus placed at its disposal.

It is hoped to distribute these two versions shortly; and that the experience gained this year will allow of the Hindi and Urdu reports being issued next year within the first quarter. It is most essential for the spreading of our work among the masses of Indian women that an account of it should be available in various vernaculars; and in this connection we welcomed the request of the member for Sindh for permission to publish, from local resources, the report in Sindhi, as neither of the other versions is useful in that Province.

In May our Organising Secretary, Mrs. Chattopadhyaya, proceeded to Europe to represent our Conference at the International World Congress of Women held in Berlin in June; and at the Fifth World Conference on Education held at Elsinore, in Denmark, in August. She was also chosen by the All-India Federation of Teachers as their delegate to the Third Biennial Conference of the World Federation of Educational Associations, held in Geneva at the end of July.

At the time of writing this Report, we hear from her of the great success of the Congress at Berlin; and of the important part taken there in the debate on Child Marriage by the various Indian ladies present, some of whom were Members of our Conference.

While in Europe Mrs. Chattopadhyaya has been able to do a great deal in spreading, among the women of the several countries she visited, a knowledge of the ideals, and of the work, of our Conference. She has also been able to arrange for European firms to exhibit labour and time-saving devices at the Household Exhibition which will form part of our Bombay Session. During the absence of our Organising Secretary, Mrs. Hamid Ali, our late Chairwoman and one of our Vice-presidents, has been acting as Organising Secretary; she has also organised a Local Women's Association in her new district—Alibagh.

Our first Chairwoman, one of the originators of our Conference, Mrs. Cousins, has been travelling in America, lecturing and visiting educational and social institutions. She writes that she has gathered much material for the use of our Conference; and has been able to make our aims and work known in many parts of the States. To the list of twenty-eight Constituent Areas as found in the Third Annual report two more must now be added:—

Kashmir with Mrs. Mukerjee as Standing Committee member and West Punjab represented on the Standing Committee by Mrs. Dobson.

From the half-yearly reports submitted by our Standing Committee members, it is clear that splendid and varied work has been done by the local committees, which, since the Patna Session, are divided in most cases into Educational and Social Sections.

Crèches, clinics, primary education in villages, work in jails, girl guiding, sanitation are some of the activities most often mentioned in these Reports.

Any of our Areas intending to start any of these, or other activities, would gain most useful information by writing to our Organising Secretary in order to be put in touch with others already at work in any special direction.

Many of the Areas have accepted the Social Service Resolutions suggested by Mrs. Nehru and have passed resolutions denouncing Child Marriage. Other Areas have realised the importance of improving the economic conditions of women and have started Industrial Homes for them.

The Constituent Areas have, in many cases, been thoroughly organised by sub-division with local sub-committees, notably as follows:—

Sindh	...	with 3 sub-constituent areas.
Oudh	...	1     "
Cochin	...	2     "
Mysore	...	3     "
Ajmere	...	2     "
Central Punjab.		5     "
Malabar	...	2     "

In nearly all our Areas public meetings have been held to explain the work done at Patna and in connection with Child Marriage.

It is with great pleasure we note that propaganda in the country against Child Marriage is having the effect of converting many people to our point of view. The youth of the country has taken up the matter in a spirit of social service; and practically all Students' Associations have passed resolutions in some way connected with the abolition of Child Marriage. A college in the Punjab has doubled its fees for married boys; and girls too are gradually realising their responsibility in the matter.

Her Highness the Rani of Mandi, convener of our Child Marriage Sub-Committee, has suggested having a competition for all Indian boys and girls to write an essay on the abolition of Child Marriage, and awarding a handsome prize for the best essay. The matter is under the consideration of the Secretary of our Social Section.

Legislation in Baroda has recently made the marriage of children under eight invalid.

Since the Patna session the women of Bihar and Orissa have received the franchise.

From the report received, we are gratified to learn that the number of women on boards and committees controlling education is constantly increasing, either by nomination or election. In this connection we have pleasure in recording the election to the Bombay University Senate of Mrs. Sharada Mehta. There are as yet no women representatives on the Legislative Assembly; and in view of the fact that many bills are pending which affect women vitally, such as the Child Marriage Act, the Women's Law of inheritance and others, it is felt by the Conference to be absolutely necessary to have women representatives in the Assembly; and whenever occasion may arise the Conference will work towards this end.

At the Delhi Standing Committee meetings, the following resolution was passed unanimously. "In view of the extreme necessity of the presence of women on all legislatures, the Standing Committee impresses on its members the need for women contesting seats in the coming elections, and for helping women candidates in their election campaigns. It also urges the members of the Conference to approach all intending candidates; and to persuade them to include, as an important item in their election programme, support of the cause of women and children". Mrs. Nehru proposed that the Standing Committee should request the leaders of all Parties to adopt at least one woman candidate, and this was passed unanimously. Action was taken immediately and a deputation of nine Standing Committee members attended on the leaders of all parties then present at Delhi, with the following result. Pandit Malaviya and Pandit Motilal Nehru promised to put the matter before a joint meeting they were holding the next day, and to adopt a candidate if a suitable woman came forward. Sir D'Arcy Lindsay pointed out that the representation of his party scarcely allowed them to adopt a woman candidate. Sir Zulfikar Khan promised to consider the question if a Muslim woman candidate came forward.

With regard to the Royal Commission on labour we put forward the claims of Indian women to be represented on it by an Indian woman. Unfortunately Mrs. Anasuya Behn, whose name would have carried great weight everywhere, declared herself unable to serve on the Commission, and the Government stated that they were unable to find another suitable Indian lady. Some of the Standing Committee Members went on deputation with regard to this; and, as part of the result, the Joint Secretary of the Commission has written to say that the Royal Commission on Labour "will welcome the co-operation of the members of the All India Women's Conference in securing evidence, both written and oral, in respect to the conditions of labour affecting women and children in important centres of industry."

The Standing Committee Members have been circularised, and it is hoped that in every industrial area at least, we shall be able to find a lady who will collect evidence and be willing to be examined and also be prepared to accompany the Commission round the works, factories, etc. with which her evidence deals.

In the last Half Yearly report we recorded with regret that so far our action with regard to the physical education of girls in the Madras Presidency had not been successful. Since then, the Committee appointed by the Government of Madras have asked our Organising Secretary to send in a report with her opinion on the following subject: "To investigate the question of physical education of girls in the elementary and secondary schools in this Presidency". In her reply our Secretary included all the resolutions passed by our Conference on this subject.

The Madras University has recognised the importance of physical culture and we are glad to note that this has been made a compulsory subject. It is regrettable that the Bombay Government have disallowed a bill of compulsory physical education but while this report is in the Press we hear that the Committee appointed by the Government of Bombay to inquire into Physical Culture in the Presidency, among other recommendations, strongly advocate the appointment of an Indian lady to be in charge of the Physical Education of the girls in the Bombay Presidency.

Representations have been made to the Provincial Governments on the subject of appointing a woman Assistant Registrar of Co-operative Societies in each Province, as has already been done in the Punjab.

The Baroda Local Committee has done a good deal of propaganda to remove some clauses from the Divorce Bill which was pending before the Baroda Legislative Council. It protested strongly against relaxing the marriage laws and making divorce easy before safeguarding the economic position of women by legislating in their favour with regard to the Hindu laws of inheritance. The Local Committee was helped to a great extent by the members of the Dhara Sabha and by many Hindu lawyers of Baroda. Ultimately the Bill has been postponed until the laws of inheritance have been passed.

Owing to Dr. Muthulaxmi's efforts the Devadasi Bill has been passed by the Madras Government. There is a similar bill pending before the Bombay Council which, we hope, will be passed this year.

Our Social Section Secretary, Mrs. Nehru, a member of the Age of Consent Committee, has been since the Patna Session, very busy with the work of the Age of Consent Committee. This Committee have now presented their Report; and it is expected that it will have a considerable effect towards raising the Age of Consent as well as the legal age of marriage.

The Standing Committee met at Delhi in April to consider the constitution of this Fund; and meetings in this connection were held at Viceregal Lodge, Delhi, under the chairmanship of H. E. Lady Irwin. At this meeting, the constitution was finally settled; a provisional Governing Body and officers arranged for; and every step taken for registration. H. E. Lady Irwin is President; Sir Bhupendranath Mitra, Treasurer and Mrs. Faridooji with Mrs. Miles Irving as assistant Secretary.

The next Annual Session is to be held in Bombay in January 1930; and the time of it is being so arranged that members of the All India Women's Conference who are members of the All India Women's Education Fund Association will be able to attend the first General Meeting of the Association and those of them who are Governors of the Fund Association can attend the meetings of the Governing Body.

The Bombay Session will include Visual Instruction in the form of visits to educational and social institutions, and Exhibition of Time and Labour-Saving Household Apparatus as well as the usual debates and business meetings.

CONCLUSION.

In conclusion we may add that, in receiving the reports of the Constituent Areas, and in viewing all the direct and indirect work of the Conference, we feel assured that the Conference is meeting the need of the women of India in finding expression for the awakening powers which lead them to come forward and join forces for the benefit of their sisters educationally, socially and economically. No one can view the work of the last three years without dreaming dreams and seeing visions. For the work of the last three years has been comparable to the ploughing of land which already held living seed—a ploughing which has set free the life hidden in the seed; and allowed it to begin the fulfilment of its purpose. Soon shall we see that fulfilment nourishing and sanctifying all the educational, social and economic life of this land; giving to it the synthesis which it sorely needs—a synthesis not only organically uniting the India of the future with Her Past, but uniting this Land in loyal comradeship with all Sister Lands to the "Greater Glory of God and Service of Humanity."

INDIA AND DOMINION STATUS.

THE VICEROY'S ANNOUNCEMENT.

The following announcement was made by His Excellency the Viceroy in a Gazette of India Extraordinary issued on Friday:—

I have just returned from England where I have had the opportunity of a prolonged consultation with His Majesty's Government. Before I left this country I said publicly that as the King-Emperor's representative in India I should hold myself bound to tell my fellow-countrymen, as faithfully as I might, of India's feelings, anxieties and aspirations. In my endeavours to discharge that undertaking I was assisted by finding, as I had expected, a generous and sincere desire not only on the part of His Majesty's Government but on that of all persons and parties in Great Britain to hear and to appreciate everything that it was my duty to represent. These are critical days, when matters, by which men are deeply touched are in issue, and when, therefore, it is inevitable that political feeling should run high, and that misunderstandings, which would scarcely arise in conditions of political tranquillity, should obtain a firm foothold in men's mind. I have, nevertheless, not faltered in my belief that behind all the disquieting tendencies of the time there lay the great mass of Indian opinion overflowing all divisions of race, religion or political thought, fundamentally loyal to the King-Emperor, and, whether consciously or not, only wanting to understand and to be understood. On the other side I have never felt any doubt that opinion in Great Britain, puzzled, as it might be, by events in India or only perhaps partially informed as to their true significance, was unshaken in its determination that Great Britain should redeem to the full the pledges she has given for India's future. On both countries the times have laid a heavy and in some ways a unique responsibility; for, the influence on the world of a perfect understanding between Great Britain and India might surely be so great that no scales can give us the measure either of the prize of success or the price of failure in our attempts to reach it. In my discussions with the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State it was inevitable that the principal topic should have been the course of events in India. It is not profitable on either side to discuss to what extent or with what justification the appointment of a Parliamentary Commission two years ago has affected the general trend of Indian thought and action. Practical men must take facts and situations as they are and not as they would have them be. Sir John Simon's Commission, assisted, as it has been, by the Indian Central Committee, is now at work on its report and until that report is laid before Parliament it is impossible and, even if it were possible, it would, in the view of His Majesty's Government, clearly be improper to forecast the nature of any constitutional changes that may subsequently be proposed. In this respect every British Party is bound to preserve to itself complete freedom of action. But what must constantly engage our attention, and is a matter of deep concern to His Majesty's Government, is the discovery of means by which, when the Commission has reported, the broad question of British Indian constitutional advance may be approached in co-operation with all those who can speak authoritatively for opinion in British India. I would venture to recall some words which I used in addressing the Assembly eight months ago in reference to the then existing political situation. "On the one side", I said, "it is as unprofitable to deny the right of Parliament to form its free and deliberate judgment on the problem, as it would be short-sighted of Parliament to underrate the importance of trying to reach a solution which might carry the willing assent of political India." We shall surely stray from the path, at the end of which lies achievement, if we let go either the one or the other of those two main guiding principles of political action. But there has lately emerged from a totally different angle another set of considerations which is very relevant to what I have just stated on this matter to be the desire of His Majesty's Government.

The Chairman of the Indian Statutory Commission has pointed out, in the course of correspondence with the Prime Minister, which, I understand, is being published in England, that, as their investigation has proceeded, he and his colleagues have been greatly impressed, in considering the direction which the future constitutional development of India, is likely to take, with the importance of bearing in mind the relations which may, at some future time, develop between British India and the Indian States. In his judgment, it is essential that the methods by which this future relationship between these two constituent parts of greater India may be adjusted should be fully examined. He has further expressed the opinion that if the Commission's report and the proposals subsequently to be framed by the Government take this wider range, it would appear necessary for the Government to revise the scheme of procedure as at present proposed. He suggests that what might be required after the reports of the Statutory Commission and the Indian Central Committee have been made, considered and published, but before the stage of the Joint Parliamentary Committee is reached, would be the setting up of a conference in which His Majesty's Government should meet representatives both of British India and of the States for the purpose of seeking the greatest possible measure of agreement for the final proposals which it would later be the duty of His Majesty's Government to submit to Parliament. The procedure of the Joint Parliamentary Committee conferring with delegations from the Indian Legislature and other bodies, which was previously contemplated and is referred to in Sir John Simon's letter to myself of February 6, 1928, would still be appropriate for the examination of the Bill when it is subsequently placed before Parliament, but would, in the opinion of the Commission, obviously have to be preceded by some such conference as they have suggested. With these views I understand that His Majesty's Government are in complete accord. For, while they will greatly desire, when the time comes, to be able to deal with the question of British Indian political development under conditions most favourable to its successful treatment, they are, like the Commission, deeply sensible of the importance of bringing under a comprehensive review the whole problem of the relations of British India and the Indian States. Indeed, an adjustment of those interests, in their view, is essential for the complete fulfilment of what they consider to be the underlying purpose of British policy, whatever the method for its furtherance which Parliament may decide to adopt.

The goal of British policy was stated in the declaration of August 1917 to be that of providing for the "gradual development of self-governing institutions with a view to the progressive realisation of Responsible Government in India as an integral part of the British Empire." As I recently pointed out, my own instrument of instructions from the King Emperor expressly states that it is His Majesty's will and pleasure that the plans laid by Parliament in 1919 should be the means by which British India may attain its due place among his Dominions. Ministers of the Crown, moreover, have more than once publicly declared that it is the desire of the British Government that India should, in the fullness of time, take her place in the Empire in equal partnership with the Dominions; but in view of the doubts which have been expressed both in Great Britain and India regarding the interpretation to be placed on the intentions of the British Government, in enacting the Statute of 1919, I am authorised, on behalf of His Majesty's Government, to state clearly that in their judgment it is implicit in the Declaration of 1917 that the natural issue of India's constitutional progress, as there contemplated, is the attainment of Dominion Status. In the full realisation of this policy it is evidently important that the Indian States should be afforded an opportunity of finding their place, and, even if we cannot at present exactly foresee on what lines this development may be shaped, it is from every point of view desirable that whatever can be done should be done to ensure that action taken now is not inconsistent with the attainment of the ultimate purpose which those, whether in British India or the States, who look forward to some unity of All-India, have in view. His Majesty's Government consider that both these objects, namely, that of finding the best approach to the British Indian side of the problem and secondly of ensuring that in this process the wider question of closer relations in the future between the two parts of greater India is not overlooked, can best be achieved by the adoption of a procedure such as the Commission has outlined. When therefore, the Commission and the Indian Central Committee have submitted their reports, and these have been published, and when His Majesty's Government have been able, in consultation with the Government of India to consider these matters in the light of all the material then available, they will propose to invite representatives of different parties and interests in British India and representatives of the Indian States to meet them separately or together, as circumstances may demand, for the purpose of conference and discussion in regard both to the British-Indian and the All-Indian problems. It will be their earnest hope that, by this means, it may subsequently prove possible on these grave issues to submit proposals to Parliament which may command a wide measure of general assent. It is not necessary for me to say how greatly I trust that the action of His Majesty's Government may evoke response from, and enlist the concurrence of all sections of opinion in India; and I believe that all who wish India well, wherever and whoever they are, desire to break through the webs of mistrust that have lately clogged the relations between India and Great Britain. I am firmly assured that the course of action now proposed is at once the outcome of a real desire to bring to the body politic of India the touch that carries with it healing and health and is the method by which we may best hope to handle those high matters in the way of constructive statesmanship.

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

NOTES.

The Late Mr. Narottam Morarjee:—A very large circle of friends will mourn the death in distressingly sudden circumstances of Mr. Narottam Morarjee, which occurred on Tuesday afternoon. Mr. Narottam was returning to Bombay from Sholapur in a motor-car and stopped near Lonavla to have a view from one of the highest points of the Western Ghats. By a fatal mischance he lost his balance and was flung down a height of about 1500 feet into the valley below where his body was found twenty-four hours later. The position which Mr. Narottam held in the business world was such that the news of his death sharply affected the Share market. But it is as a cultured and warm-hearted friend with overflowing sympathy for all good causes, that Mr. Narottam will be best remembered by those who knew him.

Marriage and Sacrament:—There are only two religious systems in which marriage is regarded as a sacrament—the Hindu and the Christian. Among Christians, it is only the Catholic Church which strictly enforces the sacramental character of marriages, refusing to recognise divorce except under a special license from the Pope. The Church of England also adheres to the sacramental view of marriage but except very strict Anglicans, that view has ceased to be regarded as obligatory. Hinduism goes much farther than these two Christian denominations. It makes marriage not only indissoluble but, so far as women are concerned, it makes it indissoluble even on the death of the husband. This approximates to the Positivist ideal which, however, would apply equally to husband and wife. Among non-Christian religions, marriage has been generally recognised as a purely civil contract. But it is curious that while one school of Hindu reformers wish to annul the sacramental character of marriage and make it a civil affair, there is a tendency among Mussalmans and Parsis to claim that marriages among them are not civil contracts but sacraments. Mrs. Brijlal Nehru, in the speech on the Sarada Marriage Act which we reprint, called attention to this tendency among Mahomedan witnesses who appeared before the Age of Consent Committee of which she was a member.

Mr. Brayne's Work at Gurgoan:—Young India is publishing a series of articles on the work of village uplift which was carried on at Gurgoan in the Punjab by Mr. and Mrs. Brayne. Mr. Brayne was Collector of the District but has left it. The writer of the articles describes the position since then. It seems that nearly all the activities started by Mr. Brayne are showing signs of slackening. Much of the success which attended them in their inception seems to have been due to Mr. Brayne's official position which he freely utilised to push on his projects. In fact, he seems to have followed the methods of the ex-King Amanullah in Afghanistan. Here is a specimen:—"An important thing requiring mention is the famous Brayne Meo High School at Nuh Tehsil opened for the Meos of Musalman community," writes the correspondent. "The foundation stone of this school was laid in 1913 by Sir Fazal-i-Hussain then the Education Minister of the Punjab Government. Funds were raised for this school by Mr. Brayne and his subordinates from the Meos themselves. The manner in which the collection was made was most objectionable and arbitrary. Mr. Brayne issued orders to all the revenue officers to collect 40 per cent. more revenue from every one besides the usual revenue amount. None could defy his authority, and the fixed subscription was paid. Out of that fund this institution was erected. Mr. Brayne introduced scouting in the schools. But the scouts are not of any practical service to the villagers. They are only meant for shows and give salutes in uniform to the officers whenever anybody happens to be on tour in the villages. These boy scouts are generally too young to serve on the occasions of fairs or such big gatherings. Mr. Brayne also started night schools for adults. But these have failed. He introduced co-education in schools. He taught that the girls should be taught reading and writing and also household duties. He further suggested that the boys and girls should be made to sit together on the same benches. To the villagers this was outrageously shocking. So the people did not accept this idea, but a very small number of the villagers, through conviction or under official influence, sent their girls to common schools. After Mr. Brayne's retirement co-education exists only in name. I have visited five or six such schools. The number of girls on the rolls is very small. Even out of these very few actually attend. I did not find a girl in any such school. The teachers told me that it was only to please Brayne Sahab. Now nobody takes any interest in it?"

A Movable School:—Very little is known in India of the work that is being done in the United States to bridge over the gulf between White and Black, while much is written about lynchings. Mr. John L. Goheen who has recently returned to Sangli from a visit to his country, gives an interesting account in the Dnyanodaya of Negro Education in the States. Among institutions for promoting mass education, he mentions one which might be found useful in India. It is what he calls "the movable school." "The Booker T. Washington Movable School," he writes, "is a remarkable example of taking education to those who may not be able to come for it. In the early days this Movable School was a four-wheel spring wagon drawn by a pair of mules, but to-day it is a very serviceable motor truck, with a body much like the bodies of motor busses seen on the roads of India. It carries a farm extension expert, a community nurse, and a home economics expert, the latter two giving their attention to the women while the former sees to the men. What an inspiration it was to see these three actually at work, out in a small hamlet some miles from Tuskegee! The equipment they take is of the simplest yet most useful sort, and they give demonstrations of pruning trees, starting sweet potato sets, making simple rugs out of jute bags or sacking, showing how to make a sick person in the home comfortable, and have conditions in and about the house as sanitary as it is possible to make them. They meet the needs of the different seasons or circumstances that confront them and what untold good they are doing in this wonderful extension work of genuine education! The writer has come back to Sangli with a ship-load of satisfaction over the fact that the Sangli Industrial and Agricultural School has been promised such a Movable School."

Lahore National Social Conference:—Vigorous efforts are being made for the success of the forthcoming Indian National Social Conference to be held at Lahore during the Christmas week. The Reception Committee have addressed letters to various institutions carrying on social reform work inviting their opinion with regard to the subjects that should be taken up at the Conference. With the removal of some of the disabilities of Indian women and the depressed classes for which purpose the Social Conference was started, the scope of the Conference has been extended to include labour problems also. Stressing the necessity of a permanent organisation, the circular letter says.—"It has been felt that besides focusing public opinion on a number of important social problems the forth-coming session of the Social Conference at Lahore should take steps to adopt a constitution and establish a permanent body for the purpose of carrying on social reform and welfare work in the country throughout the year. We shall be obliged if you will kindly send us a brief report of the work done by your Association at the same time giving an idea of the nature of work you intend to take up in the future." A permanent body would greatly help to accelerate the work of social reform and counteract the criticism that the Conference has often unjustly incurred of consisting of all talk and resolutions.

Indian Women's Protest:—We publish elsewhere a statement which appeared both in the British and Indian Press signed by prominent Indian women now in England, about the unsavoury episode in the Women of India Conference. The signatories to the statement are themselves actively engaged in educational, social and welfare work on behalf of their Indian sisters and they have done a distinct service by exposing the intentions of their so-called well-wishers of Miss Rathbone type. The high-handed manner in which it was sought to put down Mrs. Rama Rao when she questioned the bona fides of those who convened the Conference is highly reprehensible. The dual part played by Miss Rathbone as the supporter of Miss Mayo and as the saviour of Indian women does not represent British womanhood at its best.

A Free College For Women:—We reproduce this week an article by Mr. Ramanand Chatterji on the Benares Hindu University Women's College. This institution is of peculiar interest to Bombay as it owes its existence to the munificence of a Bombay merchant. With sufficient public support, the college as Mr. Chatterji points out, will become a centre of women's education. Moreover the existence of such a college is bound to have a beneficial effect in northern India where women's education has been neglected by most of the Universities. Women from all parts of India will meet at this institution and this will bring about a better understanding between the various provinces. Pandit Malaviya is taking a keen interest in the college, particularly in the arrangements for physical exercise and recreation. But owing to insufficient resources they are at present unable to develop the college as they would like to, and it is to be hoped that there will be an adequate response from the public all over India.

A Novel Interpretation:—We have from Rajahmundry a novel interpretation of the Sarda Act. The District and Sessions Judge of East Godavari District giving permission to the marriage of a ward of the Court, aged 12 to a girl aged 10, stated, "that he would not have given permission for the marriage, but for the fact that the Sarda Act was coming into force on 1st April next. He said that the marriages amongst Vaisyas and Brahmins were only betrothals, but that the consummation would take place only some-time hence. But unless rich wards like the present one were not married early, there was danger of their falling into evil company, and getting spoiled, and though the marriage would take place now, consummation would take place only after the attainment of the proper age. He concluded that the early marriage of the boy would prevent illegitimate fatherhood, and that the Marriage Act would prevent premature birth of legitimate children". If the learned Judge regards the Marriage Act as a substitute for Birth Control, all that we can say is that he has not read the Act. It looks very much as if he intended to avoid the Act and gave the necessary permission in order to get the boy married before the date when the Act comes into force.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1929.

DOMINION STATUS FOR INDIA.

We published last week the Viceroy's statement announcing and explaining the new procedure to be adopted with reference to the report of the Simon Commission and, incidentally making it clear that the meaning and intention of the Declaration of August 1917 was that the end of British policy is to grant Dominion status to India. The new procedure is that as soon as the Simon Commission had made its report and before formulating proposals thereon to be presented to Parliament, His Majesty's Government will invite representatives of British India and Indian States to a conference whereat the question of the relation of the States to British India in addition to questions bearing on constitutional reform in British India will be freely discussed. This is a notable advance in the procedure originally announced which provided for inviting Indian representatives only after Government proposals had been presented and referred to a Joint Parliamentary Committee of both Houses at Westminster. Under the new procedure, the Simon Commission's Report, assuming the worst, will present the case against further constitutional advance or even for a curtailment of the Montagu Chelmsford reforms, but His Majesty's Government will not frame their proposals on it without giving full opportunity to Indian political opinion which had largely withheld co-operation from the Simon Commission, to place its point of view before them. It is only fair to say that the suggestion to adopt this new procedure originated from Sir John Simon himself. The Prime Minister warmly approved of it and, with the consent of the leaders of the other British political parties, authorised the Viceroy to announce it to the Indian people. In carrying out this instruction Lord Irwin was also authorised by His Majesty's Government to make it plain that they understand and have always understood the Declaration of 1917 to intend the conferment of Dominion status in due course on India. The Viceroy in doing so pointed out that the Instrument of Instructions delivered to him on his appointment as Viceroy of India by His Majesty and the statements of responsible Ministers left no room for doubt about the correctness of the interpretation of the present British Government.

A correspondent writing in the Times of India cites from a judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on an Indian appeal, given by the late Lord Haldane. We reprint the letter in another column. Lord Haldane, with whom were associated four other eminent Judges, said that it has been publicly said that India is recognised by the Imperial Government as being on the way to becoming now a self-governing dominion. This is only an obiter dictum, no doubt, but coming from a statesman of Lord Haldane's eminence, it shows clearly that the interpretation of the Declaration of 1917 now authoritatively announced, is the same as that implied, and widely understood to be implied in that Declaration. This is not all. The admission of India as an original member of the League of Nations has the same significance. A. B. Keith in his little book entitled "Dominion Home Rule in Practice," holds the same view. "The new status of the Dominions" he observes, "is confirmed by the covenant of the League of Nations, under which not merely is the British Empire a member but so also are the four Dominions and India, the position of the latter being motivated by the fact that she has been assured in due course self-government on the Dominion model." In the face of these authorities, it is vain for Lord Reading to contend, as he did in the House of Lords on Tuesday, that he himself, when he was Viceroy of India, was very careful to avoid using the term Dominion status with reference to India's future position in the Commonwealth. His plea that while he had no objection to Dominion status as a goal, he objected to Indian's being led to think of it as an attainable goal, was a plea for making a promise without intending to keep it. That a man who has occupied the highest offices under the Crown, the Lord Chief Justice-ship of England and the Viceroyalty of India, should descend to this low level of statecraft, is most deplorable. A similar debate was held in the House of Commons on Thursday. The Secretary of State defended the Viceroy's statement and the question dropped.

The immediate advantage of this explicit declaration by the Viceroy with the concurrence of the British Government, is two-fold. It is an intimation to the Simon Commission that in making their report they should keep in view the fact that Dominion status for India is the definite political objective. In the next place, the declaration makes it possible for the Indian representatives to the proposed Conference to see how far the proposals of the Simon Commission are in keeping with this aim and to bring forward counter-proposals better calculated to lead to its achievement at an early date. This is a great opportunity and properly utilised should result in materially advancing the prospects of self-government. The statement drawn up at an emergency meeting of men of all parties at Delhi, has expressed satisfaction at the statement and made some suggestions in order to make the proposed Conference fruitful. Bombay leaders, including Liberals and Independents and representatives of trade and industry, have accorded it a hearty welcome. The Princes headed by the Maharaja of Bikaner have warmly approved of it and so have Moslem leaders of different political schools. Non-Brahmins and the Depressed classes have likewise acclaimed it. There is thus in India an unprecedented amount of unanimity about this important pronouncement of the Viceroy, Lord Irwin, which has revived faith which had been almost lost, in British goodwill to India.

THAT MEN ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XLV. PIONEERS.

The pioneer spirit is not determined by age. Some men are hopelessly in the rut at thirty, while to others life is a continuous unfolding. When new discoveries open up hitherto unknown fields of knowledge the pioneer does not hesitate. He considers the new in the light of the old, pulls up his tent, stakes and prepares to march. His horizon is an expanding one. He climbs the mountain top, sees new territory, and sets forth to claim it. The keynote of his life is growth. The passing years all make their contribution, and the end is but the beginning of a new adventure.

Conservatism is ever offended in change. The pioneer must endure the criticisms of his contemporaries. Conservatism is a type of mind. It feels the need of stability. It roots its authority in the past. We need it. But we also need the type of mind which dares. It is because some men dare more than others that the world makes progress. One man accepts life at its face value and settles down to enjoy it. Another man continually measures life as it is, against life as it might be, and dedicates his powers to the quest of the ideal. As social conditions change the ideal changes, and hence the pioneer is ever in the position of going forward. The outpost stations which he abandons are occupied by those who come after, while the trail blazer advances to a new outpost, and still another. The world needs both the pioneer and the settler, the visionary and those who follow. "Where there is no vision, the people perish."

The world's great religious leaders have been pioneers, but almost before the leader is dead his religion tends to become conventionalized and formal. The acts and sayings of the leader are fastened upon, and are handed down from generation to generation. Were the religious leaders of the past to return to the modern world they would undoubtedly be the first to question, "what is it all about? We gave you an inquiring spirit, but you have imprisoned the spirit in the house of convention. Open the doors, and go forth to discover new truth for your own generation. Set your faces forward. Advance!"

The road builder is the forerunner of civilization. If there is to be trade, cooperation and friendship between people there must be avenues of communication. The hills must be laid low, and the crooked paths made straight. It is to the road builder that we owe our cities, our industry, and our community of ideas. He it is who goes before, preparing the way. And in our modern social organization we also need those who go before. We need industrial pioneers, who endeavour to smooth the road between employers and employees. We need educational pioneers and religious pioneers. We need social reformers and moral reformers. We need idealists and visionaries. Blessed are they who penetrate the wilderness, charting a road for posterity.

MRS. BRIJ LAL NEHRU ON CHILD MARRIAGE ACT.

Under the auspices of the Lahore Student's Union Mrs. Brij Lal Nehru, a member of the Age of Consent Committee, delivered on the 30th October an address to the students on the "Child Marriage Act" at the Y. M. C. A. Hall, Lahore. The hall was crowded and included a number of ladies. Prof. Abdul Majid Khan of the F. C. College was in the chair.

Mrs. Brijlal Nehru who spoke in Hindustani, reports the Tribune, said during the tour of the Age of Consent Committee she was able to study the social conditions of the people in different parts of India. She found that although child marriages were not prevalent in certain parts of the country, in most of the provinces they were still in force, particularly in Gujrat, Madras and Bengal. It was a matter of gratification that the Sarda Bill was passed into law and a great step forward has been taken in eradicating the social evil of child marriage. The objection taken by a certain section of the people that Government interfered with their social and personal laws by passing social legislation had no force, because society had every right to expect its citizens to remove evils from its environments. Child Marriage in India was mostly responsible for Indians' infantile and maternal mortality, because it sapped the vitality of the people. It was also responsible for many dangerous diseases like hysteria and consumption. It was the law of nature that more girls were born than boys, but in spite of this fact more women died prematurely in India than men. This huge maternal mortality was due to early marriage.

Continuing Mrs. Nehru said that some people put a plea that all social legislations should be postponed till self-government was won by the Indians and no such legislation should be enacted under a foreign Government. She, however, could not agree with this plea for the simple reason that many social legislations like the abolition of the custom of Sati, the re-marriage of widows and the law of inheritance had been enacted during the British rule in India.

Mrs. Nehru said, although she was not a specialist in religion, from the evidence that was given before the Age of Consent Committee she could say that Hindu religion never gave any sanction for child marriage except in one solitary shloka where it was mentioned that Hindu girls should be married at the age of eight, but nobody could quote any authority for this shloka. Even the well-known Pandits of India strongly differed among themselves about pre-puberty marriage of Hindu girls. She also did not find much force in the plea of the Mahomedans that they got their girls married at a late age, because from statistics she found that in Assam and Burma and among the Moplahs in Malabar early marriage among the Musalmans was very common. She had been hearing for a long time that the Muslim marriage was a civil contract but she was now surprised to find the Muslims also saying with the Hindus that marriage was a sacrament.

Mrs. Nehru appealed to the students to take up this important social reform work in earnest and try to convince the orthodox people of the benefits of the Child Marriage Act. She said that every country depended on its youth for bringing about revolution in Society. She knew many youngmen were eager to sacrifice their lives for the freedom of the country. But she thought that the pressing need of the day was that the youngmen should know how to live for the benefit of the country and not die unnecessarily.

The chairman thanked Mrs. Nehru for her address. He said in pure Islam there was no sanction for early marriage.

A resolution was then passed by the students welcoming the Child Marriage Act and promising to do all in their power to make the legislation effective after 1st April 1930.

THE HINDU UNIVERSITY WOMAN'S COLLEGE.

Mr. Ramananda Chatterjee writes in the Modern Review, Calcutta :—

Seth Mulraj Khatau of Bombay and his two nephews Seths Tricandras and Gordhandas donated Rupees two lakhs and fifty thousand for founding a Woman's College in the Hindu University, Benares. There was some delay in giving effect to their wishes. This delay led to the addition of Rs. 34,000 as interest to this endowment. The terms of the gift were :—

Rs. 84,000 were to be spent on building the class-rooms, hostel, etc., and the balance of Rs. two lakhs was to be kept intact as an endowment from the proceeds of which the expenses of the College were to be met.

The tuition in the college was to be entirely free and the students were not to be charged any rent for the rooms in the hostel occupied by them.

The college was to be run entirely by women, and men were not to have access to it.

The buildings have cost more than a lakh. From the interest of the remainder the expenses of the college and its hostel are met. The income from this source is less than a thousand rupees per mensem. The institution has no other source of income.

Some twenty acres of land within the University area were enclosed to form the compound of the Woman's College. The institution is located within this enclosed space. The building is two-storied. The students' rooms are situated on the ground-floor, and classes are held in the upper story. The plinth of the building is sufficiently high. The students' rooms are dry, spacious, well-lighted and well-ventilated.

At present there are forty students in this college. Thirty-eight of them have taken up the Arts course, and two the Science course.

Seven of the students are married, six are widows, twenty-seven are maidens. All are, of course, above the age of sixteen. Three of the students are mothers. Two of them live in the hostel with their little daughters.

At present only the first and second year Arts classes have been opened in the Woman's College. Higher class students and science students attend the men's classes. Thus the teaching arrangements are at present largely co-educational.

Within the college compound the students play tennis, badminton and basket ball. Besides this, they can take walks anywhere within the University area, which is two miles long and one mile in width. They may with advantage be taught lathi play and jujitsu, some deshi women's games may also be introduced from Baroda.

Being at some distance from the city, the place is free from smoke, dust, dirt and squalor. Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, the Vice-Chancellor of the University, intends, when financially practicable, to make arrangements for teaching the students swimming, riding, the use of fire-arms, etc. There is ample room in the campus for all such exercises.

Some special advantages and features of this institution have to be noted.

As the college is situated in open and healthy ground, away from the town, the students enjoy freedom of movement. This conduces to health of body and mind.

As the students come from various provinces of India, they have every opportunity to get rid of provincial narrowness and prejudices and cultivate a broad national outlook, without losing what is good in the culture and traditions of the regions to which they belong.

In this institution there are special facilities for the education of girls and women of middle-class poor families. It has been already stated that tuition and lodging are here free for all students. They have to spend only about Rs. 18 per mensem for board, light, etc. This amount, too, all students have not got to spend. Mr. Ghansyam Das Birla has instituted a number of scholarships of the value of Rs. 15 a month to perpetuate the memory of his departed wife, Srimati Mahadevi Birla. This year twenty two students are in receipt of these scholarships.

There is every probability of this college developing in course of time into a big centre of woman's education. At present growth is hampered owing to several causes. On account of financial stringency, it is not practicable to secure the services of an adequate number of women professors. This want can be removed if some munificent donors make adequate endowments or if a sufficient subsidy is received from the State. There is need also of a variety of arrangements for the culture, physical exercise and recreation of the students. The University possesses a library, no doubt. But the Woman's College should have a separate library and reading-room of its own, stocked with books and periodicals. In the absence of pecuniary help from the aforesaid sources, if some cultured lady of independent means, or one who would require only her living expenses, were to offer her self-sacrificing services to the institution, it could make some progress even under its present circumstances.

INDIA AND DOMINION STATUS.

A PRIVY COUNCIL DECISION.

Mr. Modak writes to the Times of India:—It appears that the Viceregal pronouncement of November 1st has thrown Lord Birkenhead into a fit of temper. I do not know if I will be aggravating the malady by bringing to his Lordship's notice the following extract from a judgment by the late Lord Haldane sitting in collaboration with Lords Dunedin, Atkinson, Sumner and Salvesen. The judgment is in respect of a criminal appeal from the court of the Judicial Commissioner Nagpur, and was delivered on the 20th November 1924. Lord Birkenhead was then the Secretary of State for India. The judgment is as follows: "I should like to make this observation. The power to entertain appeals here arises not from the relation of this Board to the court below, as a court of criminal appeal but as the Privy Council advising the Sovereign with regard to the exercise of the prerogative. The prerogative is that remnant of the power of the Crown which remains to the Crown to interfere with tribunals of justice, which does not exist in this country at all: it has passed away in the historic development of the constitution; it used to exist and it does exist to some extent in the case of the Crown Colonies, because they are managed directly by the Crown through Ministers but when one comes to self-governing dominions I should be very sorry to say that even the principles of Dillet's case could be applied to the constitution of Canada. The constitution of Canada and of Anstralia, taking those as illustrations have so developed that they are virtually self-governing dominions, and it is a question to my mind as to whether the principles of Dillet's case apply in the case of self-governing dominions. India is not yet in that state, but it has been publicly said that India is recognised by the Imperial Government as being on the way to becoming now a self-governing dominion and therefore even with regard to India it is with the utmost care that we should pronounce any proposition that, that disappearing fragment of the prerogatives, of which I have spoken, remains. The Crown has to be extraordinarily cautious in asserting the survivor even of that very restricted prerogative which existed fifty years ago, but which may not exist now."

Nothing could be more explicit than these words of the late Lord Haldane that Dominion status has been the officially recognised goal for India, and Lord Irwin in his recent pronouncement merely emphasised the same thing once again so that the possibility of any other interpretation of the Declaration of 1917 might be definitely excluded.

THE RECENT LONDON CONFERENCE.

The following statement appears over the signatures of some prominent Indian Women now in England and was published in the Pioneer of Allahabad.

We, the representatives of the voluntary Women's Organisations in India would be very much indebted to you if, in the cause of fair play, you will kindly publish this letter.

A Conference on "Women in India" was held at the Caxton Hall on October 7 and 8 under the auspices of the National Union of Societies for Equal Citizenship presided over by Miss Rathbone, M. P. when 25 British Women's Organisations were represented.

At the opening of the Conference, the Chairwoman made it perfectly clear that it was a Conference of British women only and that Indian women were present in the capacity of experts to report on the work of Women's Organisations in India. A question was raised quite early regarding the composition of the Committee responsible for the programme and the Resolutions. The Chair confessed that the Committee was "a very valuable workable Committee, a Committee of two namely, Miss Caton and myself."

Since the Resolutions all urge voluntary societies to carry out certain measures in the interests of reform, it is only natural that the representatives of these societies should enquire into the credentials of those who offer their help. A close scrutiny reveals that the more important of this "useful Committee of two," Miss E. Rathbone, had some months previously, written an article published in the Hibbert Journal supporting Katherine Mayo's "Mother India," which the "Office of the Women of India Proposed Survey" has since published in pamphlet form for distribution.

It is common knowledge that no voluntary Men or Women's Organisations in India, religious or non-religious, will identify themselves with supporters and apologists of Katherine Mayo and if the "Office of the Women of India Proposed Survey" lends its authority to pamphlets of this nature, we the representatives of voluntary efforts in India, dissociate ourselves completely from the work of the said Office and its organisers.

When at the Conference the Indian representatives drew attention to these facts and many irregularities of procedure they were ruled out of order. No mention of or reference to the pamphlet was allowed. Are we to take this as proof that its author is ashamed of her publication?

It is truly regrettable that, at this critical time when representative Indian women in London are desirous of establishing friendly relations with the British Women's Organisations they should be treated in this high-handed and unsympathetic way. The British Societies supporting this Conference should, therefore, not be surprised if, in India, the Women's Organisations have little or no confidence in this proffered hand of friendship. We have had too many enemies in the guise of friends and do not mean to take any more risks.

Some of us may realize the sincerity behind this effort but the tactlessness and the unconstitutional manner in which the whole proceedings were conducted, combined with Miss Rathbone's public and private support of Katherine Mayo, will naturally be taken into consideration by Women's Societies in India.

SOME ANDHRA SOCIAL REFORMERS.

ANDHRA BRAHMO SAMAJ.

In the course of a long article in the Swarajya on Social Reform in Andhra Mr. M. V. Ramana Rao writes:—The Andhra Society has not remained unaffected by this wave of liberalism. After Bengal where the seed of social reform was sown it is Andhra where the principles of the Brahmo Samaj have spread with a rich luxuriance. Although as in Bengal it has not gained a considerable number of recruits to its fold its influence has permeated every home and those who are still bound by orthodoxy have had their hearts receptive to liberal impulses and their minds opened to the illumination of noble ideals. The memory of the late Mr. K. Viresalingam Pantulu, the pioneer Social Reformer in Andhra is still cherished as an imperishable perfume of rich achievement. He was not a Brahmo Samajist until the fag-end of his career during which his existence was crowded by events whose magnitude and magnificence can be gauged only by their results. But he imbibed, I believe, the best that was in the teachings of the Bengalee reformer and sought to introduce into the atmosphere of Andhra, the new air of social justice, freedom and righteousness that until then he found to be absent. He took up the cause of the child-widow and by discussions and disquisitions, through speeches and writings, by quotations from religious texts and appeals to human impulses, he tried to convince and convert the people of Andhra to the necessity of putting an end to the insufferable horror called 'the child-widow' by permitting her to remarry. Some were convinced, others were converted. But the majority held back. Widow-marriages were performed according to Hindu Sastric rites, but the parties were excommunicated. As we listen to the stories of ostracism placed on parties to such marriages we can only shudder that human beings could be put to such inhuman hardships by fellow human beings. A pariah was more welcome than a widow re-married or a man who married a widow. But nowadays they have become a matter of course, although what is preventing the welding of the community that is advanced and the community that is afraid is not a mental sanction of the principle but a social fear of the practice.

Mr. Viresalingam died in 1919, a Brahmo Samajist, and left behind him an immense legacy of achievement which his less gifted but not less conscientious followers are endeavouring to enrich and enlarge in the measure of their capacity. Honest lieutenants of the late reformer, have assimilated the best that was in the teachings of their chief and have shown an amount of courage that is only equalled by the extent of their honesty. They have married their daughters after puberty, and although in consequence they invited on themselves the opprobrium of their community they have not flinched or faltered a whit from the ideal they set up for themselves. Such unobstructive and unostentatious persons are not a few who whether by immediate association with a remote administration of the late reformer set to run their homes on the higher principles of social morality. It is invidious to mention names known and omit names unknown since a bright achievement may be hidden behind the mist of obscurity and there are not a few who have by silent example liberalised the atmosphere of their surroundings and inculcated the principles for which Mr. Viresalingam lived his life through perpetual struggle with the social odds that confronted him in the fulfilment of his mission.

MODERN ANDHRA REFORMERS.

One stalwart figure, among the old and venerable, stands out prominent in the Social annals of modern Andhra that has sown in every young heart the seed of moral uprightness and intellectual rectitude. Sir R. Venkataratnam who is among the old but is of the young, an educationist of the first order, recalling the historical personality of Dr. Arnold of Rugby, a social Reformer of the very ideal type, in his immaculate white robes that are the external symbols of a pure and rare heart, that they not merely don but adorn, has wielded enormous influence in the Andhra Society. As a teacher, he not merely confined himself to the text of the lessons that he was expected to teach, but made it a pretext for the inculcation of a moral idealism that no student could get from any other teacher, living or dead in Andhra. Every young man that came to him as a student to learn lessons became a disciple to open simple dispensaries in temples at fifty-six out-of-the way villages under their jurisdiction, where medical aid cannot be easily obtained. Physicians will be despatched from the nearest town to these dispensaries for a stay of one week or so to examine patients. Already two such places have been opened to the grateful appreciation of the local people. A subsidy of 50 yen a year will be given from the prefectural treasury to the temple maintaining the dispensary and the priest will have charge of it. It seems to us that many places in Japan and Korea may follow with much advantage this good example of Shimane prefecture.

Hinduism in America:—The public are already aware that Swami Vividishananda, a member of the R. K. Mission, after visiting various places of note and interest, has recently reached America to take up the work at the Vedanta Society, Portland, Oregon, U. S. A. He has been actively assisting Swami Phabbavananda who is now in charge of the Society there. Both are regularly holding classes and delivering lectures every week for the spread of the Vedantic ideals and it is gratifying to note that the attendance is daily on the increase. The need of active workers for the propagation of the truths of Hinduism and especially those of the Vedants in the West can hardly be exaggerated. For it is through this kind of missionary activities that the true ideals of our cultural life can be implanted in the western minds and the queer and wrong notions entertained by them about our life and culture can be removed. We sincerely believe that vigorous efforts in this line shall produce their desired result. May Lord bless the activities of the new Swami with success.—Vedanta Kesari.

The Pope approves of the Sari:—Mr. A. P. O. Albuquerque, Assistant Official Assignee of Madras, has returned with his wife from a six months' tour in Europe. Speaking to a representative of The Madras Mail, Mrs. Albuquerque who is an alumnus of St. Agnes' College, Mangalore, said that while in Rome, they were anxious to have an audience with the Pope. They communicated their desire to the Maestro di Camera who agreed to obtain an audience for them provided Mrs. Albuquerque conformed to the dress regulations enjoined on lady visitors while in the presence of the Pope. The official went on to explain that it was entirely out of question for any lady in short skirt or sleeves to have an audience with His Holiness. The dress insisted upon was an all-black dress reaching right down to the heels, with upper garments of the same colour and buttoned up to the neck. As for the sleeves they should be long and cover the arms up to the wrist. Mrs. Albuquerque pointed out that as an Indian lady she was used only to wearing saris and unfortunately she did not happen to have an all-black sari in her wardrobe. For the rest even her ordinary everyday dress would more than satisfy the rules of the Vatican. The official then went away promising to write to Mr. and Mrs. Albuquerque and the following day they received a communication from the Vatican inviting them to a private audience with the Pope. This was more than they had expected and they were both very pleased. His Holiness, who received them very graciously, spoke in French and made kindly inquiries about their tour, asking how they had liked their visit to England and France. His Holiness also expressed his pleasure at being told that the new arrangements with regard to the administration of the Archdiocese of Madras were working very satisfactorily. The audience lasted a few minutes and before they withdrew His Holiness gave them his blessing.

Mr. Sarda Honoured:—The staff and students of the Dayanand Anglo-Vedic College Lahore, presented an address to Mr. Harbilas Sarda, for his able piloting of the Child Marriage Bill, before a crowded gathering. Replying, Mr. Sarda thanked them for the address and for the appreciation of his work in the domain of social reform. He, as an Arya Samajist, thought that his success was due to the inspiration received from the personality of Dayanand Saraswati, the founder of the Arya Samaj. He thanked all those members of the Assembly, particularly the official members, who gave their support to his Bill. He believed that political progress in the country would be incomplete without social progress. He was glad to see the country awake to the rights of women and hoped that young men would take a leading part in eradicating the social evils of the country. Mr. Sarda was given an ovation by the students on the conclusion of his speech.

A Widow-Marriage at Rajahmundry:—The Secretary Hithakarhi Samaj, Rajahmundry writes: Under the auspices of the Hithakarhi Samaj Rajahmundry, the marriage of Srimathi Sitaramamma, an inmate of the Widows' Home, and Sriyuta Tadepalli Venkata Ramamurti Garu, a Telugu Pandit in the Andhra Indian High School, was celebrated on 14-10-29 at 5 p. m. in the Ananda gardens. Many distinguished citizens attended the function and blessed the couple. At the close of the ceremony, Ohilekamarti Lakshminarasimham Garu, Vice-President of the Hithakarhi Samaj, thanked all those that were present on behalf of the Samaj and said that Rao Bahadur Viresalingam Pantulu Garu had borne the brunt of the fight with marvelous self-sacrificing spirit to bring about the social reform, and that all the widow-marriages being performed in the different parts of our Telugu country were only the results of his endeavours. He also blessed the couple with long life and happiness. A dinner was arranged in connection with this marriage on 15-10-29 in the Widows' Home. At the end, Mr. C. Rama Kamath spoke a few words expressing his delight. In the course of his speech, he said that a dinner was in itself a happy thing and since it was arranged on the occasion of the marriage, it was rendered all the more happy. He observed that even though the days of persecution were gone, the widow-marriages had not yet become sufficiently popular and that it was high time for us to recognise the equality of woman and man. In conclusion he blessed, on behalf of those that were present, the bride and the bride-groom that God might give them long life and prosperity.

Against Nautch Parties:—A Pioneer correspondent writes:—Measures for inaugurating important social reform among the Hindu communities of these areas were considered last evening when a successful meeting of Sanatanists and social reformers was held, Dewan Bahadur Ranganakulu Naidu, retired Judge, presiding at Secunderabad. The object of the meeting was to reclaim members of the Devdasi community and to put a stop to nautch parties and the custom of these women going round to collect gifts during the Dewali celebrations. The chairman suggested the starting of cottage industries for providing reclaimed women with honourable occupation. Thousands of tracts on the antinatch movement have been widely distributed.

The 5th All India Federation of Teachers' Associations:—The fifth Conference of the Federation will be held at Madras, on the 27th, 28th and 29th December 1929, under the presidentship of Sir P. S. Sivaswami Iyer. The Conference is open to teachers of all types and of all grades of both sexes—University, Secondary, Primary and Technical. The Federation is affiliated to the World Federation of Education Associations and is recognised by the Government of India for representation at World Education Conferences. I appeal to all the teachers, lecturers, professors of English and Vernacular institutions of British India and States to muster strong at the Conference in order to give an educational lead to the whole country. The Federation has held four successful conferences at Cawnpore, Patna, Calcutta and Bombay. This time it will be held in the South at Madras and a very interesting and instructive programme will be gone through. Those who wish to attend the conference should write to the Secretary, Reception Committee 41, Singaraohari Street, Triplicane, Madras, for information regarding lodging, boarding and the procedure to be adopted for finding a place on the programme.

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 80 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

NOTES.

Antyajas and Temple Entry:—The pacific and deliberate manner in which the leaders of the Antyajas in Bombay and Poona are laying their plans for gaining admission to the Hindu temples, is creating a very favourable impression on the generality of caste Hindus. Several of the trustees of the temples themselves have publicly expressed their sympathy, but they plead that under the terms of their trusts they are precluded from admitting Antyajas. Mr. Shantaram Narayan Dabholkar, an outstanding figure in the orthodox world, has pointed out, by reference to a judgment of the Bombay High Court delivered nearly fifty years ago, that this is the real difficulty at present. The proper course, in the circumstances, is for the Trustees or leaders of the orthodox community like Mr. Shantaram, to move the High Court to sanction the admission of Antyajas in such temples. During the last half a century Hindu sentiments have undergone radical changes in many directions, and the High Court, if the matter is brought formally before it, cannot fail to take notice of the fact. Failing this, we suggest that the leaders of the Antyajas themselves may bring the matter before the High Court, and many caste Hindus will be glad to associate themselves with them. This is the legal and proper way of removing the legal difficulty which is felt by some of the Trustees at present. We earnestly trust that the leaders of the movement will see their way to act on our suggestion. They have an irrefragable case. Justice is on their side. The conscience of the Hindu community has been roused to the iniquity of the present custom, and, as we said above, the admirable self-restraint of the promoters of this movement of social justice is highly appreciated by the public.

Muslim Deputation Against Sarda Act:—

A deputation headed by Maulana Mahomed Ali wanted his Excellency to exclude the Muslim community from the provisions of the Sarda Act which prohibits the marriage of girls under 14 years of age. The Viceroy's reply, together with a summary of the representation submitted to him, is printed elsewhere. The claim of the deputation in short is that the Indian legislature has no right to legislate on matters affecting the personal law of Mussalmans. The Viceroy in reply referred to the Government of India Act, by which, his Excellency reminded the deputation, he and they were bound which stipulates that no Bill affecting religion should be introduced without the previous sanction of the Governor-General. The marriage question as Lord Irwin observed is one of those questions which lie on the border-land between the religious and social spheres. The general belief that old marriages are confined to Hindus, received a violent blow from the revelations before the Age of Consent Committee. They showed that, though Mahomedans are under no obligation to marry their girls before puberty, as in the case of some Hindu castes, many such marriages take place among them. There is a considerable body of educated opinion among Mussalmans as among Hindus which supports the Act, and the threat of disobeying it has no meaning. We cannot think of any one marrying his daughter at the age of 10 or 12 in order to show his disapproval of the law. Lord Irwin's reply to the Moslem deputation was in effect the same as Lord Goschen's reply to the orthodox Hindu deputation which waited on him sometime back. The opposition of a section of the Mahomedans has been the greatest surprise of the discussions on the Sarda Marriage Act. The Act comes into force on the 1st of April next, and the sensible thing for Indians to do is to see that its provisions are meanwhile fully explained to the masses.

The Viceroy's Statement And After:—

The first flush of enthusiasm with which the Viceroy's statement on the future course of Indian Constitutional reform, was received, has not been maintained. This is chiefly due to the debates in the British Parliament initiated by Opposition leaders with the object of forcing the Government to minimise the importance of the announcements in the Viceroy's statement. In India, the extreme Congressmen whose opposition was subdued in the presence of the general satisfaction at Lord Irwin's statement, have not been slow to take advantage of the explanations and limitations offered by Government in Parliament as confirming their estimates of its little value. One or two who had signed the Delhi statement welcoming the Viceroy's statement with some conditions, have publicly asked that their signatures might be cancelled. A meeting of the signatories to the Delhi manifesto is called at Allahabad next Monday to decide on further action in the light of the Parliamentary debate. The refusal of the Secretary of State for India to consider the question of a general amnesty, as desired by the signatories to the Delhi statement, has further accentuated the dissatisfaction created by the speeches in Parliament. The Liberals, on the whole, have not been stampeded in the same measure from their first-expressed satisfaction, but they, too, cannot but be embarrassed, by the change in public feeling in the country. Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru who is now the chief spokesman of Liberal opinion has written a letter to the Leader of Allahabad, in which he refuses to judge the attitude of the Labour Government by the speeches in the House of Lords and relies on Mr. Wedgwood Benn's speech in the Commons as the authentic expression of the attitude of the Cabinet. "It would be idle to pretend," he writes, "that the Labour Government has promised us immediate Dominion status, but it would be equally idle to hold that they are inviting us to discuss the question of stages. It is for us now to try to build up our case and achieve the greatest amount of agreement on its essentials." This is the most reasonable view to take of the position at present. The Viceroy's statement has made it clear that Dominion status is the objective of Indian Constitutional reform, and the invitation to a Conference before proposals are framed by the British Government on the Simon Commission's report, offers a neat opportunity to Indian leaders to co-operate in determining the character of the reforms.

Mrs. Sarojini Naidu.—The East African Indian Congress which meets early next month has invited Mrs. Sarojini Naidu to preside. This session is a momentous one and the importance of wise and strong guidance was never greater. Within the last few months there has been an apparent weakening of the Government of India's strong attitude on the question of a common roll for Indians and Europeans in East Africa. The Labour Government in Britain was expected to take a firm stand against recognising the colour bar in the constitution of the Colony. Messages from London are not encouraging in this respect. Lord Passfield, better known as Mr. Sydey Webb, seems to be inclined to take the European side. This is no news to us as a section of the intellectuals, who have joined the Labour party are followers of Nietzsche rather than of Jesus Christ. Their organ in the Press is the New Statesman and their prophet is the eccentric dramatist, Bernard Shaw. Now that Sir Mahomed Habibullah has resumed charge of the Overseas portfolio, we may hope for a restoration of the old vigour in the Government of India's support of the claims of Indians in East Africa. Mrs. Sarojini knows the ground here as well as in East Africa thoroughly and she may be relied upon to strengthen Indians in that Colony in their determination to leave no stone unturned to prevent the brand of an inferior citizenship from being placed on their brow for ever. We wish her every success in her important undertaking.

The Sastri College.—The Natal Indian Opinion of 18th October contains a report of the opening ceremony of Sastri College on the 14th of that month by his Excellency the Governor-General, Earl of Athlone. In the course of his speech his Excellency said: "It is the duty of every Indian who wishes to play the part of a citizen of this country, not only to submit cheerfully to the established political, social and educational system, but to prepare himself and his children to take their proper place in the life of the country as a whole. That, I feel sure, was the ideal which Mr. Sastri had in mind when he conceived the plan of founding this college, and incidentally laying down the basis of an organised system of education for Indians in South Africa. He realised that the first step in the so called 'uplift' movement must be education, but he also realised that if that education was to be of genuine benefit to the Indian community it must be carried out in conjunction with, and not independent of, the State educational system. It is proposed, therefore, that when the necessary buildings have been constructed and equipped the Administration should be requested to take them over and run the Institution. The College, which has now, through the efforts of Sir Kurma Reddi and the Committee helping him, been brought to completion, is the result of the idea which I have just described. It has been built from funds amounting to £16,000, which have been contributed by members of the Indian Community and is a concrete example of "self-help" on the part of the Indians themselves. The Provincial Council has acknowledged this effort by the appointment of the Education Commission, and by granting to the Indian schools in Natal the whole of the subsidy that a Province receives for Indian education. I regret that the author of this scheme cannot be with us to-day to see the completion of the first step towards the fulfilment of his ideal. This College is a fine example of personal effort by individuals for the good of a community, which is typical of the Servants of India Society, of which Mr. Sastri is a distinguished member." Speeches were made by Sir K. V. Reddi and others and messages were sent by South African leaders wishing the College every success and paying tributes to Mr. Sastri's work in the cause of education in that country. We are sure the institution which has been started under such favourable conditions will continue to retain the good-will of the various parties in South Africa and will be a matter for pride to Indians in Africa and outside.

Indian States And The Marriage Act.—Bhavnagar is to be congratulated on its Marriage Act which comes into force on April 1, 1930 when the British Indian Marriage Act also becomes operative. A press message states:—"The Bhavnagar State Marriage Act will come into operation on April 1, 1930. This Act penalises the marriage of a boy below the age of 18 and that of a girl below the age of 14. The Act provides against undue disparity in the ages of the bride and bridegroom by stipulating that a man above the age of 45 cannot marry a woman who is less than half his age." Mysore has a similar bill under consideration and we hope, it will not be long before the other Indian States follow suit. This will remove an obstacle in the way of making the British Indian Act effective and will ensure uniformity throughout India.

BOMBAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1929.

"AFTER MOTHER INDIA."*

We had dealt with Miss Katherine Mayo's book "Mother India" in a series of articles in this journal, which were first reprinted in the form of a booklet, and then published in several editions by Mr. G. A. Natesan of Madras. We had since avoided as far as possible referring to Miss Mayo's book. We have also deprecated attempts to reply to it in the spirit of tit for tat by making a collection of the social defects of the people of America. In our own reply, we pointed out in more than one instance from the very publications from which Miss Mayo had derived much of her material, that she has omitted important words, phrases, and passages which are essential to the right interpretation of the facts and statistics on which she relied for her generalisations. Our object was mainly to supply the background for want of which Miss Mayo's picture of Indian life was distorted into a gross caricature. If we were betrayed here and there into an expression of impatience or censure, it was because of the rank obscenity of some of Miss Mayo's allegations and particularly of the wicked and cruel lie that "the mother, high caste or low caste, will practise upon her children—the girl to make 'her sleep well', the boy 'to make him manly' an abuse which the boy, at least, is apt to continue daily for the rest of his life" (P. 33). (The quotations and references in this article are from the English edition of Mother India.) This was not a casual statement. She goes on to say: "This last point should be noticed. Highest medical authority in widely scattered sections attests that practically every child brought under observation, for whatever reason, bears on its body the signs of this habit." (P. 33) Miss Mayo and her friends have tried to answer criticisms on her book in several speeches, articles and books but there has been no attempt to confirm or retract this obscene libel. Not even in the latest, evidently intended to be exhaustive, entitled "After Mother India" by Harry H. Field to whom Miss Mayo in the Foreword to her book expressed her deep indebtedness "for a helpfulness, both in India and America, beyond either limit or thanks." Mr. Field himself says in his "Foreword" that his motive in writing "After Mother India" is the outgrowth of having assisted in the editing of "Mother India" and having closely followed its history from its inception. We may mention here that we have consistently maintained against a strong current of opinion that Miss Mayo's book ought not to be proscribed by the authorities.

*Jonathan Cape, London. Price 7s. 6d.

A DIABOLICAL LIE.

Mr. Field quotes profusely from the articles in the Indian Social Reformer in reply to "Mother India," and we eagerly turned his pages for his reply to our criticism of Miss Mayo's atrocious libel on Indian mothers, which was the most strongly-worded in the whole series. We reproduce what we said of it: "India may forgive Miss Mayo many things, but this cowardly assault on the honour of her mothers, never." It is hardly likely that Mr. Field could have missed this direct challenge in view of the meticulous care with which he has evidently searched our writings. Mr. Field has also made a close study of Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi's utterances as appears from the frequent references to them in his book. But he omits to notice that Dr. Reddi, with her wide experience as a medical practitioner, had stated that she had never come across any case which supported Miss Mayo's extraordinary statement. Even if he had missed her statement, the footnote about Lord Sinha at page 182 of his own book, should have put him in mind of the most serious charge against Miss Mayo which had to be met. The footnote is as follows: "Unhappy India (pp. 497-498) reports that Lord Sinha was interviewed by a representative of the Indian Daily Mail in 1927, and was asked to point out passages from "Mother India" which he held to be false. Lord Sinha replied that he just remembered one statement made by Miss Mayo which was a lie, namely, that Indian mothers taught their children unnatural vice." It is thus clear that Mr. Field was quite aware that this is the lie which he had to justify if he hoped successfully to justify Miss Mayo. And yet, would it be believed, there is not a word in the 300 pages of "After Mother India" either defending or retracting this contemptible lie? The only inference possible is that Mr. Field in his book proposing to meet and answer the criticisms of "Mother India" deliberately omits to refer to the most damaging of them, namely, that she had told a diabolical lie against Indian mothers as a class. The only comment that is necessary is that Miss Mayo has evidently found a co-adjutor worthy of her.

THE ATTACK ON LORD SINHA.

The footnote about Lord Sinha, quoted above, occurs in one of the pages which Mr. Field devotes to reply to the charge that Miss Mayo in "Mother India" made a personal attack on Lord Sinha without mentioning his name. We are unable to make out whether Mr. Field denies the attack or justifies it. In one place he says that Lord Sinha is mentioned only once in "Mother India" and "then to draw attention to one of his good works". In another place, he suggests that Lord Sinha refused to sign a contradiction which had been drafted by his friends in London of the statements of Miss Mayo. Mr. Field moralises thereon thus: "Apparently it never occurred to Mr. Sircar to ask how Lord Sinha recognised anonymously quoted words as being his own except by recalling them; nor how, having recalled them, a man of his character could do otherwise than refuse a repudiation. For most people Lord Sinha's refusal to sanction the publishing of the prepared denial, will, in itself, constitute conclusive evidence" (p. 181). The suggestion here is that Lord Sinha did not sign the repudiation because he could not. That is to say his refusal must be understood to show that Miss Mayo's account of the conversation with him in "Mother India" was correct. It is a familiar trick of the less reputable class of interviewing journalist, when a victim refuses to make any statement, to put in his mouth some sensational assertion leaving him to deny them if he cared. In most cases, careful people refuse to walk into the trap and rely on the good sense of the public to judge such faked interviews at their true worth.

LORD SINHA'S REPUDIATION.

Neither Miss Mayo nor Mr. Field can understand Lord Sinha's sensitive spirit which shrank from being involved in anything of the nature of a personal controversy. In this particular case, we happen to have unmistakable proof of what Lord Sinha thought of Miss Mayo's account of her conversation with him, of which we make a present to Mr. Harry Field. Shortly after Mr. Natesan issued his first edition of our reply to "Mother India" in the form familiar to the Indian public of his many popular publications, Dr. Paranjpye wrote from London suggesting that an edition of it should be brought out in England with an introduction by Lord Sinha. Lord Sinha was accordingly written to, and his reply is before us. He, as was expected, excused himself. "I doubt," he wrote, "if it would be of much use for me (underlining the word) to write a foreword for the proposed English edition of your articles in reply to Miss Mayo's "Mother India". Personal rancour may be attributed to me, as she devotes half a chapter to vilifying me—anonynously but sufficiently clearly to indicate whom she meant. I trust you will excuse me if I keep clear of the controversy, which is also getting stale now." The letter is dated Calcutta, 8th January 1928. If Lord Sinha recognised his own words in his own meaning in what Miss Mayo imputed to him, he was the last man to speak of her as vilifying him. It is characteristic of the pacific instincts of the man that he not only declined to take any part in the controversy himself but even deprecated in his own quiet manner the further prolongation of it by others.

THE Reformer AND Mother India.

Mr. Field quotes largely from our writings with the object evidently of showing that we have not been consistent with ourselves in criticising Miss Mayo's book. The Indian Social Reformer when it was started thirty-nine years ago had for its main and immediate object to combat such evils as child marriage, enforced widowhood, the dedication of devadasis and others referred to in Miss Mayo's book. For forty years, we have been expostulating with the public against these and other customs and institutions, and our attempts have not been without effect, though in the nature of things it must be slow and sure and not sudden and dramatic. We can have no quarrel, therefore, with Miss Mayo or any one else for stressing these facts. On the contrary, we should regard them as co-operators in the task of social reform. But the offence of Miss Mayo's book consists in the obscene eye which she brings to bear upon acknowledged facts and invents others in order to emphasise her case. "The eye sees", wrote Carlyle "what it brings with it the means of seeing". The Mayo eye could only see filth and obscenity in Hindu life, and we seriously suggested that the filth and obscenity are perhaps as much if not more in Mayo's mind than in Hindu life. The psychology of the author is the outstanding revelation of her book. Mr. Field quotes a sentence from the Reformer which he seems to think is somehow inconsistent with our condemnation of "Mother India". It is this: "The resentment provoked by the book is not due to the truth or otherwise of the facts stated in it, but to the broad inferences reflecting on the Indian and particularly the Hindu race and religion." This is what we have all along thought. Perhaps, we should have said "due not so much" to be precise.

THE GOOD DONE BY Mother India.

Mr. Field quotes from the Reformer what he calls "a reluctant testimony" wrung from it to the good already achieved by Mother India. This is to the effect that Miss Mayo's Billingsgate has been more effective than the long and patient propaganda of reformers in many Indian circles hitherto but slightly responsive to reasoned arguments. This, as every sensible reader will see, is not a justification of Miss Mayo's Billingsgate but a criticism of the mentality which is aroused by abuse while being impervious to reason. Plague, famine and war shock humanity into ideas of better sanitation, economics and international relations, but to say this is not to bear testimony to them as beneficent forces. Let us tell Mr. Field what the real harm is which Miss Mayo has done. We are not speaking at random. She has made it difficult for the many good and earnest American (and White) men and women who are sincerely desirous of establishing helpful and understanding contacts with the Indian people from being welcomed in Indian homes. She has thus widened and deepened the gulf between races and nations to bridge which is the aim and object of the finest men and women of our time in every land. If we had an international tribunal adjudging the service or guilt of individuals against peace among men, Miss Mayo will be indicted before it as one of the principal offenders of our generation.

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATION FOR THE YEAR.

XLVI. POLICEMEN AND FIREMEN.

The every day records of the police and fire departments are most prosaic, but behind the few recorded words are stories highly dramatic and thrilling. The campaign of the police against the enemies of society calls for as much courage as is displayed upon the field of battle. The fight of the firemen against the demon fire is no less dangerous than an assault upon the enemy trenches. Among both policemen and firemen there is a spirit—an indomitable spirit that admits of no defeat. There are moments in both professions when the work is largely routine, but there are other moments when every faculty is called into play, when human life is dependent upon the exercise of skill and judgment. It is to meet such emergencies that these public servants must ever be fit and faithful. The least that the good citizen can do is to show his appreciation of devoted service, to express his approval of duty well done, to give commendation where commendation is due—that the faithful may “abound with blessings.”

The policeman is the good citizen's friend, and he should be so regarded. The parent who brings up his child to be afraid of the policeman does an injustice both to the child and to the sepoy. Society is in a bad way when the guardians of law and order are looked upon with fear and hatred. How much better it is to train the child to respect the police, to turn to them for aid in crossing busy streets and to render little courtesies in return. In season and out of season policemen and firemen are working for us, our unknown and often unseen friends and protectors.

Although the policeman is the natural enemy of those who oppose law and order, these same opponents of law and order make a strenuous effort to ally themselves with the policeman. Many a high police officer's best attempts at law enforcement are rendered ineffectual because of the non-cooperation of the men within the ranks. A sepoy with a limited salary is sorely tempted, when by a none-too apparent disregard of duty he can obtain a sum of money that will go far in relieving his every-day financial burdens. Our policemen are picked men physically, but unfortunately they are not always of the highest moral calibre. Moral strength is largely a matter of environment, and hence the good citizen should make every effort to counteract the possible influence of the lower strata of society. It is of no avail for us to say, “Be strong” unless we are prepared to give the fellowship which contributes to strength. Speech without work is nothing.

May we pause for a moment to remember the policemen and firemen who have gone to their death in line of duty. In the time of crisis they have not questioned: the call of duty has been stronger than the call of life. They have demonstrated the greatest of all loves, the love that leads a man to lay down his life for his friends. May we prove ourselves to be worthy of such devotion.

MUSLIMS AND THE SARDA ACT.

A Muslim deputation consisting of 25 members led by Moulana Mahomad Ali waited on the Viceroy on the 9th instant and pleaded for the exclusion of the Muslim community from the operation of the Sarda Act. They presented a statement of 30 pages in which they said that the Dharma Shastras of the Hindus, which had prescribed the age of eight as the proper time for the marriage of girls, had also urged consummation immediately after puberty and had prohibited re-marriage even of virgin widows. Modern society has, in some measure, revolted against such rules, and interpreting Hindu Law in the manner cited above is seeking to modify or replace what is repugnant to popular feeling among a growing class of unorthodox Hindus. The Deputationists made the following representation:

NO INTERFERENCE.

According to Islam religion is the interpretation of life, and no lacerating and devitalising distinctions, such as temporal and spiritual, are recognised by Islam. Like life, the Islamic religion is one complete and indivisible synthesis. Muslim Law therefore, prescribes everything that man shall do to God, to his neighbour and to himself. It makes all duty for its portion and defines all action in terms of duty. Islam claims that its laws are intended to be applied to all mankind if it willingly embraces Islam. That they were framed by a divine legislator, himself the creator of the universe, that he alone could best understand human nature, that he had created and legislated for all mankind, in conformity with it.

The proviso in the Lucknow Pact which like one of the articles in the Constitution of the Indian National Congress gave the right of veto to two-thirds of Musalman and Hindu members of any legislature with regard to any measure which they declared to be injurious to interests of their community, did not apply to the religion or personal law of either community. For the Queen's Proclamation of 1858, States of Parliament and Acts passed by the Indian Legislature guaranteed non-interference in their religion and the application only of their own personal law to these communities. That veto related to other matters which affected merely the interests of two communities, and the Leader of House speaking in the Council of State on the Sarda Bill on September 28 last had failed to understand this difference when he said that "The modification of the personal law of each community is within the jurisdiction of this Council" and that "If more than two-thirds of the members of the community do not oppose it then the personal law of their community can be added to or modified by these Councils."

That jurisdiction cannot be extended to a mixed legislature composed of members of various communities where Islamic religion or the personal law of Musalmans are concerned when in fact it cannot be extended even to a purely Muslim legislature.

FUNDAMENTAL GUARANTEE ASKED.

Non-interference in the personal law must be guaranteed as part of the fundamental law guaranteeing religious freedom; and one of the numerous reasons why the Muslim Community does not accept the so-called Hindu-Muslim Settlement contained in the Nehru Report is that the Muslims' personal law has not been guaranteed therein, though the British Government has repeatedly guaranteed it.

While the reformers are ostensibly so anxious about the physical hygiene of minors and adolescents, and tempestuous agitation is going on in Legislative circles, not a ripple disturbs the placid surface where the moral hygiene is concerned, even though immorality is a far more insidious and powerful enemy of physical health itself than early marriage.

Prostitution still prevails, and immorality is on the increase, and is fast polluting the private life as well. But luckily the rural society is, to a great extent, still unpolluted.

The penalisation of pre-puberty marriage and consummation is bound to bring to our simple unsophisticated villages the impurity and filth that tends to make towns cesspools of immorality.

MARRIAGE PENALISED.

The Sarda Act only penalises early marriages. It does not prohibit early consummation, whether in wedlock or outside it. In other words it says: "Thou shalt not marry, but thou mayst commit adultery," and in effect in many cases, it says: "Thou shalt not marry, thou shalt commit adultery instead."

Islam on the contrary, says: "Thou mayst marry at any age, but thou shalt not commit adultery." This antithesis is so clear and convincing, that Musalmans can well leave it to any thoughtful person, whose mind is not totally warped by prejudice, to decide which of the two courses is the right one to follow. We repeat that Islam does not encourage very early marriages and prohibits prepuberty consummation, and even post-puberty consummation when it is injurious to the health of the wife. And it is not the question of the too early consummation of marriage with which we are all concerned when we desire the exclusion of Musalmans from the operation of the Sarda Act. But we are entirely opposed to the penalisation of marriages, because it deprives the parents and guardians of minors of the right of giving away such minors in marriages when it is in the interest of the minors themselves that such marriages should be contracted. Such marriages are contracted, not only in Muslim society and in the East, but were at one time quite common in non-Muslim society and in the West as well.

In exceptional cases early marriages are dictated by expediency in the interest of the minors themselves and the Age of Consent Committee itself records that early marriages are fostered among Musalmans in the United Provinces, among other things by "Some exigency or convenience or the idea of securing some advantage which may be otherwise lost."

When the Bill finally came up for consideration last September, it was rushed through in spite of 16 Muslim members of the Assembly once more giving a written statement to the Home member against the passage of the Bill. No less than 12 elected Musalman members voted for the exclusion of Musalmans from its operation, and only 5 voted against that amendment, while only 7 out of 29 Muslim elected members expressed agreement with the unamended Bill.

In the Council of State, Muslim opposition was still greater, and all Musalmans, without an exception, voted against it.

Even after this Muslim members of the Indian Legislature took a deputation to his Excellency Lord Goschen to request him to withhold his assent, and His Excellency based his postponement of a final decision on the complicated character of the question which necessitated the most careful consideration, and yet, only a couple of days after, His Excellency accorded his assent to this highly objectionable Bill, the enactment of which can never be tolerated by any believing Musalmans.

THREAT TO DISOBEY THE LAW.

This is the long-drawn history of the Sarda Act, and since we cannot ring down the curtain on a result so intolerable to the entire community, barring a few individuals, we have with great difficulty persuaded so many leading public men and Ulemas to agree to launching of yet another effort and we rely upon Your Excellency to take steps to enact an amending bill excluding Musalmans from the operation of the Sarda Act and to protect the personal law of Musalmans from such interference. We trust no question of prestige will let Government hesitate to rectify an error of judgment entailing such grave and intolerable consequences for the Muslim community in India.

With the Sarda Act, placed on the Statute Book as a precedent before the Indian Legislature there is no knowing what other Islamic Law will not be assailed next, and since it is not only the British element in the Indian Legislature that seems to be determined to throw Islamic as well as Hindu law into the melting pot of man-made legislation, but also the Indian element that claims to be Nationalist and would replace the British element, the question has assumed all the more gravity.

We submit once more that Mussalmans will never submit to such an intolerant interference with their sacred law. They will not hesitate to disobey any law robbing them of their religious freedom and they would not be deterred by the sanctions of Sarda Act. It is only too evident that Your Excellency has been sufficiently moved by what you have seen on the spot to seek to inaugurate an era of conciliation and concord. Would it not be an irony of fate, if just on the threshold of this era, Mussalmans are left to battle with their feeling of resentment on the enactment of a Law to which no one can ever reconcile himself, so long as he believes in the truth of Islam.

HIS EXCELLENCY THE VICEROY'S REPLY.

His Excellency the Viceroy in reply said:—
“I am very pleased to have the opportunity of meeting representatives of the Muslim Community here to-day, and to hear frankly from them of their anxieties in regard to the matter which has been the subject of our discussion. I fully appreciate the strength of your feeling on the subject, and wish to state as plainly as I can what seems to me to be the relevant considerations which we all have to bear in mind.

“First of all let me remind you of the legal position by which I and you are both alike bound. Under the Indian Constitution the Indian Legislature has the power to make laws for all persons, for all courts and for all places and things within British India 65 (1). This is a very wide power, but it is governed by the provision among others of 67 (2) (B).

“It shall not be lawful, without the previous sanction of the Governor-General, to introduce at any meeting of either Chamber of the Indian Legislature any measure affecting the religion or religious rites and usages of any class of British subjects in India.”

“In the exercise of this power my predecessor and, I think, I myself, have on several occasions refused sanction to Bills which by reason of their religious or quasi-religious import would have wounded the religious feelings of a community, and the mere discussion of which therefore would inevitably have aroused sharp communal feelings; and I can without hesitation say that in all such cases, any one who holds my Office would scrutinise very seriously any such proposals for legislation before granting sanction.

“There may be cases of a purely religious and spiritual character where a civil legislature would naturally be very unwilling to intervene, unless it were with the assent of the preponderance of opinion in the community concerned. I am thinking of what Maulana Mahomed Ali in his very complete and interesting statement which he was good enough to give me has referred to as ‘The boundaries of Allah which must never be transgressed.’

SOCIOLOGY AND RELIGION.

“But, as I see it, there are other questions, of which this marriage question was one, which are border line cases between Sociology or Civics and Religion. In the statement I have just referred to Maulana Mahomed Ali has spoken of the fallacy of trying to differentiate Sociology from Religion. But here clear thinking is important in a matter of this kind. It is impossible for a Modern State to disinterest itself, because it clearly bears upon a social question which must be of the most vital interest to it. But, in dealing with the question a Civil legislature is dealing with it primarily in its Civil aspect, which must always remain its responsibility.

“The difficulty is bound to arise for us all in such border line cases, and we have to judge them both as men sincerely devoted to our Religion, whatever that may be, and also as fair-minded and progressive citizens of a progressive age.

“It is not only, therefore, the legislature which has to reconcile these conflicting duties, but it is a duty which none of us can evade in forming our own private judgments.

“Where the limits of Civil Society and Religious Organisation are coterminous, these difficulties do not arise, for each is the counterpart of the other in the civil and religious sphere respectively. But neither you nor I can ignore our obligations as citizens in a Civil Society which is not composed only of members of the same religious profession as ourselves.

CHILD MARRIAGE EVILS.

“It is not necessary for me to stress the civic side of the evils of child marriage with which the Bill introduced by Rai Sahib Harbidas Sarda was designed to deal. The action taken by my Government, though it was taken in my absence, was one with which I wholeheartedly concurred and on which for the reasons I have given earlier, Government is bound to adhere to the position which, after the most full consideration, they felt it right to adopt.

“The Bill, as you know, has duly received Lord Goschen's assent. But in this particular case I understand you do not claim that the Civil authority has sought to debar you from a duty enjoined upon you by religious sanction for no Moslem maintains that child marriage is obligatory on religious grounds. I am speaking to men not only of deep religious feeling, but learned in their scriptures and I would not presume to speak to you at any length on the provisions of Islamic Law in regard to marriage whether laid down in the Quran Shareef, the Kadis or in other authoritative sources, but I believe that child marriage in so far as Muslims are concerned, is an exceptional practice, and one which, as a community, they are not prepared to defend.

"I believe, it is also true, that in Egypt, and possibly in other Muslim countries, marriage laws have been enacted by civil legislature.

"But I take it that your chief concern is in regard to the wider principle of asserting the religious character of the act of marriage and of ensuring, so far as it is possible for you to do so, having regard to those general obligations as citizens of which I spoke just now, that the religious liberties, and those that are included in the personal law, should not be impaired by civil legislation against your wishes.

"Thus Maulana Mahomed Ali, in his written statement, talks of Islamic Law as being absolutely self-contained, a complete prescription of everything that a man shall do to God, to his neighbour, and to himself. What Muslims fear, as he puts it, is the repeal of Qoranic Law by a human and non-Islamic legislature.

"I have said enough to show you that I recognise, and largely share, your feeling on these points, and you may rest well assured that I shall continue to have full regard to the sentiments you have expressed in considering whether or not sanction should be accorded to projects of legislation. And, inasmuch as the further Constitution of India is now under discussion, I shall make it my duty to acquaint those who now or later may be concerned with the drawing of its lines with the views you have laid before me.

"I would only add in conclusion that I am very pleased that you have seen fit to represent to me so frankly your anxieties, and I trust that what I have said will allay those that you yourselves have felt, and enable you to remove anxieties from the minds of others, who were unable to be here to-day."

INDIA AND UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

Mr. S. K. Batcliffe read the following paper before the East India Association at Westminster on Monday, October 21, Mr. Caxton Hall presiding:—

Not a great number of years ago the announcement of a title such as that adopted for this paper would have seemed far-fetched, even perhaps rather absurd. One would have been prepared for the question, "What relation can there be between India and the United States?" And one might well have been told that the title would not suggest to the members of the East India Association any subject matter at all. But there is to-day no need to apologize for the headline, although it might still be news to many people in England that for a large and varied section of the American public India is an important subject, and that in the difficult period upon which the Government of India is now entering the state of public opinion throughout North America cannot be a matter of indifference to us in England, to the British in India and to the Indian parties.

CAUSES OF GROWING INTEREST

India is, indeed, a subject of constantly growing interest to the American people, and increasingly important to them because of the expansion of American trade; the interaction between British India and the Philippines, America's leading Crown colony, as we should call it; the remarkable extension of American tourist traffic through the Middle East, the great development in Asia of modern American missions; and those most notable products of American wealth and public service, the Rockefeller and Carnegie foundations for research. To these we may add the widespread, and comparatively recent, awakening of a large portion of the American public to the political and social problems of India; the discussion, sometimes emotional discussion, of the social system of Hinduism, with its peculiar institutions of caste, of untouchability, of child marriage; and—most particularly—the impression made upon the common mind of America, during the past seven years, by the career, the personality, and the ideals of Mahatma Gandhi.

AMERICA IN INDIA.

I will ask you first to note that ever since the United States became responsible for the Philippines thirty years ago, the system of British India has had, for that relatively small but important minority of Americans connected with administration and semi-public enterprises overseas, a special appeal. It would be impossible to overstate the remoteness of all Americans from such matters before the Roosevelt epoch of expansion, with the exception of the small number of people concerned with the Oriental trade and the scattered men and women having some personal connection with the problems of missions and missionary education. The acquisition of the Philippines counts for almost nothing in American politics; they make hardly any appearance in the newspapers, are no nearer than the moon for the American multitude (save that they furnish effective pictures for the motives), but they are a reality for the Federal Government; they have created for the politicians and officials of Washington a problem analogous to that with which Whitehall and Simla have for so long been struggling—namely, the demand for Swaraj made by the political leaders of a people deeply divided by race, religion and social habit.

When I began work in Calcutta a short time after the pacification of the Philippines, there was much discussion of the inevitable influence in British India of the American enterprise—that is, of energetic entry into the field of colonial administration of a great modern Power, built upon the basis of theoretic democracy. The expectation was not fulfilled. American and British administrators went their separate ways. It seemed to be taken for granted that what the United States did in the Philippines would not reflect to any discernible extent the experience of British India; while if I am not mistaken, the advanced parties in India came early to the conclusion that their movement could not hope to gain much, either in stimulus or in education, from the experience of the Filipino efforts in the direction of home rule and independence.

AMERICAN RULE IN PHILIPPINES

As a consequence, during the past twenty years there has been a good deal less interaction between India and the Philippines than we expected, and I am inclined to think that the two problems will remain apart. The American administration has been modern and drastic; far less respectful towards ancient custom than the British in India has been; and latterly it has frankly and thoroughly been adjusted to the far-reaching schemes of American big business and to the prevalent conviction that the Archipelago affords a magnificent reservoir of raw material. During the eight years of the Woodrow Wilson administration the Philippines were allowed to go far towards general Swaraj.

With the passing of Wilson they came under the hand of a Rooseveltian dictator, the late General Leonard Wood. His methods and results did not commend themselves to Coolidge and Mr. Hoover, who made a decided move away from the Leonard Wood system by sending out Mr. Stimson, now Secretary of State in Washington. The policy now being followed is intelligent, and it must have consequences of no little importance. The Hoover imperialism is compatible with large political concessions and generous expenditure upon agriculture, education, and public health, for Mr. Hoover knows that a contended population, with a field of opportunity for the intelligentsia and the new commercial and technical classes, makes favourable conditions for industrial schemes and the development of natural resources.

Here, then, in the Hooverized Philippines, is America's contribution towards the problem of colonial government, and, as you will observe, it offers little in the way of parallel for India. Nor do the Philippines make any difficulty, as we might have expected, in that wide area of inter-racial conflict which in the American view is appallingly fecund in problems that are incapable of tolerable solutions—Immigration. It is here that we touch the one great question that connects North America with India, and with Asia generally.

ASIATIC IMMIGRANTS.

In the period immediately before the War America became deeply concerned over the perils of immigration from the Old World. It was an epoch marked by a return of the mass movement of communities; a repetition of phenomena familiar to the ancient world, with the added power of rapid transport from continent to continent. The cities and villages of Central and Eastern Europe were sending their folk in millions over to the land of promise. The yellow peoples, barred from Australasia, were persistently breaking into the States of the Pacific coast. The Chinese and Japanese had obtained a footing in California, as in British Columbia, and the citrus groves and fruit farms of that opulent land offered a marvellous field to the Japanese cultivator. He can make any desert blossom as the rose. Let him acquire a holding on California soil in the glow of the marvellous climate, and in no time he is a land-owner, a capitalist, with American labourers, and even farmers in his employ.

Twenty years ago the American States of the Pacific put up the barriers against all Asiatic peoples. They had been frightened by the increase of the Chinese and Japanese communities in California; they were resentful over the peaceful conquest by the Japanese of their own new colony, Hawaii. They checked the immigration of Chinese to begin with, by the imposition of a crushing impost upon such Chinese as could establish their right to enter the United States, while the menace of Japanese immigration was got rid of by means of a gentlemen's agreement with Tokio, under which Japanese labour was kept out altogether, while permits were granted to a small number of Japanese students and business and professional men. It remained for the United States Congress, in the time of President Coolidge and wholly against his will, to pass an Exclusion Bill, which ended the gentlemen's agreement and put an absolute ban upon Japanese immigration.

INDIANS IN CALIFORNIA.

In the case of Indians (called East Indians in America, for an obvious reason), there has been no such definite movement of exclusion on the part of the Pacific States; but this, as we shall see in a moment, does not mean that Indians are without their own specific and important grievance against American authority.

British Columbia had its own problem of Indian immigration. That far north western province of the Commonwealth of Greater Britain enjoys a fine temperate climate, and many years ago its farm labour was recruited by some hundreds of Indian cultivators—namely, from the Punjab. The Indians of Western Canada, as we know, are part of the India-Dominion problem, though a very small part of it only; and we have no need of a reminder as to the calamitous incident of the shipload of Sikhs turned back from Vancouver in the first year of the War. The north-western regions of the United States might easily have had an identical small problem on their hands, since the fruit ranches of Oregon and the State of Washington are habitable by the hardier Indian races; but the policy of exclusion prevented this. There has (needless to say) been no indentured Indian labour in the United States.

The question of admission in California, the one State where it has assumed proportions of consequence, has been mainly confined to a small number of property owners and educated Indians, and their grievance, it must be admitted, is of a very special character. They cannot acquire the status of American citizens. This privilege is refused to them under the laws of California, and the disability has been made absolute by the Supreme Court of the United States, the most powerful judicial tribunal in the world. Not a few of them are married to American wives, who retain their citizenship. The children being born on American soil, are birthright citizens; but the Indians themselves being Asiatics, are completely and finally barred from citizenship of the United States. Apart from the American negroes, enfranchised at the cost of civil war, all persons claiming the rights and privileges of American citizenship must belong to the branch of the human family formerly and very loosely labelled Caucasian—a pre-scientific classification made obsolete, as we had supposed, but the great modern generalization of the Aryan race.

THE EXCISE COMMISSIONER'S REPORT.

Mr. C. Rajagopalachari writes:—"Here is a summary of the Excise Report of 1928-29, keeping the language of the official report wherever possible:—

COUNTRY SPIRITS.

The consumption of country spirits increased by 11 per cent. Total quantity sold to the public was 1596998 proof gallons. The revenue was Rs. 223 lakhs.

TODDY.

The number of coconut trees licensed for tapping decreased by 82000. Total number of trees licensed for tapping liquor was 26 lakhs. The revenue from toddy increased by 5.7 per cent, total being Rs. 256 lakhs.

FOREIGN LIQUOR.

There was 26 per cent increase in the sale of Whisky, Brandy, Rum and Beer.

OPIUM.

Government sold 1.5 per cent more opium to the public this year. Total money paid by consumers was Rs. 53 lakhs.

GANJA.

Government sold 6½ per cent more Ganja and Bhangh this year, money paid by the consumers being Rs. lakhs.

OFFENCES.

Total number of cases showed a further increase of 5.5 per cent, number of cases being 19696.

GENERAL.

"The continued increase of crime against Abkari laws and its appearance in all parts of the Presidency must give pause to any immediate drastic action in the way of cutting off the supply of licit liquor—lest the result should prove more serious to the general morality than are the present conditions."

Is it not time the policy and the system of administration that produce these progressive results should be scrapped and the whole thing put on the only rational basis of total prohibition?"

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Indian Historical Records Commission:—The Gwalior Darbar have been pleased to invite the Indian Historical Records Commission which is to hold its sessions at Gwalior in December next. A Local Committee has been, therefore, formed to make the visit of the Commission a splendid success with the following as its members, namely:—(1) Sardar Madhav Rao Baba Sahib Phalke, (2) S. R. Bhagwat, Esq. Inspector-General of Records, (3) B. R. Tambo, Esq. Registrar of Education, (4) M. B. Cards, Esq., Superintendent, Archaeological Dept. (5) M. Saquib Sahib, Persian Professor, Victoria College. G. B. Makoday, Esq., Secretary of the Committee, to whom all communications should be addressed in this connection. All articles of Historical, Archaeological or Antiquarian interest relating to India are eligible as exhibits for sale or exhibition from Public institutions, Government bodies or individuals, such as Research Societies, Universities, Museums, Libraries or persons interested in antiquities. The last date for receiving exhibits will be the 30th, November 1929. Exhibits should be sent at the cost and risk of the exhibitors. While every care will be taken to ensure the safety of the exhibit, the Committee or the Superintendent of Archaeology cannot be held responsible for any loss or damage, whatever, sustained by the exhibits, either during transit to and from the Exhibition, or while they are in the possession of the superintendent of Archaeology. In all matters relating to the selection or rejection of the exhibits the decision of the Committee will be final. All exhibits will be returned at the cost of the Committee. For further particulars apply to the Inspector General of Records, Gwalior.

The XXXI All-India Theistic Conference, 1929:—Arrangements are being made to hold the next session of the All-India Theistic Conference at Lahore during the Christmas holidays. A Reception Committee has been formed with a Provincial Working Committee to prepare the preliminary steps. The Theistic Conference has been the meeting place of the representatives of Brahma and Prarthana Samajes in India and has afforded opportunity of exchanging views on many vital problems connected with the Theistic movement and of drawing the attention of the public to the necessity of a liberal religion which lays emphasis upon the worship of One Infinite God and the practice of the brotherhood of man. The success of such a Conference depends upon the hearty co-operation of all the Theistic organisations in the country. The Brahma Samaj has rendered very useful service in the course of the last one hundred years and it has been keenly felt, of late, that a better organisation is necessary to make it an effective force in the moral and spiritual uplift of the people. The Reception Committee therefore earnestly request all the Brahma and Prarthana Samajes to send their representatives to the forthcoming Conference and to communicate their suggestions regarding the subjects for discussion. Efforts are being made to draw up a useful and interesting programme. Besides divine service, lectures and discussions, the organisers will arrange trips to the various historical places round about the city of Lahore, and visits to the philanthropic and religious institutions. The Reception Committee send their cordial invitation to all the friends and well-wishers of the Theistic movement to come and take part in the Conference and thereby to promote the cause of Theism and the service of humanity, which they hold so dear. It will greatly facilitate the work of the Conference if the Committee are informed beforehand the names of the delegates. The Samjes and friends are also requested to suggest a name for election as President of the Conference. It has been suggested by some friends that Mr. Ramananda Chatterji M. A., editor of the Modern Review may be requested to preside this year. The Reception Committee invite the Samajes to express their opinion on the suggestion or to suggest new names. The question will be decided at a meeting of the Reception Committee on the 27th instant. A reply before that date will help the Committee to come to a decision agreeable to all. It has been felt that a better organisation is necessary for carrying on the work of the Conference and for promoting the cause of Theism. The Committee invite the opinion of all those interested in the movement regarding the means by which the Conference may be made more useful. The Theistic Conference has been all along financially supported by the Brahma and Prarthana Samajes and their members and well-wishers. It has been estimated that expenses this year will be not less than Rs. 3,000. The Reception Committee therefore appeal to the Samajes and the fellow-theists for some contribution towards the expenses of the Conference. All correspondence and remittances may be addressed to Prof. U. N. Ball, Provisional Secretary, Reception Committee, "Noor Cottage" McLeod Road, Lahore.

East African Congress:—In response to an urgent request from the East African Indian Congress, Mrs. Naidu has been persuaded to preside at the forthcoming session of the congress at Nairobi. She will return in time for the Lahore Congress. Though under medical advice she had to abandon the proposed tour to Andhra and Berar. She has agreed to proceed to East Africa in deference to the wishes of the Congress which has urged that the situation there is critical and her presence essential.

NOTES.

A Political Tragedy:—Sir A. Muhsin, Prime Minister of Iraq, shot himself dead on the 13th instant. He left behind a letter for his eldest son in which he explained why he was resorting to this desperate expedient. "The nation," he said "is pressing for service, but the British do not agree. I am without help. The Iraqis are weak. They believe me to be a traitor to my country and a servant of the British. What calamity! I have endured all kinds of insults and taunts as a reward of my efforts to secure happiness for my country in which my forefathers have lived with honour and dignity." A day later, Reuter stated that in a sentence which was omitted in the earlier message, the late Prime Minister had said that the Iraqis were not fit for self-government. This, by the way, does not seem to fit into the rest of the letter. Sir A. Muhsin's plight is that of many native leaders in British dependencies, not excluding India. There are few tasks more difficult for them than to befriend British rule without incurring the charge of being a traitor to the country. This is largely inherent in the position of that rule as a foreign rule. But it is also due to no inconsiderable degree to the change in the character of that rule, which has been proceeding since the last quarter of the last century, from a humanitarian and moral into a military and economic imperialism. It was possible for Raja Ram Mohan Roy in the first quarter and Dadabhai Naoroji in the third quarter of the last century to visualise British rule in India as a beneficent dispensation of Providence for the moral, intellectual and political emancipation of the people. But the same Dadabhai in 1906 confessed himself completely disillusioned and told his countrymen that in swaraj lay their only hope. Sir A. Muhsin has died, as many Indian reformers live, torn between goodwill towards Britain and loyalty to their country. Those who firmly shut their eyes to the good which British rule has wrought and work themselves up to think of it as a "satanic rule," obtain ease of mind of a certain kind; and so also those who shut their eyes to the increasing hardships of that rule, in memory of the solid good it has done in the past. It is those who cannot forget the substantial good nor overlook the growing infirmities of the British connection, that find themselves in the dreadful dilemma from which the Iraqi statesman could not think of any way of escape other than putting an end to his life.

The Better Way:—Sir A. Muhsin would seem to have killed himself with the cool deliberateness of a Japanese samurai or an ancient Roman, and not under a momentary impulse. There were two other alternatives before him. He could have retired from the Premiership and from politics, leaving it to other men to grapple with the problem of reconciling Iraqi autonomy with the requirements of the Mandatory Power. The draft of a new Treaty with Iraq which the Labour Government in Britain have made public, has made the situation far more favourable than it has been before, showing that the British attitude has undergone a marked change for the better towards Iraq. Unless there has happened something behind the scenes, the present would seem to be not a crisis which should have driven the veteran statesman who has tided over more serious crises to take away his life. Sir A. Muhsin, therefore, might have continued in office and carried through the new Treaty which would have placed Iraq in much the same position as Egypt in relation to Great Britain. It is the fate of all reformers who decline to be guided by extreme counsels to be branded as "traitors" by demagogues whose sole preoccupation is to maintain their hold on the fickle populace. The patriot of to-day has many times in history been the traitor of tomorrow. When the fruits of a wise policy of moderation are realised, the people will acclaim the man, whom they denounced as a traitor, as a hero. No more striking illustration of this can be given than the experience of the present British Prime Minister who, during the War, stood in danger of his life, because he opposed it from the first. The British people have now chosen for their Prime Minister the man whom they then hounded out of public life as a traitor. That the position is not so desperate as Sir A. Muhsin's suicide would make it appear, is shown by the fact that one of his colleagues in his own Cabinet has assumed the Premiership. It is an act of high courage and patriotism on his part and he will have the good wishes of every right-thinking man in the task which has been rendered specially difficult by the act of his predecessor. At the same time, we trust that the British Government will not fail to realise that they owe a duty to make the path of the constitutional reformer in every country where they have a controlling influence as smooth as possible, seeing that the difficulties inherent in the relation are themselves so great as to seem insuperable even to a seasoned statesman like the late Sir A. Muhsin. They have not been mindful of this duty in the past. It may be hoped that the Iraqi tragedy will make them more regardful of it in the future.

English Influence In India:—We reprint to-day a striking article by the Rev. J. D'Souza in a Catholic contemporary on the influence of English literature on neo-Hinduism. The Rev. Father, as becomes a Catholic missionary, sees a danger to Christianity in the adherence of English-educated Hindus to their ancestral faith. Christianity, in the sense of a sect, does not appeal to educated Hindus. But the life and teachings of Christ, which are so much distorted beyond recognition by the Churches which bear His name, profoundly appeals to them. No Christian who is less anxious to see the number of professing Christians increase than to see the Master's message permeate thought in this country, need regret this. But Catholic priests, as a rule, are so wedded to their particular dogmas that it is almost physically impossible for most of them to think freely or fairly where other religions are concerned. Yet, Father D'Souza might have recollected that an ancient Christian community has existed in India in full enjoyment of religious freedom for many centuries before the Society of Jesus to which he belongs was founded. Apart from this professional fallacy of the Rev. Father D'Souza, there is much in his article the truth of which is overlooked in current discussions. Particularly so is his observation that the attraction of English literature to Hindus arises out of a fundamental similarity between English and Hindu mentality and that the study of it in the Universities merely facilitates access for the Indian student. "The English conqueror," he concludes, "may or may not have come to India to stay; but surely English literature will abide." Sir Sivaswami Aiyar in his great book on the Indian constitutional question asks English statesmen not to be afraid of granting self-government to India as the cultural link is strong enough to maintain and promote intimate relations between the two countries. Father D'Souza's article, though written from the Catholic point of view, is an elaboration of Sir Sivaswami's opinion, which is very opportune at the present juncture.

America And India:—Mr. S. K. Ratcliffe, who edited the Statesman of Calcutta during Lord Curzon's Viceroyalty and incurred the wrath of that autocrat for importing a spirit of independence in one of the principal organs of the Anglo-Indian hierarchy in this county, has been writing and lecturing in the United States for some years. He read recently a paper in London on the widespread interest in India which he found prevailing in the United States. It is worthy of note that in Mr. Ratcliffe's opinion, Miss Katherine Mayo's "Mother India" has not been taken seriously outside the circle—a larger one in America than elsewhere—of persons who try to keep up a high opinion of their own morals and manners by working up a righteous indignation against the foibles of the heathen, in his blindness. The most important reason, however, which Mr. Ratcliffe gives is the interest felt among millions of Americans in the personality and views of Mahatma Gandhi, which are, as he says, a challenge to the American view at every point. As a matter of fact, however, American interest in Hindu thought is of far longer standing and did not, as Mr. Ratcliffe thinks, originate from the participation of Indian troops in the European War. Longfellow, Emerson, and Whittier were sympathetically familiar with Hindu philosophy. The best book on the religions of India is by an American, Professor J. B. Pratt. There are many more evidences which can be produced of America's interest in India which is not recent. We are almost sure that there are many more educated men in the United States than in Great Britain who have tried to and succeeded in acquiring an insight into and understanding of Indian things, undistorted by the wrong perspective which the political relations between Britain and India imposes upon the average Englishman.

Prohibition And Indian States:—We have time and again deplored the fact that Indian States, with a few honourable exceptions, have not taken a sympathetic attitude towards prohibition but Miss Campbell's statement in Madras comes on us as a surprise. A special correspondent of the Hindu writes in the course of a report of one of Miss Campbell's speeches in the South: "It was in Kolhapur that she had a peculiar experience of law when she visited that place, where though she was received kindly by the State, an order was served on her prohibiting her lectures on Prohibition as they would cause an agitation among the people which would affect the Excise revenue of that State. She sought permission to hold meetings without lecturing on Prohibition and at the meetings she found armed policemen occupying the front row of the audience. There she delivered nine lectures, and though she did not speak directly on Prohibition, she enlisted many in the cause of Prohibition, including even the policemen that guarded her in the meetings." Miss Campbell is a well-known worker in the cause of Prohibition and she is not likely to exaggerate. It is rather hard to believe, however, that an enlightened Hindu State like Kolhapur should have taken such an attitude towards a prohibition advocate and we are sure the Kolhapur State will be able to furnish an explanation of the incident. We hope only that a statement will be issued by the State without undue delay.

The Chand Marwari Number:—The Marwari Number of the Chand, the social reform Hindu monthly of Allahabad is a volume of four hundred pages containing many interesting cartoons and illustrations in colour. The leading article deals with the Marwari community at some length and will be read with considerable interest. We understand that the publishers intend issuing an Urdu edition of their monthly. We congratulate the publishers on having brought out an almost encyclopaedic review of the social and domestic life of the Marwari community.

BOMBAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1929.

THE WAR AND AFTER.

The conceit that modern western civilization is a unique product of human genius, that there has been nothing before comparable to it, is being rapidly dispelled by the results of antiquarian research. Unquestionable evidence is forthcoming of extensive commercial and cultural intercourse between distant nations, of high skill in industry and the arts, and of great achievements in the science and art of administration. The excellence of ancient classical literature has, of course, been long recognised but it is now clear that it did not appear as a freak and that it was, indeed, the expression of a very high degree of individual and social development. It appears probable that every civilization has periods of growth, culmination and decay and that the transition from the second stage to the last is often marked by a destructive war. The long war which was decided by the battle of Kurukshetra marked such a turning point in Hindu evolution. The Hindu religious, social and political life after the Mahabharata war was markedly different from what it was before it. The great European war which ended with the Armistice the eleventh anniversary of which was celebrated on the 11th instant with the annual ceremonial of two minutes' silence, poppy flower button-holes, and parades of troops, marks just such a point in the history of western civilization. Incidentally here we have actually before our eyes an explanation of the origin of ceremonies and celebrations which, started with a definite motive, lose in course of time their significance but continue to be kept up as national festivals. While admiration for the heroic self-sacrifice of the millions of men who gave up their lives, or worse, accepted cheerfully the prospect of a mutilated life, remains undiminished, the belief that the War has resulted in any sort of good to any race or nation is completely discredited by the results as they are still unfolding themselves. On the other hand, the opinion that the late War like all wars, was an unmitigated calamity for all concerned and many who were not concerned in it, widely prevails at the present day.

During the last few months there has been a talk among European statesmen, of the United States of Europe. They have become alive to the fact that the prosperity of the United States of America is largely due to the latter being a single economic unit without any tariff barriers between the several states of which it is composed. They ask themselves, why should not Europe become such a unit for industrial and commercial purposes? Before the War, the larger part of Europe except Russia was shared by two great Empires; the German and Austrian, each of which was a single economic unit. At the conclusion of the War, the Allied and Associated Powers broke up these two units into a number of small states, and in doing so created an economic chaos which is now reacting upon the victors themselves. The United States like a prudent gambler withdrew with its spoils at the nick of time, but the European Powers could not do so, and they are even greater sufferers to-day than the defeated nations. The attempt to exact a huge sum for Reparations from Germany had a curious result. Germany could raise the money only by selling her manufactured goods in foreign countries, but when she tried to do so, the Allies found their own markets slipping away from them owing to keen German competition. The Allies are unwilling to forego Reparations, and at the same time, they do not want their industries to be endangered. They have been holding Conferences with the object of finding out a way of achieving this dual object of squaring the economic circle. Germany, obliged by the Treaty of Versailles to maintain no standing army, is saved from the burden of military and naval expenditure which is weighing heavily upon the industry of the victorious nations. Disarmament Conferences are held every now and then but with very little actual result. The nations which have, want to keep their possessions intact, and are anxious to see those who are likely to challenge them, put away their arms. The nations which have not, or not as much as they would, of wealth and power, are afraid of those who have, lest they take away what little they have from them.

Of the defeated Powers, Austria has been the worst sufferer. Under the ironical title of "Self-Determination for Austria," Friedrich E. Kleinwaechter, has written an excruciatingly interesting little book, an excellent English translation of which (priced at 3 s. 6 d.) is published by Messrs. George Allen, London. The author, though he feels profoundly the wrong done to his nationality, writes with great moderation. He writes with perfect detachment like counsel pleading a case before a court of Law should, but sometimes does not, show. He shows how under the high-sounding slogan of "self-determination" the Austrians have been denied the right to join Germany to whose people they are united by bonds of race and culture and with whom alone they can become economically self-supporting. The Austro-Hungarian Empire prior to the war was made up of several races. Of all of them, the Austrian Germans alone have been held by the Allies to be accountable for the war. The others have been rewarded with separate states of their own, while the Austrian Germans numbering some six and a half millions are left with their old great capital, Vienna, and a small territory, shorn of the parts of the old Empire which supplied it with its economic foundations whose "independence" has been declared to be inviolate. "It is typical of the victor's insincerity" writes Dr. Kleinwaechter, "that they did not forbid the Union of German Austria with Germany in so many words, but rather veiled the prohibition with the pretence of maintaining Austria's independence. Thus words were chosen that seemed in harmony with the ideals proclaimed by President Wilson but were in reality a direct violation of those ideals." German Austria, he easily shows, can have no future as an independent state except in association with the German Reich. But France is afraid of the effect of the Union of the six and half a million Austrians with their sixty million German cousins. M. Clemenceau declared that there are twenty million Germans too many in the world. This is the root of France's fear. All the same, the Union of Germany and Austria is bound to happen. The two countries, as Dr. Kleinwaechter conclusively shows, are so closely allied by race, tradition and culture that no power on earth can keep them from coalescing for an indefinite period of time.

XLVII. ARTISTS AND SCULPTORS.

The offering that the artists and the sculptors have presented to the world is a highly acceptable one. From the earliest scratchings of the caveman to the finished production of the master is a far cry, and yet each represents the quest of a soul for expression. The artist works under compulsion. There is within him an urge that must find its outlet in stone or on canvass. For one it is the desire to create. For another it is the desire to interpret. In each instance the artist willingly gives his choicest offering. And he who gives willingly with all his heart, the same gives even unto God.

The layman who watches the artist or sculptor at work comes away with a feeling of amazement. To his non-critical eye the picture appears to be finished, but the artist gives a critical glance, disapproves, wipes it out, and sets to work again in the effort to reach perfection. The layman sees the working model of the sculptor. He would gladly give it place among his treasured possessions, but the sculptor is not satisfied. He moulds and remoulds, until at last he feels that he can do no more. He has set before himself an ideal and has made every effort to translate the ideal into reality. The patience of the artist and sculptor is a standing challenge to the layman to do worthy work, to give himself wholeheartedly for the achievement of the best.

But just as the artist is enriching the life of the world, he is also degrading it. Among artists we find the same old story; the prostituting of one's talents for the sake of gain. A casual survey of the magazines displayed at any railway station or large news-stands reveals no dearth of artistic talent, but it does show talent gone astray. A parent cannot but view with alarm the low illustrations in many of our popular magazines. A substantial group of artists are spending their labour for "that which satisfieth not," and bowing their heads before the God of gold. Should the voice of the public become articulate the pornographic evil would find itself to be short-lived.

Though the task of securing food and clothing occupies the greater part of a man's time and attention, the man who is only interested in food and in raiment is a man to be pitied. Man cannot live by bread alone, and he who tries it soon discovers himself to be undernourished and in dire danger of soul starvation. Material things have their place, but they can never feed the spirit within the man. Soul hunger can only be satisfied by the development of the resources, by bringing all the powers of the man to expression. It is only as one grows in appreciation and in understanding of the finer things of life that one begins to live.

MASS EDUCATION.

RAMKRISHNA MISSION'S APPEAL.

The Secretary of the Ramkrishna Mission writes:—The value of education as a powerful factor in the building up of a nation is well-known to all thinking people. The civilised countries of the West owe their enviable position to the extensive spread of education. And the United States of America tops the list because she has made education universal in the country. Our country presents a sad contrast to this. Witness as a result, the depths of degradation to which our masses have sunk. They are always poor because they do not know how to improve their material condition. They are constantly ill and die because they lack proper food and clothing and are entirely ignorant of the laws of health. They are easy prey to superstitions and are at the mercy of every quack and impostor that chooses to lay his hand on them. They cannot distinguish between what is good for them and what is bringing about their ruin. The condition of their women, in particular, is most deplorable. They are the picture of helplessness in its most pitiable aspect. No man can realise their sufferings; to do this he has to be a woman. And as everybody knows, child mortality in India is appalling. To cut a long story short, the Indian masses are living in a condition that is inhuman, heart rending and utterly unworthy of any civilised society.

This state of things must be immediately stopped. The Indian masses are also human beings, and as such it is the duty of everyone of us to set them on their feet. Our religion teaches the immanence of God in all beings. It will be the highest kind of worship if we try to help these millions of mute suffering men, women and children, our own countrymen, our brethren. It is the worship of the Living God. Swami Vivekananda spoke often of the need of mass education as a solvent for the country's problems. It will interest the public to know that in addition to our other activities we have been able to start some 65 schools, mostly primary, some of which also impart technical instruction. What we now want is, among other things, to add at least a hundred primary schools, as soon as the necessary funds will be forthcoming. It is upon the secure foundations of education that the structure of national well-being rests. In the name of our suffering millions we appeal to our generous countrymen for funds to carry out this educational work. We are confident that our appeal will meet with prompt response. Contributions, however small, will be thankfully received and acknowledged at the following address:—

JAYA AND JAYANTA.*

(By S. M. M.)

This is a translation into English of the famous Gujarati play "Jaya and Jayanta" by Nanalal Dalpatram Kavi. Nanalal has long enjoyed the undisputed position of being one of Gujarat's leading poet. This play is one of the master pieces of Gujarati literature and a favourite among the Gujaratis and it is a matter of satisfaction that at last a translation of it has been placed before the English reading public. The translation ought to help to popularise Nanalal and secure his works the greater attention and publicity which they deserve. As the translator observes in the preface "the book may also serve to show that India is not to be understood merely by a study of Blue-books and official Reports". Mr. Oza's translation maintains admirably the noble spirit and atmosphere of the play. The translation could not have been better. The play deals with the age-long conflict between the pleasures of the flesh and those of the spirit. Jaya, the beautiful daughter of the Chief of the Himalayan regions, vows to lead a chaste life devoted to religion. Her father wishes her to marry Jayanta, the son of his minister who had just returned after a successful campaign against the Demons. Jaya's mother, however, wishes her to marry the King of Benares. Jayanta proposes to Jaya but she declines. Later, she disappears from the palace after refusing to marry the Lord of Kasi. Jayanta leaves the palace and sets forth in search of Jaya. He roams after her for a long time but receiving a Divine message to start a college of physical research on the spot where he was doing penance, obeys it. Jaya in the meantime undergoes many physical and spiritual hardships as when she reaches the Temple of Sense Worshipers and falls into the hands of the Hunter. The wine-laden sensuous atmosphere of the Temple of Sense Worshipers is in direct contrast to the pure atmosphere after which Jaya's soul hungers. Jaya at last reaches Benares but falling into the hands of the priest of the Temple of Sin throws herself into the waters of the sacred Ganges to save her honour. She is, however, rescued by the pupils of Jayanta who has in the meantime established his college and gained great renown as the Sage of the Supreme Light. The third act depicts the scenes of Jaya and Jayanta's "great decision of love and celibacy" and the foundation of Jaya's college "to train women to a life of true wedded love and chastity".

The motive of the play may best be described in the words of the author as cited in the preface—"The path of platonic love and spiritual celibacy is not smooth, there are infinite temptations in the way, there is risk at every stage, but the heroism of a rarely heroic soul lies in his very fearlessness and supreme faith in the midst of all risks".

INDIA AND UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

In the United States the science of anthropology has been vigorously pursued and liberally endowed; and there, even more adventurously than in Germany, the theories of Aryan origin have been worked over and extended to the uttermost.

CONFISCATION.

And yet—so little co-ordinated are the legislative and judicial authorities which the heavily endowed departments of anthropology—the non-scientific label and definition are retained in law. The Indian is our Aryan brother, but apparently he is not of Caucasian household. The Supreme Court in Washington has condemned him to exclusion as a member of a racial family which is outside the pale and by hypothesis belonging to a group which cannot be assimilated, a metal destined to resist all the fires of the American crucible.

This judgment of the Courts was followed by punitive action on the part of the State authorities in California. Many Indians had secured naturalization, or were in possession of their first papers. Of these they were deprived, and in some cases the authorities took the next step of declaring their holding of land to be invalid and confiscating their property. In such cases the law as confirmed by the supreme Court has brought hardship and manifest injustice; but the process, I understand, has now ceased. I know of no measures of compensation for those Indians in California who were deprived of their property, but those who had not been proceeded against are left in peaceful possession, and, although they cannot establish their status, they look forward to staying in the country and bringing up families of (almost) 100 per cent. Americans.

There remains, for California especially, the problem of the Indian intelligentsia, which, at all events for some years, was complicated by the fact that the Pacific coast became a very active centre of Indian revolutionary groups dating from the day of Har Dayal, in 1914, and the Ghadr conspiracy.

* Published by Messrs. Heath Cranton, Ltd., 6 Fleet Lane, London, E. C. 4. Price 4s. 6d.

The troubles caused by the organization of young Indian extremists in India, of course, do not come within the range of my present subject. I pass them with only one remark. California has been a natural refuge and breeding point for sects both religious and social, and it is not surprising that the American shore of the Pacific should, during the Eastern excitements of the past two decades, have provided a good deal of strange history. Some of the extremist groups have carried on activities directly related to the subversive movements in India; others behaved in such a way as to bring their members into conflict with State authorities in the Far West, and some rather sensational happenings were recorded in consequence. These have tended to find some kind of interpretation in current American fiction, as well as in periodical literature. I mention in this connection "Daughters of Earth," an autobiographic novel by Agnes Smedly, an American woman, who in war-time threw herself into the cause of the young Indian revolutionaries in California. The book gives an exceedingly painful picture, unmistakably authentic, of the suffering of a radical American who became absorbed in the life of a company of 'deracines.'

In this connection I may note the fact, not unimportant in the influencing of American opinion upon Indian affairs, that for many years past a number of Indians, living permanently in America, have been engaged in continuous writing and speaking. A few have had the entree to important newspapers with more or less regularity, and perhaps half a dozen in all have made positions for themselves on the lecture platform. Save for two or three professors, and one very accomplished Bengali writer whose books have a wide and deserved success, these have been, so far as I know, identified with the political opinion of the left; for instance, giving support to the Non-Co-operation Movement. As, almost without exception, they are endowed with remarkable oratorical gifts, the opportunities they enjoy of addressing large audiences in colleges and clubs and in the open forums which have become regular institutions of the American Sunday, are considerable.

"MOTHER INDIA."

This perhaps, is the appropriate point for a few words upon the effect in the United States and Canada of Katherine Mayo's provocative book. "Mother India" met with a truly astonishing reception. It was not a best-seller as the term is understood in America (a country which will soon have the largest book-buying public in the world), but it was sold very widely and read enormously. The publisher told me that at the end of the first season its American sales were not less than 120,000. I can give personal testimony to the extent and force of interest it aroused. In the winter after its publication I was lecturing for some two months in the territory lying between Montreal and Washington, New York and Great Lakes, and that year I spoke at a larger number of colleges than usual. In perhaps the majority of cases I was invited to deal with Miss Mayo's theses, and as a rule I spoke under the heading of "Mother India and Modern India." The announcement of the title was sufficient to draw an overflowing audience. If it happened that in any place I gave two lectures, the one on "Mother India" brought the crowd.

The impression that had been made by the book made an interesting subject for analysis. Roughly, I should say that the audiences accustomed to free debate upon political and social questions such as the Sunday forums, were hostile to, or suspicious of, Miss Mayo. This was due in part to her earlier books on American subjects which were in support of influences deemed by progressive Americans to be anti-democratic. She was condemned as a strongly prejudiced observer. Secondly, in the colleges, unmistakably, the general attitude was one of curiosity. American students, lads and girls, have been excited by a long series of books treating of sex questions without reserve; and the rawness of Miss Mayo's writing in certain chapters was put by American youth in the same class with Judge Ben Lindsey's sensational disclosures of American juvenile immorality. Thirdly, there were the women's clubs and church-goers, who were in the main strongly for Miss Mayo, and convinced that her picture of Indian domestic and social conditions was substantially accurate, not, I think, interested with any political moral that might be drawn from the book, but certainly regarding it as valuable and most satisfactory, since it appeared to show the superiority of American civilization to those strange systems of the East which have a strong picturesque attraction for the Western reader and tourist, and which have been praised by Tagore and many lesser Orientals, and presented to Americans as embodying certain principles and forms of social life far better and infinitely more enduring than those of the dominant and abounding West.

I come now to the general question of America's interest in Indian affairs, a matter which must strike the English traveller in America as something actual and curiously widespread. I note, for instance, that when I spoke for the first time on the Pacific coast—at San Diego in Southern California—the subject asked for was "The Changing British Empire", and the first question of a lively half-hour after the address was, "When General Dyer was removed from the Army, was he given a pension?" From the time of my first visit to the United States, sixteen years ago, I was invited to speak and write about India; but I think it would be accurate to say that it was the coming of the Indian contingent to the Western Front that first aroused the attention of the large public.

MR. GANDHI AND AMERICA.

After the War the growth of interest was remarkable. The Punjab disturbances of 1919 and the rise of non-co-operation were featured in the American Press, and from 1922 onwards Mr. Gandhi became for the American people one of the outstanding personalities of the world. It would be difficult to make actual to an English audience the universality and directness of this interest. Several of the great American dailies sent out special correspondents to cover the Mahatma's movement, and almost every American weekly and monthly printed articles about the man himself and his gospel, emphasizing naturally his anti-Western philosophy at least as much as his political creed. The American imagination had been struck by the spectacle of this little naked elderly man, who had reduced the business of living to its barest terms, renouncing the whole of modernity and defying the mightiest imperial authority in the world.

More even than most people the Americans are attracted or impressed by a startling contrast; and for the denizens of New York and Chicago, Detroit and Los Angeles, there could be no imaginable contrast more startling than that provided by the apostle of non-violent non-co-operation. He embodies a complete negation of the American idea, of American history, habit, and ambition. A simple description of Gandhi at Ahmedabad could sound like nothing but the extremist condemnation of America and Americanism; and I suppose that this was the main reason why, to adopt his own idiom, the American got so tremendous a kick out of it.

At the time of Mr. Gandhi's imprisonment, when the Government of India came in for criticism in America from many sides, it was an irresistible temptation for an Englishman to ask his audience or his friends what attitude the Government of the United States would adopt towards a disruptive thinker, with an enormous popular following, who at the crisis of his movement had urged the imperial authority to take him at his word. Would President Wilson, or any one of his successors, have allowed the Gandhist challenge to go unanswered? And was there not a very striking moral to be drawn from such a contrast as this that a Judge in India sentenced the Ali Brothers to imprisonment for two years only, while in the United States men and women had been condemned to twenty years' imprisonment for distributing a circular or for making speeches about war and peace no worse than might be heard in comfort any day on an Indian 'maidan'?

THE INFLUENCE OF ENGLISH LITERATURE ON NEO-HINDUISM.

The Examiner, Bombay, reproduces an article by the Rev. J. D'Souza, the first part of which we print below:—

The backbone of the Neo-Hindu movement which has been gaining force in recent years, is formed by the mass of educated men who have received in a greater or lesser degree an English formation in the Universities. The initiators of the revival may have been, like Dayananda Saraswati or Ramkrishna Paramahansa, men with an exclusively Brahminic upbringing; and its apologists are certainly fond of representing it as of purely Indian growth, as a return to the Vedic religion in its pristine purity. To a certain extent this is true. But the sentiment that upholds it, its organization and methods of propaganda, its great financial resources, come from the educated class, from lawyers, teachers, government officials, politicians, merchants, and students. This it is that constitutes its peculiar danger. For these men will sooner or later become masters in India. They are just those from whom, because of their education, a more sympathetic attitude towards Christianity might have been expected. But in spite of the general scepticism characteristic of their class, they are not ashamed of Hinduism; and they are so far faithful to its fundamental beliefs as to show themselves openly convinced and at times militant Hindus.

There are many causes that account for this state of things; and students of Missiology have been busy studying them. But hitherto far too little has been made of the part of English literature in developing the Neo-Hindu mentality; not of the professedly anti-Christian books disseminated by agencies like the Rationalist Press Association, which after all reach comparatively few readers; but of the great storehouse of classical English literature which does not treat of religion directly; which is not intended as a weapon of religious propaganda by a neutral government, nor looked upon as such by the Indian public; which apparently is no more than a means of intellectual culture. The study of this literature is obligatory on all those wishing to gain the coveted University degree. It has the most important place in each of the three public examinations that mark the stages of the University course. And as the text-books for each of these three tests are changed every two years, all shades and varieties of this vast literature are being slowly diffused among the educated classes, unconsciously moulding their thoughts and forms of expression.

Now, the Indian student easily falls under the charm of this immensely rich and fascinating literature. One of the most distinguished of modern Indians, Romesh Chunder Dutt has described somewhere in glowing language, the spell cast upon him and his companions during their college days, by English poetry. Its beauty seemed to them irresistible; its rhythm haunted their ears; often they used to keep awake till late in the night reading aloud Shelley and Byron and Keats. The generation that followed R. C. Dutt adored Tennyson and Swinburne. My own college companions were passionately devoted to Meredith and Hardy. And so doubtless it will go on for a long time still, whatever be the changes in the political field. For the curious thing about this love of English books is that it goes hand in hand with an intense nationalism. In the world of books the Indian intellectual forgets his political antipathies and opens his heart to accents that seem to him all but divine. Nay, is it not precisely English literature and history which have kindled and still keep feeding within him the flame of nationalism? Indian political oratory is modelled on that of the great English Parliamentarians. And when the Indian Patriot is in need of particularly cogent argument, or a telling quotation, it is to English literature that he still goes—to Milton and Burke, to Mill and John Morley.

Nor is this love of English ideas and forms of expression a passing circumstance, a purely superficial sentiment to be cast off when its usefulness will have ceased. No, the Indian enthusiasm for English literature is based on something far deeper, I mean on a real, though perhaps an unconscious, sympathy for and understanding of, the English character. This may seem an astonishing thing to say in view of the magnitude and bitterness of the political struggle; astonishing to those who are impressed by the cheap antithesis between the cold and practical Englishman and the emotional and contemplative Oriental. But to anyone who looks beneath the surface it is clear that in spite of the thousand differences that separate Englishman and Indian there is a fundamental similarity in their characters. The artistic leanings of the two people are predominately literary or rather poetic. The depth of sentiment and emotion which the Englishman hides within him, often by means of an affected cynicism, his love of animals, of country life and of nature, his incurable homesickness, his melancholy are familiar to students of English lyric poetry. The English language is essentially a poetic medium, full of concrete and figurative terms steeped in suggestiveness, and except in the hands of the greatest masters, a difficult vehicle of abstract thought. This feature of English character and speech goes straight to the heart of the Indian. He, too, has an affectionate, even sentimental, nature. He is almost morbidly sensitive, has an unconquerable love of home and family, and an intense repugnance to tear himself away from all that is old and familiar and consecrated by usage. His finest efforts at abstract thought are marred by the intrusion of the poetic and mystic element. A beautiful metaphor has for him more force than a logical argument. Often in books of modern Indian philosophy, one is not sure where the metaphor ends and the doctrine begins.

Closely connected with the emotionalism, is the English love of moralizing which too, pleases the Indian. We must all recognize in the paradoxical English character, a store of genuine idealism which, notwithstanding his gift of humour, breaks out in rolling phrases about "doing good," "acting nobly," "leaving the world better and purer," "casting sunshine around us," about the "nobility of service," of being "helpful and brotherly." Protestant tract-literature, we may note in passing, revels in this phraseology, divorced from dogmatic teaching and often a mere cloak for sentiment. The Hindu, equally undogmatic in his beliefs, is delighted by it. He learns to repeat these pompous platitudes. And what is worse, just as with a certain type of Englishmen all this fine talk does not hinder actions dictated by self-interest, so, too, many a modern Indian throws a veil over his sordid and material pursuits by "lofty" talk about the spirituality of the East," which equals in sanctimoniousness, the choicest flowers of Peck-sniff and Chadband.

This community of sentiment both in its good and its less noble aspects, growing stronger by mutual action, explains many a curious feature of the Indian situation to-day. It explains why the Indian student masters the subtleties of English expression with comparative ease, and prides himself on that mastery. It explains why, for example, Vijayaraghavachariar presiding over a National Congress violently hostile to the Government could speak of England as "the greater Athens of the Modern world" without raising a protest. It explains why any eloquent English speaker, whatever his personal character and opinions, can hold the attention of a turbulent audience. No wonder therefore that the Indian patriot tries his best to perfect himself in so congenial a medium as the English language; no wonder he dreams of adding to the glory of his country by writing books that may become English classics. This in fact has been already done by those who are in the thickest of the religious and political struggle. The splendid eloquence of S. Banerjee and Sriivasa Sastri, the noble and austere prose of M. K. Gandhi, the exquisitely melodious lyrics of Toru Dutt and Sarojini Naidu, the superb diction of Rabindranath Tagore are now, to the Indian, part of the great tradition of English letters. The English conqueror may or may not have come to India to stay; but surely English literature will abide.

FRIENDSHIP CHESTS FOR FILIPINO CHILDREN.

The Federal Council Bulletin for October contains the following:—"We who desire peace must write it in the hearts of Children." Believing this to be true, the Committee on World Friendship Among Children is planning a project for cultivating understanding and goodwill between the children of the United States and those of the Philippine Islands. This is the third of these goodwill projects, the first being the Dolls of Friendship with the children of Japan and the second, the Friendship School Bags with the children of Mexico.

The country chosen for the third project is the Philippine Islands and the symbol chosen to bear the goodwill greetings from the children of the United States to the Filipino children is a Friendship Treasure Chest. The project will be consummated in the Philippines on December 30, 1930, a national holiday commemorating the death of Dr. José Rizal, the great Filipino patriot. The Department of Education will receive the Friendship Treasure Chests and distribute them and their contents to the children of the Philippines.

It was found necessary to make the Friendship Treasure Chests of a material impervious to white ants and, because of its decorative possibilities, metal was finally chosen. The Chests are  $10\frac{1}{2} \times 8\frac{1}{2} \times 5$  inches in size, with the handles of brass and a lock and key. They are delightfully lithographed in eleven colors and the Committee believes that children will happily study the charming old maps; the pictures of Washington and Rizal, of Columbus and Magellan; the watchful sea-serpent and whale; and Old Boreas and Father Neptune controlling the winds and the waves.

It is hoped that the filling of the Friendship Treasure Chests will be the culmination of a program of study of the country and the people. As a help to such a program, a bibliography of books on the Philippines has been compiled and arranged in two lists, one for adults and one for children.

As in others, the children of the United States will be asked to send to the children of the Philippines a personal letter of friendly greeting with a goodwill message, together with such articles as crayons, drawing sets, games, scrapbooks, harmonicas, sewing kits, paper dolls, puzzles, handkerchiefs and beads. In addition, it is hoped that every Friendship Treasure Chest will contain at least one book, preferably two. Even though the Filipino children learn English in their schools there are very few public libraries. There is, therefore, a great need for good books. A bibliography of 400 books suitable for children from six to fifteen years of age has been prepared under the supervision of Miss Clara Whitehill Hunt of Brooklyn, a librarian widely known as an authority on children's books. It is planned that wherever possible this project will be made a community affair, offering as it does an unusual opportunity for peace education.

The War Department has offered to send the Friendship Treasure Chests to the Philippines free of charge by Army Transports sailing from New York and San Francisco. The Chests to be filled are distributed by the Committee on World Friendship Among Children, N. Y., at $2.00 each.

FIFTY YEARS OF NAVAVIDHAN—ITS MEANING AND ITS MESSAGE.

A CALL TO THE JUBILEE CELEBRATION.

All communications relating to the Jubilee are to be addressed to the Secretaries, Jubilee-Centenary Committee, Peace Cottage, 84, Upper Circular Road, Calcutta.

The Secretaries, Jubilee-Centenary Committee Calcutta, write to us as follows:—The declaration of Navavidhan in 1880 was a significant event in the spiritual history of Modern India. It was preceded by a period of preparation covering exactly half a century. Rammohan Roy, the great forerunner prepared the way for its advent when he called his friends to unite in Unitarian worship in 1825.

Later on he inaugurated the Brahma Sabha in 1828. To crown all after full five years of preparation, the need for a permanent place of worship was felt and the Brahma Samaj was established in 1830.

From the very start Upasana (worship) was the rallying point around which the members met. In the early days, during the first twenty years up till 1850, readings from Vedantic scriptures formed an important part of Upasana (worship), which meant tuning our spirit to the olden rishis and seers of India. The days of Vakhyan (interpretation) came. Whatever spiritual experience found entrance into Maharshi Debeniranath's soul came to be accepted in the Brahma Samaj, and dwelt upon at length in his Vakhyan and Sermons.

With the advent of the ministry of Brahmananda Keshub Chunder Sen began the emphasis on direct prayers and Aradhana (Adoration). Instead of God being referred to in the third person, He came to be addressed to in the second person. This was an important step forward in the evolution of the Upasana of Navavidhan. Realization of such direct relationship led inevitably to the idea of dispensation (God seeking man) and to the facts of communion with God and reception of Adesh (Divine Command) from Him. These fundamental spiritual experiences have led to all the manifold thoughts, sentiments and activities that have gained recognition as Navavidhan.

Accepting as we do the continuity of the Dispensation, we cannot but say with Keshub that the Dispensation began with the foundation of the Calcutta Brahma Samaj at Jorasanko and prepared the worshippers and workers for fifty years. After an unconscious preparation for fifty years, it came to be consciously recognized in 1880 as the Navavidhan. Such realization came only after the acid test of Adesh (Divine command) which the faithful had to pass through.

In celebrating the Jubilee, therefore, we must rejoice also over the Centenary of this Brahma Samaj at Jorasanko, Calcutta, which is to be celebrated in 1930, for we are bound to it by spiritual affiliation, spiritual continuity and spiritual development and in many matters affecting our social and national life.

The Dispensation that we call the Navavidhan (New Dispensation) is not an isolated fact in history or society. It has not come for the emancipation of a handful privileged people. It forsakes none but it has come for all and through all. It has come through all humanity for it is given to us to see that the law of synthesis and harmony is operating in all the churches, sects and communions. Like the law of universal gravitation, it is the spiritual law that makes for spiritual communion and spiritual solidarity. Other communions, therefore, have a claim upon our love and goodwill. The removal of conflict between sect and sect, church and church, class and class, nation and nation, can only come from the spiritual law of synthesis and active partiicipation in all spiritual experiences in the individual as well as in the collective life in the race.

The outlook of the Navavidhan, therefore, comprehends the social, the national and religious aspects of the life of the people. Our flag is at once national and international. Our ideal is at once individual and collective. Our gospel is at once ancient and modern.

We, therefore, request all our countrymen and those who are outside its borders to send their greetings and goodwishes and to participate with us, whenever and wherever possible, in the joys which will accompany the celebration of the unique event, The Navavidhan Jubilee.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Mrs. Bryan's visit to India:—Mr. Roy, the Oriental Press, New York, sends us the following information:—The Women's Peace Union which has at its head Miss Jeannette Rankin, the first woman to be elected to the United States Congress, who as an avowed pacifist voted against America's entry into the world war in 1917, recently issued an invitation to a dinner in honor of Mrs. Jane S. Bryan at the Butler Hall of the Columbia University. Soon after this dinner, the Indo-American Association gave a Hindu dinner at the Ceylon-India Inn in appreciation of her varied services for the welfare of the Orient in general, and India in particular. These dinners were arranged at this time specially because Mrs. Bryan starts on a tour around the world in the interest of peace. Mrs. Bryan is not related to William Jennings Bryan. But there is a spiritual kinship between the two in their militant enthusiasm for world peace. She belongs to the Unitarian Church. Mrs. Bryan realizes that the relationship between the East and the West is far from satisfactory. During this educational trip to the Orient and Europe she is going to study the fundamental causes of this discord and to try to discover a method of producing harmony between the Orient and the Occident. Mrs. Bryan is indeed well fitted for such a task. She has, for the last thirty years, taught in the public schools of New York. India owes Mrs. Bryan a debt of gratitude. Indians who have lived in New York for the last fifteen years know her services to India. Lala Lajpat Rai and Professor Benoy Kumar Sarkar knew her well and Mrs. Sarojini Naidu became acquainted with her during her recent visit to America.

Hindustani Seva Dal:—The General Secretary of the Hindustani Seva Dal has issued the following circular in connection with the ensuing monthly Flag salutation:—“Apropos the recent debate in the House of Commons and the replies of the Secretary of State for India on the announcement of the Viceroy regarding the question of constitutional reforms for India, it is very evident, that the hands of the leaders of India's masses should be strengthened in their endeavour to solve the problem of Indian Swaraj either through the means of a Round Table Conference as suggested in the Viceregal announcement or otherwise. The well-known, trite saying that “Union is Strength” was never so necessary of being put into action as at the present moment. And how best can we show our unity except by coming under one Flag—the Indian Nationa Tricolour with the Charkha on it—and saluting it at every place in India with vast mass demonstrations? We therefore, trust that the ensuing eleventh monthly Flag Salutation of the Dal at 8 A.M. on Sunday, November 24, 1929, will prove doubly successful and reports of the same will be promptly sent to the Dal Headquarters.” Hindustani Seva Dal, Hubli, Karnatak.

Mr. Kunru in England:—Pandit H. N. Kunru President of the East African Indian National Congress, interviewed Lord Passfield with the object of impressing the Minister with the unanimity of all parties in India, the princes and the Government of India included, on questions concerning Indians overseas and also presenting a memorandum on behalf of the Congress which, it is understood, criticizes some statements in the Wilson report, as ‘creating a misunderstanding regarding the position of the Indian community and Mr. Sastri.’ It is stated that Mr. Kunru has gathered the impression that complete agreement exists between the Government of India and Mr. Wedgwood Benn on the question of an effective protection of Indian interests. The Cabinet proposals are expected about the end of this month.

Aga Khan's Prize Offer:—The Aga Khan has offered through the Royal Aero Club a prize of £500 for the first England India or India England flight by a person of Indian nationality. The flight must be solo and must be completed within six weeks. The prize will be open for a year from the 1st January next.

Mrs. Sarojini Naidu:—Mrs. Sarojini Naidu left Bombay for East Africa by the s.s. Khandala on Wednesday afternoon to preside over the East African Congress commencing at Nairobi on December 7. She intends to return to India on December 21 in time for the Lahore Congress. Interviewed, Mrs. Naidu stated that the ensuing session of the East African Indian Congress had to consider the critical situation created by the Hilton-Young Commission's Report and Sir Samuel Wilson's Report. Generally speaking, Indians in East Africa were fighting for the introduction of a common electoral roll, and that question would occupy the serious attention of the delegates to the Congress.

“Varasulka”:—Mr. R. S. Mani of Kottarakari has addressed the following to Mr. Sarda:—“The purpose of this letter is to bring to your notice another system which has vitally affected the Hindu Society more especially the Brahmins of South India. I mean the Varasulka. I do not know the practice prevailing in Northern India. Varasulka is the price paid by the parents of the bride to the parents of the bride-groom for marriage. In the Southern Presidency this system has got such a firm grip on the Society that it is impossible for a poor man to have his girls married to eligible husbands. The bride-groom need not be rich, accomplished, educated or money-making. But the only thing is that the bride-groom should not be a female but a male. Immediately he demands a price from Rs. 500 to Rs. 10,000 according to the whims and caprices of the bride-groom's people. This system has come into being for the past 25 or 40 years. Before that it was the other way. The parents of the bride demanded a price from the bride-groom party. This pernicious system if allowed to go on for another decade is sure to impoverish and ruin the Hindu Society beyond redemption. I am prepared to give statistics in support of my statement from certain selected typical Brahmin villages. Now I would put a straight question to the Sanathanists and Maddathipathies. This system of Varasulka is prohibited by the Sruthis and Smrithis. According to Hindu Law eight forms of marriage are recognised. Of these five are approved and three disapproved. One of the disapproved form is in which a price is demanded and taken by the father. Such being the case how is it that this system is allowed to go on by the Sanathanists and Madhathipathies? Have any of these pseud-protectors and upholders of Hindu religion raised their little finger to stop this evil practice?"

"Indian Centre" of New York:—A Pioneer special cable says:—A campaign sponsored by Mr. Hari Govil, the founder of the India Society of America, has begun to raise 22,000 dollars for buying a six-storey building on Riverside Drive as the "Indian centre," where it is proposed to set aside one room for a Hindu temple to be transported from India.

Jubbulpore Temple Thrown Open.—Through the efforts of Mr. G. D. Birla, M.L.A. and Seth Jamnala Bajaj the temple of Ramkrishna near Hanumantal which is the property of Seth Beohar Raghupir Singh and his son Rajendra Singh was thrown open to "Untouchables" this morning. A large number of "Untouchables" visited the temple. The action of Seth Beohar Raghupir Singh and his son who are Kayestha by caste has caused considerable resentment amongst the orthodox Hindu circles of the City.

Tolerated Vice Areas.—At a meeting of the "Calcutta Parliament" the following resolution was passed. "This House affirms its adherence to the principle of a high equal standard of morality as between the sexes and places on record its opposition to the system of tolerated vice areas prevailing in Calcutta and other cities."

LIFE INSURANCE TRUST PLAN

THE outright payment of the Insurance money to the widow or children in one lump sum is a great mistake. To apply a real test you would only ask yourself how your wife would invest such a sum NOW without any help whatever from you. The woman who has been "All the Wife and Mother" is ill-equipped to invest and safeguard funds designed to her family's protection for many years.

Therefore take advantage of

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

NOTES.

Mahatma Gandhi And The Social Conference :—Mahatma Gandhi—we shall continue to use the designation, which Mr. Gandhi repudiates, as pre-war titles are continued in the post-war republics of Europe as a personal name—is expected or thinks he is expected to give a reason for every act or omission of his, and he seems also to think that he should give one which is unique of its kind or, at any rate, will not be commonplace. He declined to accept the Presidentship of the forthcoming session of the Indian National Congress on the ground that he has lost touch with the younger generation of politicians although the selection of the alternative President clearly showed that the younger generation is only too ready to carry out his behests. He has now declined the Presidentship of the National Social Conference on the ground of his preoccupations, adding that "his way is often different from those of orthodox reformers." The promoters of the Conference presumably knew something of Mahatmaji's ways and probably wished to know more of it when they invited him to preside over its next session. They themselves, perhaps, preferred his ways to those of "orthodox reformers" whoever they may be, and wanted his instruction in those ways so that they may attain proficiency in them. However that may be, there is a subtle psychological and even spiritual danger in the desire to establish a character for uniqueness in one's generation. Social reform, like other reforms, can be achieved only in one way, though it may be spoiled in several ways. That way is education and personal example—putting within men the knowledge which should motivate reform and removing their apprehensions regarding the effect of innovations by the reformer showing the way by his own personal conduct. All other ways, dramatic and sensational, are liable to create reactions of the kind which Emerson had in mind when he wrote that "a great immorality treads on the heels of every reformation." So far as we have been able to judge, Mahatma Gandhi's method is of the right type. He has never asked people to do anything which he has not himself tested and found good in his own life, and his educational propaganda far exceeds in efficacy those of the older generation of reformers. There can be no patent in ways of social reform, and there is no orthodoxy in it either. We, therefore, regret Mahatmaji's wholly uncalled for remark which suggests a difference which does not exist. Social reformers of all shades have welcomed Mahatmaji's advent into the field as an extensive farmer might welcome the advent of the steam-plough in place of his old wooden contrivance.

Pandit Jawaharlal's Letters To His Daughter :—It may come as a surprise to many, as it did to us, that the President designate of the next session of the National Congress, has a daughter in whose education he takes a personal interest. Pandit Jawaharlal has been popularly regarded as a perennial youth without any of the affinities which beset other men and as a root-and-branch radical in religious, social and economic as in political matters. But this collection of letters to his little daughter ten years old, which he has been persuaded to publish, shows him to be a man with a deep-rooted sense of parental duty which is the most effective guarantee against root-and-branch radicalism turning into tooth-and-claw revolutionism. Many who felt rather sceptical about Pandit Jawaharlal's nomination to the Presidentship of the Congress, will feel reassured to know that the senior political organisation in the country is to be guided by a man who has a high sense of responsibility as a family man. In this respect the Pandit shows to advantage by the side of some who are far his seniors in political life. Of the letters themselves, our first impression on looking over them is that they must have been rather boring to a child of ten. The father is himself now and then alive to this possibility and he tries to write in a vein which, he thinks, is more likely to fit in with the fancy of his tiny correspondent, but he does not succeed very well. The fact is, his ideas about the education of his child seem to be about the same as James Mill's about the education of his son, John Stuart. The latter in his Autobiography, which Pandit Jawaharlal has no doubt read, points out with surprising detachment the defects of his father's system as manifested in himself. We hope little Miss Nehru's child nature is proof against her father's pedagogic efforts, and that she would not, as she grows up, have much of the thin rationalism of J. S. Mill.

Opposition To The Marriage Act:—While the orthodox Hindu opposition to the Sarda Marriage Act has spent its force, Mahomedans who see in the Act an infringement of their religious law, are still carrying on an agitation to get their community exempted from it. An All-India Conference of Mahomedans who are of this view is to be held at Cawnpore and in an appeal issued in connection with it, it is said that the object of the Conference is to preserve the Islamic law. It is admitted that there is no religious obligation on Mahomedans as on some castes of Hindus to marry their girls before puberty. Their objection seems to be that as the Islamic law does not prohibit child marriages the Indian Legislature could not do so, so far as Musalmans are concerned. The Islamic law does not forbid slavery. Should the Indian Legislature allow Mahomedans to have slaves? Islam punishes with severe penalties a person who leaves it for another faith. The Indian law, on the other hand, protects the property rights of such converts. The argument is absolutely untenable and no wonder few Mahomedans outside the theological class have joined in this objection. The Viceroy's reply to the deputation led by Maulana Mahomed Ali has made it perfectly, but politely, clear that the opposition to the Act is misconceived and that Government cannot support the exclusion of any community from the provisions of a law intended to protect female children. Unless it can be shown that child marriage has on Muslim girls an effect markedly different from that on other girls, the opposition movement is bound to be futile. Hindus have been denounced up and down as the protagonists of child marriage. This doubtful honour should now belong to the Indian Musalmans who are carrying on this misguided agitation.

The Sarda Act And Early Marriages:—In allowing the appeal against the decision of the District Magistrate of East Godavari permitting the marriage of a rich boy aged 12 to a girl of 11, which was commented on in these columns recently, Mr. Justice Venkata Subba Rao said that the statement of the Magistrate was "a pamphlet on early marriage and betrays a lack of judicial decorum and balance." Mr. Subba Rao pointed out the disastrous results if judges showed open hostility to the Sarda Act from the Bench.

Jubbulpore Leads:—The justice of the claims of the untouchables to temple entry is increasingly coming to be recognised. In this respect Jubbulpore has set a fine example to the whole of India by throwing open eight temples to the so-called untouchables. One of these important temples to admit untouchables for worship is that of Radhakrishna which is a hundred years old. It is gratifying that progressive ideas are fast gaining ground in the cosmopolitan city of Bombay and the decision of the Trustees of the Ramchandraj temple to admit all members of the Hindu community for worship within its precincts is a welcome precedent. The Trustees themselves declared in reply to a congratulatory message that they have, in taking the step, done only their duty and nothing more. The removal of untouchability is engaging the best minds in the country. The Indian National Congress has entrusted Sheth Jamnalal Bajaj whose devotion for the cause of the untouchables has borne fruit in the Central Provinces, to carry on an intensive propaganda during this year.

Film Stars In India:—Mr. A. M. Green, Acting Trade Commissioner for India who had served as a member of the Indian Cinematograph Committee, read a paper before the Indian Section of the Royal Society of Arts on the Film Industry in India. We give below an extract on the position of actors and actresses generally in that profession, which will interest our readers:—
"There are many excellent dramatic performers in India, but the profession, as indeed was the case in England not so very many years ago, is, to say the least, not very highly accounted. In reputable Indian dramatic companies the women's parts are still, as in Elizabethan days in England, played by men or boys. This expedient has even been tried for film work, but met with well-merited failure. Thus actresses have been found essential, and in the past have mainly been drawn from the dancing-girl class. This reacts on the supply of actors, who in the circumstances can seldom be obtained from the more select or cultured classes. It also reacts more or less on all connected with the industry, to which a certain stigma undoubtedly attaches. Consequently, it is seldom that men of culture or education are attracted to the industry, either as actors, producers, or even financiers. Happily, however, there are honourable exceptions and signs are not wanting of a general improvement".

India And The Western World:—Mr. Richard B. Gregg author of "Economics of Khaddar" writes in World Tomorrow in reviewing Miss Mayo's "Slaves of the Gods" and another book by an American:—" Criticisms about other people, books of travel, and foreign travel itself are now becoming a part of the lives of so many Americans that we ought to think out clearly and surely our standards and methods of valuation with which we are to estimate ourselves and other peoples of the world. We can no longer afford to be parochial in our judgments. After all, the inhabitants of the United States are only about one-tenth of the population of the world. And if the doctrine that the majority rules should apply to manners, customs and beliefs as well as to politics, and if it be in some degree true that children should be seen but not heard, might it not be wise for us to refrain from being too dogmatic and condemnatory, at least until we have tried long and earnestly to understand ways, that are different from our own? We should try not only to see the differences between other peoples and ourselves but, more important still, to see the resemblances underlying the apparent differences. Such an attitude seems to be more interesting, more scientific, and more illuminating. One cannot wholly explain the huge sales of Miss Mayo's books on the ground that Anglo-Saxons have morbid and maliciously gossipy minds. It seems more probable that there is among us a prevailing uneasy conscience and sense of insecurity in relation to the colored races which such books as these greatly soothe and comfort. If you read them, bear in mind Bernard Shaw's dictum that all criticism is a form of autobiography, and meditate upon the attitude and position of the white race. Then smile, for we are all children and have much to learn."

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.
BOMBAY, NOVEMBER 30, 1929.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.

Fifty years ago, the leader of English Positivists and the eminent man of letters, the late Mr. Frederic Harrison, wrote a review of the life of George Eliot (Miss Marion Evans) by J. W. Cross whom she married after the death of George Lewes, a married man with a family, with whom she had lived for several years in relations of an informal kind. George Eliot was one of the pioneers of the women's emancipation movement in England. She was one of the foremost thinkers of her time and she was a great writer. She had very high notions of purity, and was held in deep respect by her friends of whom Frederic Harrison was one. Her action in contracting an irregular alliance with a married man of family, could not be passed over in silence by a conscientious reviewer and Harrison touched on it in a couple of earnest and eloquent paragraphs. In them he took occasion to set forth his own view of marriage. He began by paying a noble tribute to George Eliot, who had died a few years previously, but felt constrained to disapprove of her relations with George Lewes. We quote his words as they represent the ideal of marriage cherished by some of the finest Englishmen of the last century:—

The cause to which some of us have pledged our lives in labouring in every way to fortify the marriage bond; would teach the future to make it indissoluble by law, and indissoluble even by death. In the chaos which has followed the loosening of old moral and religious canons, strange and unwholesome doctrines are put forth in the name of society and moral duty; and whilst opinion and religion sanction divorce, the unsettlement of ideas will still be profound. But we trust the future will recognise that responsibility in marriage and happiness in marriage alike depend on its irrevocable nature. The future will know nothing of degrees of marriage or of any honourable union but that of the inflexible law of the land. It is the essence of marriage to be above the field of individual exceptions, to stand supreme, high beyond all personal opinions, miseries or joys. The happiness of individuals would be dearly bought if it dimmed, by one passing shadow of suspicion, the inviolable institution whereon the happiness of all depends. It is meet sometimes that some suffer for the people. The moral law is infinitely more precious than the personal happiness of any; and the sufferings of exceptional cases must be borne with resignation, lest harm befall the sanctity of every home, and the moral currency be debased."

The Positivists of whom Harrison was the leading figure in England at the time had revolted against dogmatic religion because they thought that they had found a higher one in the religion of humanity. His idea of the sanctity of marriage was not derived, therefore, from ecclesiastical sources which Positivists repudiated. It was conceived as one of the essential elements in the perfection of humanity which was the goal of Comte and his followers. The Positivist ideal exceeded the Catholic one by regarding marriage irrevocable even by death and it exceeded the Brahmanical one by being the same for both men and women.

This transcendental ideal has not found acceptance in the West. The hope of Harrison has not been fulfilled. The Catholic countries instead of going forward and making marriage irrevocable even by death, have adopted civil marriage laws which allow divorce. The course of reform among Hindus, instead of levelling up the law to the practice of Hindu women, prohibiting remarriage for widowers as for widows, has taken the direction of allowing the remarriage of widows as of widowers. And now there is a growing demand for the introduction of divorce among Brahmins and other Hindus who are subject to the Brahmanical law. Something like a split seems to have developed over the resolution advocating divorce at the Women's Social Conference held in Madras last week, as will be seen from the excerpts which are printed in another part of this issue. Broadly speaking, the division of opinion at the Conference was between married and unmarried women, and amongst them, between the younger and the older generations. The point of view of the elder married women is well expressed in the letter of Mrs. Sivan to Mrs. Cousins reproduced elsewhere. Her first argument is that the mention of the word "divorce" will scare away thousands of men and women otherwise sympathetically inclined to social reform. The same argument used to be urged against the movement to remove the prohibition of the remarriage of Hindu widows, and is no more convincing in the one case than in the other. Mrs. Sivan's most effective argument is that Indian women should set a high example of sacrifice in the maintenance of the inviolability of the marriage relation. "In my opinion," she writes, "the breaking of solemn marriage pledges by one party does not call for the breaking of pledges by the other." This is a high ideal approximating to that defined by Frederic Harrison, but we are afraid that there is no more possibility of its being observed in India than it has been in Western countries. And there are practical considerations which Mrs. Sivan and those of her way of thinking do not seem sufficiently to appreciate. That she is herself not altogether unmindful of the difficulty arising from the one-sided obligations of the Hindu system as it is to-day, is clear from her advice to her sisters to "educate man to a higher level of perfection". This however is a counsel of perfection. Men have not learnt from women, all these many centuries that the latter have submitted to the existing laws, to be more like them in their devotion and sacrifice for the marriage ideal. It is hard to expect women to go on bearing the burden of the sanctity of marriage on their shoulders alone, in a society where most of them are married before they are capable of understanding what marriage is. Some sort of arrangement to permit the severance of the marriage bond in cases of definite hardship is evidently inevitable, and it is as well to admit that fact. The sanctity of marriage cannot be injured by admitting that mistakes are possible in marriage as in other matters and providing an easy and expeditious way of correcting them whenever they happen.

As for how this can be done, we would refer to an important letter from the Hon. Mr. B. V. Jadhav which we published in the Reformer of the 8th June. Mr. Jadhav observed: "It is generally supposed by the educated people that the Hindu law does not recognise divorce. But Smriti writes such as Narad, Vasishta and even Manu countenance it and the present practice will be known if one will scan the pages of vernacular mofussil newspapers in the Bombay Presidency. One will be surprised to see the immense number of notices given by deserted wives to their husbands, calling upon them to redeem the debts they had incurred and to give security for considerate treatment in future. The notice warns the husband that his default will be taken as divorce granted by him and his wife would marry again. This shows the state of things in which the divorce is said to be obtained without any judicial proceedings." It is along these customary lines, that a simple and satisfactory solution should be found for the increasing number of hard cases of wives deserted or maltreated by their husbands.

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

XLVIII. THE UNEMPLOYED.

The unemployment problem in India is a most critical one. The vast majority of the population is dependent for its living upon agriculture. Agriculture as at present practiced cannot provide enough regular openings for those who desire to work, and for certain periods of the year there is practically no employment in the villages. Many of the villagers endeavour to supplement their scanty income by migrating to the cities, where they either succeed in securing some sort of unskilled labour, or join the great company of the unemployed. The unemployed group in the city falls into five general classes. There are the skilled labourers, who through temporary depression in industry find themselves let out. There is the experienced clerical class, with numbers far in excess of the demand. There is the untrained clerical class, mostly the new crop of matriculates and graduates. There is the unskilled labour class, with the necessary physical qualifications for employment. And there is the large unskilled class which for various reasons is wholly unemployable.

With the people who are out of work through no fault of their own we have the utmost sympathy. To tramp the streets daily in search of an opening; to see one's family suffering for lack of food; to fight a continuous battle with one's self in order to maintain one's own self-respect is a difficult experience. The skilled worker knows full well that he is capable of taking full part in the life of the world, but he finds himself denied. The worker who takes a job one day and leaves it the next is not so deserving of sympathy. He is both a social and an economic loss. Always talking about his "rights," he never stops to consider his duties. The greatest temptation that presents itself to the unemployed man is to look out rather than in. The workman who is out of a job falls a ready prey to the agitator who calls his attention to the graspingness of factory owners; to the ruthlessness of employers as a class; to the weakness of a capitalistic and imperialistic government—in fact to everything but the fitness of the worker himself. And it is this latter point that is one of the most important elements in the whole labour situation.

The problem of unemployment has many angles, but it can never be solved without a generous application of the principle of brotherhood. As long as employers think only in terms of self and of profits, the problem will remain. When men begin to think in terms of service and humanity the problem will begin to disappear. If one-half of the energy that is expended in building up great fortunes were expended in an attempt to bring about a better social and economic adjustment, a new day would soon be at hand. Social maladjustment will cease when men with all their hearts actually will that it shall cease. The social body can only be healthy as its members are healthy. "We, being many, are...one."

THE INDO-BRITISH MUTUAL WELFARE LEAGUE.

The Editor, the Indian Social Reformer.
Sir,

May we use the columns of your esteemed paper to draw attention to the work of the Indo-British Mutual Welfare League, a non-political and non-sectarian organisation of Indian and British men and women in London, linked together for greater friendship and mutual service. The Aims and Objects of the League, as set out in its official leaflet, are as follows:—

1. To promote a closer friendship between India and Britain through mutual understanding and service.

2. To help existing organisations in their work of social development.

3. To provide a bureau where accurate information on India may be obtained.

4. To assist Indian visitors to become acquainted with welfare work in Britain.

5. To hold lectures and conferences on social subjects of interest to Britishers and Indians.

6. To raise a Scholarship Fund for students.

Recent events have awakened considerable British interest in Indian Problems, resulting in the growth of several societies and committees desirous of helping India on her path of social progress. The League as a strong central unit is endeavouring to affiliate all such existing organisations and has on its Committee representatives from the Women's Indian Association (Mrs. D. Jinarajadasa), British Commonwealth League (Mrs. Rama Rau), Saroj Nalini Dutt Memorial Association for the spread of Women's Institutes (Mrs. Matthai), the Ladies Auxiliary Committee of the Indian Y. M. C. A. (Mrs. M. Palit), etc.

The spirit animating the League is one of mutual responsibility with a willingness to learn rather than a wish to dictate.

In placing these facts and avenues for co-operation before your public, we invite response from your readers and would welcome any suggestions and criticisms.

NATIONAL UNION OF SOCIETIES FOR EQUAL CITIZENSHIP.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer,
Sir,

The National Union of Societies for Equal Citizenship is a union of 109 local societies in Great Britain and has nine specialized national bodies also affiliated to it. The Union is well known for its admirable work in connection with legislation affecting the status and welfare of women.

From time to time it has published valuable surveys of particular problems in the "Signpost" series such as a volume on women in local government and another on insurance.

The National Union worked hard in educating public opinion in regard to woman's suffrage in India, Burmah and Ceylon through meetings, deputations and memoranda to the various governments and commissions concerned. They have taken the same action in regard to suffrage in South Africa, and on such questions as reciprocal maintenance and nationality with Australia and the other dominions.

The Women's Movement has always been international in scope and the work the National Union of societies for Equal Citizenship has undertaken has been so successful especially as regards women in local governments that realising that information about women's work in India is difficult to obtain in Great Britain it conceived the idea of bringing out a survey. The object of the survey is to prepare a short, readable and inexpensive handbook containing facts about women's questions in India, and the organisations working for their well-being. The question of adding a chapter on constructive proposals, if any, for strengthening and helping the work of the women's organisations in India will be considered after the material has been collected and collated.

The book can only deal with so vast a subject in broad outline but this must be as full, clear and accurate as possible. The main object is to supply information to British women but it is hoped that it may also be of use to Indian social workers. Different sections will deal with such questions as health, education, women in industry, the status of women, problems of population and vital statistics.

Corresponding facts concerning the legal status of women have been already published for Canada, England and Scotland.

An account will be given of the many important movements of every kind towards social reform in India, and our grateful thanks are due to the organisers of these movements who have spared time to give us the information.

A questionnaire dealing with the above subjects has been widely circulated in India, and has had an excellent response from many leading experts both Indian and British.

When the material and information are a little more complete an advisory committee to the editors will be set up consisting of Indian and British ladies connected with the All-Indian women's organisations. Promises of such co-operation from Indian ladies have already been secured.

Misunderstandings arose in connection with the women's conference recently convened in London by the Officers of the Survey Committee, Miss Rathbone and Miss Caton. The object of the Conference was to present to an audience mainly British some practical examples of different types of work actually being done in India by Indian women themselves as well as through official and non-official agencies. It was hoped that by the publicity such a Conference would give that a greater measure of support might be forthcoming for the various schemes, three of which were comparatively new schemes whose promoters had asked for the co-operation of the Survey Committee. It is all the more regrettable therefore that such misunderstandings should have arisen, since the N. U. S. E. C. is anxious to help Indian and English women to understand each other better and to know more of each other's work, and the fact that this purpose has not succeeded is a source of regret to the N. U. S. E. C. It is the most vital part of the Survey Committee's work to put on record the size and growth of the woman's movement in India and the courageous and splendid work of Indian reformers both men and women.

The N. U. S. E. C. is only concerned with such political questions as directly affect the status and welfare of women, and takes no part in any other political question. The interest of the N. U. S. E. C. in women's education and suffrage in India dates back many years and is not concerned with any recent publications or political propaganda.

Our idea is to work in friendly co-operation with the women's organisations in India and so to strengthen the bonds of fellowship between women throughout the world.

Yours etc.,

15 Dean's Yard, Westminster,
London.
1st November, 1929.

MARGERY I. CORBETT ASHBY,
President.

THE TEMPERANCE WORK IN RANIKHET.

The Hon. General Secretary, the Ranikhet Temperance Society, has sent us the following for publication:—The Ranikhet Temperance Society has been working with much enthusiasm this year. Following are some of the achievements of the Society during this year.

(1) Two contests, one in essay writing and the other for declamation, have been organised for school students in Kumann. A gold medal to the first best essay and a silver medal to the second best essay and three silver medals in declamations will be awarded. This is in order to increase the interest of the school students in the question of temperance so that they may study the question of temperance most systematically.

(2) Also a temperance section has been opened in the public library here by our society. Temperance books and magazines etc. have been placed there for the public to read and increase their interest in the question.

(3) Then public meetings are held, processions are organised, public addresses are delivered, tracts are distributed and prohibition pledges are signed. A public meeting was very recently organised. Before the meeting a very grand procession consisting of three to four hundred people started from the place of the meeting and went round the city and in the bazars. There were flags and banners in the hands of some of the people with such words as, "Join the Prohibition," "Long live Prohibition," "Drink spoils manhood," written on them both in English and Hindi. There was music with the procession and public addresses on important centres were given. While the procession was in march people raised cries such as, "Give up drinking," "Don't attend the booths", etc.

The procession after roaming about three or four hours in the city returned to the place of the meeting, where a very interesting programme was given.

Following resolutions were also unanimously passed and sent to the proper places—(1) Urging the removal of the liquor shop in Ranikhet from the present locality to some other locality outside the city on the ground that at present it is situated very close to the Civil Hospital, the Maternity and Child Welfare Centre, The Hindu Temple and Muslim Mosque.

(2) Urging the U. P. Government to adopt the same plan of temperance propaganda work as adopted for Madras Presidency.

(3) Urging the closing up of the liquor shop at Bageswar at once on the ground that Bageswar is a holy place of pilgrimage of the Hindus.

A collection was also taken and quite a good sum was received. The membership of the Society has greatly increased and several hundreds have signed the Prohibition pledge. We hope to achieve still better results in the years to come.

NEED FOR DIVORCE LAW IN HINDU SOCIETY.

At the fourth Constituent Conference of Women on Education and Social Reform held in Madras last week the resolution which gave room for much controversy was the one urging the necessity of a divorce Law. The Conference was presided over by Mrs. Srinivasa Iyenger who while recognising, the need for Social Reform was opposed to having any divorce laws in the country. We extract the proceedings of the Conference relating to this issue from the Hindu:

Considerable discussion ensued on the following resolution moved by Mrs. Malathi Patwardhan:—

"This Conference of women demands that there should be the same standard of sex morality for men and women; women claim equal rights of legal separation and demand the introduction of an equal divorce law for both men and women"

She said that this idea of sex separation was engaging the attention of the whole of India and the whole world. Men had come to occupy a superior position and a reaction had set in. Women all over the world had begun to realise that they had equal rights and equal status with men in all walks of life. At the present time women demanded individual freedom in all matters. Divorce was an outcome of this desire for freedom and she saw nothing wrong in demanding freedom in all matters, including sex matters.

Mrs. Lakshmi Ammal seconded the resolution.

AN AMENDMENT.

Mrs. Ambuja Ammal moved an amendment that in the resolution the words "and demand the introduction of an equal divorce law for both men and women" be deleted and the words "with or without maintenance" be inserted.

She said that the problem of divorce was a very vexed one even in those countries in which the law existed. Having one husband for life was an ideal conceived in their sastras and puranas and even in the West this idea was becoming prominent. This law of divorce could not be tolerated in this country. This would go to the very root of their religion. Those women who had been discarded by their husbands might afterwards lead a useful and chaste life and she believed that a divorce law was unnecessary and undesirable.

Mrs. Gnanammal seconded the amendment and said that the effect of having this law would be that many men would divorce their wives on primary grounds.

Mrs. Bukmini Lakshmiipathi in opposing the amendment said that Mann specifically laid down that women could divorce their husbands in cases where the latter were impotent or suffering from incurable and contagious diseases. This resolution was not opposed to their ancient ideals. She believed that with the advance of learning the law would not be misused.

Mrs. Krishnaveni Ammal was of opinion that they should not make any drastic changes in their social customs. Women who had been discarded by their husbands would do well to lead a life of service to their fellow creatures. Mrs. Alamelumangathayar Ammal opined that they should take steps to have a law for doing away with polygamy before having a divorce law. Mrs. Malathi Patwardhan briefly replying to the discussion said that the resolution aimed not at giving any licence to men and women but only at having an ideal. The law of morality could not be different for the two sexes. The amendment when put to vote was lost, 24 voting for and 37 against. The original resolution was then carried by a large majority, 44 voting for and 21 against. The Conference then rose for lunch.

Reassembling after luncheon interval the Conference proceeded to discuss resolutions regarding suppression of immoral traffic in women and children, women and child labour and women's institutes and social service.

AN INDIAN LADY ON DIVORCE.

The following letter dated Srinivasapuram, Coimbatore, 15th November, was sent to Mrs. Cousins who presided over the Women's Education Conference held at Madras last week, by Mrs. M. R. Ramaswami Sivan :

Dear Mrs. Cousins,—Until yesterday, I had decided to attend the conference to-morrow and take part in the deliberations thereat, but am now prevented from doing so, owing to private circumstances. While regretting my inability to attend, I wish to convey my hearty good wishes for a successful session of the Conference which I am sure, it would be under your able guidance as President.

Swaraj—Dominion status or Independence—will materially benefit India only when her women are able, and are allowed to do their bit for the country. Women are treated as pets rather than as equals; and Indian women are no more slaves of men, as is often alleged than the women of other countries; but we want our rights granted to us, and we know that we are not likely to shirk our responsibilities, when we have got our rights.

I approve of most of the resolutions as published in "The Hindu" especially those relating to the education of girls. Only I wish a change of heart on the part of our educated men. For instance, there are two schools well-manned with qualified women teachers in the Brahman Agraharam of Coimbatore town, but there are only a few Hindu and a very few Brahman girls studying in the higher forms. It is a matter of great surprise and real pain that the Brahman men, educated themselves to the highest university standards, while they were satisfied that their women attained to no higher stage of education than ability to read trash Tamil novels and write bad dhoby accounts.

I served as a member of the District Educational Council for 2 terms, and must say that there was no lack of sympathy on the part of men members, with regard to the education of girls. First there was a paucity of women teachers, next the majority of women teachers were untrained and had not studied even up to the higher elementary grade, and last many were paid lower wages than peons. I often felt the need of some more women members on the Council if at least for consulting each other and pooling ideas—and it is necessary that there should be at least six women members in each District Educational Council apart from the Government Inspectress or Sub-Assistant Inspectress.

As regards the second para under "Women's Rights" I venture to make a remark. Let alone my personal opinion in the matter, I do not think it judicious to put the resolution before the Conference as it stands. Demanding the same standard of sex-morality for men and women may be all right but, suppose a husband has erred, what is the remedy? Think well before an answer is given lest the remedy be worse.

As regards equal rights of divorce for men and women, I can only say that the mere word "Divorce" will scare away thousands of men and women, otherwise sympathetically inclined to social reform. I know that I belong to the old school, but remember that there are people who do not wish to break from the past completely and who are in no way less patriotic or less anxious for progress. Educate man to a higher level of perfection. I would earnestly request the audience either to drop the resolution altogether or to redraft it in such a way that you will not create unnecessary opposition. Rather let the world know that the women of India cherish their chastity as their priceless jewel and their most valuable asset that they would prefer to undergo painful sufferings and sacrifices to demanding a divorce from an erring husband, violating all the sanctity of marriage and the promises made before God, before Fire, and before man. In my opinion the breaking of solemn marriage pledges by one party does not call for the breaking of pledge by the other.

I shall be glad if you will kindly read this at the Conference. I am sending my subscription as a member of the General Committee.

I intend attending the Conference at Bombay and shall be glad to be elected as a delegate.

DIVORCE LAWS DISAPPROVED.

In the course of a statement to the Press Mrs. Subbaroyan, the Zamindarini of Kumaramangalam criticising the action of the supporters of the resolution passed by the Madras Constituent Conference of Women on Social Reform, demanding "equal rights of legal separation and an equal divorce law for both men and women" says that most of the ladies present felt very strongly that the resolution had been placed before the Conference by very unfair means. She adds that they feel that these demands are highly detrimental to the true interests of the women of India and that they are entirely subversive of their religion and morality and disruptive of their family life. They are calculated to sap the foundations of their society. They apprehend that the agitation for these rights is bound to create a most undesirable split in the ranks of the Conference and to impair its usefulness by discrediting them in their agitation for urgent reforms in other directions. They are decidedly of opinion that persistence in these demands will inevitably set back the clock of progress in regard to social reform and particularly in regard to education.

Among those who opposed the resolution were Mrs. S. Srinivasa Iyengar, Mrs. Subbaroyan, (Zamindarini of Kumaramangalam), Alamelumangathayar Ammal, and Mrs. A. Ramaswami Mudaliar. Among the supporters were Mrs. Malati Patwardhan, Mrs. Swaminathan, Miss Nallamthi Ammal, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi and Mrs. Cousins.

THE DEPRESSED CLASSES MISSION, MANGALORE.

Mr. E. Shankaran Unni writes in the Servants of India:—The West Coast has not known a more loveable personality than the late Rao Sahib K. Ranga Rao. His memory is associated with the noble endeavour of elevating the Depressed Classes in South Kanara. Years ago when orthodoxy was at its height Mr. Ranga Rao started the Mission in Mangalore. The more conservative among his own community were altogether opposed to the idea and Mr. Ranga Rao had to face no end of ridicule and contempt. But his faith in his Mission enabled him to carry on the work which has to-day attained considerable success. It is interesting to notice that the Depressed Classes Mission in Mangalore is supported by all classes of people irrespective of caste or religion. This is undoubtedly due to the quiet and selfless way in which Mr. Ranga Rao went about his business. To go out and live among the poor, to participate in their joys and sorrows, he knew, was the way to help them most. To him reform was not a fashionable cult but a living necessity of his nature. There was no spirit of condescension in the work he was doing. It was to him a privilege to help the lowliest and least amongst his countrymen. Work inspired by such high ideals was bound to prosper and the Depressed Classes Mission in Mangalore serves as a monument to Mr. Ranga Rao's love for his less fortunate brethren.

The work of the Mission is now managed by the Servants of India Society with the help and sympathy of the local leaders. Messrs. R. Suryanarayana Rao, S.I.S., and A. B. Shetty, M.L.C., who are Secretaries, are probably the two best men available for this sort of service. The Mission has been doing excellent work under them. It runs a higher elementary school for Adi-Dravida and a boarding house for them. There are 90 pupils on the rolls and the attendance shows a steady improvement. The accommodation and equipment are satisfactory. The poorest among the pupils are helped with scholarships granted by the Government. Of the 9 scholarships 7 are awarded by the Commissioner of Labour, Mr. Gray, I.C.S., who takes a great interest in the work of the Mission and two by the Education Department. The best part of the curriculum is the vocational training given to the pupils. The Carpentry Department trains a number of boys in cabinet making. This Department has done very good work, but as the report for 1928-29 points out, there is room for improvement in this direction. The great difficulty seems to be to get employment for the boys so trained. For the girls there is provided training in needle work and other minor accomplishments. Gardening which is valuable not only from the point of view of manual labour but from an aesthetic point of view receives special attention at the hands of the Mission.

The most important aspect of the work carried on by the Mission is the midday meal provided to the pupils at a considerable cost. We find there is a growing demand for accommodation in the boarding house and there is not sufficient room to receive all the pupils who seek admission. This is due, unfortunately to the dearth of funds. Mangalore has been doing its best all these years, but there seems to be a fall in the funds collected from the locality. As pointed out in the report of the Mission the starting of similar enterprises in other parts of the country is tapping the sources from which the Mangalore Mission has been accustomed to receive support. Government have been rendering valuable help to the Mission but a great deal more may yet be done. Seeing that the management is in the hands of men who are truly devoted to their work it should be easy for Government to advance the necessary funds and make the work of the Mission more fruitful. The poor and depressed are always with us and there is room for a wider expansion of the activities of the Mission if only the requisite funds would be forthcoming. The Mission has also organised colonies where the Adi-Dravids and Koragas are made to settle down and make the best use of the land placed at their disposal. Building materials are supplied free of cost for house building. Nearly 100 families are under the care of the Mission.

We would remind the workers, however, of the spirit in which Mr. Ranga Rao worked. With very little sympathy and less appreciation he carried on his appointed work without being depressed or down-hearted even for a moment. In endeavours of this kind it is faith that matters most. When public attention is drawn to other and more exciting interests it often happens that quiet and sober work of this kind suffers a little neglect for the time being. But if those who have set their hands to the plough will be steady and persevering and work in a spirit of love and service, it will not be long before the public come to realise the worth and the value of their work. We have very little doubt that next year when the report comes to be drawn up the Secretaries will have even a brighter record of work well done.

WOMEN'S DEMANDS.

Interest continues to grow in the Mardas Women's Constituent Conference held annually in connection with the All-India Women's Conference for Educational and Social Reform. The fourth of such Conferences was held in the Senate House, Madras, on the 16th instant and attracted a large number of women, and the Hall was overcrowded. Amongst those present, writes the New India, Madras, were a large number of Muhammadan ladies, and this was a notable feature. The popularity of the Conference was also proved by about 100 ladies being on the Reception Committee, whose Chairwoman was Mrs. Venkatasubba Rao. Mrs. Venkatasubba Rao, in her address, laid stress on the changed conditions which enabled women to assemble in large numbers and discuss problems affecting their welfare, alluding to the striking manner in which the Indian Women's Conference revealed the capacity that women possess for organization and intelligent discussion. Lady Beatrix Stanley was kind enough to make the opening of the Conference her second public appearance since her arrival in Madras. In sympathizing with the demand of women for education, she said that she would watch the progress made in that direction during the next five years, and hoped that she would be able to encourage the movement.

After being warmly welcomed back to India after her eighteen months' absence, Mrs. Cousins gave a thoughtful Presidential Address, of which the chief points were her call to women to turn the energy and enthusiasm which had been developed by their agitation for the Child Marriage Bill into a campaign during the coming year for establishing compulsory primary education. A deep impression was made by the figures she quoted from India in 1927-28 (J. Coatman), showing that proportionately military, police and general administration expenditure absorbed 42 per cent of the total revenues (Provincial and Central together) of the country, as contrasted with 5 per cent on education and 1 per cent for health.

She had found in her travels that the memoranda on general resolutions on the whole field of education during the last three years were remarkably in consonance with the world-thought on education. It differed in that India and the Asian countries generally base all their development on the education of the spiritual nature of the student. This characteristic and the fundamental importance of the family are gifts which can be and which were nurtured. But they need to be organized and made more self-conscious in order to be available for presentation. She dreamed dreams that an All-Asian Women's Conference for this purpose might become a future expansion of the Indian Women's Movement.

A departure was made from the ordinary programme in that resolutions on primary education only were the subject of discussion for the educational section of this year. On the second day of the Conference held in the "Willingdon", with Mrs. Srinivasa Iyengar as Chairwoman, resolutions relating to women's life generally under the title of Social Reform were brought forward. The former included resolutions to open training centres for rural teachers and to secure the provision of adequate residential quarters in all teaching centres, and also to prepare reformed text books and to carry on a campaign for primary education by means of deputations to educational authorities, public meetings, press propaganda, etc. Women were also called on to start Homes and Educational Classes for adults in every town to supply teachers for the expansion of primary education. The social resolutions included a demand for equal laws of inheritance, the passing of the Brothels Bill, the encouragement of Girl Guides, the reform of untouchability, the demand for registration of births and marriages and the forming of Vigilance Committees to secure the satisfactory enforcement of the Sarda Act.

A resolution on pardah evoked a protest from some Muhammadan ladies, as they advocated its reform by education and the use of reasoned discrimination, rather than its enforced removal. All the Muhammadan ladies present did not agree with the speakers' views, however, and the resolution was passed. There was a healthy discussion over the resolution on equal morality standard for men and women, including the right of separation and the introduction of equal laws of divorce. An amendment was brought forward to delete the clause asking for divorce laws. An hour of the meeting was spent in discussing this resolution and its amendment, the conclusion being the defeat of the amendment and the passing of the original resolution by 44 to 21.

The Conference was remarkable for good speaking, practical suggestions, intelligent listening, good organization of both physical and mental food for body and mind. Everything was carried on in a happy atmosphere of enthusiasm, freedom, expansion and activity, with room for differences of opinion.

CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIAL WORK.

Miss B. Venkatratnam, co-opted Member, U. P. Christian Council sends us the following :—

Resolution moved and accepted of the U. P. Christian Council "It is the opinion of the Conference that missionaries and other Christians should be more active in newspaper propaganda in regard to social evils found in Islam and Hinduism."

A wonderful bright star brought with its radiance a new vision to those men of old in Bethlehem, and here today India is facing that bright star that will open the gates to a new national status.

Here is our opportunity to keep star figure and prove worthy citizens to the pride and glory of our motherland. There is a tremendous challenge for us Christian men and women workers to help uplift the lives of our countrymen and women; to teach them not only how to face death but how to face life—life that will keep the blood and spirit of nation strong.

There is no gainsaying that our country is moved by its religion. The social life of our people is based on its religion, and have we not enough evidence to help us trace back the many social evils in our country to their basic foundation—religion? Shall we who see these evils stand by watching them and cease to struggle against them? Let us rise to the situation and show that India needs some solid constructive work to uplift it from blind custom that is destructive.

Who knows better the problems that enslave and ensnare the people than we Christians who work in the villages among the ignorant, poor and neglected men and women. Let us who are educated and know the power of the press devote our energies to arousing public sentiment by giving suggestions for social betterment through newspaper articles. We can cry aloud against the evils of which we personally know. This will help all who are confronted with like problems to have some suggestions to work on. The result is quite obvious.

We are proud of our countrymen who have proved their ability to reason in even the smallest detail in politics. But platform oratory achieves very little. What we want is deeds, not words. If only we can bring this selfsame reason to not only see, but check the social evils in Islam and Hinduism as they are practised, Indians can hold up their heads and look square into the face of those who deny them liberty and their rightful claims.

Shall we stop to enumerate a few evils that we know of and look to those who are interested to help in solving the same, communicate their ideas and thoughts through the newspaper columns that those who are ignorant of the facts may come to see them and take an interest in them also.

What more evil can one think of than the evil effects of disease resulting from the bathing, washing and cleaning of one's teeth and drinking in and from the so-called sacred rivers? The keeping of cattle inside of one's dwelling place and the so-called sacred dung that breeds mosquitos and flies that spread malaria and a host of other diseases?

The idea that a man is unclean if he is of a lower caste is a social condition based on a religious belief. Let us try and show what cleanliness really means. That it does not come by right of birth but by habit and upbringing. Some Indian Christians, sad to say, need as much to be educated on this.

These are some of the practical problems one is faced with and which when removed will help uplift the social life on which a sound and lasting political edifice can be constructed. Readers are requested to make their suggestions through the columns of any newspapers they may know of or to send them on to me at the Isabella Thoburn College, Lucknow, for publication.

WOMEN AND CIVIC LIFE.

Mrs. Avanticabai Gokhale writes in the Fifth Anniversary Number of the Calcutta Municipal Gazette :—"A woman is just adapted to take active part in the civic affairs of the town, as it is only a larger home she aspires to manage, having had experience in the management of her smaller home.

"My experience of over half-a-dozen years as a member of the Bombay Municipal Corporation has more than convinced me, that women are as able as, if not more than, men in handling the problems of Primary Education of boys and girls, Sanitation, Medical Relief, etc.

"It is, however, regrettable that wherever the right has been extended to women, they have not come in sufficient numbers to shoulder the responsibilities of civic administration. Some are reluctant to stand in elections: for obvious reasons they are not able to canvass votes as men do.

"It is a wrong notion that they must have the gift of making speeches, as the more useful work is done in various committees of a municipality, where, in the discussion, they can make their usefulness felt.

"Only the Will to Serve and not to seek a place of honour must be the object of every woman entering a municipal corporation.

"Many think that if women took part in the civic and political life of the country, they would neglect the domestic duties, but this is quite wrong, as there will always be a few who will have the ability and grit to shoulder the additional responsibility.

"India expects women to play their part in the struggle for taking honourable place among the nations of the world."

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Gandhiji Elected President:—A general meeting of the Reception Committee of the Indian National Social Conference was held on the 22nd instant, in the Y. M. C. A. Prof. Ruchi Ram Sahni, Chairman of the Reception Committee, presided. Among those who attended the meeting about twelve were ladies. The meeting resolved that the fixing of dates for the session of the Conference be left to the Working Committee which should decide the matter within five days after consultations with the Congress authorities. The election of the President of the Conference, next took place. The Secretary read a list of names which the various Social Reform Associations in India had suggested as the result of the request of the Reception Committee. Definite proposals of names were then made. The names of Mahatma Gandhi, Dr. Mrs. Muthulakshmi Reddi, Rai Sahab Harbilas Sarada and President Patel were proposed and duly seconded. The meeting unanimously elected Mahatma Gandhi to be the President of the Conference. But as several members pointed out that Mahatma Gandhi might, in all probability, refuse the Presidentship, the meeting elected another person from the other three names. As a result of the voting Mrs. Muthulakshmi Reddi was elected the second President by a clear majority of votes. In case Mahatma Gandhi refuses Mrs. Muthulakshmi will become the President of the Conference.

Sir K. V. Reddi:—A Reuter's message states that Sir Kurma Venkata Reddi, Agent General to the Government of India, in South Africa, owing to the indifferent state of his health, has been granted leave to return to India. He sails for Bombay by the Karagola on December 2. The period of his leave will be determined by the progress he makes but he is likely to be away until the middle of March. The strain, as a result of his recent travelling, has told on him, and he has been confined to bed with a recurrent attack of fever:—

NOTES.

The Women's Forum:—The Women's Movement is in many respects the most important development of our time, and its effects are sure to be far-reaching. The problems with which the Women's movement has to deal are not merely women's but also the nation's problems. There are in fact, no women's problems or men's problems which concern exclusively women and men. Questions which affect men and affect women, and those which affect women, affect men equally. Up to recently, women have had few opportunities of making their contribution to national progress and, consequently, our progress has been halting and lop-sided. Women are now coming forward to supply this omission, and thoughtful men everywhere feel that with their co-operation social and national life can be shaped on more fruitful and harmonious lines than hitherto. It has occurred to us that we can best assist the movement, which is largely the outcome of the reforms for which this journal stands and has stood for the last forty years, by inviting women who are associated with the movement as leaders and workers to express their thoughts freely on all national questions. We publish today under the heading "The Women's Forum" eight articles by women who are in the forefront of the movement. It is our intention to publish similar articles from time to time, and while conveying our thanks to our lady contributors we trust that more of them will come forward to help us in this undertaking.

Our Lady Contributors:—The success of the third All-India Women's Conference was due in a large measure to the resourcefulness and organising power of Mrs. P. K. Sen who is the life and soul of the women's movement in India and whose efforts towards the abolition of the Purdah are too well-known to need mention here. Mrs. Sen in her article deprecates the custom of universal marriage obtaining in Hindu society and pleads for more freedom for women. The problem of providing suitable buildings and accommodation for the increasing number of girls seeking education is tackled in an article by Mrs. A. L. Huidekoper who is the Chairman of the All India Women's Conference. Her work in Karachi, Indore and other parts of the country bears testimony to her unflagging zeal for the women's cause. The honour of being the first lady member of the Nagpur Legislative Council belongs to Mrs. A. Kale who has made her presence felt in the Council by her constant advocacy in it of women's education and social reform. Many of the suggestions made in her contribution are practical solutions to real difficulties which confront our women. A member of the Bombay Municipal Corporation and one of the leading women in the presidency Mrs. Hansa Mehta brings a mind full of experience of foreign travels to bear upon the women's problem. Mrs. Mehta's most noteworthy suggestion is that labour questions also should be included in the programme of the Conference. Mrs. V. A. Sukhtankar who is well informed about women's education in Indore desires a truce to be called on the controversy on the type of education for women, declares against standardisation of women's education and emphasises the importance of home influence. Herself a fine product of the Bombay University and a social worker Mrs. Yamunabai Hirlekar expresses discontent at the present position of women in society and is a keen advocate of radical reform. The Organising Secretary of the All-India Women's Conference, Mrs. Kamaladevi Chattopadhyaya to whose indefatigable efforts for women's education much of the progress made is due, has contributed a thought provoking article on social work in Germany. Mrs. Chattopadhyaya took part in the International Women's Conference and Education Conference at Geneva and Elsinore as the Indian Women's representative. The opportunity she thus had of studying foreign institutions for women will prove highly beneficial to the women's movement here. We print also Mrs. M. E. Cousins' presidential address at Madras which breathes of hope and promise for the future of Indian womanhood.

The Future Of Social Reform:—The People of Lahore has some suggestive observations regarding the trend of social reform and of the National Social Conference. Our contemporary asks: "Is it not strange that the Social Conference has never considered the question of Labour conditions or of the relations of Capital and Labour?." The leaders of the Conference have not been unmindful of this and other questions. Ten years ago at Amritsar, the National Social Conference adopted, in pursuance of a message from Sir Narayan Chandavarkar, a resolution to enlarge the scope of the conference in these directions. "The time has come for us, social reformers and workers to enlarge the meaning and scope of social reform and extend our activity and outlook to such questions as the education of the masses, the sanitation of the country, the housing of the poor, the care of the weak and the feeble, the employment of labour on rational lines, the provision of healthy recreation and amusements for the masses, village sanitation and rural education, instead of confining social reform as we have hitherto confined it to female education, widow remarriage, removal of caste restrictions and such other items." If during the time that has elapsed since the Amritsar meeting, little has been done to give effect to this resolution, it is because, to be quite frank, the social movement has been more or less completely overshadowed by communal and political movements. The Lahore Conference, which is being organised with greater plan and forethought than some recent sessions, may well make a beginning in giving effect to the Amritsar resolution. "A problem of practical interest like that of birth-control," writes the People, "cannot even be hinted at (at the Conference) without offending against its notions of respectability." We do not see why the People thinks so. It is certainly open to any one to suggest birth-control as one of the subjects which the Conference should take up for serious consideration. It is a question which is very much to the fore at present, and it is the duty of the Conference to give a lead to the country.

Remaking Society:—The People writes: "Real re-forming of society is not mere tinkering here and there. It must involve a comprehensive programme of social reconstruction which would usher in a new society. The real work of re-formation is not merely removing a few hideous features of the social structure but bringing into existence a new social edifice constructed on a plan and resting on foundations of deliberately chosen principles. The Social Conference merely wants a few changes in the existing structure here and there but it is not trying to give the social structure a foundation of any particular principle or set of principles and has no all-comprehending social programme to offer. The time has come when this more ambitious task should be attempted, when a comprehensive programme aiming at the elimination of social injustice in all forms be drawn up. This is the real task of those who would work for the re-formation of Society." We are afraid that this is beyond the power of any Social Conference. Society is a living organism. you cannot lift it out of its historic and inherited environment so entirely as to fashion it as an architect fashions a building. The reformer, even when he is a Mahomed or a Napoleon, does not write upon a clean slate. Even Lenin, who was not troubled over-much by considerations of the past, had it not. Karl Marx himself found it necessary in his life-time to modify his original plan of creating a new social order and to fight with Bakunin who stood against any change. "The more definitely Marx became inclined" writes his biographer, "to elaborate the tactics of a law-abiding policy, in conformity with the methods and trends of the bourgeois State,—the more must Bakunin and the Bakuninists consider that he was betraying the revolution. Consequently, he made up his mind to clear the Bakuninist opposition out of the way." Lenin who drew his inspiration from Marx, similarly threw overboard Marxian principles when he found that the situation demanded more adaptive methods. When reminded of his previous principles, he curtly replied that consistency with the past might mean betrayal of the present. The example of these men shows that the most powerful and autocratic of reformers has to make terms with the historic conditions of their problem. No man, wrote Amiel, is his own ancestor. No Society can be its own progenitor. For men, it has ever been a sufficient aspiration to seek to leave the world a little better than they found it. Fortunate indeed, are those who can say that they have succeeded in doing this.

The Social Conference Programme:—The General Secretary has issued the following, on the next session of the Indian National Social Conference to be held at Lahore on the 26th, 27th and 28th December, under the Presidentship of R. S. Harbilas Sarda, M. L. A. commencing at 11 A.M. each day in a special Pandal in the Congress Nagar, separate from the Congress Pandal. The passing of the Child Marriage Restraint Act marks the dawn of a new era in the history of Social Reform Movement in India. Owing to this the forthcoming session will be of special importance. The agenda includes the framing of a permanent constitution for the Conference (for carrying out programmes of Social Reform Work throughout the year) a draft for which is being circulated to Social Reform Organisations and workers in the cause of Social Reform throughout India. It has been arranged to publish a number of leaflets on special subjects connected with various aspects of Social Reform. For the entertainment of the delegates there will be staged a social drama "Subhadra" on the 27th December at 8 P.M. There will be a National Dinner on the 28th December, at 7-30 P.M. Arrangements are made for high class music in connection with the various functions of the Conference. All associations carrying on Social Reform Work in the country are invited to send names and addresses of their delegates. Any person who has sympathy with the aims and objects of the Social Conference, and who pays a minimum fee of Rs. 2 (Rupee one in case of ladies and University students above the age of 18) is entitled to become a delegate provided that he is elected either by the Working Committee of the Reception Committee or by any Organisation doing Social Reform work in India. Persons who wish to participate in the deliberations of the Conference as delegates are requested to write to the General Secretary. All members of the Reception Committee shall be considered delegates. In addition to the programme mentioned above the All India Temperance Conference and the All India Widow Re-marriage Conference, will hold their sessions as sections of the Indian National Social Conference.

BOMBAY, DECEMBER 7, 1929.

BAHINA BAI *

To most people the rise of the Maratha power in Western India is sufficiently explained as a revolt against the anti-Hindu character of Aurangzeb's regime. Moghul rule had come to be accepted as a national rule and Shivaji himself had no ambition to found a kingdom outside it until he was forced to the conviction that there was no other alternative if the Marathas were not to be reduced to a position of religious and cultural servitude. The force which enabled Maharashtra to meet and repulse the Moghul power, however, was in process of creation for a century or more previous to the actual struggle. Ranade was the first to call attention to the important part played by the saints of Maharashtra in creating a national sentiment among the masses. It is only when an entire population of a territory feels that it is the guardian of a spiritual and cultural heritage which to it is more than life, that nationalism is born. It was largely the work of the saints of Maharashtra which produced this feeling, as Ranade has shown in his history of the Maratha power. The direct effect of the teaching of the saints was to break down the social barriers which prevented the growth of a national sentiment, and to strengthen character.

We are indebted to the Rev. Justin E. Abbott for his studies of the Maharashtra saints, which have made them accessible to the English-reading public. His latest book on Bahina Bai, one of this galaxy, from the social point of view is the most interesting of these studies. In his introduction Mr. Abbott notices the important part played by women saints in the religious life of Maharashtra. Bahina Bai though not as famous as some others, was actuated by the same strong religious devotion as they. Mr. Abbott has translated her verses which, fortunately, are in part autobiographical. It is this part which constitutes to our mind the greatest attraction of this book. Bahina was born of Brahman parents. She was married in her fifth year to an astrologer who was 30 years old as his second wife, his first wife having died. Owing to a family quarrel, the son-in-law took his wife as well as her parents and her younger brother with him on a tour of different places where he could gain a livelihood as a mendicant Brahman. They finally settled at Kolhapur, "the Gaya of the South." While here Bahina's growing devotion to Saint Tukaram and his teachings, exasperated her husband, both because, he himself had no ambition beyond being his family vocation of a religious mendicant and also and chiefly because Tukaram was of the grocer caste. He beat her and abused her and, in her despair, she thought of committing suicide. By a miracle, however, her husband repented and became a devotee of Tukaram, and both husband and wife retired into a forest to live a life of faith and worship. The gift of verse came to Bahina in the temple at Pandharpur.

We have here a first-hand account of the ferment in the religious life which coincided with the political ferment in Maharashtra. Shivaji and Bahina were born in the same year. While Shivaji revolted against the Moghul tyranny, Bahina's revolt was against the restrictions of sex and caste. She bitterly complains of the spiritual disabilities of women in orthodox Hinduism. But at the same time, she accepts implicitly the duties of a wife as laid down by the Shastras. She was no rebel against the social code. Quite the contrary. While lamenting her husband's hardness of heart, she insists on perfect devotion to husband as the great glory of a wife. She herself scrupulously observed her wifely duties. The study of the Vedas was forbidden to women. But the Bhagavad Gita taught a faith open to all classes, including women and shudras. "I was constantly committing to memory," says Bahina, "the Bhagavad Gita, not trespassing into the field of the Veda". She asserts the right of women to equal spiritual opportunities but she does so by the way of a great obedience. In the same way, she asserts that a Brahman is not one who is born of Brahman parents, but one who knows Brahma, the great Supreme. Mere learning, she says, does not make a Brahmin. "Even Muhammadans exhibit learning". This, by the way, is the only reference to Mahomedans in her verses written at a time when Mahomedan power was supreme in the country. Incidentally, Bahina's autobiography shows that child marriages were common among Brahmans in the early seventeenth century. Hindu, especially Brahmin, society had crystallised into a cake of custom. Saints like Tukaram lifted the community out of the rut in which it had got stuck.

How shall we account for Bahina Bai? Her own explanation of herself is simple. She implicitly believed in the doctrine of rebirth and she tells her son, just before dying, of her thirteen births, the thirteenth being the last. She calls herself a yoga brashita, one interrupted in one's religious endeavour which according to the Gita, is never lost. The devotee at his next birth takes up his thread where it broke off and continues on and on until the goal is reached. This is a faith which is a part of Bahina's mental make-up. The modern Freudian explanation of Bahina will attribute her religious and poetic fervour to the perversion of her sex instincts by the inhibitions of custom and an ill-assorted marriage. Between the two, the reader will have to decide for himself which is the more rational, regarding man and woman not only as physical bodies but as endowed with immortal souls.

THE WOMEN'S FORUM.

THE CALL OF THE HOUR.

(By Mrs. P. K. SEN, PATNA.)

In the strife and struggle for world-freedom, every atom, every soul, longs for liberty—its birth-right. Amid this mighty struggle the cry of the woman is heard all over the world. The Indian woman is not an exception. She, too, has awakened from her slumbers! She knows not what to do, where to drift, how to act. Yet act she must, if she is to gain her birth-right—freedom.

She bethinks herself of the privileges she enjoyed in the days of the glorious past—when she was free and happy, and tasted the joys of this beautiful world.

When she was given education and training as befitted her, side by side with her brother; when her character was moulded and formed by religious instructions which made her god-fearing and honest; when she could marry of her own free choice while of age; when she could breathe God's free air unconfined within the four walls of the zenana; when she took her share, in public and religious ceremonies along with her partner in life; when she was set in the highest place of honour and addressed as Devi and Shakti Mata and was even accorded the dignity of ruling over kingdoms; and when her advice and counsel was sought in all important matters. The women of to-day dream visions of these privileges she enjoyed in olden days.

Alas, what a contrast with the painful Present! She is now the victim of "man-made" conventions. She finds herself surrounded at every step with unmeaning social customs, which retard her progress, and render her unfit for taking her legitimate place in the march of world-progress. The Indian woman of the present generation clearly realises that her present status is far from satisfactory and that she has an inherent right to have her personal freedom and independence of thought and action. Hence the general and insistent cry of Equal Rights for Women.

At this juncture it is worth while stopping to ponder on the question as to the path which the Indian woman should take. What is the right sphere of work for the Indian woman? How to adjust her position in order to become what the Indian woman is meant to be? Should she seek to follow the customary notion of the West, and compete with man in all spheres of life, setting aside the Oriental ideals of womanhood? It is a well-known tradition of India that the woman's sphere is the home. In fact even the West now realises that perhaps women's movements are moving too fast and are tending to unsex the woman. Hence the Home is neglected. We see opinions such as this from the latest European thinkers on the subject of family. They declare "The family is to-day in a perilous position". Let not the struggle for freedom take woman away from her own sphere of work, i.e., the Home. The first duty of every woman is undoubtedly to train herself how to make her home healthy, happy, chaste and beautiful. By saying that the right sphere of woman is the Home, it is not meant that woman is not to qualify herself for work outside the family.

There are a thousand ways in which the active sympathy and service of woman may be of peculiar value to the community and to the country at large. Many of these carry woman outside her home. The woman has a great part to play in teaching, directing moral and social institutions, child-rearing and nursing, among the poor, and in building up a higher and more wholesome standard of public opinion. There is plenty of work for woman; the crying need of the present hour is better-trained mothers, housewives, teachers, nurses, doctors and organisers.

There have been many women in the world unmarried, widowed or by force of circumstances detached from family ties, who have done the noblest work of uplift of the poor and the helpless. These women have made the outside world their home, but retained their womanliness.

It is time that compulsion of marriage was done away with in India as in all civilised countries and that girls had the liberty of choosing for themselves whether they would like to have a home of their own, or choose the work to which they may feel called in order to support themselves and their people or to serve their country. In choosing the line to take, woman is faced with the question whether there is difference between man and woman. That there is the difference of nature, in body, mind, feeling and character, and man and woman each has his or her own part to play, no one can dispute. This does not mean a scale of superiority or inferiority for the one or the other. Woman is by nature designed to play a different part from man. The sphere in which the woman excels is the family, and the faculty with which she does it, is love. This great gift makes her build an ideal and refined home for herself and her family, and again love enables her to extend her sympathetic arms outside her home. Where the young is to be trained and guided with tender care; where the aged and weak is to be cared for; where the erring and untoward need guidance; where the helpless and uncared for want succour; where there is sorrow, sickness and pain, there indeed is pre-eminently the sphere of woman to serve through love, unselfishness and sacrifice, both in and outside her home. This work awaits the woman of India, the cry for such work is heard on all sides. She cannot be content by confining herself only to her home, her nature does not allow her to be selfish. It will also not do for her to spend her time and money in useless luxuries, frivolities and idle pleasures, when there is plenty of work awaiting for her gentle hand to undertake. What is required of woman is to take her share of responsibility and never to cease to feel like woman, and to work like woman. She has to raise the moral tone of the home, society and country. The woman has to fit herself to train each generation to be worthier than the last, and to make each home a heaven on earth.

It is only through mutual co-operation that man and woman can adjust the position if real progress is to be attained and if the country is to gain freedom.

When society is free from the unmeaning shackles such as child marriage, purdah, polygamy, unequal and forced marriages, restraints against widow marriage, forced dowry, unequal inheritance, caste and untouchability, when man and woman in India realise their own individual responsibilities, the one helping the other as true mutual helpmates, then and then alone can the coveted freedom come to our country.

A COMING PROBLEM IN THE EDUCATION OF INDIAN GIRLS.

(By Mrs. A. L. Hudekoper, B.Sc., (Hons.) London, late I. E. S., Chairwoman, All India Women's Conference, Karachi.)

The rapid pace at which education among the girls of India is proceeding is rarely realised; but to some extent it can be judged by the rapidity with which the problems connected with it change.

It is not so long ago that the main problem of girls' education in this country was that of inducing the girls to come to school.

When Mr. Bethune had provided, in Calcutta, his school for Indian girls, he had to "bribe" them to attend by rewarding regular attendance with gifts of rich sarees, gold bangles, etc.

Now the schools already in existence are full to overflowing and in some cities girls are daily being refused admission through lack of school accommodation.

Another problem which is fast disappearing is that of conveying the girls to school. The humble bullock cart with its curtains and fine white bullocks has given place in some places to motor busses; but this problem is fast passing away and in many places, some of them towns of importance, it is possible for the girls to walk to and from school, without anyone taking more notice of them than of school boys.

Yet another problem, and until lately it seemed insuperable, was the provision of qualified women teachers for the staff of the girls' schools. With every girl disappearing into married life at a very early age, it was difficult to retain them long enough at school to pass out from it in an upper class; and how much greater then the problem of their remaining in the educational world as teachers.

But this problem too is, in many parts of India, a problem of yesterday. I know schools where the three upper classes (the top one being the matriculation class) contain over 30-40 girls each and where it is possible to pick and choose for the staff women who are "old girls" or others, who have a college life.

All these changes have taken place within fifteen years or so. But these problems of yesterday are being replaced by a problem of to-day and of, I fear, many a to-morrow, which requires the united and concerted action of the public to solve.

This is the problem of the provision of schools in adequate number and size to give an education to the girls who in their hundreds are knocking at the gates of the high schools, keenly desirous of being admitted, but having to be refused through lack of room.

It may be that this problem has only been felt as yet in some places, but any thoughtful person must realise that within a few—a very few years—it will be the main problem and one which can only be solved by the deliberate co-operation of the public and of all public authorities.

Within the last few months this problem has been driven home to me, not only by hearing from others that in a certain large university town of India, girls were being refused admission to high school life because the new and large school lately provided had become congested within a few months, but because I myself have had, in a similar case, to try and rouse (and so far without success) the necessary powers that be, including the public, to realise the problem and its gravity.

In one of the most important towns of one of our Presidencies—a town with about 250,000 people, there are five high schools for girls. The one built by the generosity of one of its chief citizens, for the girls of his own community, stands fair to see, the pride of a town having many fine buildings. It stands in 9,000 square yards of ground, and has about 300 girls. There are besides a Convent school, and a mixed Grammar school, both classed departmentally as "European" schools where the teaching is done entirely in English.

But besides these there are, in the strictly Hindu quarter, two cosmopolitan aided high schools, in rented houses of a totally inadequate nature from every point of view, including the total absence of playground. These two schools are full to overflowing. The larger one of them, which has over 500 girls on its rolls, has had to refuse 70-80 girls since last March. It is so overcrowded that it can only admit a new girl if one leaves, and if the applicant requires a place in the same class.

The problem which is exercising my ingenuity, my thoughts day in and day out, is how to obtain for these schools new habitations fit for the present girls, and capable of absorbing another equal number of girls within a few years.

The requisites are; (i) sites; (ii) buildings; (iii) adequate playgrounds; (iv) increased income.

Sites. The city in question—one in which town planning has had plenty of scope—has large empty spaces right in the very quarter where the school accommodation is required. But the local authorities owning these spaces (there are two) do not see their way to granting as a gift the necessary sites. One of them, in fact, declares it can only consider the problem as a strictly commercial proposition. This, moreover, when the market price of the land in question is said to be twenty rupees per square yard or more. This would mean that the two schools I have in mind would have to begin by spending 200,000 rupees each on the mere site. How many high schools would there be in the world if each had to spend two lacs on its site and to collect this money by public subscription?

It is this problem of the provision of school sites and school buildings which, to my mind, unless tackled in a wise manner by all concerned, is going to act as a great set back to the education of our girls; and going thereby to set back the whole progress of India.

Let us consider quite academically and without prejudice who are the people who should feel responsible for the provisions of these two items, high school sites and buildings.

This being a problem of supreme national importance, every citizen in his private and public capacity should be doing his utmost in this direction.

The public bodies concerned are (i) the Central Government; (ii) the Local government; (iii) the Municipal authorities; the other bodies concerned are the parents of girls of high school age, and the general public.

I do not propose in such a short article to allocate to each of these bodies their part in the provision of school sites and buildings, but I do most strongly maintain that all should unite and co-operate most earnestly on solving the problem. And I do, as strongly, maintain that as regards sites, a due sense of proportion would allocate large share of responsibility to the Government and Municipal authorities.

With regard to the provision of buildings, I wish to suggest as widely as possible that the general public can, and should, do its share.

In so many educational matters, India is fortunate in being able to benefit by experience of other nations, that I feel no excuse is necessary in giving an outline of how this very problem has been solved in England.

Sixty years ago this same difficulty was very acute in England. Many parents wanted to obtain for their daughters as good an education as their sons were getting. But whereas boys' education was centuries old, and beautiful buildings for boys' schools existed, there were none for girls' schools.

A small group of ladies and gentlemen met to discuss this problem. They were headed by Princess Louise, a daughter of Queen Victoria. Their efforts resulted in the formation of the Girls' Public Day School Company, in 1872.

Many people keen on education were approached; and a company was formed with shares of £5. With the capital thus obtained many buildings for girls' high schools were erected, in London and in other towns of England.

The shareholders received their 5 per cent: the schools paid rent to the company; the girls of England without much delay had a sufficiency of high schools.

What took place in England can take place here. It ought not to be beyond the wit of man (or woman) to adapt the English system to Indian conditions. Many a man and woman could take one or more hundred rupee shares in such a company; get his interest and feel that his money was serving a good purpose.

Some of us are trying to get the All India Women's Conference and the public generally to take up these proposals, and to try to get such companies formed in different parts of India.

I shall be glad to give any further information and also to receive any suggestion, or information, from those already occupied with this problem. Letters may be addressed to me at Mehta Lodge, Victoria Road, Karachi.

THE WORK AHEAD.

(By MRS. A. KALE, M. L. C., NAGPUR.)

There has been reawakening amongst us both men and women after a lapse of a century and over. Men are beginning to have better sense of political responsibility, while women, at least those belonging to the upper strata of society, are feeling the need of some radical changes in the present condition. The influences working behind this wide awakening may be traced to, amongst others, a firmer link with the outside world. Thanks to the British connection, India is no longer an isolated land. She has learnt much in the recent decades about the customs, ideals and practices of other lands and peoples. She had an opportunity to compare herself with these others. Comparison gives rise to reflection in the direction of self examination which in its train leads to a desire for a change. Consequently what we see in India of to day is the crumbling down of old antiquated racial customs and prejudices. Side by side with it, there ought to arise from that very dust, new edifices of changed social institutions. Not only India, but the whole world is in a melting pot, as it were. Everywhere old ideals are giving place to new.

In India, a sort of social revolution is going on. Politically too, great changes will be effected before long. Women therefore must cultivate a keen sense of responsibility and now of all times. At this transitional stage, when the future of our nation is being rocked in its cradle, women as mothers ought to devote every possible attention to its proper development. The life of the nation and future generation depends on what the present generation of women in India do. It is no doubt a great burden upon us, but every one would be glad to note that the women have come to realise this responsibility and organised a common platform on which all the matters can be freely discussed. In the words of Omar Khayyam "Not only that women cannot afford to lag behind in this era of reconstruction, but they must be in the van guard." Even better than men, we are more qualified to lead our nation at this stage. Woman both by constitution and practice is a better judge in understanding the situation and consequently a better guide to the policy to be chalked out. She is conservative by temperament and her preserving instincts are too well known to need restatement. She is the mistress of the Home which is the smallest social unit. She is a trustee for the future in as much as she has to bring up children, who in time to come will constitute the future society. She thus holds a unique position wherein all her resources and capacities are tested. It is a well-known fact that she has successfully withstood the severest test in the past and now she must justify her reputation and rise to the occasion. She must therefore come forward unhesitatingly and dictate the proper course of action to be followed.

This task is made much lighter by the creation of the All India Women's Conference. It is an important body for it sounds the views of the united womanhood of India. To make it really representative, every individual woman must try to exchange views on its common platform; and when after such discussions, a definite proposal is put forth, it will certainly carry more weight. It is with this in view that I offer some suggestions.

Our Conference is still in its infancy and therefore it is the more necessary for us to lay a definite policy when we tackle any problem. Vagueness must be discouraged from the first, and clearness of course to be followed and insisted upon in reaching the desired goal. For the determination of the same, it may be divided into the usual divisions: Educational, Social, and Political. Let us briefly discuss each in turn.

In the domain of education the knotty problem to be solved is that of illiteracy which is the root cause of all evils. It is no use depending too much on Government help. That illiteracy has increased during the British regime needs no proof. There was a time, when the smallest village had its own school. Even in the era of the advent of British, educationally we were quite well off. Now the proportion of literate women to men is like the inverted pyramid; but in the pre-British days not only were women literate, but they used to conduct and control schools. Not very long ago one could meet such schools up in the North.

Mr. Mayhew who was the Director of Public Instruction of Central Provinces, in his book on the Education of India accuses Government of "timidity and stumbling" and further says, "It is such policy of Government which is largely responsible for Indians' inability to tackle the problem."

In view of these circumstances, let us beware of waiting like beggars at the doors of Government; for in that case, we shall probably have to wait till eternity—every moment impoverishing ourselves more and more. What then can the Conference do in this respect? It is too early to expect the Conference to start institutions of its own. But it can certainly agitate and bring pressure on Government and public bodies to be more active. The whole of the present policy will have to be recast. The present practice of just throwing crumbs for girls' education must be stopped. We must make them realise "That female education is the condition on which ultimately the success of male education depends." And the ideal of this education should be such as to secure the best mental development and secondly, to provide an adequate means of independent livelihood to every woman; because the achievement of the first will be ineffective without the attainment of the second as Prince Kropotkin had observed, "A reorganised society will have to provide for integrated education which education alone by teaching both science and handicraft from earliest childhood can give to society the men and women it really needs." In the present circumstances, the need of economic independence for women cannot be overlooked because the want of it has been the cause of proverbial slavery of Indian women. Free woman means free nation. The second aspect of the educational problem which I should like to emphasise is the individual effort which every woman must do. Delegates to the Conference are educated women, who understand their responsibilities and therefore, more than all others, they must make it a point to educate at least a dozen women per year. They can do so by staying at home in their own town or village. They must not rest content with attending the Conference once in a year and talking and passing pious resolutions. Remember that famous dictum "Behaviour is righteousness". Every woman delegate should strive to be, not merely a mirror of fashion in the society in which she lives, but a mirror of virtue, gentility and duty. To educate her illiterate sisters is the best beginning in the way of discharging her duties.

Coming to the social problem, it may be said to be the best field for action. In a thousand and one ways woman can introduce reforms, being the mistress of the home from which all liberal ideas ultimately emanate. She must leave aside petty caste distinction, must bury down religious and racial differences. A singular service which she can render to the present Hindu society will be by taking a vow to remove untouchability. She must also try for the uplift of her fallen sisters. We have examples of eminent social workers in the west who have made social reform their very profession.

On the Continent, various institutions have been founded and conducted by women which give special training of social workers, so that social service may be within the reach of every woman. I am glad to find that efforts are being made in Bombay in the same direction; but this is not enough. An organised body like our Conference must take up this question in earnest and should depute women to foreign countries in order to get the necessary training. Such activity alone can render real service to the countless millions of India, who are at present in miserable ignorance. A net work of such social centres is the necessity of the day and if the Conference takes up this work, it will have justified its existence.

Now coming to politics, I may point out that, if we tackle these two problems of education and social reform, politics may be conveniently left to take care of itself. After all politics has become rather deceptive; under the name of politics personal aggrandisement has increased. Let us at least be wiser and not fall a prey to this allurements. Let us do some constructive good. The social side which I have emphasised above is the foundation of political progress. It is better to be guided by this fundamental fact, than being drifted away by mere catch words of the present day political phraseology.

Secondly, in the immediate past, it is the men who have devoted their attention to this thorny problem. By sufficient experience, they must have attained specialisation. In these days of division of labour, let us women render useful help to them by mastering our own province which I have referred above. This in a nut-shell should be the main outline of our future policy. In order to make matters easy, I may draw the attention of my readers to certain practical points. Sir Vishweshwarayya in his book on reconstructing India has observed that, "if the country is to move forward at a rapid pace, Indians must increasingly disregard caste restrictions. Break bread with one another, and cultivate habits of international intercourse." A practical means suggested by him towards this end is what he terms:—"Indianisation which signifies common dress, common language, and even common food for all Indians. These are petty matters in themselves, but they are vital matters in the unification of this wide nation where diversity is the order of the day." The need of such Indianisation might have occurred to many even at the time of our own conference. It is a common experience that women having the same dress feel more affinity towards one another. This means, encouraging provincial differences which we must strive to set aside. We should assemble in the Conference as Indian women and not as Provincial groups. Another apparently insignificant thing in the life of Indian womanhood is the unduly great amount of time wasted in our kitchen; with all this, it is not that we prepare the most nourishing food, but only encourage fastidiousness. The truth of this need not be brought home by adding details. It is a matter of daily experience. The kitchen has reduced the sphere of women's activity almost to nothingness. It is therefore the most practicable and the most necessary consideration. If we remember the simple rule that trifles make perfection, I am sure my sisters will not overlook the above suggestions. I hope they will be taken for what they are worth.

TASK BEFORE US.

( MRS. HANSA MEHTA, B. A., J. P., MEMBER, BOMBAY CORPORATION. )

I remember when the All India Women's Conference on Educational Reform first met, some of the papers criticised the movement as an outcome of feminist tendencies—feminist in the sense the word is understood in the West. They entirely misunderstood the object of such a Conference which is more to arouse interest among women themselves in matters that affect them so closely, to educate their opinion in matters educational and social, to make them think and judge for themselves as to what is good for them and what is not. In short, the Conference provides a platform where women can talk without reserve, exchange their views on what they consider to be the needs for the betterment of their sex in particular, of society in general.

So far as arousing the interest of women is concerned this movement has achieved a measure of success. For instance ever since the question of prevention of child marriage was taken up at the Poona Conference, women all over India did a tremendous amount of propaganda work. They created "women's opinion" against such a horrible practice with the result that many of the Indian States like, Mysore, Rajkot, Kashmir, Gondal, Indore, Limbdi, Mandi and Bhavnagar have raised the legal age of marriage. Baroda even went so far as to make marriages under eight null and void. The success of Rai Sahab Har Bilas Sarada's Bill is also to a great extent due to the efforts of women.

Lately the Conference has taken up the question of equal right of inheritance for women. Both Baroda and Mysore have taken steps, by issuing questionnaires, to remedy this defect in the Hindu Law. There is no doubt that women are shaking off their apathy and are taking more and more lively interest in such issues which concern their welfare. The ground is prepared, the real work for the Conference begins now.

Many are the resolutions that this Conference has passed. They are still on paper. Time has come now when they must be translated into action. First and foremost are the educational problems that confront us, for education is the primary need of this country. A resolution had already been passed asking for compulsory primary education. That is not enough. War against illiteracy must be carried on more vigorously. "There shall be no illiteracy in 1940." Some such slogan must be taken up. The conference should give a mandate to its constituencies to see that every village in their area has got a school. The need for more trained teachers will naturally arise. It is a curious fact that while there is a demand for more trained teachers on one hand, the Government of Bombay is closing down the training Colleges and putting all kinds of restrictions in the way of those who wish to take training as teachers! If the fact as is made out is true that women teachers are not available for village-schools as women are afraid to live alone in villages, then let men teachers do the work for both. Co-educational schools in villages will solve the financial difficulty also.

Again the task of popularising education is not easy unless the education given is in consonance with the environment in which the child lives. The curriculum must be properly arranged. At present there is not much difference found in the curriculum of a rural school and that of an urban school. Agriculture, dairy work and such allied subjects should form part of the syllabus in a village school. Again the curricula of primary schools and secondary schools require readjustment. There is much overlapping of work with the result that much time is wasted without any fruitful gain to the child. Fortunately for this Presidency, the Government has appointed an Education Committee, which one hopes will remedy this defect in our educational system.

Another important point worth taking up is that the secondary education as imparted at present prepares the pupil for University education only. It is not complete in itself, in the sense that the recipient of such education is really good for nothing. This is a great drawback for both boys and girls, for every one cannot afford to go in for higher education either for want of time or of money. The secondary course must be extended by a year or two and made more complete, at the same time the University course may be curtailed by a year.

This leads us to the question of University education. I am not one of those who believe in a separate curriculum for girls. Education in so far as it is cultural should be the same for both boys and girls. However, University education must be universal and must have a wider range of subjects for selection, so that it can cater for different tastes. There is no doubt that the present University courses are very one-sided. Fine arts, Domestic Science, Social Science, Public Health—these are some of the subjects which ought to find a place in the University curriculum as they do in Universities abroad. Will not the women senators move in this matter?

There is a common complaint that the general turn out of the University graduates is poor. One reason to me is very obvious and that is the question of language. Whether the courses of study are made stiffer or more easy, as long as the instruction is given in a foreign tongue, the generality of students will be unable to grasp the fundamentals of the subjects taught. This language problem really requires immediate solution. Will not women agitate for provincial universities where the medium of instruction will be the vernacular of the province?

Lack of proper text books has already been felt. Take for instance the text book readers used in the primary schools in the City of Bombay. They tell us nothing about the city or surroundings that envelop this beautiful isle, nothing about the harbour or many other places of interest that would appeal to a child brought up in this city. The Bombay Women's Committee on Educational and Social Reform has already offered a prize for the best suggestions of a good series of text book readers for the use of the primary schools in this city. The All India Women's Conference has also appointed a sub-committee to tackle the question of proper text books. It is time the Committee began its work.

I have merely outlined some of the purely educational problems that need solution in the near future. I do not wish to go into technical details about them, nor do I wish to mention others in this short sketch. Similarly I wish to touch on a few only of the socio-educational problems which ought to be taken up soon. The Conference has already taken notice of them by passing resolutions. Medical Inspection of school children is one of them. Mere medical inspection is, however, not enough. From the reports of the medical inspectors who attend the primary school children in this city, one finds that a larger percentage of school children suffer from malnutrition rather than anything. Those suffering from diseases receive some sort of treatment. Even here treatment in special school clinics or in general hospitals should be insisted upon. No steps, however, are taken for underfed children. Feeding the school children, at least those who are poor and underfed, must form part of the duty of those in power concerned.

Evil arising out of overcrowding of schools is another problem requiring immediate attention. I am told that where the system of giving grants per capita prevails private aided schools are invariably overcrowded. We wish education to spread and that is why we demand that it should be made compulsory; but this should not lead to over-crowding of schools and making children victims of some kind of infection or other. Women must protest against this evil and try their best to remove it.

School buildings must be sanitary as well as spacious. In a city like Bombay where school buildings are rented, this is not always possible. The problem, however, can be solved if there are sufficient number of public spirited citizens to finance the scheme of providing the right type of school buildings. There is a resolution before the coming session of the conference to have proper school buildings built on co-operative basis. I wonder if the scheme cannot be adopted by the residents of some of the rich localities in this city. Open air schools wherever possible will also lessen the burden of erecting school buildings. Children love sunshine and open air. Such schools therefore, are bound to be very popular, where such facilities are not possible as in the case of congested places like, for instance, Bombay, open spaces as playground for children should be insisted upon.

Since the Patna Session, this Conference has widened its scope and can take up purely social questions. Uptil now it concerned itself with taking up such problems only like the prevention of child marriage or purdah which relate to the women's education, as the two evils are a great hindrance to its progress in this country. This year the Conference intends to take up the question of equal rights of inheritance for women. Equality of status in other spheres should also be insisted upon on the plea of justice. However, there are problems concerning women labourers which ought to be taken up by the Conference at an early date. The hardships women have to suffer in certain industries; the housing problem—provision of good sanitary houses in industrial towns; maternity benefit, maternity clinics in charge of women doctors, trained dais are some of them. The Conference can easily undertake investigation in these matters and urge upon introducing necessary reforms.

One more evil, perhaps the greatest nuisance that exists all over India must not remain unmentioned. The beggar problem must find an early solution. Every city, town or village ought to be able to look after its own poor. Begging in streets should be prohibited. The Conference should demand a vagrancy act corresponding to the one existing in England. Women are responsible for encouraging beggars, specially in religious places; they must, therefore, come forward to mitigate this evil.

There is no end to these problems. One can mention hundreds of them. The whole task of social reconstruction is before us. It is a great task. The old order has changed giving place to terrible disorder. Let woman come forward to set things right, to set her house in order, to re-construct a society from whence ignorance, poverty and inequality as between man and man, as between man and woman will have fled.

IDEALS IN WOMEN'S EDUCATION.

( BY MRS. V. A. SUKHTANKAR, Indore. )

It is a sign of hope and promise that we are finding all around us a quickening of interest in Indian girls' education, although the subject tends to become a very controversial one. And the question which most frequently comes under discussion is that of the object and scope of the present system of education. Has the scheme been prepared carefully and wisely, with a view to make women's lives more fruitful of good to themselves individually and to the community?

In relation to this question the ideals and type of western women's education often come in for criticism. It is deplored that the western type has become the pattern for the East, for the Indian girls' ideals are, as should be, different and therefore the western type of education is unsuitable for her, inciting to too much freedom and independence and drawing her away from her natural avocation and detesting home-life, wife-hood and motherhood. Her school curriculum, it is said should discourage the inclusion of the more "brainy" subjects by the substitution of "domestic arts," to fit her for her future part in life. This is so often and earnestly urged that personally I have been led to wonder why it does not occur to these critics to ask themselves what the school's function is, also where home should and must come in as an immensely important factor in girls' development. For much as school and college can do they cannot provide in any real sense, home culture. This can only be supplied by well regulated, refined homes and by the home-makers, the girls' mothers. No school and no curriculum can achieve the same result. Suppose that a school does make it its business to give students cookery lessons, say, three times a week, can such compare for usefulness with the mere sight of the preparation of every day dinner in the natural setting of the home, to say nothing of actually helping in the work, which is not at all outside the province of Indian girl students. I cannot help feeling that if our daughters, who are being educated, fail to give promise of being orderly, industrious housewives the fault lies with us, their mothers, and is not a reflection upon the type of education in vogue in the schools.

Where girls have to live away from home at a boarding school the case becomes different, but the remedy lies with the school authorities in creating in the boarding house, as far as possible, the genial atmosphere of a cultured Indian home and excluding all that tends to a barrack life. Happy instances exist where this is the aim, and a fine result has been achieved. It would indeed be good if such a type of boarding school were many times duplicated. It is one of the greatest needs of girls' education in this country.

But let us not lose sight of the fact that our girls are not simply prospective wives, but human beings first of all, endowed with those noble qualities of mind and heart which are the inheritance of the whole human race.

The educational advantages that Indian girls may now enjoy have been won mainly through the valiant efforts of the pioneer band of women educationists who, scarcely a century ago, in England, set themselves the task, against great opposition of obtaining facilities for higher education which numbers of their own country women were earnestly desiring. Should we willingly let go a position so hardly won, and hark back to the old cry of women's sphere being confined to domestic concerns? It is true that all women have neither the capacity nor the desire for severe, prolonged study—to these the well beaten paths remain always free, but those others who have, may safely be left to pursue their chosen way.

In educational controversies we seem too much disposed to emphasise differences rather than notice points of resemblance. We speak of the East and the West as implying a world of difference, yet mostly the differences are but surface ones.

Beneath lies the common bond of our human intelligence. The Eastern boy and girl and the Western boy and girl are equally appreciating and benefiting by the same good things in education; and because certain things are taught in Western schools is no reason for discarding them in schools for Eastern children. We should avail ourselves of the best that we find in both the Eastern and Western cultures in a spirit of reasonableness and gratitude.

The idea that the strenuous cultivation of the mental faculties must be attended by a falling off in those qualities implied by "heart" seems an absurd one. "Head and heart" together—that should be the ideal—and it can only be fully realised where sound school and college training are supplemented by home nurture of the right type. Happily we can see homes rising around us expressing the old Indian charm of simplicity combined with a fresh sense of delight in beauty and brightness and infused with the modern spirit of activity and public service. And from all that I know of a wide circle of Indian graduate women and college girls I feel that our hope for the fair future of India lies mainly and safely in their keeping—as liberal-minded friends of progress, helpers of good causes, true companions to their future husbands and noble mothers of the generation to come.

THE WORK BEFORE THE ALL INDIA WOMEN'S CONFERENCE.

(By Mrs. Y. HIRLEKAR, M.A., BOMBAY).

The times are fast changing and the call for action is urgent. We have seen—and it is never too late to mend—that we cannot expect anything to be bestowed upon us as a gift on a fine morning by some mysterious power but that everything has to be struggled for and earned. If women's emancipation is to take place, it is women who must take the initiative in this matter. Moreover, it is they who can best understand their own interests and needs. Men can not do this for them even if they would, which involves many unjustified assumptions. Thus women's emancipation is a problem for women alone. For, the need for advancement and progress must be felt from within and the urge for the necessary action will follow from within. It is because of this universal truth and not because man's interests are at variance with woman's that I say that women's progress and advancement is essentially their own task, lying before them at present when a general national struggle is raging keen.

Along with others, education is an item which will have to be taken up more seriously than it is even now. We have not yet arrived at a satisfactory scheme of education for girls, although it is a long established fact among the orthodox as well as the liberal sections of women that women's education is the basis of all progress. A scheme of education for girls gives rise to several problems the details which have not yet received proper attention, thought and investigation. These problems are many and varied. Should there be a difference between the curricula for boys and girls? If so, is co-education practicable? If not, is co-education preferable? Are there any innate differences between the intellectual capacity and calibre of boys and girls? Do such innate differences exist between their psychology? If so, how do they affect their respective development of individuality? In view of this, what difference should there be in their respective courses of education? There are many more such questions and considerations which have got to be solved and taken into account before a scheme can be drawn. Now, the solution of these questions must be guided not by sentiment or tradition but by a scientific investigation of the innate differences, psychological and intellectual, if any, and physical, between boys and girls and the results must be corroborated by statistics. A scheme of education based on such sound data is naturally likely to be more effective than any other.

In order to improve upon the past, we must be clear about two things. What is to be aimed at and in what respects the previous attempt fell short of that aim. Volumes can be written on what is to be aimed at but to be brief one can sum up the aim of education as follows: Education is the mental and physical equipment which renders the individual economically self-reliant and more able and confident under the conditions of existence. If this is to be our aim, what has the education that is being given to our girls at present, done to achieve it. They appear to have become economically independent because of their scarcity value but if the scope of education is not broadened, women will be as helpless economically in some years to come, as our men-graduates. We must take a lesson from the experience of our boys who have to spend a tremendous amount of time, money and energy over their college career and at the end of it the majority are unable to translate their efforts into money. Physically our girls have become nervous and weak and we are often faced with the anomaly that our illiterate sisters of the working-class are often superior in this respect. For, as long as the education which our girls receive is only meant to be an accomplishment and aims at preparing "cultured ladies", what profession are they fit for except perhaps teaching, medicine and law? All other kinds of labour is below their dignity in their eyes. This is the mentality created by the purely academical education that our schools are providing. Secondly, there is not sufficient variety and option offered to suit individual difference of temperament and capacity. Every one is forced to pass through one particular groove and is declared unfit year after year if the individuality is too strong to succumb to the common rut and is finally made a nervous wreck. An eminent psychologist says, every normal person is a genius at something or other and it is the fault of the school and the whole machinery of education if they cannot find out that 'something'. It is the sacred task of educationists to afford scope, create opportunities and possibilities for every individual to have his or her temperamental and intellectual needs satisfied so that at the end of education he or she may come out a stronger personality and a better citizen.

Thirdly, whatever scheme we have framed, is meant only for the upper and the fairly well-to-do middle classes and we have made no provision for the poorer classes of whom practically the whole nation is composed. If education of the masses is our goal, the scheme has to be entirely changed. It must have a more practical, technical and industrial bias. For, unless education means some material gain, it is futile to expect the half-starving masses to enjoy the beauties of literature.

All this proves one thing that there is much to be desired in our present scheme of education and it is our duty to take up the matter seriously. Now such questions of general importance can not be tackled by individuals. They must be taken up by a responsible and representative body. Being the biggest women's organization, it is up to the All India Women's Conference to consider this important problem. Upto the last year, it called itself the All India Women's Educational Conference. Now it has dropped the word 'Educational' so as to extend its sphere of activity. This is no doubt a welcome change, still it must not fail to see that there is bound to be a certain logical sequence which must guide its activities in its extended field. It is education alone, where education is defined and administered in a broader sense, that will bring about in its train almost automatically social, economic and political reform. It is not enough to have finely-worded resolutions put on the agenda and to get them 'unanimously' passed when the resolutions are only destined to lie on the paper until another year brings in new resolutions to replace them. It is up to the Conference to see that some actual work is being done throughout the whole year in accordance with the resolutions.

Returning to the question of drawing up a reformed scheme of education for girls, in addition to passing resolutions, the Conference should see that its representative constituent bodies in the various provinces of India appoint expert women-educationists from their respective constituencies to do some investigation and research work and prepare annual reports. This would also be a convenient way of collecting statistics and getting various other informations which would make extremely useful data for further work. Every year is launching in new possibilities and the air is full of vigour. Naturally, we are all looking forward to the All-India Women's Conference which meets in January, to give voice to the needs of women as disclosed by experience and to promote the necessary action in an organized way.

SOCIAL WORK IN GERMANY.

(By Mrs. KAMALADEVI CHATOPADHYAYA, Organising Secretary, All-India Women's Conference.)

Social work in Germany is a monumental one and strikes a visitor as being very stupendous. It seems to have had its birth in very ancient times, for private and public social relief work was said to have existed during the reign of Charlemagne. In the early middle ages there existed a widespread system of poor relief administered by the feudal lords while side by side with it the monasteries and religious orders founded hospitals, alms houses and other institutions. Some of these are still to be found in the south of Germany. Later due chiefly to the Reformation and the French Revolution, German relief work underwent a reform particularly in the larger towns and the individualising form of relief was founded. This help consisted not merely in giving food and shelter but extended its care to health and education and provided means of employment. This was carried on by the communities as well as the churches.

Industrialisation in the second half of the 19th century, the war and the post-war period of the 20th century gave a particular character to social work throughout Germany. As a result of the changed conditions of life new problems regarding health, education and economics arose and new methods were sought to solve them. The three main agencies or instruments of work are: (1) public social work, (2) private social work, (3) social insurance.

PUBLIC SOCIAL WORK.

Up to 1924 public social work was based on a Poor law but since then it has undergone certain changes which has made it extend its scope. This extensive law makes the towns and rural communities responsible for the individual care of the war disabled and the dependents of deceased soldiers besides the regular pensions paid to them by the State, of those who lost their property as a result of currency inflation, of those who in spite of their invalid and old age pension are in need, of children, of women in pre-natal and anti-natal states, of the handicapped children and other necessitous persons in general. They are likewise responsible for the welfare of the children according to the new law of 1922. By this every German child is entitled to an education enabling it to attain physical, intellectual and social fitness. To attain this end Child Welfare Boards are established by the urban and rural administrations. These are responsible for the

1. Protection of boarded out children,
2. Guardianship of illegitimate children and other wards,
3. Supervision and education of neglected, unprotected, problem and delinquent children,
4. Assistance to the Juvenile Courts (Probationary Courts),
5. Assistance in enforcing the Child Labour Act (Kinderschutzgesetz),

6. Assistance to the police in handling juvenile cases,
7. Relief for war-orphans and children of the war disabled,
8. Besides these measures especial importance is attached to the protection of motherhood, and the welfare of infants, children and adolescents.

Additional legislation provides for the protection and care of cripples and those suffering from venereal diseases or tuberculosis. Most German welfare laws apply to all the German States. In some like Prussia, Bavaria and Saxony they are supplemented by useful additional legislation.

The communities have established welfare boards to carry out the programme. These administer relief on uniform lines. The various departments of these Welfare Boards are the Relief Board, the Child Welfare Board, the Board of Health, the Housing Board and the Board for extensional public education. A Welfare Council has the responsibility of putting the programme into effect. Representatives of the Municipal Council and all classes of the population with expert knowledge of social conditions are members of this. The programme is administered by a system of decentralisation. The various districts are divided into very small sections. A committee consisting of the director, a physician, a social worker and about 20 helpers cares for the individual cases. The members of the Committee are voluntary workers. Their work is carried on in close co-operation with the welfare boards. These take charge of the more difficult cases and turn them over to trained social workers.

The aim of this relief work is that it should be preventive and effective and therefore to be given early and to an extent which would prevent temporary need changing into a permanent one. The particular kind of need should be considered. The relief offered is to insure the necessities of life. These are housing, food, clothing, help and care in times of sickness, help for children's education and vocational training for the blind, deaf and dumb, and burial expenses for all needy persons. A number of welfare centres are maintained and these carry on out-door relief in connection with the health and educational work. There are welfare centres for mothers, infants and small children, for cripples, for the mentally and morally defective children.

PRIVATE SOCIAL WORK.

In pre-war times private philanthropy developed strongly and did valuable pioneer work. It established the first kindergarten school, the first welfare centres, labour colonies, employment agencies and convalescent homes. This work was carried out a good deal by the religious charity associations, Protestant, Catholic and Jewish as well as non-secretarian bodies such as the Red-cross and socialist associations. All these associations now aim at co-operation amongst themselves. They have centres and sub-committees in all parts of Germany and maintain a great number of welfare institutions.

Public and private organs of social work operate in close contact and in many cases joint councils have been formed in order to co-ordinate all efforts in the interest of the various phases of the work. Welfare work is being greatly helped by the scientific research that is done by the German Society for Public and Private Relief.

SOCIAL INSURANCE.

Besides this, social insurance in Germany has so developed that it ranks foremost in social work today. The Social Insurance Acts provide sick-benefits, maternity-benefits, accident, invalidity and old age benefits, and unemployment-benefits. The disability and old-age insurance fund grants its members periodical money payments and in order to prevent disablement, gives medical and institutional treatment. The sick-fund grants benefit in the way of periodical money payments, medical treatment including medicines and if necessary, treatment in hospitals and convalescent homes. The accident-insurance-fund grants periodical money payments to its members, if, due to an accident in the course of their employment they are handicapped. The unemployment insurance grants payments to unemployed and their dependents. The social insurance funds maintain their own welfare centres, where the insured members and their dependents undergo medical examination and have records kept of the development and progress of diseases. They also maintain hospitals, sanatoria and convalescent homes.

Then there are of course relief measures carried on by the trade-unions and the employers.

Welfare work is mainly practised by professional trained workers. There are 47 schools for social work out of which 43 are for women and 4 for men. At the end of the training period the students have to pass a State examination.

SOCIAL WORK IN BERLIN.

A brief survey of the social work in Berlin gives one an idea of its detailed working. The great expansion of Berlin with its population of 4,000,000 has made it necessary to organize the work in a special manner. The city is divided into 20 districts. Public relief work is directed by a Central Welfare and Child Welfare Board, and has a Central Health Board and a Central Welfare Council and Housing Board working with it. The Central Welfare and Child Welfare Board is organised by a City Department which is a special administrative body. It gives relief in general including care of the blind, deaf and dumb, the administration of shelters, workhouses and public kitchens. The Child Welfare work is for normal, dependent, problem, neglected and delinquent children. It deals with war-disabled and dependents of deceased soldiers and also with social endowments. Twenty district welfare, child welfare boards are entrusted with carrying out the welfare programme.

They are mainly in charge of individual relief work and carry it out according to the family welfare system. A great many professional welfare workers are engaged in this work and in addition there are about 1,000 general welfare and child welfare committees who in their turn are assisted by about 20,000 voluntary helpers.

Family social work includes practically all efforts on behalf of the welfare of a family with the exception of a few relief measures that are referred to one or other departments.

A YEAR'S WORK.

In the course of a year Berlin gives assistance and relief to about 3,200 war-disabled and dependents of the deceased soldiers, 74,000 people who lost their property during the war, 33,800 people who in spite of their invalid or old age pension are in need, 108,000 unemployed with no claims on unemployed insurance, 70,000 other necessitous persons, 14,000 pregnant women with institutional care for 10,000, 20,000 mentally diseased, 80,000 needy in hospitals, 35,000 cripples, 18,000 dependent children 7,003 of which are in custodial care, 30,000 juveniles out of whom 16,000 are completely provided for.

The Public Health Service of Berlin is administered by the Central Board of Health under the authority of a Central Council of Health. It is in charge of the administration of hospitals and infirmaries, disinfection, prevention of infectious diseases, social hygiene, first aid, midwifery, private utilitarian health institutions and other measures of welfare service. It has under it 25 hospitals, 3 sanatoria for tuberculosis, 4 asylums and 13 infirmaries.

In order to promote co-operation between the agencies of public and private social work a joint council has been formed consisting of an equal number of representatives of both under the presidency of the Chairman of the Welfare Council.

Berlin has 6 schools of social work for women and 2 for men.

I should like to mention some of the important institutions that do this work of welfare.

INSTITUTIONS FOR SOCIAL WORK.

The Municipal Centre combines a night shelter, quarters for homeless families, family shelter and welfare centre for the inmates of the shelter. The night shelter accommodates 5,000 homeless persons and is open between 10 p. m. and 2-30 p. m. The family shelter has wards for men, women and children, for maternity cases and sick people. The centre also helps the inmates in their re-habilitation.

The Municipal Labour colony is a big farm and provides accommodation, food and agricultural employment to the unsheltered. It can harbour 160 men; work is also provided for on neighbouring farms. There is another labour colony where unemployed men find shelter food and work, and in addition they receive a small remuneration.

It comprises three colonies, one for elderly men capable of work, the second for adolescent unemployed and the third for elderly men with limited working capacity. To meet the special needs of formerly well-to-do but now impoverished people a dwelling house has been erected.

The Pestalozzi-Frobel-House is a very magnificent institution and can be taken as a model house for the care of infants and school children. It consists of three imposing buildings. House one contains model kinder-garten schools run both on Montessori and Frobel methods, a school for psychopathic and backward children, a creche, day and night homes, a home for apprentices, a children's reading room, a boarding house for orphans, a convalescent home as also a school for training workers in charge of kinder-garten, clubs and homes. House two trains teachers and adolescent girls in domestic science. House three is the headquarters of the oldest school of social work and of the German women's Academy for social and educational work, offering post-graduate training for such professions.

The Evangelisches-Johannisstift combines a great number of modern child welfare institutions. It has homes for the treatment of psychopathic children, for children with spinal trouble, a home for morally defective youths, a war-orphan training school for domestic science and a home for the aged. It is likewise a training school for diacons and social workers. A special department offers courses in principles of social ethics, social politics, and mission service to workmen, union secretaries and all other groups.

SANATORIA AND CONVALESCENT HOMES.

The tuberculosis sanatoria and convalescent homes of the Redcross in Hohen-Lycheu is a very huge concern. The climatic conditions and scenery of the country greatly benefit the healing process. The whole complex with 652 beds and accommodation for another 272 in rooms consists of sanatoria for tuberculosis of all kinds and maintains a hospital and a convalescent home. There are colonies for children pre-disposed for tuberculosis and a horticultural school for juveniles affected by the disease.

The Oskar-Helene-Home is a modern institute for crippled children and adolescents. This is maintained by the society for the treatment and care of cripples. It has a large medical department for clinical and ray treatment for infants and children. It has special wards for the treatment of tuberculosis of the bones and joints, an open air station, a station for surgical and orthopedic treatment.

In addition there is an educational department and a number of workshops for professional training and a seminary for training workers in the care of cripples to which is attached a museum for cripple-dom and cripple welfare. There is provision for the education of adults who have lost or are apt to lose their sight, hearing or speech.

The Jugendland of the City of Berlin in Zossen is a novel institution, formerly a military camp now comprises about 15 barracks and small houses with 1000 beds for convalescent children. The children are admitted for a period of 4 to 6 weeks; whole classes of kinder-garten and school children accompanied by their teachers stay at Zossen for several weeks and receive regular school training. The deaf, the dumb, the crippled and the mentally deficient regain health and strength here and are offered a shelter-home situated on the outskirts, for hiking, rambling and excursionist boys and girls.

The Private Social Service Centre is doing some unique work. This agency originally founded by the society for Ethical Culture in co-operation with the public and private welfare agencies now gives advice to the needy and takes on the personal guardianship of those in distress and carries on systematic follow up work. Public relief agencies, business firms and wealthy individuals submit applications they have received for help to this Social Service Centre for investigation and relief work.

The society for the protection of children against exploitation and ill-treatment tries to prevent children from being tyrannised and places them in their own houses in unison with physicians, teachers, social workers etc. It maintains a home for the education of unprotected and ill-treated children.

A new form of work is represented by the Schrebergarten of the Volksh eilstattenverein of the Red Cross. These are gardens intended for working men and their families and are meant to raise the general standard of health. The society offers land at low rates stipulating that it be used for growing vegetables or flowers and for recreational purposes.

There are a good many scientific institutes that carry on research work and collect information about Social Welfare. The Archiv Fur Wohlfahrtspfleger is a huge centre. Its library contains about 17,000 books, and about 100 German and Foreign language periodicals and newspapers. It has further more a collection of reports and illustrative literature dealing with the administration of organised relief and activities of welfare institutions. Information is collected on all social work. It also assists in publishing welfare magazines and bulletins. It issues regularly a bibliography of welfare work, a directory of social agencies in Berlin as well as other publications. Information can be obtained here regarding German and Foreign welfare work.

These are but a few of the innumerable institutions for social welfare that Berlin can boast of.

WOMEN'S PROGRESS IN INDIA.*

This is the fourth time that the Madras Constituent Conference of the All-India Women's Conference on Educational Reform has assembled. So momentous has been the result of its earlier deliberations, and so fraught with possibilities of future changes for India are the present times, that I realise how great is the honour you have done me in inviting me to be your president for this year and the responsibility that lies on me to be worthy of the office. I am particularly grateful for the kindness you have shown me in view of the fact that I have been absent from India for 18 months. I can truly say however that while I was absent from India, during my world tour, India was seldom absent from my thoughts and speech, for in over a hundred meetings which I addressed in Europe, America and Japan I never failed to tell my audiences of the work of these women's conferences and of women's organisations in India for various specialised objects. I believe that such proclamation of the awakened and capable powers of the women of India was a course of education for the adults of the West which had been omitted by their local educational authorities but one which will be fruitful in the international appreciations, which are indispensable to world peace and to the attainment of India's national aspirations.

I feel that my presidentship is under particularly auspicious auspices in that Her Excellency Lady Beatrix Stanley is so graciously amongst us and that she will receive from this gathering her first impressions of the strong currents of life that are evident everywhere amongst Indian women.

THE CHILD MARRIAGE RESTRAINT ACT.

The rapid speed with which all things move is characteristic of the present time. We have only to give a strong push towards a goal and we find that the time-Spirit gives us assistance far beyond our expectations. I would remind you that when we first met in this very hall four years ago and groped our way towards clear expression of our desire for better education and more education we came across the barrier of early marriage. We thought then that we could take no more pronounced step than to urge that no marriage of girls should take place before 16. No organisation in the country had at that time formulated a demand for legislation on child marriage. It remained for Her Highness the Maharani of Baroda, President of the first All-India Women's Conference, held in Poona three months later than our Madras Conference, to be the first to sound a clarion call for a law to prohibit child marriage. It was the resolution of that Conference which on the 7th of January 1927 first urged the Government of India to pass legislation making marriage under 16 years a penal offence. The women of India leaped forward to follow the lead of the conference. Before six months have passed our champion in the Legislative Assembly had tabled the Child Marriage Bill and to-day our first thought must be of gratitude to Rai Bahadur Harbilas Sarla and all the men and women and the youth of both the sexes who by their hard work have succeeded in placing the Child Marriage Restraint Act on the statute book. Thus the first push of the women's conference on educational reform has brought us to one goal. We have to consolidate the gain by vigilance over the details of the enforcement of the law through such instruments as strict enforced registration of births and marriages so that the ages may be under clear supervision. Our conference must be ready also after the first of April 1930 to help in taking legal proceedings if there should be any flouting of the law. But to-day our hearts are full of joy that a historic milestone has been passed on the way to the complete accomplishment of our ideals and the freeing of young people.

WIDENED SCOPE OF THE CONFERENCE.

Another instance of the speed of the women's movement is the expansion of objectives for which our conference this year stands. Such a full flood of conscious life has coursed through the women in all the constituent conferences of last year that at the Patna All-India session it burst through the confining banks of educational reform only. It is self-evident that the many reforms which are needed in women's conditions all act and re-act on education and accordingly resolutions relating generally to women's life come within the scope of this year's conference. While we think of the division as in terms of Education and Social Reform these are for convenience only in the conduct of our business. It will be seen from the resolutions that many of them might equally well be placed in the alternate sections. The conference is not a duality. It is an indivisible unity. It may be that in the future as in the Pan-Pacific Women's Conference it eventually has sections also on Health, Industry and Government, yet all these are as the various limbs of the one life and have to function not independently but interdependently. The same is the case with the Women's Education Fund. We have financial responsibility and loyalty to the Conference Fund which is continuously needed to pay the working expenses of propaganda office, printing etc., and I hope that every Constituent Conference will gladly share that responsibility by collecting not less than Rs. 100 each for that purpose. But we have also the privilege and opportunity and duty of helping to collect the lakhs of rupees which are necessary for establishing a Home Science College with its nursery, primary and secondary practice schools on the model of the resolutions we have all drafted as our ideals. It is from this fund also that other necessary reforms about text books, housing for teachers, etc., have to be financed. We see how Christians in America and England are at the moment employing every means to collect money for their missionary women's colleges here. Let us be encouraged by their example to organise in this country great sums for educational purposes.

EXAMPLE OF JAPAN.

In Kyoto, (Japan) the largest Buddhist temple was burnt down 30 years ago. In rebuilding it no ropes could be found strong enough to raise the great timbers of its pillars and roofing. Human hair was found to be the strongest substance and when a call for this went out through Kyoto, 4,000 women devotedly shaved off their dark tresses, willing to sacrifice their beauty in service to the temple of the Enlightened and Compassionate One. We need such a spirit here to erect the temple of learning. We women must mobilise our forces to that end. On the principle of first things first let us make the establishment of compulsory and free Primary education throughout this Presidency and all India our primary and immediate goal. A spirit of promise, good will, expectation and expansion are to-day in the air. It is a psychological moment comparable to that of the period 1917-1919, out of which eventuated the enfranchisement of women and their emergence into all spheres of public life with the success which is willingly accorded to them. Let us utilise this time for a drive to secure primary education for every child in the country.

I am the more impressed with the importance of laying the foundation of the literacy of the masses because of what I have seen and felt in other countries since I last stood here. Many a time my heart has ached with longing that India should soon enjoy the same facilities for education as the children get in all other countries. Our task is enormous—to raise literacy from 2 per cent to 92 per cent for our girls and from 12 per cent to the same for our boys but we will not be paralysed by numbers but rejoice in the honour that is ours in our knowledge that it can and will be accomplished. Japan was faced with the same problem and solved it so successfully that the immense primary school buildings and play grounds of Japan catch the eye in every landscape and in them 98 per cent of Japanese children spend nine happy years. I might instance that one Japanese city has 50 kindergartens and 10 day nurseries and all this education has developed since 1870 when the Emperor Meiji issued an edict that there should not be a village without a school nor family with a single uneducated child. In California it was thrilling to find that the remarkable proportion of sixty per cent of the revenues of that State were given for education. Ancient India realised the basic need for education. The Manusmriti lays down this truth in these words: "The State in which the administrator allows the good and virtuous educationist—and therefore good and sound education, to starve—that whole State will begin to starve very soon similarly and fall in status and civilisation with all its people and their servants, the administrators." I have only to quote the following figures to you to show you how utterly wrong are the ratios of expenditure of India's revenues as contrasted with the wisdom of Manu—Of the total of the country's revenues, 27 per cent are spent on military purpose, 15 per cent for police, 5 per cent for education and per cent for health.

India is physically starving today because its mind has been starved for several centuries. Women are the nourishers of the race. Now they are awake to the necessity for feeding the mind as well as the body. Our new slogan will complete the circle of life for every individual:—"Well Born, Well educated, and Well Employed."

MASS EDUCATION.

The establishment of mass education adapted to the conditions of the individual, the locality and the community, and including elements for physical, mental, emotional, civic and spiritual development is a noble cause and a basic part of responsible national reconstruction. Disproportionate national expenditure which prevents the provision of education will have to be grappled with and removed. Women's desire for world peace and disarmament is linked up with the need of the race for the positive blessings that will accrue to it from the money set free in an era of non-militarism. We shall then have human welfare instead of inhuman welfare.

We, women will undertake from to-day an enthusiastic, eager, persistent campaign to get every child into a primary school, to have the school and play ground into which the little boy and girl can go and to give them the teachers who will give them the happiness. The report of the Hartog Committee on Education and the findings of the Commission on Physical Training will strengthen our hands. I congratulate Madras City on the remarkable increase in the numbers of young women who during the last few years have got the facilities for training as teachers through the self-sacrificing devotion of voluntary and official organisers of women's Training Homes. While this year we are concentrating our educational resolutions on primary education, we remember that our Foundation Memorandum on Educational Reform cover the whole field of education. When abroad I visited very many educational and social service institutions in Europe, America, Japan and China and proud to find that our resolutions are so fundamentally in line with the latest findings of the most up-to-date educationists. Our theories are sound for they are based on the bedrock of living necessity. Now our need is for workers in every sphere.

DUTY OF WOMAN.

There is a joy in educational and social service which has to be experienced—it cannot be imagined. Every woman who helps to bring about conditions of freedom for those confined wrongly in body, mind or soul will gain a new zest in life. These conferences point out ways of giving such help as raising the depressed, giving light and clear sight to those in purdah, knowledge to the widow, rescue—as has been so nobly achieved by Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi, M. L. C.—to those exploited for sex purposes, commercialised vice, health to the mother and political opportunities to women for national service in all ways.

Finally I would like to point out that though we call these women's conferences and at present we reserve them only for women members and visitors, we do not look on them as for the good of women only. This is only a transitional means of proceeding to that time when through the practice women get in these specialised meetings they will become efficient to mingle and co-operate with men without danger of either sex becoming submerged to when there will be true, free, helpful exchange of views and co-partnership in solving together the problem which for the moment we now discuss apart. The Trinity of Mother, Father and Child is the actual Unit of Indian Life. The child is only "well born" where there is equality of freedom, health development, respect in the duality of dissimilar complementaries, the father and mother. And this is equally true of those men and women who whether actually parents or not, perform by their natures the functions of mental and spiritual parentage through remoulding the world nearer to the heart's desires. There is no real division of the problems of the sexes. The status of men and women acts and reacts on both like the seeming divisions of our conference. They are one and we work as the Irish say "separately together" for the good of the whole.

Neither are these conferences working for the good of India only. Our expressed ideals convey needed supplements also to the ideals of other nations. Again in my travels I found that secular education produced a secular 'people and a materialistic civilisation. From the beginning we in India have recognised the spiritual nature of the individuals as the seed from which everything must evolve. We have laid down as one of the first necessities of education that moral training based on spiritual ideals must be included in all schools and colleges. This is in line with the Indian custom by which the first letter taught to an Indian child is the sacred symbol 'Om'. There are eternal verities common to all religious faiths, a realisation of the relationship of the known to the Unknown, of the creature to the Creator, without reverence for the infinite, that inclusive life which is Law and Love, called by Emerson the 'Over soul', the results of education will fail to develop the high character which must be our motive in all our work.

This spiritual consciousness and the fundamental importance of the family are essentially characteristic of Asian countries as contrasted with other continents and they are gifts which Asia can make to world culture. But they can become serviceable to humanity only when Asia herself becomes aware of their value to others and organises them for the enrichment of the human race. For this purpose I dream dreams that these All-India Women's Conferences may blossom into a future All-Asian Women's Conference.

THE SARDA ACT.

(By Mr. KOPARGAM RAMAMURTI.)

Years ago, the author of "Hindu Superiority" won by the very title of his book the gratitude of most Hindus who regarded themselves as orthodox and patriotic. Today the name of Rai Saheb Har Bilas Sarada, the author of the Child Marriage Bill which has become the law of the whole country as Act XIX of 1929, is a household word and is spoken with gratitude everywhere except by a handful of die-hards whose power for social tyranny is threatened with extinction. There is no doubt that the Sarda Act is the most momentous achievement of the Indian Legislature for nearly a century. It is calculated to obviate much avoidable suffering and set the people fairly on the path of greater health, happiness and efficiency.

The law which suppressed the "religious" practice of burning women alive on the funeral pyre of their dead husbands is quite a century old. The law which declared the legal right of widowed Hindu women to live an honourable married life again if they liked, in spite of any custom or supposed religious injunction to the contrary, was passed no less than eighty years ago. They were practically British-made. They were both measures undertaken by the State as the supreme protector of its people. Their object was the prevention of organised cruelty to unfortunate members of the weaker sex enforced in the name of religion by the learned and the pious, the Mahamahopadhyayas and Acharyas of India.

Mr. Sarda's Child Marriage Restraint Act and Dr. Gour's Age of Consent Amendment Act are designed to be the first and second line defences against the cruel kindness inflicted upon voiceless female children during their infancy in the holy name of matrimony and religious obligation, causing individual misery and racial decay. These two measures enjoy the superior merit of being Swadeshi. They owe their initiative and energy to the patriotism, humanity and self-respect of Indians themselves, including Indian women, which converted the Government benches from persistent hostility to active friendliness.

Incidentally, the Sarda Act helps to alleviate another cruelty. It is the cruelty to unfortunate Hindu fathers and mothers "blessed" with female progeny. Among Brahmans, and among certain non-Brahman castes as well who ape the Brahmans in their harmful ways, it has become an established canon of social duty that every female child shall be given away by her parents in indissoluble marriage before the earliest symptoms of dawning womanhood make their appearance, which may happen any time between nine and twelve years of age. If this is not done the whole family is doomed to excommunication and would be shunned by their fellows as shameless outcasts. Poverty of the parents is no excuse. Physical unfitness of the girl herself or her repugnance is no valid ground for exempting her from married life; some male person young or old, suitable or unsuitable, worthy or unworthy, willing or unwilling, but belonging to the limited fold of the girl's particular caste, and sub-caste, must be begged, coaxed and bribed heavily along with his parents and relations to "release" her from the "distress of maidenhood" by tying the marriage knot round her neck before the fatal climacteric of Rajawalskip is reached. The prospect of this terrible social duty hangs like a mill-stone round the neck of a girl's parents, whether rich or poor, from the date of her birth and robs life of its innocent joy. The sad case of Snehalata, the sensitive Bengali girl who burnt herself with kerosine oil rather than see her parents ruined for her marriage must still be fresh in the memory of all India. "Kusika", in one of his inimitable stories of South Indian family life, recounts how a poor distracted Brahman father, who found himself between the Scylla of financial ruin and the Charybdis of social ostracism under similar circumstances, burst into a fit of insane glee when his daughter was suddenly seized and carried off by the plague!

Every Hindu house-holder has felt the harrow at one time or other. But few have had the courage to defy the cruel cat of custom to its face, for it meant nothing less than social death to the rash innovator and his family although the number and importance of those who have deified it into a Religion is negligible. There is general rejoicing therefore and thankfulness at the news that that inexorable cat is doomed to death by an Act of the legislature which none of its worshippers can defy with impunity to sacrifice even their own children at its altar.

At the same time there is much trembling curiosity and doubt in the public mind. The date officially fixed for the happy event is yet far off. The Cat and its instruments, are left in full power to scratch and maul till then. Who knows that it would readily yield up its ghost exactly by the morning of All Fools day? Its nine lives are proverbial. Much caterwauling might perhaps frighten the Viceroy into rescinding the Act. What then will become of those who might hastily cross the Rubicon and expose their disloyalty to the Cat? "My safety first" has been our national motto for some centuries past. Tyranny, whether political or social, finds its strongest bulwark in the mutual distrust, mutual fear and mutual ill-will of its victims and in their individual self-seeking and cowardices. So there is a panicky rush of one and all to the marriage market just now to dispose of at once, long before the 1st of April has a chance of coming round, every girl who is likely to be ten or eleven years old within the next three years. Once we are rid of every such contraband and combustible article from keeping, we may leisurely watch with a light heart and from a safe distance the death-struggle between the Cat and the Act and then hasten to offer our allegiance to whichever combatant is found to triumph in the end! Bridegrooms may therefore fetch fabulous prices within the next four months. Even those who had at first made up their minds to lean on the strength of the Act are now stampeded to the side of prudence when they see that the few eligible lads whom they had hoped to secure for their girls in proper time are being eagerly besieged by rival bidders and are sure to be snapped up long before the midnight hour of 31st March 1930 is struck.

Social reformers, however, have no reason to be particularly depressed or agitated at this mad holocaust and hallaballoo. It matters little to the purpose of the legislation or the destiny of our race that one more generation of our little girls is decimated at the altar of too early marriage in double quick time before the Act could come to their rescue. They may rather rejoice that the glad tidings of the dawn of a new era is carried thus, albeit in a perturbing fashion, into every nook and corner, every village and hamlet of this vast continent much more effectively and quickly than through the usual official channels.

But one thing every well-wisher of the people must guard against. That is the misleading propaganda of a handful of busybodies who are out to incite the people against the Act by misrepresenting its purpose and scope and trying to make out that it is a tyrannical measure affecting their religious freedom and the sanctity of domestic life. The times however are propitious to this legislation. A new spirit is abroad among the woman-folk as well as the men. The temper of the sufferers is not the same now as it was even a decade ago. The accumulated hard experience of every parent and child-wife and child-mother which has sunk into their hearts is asserting itself and will surely rally them round the Act the moment it comes into force and make them cling to it as the super-guardian of their victimised children and their best friend against the tantrums of the social bully and mischievous exploiter of old-world prejudices who masquerades in the garb of religion. Let every intelligent and honest friend of his people make it his sacred duty to study the provisions of the Act and its implications carefully and carry its healing message to every home within his reach in a devoted spirit of service.

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

NOTES.

Jesus Christ In India:—Referring to an observation that the life and teachings of Jesus Christ appeal to educated Hindus, the Indian Witness asks in what manner do they appeal, and what the result has been. If the Witness were asked how Jesus appeals to Europeans and Americans and what the result is, the answer will perhaps be to point to the translations of the Bible into many of the world's languages, and the publication of books dealing with Christianity. At least that is what may be gathered from the question, "Are they (educated Hindus) making translations into their vernaculars and are they writing treatises setting forth their understanding of these teachings?" And anticipating a negative answer, the Witness explains that the Hindu would not care to say very much about the influence of Jesus Christ, as he would be accused of turning towards Christianity. "He would be charged with honouring Christ's teachings above those of Hindu teachers." We can assure our contemporary that it is very much mistaken. Educated Indians who come under the influence of Christ's teachings, have not been afraid or ashamed to acknowledge the fact. But their efforts are directed more to bring their own conduct in line with what they admire in Jesus's teachings than to carry on a propaganda to get others to do so. It is very, very hard to be a Christian after the manner of Christ as the Witness will admit. And the average Indian feels that unless he has in some degree approximated to the ideal, one cannot teach Christ or any other teacher for that matter, to others. Religion in India is a manner of life and not a matter for propagandism. Still, men like Ramakrishna Paramahansa, Swami Vivekananda, Mahatma Gandhi, and many others, have not shrunk from avowing their reverence for Jesus. "We long for the day," writes the Witness, "when the educated Hindu will take upon himself the task of interpreting the life and teachings of Christ to his Hindu brethren." Keshub Chander Sen did so, and his colleague P. C. Mozumdar wrote

"the Oriental Christ." We too would welcome an Indian interpretation of Christ not for Hindus only but, we rather think, that the influence of Christ will be merged in the general religious thought of India, as the seed is merged in the flower and fruit. As we have often remarked Christ's teachings to the Hindu seem to be the summing up in their practical application of the religio-philosophical speculations of the Vedanta. Their effect, therefore, is rather in the nature of illuminating than of controverting Hinduism.

The Viceroy In South India:—After the sudden ebullition over the Viceroy's statement on constitutional reform, there is a lull in the political atmospheric conditions. Lord Irwin himself is to all appearance entirely absorbed in his South Indian tour. At Sangli and Kolhapur there was some speech-making but total abstinence from postprandial oratory has been the order of the day in Mysore, Cochin and Travancore. The heart of Hindu India beats in these States which are among the most progressive in the country. Education is highly advanced, and the administration is carried on on the lines of British India, but with Indian personnel. There is a clearly marked division between the privy purse and the public treasury and the judicial administration is beyond suspicion of encroachment by palace influence. Whether from the point of natural scenery or historical interest, there is no part of India which is so richly endowed as the territory comprised in these States. The Jews in Cochin and the Syrian Christians in Travancore are ancient communities who settled in India almost at the commencement of the Christian era and have maintained their traditions and practices up to the present day. To one of Lord Irwin's fine feeling, the sights and scenes in these States must have been of absorbing interest. The clamour of the press and questions in parliament had no place amidst the sylvan splendours of Mysore and Travancore. At Cape Comorin where the Arabian Sea and the Bay of Bengal meet and mingle their waters, Lord and Lady Irwin are reported to have enjoyed a sea-bath. Orthodox Hindus will appreciate the compliment implied in this spontaneous concession to the age-long tradition of Kanyakumari as one of the great centres of pilgrimage.

Function Of The Capitalists:—Mr. G. D. Birla concluded a thoughtful address as president of the fourth Maharashtra Vyapari Parishad, or Maharashtra Industrial Conference, held at Sholapur last week, with an eloquent appeal for unity. "But," he went on to say, "let me make it clear that the unity which I propose for the businessmen should be unity for service and not for exploitation. The modern capitalist has been much abused of late. In fact, he is being looked upon at present as belonging to a separate class. But in the days of yore the situation was something quite different. If we analysed the functions of the Vaisya of the ancient times we find that he was assigned the duty of production and distribution not for personal gain but for common good. All the wealth that he amassed, he held as a Trustee for the nation. The state of the capitalists, if they are to fulfil their real function must exist not as exploiters, but as servants of society. No communism or Bolshevism can thrive if we knew and discharged our duty. If I may say so, it is we who provide a fertile soil for the development of communism and Bolshevism by relegating our duty to the background. If we knew our duty and followed it faithfully, I am sure that we could save society from many evils. I have mentioned that our true function is to produce and distribute. India has at present to depend entirely on foreign imports for a large portion of her requirements. You may walk through the streets or move about your house, at every step you come across things of foreign manufacture. India at present is suffering very acutely from unemployment. We could to a very great extent solve the question of unemployment if we took to new industries." These are wise and weighty words which, we trust, will be taken to heart by the Indian Commercial Community. Not only the ancient Hindu system, but a modern thinker like Ruskin, defined the duties of a merchant as those of service to society. Ruskin distinguished the "Liberal Professions" from trades having for their object the earning of a livelihood, on the ground that those who adopted the liberal professions must carry out their functions even at the risk of their lives when the occasion arose for such sacrifice. Commerce, Ruskin included among the liberal professions, because he held that just as it is the duty of a soldier to die in rather than retreat from the battle-field, so it is the duty of the merchant to look to the adequate and proper supply of social wants in times of distress even at a loss to himself, it may be of life. If the men of industry and commerce in this country, have this high conception of their vocation, they will not, as Mr. Birla said, rest content until India is able to supply herself with all her needs.

Women In Modern India :—A collection of fifteen papers written by Indian women who are more or less specialists in their own field of work has been published in the form of a book entitled "Women In Modern India," with a foreword by Mrs. Sarojini Naidu and prefatory notes by the compilers, Miss E. C. Gedge and Mrs. Choksi. The book is intended to dispel the ignorance prevalent in the West about Indian women and to furnish information of women's movements here by women themselves. The Editors themselves disarm criticism by declaring at the outset that the book does not claim to be an exhaustive account of the women's activities in India. The contributions to the book testify to the high literary ability of our educated women. But with the exception of a few papers which are to the point, the rest indulge in rambling excursions into the achievements of women in the past and have very little to say about their modern activities which the title of the book leads one to expect. It is plain, therefore, that the title of the book "Women In Modern India" is a misnomer. Nevertheless we welcome this little volume as the first effort of Indian women to interpret the new awakening among them, that is so much in evidence at the present day. The book is priced at Rs. 4 a copy and can be had of Messrs. Tarsaporewalla and Sons, Bombay. The little book should command a good sale, as the profits gained will be devoted to the new building of the University Settlement in Bombay, which provides hostel accommodation for students and professional women without distinction of caste or creed.

The Library Movement :—We have received from the Madras Library Association a book entitled "The Library Movement" priced Rs. 2. The volume is a collection of articles on the subject written in five languages—English, Tamil, Telugu, Canarese and Malayalam. The contributions which are from the pen of distinguished men emphasise the importance of libraries and the various aspects of the Library movement to national well-being. The movement is not confined strictly to libraries but as is pointed out in this volume comprises three lines of work—the first is the work with the masses; the second with those that can read and write but have had no real education; and the third with the educated. Hence such agencies as the cinema are also in the programme of the movement. One of the writers in this series makes an interesting suggestion. "Should college libraries," asks Mr. A. Aravamuda Aiyangar of Sri Minakshi College, Chidambaram, "be accessible to the public? This question is likely to arise only in mofussil stations where there are no public libraries and my answer is in the affirmative." We commend the book to our readers as a valuable contribution to the increasingly important subject of mass education.

A Correction :—We much regret that in our last issue, writing about the Lady contributors to the Special Number we said that Mrs. Hansa Mehta is a member of the Bombay Corporation whereas she is a co-opted member of the Schools Committee.

Bar. "Tilak's heart," suggests Mr. Kelkar, "was always big with an ambition to achieve something which others could not do and which was not done before his time. This inner urge, or perhaps divine afflatus, it was that impelled Tilak to handle the rod rather than adorn himself with the Gown". And the surprising thing about it is, that Tilak had no natural bent for teaching and was very perfunctory in his methods. "He did not" says Mr. Kelkar, "much care to examine the students' note-books or even to go through the papers with special solicitude. When teaching mathematics, he solved mathematical sums out of hand, which left the students' mind quite vacant." His dislike to the use of the blackboard has been noted above.

BOMBAY, DECEMBER 14, 1929.

LOKAMANYA TILAK.*

I

Mr. N. C. Kelkar has produced a very readable Life of Lokamanya Tilak. The first volume was written in Marathi and published six years ago. Mr. Kelkar could not undertake the English translation himself as he was busy with the second and third volumes. The work had, therefore, to be entrusted to his friend, Mr. D. V. Divekar, and he has carried out the difficult task with a considerable measure of success. The first volume which is the only one which has been so far translated, covers forty-three years of Tilak's life and ends with the last century. Tilak was released in September 1898 from jail after serving the larger part of the sentence passed on him by Mr. Justice Strachey in the first case in which he was prosecuted for sedition. His first book on Indian chronology, "Orion", had been published in 1893, and a large part of the material for his second great book "The Arctic Home of the Vedas" was collected during his period of incarceration. It was soon after his release, that Tilak who, in the words of Mr. Kelkar, occupied till then the position of only a provincial leader, came to hold the position of an All-India leader. It was thus during the period comprised in this volume that the Lokamanya prepared himself for the larger role which may be said to have been thrust upon him. For, Tilak's ambition from the first was to be the representative and mouth-piece of Maharashtra. The larger India outside his native province had only a vague interest for him. Even in Maharashtra, he was essentially the representative of Brahminical opinion. Mussolini to whom the Lokamanya bears more resemblance than to any other modern European leader, says in his autobiography: "I am desperately Italian. I believe in the function of Latinity." Tilak might have said of himself: "I am desperately Maharashtrian. I believe in the function of Brahmandom." He became an All-India leader as after the death of Sir Pheroze-shah Mehta and Gokhale he was the sole survivor of the older group which made politics its main concern. He was obviously ill at ease in the position and yielded it to Mahatma Gandhi at the first opportunity. His dominant interest was Maharashtra as the traditional guardian of Hindu society and religion.

CHITPAVAN BRAHMINS.

Mr. Kelkar's introductory chapters on the Chitpavan Brahmins furnishes a background which materially helps us to understand Tilak.

* Life And Times Of Lokamanya Tilak, Volume I, published by Mr S. Ganeshan, Madras, price Rs. 4-8-0.

Mr. Kelkar seems inclined to accept the theory that the Chitpavans were immigrants. "On coming into India," he writes, "the Konkanasthas, however, came to be included among the Panch-Dravid Brahmans." Tilak had drawn up during his life-time a genealogical tree at the top of which he placed an ancestor who had gone to the battle-field of Panipat and died on his way home from that disastrous scene. Mr. Kelkar is sure that Tilak had some purpose in preparing this table, but he does not know what it was. It is clear that the Lokamanya, cherishing as he did his Brahman caste, preferred to think of it not as an ecclesiastical sect but as a fighting and ruling race which had founded one Empire and might yet become the dominant factor in another which had been founded upon the ruins of that Empire. "These Chitpavans" writes Mr. Kelkar, "may rightly be compared to the Phoenix." He adds that "it seems as though the goddess of genius is indissolubly wedded to the Konkanasthas," with Ratnagiri, "as an emporium of intellect," for their principal centre. Tilak did not indulge in rhapsodies but it is clear that he felt about his caste much as his friend and biographer. This feeling in its wider scope embraced Hindu society and accounts for the strong and often bitter opposition to social reform and reformers which characterised Tilak's early public activities. The Lokamanya resented the conversion of two of his clan to Christianity and was implacable in his hatred of Pandita Ramabai for her perversion, as he thought, to that faith. Indeed, his antagonism to her seems to strike even Mr. Kelkar as somewhat unreasonable, as he feels constrained to suggest that "it may be, Tilak felt a kind of disgust for Pandita Ramabai at their very first meeting, which her subsequent career confirmed more and more." When the Lokamanya went to South India for the first time, he, we are told, "felt great satisfaction when he saw the undiminished faith of Madrasis in their religion and their extreme regard for the maintenance of the old religious observances, in spite of their contact with Englishmen of a longer duration than that of people on the western side." In Ceylon, he saw a very different state of things and expressed his disgust in strong terms. "To my mind," he wrote "the reusucitation of the instinct of love of country and their own manners must be the first task to which all their (Sinhalese) social reformers must address themselves."

PERSONAL AND FAMILY LIFE.

Tilak's orthodoxy, however, was largely a matter of externals. Sir William Hunter wrote of Dewan Seshadri Aiyar of Mysore that he carried Parabrahma in his heart and Herbert Spencer in his head. This was probably true also of the Lokamanya. His personal and family life, of which Mr. Kelkar gives a vivid pen-picture, was simple and differed little from that of his forefathers. "A dhoti of the rough common texture, a shirt of coarse cloth, a white upper garment and an ordinary scarf worth about a rupee or two, constituted his daily dress. He never handled a handkerchief, and carried with him a walking-stick costing more than a quarter of a rupee." His meals were equally simple. "He ate in silence whatever was served to him, without pausing to discuss the taste of one dish or another. By day he used to eat wheat and his supper contained the only one unvarying course of rice." The Lokamanya's only luxuries were betel-nut, tea and an occasional glass of aerated water with, in summer, pieces of ices in it. Mr. Kelkar describes his hero as reclining, except when in bed, in a favourite easy chair where "while his mouth was engaged in talking, his hands were occupied in breaking nuts into bits, of which he was extraordinarily fond." Two other peculiarities of the Lokamanya may be noted. He avoided handling chalk while teaching mathematics as Professor in the Fergusson College, and as editor of the Kesari and Mahratta he sedulously eschewed writing with his own hand. As Mr. Divakar puts it in flowery language: "Except when some peculiar occasion necessitated his own penning, he shunned the atramental touch of the holder as a religiously minded man would fear to handle an accursed or ghostly thing. Writing was to him that dry drudgery at the desk's dead wood." His wife conformed with rigidity to the Hindu ideal of a housewife. "She never crossed the threshold of her house," says Mr. Kelkar, "and in all her life, she never exchanged even a few formal words with persons outside the charmed circle of her family. Her house was all the world to her." As for religion, writes his biographer: "Tilak indeed was religiously-minded but he never made much ado about the observance of religious practices. He did perform certain periodical religious rites in honour of his ancestors; but, though had the ancestral images of gods in his household, he was never noticed to kill them in worshipful meditation in front of them." That last phrase is a characteristic effort at humour of Mr. Kelkar's, of which there are many scattered over these pages. But Tilak insisted on putting on the sacred cloth at the time of dinner and all his numerous and frequent guests, rich or poor, were also expected to conform to this practice.

ATTITUDE TOWARDS SOCIAL REFORM.

Writing of Tilak's antipathy towards Pandita Ramabai, his biographer observes: "There, indeed, is no greater lie than that he (Tilak) was opposed to female education. He had the highest regard for every educated lady who sought to lead society gradually towards reform; and whenever he came across a lady even with a faintly nationalistic outlook, he never failed to hold her up for public commendation." Though Mr. Tilak might not have been opposed to women's education, he did not, Mr. Kelkar would admit, give it, any more than other items of social reform, an important place among his activities. Mr. Tilak, Mr. Kelkar assures us, was not against social reform but he believed that it might wait but political emancipation could not brook any delay. His visit to Ceylon and Burma, confirmed the Lokamanya in his belief that social reform was not essential to political reform. The Burmese and the Ceylonese had no caste, no purdah, practised late marriages and widow remarriages, and had a system of divorce, but they were no more politically free than Indians. "Thus," he declared, "we arrive at the conclusion that there is no inherent connection or relation of cause and effect between social reform and earnestness about national regeneration. On the contrary, there is a possibility of opposition between them."

POLITICS AND NATIONAL REGENERATION.

Tilak's sole aim, then, was "national regeneration" by which he meant political freedom. His complaint against social reformers was that they wished to put social reform before political reform. The benefits likely to accrue from social reforms, in his opinion, were secondary. "Far different are the virtues necessary for the development of a nation. Love of one's country, forgetfulness of petty differences, inclination and habit to work unitedly for the country, energy for the acquisition of industrial knowledge of foreign lands, anxiety for the maintenance of national individuality—these may be cited as some of the virtues." The fallacy of Mr. Tilak's argument was obscured at the time but it is clear as day light today that the chief barrier to political freedom is the existence of caste and communal differences, the low literate and social position of women. The full energy of the nation can be made available to sustain political freedom, only if all units function freely and to the utmost of their capacity.

KEYNOTE OF HIS CAREER.

The working of the Lokamanya's mind often puzzles even the sympathetic biographer who lived in close intimacy with him. Mr. Kelkar is sure that Tilak never did anything without a definite object in view but he has often to confess that he is at a loss to know what it might have been. One of such is Tilak's studying law and becoming a school master. The legal profession in those days was not crowded and Tilak could easily have made a high position for himself in it had he chosen to practice at the

A THOUGHT FOR THE GITA DAY.

DUTY IS WORSHIP.

G. V. Ketkar B.A.L.L.B. Founder and Secretary, Gita Dharma Mandal Poona, and Assistant Editor Kesari writes:—The 12th of December is according to the Hindu calendar the 11th of the bright half of Margashirsha, the Gita Day or the Gita Jayanti Day, the day on which, scholars of Mahabharatha say, the war between Kouravas and Pandavas commenced. On this day Krishna propounded his philosophy to Arjuna on the battle-field of Kurukshetra. This day has been selected to commemorate the birth of the "Divine Song" and for the last six years observed as the Gita Day throughout India.

Out of the many priceless teachings of the Gita, the one about man's duty, stands foremost. Man's duty to human Society is regarded by the Gita as a part and an essential part of his spiritual preparation. The progress and maintenance of human society is compared to "the wheel of sacrifice." All men great and small have their place, their duty and responsibility as part of this wheel. He who does not help the turning of this wheel, who does not play his own part on the stage of human progress is regarded as a sinful man, a man utterly useless to the world. Man's perfection and salvation lies in doing the duty assigned to him. That duty not only benefits himself and the society but that itself is the best form of worship.

The 48th verse of the 18th chapter of the Gita says this in the clearest and the most comprehensive manner. It may be freely translated as follows:—

"That from which all beings emanate and by which all this is pervaded, by propitiating it by means of doing one's own duty, does a human being win perfection (salvation)."

This verse is incomparable in its breadth of conception. The word "God" does not appear in it. God is mentioned in the most indirect and rational way. "That which is the source of creation and which pervades that universe"—this is the common factor of the attributes of God in all religions. The desire to worship is also taken for granted as a part of human nature. This natural desire is directed towards the wholesome purpose of doing one's own duty.

This is laid down as a precept for all human beings alike, whatever may be their position in society. For, every one has the primary conception of God as the source of creation and as the all-pervading spirit. Everyone has to do his social duty whatever may be his status in life and everyone has the desire to worship. Those who do not possess their minimum are beyond the pale of any religion worth the name. But inside that limit the Gita has a message for everybody. By doing your duty you will benefit society, elevate yourself and please the Almighty. In this verse, the Gita does not give a particular name to God. Neither does it prescribe a particular form to the perfection or salvation which is promised as a fruit of duty. And the path is shown, not to a particular section of mankind but to humanity in general. No wonder, several Western writers call Gita, a book for mankind, a book for all time, a contribution from India to the future religion of the world.

XLIX. STRANGERS.

Anyone who has been a stranger in a great city must have a feeling of friendliness towards the stranger. To leave the intimacy of the boarding house; to leave trusted friends for the companionship of slight acquaintances; to desert the green fields for the dusty pavements; to leave the fresh air of the village for the reeking odours of crowded chawls; to exchange the quiet out-of-doors for noisy factories; is no trifling experience. It takes a stout heart to accomplish this transition and to face it smiling.

As I myself, a stranger in a strange land, go about through the chawls, my heart cannot but go out to the newly arrived villagers who are striving to make their adjustment. At times it is most depressing, and at other times the courage of these simple people is a fountain of inspiration. It is no small achievement to maintain a high standard of family life in the midst of overcrowded and unsanitary surroundings. And yet it is not only being done, it is being done triumphantly.

The stranger who comes to us from a different language area, or perhaps even from a different country is often subject to jibes and to suspicion, but unless this same man were not somewhat above the average he never would have left the known for the uncertainty of the unknown. Somewhere in his makeup, hidden beneath his different clothing, and still further concealed by his different tongue, there are perhaps rare qualities—qualities awaiting the sun of friendship ere they spring forth into full bloom. It is not essential to the welfare of the city that every inhabitant adopt the same style of clothing, eat the same food, or speak the same tongue. It is essential to the welfare of the city that there be common loyalty to certain ideals, and a strong bond of brotherhood uniting the diverse population groups. And this spirit of brotherhood cannot spread until men show themselves to be friendly. It is only as we rise above petty prejudice and factionalism that we can hope to see the city great.

To the man who really understands his world there is but one language. In every city there may be a diversity of people, but there is none among them that does not understand the language of friendliness. Go into any strange section of the city. Do not utter a word. Smile, and you will see your world transformed. Persians, Arabians, Afghans, Chinese, Punjabis, Madrasses, Marathis, Gujeratis—differing in many ways, but brothers. All know the language of the friendly heart.

The lovers of animals are really the members of a brotherhood, for they have a common bond that is understood only by the initiated. A man either loves animals or he does not, and if he does love them he is always an enthusiast. To him a horse is not just a horse, or a dog just a dog—each animal has an individuality of its own. The horse is a horse plus the qualities that the discerning eye sees there; and each separate dog means something more than dog in general. There is a flow of sympathy between man and beast, which from the man's standpoint at any rate, is an enriching experience. Time and time again under trying circumstances a man's love for an animal keeps alive within him his love for humanity. And time and time again the patience of our animal friends is a sharp rebuke to our own petulance and impatience.

Though many animal lovers are sportsmen, not all sportsmen can qualify as animal lovers. A steeple-chase over a hazardous course may be regarded as good sport, but it is difficult for one who really loves animals to obtain much satisfaction in watching thoroughbred horses stumble, fall and crash against barriers for the entertainment of a crowd. Hunting may at times be of benefit in ridding the country of dangerous animals or pests, but the kind of hunting that is so often arranged for the so-called entertainment of men of position, whereby the animals are practically delivered into the hands of the hunter, can scarcely be indulged in by real lovers of sport. There is a legitimate sporting field for both men and animals, but when sport turns itself into the hurtful exploitation of animals, the lover of animals must draw the line.

In India it should hardly be necessary to ask the owners of animals to be humane, but the broken and twisted tails of the oxen bear their own mute evidence to the brutality of many drivers. And though the midnight races of the city gharriwallas may be an outcropping of the same spirit that is found on the race course, there is a vast difference between the specially trained racer and the underfed and overworked horse of the gharriwalla. The entrance of the motor truck into the field of heavy hauling calls forth a natural defence reaction on the part of the cartmen, but it is no excuse for the overloading of carts and the consequent straining of the oxen that is so often witnessed upon our city streets. A two-bullock cart is not, and cannot by any stretch of the imagination become the equivalent of a high powered engine. The least that the general public can do is to keep a careful eye upon the treatment of dumb animals, and to report instances of cruelty to the proper authorities. And for those who own animals, personal example is its own best preachment of kindness.

SOCIAL SERVICE TRAINING CENTRE FOR WOMEN.

The Social Service Training Centre for women completed its third year of work in October 1929. During the year the Training Centre passed through a critical stage and hence the nature of the year's work has been largely experimental.

At the beginning of the year there were only two students taking a part-time course. Their individual needs were met by holding a study group twice a week. At the same time the reasons for the lack of students coming forward for training were investigated. One of the difficulties experienced in making students realise the usefulness of the training was that the S. T. C. was not definitely attached to any one centre of practical work. It seemed essential for the successful running of a Social Training Centre to have such a centre which would serve as a field for the students' practical work. This was felt to be an immediate need, and possibilities of attaching the Training Centre to any one of the centres of practical work already existing (Naigon Social Service Centre and the Seva Mandir Tardeo) were discussed. Dr. Manshardt of Neighbourhood House suggested Nagpada with its possibilities of work for women as a new and untried field. On this suggestion the possibilities of Nagpada were explored, and it was found to be suitable. As a result the Social Training Centre was moved from University Settlement to Nagpada in November for an experimental period of six months. About this time a student from outside Bombay came for training. It was felt necessary at this stage to take a house so that the worker and the students in training might live close to their centre of work. A house was found near Neighbourhood House and the S. T. C. moved into its new home early in January. By the end of the month two new students both resident, had joined. As soon as a group of four had been got together, the normal time table, with its programme of theoretical and practical work was followed and regular class instruction three days a week was resumed. The first term's work in the syllabus was completed. Along side of class instruction individual coaching was given to meet the needs of the individual students. Before starting any practical work, the students were taken to visit in the neighbourhood in order to get acquainted with the conditions of the life of the people living in the district. Out of this general as well as concentrated visiting in four chawls grew some of the practical work. Two girls' clubs with an average attendance of between 20 and 30 were started. A play centre was started for the children of the primary school in the Poor House, Byculla. Also once a week the students helped in arranging some programme of music or lantern slide show for the women who came to the clinic at the Neighbourhood house.

Besides the theoretical and practical work done during the term, the homes of women students likely to be interested in social study and work were regularly visited once a week. With the same end in view a week's course in Social Service consisting of evening lectures and visits to institutions was held at the Wilson College by kind permission of Principal McKenzie. The average daily attendance was between 15 and 20. In order to keep in touch with those interested in social study, a study circle was conducted once a week at the University Settlement by Miss Wright throughout the year. Encouraged by the success in practical work done during the term it was decided that the S. T. C. should continue at Nagpada until September.

At the beginning of the Monsoon term there were four Students, two had left at the end of the previous term and two others came for a term. The theoretical work of the term was planned primarily to supplement the work done by the Social Service League Training Class. In addition, special sets of lectures were given on the history of social work in India, nursery school work club and play centre work. Dr. Manshardt kindly gave us the use of two big rooms in the Neighbourhood House which helped a great deal in carrying on and developing new practical work. In addition to the Girls' clubs and Play Centre, two sewing classes for women were started. Three of the Students took the Social Service League classes and appeared for the examination. All three passed creditably, two taking the first two places on the list of successful candidates.

Besides helping to carry on practical work at Nagpada the students have helped at other centres such as Naigaon Social Service Centre and the Seva Mandir.

The work of the S. T. C. was made known among the students of schools and colleges through speaking to groups of students as well as to individuals.

Through the S. T. C. we have tried to direct those who are anxious to do practical work to institutions which need voluntary helpers. Two pieces of work in this way have been carried on for the past six months. A group consisting mainly of Parsi ladies has visited the surgical tuberculosis ward of the Cama Hospital where the patients are mainly Mohamedan and illiterate and are often in the hospital for months at a time. The visitors have not missed a week since they began in April and they are doing very good work in teaching reading and writing in the vernacular and in English to those who are illiterate, also knitting, crochet, sewing and fancy work. Another group of women were taken to an orphanage for Mohamedan girls with a view to starting a play centre there and now two Mohamedan ladies are running a Blue Bird flock under the direction of the Bombay Girl Guide trainer.

The S. T. C. also keeps in touch with old students in and outside Bombay and watches with interest their voluntary and professional work. Mrs. Bulsara is taking a painting and fancy work class for Parsi girls at Balaram Street. Along with Miss Doctor, another old student, she is also conducting a painting class at the Seva Sadan.

The nursery School for Parsi children at Tardeo, started by Miss Mahaluxmiwala is going well. It has an average attendance of between 30 and 35 children. Mrs. Mehta and Miss Jal, two old students are full time workers there.

Miss Patel and Miss Kapadia are running a club for Parsi girls at Balaram Street. Miss Patel is also helping at the Vigilance Association Shelter where Mrs. Joglekar, an old student is acting-superintendent. Miss Patel has continued to make visits of enquiry for the Parsi Charity Organisation Society. Miss Chinoy is helping with club-work at Nagpada.

We are glad to welcome back Miss Kara from England where she had been to study Settlement work. She has thrown herself with greater enthusiasm into the work at Tardeo which she started before going to the West.

We take this opportunity to thank all who have helped in the work of training the students. We thank them for coming to speak to the students about their work, for welcoming them to their institutions and for providing them with opportunities of getting experience. We would thank Dr. Manker, Miss Williams, Miss Wilkie-Brown, Miss Anandkar and all those who helped with the concert but especially Miss Chattopadhyaya and Miss Noel-Paton who provided us with a splendid entertainment which was very much appreciated by a large audience and raised nearly Rs. 110) which was shared with the Naigaon Social Service Centre.

Co-operation between men and women is most essential in solving social problems in any country but the need for women who will take their share of the task is all the more evident in India. In the West women who have come forward to take part in the work of social welfare have felt the need of training that will equip them. The need has been successfully met in the Western countries by special courses of training conducted by the universities and social settlements jointly. The Social Training Centre is trying to meet a similar need in India but it cannot meet the need effectively without the co-operation of all the existing institutions and agencies of social work that want trained and efficient women workers.

We want to appeal to all those interested in Women's work and women's movements to make full use of the facilities afforded by the Social Training Centre.

WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION CONVENTION.

MADRAS DIVISION.

(BY MISS RUTH E. ROBINSON, EDITOR, THE Treasure Chest.)

Unusual interest and enthusiasm characterized the Annual Convention of the Women's Christian Temperance Union of the Madras Division, held in Bangalore from December the 3rd to the 5th. The presence of Miss Campbell, the National President, and the thoughtful and forceful addresses of the speakers listed on the programme, did much to create a favourable atmosphere.

The most important action taken by the delegates was the dividing of the Madras Division into three sections, to be known henceforth as the Mysore, Andhra and Madras Divisions. This arrangement, although giving each Division a smaller number of members than before, gives, on the other hand, a greater compactness and a chance for more intensive work than has hitherto been possible.

Several new members were added at the reception held on the first afternoon, and thirty signatures to the pledge by children and young people were secured after the very effective lantern lecture on temperance one evening by Mr. G. Shankar, cinematographer at the Medical College, Bangalore.

America came in for a good deal of attention by the speakers, and the lessons of its successes and failures in prohibition work applied to India. Miss Ellis, the Y. W. C. A. Secretary of Ootacamund, gave a concise and vivid summary of the outstanding achievements of prohibition to date the world over, beginning with a description of what had been accomplished in America and ending with an account of the movement towards prohibition in the Madras Presidency, with special reference to the work in the Nilgiris. Mr. Isaac, General Secretary of the Y. M. C. A. in Bangalore, and Miss Campbell both pictured the difference they had seen in America in the pre-war years and within the past few years. Mr. Isaac, referring to his visit to Mr. "Pussyfoot" Johnson in the latter's American home, said, "When I congratulated him on the success of his efforts to bring about prohibition in the United States, he answered, "My effort was not what accounted most. You must have heard about the band of devoted women who for years had been agitating this question and educating public opinion so that we men found the ground all prepared for us." Mr. Isaac called upon the women of India to do their part in arousing their country to the need of legislation in this field. He said that the Mysore Government had given a considerable sum of money to the Bangalore Temperance Federation for Temperance propaganda, and were prepared to give a great deal more. But he appealed for voluntary workers from among both young men and young women who would devote their lives to this cause.

Mrs. Marler, of the London Mission, Bangalore, mentioned having seen some violations of the prohibition law during her recent visit to the United States, and said that, while she did not wish to minimize in the least the splendid work of reform that had been accomplished, she could not help feeling that the abolishing of the saloon had brought about victory only on the physical plane, while the higher, spiritual victory had yet to be won. "When men's hearts are so changed that they have no desire to drink," she said, "a prohibition law will not be necessary." She felt that India must not be content with the mere passing of the law forbidding drink, but must also work for a change in the hearts of individuals throughout the nation.

In addition to the ordinary officials, chairmen were appointed for the following departments: Evangelistic, hospital visiting, soldiers' work, literature distribution, translation, medal contest, moral education, young people, Loyal Temperance Legion, social purity, child welfare, anti-narcotics, press, membership, citizenship, scattered members, mother's meetings, magazine agents.

Among the resolutions passed was the following:

Resolved, that this Convention of the Women's Christian Temperance Union put on record its deep satisfaction in the recent action of the Government of the Mysore State in appointing a Commission to explore the possible sources of revenue from the State that may be substituted for the liquor excise and to assure H. H. the Maharajah that his enlightened and farsighted policy is appreciated by the well-wishers of the Mysore State of all nationalities and creeds. Holding as it does a place of leadership in reform movements in India, the Mysore State, by its courageous example in this instance, is bound to influence opinion in all parts of the land.

BEGUM HABIBULLAH SUPPORTS SARDA ACT.

Begum Habibullah delivered the following speech in support of the Sarda Act at the Oudh Women's Social and Educational Conference held at Kaiser Bagh Baradari, Lucknow:—

President and Ladies,—One finds the columns of newspapers full of controversial opinions over the Sarda Act against all expectations as no discordant note could be anticipated against such a useful and wholesome legislation of which the object is to eradicate one of the greatest social evils in existence in India—an evil which has not only undermined the health of the Indians as a whole but which threatens to destroy their future physical and intellectual growth as well.

It was inconceivable that the Muslims will take any objection to such a legislation because Islam leads and is far ahead of all creeds in the recognition and safeguard of the rights of women and the Islamic law has already provisions which if properly followed would have kept the evil down to prevent which the present Sarda Act has been passed.

MARRIAGE IN ISLAM

Marriage under the Islamic law is a contract between a man and woman with the free will and accord of the parties concerned and is attested by the testimony of independent witnesses. It is therefore evident that the contracting parties should be adults and should have attained the age of discretion. Such being the case the fixation of age by means of law under which the contract should not be made is by no means against the Islamic law but it rather facilitates the compliance to its provisions. Besides it should be remembered that in Islam marriage is not complete so long as it is not consummated and that is only possible when the parties to the marriage are adults. Moreover the Musalmans ordinarily do not marry minor girls. That section of Muslims who is against the Sarda Act argue that the legislation takes away the power of guardians and parents of marrying minors. I may remind you here that the opposition comes merely from men who find that their authority and arbitrary use of power is being affected by the legislation. May I ask them whether they exercise their power of marrying minors under the conditions laid down in the Islamic law? The Shariat clearly lays down that a girl if married when a minor will have a full and unchecked right and liberty to affirm or repudiate the contract of marriage made on her behalf during her minority.

AN IRONY OF FATE.

Ladies, may I know a single instance in which a girl is ever asked to affirm or repudiate the marriage on attaining puberty. It is evident that the power to marry minors is very restricted and is subject to very strict conditions. To maintain this power which men exercise so arbitrarily they say that they hold this power very dear as it is a gift to them by their religion. But it is an irony of fate that these men have resolved to violate and misuse all sacred laws affecting the right and title of women. Is it not against the clear Islamic laws that they marry these minors without giving them a chance to affirm or repudiate the contract made during their minority on their behalf? Is it not a still greater sin and a clear disregard of the Islamic law not even to take the consent of the adult girls before the settlement of their marriage? This behaviour on the part of men does not only show their undue interference with the rights of women but it is a violation of an essential provision of the Islamic law of marriage as a girl when she comes of age is the chief consenting party to the contract.

The reality is that all Islamic laws relating to women have been trampled under feet by the all powerful man who has introduced such social customs as have nullified the sacred laws of Islam and for this objectionable misuse of power the laws of Islam if promulgated in their true sense would not have necessitated any civil legislation to eradicate these social evils.

Ladies, when our sacred laws have been violated there is no other way to prevent the mischief which threatens to endanger our future physical and intellectual development and growth than by means of civil legislation. It is such a serious mischief that it would be a sin to leave it alone without adopting legislative measures against it.

NOT AGAINST SPIRIT OF ISLAMIC LAW.

Another plea taken by those opposed to this wholesome Act is that the law is an encroachment upon the religious liberty of Musalmans hence opposed to the Proclamation of the late Queen Victoria and ultra vires. It is true that the Proclamation does not permit any legislation against the religious laws of any community but how can this legislation against the marriage of minors be considered as against Islamic law. Similar laws were passed in Turkey during the rule of the Khalifa and again one finds the same kind of legislation passed in Egypt in recent years. There is not the least doubt that the Sarda Act provides against the misuse of power in violation of the Islamic law as regards the marriage of minor girls and that it is in no way against the spirit of the laws of Islam. May I in this connection know if the Indian Penal Code is in conformity with the laws of the Shariat? May I further know whether the civil laws of succession which are applicable to Mahomedans as well and which deprive the women of the right of succession are in accordance with the Shariat?

It is a significant fact that the hue and cry against the Sarda Act is all from men and that class of men who cannot tolerate the least diminution of their arbitrary and unrestricted powers over women. Ladies, ours should have been and should always be the first voice in matters where the interest of womanhood are involved. It is we and we alone who can and do realise the detrimental effect of the mischief of early marriage of girls and we should thoroughly endorse the provisions of the Sarda Act relating to the prevention of early marriages and the wholesome provision of the fixation of the age limit. I appeal to you to lend your support to this resolution in all sincerity and earnestness.—The Leader.

UNTOUCHABILITY BILLS.

MR. JAYAKAR'S BILL.

The following is the text of the Bill to remove the disabilities affecting the untouchable castes of the Hindu community, which Mr. M. R. Jayakar proposes to move at the next session of the Legislative Assembly :—

"BILL TO REMOVE DISABILITIES AFFECTING THE UNTOUCHABLE CASTES OF THE HINDU COMMUNITY."

"Whereas by usage and custom prevalent in the Hindu community certain castes of Hindus are regarded as untouchable and unfit for association; and

Whereas this imputed impurity imposes serious disabilities on such castes, injures their self-respect and well-being and deprives them of the benefit of institutions, foundations, conveniences and services dedicated to or maintained for public use; and

Whereas many Hindus believe that such imputed impurity is not in accordance with the true interpretation of the precepts of Hinduism and desire that the said disabilities should be removed; and

Where it is just and proper to relieve all such castes from the said disabilities, in order that such relief may tend to the promotion of the public welfare and the solidarity of the Hindu Community, it is enacted as follows:—

1. This Act may be called the Hindu Untouchable Castes (Removal of Disabilities) Act of 193—

2. It extends to the whole of British India.

3. It shall come into force on the 1st day of—193—

4. No person belonging to the Hindu Community shall be deemed to be incapable, by reason of his caste, of sharing the benefit of a religious or charitable trust created for the general benefit of persons professing the Hindu religion, or of sharing the benefit of a convenience, utility or service, dedicated to or maintained or licensed for the use of the general public, any custom or interpretation of the law to the contrary notwithstanding."

STATEMENT OF OBJECTS AND REASONS.

The following is the statement of objects and reasons:—

"This Bill is intended to remove the disabilities, too various to be detailed here, from which castes known as "untouchable" in Hindu Society suffer. These disabilities mostly arise from custom. The Preamble of the Bill states the grounds which have made its provisions necessary. To these grounds may be added the insignificant circumstances that British Indian adjudication, respectful as it often is of Hindu usages, has tended to confirm the customs, which have had the effect of excluding the untouchable classes from participation in the benefits of endowments in which it is but just that they, as members of the Hindu community, should participate. One ruling of the Privy Council, Sankarlinga Nadan and others (appellants) and Raja Rajeswari Dorai and others (Respondents) reported in 35, Indian Appeals, page 176, has gone the length of laying down, with all the authority of that august tribunal, and the eminent judges who formed the bench on that occasion, a rule which in effect provides that the duty of the Trustees of Hindu religious endowment is to follow the ancient custom; it is not for them to vary it, however unreasonable or antiquated it may be. If they endeavour to alter it, they may be guilty of a breach of trust.

RESULT OF RULINGS.

The result of these rulings, consequently, is that it is difficult to obtain, through the medium of adjudication, a variation of the customs which prejudicially affect the untouchable classes, injure their self-respect, and deprive them of the benefits of association with other sections of the Hindu community. This has resulted in a disruption of the Hindu society, the extent of which tends to increase causing irritation and embitterment. It is therefore thought desirable to have recourse to legislation, and with its aid, to abolish all such objectionable customs, to the extent mentioned in the Bill. The Bill effects only those cases in which the bar against the untouchable classes arises by reason of custom, and the endowment is a public one. The Bill will not affect private endowments nor those where, by the express terms of their constitution, the benefits are confined to particular sections of the Hindu community or of the general public.

The Bill also provides for removal of disabilities from which the untouchable classes suffer in the use of conveniences like public wells or services like tramcars, buses, etc., which are maintained or licensed for the use of the public."

DR. AMBEDKAR'S MEASURE.

The following Bill has been drafted by Dr. B. R. Ambedkar, Bar-at-Law, for the removal of untouchability by law. It will be moved most probably in the next session of the Legislative Assembly by Mr. Jayakar or by Dr. Ambedkar in the next session of the Bombay Legislative Council with appropriate changes with respect to the definition of the locality of its application:—

Whereas it is known that by usage and custom prevalent in the Hindu Community that certain Castes of Hindus are held to be by reason of such usage and customs, untouchable and unfit for association; and

Whereas this imputed impurity imposes serious disabilities on these castes of Hindus and deprives them of their right to the benefit of institutions, services and foundations dedicated to or maintained for public use; and

Whereas many Hindus believe that this imputed impurity, although it is in accordance with established custom is not in accordance with a true interpretation of the precepts of their religion and desire that the disabilities of these castes should be removed; and

Whereas it is just to relieve all such Hindus from such incapacity of which they complain; and

Whereas the removal of this invidious discrimination among persons of the same faith will tend to the promotion of good morals and to the public welfare in general and of the Hindus in particular; it is enacted as follows:—

This Act may be called the Hindu Untouchable Castes (Removal of Disabilities) Act 193—

It extends to the whole of British India, including British Baluchistan and Santhal Parganas.

No person shall be deemed to be unfit or incapable by reason of his caste of sharing the benefit of a religious or charitable trust created for persons of his or her faith or of sharing the benefit of a utility or convenience dedicated to or maintained or licensed for the use of the general public, any custom and any interpretation of law to the contrary notwithstanding.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Open Door International:—The Hon. Secretary, Open Door International writes:—The new international organisation which was founded in Berlin in June of this year, to work for the Economic Emancipation of the Woman Worker with the title of The Open Door International, has now been added to the long list of societies having direct representation in Geneva. The Open Door International is particularly interested in the decisions of the International Labour Conference and the activities of the International Labour Office, as it exists for the purpose of combating special restrictions placed on women based on sex alone, many of which have been spread to all countries through the influence of the International Labour Organisation. An Office will be opened on Monday, November 4th, 1929, at 67 Avenue Wendt, Servette, Geneva, and Edith Rodgers, the representative in Geneva of the Open Door International will welcome enquires and visitors between the hours of 10 a. m. and noon on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays, except during the sitting of the International Labour and other important Conferences, when an appointment should be made.

Government Servants And Social Conference.—A deputation on behalf of the Working Committee of the Indian National Social Conference waited upon Mr. O. M. G. Ogilvie, Home Secretary to the Government of Punjab on 4th December with a view to making clear the position of government servants who desired to participate in the Social Conference. The deputation which consisted of Mr. K. L. Rallia Ram, Begum Shah Nawaz, Mrs. Bashir Ahmed, B. B. Sewak Ram, Mr. B. L. Rallia Ram, and Mr. Haradatta, explained that the object of the Conference was to focus public opinion on important social problems such as the age of marriage, the marriage of widows, the removal of untouchability, the caste system, the evil of drunkenness, etc. The deputation further drew the attention of the Home Secretary to the fact that it had never been the intention of the Government to put any restriction upon Government officials who wished to attend a non-political conference such as the Indian National Social Conference or to take part in the Conference. The deputation, therefore, requested the Home Secretary to make it clear that the orders referred to above did not restrict the freedom of Government employees in the case of the forthcoming session of the Social Conference. In reply, the Home Secretary stated that the provision of section 23 of the Government Servants Conduct Rules did not apply to participation in meetings or conferences which were not political in character and that it had never been the intention of the Government to exclude its servants from participation in such meetings or conferences if they desired to attend them.

NOTES.

The National Social Conference:—
"While the political movement has changed almost beyond recognition during the last quarter of a century," says the Tribune of Lahore "the Social Conference practically stands where Ranade left it." The analogy does not hold. The political movement is a movement to obtain reforms in a system which has existed for hardly two hundred years and which is controlled by a democratic nation. As Telang perceived long ago, it is the line of least resistance to Indians who have acquired a taste for progress. Indeed, the Indian political reformer's most powerful argument is that the political constitution of the country is a violation of British principles and of the pledges based on those principles. When we turn to social reform, we are confronted by a very different state of things. To begin with, we have here to do with a system some thousands of years old and deeply rooted in the religious and social instincts of the people. This system is controlled not by an authority outside it, but by the reformer's own flesh and blood. The rapid development of the political movement is due to several causes, not the least of which was the Great War. The Declaration of 1917 and even the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms date before the adoption of non-co-operation by the National Congress. The fundamental difference between political and social reform can be best illustrated by a recent incident. A leading social worker closely in touch with Sabarmati, who is working for the removal of untouchability, recently met us and was much concerned at the threat of satyagraha of some antyaaja leaders in order to force Hindu temples to be thrown open to them. He said that it had actually led to some twenty temple managers going back on their promise to admit antyaajas to their temples. He had a list of these. At the close of the conversation, this writer gently hinted that, while he agreed with the social worker that satyagraha in such a matter would be prejudicial to the cause, he went further and held that it was prejudicial to any cause, including politics. The worker smilingly replied, "I must admit that logically you have the advantage of me."

A Constitution For The Conference:—The Tribune refers to the absence of a permanent constitution for the National Social Conference. Here, again the analogy of the National Congress is of very doubtful applicability. Even in the case of the Congress, its constitution has been preserved from collapse only by the eleventh-hour interventions of Mahatma Gandhi. What is happening in Bengal where, if anywhere, it might have been expected to function with the most harmony, is worthy of attention. Things are not much better in Bombay. The only two Congress provinces where there has been least friction is Gujarat, Mahatma Gandhi's home province, and the United Provinces where the Nehru influence happens to be dominant. Incidentally, the experience of Bengal ought to serve as a warning to those who want the Provinces to have residual powers and to be practically independent of the Central Government. The manner in which Pandit Motilal's deputy, Dr. Pattabhi Sitaramayya, was treated by the Bengal belligerents between whom he had been commissioned to make peace, is a foretaste of what may be expected to happen when the Provinces are made autonomous and independent of the Central authority. A strong central authority is the very essence of a stable political constitution, whereas the very reverse is the case with social reform. It is this fundamental difference in the nature of political and social reform that led to the two being kept apart in the organisation of the Congress. We have now separate women's organizations, including social conferences, caste and communal congresses and conferences, the depressed classes movement and so on. The function of the Social Conference is to gather together all these several activities and not to impose a hard and fast constitution of its own on them. The Social Conference can best fulfil its object by studying the developments, old and new, and trying to co-ordinate them on broad, general lines, so that they may not conflict with one another.

India In Parliament:—The House of Commons passed without dissent on Wednesday the following resolution which was moved by Mr. Fenner Brockway who is well-known in this country for his sincere sympathy with Indian political aspirations: "This House welcomes the evidence of co-operation of Indian representatives on the question of constitutional reform in India and relies on the Government of India to encourage goodwill by the sympathetic conduct of its administrative and executive functions, particularly in relation to expressions of political opinion." The remarkable thing about the debate on the resolution is that it was backed up by the Conservative spokesman, Sir Samuel Hoare—he is perhaps designated for the India Office in the next Conservative Cabinet—who did his best to efface the impression created by the speeches and writings of prominent Conservative ex-Ministers like Lord Birkenhead and Mr. Winston Churchill. On the question of amnesty for political offences, Sir Samuel wanted it to be left to the Viceroy. "After all," he said, "the Viceroy was not a hard faced and narrow-minded man. He was a man in whose judgment, sympathy and wisdom, they all had the greatest confidence." There can be no objection to this being done. The debate and the resolution give Lord Irwin a free hand in the conversations which he is believed to have in contemplation with Mahatma Gandhi, Pandit Motilal Nehru and other Indian leaders. While the whole country will support the Congress leaders in seeking a settlement, their failure to achieve it, should not be taken to commit all parties.

Lord Irwin :—The Position which Lord Irwin holds today in the estimation of the Indian people is most remarkable. "You know," said one of the most prominent Indians who has special opportunities of coming into touch with the Viceroy, "that I do not believe in Englishmen, but I do believe in this man. I have differed from him frequently, but I feel that he is one, whether you agree with him or not, you cannot but trust and honour." This represents the almost universal opinion among Indians. This is due, to not a small extent, to his statement about the reforms, but it also rests on an instinctive appreciation of the genuineness of Lord Irwin's desire to see the irksome political relations between Great Britain and India replaced by the bonds of mutual respect and goodwill. The two countries can be of immense help to each other. In fact, they are indispensable to each other. The relation in which the other Dominions stand to Great Britain are no concern of ours. It is their concern and that of Britain. So far as India is concerned, it must be free to deal with the Dominions on the principle of reciprocity, as agreed to at the Imperial Conference. Mr. Lloyd George's attempt to bring the Dominions into the discussion on Indian constitutional reform was rightly stigmatised as mischievous by Mr. Wedgwood Benn, the Secretary of State for India, in the House of Commons. The basis of the future relations between Great Britain and India should be interdependence which is as honourable as independence. Lord Irwin's reply to the deputation of the depressed classes in Madras, which we reprint, shows how clearly and completely he has grasped the essentials of Indian policy.

International Fellowship :—The International Fellowship movement aims at promoting goodwill and harmony amongst people divided by racial, communal, religious and other differences. The belief that God affords the highest incentive to human brotherhood, is fundamental to the movement which is yet in its infancy in this country. But it is a vigorous infancy and the energetic General Secretary, Mr. A. A. Paul, may be expected to see it safely on to its adolescence. Professor P. A. Wadia is the President of the Indian Fellowship for the year and among members, are Mahatma Gandhi, Mr. C. F. Andrews, Sheth Jamnalal Bajaj, Dr. M. A. Ansari and others. The office of the Fellowship is Maitri, Miller Road, Kilpauk, Madras. The movement has to encounter some obstacles, the chief of which are the jealousy with which the narrow type of nationalism views everything which aims at international co-operation and the distrust with which professions of international sympathy have come to be regarded by many people. This jealousy and distrust are themselves the outcome of a conscious sense of inferiority which leads to the belief that nations can have no real interest in one another except as objects of exploitation. It is unfortunately true that the majority of men have not cultivated an international outlook, but the aim of this movement is precisely to induce them to do so. We in India have especially to be on our guard against allowing the thought of political subjection to blunt our appreciation of the value of efforts to promote international fellowship.

Prohibition Propaganda In Kolhapur :—In an editorial note in the Indian Social Reformer of the 23rd November, comment was made on a statement by the well-known Temperance Worker, Miss Mary Campbell, about her experience in the Kolhapur State. With reference to that, a correspondent writes: "Miss Campbell, who is attending the annual convention of the Women's Christian Union of the Madras Division now being held in Bangalore, was asked by a delegate to state the facts in this case. Miss Campbell replied that in 1920 or 1921 when, at the request of Dr. Wanless and other missionaries, she visited the Kolhapur State for the purpose of holding meetings, she was served with Government injunction No. 144, forbidding her to speak on temperance. This injunction was served by the then ruling Maharaja, the father of the present ruler. In one of the towns of the Kolhapur State, in which Miss Campbell delivered nine lectures, five village policemen armed with ancient weapons occupied the front row. No further trouble ensued, but Miss Campbell still treasures the injunction bearing the Maharaja's seal. The present Maharaja, it was stated, is a teetotaler and in sympathy with temperance work." Miss Mary Campbell in a personal letter bears testimony to the excellent work that is being done in Mysore State.

An Anniversary Number :—The Fifth Anniversary Number of the Calcutta Municipal Gazette from which we reproduced in a recent issue an article by Mrs. Avantikabai Gokhale on Women and Civic rights, contains articles on various subjects and will be read with great interest. Though most of the articles deal with the problems with which Calcutta is confronted they have more than a local interest as the problems of every city are approximately the same. Mahatma Gandhi contributes an article which is given the place of honour in this number and in which he points out how municipalities can help in the matter of untouchability. Among the other contributors are Dr. Rabindranath Tagore, Sir Jagadis Bose, Mr. Bepin Chandra Pal, Mr. Kalinath Ray and Mrs. Sarala Devi Chaudhurani. The get-up of the annual is creditable to the publishers.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.
BOMBAY, DECEMBER 21, 1929.

LOKAMANYA TILAK.

II.

Lokamanya Tilak was born in 1854. He took his B.A. degree from the Deccan College in 1876 and in 1879 he took the L.L.B. of the Bombay University. He seems to have wavered for a while between the career of a lawyer and that of a teacher in a school of his own, and finally he decided on the latter course. The school was started in 1880, its moving spirits being Tilak and Agarkar. A year after, they started the Kesari and the Mahratta newspapers, through which to educate the public of Maharashtra. The very next year, the two school-master editors, became involved in a libel case in connection with an article in their newspapers and were sentenced to four months simple imprisonment. In 1884, the Deccan Education Society was started and next year the Fergusson College was opened, Tilak and Agarkar being the prime movers. Tilak retired from the College and the Society in 1891. Mr. Kelkar prints as an appendix Tilak's letter of resignation which is a lengthy document. In that letter, the immediate cause is made out to be whether life members of the Society should give their whole time to the college or not.

"INDIAN JESUITS."

The Deccan Education Society, it seems, was originally intended to be conducted on the lines of the Society of Jesus. "We are proud to call ourselves," says Tilak, "Indian Jesuits." Tilak objected to some of the members undertaking extraneous work as being against what Mr. Kelkar calls "jesuitical principles." Tilak himself was conducting a newspaper and Agarkar another, and if they were not guilty of violating "jesuitical principles" it is not clear why the publication of a dictionary or a book on Arithmetic by other members should be regarded as violations of them. Jesuits are popularly, but erroneously as they themselves maintain, supposed to hold that the end justifies the means. Tilak's admiration for jesuitical principles was not perhaps limited to the vow of poverty. There is considerable casuistry in the attempt in this letter to show that the extraneous work which Tilak himself was doing belonged to an unexceptionable category. Tilak never believed in placing all his cards on the table. He had no great regard for those who would apply to politics the principles of the Sermon on the Mount. There are several instances in this book admirably described by Mr. Kelkar of how Tilak outwitted his opponents. One such which Mr. Kelkar narrates with boyish gusto relates to the welcome offered to Surendranath Banerjee at Dhond railway station on his way to Poona to preside over the National Congress. While the conscientious Gokhale as representing the majority (Liberal) party, was patiently waiting on the platform for the distinguished leader to peep out of his carriage—the train reached Dhond early morning—Tilak or his emissary quickly slipped into the compartment and garlanded the President-elect while he was yet only half-awake!

TILAK AND RANADE.

Social reform was the great bone of contention among the Poona intellectuals in the last decade of the last century. Not that Tilak was indifferent to the need of social reform. "He set an example to the hypocritical reformers in respect of late marriages of daughters" writes Mr. Kelkar, "by marrying his after they completed the fifteenth year." There were in those days, and perhaps will be always, two kinds of "hypocrites" among reformers: those preaching reforms but following the practices which they condemned in public, and those practising social reform while posing as champions of orthodoxy in public. Both lack the inner harmony which springs out of correspondence between conviction and conduct. To our mind, the second type is perhaps morally the more objectionable of the two. The man who proclaims the truth which he intellectually apprehends, but finds circumstances too strong for him to follow in practice, provided he does not seek to justify the discrepancy, is entitled to sympathy. He does not sin against light, he does not seek to stifle his conscience into conformity with his conduct. The second type sees that a practice is wrong, feels it his duty to depart from it in his own life; nevertheless, he pretends in public that it is right and seeks to discredit those who are striving to create a public opinion against it, as enemies of society. With all his admiration for Tilak and his anxiety to put the best construction on Mr. Tilak's actions, Mr. Kelkar is obliged reluctantly to admit that, while the reformers never indulged in immoderate abuse of Tilak, Tilak was not equally restrained in his denunciations of them. "Neither Ranade nor Gokhale," writes Mr. Kelkar, "is reported to have given expression to any such vehemently harsh words about Tilak. If on the side of Ranade there is to be debited a kind of sloppy softness for the Government, we cannot but record in Tilak's account-books a most unrestrained licence of personal diatribe against Ranade and his group." Mr. Kelkar asks the reader to peruse the obituary notices which Tilak wrote of Agarkar, Ranade, and Gokhale, as proof of the absence of any animus against them,

The first article on "Lokamanya Tilak" appeared in the last issue.

We quite believe it. Tilak was seeking to force his way to the front and these people happened to obstruct his path or, which comes to the same thing, he happened to think they did so. He did his worst to pull them down, and by way of atonement, praised them when they were dead and safely out of his way. It is easy to show from Mr. Kelkar's book that Tilak's opposition to social reformers was not an opposition of conviction but an opposition of personal necessity.

PERSONS AND PRINCIPLE.

A certain confusion of personalities and principles is involved in this mode of rising to eminence which, however, has been often adopted by politicians in all countries and at all times. Disraeli's attitude to Peel, is the classic example in English politics. Peel was the incarnation of patient dignity and never replied to Disraeli's attacks which made the latter only more furious. On one occasion, however, when Disraeli exceeded even his spacious limits, Peel was moved to anger and in his reply asked why, if Disraeli thought him to be an unscrupulous Minister, he had sought to associate himself with Peel in his political career. Disraeli rose and vehemently repudiated the statement as a total falsehood. Peel said nothing at the time, but his biographer records that one night several days later Peel called his Private Secretary and, under the seal of strict confidence, showed him a letter which Disraeli had written to him asking for recognition of his position in the Tory Party in the formation of Peel's first Ministry. "A public man should never destroy his letters" was the only remark Peel made about it. The letter was locked up again and did not see the light till fifty years later it was reproduced in Peel's "Life." If Ranade belonged to the Peel school, Tilak was of the Disraeli type in Maharastriyan politics.

A BIOGRAPHER'S PROBLEM.

In writing a "Life" the most difficult point to decide is how far a biographer should allow his personal friendship to override his judgment of the behaviour of his subject in the important events of his career. Lord Ronaldsday, to take a recent instance, has been criticised for his severe detachment in his estimate of the career of his friend, the late Lord Curzon. In India, as a rule, a biographer is expected to be a panegyrist pure and simple. "Paint me as I am," Oliver Cromwell told the artist who was making a portrait of him for posterity. But few Indians feel like that yet. Mr. Kelkar has, on the whole, given an adequate and faithful picture of the Lokamanya, but he cannot be entirely acquitted of the charge of tilting the scales against Tilak's opponents for the purpose, as it seems to us, of exalting the Lokamanya. From the miscellaneous rabble—"a host of persons, both worthy and worthless, well-known, unknown or even ill-known," he avers,—who gathered round Tilak in vast numbers—Mr. Kelkar has always stood apart as a man of culture and independence. Gokhale often spoke of him in kindly appreciation. Mr. Kelkar's influence, we are sure, was a good deal responsible for the good understanding which has latterly grown up between the two schools of Maharashtra reformers.

THE SOCIAL CONFERENCE CONTROVERSY.

Mr. Kelkar's account of the incidents connected with the quarrel over the use of the Congress pandal for the Social Conference in 1895, is clearly biased by his sense of loyalty to the Lokamanya. The Reformer was in close touch with the happenings in Poona at the time, and Mr. Kelkar's narrative strikes us as a travesty. Tilak did not, as Mr. Kelkar makes out, secure the victory in that controversy. The Congress Committee by a large majority rejected Tilak's demand that the Conference should not be allowed the use of the Congress pandal, which had grown into a sort of prescriptive right. It was Ranade who, having secured the victory, voluntarily decided to hold the Conference in a separate pandal out of a magnanimous regard for the susceptibilities of the vanquished opponents. Ranade concluded his inaugural address at the Poona Conference that year with a memorable passage which thrilled all those, this writer was privileged to be one of them, who heard it pronounced in the calm, even tones of the illustrious leader.

"In view of this conflict," said Ranade "it becomes the duty of all to consider what should be the attitude of the reformers towards those who are opposed to them. Strength of numbers we cannot command, but we can command earnestness of conviction, singleness of devotion, readiness for self-sacrifice in all honest workers in the cause. Even though these workers may be few in number, they will in the end succeed in overcoming opposition. We have above all to learn what it is to bear and forbear—to bear ridicule, insults, even personal injuries at times, and forbear from returning abuse for abuse. In the words of the Prophet of Nazareth, we have to take up the cross not because it is pleasant to be persecuted, but because the pain and the injury are as nothing by the side of the principles for which they are endured."

To Ranade the end was not everything. The means was as important as, perhaps more important than, the end. He looked, for national progress to be permanent and wholesome, to the training of character more than to securing of immediate results. Tilak was constitutionally incapable of understanding this point of view. At any rate, it would not have been in accord with his policy to do so, so long as Ranade was alive.

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

II. GOOD CITIZENS.

The term "good citizen" is often used, but it is seldom that anyone attempts to define it. And indeed, if one were to attempt a concise, dictionary-like definition it would be a well nigh impossible task, for the good citizen is a many sided man of both positive and negative qualities. The good citizen is not just a herd-man, always trying to ally himself with the majority. The herd-man may be a good citizen, but in all probability it is in spite of his tendency to follow, and not because of it. The fact that man is endowed with the ability to reason indicates that the Creator must have desired him to do a bit of thinking for himself. Political leaders may be able men, but it is no compliment to any man to accept his ideas without seriously examining them. And the good citizen will examine. He will listen attentively, think deeply, and act reasonably. He will be neither a prey to unscrupulous propaganda, nor a pawn in the hands of a grasping leader. The good citizen is a man of intelligence.

The good citizen is a cooperator. He is not the kind of man who is ready to accept the benefits of peace and of stable government without giving anything in return. He knows that if the village, city or state is to prosper it can only be through the joint efforts of its citizenry. The men in authority may be exceedingly wise, but the programs which they formulate are useless unless they are willingly accepted and heartily carried through to completion by an enthusiastic people. And if at times it seems to the good citizen that any policy of government is not wise, he will still play the game. Instead of sulking in his tent, or proclaiming himself a revolutionary, he will obey the law, though he has the privilege and the duty to use all constitutional methods in an endeavour to bring about its change. In other words the good citizen feels a personal responsibility for the political welfare of the state.

The good citizen is also interested in the social welfare. To him a village or city is much more than a collection of shops and of houses. It is the home of a spirit. It is a pulsing, living thing, and the good citizen feels a personal interest in its development. If the ideals of the city are low he is genuinely troubled, and searches his own life to see wherein he has failed. The good citizen stands for justice in all social relationships. But he does not stop with justice, he also believes in mercy. He wants every man to have a square deal and he is quite willing to surrender some of his own rights in the interest of the larger public welfare. Honest himself, he desires to see the principle of honesty extended into wider relationships. The good citizen does not rejoice in a brother's weakness. Neither is he censorious. Sympathetic and understanding, he helps to bear the burdens of the weak. The good citizen is every inch a man.

The good citizen belongs to a community. He owes that community certain obligations, and he should be proud of his communal heritage. But his regard for his own community should not blind him to the good in other communities. The good citizen will not engage in communal strife. He will endeavour to promote inter-communal unity. He will have faith in himself. He will have pride in his country. And he will have love for his fellow-men.

NATIONAL SCRIPT FOR INDIA.

(BY SHRIKRISHNA D. CHITALE.)

The more we think of India as a nation the more do we feel the need of a national script for her. Within a very short time India is bound to be remodelled on the lines of the United States of America with a few administrative changes according to her needs. Until a century ago India was a continent composing of various nations as it were, but owing to changing circumstances chiefly political and economical she is bound to be cast into a solid nation. The need therefore of a national script, in view of the impending changes, is all the more pressing.

COMMON SCRIPT FOR OCCIDENTAL COUNTRIES.

Europe knows the advantages of a common script. Owing to a common script it has been quite easy for all European countries to communicate their feelings and expressions through the means of telegraphy and the press. Just for a moment imagine how difficult the task of telegraphy would have been if a common script would not have been in existence in Europe. It would not be an exaggeration to say that communications through telegraphy would not have been possible without a common script. The task of learning to read and write different languages spoken on the continent has been quite within the reach of an ordinary man owing to a common script which has been responsible for creating common thought and communicating it to men and women of different countries.

INDIA'S PRESSING NEED.

In view of India's identity of common interest owing to her shortly being cast into a nation her need for a national script is all the more important. She cannot truly be a nation without a national script. A national script is more important than a national tongue. It is easy to learn to speak different languages but it is difficult to learn to write different scripts, unless one specially devotes oneself to it.

DEVNAGARI AS THE NATIONAL SCRIPT.

Now, which script can possibly be a national script is the question. In my humble opinion Devnagari (देवनागरी) alone can be the national script, since the Sanskrit language which is considered to be the fountain-head of all languages, for most of the words are derived from this mother of languages is written in Devnagari script. This in my opinion is the chief reason why Devnagari देवनागरी should be the national script. Besides this another important reason why Devnagari should be the national script is that the Hindi language which is shortly going to be the national language is also written in Devnagari script.

TELEGRAPHY.

Now assuming that India has a national language—Hindi, without a national script, imagine how difficult, even impossible it will be to introduce telegraphy as a rapid means of communication. If we have about 10 to 15 scripts, how are we going to arrange the telegraphic code? It is needless to say that it is impossible. No matter what language we speak, when we have a national script the task of communicating telegraphic messages by means of a common code will be very easy. It is impossible to have a separate telegraphic code for each script.

IV. ADVANTAGES TO PRESS.

We all know that in the modern times press is the best means of communicating thought from man to man even in the remotest corners of the earth. Imagine what an amount of energy is spent in casting different types of letters for the press. Again, the task of composing different letters of different scripts has become a very difficult one. Instead when we have accepted Devnagari as our national common script, imagine how easy the task of the Indian Press will be. I give here an illustration. The sentence below written in different languages shows how easy the task of composing letters will be owing to a national script.

स्वराज्य र दरक मनुष्याका जन्मसिद्ध हक है: Hindi; स्वराज्य हा प्रत्येक मनुष्याचा जन्मसिद्ध हक आहे: Marathi; स्वराज्य आर दरक मनुष्ये जन्मसिद्ध हक छे: Gujarathi; स्वराज्य हई दरक मनुष्ये जन्मसिद्ध हक आहे: Oaneresse.

Now on the contrary imagine what a difficult task it would be to compose this one sentence into several scripts.

UNDERSTANDING BETWEEN PROVINCES.

By accepting Devnagari as our national script we will make the task of learning to read and write different languages very easy. They will then be quite within the reach of the ordinary man. This will lead us to a better understanding of men and women belonging to different provinces as a result of which social intercourse will increase and provincial marriages will be possible and popular. In short we will then march towards national solidarity which is the most important thing for a new nation like India to have, which is the result only of a better understanding between men and women belonging to different provinces.

MY OWN DIFFICULTY.

I myself can speak about five or six important languages, but I cannot read and write them only because the scripts are different on account of this alone I am not in a position to intimately know the culture of different provincial peoples. I am sure, this is the difficulty with thousands of men and women in this country for there are hardly very few people who do not speak at least two or three languages. Let us not deny each other the privilege of knowing each other intimately. By accepting Devnagari as our national script, we shall be solving the problem of problems viz. creating an understanding between different provinces without which national solidarity will not be a fait accompli.

THE ALL-INDIA TEACHERS' FEDERATION, MADRAS.

The Editor, The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Among the Conferences which will meet during the ensuing Christmas Week is the fifth session of the All-India Teachers' Federation which is to assemble in the city of Madras on the 27th, 28th and the 29th instants, under, the distinguished presidency of Sir P. S. Sivaswami Iyer, K. C. S. I. The organisation must be congratulated at the outset on being able to secure the services of such a ripe and experienced publicist for the presidentship. It is pleasing to note that Sir P. S. Sivaswami Iyer has not only held the Vice-Chancellorships of the Madras and the Benares Hindu Universities, but has also given generously to the cause of education and has always been distinguished by the most progressive views on the subject. The Chairman of the Reception Committee is to be the Hon'ble Raja Sir Annamalai Chetti whose princely benefaction of twenty lakhs for the creation of the Annamalai University is well-known and whose purse has been open for many years for the unstinted support of educational charities of various kinds.

May I seek the hospitality of your columns to invite the attention of members of the teaching profession all over India and generally of all lovers of education to help this movement which aims not only at the creation of an effective professional organisation, but also at the advancement of the highest principles of education. It was only five years ago that some of us inaugurated this new organisation and enunciated its aims in the following words:

(a) To study educational problems with special reference to Indian conditions;

(b) To work for the adequate realization of the educational needs of India;

(c) To co-ordinate the working of the various teachers' associations of the country;

(d) To safeguard and advance the interests of the teaching profession in India, and to secure for it its legitimate place in national life;

(e) To act as a vehicle of representation at International Teachers' Conferences."

Successful annual conferences have already been held at Cawnpore, Patna, Calcutta and Bombay and the movement is now seeking a new centre in Madras where educational conditions are happily in advance of many other parts of India and where teaching organisations have already considerable good work to their credit. Any body who takes the trouble of perusing the proceedings of the last Conference held at Bombay (Messrs. Longmans Green & Co., Rs. 2-8-0) will be easily convinced of the genuine efforts made by the Federation to advance educational efficiency and to give a lead to the country in matters on which the teacher can speak with experience and authority. There were a large number of papers read at the Conference on many aspects of the educational problem in relation to India and representatives who came from various parts of the country went back, it is hoped, with the satisfaction that they had learnt some new ideas relating to their own craft. As in the case of last year, the Reception Committee at Madras is also arranging an Educational Exhibition and it may be claimed without any exaggeration that the purely pedagogic aspects of the Conference are receiving close attention.

The direction of educational effort for fostering a sense of international brotherhood is coming to be a recognised aim of the educational systems of to-day and the Federation can be said to have done something even in this direction. The All-India Teachers' Federation is one of the affiliated organisations of the world Federation of Educational Associations and was represented at the recent biennial Conference at Geneva by as many as twenty delegates, including Prof. D. K. Karve, the founder of the women's University, Dr. V. S. Ram of the Lucknow University and Mrs. Kamaladevi Chattopadhyaya, the well-known worker in the cause of Women's Educational Reform in India. A pan-Asiatic Conference is also to be held next year in Benares and as President of the Indian organisation under whose auspices the Conference is to meet, I have just heard from the National Federation of Teachers in the Philippines that a large number of delegates intend to attend the session coming in a special steamer chartered for the purpose. There can be no nobler ideal than the meeting of people for the great work of spreading enlightenment over the world and it is hoped this All-India organisation will receive the public support its great aims deserve and the fifth session in Madras will mark an important stage in its advancement.

P. SEHADRI, Chairman, Executive Council,
All-India Teachers' Federation.
Sanatana Dharma College,
Cawnpore, 17th December 29.

LORD IRWIN ON THE DEPRESSED CLASSES.

During Lord Irwin's recent visit to Madras, five addresses were presented by the depressed classes sabhas, namely Arundateeya Maha Sabha, Adi Dravida Mahajana Sabha, Madras and the Madras Provincial Depressed Classes Federation. His Excellency in reply said:—Gentlemen,—I have been forced by pressure of time to adopt the expedient of thanking you for your five addresses in one reply, but I should like to offer you severally my warmest thanks, and those of Lady Irwin, for the kind way in which you have welcomed us to Madras.

I can assure you that ever since I came to India I have given constant thought to the problem of the Depressed Classes. I have followed with interest the various measures employed to improve their condition such as the acquisition of land for houses, burial grounds and cultivation, the construction of wells, the organisation of co-operative societies, and the provision of educational facilities by scholarships and otherwise. The appointment of Mr. Rajah to the Indian Central Committee, which co-operated with the Statutory Commission, was evidence that Government were determined that your case should not go unrepresented. As regards the request made this morning that the Depressed Classes should be assured of representation on the Conference which, as I announced in my statement of October, 31st, it is the intention of His Majesty's Government to call. You will realise that it is not possible for me at this stage to say anything in detail about the composition of the Conference except that, as has already been made clear, it will be fully representative of all classes and interests in India. Much has been done both by Government and by Government officers, by leaders of public opinion like Mr. Gandhi, by social reformers and Christian missionaries, and I am sure that you appreciate the efforts that have been made on your behalf. But you realise no doubt that the age-long disabilities from which the depressed classes have been suffering cannot be removed in the twinkling of an eye. The process of their alleviation must of necessity be gradual, and in this process you yourselves have your part to play. The problem is one which neither Government nor individual social reformers unaided can wholly solve. It is only those who respect themselves that will obtain respect from others, and this battle a man must fight for himself. He must learn that habits of thrift will improve his standard of life, his general well-being and happiness, that cleanliness, both moral and physical, endows mind and body with vigour, that temperance will save him from many forms of degradation. The existence of such societies as I am now addressing leads me to hope that you realise how far the salvation of your community lies in your own hands. But above all things I would appeal for unity among the different classes which compose your community. Union is strength, and the assertion of your claims for equitable treatment must be seriously delayed if your ranks are weakened by dissension.

Although it is thus to a certain extent within your power to improve your own condition, there are difficult obstacles to surmount unless you can find a helping hand from those more fortunately placed than yourselves. Life is a stern school, and one in which it is not always possible to rise from class to class by one's own unaided efforts. I do not dwell in detail on the particular aspects in which you feel your disabilities, to which you have referred this morning. I appreciate of course their importance in your daily life but they are part of a wider question, on which through you I may in fact address a wider audience, an audience which I hope and believe is ready to listen to your appeals and to hold out a hand to assist you in raising your status in society.

The very term "depressed classes" provokes the thinking mind to enquire on every ground of justice and humanity, what the justification may be for such debasement. Is there, I wonder, a synonym in any other country for the term "depressed classes?" I doubt it. There are social inequalities everywhere, injustices which any one with a soul would wish to set right, contrasts between poverty and riches which it is difficult to justify. But where else in the world is a man by the accident of birth irrevocably denied the barest possibility of ever sharing with his fellow men so many of the things that make life worth living? Few men would think twice about stretching out a helping hand to rescue a drowning man, or would have it in their hearts to knock away the hand on the boat by which the unfortunate man was clinging to the hope of life. And yet I am forced to believe that there are many who are able unmoved to watch their fellow human beings caught in the quicksands of social ostracism, and yet feel themselves debarred by a religious and social philosophy from stirring a finger on their behalf. I am only repeating what many people have said before. You may remember some memorable words used by a great public man and a great speaker, the late Mr. Gokhale. "I think," he said, "all fair minded persons will have to admit that it is absolutely monstrous that a class of human beings with bodies similar to our own, with brains that can think and with hearts that can feel, should be perpetually condemned to a low life of utter wretchedness, servitude and mental and moral degradation and that permanent barriers should be placed in their way, so that it should be impossible for them ever to overcome them and improve their lot."

But words too often fall upon deaf ears, and I make no excuse for adding my appeal to those which have gone before.

All the world knows the greatness of the Hindu religion, its power for good as a religious and a social force, its ideals of national and family life, its inspiration in art and literature, its vitality and absorbent powers. With its roots deep in the soil of antiquity it has produced a civilisation which has stood the test of time. In that civilisation barriers of caste are a recognised feature and have no doubt, served a useful purpose in the various stages of its progress. But the world never stands still, and looking at the political, intellectual and economic forces by which it is to-day being moved I cannot doubt that a tenet which aims at debarring millions of human beings from concourse with their fellows must in the end prove a grave weakness to Hindu society.

As I have already said I do not believe that it is by any sudden convulsion that reform in these matters will come. But when in so many other ways I see signs of the stimulating of national consciousness in India, I cannot but believe that hand in hand with this will come a quickening of sympathy with the depressed classes and a desire to see them given their proper place in both the social and political life of their Motherland. Meanwhile I wish you well in your task of so organising and educating opinion both within and without your own classes, that in your own generation you may see steady advance made towards the ideal of equal opportunity being afforded to all the sons and daughters of India to do her service.

INDIANS ABROAD.

MRS. NAIDU IN EAST AFRICA.

On their reaching Nairobi, Mrs. Sarojini Naidu and Miss Padmaja, her daughter were extended a cordial welcome. Mrs. Sarojini Naidu laid the foundation stone of the Desai Memorial Hall on Tuesday, when many Europeans attended.

The Patel Brotherhood entertained Mrs. Sarojini Naidu at a grand garden party, when, replying to the address she eulogised the services to India by Messrs. Vithalbhai Patel and his brother Vallabh-bhai, the hero of Bardoli and congratulated the colonial Patels on their great progress.

Two prominent Scotsmen, Mr. James Riddell ex-Mayor of Nairobi Municipal Corporation and Mr. McLaren, Chairman, Kenya Workers' Federation Committee were present at the function. In the course of their speeches, they pleaded for toleration in politics and declared that a growing intelligent European section did not share the dismal forebodings of the scaremongers and favoured the introduction of common franchise. They were governed too long by the Lord Delamere-Grogan crowd and it was time that Kenya settled down to the advancement of common prosperity.

THE CONGRESS.

The Congress opened on the 6th instant at Nairobi when, hundreds of Indians and many leading Europeans were present. Mr. Bhagwansingh Varma, the chairman of the Reception Committee in his speech welcomed Mrs. Naidu and emphasised Indians' claims for equality of treatment.

Mr. Gandhi sent a message urging that no compromise should be thought of which affected Indian national honour. A message from Sir Parshottamdas Thakurdas urged for unity. Pandit Kunzru wired from London urging a united stand for equal rights.

MRS. NAIDU'S ADDRESS.

Mrs. Sarojini Naidu in her presidential address recalled her previous visit and referred to the two commissions; viz., the Hilton-Young Commission and the Wilson mission and described the latter as being most reactionary. She strongly pleaded for equality and gravely warned Indians against the dangers of non-co-operation and declared that the motherland's millions and the Government were to a man one with the East African Indians.

RESOLUTIONS.

The Congress passed resolutions urging the repeal of education cess and the appointment of Indians to higher civil services. It also urged the continuance of abstention from Municipal and legislative councils and opposed any scheme of economic federation, as distinguished from administrative co-ordination, as the former will be utilised to form the thin end of the wedge for the advent of a political federation and strongly opposed the inclusion of Tanganyika in any form of closer union.

THE FIJI LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

The New Legislative Council met for its first session on the 25th inst. After the swearing of the members, His Excellency the Acting Governor welcomed the new members to the Council. He intimated that all important business would be postponed until the arrival of the Governor. The matters to be dealt with in this session were all of a minor nature except the amendment of the Marriage Ordinance. He reviewed the progress of the Colony for the last year, and recommended the appropriation of a further £9,000 for education in 1930, to compensate for delay in formulating an Education Rate Scheme. Sir Maynard Hedstrom, on behalf of the European Elected Members, welcomed the Indian representatives. In his speech he referred to the Kenya White Paper as stating the unalterable basis of the Government of the Colony. The Hon. Premanand Singh returned thanks on behalf of the Indian members. His Excellency entertained the Members of the Council to dinner at Government House. The same evening the Indian Reform League held a Social to commemorate the occasion which was also their own fifth anniversary.

THE Vridhhi.

This monthly Hindi-English journal announces in its current (October) number that it will be the last of the present series. Our contemporary writes:—First, during the period of indenture, the seed of the glory of India lay sleeping in and beneath the dust. Next came the shoot above ground; the gradual growth from slavery to freedom; the series of changes which culminated last month in the election of three Indian Members to the Legislative Council of the Colony. In this early stage of growth the tender plant had many enemies from which it needed protection, and "Vridhhi" claims to have been one of the gardeners. But the time for that is now past. The seed has struck a sturdy root, and henceforth is fit to fend for itself; it is well able to grow without our help, and to continue to offer such assistance is almost an insult. It goes on to say: The Indian elected Members, the Indian National Congress, and the projected Indian newspapers are the proper agencies to carry on our past work; nor do we wish to offend or embarrass them by interference.

TENTH SOUTH AFRICAN INDIAN CONGRESS.

The Executive of the South African Indian Congress has decided to hold the tenth session of the Conference at Capetown from the 1st to 4th January 1930. The Congress by its systematic and selfless work has gained a popularity which has given added weight to its prestige. It is recognised by the Union Government as a body which speaks for and acts on behalf of the community. The Indian Government likewise recognises it. Since the Congress has been placed on a stable position, it has done work of no mean kind. Its achievements are a credit to those who have worked heart and soul to elevate the position of the Congress to its present pitch. The wise handling of the situation and the presentation of cases on behalf of our people won approbation for the Congress. We need only mention, among many, the fate of the Class Areas Bill and the deletion of the provision in the Liquor Bill, which threatened the livelihood of a section of our people. The tenth session of the Conference promises to be no less important than those which preceded it. The present unsettled situation in the Transvaal in regard to the question of trade will be bound to become acute.

INDIAN PRINCES IN TANGANYIKA.

The Maharao of Cutch and the Raja of Sirguja landed in Tanganyika last month on a hunting trip. The Tanganyika Opinion in welcoming them, observes that in Tanganyika there are very few Indian settlers who take interest in game. "We have, however, a very lively account of the game experiences of Mr. Abdul Karim Y. A. Karimji aged about 23 (who is now on a European tour with his parents) a partner of Messrs. Karimji Jivanji & Co. the foremost landowners and employers of native labour in Tanganyika. (It is reported that they own 100,000 acres of land and employ about 200,000 natives on their plantations and factories). He shot a lion 100 inches long some four miles away from the salt mines on the Bagamoyo Road. In September 1928 he had shot two elephants from a distance of 50 yards at his Ngomeni Sisal Estates some twelve miles from the port of Tanga."

It goes on to point out that the Maharao of Cutch has a large number of his subjects settled in Tanganyika, particularly in Dar-es-Salam and they made elaborate arrangements to give their Highness a public reception. The Indians have expressed complete unanimity with the Government and people of India as regards safeguarding the rights of Indians in Tanganyika. The paper expresses its confidence that His Highness of Cutch's visit will materially strengthen the position of Indians in that mandated territory.

ALL-INDIA WOMEN'S CONFERENCE.*FORTHCOMING BOMBAY SESSION.

A proposal for a country-wide campaign for the immediate introduction of compulsory primary education and for improvement in the standard of living of school-going children is the principal item on the agenda for the All-India Women's Conference, which holds its fourth session in Bombay in the University Convocation Hall from January 20 to 24th. Mrs. Sarojini Naidu will preside and nearly 250 delegates from all parts of the country are expected to attend.

Preparations for the Conference, which are proceeding apace are in the hands of Lady Dorab Tata and Mrs. Hansa Mehta, the Chairman and Secretary respectively of the Reception Committee of the Conference and Mrs. Kamaladevi Chattopadhyaya, the retiring Secretary of the Conference.

The resolutions which the Conference will consider include one extending an invitation to Asiatic countries to hold the first Asiatic Women's Conference in Madras in 1931. Other subjects which the Conference will consider relate to purdah, divorce and the law of inheritance with particular reference to bills on the subject, which are now pending before the legislatures.

The standing committee and all the sub-committees of the All-India Women's Conference will meet from the 16th to the 19th January, 1930 at Bombay. The Organising Secretary writes to say that the names of the delegates with their full addresses must be sent in immediately. Free Board and lodging will be provided for the delegates from the 20th to the 24th January only. Those who are arriving earlier will have to make their own arrangements till the 20th. It is also mentioned that boarding and lodging will be provided for visitors on payment of the required charges. All information with regard to housing arrangements for delegates and visitors can be obtained from Mrs. Hansa Mehta, 23, Nepean Sea Road, Bombay. Delegates of each province, can write directly to Mrs. Mehta and arrange for their accommodation.

No railway concessions can be guaranteed to visitors, although an attempt is being made to secure them.

Delegates who intend to attend the Bombay session of the Conference must take from their standing committee member certificates for railway concession.

The programme for the Bombay session is as follows:—

20TH JANUARY 1930.

9-30—11-30 a. m.—Registration of Delegates etc.

1-30—4-30 p. m.—Visits to Institutions.

6 p. m.—Opening ceremony of Conference.

21ST JANUARY 1930.

9—12 a. m.—First Sitting.

Afternoon—Visits to Institutions, Entertainment by the Women Graduates' Union.

6 p. m.—Madame Von Killer's Cinema. Lecture on a new experiment in her School.

22ND JANUARY 1930.

9—12-30 a. m.—Second Sitting.

Afternoon—Visits to Institutions.

4—5 p. m.—Opening ceremony of the Prabha Mills creche.

6-30 p. m.—Musical Entertainment.

23RD JANUARY 1930.

9—12-30 a. m.—Third Sitting.

Afternoon—Visits to Institutions.

4—5 p. m.—Entertainments.

6 p. m.—Lantern Slide Lecture on Art.

24TH JANUARY 1930.

Morning—Elephanta Caves.

1 p. m.—Lunch—Talk on Indian Women's Right of Inheritance by Mr. Jayakar.

4—6 p. m.—Final Sitting.

7 p. m.—At Home.

The list of institutions to be visited is as follows:—

EDUCATIONAL.

Fellowship School.

New High Schools for Girls.

Municipal Schools where Vocational Training is given

Deodhar's School for Music.

Prince of Wales' Museum.

School for the Blind.

Mahila Mandal.

SOCIAL.

(1) Seva Sadan (2) Sir Ratan Tata's Industrial Home for Women, (3) Rescue Home, (4) Children's Welfare centre, (5) Wadia Maternity Hospital, (6) Wadia Children's Hospital, (7) Seva Mandal, (8) Petit Orphanage and (9) Vanita Vishram.

On the evening of the 20th January there will be a broadcasting of messages from the conference as the constituencies are too many. One representative from each province will give a message on the Radio, each speech to last 5 minutes and to briefly outline the work and the ideal of that province. The representative must be a good speaker and must have a knowledge of her province. As there seems to be some difficulty in selecting speakers for the radio it has been decided to have them elected. Each constituency should send to the Organising Secretary the name of one delegate whom it considers the most suitable speaker. The name of one person can be sent from two places. The names of the nominees of each province will then be circulated among the constituencies of that province for the constituencies to vote upon and elect their provincial representative.

Rasa-Mandal Special Exhibition:—An Exhibition of Paintings by Manindra Gupta will be held at the Blavatsky Lodge, Theosophical Hall, Chauspati on 20th, 21st and 22nd December 1929. Time 9 to 12 A. M. and 3 to 6 P. M.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Inter-caste Marriage at Sabarmati.—The Sabarmati Ashram was the scene of social reform measure of a first class importance on the evening of Thursday week last. The first inter sub-caste marriage of its kind in the Vaishya community where the bride and bridegroom came from two distant Vaishya communities of different provinces was performed in the presence of Seth Jamnalal Bajaj, Kunwar Mohan Singhji of Mewar and friends and relatives of both sides when Mahatma Gandhi bestowed blessings on the couple. The bride, Uma Gouri, 18 years old is a Gujarati Vaishya girl and daughter of Mahatma Gandhi's nephew, whereas the bride-groom is Mr. Shankarlal Agarwala of Mewar and is about 24 years of age. The simplicity of the rites, without the usual feasts and unnecessary and cumbersome ceremonies was a special feature of the marriage.

The Catholic Index:—The "Index of Prohibited Books," issued last month by the Catholic Leader, Madras, is the first book published by the new printing works of the Holy See in the Vatican City. It is composed of 565 pages, and contains the names of about 5,000 books in alphabetical order. The first "Index" was published in 1559 under Paul IV and since then it has been constantly revised. The "Index" contains a catalogue of books which have been condemned by the Sacred Congregations, but by the general law of the Church the reading of all publications calculated to undermine faith and morals is forbidden. It is a matter of common knowledge that in our days especially the danger to faith and morals from the growing spread of pernicious books is very great. The Church, constantly watching over the spiritual interests of her children, endeavours to ward off all danger to their souls from the perusal of unwholesome publications. The object of the Church is the preservation and propagation of the teachings of Christ and a life in accordance with these teachings. In fulfilment of her mission, therefore, the Church takes all precautions necessary for safeguarding the purity of faith and morals among her children.

LIFE INSURANCE TRUST PLAN

THE outright payment of the Insurance money to the widow or children in one lump sum is a great mistake. To apply a real test you would only ask yourself how your wife would invest such a sum: NOW without any help whatever from you. ## NOTES.

Social Conference Presidential Address:—

We print the full text of the excellent address which the President of the forty-second Indian National Social Conference delivered at Lahore where the session opened on Thursday. It is a well-reasoned and sober pronouncement of the important reforms in our society which are most urgently needed at the present time. Mr. Har Bilas Sharda recognises, as every student of social institutions must, that several of the customs which need reform had originally served some useful purpose, but that they have become now out of place and should be radically changed. The social system provided also a mechanism for making changes from time to time to bring it in line with changing requirements. But this mechanism has broken down and hence, as the President pointed out, we have to resort to legislation as the only sure means of effecting social reform. Mr. Sharda gave the removal of the legal disabilities of woman the first place among subjects requiring urgent legislation. Amongst the Hindus, he said, some of the primary rights of a woman are now denied to her. And even among Mahomedans, although Moslem law gives her certain rights, these are, as in the Punjab, denied to her by custom. Mr. Sharda divided social reform under three heads:—(1) the rights of children, (2) the rights of women and (3) social rights of individuals and classes. This is a very useful and scientific classification and it also brings out the interdependence of the several reforms, making each reform a step in the direction of all other reforms. His own important Act fixing the marriage age, Mr. Sharda placed under the first head of "rights of children." It has also a close bearing on the second and third groups. The practice of child marriage, is an infringement of the most important right of women, namely, the right to have sufficient time for physical growth and education, and it also affects the relations of individuals and classes. Mr. Sharda favours intermarriages though only as a corrective to the caste system. "So long as the caste system exists," he said, "we must permit and, at times, encourage inter-caste marriages."

Social Rights:—In his third group, Mr. Sharda includes a large number of questions of varying degrees of importance, such as, interdining and free social intercourse between people belonging to different castes—both of which are now fairly common—"the admission in the various castes of people belonging to other faiths seeking such admission", the removal of untouchability by extending to the untouchables freedom to enter temples to offer divine worship, and to use wells and tanks and public schools. On the last question, the President of the Social Conference spoke with much feeling and conviction. "It is only in this unfortunate country," he said, "that a man is regarded as untouchable by another. And it is a matter of shame that those whose Sastras teach them that all men are brethren, and that there is divine essence in every man, woman and child should practice untouchability and regard certain classes of men and women as untouchables." He quoted with approval Lord Irwin's wise advice to the Hindu community to get rid of this blot on their social system. Mr. Sharda's observations on the position of women deserve to be deeply pondered by orthodox opponents of social reform legislation. Mr. Sharda traces the lowering of the position of women to the political subjugation of the country. Sir Sankaran Nair, in an important speech in the Council of State in which he called attention to the differences in the legal position of women in different provinces, said that the comparatively liberal interpretation of the Hindu Law in the Bombay Presidency, was due to the political freedom which the Hindu people enjoyed under the Maratha rule. There is a very great deal of force in this view, and that is why social reformers have to be as earnest in their endeavours to secure political reforms as professing politicians. In fact, it is the social reformer, with his perception of the social needs and defects of the community, who has a true perspective of political ends, and can judge correctly the appropriate measure of political advance which would secure at each step the greatest measure of social justice and freedom of development to all classes of people. Politicians who are either opposed or indifferent to social reform are apt to be carried away by watch-words which have no application to the realities of life. We congratulate Mr. Har Bilas Sharda on his thoughtful and weighty address.

Lady Hydari On Child Marriage:—Lady Hydari who presided over a public meeting of women in Secunderabad in the course of her address effectively demolished the criticism of the Muslim opponents of the Child Marriage Act that it is opposed to the Shariat. "Child Marriage," observed Lady Hydari, "was a mere custom and defied any one to prove that the Quran encouraged it. In these days to marry a girl of 14 years of age even was solum." She had known several cases where the wife was sent back to her father's house as soon as her health was broken and the man married another woman and the first poor wife was left to beg. In these circumstances she thought it was lesser crime to kill the girls when young than to make them suffer life-long torture. She asked if men ever observed all the commands of their great Prophet and how many men with more than one wife treated them all alike as commanded by the Prophet, or if any of them celebrated, like the Prophet, marriages with widows of forty years. She said Islam allowed widows to marry and yet over and over again they found, when the question arose, that men in the widow's family would not allow her to re-marry. On the other hand, a man could go and look out for another wife on the third or fourth day after his wife's death. In conclusion, she said that women ought to thank God that in British India the Government had at last passed a law to help the poor women and unless the women took it into their own hands to act for themselves, there was no other help for them. The meeting adopted a resolution not only supporting the Sarda Act but calling upon the Nizam's Government to pass a law forbidding child marriage in the State. Recently we published in the columns of the Reformer the presidential address of Begum Habibullah who also condemned child marriage and welcomed the Sarda Act. We welcome the expression of opinion by enlightened Muslim ladies in favour of the Act. It is bound to have a counteracting effect to the agitation carried on by the Hindu and Muslim opponents of the beneficial measure.

The Political Situation :—The conference of five political leaders with Lord Irwin on Monday did not lead to any definite result. The following official communication which was agreed to by those who attended, was issued after the conference :—

"H. E. the Viceroy met Mr. Gandhi, Pandit Motilal Nehru, the Hon'ble Mr. Patel, Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru, and Mr. Mahomed Ali Jinnah at the Viceroy's House, New Delhi, this afternoon.

Discussion was limited to the function of the proposed conference in London. It was pointed out that any member of the Conference would be free to advocate any proposals, and that any measure of unanimity at the Conference would necessarily carry weight with British opinion.

On behalf of the Congress Party, the view was expressed that, unless previous assurances were given by His Majesty's Government that the purpose of the conference was to draft a scheme for Dominion Status which His Majesty's Government would undertake to support, there would be grave difficulty about Congress participation.

His Excellency made it plain that the conference was designed to elicit the greatest possible measure of agreement for the final proposals which it would be the duty of His Majesty's Government to submit to Parliament, and that it was impossible for him or for His Majesty's Government in any way to prejudge the action of the Conference or to restrict the liberty of Parliament. Conversation then concluded."

This inconclusive result has been regarded in many quarters as meaning practically the re-starting of the non-cooperation movement by the National Congress. In some others, it is thought that the door for negotiation is still open. If the Congress embarks upon an extreme policy now, it will do so in the face of strong opposition. Among Congress leaders themselves there is a strong difference of opinion as regards the trend of the Gandhi-Nehru policy. Mr. N. C. Kelkar speaking at the Punjab Hindu Conference at Lahore on the eve of the Congress session, declared that the Hindu Mahasabha would act independently and will not be guided by the policy of the Congress, which he severely criticised as being opposed to the best interests of the Hindus. Mahomedans will not join the Congress non-co-operation as they did in 1921. The Princes of India, the great non-Brahmin community, and the depressed classes, are opposed to it. The Congress will find itself without support except from the small but active group of non-co-operators. The key to the situation, therefore, is once again in the hands of the Viceroy and the British Government. If by a generous measure of constitutional reform they meet the actual political needs as disclosed by the failure of the present system at several points, the non-co-operation movement will pass over without any serious consequence. If, on the other hand, they are niggardly, the situation will become dangerous and it may become uncontrollable.

The Attempt On The Viceroy :—The news that a bomb placed on the railway track exploded when the Viceroy's special train passed over it on Monday morning, causing damage to the dining car, and slightly injuring an attendant who was in it, was received with horror mingled with surprise that the attempt should have been made on one so generally respected as Lord Irwin. The bomb is said to have been buried between the two rails and exploded from a distance of two or three hundred yards by means of an electric battery with which it was connected by a carefully hidden length of wire. The incident happened almost just outside New Delhi within a quarter of an hour of the Viceroy alighting there. The motive of the crime was evidently to kill the Viceroy who more than any other of the present generation is working to bring about a feeling of mutual goodwill between the British and Indian peoples. There are unfortunately some who do not wish such a result, and who build their hopes upon the estrangement of Britain from India and India from Britain. All those who realise how important cordial relations between the two countries are to each other and to the peace of the world, will strenuously set themselves to combat this sinister movement.

The Central Committee's Report :—The report of the Indian Central Committee which was published on Monday last is a unique document in that the memoranda and dissenting minutes occupy more pages than the actual report. In spite of the differences of opinion recorded in the report, it is gratifying that there is a substantial agreement on the important constitutional issues. There is unanimity regarding the grant of full provincial autonomy and the introduction of responsibility in the Central Government except in Foreign relations and Defence. The question of communal electorates for Mahomedans has given rise to the diversity of opinion expressed in the report.

BOMBAY, DECEMBER 28, 1929.

THE NEW RELIGIOUS OUTLOOK.*

Amidst much that is discouraging in international relations, there is a gleam of light in the new tendency discernible in the attitude of religions to one another. The most hopeful prospect of peace on earth and goodwill among men, is to be found in fostering and extending this tendency. The Rev. D. J. Fleming who was connected with the Forman Christian College, Lahore, several years ago, and is now on the staff of the Union Theological Seminary of New York, has from the first taken a fresh and independent line regarding the best service which Christian Missions can do in India. The key to his attitude is furnished in the title of one of his best-known books "Building with India." This is different from the attitude of the Farquhar-Macnicol school of building upon India, which was itself a big departure from the old missionary idea of building against India. No religion can claim that it has realised its ideals in the lives of those who profess them. The higher the ideal the greater has been the ill-success in capturing it.

That low man seeks a little thing to do,
Sees it and does it :
This high man, with a great thing to pursue
Dies ere he knows it.
That low man goes on adding one to one,
His hundred's soon hit :
This high man aiming at a million,
Misses an unit.
That, has the world here—should he need the next,

Let the world mind him !
This, throws himself on God, and unperplexed
Seeking shall find him.

Christianity has very high ideals, and its failure has been correspondingly great. Jesus Christ declared that those who followed him would be able to do even greater miracles than he did. No Christian Missionary pretends that he can raise the dead, cast out evil spirits, make a cripple walk by his mere word. Missions have established hospitals, leper asylums and orphanages, but these are, really, an admission of their inability to effect cures as Jesus did by renovating the inner life of the patient by forgiving his sins. Judged by Jesus' test, the Missionaries, therefore, cannot be said to be his true and effective followers. In some vital respect, they are wanting in the power of faith. If this is the case with Missionaries of Jesus Christ, it is much more so with the rank and file of Christians. Then, again, Jesus came to promote peace and goodwill amongst men. Christian nations are among the most wealthy and powerful nations to-day, but this was not what Christ wanted them to be. He wished Christians to be active agents in promoting peace and goodwill among nations, and it is needless to point out how far his wish has been fulfilled.

* "Ways of Sharing with other Faiths," By Daniel J. Fleming Ph. D., Association Press, New York. Price.

Judged by these two specific tests explicit in Christ's own words Christianity has been a failure. Not that other religions have a better record in this respect. The Hindu religion which proclaims the solidarity of man through identity of the human with the Supreme Soul has miserably failed to live up to it. The existence of the "untouchable" classes is the crowning proof of its failure. Aiming at the Universal in its philosophy, in practice it has become the most particularistic of religions. Islam which was to be a brotherhood, has its castes and sects, and while its very name signifies Peace, it has become a fruitful source of conflict in India and elsewhere. Thus, no religion can say that it has succeeded more than others in raising its followers to the level of its highest teaching. All are in the same boat. It does not lie in the mouth of one of them to reprove the others for their defects. All have to sit together and take counsel among themselves as to why religion has lost its hold on nations and how it can be made what it should be, that is the most potent influence in human life.

This, if we understand him aright, is what Dr. Fleming pleads for in this extremely suggestive book. It is not only that he does not lay much store by the proselytising activities of the missions; others before him have emphasised the evangelical against the proselytising function of missions. Dr. Fleming's special contribution lies in his acceptance of other religions as having much not only to learn from but also to impart to Christianity and to one another. We certainly do not think it derogatory to Hinduism for a Hindu to derive spiritual comfort and inspiration from the life and teachings of Jesus Christ. The Gita declares that whenever there is unrighteousness, the Divine Being incarnates to redeem the world from age to age. It does not say that the Incarnation has always been or should necessarily be in India or in any other country. Gautama Buddha is one of the recognised avatars of Hinduism, and Jesus too, is entitled to a rank by his side. If the Incarnation idea is unacceptable, Jesus belongs to the category of great Teachers of the human race. The Prophet of Arabia acknowledged that there have been messengers of God before him, and liberal-minded Mussalmans today cite the Koran as the greatest gospel of religious toleration. Christians alone have refused to recognise any Teacher other than Jesus except on an inferior plane. We do not quarrel with Dr. Fleming when he places Christianity in the centre of his religious sphere as the sun in the solar system illumining other religions. He, we are sure, will not quarrel if a Hindu or a Buddhist or a Mussulman assigns the central place to his own faith. After all, it is difficult to distinguish between centre and circumference in the religious sphere. Every point is a centre and all points together make the circumference. As a geometrical proposition, this cannot be demonstrated on the black board, but in the geometry of the spirit, it stands out in high relief to every earnest seeker after Truth.

THE 42nd INDIAN NATIONAL SOCIAL CONFERENCE.

MR. SARDA'S PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS.

The forty-second session of the Indian National Social Conference was held at Lahore under the presidentship of Rao Bahadur Har Bilas Sarada. The following is the full text of Mr. Sarada's Presidential address :—

I must thank the Chairman and the members of the Reception Committee of the 42nd session of the Indian National Social Conference for the honour they have done me in asking me to preside at this year's momentous session. While I appreciate the great honour done to me, I am not unconscious of the fact that the office, to which I have been called, imposes upon me heavy obligations and responsibilities, especially as, after the passing of the important social legislation by the Central Legislature this year, we have entered upon a stage in the evolution of our social life when the eyes of the whole world are fixed upon India, and the people of Europe and America and the advanced countries of Asia are watching us to see how we deal with those great social problems peculiar to India—problems which have long stood in the way of our progress, and whether we possess the necessary courage, intelligence and wisdom to solve them satisfactorily. For, by the results of our efforts in that direction, they will judge whether we possess the qualities necessary to enable our great country to retrieve her lost position.

We have therefore to bring all the ability, wisdom and courage we possess, to bear on the deliberations of this distinguished assembly representing as it does, the accumulated intelligence and united experience of social India. And I have ventured to take part in the deliberations of this august body because of my burning desire to serve my country, my unflagging interest in the social welfare of the people, my pride in her past and my unshakable belief in the great future. And if we continue to bring to the solution of the various social problems that face us the same spirit, wisdom and courage which have been shown by the representatives of the nation in the Legislative Assembly in dealing with child marriage—one of the greatest evils from which our country has long been suffering—there can be little doubt that the dawn of a happier era is near and that our woes and troubles are soon coming to an end.

READJUSTMENT ESSENTIAL FOR PROGRESS.

Gentlemen, while the fundamental principles of life remain permanent and unchangeable, the conditions of life keep ever changing, owing to the conflicting interests of individuals and communities, and the varying needs and requirements of the nations of the world in different stages of evolution. In view of this constant change it is necessary to maintain a proper adjustment of relations between the facts and conditions of existence and our acts and practices in order to secure a healthy life and growth of society. When this adjustment is broken, the life of a society is threatened and its progress and prosperity stopped. Constant adjustment of relations is therefore a condition of healthy growth. In other words, reform, political and social, is the necessity of a healthy state of society. We in this conference are concerned only with the social aspects of Indian life, and our deliberations are to be confined to the consideration of social matters. A wise people therefore is always ready for reform, where and when necessary. It will never nail its colours to the product or embodiment of a particular aspect or condition of life and say, we are wedded to it, and by it we stand or fall. The principles of life, which guide us in readjusting relations are, as stated before, always true and unchanging; and we must always hold by them. But the products of forces, generated by adjustment of relations, such as individual acts, customs, practices or attitudes towards things, must change according as the conditions of life change. A readiness to revise the valuations of facts and standards of life, whenever necessary or called for, is essential to the continuance and growth of social life. Thus only can a social system be kept as a living and growing organism and thus only can social life lead to a healthy and vigorous national life.

SOCIAL AND POLITICAL REFORM CORRELATED.

Both the social and the political aspects of life are equally important as they touch every individual member of society at every point of his life, and his well-being and happiness are promoted or retarded according as a proper and timely readjustment of relations is effected or neglected. This is why, social and political reforms are so intimately connected with each other that the neglect of the one vitally injures the other. They act and react on each other. Social reform, by releasing forces hitherto held in check and by generating others, gives dynamic force to the movement of political reform just as political emancipation powerfully helps to bring about readjustment of social relations and facilitate social reform. The emancipation of the mind from thralldom, individual or communal, whether in the social sphere or the political broadens the vision, quickens the impulses, strengthens the will and has an elating effect on every fibre of the person or persons emancipated, leading automatically to the breaking of chains in the other sphere. This truth is summed up in the aphorism, 'Progress is Unity'. Social and political advancement must therefore go hand in hand. Any effort in one direction only, to the neglect of the other, will be infructuous and of little value.

VARANASHRAMA SYSTEM.

We all know that India had a glorious past and that her achievements in the various domains of human activity were great. One great reason for this was that her social constitution was very elastic and gave freedom to individuals. It did not hamper growth but afforded full and free scope for their activities in all directions.

The structure of society was based on two institutions peculiar to India: (1) Varnashrama and (2) Joint family system. The Varnashrama meant the division of the people into 4 classes—Brahmans, Kshatriyas, Vaishas and Sudras. Those devoted themselves to acquiring and imparting knowledge and dedicated their lives to the development of mental and spiritual powers, and guided the counsels of the nation, were called Brahmans and were accorded a place of honour in society. Their ideal was self-denial. They did not seek wealth or material advancement. Their rule of life was high thinking and plain living. They were therefore accorded the position which in the modern world, wealth and worldly power alone give. They thus enjoyed all the benefits which wealth and power confer without their drawbacks.

The ideal of the Kshatriyas was not how best to live, but how best to die. Self-aggrandisement was not their aim: service was their summum bonum in life. The Rajputs, the descendants of the Kshatriyas, illustrated in their lives the high ideal of the warrior class. To die worthily in a worthy cause, "to make the mother's milk resplendent" was their solicitude. The Rajputs in days gone by "loved strife, and sought opportunities of dying in a just cause." To die gloriously was what they lived for. The history of India is full of instances that prove this distinguishing feature of their character. The outburst of Devaldevi, the mother of the celebrated heroes Ala and Udil, on their refusal to return to Mahoba to fight for their country on its invasion by Prithviraj Chauhan, sums up Rajput character in a sentence. She exclaimed:—

"Would that gods had made me barren, that I had never borne sons who thus abandon the path of the Rajput and refuse to succour their prince and country in danger. Her heart bursting with grief, her eyes raised to heaven, she continued, "Was it for this, O Universal Lord, Thou madest me feel a mother's pangs for these destroyers of Binafur's fame? Unworthy offspring, the heart of a true Rajput dances with joy at the mere name of strife, but ye, degenerate, cannot be the sons of Jasraj. Some earl must have stolen to my embrace and from such ye must be sprung."

This was irresistible. The two heroes declared they would die fighting for Mahoba. On this, Devaldevi said:—

"Well have you spoken my son. Nothing now remains but to make thy parent's milk resplendent by thy deeds. The calls of the peasant driven from his home meets the ear, and, while we deliberate, our villages are given to the flames."

Ala added:—

He who can look tamely on while the smoke rises from his ruined towns, his fields laid waste, can be no Rajput. He who succumbs to fear when his country is invaded, his body will be plunged into the hell of hells, his soul a wanderer in the world of spirits for sixty thousand years, but the warrior who performs his duty will be received into the mansions of the Sun and his deeds will last for ever."

In the third division came the Vaishas. They were engaged in manufacture and trade. They produced things and distributed them and accumulated wealth and material resources. They were men of intelligence, industry and courage. They went to every part of the world, had the strength of arm to defend their lives and property. The Vaishas were the mainstay of society. Those who were unfitted to follow any of the above mentioned three callings supplied labour and served the other three classes.

CASTE SYSTEM NOT RIGIDLY EXCLUSIVE.

But these four classes were not rigidly exclusive of each other. In the same family one was a Brahman, the other a Kshatriya and the third a Vaisha. The Hindu scriptures themselves illustrate this feature of the Varnashrama system. The Puranas say that Raja Yuvnashva of the solar dynasty had a son called Harita. Harit's son became a Brahman and his descendants were known as Ângiris: Harit. The The Vishnu Purana and Bhagwad say that Raja Nélishta's son Nâbhâg became a Vaishya. Raja Suhotra of the lunar dynasty had three sons, Kâsh, Lôsh and Gritsmad. The latter's son Shunak had a son called Shainak. Shainak's sons became Brahman, Kshatriya, Vaisha and Sudra respectively. Take another instance. Kushik was the son of Raja Kushashva of the lunar dynasty. His grandson Vishwâmitra's descendants are known in India as Brahmans of the Kaushik gotra.

Individuals and communities took up the callings and pursuits that suited them and afforded free and full development to the physical, mental and moral qualities with which nature had endowed them. There was no rigid, hide-bound, watertight system of caste in old days. The classification was based on individual गुण कर्म स्वभाव qualities, actions and temperament. But for all practical purposes of social life, they formed one class. There was perfect adjustment between the requirements of the time, the needs of the nation and the material required fully to satisfy those wants. People were thus enabled to make the best use of their talents and opportunities for their own happiness and prosperity, and employ them, when necessary, in the service of the nation.

SOCIAL DISINTEGRATION LEADS TO POLITICAL DEGRADATION.

Coming now to the application of the theoretical propositions enunciated above to the practical facts of social life in our country at the present time, we find that our social life is at a very low ebb; that society is cut up into castes and sub-castes, and the sub-castes are again divided into smaller groups all exclusive of one another, with restrictions regarding food and marriage and association carried to a point beyond which this fissiparous tendency could not go. This, with the resultant narrow view of things, and the lowering of high ideals of conduct, made the nation impotent to protect itself from foreign inroads, and powerless to withstand the impact of forces foreign to its constitution. The result was social disintegration ending in political subjection. The history of India illustrates most clearly how social evils have inevitably led to political degradation. In Ancient India, free and elastic social system went hand in hand with political liberty and economic prosperity.

BREAK DOWN OF JOINT FAMILY SYSTEM.

The joint family system was a contrivance which the Hindu economists and social thinkers invented in order to maintain the traditions of the race, and give stability and continuity to family life, as the family and not the individual was the unit in the social system. The two bases on which the system rested, were (a) co-operation or mutual help between those who were nearest in blood and bound by ties created by nature herself, and (b) the care and protection of the weak and afflicted among them. This institution made for peace and order, promoted unity and prevented disintegration. But it did not ensure progress. So long as it worked properly, no necessity was felt for such institutions of the West as poor houses, old age pensions and poor laws. But the joint family system was a product of the peculiar circumstances in which society was placed at the time. The system worked successfully and did useful work when the country was self-contained and self governed; when the population was homogeneous and differences of religion were not serious; when education was in the hands of the nation, and society was not subjected to the impact of foreign influences; and, lastly when life moved in a narrow sphere. But things are completely changed now. India has long ceased to be self governed and is no longer homogeneous; religious differences are tearing the society asunder: education is in foreign hands. The impact of foreign influences, political, economic and social, is disintegrating society. New ideals of life and conduct, due partly to the introduction of foreign culture and partly to a new valuation of things, which both are being increasingly accepted in the country, resulting in the rejection of the principles and ideals on which the system was based, are undermining it and must ultimately destroy it. Moreover, life has now begun to flow in much wider channels. Take the case of a father who lives in Simla, and has four sons. One is a doctor in Lahore, another a contractor in Delhi, the third a shopkeeper in Agra, the fourth in railway service, one day here and the next in another place, all having different interests, moving in different circles and forming no corporate life. Is it possible for them all long to form a joint family?

OUR SOCIAL SYSTEM SHOULD BE OVERHAULED.

The Varnashrama has disappeared giving place to the present caste system. And the joint family system, which took away the personal rights of individuals and bestowed them on a corporate body, the family, has now ceased to function as originally intended. Naturally, the adjustment between the actual facts of life and the necessities of personal happiness and social welfare is completely broken.

My purpose in describing in detail the leading features of the social system of the Hindus is not to advocate its revival. The object is only to show that the elasticity of the social system of ancient India, and the freedom it gave to individuals to live the life that suited them best, enabled the people to achieve good results. Back to the past, is not my cry. This, however, does not mean that we must discard everything that is old. Much of what is old has stood the test of time and has proved its efficacy; and we must retain what has been proved to be sound in the past. But we must be prepared to accept new things as circumstances require and we find them helpful. The interests of the country require that our social system must be modified so as to admit of social intercourse with people belonging to different denominations and faiths in the country. Economic forces beyond our control and foreign trade relations demand that the limitations and restrictions necessitated by a strict observance of the caste and other social conventions must be removed.

FULL FREEDOM FOR MAN AND WOMAN DESIRABLE.

The social system in vogue in ancient India had its own ways to secure the welfare of women. In the changed conditions of modern India, that welfare can only be secured by according to the women their natural rights, and making them enforceable at law. In order that those rights may be fully exercised, it is necessary to break the bonds of caste, and free men and women from the shackles which tie them to the old order of things. Men and women must have full freedom to utilize all opportunities and avenues open to them to attain their full physical, mental, and moral growth, and to arm themselves with all the modern weapons used in economic, educational and social spheres to enable them to hold their own in the deadly struggle for existence going on in the world. Then only can we successfully compete with the advanced nations of the West.

LEGISLATION, THE ONLY METHOD OF REFORM.

As for the methods of social reform, there exist at present in India two ways in which reforms can be introduced: (a) public opinion crystallised into caste or communal regulations and (b) legislation. If the caste organizations were at the present time effective and fully operative, a great deal of social reform could be carried out through those organizations. But the discipline of caste having become loose and its authority having lost its efficacy, the work done in old days through this agency cannot now be so accomplished. The only sure means of effecting social reform now is legislation. As a great English writer has said, where large communities or numbers are concerned legislation is the only effective means of carrying out social reform.

There is no country in the world where important social reform has been accomplished by means other than legislation. Those who contend that social reform should be carried out only by educating public opinion and through the agency of caste or communal organizations, have failed to understand the real nature of reform and the function of legislation. Nor do they appreciate the gravity of the situation. Reform becomes necessary where the rights of individuals or groups of individuals are withheld or denied. As the caste agency has no legal sanction behind it and is powerless to have those rights respected, the aggrieved party has every right to appeal to the State, whose primary duty is to see that the rights of individuals living within its jurisdiction are respected. We see this in daily life. When a right to land or money is invaded or the terms of a contract are broken, if an amicable settlement by the intervention of friends is not arrived at, the aggrieved individual appeals to the State and the courts of law enforce the right. If the just rights of a woman, on the exercise of which her happiness depends, cannot be protected by society; if public opinion or caste organizations have not the power or the inclination to redress her wrongs, it is the legitimate right of the woman to appeal to the State for protection. It is the inherent right of a child to get nourishment, to be allowed to grow up and develop physically and mentally. If food or protection is refused to it by parents, or if a child is sought to be sacrificed as an offering to some deity or to save the parents from expense, or fear of ignominy (vide the annals of infanticide) the law must step in to save it. Similarly, if the parents give away a girl in her infancy in marriage, whereby she may be subjected to the cruelties of early consummation or maternity, while she is physically quite undeveloped, the girl has a right of protection from the State against the custom-sanctioned, though non-malicious, cruelty of the parents.

WOMEN'S RIGHTS DENIED.

If the rights of a woman, who is entitled to equal treatment with man, are systematically denied her and she is treated like chattel, it is the duty of the State to intervene. Amongst the Hindus some of the primary rights of a woman are now denied to her. And even in other communities, some of her rights though recognised by the personal law governing her, are denied her owing to the force of custom. In the Punjab, the right of inheritance conceded to a Moslem woman by Shariat (Moslem law) is denied to her by customary law, and so far as her right to property is concerned, she is very nearly in the same position as her Hindu sister.

Hindu law chiefly centres round marriage, inheritance and the joint family system. The law of inheritance was based on the requirements and the incidents of the joint family. But as the joint family system is rapidly disintegrating and the individual is taking the place of the family as a unit of society, both the law of inheritance and that governing joint family must be modified in the light of changed circumstances. As the present law governing marriage was based on the Varnashrama which has long since disappeared and even the caste system which took its place, is rapidly going to pieces, it is necessary that this law too must be materially modified.

LEGISLATIVE INTERFERENCE JUSTIFIED.

It is too late in the day to object to legislative interference with the Hindu law of inheritance or of joint family or marriage. The State has irrespective of the scruples of the orthodox, been enacting laws on social matters. In 1870 A. D. a law was passed providing that a member of a joint Hindu family could become a Christian and yet retain all the rights and privileges of a member of the joint family. And can there be a greater interference with the Hindu marriage law than that embodied in Act III of 1872? An Act of legislature has made it possible for a Hindu widow to remarry and yet retain under certain circumstances the property of her last husband.

SAFEGUARDING RIGHTS OF CHILDREN.

The readjustment or reform in the social system of the country easily falls under three heads: (1) Rights and welfare of children (2) Rights and status of women (3) Social rights of individuals and classes. As regards the rights of children, an important step has recently been taken by the country in forbidding marriages of boys below 18 and girls below 14 years of age. This law, if duly enforced and strengthened later in the light of future experience of its working, will put a stop to child widowhood, protect girls from early death and lifelong ill health, and will give them time to receive education. Physical degeneration of the race will be arrested, and boys will have a chance of growing into sturdy men. Children are also entitled to receive such education and training as will enable them to live a decent life in the world. For this, the State should provide necessary facilities. It has now been universally recognised as the duty of the State to give primary education to every boy and girl; and we call upon our Government to recognise its obligations in this respect. In England, the State has also recognised its duty to look after the health of all children between 5 and 14 years, which is the period of compulsory education there.

INTER-CASTE MARRIAGES.

So long as the caste system exists we must permit and, at times, encourage inter-caste marriages. Some communities are so small that it is not possible to find within their folds, suitable matches for boys and girls. Inter-caste marriages upto a certain extent are sanctioned by Sastras and they are now recognised by law. With such marriages becoming more frequent, the evil of prices being paid sometimes for bride-grooms and sometimes for brides will disappear. This pernicious practice has ruined many homes and has occasioned many suicides. Reform in this direction is urgently called for.

SOCIAL DISABILITIES SHOULD GO.

I include under the head, Social rights of individuals and classes, such questions as interdinings; free social intercourse between individuals belonging to different castes; admission in the various castes of people belonging to other faiths seeking such admission; untouchability; freedom to enter temples to offer divine worship; use of wells and tanks and public schools. It is only in this unfortunate country that a man is regarded as untouchable by another. And it is a matter of shame that those who believe in वसुदेव कुटुम्बकं (Mankind form one family), whose Sastras teach them that all man are brethren, and that there is divine essence in every man, woman and child should practice untouchability, and regard certain classes of men and women as untouchables. If it is true that "bani adam azai yak degrand," and if all mankind are regarded as forming one family, why should those who follow certain most useful and necessary professions be regarded as untouchables and be looked upon as less than men and women. Everyone has a right to use public wells and tanks and roads; to read in public schools maintained by public revenues; and to worship God in temples. Places of divine worship and temples are places dedicated to the Deity, and as God is the God of all peoples, irrespective of caste or colour, rich or poor, high or low, no person or persons can rightfully prevent any other class of persons from approaching the Creator and offering worship in those places. Those who do so prevent people, deny that God is the God of all mankind.

PROPER TREATMENT OF THE DEPRESSED CLASSES.

It is of prime importance for the Hindus to do away with the evil of untouchability. It has yet to be realized by them that the future of the Hindus as a community depends to a great extent on a proper treatment of the depressed classes, and on their whole-hearted co-operation. All well wishers of the country must therefore see that this question is solved to the satisfaction of those classes. Fortunately, the question of untouchability, except in the case of the small class of sweepers, is practically non-existent in Upper India.

I cannot do better than quote here the excellent observations made by His Excellency Lord Irwin in his reply to the address presented to him by the Madras Depressed Classes Federation on the 12th of this month. In three sentences full of profound wisdom and sympathy, he summed up in a masterly way the greatness of Hinduism and the strength and weakness of the Hindu caste system. He said:—

"All the world knows the greatness of the Hindu religion, its power for good as a religious and a social force, its ideals of national and family life, its inspiration in art and literature, its vitality and absorbent powers. With its roots deep in the soil of antiquity, it has produced a civilisation which has stood the test of time. In that civilisation, barriers of caste are a recognised feature and have no doubt served a useful purpose in the various stages of its progress; but the world never stands still, and looking at the political, intellectual and economic forces by which it is to-day being moved, I cannot doubt that a tenet which aims at debarring millions of human beings from concourse with their fellows must in the end prove a grave weakness to Hindu society."

WOMAN'S QUESTION SUPREME.

The most important question, however, as it concerns every man and woman in the country, and as it vitally affects society, is the position of woman and her rights. The woman question is in one shape or another a world question. In India it is of especial importance at the present moment, as on the right and speedy solution of it, hinges the future welfare of the country. The pivot of life is the home and the home is the woman's citadel. She is the presiding genius of the household. People test a nation's civilization from the position women occupy in it. In Islam, the most democratic religious organization in the world, theoretically her position is high and her rights are to a great extent safeguarded by law. Amongst the Hindus of old, she occupied a position of great respect and consideration, enjoyed great privileges and in certain respects held a dominant position in the family.

The Rigveda, (Mandala 10, verse 45) says:—

Over thy husband's father and thy husband's mother, bear full sway. Over the sisters of thy lord and over his brothers, rule supreme."

The Shatapath Brahmana (5. 2. 10) says:—

"She the wife, in sooth, is half of his own self, hence as long as he does not obtain her, so long is he not regenerated, for, so long is he incomplete."

Manu says:—

"The mouth of a woman is constantly to be held in the same esteem as running water, or a beam of sunlight."—Ch. V. 133.

"Where women are honoured, there the deities are pleased; and where they are not honoured, no religious rite yields rewards. Where women live in grief, the family soon perishes, but the family where they are happy ever prospers."—Ch. III 55.

The Mahabharata, the grandest of the epics of the world says:—

"The wife is the best of friends: the wife is the root of threefold worldly activity: the wife is the root of salvation."

"Strike not even with a blossom a wife guilty of hundred faults," says a Hindu sage,—"a sentiment so delicate," says Colonel Tod "that Reginald de Born, the prince of Troubadours never uttered any more refined."

STATUS OF HINDU WOMEN IN ANCIENT TIMES.

Hindu scriptures show that women were given the highest education in ancient times. They held their own in philosophical and literary discussions with the most eminent scholars of the time. Gargiya and Maitriya are names wellknown for their learning. Women occupied a position of equality with men in every respect. They accompanied their husbands every where, sometimes even to the battlefields, and fought by their side, performing deeds of valour. Kekayi, Satyabhama and others are instances in point. Women enjoyed rights of property. Even in the Vedas there is mention of women growing old in their father's houses and claiming their share of the paternal estate. A wife's co-ownership of property was recognised in that the husband could not make a religious gift without her consent. The legal status of a wife and the equal treatment accorded to her with her husband is thus defined in law :—

1. If a wife dies, her husband may marry another wife. (Manu, Ch. V. v. 165).

If a husband dies, a wife may marry another husband (Manu quoted by Madhava and Vidyanatha Dikshita ; Parasara Smriti ; Narada ; Yagnavalkya, quoted by Krishnacharya ; Agni Parana ; Smriti, quoted Chetti Koneri Acharya and Janardana Bhatta).

2. If a wife becomes fallen by drunkenness or immorality, her husband may marry another. (Manu, Ch. IX, v. 80 ; Yagnavalkya, page 416, v. 73.)

If a husband becomes fallen, a wife may marry another husband (Manu, quoted by Madhava and several other authorities above mentioned).

3. If a wife be barren, her husband may marry another wife (Manu Ch. IX, v. 81).

If a husband be impotent she may marry another husband (Manu, and several other authorities quoted above).

4. In particular circumstances, a wife may cease to cohabit with her husband (Manu, Ch. IX, v. 79).

5. If a husband deserts his wife, she may marry another (Manu, Ch. IX, v. 76, and several others).

6. If a wife treats her husband with aversion, he may cease to co-habit with her (Manu, Ch. IX, v. 77).

7. A husband must be revered (Manu, Ch. V, v. 154).

A wife must be honoured by the husband (Manu, Ch. III, v. 55).

8. A good wife irradiates the house and is a goddess of wealth (Manu, Ch. IX, v. 26).

A good husband makes his wife entitled to honour (Manu, Ch. IX, v. 23).

INFLUENCE OF HINDU WOMEN.

With the political downfall of the Hindus came their social decline, and the legal position of women deteriorated. In the matter of marriage, in matters of inheritance and her position in the family, many of her rights have been taken away from her and her freedom has been restricted. But though her freedom has been restricted, and owing to the desirability of maintaining intact the joint family system, legal power to enforce many of her rights has been taken away from her, yet it is generally true that the position she occupies in the family is predominant, and the influence she exercises in domestic matters almost supreme. Traducers of Indians, professional decriers of weak nations, who have made it a business to defame subject peoples for political purposes like the notorious Miss Katherine Mayo, may with the aid of imagination, depict the condition of Indian women in family life as deplorable. But those who are acquainted with the real condition of things and who have a knowledge of the working of family life in this country, know well that women occupy even now a most respected position in Indian households, and that their influence remains unimpaired. The late Mrs. Ramsay MacDonald, on her return home from a tour in India with her husband, the present Prime Minister of England, declared that the influence of Hindu woman in domestic and social matters was supreme and that she possessed a greater sense of honour than men.

SOME URGENT REFORMS.

Monogamy should be made the strict rule of life. Polygamy in its origin was an economic measure. When more men were wanted for fighting purposes and tribal strength had to be kept up, polygamy perhaps had its use. But times have changed, and this institution has now become positively harmful. Ethically, it cannot be justified ; and students of Indian history know how disastrous have been its consequences on the politics of the country. The history of every State in Rajputana is stamped with the dire results of this evil custom. The dissensions amongst the nobles of Mewar which paralyzed its power and allowed Babur to consolidate his position, illustrates the disastrous consequence of the evil custom.

If a man can claim restitution of conjugal rights, a woman is equally entitled to do so, though in the case of both, such rights should be governed by considerations of the welfare and happiness of the parties.

Widow re-marriage should become as general as widower remarriage at present is. If marriage is a sacrament, and can be performed only once in life, why is a widower allowed to perform it a second, a third or a fourth time when a widow is not so allowed ? A husband is as much subject to the conditions of the sacrament as a wife is. The evils of enforced widowhood are many and widespread ; and apart from the great injustice it does to women, it has its repercussions in the entire field of domestic life, and produces most harmful effects on the body politic of the Hindus.

RIGHTS OF INHERITANCE FOR WOMEN.

It has also become essential now that full rights of inheritance should be secured to women. If a son gets a share in his patrimony, on what moral or spiritual grounds, can a daughter be refused her share ? The natural rights of both are equal,

Marriage and transplanation in another family may modify the extent of the right, but should not take it away completely. She is also entitled to a share in her husband's property. She becomes by marriage a member of her husband's family and must ipso facto acquire rights of property in that family. I have introduced in the Central Legislature, a bill to give a Hindu widow right to inherit her husband's share in the family property, along with her sons if any. The key to secure and strengthen her lawful position in the family is to give her a legally enforceable right of inheritance. As soon as her just right in family property is secured to her by law, most of her troubles will be over.

WRONG FOREIGN INTERPRETATION OF LAW.

Hindu women have suffered not at the hands of Indians only. Part of her troubles is due to the fact that India has the misfortune of having her Sastrie laws interpreted and administered by strangers—to her traditions, strangers to her culture and ignorant of the language in which the laws exist. Moreover, these judges were till very recently very backward in their ideas of women's rights. We know with what difficulty and after what hard struggle, the Englishwoman has been able to secure her right of franchise; while the Indians with age-long traditions of chivalry behind them have already conceded this right to women in some provinces, and are ready to give it to the rest as soon as it is desired. Mr. M. B. Jayakar, in his learned Presidential Address to the 41st Indian National Social Conference last year at Calcutta, said:—

“The Englishman was not accustomed until the eighties to regard women in his own country as independently capable of acquiring or holding property. English women got this right at a very late stage. With this bias in his mind, it is not surprising that the English judge at Westminster, in interpreting ancient Indian texts written in a language which he did not understand, and of the context of which too he was personally ignorant, adopted a position inclining more towards limited female rights than towards absolute ones. In a celebrated ruling which laid down for all time that inheritance derived by women from a male in their husband's family can never become their absolute property, the Privy Council, being solely dependent upon confusing rival quotations cited on opposite sides, have actually the Mitakshara rule in favour of more ancient and doubtful texts vaguely prescribing an ascetic life for Hindu widows. The bias thus acquired by judicial decisions has unconsciously survived to the present day. The English judge in England and in India, owing to his natural caution born of his ignorance of the language and the habits of the people, has fought shy of liberal interpretations except when compelled by the clearest evidence. The whole administration has been, so far as Hindu Law is concerned as grievously unnatural as if Japanese judges sat at Westminster in 1928, giving rulings on the domestic laws of Englishmen from Japanese translations of Bracton or Coke or Lytteton, unconcerned with the mighty social changes which had taken place in English society since those times of which they had no conception owing to their isolation.

The time has now come to put an end to the judicial system under which English Judges—though capable and conscientious but ignorant of Indian conditions and ideals of life and the language in which the laws are written—are invested with power to interpret and administer Hindu Law.

WIDER FIELD OF SOCIAL LEGISLATION.

Social reform, as popularly understood, is reform of evil customs and practices; but social legislation covers a much larger field and we must now enlarge the sphere of legislation in our country by including in it all measures calculated to promote the health and happiness of men and women, increase their comfort, and help the general welfare of society.

EXHORTATION TO YOUNG WOMEN AND MEN.

And now I appeal to the women and young men of India. I appeal to the women to prove themselves worthy daughters of the brave women of India who, in days gone by, covered the history of this country with glory. It was the women of India who made heroes of men and inspired them to perform deeds of valour which are sung in the country and are remembered and admired everywhere. Take the case of Rajputs. The history of Rajput heroism is the history of the heroism of Rajput women. It was the Rajput women who inspired their husbands and brothers and sons to do great deeds. They not only defended their minor sons' rights with exemplary valour, but actually headed troops in their places. Read the historian Feristha's animated picture of Durgvati, the queen of Gurrah who, like another Boadicea, headed the army and fought a desperate battle with Akbar's general Asaf Khan, in which she was wounded. Scorning flight or to survive the loss of independence, she like the antique Roman in such circumstances, slew herself on the field of battle. Remember how, on the death of the Rana of Chitor on the battlefield of Thaneshwar, his heir Karan Singh being a minor, the queen-mother Korum Devi, headed her Rajputs and gave battle in person to Qutbuddin Aibak near Amber (Jaipur) when Qutbuddin was defeated and wounded. Jawahir Bai, another queen-mother of Chitor in order to set an example of courageous devotion, headed a sally during the seige of that fortress by Bahadur Shah of Gujerat in which she was slain. The unparalleled heroism displayed by the mother of Fattah during the seige of Chitor by Akbar is unforgettable. Says Colonel Tod:—

“When the Saloombra fell at the gate of the Sun, the command devolved on Fattah of Kailwa. He was only 16. His father had fallen in the last shock and his mother had survived but to rear the sole heir of their house. Like the Spartan mother of old, she commanded him to put on the saffron robe—the robe that Rajputs put on when determined to die in a fight—and die for Chitor; but surpassing the Grecian dams she illustrated her precept by example; and lest any soft compunctious visitings for one dearer than herself might dim the lustre of Kailwa, she armed the young bride with a lance, with her descended the rock, and the defenders of Chitor saw her fall fighting by the side of her Amazonian mother. When their wives and daughters performed such deeds, the Rajputs became reckless of life."

Another instance of how Rajput women compelled the men to defend their country and die in its defence is related by the French traveller Bernier. When Maharaja Jaswant Singh of Jodhpur, after losing the battle of Fatehabad about the middle of the 17th Century, retired with only a handful of followers to Jodhpur, his queen refused to see him. Bernier says:—

"I cannot forbear to relate the fierce reception which the daughter of the Rana gave to her husband Jaswant Singh after his defeat and flight. When she heard he was nigh, and had understood what had passed in the battle, that he had fought with all possible courage; that he had but four or five hundred men left; and at last, no longer able to resist the enemy, had been forced to retreat; instead of sending some one to condole with him in his misfortune, she commanded in a dry mood to shut the gate of the castle, and not to let this infamous man enter; that he was not her husband;.....In a word, he was to vanquish or to die."

The magnificent example of woman's valour and devotion to her country so finely displayed by that immortal heroine, Queen Lakshmbai of Jhansi, during the days of the Sepoy war must ever inspire you to remain true to your ideals.

I will not tire your patience with more examples of woman's courage, sense of duty and devotion to her country. The noble traditions of heroism left by your forbears should ever be kept untarnished. Let the sons and daughters you rear, be such as would uphold the honour of the country and restore to our motherland her past grandeur and glory. There was a time when in my part of the country the ideal of motherhood was embodied in the famous line—

जननी जने तो ऐसो जन के दाता के दूर,

"O Mother, let thy offspring be either a great benefactor or a hero ;

My appeal to you, young men, is to break the bonds of convention and custom. Fight against evil customs and pernicious practices. Emancipate the women. Cultivate the spirit of self denial of the Brahman of old, become as fearless and as devoted to duty as the Rajput of medieval times. Remember also that a sound social system is the only basis for a lasting political structure to be raised on it. Forget not that an enormous amount of social work has to be done in the country. Let every young man in India work with the unshakeable resolution born of the conviction which inspired William Pitt at the age of 24 to declare, "I know that I can save England and I know that no one else can save it." Lay to heart the sound advice of the great Goethe, and act accordingly—

Ponder well and know the right
Onward, then, with all thy might.

THAT MEN MAY ALL BE BROTHERS.

MEDITATIONS FOR THE YEAR.

LII. THE GREAT COMMUNITY.

During the past few months we have been endeavouring to share the lives of the people whom we are daily meeting, but with whom we may have felt that we have little or nothing in common. We have tried to show that though men may differ in occupation and general outlook, they still have certain common ideals and aspirations. We have attempted to take a cross section of our every-day life and so to delineate it, that men would actually feel themselves to be akin to their fellow-men. Our underlying idea is more worthy than has been our execution of it, but we do venture to hope that some good has been accomplished. Unless mankind does recognise its underlying unity, there is scant reason to expect that civilisation as we know it will continue. Unless we learn the lesson of co-operation there is little to look forward to save a resounding crash. Individuals and nations cannot utterly oppose one another and still expect to dwell in peace and harmony. Understanding and good will seem to be the only way out, and the object of this series of papers has been to create understanding.

The great Prophet of Nazareth once spoke the following parable to his disciples: "The kingdom of heaven is like to a grain of mustard seed, which a man took, and sowed in his field, which indeed is the least of all seeds, but when it is grown, it is the greater among herbs and becometh a tree, so that the birds of the air come and lodge in the branches thereof." So it is with the Great Community—the Kingdom of Goodwill. It progresses from small beginnings. A voice is heard, another voice is heard there; a newspaper begins to champion the cause; the public becomes awakened; and soon a mighty movement is under way having for its aim the righting of a wrong, giving some unprivileged group a chance, or making a definite contribution to the public welfare. First the seed, and then in the fulness of time the tree. The one lesson that we need to learn and often to re-learn, is the lesson of patience.

And now as we come to the end, your mind cannot but turn again to the words of that far-seeing prophet, Isaiah. Living centuries ago in a day of religious formalism, he sensed the true meaning of religion, and laid down a formula that is still a worthy guide to both religionists and to social workers.

"Is it such a fast that I have chosen? a day for a man to afflict his soul? is it to bow down his head as a bulrush, and to spread sackcloth and ashes under him? wilt thou call this a fast, and an acceptable day to the Lord?"

"Is not this the fast that I have chosen to loose the hands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke?

"Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry, and that thou bring the poor that are cast out to thy house? When thou seest the naked, that thou cover him; and that thou hide not thyself from thine own flesh?"

"Then shall thy light break forth as the morning, and thine health shall spring forth speedily, and thy righteousness shall go before thee....."

"And the Lord shall guide thee continually, and satisfy thy soul in drought, and make fat thy bones, and thou shalt be like a watered garden, and like a spring of water, whose waters fail not."

THE VICEROY AND THE INDIAN YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

H. E. the Viceroy showed his interest in the Indian Y. M. C. A. of which he is Patron, by interrupting his programme, during a tour of Travancore, to pay a visit to the Y.M.C.A. in Trivandrum, the capital of the State. Trivandrum ranks second to Madras as a centre of student life in South India, and a large gathering of all castes and communities crowded the new building of the Y.M.C.A. on December 8th to honour the distinguished guest. The visit was quite informal, and before leaving, although he had asked that there should be no speeches, His Excellency came back to the platform and addressed a few words to the gathering.

Speaking extempore he said, that though he had made it a condition before accepting their invitation that his visit should be completely informal and there should be no speeches, he felt that courtesy required that, even at the point of breaking a rule he had endeavoured to lay down, he must say a few words of thanks for allowing him the pleasure of visiting their premises and seeing those who are engaged in the work. He found it hardly possible to believe that everything he had been shown was only a year old. Even more than the pleasure of seeing the buildings was his pleasure in seeing the people who were working there and those for whom they were working. Nothing had struck him more during his visit to Travancore than the immensely valuable contribution that was being made, up and down the length of the State, by such agencies as this, and the contribution they were making to the life and development, in the best sense of the word of the whole population.

"If I may conclude with one word," said His Excellency, to the young men who have come or will come within the influence of the Young Men's Christian Association, "I would like to say this. To all young men who are here, and many thousands outside, life is going to offer a very, very great opportunity. As they grow up, they will find themselves differing in political thought and in their general outlook on life. If however they will only come together through agencies like this, finding the one foundation of life which really matters, namely the combination of education with a foundation of religion, be that whatever it may, they will be able to compose their differences and to fulfil that which has been the honourable motto of this Association namely, partnership in service. And their service will be for the greater good of their community, the greater good of Travancore State, the greater good of India, and the greater good of the still wider field, the world. Let this Association always keep the glamour, charm, romance and powers of youth. Let it always look forward to the development of youth with all the enthusiasm, zeal and energy youth alone can give. Thus will all be enabled, with the growing experience of years and with an enthusiasm that is ever new, to approach new problems and extend their field of service. I thank you for allowing me to see you, and I can wish you nothing better than that you may continue the work you are doing and the fine things for which the Association stands. You may ever hold a large place in the world in which your labours are carried on."

One phase of Y. M. C. A. work, though not mentioned in His Excellency's speech, found a place on Viceregal table. Near Trivandrum the Y.M.C.A. maintains one of its rural reconstruction centres at the village of Martandam where a valuable demonstration work is being done in poultry rearing, bee keeping, cottage industries, &c. A day or two before the Viceroy's visit to Trivandrum, the villagers of the Martandam Y.M.C.A. were flattered, and their hen-runs not a little flattered, by a telegram ordering a hundred eggs to be sent to the State Guest House for the Viceroy's party. It meant much to the villagers to know that they were in a position to supply eggs good enough for the Viceroy's table.

CHRISTMAS SEASON.

The Editor The Indian Social Reformer.

Sir:—The Christmas season is the season of the year above all others when nations, societies, and individuals put aside their animosities and disagreements, and experience something of that benevolent spirit that animated the Founder of Christianity.

Christ was the Light of the world. He came to us in the flesh. He will come again in the flesh, and unite all nations into one under a theocratic rule. At that time there will be no United States of America, and no United States of Europe, but the United States of the world. God will be king and Father to all races on earth, and Christ, His Son, will be the Prince of Peace.

Christ was the Light of the World. Then at Christmas time, the anniversary of His appearance in the world, let us put lights in our windows to symbolize Him who was the true Light. These Lights will also serve to express our hope and confidence that He will not leave us desolate at this time of our need, at this time of the world's need, but that He will come again, and set our feet upon true paths. We sweep, decorate, and light our houses when we expect an honoured guest. Then let us set lights in our windows to welcome that Guest of guests who is coming, and who is coming quickly.

Coeur d'Alene, Idaho, U.S.A.

Yours etc.

THE SOCIAL SERVICE LEAGUE, BOMBAY.

REPORT OF THE WORK DONE DURING THE YEAR 1928.

The following is a brief summary of the report of the work done by the Social Service League, Bombay, during the year 1928.

The League maintains four centres, i. e., the Head Office in Girgaon, (2) The Parel Settlements, (3) The Madanpura Settlement, (4) and the working-men's Institute.

NIGHT SCHOOL.

During the year under report the League maintained 9 night schools out of which one was Anglo-Marathi, two Anglo-Gujarathi, 4 Anglo-Urdu, and two Night High Schools. The total number of students on the roll in all these night schools was 413, the average daily attendance being 310. Six of the night schools received grants-in-aid from the Bombay Municipality.

In three of the night schools at the Madanpura Settlement Boys' Clubs were continued and 28 meetings were held.

LIBRARIES AND READING ROOMS.

There were three standing libraries, 3 reading rooms and 38 boxes of travelling free library during the year under report. All the libraries contained 9,808 books and pamphlets in Marathi, Gujarathi, Urdu and English and the total number of books issued during the year was 4,339. The number of those who took advantage of the Libraries and Reading rooms was 125.

MAGIC LANTERN LECTURES.

During the year under report 12 lantern lectures were arranged under the auspices of the League, the subjects of lectures being "Co-operation," "Social Service," "Child Welfare," etc.,

TEXTILE TECHNICAL SCHOOL.

There are in all six classes in this school, 3 in each of the two departments, viz., spinning and weaving, each class requiring a year's instruction. This school is equipped with machinery necessary for demonstration in practical training. At the beginning of the year under report there were 32 students on the roll, the daily average attendance being 25. Twenty-two students appeared for the examinations and out of them 16 were successful. Six students appeared for the final year examination, and five of them passed it and were given certificates.

This school receives grants-in-aid from the Bombay Municipality and the Committee of Direction for Technical Education.

BOY SCOUT TROOP.

At the end of the year this Troop consisted of 40 scouts and 8 Rovers. Patrol classes were regularly held and the students went through the theoretical course in scouting. Parade drill and games were regularly held and several excursions and camps were organized during the year under report.

BAI BACHUBAI CHARITABLE DISPENSARY FOR WOMEN AND CHILDREN.

This dispensary is maintained by the League at Parel. During the year under report the total number of patients treated at this dispensary was 21,987, of whom 11,717 were women and 10,270 children. The daily average number of patients was 73. A grant is received in aid of this dispensary from the Bombay Municipality. On behalf of the Arya Mahila Samaj, Bombay, milk is supplied free to needy mothers and children at this dispensary at the recommendation of the lady doctor. In the year under report the cost of milk thus distributed came to Rs. 828-8-0.

FREE EYE TREATMENT.

At the Madanpura Settlement Dr. S. R. Machave of the Blind Relief Association continued to attend twice a week to the eye complaints of poor people. During the year under report 2,551 patients were treated.

SANITATION ROUNDS.

During the year under report four sanitation rounds were arranged in the different wards of the city, and the reports of the insanitary conditions noted and complaints received from the inhabitants of the respective localities, in the course of these rounds, were forwarded to the authorities concerned. Also several representations were made to Municipal authorities by whom, most of these complaints were attended to.

MISS FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE VILLAGE SANITATION FUND.

This fund is administered by the League. During the year under report four applications were received for grants and the total amount sanctioned was Rs. 300.

WORK FOR WOMEN.

This work consists of sewing and cutting classes, home industry classes, reading room lectures and meetings etc. During the year under report the total number of students attending sewing and cutting classes was 122, the daily average attendance being 65. The schools committee of the Bombay Municipal Corporation has recognized the eighteen months' course in these classes as qualification for employment as sewing mistresses in its schools. In the year under report these classes were registered with the Educational Department of the Bombay Government and the Director of Public Instruction was pleased to sanction a grant-in-aid. Home industry classes were attended by forty women. Several ordinary and lantern lectures were organized for the benefit of women during the year under report. A sewing cutting class is maintained at Vile Parle, and during the year under report the number of students on the roll at Parle was 45. The work for women is managed by the Mahila Mandal, Parel (The Women's Branch of Social Service League, Bombay).

INDUSTRIAL SETTLEMENT AT BELGAUM.

In the year under report the League received a proposal from the Government for undertaking the management of the Industrial (Criminal Tribes) Settlement at Belgaum. The League accepted the proposal and sent Mr. M. B. Bade, B. A., B. Sc., one of its life-workers, to take over the management of the Settlement, which consisted of 145 persons, men, women and children. Sanitation, education and recreation are looked after by the manager, who has also started a co-operative society for the inmates of the Settlement. The expense of this settlement are met from the capitulation grant received from the Government.

WORK FOR OTHER INSTITUTIONS.

Messrs. P. G. Naik, D. S. Savardekar and A. W. Phanse worked for the Bombay Released Prisoner's Aid Society, the Children's Aid Society, the Bombay Vigilance Association and the Society for the protection of Children in Western India, during the year under report.

CO-OPERATION.

There were 38 Co-operative societies under the League's supervision. The total membership of these societies in the year under report was 3,447; working capital, Rs. 1,47,031; Share capital Rs. 61,555; reserve fund Rs. 20,156; and during the same period loans amounting to Rs. 1,18,493 were advanced to needy members, the amount recovered during the same period being Rs. 95,213. 12 lectures on co-operation and allied subjects were arranged during the year.

RECREATION FOR THE WORKING CLASSES.

The Indian Gymnasium attached to the Parel Settlement was taken advantage of by about 50 men daily on an average during the year. Forty-six dramatic performances were performed in the Damodar Thackersey Hall, and out of these 8 were given by the Sahakari Manoranjan Mandal which is an amateur dramatic club formed under the auspices of the League. Open air sports were organized for the students of a night-school conducted by the League and two fresh air excursions were arranged for two of the night schools.

LEGAL ADVICE AND PETITION WRITING.

Mr. A. G. Shaik, B. A., LL. B., continued to attend the Madanpura Settlement on every Sunday and gave free legal advice to 63 persons during the year under report. At the same settlement 218 letters, 129 applications and 43 petitions were written on behalf of poor illiterate persons. At the Workingmen's Institute 249 petitions, applications, complaints notices etc., were written during the same period. A number of workmen's Compensation cases were also dealt with.

PROPAGANDA WORK.

In the year under report the League continued the publication of two quarterlies, viz., the Social Service Quarterly and the Samaj Sevak, in English and Marathi respectively, maintained an Information Bureau and Register of charities, a library of books on social and labour questions, and organized a social workers' training class. Thirty-five lectures on different subjects were arranged in this class and were attended by 74 students among whom there were several ladies.

MEMORANDA TO GOVERNMENT.

The views of the League's Managing Committee were called for by the Government and were duly forwarded to it on the Dangerous Drugs Bill, the Trade Disputes Bill and the Workmen's Compensation (Amendment) Bill.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Queen buys Portrait of Sheshanna.—The Indian exhibition in London was honoured by the visit of the Queen who was interested in the examples of Indian art and purchased a portrait of Veena Sheshanna, the musician. The Queen also admired the decoration showing inlaid work on the cornice of Delhi dome with which Fyzee Rahmin presented Her Majesty.

Signor Mussolini And Birth Control.—A new Italian Penal Code has been introduced bringing drastic changes into the law of the land in the right direction. Among the offences punishable by law is propaganda in favour of birth control. Anyone publicly advocating its practice or carrying on a campaign in its favour is made liable to a fine of 50,000 lire or a year's imprisonment.

Stagnation In The Arya Samaj.—Says the Liberator:—"Taken on whole, it must be admitted that the movement has been more or less stationary during the past one year. Something like a feverish activity was visible for a time in one or other of the various centres of the movement but when we start counting the cash at the end of the day, we find that there has been little addition to what we had before. Even on such a point as the establishment of the right of the Samaj to carry nagarkirtan processions in various parts of the country, our achievement has been on the negative side. The Moradabad satyagraha campaign which was being widely canvassed and for which preparations appeared to be in progress, fizzled out. To our mind even the failure on the part of the Samaj to carry out the campaign of satyagraha is by no means so great as the absence of real work in the propagation of the gospel of Rishi Dayanand. How many non-Aryas have been into the fold of the Aryan religion during the year? What is the progress which we can point to in the matter of keeping alive the teachings of the Swami?"

Mrs. Whitley on Indians:—Mrs. Whitley, wife of the chairman of the Royal Labour Commission, in the course of an interview observed "Send your young men, who have had the benefit of Cambridge and Oxford education to the villages. 'Mass education is the only remedy to make your villagers and workers read. English workers read the morning paper and that is why they are earning more. When every one of India's vast population learns to read and write there can be no nation in the world so much advanced as she will be.'" The illiteracy of the Indian workers pained Mrs. Whitley much. She said that mass education was India's salvation. Mrs. Whitley was very much impressed with Indian hospitality, India is a very wonderful country and her people are wonderfully patient and good-tempered, she stated. Mrs. Whitley paid a glorious tribute to Indian womanhood who, in her opinion, were adorable. Indian women were very gentle, sweet and capable. Comparatively Indian women were unselfish and clean in their habits. The labouring classes, though they lived in dingy chawls, had their floors well swept and things well arranged, whereas in the English worker's house, everything was in confusion. Mrs. Whitley, summing up her impression of India, said that the country's prospects would improve, if efforts were taken to educate the masses. Mrs. Whitley paid a tribute to Gandhiji for having awakened the consciousness of the masses.

NOTES.

Presidential Addresses:—A large part of this issue is taken up with extracts from the presidential address of Sir Phiroze Sethna and Pandit Jawharlal Nehru at the Liberal Federation in Madras and the National Congress at Lahore respectively. We feel an explanation is due for devoting so much space in a weekly paper to utterances which have been published in extenso in the daily papers. The Reformer from the first has been not only a review but also a record of all important pronouncements having a bearing, direct or indirect, on the social life of the people. The presidential addresses at the two most important political gatherings this year, are of special significance inasmuch as they lay down the broad lines of India's political evolution. While Sir Phiroze holds that such evolution can best be advanced within the British Commonwealth, Pandit Jawharlal Nehru is convinced that it should and could be only independently of the British connection. The difference between the two may be illustrated by reference to a parallel in social reform. A large number of Indians are dissatisfied to a more or less extent with the social systems in which they are born. Some disgusted with the old customs have gone over to other communities where, they thought better customs prevail, and a few have settled down in Europe or America where they find social conditions more congenial. To this latter group, belong those who have married foreign wives finding it easier to do so than to educate and train Indian wives to the manner acceptable to them. Others, by far the largest number, have preferred to stay in their own communities and to work for the social betterment of their own people. Judging by the results during the last one hundred years, it is quite plain that the latter method has been fruitful of greater good to the people of India than the former. The Indian Christian Community is advanced in education and social life, but it has become isolated and as the result of its isolation is not contributing as much as it might to the general progress. Not only that, but it has itself suffered owing to this isolation, but, we are glad, that far-seeing leaders of the Community are exerting themselves actively to break down this isolation and to bring the Community into organic relations with the parent communities. Coming to the British connection, it is clear that though only of two centuries duration, it has struck root into and greatly influenced Indian culture and outlook. We are therefore bound to it by ties not dissimilar to those which binds us to our respective communities. For good or evil, India internationally belongs to the English-speaking group of nations in the world. The right policy for us to follow is the one which, in the social sphere, has been tried and proved most effective to bring about wholesome reforms.

Women Of Asia:—We warmly support Mrs. Margaret Cousins' suggestion to hold an All-Asian Women's Conference, the first session to be held in this country. The reasons for convening a conference of this kind are admirably set forth in her letter which we print to-day. For centuries there was no essential difference between the Eastern and Western ideals of womanhood. During the last fifty or seventy years, the democratic principle has pervaded social no less than political life, and women in the West have made great strides towards equality with men in all spheres of life. This equalitarian movement has affected the East, but owing chiefly to the prevailing illiteracy of women it has touched only a small fraction of the population. While the fundamental principle is the same for East and West, namely, that women's status should be in no way inferior and that they, like men, should have full freedom of personality and opportunities for service, the way in which it should be applied need not be identical in all countries. It may be that the women of Asia will be able to improve upon the modes of the West so that eventually we may, as in the past, have a single ideal for the East as well as the West. There are also other reasons for an Asian Women's Conference, which are clearly indicated by Mrs. Margaret Cousins.

The Hindu Annual:—The Hindu Annual for the year 1929 maintains the high standard which is expected of it both in its contributions and illustrations. The articles are mostly on subjects which are topical and range from high politics, descriptive accounts to stories and sketches in a lighter vein. The special feature of the Annual is the number of contributions on the burning questions of the day from the pen of English friends of India like Mr. Fenner Brockway, Major Graham Pole and others whose unceasing efforts to secure the political freedom of this country both in parliament and outside are well known. The cultural subjects have a due share in the Annual, art and music having found fitting exponents. The readable stories written with a purpose to ridicule some social custom or an individual foible will help to while away many a weary hour. The colour plates and pictures reproduced from the works of rising young artists give an adequate idea of the revival of art in this country. The selection of illustrations might have been better. The inclusion in it of one of the pictures from the Wilson studio, is not quite in tune with the rest of the Annual. It would have been more distinctive of the presidency if the Annual had made it a point to select its studies from the type common there.

Company Of Books :—In a very learned and interesting address to the All-India Library Conference held at Lahore during Congress week, Sir P. C. Ray showed the value of reading habit in one's life. Speaking about himself, Dr. Ray said that the most precious portion of his life had been divided between the library and the laboratory. "I might add," said Dr. Ray "that the company of books in which are enshrined the thoughts master-minds has been a source of perennial joy to me. It has enabled me to drown, nay, to defy many a sorrow." Dr. Ray lamented that a taste for reading and a love for books was rarely found among students. Dr. Ray remarked that a good library is a national asset and that books are the priceless treasures of the wisdom of nations. He also expressed satisfaction that the library movement had taken root and that there were organisations of district and taluka libraries and associations in various parts of the country. Every student should take to heart Dr. Ray's words and strenuously cultivate the reading habit.

Opposed To Communal Representation :—It must be said to the credit of the Christian community that it has been consistently opposed to communal representation. The Rev. B. A. Nag in his presidential address to the All-India Christian Conference gave expression to the feeling of his community in this respect when he observed, "I trust we all realise how harmful communal electorates are to a minority community like ours. Such electorates make the majority communities absolutely independent of the minority communities and often hostile to them. The majority communities can thus by sheer force of numbers override the wishes of the minority." He is also opposed to nominations to the legislatures and local bodies because "they proclaim them as inferior to other communities in education, culture and influence." Mr. Nag wants Indian Christians as a minority community to lead the opposition against communal representation. The other communities clamouring for communal representation will do well to ponder over Mr. Nag's words.

The Late Dr. Swaminathan :—We regret to learn of the death of Dr. S. Swaminathan, M.A., LL.B., B. Sc. (Edin.), Ph. D. (Harvard), Barrister-at-law, on Tuesday night at his residence in Chetput. He was ailing for the last few days from heart trouble and in spite of medical help he succumbed. He belonged to a poor and respectable

Brahmin family in Malabar and by dint of sheer merit and perseverance he rose to be an eminent Advocate of the Madras High Court. The late Dr. Swaminathan though a busy lawyer, took a keen interest in the educational and civic affairs. For a number of years he was a member of the Senate of the Madras University and the City Corporation Council and his services to those bodies were very valuable. When the District Education Councils and the Secondary Education Boards were constituted he was appointed President of the Madras Council. He as an active worker in the Co-operative field and was one of the promoters of the recently formed Central Land Mortgage Bank. He was for some time the President of the Provincial Co-operative Bank, and the State Aided Bank of Travancore, Alleppey. We extend our heartfelt sympathy to his family.

The First Bombay Khoja Conference :—Mr. S. M. Merchant writes :—

"The Khojas of Bombay will be interested to learn that a Khoja Social Conference the first of its kind is shortly to be held in the city. Mr. M. A. Jinnah and other leading Khojas of the city have promised the Conference their valuable support. The preliminary meeting of the leading Khojas came off on Sunday the 15th instant in the Hall of the Muslim Students' Union and was attended by Mr. M. A. Jinnah, Mr. Bundalibhai Hajibhai, present Sheriff of Bombay, Mrs. Sakinabai Somjee, Mrs. A. Vishram, Miss Miani and many others. The meeting was of the unanimous opinion that there was a great need for such a Conference. The aims and objects of the Conference were considered and approved with a few alterations. Those present at the meeting formed themselves into a reception committee with Mr. M. C. Chagla as its president, and Lady Currimbhoy Ebrahim, Mrs. Sakinabai Somjee and Mr. A. M. Merchant as the Joint Honorary General Secretaries. The meeting fixed rupees ten as the minimum subscription for membership to the Reception Committee. An appeal is being issued to the members of the Khoja community to join the reception committee in large numbers in order to make the Conference a great success which it undoubtedly deserves to be.

The object of the Conference is to bring about better understanding between the Khojas of various sects and to promote their general welfare. The aims for which the Conference is being convened are :—

1. To combat harmful social customs.
2. To take steps for the spread of education, particularly technical and vocational. Special efforts to be made to promote female education.
3. To organise Home nursing and first aid classes for ladies.
4. To establish a Central Industrial School for Khojas.
5. To fight the growing menace of unemployment.
6. To assist the growth of the Library and kindred movements.
7. To popularise physical culture institutions and demonstrations.
8. To encourage the formation of co-operative societies.
9. To take part in such activities as may be beneficial to the carrying out of the above aims and objects."

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, JANUARY 4, 1930.

A FALSE STEP.

The proceedings at the National Congress at Lahore and the Liberal Federation at Madras, both of which began on Sunday, make it plain that Mahatma Gandhi has made a serious mistake in practically rejecting the offer of a Round Table Conference by the Viceroy with the approval and sanction of the British Government. This Conference is to be convened by the Prime Minister after the issue of the report of the Simon Commission but before the British Government drafts its proposals on the report for submission to Parliament, in order to allow Indian representatives to have the opportunity of stating their views on the recommendations of the Commission. The Legislative Assembly on the motion of Pandit Motilal Nehru himself had put forward, as the national demand, the suggestion that such a Conference should be called, and it was understood that the British Government and the Viceroy had this in mind in deciding upon calling the Conference. In the statement in which Lord Irwin made the announcement, he incidentally took occasion to remove a doubt which had been expressed as to the meaning of the Declaration of 1917. The Viceroy stated that it meant and was intended to mean that it is the policy and purpose of Britain to admit India to equal status with the self-governing Dominions. This is what the Declaration had been understood to mean by Indians and by several British publicists of note, and Mr. Baldwin, the late Conservative Prime Minister, said in the House of Commons that it could mean nothing else. But the Government of India in Lord Reading's time had thrown doubt on this point. The Viceroy's statement besides removing the doubt on this point said nothing and could have said nothing as to the time and conditions of India's admission to Dominion status. These remained subject to the qualifications mentioned in the Declaration and recited in the pre-ambule to the Act of Parliament which gave effect to the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms.

The Congress leaders were placed in a dilemma. At the Calcutta Congress in December last year they had been parties to a resolution to declare independence of the British connection as the goal if Dominion status were not conceded before the expiry of 1929. Mahatma Gandhi, Pandit Motilal Nehru and some other Congress leaders were content with Dominion status, but some others were for independence. The rank and file, as usual, was for the more radical claim, and in order to conciliate them, Mahatma Gandhi proposed the compromise. But he had suggested two years which, however, was reduced to one on the insistence of the Independence group. It was natural in these circumstances that the Viceroy should infer that if the goal of Dominion Status was placed beyond doubt, Mahatma Gandhi would feel and exert his influence to make the Congress feel that the principal condition having been satisfied, the resolution of the Independence goal became inoperative. But Mahatma Gandhi and Pandit Motilal Nehru professed to understand the Viceroy's statement to mean that Dominion Status was already granted and that the Round Table Conference was merely to work out the details of the scheme of Indian self-government. Mr. Lloyd George fastened upon this interpretation by the Congress leaders and demanded to know whether the British Government had agreed to it. In order, evidently to clear up the situation, Lord Irwin invited Mahatma Gandhi, Pandit Motilal Nehru, Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru and Mr. Jinnah to a personal interview. The two Congress leaders at that interview seem to have insisted on their interpretation of the Viceroy's statement and when Lord Irwin pointed out that neither he nor the British Government had authority to anticipate the decision of Parliament, they declined to join the proposed Conference and withdrew. They went to Lahore and the Congress passed by a large majority a resolution declaring Independence to be the objective of Indian politics.

The immediate step towards giving effect to the resolution which the Congress adopted, is to boycott the Legislatures, Provincial and Imperial. Pandit Motilal Nehru has lost no time in calling upon Congress members of the councils to resign their seats. It may be recalled that the Pandit on his own authority as the President of the Congress for last year had issued a similar fiat in the middle of the year, and if it had been obeyed, the Sarda Act would not have been passed. But he found the protests from Congress members so strong that he had to suspend his mandate for the time being. The President of the Legislative Assembly, the Hon. Mr. V. J. Patel, unveiling a statue to the late Lala Lajpat Rai in Lahore this week, spoke of the Sarda Act as a historic achievement. There are several other important Bills pertaining to urgent social reform either pending or awaiting introduction in the Legislature. We may mention as prominent instances Mr. Jayakar's Bills regarding women's property rights and the disabilities of the Antyajias. There is besides the important Coastal Traffic Reservation Bill which has reached the third reading stage in the Assembly. Several measures of industrial and economic amelioration, are ripe for legislation. The decision of the Congress to break up the continuity of such a beneficent history is nothing short of madness. The question of importance, to our mind, is not so much under what flag India should progress. The question is what the chances of progress are if the Congress resolution is to be taken seriously. These are very much less than they are sure to be if the reform of the present system of administration without breaking with Great Britain is pressed forward. It is the duty of all those who do not want the country to be plunged into a more or less prolonged period of social and economic regression and political chaos to make a determined stand against the destructive policy which the Congress has adopted under the guidance, we are sorry to say, of Mahatma Gandhi.

AN ALL-ASIAN WOMEN'S CONFERENCE.

(By Mrs. MARGARET E. COUSINS.)

Each Continent of the World has its own distinctive characteristics. Europe,—Asia,—America—what different feelings they call up in our minds! Asia, which contains more than half the population of the world, is utterly different from Latin and Teutonic Europe, or futuristic young, America. Each has its gift for the world. Each must retain its individuality for the enrichment of human unity.

The world "oriental" best expresses the quality of Asia. It calls up quietness, simplicity, agriculture rather than industrialism, arts and crafts rather than mass factory production, a realisation of Time stretching behind and before in aeons, an ever-present sense of a world of the spirit interpenetrating this world of the senses, poverty, pain, poise, patience, peace.

In the extremes of honour and of serfdom accorded to its Womanhood Asia is one. In its worship of the Family, in the hopes of the here and the hereafter that it places in the Child, in its marriage codes, in its illiteracy, in its present renaissance Asia is one. It has messages concerning the sanctity of life; the vocation of woman as race nourisher; ideals of art, philosophy and spirituality of a complementary nature to the views on these subjects entertained by other continents. None hold this oriental culture more tenaciously, more authentically than its women. But the Chinese woman sees more of her American sister than of her Burmese neighbour; the Hindu woman knows more of her British sister than of her Arabian or Afghan relative.

The tides of Western influence are pouring in on the oriental woman from all sides. They are already putting a modernist veneer over Japan. They have swept away cultural landmarks of Turkestan women. They seek to cast a glamour over India. The power to sift what is essential, what is appropriate for Asia from this surging life can only be wisely gained if ASIA AS ASIA gets together to review her own uniqueness, if she takes stock of her own assets of civilisation.

How can Asia's gifts be preserved? By bringing together the closest custodians of her inherent life, the women of Asia, that they may discuss their own cultural problems, and through a better knowledge of their fundamental differences from women of other lands may the more valuably be able to solve their difficulties, appreciate at its legitimate value the interchange of gifts from other lands and through keener appreciation of human relationships be the better fitted to preserve the peace of the world. It is essential that they meet face to face to know their common heritage, so that they may become self-conscious of the spiritual gifts with which they can serve the world.

The women of India have already experienced the inspiration of gathering together from all parts of India, and have realised the power of united service of the needs of this country. The women who met at the Women's Pan-Pacific Conference in Honolulu joined the hands of East and West. Women of Europe have many times rejoiced in their solidarity. The women of the Americas made vital contacts in their Pan-American Conference—but Asia lags behind in unified self-consciousness.

Cannot Bharatmata, Mother India, the foster mother of Asia's cultures, the caravanserai of Islam from the West, of the Aryan from the north, of the Buddhist returning from the East, cannot she call her daughters to her shores so that in a joint family they may review their oriental qualities and defects; organise the first for their own and world service; strengthen one another by understanding, knowledge of data, interchange of experience; remedy the evils of their illiteracy, their high death-rate, their infant mortality, their unequal national status. Such a union of Japanese, Korean, Chinese, Burmese, Javanese, Indian, Afghan, Tibetan, Arabian, Persian, Turkish, Jewish and other Asian women, can be brought together if a loving, wise, call to unity is sent forth bravely, strongly, unselfishly. Through such a Conference of Asian women more easily than in any other way can oriental gifts of spiritual consciousness, the fundamental value of the family, the holiness of Motherhood, the restfulness of simplicity, the happiness of unselfish service, be organised and made available for the helping of humanity.

Shall not we awakened and unified women in India invite the representatives of all the Asian family to meet in this focal, magnetic point of Asia as soon as possible? Honolulu will see another Pan-Pacific Women's Conference in August 1930, and in China in 1932. Let us plan for an All-Asian Women's Conference for 1931.

Offers of co-operation with this proposal, and opinions and suggestions concerning it are requested to be sent to Mrs. Cousins, International Representative of the Women's Indian Association, Pantheon Gardens, Egmore, Madras, who is willing to undertake the preliminary organisation of the Conference if sufficient approval of it is expressed.

THE 42nd INDIAN NATIONAL SOCIAL CONFERENCE.

PROF. RUCHIRAM SAHNI'S WELCOME ADDRESS.

Prof. Ruchiram Sahni, Chairman of the Reception Committee of the 42nd National Social Conference held at Lahore in the course of his welcome address said:—

OUR CHEQUERED HISTORY.

Our past chequered history has profoundly influenced, shaped and moulded our whole social life and polity. The very stream, which is flowing at our feet to day, is associated with an event which heralded the advent of the Aryans to this country. For as scholars tell us, it was probably, on the banks of the Ravi—the Parushni of the Rig Veda—that the great fight between the first Aryan immigrants and the combined forces of ten indigenous kings took place, resulting in the complete victory of the race whose descendants the bulk of the present day Indians are proud to claim themselves to be. It was in this land of the Five rivers, again that our ancestors finally laid down and codified most of the rituals, the customs and the canons and standards of conduct for the various spheres, aspects and relationship of life, which we find embodied and enshrined in the sublime Vedas, and exemplified in our two great Epics.

CULTURAL CONTACTS.

We are not here concerned with the purely political results of the invasions from the north-west. What is more germane to the special objects which have brought us together on the present occasion is the outstanding fact that cultural contact with diverse races, religions and civilizations could not but have profoundly influenced and liberalised our social order, lifting up the incubus of long established customs and usages, widening our outlook and broadbasing our sympathies, feelings and social conduct more and more on reason, justice and the growing needs of the times. It is, I firmly believe, to this circumstance more than to any other single factor that we, Punjabis, owe the comparative freedom and elasticity of our own social system. If the sea-voyage question has never seriously stood in the way of our students, scholars, merchants and soldiers going to foreign lands, if we are not tied down so much as most other provinces have been by the minutiae of a rigid caste system, specially in the matter of eating and drinking, if the extreme forms and practices of the curse of untouchability, the very mention of which makes a Hindu hang down his head in shame and humiliation, are unknown to us here; it is mainly because we have escaped the social and intellectual isolation in which it was the lot of our brethren in other parts of India to live for long centuries.

OUR LOSSES.

Before I proceed further, I must say a few words about the great loss which the cause of social reform suffered about this time last year in the death of Lala Lajpat Rai. Great as were his services as a political leader of the front rank, I venture to claim that his services to the cause of social reform were greater still. Indeed here in the Punjab, he had already carved for himself a niche in the temple of fame by the work as a sincere, selfless, devoted friend and helper of the orphans and the poor widows, long before he came into prominence as political worker. We also deeply mourn the sad death of Pandit Raghbar Dayal, late Principal of the local Sanatan Dharam College.

These losses coming soon after the deaths of veteran social reformers like Swami Shraddhanand, Pandit Bishen Narain Razdan, Rai Sahib Bhai Kashi Ram, Babu Abinsh Chander Mozumdar and Sir Ganga Ram have been most keenly felt by workers in the cause of social reform all over India.

CHOICE OF PRESIDENT.

You will agree with me that we have been particularly happy this year in our choice of President for the Conference. Rai Sahib Har bilas Sarda is a veteran worker in the field of social reform, and his arduous labours in connection with the important legislation which has made his name so well known all over the land, have justly earned for him the esteem, regard and gratitude of his countrymen. It is a good augury for the success of the Sarda Act that it was passed in the centenary year of the abolition of the cruel rite of Suttee through the labours of the illustrious Raja Ram Mohan Roy.

The new law is bound to produce far-reaching results. As we know, there are a little less than 3 lakhs of widows in India below the age of fourteen years. The Sarda Act ensures that not a single unhappy soul shall be added to this category in future years. It is also expected that the incidence of infantile mortality as of mortality of women during child-birth will be appreciably reduced, that the number of abductions of minor girls will be diminished, and that, generally, the new Act will make a substantial contribution towards improved health and happiness in numerous homes.

This does not mean that we can now rest upon our oars. Far from it. It should be the constant endeavour of every well wisher of his country to educate and organise public opinion for further substantial advance in the same direction. In my opinion, no girl should ever be allowed to enter the temple of holy wedlock before she has completed her eighteenth year.

THE SCOPE OF THE CONFERENCE.

As some of you might know, during the past few years, there has been a persistent demand for enlarging the scope of the work and activities of the Conference and now and again resolutions on the subject of social welfare which were previously regarded as being outside the province of the Conference were actually moved and adopted. We have, therefore, definitely decided to extend the scope of the Conference by including in our programme such subjects as child-welfare, domestic hygiene, mother craft, public health and sanitation, factory labour and the social problems connected with it, and generally questions like co-operation, cottage industries and primary education which affect the social well-being of the masses and which are included in the comprehensive phrase "rural reconstruction."

CONFERENCE CONSTITUTION.

While whole-heartedly welcoming this change, I must say that unless we have a proper All-India Organisation, with provincial committees affiliated to it and functioning throughout the year, the mere passing of resolutions once in twelve months will not take us very far. If we are earnest about this work, before this Conference comes to a close we should adopt a permanent constitution for the future work of the Conference.

THE VITAL PROBLEMS.

The newly enlarged scope of the Conference would not, I hope, lead any one to the conclusion that we are quite satisfied with our achievements in respect of the older and more restricted programme of our work. No doubt during the last ten years, along with the general political upheaval, there has been a tremendous awakening in the social sphere also, but, as a well-known philosopher has told us, the enlightenment has only made us realise more keenly than ever before the existence of a greater circle of darkness outside of it. If I had my own way I would see that our efforts for the social uplift and emancipation of our people are largely concentrated on two problems, namely, the abolition of caste and the full recognition of the equal right of women to lead a healthy, normal life in the free enjoyment of equal privileges with men, both as members of society. I have not mentioned untouchability, because, as my friend Mr. Natarajan once so neatly put it, "so long as there are castes, there must be outcastes." The obliteration of caste distinction naturally implies and includes the disappearance of the monster of untouchability.

I am glad to tell you that the Punjab is taking the lead in this direction. Last year a separate Association was formed here with the sole object of abolishing caste. The Jat Pat Torak Mandal, as the new organisation is called, has been carrying on a vigorous propaganda throughout the province. It has a monthly organ of its own as well as a band of enthusiastic itinerant preachers. It has met with a fair measure of success. The Mandal is holding a separate Conference during the present national week under the presidency of Mr. Ramanand Chatterjee, Editor of the Modern Review.

About the other vital problem I will not say much. It is recognised by all that woman is the pivot of our ancient social and religious system. She is the Ardhangi, half body, of man, his constant and inseparable helpmate and partner in life without whose active participation no social or religious ceremony may be performed. In the Hindu pantheon these are goddesses as well as gods sitting side by side and both are worshipped with equal reverence. More than this, the goddess Shakti is even to-day exalted above all other deities by millions of Hindus and adored as their chief object of worship.

CONCLUSION.

The object of all the social workers coming together in a Conference like this once a year is simply to compare views with one another, to co-ordinate our activities and, as far as possible, to formulate common plans and programme of work. The real work, of social reform propagandist as well as the actual carrying out of the resolutions adopted at our Conferences, can only be done by small organisations working throughout the year. Nothing substantial can be achieved without patient, steady and strenuous effort on the part of a large number of men and women. Here is a job waiting for each and all of us. But many or few, social reformers must be men of sincerity and of faith. Numbers are not so important as faith in ourselves and the cause for which we stand. Let us then make our own humble contribution in the firm assurance that all will go well.

RESOLUTIONS.

The Social Conference reassembling on the 27th adopted the following resolutions:—

Miss Khem Chand moved the following resolution:

(a) That while congratulating Mr. Harbilas Sarda on the successful issue of his efforts towards raising by legislation the minimum age limits for marriage to 14 years for girls and 18 years for boys and thanking the Government and members of the Legislative Assembly for supporting the cause of reform this Conference regards the recent measure as only a step in the right direction and urges upon the reformers all over the country to agitate for a further advance in the marriage age limits for boys and girls alike.

(b) That this Conference rejoices at the enactment of the Child Marriage Restraint Act and places on record its grateful appreciation of the service rendered by Mr. Harbilas Sarda who introduced the measure in the Indian Legislative Assembly and worked vigorously for its success and of the courage shown by the members of the Assembly and of the Council of State both official and non official who have helped in carrying out this much needed reform.

Miss Khem Chand said that the Bill had been passed and therefore, the only work to be done by them was propaganda. A section of Muslims was against this Bill and they had organised hartals, but the Government was to be congratulated for not paying any heed to it. It was the women of India who had given their support to this Bill. It was regretted that members of the Hindu Sabha were also standing in their way. It was really surprising that Pt. Malaviya, the great leader, was against this Bill. They wanted heroes like Pt. Jawahar Lal to liberate their country. How could they get heroes, if women were not free.

Mr. Rattan, Mr. Krishan Gopal Datt and Mr. K. L. Ballia Ram supported the resolution and it was carried unanimously.

Prof. U. N. Ball moved another resolution urging upon the social bodies to carry on propaganda to popularise this Bill.

Prof. Tej Singh of Khalsa College supported it and the resolution was carried.

INTER-COMMUNAL UNITY.

Sir Mohammad Shafi then moved the following resolution :—

The Indian National Social Conference is firmly convinced that social solidarity and intercommunal co-operation are essential for the social progress of India. It earnestly appeals to all communities to take active steps to promote harmony and concord as a result of enlightened tolerance and generally, by creating common social platform to enable members of all communities to come together in a spirit of harmony and good-will for the purpose of promoting unity.

Sir Mohammad Shafi, in moving the resolution, said that their ancestors did not move in motor cars as they were now moving. They did not put on coats and pantaloons, but were united. The Hindu and Muslims always participated together in marriages and fairs and in other social conferences. At present India needed Hindu-Muslim unity most and if Hindus, Muslims, Sikhs and Christians were united at this time, they would have attained their object. It was their dis-union that was an obstacle in their way. He said that clubs should be opened throughout the provinces where Hindus, Muslims and Sikhs should meet together. Political advance he said, was essential, but this could not be got unless the country was socially reformed. Sir M. Shafi concluded by reading a poem on Hindu-Muslim unity.

Dr. Gokul Chand Narang, in supporting the resolution, said, as far as social reform was concerned there were three evils. First was the caste-system, the second was the mistreatment accorded to widows, and the third was the child marriage. These three evils, he said, should be eradicated from the country.

The common ideal before India was to liberate the motherland. He said every Hindu, Muslim, Sikh and Christian should consider himself as born in India. There should be oneness of the ideal. It was then that there could be unity. He appealed to the Moulvis and the Pundits not to indulge in criticism that might injure the religious susceptibilities of the other communities and that they should have forbearance and fortitude. He strongly appealed to the Press that it should lead the country towards unity.

Sir Abdul Qadir also supported the resolution.

Mr. P. V. Kamal said that unless communal representation and communal educational institutions were abolished, there could be no social progress and communal unity.

Dr. Satyapal regretted that other countries had marched fast while the Hindus and Muslims were fighting with each other. He said that youngmen had risen who would soon drive out communal distinction out of the country.

After some more speeches, the resolution was passed unanimously.

WIDOW REMARRIAGE.

F. S. Sewak Ram then moved the following resolution :—

While appreciating the progress made in regard to widow re-marriage all over the country this Conference would impress upon all social workers to redouble their efforts.

After being supported the resolution was passed.

Professor Ruchi Ram Sahni next moved the following resolution :—

This Conference is strongly of opinion that special efforts should be made to provide largely increased facilities for women in general and widows in particular to be trained for some calling or trade by which they could if necessary, carry a respectable livelihood. With this object in view, this Conference appeals to the Government and the charitable-minded public to establish in all large towns and other important centres, industrial schools and widow homes like those founded by the late Sir Ganga Ram, Lady Bose and others.

The resolution was supported by Mr. Dwyendra Nath Dutt and others and was passed. After some more resolutions were considered the Conference adjourned.

On Dec. 28th the Conference passed some more resolutions. Mrs. Sarojini Naidu spoke on the resolution relating to the abolition of castes. She said that widespread education would enable young men to exercise complete freedom in the matter of the choice of wives. According to her, there was nothing wrong with the spirit of the caste system, but the trouble lay with unreasonable caste men. Many women speakers supported the resolution which was passed unanimously. A resolution regarding the removal of the disabilities of untouchables, moved by Mr. Raju, the depressed classes' representative in the Bombay Municipality and Secretary of the Parvati Temple Satyagraha Committee, was also passed.

The session concluded at night with a dinner, which could be characterised as international, inter-provincial, inter-religions and inter-caste, for it was attended by men and women of four nationalities, of almost all the provinces of India and the principal religions in India and of several castes. Among the hundred and fifty guests present were Dr. Stanley Jones, Dr. Holt of Chicago University, Dr. Kraemar, a Dutch missionary, the Hon. Emile Kinnaird, sister of Lord Kinnaird and Mr. Manoharlal, Minister of Education, the Punjab. After Mrs. Shah Nawaz had eulogised the services of Harbilas Sarda in getting the Child Marriage Bill passed and after other speeches urging social uplift, Prof. Ruchiram Sahni, Chairman of the Reception Committee, thanked the delegates for making the Conference a success.

THE NATIONAL LIBERAL FEDERATION.

SIR PHIROZE SETHNA'S ADDRESS.

The following extracts are from Sir Phiroze Sethna's presidential address at the annual session of the Liberal Federation held in Madras on Dec. 29.

VICEROY'S ANNOUNCEMENT ANALYSED.

The announcement clearly and emphatically declares that Dominion Status is the political goal of India. 'I am authorised,' says his Excellency, 'on behalf of his Majesty's Government to state clearly that in their judgment, it is implicit in the Declaration of 1917 that the natural issue of India's constitutional progress as there contemplated, is the attainment of Dominion Status.' This is, indeed, satisfactory. All that is necessary now is to make what is implicit in the Declaration of 1917 perfectly explicit by a statutory enactment.

OUR DUTY.

What then should be our response to this new gesture on the part of Government? I feel not the slightest hesitation in saying that India will commit a very grave blunder if she rejects the offer. I think the Secretary of State is fully justified in saying that using the word policy in a wide sense there has been a change. The first change is a change of spirit, but the second is far more important. It is a change in policy which in reality is the central object of interested Indian opinion and that is the 'Conference.' I think the keynote of the new spirit and the new policy is to be found in the noble sentiment expressed by the Secretary of State, instinct with true moral and political purpose, viz. that obstacles to selfgovernment should be regarded not as an excuse for abandoning a predetermined course but as merely exciting a desire to overcome them, and that they could be overcome in a spirit of sincerity and goodwill. Given sincerity, goodwill and a genuine desire to appreciate and adjust different points of view, it is not at all difficult to arrive in the Conference at a solution of the constitutional problem such as may carry behind it the general agreement of political India. We should, therefore, accept the offer of the Conference in the same spirit in which it has been made.

CAUTION.

Provided the terms of reference to the Conference are satisfactory, we should not insist on any condition being fulfilled as a prerequisite to our cooperation with Government in this matter of the Conference. We should scrupulously avoid complicating the situation or adding to the difficulties of the Labour Government by seeking to impose any such condition. It will be a great folly on our part to commit once more the mistake made in 1921 when Lord Reading seriously thought of holding a conference. As Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru has told us with his inside knowledge, if that mistake had not been committed, the political situation to-day would have been quite different from what it is. A repetition of such a mistake would show that we utterly lack constructive statesmanship, or sound diplomacy and allow ourselves to sacrifice vital interests in the pursuit of objects which are really of a subsidiary character. The transcendent issue is the satisfactory settlement of the constitutional problem, and its chances must not in the least be imperilled by mistaken or impractical idealism or sentimentalism, or by giving undue prominence to matters or questions that might well abate the conclusion of the Conference.

THE REALITIES.

I think, the British people are realising with greater and greater vividness that the days of Imperialism, of domination, of autocracy are gone for ever. The perpetuation of the British domination is now impossible. It is impossible because it is opposed to the true interests of the British people themselves. It is impossible because awakened India is bound to revolt against it and to continue the revolt till the domination is ended. It is impossible because the world forces which are irresistibly leading humanity on to a higher and higher destiny are arrayed against it. It is impossible because rational and enlightened world opinion sees and feels that therein lies the destruction of all hopes and efforts for a higher, nobler, worthier, happier and purer human life, that therein lie embedded the poisonous germs of the crash of culture and civilisation. There can be no doubt therefore that the national will of India is bound to prevail with the British Government and people, that they are not likely to commit such an act of insanity and national suicide as to flout or defy it.

THE IRREDUCIBLE MINIMUM.

We are all agreed as regards our political goal and it is to us a matter of the sincerest satisfaction that the British Government have made it absolutely clear that that goal is no other than and nothing short of Dominion Status. Dominion Status will give us every scope for rising to the fullest height of our national stature. As regards this goal there is perfect agreement not only among all Indians except those who want independence, but also between them and the British.

COMMUNAL REPRESENTATION.

Let us examine what are our differences? They relate, as you know, for the most part, to the question of communal representation. Even with regard to this question, let us, in the first place, note and emphasise the points of agreement rather than the points of difference. Though in the opinion of a considerable section of our people, communal representation is a necessary evil in the present conditions of India, we are all agreed that it is an evil that in the long run must disappear and further that the sooner the conditions become favourable to its disappearance the better. The evils of communalism and communal representation are recognised on all hands, even the strongest and the most extreme communalists do not maintain that communal representation is good in itself and that therefore it should remain a permanent feature of our polity. They admit, no less than others, that a system of democratic self-government of which communal representation is a permanent feature cannot be a sound system of democratic self-government, that it must be a parody of such a system, that it is not a system that will make for the fusion of the different communities and elements in the body politic, and the evolution of a true national and democratic mind. Such being the case we all realise with greater or less force and vividness, the inherent and patent evils of communal representation and we all want that it should not mark our political life and system a day longer than may be absolutely necessary.

FAIR REQUEST.

I, therefore, most strongly urge that another serious effort should be made to reach an agreed solution of the question of communal representation with the Moslem community. Any solution of this question which fails to carry behind it the support of at least a considerable majority of the Moslem community, however good it may be in itself, has little chance of being acceptable to the British Parliament which will certainly be justified, if it desired, in vetoing such proposals. Similar efforts should also be made to reach agreements with the depressed classes and other important minority communities. If we are able, as I fervently hope we may be, to settle our internal differences as regards this question of communal representation, the constitution which we shall then be in a position to recommend at the Round Table Conference will have such strength behind it that the British Government and Parliament will find it extremely difficult, if not impossible, to reject it. And if they do, the responsibility for such disregard of the Indian national desire will fall on them, and such disregard will be a sufficient justification for any strong action we may subsequently decide to take. Personally I feel confident that an agreed solution of the constitutional problem, reached by us among ourselves, will strengthen the hands of the Labour Government which will, I think in that case, be able to persuade Parliament that any delay in meeting the united wishes of all India and in granting her Dominion Status will be unjust and fraught with grave danger.

INDIAN STATES.

It is a matter of the utmost satisfaction that the Indian Princes and Chiefs have all heartily welcomed the proposal for the Conference and are quite willing to extend their co-operation for the sake of making it a thorough success. The question of the relations between British India and the Indian States, when she develops into a self-governing Dominion in the fullest enjoyment of responsible government and Dominion Status, is a highly important one which must be satisfactorily solved, if the organic territorial unity and nationality of India are to be living realities, and the development of the two constituent parts of India is to take place on peaceful, harmonious and well considered lines.

RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT AND DEFENCE.

One of the objections taken to the establishment of full responsible government in India is that she is not yet ready to undertake the responsibility of her own defence, and that she will not be able to maintain internal peace and security without British troops. The argument is that responsible government connotes the assumption of the duty of maintaining internal peace and security by the sons of the soil and of defending national frontiers against foreign aggression. It is contended that India will not be able to maintain internal peace and security and defend herself against foreign aggression without British troops, as she has no national army fully trained, equipped and manned by Indian officers, and that so long as British troops cannot be withdrawn from India, the establishment of full Swaraj or responsible government is outside the domain of practical politics. Now in the first place, it must be borne in mind that the demand for full responsible government and Dominion Status stands on an entirely different footing from that for national independence. It is obvious that the latter is incompatible with the maintenance or selection of foreign troops and that a people that want national independence must depend upon themselves for its national defence. But the question assumes a somewhat different aspect in the case of a demand only for full responsible government and Dominion Status. The proposition that if India wishes to have full responsible government and be raised to the status of a Dominion, she must assume the responsibility for her national defence, may be admitted as perfectly sound.

INTERNAL PEACE.

A responsible government must certainly be able to preserve peace and order without relying upon troops that are not indigenous. We claim that we shall certainly be able to maintain internal peace and order without invoking the assistance of British troops. Preservation of internal peace and order does not mean that there will be no disturbances at all; if that were its meaning, even the British Government cannot claim that it is able to maintain peace and order. Disturbances may take place in future as in the past, but we do claim and claim most emphatically that we shall be fully able to discharge our responsibility of maintaining peace and order with our own police and military forces. In this connection it is pertinent to remember that even in the British Colonies, though the principle was laid down that they must assume responsibility for defence and internal peace and security, yet British troops were not immediately withdrawn, they were even employed in maintaining internal peace and order. When the cry is raised that India cannot be granted full responsible government because she does not possess a national army fully trained and equipped and therefore cannot discharge the responsibility of national self-defence, we cannot but condemn that cry as utterly unfair, absolutely unjustified by the facts of colonial history, and as really inspired by the selfish desire for prolonging Indian political subordination as much as possible.

INDIANS IN SOUTH AFRICA.

Next in importance to the supreme question of the attainment of Dominion Status is that of the status of our countrymen in other parts of the Empire. Happily in South Africa the wonderful work of the Right Hon. Srinivasa Sastri has helped to set our minds at ease. Thanks to his matchless labours, there has been a decided change for the better in the angle of vision not only of the white population in South Africa but of our countrymen too. Among the latter the old spirit of bitter and sulking despondency has given place to a feeling of hope for the future. Their self-respect and with it their self-confidence and self-help have revived. The most striking example of this renaissance is the Sastri College built entirely by contributions from Indians in Natal, which was recently opened by his Excellency the Governor-General of South Africa, a compliment which India appreciates greatly. There has been striking progress in the education of Indian children.

KENYA.

In East Africa the situation is far from reassuring. The spirit of arrogance and unreason seems to animate the outlook of the European settlers. The just and moderate claims of our fellow-countrymen are viewed with contumely and hostility. Our demand for equal citizenship is met by the Europeans with a demand that they shall be politically dominant in East Africa. Our contention that political advance in these territories shall wait upon the development of the native community to take their just share in ordering their own affairs is met by the rejoinder that they (the European settlers) can be fully trusted to exercise greater political power to the advantage of the native. Indians in East Africa have repeatedly declared that they do not seek political domination either in Kenya or in any of the other territories in Eastern Africa. At the same time, consistently with their self-respect, they cannot accept a position of political inferiority. Nor does their past experience encourage them to view with satisfaction the prospect of any arrangement which will transfer greater power of government to representatives of the European settlers. In the interests of the Indian who in the past has admittedly done a great deal for the development of Eastern Africa, and in the interests of Imperial solidarity, the duty of his Majesty's Government is clearly to repudiate the European claim to domination and concede the Indian claim for equality. More it will be unreasonable of us to ask. Less it will be unmanly of us to accept.

NO PROPER MACHINERY.

It is the bounden duty of Government to look after the interests of our nationals in other parts of the Empire. Have we readily available full information about their present political and economic status in all those lands where they have settled? Have we any efficient machinery for keeping ourselves informed of the political and economic changes that are afoot in the rapidly developing colonial Empire of Great Britain; an agency which constantly studies developments in these regions; determines what changes are likely to affect the interests of our compatriots and acts with the fullness of knowledge and promptitude of decision which in international affairs hold the key to success? It is obvious that the setting up of the machinery which would help us both in looking after the Indian communities already settled abroad or in exploring the possibilities of fresh migration, must be done by the government of the country. Government alone has resources, the facilities and the power to study, to investigate and, when necessary, to act diplomatically. True, its policy must conform to public opinion. But public opinion cannot be clearly and correctly formed unless the necessary data are placed before it and those data must be collected by Government agency.

CONCLUSION.

I must apologise for the length of my remarks and thank you for the patience with which you have listened to me. It is expected of the President to refer to the burning questions of the day. There are many I have had to leave out. Those that I have taken up, I am sure you will agree with me, required to be dealt with at some length. The numerical strength of the Liberal party may not at present be very large, but we are the leaven of the whole national life of India and our influence upon her development has always been wholesome and abiding. We stand for all-round progress, we have faith in modern civilisation, modern spirit and modern culture. We believe in construction, in unity, in synthesis, in harmony. We stand for Dominion Status with the firm conviction that England cannot withhold it from India even if she wished, and that England will not wish it even if she can. We insist on national self-improvement and maintain that all the social evils from which this country is suffering must be completely removed. Our faith in social reform is as intense as our faith in India's political destiny; we want that all the communities in India, great and small, will be inspired by enlightened liberalism and rise absolutely above communal, parochial, sectional and narrow spirit. We aim at building up a strong, united, progressive India with a unity that nothing shall break, with a deep and abiding sense of nationality and solidarity which will synthesise all differences and in the fulness of time evolve a nation whose material and moral strength and whose achievements will further the highest ends of internationalism. We believe in self-government, but we also believe in good and efficient government. We believe in democracy but we want that it should be an enlightened democracy keenly alive no less to its duties than to its rights. Such is the high mission we have to perform, such is the great responsibility that rests on our shoulders. Let us be true to God, to our Motherland, to ourselves and it shall follow as the night the day, that we Liberals shall play a part, by no means small or unworthy, in the remaking of this country.

RESOLUTIONS.

Sir Tej Bahadur moved the resolution relating to the Viceroy's announcement. It ran :—

"The National Liberal Federation cordially welcomes the announcement made on October 31 by the Viceroy as it authoritatively confirms the view that Dominion Status for India was what was intended by the declaration of 1917, as it definitely recognises that British India and Indian States should together form a greater united India, and as it concedes India's claim to the right to confer on a footing of equality with the British Cabinet on the form of the future constitution of India. The Federation further resolves that the Liberal Party do participate in the deliberations of the Conference contemplated in the announcement and strongly urges that the Round Table Conference should be held as early as possible in 1930 and that the progressive element in the country should have preponderant representation on it".

The Rt. Hon. V. S. Srinivasa Sastri then moved the following resolution :—

"This Federation urges upon all parties in India which accept the recent announcement of the Viceroy wholeheartedly and are prepared to secure its complete and immediate realisation, to combine for the purpose of securing a constitution based on Dominion Status with such safeguards and reservations as may be necessary for the period of transition."

APPEAL.

The following is the text of an appeal issued by the National Liberal Federation :—

"The March of events during the last two months, particularly during the last few days, makes it imperative that the Liberal Federation should make an appeal to those in the country who have hitherto pinned their faith to the achievement by India of Dominion Status as an integral member of the British Commonwealth of Nations. The announcement made by H. E. the Viceroy on October 31 with the full consent and authority of His Majesty's Government evoked a remarkable feeling of response in the country and from the Indian Princes which led us to believe that a solution of the difficulties with which we have been confronted was at last within sight. The debates that followed in the House of Lords and in the House of Commons unfortunately gave rise to a great deal of misunderstanding with regard to the meaning and the effect of the purpose and scope of British policy adumbrated by the Viceroy. Nevertheless those of us who realise the political conditions surrounding the Labour Government in England were disposed, and are still disposed, to attach far greater significance and weight to the authoritative statements made by His Majesty's Government through the Secretary of State in England and the Viceroy in India than their critics in Parliament or in the English press.

NEED FOR AGREEMENT.

"As we read the situation, the essential condition of the success of the Round Table Conference is that there should be the maximum amount of agreement among ourselves in India. If we can secure such an agreement our representatives at the Round Table Conference will be able to press with every hope of success for complete Dominion Status being established, subject to such safeguards and reservations, including the the protection of the interests and rights of the minorities, as might be necessary in the present condition of India for the period of transition. We have always been anxious that in order to produce a favourable atmosphere the Government of India should implement the new policy by an action calculated to remove all causes of irritation and produce calm and good will.

THE ONLY RALLYING CRY.

"We firmly believe that the only rallying cry which can unite Hindus, Mahomedans, Christians, Sikhs, Parsis, Europeans, the propertied classes and the labouring and the depressed classes can be Dominion Status for India not as a distant goal or ideal but as an object capable of achievement within the shortest possible limit of time. In a constitution seeking to give India a status of a Dominion there will be no difficulty in making ample provision for the safeguarding of her security against internal trouble and foreign aggression. During the period of transition the mutual relations of British India and the Indian States can also be satisfactorily defined and a provision made for their future regulation consistently, on the one hand, with Dominion Status now contemplated and, on the other, with the autonomy of the Indian States.

CONGRESS POLICY DEPLORED.

"Those of us who believed in the peaceful evolution cannot but deplore that any section of the people of this country should raise the cry of independence and involve our future in turmoil and confusion. Believing as we do that the Labour Government and Lord Irwin are in real earnest in seeking an acceptable solution of the constitutional problem, we should be guilty of utter shortsightedness and lack of statesmanship if we fail to seize the opportunity that has been extended us. We realise that the task of those who believe in Dominion Status and who are prepared to work for it has become more difficult by reason of the attitude adopted by one leading political organisation in India and that their responsibility has become all the greater, but if other parties who believe in Dominion Status will join hands together, in pressing India's claim there is no reason why we should not achieve it.

COMMUNAL AMITY.

"But this makes it necessary that the internal differences which divide one community from another should be composed in a just and generous manner. Believing as we do, in the principles of justice and equality and fairness to all parties and communities and interests, we make an earnest appeal to all these whose object is Dominion Status to devise means of common deliberation. If such an attempt is made and we proceed about our business in a spirit of give and take, we are confident of a settlement amongst ourselves which will expedite and facilitate the work of the Round Table Conference in London. As a necessary preliminary, we appoint a small committee of our own party, with power to co-operate with representatives of other parties, for taking the necessary initiative."

THE 44th INDIAN NATIONAL CONGRESS.

PANDIT JAWAHARLAL'S ADDRESS.

The following excerpts are from Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru's presidential address at the Lahore session of the Indian National Congress held on the 29th December.

WHY INDIA FELL?

When everything is changing it is well to remember the long course of Indian history. Few things in history are more amazing than the wonderful stability of the social structure in India which withstood the impact of numerous alien influences and thousands of years of change and conflict. It withstood them because it always sought to absorb them and tolerate them. Its aim was not to exterminate but to establish an equilibrium between different cultures. Aryans and non-Aryans settled down together recognising each other's right to their culture, and outsiders who came like the Parsis found a welcome and a place in the social order. With the coming of the Moslems the equilibrium was disturbed but India sought to restore it and largely succeeded. Unhappily for us before we could adjust our differences, the political structure broke down, the British came and we fell.

Great as was the success of India in evolving a stable society she failed in a vital particular and because she failed in this she fell and remains fallen. No solution was found for the problem of equality. India deliberately ignored this and built up her social structure on inequality, and we have the tragic consequences of the millions of our people who till yesterday were suppressed and had little opportunity for growth.

And yet when Europe fought her wars of religion and Christians massacred each other in the name of their Saviour, India was tolerant although alas! there is little of this toleration to-day. Having attained some measure of religious liberty, Europe sought after political liberty and political and legal equality. Having attained these also she finds that they mean very little without economic liberty and equality. And so to-day politics have ceased to have much meaning and the most vital question is that of social and economic equality. And so to-day politics have ceased to have much meaning and the most vital question is that of social and economic equality.

India also will have to find a solution to this problem and until she does so her political and social structure cannot have stability. That solution need not necessarily follow the example of any other country. It must, if it has to endure, be based on the genius of her people and be an outcome of her thought and culture. And when it is found, the unhappy differences between various communities, which trouble us to-day and keep our freedom, will automatically disappear.

DISTRUST AND SUSPICION.

Indeed the real differences have already largely gone, but fear of each other and distrust and suspicion remain and sow seeds of discord. The problem before us is not one of removing differences. They can well remain side by side and enrich our many-sided culture. The problem is how to remove fear and suspicion and being intangible they are hard to get at. An earnest attempt was made last year by the All Parties Conference and much progress was made towards the goal. But we must admit with sorrow that success has not wholly crowned its efforts. Many of our Muslim and Sikh friends have strenuously opposed the solutions suggested and passions have been roused over mathematical figures and percentages. Logic and cold reason are poor weapons to fight fear and distrust. Only faith and generosity can overcome them. I can only hope that the leaders of various communities will have this faith and generosity in ample measure. What shall we gain for ourselves or for our community if all of us are slaves in a slave country? And what can we lose if once we remove the shackles from India and can breathe the air of freedom? Do we want outsiders who are not of us and who have kept us in bondage to be the protectors of our little rights and privileges, when they deny us the very right to freedom? No majority can crush a determined minority and no minority can be sufficiently protected by a little addition to its seats in a legislature. Let us remember that in the world to-day almost everywhere a very small minority holds wealth and power and dominates over the great majority.

I was born a Hindu, but I do not know how far I am justified in calling myself one or in speaking on behalf of Hindus. But birth still counts in this country and by right of birth I shall venture to submit to the leaders of the Hindus that it should be their privilege to take the lead in generosity. Generosity is not only good morals but is often good politics and sound expediency. And it is inconceivable to me that in a free India the Hindus can ever be powerless. So far as I am concerned I would gladly ask our Moslem and Sikh friends to take what they will without protest or argument from me. I know that the time is coming soon when these labels and appellations will have little meaning and when our struggle will be on an economic basis. Meanwhile it matters little what our mutual arrangements are, provided only that we do not build up barriers which will come in the way of our future progress.

SEEMING OFFER OF PEACE.

Recently there has been a seeming offer of peace. The Viceroy has stated on behalf of the British Government that the leaders of Indian opinion will be invited to confer with the Government on the subject of India's future constitution. The Viceroy means well and his language was the language of peace. But even the Viceroy's goodwill and courteous phrases are poor substitutes for the hard facts that confront us.

TRUE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE OFFER

With much searching of heart we signed that manifesto and I know not to-day if we did right or wrong. Later came the explanations and amplifications in the British Parliament and elsewhere and all doubt, if doubt there was, was removed as to the true significance of the offer. Even so your Working Committee chose to keep open the door of negotiation and left it to this Congress to take the final decision.

'DOMINION STATUS IN ACTION' A SNARE.

During the last few days there has been another discussion of this subject in the British House of Commons and the Secretary of State for India has endeavoured to point out that successive British Governments have tried to prove not only by words but by deeds also the sincerity of their faith in regard to India. We must recognise Mr. Wedgwood Benn's desire to do something for India and his anxiety to secure the goodwill of the Indian people. But his speech and the other speeches made in Parliament carry us no further. 'Dominion Status in action' to which he draws attention has been a snare for us and has certainly not reduced the exploitation of India. The burdens on the Indian masses are even greater to-day because of this 'Dominion Status in action' and the so-called constitutional reforms of ten years ago. High Commissioners in London and representatives on the League of Nations and the purchase of stores and Indian Governors and high officials are no parts of our demand. We want to put an end to the exploitation of India's poor and to get the reality of power and not merely the livery of office. Mr. Wedgwood Benn has given us a record of the achievements of the past decade. He could have added to it by referring to martial law in the Punjab, and the Jallianwala Bag shooting and the repression and exploitation that have gone continually during this period of 'Dominion Status in action.' He has given us some insight into what more of Dominion Status may mean for us. It will mean the shadow of authority to a handful of Indians and more repression and exploitation of the masses.

CONDITIONS FOR CO-OPERATION REMAIN UNFULFILLED.

What will this Congress do? The conditions for co-operation remain unfulfilled. Can we co-operate so long as there are no guarantees that real freedom will come to us? Can we co-operate when our comrades lie in prison and repression continues? Can we co-operate until we are assured that real peace is sought after and not merely a tactical advantage over us? Peace cannot come at the point of the bayonet and if we are to continue to be dominated over by an alien people let us at least be no consenting parties to it.

THE GOAL OF INDEPENDENCE.

If the Calcutta resolution holds we have but one goal to-day, that of independence. Independence is not a happy word in the word to-day for it means exclusiveness and isolation. Civilization has had enough of narrow nationalism and gropes towards a wider co-operation and interdependence. And if we use the word independence we do so, not in the sense hostile to the larger ideals. Independence for us means complete freedom from British domination and British imperialism. Having attained our freedom I have no doubt that India will welcome all attempts at world co-operation and federation and will even agree to give up part of her own independence to a larger group of which she is an equal member.

FULLEST FREEDOM OF INDIA.

We stand, therefore, today for the fullest freedom of India. This Congress has not acknowledged and will not acknowledge the right of the British Parliament to dictate to us in any way. To it we make no appeal. But we do appeal to the Parliament and conscience of the world and to them we shall demonstrate, I hope, that India submits no longer to any foreign domination. Today or tomorrow we may not be strong enough to assert our will.

THREE MAJOR PROBLEMS.

We have three major problems--the minorities, the Indian states, and labour and peasantry. I have dealt already with the question of minorities. I shall only repeat that we must give the fullest assurance by our words and our deeds that their culture and traditions will be safe.

THE INDIAN STATES.

The Indian states, even for India, are the most curious relics of a bygone age. Many of their rulers apparently still believe in the divine right of kings--puppet kings though they be--and consider the state and all it contains to be their personal property, with they can squander at will. A few of them have a sense of responsibility and have endeavoured to serve their people, but many of them have hardly any redeeming feature.

THE ECONOMIC PROGRAMME.

Our economic programme must therefore be based on a human outlook and must not sacrifice man to money. If an industry cannot be run without starving its workers then the industry must close down. If the workers on the land have not enough to eat then the intermediaries who deprive them of their full share must go. The least that every worker in field or factory is entitled to is a minimum wage which will enable him to live in moderate comfort, and minimum hours of labour which do not break his strength and spirit. The All-Parties Committee accepted the principle and included it in their recommendations. I hope the Congress will also do and will in addition be prepared to accept its natural consequences. Further that it will adopt the well-known demands of labour for a better life, and will give every assistance to it to organise itself and prepare itself for the day when it can control industry on a co-operative basis.

THE CRY OF THE PEASANTRY.

But industrial labour is only a small part of India although it is rapidly becoming a force that cannot be ignored. It is the peasantry that cry loudly, piteously, for relief and our programme must deal with their present condition. Real relief can only come by a great change in the land laws and the basis of the present system of land tenure. We have among us many big landowners and we welcome them. But they must realise that the ownership of large estates by individuals which is the outcome of a state resembling the old feudalism of Europe, is a rapidly disappearing phenomenon all over the world. Even in countries which are the strongholds of capitalism the large estates are being split up and given to the peasantry who work on them. In India also we have large areas where the system of peasant proprietorship prevails and we shall have to extend this all over the country. I hope that in doing so we may have the co-operation of some at least of the big landowners.

PEACEFUL MASS MOVEMENT.

Any great movement for liberation to-day must necessarily be a mass movement and mass movements must essentially be peaceful, except in times of organised revolt. Whether we have the non-co-operation of a decade ago or modern industrial weapon of the general strike, the basis is peaceful organisation and peaceful action. And if the principal movement is a peaceful one contemporaneous attempts at sporadic violence can only distract attention and weaken it. It is not possible to carry on at one and the same time the two movements side by side. We have to choose and strictly to abide by our choice. What the choice of this Congress is likely to be I have no doubt. It can only choose a peaceful mass movement.

Should we repeat the programme and tactics of the non-co-operation movement? Not necessarily, but the basic idea must remain. Programmes and tactics must be made to fit in with circumstances and it is neither easy nor desirable for this Congress at this stage to determine them in detail. That should be the work of its executive, the All-India Congress Committee. But the principles have to be fixed.

BOYCOTT OF COURTS AND SCHOOLS.

The old programme was one of the three boycotts—Councils, law courts and schools—leading up to refusal of service in the army and non-payment of taxes. When the national struggle is at its height I fail to see how it will be possible for any person engaged in it to continue in the courts or the schools.

BOYCOTT OF LEGISLATURES.

The boycott of the legislative councils has led to much heated debate in the past and this Congress itself has been rent in twain over it. We need not revive that controversy for the circumstances to-day are entirely different. I feel that the step the Congress took some years ago to permit Congressmen to enter the councils was an inevitable step and I am not prepared to say that some good has not resulted from it. But we have exhausted that good and there is no middle course left to-day between boycott and full co-operation. All of us know the demoralisation that these sham legislatures have brought in our ranks and how many of our good men, their committees and commissions lure away. Our workers are limited in number and we can have no mass movement unless they concentrate on it and turn their backs to the palatial council chambers of our legislatures. And if we declare for independence how can we enter the councils and carry on humdrum and profitless activities there?

NON-PAYMENT OF TAXES.

This boycott will only be a means to an end. It will release energy and divert attention to the real struggle which must take the shape of non-payment of taxes and where possible with the co-operation of the labour movement, general strikes. But non-payment of taxes must be well organised in specific areas, and for this purpose the Congress should authorise the All-India Congress Committee to take the necessary action wherever and whenever it considers desirable.

POLITICAL AND ECONOMIC BOYCOTT.

Our programme must therefore be one of political and economic boycott. It is not possible for us, so long as we are not actually independent, and not even then completely, to boycott another country wholly or to sever all connection with it. But our endeavour must be to reduce all points of contact with the British Government and to rely on ourselves.

WE PLAY FOR HIGH STAKES.

The Congress represents no small minority in the country and though many may be too weak to join it or to work for it, they look to it with hope and longing to bring them deliverance. Ever since the Calcutta resolution the country has waited with anxious expectation for this great day when this Congress meets. None of us can say what and when we can achieve. We cannot command success. But success often comes to those who dare and act; it seldom goes to the timid who are ever afraid of the consequences. We play for high stakes; and if we seek to achieve great things it can only be through great dangers. Whether we succeed soon or late, none but ourselves can stop us from high endeavour and from writing a noble page in our country's long and splendid history.

AN OPEN CONSPIRACY TO FREE COUNTRY.

We have conspiracy cases going on in various parts of the country. They are ever with us. But the time has gone for secret conspiracy. We have now an open conspiracy to free this country from foreign rule, and you, comrades, and all our countrymen and countrywomen are invited to join it. But the rewards that are in store for you are suffering and prison, it may be death. But you shall also have the satisfaction that you have done your little bit for India, the ancient, but ever young, and have helped a little in the liberation of humanity from its present bondage.

RESOLUTIONS.

MR. GANDHI EXPLAINS THE NEW POLICY.

Mr. Gandhi next moved the main resolution of this session of the Congress regarding independence and boycott. The resolution reads :—

“This Congress whilst endorsing the action of the Working Committee in connection with the manifesto signed by the party leaders including Congressmen in connection with the Viceregal pronouncement of October 31, relating to Dominion Status and appreciating the efforts of H. E. the Viceroy towards a peaceful settlement of the national movement for Swaraj, and having considered the result of the meeting between the Viceroy and Pundit Motilal Nehru and other leaders, is of opinion :—

“That nothing is to be gained in the existing circumstances by the Congress being represented at the proposed Round Table Conference;

“And in pursuance of the resolution passed at the Calcutta Congress last year this Congress now declares that Swaraj in the Congress creed shall mean complete independence, and, therefore, further declares the Nehru scheme of Dominion Status to have lapsed, and hopes that all parties in the Congress will devote their exclusive attention to the attainment of complete independence, and hopes also that those whom the tentative solution of the communal problem suggested in the Nehru constitution has prevented from joining the Congress or actuated them to abstain from it, will now join or rejoin the Congress and zealously prosecute the common goal :—

“And as a preliminary step towards organising a campaign for independence, and in order to make Congress policy consistent with the change of the creed, declares a complete boycott of the Central and Provincial Legislatures and calls upon Congressmen to abstain from participating, directly or indirectly, in future elections, and the present members of the legislatures to tender their resignations, and calls upon the nation to concentrate its attention upon the Constructive programme of the Congress, and authorises the All-India Congress Committee, whenever it deems fit, to launch upon a programme of civil disobedience, including non-payment of taxes, whether in selected areas or otherwise, and under such safeguards as it may consider necessary.”

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

NOTES.

The Next Social Conference:—The decision of the Congress that there will not be a session in December this year once more raises the question whether the National Social Conference will not be better able to fulfil its objects by holding its annual session away from the Congress. The fact, moreover, that by favouring the boycott of Legislatures the Congress has repudiated an important instrument of social reform, gives prominence to the necessity of appealing to the large section of the intelligentsia outside the Congress who have hitherto held back from the Social Conference under the impression that it was an auxiliary body to the Congress. The main reason advanced in favour of holding the Social Conferences at the same place as the Congress was that it was there that the appeal could be made to the largest gatherings. With the division of the Congress into three parties this is no longer valid and it cannot be denied that in the past the Social Conference has suffered from the alliance. Apart from the fact that several social workers have feared that their participation in the annual gathering would be construed as inspired by political motives—and among this body are several missionary social workers both Indian and foreign—the delegates to the Social Conference are very often Congress delegates who are asked to speak on resolutions of which they are not active supporters. Nor has the Congress always adopted a very cordial attitude towards the Social Conference. We are sure that it will be a welcome change if the usual practice is deviated from this year and it must happen unless the Social Conference also postpones its session to February which, for obvious reasons, would be absurd. The Conference separated from the Congress may not attract the large audiences it has drawn in the past but it will be attended by people who are really interested in social work, to whatever political party they may belong.

The English Eye On Indian Life:—We have had with us for some time back three books written by Englishmen, which show an earnest desire to take a fair and just view of the Indian people and their problems. The authors are Mr. J. S. Hoyland, Mr. F. W. Wilson and Mr. Edwyn Bevan. All of them have proved themselves in different capacities to be true friends who are sincerely anxious to bring about a cordial understanding between Great Britain and this country with the object of helping them to adjust their relations on an honourable and mutually beneficial footing. Every thing in this direction is to be welcomed and we are sure that the efforts of these and other publicists of the same type will not be without effect. We must confess, however, that none of these books produce in our minds the impression, of absolute detachment which some recent books by English writers on Ireland, Egypt and even Russia have done. Our English friends are either apologising for us, or are trying to strike out a balance on the most approved principles of Accountancy between our virtues and our weaknesses with a view to get an exact and "scientific" idea of how much Great Britain might yield and how much she should withhold of her political control in the interests of India and of England. It is not quite correct to describe Mr. Hoyland as an apologist, because his main ground is that Britain herself has to revise her ideas in the light of a fuller knowledge of Indian character and conditions. Nevertheless, one cannot help feeling that he is more than a little blind to our faults and more than a little kind to our virtues. This is inevitable in men like Mr. Hoyland, Mr. C. F. Andrews and the few others of this group who view the Indian problem from a penitential chair. Mr. Wilson's little book with its "Foreword" by Pandit Jawharlal Nehru and its dedication to Pandit Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru is painfully suggestive of the proverbial attempt to sit between two stools, with the proverbial result of finding a seat in neither. Mr. Wilson's true role in this country is that of the voice in the wilderness proclaiming to his countrymen "Repent ye, for Swaraj is at hand. Prepare ye the way for it and make its paths straight."

Mr. Bevan's Book:—Mr. Edwyn Bevan's book is named "Thoughts On Indian Discontents." The author's "Thoughts" reduce themselves to and are, indeed, variations of the single "Thought" that Indians have no reason to be discontented as their grievances such as they are more or less of their own making. The following is perhaps the most typical as it is evidently meant as the most conclusive argument in the book. "It is not true to say," writes Mr. Bevan "that a nation cannot make spiritual contribution to the world under foreign rule. The greatest spiritual contribution which the people of Israel made to the world was through Jesus Christ. And that contribution was made when the Jews were a subject people under a Government as ungentle as Rome. I do not see that there is any hindrance today from the Government to Indians expressing their genius in religion and thought and literature and art." And Mr. Bevan goes on to point to Gandhi, Tagore, Ramanuja (the mathematical prodigy and not the Visishtadvaita philosopher) and Srinivasa Sastri, as typical products of the British bureaucracy. As the author expects the world to take this argument seriously—we can hardly think that Mr. Bevan is capable of writing with his tongue in his cheek—let us briefly point out some of its implications. If it means anything, it means not only that the Roman despotism was no bar to the message and mission of Jesus Christ, but that it was the essential condition of that message and mission. It follows that the flogging and crucifixion too were necessary to the expression of Israel's spiritual genius through Jesus Christ, and that the British Government of India will best help India to spiritual expression by hanging Gandhi, Tagore and Sastri. The matter does not end there. Mr. Bevan has to explain the rise of Gautama Buddha who was the noblest expression of India's religious genius twenty-five centuries ago under conditions wholly the reverse of those which existed in Palastine at the time of Jesus Christ. He will also have to explain how India produced Shankara, Ramanuja (the Vaishnava apostle) and her numerous saints and sages, when there was no British rule in the land. Further the success or failure of a political system must be judged in India by the same standards as in Great Britain or France or the United States. We cannot say that Mr. Bevan's present book is a wholesome contribution to current English literature on Indian subjects.

Beauty Competitions:—Newspapers in their anxiety to increase their circulations in order to attract advertisers get up all sorts of competitions. One of these is what is known as "Beauty Competitions." Women, and sometimes men, are invited to send their photographs and a committee of three or four persons is appointed to judge which of the faces in the pictures is the most beautiful. Sometimes, the competition is limited to the limbs only, and particularly legs. The judges' decision is final and the face or leg which most approves itself to them is awarded a prize. The absurdity of this device for collecting coppers or nickels is obvious, but competition among newspapers is so keen that the proprietors are unable to distinguish between what is legitimate and what is illegitimate as a means of pushing up their sales. The dangerous demoralisation of "beauty competitions," was strikingly illustrated in a case which occurred recently in England and which has called forth comments in the Press. A London shop girl, naturally of a shy and retiring disposition, had her photograph submitted without her knowledge by her mother to one of these competitions. She secured the prize and that was her ruin. She became a victim to what is called "Narcissism" and became obsessed by ideas of self-adulation. But being too poor to buy clothes artistic enough to set off her advertised beauty, she started stealing clothes, and when she was found out and arrested, one hundred and eighteen stolen dresses were found in her residence. The unfortunate girl was sentenced to three months' imprisonment for stealing. A writer in the New Statesman commenting on the case observes: "Most of us have always disliked beauty competitions, and we shall not like them any better now that one of them has resulted in an unfortunate girl being sent to prison—unnecessarily, it seems to me, for this is surely a case in which imprisonment can effect no cure."

The Shipping Conference:—The failure of the Conference summoned by the Government of India to consider the development of an Indian Mercantile Marine, which met last week under the presidency of the Vicery was a foregone conclusion. It was not expected that the European interests would be agreeable to an amicable settlement. The Conference was not open to the public but in a statement issued later it was said that owing to "fundamental differences" no agreement could be reached. The responsibility now rests with the Government of India to see justice done to the Indian claims of the coastal trade. Mr. Haji's Bill stands no chance of becoming law at present as the ranks of the nationalists in the Assembly have been depleted by the resignation of members in obedience to the Congress mandate.

The Late Maulana Mazharul Haq:—In the death of Maulana Mazharul Haq the country has sustained an irreparable loss. By nature and temperament a scholar and philosopher, Mr. Mazharul Haq did not shrink from leadership when the call of his country came. He was a staunch believer in Hindu-Muslim unity and worked towards that end inspite of bitter opposition. He contributed not a little to the awakening of the political consciousness of the men of his community in Behar. We publish elsewhere an interesting sketch of his life which throws light on his many qualities of head and heart.

Training College Education Week:—An Education Week is to be celebrated under the auspices of the Secondary Training College, Cruickshank Road, Bombay, from 18th to 25th instant. The Honorable Maulavi Raffiuddin Ahmed, Bat-at-law, Minister of Education, will preside at the inauguration ceremony (4-30 p.m. Saturday 18th instant) and declare open an Exhibition of Teachers' Aids. From the 20th to the 25th instant Demonstration lessons will be given between 8-30 to 10 a.m. Public lectures on Modern developments in Education will be delivered between 6 and 7 p.m. everyday. The College practice lessons will be open to all from 12-30 to 4-30 p. m., and the Exhibition will be kept open till 6 p. m. during these days. All interested in education are cordially invited.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, JANUARY 11, 1930.

THE WOMEN'S MOVEMENT.

The rapid growth of the Women's Movement in this country since the introduction of the Montagu-Chelmsford reforms is conclusive proof, if proof were needed, of the well-established inter-relation between political and social progress. The late Mr. Montagu, who was a far-seeing statesman, hoped, intended and expected that his reforms would give much-needed stimulus to social reform. So did the late Mr. A. O. Hume, the father of the Indian National Congress who defended the prominence given to political reform on the ground that it was needed to infuse sufficient confidence in themselves in the people to encourage them to undertake social reforms. He added, in an interview which will be found in one of the early volumes of the Reformer, that he himself was by heredity a social reformer rather than a politician. Under the reformed constitution women were enfranchised and found their way into the Legislatures and Local and Municipal boards. This awakened in them aspirations for education and public service. Then, there were a number of measures in the Legislatures which led to wide-spread public discussion on social problems. The movement of thought thus created led to several women's meetings and associations which culminated in the founding of the All-India Women's Conference.

The fourth All-India Women's Conference will meet in Bombay on the 20th instant under the presidentship of Mrs. Sarojini Naidu. This is the first time that a lady not belonging to a ruling family has been chosen for the honour. The first Conference which met in Poona in 1927 was presided over by Her Highness the Maharani of Baroda. The second Conference which was held in Delhi had Her Highness the Begum of Bhopal for president and was opened by Her Excellency Lady Irwin. The third met last year at Patna and had the Rani of Mandi in the presidential chair. Bombay, however, is a modern city with none of the medieval traditions of Poona, Delhi and Patna. The aristocracy of Bombay is an aristocracy of commerce and culture. It is, therefore, appropriate that for the fourth Conference which meets here, Lady Dorab, the cultured and widely-travelled wife of the present head of the honoured house of Tata, should have undertaken to organize the Conference and to welcome the delegates as Chairman of the Reception Committee; and that Mrs. Sarojini Naidu, a harmonious blending of the ancient Indian tradition with the modern aspirations of India's womanhood, should preside and guide its deliberations. The Conference has completed only three years, but in that short time, it has had a rather luxuriant growth. This is due to a considerable measure to the zeal and energy of the accomplished Organising Secretary, Mrs. Kamaladevi Chattopadhyaya. It is also due to the cordial sympathy and support which it has received from the first from the highest official circles in British India and from the ruling houses in Indian states. Behind all these there is the awakened consciousness of the women of India seeking for expression in the national life. Nevertheless, the rapid growth of the Conference is a matter not only for congratulation but also for reflection. It is the fashion for some enthusiastic women orators to inveigh bitterly against men for opposing the movement. As a matter of fact, however, the movement as such has encountered very little opposition even from the reactionary politicians who raised a hue and cry over the Sarda Marriage Act. These men are quite willing that women should have the franchise, should sit in Legislative Assemblies and Municipal and Local Boards, should hold offices and enter the professions. But with a strange absence of consistency they are opposed to the reform of the social customs which prevent women from developing their full personalities. Perhaps, they count upon the continuance of the old customs to render inoperative the freedom which they concede in respect of political and civic life. If so, they are certainly right. It is absolutely out of the question that in a society in which child marriage and the purdah largely prevail there should arise, except as rare exceptions, women fit to be leaders in social and national life.

The emancipation of women from cramping social customs is, therefore, the first essential to fit them for active co-operation with men in the larger life of the country. The Conference began as an educational Conference but it has wisely included social questions within its purview since last year. Education and social reform are the two fundamental needs of Indian women at the present time. Political and municipal franchise and seats in the Legislatures and Local self-government bodies, will, as shown at the outset, be of help and we should like to see a larger number of well qualified Indian women on these bodies. But the primary problems concerning Indian women are educational and social. What is the education that women need, which can best qualify them to take an equal place with men in national life? Is it enough to provide them with a type of education specifically directed to make them good wives and mothers? Would this kind of education suffice to enlarge their present outlook which is limited to their family and at most to their caste or community? Are Indian women content with the ideal of Sita and Savitri or do they want to graft upon it an ideal of public service in keeping with the spirit of the present time? If the latter, can it be done and, if yes, how? Does the ideal of marriage which produced the ancient Sitas suffice the present generations or their descendants? If not, in what respects do they wish to have it changed? What is the attitude of the educated women of this country to the subject of divorce? Do they think that the modern movement of birth-control is desirable and would be of benefit to Indian Society? These are some of the important questions which require to be considered by the Indian women's movement, and we hope the Bombay Conference will give a clear lead on them.

THE FRANKFORT PEACE CONFERENCE.

A determined effort is being made by international thinkers to rid the world of war. It has been rightly felt that this can best be achieved by bringing together representatives of the world's living religions to discuss the ways and means of promoting peace. An organisation consisting of delegates from various nations was created in Geneva to which is entrusted the task of organising this new movement and taking steps for convening the world Peace Conference. The Executive Committee of the World Conference for International Peace through Religion, as the preparatory organisation is called, held its second meeting in Frankfort, Germany, the proceedings of which are embodied in a report. A foreword to the report gives the method that will be adopted at the proposed Peace Conference in these words: "At the Conference each religion will be asked to state its teachings on peace; what it is doing to inculcate these teachings among its followers; how far it can go in uniting in a common crusade to establish international relationships among its followers; how far it can go in uniting in a common crusade to establish international relationships on a peace footing and to outlaw war. The conference will create a great world sentiment in behalf of the things for which vital religion stands." A conference with the object stated above can do a great deal to promote peace and good will among mankind. The fundamental teaching of all religions is the same, namely, the supremacy of moral and spiritual over material means and once this is grasped the recognition of world brotherhood is an easy next step which will herald the era of peace.

The noteworthy feature of the proceedings is the report by the General Secretary, Dr. Henry A. Atkinson, of his eastern tour undertaken on behalf of the Committee. The first place in the East which Dr. Atkinson visited was India where he found much sympathy and support for the peace movement. The Viceroy with whom he had an interview suggested that the World Peace Conference should be held in India. The East is the cradle of all the important religions in the world and no country embraces within its fold almost all the religions as India does. The Executive Committee will do well to accept the suggestion and make India the venue of the first Peace Conference.

Dr. Atkinson has set down in the report as the result of his extensive tour in India, China and Japan the dominating factors that are evident in the life of the people of East. With an insight very rarely found in Western travellers in the East, he has taken the true measure of the new life throbbing in the veins of the Eastern nations. "First of all," says Dr. Atkinson, "is the determination of the people to have a larger voice in the control of their own affairs. The era of white domination over the rest of the world is drawing to a close. "The White Man's Burden" has proven to be in most cases, the weight of a White man carried on the shoulders of the colored races." What is patent to the onlooker often escapes the attention of the actors in the drama. The other factors mentioned are the youth movement in India and China, the impact of Western standards of living on the thought and life of the people, the awakening among the masses and the women's movement. Referring to the last, Mr. Atkinson observes: "Were I to give in categorical form the important movements throughout the East and indicate their importance by their position in the categorical scale, I should put the forward movement among the women as very near the top. No people ever rises higher than the position of its women. Just as long as half of the human race is condemned to an inferior position, so long the race will remain below one-half the position it might occupy. The changed status of women and the new attitude is noticeable in India, China, Japan, and throughout the entire East. It is to this great improvement of the conditions of the women, for the women, and largely by the women, that some sages, and otherwise, wise men, look with suspicion and disfavour, and even with fear, because of what is taking place in the home. No one, seeing the situation, who has any sense of moral and social values, will fail to see the almost infinite possibilities of good in this revolution that is taking place."

From the conclusions arrived at by the Committee, it is evident that much spare work has to be done before the conference can be convened. As a preliminary it has been suggested that arrangements should be made to send deputations to the various countries for establishing friendships and points of contact and it should also be arranged so that these visitors will be received by various religions and will have the opportunity to speak in the Universities and Colleges, The International Fellowship Association which has been doing much valuable work in promoting better understanding among people of different religions in Bombay and other parts can contribute a good deal to the movement. Indeed, it will be a happy consummation when the church, the Synagogue, the mosque and the temple unite together to proclaim the message of peace.

BOMBAY ANDHRAS IN CONFERENCE.***

Social Reform is a much misunderstood phrase ; it is a much misused phrase also. Rebellion against restraint of custom is all that has often been denoted by this expression in our country. It is inevitable in the initial stages. It is inevitable in a subject race which has no real power to lay out social programmes and carry them out. With greater freedom in political life we are fortunately on the way to constructive Social Reform. Undigested spiritualism unrelated to social life on account of our political conditions had also helped to dwarf social endeavour and restrict the scope of Social Reform. That again has been corrected by a cosmic spiritual outlook, thanks to the great liberal movements beginning with Raja Ram Mohan and Swami Dayananda and coming down to Tilak, Shradhananda and Gandhi and Tagore through a succession of great names. We are now on the threshold of a New Yuga and its great beginnings. Let us glory in it and go forward.

RESPECT FOR HUMANITY.

The bedrock of all modern reform is respect for humanity. No man is inferior in the eye of society, which is but a manifestation of Godhead. From the pages of the Bible the West has attempted to bring this down to every day life through its democracy and from the pages of our Vedanta we have begun to apply it in life. The first manifestation of that life is our great movement for the removal of untouchability. Vedanta in one hand and untouchability in the other ! It is unthinkable. The learned slave of the dark ages that had to bow his head before ignorant tyrants might have reconciled himself to it but the free man, the fearless thinker, the real scion of the great rishis can no more tolerate it. The curse of bondage must disappear if Vedanta has to be lived. The inspired seer that Gandhi is, he has achieved and yet he shall achieve through all of us.

CASTE, CLASS DISTINCTION.

The next question that arises in this application of human relationships is the question of caste as it exists to-day in the orthodox mind with immemorial heredity as its pivot, with barriers between caste and caste, subcaste and subcaste, irremovable except by death, with intolerable restrictions of Panthidosha and Dristhidosha has already vanished in part and it is bound to vanish much further. Where a common standard is established, where a common cause has to be served, India has learnt to abolish caste. The great National Congress and similar annual recurring functions, the permanent institutions attached thereto, many a school and many a college have all practically abolished caste. The new order is not still fully evolved but it is idle to believe caste, orthodox caste, is now alive. Brothers and sisters, press forward in true companionship in everyday life with your equals and the problem of caste will settle itself. Let not caste intervene in achieving common good and there the solution lies. Caste does not require to be attacked, it requires to be ignored.

WOMEN, THEIR PLACE IN SOCIETY.

Newer and more important problems stare us in the face to day. The woman's movement is afoot and many a man is puzzled where it leads us to. The demand for a law of divorce recently made by the Women's Conference in Madras has set men on tenter hooks where thousands of marriages of babes are being rushed, just to escape the Sarda act, by cowards who dare not face the jails, where, thanks to our degenerate education pauper graduates of Universities abandon their innocent wives yet in the earlier teens because their fathers do not satisfy the lust of the sons-in-law for lucre, where orthodox men of sixty marry girls of ten or twelve with all the pomp and pageantry of religious observance blighting the whole future of their existence, where sastris, acharyas and purohits play a profitable trade in their own children and others' children for matrimonial purposes, it is no wonder woman has rebelled and asked for a law of divorce. It may cause consternation in the hearts of sinners but it causes no consternation in my mind. I have more faith in my mothers and sisters. This land is not a land that did not know divorce. In the time of Chandragupta divorce was allowed. It never could take root in India. I am sure the Indian woman has never transgressed her natural limits. She has been the queen, she has been the warrior, she has been the poet, she has been the scientist, but she has never divested herself of her rightful place as the mother and the housewife. She has never allowed the simple, disciplined, spiritual life of India to slip from her grasp. Let man correct himself. Let him realize the significance of spiritual marriage ; let him apply to himself the standards of judgment that woman has stood so well and so splendidly for centuries, let him rise from the grovelling feeling of his own particular rights and conveniences, let him once more rise to the stature of his ancient forefathers in that great spiritual outlook, which is our heritage and correct his relationship with his Ardhangi and he will discover that India still produces the great Sitas, Damayanthis, Savitris, Sakuntalas, Ahalyas and Lakshmbais.

MAIN PURPOSE.

The whole fault with us is that we are not making efficient men and efficient women capable of sacrifice and service. The talk of reform is easy but the grit to carry it out is difficult to get. Let us train men and women to do and die. We must determine to cease producing weak children and weaker mothers. We must determine to stop the ever growing emasculation of our boys and girls by early and proper attention to their physical well being and mental outlook on life. We must determine to stop life's waste in our country by cleansing ourselves of extravagant, unpunctual and irregular habits. We must determine to hound out the evils of drink and other sinful habits and stop the great drain of human energy that they involve. We must determine that we look upon our lives not as opportunities given to us for self-gratification and self aggrandisement but as opportunities bestowed upon us for incessantly building up the edifice of the world in which we subsist for ever, either as our own progeny, or as reincarnated beings. In one word we must do all that is necessary to make our nation efficient and cheerful.

LABOUR LIFE.

One aspect of life that concerns you along with our masses in this city is the problem of "Labour Life." Most of our brethren here, I presume, are labourers. I have had occasion to visit Kamathipura and come into contact with the great work our friends are doing there for cultural purposes. But I must say that a great deal more has yet to be done. In a similar manner our brethren are scattered, labouring under difficult circumstances in many a place in this province like Poona, Sholapur, Ahmedabad, Broach and Surat, I am glad that there are a large number of Andhra organisations. I am told in this City there are four of them; the Telugu Mahajan Sabha, the Bombay Andhra Association, the Bombay Provincial Andhra Mahasabha and the Bombay Andhra Nilayam, the last a reading room and library. The Poona City has an Andhra Association. The other places have not much of an organisation while there is no question that these associations are all doing their best, there certainly is a need for the Andhra brethren in this Province to come together into a united effort for Social Service. Housing schemes for our labour-population is a crying need. To initiate such schemes, to take interest in such schemes where they are initiated by others, to press the claims of Andhras where such claims exist and get justice done—all require the patient attention of a central organisation. Again the sanitary conditions under which our brethren live are most often any thing but desirable. To rouse a real civic sense in our brethren, to co-operate with other communities in schemes of health and sanitary propoganda and carefully get the advantage thereof for our community is equally a task in which a central guiding agency is a necessity.

TELUGU AND THE BOMBAY UNIVERSITY.

Your special problem, I know, is the problem of the recognition of our common mother tongue. I have no desire to be separatist. I would urge on you the necessity to feel one with your neighbour in a land where they are a majority and we are a minority, but I would certainly plead, where our population is a considerable compact body we should have facilities for an early grounding in our own mother tongue and at the topmost reaches in the University for a special optional application to it. Why our Universities should decline to encourage our own languages like Telugu which is reputed to be the most musical in India, admittedly the very best in Southern India, is really what I am not able to understand. To my mind the Bombay University which has to deal primarily with Marathi, must have taken care to include Telugu in its courses of study because I am sure Marathi would greatly gain by research in Telugu. I hold the relationship between Maharashtrian and the Andhra, even with regard to language, is very much closer than his relationship with other groups probably with the exception of Canarese. On the high authority of Lokamanya Tilak and from my own personal knowledge I am able to state, without fear of contradiction, that the Marathi and the Telugu are very near cousins. May I hope that the Bombay University will take note of it and the Andhra University though still very young will exert its influence, the former to give and the latter to get a place for Telugu in the Bombay University.

THE PROPOSED ASHRAM AT SAT TAL

A PRELIMINARY STATEMENT.

(BY REV. E. STANLEY JONES, SITAPUR).

The purpose and spirit of the proposed Ashram might be stated as follows:—

1. To yoke the Christian spirit and the Indian spirit in the service of Christ and India.
2. To endeavour to produce a type of Christianity more in touch with the soul of India and more aflame with the love of Christ.
3. In order to fulfil the above aims we propose to have a group of specially invited Indians and Europeans who shall, in group meditation and devotion and study, endeavour to think through the problems of the relationship of our Gospel to the other faiths of the world and especially of India, and of the relationship of our lives and work to the future of India.
  - (a) In addition to this group of the specially invited we will welcome those who care to join us from time to time.
4. This group will live in Indian style, eat Indian food and wear Indian dress. As we hope to have Hindus join us the food will be vegetarian. This group will share the same bungalow and out-cottage. No distinctions will be made. We hope to break down all barriers.
5. As one of the chief marks of the Indian spirit is simplicity this group will live in simplicity, have few or no servants; work with their hands in the bungalow and in the surrounding gardens and serve each other generally.
6. We shall endeavour to learn sympathetically the languages, culture and religions of India in order to have a more sympathetic approach to the people. At the same time we shall endeavour to hold a passionate devotion to the mind and purpose and person of Christ. We hope to make the Indian spirit creative in art, in music and in Christian thinking.

7. Out of this group-thinking we shall endeavour to produce a literature which shall interpret our Gospel to India and to the rest of the world.

8. As we propose, for the present, to have the Ashram run from April to July, inclusive, it will be composed of those who are engaged in other work in India. We hope they will carry back a new spirit into their local situations. We will endeavour thereby to create new centers of understanding of India and a passionate devotion to Jesus Christ in various parts of the country.

9. As the Ashram will be a part-of-the-year Ashram there will be no question of salaries or allowances. Each one will, as far as possible, contribute to the cost of food and incidentals.

10. As the location is in a hill-station we hope to have missionaries and Christian workers and laymen come to us for spiritual recuperation and to get into closer touch with the soul of India. If there is not room in the Ashram proper there are twelve bungalows connected with the Sat Tal Estate which can be rented. These bungalows are furnished and will be suitable for families or groups of single individuals. The average rental for a bungalow for a family is about Rs. 50.

11. We expect to have with us Hindus and Moslems and men of other faiths who will join us for periods of sympathetic study of the Christian faith. We also hope to have those who have recently begun the Christian way of life to join us to learn it more perfectly and to become established.

12. Later on when the Ashram has found its soul we may establish a school in connection with it, but for the present we will have no provision for the children. They can be accommodated in the surrounding rented bungalows with their families. The central Ashram bungalow, which has fourteen rooms, will be occupied by men. Behind this bungalow and connected with the Ashram is a small bungalow of three suits which might be occupied by married couples without children. Ladies, single and married, can be accommodated in the rented cottages not connected with the Ashram. Those living outside the Ashram proper may partake of the activities and life of the Ashram.

13. The Ashram will be Christian but will know nothing of denominational lines. In our worship we shall endeavour to take that which will best express the Christian spirit. At the same time we hope the worship will express the finest of the Indian spirit. We trust that prayer will be the very breath of the Ashram.

14. The central group, which will be specially invited, will be in number from ten to thirty. They will be invited on the basis of their sympathy toward the aims of the Ashram and their ability to contribute to the fulfilment of those aims. While we state the aims to be the above we will endeavour to face the situation with an open mind, ready to respond to new leadings as 'it seems good to the Holy Spirit and to us.'

GENERAL INFORMATION.

The Sat Tal Estate has recently been acquired from Mr. and Mrs. A. C. Evans who have run it as a Hill-station resort. It is composed of 400 acres, mostly of wooded land. It has a beautiful lake (Panna) which belongs to the Estate and it borders on two Government lakes. It is filled with wild-life and the Government forests surround it. It is thus self-contained. There can be no encroachments upon it. Its peace and quiet are assured.

The Ashram will be located on the ridge known as Midlakes. There will be other activities centering in Sat Tal such as Student Camps, Teachers Institutes, etc., for it is the purpose of the Committee of Management of the Sat Tal Estate to make the place a Christian centre. But the Ashram, located on the central but isolated ridge, will have a life of its own. The rest of the cottages will be rented to those who may, or may not have any connection or interest in the life of the Ashram.

Sat Tal is 4,800 feet above sea level, has a post office of its own, is two and a half miles from Bhim Tal where supplies can be had, is three miles from the Motor Road at Bhawali, ten miles by bridle path from Kathgodam, the rail head, and ten miles from Naini Tal. It is therefore one of the most accessible of hill-stations.

To get to Sat Tal one should purchase his ticket to Kathgodam on the R. and K. Ry. From there motor buses run to Bhawali, which is on the main road to Ranikhet and Almora. The bus fare from Kathgodam to Bhawali is from one to two rupees. From Bhawali to Sat Tal, a distance of three miles, luggage can be sent by coolie and one can walk or obtain a dandy or pony. Another way is to have luggage sent straight from Kathgodam to Sat Tal by coolie and one can walk or get a bandy or pony for the ten miles up the hill. The first mentioned way is preferable.

Enquiries for the rental of cottages not connected with the Ashram can be made from Rev. T. C. Badley, 37 Cantt. Road, Lucknow until March 1st, after that from Rev. E. M. Moffatt, Mission, Sitapur, U. P. Enquiries about the Ashram are to be made from Rev. E. Standley Jones, Sitapur, U. P. Please note that approval of stay at the Ashram should be secured before coming.

Drowning Boy Saved :—A very admirable act of bravery was performed by Captain Jagannath, a Congress volunteer. The boy, aged eight years, who is the son of Seth Bharosamal of Benares, was walking on the Ravi bridge when, afraid of being run over by a motor car, he swung to the right and slipped into the river from a height of about forty feet. Jagannath, who happened to be on the bridge doing his usual round of duty, saw the boy falling, jumped into the river at once and caught the boy who had become unconscious. He was brought back on the camp and regained consciousness after an hour. Seth Bharosamal, who was accompanying the boy thanked Captain Jagannath and offered him a reward of Rs. 1,000. The volunteer declined the money with thanks as he said he had only performed his duty.

THE LATE Mr. MAZHARUL HAQ.

Maulana Masharul Haq passed away at his village residence Faridpur on the 2nd instant. For the following interesting sketch of his life we are indebted to the Searchlight, Patna.

Maulana Haq's education began in his fifth year. From his very early days he was of studious habits and the love of books which he acquired early in life never left him till his last moments. He read all kinds of books, light and serious, but his chief hobby was history, particularly Islamic history, and Philosophy. He succeeded in going to England in spite of opposition. He returned to India after having been called to the Bar.

In 1908 Mr. Haq organised a branch of the Muslim League, with the sole object of making his co-religionists come out of their shell and take part in the political life of the province and in this he completely succeeded. He with some of his Hindu friends organised the Behar Provincial Conference, the first session of which was held at Bankipore in April 1908 with Sir Ali Imam as its President. The association of these two Musalman leaders had the most salutary effect upon the fortunes of the conference. All the Musalmans of light and leading and influence joined it in a body and Bihar presented a unique spectacle, in the whole of India, of Hindus and Musalmans working shoulder to shoulder in complete harmony, inspired by common ideals and aspirations. He was twice elected to the old Imperial Council and his work there was always inspired by a high sense of patriotism and sturdy independence. He was chairman of the Bankipore session of the Indian National Congress and in that capacity he delivered a remarkable address which was so widely appreciated throughout the country. We need hardly here dwell upon the prominent part that he played in the Cawnpore Mosque affair. It was mainly due to his efforts that a satisfactory settlement was brought about and he won the esteem and regard of all his co-religionists.

In the great famine of 1897, Maulana Haq acted as secretary of the charitable Famine Relief Fund of the district, and did yeoman service in that connection. He began to take interest in Municipal affairs also.

But these activities of his early years fade into insignificance before the valuable contribution that he made to the political activities of the country. A man of very large and wide outlook, Maulana Haq's sturdy independence, fearlessness, courage of conviction and his sense of intense patriotism were apparent. Maulana Haq was responsible for the starting of the All-India Muslim League. The unfortunate and regrettable controversy that raged about the special and mixed electorates in connection with the Minto-Morley Reform, again put him on his mettle. He stood out prominently in the controversy and opposed the unreasonable demands of the Muslim League extremists for special electorates throughout, most manfully and courageously. He was attacked and abused by the bulk of the Muslim Press in India. Contumely, ridicule and abuse were poured upon him, but they did not in the least affect his patriotism. He fought and fought hard unmindful of all the consequences. He was one of the greatest apostles of Hindu-Muslim Unity, and always preached and practised it, both in public and private. He always stood the severest test in this connection and never allowed himself to waver in the least in his unflinching faith in Hindu-Muslim Unity.

And in 1920, Maulana Haq was not a whit behind in responding to the call of the country. He readily gave up his lucrative practice at the Bar and threw himself heart and soul into the Non-co-operation movement. He hesitated not in the least to give a go by to the fashionable life of luxury, ease and comfort to which he was accustomed and embracing all at once a life of poverty. He founded the local Sadakat Ashram from where he started a weekly paper called "The Motherland." It was while editing this paper that he offended the Jail authorities by exposing some of their misdeeds in connection with the treatment of political prisoners, for which he had to suffer incarceration for three months. Later on he removed to his village home at Faridpur where he lived a retired life till his death. But even in his retirement he was a source of considerable inspiration to many a worker in the field of politics. He was practically elected president of the Gauhati Session of the Congress, and it was only because he refused to come out of his seclusion that Sjt. Srinivas Iyengar was elected. He acted for three years as Chairman of the Saran District Board as well. In his old age Maulana Haq suffered a great shock in the death by accident of his son whom he loved so passionately. From this shock he never recovered completely, but found a great consolation in the study of philosophy, and spiritualism which was his chief hobby during this period. In his noble, intelligent and cultured wife he found a great support in his trials and tribulations. To her and members of the bereaved family we offer our heartfelt condolence. A distinguished Indian, a great Beharee, a staunch patriot and one of the greatest apostles of Hindu-Muslim Unity has passed away.

CHRISTA SEVA SANGH.

The Rev. W. S. A. Robertson writes in the Indian Witness :—

In Poona recently there has come into being a Christian Ashram where the simple Indian life is lived by a group of Indians and Westerners together. There are some sixteen in all. The life of prayer and devotion is given the first place here. Through Bhakti they seek that union with God which the saints and seers have longed for. They seek to follow, too, the pathways of Dnyan and Karma. Dnyan is interpreted as sacred study. There is in the ashram a very good library and an endeavour is made to have ever increasingly here the atmosphere of real scholarship. By Karma is understood loving service of all kinds; particularly for those in distress and poverty. From the Ashram various forms of Christian activity radiates. There is the visiting of the hospitals, the prison, the leper asylum and some social work and preaching of the Gospel in villages near by.

The members of the Ashram are bound together in a community. This is called "Christa Seva Sangh" (the Society of the Servants of Christ). The Ashram in Poona has been built only eighteen months; but the "Sangh" has existed for some seven years, although in earlier days it had no fixed abode. Father Winslow, who was once an S. P. G. Missionary in Ahmadnagar, gathered around him a group of young Indians living a simple life in which prayer was put first. They lived a wandering life in the villages, seeking to make known the love of Christ. Later, with the strong approval of the Bishop of Bombay, they came to feel the desirability of a permanent home; and it was thought that the most suitable place for this was Poona, where they could come freely into contact with educated people. So the Poona Ashram of "Christa Seva Sangh" has sprung up.

The "Sangh" has a special devotion to St. Francis, the little poor man of Assisi, through whose "friars" in the thirteenth century new spiritual life was brought to Italy and indeed to the whole of Europe. So just as St. Francis founded a Brotherhood, a Sisterhood, and a Third Order for those following the ordinary callings in life who would normally be married, there are within the family of the "Sangh" the same three Orders. The First Order is for men who will give up all money and other possessions, living in celibacy for the Kingdom of God's sake. The Second Order is for women who feel called by God to live their life under similar conditions. There is as yet no Sisterhood in Poona but there are several women, both Indian and English, who are hoping to join the "Sangh," and it is expected that later on there will be an Ashram for them close to the Ashram for the Brothers. Then the Tertiaries have already begun; and there are more men and women anxious to be enrolled. There is a special call for Grihasthas (householders) who will live their life fully consecrated to God. For them his will would seem to be the avoidance of luxury, the spreading among men of the spirit of brotherhood, and the making known of Christ and his love. In the Ashram live Brothers who are members of the First Order. They have no money of their own, they share a common purse. For all their needs they rely on the gifts of friends, both Indian and English. They live in as great simplicity as possible, following Indian ways. It is their custom to eat no meat, to take their meals on the ground and most of the Brothers do not have beds to sleep in. No servants are kept except a cook. No Brother has yet turned up with the vocation of a claf (?). There is plenty of work to do in the cleaning of the Brothers' cells, in the care of the library and chapel and in looking after the garden. There is in the Ashram the spirit of the happy family. There is always much gaiety and laughter, for the Brothers seek to catch something of the happy spirit of St. Francis, and indeed one of the notes of the "Sangh" is joy.

Much time each day is given to reading and study. Lectures are given by those Brothers who are qualified to teach. The Ashram is in a very real sense a place of training. Later some of the Brothers may go out and engage in active work in other places but many of them are now young and inexperienced. Therefore it is of vital importance that the most should be made of those first years in the Ashram. The period of probation for a Brother is a long one. It is many years before he can become a full member of the "Sangh." And for him in the first days as a Brahmachari the training of the mind through reading and study is essential. But of course, even more essential is the learning of the ways of prayer. Therefore, in the Ashram normally many hours a day are spent in silence and the day is punctuated by times of corporate worship. At sun-rise in the open air is the morning sandhya, an offering of singing and meditation. Similarly at the end of the day at sunset, as the light fades and stars begin to appear, the Brothers gather together for the evening sandhya. The songs of Narain Vaman Tilak are their treasury of devotion at these times, sung sitting on the ground in the Indian fashion as often as possible to the accompaniment of Indian instruments.

It is the great hope of the Brothers to do something towards the clothing of Christianity in Indian dress. They look upon it as an appalling tragedy that in this land, full of religious devotion, Christ has been so often presented in such a Western way that he cannot be readily understood and loved by the people. Similarly, too, the Brothers regard the Western divisions among Christians as a hindrance to the spread of God's Kingdom in India. They long for the healing of those divisions and continually pray and work for unity.

The "Sangh" does not confine its vision of work to the Ashram. The Brothers have founded in Poona near by, a hostel for students where those who attend colleges may live in the atmosphere of a Christian household. Two Brothers are set apart to be in charge of this hostel. It started a year ago and has now eighteen students in it. Indeed it is as full as it possibly can be and there is a waiting list. There are Muslim and Hindu students living together and dining together with the Christians. It is the hope of the Brothers that by reading the Gospels with them, by personal talks and through the influence of friendship they may lead these young men to know Christ.

Some times the Brothers dream dreams of the future. They hope that the day will come when the "Sangh" will have a piece of work in the villages. They wish that this should aim at the complete uplift of the people. Such work would include teaching, medical assistance, instruction in hygiene and improved agricultural methods. Perhaps one day the "Sangh" will count among its Brothers a doctor Brother and some nursing sisters. Then, too, there is the hope that there will be started in a few years' time an Ashram in Ceylon. Several educated Singalese clergy and laymen are hoping to join it. Hence it is desired that there should be made a special study of Buddhism in relation to Christianity. One day, too, in the more distant future there may be a house of "Christa Seva Sangh" in Northern India which would seek to make an approach towards Islam. The Lord has done great things for them already and it is for this reason that the Brothers dare to expect great things from him in the days to come.

INDIA AND THE DRINK TRADE.

The following interview with Rev. J. F. Edwards of Bombay, appeared in the Methodist Recorder, U. S. A.

First-hand information concerning the social and moral problems which affect the work of missionary evangelisation is of interest and importance to Methodists everywhere, and for that reason, I caught the Rev. J. F. Edwards of Bombay, "on the wing," to gain some information of the missionary attitude to possible political developments in India. Mr. Edwards, who is on furlough in this country, has just completed twenty-one years' work in India, during the latter half of which he has been Editor of a joint missionary weekly paper for our own Missionary Society and five others, and reviser of the Marathi Bible. But of special interest at the moment is the fact that Mr. Edwards has forwarded to the India Statutory Commission, now in session under the presidency of Sir John Simon, the only memorial for all India on India's trade in drink and opium—a memorial which has been accepted by Indian leaders as setting forth their point-of-view with accuracy, and which at the same time incorporates a summary of the official statistics on the subject. This memorial, by the way, is now being reprinted as a pamphlet by the Joint Overseas Temperance and Social Welfare Committee of our Church, and can be obtained from the Central Buildings, Westminster (price 6d.).

I asked what led him to intervene by submitting a memorial on the Indian Temperance Question to the Simon Commission.

Mr. Edwards answered: "When the Simon Commission was in India it was boycotted so widely that even progressive reformers and constructive politicians would not meet the Commission, either to give evidence or to make any requests. It was in such an impasse that distinguished Indians and missionaries urged me, as Missionary Editor, to draft the memorial which I forwarded to the Commission. I need not remind you that since three out of every four of King George's subjects live in India, this question should be carefully weighed by the people of Britain. For with 90 per cent. of India's 320 million people illiterate, 66 per cent. of them in serious poverty, and 100 millions without any medical facilities, liquor and opium cannot but retard India's national and religious development. This is fully realised by Hindu and Muslim leaders who are united in their opposition to the liquor trade. Hence the alienating and estranging influence of this trade on the relations between Britain and India."

"Is the liquor traffic in India on the increase?" I asked.

"The position, briefly, is this" said Mr. Edwards. "In some Indian Provinces the consumption of what is called Indian country liquor shows a decrease; but over against this there is a startling increase spread over all India in the consumption of foreign liquor and beer. While the number of drinkshops has decreased from 83,000 in 1901-1 to 45,000 in 1926-27, the total revenue from these shops rose from 6 crores of rupees to 24 crores, which means that a mere reduction of shops is not preventing the consolidation of the liquor trade. More serious still is the increase in the figures for foreign liquor, 1,297,611 gallons of foreign liquor being imported in 1904-5, and five times that quantity, 6,207,343 gallons, in 1927-28. The average proportion of public revenue derived from liquor and drugs in the Provincial Governments of India is about 25 per cent.; the proportion derived from this source of India's total tax-revenue, from both Central and Provincial Governments, is stated by the Taxation Inquiry Committee to be 18 per cent. last year's total being about fifteen million pounds, against two million pounds fifty years ago." Since India's scientists and statesmen denounce this revenue as "tainted money," a moral issue is raised which justifies the Christian missionary in stepping into the arena.

"In this connection," continued Mr. Edwards, "I would like to draw attention to the following sentence in my pamphlet, Liquor and Opium in India: Anything short of Dominion Status would mean that some special provision would need to be inserted in the new Constitution to ensure that India should not be foiled of her desire to keep out foreign liquor."

"You hold, then, that the Indian Temperance question is a strong argument in favour of granting Dominion Status for India?" I queried.

"Yes, emphatically," came the reply. "It will mean that if the liquor traffic is continued in India, especially the traffic in foreign liquor which is doing most harm, then that will be India's own act, and Britain will be largely absolved from responsibility for the continuance of such a shocking state of things as the foreign liquor traffic involves, with no less than 1,320,000 gallons of foreign spirit (half from the United Kingdom) being unloaded each year on India."

"Are you confident India will abolish the liquor traffic if it gets power to do so?" I inquired.

To this Mr. Edwards gave a cautious reply; "Someone has wisely said that concerning India we should observe the past, study the present, but never prophesy. "Recorder" readers may draw their own conclusions from two recent expressions of Indian opinion. The Municipality of Taran-Taran in the Amritsar District of the Punjab last year decided to avail itself of the powers of the new Punjab Local Option Act. Out of 2,000 voters, 1,600 voted, and not a single voter favoured the liquor shop. Changanacherry, in the Travancore State, recently had a similar opportunity, when 90 per cent. of the Municipal voters voted for closing liquor shops in the town. I believe equally remarkable results would follow a universal Local Option Act for India."

"I take it, then, that on the whole you believe Dominion Status is a practicable solution for the problem of India's future?"

"On the whole, yes," was Mr. Edwards' guarded reply; "I believe a round-table conference on the subject between Government, Indian politicians and Indian Princes, on the agreed basis of Dominion Status, would reach a solution of the innumerable problems involved. In holding this belief I am encouraged by the manifest growth of the true democratic spirit in the Indian Church, by the increasing influence of Indian Christian leaders throughout the country, and by the steady dominance of the spirit of constructive reform under the leadership of educated Indian men and women of all social grades."

Mr. Edwards has made plans for returning to India. He sails on the Berengaria, which leaves Southampton for New York on December 4. He proposes to visit Japan and China to glean ideas from the Churches there on the important matter of training indigenous leaders of the Christian Church.

An Amazing Trial!

WHICH ENLIVENED AN AMILDAR !!

For about 8 months last year I was seriously suffering from Diabetes and tried in vain many of the English medicines. I thought I would never find an efficacious remedy for my complaint. At last as a trial I took to the use of Amrita. It was really amazing for me to see that I got over my disease by using only 2 bottles. Besides I find I have greatly improved myself in health and what is more I find I have been actually enlivened by the medicine.

NOTES.

The Women's Conference :—The Women's Education Conference of which the fourth session will be held in this city from Monday next is an organised effort at improvement of the conditions of women for women and by women themselves. Critics have not been wanting, who can not imagine why women should organise themselves separately. But the wearer alone knows where the shoe pinches and the thousand and one problems which affect women are best dealt with by women themselves. The foundation laid by social reformers, men of vision and thought, has been so secure and productive of such good results that we have to-day women leaders who can continue the work by building upon it. The conference has rightly given the first place in the programme of its work to women's education. The general illiteracy prevailing among women, which has been time and again pointed out in educational reports is the source of their backwardness in the country. Time was when girls' education was considered a costly and unprofitable luxury but now it is conceded that education is the birthright of every girl as much as every boy. It is high time that the conference awakened the public conscience and the sense of duty of the state to enforce compulsory primary education for girls, irrespective of community or creed. It is essential to bring this about that the conference should, through its constituencies establish contacts with villages which are steeped in ignorance. In elementary and secondary stages the question of differentiation in the curricula for studies for boys and girls does not arise. It is in higher stages that it is insisted that the nature of education for women should fit them for the domestic duties which they will be called upon to perform as wives and mothers. On this ground alone a different curriculum for women is not justified. Already there is a wide divergence between the mental outlook of men and women, owing to the almost total neglect of women's education in the past. Our aim in women's education should be to bridge the gulf and not make it wider. The sharing by men and women of the same labours, necessitating a common culture and therefore common habits of thought and interests will be the very means of filling this undesirable hiatus. For this purpose the courses of studies for men and women should be the same. This is not to say that adequate provision for cultural studies should not be insisted on for both sexes in education.

Programme Of Women's Conference :—The programme before the fourth All India Women's Conference is a lengthy one extending over five days. Except on Monday, when the Conference opens in the evening, the sessions will all be held in the mornings, and afternoons will be devoted to visits to schools, social work and industrial centres, hospitals and maternity homes and excursions to places of interest. The programme also includes Radio talks, lantern lectures, a public concert and entertainments. Thus the organisers of the All-India Women's Conference have made their programme attractive by a judicious combination of business and pleasure. There will not only be speeches and resolutions but practical demonstration of what have been done by women.

Sir Purshotamdas' Munificence :—The excellent building scheme initiated by Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas in his own district of Surat four years ago has been an unqualified success in the spread of primary education in the rural area. The number of schools that have taken advantage of the scheme rose from 5 in the first year, to 59 at the present day, including 9 schools which are under construction. These buildings constructed under the scheme are authoritatively stated to be built on the latest hygienic principles. They provide plenty of accommodation and furnish every convenience and comfort to the pupils receiving instruction in them. It must be a pleasure to the pupils to receive instruction in such wholesome surroundings. "The Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas Village School Building Scheme" as it is called, has done much to teach the value of self-help and stimulate interest in education among the rural population of Surat. One of the essential conditions of the scheme is that the villagers should contribute not less than one third of the cost of the buildings and also provide sites for them. The actual supervision of the work of construction is also entrusted to their care. Another important feature of the scheme is that its benefits are by no means confined to any particular class or creed. Four schools for Mahomedans, two for depressed classes and four girls' schools are enough to convince one of the universality of the scheme. Only last week the Governor of Bombay performed the opening ceremony of an Urdu School at Pardi and paid a well-deserved tribute to Sir Purshotamdas for his generosity and public spirit.

The Social Conference :—We publish elsewhere the constitution of the National Social Conference as adopted at the 42nd Session held at Lahore. From a perusal of the contents it seems to us that the institution has limited its activities and powers by framing this, and that it has now become more of an All-India organisation for social service than a conference of the various social workers all over the country. The constitution which is similar to that of the Congress provides for provincial conferences and committees which will be responsible to the All-India committee. No one can go as a delegate to the All-India Conference unless he is elected by an organisation recognised by the Provincial Committees or is a member of the All-India Committee. We think that the attempt at "centralising" reform work was not necessary as already it exists to a greater measure than in any other sphere. If, however, this constitution is able to co-ordinate the social work carried on within each province, much will have been achieved. The provision that past presidents of the National Conference will be members of the All-India Committee will increase the number of that body by at least twenty. The number of members in the Committee will be roughly eighty and the rule that one-fifth of this will be necessary for a quorum will prevent it from meeting more often than the one occasion required by the constitution. As its object is mainly to co-ordinate the work of the provincial committees this is to be welcomed as the committee can only lay down general rules for the guidance of the provincial bodies. We wish the Conference every success in the new stage it has entered.

Anti Untouchability Bill in C. P. :—We take the following from the Hitavada, Nagpur :—"In the list of business for the ensuing session of the C. P. Legislative Council there is a short Bill for the introduction of which Mr. Gavai, M.L.C., will seek the permission of the Council. The object of the Bill is nearly the same as that of Mr. Jayakar's Bill in the Legislative Assembly viz., the extending of the free use of all places of public utility constructed or maintained partly or wholly out of public funds such as wells, tanks, rest-houses and the like to all classes of people irrespective of caste prejudices in the matter. It will be recalled in this connection that in 1921 a resolution was moved in the C. P. Council by Mr. Nandagaoli, one of the representatives of the depressed classes, recommending the extension of the use of all public places to the members of the depressed classes, without let or hindrance. Owing mainly to the attitude of strict neutrality which Government took up at the time, the resolution was defeated, 10 voting for and 23 against the motion." The resignation of the Swarajists in the Council reduces the supporters of the Bill, but we hope Mr. Gavai's efforts will meet with success.

Women's Education And Work In Behar And Orissa :—We print elsewhere a lengthy report of the work done by the women of Behar and Orissa for the education and uplift of their sisters. During the four years that the Bihar and Orissa Women's Council has been in existence, it has initiated and has been carrying on a comprehensive programme of work. One of the demands they have put forth is that women should be nominated in large numbers to municipalities and local boards to promote primary education for girls. Miss S. B. Das one of the three lady members in the Senate of the University of Patna made a forceful speech drawing the attention of the Government to the backwardness of women's education in the province and appealing to them to take immediate steps to open Intermediate classes to provide higher education for women. With all these activities, the women of Bihar and Orissa have shed the epithet "backward" which was used to describe them in the past.

The East African Question: Pundit Hirdayanath Kunzru who led the East African Indian Deputation to England and who returned to India last week declared that there is a change for the better in the East African situation from the Indian point of view. He stated in his interview to the press :—"The three main questions in which Indians are interested are those relating to the closer union of Kenya, Uganda and Tanganyika, the official majority in the Kenya Legislative Council and a common electoral roll for all races. The report of Sir Samuel Wilson goes against Indians on all these points and proposes a constitution which if accepted by the British Government will make unofficial European influence dominant not merely in Kenya but generally speaking throughout East Africa. It paves the way as far as is practicable for a dominion of East Africa controlled by the white settlers. As the proceedings of the Mandate Commission show it has aroused considerable feeling in international circles. I have good reasons for believing that it has been strongly opposed by both the Government of India and the India Office. The situation has improved in other ways also. The Cabinet, it appears, is realising the gravity of the problem more and more and is studying the question more fully. The postponement of any decision till the reopening of Parliament, which appears to me to be partly the result of the strong line taken by the Government of India and the Secretary of State for India and the representations made on behalf of the East African Indians will give his Majesty's Government more time to grasp the imperial significance of the East African question. Mr. Wedgwood Benn has taken the deepest interest in it. He understands the Indian point of view as well as any Indian and it will be no exaggeration to say that he will watch sleeplessly over Indian interests in East Africa. He will try to the utmost of his power to secure justice for Indians."

The Sarda Act :—We understand that the Marathi translation of the Sarda Act is in very ambiguous language and has given rise to grave misinterpretations. As a result of this there is a danger of many people being driven to perpetrate the very evil which the Act seeks to destroy. We hope the authorities will move at once to set things right.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, JANUARY 18, 1930.

"JESUS OR CHRISTIANITY."*

Such is the arresting title of a remarkable book by Mr. Kirby Page, Editor of the well-known American review of what may be called applied religion "The World Tomorrow". Mr. Page was in India a short time back and to those who had the good fortune to meet him, the book has an added personal interest. Mr. Page's book in its method strongly reminds one of Miss Katherine Mayo's "Mother India." But its motive is wholly different from that of Miss Mayo. He warns the reader at the outset and, indeed, by his sub-title for the book that it is neither a history of Christianity nor an interpretation of Western civilization, and that it is merely "a study in contrasts." He explains that, since he has primarily written for ministers and lay members of the churches, he has been far more critical of organized Christianity than if he had been writing for non-Christians. "This is also the reason," he writes, "why I have devoted so little space to an enumeration of the glorious achievements of the churches. The reader must, therefore, constantly remember that this presentation by no means constitutes the whole story." Again, at the end he repeats this warning with even more emphasis. "It is not whole story," he repeats. "It is merely an examination of certain attitudes and practices on the part of Christians which constitute conspicuous violations of the spirit and teaching of Jesus. My purpose is to shed light on the question as to why Christianity has not been more successful in uprooting giant evils and why it is so often paralyzed in times of crisis." Mr. Page is an implicit believer not only in the excellence but also the practicability of the teachings of Jesus Christ. His purpose is to help to extend the application of these principles in American life and not to discredit Christianity and the American people in the eyes of other nations. This is what makes the difference between his book and Miss Mayo's.

We have ourselves constantly drawn a distinction between the teachings of Christ and Christianity. But not being Christians ourselves, we can only do so in a general, tentative way. Mr. Page, however, does not labour under the disability. He sees things from the inside and can speak from experience. Whenever the patent inconsistency between the practices of Christian nations and their profession of allegiance to Christ, was pointed out, the answer was that many Christians are not truly Christians but Christians only in name. The same explanation, however, has been assumed by our European Christian critics to be unavailable to Hindus, Mussalmans and Buddhists. We have never been able to understand, why Mr. Kirby Page, however, shows that this plea is not tenable in face of the fact that not merely lay Christians but clergymen and religious leaders are likewise infected by ideas and addicted to practices which are opposed to the teachings of Jesus. The most conspicuous instance of this is their attitude towards war. It has always been a puzzle to us why our Christian missionary friends who regard the institutions of devadasis as the crowning infamy of Hinduism, are so tolerant, to say the least of it, towards War. Arjun, the generalissimo of the Pandava Armies in Mahabharata war, threw down his arms and refused to fight at the last moment because he foresaw the evil consequences even if victory fell to his side. Prominent among these, and that which most distressed him, was the break-up of family life and the corruption of sexual morality which he anticipated as an inevitable result. If the Christian clergy did not foresee this, they should, indeed, be far less keensighted than was Arjun some three thousand years ago. If they did foresee it, and yet blessed the banners, they cannot disown responsibility for the wide-spread sexual demoralisation that has followed the War. We can quote numerous authorities in confirmation of this fact, if necessary. We have had with us for some time past a remarkable collection of essays by authors of exceptional competence, under the title "Sex in Civilization" published by Messrs. Allen and Unwin, London, which we have not yet been able to notice as it is a book which requires close and careful study. Almost every one of the writers starts with the statement or assumption that the War had revolutionised ideas of sexual morality. We shall deal in more detail with the subject when we review the book. Our point, here, is that if the institution of devadasis damns Hinduism beyond reprieve, the close association of the Christian church with what Mr. Kirby Page calls "the War System," must damn Christianity equally irretrievably. He leaves no loop-hole of escape by the usual plea that war exists in spite of Christianity, as he quotes eminent Christian Divines defending and justifying War as sanctioned by Christianity and even by Jesus Christ. "The available evidence is irrefutable," he writes. "Many Christian ecclesiastics and institutions are still upholding and blessing the war system although it is well known that modern war is caused by conflicting economic and political interests and that men, women and children, guilty or innocent, are slaughtered indiscriminately."

* Published by Messrs. Doubleday, Doran & Co., Inc., New York. Price

What is the value of a book of this kind to us who are not Christian ministers or lay members of churches, for whom it is specially written? Its greatest value lies in the first and last chapters where the author describes what Jesus Christ's religion is and how it is quite practicable of application to national life and to international relations. These are of the most interest and value to non-Christian readers. Of less but of none the less practical interest are the detailed exposure of the entanglement of the Churches with dark places of modern civilization. The worst evil of foreign domination is that it fosters and, indeed, depends for its existence on, a constant sense of inferiority in the subject people. This it does unconsciously, even if it does not intend to do so consciously. This tendency of foreign domination is assisted in the modern world by Christian Missions who rely for making converts on persuading the people among whom they work that they are the greatest sinners in the world, and that they (the missionaries) have come from a sinless land to save them from the perdition to which they are otherwise doomed. The Christian Missionary is thus, consciously or unconsciously, an auxiliary of European domination over Asiatic races. That is why nationalism among these races instinctively feels the presence of the missions as a serious menace to itself. Mr. Kirby Page's book shows that West and East, Asia and America, are more or less tarred with the same brush, have more or less the same crying evils, have more or less the same social problems, and are more or less in need of the same stringent application of the religious truths common to all religions in order to raise them in the scale of humanity. It is a feeling which brings us nearer to brotherhood and that is the service which Mr. Kirby Page's book does to non-Christians.

Hindu Temple in New York:—New York is to have a Hindu temple the first, it is said, to be erected in the New world. The temple is to be part of the India Society's building on the site of a house formerly owned by a wealthy American toothpaste manufacturer at Riverside Drive. The centre will have an auditorium, library, art galleries, travel and lecture bureaus, a restaurant and studio apartments where Hindu customs and traditions may be observed in the midst of the pressure of the Western world. The sponsors include Professor Edwin Seligman, Oswald Garrison Villard, Professor John Dewey, Dr. John Haynes Holmes and other distinguished Americans, in addition to Hindus. The Society was founded by Hari G. Govil, a Hindu who went, as a poor immigrant, to that country ten years ago. Mr. Govil's original purpose in going to America was to learn the efficient and hustling ways of the West so that he might carry their influence to his own people. Residence here, however, convinced him, he says, that the East, perhaps, had more to offer the West than the West had to give the East. So he has remained to interpret India to America. Hindus he says, find difficulty in maintaining the life of the spirit in New York, but they can't do it, and the India centre will help.

SOCIAL WORK AND THE CITY.

Dr. Manshardt whose name is well-known to our readers as the writer of the series of short and suggestive articles which appeared last year in the Reformer under the heading "That Men May All Be Brothers," has arranged for a series of lectures at the American Marathi Mission, Neighbourhood House, on "Building a better Bombay." The first lecture on "the Municipality and the City" was given by Mr. A. R. Dalal, the Municipal Commissioner; the second on "Journalism and the City" by Mr. Boulton of the Times of India; the third on "Communal problem in the City" by Mr. M. R. Jayakar. Mr. K. Natarajan delivered the fourth of the series on Wednesday the 16th January on "Social Work and the city" of which the following is a summary:—

Neighbourhood House is founded as a centre of influence based on the injunction, "Love thy neighbour as thyself." A neighbour in the ordinary sense is the person who lives next to you but the sense in which Jesus Christ used it is different. Mr. Kirby Page in his latest book "Jesus or Christianity" says that Jesus meant by neighbour everyone who stood in need of assistance. An even better interpretation is that of the Vedanta as Paul Deussen explained it in the following passage in a lecture delivered in Bombay nearly thirty years ago:—

"The Gospels fix quite correctly as the highest law of Morality: 'Love your neighbour as yourselves.' But why should I do so, since by the order of nature I feel pain and pleasure only in myself, not in my neighbour? The answer is not in the Bible (this venerable book being not yet quite free of Semitic realism), but it is in the Veda, in the great formula Tat Teem Asi, which gives in three words metaphysics and morals together. You shall love your neighbour as yourselves, because you are your neighbour, and mere illusion makes you believe that your neighbour is something different from yourselves. Or in the words of the Bhagavad-gita: he who knows himself in everything and everything in himself will not injure himself by himself, Na Hinasti Atmana Atmanam. This is the sum and tenor of all morality."

On this interpretation, "loving your neighbour" and serving him is to your own interest as much as to his. This also is the teaching of the New Psychology which seeks to explain altruism as a sublimation of the self-regarding instincts of the individual. So far as to the "why" of Social Service.

Now "what" is social service. In a sense every one is doing social service though he may not be aware of it. Every thought and act of an individual has its reaction on other individuals and the Society at large. The careless throwing of a burning cigarette end has often led to disastrous fires. In the same way a wise word spoken thousands of years ago has been a solace and inspiration to millions through ages. Even the poorest beggar has his social value and a great one. Wordsworth devoted a poem to explain the importance of the beggar to society. The following lines occur in his "Old Cumberland Beggar:—

" But deem not this man useless.....
 .....While from door to door,
 This old Man creeps, the villager in him
 Behold a record which together binds
 Past deeds and offices of charity,
 Else unremembered, and so keeps alive
 The kindly mood in hearts which lapse of years,
 And that half-wisdom half-experience gives
 Make slow to feel, and by sure steps resign
 To selfishness and cold oblivious cares.
 Among the farms and solitary huts.
 Hamlets and thinly-scattered villages,
 Where the aged Beggar takes his rounds,
 The mild necessity of use compels
 To acts of love ; and habit does the work
 Of reason ; yet prepares that after-joy
 Which reason cherishes. And thus the soul,
 By that sweet taste of pleasure unpursued,
 Doth find herself insensibly disposed
 To virtue and true goodness. "

Social Service therefore is an expression of respect for human personality as such irrespective of the accidents of life. A society which is organised on the principle of respect for human personality will be the ideal society but unfortunately there is no such ideal society anywhere in the world and it is the object of social service to make society more and more expressive of this principle. It is obvious that in such service the even distribution of the necessities and the amenities of life is of the first importance. The individual social worker or private social organisation can only indirectly help in this important sphere. The bulk of it must be done by the State, Municipal and other authorities, and the Social Worker must see that these authorities are kept up to the mark. Among the necessities and amenities of life which should be sufficiently available to all citizens are air, water, food, clothing, elementary education for his children, decent and sanitary housing and opportunities for self culture. The adequate provision of these will of itself solve many a social problem. It is the deprivation of these that largely lead to anti-social conduct. The city of Bombay, the improvement of which was the purpose of these lectures, is one of the worst socially organised communities in the world. A population of one million three hundred thousand is cooped up in half of an island whose area is about twenty three square miles. Two-thirds of this population is male and only one-third is female. The housing conditions are most deplorable, nearly two-thirds of the population inhabiting one room tenements where 43 per cent. of the total deaths of the city occur and 82 per cent. of the deaths of infants in this city. Prof. Patrick Geddes used to say of the Development Department Chawls that it was not housing but ware-housing the people and the Professor got into hot waters with the Authorities for his outspokenness. Professor Geddes laid it down as an axiom that no chawl in Bombay should be permitted of a height which a pregnant woman with a pot of water cannot comfortably ascend. It is this kind of thinking in which social work is kept constantly in touch with human need that has to be fostered particularly in our Municipal Councillors, Legislators and Members of Government. Patrick Geddes said that he prophesied several years before the Great War that the manner in which the workers were housed in Berlin was bound to produce a nervous condition in them leading to a revolution. In Bombay however whenever we encounter trouble we are ready to ascribe it to Bolshevism, Communism or any other cause instead of the real condition of the people which makes them a ready prey to subversive propaganda. We prevent an epidemic of Cholera by purifying our water supply and not by prosecuting the carriers of bacilli and sending them to jail. This great department of social work is not within the sphere of private initiative. In a city like Bombay, Social service workers are like the ambulance corps of an army whose duty it is to look after the wounded without any voice whatever in the policy which declares war or the strategy which precipitates a battle, it may be under the most unfavourable conditions. A mad statesman might have provoked a war or a drunken general might have launched the battle but the social worker must uncomplainingly set himself to the Sisyphean task of acting as stretcher bearers. On the whole the individual social worker or social organisation can better serve the community by imparting knowledge than by giving material relief. In other words they must help the people to help themselves. The method of Gautama Buddha who put a bereaved mother in the way of realising that death was universal and therefore to be endured with patience, although perhaps, he might have, if he chose, called the dead child back to life and thus could have immediately relieved her anguish, has a profound lesson for the social worker. There are certain qualities which every social worker should possess: Sound health, cheerful temperament, a habit of looking at the bright side of things, sympathy—i. e. the power of looking at the other side of things,—the power of hope in the face of constant and repeated failures, and knowledge without which all the other qualities may not be of much value. A good general education is necessary and particularly a study of psychology in its latest extension to the subconscious. Finally the social worker should know that progress must come by slow degrees by patient and unwearied effort, and sudden progress by revolution is the great illusion that he or she must guard against.

Competition for the Aga Khan Prize:—Man Mohan Singh, a young Indian student of the Bristol University, took off from Croydon on the 4th January on an attempt to win the Aga Khan's £ 500 prize, but owing to mishap had to abandon the flight for the present.

INTER-COMMUNAL AMITY.

MR. JAYAKAR'S LECTURE.

"Compromises do not solve the communal problem. It is essential to make a scientific study of the question which now exists the world over. Nations and individuals who have made a special study of the question, have discovered very recently that common interests, common impulses, common attributes and common avocations alone can solve the feeling" said Mr. Jayakar, M. L. A., speaking on the 8th instant at Nagapada House, Bombay. The subject of the lecture was "Communal problems in the city," in the "Building A Better City" series which was, the other day, inaugurated by Sir Frederick Sykes. Justice Mirza presided.

Mr. Jayakar first dealt with the situation in Bombay, but later dwelt on the communal problem as a world question. He emphasised that common interests alone would provide a permanent solution.

Referring to Bombay's past, the speaker said it had the reputation, like Alexandria of olden days, of being a cosmopolitan city. It was the microcosm of India where lived Hindus, Muslims, Parsees, Sikhs, Jews and Christians. In his younger days, there existed harmony and friendliness amongst the Bombay citizens. The Parsees used to appoint Deccanis as executors of their wills. The Muslims used to consult Hindu friends even on questions of marriage. He regretted that times had changed and each community was nourishing self-consciousness. The Montford reforms were undoubtedly responsible for this self-consciousness among the different communities which were trying to increase their strength by organisation of themselves. That naturally resulted in the formation of classes.

The speaker next stated that such classes were not being formed only in India, but all over the world. There was not a Hindu-Muslim squabble in England, but there was something else. Even America, which claimed to be an advanced nation, was not free from communal diseases, but the last named nation was seriously making a scientific study of the question. Societies and associations had been started and schools were trying to find out what was at the bottom of the cruel disease. As a result of the studies, a few had found out solutions.

Research schools had discovered that the child's mind must be protected from infection. Generally the communal feeling entered into the child when in a sub-conscious state and reached a virulent form at a later age.

Mr. Jayakar quoted the example of an American school where there was a quarrel between the town side and country side boys. The headmaster of that institution found that the feeling originated from the parent. Hence, he arranged functions where the parents were invited to take part. He was careful to put the townside parents and the country-side parents together and arrange common social functions often. In 25 years' time the feeling disappeared.

The speaker concluded that it was the duty of the Bombay Schools Committee to try such methods to remove the communal feeling from the future generation. It was for India to take lessons from such research studies and experiment.

The Chairman, Justice Mirza, endorsed the speaker's suggestions.

WOMEN'S WORK IN BIHAR.

The Honorary Secretary, Miss S. B. Das of the Bihar and Orisa Council of Women presented the following report at the Biennial Conference held last month :—

Our Council came into existence in April 26th 1925. It is a body representing all communities European, Anglo-Indian, Behari, Bengali, and Oriya. The aims and objects of the Council of women are those of all the other women's Council, that is social service and the promotion of sympathy and purpose among women of all communities and to develop the civic sense of women. These aims can be best carried out by encouraging and co-ordinating such forms of social works as already exist for the betterment of social condition. In places like Bombay and Calcutta there were many groups of women working for the public good in many ways. In B. and O. apart from the workers in the mission and the hospitals there were almost no groups of this kind, when our council was started. The fact that there were no existing societies to affiliate to the council of women had made the initial work of the council rather different from the work actually carried on by sister councils in other provinces. It has been necessary in the beginning to find out those who were interested in a subject and then to take steps to form them into a working group, which it is hoped, would later develop into a separate society which could carry on its own work.

I am glad to say that within the last four years, the work of the women's council has become a strong factor in our public life. Some of the movements specially for the uplift of women and children of our province owe their inception to our council which have carried on organised propaganda or participated in public meetings and in many other ways helped to educate public opinion in vital matters.

The work of our council has steadily developed under the presidentship of Lady Stephenson who is one with us as a woman in our aims and for the welfare of the women of our province.

At our last annual general meeting which was held in 25th November our management committee was formed with nine ladies from the European and nine from the Indian communities. And thus for the first time it is truly representative of all communities. Lady Stephenson is its president and the secretaryship has passed through the hand of Mrs. Macpherson to Miss Das and Mrs. H. D. Chatterjee has been elected Jt. Secretary.

Our Council has at present four branches, namely Patna, Ranchi, Cuttack, and Jamshedpur. Patna is our headquarters. The total roll of membership is about three hundred. All our branches are doing good and useful work.

The Council of Women carry on the work by means of the representatives who are called Conveners of the sub-committees. We have the following sub-committees, viz., Education, Jail visiting work, Hospital visiting and Ladies work party. Women's education is very backward in our province. Education sub-committee deals with matters concerning the education of girls and women. In this connection it will not be out of place to mention that four of our members are the Fellows of the Patna University and one of them Miss Das is a member of the Syndicate. Music has been introduced in our university curriculum through the activity of one of the members Miss Das, who is a fellow. As there is no I. A. classes in the capital of our province, one of our members Miss Das who is a Fellow of the University moved a resolution regarding the I. A. classes to be started at Patna at the last annual senate meeting which was unanimously carried and three special scholarships of Rs. 25 each for our girls to prosecute studies in the I. A. classes have been created. One of our members (Miss Das) is also a member on the Secondary Board of Education and she is an elected member on the University Examination Delegacy and also a Municipal Commissioner and is on the primary education committee. Thus you will see that though our province is backward in women's education yet we are proud to say that we are able to voice the aspiration of women for the education of our daughters from primary to university stage before the competent authorities. This is a great step forward for us women of to day. Our Council helps the women of our province in their just aspirations.

As the control of the primary education is entirely in the hands of the Municipalities and the District Boards, and as no portion of the education grant is earmarked for the girl's primary education and as also these Local bodies are composed only of men except one woman (Miss Das) in the whole province, the girl's primary education has been much neglected in the past. Therefore an important resolution was moved by Miss Das at the annual general meeting regarding the recommendation to Government to nominate competent and able women as members on Municipalities and District Boards. This resolution was seconded and supported by Mrs. H. D. Chatterjee and Miss Hasra B. L. and was passed unanimously by the Council and a copy of it has been sent to Government by our committee, for favourable consideration.

Our Council is interested in women's welfare work and social activities and helped them wherever necessary. When after the expiry of three years' service Miss Das was not re-appointed as Hon. magistrate on the ground that owing to a number of junior officers who were under training, there were not sufficient cases to go round, our Council took up this matter with diffidence, and was successful in having her re-appointed. And she has shown to the authorities that there is sufficient work for women magistrate by disposing of 537 cases of I. P. C. and various other acts in last eleven months.

Ladies work parties have been organised and proved successful in our branches. Mrs. Gokhale is the convener of the work party. Garments, bandages, pillow-cases, sheets, flannel kurtas, cotton kurtas, mufflers, woollen vests, etc, etc are done by the work party. And these are sent to the child welfare centres, Duchess of York hospital, leper Asylum, Blind School and Convent where, they are greatly appreciated.

The members of the hospital sub-committee regularly visited throughout the year. The visits seem to be much appreciated both by the women and children and specially by patients who were long bedridden in the hospital.

Jail-work—The management committee of our council felt that the interest of the female prisoners in both the larger and the smaller jails would be furthered, if there were regular lady visitors who would be in a position, not only to represent their needs, but also in some measure to exercise an educative influence. The proposal was brought before the Government and met with full sympathy. Miss Dass who was appointed by the Government as a non-official visitor to the Bankipore Jail is the president of the jail-visiting sub-committee and has been successful in having lady non-official visitors appointed in all of the 13 districts and central jails of this province. Our jail visitors take great interest in their works and many improvements have been carried out at their suggestions. A memorandum was sent up by our council to the Government regarding the condition of women prisoners suggesting certain improvements—much needed in the amenities of jail life for female prisoners. The memorandum is still under consideration of Government.

Child welfare work has progressed in a measure beyond our expectation. Lady Stephenson has taken great interest in this work. The Patna City Municipality has given land for the child welfare work on a lease of ninety nine years free of rent. Raja Devakinandan Prasad Sing of Monghyr built a new centre at a cost of Rs. 20,000 and called it Lady Stephenson's centre. An endowment fund was raised in Lady Stephenson's name which amounts to Rs. 62,754. A child welfare fete was kindly organised by Lady Stephenson last year at the Government House and realised about Rs. 50000, which is included in Rs. 62,764. The child welfare work was originally started by this council and was managed by its sub-committee. It has progressed so much that it is soon going to be entrusted to a society and will be affiliated to our council.

Our Council has also started the work of prevention of cruelty to animals. Through the Council's activities this work has turned into a society, the S.P.C.A. And this society is affiliated to our Council. The late Maharaja of Darbhanga gave a donation of Rs. 5,000 to Lady Stephenson to spend for any public work and she gave this sum of money for the erection of a shade at the railway station for animals for drinking water and also promised to pay an annual donation of Rs. 2000 to the society.

The blind school is another affiliated society to our Council. Owing to the Council's interest in this society it is now shortly going to have a building of its own, and receives considerable help and support from the Council which are greatly appreciated by the committee of the school.

During the year under report many interesting lectures have been organised by the Council and they were greatly appreciated, and attended by our members. A popular activity of women's Council has been the three social gatherings. The Council of women welcomed Lady Irwin at the Sinha Institute Hall where an address was presented. A Purdah party was given by Lady Stephenson when Lady Simon was here in the last cold weather. Lady Stephenson entertained the members of the Council at a tea at the annual general meeting. The social gatherings were a great success and well attended by Purdah ladies.

The Girl Guide is affiliated to our society and the Girl Guide helps us in our social gatherings in looking after these gatherings which are strictly Purdah. It is impossible to give in a brief report all about the activities of our branches and so I shall not deal with them in my report.

We have a liason officer for our lone members. We felt the need of linking them up and of giving them more fully the benefits of co-operation in the Council though isolated in mofussil stations. The number of the members are increasing and we have to-day 40 lone members. Our Liaison officers get into touch with our lone members and make them feel that they have their place in a great sisterhood of womanhood with whom they can co-operate in social service.

BIHAR WOMEN'S EDUCATION.

Miss S. B. Das who is a member of the Senate of the Patna University put in a plea for the rapid spread of girls' education in the Province.

Miss Das moved "that the senate recommend to Government that in view of the strong recommendation of the Hartog Committee on the subject of development and encouragement to be given to women's education, and also in view of the fact, that women's education in this Province is in a very backward condition, immediate steps should be taken to start at Patna the capital of the Province I. A. classes to be attached to the Girls' High School at Bankipur".

The following speech was made by her in the Senate on the occasion:—

I rise to address this illustrious assembly on a subject, that is of the greatest importance to our province. It is a matter of great pride to me, to do what should have been done long ago by the more learned, the more eloquent, and the more patriotic of the Senate, but if they have failed to understand or having understood have failed to discharge their duty, I am not prepared to neglect my duty and wink at their failure.

The condition of women's education in Behar and Orissa arouses serious misgivings in me, regarding the future of our province. Nine years ago, we fondly hoped that very soon we would be able to hold our heads high and march hand in hand with the advanced provinces in India and take our legitimate share in the assembly of our educated women. And since education became a transferred subject, it inspired a conviction in me that the education of our girls would receive better attention than it had done till 1920. But never was disillusionment more complete or more tragic. The Government have done nothing for the higher education of girls in this province, with the result that we can not keep pace, not only with the advanced countries but even with the other provinces of India. The Government give an excuse, that there is no appreciable demand for girls' higher education in this province, so why waste money for mere girls? It may be true to a certain extent. When Government is encouraging the boys' education, is it not the duty of Government, to encourage girls' education in this province even when their number is small?? It is high time, we realised that the future of the province depends upon the character and the personality of the mother of Behar and Orissa. What sad specimens of humanity will be the children of illiterate or ill-educated mothers? Test of civilization is treatment it gives to women. Judged by this we are perilously near barbarians. It is amusing to consider some figures. In the year 1927-28, nearly one crore and eighty lacs rupees were spent on boy's education while only 12 lacs were spent on girl's education! This is sufficient to condemn the powers that be. Since the existing Bankipur Girls' School has been raised to high school what provision, I ask, is made for the higher education of these girls? If none, what is the reason of this sex distinction in matters educational? I confess, I cannot conceive any. Did Government think that education is only the privilege of one sex? But surely the women equally have got the right of education. And neither one sex nor the other can advance by itself without the strain on the social and national system and injury to itself. Hartog Committee's opinion is that in the interest of the advance of the Indian education as a whole, priority should now be given to the claims of girls' education in every scheme of expansion. Will our Government do that? In these days of self-assertion, in these times of activity, in these days of progress, it is simply suicidal for us women to be deprived of higher education. Government, ought to know that we women exist in this province, and we must have better consideration now from the hands of Government, since in the past our education has been totally neglected. I appeal to this august assembly, to demand from Government to open I. A. classes immediately in the Bankipur Girls' High School which is in the heart of the province. The sum of money wanted for this purpose, is so insignificant, that I have no doubt, that no opposition will be offered from the opposite sex, whose duty, as I said in the beginning would have been to see that the women of this province have had their legitimate share in the higher education. It is estimated that a sum of less than Rs. 6000 a year would suffice for the education of I. A. classes here. Surely no man could or would object to a grant of such a small amount for women's higher education in this capital. Failure to grant so great a boon at so small a cost will, I am afraid, be detrimental to the interests of the country in general and this province in particular. With these few words, I beg to move my resolution.

CONSTITUTION OF THE INDIAN NATIONAL SOCIAL CONFERENCE.

OBJECTS.

I.—The objects of the Indian National Social Conference are the promotion of the social well-being of the people of all classes in India, irrespective of caste, creed or race, and the general elevation of their social standards. These objects are to be attained by developing social conscience; by upholding the principle of justice and liberty in social relations, and by reforming social institutions of the country according to the needs and conditions of the times.

SESSIONS OF THE INDIAN NATIONAL SOCIAL CONFERENCE.

II.—The Indian National Social Conference shall ordinarily meet once every year at such time and place as may have been decided upon at its previous Session or such other place as may be determined by the All-India Social Conference Committee hereinafter referred to.

RECEPTION COMMITTEE.

X.—The Provincial Social Conference Committee of the Province in which the Indian National Social Conference is to be held, shall organise a Reception Committee for the Indian National Social Conference at least four months before the meeting of the Indian National Social Conference and may include persons who are not members of the Provincial Social Conference Committee. The minimum fee for membership of the Reception Committee shall be five rupees.

XI.—The Reception Committee shall elect its Chairman and other office-bearers from amongst its members.

FUNCTIONS OF THE RECEPTION COMMITTEE.

XII.—It shall be the duty of the Reception Committee, (1) to collect funds for the expenses of the Conference, (2) to elect the President of the Conference in the manner set forth in the following article, (3) to make all necessary arrangements for reception and accommodation of delegates, (4) to print and publish the report of the All-India Social Conference Committee, (vide article XIX), (5) to submit statements of receipts and expenditure to a general meeting of the Reception Committee who shall make over half of the surplus, if any, to the All-India Social Conference Committee and the other half to the Provincial Social Conference Committee, within four months of the session of the Conference.

ELECTION OF THE PRESIDENT.

XIII.—The Reception Committee shall, four months before the session of the Indian National Social Conference, ask the Provincial Conference Committees to nominate not more than three persons for the Presidentship of the Indian National Social Conference. The Provincial Social Conference Committees shall send in their nominations within two weeks after receiving this intimation, and the Reception Committee shall circulate all the names to the various Provincial Conference Committees with a request that they shall vote for one of those persons to be elected President. The person receiving a majority of such votes shall be elected President. Provided that if the name proves unacceptable to the Reception Committee, it shall refer the matter to the All-India Social Conference Committee with its own recommendation and the decision made by the All-India Social Conference Committee shall be final. Such decision shall be communicated to the Reception Committee six weeks before the session of the Conference.

The President of a special or extra-ordinary session of the Indian National Social Conference shall be elected by the All-India Social Conference Committee.

AUDIT.

XIV.—The accounts and expenditure of the Reception Committee, and of the All-India Social Conference Committee and the Provincial Social Conference Committees shall be audited by an auditor or auditors appointed by the respective Committees.

ALL-INDIA SOCIAL CONFERENCE COMMITTEE.

XV.—The All-India Social Conference Committee shall consist of the President, two Secretaries, the Treasurer, all the past Presidents of the Indian National Social Conference and other elected representatives of each Provincial Social Conference Committee affiliated to the All-India Social Conference Committee.

Every member of the All-India Social Conference Committee shall pay a minimum annual subscription of three rupees.

FUNCTIONS OF THE ALL-INDIA SOCIAL CONFERENCE COMMITTEE.

XVI.—The functions of the All-India Social Conference Committee shall be to carry out the programme of work laid down by the Conference from year to year; to co-ordinate the activities of the provincial committees; and to deal with all matters that may arise during the year. For this purpose the All-India Social Conference Committee shall have the power to frame rules not inconsistent with this constitution.

XVII.—The President of the Indian National Social Conference shall be the Chairman of the All-India Social Conference Committee.

XVIII.—(a) The quorum of the All-India Social Conference Committee shall be one-fifth of the total membership of the Committee.

(b) The All-India Social Conference Committee shall meet at least once before the Session of the Conference, to discuss and adopt the Annual Report submitted by the Secretaries, and to transact other necessary business.

FUNCTIONS OF THE SECRETARIES OF THE ALL INDIA SOCIAL CONFERENCE COMMITTEE.

XIX.—The All-India Social Conference Committee shall have two Secretaries, one of whom shall belong to the Province to which the President of the Session belongs.

The Secretaries shall be in charge of the office of the All-India Social Conference Committee and shall prepare an account of the work done during the year on the basis of the reports of the Provincial Social Conference Committees referred to in Article 6 (c). This report along with a statement of accounts of the funds which may come into their hands, shall be considered by the All-India Social Conference Committee at a meeting to be held before the session of the Conference for the year.

The Reception Committee shall publish this report along with the report of the proceedings of the Conference (Vide Article XII).

SUBJECTS COMMITTEE.

XX.—The following shall form the Subjects Committee of the Indian National Social Conference :—

1. All members of the All-India Social Conference Committee.
2. The Chairman and the General Secretary of the Reception Committee.
3. Representatives of delegates to the Indian National Social Conference as given below (vide Appendix A.)

Provided that when people of an Indian State join the Conference as a part of a province or by itself its representation shall be fixed by the All-India Social Conference Committee.

(b) The Reception Committee shall be entitled to elect not more than ten of its members to the Subjects Committee in addition to the Chairman and the Secretaries.

XXI.—The Subjects Committee shall meet from time to time during the Conference as the occasion may require. At such meetings the President shall preside, and the Reception Committee shall submit the draft programme of the work for the ensuing session of the Conference, including resolutions.

XXII.—Resolutions to be moved at the Conference, must be approved of by the Subjects Committee. Provided that a resolution, which has not been approved of by the Subjects Committee, may be moved if a requisition to that effect signed by twenty-five delegates is submitted to the President before the beginning of the meeting in which it is proposed to be moved.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Colour Again :—The students of Glasgow, writes the Hindu, deserve to be congratulated on the well-merited snub they have administered to the proprietor of the City Dance Hall. They had, it would appear, reserved the Hall for their use, but the proprietor refused to admit coloured students, an insult which was promptly resented by their white fellow-students who refused to use the Hall even though its owner held out to them the inducement of a reduced fee. This striking gesture on the part of the students of Glasgow is welcome, showing as it does that they are happily free from the most odious form of snobbery, that which exalts race and colour. Clearly they are not in the authentic line of empire builders—such, at any rate, will be the doleful verdict of the proprietor of the Glasgow Dance Hall and his ilk. But the world has had enough of empire builders.

Simon Commission Report :—A report of the Indian Statutory Commission under the chairmanship of Sir John Simon, which will make recommendations for reforms in the constitution of India is expected to be ready for publication in the early part of March.

LIFE INSURANCE TRUST PLAN

THE outright payment of the Insurance money to the widow or children in one lump sum is a great mistake. To apply a real test you would only ask yourself how your wife would invest such a sum NOW without any help whatever from you. The woman who has been "All the Wife and Mother" is ill-equipped to invest and safeguard funds designed to her family's protection for many years.

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

NOTES.

The Arya Samaj Marriage Bill:—After some discussion in the Legislative Assembly, Mr. Muktar Singh's Bill to validate marriages performed according to Arya Samaj rites was ordered to be circulated for opinion to the public. Mr. Muktar Singh wanted the Bill to be referred immediately to a Select Committee but this was opposed by some Mahomedan members, on the ground that the Bill sought to legalise marriages between Aryas and non-Aryas, including non-Hindus, and was, therefore, an infringement of Mahomedan law. This nowadays has become a stock argument for Mahomedan communally-elected members against any proposal of social reform. The Government favoured circulation for other reasons and they were supported by Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya. We have not seen the Bill and we think it important that it should not be allowed to pass without scrutiny. The Indian Legislature has committed one unfortunate blunder in putting its stamp on the custom of Anand marriages among Sikhs, without attaching to them the condition of monogamy which has always before and since been attached to every marriage recognised by the Indian Legislature. If the Arya marriage is legalised without the condition, it would in practice be a charter to every Hindu to take a second, third or fourth wife in as many different communities, by the simple process of calling himself an Arya for the time being. This is happening often in the Brahma Samaj where a couple become Brahmos a fortnight before their marriage and forget all about it the day after the solemn ceremony. In fact, if we may say so without hurting feelings, such marriages recall what used to be known as Gretna Green marriages. In one or two cases within our knowledge, the Anand and Brahma marriages have been abused by persons with Hindu wives living marrying second wives whom they otherwise could not have married either under the Hindu or the Civil Law of Marriage. Arya marriages in the Punjab may be a well-recognised rite, but outside that province, such marriages, though sometimes contracted, have no such status.

Lord Irwin In Baroda:—During the visit of the Viceroy and Lady Irwin to the Baroda State, Lord Irwin paid a fitting tribute to the enlightened rule of His Highness the Maharaja Gaikwad who has shown by practical example that the progress of a state depends not only on its administration but on the development of nation building departments also. In education the State is easily ahead of British India, having adopted the system of free and compulsory education several years ago. But the most remarkable feature in the education policy of the State as Lord Irwin remarked was the provision of 200 schools for the so-called depressed classes. Lord Irwin also paid a high tribute to the cultured Maharani of Baroda for the progress of women's education and the constant interest Her Highness displayed in the welfare of women in the State. We would add that Her Highness' interest in Indian women's uplift is not only confined to her State but extends all over the country as shown by the brilliant lead she gave as the president of the first All-India Women's Conference.

Education And The City:—The fifth of the series of lectures arranged by Dr. Clifford Manshardt of Nagpada Neighbourhood House fame on "Building A Better City" was delivered by Principal Mckenzie of the Willson College on Wednesday last. "Education And The City" formed the subject of the lecture. Principal Mckenzie said that nature, environment and the cinema were the most powerful influences that contributed to the shaping of the life of the young and that the cinema for good or evil had come to stay because it had an educative value. Mr. Mckenzie then dwelt on the elements which were "dis-educative" and he added that it was impossible to talk of education without drawing attention to the fact that there were unsavoury elements—slum dwellings, filth and disease—which tended to stifle the spiritual life of the individual. The lecturer, proceeded to discuss education as carried on in school or college. It must not be forgotten, he said, that it was comparatively in modern times that these institutions had come into such importance. There was a time when a man might fill a high, honourable and useful place in society without being able to read and write, indeed when these were almost worthy of a gentleman Charlemagne considered to be accomplishments unworthy of a gentleman. Charlemagne was illiterate. The great Akbar could neither read nor write. But they had somehow or other received an education that fitted them for their position. "Indeed," said the lecturer, "it would be a very narrow conception of education by which they could be classed as uneducated."

men." Education in ancient India was that given by a guru who initiated his little band into the mysteries of the spirit. The peasants and the artisans were, in those days, largely outside the intellectual movement connected with the schools, but nevertheless they received their own important kind of education. The lecturer dwelt at some length upon the system of education to be adopted in India, now that the country had come into contact with the culture of the West. The great advances that had been made in knowledge, particularly in the science, invention and discovery, combined with the acceleration of travel and communication, had destroyed the Indian's tidy plans of the universe. The key to the situation in the opinion of the lecturer lay in the teacher.

Purdah And Afghanistan:—A correspondent of the Times of India writes from Peshawar: "According to the Kabul correspondent of the newspaper the 'Frontier Advocate,' King Nadir Khan has granted complete liberty to Muslim women to come out of the seclusion of purdah and in consequence of this, the correspondent avers that the ladies of the Royal harem may now be seen rushing to and fro and in and out of the streets of Kabul in their motor cars without any veil or pretence at it." A year has barely passed since Amanullah sought among other reforms to abolish purdah. The difference between Amanullah's method and that of Nadir Khan is obvious. There is no penalty attached to wearing the purdah under the new regime of reforms and it does not affect the orthodox except in so far as the sight of ladies moving freely without purdah may be offensive to them. We have no doubt that this will be not without effect here and that it will strengthen the anti-purdah movement here. The following is further evidence of the fact that Amanullah's ideals will endure in Afghanistan. We learn "that most of the Afghan students, who were forced to give up their studies last year and return home on account of lack of support from Bachcha-e-Saqqa and who have already gone through the major portion of their studies have been reselected by Nadir Khan's Government to complete their education. They will shortly be leaving Kabul for their respective universities in Europe." This is a welcome move as considerable harm would be caused to the State by leaving the young students in Afghanistan without completing their foreign education. King Nadir Khan has given ample proof that under his regime progressive ideas will be advanced even more surely than under the previous reform period.

"It Was The Maharajah".—Mr. Lewis Mumford writes in a recent issue of the New Republic: "On glancing over my article on Patrick Geddes, in The New Republic for October 30, I note a reference to the 'now deposed Nizam of Hyderabad.' This is a dreadful howler, and an insult to the Nizam into the bargain: I meant, of course, the 'now deposed Maharajah of Indore.' Why I should have slipped in the wrong title no conscious part of me is aware." The New Republic is a well informed American paper which numbers among its contributors some of the younger members of the British Labour party as well as writers like Mr. S. K. Ratcliffe and Mr. C. F. Andrews on Indian affairs.

It is surprising that such an error should have escaped their notice. As for Mr. Mumford, we do not expect that everyone who has heard of Prof. Geddes knows India and we congratulate him on being the first to find out his mistake. On the whole we are glad of the mistake for though H. H. the Nizam will have suffered a temporary set-back in the United States the correction will bring forcibly to the minds of many Americans including Mr. Mumford the fact that the Nizam of Hyderabad is not the same individual as the Indore ex-Maharajah. It is perhaps to avoid such slips that some of our Indian rulers make it a point to show themselves every now and then in Europe or America.

Buddhism In France:—We take the following remarks on the Buddhist Society in France called "Les Amis de Bouddhisme" from the British Buddhist: "Miss G. Constant Lounabery and her co-workers are to be congratulated upon the success of their efforts to organise an association for the purpose of working in the interest of the cause of Buddhism in France. "Les Amis de Bouddhisme" is now a properly constituted society. Besides disseminating the teachings of the Buddha by means of lectures and the publication of literature, the Society aims at bringing about, through the medium of the Buddhist religion, a better understanding between the peoples of the West and the East. This is a very laudable object and is fraught with great possibilities for the general welfare of humanity. In France the study of Buddhism has, so far, been confined to the elite of intellectual life. Some eminent French scholars have gone deep into the philosophy of life found in Buddhism. Men like Anatole France have showered unstinted praise upon the Buddha Dhamma. In one of his essays the great French author and philosopher says that Buddhism is the most beautiful and the most rational teaching that has ever been presented to mankind. But Buddhism in France has never gone beyond the portals of academic study. If the "Les Amis de Bouddhisme" is to attain its objects it will have to take into consideration the fundamental fact that Buddhism is a religion for humanity."

The Women's Conference:—We publish in this issue the report of the opening ceremony and the proceedings of the educational section of the 4th All-India Women's Conference held at Bombay from January 20 to 24. The proceedings of the social section, Mrs. Naidu's speech at the opening of the Pahlad Mills creche and Mr. Jayakar's speech on Women's Rights of Inheritance delivered before the delegates of the Conference will be printed next week.

Prohibition:—We take the following from the Servant of India: "We are convinced that Prohibition must be ultimately carried out whatever the sacrifices that people will have to make. In this connection it may be noted that the import duty on liquors collected in Bombay Port has decreased owing to the higher licence fees in pursuance of the new Excise policy. If this is so the result will be welcomed by Prohibitionists as a side proof of the success of the policy of putting obstacles in the path of the seller. If the policy of rationing country liquor were to lead to an increase in the consumption of foreign liquors the result is hardly one on which the champions of Prohibition can congratulate themselves."

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, JANUARY 25, 1930.

ALL-INDIA WOMEN'S CONFERENCE.

The fourth All-India Women's Conference which was the great event of the week in Bombay, was a tremendous success, reflecting great credit on the organisers. There were nearly 300 delegates from all parts of the country. Lady Dorab Tata in her address as Chairman of the Reception Committee regretted that the conditions in Bombay made a common camp difficult. The idea is well worth bearing in mind and being given effect to wherever possible. Lahore where the next Conference is to meet is not so lacking in open spaces as Bombay, and a beginning may will be made there. The most valuable part of such Conferences is the occasions which they provide for people from different parts of the country to meet together, not only in the formal proceedings of the public sessions, nor even the exchange of ideas at closer quarters in Committees, but in the ordinary amenities of daily life, in moments of relaxation, when they can mix freely and form friendships. Though a camp of this kind could not be set up, the arrangements for the accommodation, transport and entertainment of the delegates, were excellent. The only complaint that came to our ears, and that was as much a compliment as a complaint, is that the programme for the delegates' entertainment and instruction was so crowded as to leave hardly time for rest and relaxation in the intervals. Most of the delegates belonged to the younger generations, but there were some among them who though equally if not more youthful in spirit, were not so young physically, and the effort to keep up with the programme, must have been rather a strain on them. Most men when they get on in years, accept the fact and regulate their activities in accordance with it. This seems not so easy in the case of women who defy time to quench their ardour for the uplift of themselves and their sisters. The programme of future Conferences may well be arranged with this fact in view.

The Conference work actually commenced on Friday last when Lady Irwin presided over the first general meeting of the All-India Women's Education Fund started by the Conference. This Fund which already amounts to about Rs. 80,000 is registered as a separate body, with separate office-bearers, a link with the Conference being the clause in the Articles of Association which provides that the Fund should consider the suggestions of the Conference in formulating its scheme of work. We do not know what the amount is which the Fund wishes or expects to raise, but it should be several crores if it is intended to cover even a small part of the vast empty spaces of women's education which want filling. We appreciate the excellence of the object, but we should like to be assured that it is not intended to establish a Women's Education Service, like the Women's Medical Service, outside the influence either of the regular Government departments or of Indian opinion, as a special enclave under the control of a mainly foreign agency. The opening Session of the Fourth All-India Women's Conference was held in the University Convocation Hall on Monday evening. The great Hall was literally packed with women of all creeds and castes, and the whole vast audience followed the addresses, which were in English, with close interest and attention, being enabled to do so, notwithstanding the poor acoustic properties of the Hall, by the installation of a loud speaker on the platform. Indian audiences nowadays do not remember that English is a foreign language until some intense nationalist calls loud attention to the fact. That at a great Women's Conference, it should have been tacitly and unquestionably agreed upon as the common medium, is conclusive proof that the English language is now the indisputable lingua franca of India and is to be regarded as the most important of Indian vernaculars. Lady Sykes opened the Conference with a short speech in which she indicated briefly the great scope of the Conference. Lady Tata as Chairman of the Reception Committee, welcomed the delegates in an address which set forth clearly the important questions of public interest which have a direct bearing on the Women's movement. Lady Tata has travelled much and with her eyes open. She has thought much about the social problems of the country and has clear-cut views on many of them, such as the removal of untouchability, education of girls, and social purity. Of all important movements affecting women in different parts of the country, she keeps herself well-informed as shown by her appreciative references to Mrs. P. K. Roy's Gokhale Memorial School in Calcutta and Mrs. Paul Appaswami's similar institution in Madras. Her address may be regarded as embodying the considered views on the principal social problems of the day from the Indian woman's point of view. Mrs. Sarojini Naidu's presidential address delivered extempore, rose to the very highest flights of oratory. But behind the glowing periods there were searching phrases which went to the very core of the women's movement and formulated the tests by which it would be judged by India and the world at large. We must reserve further comments on it for the next issue owing to the limits of the space left for this article.

THE 4th ALL-INDIA WOMEN'S CONFERENCE.

THE BOMBAY SESSION.

The 4th All-India Women's Educational and Social Conference commenced its Bombay Sessions on Monday the 20th instant when Lady Sykes declared the Conference open. Long before the appointed time the University Convocation Hall was filled with the delegates and visitors. There must have been barely twenty men present on the occasion. A very small section of the audience, about 25 were in purdah. The proceedings commenced with an opening song sung by the pupils of Mr. Deodhar School of Music. Lady Sykes then delivered her address declaring the Conference open.

LADY SYKES' OPENING ADDRESS.

This is the Fourth Annual Session of the All-India Women's Conference on Educational Reform. Our object in meeting is to discuss the many urgent and pressing problems connected with the education of women in this country of ours.

We meet at a time of crisis in the history of India. India is on the eve of political and social changes of far-reaching and momentous significance, and none can foretell what the upshot may be. It is almost superfluous to dwell upon the enormous importance of the question of Women's Education at this grave juncture. Political reform, unless accompanied, step by step, by social reform, is of little real service in a country's uplift; indeed, I may go so far as to say that political advancement minus the corresponding social advancement is a contradiction in terms. Let us take for example the subject of Nation-building, on which the future of India so largely depends. The defective physique of the rising generation has caused educationists deep concern, but no real progress in remedying this is possible, so long as there persists, behind the purdah, a body of conservative and reactionary opinion, which is responsible for a high rate of infant mortality, apathy in taking precautions against malaria and other preventable epidemic diseases, neglect of sanitation, and social evils like child-marriage and the dowry system. The East is waking up from the sleep of centuries. We see what education has done for women in Turkey. Upon our shoulders lies the grave responsibility of seeing that India does not fail to rise to the occasion.

I do not pretend that the battle can be won without a struggle. No battle worth the winning ever is. In England, Girton College, the first University College for Women, was opened less than sixty years ago, and it was not until Englishwomen had won their spurs in the Great War of 1914-18 that they finally attained their goal. It is not sufficient to meet at Annual Conferences and pass resolutions. That is the least part of our duty. The real spade-work begins when we return home, and endeavour to influence those around us, and in our own households put into practice what we preach in public.

Signs of progress—almost startling progress—are not wanting. Last year was signalized by the passing of what may easily prove to be the most momentous piece of legislation affecting the status of Indian women since Lord Bentinck's famous regulation abolishing Suttee which, by a curious coincidence, became law exactly a century ago. I refer of course to the Sarda Bill. But the part played by the All-India Women's Conference in the passing of that measure has left us with a clear duty; and those of us who believe in it—and I am sure there are many, both within this Conference and outside it—must now devote ourselves to the task of convincing others, of educating them to accept and welcome it, remembering that legislation, unless it is backed by public opinion, is of small avail.

India has many pressing problems to solve as regards female education. Some of them she shares with the rest of the civilized world; others are peculiar to herself. Are we, for instance, to have separate universities for women, with their own curricula, or should Indian women, as in the West, attend the same universities as men? Again, if we accept the latter alternative, do we advocate separate colleges for women, as at Oxford and Cambridge, or do we prefer co-education such as prevails in America? Then there is the perennial question of English versus the vernaculars as the medium of education for Indian women.

One disquieting fact which I derive from the quinquennial report on education in India is that while the number of girls receiving education in the lower classes is fairly satisfactory, the numbers dwindle in the higher classes in a most alarming manner, so that the percentage of girls who remain at school after the age of 12 is infinitesimal. It is, surely, a calamitous thing to take a girl away from school just as her education begins to enter upon its most fruitful stage. I spoke just now of the necessity of educating public opinion. We must try and educate the Indian public into dropping the old prejudice against independent careers for women. They must come to see that there is nothing derogatory in an Indian girl taking up teaching or nursing or business as a profession, as her sisters do in the West. Otherwise higher education for women becomes almost objectless. But above all, we must beware of the common but fatal mistake of confusing education with passing the Matriculation examination, or winning diplomas or degrees. I expect many of you have come across a delightful book, Socrates in an Indian Village. It tells the story of the efforts of a devoted couple to educate a rural district in the Punjab. The campaign was carried out with the aid of gramophones, loud-speakers and magic lantern-slides. The subjects included infant-welfare, sanitation, hygiene, cookery and first-aid. The results attained were surprising. Here, surely, lies educational work enough at our very doors of far-reaching importance to national welfare.

We have, then, much to accomplish. But we can receive inspiration from the glorious past of India herself. I was reading the other day the life of the great Indian Emperor Harsha, who lived in the 7th century A.D., when Europe was still plunged in the darkness of the Middle Ages. The historian recounts how, at the lectures given before the court upon the Buddhist religion, the King's widowed sister sat by his side, and took a prominent part in the abstruse theological discussions which followed. In this India of ours, which gave birth to administrators and warriors among her women like Ahalya Bai Holkar of Indore and the Rani of Jhansi, and in our own days to rulers such as Her Highness the Begum of Bhopal, who has taken such an active part in directing and leading our movement, we have, surely, no reason for despair. "Lift up your hearts." Let us go forth to our labours with what the poet calls—

"One equal temper of heroic hearts,
To strive, to seek, to find, and not to yield."

Imbued with these ideals we cannot, I think, fail in the attainment of our goal.

I have now great pleasure in declaring this Conference open.

LADY TATA'S WELCOME ADDRESS.

It is my privilege and pleasing duty to welcome you all, delegates and visitors, to this the Fourth Session of the All-India Women's Educational and Social Conference. The Conference when it started four years ago was known as the Women's Educational Conference. But it became increasingly clear that the education of women was a good deal dependent on their social condition. It was, therefore, wisely decided at last year's conference held at Patna to add the word "Social" to the name of our conference. As a matter of fact, even at the first Conference presided over by Her Highness the Maharani of Baroda a large part of the proceedings related to the social position of women. The addition, therefore, only makes explicit what was implicit in the original name and objects of this conference.

In extending to you all who have come from so many distant parts of India a warm and cordial welcome on behalf of the women of Bombay I may add that we are proud and happy to have you in our midst. We wish we could have included in our welcome Their Excellencies the Viceroy and Lady Irwin and also Her Highness the Maharani of Baroda but unfortunately we are deprived of that privilege owing to His Excellency the Viceroy's visit to Baroda at the present moment.

We have endeavoured to do our best in making all arrangements for your comfort during your all too short stay in Bombay while this Conference lasts but I fear we may not have succeeded in giving you all the comforts of your own homes and for this I crave your indulgence and forbearance. We have had a much larger number of delegates to arrange for than at any previous Conference and as there were no facilities in Bombay to establish one large camp where you could have all stayed together we have been obliged to arrange for you all in different houses and hotels where I trust you will not suffer any other discomforts except those of distance and transport which we have endeavoured to overcome as best we can.

If I may be allowed to do so I should like to say a few words about the various activities of the Conference during the past year. This Conference is, I feel sure, destined to play a great part in the regeneration and renaissance of the great Indian Nation by its wide and far-reaching influence upon all the women from every part of India. The very fact that there are already 32 Constituencies, including several Native States, linked up under its guidance speaks for itself. This Women's Conference was the first body to initiate the idea of fixing the age of marriage by legislation, and at its very first Session at Poona passed a resolution to that effect—the result was the drafting of the Sarda Bill which has now become Law. (Applause). The Women's Conference sent a deputation to His Excellency the Viceroy which led to the appointment by Government of Mrs. Nehru on the Age of Consent Committee. (Applause). We all know how ably she worked on that Committee and it was owing to her work on it and the propaganda carried on by the Conference that we have now the satisfaction of seeing the Sarda Bill passed into an Act. (Applause).

THE SARDA ACT.

The past year will ever be memorable in the history of British India as the year in which the Sarda Marriage Act prescribing a minimum age of Marriage was passed by the Legislature. The measure has received the assent of the Governor-General and will come into force on the 1st of April next. Great efforts have been and are being made by the opponents of the Act to prevent its passing into law and since its enactment, to have it amended if not repealed. There is talk too of passive resistance in order to defeat the objects of the Act. I feel sure that all these attempts to thwart the course of a very necessary reform, will meet, as they deserve to do, with complete failure. The women of India will not tolerate any longer the system of child marriage (Loud Applause) with all its numerous evil consequences which are too well-known to need detailed mention here. What surprises me, as it has surprised many others in India and outside India, most, is the opposition set up against the Act by a certain section of our Mahomedan countrymen. Islam does not prescribe child marriages; and it came as a surprise to most people when the Age of Consent Committee reported that child marriages were prevalent among Mussalmans in some parts of India and were not confined to Hindus only, as was commonly supposed. That being the case, it was clearly the duty of the Legislature to protect Mussalman children as well as children of other communities from the physical and moral evils of child marriage. I am glad that enlightened Mahomedans, including ladies like Lady Hydari of Hyderabad have spoken out against this unreasoning opposition and I earnestly trust that their voices will prevail and that the opponents of the Act will accept it in the best interests of the mothers of the future generations of the great Mahomedan community in India. (Applause). I should be failing in my duty if, on this occasion, I do not express, on behalf of the womanhood of India, our deep gratitude to the Government of India (Applause) for their strong and whole-hearted support of Mr. Sarda's Bill, but for which, in view particularly of the deadset made against it by orthodox Hindu and Mussalman members, it might in all probability have not become law. (Hear, hear).

Since last year the Conference has widened its scope to include social matters as well. It took up the question of the revision of Inheritance Laws and the abolition of Purdah and Polygamy as the chief items of work for the year. The result is that the following Bills are now pending before the Assembly. Mr. Sarda's Bill to give the widow a share in the husband's property—Mr. Jayaker's Bill to make better provision for certain heirs under Hindu Law, especially the women heirs. Also a Bill for the removal of certain existing disabilities with regard to adoption. Also one more bill of his to further amend the Civil Marriage Act of 1872 to facilitate intercommunal marriages.

The Conference interests itself in the welfare of women in Industries and Factories, and co-operates with all Educational Agencies and bodies for putting forward reforms and new schemes for bettering and widening educational facilities.

There are a few more points I should like to touch upon. The first is the need of women in our Legislature. (Applause).

THE NEED OF WOMEN IN THE LEGISLATURE.

The absence of women members in the Legislative Assembly was felt as a great drawback by the Supporters of the Sarda Bill, as women could have voiced the feelings of their sisters with greater directness and force than men to whom, nevertheless, our warmest acknowledgments are due for their bold and courageous stand for the Bill. There are several other social measures either before or awaiting introduction in the Legislature, and I earnestly hope that Government will realise the importance of having women members to assist in their discussion. I may, in passing, refer to the omission of the Government of Bombay to nominate even a single woman to the local Legislative Council. Bombay has been the pioneer in women's education and social reform, and we have a large number of educated and public-spirited women engaged in different spheres of social work. But while many other Provinces have women members in their Legislative Council—in Madras a woman occupies the responsible position of Vice-President of the Council—it is surprising that in Bombay, we have none. May we not hope that His Excellency Sir Frederick Sykes, with the kind guidance of Lady Sykes (Applause) who is deeply interested in social questions, will take the earliest opportunity of remedying this glaring anomaly?

Then there are the subjects of Child Marriage, Education, the Pardah System, Social Purity, Prohibition and Untouchability.

CHILD MARRIAGE AND EDUCATION.

The enactment of the Sarda Act is calculated to remove the most serious obstacle in the way of women's education in our country. Child marriage left our girls without the opportunity of education, and the postponement of marriage till at least their fourteenth year, ensures them at least sufficient time to complete their primary education. This is much, but this is not enough. Her Highness the Maharani of Baroda, whose interest in women's education is well-known and who has practically shown it by endowing a fund for scholarships to girl students, told me not long ago that the Act could not of itself be of much benefit in this direction, unless we establish schools in sufficiently large numbers to enable all girls of school-going age to be educated, and that it may be positively dangerous if owing to the absence of adequate educational facilities the girls are obliged to spend their time without any serious interest to occupy their minds. I entirely agree with Her Highness and I would earnestly urge on our Education Ministers as well as on Municipal and Local Boards to do all in their power—even at some sacrifice—to provide the necessary institutions for the education of our girls. A tremendous responsibility rests on them in order to provide social progress, on which depends political and industrial progress, with an enduring foundation in an educated and emancipated womanhood. Equally important and even more necessary is the provision of trained women teachers and training colleges for women. (Cheers).

COURSES OF STUDY FOR WOMEN.

While on the subject of education for women, I would like to express my strong belief that primary and secondary courses for women should be especially adapted to meet the requirements of the large majority who are destined to become wives and mothers and the guiding spirits of their homes and children. (Applause). In this connection I should like to mention the Gokhale Memorial High School for girls conducted by Mrs. P. K. Ray in Calcutta, which I recently visited, and Mrs. Appasamy's School in Madras which, I believe, is conducted much on the same lines, as examples which may be followed in other places. There should, of course, be no barrier in the way of women who wish to embark upon professional or public careers following the ordinary courses of study in Colleges and Universities as at present. In these institutions the practice in Bombay for a long time has been co-education, and it has proved eminently successful (Applause). Conditions may be different in other parts of the country, but in this Presidency co-education in colleges has become a cherished tradition and I see no reason to depart from it.

THE WOMEN'S EDUCATION FUND.

This Conference has not been content merely with passing resolutions on women's education. It has been instrumental in starting the All-India Women's Education Fund Association which aims at helping forward women's education in the most practical way by providing funds. This Association, I need hardly say, cannot relieve Government and Municipal and Local Bodies of their responsibility. It can only supplement them, and that too, to a limited extent. As Mrs. Huidekoper points out in her report, individual members of the Conference can only have a voice in the Counsels of the Fund Association by becoming members of it and I cordially endorse her appeal to our members to join the Fund Association in large numbers so that we may have an influential voice in shaping its policy.

THE PURDAH SYSTEM.

Another conspicuous example of the close bearing of a social institution on the education of women is afforded by the purdah system. There are a hundred reasons why Burma, Bombay and Madras, Baroda, Mysore and Travancore have the largest proportion of literate women in the Indian Empire. But the most important of them, to my mind, is that women in these Provinces are largely free from the hindrance of the Purdah. This point can be further enforced by the fact that even in these Provinces the proportion of literate women and female children in Schools among Purdah communities is less than that among non-purdah communities. It cannot be denied, therefore, that the Purdah is detrimental to women's education and, from the purely educational point of view, the sooner it is considerably relaxed, if not totally abolished, the better will it be for the progress of the women of this country. For, remember, that we are all members of one another, to use the words of St. Paul, and what adversely affects one section of the population affects us all in the same way. (Applause). There are other arguments against the Purdah, such as the greater tendency to diseases like consumption of women in Purdah, which are too well-known to need mention here. But I would call the attention particularly of men who naturally all wish to see their women bright and cheerful and healthy and happy in their homes when they return after a hard day's work, to Mastapha Kemal Pasha's striking observation in the course of his campaign against the veil in Turkey, that contrary to the general belief, the faces and figures of women brought up behind the veil are the reverse of bright and cheerful and beautiful. And this may well be the fact, judging from our experience that the fairest and most perfect flowers are those which blossom in full view of the sun and sky, while those which are hidden from these by large trees or buildings, generally have a withered and crumpled appearance. As the researches of Sir Jagadish Bose have shown, the behaviour of plant life is closely akin to that of human life, and the analogy which I have used is, therefore, not inappropriate. We all know that there are many women of extraordinary beauty of mind and body among our friends who observe the Purdah, and can recall the famous names of Empress Nur Jehan and Mumtaz Mahal who were among the most beautiful women in history. But, remember, that such women belong as a rule to the wealthy and well-to-do families in which the rigours of the purdah are neutralised by the ample open spaces and varied opportunities of artistic and social activities open to them in their homes. In the case of the working classes, too, the effect of the Purdah is largely counteracted by the stern necessities of life. (Applause). It is upon the women of the middle classes that the institution bears hardest, and the middle classes are the back-bone of every society. (Applause). For all these reasons, the abolition of the Purdah is essential to women's progress and I rejoice to see the noble example set by educated Hindu and Mussalman women of high social position such as H. H. the Maharani of Baroda and H. H. the Begum Mother of Bhopal in discarding the Purdah on public occasions (Applause). Great credit is due to H. H. the Begum Mother of Bhopal for changing her life-long habit of observing the strictest Purdah at this advanced age and she has my deep admiration for taking such a courageous and wise step. It is only when the ladies of the highest families and the wives of Ruling Princes will show the way that the women of the middle classes will have the courage to do likewise and come out of Purdah, and thereby gain immeasurably in health and beauty. (Applause).

SOCIAL PURITY MOVEMENTS.

I should like to express my gratification at the efforts that are being made to abolish the pernicious and degrading practice of the dedication of women as devadasis (cheers), and to deal with commercialised prostitution which has been increasing to an alarming extent particularly in cities like Bombay, Calcutta and Rangoon. The Government of His Highness the Maharajah of Mysore led the way to the rest of India in putting a stop to the service of devadasis in temples, thus depriving the profession of its stamp of religion. An Act has been passed by the Madras Legislative Council, at the instance of Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi, whom by the way we are sorry not to see here to-day, prohibiting the dedication of girls, and a similar Bill, I understand, is before the Bombay Legislative Council, which I trust will be passed without opposition. As regards brothels there is one law I should like to see passed here in Bombay, and wherever else such conditions exist; and that is that the woman brothel keeper should be equally penalised with the man, (Hear, hear) and not be permitted to run a brothel any more than a man may be permitted to do so. (Applause) As regards Prostitution, laws have been passed in several provinces. But it is one thing to pass a law and another thing to enforce it. Unless there is a strong public opinion behind the law, it is liable to become more or less a dead letter or, what is worse, become an instrument of persecution, blackmail and other evils. Now, the very fact of the existence and the increase of prostitution shows that the moral standard of the community leaves much to be desired (Applause). If men did not encourage it the evil would die a natural death. But we, women, are also responsible for the existence of this social curse in as much as we do not sufficiently exert our moral influence to create a healthy public opinion against the patrons of vice. If we did we could surely help much more than at present in eradicating the evil.

PROHIBITION.

Another movement which is closely associated with women's well-being is that known as Prohibition. The question of Temperance has always been associated with Social Purity. And rightly so, as it is the palpable fact that the use of intoxicating drinks and drugs is inseparably associated with loose morals. The adoption of Prohibition in the United States has greatly benefitted women and children, and it is due largely to the Women's vote that President Hoover succeeded in being elected to the Presidency against his powerful rival who was opposed to Prohibition. Drink is the cause of great misery in India also, and it is well-known that most of the increase in wages which the mill-workers secured during the War and after, went directly into the liquor shops. I have no doubt that the introduction of Prohibition will be a great benefit to the country's industries as well as to family life, and I am sure that the women of India are whole-heartedly with the Prohibition reformers of the country. (Prolonged Applause).

REMOVAL OF UNTOUCHABILITY.

I have always felt very strongly on the questions of Caste and Untouchability. So long as these are allowed to exist in any community no social progress is possible. I, therefore, welcome on the grounds of humanity the growing public opinion, particularly among caste Hindus, against the sin and crime of regarding the untouchables as outside the pale of civilisation. I should like to add that the word "untouchable" is a very objectionable one and we should all try to use a better one. Several temples which have been hitherto closed have within the last few months been thrown open in various parts of the country to these castes, and there is an influential movement to do away with the last relics of this most regrettable custom. A Bill has been drafted by Mr. M. B. Jayakar for introduction in the Legislative Assembly to relieve the "Untouchables" of their disabilities, and I am sure I am expressing the wish of all women present here in hoping that it will become law at an early date. (Hear, hear).

I now wish to express our very grateful thanks to all those who have helped and assisted the Reception Committee in many different ways to enable us to show hospitality to about 260 delegates who have come to this Conference. Our thanks are specially due to all the hosts and hostesses—about 35 in all—for so kindly putting up a large number of the delegates as their guests, to the University Authorities for very kindly giving us the use of this beautiful and spacious Hall and the whole of the ground floor in the South Wing for our use during the week of the Conference free of charge, (Applause) to all the donors for their kind contributions which have enabled us to carry out our programme of hospitality—without whose help we could not have done it,—to Mr. Sultan Chinoy for allowing us the use of 2 of his buses for the whole time free of charge and also for other kindnesses, to Messrs. Pratt & Co., and Mr. Cursetjee Limji, each for the use of 1 bus for 1 day free of charge, to the Bombay B. E. S. T. Co. for giving their buses at a greatly reduced rate and to those kind friends who have lent us their motor cars for the use of the delegates, to the P. & O. Company for giving us the free use of their launch for the excursion to the Elephanta Caves, to Scout Organiser Mr. Kulkarni and Guide Organiser Mrs. Malandker and all those Scout Masters, Guiders, Rangers and Rovers who have given their services most willingly and efficiently for all these days at much sacrifice of time and trouble. (Applause). We have also to thank the Taj Mahal Hotel particularly for taking a large number of our delegates at a very nominal rate, (Applause) and the Apollo Hotel for taking some of our delegates at a reduced rate.

In conclusion I wish you all a very successful conference and hope that your deliberations may be fruitful of many necessary and uplifting reforms which will raise the status of Indian womanhood in every direction.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT.

Mrs. Fais Tyabji in proposing Mrs. Sarojini Naidu to the chair said that she had great pleasure in placing before them the resolution. Mrs. Naidu represented the highest type of Indian Womanhood and was a person of international reputation. Though she has expressed herself mainly in the English language and has mastered it she is as thoroughly Indian as the least sophisticated. The Women's Conference has to contend against several difficulties and it is essential that they had proper guidance. First, they had to take themselves seriously and make others take them seriously. Secondly, they must be Indian in their aspirations and avoid the danger of becoming westernised. Again the prevalent idea that woman will lose her womanliness if she enters public life has to be refuted and the president is a living example of the absurdity of these ideas. Mrs. Naidu therefore is the ideal choice for the presidentship.

Miss Lazarus of Mysore seconded the resolution and said that Mrs. Naidu needed no commendation and that in honouring her the speakers were honouring themselves and thus shining in reflected light. Mrs. Naidu was regarded by the South as one of them for she was born in the South and had spent the greater part of her life there. But as women were disputing the point they would agree to say that she belonged to both of them. By her poems and her eloquence she had gained renown in foreign countries and thus done much to restore our self-respect and our pride in our ancient culture and civilisation. She is moreover, a most illustrious example that women are no longer under tutelage. The speaker believed that Mrs. Naidu was born in India in response to a call and that she was an Indian not by accident. At present when many are groping for the light, there could be no better guiding star than Sarojini Naidu. The resolution was passed with acclamations. Mrs. Naidu then called upon the organising Secretary to read the Report of the activities of the Conference during the past year.

MRS. CHATTOPADHYAYA'S REPORT.

Mrs. Kamaladevi Chattopadhyaya in reading the report said that the Conference provided a wide and open platform for women to advocate their views and state their grievances. Its object was to draw women out from their seclusion, to rouse their interest and to create in them a due sense of their responsibility. In the year under review they had had their report printed in English and several vernaculars and hoped to issue it in more languages in future. Last year the Conference found it necessary to widen its scope so as to include other questions. As life is indivisible so are its aspects and the two sections into which the Conference had been divided existed merely for the sake of convenience and to facilitate organised work. The first section, educational, was mainly concerned with children in the primary stage. The Standing Committee of the Conference had spared no pains to advance the cause of primary education and its continual efforts had resulted in more schools being started all over the country. In addition to this they had succeeded in improving the conditions of existing schools and had introduced physical training in some of them. At three consecutive sittings the Conference had advanced the ideals underlying the Sarda Bill and had advocated the fixing of an even higher age. At the first Conference at Poona the idea of fixing a marriage age was first put forward and it was pointed out that it would be useless to raise the age of consent if there was no marriage age; and in spite of opposition from the orthodox who were opposed to "anti-religious" legislation and from the cautious who feared the advisability of legislating on such a question they had achieved success in so short a time. The Conference regarded the Sarda Act as a personal triumph which they had achieved in the short space of a year and a half and they would not rest till they had fixed the marriage age at 16 for girls and 21 for boys as advocated at the Poona Conference. Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi was to be congratulated on her Devadasi Bill and her work in the Madras Council.

The Social section, continued Mrs. Chattopadhyaya, dealt with the problems of women's rights. They were conducting a propoganda against the enforced seclusion of women. They would like to see in the near future women as assistant registrars of co-operative societies as there is at present in the Punjab. The employment of women as sanitary inspectors was being seriously considered in Behar and Orissa. The first effort they had made in the matter of labour was with reference to the Labour Commission. Though they were not successful in getting women as members of the Commission still they had some measure of success as the Commission took women assessors in each province to help them to understand the problems of the women in the mills. It was now decided that in future programmes of the Conference visits to mill areas were to be introduced. Mrs. Rameshwari Nehru of Delhi was managing the section which concerned itself with the grievances of women passengers on the railway. Continuing Mrs. Chattopadhyaya drew the attention of the audience to the fact that kitchen drudgery took up too large a part of the Indian women's time. Though the modern woman had imbibed new ideas and expanded her outlook the fact that there was no simplification of kitchen work gave her no opportunity to enlarge her field of activity. This problem could only be solved by the increasing use of labour-saving devices. The Conference was also anxious to see the employment of women in the Secretariats and the Legislatures in large numbers. Much work had been done outside India in the various international women's conferences that had been held during the year. At the International World Congress of Women at Berlin, the Indian delegates moved an amendment that the age of marriage should be 16 for girls and 18 for boys whereas the original resolution recommended 16 for both on the grounds of sex equality. The amendment was carried though it met with some opposition particularly from the British delegates. This came as a revelation to most of the other delegates who had believed that Indian opinion was indifferent if not opposed to reform. Women in India were increasingly realising that the time had come for them to join in the general national regeneration.

MRS. SAROJINI NAIDU'S PRESIDENTIAL ADDRESS.

FELLOWSHIP OF HUMANITY.

Mrs. Naidu delivered her presidential address extempore. She said that after the three eloquent speakers who had preceded her there was nothing left for her to say. Lady Sykes had struck the right keynote of the ideas of women's emancipation. Lady Tata practical always, had covered the whole ground of the possible activities of the women of today, and in the report the Secretary had given in detail the concrete achievements of the Conference. When so many educational experts and social reformers had spoken before her what was left for her—a mere visionary, a dreamer and a poet, except to restate in other phraseology the identical things that had been put forward so ably by other speakers.

She did not think that at any time was it her function to go into the details of life or life's manifold activities. Her special function and the function of men and women like her was to kindle, to guard and to cherish the ideals that made possible the achievements of humanity. She would therefore try to deal with the larger human issues that transcend race, creed and culture and become part of the great human contribution to progress.

REAWAKENING OF INDIAN WOMANHOOD.

Lady Sykes had reminded them that they were on the threshold of a great political and social evolution and if anything was prophetic of that great evolution it was the re-awakening of the womanhood of India to a sense of its long lost responsibilities and duties.

Proceeding Mrs. Naidu alluded to the fact that whereas the first three sessions of the Conference were presided over by women of Royal rank when they were held in historic cities like Poona, Patna and Delhi, it was but fitting that in a cosmopolitan city like Bombay where all ranks were one and where all cultures were freely associated with one another they had risen from royalty to democracy and had chosen her, a mere servant of the nation as their president. She was proud of the honour they had done to her not because such honour was new to her as she had had the honour of being elected president of the greatest political organisation of this country but because she regarded this women's conference as the greatest representative gathering of Indian womanhood.

She added that while the Indian National Congress was only a national institution the women's conference might justly pride itself as being the greatest international movement in India. Every one who was willing to acknowledge her life's debt to this great land, no matter what her religion, creed or race was eligible to be a member of the Conference.

IN DEFENCE OF INDIAN WOMANHOOD

The purpose for which the conference existed, Mrs. Naidu continued, was not merely to pass more and more resolutions for educational or social reforms but they stood for something more profound, more intimate, more enduring in human values. The charge had been made against Indian womanhood that their genius had been one of isolation and exclusion and passive resignation in the hands of destiny, that they were bound by mere traditions and were unable to get beyond the fetters of dead conventions and ideas. She thought that the conference was the triumph and vindication of her assertion that the genius of Indian womanhood included everything and was all comprehensive. The whole history of Indian culture was creative and it was able to transmute even the hostility of their enemies. That conference was the proof of the indivisible quality of fellowship of all women.

All the circumstances of their national struggle must temporarily make them seem to be aggressively, almost exclusively nationalist in their attitude towards life but she was a nationalist by compulsion and by the tragedy of her country. She was first and last a human being and she did not recognise divisions of humanity merely because of race or geographical barriers. Men made wars and created political and economic divisions for selfish interests and created combinations and groups of friendship and hostility. But all these were temporary shifts and the purpose of womanhood in the nation's or the world's life was to do away with these temporary barriers. They were evangelists of peace, working for the attainment of the common rights of humanity, seeking to stop exploitation of one nation by another.

Mrs. Naidu emphatically declared that she was not a feminist and would never be one. The demand for granting preferential treatment to women was an admission of their inferiority and there was no need for such a thing in India as the women of this country were always by the side of men both in the political councils and in the fields of battle.

CO-EDUCATION.

Mrs. Naidu strongly advocated co-education as the best possible means of creating the best form of co-operation and comradeship between the two sexes.

Referring to the part women could play in the great political struggle Mrs. Naidu said that in their struggle for freedom there was bound to be moments of bitterness, sorrow and mutual conflict. A conference like theirs could do a great deal to diminish such bitterness and add a sweetening touch in the struggle, recognising the fact that patriotism and nationalism were not the only things. There was something they should work for and that was the common bond of fellowship of humanity, which transcended race, colour and creed barriers. (Applause).

The Ranee of Sangli then proposing a vote of thanks to Lady Sykes, said that they were fortunate in having Lady Sykes to open their Conference. Lady Sykes and the popular Governor of Bombay had shown great interest in progressive movements in the Presidency. Mrs. D. N. Sirur in seconding the resolution, said that she had great pleasure in doing so. She said that among Indians it was customary to name their daughters after rivers and the place where two rivers met was sacred. Lady Sykes representing the West and Mrs. Naidu representing the East meeting together on the platform of the Conference symbolised the unity that characterised the Conference.

The proceedings terminated with the singing of "Vande Mataram."

The Conference then adjourned to Tuesday.

MESSAGES AND REPORTS.

CONFIDENCE IN MRS. NAIDU'S LEADERSHIP.

The All-India Women's Conference re-assembled in the University Convocation Hall on Tuesday the 21st. The proceedings were mainly devoted to the reading of reports by sectional Secretaries and the Secretaries of the various constituencies.

At the outset Mrs. Kamaladevi Chattopadhyaya read messages from absent delegates wishing the Conference success. Sumati Lalit Kumari of Mandi regretted her inability to attend the Conference and expressed the hope that under the distinguished guidance of Mrs. Naidu the Indian women would progress rapidly. Miss Bary Power, member of the Royal Commission on Labour had sent the following message:—Enough public opinion and practical help of women increasingly needed in connection with India's growing industries. All-India Women's Conference is an invaluable movement to this end. Knowing the part played by women Inspectors in other countries your resolution asking for similar appointments in industrial provinces should assist to obtain some help for women and child-workers in this country.

The following resolution of condolence was then moved from the chair and passed unanimously, the entire audience standing:—This Conference wishes to express its deep sense of sorrow at the sad demise of Mr. Mazarul Huq, Mr. D. M. Chiplunkar and Mr. Gokarnath Misra who rendered meritorious service in the cause of Women's Education and social reform and places on record its sincere condolence and sympathy to the families of the bereaved.

A statement was then made by Mrs. Huidekoper, Chairman of the Standing Committee, regarding the action taken by this Committee in considering all the resolutions sent in by constituent conferences and acting as a Subjects Committee with regard to them and for which she desired the formal confirmation of the Conference. This was done. As Educational Secretary, Mrs. Huidekoper then gave a report on the year's working which had closely followed the schemes mapped out by the Patna Conference, the idea being the investigation of the education of children under eight.

Mrs. Nehru, Social Secretary, in placing her report before the meeting, mentioned that 1929 was the first year the All-India Women's Conference worked for social reform, and they considered it their greatest achievement that the Sarda Child Marriage Restraint Act should have been passed into law. The scheme of work planned for the year included the prevention of child marriage, the abolition of the enforced seclusion of the pardah, equal rights of inheritance, prevention of polygamy, the prevention of unequal marriages and the prevention of enforced widowhood. As social conditions in the various provinces differed so widely, each province worked out its own scheme. The two questions, child marriage prevention and equal inheritance, were taken up thoroughly, but that of the abolition of the pardah was not so popular. Mrs. Nehru next read a report of work done with regard to social reform, in several constituencies and institutions that had come into being as a result of their endeavour. She concluded that the atmosphere they had created and the interest awakened in social reform in general and women's rights in particular, though not tangible, was yet felt by all. She also stated that two sub-committees were to be appointed by the Conference on Indigenous Industries and Labour. This widening of the sphere means an undertaking of activities covering the whole field of life.

In making a statement concerning the finances of the All-India Women's Conference, Mrs. Sen, treasurer, announced that the balance-sheet would be put before the delegates in due course, but she felt she must say a few words about finance, which, in organisations like this, was a most potential factor. Difficulties had been experienced last year on account of lack of funds for annual working expenses, and it was only the personal devotion, co-operation and self-sacrifice of the officers that made it possible to carry on. Mrs. Sen appealed on behalf of the Conference to all who had woman's uplift at heart to help and support the A. I. W. C. by giving practical assistance in the way of donations.

Following on the reports of the treasurer and the educational and social secretaries came reports from the constituencies of the work they had done to further women's education in their particular corners of India during the past year. Andhra, the Central Provinces, Baroda, Ajmer, Merwara, Oudh, East Bengal, Madras, Tamil Nadu, Utkal, Bombay, Hyderabad Deccan, Delhi, Sind, Mysore, Karnatak, Bihar, Alibag, and East and Central Punjab gave a report of work well begun and done. It was interesting to find that a strict pardah lady, a delegate from the Punjab, was helping on the educational emancipation of her sisters.

VISITS TO INSTITUTIONS.

The afternoon was devoted to visits to several institutions in the city. The first of these was to the Seva Mandir, where Miss Manibai Kara and a devoted band of helpers have begun and are successfully carrying on a creche, a nursery school and children's clinic for the youth of the mill labourers in the district. In addition to this there is an educational class for married girls between the age of 14 and 18, a sewing and health talk class, a play centre, and gatherings for women. The next institution visited was the Victoria Memorial School for the Blind, where several practical demonstrations were given of the methods adopted to make the inmates useful units of humanity. There were also on view numerous models illustrating the means by which instruction was given in geography. The third visit on Tuesday afternoon was paid to the Sir Ratan Tata Industrial Institute, which caters solely for the poor and middle class Parsi girl who has to earn her own living. Each single section of this institution provides a girl with her livelihood. The last visit was to the Seva Sadan, where so much is done to educate and train girls of all creeds. There is also here a home for the homeless.

Later in the afternoon there was an "At Home" at Government House.

The concert arranged by the All-Women's Conference at the Cowasji Jehangir Hall on Tuesday proved to be an admirable blending of the art and music of the East with that of the West. Many of the delegates contributed to the programme and an exceptionally large audience enjoyed itself thoroughly.

EDUCATIONAL PROBLEMS.

A number of resolutions relating to women's education were passed at Wednesday's sitting of the All-India Women's Conference.

At the outset of the day's proceedings, Mrs. Naidu (President) read the following message from the Maharanee of Baroda:—"Wish ever increasing success to this year's session and to intellectual, social and economic emancipation of women of India for which the Conference stands. Regret could not wire earlier, being busy with Viceregal visit."

NEW SYLLABUS FOR MATRICULATION EXAMINATION.

The first resolution moved by Miss Bahadurji from Bombay read as follows:—"That this Conference is of opinion that whereas it is the intention of the University of Bombay very shortly to draw up a new syllabus for the Matriculation Examination, the All-India Women's Conference should send a deputation of its members to the Bombay University authorities, offering the help of the Conference in drawing up a syllabus on the lines of its memorandum."

Miss Bahadurji said that in the preparation of the syllabus women should have as strong a voice as men as the course of instruction imparted was of equal interest and importance to girls as well as to boys. She regretted that there were not enough women in the University Senate to put forward the special educational needs of girls and hence the proposed deputation would be of great help in the framing of a better and more suitable syllabus.

Mrs. Ambegaokar (C. P. South), seconding the resolution, said that as women were more intimately acquainted with the problems of female education their views should be obtained in preparing the syllabus.

Miss Q. Sorabji, supporting the resolution, complained that there was no meaning in the talk of equality between men and women, if women were not allowed a hand in such vital matters as these.

The resolution was carried.

WANTED MORE BUILDINGS FOR GIRLS' SCHOOLS, PROPAGANDA CAMPAIGN SUGGESTED.

Mrs. Huidekoper from Sind moved the following resolution:—

That, whereas in many parts of India the problem of obtaining suitable buildings for girls' Schools is becoming more and more acute, this Conference calls upon the All-India Women's Conference to consider.—(a) the advisability of launching a propaganda campaign in its many constituent areas in order that companies may be formed on the lines of the Girls' Public Day School Company in England whereby in that country a sufficiency of girls' High Schools was established and (b) the recommending of such a campaign to the All-India Women's Educational Fund Association as part of its work in the coming year.

The mover deplored that women's education was handicapped very seriously due to lack of buildings for girls' schools. Whenever they approached the Local Government they were told of financial stringency. For the same reason, the local bodies also did not do anything. She was now appealing to the public to remove this serious difficulty and thus help the cause of women's education.

Mrs. Desai and Miss Vincent spoke in support of the resolution, which was unanimously adopted.

Miss Feruze Din (Punjab) moved the next resolution:—"This Conference recommends to the University of Bombay and to such other Universities where such facilities do not exist (1) that Vernaculars should be allowed optionally with classical languages in the curricula at every stage in the University course and (2) that Domestic Science, optionally with physics, should be allowed in the First Year in the Arts Examination."

The resolution was seconded by Miss Khare and supported by Lady Nilkanth Ramanbhai and was passed.

WANTED A CENTRAL TRAINING COLLEGE.

There was some opposition to a proposal for the establishment of a Central Training College for Women; the resolution on this subject was moved by Miss Young and ran as follows:—

That immediate steps be taken to carry into effect the repeated resolution that a central college be founded to train graduates and matriculates in order to secure a higher standard of Kindergarten and Secondary Teachers and that the Fund Association be requested to allot money for founding and endowing such a college.

That this Conference recommends to the Fund Association that a Committee be formed at once to draw up plans for the establishment of a Teachers' Training College of a specialised Home Science character covering the complete life of a pupil, whether rural or urban, the courses of which should be on the lines of the Memorandum of the A. I. W. C.

TEACHING PROFESSION.

Miss Young said that the teaching profession had no prestige in India at present and that was because of the low standard of teachers. It was impossible for a decent girl to join the profession, as it was not recognised in the same way as the medical profession. When they were asking for compulsory primary education they should take care to provide properly qualified and trained teachers.

Mrs. Rustomjee Fareedonji (Hyderabad Deccan) seconding the resolution said that the All-India Women's Education Fund Association had adopted two resolutions and the governing body of the Association were arranging to appoint a Committee of experts to advise them on the subject. Lady Irwin, the President of the Association, was anxious to do something before leaving India and she wanted everyone present to help her in all possible manner in carrying out the proposal. First of all, she wanted ideas and suggestions from all interested in education giving the latest information regarding domestic science, hygiene and educational methods. Secondly, she wanted young women to go abroad and study educational systems and methods with a view to adopt for their own use what was suitable to them in India.

Mrs. Cousins from Madras strongly supported the resolution.

OPPOSITION TO PROPOSAL.

Opposition to the proposal was mainly two-sided. One was the difficulty about the medium of instruction in the College. Mrs. Maya Das advancing this view, held that they had in one breath asked for Vernacular as medium of instruction and in the next breath they were proposing to have a Central College with English as medium of instruction. She thought that if instruction was imparted in the Vernacular it would prevent difficulties to women coming from different Provinces. She, therefore opposed the proposal on practical grounds.

Some members opposed the idea of having a Central College but preferred to have such training colleges in different parts of the country.

Mrs. Fareedonji, replying to the objections, said that the College was for training teachers and not children. The object was to enable teachers from different parts of the country to receive training in the latest ideas and methods of education without having to go to England, America or Germany. After receiving the training they could go to their own Provinces and teach what they had learnt in their own Vernaculars.

The resolution on being put to the vote was carried by a large majority.

COMPULSORY PRIMARY EDUCATION.

Mrs. Krishnavenamma moved the following resolution regarding compulsory primary education.

"This Conference is strongly in favour of compulsory primary education for girls as well as boys and requests all Local Governments and local bodies to take immediate steps to introduce compulsory education in urban, suburban and rural districts in such a way that in all district headquarters and towns the scheme is in full working order within five years and is universal in 20 years. This Conference is of opinion that this compulsory education should be made free in all schools provided by public authorities to all those unable to pay for it."

The mover said that unless they were able to carry education to the masses of the people all their efforts to improve women's lot will bear no fruit. Mrs. Kamaladevi Chattopadhyaya in seconding the resolution said that compulsory education must be free as the bulk of the people were steeped in poverty and could not send their children to school at their own expense. The resolution was passed unanimously.

OTHER RESOLUTIONS.

The following other resolutions were passed at the Conference :—

"This Conference considers that the present course of training for Matriculate and non-Matriculate teachers is very unsatisfactory, and that the standard of examination should be raised, and better provision made for the actual training."

"This Conference recommends that the inspecting staff of girl's schools should consist of women only, and that a Deputy Directress of Public Instruction preferably an Indian, be appointed in every province."

"That in order to carry out compulsory primary education effectively this Conference is of opinion that more rural training centres should be opened where teachers drawn from rural areas should be trained under such conditions as they will meet in their work. These teachers should in every possible case, be of secondary grade, and the employment of teachers of lower grade should ultimately cease. Residential quarters for women teachers should be provided in all teaching centres; creches and nursery schools should be established near schools; only clean, dry, airy and well ventilated buildings with play grounds should be used for schools, school text books should be related to the psychology and environment of the child; more women should be trained as specialist teachers in domestic science; nutrition bureaus should be established in every Province where the much needed research work on the value of the food stuffs available in the Province should be carried out and where all information regarding suitable dietaries could be obtained."

"This Conference places on record its dissatisfaction with the policy of the Government of Bombay in reducing the number of students admitted to the training colleges and strongly desires that their numbers should be increased. This Conference regards the standard accepted by the Government of 50 per cent. of trained teachers in primary schools as a very low one, and suggests to all Municipalities and Local Boards to engage only trained teachers."

As regards the resolution dealing with the appointment of a Deputy Directress of Public Instruction an amendment was brought forward that the Chief Inspectress of Schools should be considered as Deputy Directress of Public Instruction. This amendment being accepted by the proposer Mrs. Kashaker, was carried.

Mrs. Hamid Ali and Mrs. Chattopadhyaya were Treasurer and Organising Secretary respectively for the year 1930.

Close on two hundred ladies sat down to lunch at the Taj Mahal Hotel, where one more opportunity was given the delegates of meeting and exchanging views with their sisters from other parts of India. The delegates carried on an animated conversation.

PRABHAD MILLS CRECHE.

The afternoon was once again devoted to visits, and delegates made a choice of seeing the Cama and Allbless Hospital, which is run entirely by women for women with a Nursing Association for training nurses and where recently the hospital authorities threw open their doors to post-medical graduates to gain more practical experience; the Mahila Mandal at Parel or the Avabai Petit Orphanage, Bandra, both of which have industrial classes—the first for women of the mill area and the latter for Parsi girls; or the Prahlad Spinning and Weaving Mills. Here Mrs. Naidu performed the opening ceremony of the Prahlad Mills creche.

LADY IRWIN ON WOMEN'S EDUCATION.

The first general meeting of the All-India Women's Education Fund was held at the University Convocation Hall on Friday the 17th instant under the Presidency of Her Excellency Lady Irwin. Lady Tata in welcoming Her Excellency emphasised the importance of women's education and wished Lady Irwin every success in the noble work inaugurated by her. In the course of her presidential address Lady Irwin said:

"I must thank you very much for your kind welcome to me to-day. I feel that it is a happy augury for our work that the first meeting of our newly formed Association should be in this city. For even as it is here at the Gateway of India that the traveller from overseas first sets foot in this great country, so I hope that we too are standing here to-day at the Gateway of a new land of discovery and greater opportunity for women.

"It was in May of last year that we were able, with much thought and deliberation, finally to draft the Constitution of this Association, after the idea of raising a fund had first germinated at the meeting of the A.I.W.C. in the previous year. We are met now, a small body of its first members, with a firm determination to carry out the objects to which we have set our hand. The splendid work which the A.I.W.C. has done and is doing in bringing people together for discussion and deliberation and in arousing interest and harnessing enthusiasm to the cause of women's education has started a new era in the sphere of women's endeavours to benefit her fellows.

"The great efforts that are made to come to the Conference from far and near, not only by those who are already taking an active part in the world affairs, but also by those who are in purdah, is a sufficient sign of the strong interest which women are taking in education, and must be a great encouragement to those enthusiasts who are working for this cause. Perhaps their enthusiasm and perseverance may have times of discouragement and disappointment in what they seem to achieve. But I feel convinced that historians of the future will discover cornerstones laid by forgotten hands, and that when the world's judgments come to be revised, we shall find that a high place among the host of benefactors to mankind will be given to those who worked so persistently for the expansion of women's education in earlier days.

"LIFE A GREAT SCHOOL."

"I am profoundly persuaded that the prosperity and development of India depend in a very marked degree on the education of women and the influence which they may bring upon the progress of their country. It has been truly said that on sound public opinion sound administration rests. That women's influence is very strong is a matter of no doubt, and a great responsibility must lie on their shoulders for the formation of public opinion and for the choice which will be taken by men and as well as women of right paths of development and progress.

"We cannot think too seriously or examine too carefully the lines on which women's education should develop. Life is a great school in which every human being throughout his allotted span is a student in the science of living. It is generally recognised that the first aim of education must be to lay firmly the foundations of character, judgment and discrimination, and those years (be they many or few) which a girl spends at school should be a preparation and training of her body and mind for the bigger education which will come to her later.

METHODS OF TEACHING.

"Let us never forget that it is impossible to deal with a child as though it were a machine, that girls differ from boys and equally that one girl may be totally different from her sister. The same lines of teaching which stimulate one child may suffocate or suppress another. For one the appropriate means of self-expression will be the direct training of the intellectual faculty, for another the same purpose will be achieved by instruction of a more practical kind. Therefore let us be prepared to encourage a wide diversity of the type of school and the character of the curriculums. A girl's education should help her first and foremost to steer her course through life and to play the part which is allotted to her in the world, be it humble or be it great. Next to that, I would claim that it should cultivate her imagination and an appreciation of life and foster her interest in Beauty, Nature, and Books. If her school days can give her interests which will continue to be an unending occupation and joy, much will have been achieved towards making a happy home for her and her family.

TEST OF MEN'S EDUCATION.

"It has been well said that "the test of man's education is what he chooses to do when he is not obliged to do anything." I feel that this can equally be said, and just as truly, of a woman.

"I am afraid my hearers will say that I am speaking of things that are impossible to realise for many years to come and that I am setting too high an ideal, but I do feel strongly that we must have our final objects and purposes clearly in view from the beginning—even in the most elementary education, so that we may start the child with the right foundations upon which a sound structure may later be built when further opportunity arises.

"In approaching these problems it seems necessary to combine the virtues of two types; an idealism that impels us to follow our dreams and visions, and also a practical sense which will accurately measure the difficulties with which we have to deal. Thus only, with our feet set on solid ground keeping touch with the realities of our task shall we be able to build patiently and securely upon the material which we have yet all the while aflame with the inspiration of a great cause, marching forward to the land of our ultimate desire."

INTERNATIONAL FELLOWSHIP.

Presenting the report for the year 1929, Mrs. Rustomji Fareedoonji said that as the outcome of a resolution passed at the second session of the All-India Women's Conference, the All-India Women's Education Fund had been started for the promotion of women's education. The fund developed into an association, and in response to a personal appeal from Her Excellency the sum of Rs. 20,000 was collected from the Ruling Princes of India. A statement of accounts submitted to the meeting showed that the subscription received amounted to over Rs. 95,000.

The adoption of the report and balance sheet was followed by the passing of the budget for 1930 and afterwards the question of the establishment of a Teachers' Training College was discussed. It was decided to refer this matter to a special committee for report.

A vote of thanks to Lady Irwin was charmingly proposed by Mrs. Sarojini Naidu, who thanked Her Excellency for her co-operation in this great work of women's education in India. She stressed once again her sentiments that in order to gain any measure of progress, Indian women could not be only Indian women hedged in by the narrow boundaries of caste, creed etc. They must become part of that great international fellowship to advance along the right lines. She conveyed the gratitude of Indian womanhood for Her Excellency's co-operation as a woman for the women.

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 30 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

NOTES.

Mahatma Gandhi's New Offer:—Mahatmaji has been impressed by the strength and unanimity of the opposition of many who hold him in the highest personal regard, to the Lahore Congress resolution on Independence and boycott of the Legislative Councils. Among the latest protests is one from Mrs. Sarojini Naidu who says: "I would in deep earnestness reiterate my word of warning and entreaty to the leaders of the Congress to pause and consider the tremendous and almost terrible implications of their responsibility in regard to the vast masses of men, in whom they can so readily evoke great emotional response. It behoves them not to be easily content or misled into false security by the temporary endorsements of transitory enthusiasm, however genuine, but to transmute it into the substance of reality by mobilising, co-ordinating and disciplining all the forces in the nation into a permanent sanction and support to all proper and necessary policies and plans for the attainment of complete freedom." Some people are fond of taunting Mahatma Gandhi for making "Himalayan mistakes" but one who never makes great mistakes seldom does anything noteworthy. A mistake made in a disinterested way reflects no discredit on any one. Englishmen understand this but Indians do not and hence the nagging which paralyses initiative among us. This is by the way. Mahatma Gandhi having realised the disinterestedness of the opposition to the Lahore resolution has made a fresh offer to the Viceroy. Leaving constitutional questions aside, he asks that certain reforms which can be carried out even under the present constitution and which affect the vital interests of the people, should be immediately taken in hand, and says that, if this is done, "the Congress will heartily participate in any Conference where there is perfect freedom of expression and demands." This in no way derogates from the Congress resolution, while opening the door to further negotiation before it is put into effect. We are sure that Lord Irwin and Mr. Wedgwood Benn will appreciate the goodwill behind this offer and respond to it in the spirit in which it is made.

The Reforms:—Mahatma Gandhi's list of reforms consists of eleven items. They are:—

1. Total Prohibition, 2. Reduction of the ratio to 1 s. 4 d., 3. Reduction of the land revenue to at least 50 per cent. and making it subject to legislative control, 4. Abolition of the salt tax, 5. Reduction of the military expenditure to at least 50 per cent. to begin with, 6. Reduction of the salaries of the higher grade service to one half or less so as to suit the reduced revenue, 7. Protective tariff on foreign cloth, 8. The passage of the Coastal Traffic Reservation Bill, 9. Discharge of all political prisoners save those condemned for murder or the attempt thereof by the ordinary judicial tribunal, withdrawal of all political prosecutions, abrogation of Section 124A, the Regulation of 1818 and the like, a permission to all the Indian exiles to return, 10. Abolition of C. I. D. or its popular control, and 11. Issue of licenses to use fire arms for self-defence subject to popular control. The list does not exhaust all the requirements of the masses, but, says Mahatmaji, let the Viceroy satisfy these very simple but vital needs of India. "He will then hear no talk of civil disobedience, and the Congress will heartily participate in any Conference where there is perfect freedom of expression and demands." The several items in the list, to our mind, are of unequal importance and seem to have been put together with a view to reach maximum unity. We are greatly pleased to see Prohibition at the head of Mahatmaji's list. The intelligentsia of India, mainly belonging to the non-drinking castes, do not realise the immense peril to national existence which is involved in the drink and drug traffic. But their sense of safety is an illusion and if the evil is allowed to continue and to spread, no caste or class will be long exempt from it. We wholeheartedly support the demand for Prohibition and we regard the attitude of Government to it as the acid test of their sincerity in desiring to see this country rise morally and materially in the scale of nations. Of the other items of Mahatmaji's list, we support the reduction of the salt tax to such a nominal figure as practically to mean total abolition. A small skeleton staff will have to be maintained to see that the people get pure salt and that there is no speculation in this necessity of life. As for the rest, they relate to matters of administration, and require to be carefully gone into. Mahatmaji knows that the Viceroy cannot effect all these reforms by a stroke of his pen, and he only asks that his Excellency should "initiate" these reforms, that is to say, take steps to have them properly formulated and introduced in the appropriate ways for progressive consideration. We are sure that Lord Irwin as well as other political groups, will welcome Mahatmaji's gesture of conciliation as going a great way to ease the present tense situation.

Baroda State And Divorce :—We published about a year ago and commented upon the Baroda Hindu Divorce Bill which was published to elicit public opinion. A special session has now been called of the State Legislative Assembly to consider the Bill. The proposed measure has roused much criticism both in Baroda and outside. We take the following from the Hindu :—"The Bill is designed to apply to Hindus only but the definition of the word Hindu includes Jains, Buddhists and Sikhs. The Court shall have jurisdiction under the proposed Act only if the party praying for relief under this Act is the domiciled subject of the State at the time of the suit and in case of a suit for the dissolution of marriage only if the marriage has been solemnised in the State or the cause of action has been in the State. Another important provision made in the Bill permits a wife or husband to file a suit for judicial separation instead of asking for a dissolution of marriage on several other grounds in addition to any of the grounds specified for divorce. The property acquired by a wife or vesting in her from the date she obtains a decree of judicial separation shall be her own, the husband having no claims over it during her life time. On the other hand the husband is absolved from all liability in respect of acts committed by the wife from the date." Peculiar interest attaches to this Bill as it is a pioneer attempt to break through the Hindu conception of the inviolability of the marriage tie. In fact divorce is not quite acceptable to many even among social reformers and it is significant that it is not to be found among the social resolutions passed at the Women's Conference which we print elsewhere. Bearing in mind the fact that at several women's constituent conferences divorce was advocated and later became a subject of much controversy in the press, the only explanation to its not even being raised in the Conference is that those who drafted the resolutions felt the time was not yet ripe for the subject to be taken up. As we have pointed out before we hope when the Bill emerges from the Baroda Assembly it will provide adequate safeguards that it may not impose an even greater hardship on women. Further if divorce is to be of any use in ameliorating the conditions of unhappy wives it should be supported by the strict enforcement of the monogamous principle.

The Madras Brothels Bill :—Another stage has been reached in the Madras Brothels Bill and we hope that very soon it will come into force. The Select Committee on the Bill for the suppression of Brothels and Immoral Traffic have reported on the Bill recommended to them. The Bill, as now amended, will be taken up for consideration by the Council on Friday next. They state as follows: "In our previous report we considered that it should be obligatory upon the Local Government to provide rescue homes for the custody and detention of girls removed under this Act, and therefore made such amendments in the Bill as were deemed necessary to carry out this intention. As His Excellency the Governor has refused to grant sanction to the amendments, it has become necessary for us to delete the same. We have accordingly deleted clause 16 of the Bill as originally amended by us, and also the words "provided by the Local Government" in clause 6

(ii) and in clause 7 of the Bill. We have also removed the words "or otherwise" in clause 12 of the Bill, as we consider that these words introduce an element of indefiniteness into the offence and widen its scope unnecessarily. We have reduced the sentence provided for under clause 12 and we have made one or two other minor changes. The Bill as amended by us is attached. As the changes made by us are not of an important character, the Bill need not be republished in the Gazette." We do not think it an adequate excuse for the Committee to drop amendments on vital questions because of the Governor's act. Without adequate provision of rescue homes, such a measure loses much of its importance and the Madras reformers will be hard put to it to discover and provide for proper channels to which they could divert the energies of the rescued girls. We trust that though no legal provision has been made it does not mean that Madras Government will not take the initiative to provide rescue homes.

The Hindu Mahasabha :—From a message to the press from the Secretary of the Hindu Mahasabha, it is clear that so far the person most favoured for the presidentship of the Mahasabha Session at Bezwada is Mr. M. R. Jayakar. Mr. Jayakar, as is well-known to our readers, has been one of the strongest advocates of Social Reform and has to his credit several reform bills in the Assembly. Moreover his position in politics makes his election to the presidentship all the more valuable at a time when the political problem has become acute. That Mr. Jayakar's name was put forward by several Provincial Sabhas clearly shows that the Hindu organisation realises the value of social legislation though some of its leaders may be doubtful of its expediency. We trust Mr. Jayakar will be unanimously elected to the presidentship and we look forward eagerly to the lead he will give not only to the Mahasabha but to the country, particularly on social problems this Easter.

The Catholic Index :—The United Church Review of Northern India has in its last issue taken strong exception in an editorial to a news item which we had extracted from the Catholic Leader in our issue of December 21, 1929. The first sentence of that news note should have read: "The Index of Prohibited Books issued last month, says the Catholic Leader, Madras, is the first book published by the new printing works of the Holy See in the Vatican City." By a misprint which we regret all the more since it has caused our North Indian contemporaries some anxiety, the word "by" was substituted for "says" and the credulous were led to think that "the first book published by the new printing works of the Holy See in the Vatican city" was issued in Madras! At the same time we hope the United Church Review will not take it amiss if we comment on one of the issues raised in its editorial. We are aware that in Christianity as in other religions there are several sects but it comes as a surprise to us that the editor of the organ of one of these should feel sorrow that the "average Non-Christian does not distinguish markedly between Protestant and Catholic." We do not know what are the various sects that

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1930.

MRS. SAROJINI NAIDU'S ADDRESS.

Mrs. Sarojini Naidu delivered her presidential address at the fourth All-India Women's Conference extemporarily. It has not been taken down verbatim as the expert stenographer specially instructed to do it, gave up the attempt in sheer despair. Her eloquence is like a rushing torrent which sweeps all before it, herself not excepted. Browning in one of his poems speaks of "the hand upon my shoulder" at moments of inspiration. Mrs. Naidu when she speaks is like one possessed. The words seem to shoot out like burning lava from a volcano, but the thoughts behind them suggest the deep serenity of a lake amidst towering mountains. There is a school of biography just coming into prominence of which the "Life of Karl Marx" by Otto Ruble, (an excellent English translation of which by Eden and Cedar Paul, is published by George Allen and Unwin) is the most through-going example that we have seen. According to this school every life must be interpreted in the light of its inherited and acquired circumstances. The personal equation is almost everything.

Application of this theory to Mrs. Sarojini Naidu is illuminating. In a speech which she made a day or two later presiding at a Vivekananda celebration, she referred to her first meeting the Swami as a small girl in her home with a flash-light picture of which she held her audience spell-bound. It was her father's picture in fact—a man of transcendent ideals seeking to live the truths he believed in. He might have applied to himself Francis Thompson's lines:

I hang, 'mid men my needless head,
And my fruit is dreams, as theirs is bread:
The goodly men and the sun-hazed sleeper
Time shall reap, but after the reaper
The world shall glean of me, me the sleeper.

Anyhow, to the dreamer Chattopadhyaya and the home-life he inspired, India owes Mrs. Sarojini Naidu whose position to day as a harmonising factor is without a parallel. The first Brahmin girl to marry against the immemorial tradition and the iron law of her caste a non-Brahmin, a Hindu steeped in the atmosphere of Islamic culture, an Indian to whom the English language is the natural and spontaneous medium of expression, she harmonises in herself some of the cardinal incompatibilities of modern India. No wonder, as she told the Women's Conference, she hates and despises the 'feminism' which would separate and antagonise woman against "our Comrade, Man." No wonder, she chafes at "Nationalism" though she recognises its temporary use, and feels in every fibre of her the longing to embrace whole humanity in her hopes and endeavours. The opposition of some of the members of the Conference to the association of the wives of high officials struck her as an exhibition of "the inferiority complex" which has to be fought and overcome by every Indian. In fact, the problem of Swaraj is largely the psychological one of dealing with the White man as a human being and not as a super-man or as the devil incarnate. This is not a new discovery. The Cambridge Professor of History, Seeley, wrote fifty years ago that the day on which Indians felt it was shameful to assist the White man in maintaining his dominion, that day the imperialistic system would cease to exist.

The President of such a Conference has only to suggest broad principles and leave the details to be worked out by others in the subsequent proceedings. This is what Mrs. Sarojini Naidu did. How far the resolutions passed by the Conference on educational and social subjects conformed to, and are reconcilable with, the general ideas of her address, is a matter for careful consideration. The Conference is only a three-year infant, trying to distinguish its own personality from the world into which it has been so recently born. It is a common phenomenon noticeable in child life that its earliest efforts are directed to grasping at bright, coloured, shiny things, with sole regard to their sensory attraction. The Conference will take some time to find itself. At present, the onlooker cannot help perceiving a certain mixture of incongruous aims both in education and in social and national life. There are, besides the inevitable conflict between the ancient and the modern, the traditional and the rational, the convulsions of the Peace after the War in the Western world, the influence of which, like that of an invisible planet, causes aberrations in the normal evolution of Indian society. These have started cross-currents which create whirls and eddies, so that to the superficial observer, we seem to be plunging into the chaos of anarchy. But as the poet said of a similar period in the world's history a century ago

Well roars the storm to those who hear
A deeper voice across the storm,
Proclaiming social truth shall spread
And justice; ev'n tho' thrice again
The red fool fury of the Seine
Should pile her barricades with Dead.

are united in the "United Church" but the editorial comments of its official organ seem to show that the Roman Catholic Church is not and is not likely to be one of them. As for ourselves we have too often expressed our faith in education, for our readers to believe us to be advocates of any arbitrary system of censorship of books,

HINDU WOMEN'S RIGHTS OF INHERITANCE.

An important lecture on Hindu women's rights of inheritance delivered by Mr. M. R. Jayakar, the champion of women's rights, formed part of the programme of the women's Conference last week. Mr. Jayakar said that the laws with regard to women's inheritance of property varied from time to time before the Aryans had come into contact with the indigenous races of the country. Aryan women shared rights to a far more preeminent degree than they did now. That was evident from the Sanskrit saying which had come down from Vedic times to this day, although perhaps not many people understood its meaning. When a father gave away his daughter in marriage, he said to the bride-groom: "I am giving away my daughter to you today in marriage, promise me that you will allow her to acquire property." The bridegroom then made the solemn oath in reply "Amen", meaning that he would do so. That state of things had existed for several centuries. Then came a stage, when Aryans began to spread themselves over the country. During this period a kind of premium came to be put upon sons as they were considered to be a fighting asset for the family.

The law then changed and for the purpose of inheritance women were divided into two classes. Those who came into the family and those who went out. The woman who came by marriage enjoyed all privileges and comforts in the joint family as long as her husband was alive. The moment, however, he died without leaving a son, her rights became contracted into mere maintenance. That was why it had been aptly said that if a Hindu male were really true to his wife, he should ask for partition of the property. The saying might sound harsh, but it was true. The moment the husband died, her share in the joint family property was determined on the basis of her requirements. Generally, as Hindu widows were expected to lead austere lives, the assessment of requirements never exceeded bare maintenance.

The position differed if the husband died after separation of the family. The widow, if she had no son, could enjoy the property during her life time. But she had only a life interest in it. The preference for the male over the female remained. She had only to preserve the property in order that on her death the fourteenth removed descendant of the fourteenth removed ancestor should come in possession of it.

Although such a person's existence was not known, he cropped up some times immediately after the husband's death. This anomaly existed because of the theory in Hindu law that a widow could not offer pinda to her husband, but only a male could, however removed he might be, in relationship.

In the Bombay Presidency the Hindu Law of inheritance was more favourable to women than in other provinces. In Bombay women can be heirs to the family property. They are divided into two classes—those who come by marriage and those born in the family. The former, such as widows mothers and daughters-in-law have only a limited ownership of the property, whereas the latter can inherit property absolutely and on their death the property passes to their stridhan heirs.

Mr. Jayakar appealed to the audience to agitate for an amendment of the Hindu law of inheritance so as to include women heirs. He showed the way by indicating three points on which they should take their stand. (1) A widow in a joint family whose husband died without leaving a son should get the entire share of the husband and also the right to claim partition of that share, (2) If the widow's husband was living apart from the family and did not leave a son or a daughter, the widow should get the whole of the estate absolutely without the property reverting to distant kinsmen and (3) by whatever influence or from whatever source women acquired property, it should be regarded as their absolute property.

The lecture was followed with breathless interest by the audience, some of whom put intelligent questions to the lecturer at the conclusion. Mrs. Chattopadhyaya wanted to know if laws giving inheritance to women were passed whether they would have retrospective effect. Mrs. Hamid Ali wished to know why legislators and politicians did not think of passing common laws applicable for all women alike irrespective of caste or creed. Mr. Jayakar in reply said that he heartily approved of the ideal, but pointed out the unhappy position arising from the attitude of certain Mahomedans towards even an elementary measure of reform as the Child Marriage Restraint Act. Mrs. Patwardan asked why the Malabar women's rights of inheritance differed so fundamentally from those of other provinces, to which the lecturer pointed out that it was due to the prevalence of the matriarchal system.

CHRISTIAN MISSION AND FOREIGN DOMINATION.

The Editor, Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

From time to time I notice in the columns of your paper evidence of a great misconception which I regret very much to see. In your January 18th number, on page 324 you say, "This tendency of foreign domination is assisted in the modern world by Christian Missions who rely for making converts on persuading the people among whom they work that they (the missionaries) have come from a sinless land to save them from the predition to which they are otherwise doomed."

If you have gathered this impression from a former generation I would suggest that you try to get acquainted with the life, the teaching and the preaching of men and women who are to-day trying to present Christ to India. I am a missionary myself. Sometimes people ask me to tell them something about America. I invariably say to them that I have not come to tell them about America or about myself, or any of the supposed wonders of our western civilisation, but that I have come to try to share with them in a spirit of love and brotherhood, the good things of Christ and His Gospel. That He and He alone holds out the promise of new life, victorious life over sin, here and now. That He alone offers true heart freedom which so many want these days. That He alone will give the true recognition of sin which will make a man hate it and his old sinful life and cry out for cleansing and redemption.

We simply do not come to preach America to you of India. We come not at all with the thought that you are more involved in sin than are vast numbers in our own country but because men here are sinful and in the need of a saviour just as they are in every country of the world, and Christ came to save us all. We have something in life which we know works. We know that the living Christ if honestly received and obeyed will give new life right here and now. We know from experience that He is doing it for us and a host of others like us. It is this blessed assurance that we want to share with men who are heart hungry and seeking release from bondage. So we would be ashamed to come and disturb India's simple and worthy people in the villages or the cities with stories of far-away grandeurs which we know are but for a day if they exist at all, and are very apt to be revealed as hollow. Like Paul, we are resolved to "know none other among you save Christ and Him crucified." This is our message and we try to express it in love and humility and to live genuine Christ-like lives ourselves. Can you believe this? It is true whether you can bring yourself to accept the fact or not. I hope you may have the happy experience of seeing this for yourself and thus avoid that old type of expression which smacks of musty archives as the older theology smacks of things outworn.

ALL-INDIA WOMEN'S CONFERENCE. OPENING OF PRAHLAD MILLS CRECHE.

Requesting Mrs. Naidu to declare the creche open, Rani Pratapgir Narsingirji said that she regarded it as a great privilege that Mrs. Sarojini Naidu should have spared time from her many public activities to attend the opening of the creche, and she and her husband appreciated also the presence of so many ladies from all parts of India. The Rani felt that every step taken to popularise creches was a measure of public welfare and, as such deserved the appreciation and support of Indian women. It fostered character and brought the human touch into the problem of Indian labour and made the employer and the employee partners in the same venture. But for the labour trouble in Bombay, the function then being held at the Prahlad Mills might have taken place two years earlier, but she was glad that the female artisans were now able to enjoy an advantage which she considered to be one of the rights of women, and one which also made for harmonious progress of the cotton mill industry. There was only a small venture, but she looked upon it as the precursor of many other developments in industrial welfare, wherein Indian women will find their due place and opportunity for personal uplift. In asking Mrs. Naidu to perform the ceremony she paid a tribute to the zealous work of Mr. Osman Sobani and hoped that he would long be associated with a venture, which he had been able to establish as a personal success.

Mrs. Naidu expressed her joy at seeing the accomplishment of a long-cherished dream and also that this creche should have been opened in the presence of so many educationists from all parts of India. She felt that the All-India Women's Conference could not work only for the leisured classes, but in order to fulfil its true mission must increasingly associate itself with labouring womanhood.

Later in the evening the Bombay Presidency Women Graduates' Union and British University Women in India were "At Home" in the University gardens.

The programme of the All-India Women's Conference on Wednesday, 22nd instant, included two cinema lectures delivered in the evening by Dr. (Mrs.) Wilson and Madame Von Keller. Mrs. Wilson illustrated, with the aid of photographs taken by the Indian Research Fund Association, how overcrowding and want of sunshine brought about diseases.

Mrs. Wilson was of the opinion that those who framed schemes for the introduction of development of compulsory education ought to see that the schools were located in healthy surroundings and that the class-rooms were not over-crowded. In the course of her visits to schools in Northern India and particularly in the Punjab, she gathered the impression that public opinion had not strongly been expressed against over-crowding in schools. The lecturer said diseases like rickets developed mostly amongst women who lived in a close atmosphere and did not enjoy sun light.

Madame Von Keller of the Odenwald School in West Germany demonstrated to the audience how that school which was founded about 20 years ago trying to realise the motto "Become what thou art." That school stood for co-education and fellowship of boys and girls of different nationalities. She regretted that most educationists forced their ideas into the minds of young boys and girls without trying to bring out their latent faculties and develop them.

RESOLUTIONS

At the third session of the All-India Women's Conference on Thursday (23rd instant) morning the whole time was devoted to the consideration of social reform resolutions, and of the sixteen set down for decision, only eight were disposed of. The two dealing with child marriage and inheritance attracted a great many speakers, who spoke with a zeal and eloquence that indicated how deeply Indian womanhood felt on these two points. Lady Sykes, spent over an hour listening to the speeches in support of the various resolutions and appeared keenly interested in the proceedings.

Miss Mithan Tata placed before the House the resolution dealing with the laws of inheritance and was followed by speakers in Gujarati and Marathi. Miss Ferozuddin spoke feelingly on this question in English. Without the economic independence of woman, she said, her emancipation could only be a dream.

Speaking on that part of the resolution which deals with Muslim women's rights in accordance with the laws laid down in the Quran and the current customary law as practised in some parts of India, Miss Ferozuddin emphasised that Muslim women, in desiring a rectification of the present state of affairs, were not humble suppliants for favours, but were demanding what was their right. She mentioned that shortly before she left for Bombay 500 Muslim women had met, made this demand and forwarded a copy of it to His Excellency the Viceroy and there was now in existence in the Punjab a Muslim Women's Rights Association. The resolution was carried unanimously.

SARDA ACT.

The child marriage question was sponsored by Mrs. Nehru, who spoke very ably on the need for Indian States' co-operation with British India and the passing of an Act similar to the Sarda Act, for the present position enabled an evasion of the law by child marriages not being penalised in Indian States. Speakers in all languages and including some from Indian States with one accord supported Mrs. Nehru's proposition, which was passed without a dissentient note.

Mrs. Shafi Tyabji and Miss Ferozuddin condemned in strong terms the opposition raised by Muslims against this Act and said that it did not in any manner violate the "Shariat" of Muslims. The latter declared that a marriage among Muslims was only an agreement and it was commonsense to understand that the agreement could not be entered into unless both the boy and the girl had attained majority.

The question of equal rights of guardianship of mother and father presented by Miss Tata, that of the existing disabilities in respect of adoption as proposed by Miss Patel and that put forward by Mrs. Abbas Tyabji regarding woman's responsibility to society in the undertaking of some form of social work were all successfully carried.

The resolution moved from the chair (Mrs. Sarojini Naidu) had an amendment put forward for its final clause, which after being formally proposed by Miss Gedge, was added to the original resolution and passed. The proposition with its addendum read thus: This Conference supports all efforts that are being made in the country (a) to remove untouchability and supports Mr. Jayakar's "Bill to remove disabilities affecting the untouchable classes of Hindus" pending in the Assembly, (b) the evils of intemperance and (c) all efforts to suppress immoral traffic in women and children and in particular it supports the Madras Brothels Bill and the Prevention of Devadasi Dedication Bill, and is of opinion that women should be equally penalised with men in the keeping of brothels.

"Revolt against the Purdah," this was the advice which Mrs. Shaffi Tyabji offered to her Muslim sisters in moving a resolution condemning the enforced seclusion of women and entreating Hindus and Muslims to educate public opinion towards abolishing it. The mover said that the Quran did not enjoin them to veil their faces and characterised the custom as harmful and one which undermined their health. Several Muslim as well as Hindu women spoke in favour of the resolution which was unanimously passed.

VISIT TO RESCUE HOME.

The first visit of the delegates on Thursday afternoon was to the Rescue Home for Indian Women run by the Bombay Presidency Women's Council. Here the delegates and visitors arrived in large numbers and were conducted round the Home, in which they evinced a great interest. There are at present twenty women inmates, who cook and fend for themselves, rear poultry, grow their own vegetables and are cultivating a flower garden. In addition to this sewing is also taught, and with plenty of work and exercise they are quite happy. The next visit was paid to the Wadia Maternity Hospital, where the latest equipment for the alleviation of the sick has been installed. This hospital, a result of the generosity of the Wadia brothers, has been built solely for women of the labouring classes. From there the delegates went to a Municipal vocational training school, where handicrafts are being taught to Bombay's young generation. Then on to the New High School for Girls where there was an entertainment consisting of a one-act playlet and some dances given by the pupils.

An Educational and Industrial Exhibition was held in the South wing of the University Building during the first three sessions of the Conference showing some really good work done by various local institutions. There were also displayed several interesting educational text books.

CONCERT.

One of the most pleasant functions organised in connection with the fourth session of the Indian Women's Conference was the concert of Indian music and "Garba," which came off on Thursday evening in Sir Cowasji Hall. The concert and the "Garba" were well appreciated by the representative gathering present and Prof. B. B. Deodhar of the Indian School of Music who was responsible for the excellent treat provided, received well merited praise.

The programme opened with a prayer recited by a bevy of young girls of the School of Indian Music. This was followed by the Indian Orchestra, which is of special importance since this form of music is a new departure in the realm of Indian music. Miss Shanta Amaladi's rendering of a 'Hori' was well received.

But the most spectacular item on the card was the "Garba Dance" conducted by the new Garba Mandal under the direction Mrs. Maniben Manji. The dancers in picturesque Indian village dress with pitchers on the heads looked extremely pretty on the stage, while the rhythmical representation accompanied by appropriate musical rendering was in keeping with the spirit of the village folk songs.

MR. K. H. VAKIL'S LECTURE.

The last item in the programme of the Women's Conference on Thursday was a lecture delivered by Mr. K. H. Vakil on "Some aspects of Indian Art," which was profusely illustrated with magic lantern slides. The speaker dwelt at length on the importance of environment in art and its intimate relation to life. The famous painting at Ajanta, the Mughal paintings, the Pahari and Rajasthani paintings, he said, were achieved by those who were in direct contact with the then environment. They were not the outcome of extraneous and imposed conventions. The study of Indian sculpture was more or less an enumeration of symbolic devices and iconographic details, and nowhere else was the vivid relation between art and life better depicted than in the examples of sculpture showing various dance poses which interpret the beauty of the Indian sari, the gentle life of village and temple and the worship of woman at dawn beside the sea. These the lecturer concluded, unfolded life as a picture of beauty, free, happy and tranquil with the luminous colourful audacity of the open air and the regenerative force of the unchanging elements.

CONCLUDING SESSION.

MRS. NAIDU'S MESSAGES.

"Be Marys not Marthas" was Mrs. Naidu's advice to those delegates who had met at the fourth All India women's Conference from all parts of this country. She implored them not to be so censorious. Human nature is liable to make mistakes and it was this triumph, this spirit that transmutes these mistakes into a living thing. Women delegates could transcend all the difficulties in their own provinces and it was this triumph, this spirit of dedication that was the lesson to be derived from this Conference. During the present sessions, said Mrs. Naidu, they had in their deliberations come down to the very bedrock of life in their consideration of the agriculturists and labourers. They were the custodians of the poor and they met in conference, not arrogant with their learning but as humble women who served their sisters. Theirs was the kinship of womanhood, a kinship with suffering woman, a fellowship of women with the common destiny of womanhood. Mrs. Naidu also made an appeal for donations towards the working expenses of the Conference.

In giving an outline of work planned for 1930 Mrs. Huidekoper, Educational Secretary, referred to the resolution passed at Patna regarding an investigation of the conditions in the education of the children under 8, which had never made any definite progress, and yet she had heard on all sides what urgent need there was for reform in this connection; she thereupon appealed to the delegates while endeavouring to surmount their own local difficulties with regard to various phases of education to bear in mind the work required by the Educational Secretary and also make investigations along those lines as well.

Mrs. Nehru, Social Secretary, made the same appeal for co-operation in those social reforms with which the Conference had associated itself. Both appeals were acclaimed by the House.

During the first session in the afternoon votes were taken for the officers for 1930 and the following ladies were elected:—Mrs. P. K. Sen (Chairman, Standing Committee), Mrs. Huidekoper (Educational Secretary) Mrs. Rameshwari Nehru (Social Secretary), while the vice-Presidents for the year were:—Mrs. Cousins, Lady Tata, Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddy, M.L.C., Mrs. Hansa Mehta, Mrs. Abbas Tyebji (Indian States) and Lady Abdul Kadir.

SOCIAL RESOLUTIONS.

In the course of the second and final session of the Conference, on Friday afternoon, the remaining social resolutions were dealt with there being, however, very little discussion on them. Five out of the eight resolutions were proposed by the Chair (Mrs. Sarojini Naidu)—dealing with unequal marriages, with the need for at least one woman magistrate to be present at each sitting of Juvenile Courts and the establishment of these courts in all provinces, a resolution that marriage should not be compulsory for girls, giving the support of the Conference to the further amending of the Special Marriage Act of 1872 and desiring the inclusion of women representatives well acquainted with Indian conditions in conferences and commissions appointed to deal with questions of the national welfare of India. The resolution on polygamy was proposed by Mrs. Asaf Ali, supported by two other Indian ladies and was carried unanimously. Of the two resolutions dealing with labour questions the first desired the appointment of an adequate number of Factory Inspectresses to look after the welfare and requirements of women and children employees in all industrial areas. This was ably put forward by Miss B. A. Engineer and supported by Miss Iris Wingate, both of Bombay. The second sponsored by Mrs. Kamaladevi Chattopadhyaya desired the Standing Committee to inquire into the condition of women and children, employed in organised labour areas and also to inquire into the agricultural and indigenous industries of their area and to foster such industries. Both resolutions were passed.

THANKS TO LADY TATA.

Mrs. Cousins, on behalf of the delegates, thanked Bombay in general and Lady Tata and her Working Committee in particular for the programme planned for them, for the hospitality extended to them and for the warm welcome they had received. Lady Tata in reply said that Bombay was both proud and happy to have women from all parts of India as her guests. She and her Committee realised their shortcomings and had endeavoured to do their best, but they had been beset by difficulties when substitute delegates appeared who were of different castes and creeds from those for whom arrangements had been made.

In the evening Lady Tata was "At Home." There Monsieur Mirovitch's skilful music transported his listeners to realms of beauty unexplored. His recital included compositions of Chopin, Liszt and himself. The entertainment also contained two items of Indian music delightfully rendered by Professor Deodhar's School of Music.

In thanking the performers Lady Tata paid a tribute to the great musician who had wished to show his appreciation of the Conference by playing to its delegates. The thanks to Lady Tata was conveyed by Mrs. Naidu who referred to her as "the gracious lady who welcomed us and now bids us a warm farewell." Turning to M. Mirovitch she thanked him as an Indian woman on behalf of the women of India for the beauty he had unfolded to them that evening.

MR. JAYAKAR'S DEVADASI BILL.

The following is the text of the Bill (with statement of objects and reasons) relating to Devadasis, which Mr. M. R. Jayakar will introduce during the current session of the Indian Legislative Assembly.

The Bill seeks to prevent the dedication of women to service in Hindu temples in British India. The following is the preamble:—

Preamble.—Whereas the practice of dedicating women as Devadasis for services in Hindu temples exists in many Provinces in British India, and whereas such practice, however ancient and pure its origin, invariably serves at present as an initiation to a life of prostitution and results in such women adopting the profession of prostitution and,

Whereas steps have been taken in some Provinces to discontinue such practice and it is now desirable and expedient to terminate it wherever it exists in British India and,

Whereas the enfranchisement of lands held by such women on condition of service in temples will be an effective step in terminating such practice, it is hereby enacted as follows:—

SCOPE AND TERMS.

1. (A) This Act may be called the Prevention of Dedication of Devadasis Act, 193 .

(B) It extends to the whole of British India.

(C) It shall come into force on the 1st day of .....193 .

2. In this Act, unless there is something repugnant in the subject or context,

(A) The expression "Devadasi" shall mean any Hindu unmarried woman, who is dedicated to service in a temple;

(B) The expression "Temple" shall mean any place of worship public or private.

3. The performance, within the precincts of a Hindu temple or outside, of any ceremony under whatever name or description, with reference to a Hindu woman, with or without her consent, intended or having the effect to dedicate her for service as a Devadasi in a Hindu temple, is hereby declared illegal and of no effect.

4. Subject to the provision of the laws by which she may be otherwise governed, a Devadasi may contract a marriage, and the same shall be regarded as valid, notwithstanding any law or custom declaring such marriage to be invalid by reason of her subjection to the ceremony mentioned in Section 3.

5. Whoever performs, or permits, takes part in, or abets the performance of any ceremony mentioned in Section 3, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine or with both.

6. Nothing in this Act shall be construed to prevent any person from being liable, under Section 372 of the Indian Penal Code, or under any other law, to any other or higher punishment than is provided by this Act.

ENFRANCHISEMENT OF LANDS.

7. (A) Where the remuneration for any service to be rendered by a Devadasi in a temple consists, in whole or in part, of lands or assignments of the revenue of lands, granted or continued by the British Government, the Local Government, in whose territory such lands may be situate, shall enfranchise the said lands, for the condition of such service, and substitute an adequate quit rent therefor, under such rules as it may prescribe in this behalf, and such enfranchisement shall take effect from the date to be fixed as hereinafter provided;

(B) Where the remuneration for such service consists, in whole or in part, of lands or the produce of lands, not falling under Sub-section (A) the Local Government concerned shall direct the Collector of the District in which such lands are situate, to determine the amount of rent payable in respect of such lands. The Collector shall, thereupon, after notice to the parties concerned, hold an enquiry and determine the amount of such rent.

(C) The Local Government shall prescribe rules, not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, providing for the holding of such enquiry, the determination of the said rent, the payment of the costs of the proceedings and all other matters relating thereto. The said rules shall be published in the Local Government Gazette and within six months of such publication shall be submitted for the approval of the Legislative Council of the Province and will become operative on receiving such approval, with or without amendments.

(D) The order fixing the quit rent under Sub-section (A) or the rent under Sub-section (B) shall be communicated to the parties concerned and published in the Local Government Gazette, and subject to any appeal which the rules to be prescribed by the Local Government under Sub-section (C) may allow, the said order shall be final and shall not be liable to be contested in any court of law.

(E) The order fixing the quit rent or rent as aforesaid shall specify a date from which the order shall take effect, and the said lands shall be deemed to have been enfranchised from the condition of such service as and from the said date.

NEW RIGHTS FOR DEVADASIS

(F) From and after the said date,

A. The quit rent imposed under sub-section (A) shall be payable to the temple concerned, and subject to such payment, the Devadasi concerned shall hold the land as her own.

B. The assignment of revenue in respect of lands enfranchised under sub-section (A) or the rent fixed under sub-section (B) as the case may be, shall be payable to the Devadasi concerned during her life and after her death to the temple concerned.

(G) From and after the said date, no obligation to render such existence to the said temple shall be enforceable against the Devadasi concerned.

(H) No order passed under Sub-section (A) or (B) shall operate as a bar to the trial of any suitor or issue relating to the right to enjoy the land on which the quit rent or rent has been fixed as aforesaid.

STATEMENT OF OBJECTS AND REASONS.

LEGISLATION IN SOME PROVINCES

In many Provinces in India exists practice of dedicating girls to Hindu temples for purposes of service to the idol. This is done in various ways, and under different names. The common notion, however, which influences the practice, is that the girl should become a "Servant of God" (Devadasi) at a young age, remain unmarried for life, and devote herself to the service of the idol. Doubts have been expressed by experts whether this practice has any sanction of Vedic Hinduism. Many ascribe it to an aboriginal origin. But, whatever its source or original purity, there is no doubt that, in recent times, the practice has degenerated mainly into a method of initiating young women to a life of immorality and prostitution, which, in many cases, becomes compulsory by reason of the cruel custom that a girl so dedicated cannot contract a valid marriage.

NEED OF A COMPREHENSIVE MEASURE.

It is therefore highly desirable and expedient to terminate this practice and permit the girl to contract a valid marriage. Attempts have been made in the past to put an end to this practice, but they have been more or less indirect, and have not produced the desired result. Experience shows that the provisions of Sections 372 and 373 of the Indian Penal Code have been evaded. Consequently, a few Provinces in British India like e.g. Madras and United Provinces of Agra, and Oudh have been compelled to adopt legislative measures directly dealing with this evil. Likewise, the Mysore Government, after consulting expert opinion from the point of view of Hindu Shastras, thought it necessary to pass orders, as early as 1909, directing the exclusion of Devadasis from services in temples in the State and also laying down the manner in which the cash emoluments or Inam lands attached to the said service should be treated. Similar provisions for the enfranchisement of such lands and emoluments have been adopted at Madras, and the time has now arrived for the passing of a comprehensive measure dealing with this evil wherever it exists in British India.

OBSERVATIONS OF MYSORE GOVERNMENT.

The Mysore Government observed in their order referred to above, that whatever might be the euphemism by which the true nature of the (dedication) ceremony was concealed, it had an intimate connection with the profession of a prostitute or dancing girl. They were, therefore, not prepared to allow the performance of such a ceremony in the State temples and were satisfied from the depositions and the opinions of the authorities concerned that no hardship would be caused by the prohibition of such ceremonies in temples. This is indeed very high and valuable testimony, proceeding as it does from a Government over which an enlightened Hindu ruler presides, and which had singular opportunities of consulting Shastric authorities and the Hindu sentiment relating thereto.

Since the passing of the foregoing order by the Mysore Government, public opinion has more strongly insisted on the suppression of this evil, and several appeals have been addressed to the British Government and to the moral sense of the Hindu community by men's and women's associations, including a few in which enlightened members of the Devadasi community have wholeheartedly joined.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Lord Parmoor writes in the Aryan Path, Bombay :—

The League's tenth birthday is, in itself, a testimony to the admirable work which it has carried out at Geneva, hopeful guarantee for future stability and progress. At the same time, there is a danger of weak optimism. The desire that nations should covenant with one another in order to agree on a method for settling international disputes by friendly means finds a place both in the history of Greece and Rome, and as a sequel to the terrible mediæval and religious war which desolated Europe. Can the League of Nations depend not only on the spirit on which it is administered at Geneva, but on the strength of a world opinion in favour of a peace basis in international relationships? This is the only ultimate guarantee, raising the League above political changes and the risks attendant on the recrudescence of armament competition. This competition will not be effectively discouraged so long as the power of secret diplomacy is maintained.

The main question is whether the peoples of the world can exercise a permanent influence in the domain of foreign politics. They certainly desire peace, but there is a difficulty in giving expression to this desire. The prejudice in favour of war, as the ultimate sanction in international affairs, remains a strong factor. At first thought, it would appear that, immediately on the morrow of the Great War, so destructive to human civilization and resulting in an industrial dislocation, widespread in its ruin, some really drastic steps might have been taken in the all-round reduction of armaments. The years, however, are slipping by, and a new generation is growing up to whom the terrible memory of the Great War is less vivid. Effective disarmament is still delayed. This is so, in spite of the evidence that the most potent cause of the war outbreak was the competitive increase in armaments during the preceding decades. There is, too, the certainty that, as invention advances in the development of methods of human destruction, future warfare will bring about the silence of death. Macaulay's picture of the New Zealander gazing over the ruins of London may be realized unless the government of this country, before it is too late, gives its whole-hearted support to League principle.

There are evident signs that the prestige of the League is not being safeguarded with sufficient vigilance. Peace-lovers recognized the value of the Locarno Treaty and of the Kellogg Pact, but if Geneva is to become the true centre of international understanding, these and other movements should have found a place for discussion and settlement at Geneva. International opinion at Geneva has expressed the opinion that no general scheme of disarmament can be finally carried out unless an alternative way to war is accepted for the settling of international disputes when conciliation fails. The only suggested alternative is the acceptance of third party decision in all cases, whatever their nature or quality. This principle stands out prominently in the preamble of the Covenant of the League, one of the most solemn treaties in history. It is recognized throughout all the subsequent articles, however, contained a gap by which constituent nations might still resort to war after certain preliminary precautions had been taken. It was unanimously desired by representative international opinion, as expressed in the Assembly at Geneva in 1924, to amend the Covenant and to fill up this gap. It then became possible to define an aggressor clearly, and to denounce an aggressive war as an international crime. Proposals, having this object, were forwarded from Geneva for approval to the various constituent countries, not necessarily as an ultimate solution, but as a basis for a world conference on disarmament. They were at that time jettisoned by this country without reservation. Great Britain still stood out for the reservation of a right to use force in large ranges of international disputes.

At Christmas time, Christians, turn once more to the lesson of peace and goodwill; but, unless these lessons take a permanent place in modern evolution, the future is not assured. It is not that the people, who stand for moral evolution, are not urging a new international justice, but that the old methods of international intercourse are entrenched under the traditions of secret diplomatic methods, handed down through the archives of history.

Earl Loreborn wrote in 1919: "But reconciliation must come before the League can really succeed, and the prospect of this seems to be daily becoming more remote." This forecast has been proved to be too pessimistic. The League has become an established institution; each year has enlarged the area of its international influence. Those who desired a League of Nations before the Great War, and steadily supported the principle during the War, feel that their faith has been justified, and that Geneva will continue to grow as the centre of a new international peace spirit. It is essential that it should hold its place as a meeting for public discussion between all the constituent countries of the League, great and small, and not be allowed to become merely a convenient meeting place to recreate the old diplomatic methods with the risk of bringing back the heresy that a balance of power, calculated on the strength of rival war equipments, can ever give security to an advancing civilization or ensure an era of progressive industrial stability, Jaananjan Neogi, "Peace Cottage", 84, Upper Circular Road, Calcutta. (1) Keshub Chander Sen. (2) Max Muller on Ram Krishna and Keshub. (3) Keshub Chander Sen—a study.

Shri Ramakrishna Ashram:—The sixty-eighth Birthday Anniversary of Swami Vivekananda was celebrated at the Ramakrishna Ashram, Khar, on Sunday the 26th January 1930. Public Meetings in this connection were held at the Peoples' Jinnah Hall on Wednesday the 22nd and at Mulji Jetha Market Hall on Thursday the 23rd.

M. E. Mission Annual Convention:—The Annual Convention of the United Provinces Division of the W. O. T. U. was held recently in Lucknow, under the presidency of Mrs. G. H. Thomas. Delegates were present from a half dozen local unions, including Agra, Muttra, Gonda, Landour and Cawnpore. The usual reports were read and discussions followed. Always at noontide business was suspended for ten or fifteen minutes while, true to the custom followed by members of the White Ribbon Army, the convention was in prayer for this organization that encircles the globe and works for purity in home, state and nation. Congratulations were sent to the legislative representatives who helped to pass the Sarda Bill. Mr. Gulam Hassan was introduced to the convention and explained the Local Option Bill. After the discussion which followed, resolutions were passed framing the opinion of the body, on this measure. The delegates from Agra extended an invitation for the next convention to be held in their city, and the annual election of officers resulted in Mrs. G. H. Thomas being re-elected to the Presidency, and Mrs. J. R. Ohitamber being made corresponding secretary. Mrs. T. O. Badley about to leave for America, was presented with a life membership certificate and Mrs. Ohitamber was honoured also by being made a life member of the W. O. T. U.

Benn to Tour India:—The political correspondent of "Liberty" writes under date London, January 4:—I gather that Mr. Benn has made up his mind to make his deferred tour in India on the publication of the Simon report. It is presumed that nothing in the meantime will happen that will prevent his seeing the elder statesmen of the Congress to whom Mr. Benn will personally explain the attitude of the Labour Government.

The Harmonium:—At the second session of the Allahabad District Conference of Music, which was held in connection with the visit of Pandit Vishnu Digambar, a well known musician and founder of the Gandharva Mahavidyalaya, great emphasis was laid by Munshi Iswar Saran, M.L.A., President, for the revival of Indian music and dancing. Mr. Iswar Saran hoped that the harmonium and "abominations of that character would be kept out of Indian music" which should be considered on its own lines.

Late Mr. C. V. Swaminatha Iyer.—Death occurred, writes the Hindu, of Mr. C. V. Swaminatha Iyer, the last of the pioneers of Indian journalism. Mr. Swaminatha Iyer was closely associated with the late Mr. Subrahmanya Iyer in journalism during the early eighties. He founded in 1898 the Viveka Chintamani, the popular and premier Tamil monthly, which he conducted uninterruptedly till 1922, when it ceased publication with his retirement from active life. He also founded in the nineties the Societies for diffusion of Knowledge for the purpose of carrying on propaganda for education of women, village sanitation, universal and primary education, etc., and succeeded in enlisting the co-operation of a distinguished body of public men, both Indian and English in his labours. Under the auspices of the Society, considerable pioneer literature was published and rendered much valuable work. It was at the suggestion of the late Mr. Swaminatha Iyer that advantage was taken of the presence of the King Emperor in Madras in 1906 (then Prince of Wales) and the name of George Town was conferred upon what was known as the Black Town in the city of Madras. He leaves behind two sons and two daughters, the eldest of whom is Mr. Sadanand of the Free Press of India.

Dr. Tagore on Education:—Dr. Rabindranath Tagore, who was in Cawnpore to collect funds for his international institution, the Viswabharati, was entertained at an "at home" by Mr. J. P. Srivastava, and prominent business and literary men were invited to meet the distinguished visitor. Dr. Tagore in his talk spoke of his early environments and education and told how the present institution was built up. He said that education must be like a nest and not like a cage.

Describing how help was received from the French, German and Italian Governments, he pleaded that India should not be ignored in the Indian universities and opportunities should be offered whereby various Indian cultures could be brought together. The European countries were aware of the experiment in education that he was carrying on and some countries had already started similar institutions in imitation of his own. He described how Indians were ignored in the study of Indian philosophy, because they had more confidence in their own scholars. He wanted his countrymen to share his big burden and try to make it successful.

Theosophical Convention at Adyar:—The 54th annual convention of the Theosophical Society was held at Adyar in December 1929. Dr. Besant, welcoming the delegates, made a reference at the outset to the dissolution of the Order of Star by Mr. Krishnamurty. Addressing the Theosophical Convention on the 24th Dec. Dr. Besant reviewed the Society's activities in the past half a century and pointed out the main lines of its future activities. She emphatically repudiated the suggestion that the Society had finished its mission. She exhorted the members to show greater keenness for the solution of the problem of untouchability, which, she declared, is the greatest obstacle in India's pathway.

Anti-Indian Propaganda In England:—
 We refer in our leading article to the anti-Indian propaganda which some retired English officials carry on in England. This has lately become accentuated owing to the Viceroy's statement about the proposed Round Table Conference, and some English newspapers have been publishing articles from English and Anglo-Indian statesmen and ex-Governors protesting against further extension of political power to Indians. Some of these compositions have been characterised by extreme bitterness, verging almost on a fanatic hatred and contempt for Indians, particularly the Hindus. It is noteworthy how the brunt of criticism on such occasions is always directed to the Hindus and Hinduism, and one would think that if India were inhabited wholly by Mussalmans, Parsis and Christians, British rule would not have been confronted by popular discontent. Unfortunately, however, the vast majority of Indians happen to be Hindus, and a thousand years of Moslem and two hundred years of Christian missionary propaganda, seem only to have led to the energetic Hindu renaissance now in progress. The anti-Indian propaganda so long confined to the Press, is showing a tendency to extend to a wider field. Last week Reuter cabled the news that a bomb had been found in the British Museum and that it was alleged to be done by Indian students. A telephone message was received by the Museum people from one Khan who professed to have over-heard some Indian students talking of causing an explosion in the British Museum. Some British newspapers made use of this as a text for most offensive diatribes against Indian students in England, who, one of them stated, were being subjected to extra surveillance nowadays. It has since been found that the bomb was a "noise and smoke" thing and that the man who placed it when it was found was not an Indian but one Frank Biggs who "discovered" it there and called attention to it. Biggs himself confessed to having done so. The only motive he could have had was to create a scare against Indians, and, incidentally it may be, to make a little money out of it. We must say to the credit of the British Police that they have not, as they might have easily done and as it would be done in some other parts of the British Empire, hushed up the matter. They have frankly stated the result of their investigation and Indians have reason to be grateful to them for it. The point we wish to emphasize here is that attempts like that of Frank Biggs is the natural consequence of the anti-Indian propaganda in the English press and unless this is stopped, we may expect such incidents to increase

Anti-Prohibition Lies:—The number of Prohibition, the official organ of the Prohibition League of India, edited by Mr. C. Rajagopalachari, is excellently got-up, and has pithy articles and excerpts dealing with some of the familiar objections to the adoption of Prohibition in this country. It gives some specimens of the falsehoods and misrepresentations of the anti-Prohibition propagandists. Here is one. The Licensing World of July 6th published a sensational statement alleged to have been made by the Archbishop of York as follows:—"I confess that I very often do not agree with some of the remarks made on 'temperance' platforms, and I cannot endorse the statement that if a man touches alcoholic liquor at all he is sure to get worse and worse. I have drunk alcoholic liquor for a good many years of my life, and I have never at any time felt that I could not check or control it." The Archbishop's attention was drawn to this and on July 20, the Licensing World had to publish the following letter under his signature:—"Sir, my attention has been called to a paragraph in your issue of July 6th, which attributes to me the statement that "I have drunk alcoholic liquors for a good many years of my life." As I am, in fact, a life-long teetotaler, I should be glad if you will insert this correction. It is clear that the remarks of somebody else have been inadvertently attributed to me." Another instance is given in the same number of Prohibition. Recently the Association Opposed to Prohibition, the American organization working on behalf of liquor interests, put out a very alarming pamphlet giving "statistics" of the alleged cost of Prohibition in America, for the fiscal year 1928. The "Association" computed the cost to the taxpayers for the year at $ 936, 246,945. These extraordinary "statistics" had a wide publication. Dr. J. M. Doran, Commissioner for Prohibition, in reply, gives out the official record of the actual cost of Prohibition for the nine years period prior to 1928, from which it is clear that, instead of there being any cost to the taxpayers, up to and including the fiscal year 1928, the receipts from the enforcement have netted the tax payers 247,324,307 dollars. As long as rich people are inclined to organise law-breaking, comments our contemporary, enforcement can be made to pay. When they give it up, enforcement will be a simple affair.

Children's Aid Society:—The third annual report of the Children's Aid Society, records the great progress the institution has made during the three years of its existence. It has been the means of saving a number of, to be more accurate, 1, 645, children from lapsing into a life of crime and vice by one single offence committed through indiscretion or ignorance. The principle underlying the working of the Society is that the juvenile criminal during his commitment with proper education and training will be able to realise the error of his ways as he grows up, turn over a new leaf and become an honest citizen, whereas the avenue of reforming himself would be closed if he were to associate with grown up and hardened criminals. The number of new admissions, during the year was 678 and the report states that recently in one twenty-four hour period as many as 30 new children were admitted. The second great achievement of the Society is the completion of the plans for the establishment of the new Junior Reformatory Schools for boys less than twelve years of age in a spare compound on the Umerkhadhi site. Thus the Society, besides conducting a Remand Home, is solving the institutional problem by its recent venture. It is interesting to learn that 60 per cent. of children admitted did not belong to Bombay but were upcountry cases. For the first time destitute children have been the largest element in the Remand Home. The increase in the number of children is ascribed to greater police activity rather than to the bad character of the neighbourhood. The Society owes a good deal of its success to Miss M. K. Davis its indefatigable secretary. Miss Davis' appeal to the public for more funds to extend the activities of the Society should meet with adequate and prompt response.

Sea Voyages and the Orthodox:—We learn from the Brahmana, the "Guardian of Sanatana Dharma" a weekly paper started in South India about a year ago, that there is much controversy going on among the orthodox as to the propriety of going to England on deputation to protest against the Sarda Act. "Though the opinion of authoritative Heads has not yet come forth to the public, our association with some of them leads us to infer the reverse of the announcements of the Madras leaders" says the Brahmana. "The reply wired by His Holiness Paramahansa Parivrajacharya Srimad Anandarama Swamigal of Sri Chitrapura Matam of Shirali, Honaver P. O., North Canara District, to the prayer of his disciple Mr. M. M. Ananta Rao, the Secretary of the Madras Brahmana Sabha, to permit him to go to England on a deputation to His Majesty the Emperor in respect of the Child Marriage Act, has been forwarded to us for publication. It is as follows:—'Work specified in Binha Patra may be done through others without your going. If gone, as apaddharma, whether you be Samvyavaharya by Prayaaschitta, cannot be done'. This reply is appropriate to the seat His Holiness justly occupies." The predecessor of this Swami excommunicated Sir Narayan Chandavarkar for going to England and forbade his followers from crossing the sea. The order has been practically a dead letter. "Though it cannot be decidedly stated what other Heads would say, it is certain, in all probabilities, that they too would advocate the same view, regardless of the specious plea of some, who entertain a longing to visit England." If it is wrong for the misguidedly enthusiastic disciple to go to England surely it cannot be right for any one else to do so.

The Anti-Untouchability Campaign:—It is gratifying to learn that the work of the Anti-Untouchability Committee has so far met with gratifying response. All the eight temples owned by the Telugu Munurvar community residing in Bombay were declared open to all the members of the Hindu community irrespective of their caste or creed by a resolution passed at their meeting held on the 2nd instant at Kamathipura under the chairmanship of Sriyut Sayaji Laxman Silam, B. A. LL. B., Advocate, member of the Bombay Municipal Corporation. The resolution was passed almost unanimously only one member dissenting. The temples thrown open are:—1. Panch Mukhi Maruti (Vitho Rukhmai) Temple, Kamathipura, 5th Lane, Bombay. 2. Shri Khandobas Temple, Kamathipura, 5th Lane, Bombay. 3. Shri Pochamma Temple, Kamathipura, 11th Lane, Bombay. 4. Sudalamma Temple, Kamathipura, 9th Lane, Bombay. 5. Shri Laxmi Narayan Temple, Kamathipura, 7th Lane, Bombay. 6. Shri Ram Maruti Temple, Kamathipura, Bazar Road, Bombay. 7. Shri Durga Devi Temple, Kamathipura, Durgadevi Road, Bombay. 8. Shri Mari Amma (Goddess), Kamathipura, Bazar Road. The question of admitting the members of the so called untouchables or the depressed classes was discussed in four successive meetings of the community held during recent months and although the advanced section among the community under the leadership of Sjts. Silam, Pupala, Gangala and others could have carried the resolution by majority any time, the latter wisely decided to wait and without pressing the issue to voting strove to bring about unanimity by reasoning and persuasion with the orthodox section with the happy result that ultimately on Sunday last after a full dress debate the resolution was carried amidst enthusiasm with a single vote against it. The resolution was moved by Sjt. S. K. Pupala, another prominent member of the community and a member of the Municipal Corporation. It resolved that from that day onward all the temples owned by the community were to be thrown open for worship to all Hindus irrespective of any caste or creed, and called upon the leaders of the untouchables to strive to rid their people of the evil habits of eating beef etc. which were held to be essentially irreligious, and observe more clearly the standard and mode of living. It also called upon them to pay special attention to the spread of untouchability.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1930.

NATIONAL BELIEFS AND NATIONAL PROSPERITY.

Miss Katherine Mayo propounded in her book "Mother India" the thesis that the Hindu Social system was the great obstacle to Indian Self-Government. Other writers, chiefly retired Anglo-Indian Governors and Lieutenant-Governors, before her, had pitched upon some particular custom or practice such as caste, child-marriage, or temple women, as differentiating the people of India from the Western nations enjoying self-Government, thus suggesting that self-government cannot be expected to be worked with equal success in this country. British statesmen whose little knowledge of India was derived through these sources, generalised such criticisms into universal propositions. The late Lord Salisbury said that the Irish like the Hottentots and the Hindus were incapable of self-government. The late Lord Morley dismissed the demand for Dominion self-government with the airy remark that fur-coats which were necessary in Canada were unsuitable to India. With regard to this remark, we recently read somewhere that when the late Lord Sinha and another Indian expressed surprise at the remark, Lord Morley characteristically observed, "But climates may change." These facile generalisations do not resolve any difficulties, but they have a tremendous influence in shaping public opinion which is mostly compacted of catch phrases. The special distinction of Miss Mayo's book was that it focussed all these fleeting ideas in a single book, annotated them by references to persons, books and reports, and offered it to the world as a final justification for the continuation of the British bureaucratic system as the sole means of saving it from being infected by the insanitation and epidemics of India. The nations of the world were warned that if anything happens to relax the British grip on India, they would all have cholera, small-pox and other diseases endemic in India, devastating their homes and ruining their prosperity. It was an appeal to their instinct of self-preservation to oppose the demands of Indians for self-Government.

The book, as we all know, had a tremendous vogue for a time, but as is the fate of all sensational publications, it has given place to fresh sensations. Relating to Russia, China and other countries. The bomb was a European and American in the man who with national interests. But the not an Indian officials who use their pensioned covered" it gland to obstruct Indian reforms Biggs himself keep up and improve upon Miss only motive h rise. Two of these, Lord Meston scare against be, to make, Blackett, both of whom occupied at one time the office of Financial Member of the Government of India, have been lately entertaining their fellow retired Anglo-Indians with disquisitions on the effects of the Hindu philosophy of religion on the economic condition of the people. The sum and substance of their essays is;—"Indians say that the poverty of India is due to the British Indian system of administration. It is quite absurd. It is due to the Hindu philosophy of religion, particularly, the doctrine of Karma whose effect is a fatalistic resignation to poverty, and disease and absence of all desire to improve their own moral and material condition. We who have at one time or another helped in the administration of that country have done our best. We have nothing to reproach ourselves with. We have made great sacrifices, have set an example to the world in the disinterested performance of duty for duty's sake, and can look back on our achievements with a clear gaze and a clean conscience. It is all due to the Hindu's religion and philosophy that the results of our magnificent labours have been so inappreciable, that illiteracy is rampant, that the peasantry is steeped in debt, and that education is so largely a door to unemployment, that the few modern industries in the country are in the grip of a chronic depression, that the exchange value of the rupee is a source of constant anxiety to the Finance Member and so on and so on." The thirst for such soothing syrup which seems to be growing, is itself a sure sign that something lies heavy upon the conscience of those who require from time to time to have it administered to them.

The effect of a nation's religion or philosophy on its economic and political condition is an interesting study. Morley in his "Compromise" says that no nation has been great in politics and metaphysics at the same time. Mr. Edwin Bevan in his latest book has stressed the importance of the political subjection of Palestine to Rome as a factor in producing Christianity. Are such generalisations true except to a limited extent? Even if they are, does it follow that they are incapable of being disproved in any present or future state? These are large questions which may be discussed in many volumes. Limiting ourselves to the effect of the doctrine of Karma, is it peculiar to Hindu religion? Does it necessarily lead to a fatalistic acceptance of existing conditions? It seems to us that all religions have for their central principle the conservation of moral and spiritual values. The doctrine of Karma is nothing but that which Jesus Christ taught when he said "as you sow, so shall you reap." The Prophet of Islam was no less emphatic on the relation between present conduct and the future state here and hereafter. We do not know of any religion or philosophy which teaches 1928, the receipts from the enforcement have netted the tax payers 247,324,307 dollars. As long as rich people are inclined to organise law-breaking, comments our contemporary, enforcement can be made to pay. When they give it up, enforcement will be a simple affair.

Children's Aid Society:—The third annual report of the Children's Aid Society, records the great progress the institution has made during the three years of its existence. It has been the means of saving a number of, to be more accurate, 1, 645, children from lapsing into a life of crime and vice by one single offence committed through indiscretion or ignorance. The principle underlying the working of the Society is that the juvenile criminal during his commitment with proper education and training will be able to realise the error of his ways as he grows up, turn over a new leaf and become an honest citizen, whereas the avenue of reforming himself would be closed if he were to associate with grown up and hardened criminals. The number of new admissions, during the year was 678 and the report states that recently in one twenty-four hour period as many as 30 new children were admitted. The second great achievement of the Society is the completion of the plans for the establishment of the new Junior Reformatory Schools for boys less than twelve years of age in a spare compound on the Umerkadi site. Thus the Society, besides conducting a Remand Home, is solving the institutional problem by its recent venture. It is interesting to learn that 60 per cent. of children admitted did not belong to Bombay but were upcountry cases. For the first time destitute children have been the largest element in the Remand Home. The increase in the number of children is ascribed to greater police activity rather than to the bad character of the neighbourhood. The Society owes a good deal of its success to Miss M. K. Davis its indefatigable secretary. Miss Davis' appeal to the public for more funds to extend the activities of the Society should meet with adequate and prompt response.

Sea Voyages and the Orthodox:—We learn from the Brahmana, the "Guardian of Sanatana Dharma" a weekly paper started in South India about a year ago, that there is much controversy going on among the orthodox as to the propriety of going to England on deputation to protest against the Sarda Act. "Though the opinion of authoritative Heads has not yet come forth to the public, our association with some of them leads us to infer the reverse of the announcements of the Madras leaders" says the Brahmana. "The reply wired by His Holiness Paramahansa Parivrajakacharya Srimad Anandarama Swamigal of Sri Chitrapura Matam of Shirali, Honaver P. O., North Canara District, to the prayer of his disciple Mr. M. M. Ananta Rao, the Secretary of the Madras Brahmana Sabha, to permit him to go to England on a deputation to His Majesty the Emperor in respect of the Child Marriage Act, has been forwarded to us for publication. It is as follows:—'Work specified in Binha Patra may be done through others without your going. If gone, as apaddharma, whether you be Samvyavaharya by Prayaschitta, cannot be done'. This reply is appropriate to the seat His Holiness justly occupies." The predecessor of this Swami excommunicated Sir Narayan Chandavarkar for going to England and forbade his followers from crossing the sea. The order has been practically a dead letter. "Though it cannot be decidedly stated what other Heads would say, it is certain, in all probabilities, that they too would advocate the same view, regardless of the specious plea of some, who entertain a longing to visit England." If it is wrong for the misguidedly enthusiastic disciple to go to England surely it cannot be right for any one else to do so.

The Anti-Untouchability Campaign:—It is gratifying to learn that the work of the Anti-Untouchability Committee has so far met with gratifying response. All the eight temples owned by the Telugu Munurvar community residing in Bombay were declared open to all the members of the Hindu community irrespective of their caste or creed by a resolution passed at their meeting held on the 2nd instant at Kamathipura under the chairmanship of Sriyut Sayaji Laxman Silam, B. A. LL. B., Advocate, member of the Bombay Municipal Corporation. The resolution was passed almost unanimously only one member dissenting. The temples thrown open are:—1. Panch Mukhi Maruti (Vitho Rukhmai) Temple, Kamathipura, 5th Lane, Bombay. 2. Shri Khandobas Temple, Kamathipura, 5th Lane, Bombay. 3. Shri Pochamma Temple, Kamathipura, 11th Lane, Bombay. 4. Sudalamma Temple, Kamathipura, 9th Lane, Bombay. 5. Shri Laxmi Narayan Temple, Kamathipura, 7th Lane, Bombay. 6. Shri Ram Maruti Temple, Kamathipura, Bazar Road, Bombay. 7. Shri Durga Devi Temple, Kamathipura, Durgadevi Road, Bombay. 8. Shri Mari Amma (Goddess), Kamathipura, Bazar Road. The question of admitting the members of the so called untouchables or the depressed classes was discussed in four successive meetings of the community held during recent months and although the advanced section among the community under the leadership of Sjts. Silam, Pupala, Gangala and others could have carried the resolution by majority any time, the latter wisely decided to wait and without pressing the issue to voting strove to bring about unanimity by reasoning and persuasion with the orthodox section with the happy result that ultimately on Sunday last after a full dress debate the resolution was carried amidst enthusiasm with a single vote against it. The resolution was moved by Sjt. S. K. Pupala, another prominent member of the community and a member of the Municipal Corporation. It resolved that from that day onward all the temples owned by the community were to be thrown open for worship to all Hindus irrespective of any caste or creed, and called upon the leaders of the untouchables to strive to rid their people of the evil habits of eating beef etc. which were held to be essentially irreligious, and observe more clearly the standard and mode of living. It also called upon them to pay special attention to the spread of education.

MANAGER'S NOTICE.

Reminder cards will be sent at the end of this month to subscribers whose subscriptions are in arrears and to those whose subscriptions are due for the current year. As our financial year is drawing to a close those subscribers who are in arrears are requested to remit the amounts due without delay.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1930.

NATIONAL BELIEFS AND NATIONAL PROSPERITY.

Miss Katherine Mayo propounded in her book "Mother India" the thesis that the Hindu Social system was the great obstacle to Indian Self-Government. Other writers, chiefly retired Anglo-Indian Governors and Lieutenant-Governors, before her, had pitched upon some particular custom or practice such as caste, child-marriage, or temple women, as differentiating the people of India from the Western nations enjoying self-Government, thus suggesting that self-government cannot be expected to be worked with equal success in this country. British statesmen whose little knowledge of India was derived through these sources, generalised such criticisms into universal propositions. The late Lord Salisbury said that the Irish like the Hottentots and the Hindus were incapable of self-government. The late Lord Morley dismissed the demand for Dominion self-government with the airy remark that fur-coats which were necessary in Canada were unsuitable to India. With regard to this remark, we recently read somewhere that when the late Lord Sinha and another Indian expressed surprise at the remark, Lord Morley characteristically observed, "But climates may change." These facile generalisations do not resolve any difficulties, but they have a tremendous influence in shaping public opinion which is mostly compacted of catch phrases. The special distinction of Miss Mayo's book was that it focussed all these fleeting ideas in a single book, annotated them by references to persons, books and reports, and offered it to the world as a final justification for the continuation of the British bureaucratic system as the sole means of saving it from being infected by the insanitation and epidemics of India. The nations of the world were warned that if anything happens to relax the British grip on India, they would all have cholera, small-pox and other diseases endemic in India, devastating their homes and ruining their prosperity. It was an appeal to their instinct of self-preservation to oppose the demands of Indians for self-Government.

The book, as we all know, had a tremendous vogue for a time, but as is the fate of all sensational publications, it has given place to fresh sensations relating to Russia, China and other countries where European and American interests clash with national interests. But the Anglo-Indian ex-officials who use their pensioned leisure in England to obstruct Indian reforms are trying to keep up and improve upon Miss Mayo's enterprise. Two of these, Lord Meston and Sir Basil Blackett, both of whom occupied at one time the office of Financial Member of the Government of India, have been lately entertaining their fellow retired Anglo-Indians with disquisitions on the effects of the Hindu philosophy of religion on the economic condition of the people. The sum and substance of their essays is;—"Indians say that the poverty of India is due to the British Indian system of administration. It is quite absurd. It is due to the Hindu philosophy of religion, particularly, the doctrine of Karma whose effect is a fatalistic resignation to poverty, and disease and absence of all desire to improve their own moral and material condition. We who have at one time or another helped in the administration of that country have done our best. We have nothing to reproach ourselves with. We have made great sacrifices, have set an example to the world in the disinterested performance of duty for duty's sake, and can look back on our achievements with a clear gaze and a clean conscience. It is all due to the Hindu's religion and philosophy that the results of our magnificent labours have been so inappreciable, that illiteracy is rampant, that the peasantry is steeped in debt, and that education is so largely a door to unemployment, that the few modern industries in the country are in the grip of a chronic depression, that the exchange value of the rupee is a source of constant anxiety to the Finance Member and so on and so on." The thirst for such soothing syrup which seems to be growing, is itself a sure sign that something lies heavy upon the conscience of those who require from time to time to have it administered to them.

The effect of a nation's religion or philosophy on its economic and political condition is an interesting study. Morley in his "Compromise" says that no nation has been great in politics and metaphysics at the same time. Mr. Edwin Bevan in his latest book has stressed the importance of the political subjection of Palestine to Rome as a factor in producing Christianity. Are such generalisations true except to a limited extent? Even if they are, does it follow that they are incapable of being disproved in any present or future state? These are large questions which may be discussed in many volumes. Limiting ourselves to the effect of the doctrine of Karma, is it peculiar to Hindu religion? Does it necessarily lead to a fatalistic acceptance of existing conditions? It seems to us that all religions have for their central principle the conservation of moral and spiritual values. The doctrine of Karma is nothing but that which Jesus Christ taught when he said "as you sow, so shall you reap." The Prophet of Islam was no less emphatic on the relation between present conduct and the future state here and hereafter. We do not know of any religion or philosophy which teaches that whatever you may be or do, has nothing whatever to do with what you may become or achieve. As a logical principle and as a rule of practical conduct, the doctrine of Karma seems to us to be perfect. Does it necessarily lead to fatalism? There are numerous persons, including philosophers, who are fatalists without believing in the law of Karma. On the other hand, there are many who profoundly believe in the law, but find in it only an incentive to an active life. Gautama Buddha who isolated the law from the rest of Hindu metaphysics and made it the basis of his creed, led an intensely active life to the end of his gracious life. Sri Krishna in the Bhagavadgita proclaimed the momentous truth that disinterested performance of one's duty, absolved one from bondage to one's past Karma. His followers for a thousand years carried his message all over Asia, and during this period, India was at the zenith of her prosperity enjoying peace within and without her borders. We can enlarge upon this subject, but the limits of our space have to be considered. People like Lord Meston and Sir Basil Blackett only indulge in special pleading for the system of which they were a part, on the basis of little knowledge and a good deal of interested concern in keeping things as they are. Their purpose is to divert attention from the failure of their system and in this, they may succeed for the time but not for all time.

WEALTH AND WELFARE.

Dr. Rabindranath Tagore writes in the Modern Review:—The standard of living in modern times has been raised far higher than the average level of our necessity. Where the temptation of high living, normally confined to a negligible small section of the community, becomes widespread, its evergrowing burden is sure to prove fatal to civilization. It forces society not only to make provision for filling of the vessel to the brim, which has its own limit, but also for the overflow. This excess, if it is for creative purposes, is a gain, and the expenditure is made true by the profit. But when it is for display and unproductive self-enjoyment then it is an absolute loss which can be suffered with impunity only within certain bounds.

The tendency towards extravagance is natural to man, it is to make manifest his power, his magnanimity. There was a time when it found its play mostly in the surroundings of a king, in the expression of a communal spirit in religion and other collective sentiments. The poorest and the meanest among the citizens found his dignity represented in the public buildings and the pomp and ceremonies of public life. This could never give rise to the personal feeling of envy or fury of insane emulation. Most of the expressions of any great surplus of life and wealth was dedicated to the community. The dark planets merely represent themselves, the radiant star, in its excess of light, represents the constellation; and the wealth reaching that degree of radiance which exceeds the obscure limits of personal necessity once did belong to the illumination of a whole society. This prevented the universal competition in wastefulness which to-day is exhausting human energy and the material resources of the earth.

In former days, in India, public opinion levied heavy taxes upon wealth and most of the public works of the country were voluntarily supported by the rich. Water-supply, medical help, education and amusement were naturally maintained by men of property through a spontaneous adjustment of mutual obligation. This was made possible, because the limits set to the individual right of self-indulgence were narrow, and the surplus wealth easily followed the channel of social responsibility. In such a society, property was the pillar that supported its civilization, and wealth gave opportunity to the fortunate for self-sacrifice.

There are some who believe that the eradication of the idea of property will give the communal spirit its full freedom. But we must know that the urge which has given rise to property, is something fundamental in human nature. If you have the power you may tyrannically do violence to all that constitutes property; but you cannot change the constitution of mind itself.

Property is medium for the expression of our personality. If we look at the negative aspect of this personality we see in it the limits which separate one person from another. And when, in some men, this sense of separateness takes on an intense emphasis, we call them selfish. But its positive aspect reveals the truth, that it is the only medium through which men can communicate with one another. Most often and for most men, property is the only frame that can give a foundation for the creation of a personal world. It is not merely money, not merely furniture; it does not represent merely acquisitiveness, but is an objective manifestation of our taste, our imagination, our constructive faculties, our desire for self-sacrifice.

Through this creative limitation which is our personality, we receive, we give, we express. Our highest social training is to make our property the richest expression of the best in us, of that which is universal, of our individuality whose greatest illumination is love. As individuals are the units that build the community, so property is the unit of wealth that makes for communal prosperity, when it is alive to its function. Our wisdom lies not in destroying separateness of units, but in maintaining the spirit of unity in its full strength.

When life is simple, wealth does not become too exclusive, and individual property finds no great difficulty in acknowledging its communal responsibility, rather, it becomes its vehicle.

But with the rise of the standard of living, property changes its aspect. It shuts the gate of hospitality, which is the best means of social intercommunication. It displays its wealth in an extravagance which is self-centred. It begets envy and irreconcilable class division. In short, property becomes anti-social. Because, with what is called material progress, property has become intensely individualistic, the method of gaining it has become a matter of science and not of social ethics. It breaks social bonds; it drains the life sap of the community.

There are always insects in our harvest field which, in spite of their robbery, leave a sufficient surplus for the tillers of the soil, and it does not pay to try to exterminate them. But when some pest that has enormous powers of self-multiplication, attacks our food crop, it has to be dealt with as a calamity. In human society, in normal circumstances, there are a number of causes that make for wastage, yet it does not cost us too much to ignore them. But to-day the blight that has fallen on our social life and its resources is disastrous, because it is not restricted to limited regions. It is an epidemic of voracity that has infected the total area of civilisation.

We all now-a-days claim our right of freedom to be extravagant in our enjoyment. Not to be able to waste as much upon individual gratification as my rich neighbour does, merely proves a poverty of which I am ashamed, and against which my women-folk and my parasites are permitted to cherish their grievance. Thus, society, which should be our field of co-operation, has become that of competition, in which, through its tyrannical standard of respectability, all the members are goading one another to spoil themselves to the uttermost limit.

Civilization to-day has turned into a vast catering establishment. It maintains constant feasts for a whole population of gluttons. The intemperance which could safely have been tolerated in a few has spread its contagion to the multitude. The universal greed, produced as a consequence, is the cause of the meanness, cruelty and lies in politics and commerce, that vitiate the whole human atmosphere.

A civilization with such an unnatural appetite must depend for its existence upon numberless victims and these are being sought in those parts of the world where human flesh is cheap. In Asia and Africa a bartering goes on, whereby the future hope and happiness of entire peoples are sold for the sake of providing fastidious fashion with an endless train of rubbish.

The consequence of such material and moral drain is more evident when one studies the conditions manifested in the fatness of the cities and the physical and mental anaemia of the villages, almost everywhere in the world. For cities have become inevitably important. They represent energy and materials concentrated for the satisfaction of that exaggerated appetite, which is the characteristic symptom of modern civilization. Such an abnormal devouring process cannot be carried on, unless certain parts of the social body conspire and organize to feed upon the whole. This is suicidal; but before its progressive degeneracy ends in death, the disproportionate enlargement of the particular section looks formidably great, and conceals the starved pallor of the entire body,—the sacrifice of the large maintaining the small in its enormity, and creating for the time being an illusion of wealth.

The capital needed for the commerce of life accumulates in villages; the city draws upon that for its various functions of civilization. So long as these are productive and creative, it is no loss. But when a disproportionate part of it goes to supply fuel to the fire of an extravagant self-indulgence, precious materials of life are reduced to ash heaps. In a fire-play of recklessness the spendthrift exhausts his future in making a burning rocket of his immediate present, sending it up to the void in a dazzling speed of progress. But it is a brilliant process of dissolution, because by its erratic excesses the food is consumed not for feeding life but for pampering a flame of passion.

THE CATHOLIC INDEX.

The Editor, Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

Your issue of February 1st, just to hand. I am glad to note your explanation regarding the paragraph on the Catholic Index and to learn that, like myself, you do not believe in the "arbitrary system of censorship" which the Index represents. At the same time I am sure you will appreciate my reason for supposing you printed the item with your own approval. For it is quite apparent that the paragraph is not purely "news": I am not aware how the Catholic Leader printed it up, but it expresses such a judgment regarding the Index and the position of the Roman Catholic Church in such matters as rightly finds a place in Editorial, Leading Article, or Book Review. Inasmuch as you printed it in your news column without comment, I naturally supposed you did so with your approval, for in a magazine not devoted largely to News such items as are selected for publication by the editor are naturally those which he wishes for some special reason to place before his readers' attention.

If on the other hand, you printed it simply that your readers might see the attitude of the "Church" on a question so vital as that of the censorship of the literature issuing from the general Press, I am the more glad that I called your attention to the necessity of limiting the word "Church" in that paragraph with the adjective "Roman Catholic." In your editorial you express surprise that I "should feel sorrow that 'the average non-Christian does not distinguish between Protestant and Catholic.'" By way of reply, may I ask—would you care whether the thinking public identified you with an organisation whose whole spirit is sufficiently illustrated by the enslaving of mind and conscience for which the Catholic Index stands? You have yourself, Sir, laid your finger upon the deeply-rooted cleavage between Protestantism and Roman Catholicism. The religion of the New Testament is one of "spiritual liberty" and Protestants have died, not on the battlefield but by burning at the stake, on the rack, and by the edge of the sword for that principle. That is why we do not choose to be identified in the minds of thinking Indian non-Christians with an institution which is the living embodiment of the opposite principle.

THE INSTITUTE OF PACIFIC RELATIONS.

To meet the need for some common council among the nations in the Pacific, the Institute of Pacific Relations came into being at Honolulu in 1925. Since that time it has become a recognized agency for furthering peaceful relations in the Pacific.

It has a central Executive, resident in Honolulu, a Council with representatives of each of the Pacific nations and five travelling secretaries, two Americans, one New Zealander, a Chinese and a Japanese. The Royal Institute of International Affairs of London, England, and the Canadian Institute of International Affairs, with branches in Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Winnipeg, Regina and Vancouver, are affiliated with the Institute and it has branches in all the chief centres in the United States, Australia, New Zealand, China, Japan and the Phillipine Islands. It has built up a large library on Pacific Affairs, at Honolulu, and keeps its members supplied from time to time with studies on the most vital questions affecting Pacific countries, in addition to the results of the various research projects being carried out under the direction of the Research Committee. A monthly magazine keeps the members informed as to developments from month to month and provides reviews of books and magazines dealing with the Pacific.

The Conference, which meets every two years, is therefore only one feature of a very far-reaching organization, but it brings together representative men and women from all the Pacific countries and provides an opportunity for free and full discussion of vital questions which have in them the seeds of trouble.

This year's Conference met in Kyoto, Japan, the old capital of the Empire and was the largest and most representative Conference yet held. Japan and China each had large and representative groups of men and women who carried on discussions in English with fluency and ease. It would hardly be possible to gather a group which would better represent the leadership of Japan than the delegation which contained at least half a dozen former members of the Cabinet, besides former Government officials and men and women high in the business and educational life of the country. The presence of such leaders and the earnestness with which they took part in the discussions convinced all of us that, despite her difficult position, Japan sincerely desires the peace of the world and the respect and confidence of all the powers.

China's delegation consisted, for the most part, of young foreign-trained men and women and was a little inclined to be militant and rather critical of the other powers, though it had among its members such men as Dr. Chang Po Lin, President of Tien Tsin Christian University, one of the ablest and most trusted leaders of the New China; Dr. Hawking Yen, a diplomat under the old regime and yet in thorough accord with the new; and Dr. David Yui, President of China Christian Council and several others of like weight and experience.

At the Second Conference in Honolulu, two years ago, the Chinese were in the midst of their anti-foreign campaign and made a bitter attack on the Western powers, especially Great Britain. But their essential reasonableness and fair-mindedness appeared when they saw the situation through the eyes of the representatives of these powers. Their response was whole-hearted and they induced Sir Frederick White, leader of the British delegation, to return to China with them, with the result that the relations between Great Britain and China have steadily improved and Sir Frederick is now adviser-in-chief to the Nanking Government.

The difficult situation within the Kuomintang had the effect of turning the attention of the Chinese delegation at Kyoto away from international affairs and none of the difficulties between China and the Western powers was pressed with the same vigour as at last Conference. The discussions on Extra-territoriality, settlements, concessions, etc., were carried on in an atmosphere of good will, the Chinese seeming to realize that the correction of these difficulties rested upon the establishment of a strong central Government more than anything else.

The one point where bitterness was very evident was in regard to Japan's relations to China, especially in Manchuria, and it looked at one point as if the Conference was going to be wrecked on this point. But, after the matter had been frankly discussed from every angle, for almost two days, there was a complete cessation of bitterness and the two delegations were dining together and planning for a joint Commission to solve the pressing problems and prepare the way for a treaty of amity and co-operation between the two powers. It looks as if the Kyoto Conference would go down to history as the beginning of better Sino-Japanese relations, just as the Honolulu Conference began better Sino-British relations.—The Canadian Student.

Girls' Schools for Sikhs.—Some prominent Canada-returned Sikh gentlemen have raised about a lakh of rupees to dot the whole Jullundur District with Sikh Primary Girls Schools wherever the Sikh population preponderates. The scheme is to come into operation soon.

HINDU DIVORCE.

We take the following from the Times of India:— The Baroda State Legislative Assembly in the Assembly Hall under the presidentship of Rao Bahadur V. T. Krishnamachariar, the Dewan, was specially convened to discuss the Hindu Divorce Bill.

In introducing the Bill, Mr. V. K. Dhurandhar, the Legal Remembrancer said that the object of introducing the Bill was to provide the higher castes among the Hindus with the legal means of obtaining a divorce when they were not in a position to maintain harmonious marital relations. The present Bill, besides codifying the ground which the Hindu Law provided, had merely added others of a similar nature, and did not therefore override the present Hindu Law in that respect. In addition to this, the Bill also provided for judicial separation, the compulsory registration of the dissolution of marriages in castes where it was permitted by custom, as also for alimony, custody of children and damages to the injured parties. Mr. Dhurandhar next explained that Government in drafting the Bill had not only taken into consideration the tenets of the ancient Hindu Shastras but the provisions of divorce and dissolution of marriage embodied in the Acts of several countries in the West and the East.

Mr. Bapubhai Desai in opening the discussion said several Smritis permitted divorce in certain circumstances, but so far no Hindu woman of the higher castes had ever availed herself of this freedom. Instead there had been numerous instances of women having sacrificed their lives to safeguard their honour. Circumstances had, however, changed and in the present state of Hindu society any measure which aimed at granting relief to women from the tyranny of social bondage would always find favour with the educated classes.

He, however, feared that the Bill had failed to achieve its end in so far as it was mainly based on western conditions which were totally unsuitable to India. The Bill as it stood was likely to do more harm than good to women as it gave greater facilities to husbands to tyrannise over their wives, unless their status in society was raised to the same level as that of men both economically and socially. In order that the measure should be really effective, what was essential was that polygamy among males, the legal disqualification of women in matters of inheritance and succession, in short, the complete economic dependency of women on their husbands, should first be done away with to enable them to seek redress against their husbands in courts of law.

Referring to the provisions of the Bill, Mr. Desai strongly criticised the Bill from the point of view of women for not having the same grounds for divorce applicable to both sexes. Mr. Desai also expressed grave doubts as to the success of the measure as Hindu society at present was divided into water-tight compartments of castes and sub-castes. In conclusion, he requested Government to co-opt two lady members on the panel of the select committee to indicate the women's point of view.

Mr. Ramchandra Amin opposed the Bill on the ground that society was not sufficiently advanced to benefit from the measure. Conditions in India and the countries of the West differed radically and the laws and customs of the latter would hardly be suitable to Indian conditions. The very fact that the Hindu marriage system had withstood the attack of many civilizations which it had come in contact with and had remained unaltered for centuries proved its soundness. Any attack made on it would be the greatest disservice to the Hindu community. He suggested that if the Bill be accepted by the House it should not be restricted to Hindus alone, but should be applicable to all castes and creeds in the State.

Mr. Mohanlal Virji speaking in support of the Bill believed that they would be failing in their duty towards women if, after realizing the injustice done to them, they did not support the measure which aimed at improving their condition.

Mr. Lalloobhai Kishorbhai and Mr. Popatlal spoke in favour of the Bill. Mr. Lalloobhai said that it was very difficult to believe in the sacredness of marriage when man broke it in every third case by having more than one wife and by the tyranny and ill-treatment to which women were subjected.

Mr. Devidas opposing the introduction of the Bill, felt that in the present state of Hindu society the position of divorced wives would be worse than that of widows as they would be left without any means of sustenance. He feared that the Bill if passed would be a source of danger and likely to encourage immorality. He suggested the appointment of a commission.

After several members had spoken on the Bill, Mr. Dhurandhar expressed great satisfaction at the fact that the majority of members had accepted the principle, if not the actual wording of the Bill. He agreed that polygamy should be penalised. At the end of the discussion a select committee of nine members, four officials and five non-officials with powers to co-opt two lady members, was proposed and unanimously adopted by the House.

ALLAHABAD WOMEN'S CONFERENCE.

Mrs. Sarojini Naidu presided at the Allahabad Women's Conference held in the Prayag Mahila Vidyapith hall on Tuesday last.

The Conference adopted numerous resolutions. One of these extended full support to the Sarda Act and condemned all agitation against it. It further demanded that if any service is organised to supervise the enforcement of the Act it must exclusively consist of women as any other agency is bound to prove ineffective and is likely to entail great hardship. Miss Shyam Kumari Nehru moved the resolution which was supported by Mrs. R. Wanchoo, Mrs. Uma Das and Mrs. Das of the Punjab.

EDUCATION.

The Conference recorded its view that compulsory primary education was essential for girls and, therefore, urged upon the Government and local bodies to make necessary provision for it, preferably appointing Indian women teachers, inspectresses and superintendents in all primary schools.

Another resolution while strongly supporting co-education of boys and girls in the higher and university classes, recorded the opinion that it was necessary to have at present separate residential colleges for women exclusively under the control of women, and that immediate steps were necessary for providing facilities for the education of married women and therefore urged upon the Government, local bodies and women's associations to make special arrangements for classes for imparting instruction in literary and industrial subjects with special reference to domestic science, fine arts and first aid.

INADEQUATE FUNDS.

The Conference was also of the opinion that funds generally allotted by the Government and local bodies for the education of girls were wholly inadequate to meet the growing demands of women's education, resented the glaring inequality in the proportion of money spent on the education of boys and of girls and urged upon the Government and local bodies to spend at least half the funds reserved for educational purposes exclusively on the education of women.

The Conference was further of opinion that sex hygiene should be taught in all secondary schools and colleges by competent women teachers and that the vernacular should be the medium of instruction in secondary and higher education and Hindustani should be a compulsory second subject.

Among those who participated in the discussion were Srimati Premkali Devi, Mrs. P. N. Sapra, Miss Seth, Mrs. Hafiz Syed, Srimati Mohan Devi of Calcutta, Mrs. Uma Nehru, Miss Rao, Mrs. Pandit, Kunwarani Maharaj Singh, Mrs. A. C. Banerji, Mrs. Sathe, Mrs. L. G. Mukerji, Srimati Amba Devi of Bijnor, Miss Tripathi and Miss Sarla Devi of Bijnor.

WOMEN OF INDIA.

Mrs. B. Nehru, writing on behalf of the standing committee of the All-India Women's Conference, to Miss Bathbone, M. P., Editor of the "Women of India—a Survey," London, with whom she has been corresponding on the question of the All-India Women's Conference cooperating in the proposed "Women of India—a Survey," in the course of a letter says:

"While the standing committee has noted with satisfaction that it is your intention to make the survey of the women in India as clear and accurate as possible the committee after full discussion of all the points involved voted unanimously against taking any share or responsibility in producing the survey of India proposed to be issued under the auspices of the National Union of Societies for Equal Citizenship and under your editorship for the following reasons: That the events are moving at such rapid speed in India that such a survey would be out of date in a very short time, that it is undesirable that such a survey should be undertaken at all by women of a different nation, that such a survey cannot adequately and surely be made by women who do not know India by long residence and sympathetic co-operation in the life of its women, that the placing of the statistics of to-day without reference to or inclusion of the statistics and conditions (about art, learning, philosophy, trade, riches, political systems, religion, etc.), of the past when India had not been invaded by foreigners would give an entirely misleading picture and that if such statistics and statements were included it would not be agreeable to the National Union to publish under their present political restrictions. Without such an investigation into the roots of the present state of affairs the book would do more harm than good. The All-India Women's Conference would much prefer that those who have the interests of this country at heart would come and work with the people who are changing the present statistics."

Mrs. Nehru believes this will close further correspondence on the subject.

DEDICATION OF WOMEN TO TEMPLES.

Dr. Muthulakshmi Reddi moved in the Madras Legislative Council that her bill to prevent the dedication of women to Hindu temples in the presidency of Madras be referred to a Select Committee.

In the course of the statement of objects and reasons for the Bill, it is stated as follows:—

"Not only the inam-holding devadasis but also other devadasis dedicate a large number of girls to Hindu temples by going through pottukattu or gajje puja or similar ceremony in Hindu temples. Whatever the origin of the practice in ancient days of the dedication of women as devadasis in Hindu temples, it is unfortunately the case that the practice has now degenerated mainly into a method of initiation of young women to a life of immorality and prostitution. The existence or otherwise of shastric sanction to the practice of dedication as devadasis is therefore immaterial. The shastras are against vice and impurity of all kinds, and enlightened public opinion is against tolerating the continuance of a practice which in the name of service to God, has condemned a certain class of women to a life of either concubinage or prostitution. A Hindu woman who is so dedicated is considered by custom to be incapable of contracting a valid marriage thereafter. Therefore it is highly desirable and expedient to prohibit the performance of dedication of girls to Hindu temples within the precincts of any temples and legalise the marriage of such girls when contracted after such dedication. There have been previous attempts at putting an end to this practice of dedication but they have been, so to say, indirect and have not produced the desired result. By amendments to sections 372 and 373 of the Indian Penal Code, the age-limit for the disposal of minor girls for purposes of prostitution has been raised from 16 to 18 years. But though at the time when this change was effected it was supposed that it would reduce if not put an end to the evil of dedication of girls to temples, it has failed to achieve this result because it does not deal with the dedication of girls as a whole. Sections 372 and 373 of the Indian Penal Code are evaded by the temples allowing dedication after the girl attains 18 years of age; and in the mofussil even minor girls are dedicated even to-day because the temple authorities, the parent and the general public honestly feel that religion sanctions it and the law is not absolutely against it. A legislative enactment is therefore necessary in this province for dealing with the practice of dedication of Hindu girls and women without touching the existing penalties for the disposal of minor girls for immoral purposes dealt with by sections 372 and 373 of the Indian Penal Code.

MOTION FOR CIRCULATION CARRIED

The Hon. Sir Krishnan Nair moved that the bill be circulated for eliciting public opinion.

He said that he quite sympathised with the object of the bill. The Government must be in a position to determine their attitude. However laudable the object might be, the Government had not before them the necessary material to enable them to come to a definite conclusion. This was essentially a piece of social legislation and it was desirable in the interests of everybody concerned that the public must have an opportunity to express an opinion on the various provisions of the bill. The section to punish persons taking part in dedication ceremony required careful consideration. He therefore opposed the motion.

The Hon. Sir Mahomed Usman seconded.

Dr. Muthalakshmi Reddi said that the Government had already committed themselves to the principles of the bill. It accepted her bill against the dedication of inam-holding devadasis to temples. Her present bill was a further step in the same direction. The Council unanimously passed a resolution some time back on the same subject. Was not the Council representative of public opinion? Where was the necessity then to elicit public opinion on the bill? The Law Member's motion was merely dilatory. If this bill was not taken now it would not have the chance of being passed by this Council. In the Bombay Council and in the Assembly similar Bills were being introduced. It showed that public opinion was in favour of the social reform. The Mysore Government had prohibited the dedication of Hindu girls in its temples. This Government need not fear any opposition from the public. She brought forward this bill in response to the appeal of several men and women.

Mr. Nagan Gowda said that by passing the Bill they would be strengthening the hands of the social reformers. The matter referred to by the Law Member could very well be carefully considered by the Select Committee.

The motion for circulation was carried, 33 voting for and 9 against.

A NEW COLLEGE FOR BOMBAY.

The Director of Information, Bombay, sends us the following: A very important addition to the educational institutions of the Bombay Presidency will be made when the Ismail College at Andheri is opened from the 1st of June of this year. This College owes its existence to a donation of Rs. 8 lakhs from Sir Mahomed Yusuf which was offered to Government as far back as January 1914 for the promotion of the higher education of Muhammadan youths. Careful consideration was given to the best means of utilising the money. Among the possible alternatives considered has been the establishment of a technological college. In 1919 Government announced their final decision to devote the donation towards the establishment of a First Grade Government Arts College, to be erected on a selected site in Salsette, part of the funds being set aside to form a permanent scholarship endowment fund. Pending the establishment of the College the income from the Endowment set apart for scholarships was utilised in providing scholarships for Muhammadan students at other Arts Colleges in the Bombay Presidency. The large increase in prices following upon the war required numerous alterations in the estimates and materially altered the financial aspect of the proposed scheme. These difficulties have, however, been overcome and subject to the approval of the Legislative Council the College will be opened at the beginning of the monsoon, with accommodation for 400 students. To commence with, only the First Year Inter Arts classes will be opened. The Inter Science and Junior B.A. classes will be added in 1931-32 and the Senior B.A. classes in 1932-33. It is proposed to teach the Pass and Honours courses in English, Persian, Arabic, Urdu and Sanskrit and also the Pass courses in History and Economics and in Mathematics, and the Inter Science course in groups A and B. While, therefore students at the College will be able to follow a course enabling them to secure degrees at the University, the College itself will, it is hoped, become the centre and inspiration of Islamic study and culture in Western India and for that reason is expected to attract the best students from the Muhammadan community. The College, will, however, be opened to all communities though preference will be given to Muhammadan candidates and it is probable that its situation in the suburbs, yet quite convenient to Bombay, will make it specially attractive to other communities. To start with, hostel accommodation for 100 students will be provided. The College fees will be Rs. 75 a term, but there will be a number of scholarships in addition to those derived from Sir Mahomed Yusuf's Endowment Fund which will be reserved for Muhammadan students.

Application has been made for the affiliation of the College to the Bombay University and the sanction of the Legislative Council to the cost involved will be asked during the ensuing Budget Session. Government have decided to give early notice of the opening of the College in order that parents may have ample time to make arrangement to enter their sons at the College.

INDIAN INFLUENCE IN JAVA.

Dr. H. Craemer, Secretary of the Dutch Bible Society, Java, who is now in Madras on his way to Java, delivered an interesting lecture on Monday last at the Y. M. C. A. Auditorium on "The Indian Influence in Java." Dr. Craemer is also engaged in a research study of the cultural and religious influences in Java. As Java contains a predominantly large population of Muslims, Dr. Craemer's present tour is for the sake of studying Islamic culture and civilisation in India and elsewhere, especially as Java is even to-day influenced by the Hindu culture.

CAME THROUGH INDIA.

Dealing with the historical aspect of the Indian influence, the lecturer said that they found in Ramayana a reference about Java. The Javanese called India Jamboo Dwipa. One of the old books dealing with the origin of Java mentioned that it was once an unsteady island unfit for human habitation. Gods taking pity on it, brought Mahameru from India, broke and scattered it all over the island, thus making the land steady. The first thing historically known of Java was in the fourth century. In the Western part of Java could be found inscriptions in Sanscrit in Pallava script. Javanese script was traced to this script and it had something in common with Tamil characters also. The next thing they heard was in Fahian's narations of his travels where he spoke of Java as containing many heretics and many Brahmins. That showed that Buddhism had no influence in Java at that time. About three centuries after that they could see all traces of Indian influence in Java especially Central Java, in the many beautiful temples with numerous inscriptions. These inscriptions were also in Sanscrit. The influence of Hindus from India never seemed to have been through conquests. They found only one mention about war in the 11th or 12th century between Chola Kings and the Sumatran King Sri Vijaya. Sri Vijaya even appeared to have sent an army to South India which met with heavy disaster. Therefore Indian influence in Java was not through martial enterprises. Moreover, from the information available Hindus appeared to have never gone there in large numbers. The numbers were extremely small but wherever they went, they had left deep traces in the history of the people.

"JAMBOO DWIPA."

Dr. Craemer began by saying that Java with a Javanese population was indebted to India for all its higher cultural life. These religious and cultural influences could be roughly divided into two periods namely Hindu and Buddhist influences in the beginning of the Christian era and the Islamic influence. Though it was supposed by some, that Islamic influence came from Arabia, the speaker was led to think that that influence also came through India, particularly South India. Java was mostly a Muslim country. Still Indian influence was very active there even to-day. The country could be divided into three parts, Western, Eastern and Central. The western regions had been most thoroughly Muslimised. Between the other two regions, the Central Java retained more of its Hindu character. This might be due to the shifting of political thought to the centre when the country came into contact with Islamic culture. It also showed that it had taken some centuries before Islam came to be recognised as the official religion of Java. It was only official, because every Javanese was conscious of the presence of something else in the culture. But forces were at present at work in Java trying to spread the purer form of Islam. Still many Javanese consider India "Hindustan" as they called it, the most sacred country.

CENTRES OF LEARNING.

Most of the ancient kings who ruled in Java were not Hindus. They were Javanese. But they had a great preference for Hindu names. The titles of officials, though Javanese, were found to have been made to resemble Sanscrit words by the addition of a syllable or one or two words. There were also records to show that Sumatra and Java, though influenced by India, became themselves centres of learning at one time and it was said that a Tibetan reformer remained for about 2 years at a famous centre of learning in Java.

HINDU CULTURE.

The temples in Java seemed to have been neglected until a few years ago, when the Dutch Government made arrangements to preserve them. This supported the theory that Hindu religion had not so much influence in Java as Hindu Culture. The Javanese had an enormous quantity of literature. Some were in the old Javanese language and the rest in the modern Javanese language. The old books were influenced mainly by Hindu Culture. Most of them were in prose containing stories of Mahabharata. The modern Javanese books were partly derived from the old sources and partly from Islamic sources. But it could be safely said that they too were derived from Hindu sources though considerably altered. The old books dated back to the tenth century. There ought to have been a lot of literature prior to this period, but they were not available. One thing was certain, namely, the interest of Javanese people centred round the great Hindu epics. Next to Hindus no people were so devoted to Ramayana and Bharata as the Javanese. They drew their inspirations from these two books. It should not be presumed that the old Javanese books were mere translations of the epics. They were not. The Javanese assimilated Hindu culture in their own way. The parts dealing with the religious aspect were left out. Gita found no place in those books. The central part of the epics dealing with the heroes and their valour and civilisation alone were found in the Javanese books. Even now the modern Javanese translation of the books were widely read.

THE JAVANESE PLAYS.

The book Arjuna-vivaha wherein Arjuna is stated to have withstood the seductive charms of heavenly damsels, fought for the gods and as a reward for that, lived in heaven for one year, was a very popular book among them. Koran did not play such an important part in moulding the Javanese life as these books. Javanese dancing, the speaker would say, was the finest of all the dances in the world. These dances were nothing but the representation of the stories from Mahabharata. The Javanese plays which lasted from 8 p.m. to 6 a.m. were also based upon the epics. For the Javanese the play was not a matter of enjoyment; it was to them a matter of philosophy of life and source of moral and religious inspirations. On the walls of a Siva and a Brahma temple in Java, pictures from Ramayana were found drawn. But the scenes did not entirely agree with the scenes of the Sanskrit Ramayana. This might have been due to the copying of some popular version of Ramayana then current in South India. But it seemed to him a matter which could be cleared up by a better co-operation of South Indian scholars and scholars of Java than that which existed at present.

FROM HINDU HEROES.

It was striking, the lecturer concluded, to find that Muslim population derived its inspiration from Hindu heroes. Arjuna, Bhima, Yudhishtra and other heroes were living ideals for Javanese even now. Those stories were still part and parcel of their history and national life. They traced back their pedigree to one or the other of these Hindu heroes. Though Muslims, they felt that no Javanese should be without such a noble pedigree. They pointed out a certain part in Java as Kuruksheetra. They stated Vyasa, Abiyosa as they called him, had his hermitage in one of the mountains of Java. They had their own era which they called Aji Soko. This era, it was stated, began from the time of the arrival of a King from Hindustan who educated and civilised the then barbarian natives of Java. This was how they consciously and unconsciously expressed their indebtedness to Indian Civilisation and Culture.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

New Buddhist Relic :—The discovery of an authentic relic of Buddha, which is bound to excite immense interest in the Buddhist world, is just reported by Mr.

Longhurst of the Indian Archaeological Survey. The discovery has been made in the Nagarjunikonda Hill on the right bank of the Krishna river in Palnad Taluk in Guntur District. Mr. Longhurst discovered the remains of the Great Stupa which was founded by Princess Chantisirri belonging to the dynasty which ruled Andhra in the second and third centuries. In simplicity of style, the stupa seems to have been similar in appearance to the stupas of the same age existing in Ceylon. While excavating one of the outer chambers on the north side, Mr. Longhurst discovered a broken earthenware pot, filled with hard, red earth wherein a few white crystal beads were embedded near the surface. This earth was removed, and a tiny round box, three-quarters of an inch in diameter containing the fragment of a bone, about the size of a pea, was found. This together with a few gold flowers, pearls and garnets had been originally placed inside a small silver casket, shaped like a miniature stupa, 2½ inches in height. Other important discoveries include four Buddhist monasteries, six temples and several smaller stupas. Explorations continue.

Muslim Girls' Education :—The Hon. Secretary of the Muhammadan Educational Association of Southern India writes :—At the instance of Mr. H. O. L. Marikar of Munnar, the Muhammadan Educational Association of Southern India, Madras, will award a gold medal every year to the Muslim girl who passes the first Intermediate Examination of the University of Madras with the highest aggregate marks. The first medal will be awarded on the result of the Intermediate examination of the University to be held in April this year.

NOTES.

Social Legislation In The Assembly :—On Thursday the Legislative Assembly at Delhi considers two Bills which Mr. Jayakar has drafted. The first had for object the removal of the uncertainties of the Hindu law as regards the gains derived from learning. Mr. Jayakar illustrated the uncertainties of the law as at present administered by a striking example. "The earnings of a B.A.," he said "would remain his personal property while that of an LL.B. became the property of the family," owing to the distinction made between general and special education. The evil of this was that a great deal of money was concealed instead of being invested in a profitable way. The consequences of the present state of the law bore with special harshness on women. Mr. Jayakar explained that the principal object of his Bill was to improve the status of dependent female members of joint Hindu families. Under the present law the widow got maintenance and residence while the daughter got only provision for marriage. All inquiries whether certain property was a result of general or special learning were made after the man was dead and the onus of proving that the property was self-acquired by her husband fell on the widow and in the majority of cases presumption prevailed that what was not proved to the contrary remained joint property. The Bill is thus very important as a measure for placing the position of women on a stable economic basis and as such it will, we have no doubt, receive the support of the public.

The Civil Marriage Bill :—Mr. Jayakar had another Bill before the Assembly on Thursday the debate on which, however, was prolonged beyond the time for closing and had to be adjourned to the next Session as there is no more non-official day in the present. This Bill seeks to remove a glaring anomaly of the law at present. There are two Acts under which a civil marriage can be contracted in British India. The earlier, known as the Special Marriage Act was passed in 1872. Under it, as Mr. Jayakar explained, only if the parties forswore their religion for the moment before the Registrar could they marry each other and yet they could come back and follow their respective religions. It thus actually bred insincerity and hypocrisy. Then in 1923, Sir Hari-singh Gour saw the fruition of his efforts to amend the law extending the benefits to Hindu and allied communities like Jains, Buddhists and Sikhs. Under this Act, parties to the marriage were to give up five important privileges including succession, but there was no forswearing as under the Act of 1872. Mr. Jayakar's Bill seeks to provide a simple civil marriage law applicable to all communities. The Bill, he said, would be a most potent instrument in spreading notions of monogamy and in preventing artificial conversions resulting from exigencies of such marriages. It would introduce greater sincerity in marriages by dispensing with declaration which many desiring to marry under the Act had to subscribe to, not without considerable mental reserve. This innocent measure was opposed by a number of Mahomedan members on the ground that it was opposed to the Koran and the Shariat, and one of them went so far as to criticise the Governor-General for giving his permission for the introduction of the Bill. The most beneficent effect of the Montagu-Chelmsford Reforms has been the stimulus given to social legislation. The late Mr. Montague expressed his wish and hope that they might have that effect. While orthodox Hindu opposition has but died out—Mr. M. K. Acharya who is now its sole representative in the Assembly may not be returned by his constituency next time—the Mahomedan opposition to social legislation is becoming strident. There are, of course, exceptions but the tendency of the bulk of the members returned by the separate Mahomedan electorates is, as might be expected, to oppose reform measures on avowedly communal grounds. This sinister effect of communal franchise urgently demands consideration in the next scheme of reforms.

Indians In South Africa :—The statement which we print to-day by Swami Bhavani Dayal Sannyasi on the condition in this country of the Indians repatriated from South Africa under the Cape Town Agreement, is avowedly tentative, but it is sufficiently plain that the Swami is far from being satisfied with the state of things he has found to exist from his enquiries. The number of repatriates has steadily decreased and the information which the Swami has gathered, if found correct and published, will probably check any further return of Indians from South Africa. The problem, therefore, is to do something to improve the lot of the 7000 repatriates already in this country. A proportion of them, we are told, have left for Ceylon and Malaya, and others too would be glad to go anywhere out of India where they find themselves stranded. The Agent to the South African Government, Mr. Venn, who came out to study the question last year, expressed his satisfaction at what he saw. Swami Bhavani Dayal's statement is to the contrary effect. The Swami suggests the appointment of an independent commission to go into the question, and it is a suggestion which the Government of India should consider favourably.

A Pessimist On The Women's Conference:—The Subodha Patrika's editorial comments on the All-India Women's Conference strike an unusually pessimistic note. This is perhaps the greatest tribute paid to the Conference so far as it shows that much more was expected of the Conference. The Patrika writes appreciatively of Lady Sykes' opening address and says that Lady Tata's welcome address was the best delivered at the conference. We are sorry our contemporary has not read Mrs. Naidu's speech more carefully because it would have removed the wrong impression which has arisen in its mind that the women's movement here is an imitation of the suffragette movement in the West, and we would earnestly advise the Patrika to go through the Presidential Address once again. The Subodha Patrika asks why the burning questions of the day were not even raised at the conference. We do not believe that in this country companionate marriage is a "burning question of the day" and the reason why no one raised it at the Women's Conference was perhaps because no one thought of it. Nor can the doctrines of birth control be preached effectively to an illiterate people. Divorce, again, can only be discussed rationally by the educated and as we have the sad fortune to be born in these democratic days we cannot force it upon the masses. Our contemporary with the courage that is born of conviction writes: "If we say here that the primary function of women is to create a noble human race, we shall at once be condemned from every feminist platform as a reactionary. There are exceptional women who can very easily compete with exceptional men and make their mark either in the field of law, medicine or business: but we must consider what is going to be the function of an average woman; if the so-called education of woman is not going to prevent them from fulfilling the one duty which nature has placed upon them, then we must consider if the so-called education that we are thinking of, and any changes in the university curricula will alone bring about the desired result." But how are the women of "exceptional ability" to be recognised if they are not given opportunities to develop their ability? The remarks of the Patrika on freedom have been anticipated by Mrs. Naidu. We are sorry to see that our contemporary's enthusiasm for the Sarda Act has made it blind to the value of the other resolutions, but we trust that the pessimism which mars its editorial this week was only a passing phase and that by now the Subodha Patrika has regained its normal optimism.

The Brothels Act:—After much inexcusable delay the Brothels Bill sponsored by Mr. K. R. Venkatarama Iyer in the Madras Legislative Council has become law. It aims at the suppression of brothels and immoral traffic in the presidency. The Madras Act is an advance over the Bombay measure inasmuch as it penalises both men and women who are responsible for houses of ill fame. This is the second measure to be enacted against social evil during the life-time of the present Legislative Council of the province, the first being Dr. Muthulakshmi's Religious Amendment Act freeing devadasis from temple service. It is significant that the Legislative Council to pass social measures to purify the life of the province should have a woman Deputy President.

A New Shrine For Malden:—It is difficult to believe that the scenes at the grave of a Catholic priest at Malden, Massachusetts, described by Karl Schriftgiesser in the New Republic took place not in India but in modern America. The article which we reproduce in this issue bears out Lippman's statement that modern man though ceasing to believe has not ceased to be credulous. Whilst Mr. Schriftgiesser, during the eight hours he was there, did not witness a single miraculous cure, others seem to have been more fortunate. It is significant however that most of the reports of miraculous cures are not from eye witnesses. The correspondent of the New York Times who gives a few cures which he heard of at the grave, writes:—"The scenes at the cemetery have been poignant and impressive to all the thoughtful, a marvel to the ordinary onlooker. The visitors file past the tomb in two lines; they make the sign of the cross, kneel beside the slab, dip a handkerchief in the chalice, scoop a handful of earth from the ground at the head or foot of the grave, kiss the marble and toss an offering into a box placed for the reception of gifts. Sometimes they leave candles, jewellery, or flowers. A woman overcome by the intensity of her emotions, shrieks and faints. Fathers carry paralysed children to kiss the chalice. Families come with jars and vases in the rain to carry away some of the water that falls on the slab and fills the chalice. It is told that on the rainy Sunday the stone always was dry, for nobody passed without saturating a handkerchief. This young girl leads a whitehaired old man: he is blind. This weeping mother is unable to reach the grave with her little girl, born dumb. The scenes are calculated to rebuke irreverence." The Roman Catholic Church, it is said, is investigating into the question and there is talk of a shrine at Malden similar to that at Lourdes.

grasp its significance. Whether they do so or not, however, does not affect our own position. Holding as we do, that the purpose of Indo-European contact is the evolution of a civilization more universal in its outlook than any which has preceded it, we must do what we can to keep up that contact in all circumstances and not to break it. This is in accord also with the genius of India which is essentially assimilative and not disruptive. This is why we dissent with the Independence goal and approve of working out our destiny within the Commonwealth of British nations in which we find ourselves placed.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1930.

THE BACKGROUND OF OUR POLITICS.

The Indian Social Reformer is not primarily interested in politics. In fact it has always deprecated exclusive attention to the kind of politics which is concerned with the forms without taking into adequate account the substance of good government. Nor does the Reformer hold with the modern tendency to make economics the motive power of human history. The materialistic interpretation of history has a value of its own, but the springs of all great human endeavour are spiritual. Lord Acton hit upon the right clue when he defined human history as a movement towards greater and greater freedom. Europe conceived freedom mainly in the politico-economic sphere, and its history therefore has been predominantly politico-economic. Asia, and particularly India, conceived freedom as primarily spiritual, and altogether ignored politics and economics in its exclusive pursuit. The result has been disappointing both in Europe and Asia. Europe is beginning to realize, especially in consequence of its experiences in the Great War, that politico-economic ideal leads eventually to its own undoing. Asia as the result of its contact with Europe has realized that neglect of political and economic interests has incapacitated it to create and maintain the conditions and the atmosphere in which alone spiritual freedom can be sought and found. Man does not live by bread alone, but he cannot live without it. This truth is well put in Browning's lines in "Rabi Ben Ezra":

Let us not always say
"Spite of this flesh to-day
I strove, made head, gained ground upon the whole!"

As the bird wings and sings,
Let us cry "All good things
Are ours, nor soul helps flesh more, now, than flesh helps soul."

The failure of both the European and Asiatic civilizations is due to the one-sidedness of their conscious endeavour. If they both sit together and frankly discuss their mutual problems, they are sure to reach principles which, comprehending the whole nature of man will furnish the key to a full and complete civilization harmonizing racial, credal, economic and industrial interests. Whatever makes for this co-operation between the two Continents—America, Australia, and Africa are but their outgrowths—makes for this harmonizing of human life, and whatever hinders such co-operation hinders this beneficent objective.

Social reform which is the original and primary object of this journal, is largely the working out of this idea in the family, social and national life of India. The aim is the removal of obstacles to the full development, physical, intellectual and spiritual of every individual and community and of the nation as a whole. From the background of thought described in the preceding paragraph, it follows that social reform has to find within its own sphere the means of co-ordinating the experience of East and West. Indeed, each one of us has to do this within his or her own self. In other words, the interaction of Europe and Asia on each other is the great motive power of contemporary history. Should this interaction be sympathetic or anti-pathetic? In the long run, of course, it does not matter whether it is the one or the other. But it matters immensely as a factor of every day life. The interaction will as a rule, be sympathetic in the case of individuals whose contacts with Europeans have been pleasant and profitable, spiritually more than materially. In the case of those whose experiences have been unpleasant, it will be antipathetic. The vast majority who have no contacts at all with Europeans, are led by what they hear from their friends and acquaintances or read in the newspapers of the experience of those who have contacts. At the present time, to a large majority of Indians the interaction between West and East is antipathetic. Every White man in India appears to them to be an exploiter, in one field or another, political, economic, religious. The possibility of there being some White men at least who are here sincerely and disinterestedly to help Indians, does not readily occur to many of us. The good faith of even a man like C. F. Andrews has sometimes been questioned. This is a most unfortunate state of things. It is the greatest barrier to the co-operation between East and West on which rests the whole hope of the future.

To a very large extent, this is due to what Mahatma Gandhi has described as the unnatural relation between India and Great Britain. The normalising of these relations is therefore, an essential condition for Asiatic-European collaboration. Mahatma Gandhi at one time, and that not very long ago, thought that this can best be done by making the administration fully responsive to the requirements of the Indian people. Although now he has thrown his great influence on the side of those who stand for a complete severance of the British connection, his article in a recent Young India setting forth eleven reforms which should go far to satisfy him, shows that he is still far from reconciled to a clean break with the historical past of India under the tutelage and guidance (side by side with the exploitation) of Great Britain. We attach the very greatest importance to that article and we should be much surprised if responsible British statesmen do not

THE SOCIAL SERVICE TRAINING FOR WOMEN IN BOMBAY.

(By Miss Wright, University Settlement, Bombay.)

Last year the name of the All-India Women's Conference on Educational Reform was changed to 'The All-India Women's Conference on Educational and Social Reform' because women realised that they could not have educational reform without social reform. After receiving a High School or University education they are forming themselves into social and political societies, holding conferences and formulating schemes for serving their country by working for the uplift of their poor and uneducated women. They have the will to help but they are often discouraged by the magnitude of the task that lies before them and they have very often a vague idea of the ways and methods of setting about it.

The Social Training Centre for women was started three years ago primarily with a view to helping women who, having had opportunities for self-development and education themselves, wished to give what they had received to their less fortunate sisters. It provides facilities whereby those who are attracted towards social service may definitely prepare themselves for it and the theoretical course includes the study of social conditions, social history, modern labour problems, elementary economics, health psychology, modern social institutions, public administration, problems of primary education in India, public meeting work, social ethics, etc.

New Nagpada, in the very heart of the city, has a population of Mohammedans, Hindus, Jews, Indian Christians, Parsees, and Anglo-Indians living 713 to the square acre. The narrow dirty streets are filled with grubby boys fighting and playing cricket with old tins for stumps, grubby little girls minding grubby babies, Mohamedan women in bourkas gossiping on the pavement and Jewish women with their clattering wooden shoes buying ready-cooked food from men who squat in the gutter and cook amid the rubbish and flies. All the noise and dust and teeming humanity that are common to the poor quarters of any great city in the world are found here.

The Social Training Centre is here in a flat in 2nd Pserkhan Street and the resident students go out every day to their practical work in Neighbourhood House, a Settlement for men and boys. Here they hold clubs for Jewish girls and sewing classes mainly for Mohammedan and Hindu women. They also have a Play Centre for the Marathi-speaking children from a Poor house with simple handicrafts, drill and organised games and, most important of all, cleanliness inspection and washing lessons. The first time we tried to wash a very soiled little girl we led her by the hand to the common tap in the yard and were just about to give her a thorough scrub when we were surrounded by a wildly gesticulating crowd of inmates who protested against our washing a low caste child at their caste tap. What unforeseen difficulties the would-be social worker is up against! However we got over the difficulty the next week by bringing with us a basin for water in which all the babies wash from head to foot regardless of caste.

The first student of the Social Training Centre has just returned from the West, where she has taken a further course of social study, to continue her work at the Seva Mandir where a group of young Hindu women are doing splendid work among the mill operatives of Tardeo. Three old students are working at a nursery school and three are doing voluntary educational and club work at Parsee Social Service Centres. Others are doing voluntary or professional work in connection with the Parsee Charity Organisation Society, the Bombay Vigilance Association, and the Children's Aid Society. We feel that a large part of the work of the Social Training Centres lies in keeping in touch with its old students in and outside Bombay and in giving them advice and encouragement in their work. The Social Training Centre tries to direct those who are anxious to do practical work to those institutions which need voluntary helpers. We have organised a group of Parsee ladies who visit weekly the largest women's hospital in Bombay and another group is hoping to start a play Centre and Blue Birds in an orphanage for Mohammedan girls. We have lately arranged for two Hindu married women to visit the prisoners in a Bombay women's gaol.

The Social Training Centre is not only a place of training for voluntary and professional workers, it aims at creating and educating public opinion among women regarding social conditions and in helping them to see and carry out their duties as citizens and patriots. This is our ideal:

To live to the highest in all things that pertain to us, and to lend a hand to all others for this same end.

To recognise the good lying at the heart of all people; to aid in righting the wrongs that cross our path.

ARYA MARRIAGE VALIDITY BILL.

THE EDITOR, THE Indian Social Reformer.

Sir,

In Western countries Christians, Hindus, Mohammedans etc., are permitted to contract valid marriages without any distinction of caste, creed, nationality or religion. But within the territorial limits of India any one professing to be a Hindu, Muslim or Sikh etc., must conform to the formalities and requisites of a valid marriage according to his personal law. Nearly 60 years ago the necessity was felt of having a Civil Marriage Law for the benefit at least of those who did not profess any of the recognised religions and an Act known as the Special Marriage Act, was passed in 1872. Under this Act of 1872 several hundred registered marriages have taken place but this Act has suffered from one grave defect, that no one who is a staunch believer in the tenets of his religion can avail himself of the provisions of this Act, without making a false declaration that he is a non-Hindu or non-Muslim. There are for instance Hindus such as Brahmos and Arya Samajists who have as much reverence for the Shastras and are as staunch believers in Hinduism as the orthodox section, but who maintain that inter-caste marriages were prevalent in ancient times and are sanctioned by their religious books, according to their true interpretation. Until 1923 there did not exist any law under which persons professing to be Hindus who did not wish to place themselves outside their community could contract a valid and legal inter-caste marriage. The Act of 1872 was out of question in their case because they were not willing to call themselves non-Hindus.

In 1910 Mr. Bhupendra Nath Basu brought forward a Civil Marriage Bill for legalising inter-communal and inter-caste marriages but the attempt was unsuccessful. In 1919 Mr. V. J. Patel (now the President of the Assembly) brought before the Pre-Reform Legislature a Hindu Marriage Bill which was confined in its operation to legalising marriages of different castes of Hindus but that Bill was also dropped. At last in 1923 Dr. Sir Hari Singh Gour, the author of the Hindu Code and a distinguished social reformer, introduced his Special Marriage Amendment Bill for the legalisation of both inter-communal as well as inter-caste marriages. His Bill met with strenuous opposition from several quarters particularly from the Muslim members and the orthodox Hindu members with the result that Muslims, Parsis and Jews were excluded entirely from its operation and in deference to the objections of orthodox Hindus several objectionable clauses were introduced in the Act. The Act of 1923 is an enabling or permissive Act by which Hindus, Buddhists, Sikhs, and Jains can celebrate, while remaining as such, registered inter-caste marriages. It is not necessary for the validity of such a marriage that the parties should belong to the same caste, nor is it necessary to perform any ceremony prescribed by their personal law. There are certain features of the Special Marriage Amendment Act of 1923 which are not likely to appeal to the bulk of Hindus for whose benefit it has been passed. The disqualifications which the Act imposes upon a Hindu marrying under it are as follows :—

- (a) It effects his severance from the joint family of which he is a member.
- (b) He forfeits the right to manage Hindu family trusts and charitable property.
- (c) Succession to the property of such person and his issue is governed by the Indian Succession Act.
- (d) He loses the right of adoption.

Before the passing of this amended Act, a person who married under the Act of 1872, and declared himself a non-Hindu, was nevertheless entitled to be governed by his personal law in matters of succession, adoption and management of religious property. The Removal of Caste Disabilities Act 1850, laid it down that no person was to suffer any penalty by the mere fact of his renouncing his caste or religion. The effect of the Act of 1923 is, instead of improving the status of parties marrying under it, the reverse. A person who marries under the Act of 1923, remains in name a Hindu but he has to forego some of the most cherished rights and privileges of being a Hindu. One of them is that he and his issues are governed by the law of succession applicable to Christians, another is that he loses the right of adoption. The effect of these and other disabilities is that the amended Act of 1923 would be perhaps less acceptable to Hindus than the old Act of 1872, and its deterrent provisions would discourage many persons from availing of it.

From the foregoing it would appear that there is need for some Act which is free from the above objections and can meet the needs of that growing section of the Hindu community who wish to break off from the shackles of caste.

It is very gratifying to note that a member of the Assembly has at last brought forward a bill to meet the needs of Arya Samajists and it will be an act of bare justice, to pass the bill and grant relief to the children of those who have chosen from conviction to defy caste and have contracted inter-caste marriages. The bill is restricted in its application to professed Arya Samajists and no other community has any cause for objection. There is no reason why Arya Samajists should be deprived of the benefits of the ancient law of their forefathers and an alien system of law should be fathered upon them simply because they choose to contract an inter-caste marriage. It has been recently held by a High Court that according to the tenets of the Arya Samajists which does not permit differences of caste to interfere with marriage a convert from Christianity or Islam who has undergone a ceremony of initiation in the Arya Samaj, can contract a Valid Hindu marriage with a born Hindu (See Judgment of Justice Kulwant Sahai Macpherson in Sita Devi versus Gopal Saran Narainsingh 1928. A. I. R. Patna 375). If a Hindu can contract a valid marriage with a convert to Hinduism according to the ruling of Patna High Court why a previous born in the fold of Hinduism should be deprived of that right? A division bench of a High Court has given its seal of approval to marriages of this description and it only remains for the Legislature to cure a defect in law and render justice to the Arya community.

A CORRESPONDENT.

Medical Research Institute :—During the week, Mr. M. R. Jayakar's resolution relating to the location of the Central Medical Research Institute was discussed. The feeling of the Assembly was strong against Dehra Dun and in favour of a University Centre. As a conference is to meet shortly to discuss questions relating to Medical Research the resolution was withdrawn on the assurance that the matter would come up again.

RETURNED EMIGRANTS FROM SOUTH AFRICA.

(BY SWAMI BHAWANI DAYAL SANHYASI).

At the time of my departure from South Africa I was asked by the Indian public there to enquire into the condition of the repatriated emigrants and to communicate to them the result of my enquiry as early as possible. I arrived in Bombay on 26th October, 1929, and have since that time been busy making these enquiries. During these three months I have travelled more than 4 thousand miles and have interviewed a large number of these returned emigrants individually and in meetings. Not only had I to travel in Northern India for this purpose but had to go to South India as well. I am grateful to the Government officials—the Commissioner of Police at Bombay, the Protector of Emigrants at Calcutta and the Special officer for South African repatriates at Madras for their valuable help, without which my enquiries would have remained incomplete. I have already drafted out my report but I am withholding it from publication for the following reasons:—

I. The problem of returned emigrants from South Africa is of vast significance and any hasty conclusions may adversely affect the Capetown Agreement.

II. By way of courtesy I must submit my own ideas on this subject to people like Right Honourable V. S. Srinivas Sastri, Sir K. V. Reddy and others and get their suggestions.

III. I have still an open mind on this subject and though the facts and figures that I have been able to gather are sufficient to convince any reasonable person that this repatriation business has proved harmful to the returned emigrants and has brought untold miseries to the colonial-born children, still, I have not made up my mind regarding the line of action to be taken to remedy this state of affairs.

IV. Though I have intimate knowledge about the condition of returned emigrants in Northern India, my knowledge about the returned emigrants in South India is confined to Madras and its suburbs only.

Thus the present statement is only a tentative one and is subject to revision in the light of new facts and figures that may be brought to bear upon it.

It is most difficult for the returned emigrants to settle in India peacefully. During the last three months of my travel in several parts of India, I did not meet a single returned emigrant who is happy with his new environments and who would not like to return to the colony if he could only get a chance; while the number of people who are simply pining away in the hope of getting a free passage to South Africa or any other colony can be counted by hundreds, if not thousands. I have been actually approached by a large number of people to make an arrangement for their emigration to some colony.

It has been a pathetic sight to see some of those healthy labourers of Natal reduced to a mere skeleton by living in the slums of Calcutta and Madras in most unhealthy surroundings. They have cried before me and their cry has made me think furiously about the wisdom of repatriating these people from South Africa and other colonies.

I myself am a colonial born and can therefore easily enter into the spirit of those who are born in the colonies and who are suffering great hardship, on account of the indiscretion of their parents who brought them over here without realising its consequences.

Those who are returning from South Africa are mostly either illiterate or half-educated and they cannot realise the difficulties that await them in the Motherland. To say that they are coming voluntarily is only a half-truth. No doubt there is no compulsion on them but the temptation of £ 20 per adult does persuade most of these returned emigrants to leave South Africa along with their children. Things have considerably changed since the time when these people went to South Africa and they can never visualise the sort of life that they will have to lead in India. Mahatma Gandhi rightly observed in the Young India of 2nd May 1927:

“There is no doubt that if these repatriates are to be received they must be specially cared for. India to most of them, is like foreign land.”

I have been told that a considerable number of the returned emigrants from South Africa emigrate to Malaya and Ceylon after having exhausted all their resources in India. Now this is a serious development which neither the makers of the assisted emigration scheme nor the returning emigrants themselves, could ever have imagined as likely. Wages in Malaya and Ceylon are much lower than those in South Africa. If on their return these returned emigrants are to be compelled by their circumstances to emigrate to Malaya and Ceylon then they ought to be told of this fact before their departure to India.

The assisted emigration scheme has been in force for more than two years and between six and seven thousand Indians have taken advantage of it. What percentage of these people have been able to settle peacefully in India is a question that cannot be answered off hand. For that we require a Commission of enquiry to be appointed by the Government of India. It is a fact that Rao Sahab Kumbhraman Nair in spite of his undoubted ability and deep sympathy has been able to look after only a small percentage of the returned emigrants.

I have been receiving a number of letters from my friends in South Africa to let them know the results of my enquiry. I would advise them to be a little more patient. It is a delicate problem and the Government of India should be given sufficient time to consider this question.

I earnestly hope that Sir Mohammad Habibulla will give his serious attention to this question and would appoint a Commission of enquiry.

If, unfortunately the Government does not accede to this request, then it will be my duty to publish my report by the end of April. We must proceed constitutionally and should not begin any propaganda against repatriation before we have exhausted all other sources of bringing pressure on the Government of India and the Union Government to reconsider the assisted emigration scheme in the light of facts and figures that may be established by the Commission of Enquiry.

I may add here in the end that I alone am responsible for this statement, that is the result of an absolutely independent enquiry.

THE FUTURE OF INDIA.

A friend sends us the following by "Historicus" in the Methodist Times, New York:

During the past few weeks a great storm has raged in both Houses of Parliament and in the Press over the future position of India in the Empire. It raged over two words—"Dominion Status." The storm subsided almost as suddenly as it rose, but not without ominous mutterings and threatenings from one side that it would break out again in the form of trouble in India.

Few of the disputants seemed to me to have any clear idea of what they meant by "Dominion Status." One of the surprises of the discussion was that the man who appeared to have the clearest idea was Gandhi, the Indian leader. For what is the essence of "Dominion Status"? To my mind it is that what is called a "Dominion" is free to leave the British Empire whenever it likes. That, and nothing else, is the essential.

The British Empire (so-called) was an Empire till the early part of the last century. Towards the end of the eighteenth century a great portion of it—then called the American Colonies, and now called the United States of America—broke off. But it broke off by force, as the result of a successful war. Half a century or so later, the Earl of Durham and his secretary, Charles Buller, evolved a new political idea which was in effect based on the inference that all the white colonies would in turn follow the example of the United States. The new idea was to allow them complete control of their own affairs without any interference from the Home Government; the natural corollary being that, being completely independent they could sever their connection whenever they liked, and if they attempted to do so the Home Government would not fire a shot to prevent them.

Durham and Buller were able to carry out their idea in practice because at that time the English people took no interest in the white colonies. Beaconsfield, the great Imperialist of the nineteenth century, spoke of them as being "millstones round our necks." That was the view of all the shortsighted politicians of all parties. So Durham and Buller were left alone to do what they liked with the most troublesome of the "millstones"—Canada.

Their foresight—if they foresaw all the consequences of their action—was, indeed, remarkable. They had introduced a new and active ferment into the old Roman idea of Empire—that is, the holding by military force of subject peoples by a virile and conquering power. It is true the great statesmanship of the Romans modified that primal conception and made the Roman Empire the long-lived institution it became by very wide extensions of citizenship and self-government. Perhaps Durham and Buller derived their great idea from the Romans. I suspect rather that their action was based solely or mainly on a firm faith in the Whig principle of liberty.

At any rate, from the moment of their first step there began the process of dividing the Empire—now no longer rightly so-called—into two portions one portion quite independent in its government; the other, governed from London, the heart and centre of the Empire. The process has proceeded steadily ever since till to-day the purely white colonies—and one, South Africa, by no means, even mainly, white—are all independent and enjoying as complete self-government as if they were sovereign States.

This process has not gone on without opposition. From the moment when it was realised what Durham had really done, the genuine Imperialists in this country took alarm and tried to undo what he had accomplished. They recognised that it would be difficult, perhaps impossible, to put back the clock, and deprive Canada of the freedom she had gained. But they tried even that by indirect means. They started a crusade for what they called "Imperial Federation." That meant a Parliament for the whole Empire, or at least for the self-governing parts of it. That involved, as gradually became plain, that such a Parliament would have the right of taxation and tariffs all over the Empire, and that meant in its turn Free Trade all over the Empire. From that moment "Imperial Federation" was doomed to the opposition of the white Dominions. So it dropped like the stick of a rocket.

The only frontal attack that the Imperialists delivered since Durham turned their position unnoticed, was after the South African war, when Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman proposed to admit a united South Africa to "Dominion Status." Even some members of his own cabinet, fearful that he was going too fast and too far, wavered. Not that they were Imperialists; they were firm believers in liberty, but cautious and timorous believers. Sir Henry put his back to the wall and won a resounding triumph, writing his name for ever in the annals of the country.

The late Great War was an astounding revelation to foreign nations, and even to many people in this country. Before that war was in sight, an able Prussian friend of mine, a great admirer and friend of England, used to assure me that England did not understand the art of government. He told me that we displayed it in India, in Egypt, and in Ireland. But that if England were engaged in a big war, Canada, Australia, South Africa, New Zealand, and Newfoundland would break off and become independent nations. They were in no way bound to England. I used to assure him that just that portion of our Empire would rally to the old country as loyally as the people at home. If we had any trouble, it would be in India, in Egypt, in Ireland. He pitied my shortness of sight, and ignorance of the art of government. He died before the falsification of his prophecies came.

Few people realise that just as the Empire (so-called) consists of two parts, the real Empire and the British Commonwealth of self-governing States, so the so-called India is governed in large degree from London. One-third of it is governed by almost independent princes, with armies and governments of their own. This third was as loyal and helpful as the white Dominions in the Great War. Imperialists, fighting a rearguard action, constantly tell us that only white men are fit to govern. Yet many of these native princes are men of great ability, of great statesmanship, who could hold their own with any of the statesmen of Europe or America. The fact which I have tried to set out in the above paragraphs are worthy of the careful attention of all who look into the difficult, and possibly, sometimes dangerous, future.

The issue is a very simple one. Some men believe that no country should have under its sway any but willing subjects. They are the anti-Imperialists. Others hold that a superior country (which always means the one to which they themselves belong) has the right and duty to govern for their own good other inferior nations. They are the Imperialists. The former wish all subjects of the Crown to be made willing subjects, and believe the only way to accomplish this is to make all so free that no greater freedom could be obtained if the Empire ceased to exist. The latter are careless whether subjects are willing or not, but are determined that subjects they shall remain.

Between these two definite schools there are a number of wobbling doubters. Some believe ultimately in liberty, but fear its too rapid extension. They are honest, but timid. There can, undoubtedly, be too rapid movement even in a right direction. It is the part of statesmanship to decide the exactly right moment. Others profess that complete freedom is their goal, but persistently throw every obstacle in the way of every advance. They are dishonest and cowardly. Their hearts are Imperialist, but they are afraid to say so. To a certain extent I admire the out-and-out Imperialist. In my opinion he is blind, but honest and brave. But my belief in liberty remains an unshakable faith.

TRAFFIC IN WOMEN AND CHILDREN.

We have received the following from the Information section of the League of Nations, Geneva:—

At the fifty-fifth session of the Council a proposal was considered for the extension of the expert enquiry into traffic in women and children to other countries not previously visited, especially in the East. The Traffic in Women and Children Committee at its eighth session had endorsed the opinion expressed by the Assembly at its ninth session that the enquiry should be extended. The Rapporteur to the Council pointed out that the possibility of continuing the enquiry must depend on the question of finance. He drew attention however, at the same time, to the fact that there was a strong probability that the necessary funds would be made available from the same source as those provided for the previous enquiry, in the event of both the Council, and the interested States feeling that such an enquiry would be of real value.

The council, therefore, instructed the Secretary-General to communicate in regard to this question with the Governments concerned, namely, those governments of the Near, Middle and Far East whose territories had not been visited in the course of the previous enquiry and to ask them whether they would be prepared to give their consent and co-operation to the action suggested on the understanding that the enquiry would relate strictly to the international aspects of the problem. The Council requested the Secretary-General to prepare and submit to it, if possible for the December session, a report dealing with the replies received from the Governments concerned and containing also suggestions for the composition of the Special Body of Experts and the scope of the enquiry.

Replies have now been received by the Secretary-General from all the States with which he communicated. China, France, Great Britain, India, Japan, the Netherlands, Persia, Portugal and Siam have all expressed their willingness to receive the enquiry within their territories. Several of those States lay stress on the fact that the enquiry must be into the international aspects of the question alone. The scope of the enquiry seems, therefore, well defined.

It will be noted that India states also in her reply that in accepting the enquiry the Government of India understands that suitable changes will be made in (1) the composition of the Special Body of Experts, (2) the investigations employed and (3) the methods of investigation.

China in giving her consent to the investigations assumes that a national approved by the Government of each country visited will be attached to the Special Body of Experts to participate in its investigations in that country.

The Advisory Committee had itself considered it desirable to point out in its report to the Council that the social customs of some countries in the East differed in many aspects from those obtaining in European or American States and that it was, therefore, important to bear this carefully in mind in determining the nature and extent of the enquiries to be made and the methods to be followed in conducting the investigation. The Committee had, therefore, recommended that when the time came for continuing the work in the new field, the composition of the Special Body of Experts should be examined by the Council in the light of the altered circumstances so as to ensure, in particular that the Body of Experts should include persons who have a wide knowledge and experience of the Eastern conditions.

It is clear that in order to act in accordance with the recommendations of the Advisory Committee, and at the same time to take into account the observations made by India, it will be necessary to find for the new Body of the Experts men and women having, as far as possible, an intimate knowledge of Eastern conditions and at the same time a knowledge of the problem with which the Body of Experts will have to deal. It would seem particularly important that the Chairman of the Special Body should have a high standing in the East and be persona grata both to the diplomatic world and to the social worker. It might perhaps be possible for the Rapporteur to put forward the name of some such person to the Council at its coming session.

It would not seem desirable to follow in the East the same method of underworld investigation as was followed in the enquiry into conditions in Europe and the Americas. As an alternative method the following might be worth consideration by the Council:

The expert Committee might consist of not less than seven and not more than ten members, of whom three should form a travelling commission. In order to select these experts the members of the Council might agree to propose, before the May meeting of the Council, names of men and women having a knowledge both of the international traffic problem and of the East. It would not be necessary for these experts to be nationals of the States submitting their names. These names might be considered before the May meeting of the Council and a suitable number selected by the Rapporteur assisted by two members of the Council. The Council Sub-Committee, in making its report, might also be asked to state which of the expert would, in its opinion, be most suitable as travelling commissioners. Of these travelling commissioners one at least should be a woman, as the problem is naturally one of very great interest not only to women of the East but to all women.

In view of the fact that the funds for the enquiry are being made available from American sources and of the great services rendered by the Chairman and the Director of Investigation (both of them American) during the first enquiry, the Council might, in the event of the plan herein proposed being followed, wish to include these two names in the list of experts to be considered by the Rapporteur and his two colleagues.

A MODERN LOURDES.

Karl Schriftgiesser writes in the New Republic:—

Father Patrick Power has been dead for sixty years. While he lived he was little known—an obscure priest who never had a parish of his own. Thirty years after his death, so the story goes, the grass on his grave remained green when all around it was yellow and dying. Candles placed upon his grave kept burning when candles placed on other graves flickered and went out. The grave took on a special significance and once or twice cures were reported to have happened there. But the rank and file of the faithful knew nothing about it, and only those who heard about it in a casual way went there to do homage. Three weeks ago a tabloid newspaper resurrected the story of the grave's strange, uncanny power; it told of cures of the afflicted reported there; the story spread to the front pages of the Boston press until such a wave of religious hysteria as has never been known before in Massachusetts has brought fully eight hundred thousand people in the past three weeks into the cemetery to fall on their knees and kiss the obscure grave of the unknown priest.

Twice has Cardinal William O'Connell visited the grave, and the report is current that the machinery of the Church has been started toward making the Malden grave a shrine on a par with St. Anne de Beaupré and with Lourdes. But, whether or not this is so, surely no modern city has ever seen in this century such an overwhelming outpouring of maimed and crippled, diseased and idiot, seeking to regain their health from the supernatural.

Darkness had fallen when I boarded the street car in the dismal elevated terminal at Everett. There was no need to ask the way. One followed the crowd. Irish, Italians, French Canucks, Americans, white, black—a motley mixture of races with Irish predominating—were heading towards the shrine. Extra cars were being run out into the out-skirts of Malden where the graveyard is. On my car an ancient crone, a crippled girl, an idiot boy with his plodding Irish father and care-worn mother, a young couple, well dressed and well fed, stood out from the mediocrity of the others. None of them smiled, and on the faces of all these hopefuls who were going to offer prayers for themselves, and for others, perhaps, who could not go themselves, there was stamped a dumb, appealing, saint-like look.

Silent as cattle they sat there, and no one minded his neighbor. The car jerked its way along through the brighter lights of Everett Square, out of the dark thoroughfare. None got off; it was as if it had been a special car sent only to carry the pilgrims. Finally it stopped, and one knew one was at last at Holy Cross. As far as one could see, on either side of the street, cars were parked. Hundreds of others were looking for a space. Policemen, imbued with a suspicious courtesy guided the faithful across the street. By the iron gate that bars the way of automobiles—except those which arrive in quick succession bearing the maimed and the paralyzed—police herd the growing crowd into two lines. Two single files, that go up the hill, wind through the graves, and reach at the end the spot where Father Power lies.

Strong men guide ancient women who hobble painfully along. Young toughs mingle with the crowds and try to look less hard than usual. A mother carries a baby, its lifeless legs dangling like a doll's legs from beneath its little skirts. A toil-bent laborer staggers a bit; a little girl leads a woman who cannot see her way; two boys push a twisted, tortured paralytic wreck in a wheel chair; a gibbering idiot is carefully led along by his harassed but faithful mother; one man, his face all sores like the face of Lazarus, slumps down into the collar of his coat. The ground is drying from an afternoon of rain and the wind is chill. A moon sheds light palely on the gravelled walk, shines in the puddles by the roadside. The lights of a car come up the hill—another cripple on a stretcher, brought out into the night to be healed by faith where the hands of science have failed.

Two thin lines going up the hill. Hardly any talk from anyone; not a laugh anywhere; scarcely a smile, except from a mother bearing her infant whose two eyes look inward at each other; but in the faces of them all that look of dumb faith in something they cannot explain, but which they believe as strongly as it is possible for humans to believe. The line never breaks, and it never ends. At midnight it will be the same, and when the dawn comes it will be moving there, just as it is now. I fall in with the rest, and, inch by inch, creep closer to the resting place of Father Patrick Power. In front of me is a woman. She, like myself, is cold, but she stands there as patiently as centuries ago women stood to watch the passing of the Christ. In front of her is her husband. They are Italians, and his face is wet with tears. His big brown eyes are pleading, his lips move in prayer. For in his arms is the child of their union, and if the faith of these two can make her whole again—well, then there are miracles. For her eyes see not, her legs feel not, her mouth hangs open and never utters a sound. Nor can she hear the plodding, shuffling feet, nor the murmuring of prayers as the slow line moves along.

I follow these two, fascinated. Hope fills them; hope, and faith. At last the grave is reached. Two policemen, patient as Job, are exhorting the crowd. "Just touch the shrine. The chapel is open for prayer. Be quick and let the cripples have a chance." It is a singsong, repeated from morn till night. With gentle hands they lead the father and the mother and the unhuman child to a place. Crossing themselves the parents kneel. The father holds the baby over the shrine. He places a candle in her senseless hands; it falls out; he picks it up. He holds it there. With his other hand he scoops up the dank earth of the grave.

He rubs it on the withered legs, the sightless eyes, the dumb mouth. He crosses himself again and from a bottle pours holy water on the tala dress of his bambino. Tears streak down his olive cheeks and his lips are moving in continuous prayer. The child, whose tam o' shanter keeps falling off for the mother to place on again with shaking hands, grins horribly and tries to babble. Five minutes they stay there. Even the police are moved, and do not hurry them. Once more the father scoops up the earth and rubs the members of this luckless child. He puts her on her feet, his face now alight with wonder, with hope, with faith. His bambino tumbles in a heap at his feet and does not move. It is like a slap in the face to the father. He gathers her up, crying; the mother's weeping can be heard. They move off—to the chapel. To pray.

The line moves on. Twenty people at a time can kneel around the grave where vigil lights in little red tumbler flicker in the chill wind. The grave, whence the marker has been removed since the crowds began coming, is covered with coins and bills which have been dropped there by the moving mob. For a few seconds the faithful kneel, cross themselves, say a prayer, Then they are urged on by the two policemen. Others take their places. The cripples have the right of way. Some of them fling themselves down in ludicrous, pitiful positions. They babble their prayers and rub their sores with dirt that is damp and sticky. Some carry away handfuls of it and every now and then a laborer brings more in a shovel to sprinkle over the shrine. Gifts are left there, wrapped in paper. Some light tapers there and blow them out. The center of the grave is a mass of wax from the vigil lights.

A man in a wheel chair is brought up. He is lifted out. He hasn't walked for twelve years. The crowd closes in. He says his prayers and rubs his legs, from which the trousers have been removed, with dirt. He works it in around the heavy braces. He is there ten minutes. Then he is lifted to his wheel chair again. Away from the grave two friends laboriously remove the braces and with an effort lift him to his feet. He smiles and strains. They step aside—only to spring back and catch him as he falls heavily to the ground. A young man in derby hat and tight fitting overcoat says, "You must have faith. Others have walked and you can. Go to the chapel and pray and almighty God will make you walk." The man is crying, so is everyone around him. He is wheeled off to the chapel on the hill. "God, but my legs hurt," he whimpers, and he tries to choke back the tears.

I go to the chapel. The father with his bambino has just reached the altar rail. He lights a taper, he prays, he counts his beads. He rubs the afflicted baby—as hundreds of others have done—against the statue of the Christ upon the Cross. His face is hopeful again and, his prayers finished, he moves off—to visit the shrine and go through it all once more. The chapel is crowded and the air is rank with body-smells and burning paraffin. A boy in dungarees keeps replacing burnt-out vigil lights. Firemen in uniform keep the crowd lined up. Here one may pray as long as one desires. The crowd which has gone up to the grave comes here and prays and prays. The cripples, the diseased, the deaf and the dumb, they come or are brought. Some are borne down the aisle on stretchers, some carried like drunken men between supporting comrades. There are more women, but there are hundreds of men. Babes in arms are plentiful; children, middle-aged, ancients—from every walk of life. Some just curious, but all silent and imbued with a religious hysteria that makes them all akin. The only music in the chapel is the clink of coins being cast at the altar rail.

Day and night this keeps up. For three weeks now the crowds have been growing greater and greater. The stories in the newspapers of cures have been increasing daily. In the eight hours I wandered about I saw no cripple suddenly walk, no dumb person speak, no blind man cast away his darkened glasses. But in the chapel the pile of braces and crutches, canes and spectacles grows larger all the time. The Herald has run a full-page feature story of a cure, the first that not only has taken place, but has lasted beyond the hysteria at the graveside. And while the Church has not yet spoken, except to defend shrines in general, it has not condemned. The cemetery, presided over by the brother of Cardinal O'Connell, stays open twenty-four hours a day and pilgrims to the extent of fifty thousand in one single day come flocking to the grave.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Independence of the Dominions:—The Conference on the operation of Dominion legislation and merchant shipping legislation representing Britain, the Dominions and India, which sat in London last year has issued a report embodying its recommendations formed with the object of "carrying into full effect the quality of the status established as the root principle, covering the relations between members of the Commonwealth, and indicating methods for maintaining and strengthening a practical system of free co-operation. It expresses the opinion that the power of the Crown on the advice of Ministers of the United Kingdom to disallow Dominion legislation cannot any longer be exercised. It recommends the enactment of legislation affirming that the Dominion Parliaments are fully empowered to make laws having extra territorial operation. The Conference recommends that the Colonial Laws Validity Act of 1865 shall cease to apply to any law, made by the Parliaments of the Dominions. It declares that inasmuch as the Crown is the symbol of the free association of the members of the Commonwealth, a convention should be framed laying down that any alteration of the law touching the succession to the throne, or royal style and titles shall hereafter require the assent of the Parliaments of all the Dominions as well as the Parliament of the United Kingdom.

Untouchables in Temple Ceremony:—It was a red letter day in the history of Wardha when the Janmotsava celebration of the Shri Lakshminarayana temple belonging to Seth Jamanlalji was performed. A huge procession of high caste Hindus and so-called untouchables who mixed freely among themselves passed through the main streets of Wardha amidst great enthusiasm and religious fervour. It was followed by a mass meeting of the processionists and others, presided over by Baba Saheb Dashmukh when Acharya Venoba Bhawe of Wardha Satyagrahashram delivered a very impressive speech. After the meeting, there was a big feast in which about 300 untouchables were fed in the temple grounds amidst singing. Then followed harikirtan in the Lakshminarayana temple. The whole ceremony ended late at night amidst great enthusiasm and ovation.

Dr. Kalidas Nag:—The Calcutta Review writes that Dr. Kalidas Nag M.A., D.Litt. (Paris) has been invited by the Carnegie Institute of International Education, New York, America, to deliver a course of lectures on "Indian Art and Archaeology" as the visiting Professor of the Institute for 1930. He has also been invited by a number of learned Societies of Europe, such as the German Academy of Munich and the Kern Institute of Leyden, to deliver lectures on Indian cultural subjects.

FIRE INSURANCE.

MILLOWNERS & MERCHANTS OF INDIA.

Do you know that 50 of the leading countries of the world have, during the last 20 years, taken effective steps to establishing their own Insurance Companies for conserving the insurance premiums in their own countries? Governments have helped Insurance Companies by passing favourable legislations in favour of Companies even at a disadvantage to foreign companies. The patriotism of the business community of these countries has enabled Insurance Companies to become a real power, and a large financial institution.

It is in your hands to make the Indian Insurance Companies as powerful financially in this country as Insurance Companies have become in other countries. We appeal to you for patronage to your own institutions and we hope that you will stand by these Indian Insurance Companies.

NOTES.

The Working Committee's Decision:—
The Working Committee of the Congress which met at Ahmedabad during the week passed the following resolution giving full power to Mahatma Gandhi to start his campaign of civil disobedience: "In the opinion of the Working Committee civil disobedience should be initiated and controlled by those who believe in non-violence for the purpose of achieving Purna Swaraj as an article of faith, and as the Congress contains in its organisation not merely such men and women, but also those who accept non-violence as a policy essential in the existing circumstances in the country, the Working Committee welcomes the proposal of Mahatma Gandhi and authorises him and those working with him who believe in non-violence as an article of faith to the extent above indicated to start civil disobedience as and when they desire and in the manner and to the extent they decide. The Working Committee trusts that when the campaign is actually in action all Congressmen and others will extend to the civil resisters their full cooperation in every way possible, and that they will observe and preserve complete non-violence notwithstanding any provocation that may be offered. The Working Committee further hopes that in the event of a mass movement taking place, all those who are rendering voluntary cooperation to the Government, such as lawyers, and those who are receiving so-called benefits from it, such as students, will withdraw their cooperation or renounce benefits as the case may be, and throw themselves into the final struggle for freedom. The Working Committee trusts, that in the event of the leaders being arrested and imprisoned, those, who are left behind and have the spirit of sacrifice and service in them, will carry on the Congress organisation, and guide the movement to the best of their ability."

The Baroda Divorce Bill:—The comment of the Catholic Leader on the Baroda Divorce (for Hindus) Bill will interest our readers: "It is a pity that one of the most enlightened and progressive States in India, Baroda, is introducing legislation to loosen the marriage bond. The indissolubility of the marriage contract is one of the best features of Hindu family life and any weakening of that tie must have disastrous consequences on the welfare of many homes and families. The up-bringing and education of children demand the undivided attention of both father and mother and by the natural law marriage has always been regarded in civilised countries as a permanent and indissoluble union between man and woman. The existence and welfare of the State depend upon the existence of the home and divorce should never be sanctioned by civil authority in its own interests and in the general interests of its subjects. Divorce is a devastating plague and is responsible for the misery, unhappiness and ruin of many families in countries where it has been legally introduced. There is evidently room for the reform of the Hindu family life and the elevation of the position of woman. The practice of polygamy and the legal disqualification of women in matters of inheritance and succession should be done away with and equal status with men accorded to them. But divorce far from contributing to the progress and emancipation of woman will only tend to her degradation and frustrate the primary purpose of marriage." We publish elsewhere in this issue an article from Mr. Bhagat Ram who is evidently an Anya gentleman and a fervent advocate of divorce. We are surprised that, believing as he does, that the average Hindu marriage is unhappy Mr. Ram stops short at a "qualified form of divorce" and does not ask for easy divorce. To turn to the Catholic Leader, we should like to point out, that divorce is not contemplated with a view to break up family life but to decrease the number of unhappy families and we should say that children are more likely to benefit if they are removed from homes where they are neglected. As to civilised countries regarding marriage as a permanent and indissoluble union our contemporary may have its own meaning of the word "civilised." The attempt to introduce divorce in Hindu Society is not a mere hankering after novelty but arises from a genuine desire to alleviate suffering. It is, if we may say so, a choice between two evils and the mere possibility of a divorce may result in many cases in more consideration being shown to each other by the two parties. Even among the Roman Catholics, we believe, there is what virtually amounts to a divorce. But annulment has this disadvantage to divorce in that it works retro-actively and illegitimatises the issue of the marriage.

The Late Dewan Bahadur A. K. Pai:—
In the death of Dewan Bahadur A. K. Pai, which occurred on Tuesday last, the city of Bombay loses a genuine and earnest social worker and reformer. Possessed of a high civic sense and public spirit the Dewan Bahadur threw himself heart and soul into the work of the Bombay Municipal Corporation, of which he was a member for the last eight years, ever since his retirement as an employee from that body. His services to the Corporation led to his election as the chairman of the Standing Committee and later on as the chairman of the Schools' Committee. It was mainly through the efforts of Mr. Pai that the Scout movement was introduced in Municipal schools and he kept up his interest in the movement to the last. As a social reformer he was a staunch believer in the education and progress of women and he set a practical example by educating his daughter who is an M.A. of the Bombay University and who recently left Bombay for Rajkot to take up the principalship of the Girls' High School there. Mr. Pai was actuated by great sympathy for the poor and the oppressed and was actively engaged in the movement for the relief of helpless beggars in Bombay by directing the individual alms giving into institutional channels. A free and liberal spirit pervaded all his activities and his death leaves a gap in the ranks of public men in Bombay.

The Late Mr. Mirza Ali Mahomed Khan:—We regret to record the death of Mr. Mirza Ali Mahomed Khan, the Vice Chancellor of the Bombay University on Thursday last. He came of an enlightened Muslim family and was himself a distinguished Persian scholar. He served the Bombay Municipal Corporation in the varied capacities of member, Chairman of the Standing Committee and President. The late Mr. Khan was a Fellow of the Bombay University for many years and for a long time an elected member of the Syndicate and Dean of the Faculty of Arts. He was appointed Vice-Chancellor of the University last year and to him belonged the privilege of ushering in the reforms in the University. Himself a staunch Muslim, Mr. Khan evinced a keen interest in the education and uplift of his community.

Broadcasting in India:—Broadcasting in India has been the proverbial nine days' wonder. The Indian Broadcasting Company which was started about two years ago has announced that it would close down by the end of this month owing to its financial condition. Due to several reasons the wireless in India has not been as popular as was anticipated. There is a general feeling that the Company was defrauded of its income from licences and the levy on imported wireless apparatus. On the other hand, its failure is attributed by the public to the poor standard of the programmes broadcast. The Company's appeal to the Government for financial help was turned down and the Directors had no alternative but to advise the shareholders to wind up its affairs. The potentialities of the wireless as a factor in education are great indeed. It is unfortunate that the advantage conferred by this great invention of modern science will be lost when the need for education by all available means is nowhere so imperative as in this country. We, therefore, welcome the news that some leading members of the Assembly including Sir Purshotamdas Thakurdas and Sir Darcy Lindsay are getting up an appeal to the Government to take over the affairs of the Company. Since writing the above, it was decided at an extraordinary meeting of the company held on Monday last to wind up voluntarily the business of the company.

Mysore Dewan on Communal Institutions:—Sir Mirza Ismail, the Dewan of Mysore has always taken a true perspective of communal institutions and has regarded them as a means to an end. In his forceful speech at the opening ceremony of the Jain Students' Home at Mysore, elaborating this point, he observed: "Hostels or other institutions of a denominational kind are not altogether a blessing in a country like ours with its diverse castes and creeds, because they tend to emphasize, if not to perpetuate, those differences and distinctions which it must be the desire of every patriotic Indian—with a vision for the future—to minimise, and, as far as possible, to ignore. In the peculiar circumstances of India, however, their abolition must remain an ideal for a long time yet; and in the meantime, it is only right that the desire for the uplift of one's own community, which expresses itself in such forms as we witness to-day, should not be discouraged but fully utilised. Only, let the boys and young men living in the hostel be taught that they owe a lesser allegiance to their hostel than to their school or college, and through that, to their country. Beyond the hostel is the school or college, beyond the Jain community is the Indian Motherland. It is only by the cultivation of such an attitude; by laying stress on the wider relationships of humanity, that it is possible for a country of many religions and races to take its proper place among the nations of the world. India cannot progress if its efforts are governed by separated aspirations."

Sarda Act Again:—The nearer we are to the 1st of April when the Sarda Act comes into force the more frantic are the efforts made by the opponents of the Act to avoid the consequences of it. An absurd case is reported in the Tribune: "A girl of 6 months has been married to a boy of 3 years at a village named Kaler, in the Amritsar district. At the time of Phera ceremony the girl was in the arms of her mother and the boy was in the arms of his father. It is understood that this was due to the Child Marriage Act." These cases which have received some prominence in the press are further evidence that the greater part of the people will not go against the Act when it comes into force. We are sorry for the individuals who will suffer through these panicky measures and who have been victimised by their parents.

"A Picture of India":—We have received a copy of the India number of the London Times, for review and we have looked through the contributions in vain for one from the pen of any Indian public man. In fact there is only one on the awakening of Indian women by Miss Cornelia Sorabji. A marked feature of the issue is the numerous advertisements from the railways in this country and one might look on the publication as a Government one in many respects. Ex-Governors and ex-civil servants have contributed to fill the pages of the paper and it could more aptly have been called the "Official Estimate of British Rule in India." We greatly doubt if any Englishman will seriously learn much about India from this number to which we learn with surprise that over a year has been devoted.

INDIAN SOCIAL REFORMER.

BOMBAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1930.

AHIMSA AND LOVE.

The Indian National Congress passed at its last session at Lahore a resolution explicitly declaring that its creed was the attainment of Independence, and the means to be employed were non-violent non-co-operation and civil disobedience, under the guidance of Mahatma Gandhi. The Working Committee of the Congress met at the Udyoga Mandir at Sabarmati last Saturday and decided upon its plan of action. This, in short, is the endorsement of the proposal of Mahatmaji to give him a free hand with the help of his more intimate associates who believe in non-violence as an article of faith, to start and carry on civil disobedience, at the time, in the manner and on the issue which they consider to be most appropriate. Referring to the resolution of the Working Committee, Mahatmaji observes in his article in Young India: "The resolution of the Working Committee gives me my charter of freedom if it also binds me in the tightest chains. It is the formula of which I have been in search these long and weary months." At the moment we are not able to look up references, but we have a general notion that the present formula is practically an old one which he adopted in South Africa and "the long and weary search" was largely the process of recovering from the depths of the sub-conscious a past experience which had been submerged in it through lapse of time. The ensuring of non-violence was to him then as now a far more important consideration than even the object with which civil disobedience was undertaken. It necessarily follows that he could only accept as co-adjutors those who under any circumstances would not waver in their non-violence. This steadfastness is possible only to those who have realised as an experience that non-violence is the most effective weapon of victory in every struggle where right is at issue with error. Mere blind faith will not suffice. A person who can blindly believe, can believe as much in error as in truth. Peter denied Christ thrice before cock-crow because he had till then only blind faith. There must be the conviction and the faith born of conviction that non-violence is absolutely the strongest force in a conflict between an awakened sense of right and an established social or political system. Mahatma Gandhi, of course, has arrived at such faith through such conviction. We may say that we believe in it too not altogether in the abstract, as we have found it effective as a working principle of everyday life. Control of anger and other explosive tendencies of human nature, sets free the better part of it and what began as a negative process is transformed into a positive, vitalising force making for the solution of difficult problems in the spirit of goodwill. There is one important principle to which attention may be called. Action, in the spiritual sense which is also the psychological, does not mean overt action. Thought is action. Violence in thought is as much as knocking down your adversary in its subjective effects. There is a verse of the Gita, among many of wonderful insight into Indian psychology, which warns the aspirant to truth that mere control of the organs of sense, if it is not fortified by the control of the mind, breeds only hypocrisy. Violence and non-violence in Mahatma Gandhi's propaganda contains, we fear, no similar warning. In any case, we have our doubts whether a principle derived from the experience of highly-developed individuals, can be applied wholesale to a group of men. The personal loyalty to a well beloved Teacher counts for much, but when his personal guidance is prevented or withheld, followers are liable to lose heart and collapse, or to break the bounds of the non-violent creed and launch into violent resistance. Sikhism provides a classical illustration. Originally a peaceful, non-violent creed, it was transformed by oppression into a militant sect, every member of which man, woman and child, is enjoined to carry on the person a miniature sword as a religious emblem. Mussolini in his autobiography writes: "In some contingencies violence has a deep moral significance. Ignorance was still astride of the workmen and peasant masses. It was useless to attempt to blaze a trail by fine words, by sermons from chairs. It was necessary to give timely, genial recognition to chivalrous violence. The only straight road was to beat the violent forces of evil on the very ground they had chosen." These sentences show that, while Mussolini held by non-violence as a general principle, he was of opinion that violence can become sanctified if used in a good cause to overcome violence. Many well-educated Hindus believe that this is precisely the teaching of the Gita and there are many among even Mahatma Gandhi's disciples who may not altogether discard Mussolini's doctrine as contravening their personal belief in non-violence. What we wish to emphasise is that in starting civil disobedience and before, and long before, doing it, the possibility, nay, the probability of its developing a violent side, ought to be clearly faced and provided for. Mahatma Gandhi in his article quotes a fragment, and that not correctly, of St. Paul's grand definition of charity which is Love. If he had the whole of it before him, he would have found that an essential attitude of Love is patience. Let us do it for him.

"Love suffereth long and is kind; Love envieth not; Love vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up;

"Doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil;

"Beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things;

"Love never faileth."

The true rendering of the word, Ahimsa, says Mahatmaji, in English is Love or Charity. We agree with him. He who is not actively kind, said Ruskin, is cruel. But as popularly understood, and we are here dealing with a popular movement, Ahimsa means only abstinence from physical violence. Even that in only certain conventional forms. We need not enlarge on this, as Mahatmaji himself has done so many times. We are told it is no use arguing with him now that he has crossed the Rubicon. We refuse to take this view. We have seen him (having been present with him at the time), call off the contemplated Bardoli satyagraha within a few hours of the time fixed for launching it. He had to bear heavy reproaches from his closest friends, but he did not mind. We are confident that even now if he is convinced that there is a better way or that the data upon which he has made his decision are by no means complete or accurate, he will not hesitate, cost what it might, to reconsider it. We suggest that in conformity with Pauline charity which he accepts as a true description of ahimsa, he should believe the Viceroy and Mr. Wedgwood Benn when they say that they intend to have a completely free and open exploration at the Round Table Conference and that he should hope that the result of such exploration will give the country what it needs. He has given an implied promise in one of his articles that, if as a result of the Round Table Conference a satisfactory settlement is reached, he would gladly relinquish his present plans. We suggest that he should wait, if he cannot indeed bring himself to join the Conference, till its results are known before launching civil disobedience anywhere or for any reason. We have seen the behaviour of the Independence young men at the Liberal meeting at Blavatsky Hall and we cannot say that it was a conspicuous example of St. Paul's definition. Love doth not behave itself unseemly. Nor can we find in the speeches of some of the younger politicians the charity which vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up. And these are the instruments with which Mahatmaji has to work.

INDIANS ABROAD.

The following statement has been issued by the South African Indian Congress having reference to the term "domicile" as defined in Act 37 of 1927:

Act No. 37 of 1927 enacted by the Government of the Union of South Africa, which amends the law relating to immigration of Asiatics, gives an enlarged definition of the term "Domicile," and lays down, among other things, "that a person shall be deemed for the purposes of this Act to have lost his domicile within the Union if he absents himself from the Union and does not re-enter the Union within three years from the date of departure therefrom or from the commencement of the Act (which is the Immigration and Indian Relief (Further Provision Act, 1927) whichever may be later, whether or not he is in possession of a registration certificate or a certificate of domicile or any other document issued under any prior law permitting his entrance to or residence in or recognising his domicile in the Union or any Province thereof."

The purport of this definition is that a person shall return to the place of his domicile in the Union within three years of his departure therefrom, or within three years from the commencement of the Act, whichever may be later.

The Act came into force on the 5th of May 1927. This means that those who have overstayed in India the period of three years allowed them should return to the Union by the 5th of May 1930, if not, they shall be deemed to have lost their domicile, and, of course, will be refused to enter the Union.

This notice is issued for the information of people domiciled in the Union, but who are now in India and who come under this part of the definition of "Domicile" laid down in the Act.

SASTRI COLLEGE.

The following information has been issued by the Education Department:—

(1) Sastri College: This institution will open on Feb. 10, 1930, the delay being due to the inability of the teachers from India getting to Natal earlier. The classes will be from Standard V. to Standard X. Provision will be made for (a) secondary education, and (b) the training of teachers.

No pupil will be admitted who intends to pursue only a primary course. A pupil entering any Standard below VIII. will be required to give a written undertaking that he intends to stay at school until he has completed Standard VIII. at least, and must also produce a written statement from his last headmaster as to the last Standard passed by him.

The enrolment will be limited to 220, so intending applicants should take immediate steps to carry out the provisions of the previous paragraph. All applications for admission should be addressed to the headmaster, Mr. W. M. Buss, B.A., whose address is Sastri College, Durban.

Fees will be charged as follows:—

Standard V., 5s. per school month; Standard VI., 6s.; Standard VII., 7s. 6d.; Standard VIII., 10s.; Standard IX., 12s. 6d.; Standard X., 15s.

(2) Mitchell Crescent School: This will be opened on Jan. 27, 1930, as a girls' school, from Standard IV. to VII. The fees will be:—

Standard IV., 2s. per school month; Standard V., 2s. 6d.; Standard VI. and Standard VII., 5s.

The staff here will be of European women. The intention is to develop the school up to Standard X. if support is forthcoming.

(3) Carlisle Street School: This will become from Jan. 27, 1930, a primary school for boys up to Standard VI. There will be an Indian staff. Boys who do not intend in any case to go beyond Standard VI. must attend this or some other primary school in Durban.

GOKHALE—THE MAN AND HIS WORK.*

GOKHALE'S HOUR OF TRIAL.

Of all professions journalism is at once the most fascinating and the most dreary. It is fascinating because of the wide variety of interests it constantly presents and because, if one happens to have some great cause at heart, it gives him the opportunity of striking a blow for it at the right time. It is dreary because, unlike the other professions such as law and medicine where the results of one's efforts are known sooner or later, the journalist may never know what the results of his efforts are. Sometimes, however, the journalist also has the gratification of knowing that what he wrote has produced some effect and there is no moment in his life so exhilarating as when he is told by some distant and unknown reader that his writing stirred in him some abiding thought or emotion. This experience happened to me with Gokhale. The Indian Social Reformer, published in its issue of the 16th January 1898 a letter from Mr. Gokhale, dated 7th January 1898, which concluded as follows:—

I have no doubt about the ultimate verdict on my conduct. The day will come when it will be generally recognized by my countrymen that this most unfortunate incident deserves to be thought of, as far as I am concerned, in sorrow, not in anger, and that under most trying circumstances I had taken the only course which was consistent with duty and honour. Meanwhile, I am content to wait.

The reference, of course, is to the unhappy incident which led Mr. Gokhale to withdraw and apologise for certain statements with regard to the plague operations in Poona when he was in England giving evidence before the Welby Commission on Indian expenditure. The statements related to the conduct of British Soldiers who were employed to evacuate compulsorily the inmates of infected houses in Poona. The persons who supplied Mr. Gokhale with the information, with the exception of Pandita Ramabai, refused to come forward to substantiate their allegations and Gokhale had no alternative in the circumstances except to withdraw and apologise for those allegations which had created a storm of indignation in England and in India. Mr. Gokhale's letter was evidently a long one as in the editorial comments it was mentioned that it had to be cut short to bring it within the limits of the space available in the Reformer. In the course of that comment which was a lengthy one extending to three paragraphs, I wrote:—

"That Mr. Gokhale was made to feel that an explanation was at all required from him for his conduct which, every honourable and honest man must admit, was the only honourable and honest course open to him, is another serious reflection on the character of those who took part or sympathised with the ill-mannered and silly demonstration with which, it is said, a proposal to include Mr. Gokhale among the speakers in the last Congress at Amraoti was met."

* Being Mr. K. Natarajan's address on Gokhale Anniversary Day (15 February, 1930) at the Deccan Sabha, Poona.

It was two years after this that I met Mr. Gokhale in Bombay for the first time. He spoke to me with warm feeling of this comment as a thing that he would never forget, of the Reformer having been the only journal which stood by him in his "dark hour of trial."

GOKHALE'S RELIGIOUS VIEWS.

In December 1899, I met Mr. Gokhale at the Lahore Congress over which Sir Narayan Chandavarkar presided. He was still brooding over the harsh treatment he had received at the hands of his fellow-countrymen and sat with me in the backbenches and told me that he would not speak even if he was invited as they had treated him so shabbily. The position continued to remain so strained particularly with his fellow-citizens of Poona that in 1902 Mr. Gokhale had made up his mind to shift his home to Bombay and was induced to alter his plans at the last moment by the pressure of friends who wished him to become the first non-official president of the Poona Municipality. This experience would seem to have turned Mr. Gokhale's thoughts in a most important direction. The professors of the Ferguson College had the reputation of being agnostics and Mr. Gokhale being one of them shared in it and Sir Valentine Chirol in his book "Indian Unrest" has thought fit to note it. I do not know whether the professors of that College still profess that creed. If they do so they must be really very tenacious of their views as agnosticism has disappeared from the rest of the world. Anyhow Mr. Gokhale's religious views were undergoing change. I find that in a letter dated 26th July 1902, Mr. Gokhale wrote:

"I wanted to write and tell you sometime ago that I read your article on Vivekananda with great pleasure. During my stay in Calcutta, I came to understand his aims and aspirations much better than before and you exactly expressed my feelings in your article."

Some years later when I happened to be in Calcutta Mr. Gokhale who was also there attending the Imperial Legislative Council, took me into his study one day where I found on his table a glass paper weight with an inscription in bold letters "God is Love." I could not help making some remark expressive of my surprise whereupon Gokhale quietly said that was what he had come to believe. A few days after Mr. Gokhale's death, meeting Sir Ramkrishna Bhandarkar at the University, I mentioned this incident to him. Sir Ramkrishna observed that he had heard from Mr. Justice Ranade that Gokhale's religious views were undergoing change and that a public declaration might be shortly expected. "But," he added regretfully, "that declaration never came."

MR. MADHAVA RAO AND THE SERVANTS OF INDIA.

An amusing incident happened during this time at Calcutta. Mr. V. P. Madhava Rao who had been Dewan of Travancore, Mysore and Baroda, had a few months before retired from the last named state and was looking out for some sphere of public usefulness in which he could utilise his vast administrative experience to the benefit of the country. The idea of joining the Servants of India Society had occurred to him and he had asked me to sound Mr. Gokhale about it. Gokhale seemed rather disinclined as Mr. Madhava Rao, he thought, was much too big a man to be fitted into the scheme of his Society which was then in its infancy. However, he made an appointment to call on the Dewan at Sir Vithaldas' house. Gokhale came at about 2 p.m. and a servant said that the Dewan was having his seista when Mr. Gokhale turned to me and said seriously that it was against the rules of the Society to sleep in the daytime. The Dewan turned up in a few minutes and I told him what Gokhale had said when Madhava Rao laughed and said that he was not sleeping but only lying down with his eyes closed and his servant thought he was asleep.

INTERMEDIARY BETWEEN GANDHI AND LORD HARDINGE.

The last personal experience which I might mention here was very shortly before Gokhale's death. Mr. Gokhale had asked me when he returned from South Africa to correspond with Gandhi on his behalf in connection with the fund which Mr. Jehangir Petit was collecting and of which the late Sir Hormasji Wadia was the chairman. One day, Sir Hormasji and I received a telegram from Gokhale to see him in Poona at once as he had had the previous day the first of the heart attacks to which he succumbed shortly after. We reached the Society's home at about noon and were immediately admitted to Gokhale's room where he was lying on a couch evidently exhausted. Gokhale at once sat up and insisted on himself reading to us, in spite of our protests, a large batch of telegrams and cables which had passed during the two or three days previous between Lord Hardinge who was then on a visit to Lucknow and Mr. Gokhale on the one hand and on the other between Mr. Gokhale and Mr. Gandhi in South Africa. Mr. Gandhi had refused to appear before the Commission and Lord Hardinge who had taken up a strong attitude in support of the Indian cause, was insistent that the Indians should appear before the Commission. The Viceroy's tone was unusually strong and I think he said he would wash his hands clean of the matter if Mr. Gandhi persisted in his attitude. Gokhale was evidently much distressed and we were with him for about four hours and we could see that the difficulty of mediating between these two personages was severely straining his fast failing health. That was the last I saw of Gokhale.

These are some of the incidents serious and trivial which come to mind when I think of Gokhale and which seem to me to give a true picture of the man as he appeared to one who had the privilege of his friendship till his death. A much more intimate view was presented to you by Sir Lalubhai Samaldas in laying the foundation stone of the Gokhale Hall which is rising near by, five years ago. I have read Sir Lalubhai's speech and I think that his impressions of Gokhale the Man coincide surprisingly with my own.

GOKHALE AND BRITISH OFFICIALS.

I may now give you one or two illustrations of the impression which Mr. Gokhale made on high English officials with whom he was thrown in contact. The first one is from Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson's "Letters to Nobody," Sir Guy was finance Member of the Government of India, 1908-1913, having been specially sent out from England. Writing of his first Budget experience in the Imperial Legislative Council he makes a striking reference to Mr. Gokhale, which perhaps many have not seen. It is as follows:—

It was a wonderful chance for the Indian members of the Legislative Council to upset an inexperienced Minister, and I anticipated a trying time of it in debate. The one man I frankly feared was Gokhale, the Gladstone of India.

Accordingly I endeavoured to find out what Gokhale's line of attack would be. All and everyone told me that the attempt would be futile, and that any apparent frankness on Gokhale's part would only be a cloak to his real intentions. So I left him severely alone.

Imagining my surprise at receiving on the eve of the debate a letter from Gokhale, whom I did not even know, to the effect that as he had good reason to believe that I meant to do my utmost for the good of India, he had no desire to embarrass me, and that therefore he sent me the notes of the speech he proposed to make so that I should not be taken unawares.

I do not believe that such a generous attitude has ever been assumed by the Leader of the opposition in any other country in the world.

Here is another from Lord Ronaldsday's "Life of Curzon" which testifies to the same innate chivalry of Mr. Gokhale:—

As President of the National Congress at Benares in 1905, Mr. G. K. Gokhale indulged in "a passionate and acrid onslaught" on Lord Curzon and all his works. But six months later when Lord Curzon himself lay stricken with the pain of a great affliction, Mr. Gokhale wrote to him that the heart of all India would go out to him in profound and reverent sorrow. And he spoke in touching terms of the inevitable loneliness of "such rare spirits as your Lordship who live for lofty ends and make a religion of all their work."

Most of us know Lord Morley's estimate of Gokhale, "a Mahratta Brahmin from Bombay immensely interesting." "He has a politician's head; appreciates executive responsibility; has made no secret of his ultimate hope and design—India to be on the footing of a self-governing colony. I equally made no secret of my conviction, that for many a day to come—long beyond the short span of time that may be left to us—this was a mere dream." In reading Lord Morley's references to Gokhale I made a surprising discovery, Lord Minto, while he was in India publicly referred to Mr. Gokhale in such terms as have seldom been employed by Viceroys on Indian public men but in private he was writing to Lord Morley in a different strain. "I rather smile at your warning," writes Lord Morley to Lord Minto, "not to take Gokhale and his letters to third persons too seriously or too literally." Lord Morley went on to say that having dealt with Parnell he knew how to deal with Gokhale and "others of the political breed." I have heard before in a vague way of high English officials making fun in private of Indians whom they profusely honoured in public but this dual attitude of a Viceroy who was known best before he came to India as a typical British sportsman came upon me as no doubt it will come upon you, with a shock. Indians too will do well to take Lord Minto's warning and not take the compliments of British Governors and Viceroys too seriously or too literally. But all this is past history though not without its implications for the present or the future.

MR. GOKHALE'S POLITICAL CREDO.

I now come to Mr. Gokhale's views on public questions which are naturally of more practical interest to us. Political and public life before Gokhale died was materially different from what they have since come to be. But the germs of nearly all the important subsequent developments had already begun to sprout and we are fortunate in having Mr. Gokhale's considered and almost prophetic pronouncements on nearly all of them. The first and most prominent though not necessarily the most serious question debated at the present day relates to the political goal of India—whether it should be Independence or Dominion Status. On that Mr. Gokhale has recorded his deliberate opinion in unmistakable terms. Speaking in Allahabad in February 1907 Mr. Gokhale said and the words are printed on the front page of Mr. Natesan's collection of Gokhale's speeches:

"I recognize no limits to my aspirations for our motherland. I want our people to be in their own country what other people are in theirs. I want our men and women, without distinction of caste or creed, to have opportunities to grow to the full height of their stature, unhampered by cramping and unnatural restrictions. I want India to take her proper place among the great nations of the world, politically, industrially, in religion, in literature, in science and in arts. I want all this and feel at the same time that the whole of this aspiration can, in its essence and its reality, be realized within this Empire." In some of Mr. Gokhale's later speeches he has closely argued out this question and I would specially refer you to the speech in which this passage occurs on "the Work before us" delivered at a public meeting in Allahabad at which it is interesting to note the Chair was taken by Pandit Motilal Nehru. I wish to stress this matter because I feel that the case for Dominion Status is not being presented to our young men and women in its fullest and truest form. It is too often represented as a matter of practical though unpleasant necessity and even as a temporary makeshift. The late Mr. C. R. Das who was far above the level of the carpet bag politician perceived the true spiritual superiority of the ideal of working out our destiny within the British Commonwealth of Nations. Gokhale too I think perceived it and I feel sure that if properly presented it will appeal to young minds by its power of idealism and attraction of disinterested service.

THE COMMUNAL QUESTION.

On the question of Hindu-Mahomedan relations Mr. Gokhale has likewise left behind for our guidance his method of solution. Mr. Gokhale visualised the problem as it should be done as relating not only to the Mahomedans but all important minority communities. There is a speech which he made at this very Deccan Sabha in Marathi in July 1909 on the Hindu-Mahomedan question and which is of great current importance. It is not necessary to make a long quotation here as Mr. Natesan's collection is easily available to the public. Mr. Gokhale was not against special separate electorates. He said on the other hand that he had all along been in favour of special separate electorates for important minorities but he wanted such electorates to provide not the whole of the representation to which the communities were entitled but only so much of it as was necessary to redress the deficiencies and inequalities of general elections; and he wanted the same treatment to be extended to other important minorities than Mahomedans where necessary. Mr. Gokhale mentioned in this speech that the Government of India's original proposals had been very much on these lines. This is confirmed by John Buchan in his "Lord Minto." "Minto," he writes, "desired to prevent the followers of Islam from becoming a rigid enclave divorced from the rest of Indian life." Both Gokhale and Mr. Buchan lay the blame for the scheme as it was actually adopted upon Lord Morley's ignorant meddling which conceded a point on which Morley would make no compromise. That was about excessive representation. Mr. Gokhale in his speech said:—

When anyone said that his community was important and should receive fair and adequate representation the claim was entitled to the sympathetic consideration of all. But when anyone urged that his community was specially important and should therefore receive representation in excess of its fair share, the undoubted and irresistible implication was that the other communities were comparatively inferior and should receive less than their fair share. That was a position to which naturally the other communities could not assent. British rule was based on equal treatment of all communities and the speaker trusted that the Government would never be so weak as to lean for support on any one community in particular.

Gokhale's trust was belied by the decision of Government but all the same it is impossible to deny the justice and equity of Gokhale's attitude. The decision in this matter changed the whole basis of British rule which, as Gokhale said, was the perfect equality of all subjects without distinction of caste or creed. It is worthy of note that it was only after Gokhale and Sir Pherozeshah Mehta, who was also stoutly opposed to excessive representation, passed away from the scene that the so-called Lucknow Pact accepting and endorsing the principle of excessive representation was framed at the instance, of all men, of the late Mr. Tilak! While on the subject I would call attention to diverse meanings attached to the word community in connection with constitutional reform. Applied to the Europeans it refers to race. Applied to Indian Christians it is a combination of race and religion. In the case of Anglo-Indians the test is neither race nor religion but the intermingling of two races, the result of which is the absence of racial identity. With Mahomedans the difference is pure religion. It seems to me that the only correct meaning of the word community is neither race nor religion but the existence of special marriage laws. In this sense which, I repeat is the only true sense, every Hindu caste and sub-caste is a community, and the Hindus as a whole are an aggregate of communal minorities some of them much smaller than even the Parsees. If each of these Hindu minorities claimed representation for itself the result would be extremely interesting and it would tax the ingenuity of the promoters of the All-Minorities Conference to be shortly convened at Delhi to satisfy their demands. I seriously suggest that the Hindu castes and sub-castes should apply to the Committee of the All-Minorities Conference just formed, to admit their representatives to the Conference. Someone described Socialism as a state of society in which everyone took every other's wishing. The protection of minorities on the plan of the All-Minorities Conference means excessive representation to minorities at the expense of every other.

THE DEPRESSED CLASSES AND THE INDIAN STATES.

Mr. Gokhale felt deeply about the position of the "depressed" classes and called upon the higher castes to adopt every means in their power to promote their education and facilitate their admission to honourable employment as the most important means of elevating them in the social scale. He would surely have sympathised with their claim for fair representation in the Legislative and other Councils. As regards Indian States, Mr. Gokhale's attitude was one of complete abstinence. This seems to have been the result not merely of constitutional considerations but also of Mr. Gokhale's personal temperament. He once told me that he had made it a rule not to set foot in any Indian State and this feeling was somewhat aggravated when a late Dewan of Mysore issued an order prohibiting Mr. Srinivas Sastri from making a speech at a public meeting in Bangalore. The Dewan made one or two attempts afterwards to meet Mr. Gokhale and explain his position but Mr. Gokhale I think, did not countenance them. Another occasion in which Gokhale acted similarly was one in which I was myself an intermediary. Mr. Lovat Fraser, perhaps the most brilliant English Journalist who ever came out to India, expressed to me when he retired from the Times of India a wish to see Mr. Gokhale. Fraser was a staunch supporter of the Curzon regime and had not spared Gokhale who was its most powerful critic. Fraser said to me "You know we are often ashamed to read in the morning what we dash off in the night" and that he would like to make up with Gokhale, for whom he had a sincere respect before he left India. I duly conveyed the message to Gokhale and his reply was characteristic. "I have no sort of dignity or sense of humiliation in approaching any Indian but as regards Englishmen," he said, "in the present circumstances of the country I must stand on my dignity. I will not call upon Mr. Lovat Fraser." The two men however met later in London and Gokhale told me that Fraser who was then influentially connected with the London Times and besides was in close touch with Lord Morley was extremely helpful to him in getting into touch with leading English publicists.

GOKHALE ON CONSTITUTIONAL AGITATION.

Mr. Gokhale visualised Indian Politics as the task of the educated classes who had on the one side the huge mass of ignorance and illiteracy of the people to redeem and on the other to obtain from an able and influential bureaucracy practical and substantial recognition of their right to direct the policies and shape the administration of the country. This is far from the idea of adult suffrage which has become a watch word during the last year or two. The sudden extension of the franchise in the Montague-Chelmsford Reforms and the thrusting of a phantom principle of responsibility to the Legislature are responsible for the general lowering of the calibre of public men and the standards of public life which are visible at the present day. Mr. Gokhale's ideas are clearly set forth in his address on "the Work before us" to which I have already referred. Gokhale laid down two essential conditions of constitutional agitation—the methods adopted should be legitimate and the changes desired should be obtained only through the action of constituted authorities by bringing to bear on them the pressure of public opinion. Three things were excluded—namely, rebellion, aiding or abetting a foreign invasion, and resort to crime. He went on to say: "Roughly speaking, barring these three things, all else was constitutional. No doubt everything that was constitutional was not necessarily wise or expedient but that was a different matter. Prayers and appeals to justice lay at one end. Passive resistance, including even its extreme form of non-payment of taxes till redress was obtained, lay at the other end." This is how Mr. Gokhale conceived constitutional agitation and I like to lay special emphasis on it as I fear that Liberal leaders now-a-days are not always in touch with the first principles of the constitutional creed. A distinguished Liberal leader only the other day spoke of the attitude of Liberals as a constitutional party in case Government took repressive measures "in self-defence." That phrase jarred on me at sight and on reflection I found the reason why it did. In the long ago when I played at being a law student, one of the few things that stuck in my head was that there can be no "act of State" as between a Government and its own subjects. The idea is that the state has no personality apart from its own subjects. When the Government of a state for the time being finds itself seriously differing from its subjects the constitutional theory is that it should give place to a more responsible Government and not that it should repress its subjects into acquiescence with its own policies. This seems to be an elementary principle which lies at the root of constitutionalism and the idea of Government doing anything in self-defence is totally incompatible with it.

THE LIBERALS' ROLE IN INDIAN POLITICS.

The scene comes vividly before my eyes of Gokhale with his arms protectingly circling Mr. Tilak's person from being hustled off the platform at the Surat Congress, when the persistence of the latter in holding up the proceedings, led to indignant demands to have him bodily removed from it. It was then that a Dakshini shoe, hustling over the heads of the pressmen, glanced at Sir Pherozshah's face. Whenever I think of the duty of Indian constitutionalists to extremists when they are subjected, it may be as a consequence of their opinions or even conduct, to a regime of repression, that scene at Surat comes to my mind. The Liberals if they are true to their names cannot tolerate any encroachment on the personal freedom of political propagandists so long as their propaganda does not include commission of or incitement to crime. Mr. Gokhale was very firm on this question and in one of his speeches in the Legislative Council he made a trenchant reply to Sir Harvey Adamson who had blamed the Liberals for not condemning the Extremists at public meetings. If you concede the right of self-defence to a Government, you cannot deny it to its people, and that, of course, means civil war. The immediate duty of the Liberals, to my mind, is to act as a reconciling influence between Government and the Gandhians, to exert their full influence on the former to hasten on with reforms and to bring pressure to bear on the latter to await the result of the Round Table Conference before launching into civil disobedience and other disruptive propaganda. Mr. Gandhi has virtually promised this in one of his articles in his Young India and however much we may differ from him, we cannot doubt that he will keep his word. Congressmen, after all, are nearer to the Liberals in spirit and aim, than the bureaucracy, and they would do well to bear in mind in dealing with Congressmen as political adversaries, that it will not be long, if their expectations materialise, before they will have to deal with them as political friends and colleagues in carrying on the great task of Indian Swaraj! If those expectations do not materialise—there will be an end to constitutional reform and reformers, and there is no need to forecast their future relations with the Independence school.

DIVORCE IN HINDUISM.

(By MR. BHAGAT RAM, FEROZPORE CANTONMENT.)

Hindu marriage is considered to be a sacrament in idea. But in practice, it is generally not so observed; for such a union can be put to an end at any time by the husband, but never by the wife. Thus the sacramental obligations whatever they are, are binding only upon the woman, while the husband remains free. Even educated men contract second marriages without the least compunction, deserting their first wives often on the flimsiest possible excuses, and without making any provision for the poor deserted or superseded wives and their children. Besides, the present Hindu law has nothing to say about unfaithfulness of the husband to his wife, even illicit relations with other women kept as prostitutes. In fact, only that can be a sacrament which binds equally both parties to the sacrament.

The result of such a partiality for men is that immediately upon marriage, the men more often than not abuse their powers and indulge in brutal behaviour towards their wives, well knowing that the wives (being entirely as they are at the mercy of men) can find little or no redress for such ill-treatment.

We often hear of cases where the wife has been shut inside a room as a prison during the hot season. We often see cases where parents of the girl have not been permitted to see her in the Sûsrâl. We are told of a case where the wife was compelled to sleep outside in the yard during a cold winter night without bedding. Similarly by other various means and neglect, men often make the discarded wives invalid or disfigured for life. The root of such persecution is often evil desire—desire for a new bride of fairer complexion, or desire for more dowry.

If the wife happens to be rather strong-willed, then other excuses are made for turning her out of the house. It may be that she has no children, or no son—only girl after girl. The husband and his relatives may complain that the parents at a certain time used abusive language, thus seeking any occasion for a quarrel. The result frequently is that after being stripped of her ornaments and most of her clothes, the poor wife is turned out to return to her parents, or shift as best she can. The case of gross cruelty recently brought to light by a correspondent in the Young India, as complaining of the heart-rending treatment his sister was receiving at the hands of her cruel-hearted husband is only one of the thousands of such instances of cruelty in Hinduism.

Thousands of Hindu women have been thus turned out by their callous-hearted husbands, and because of their poverty and helplessness cannot set up any claim by going to law for alimony. If by chance any was able to set up a claim by going to law for alimony then the Sûsrâlwâlas did not scruple to set afloat a rumour to the effect that

"this woman is of bad character, otherwise she had no business coming here to the Court against the husband—whether good, bad, or indifferent." Because of the disfavour of Hindu society at women appearing in courts, neighbour witnesses very rarely come forward to give evidence against men. Even the respectable neighbours who know the woman to be of good character and who could give evidence for her, often remain silent or say nothing except the usual remark—"She is his wife, it is none of our business to interfere."

Indian pleaders often take double fees from the woman, and then frequently do not give their hearts to such cases, feeling that somehow it is against their custom to work against the husband and for the wife. On the other hand, some unsolicited pleaders will be often found ready to help the man free of charge, simply for the good name of keeping up the absolute authority of a Hindu husband. In the face of such difficulties, it is no wonder that the woman finds it practically impossible to get justice for herself even from the law courts—especially where almost every person of an average Hindu mentality favours the man, and does not want the woman to bring such a case to the Court. Consequently even in cases in which the life of a Hindu wife is made intolerable by the brutality of the husband, and in which separation is the only remedy, she can hardly see any way of deliverance from the whirlpools of the Hindu Law.

Again think of those of the ill-treated, deserted and disappointed wives who seeing no where to go to, and being unable to make an honourable livelihood sometimes flood the houses of ill fame in the slums of cities. If these unfortunate women had the helping hand of divorce in intolerable cases, some of them could have entered anew into married life if they had so desired, and the others after securing divorce could have consecrated their lives to some noble cause of their interests.

While cases like these are found in every part of the country, still there arise priests and prophets who would flatter themselves by saying that everything is going smoothly. It may be all well for the sheltered people who are naturally not concerned about anything which does not immediately affect their own persons or property, and who being thus self-satisfied cannot picture to themselves the sorrows and sufferings of others. Hence they do not or may not often feel the necessity of this long-needed reform.

The husband having married a second wife may have deserted and neglected the first for a dozen years, the mutual affection or sympathy which was the cement of the union may have long ceased to exist, and both the parties may have also desired long for severance of the now nominal tie; but the moment the aggrieved, deserted woman tries to contract marriage with another Hindu, all the severity of the law comes forth upon her and her spouse with the criminal charge of adultery. To talk of Hindu marriage as a sacrament is like compromising with double standards of morality, and keeping innocent women from gaining justice which is their just right. May we then in all seriousness ask, wherein lies the superiority of the Hindu Marriage?

Would it not be a point of justice and superiority, if in order to save thousands of such helpless souls a qualified divorce on the authority of Rishi Narad be opened? It now remains for the humanitarians to come and show the way for relief from these afflictions. The result would be good. There will be greater respect for each other's feelings, and thus greater harmony between the two. Domestic quarrels would be stopped. Cruelty would be lessened. The number of such extreme cases of divorce is very likely to be far less than the present percentage of deserted wives in Hinddism.

We believe that a qualified divorce is necessary to end the inferior complexity as well as the legal subjection of Hindu women. None of the dire results which are today being conjured up by our opponents have occurred in our Brahmō sect where dissolution of marriage in urgent cases is already in vogue. We also believe that even those who are today opposed to this long-needed reform will live to bless it as the most effective and the surest remedy to stop the misery, suffering, groaning and weeping which is now going on here and there over the present situation.

PRESS AND INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS.

The following is an address delivered in Japanese at the 3rd Biennial Conference of the Institute of Pacific Relations by Dr. D. C. Wu, which we take from the Pacific Affairs :—

Nations are like individuals. To live a life all by one's self is impossible. This is especially true in these days of easy communication. Nations or countries formerly quite apart are now brought into close and constant contact and have to live like neighbors.

It needs scarcely be said that in these elbow-rubbing days, the well-being of one country depends in a large measure upon its relations with the surrounding countries. Indeed, the well-being of the whole world often hinges upon the relations of two particular countries.

We know from history that hitherto the relation among nations assumes one of two forms; peace or war. There has been no consistent policy. War might be declared upon one neighboring country and peace concluded with another. With reference to the same neighbouring country, war might be waged during one period, and peace concluded during another. The press, or indeed any other agent of publicity, has always been instrumental in bringing about either war or peace. The press, like the government under which it operated, had no consistent policy either.

But since 1918 the wind seems to have changed its direction. The Great War proved a lesson to the belligerent as well as non-belligerent countries. They were brought to see that modern warfare is no solution of international problems, not even a method of redressing a country's grievances, or a means for making up a country's losses sustained in other ways. Before the modern tribunal of Mars, justice is accorded to none, but penalty and punishment to all who participate. They were brought to see, therefore, that international disputes must be settled, if settled at all, through peaceful and amicable means. The Kellogg Anti-war Pact is nothing but the culmination of this slow and painful process of realization as to the futility of war, to say nothing of its destructiveness.

But the anti-war pact will forever remain a pact on paper, if no effort is made to render it a living reality in the hearts of men. So to make it will necessarily call for the service of popular education. And certainly of all organs of popular education, none is more effective and far-reaching than the press, particularly the newspaper press. Were it only possible that the newspapers of all countries devote a few paragraphs, or even a few lines, to the cultivation of what might be called the anti-war sentiment, war would become obsolete in one or two generations. Such a sentiment, like patriotism, needs to be cultivated and kept vital. Just to raise a hue-and-cry against the spectre of war when it is already imminent is not only quite useless, but may precipitate disaster all the sooner.

The newspapers can do many things for popular education. Comparative studies in culture, recent progress in science, are certainly rich fields in which to labour. But for the present, certainly no field deserves more attention than the one of international ethics. The spirit that is embodied in the Anti-War Pact must be perpetually kept alive, and made to permeate the thoughts and feelings of all men. News and discussions on international affairs will not be wanting, but they must be presented in such a way as to engender the sense of justice, the desire to understand and the feeling of sympathy. When a newspaper man will have become at the same time an educator, and truthfulness and a keen sense of justice an integral part of his professional ethics, the world will then be on the way to a better social order.

I for one would be willing to commit myself to the task of educating the Chinese people to a sense of international equity and justice, to a love of peace and of peaceful settlement of international disputes. Indeed, for about a decade past I have been largely engaged in the work of the Ta Kung Pao, (called in French L'Impartial) a daily newspaper in Tientsin, the Kuo Wen Weekly, and the Kuo Wen News Agency, all of which are well known to my compatriots in the audience. I sincerely hope that the press in this country will join us in this common enterprise of a new type of popular education.

A word more before I leave the platform. The Japanese and Chinese, both being Oriental peoples, are richly endowed with emotions. There is then the danger in the two peoples of letting these emotions play a much stronger role in our attitudes towards each other than our reason, whereas reason after all should be the supreme arbiter of our opinions, judgments and actions. And it is here that the press may contribute toward what I may call the rationalization of our emotions. I believe the duty of the journalists of the two countries lies in supplying to the public every morning or evening something that resembles a cold shower, a potion that cools our heads and makes us rational beings, but not heated draughts that intoxicate us and call forth the basest of human instincts. I believe I am not exaggerating if I say that the happiness of all the peoples lies in the hands of the pressmen.
